The Chairman: Almost imperceptible to the chair, shall I say. He proceeded to discuss capital gains as applied to individuals. It is quite true that this resolution deals only with gains and losses of the trustees under the plan, so that a discussion of capital gains other than that is not in order. Have we completed our discussion of paragraph 1?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Paragraph 2.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to ask the minister to define, if he will, what he means by "conventions" in paragraph 2. Are we to understand that any taxpayer who attends a convention has the right to deduct that from his income tax? For instance, if a farmer attends an agricultural convention, if a teacher attends a convention or if anybody else attends any convention which is part of his business, will he be allowed an exemption on this? Will the minister define what he means by "convention"?

Mr. Benidickson: Without anything overly direct or specific in the Income Tax Act, up until a court decision of 1955, taxpayers in business were allowed tax deductions with respect to expenses attending conventions under section 12, which refers to deductions of expenditures made in order to earn income. In 1955 a court decision held that, as the law was written, convention expense was not an expenditure necessary for the purpose of earning that income, and therefore the convention expenses of that taxpayer who appealed were disallowed.

It is proposed here to restore more or less the administrative practice that had been in existence prior to 1955, when that court decision was rendered. I draw to my hon. friends' attention the word "business". This would apply to a person who was attending a convention in connection with his profession or his business, and it was considered to provide benefit to him in earning his income.

Mr. Knowles: I must express amazement that this change has been brought in. The parliamentary assistant says that it is an attempt to restore the administrative practice, but it reminds me of a chapter in income tax history which, I am sure, is still in the memories of a good many who are here in the house.

A number of years ago there was general provision that the membership fees that certain people paid could be deducted for income tax purposes. Apparently it was intended by the government at that time that the deductibility of those membership fees should apply only in the case of persons who were on gross income, the kind of income that doctors and lawyers obtain by receiving fees and paying out certain expenses, in other words self-employed persons.

However, as hon. members recall, there were, once upon a time, a couple of trade unionists who sought the same deductibility for their trade union dues. They took their case right to the Exchequer Court of Canada, which ruled that, under the law as it formerly read, they were just as much entitled to that deductibility as were doctors and lawyers. The government, shortly after that, following the course of procedure to which the Minister of Finance referred a moment ago, brought in an amendment to the act to change it and make it clear that people on net salaries or wages would not have the privilege of deducting their dues to the organization with which they were connected.

So for a number of years we had the situation under which lawyers and doctors as professional people who received fees and were allowed to deduct expenses, were permitted to deduct their dues to the bar association or the medical society. On the other hand, during that same period, trade unionists on wages and school teachers on salaries were not permitted to deduct their membership dues to their trade unions or their teachers' associations. The same limitation, I may say, was imposed on any doctors or lawyers who were on staffs of various institutions and, consequently, on salaries.

Despite the fact that, to the income tax authorities and to the Minister of Finance at that time, this line of distinction seemed to have some sense, it did not have sense in the eyes of the general public. It certainly did not appeal to the trade unionists of this country, who were denied the right to deduct their trade union dues, whereas most doctors and lawyers were being allowed to deduct their dues to the bar association or the medical society. Consequently, as members will recall, a few years after the period to which I have been referring, and after many amendments and speeches from this part of the house, the government brought in at long last another amendment to the Income Tax Act permitting the deductibility of trade union dues and fees to other professional organizations to which people belong in connection with the work they do in earning their living. In other words, that story, which indeed had several chapters, finally came out more or less all right. There is one qualification with which I could deal on some other occasion, but it came out more or less all right, in that a result was achieved whereby all these people —doctors, lawyers, trade unionists, teachers and professional people—seemed to be put on the same basis. They were all—and they still are all—permitted to deduct their membership dues to the bar association, the medical association, teachers' societies, trade unions, or what have you.

I think the government learned a good lesson from the debates that took place on that issue, and the government did well eventually to come out where it should have come out on the matter, but now we are starting all over again. Now a proposal is being made which, though the distinction, as set out in the resolution and as underlined by the parliamentary assistant, may seem clear to the government, nevertheless will again create a sense of discrimination.

Again we are going to have the situation that certain people in the country will be able to attend conventions, two of them a year, and be allowed to deduct their expenses from their taxable income. But, in order to qualify for that right to deduct these convention expenses, you will have to be the kind of person who receives gross income, again like doctors and lawyers, against which you are permitted to charge the expenses that you incur in connection with earning that income. In other words, you will have to be self-employed. In the case of the teacher, as my hon. friend from Bow River used to be, or in the case of trade unionists who work for wages, they will not be allowed this right to deduct expenses of attending conventions.

I want to be perfectly fair about this and admit that there is a difference with respect to conventions, one that did not apply with respect to membership dues and fees. As far as membership dues and fees are concerned, they are paid by the individual himself in practically all cases. When it comes to conventions—let me refer to medical and bar conventions on the one hand and trade union conventions on the other—I recognize that in the case of medical conventions, such as my hon. friend who sits at my right may attend, undoubtedly he will pay his own expenses, and those, therefore, will be expenses that he incurs out of his own pocket in connection with the earning of his livelihood as a doctor. I recognize that in the case of most trade unionists who go to conventions their expenses are paid for them by the union they represent, although there are some exceptions to this general rule. Nevertheless, these same trade unionists will see, in addition to the same discrimination that applied before cropping up again, that the justification for convention expenses being allowed as deductible is that those expenses relate to the business of the taxpayer. To the average wage earner this paragraph means that the expenses that are recognized are those that relate to the earning of a livelihood by a doctor or a lawyer. That raises in the minds of the average wage earner the question that he has been asking for many years. Why can he not get a deduction for some of the expenses he has to incur directly in connection with earning his livelihood?

That raises the whole question of the special tools that some workers have to purchase. It raises the question of the special clothing that workers in some industries have to buy. It raises the question of special expense in connection with travelling great distances to places of employment. All of these requests that have been made from time to time to the government on behalf of workers are made under the general thought that money that you expend in order to earn your livelihood should be allowed as a deductible item. I think of the position of married women who go out to work and find it necessary—

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order, similar to the point of order which the hon. member raised against me a short time ago, are we not considering now only expenses which may be deducted for attending conventions and not the type of clothing that people may wear in the occupation they pursue or anything else along that line? Therefore the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is out of order.

Mr. Knowles: I do not blame the hon. member for trying to get back at me but he had better wait until he has a much better case than he has now.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I ask you if my point of order is not well taken.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, I submit—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member does not need to justify his position. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is perfectly in order in outlining an analogous and comparative case. I have been sitting here attempting to listen to him very carefully and prepared to call his attention to the fact when I thought that he was arguing the merits of the analogous case and not the merits of the resolution before us, but I do not think he has reached that stage.

Mr. Harkness: Still on the point of order, I see there is a different chairman in the chair. As I was doing the same thing and was ruled out of order, may I now come back to my original point?

The Deputy Chairman: For the benefit of the record, I think that perhaps it might be stated here that I heard the ruling made by the previous chairman. I think that he and I are endeavouring to follow the same line of reasoning. I feel he would have come to the same conclusion as I have at the moment just as I would have come to the same conclusion that he did at the time he considered it necessary to interject. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will continue. Of course, any member has the right at any time to raise a point of order. I, unfortunately for me, have the responsibility of deciding them.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the analysis you have made of the argument I was trying to make and, if I may say so, your analysis was perfectly correct. By making these other references I am trying to persuade the government that it should do either one of two things. Either it should not go ahead with the proposal in paragraph 2 or it should broaden what it proposes to do in paragraph 2 and allow all people deductibility for moneys that they expend in relation to the earning of their livelihood. If I may complete what I was saying, I was referring to one more example when I was interrupted by my good friend, the hon. member for Calgary North. I was referring to the case of married women who go out to work, find it necessary to hire someone in the home and feel that the money they spend on that is just as much an expense in relation to earning their income as is the money that a doctor or lawyer spends in going to a convention. I see that you are shaking your head, Mr. Chairman. I do not know whether you disagree with my argument or whether you think that I have strayed too far. At any rate, I will not go any further. I think I have made my point.

In fact, I must say that I was thinking of this the other day when the Minister of Finance laid down the dictum that it is not a good idea to introduce too many exemptions in the income tax law. He said that every time you introduce an exemption you have a clamour for some other exemption and this thing goes on and on. Now in paragraph

2 of this resolution, he is doing the very thing that he argued against when he was speaking the other day. I feel that the government appears, by its decision in respect of this matter, not to have learned its lesson from its long experience with relation to doctors' and lawyers' fees to their societies on the one hand and the dues of trade unionists, teachers and other professional people on the other hand.

I realize that the hon. member for Bow River was hopeful that this resolution meant that people who attend the kind of conventions that he goes to would get deductibility for those expenses. I think he now knows that is not the case and that this is limited simply to people like doctors and lawyers who make their income in a particular way and that is not one of those general exemptions for convention expenses as people might have thought it to be. In my view the government should reconsider its position with respect to this proposition. Either it has gone too far or it has not gone far enough.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the wording of this part of the resolution I submit that it was ill thought out when it was drafted. I refer to that part of paragraph 2 reading:

> . . . a deduction shall be allowed for expenses of attending in Canada not more than two conventions annually . . .

And so on. Since this session started we have heard on numerous occasions from members on all sides of the house about the shortage of engineers and scientists in the western world compared with the Soviet union and her related countries. We have not only heard about it in the house but we have heard about it from the Department of Labour in the committee on estimates. We heard about it the other day from Mr. Cavell in the committee on external affairs. We have also read about it in magazines and all sorts of authoritative publications.

I think there is little doubt that the countries of the western world, nations such as the United States, Canada, Great Britain and so on, are desperately short at the present time of needed trained scientists and engineers compared with the Soviet union. In fact, in this country in particular we are very short indeed. We only had to listen to the evidence in the external affairs committee the other day to emphasize that point.

It is quite impossible to produce a great number of highly trained scientists and engineers in a few days, but what we can do is to try to assist the scientists, engineers and doctors that we have in our country at the present time to enlarge their knowledge in their own fields. One of the very good ways of doing so is to allow them to attend conventions of scientists, doctors and engineers in other countries such as the United States, the European countries and so on. I think it is quite ridiculous that they should be limited to attending conventions in Canada. I am sure that whoever drafted the resolution did not think about it very much because I point out, as I have already said, that if you cannot get more of these people you can at least improve the quality of the ones you have, and the best way to do that is by an exchange of ideas with scientists, doctors and engineers of other countries. I hope that the minister will reconsider this paragraph of the income tax resolution and make some changes.

Mr. Thomas: I should like to ask the minister to be a little more specific on the point raised by the hon. member for Bow River and to ask him whether or not under the terms of this amendment a farmer would be considered a businessman and would be allowed to deduct his convention expenses incurred while attending a farm union convention.

Mr. Benidickson: That farmer would be so entitled, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Monteith: The hon. member for Oxford covered I think what should be changed in this section. However, I should like to point out that any businessman in Canada can have his expenses paid to go to the United States or to go to Europe on business. Why should not the same consideration be accorded to a professional man who is also laying out money to increase his earned income on which he is going to pay taxes?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I agree with remarks made by the hon. member for Oxford and the hon. member for Perth but I should like to go a little bit further. With regard to this clause 2, I think the minister has said that this provision relates to business or profession. I think that he should be a little bit more definite on that point. It actually does say "business"; and in a good many persons' minds there is a distinction between a person engaged in a business and one engaged in a profession. In the minds of a good many of the assessors in the income tax branches throughout the country, I know that what appears on the book is law and what does not appear there is something they find extremely hard to interpret. With that consideration in mind, I would think that the minister might be a little bit more explicit in this regard and broaden the field to business and professions. I also think that he might drop from this section 2 the words "in Canada". Such action would meet the objections which have been raised with regard to conventions which are held elsewhere than in this country.

Since the chairman has permitted the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to explore the field of allowable deductions, I might say that I have some sympathy for the views which he has expressed, particularly with regard to deductions allowed to married women who are working. I have particular sympathy for them because I have had personal experience with that particular phase over many years and have been in the unenviable position—as have a great many other working women in the country—of having the statutory exemption reduced from $2,000 to $1,000 and then having to expend in addition the amount that was laid out to secure the services of a person to do the work which a housewife would ordinarily have done in her own home and for which there was no basis for deduction under the Income Tax Act. I have long felt that it was a grave injustice because it is a fact that most of the women who work outside their own homes do not do so from choice; they do so from necessity. Consequently it is a great hardship for them that they should be forced to expend money for the hiring of household help in order that they may augment the family income and that they or their husbands at the same time are penalized by being placed on single status in so far as statutory exemption is concerned.

In considering this point and in view of the point which was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I feel strongly that consideration should definitely be given to the situation which exists in Canada today and that the statutory exemption for married persons should be allowed to the spouse who is the recognized breadwinner for the family and that the statutory exemption for single persons should be allowed to the other partner in that marriage if he or she should likewise be earning an income outside the family. If you are not going to allow these exemptions on that basis, then definitely the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre becomes pertinent, and the expenses which are laid out by the person who is forced to seek some sort of earning capacity outside the home should be allowed as an expense.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made a good argument but there are two or three points I should like to raise. First of all, I note that this amendment includes the year 1955. It would appear to me that that is an unnecessary provision to make. We are now well into May of 1956. A citizen who incurred expenses in 1955 in connection with attending conventions had no indication then that he would get any such provision made. It is now past the time when income tax returns can be filed. Since this deduction is not allowed now, it would seem to me that it is unfortunate to have that provision in legislation we are discussing at this stage.

I wonder whether the minister or his parliamentary assistant could estimate what this change is going to cost the treasury? Some estimate must have been made before this change was brought in. I think we should have some information about that matter. I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant could give an indication of the situation with regard to what now is considered to be an extremely important item in connection with these conventions? I do not attend conventions of this sort myself but when I go to the Chateau Laurier and see the conventions that are held there nearly every day I find that the liquor bill that somebody must pay must be terrific. I wonder whether this provision has been made so the taxpayers of Canada will be asked to foot the liquor bill that seems to be so important in connection with most conventions that are now held?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder whether the minister can tell us what the cost to the treasury will be and whether this amendment is providing that the liquor expenses that are involved will be included?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this has been a deduction, as I say, that has been allowed for some considerable number of years. It was interrupted in 1955 by a court decision. It is not unusual to restore by new law what has been administrative practice. As it was a deduction under a general section of expense in connection with the earnings of income, we would have no statistics of the actual total sums deducted in this category alone. I can assure my hon. friend that vouchers and receipts in detail indicating the nature of the expenses for conventions are required by the officials in the Department of National Revenue examining the tax returns; and he can be sure that certain items such as those to which he referred would be disallowed.

Mr. Rowe: You should not charge for your liquor anyway; pay for it yourself.

Mr. Herridge: I wish briefly to support the excellent argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If we allow for a very few people in Canada these expenses for travelling in connection with attending two conventions a year, I think we should allow other even more legitimate expenses.

I refer again to a matter I have raised on five occasions during the last five years and that is the abnormal travelling expenses of industrial workers who, because of the circumstances under which they work, must live 15 to 35 miles away from their place of occupation. I could never see why a traveller could charge up his expenses for selling bubble gum, no matter how far he travelled, while an industrial worker was not allowed exemption for abnormal expenses. I am not suggesting anything like 10, 15 or 25 cents. I am thinking of some of the workers of consolidated mining and smelting company who pay all the way from $15 to $35 a month in abnormal travelling expenses because they have to live long distances away from the plant in order to acquire living accommodation.

Before I sit down, and I think I am in order —in fact I am always in order—I want to deal with another matter which is really the inverse of what I have been talking about. We have a lot of volunteer fire departments in British Columbia. These volunteer firemen are allowed a little money for travelling to and from their homes when fires occur. This is added to their income, and in some cases these volunteer firemen who risk their lives in fighting fires are put into a higher income tax bracket and have to pay a higher tax. This has been brought to the attention of the minister on numerous occasions and I think it is unfair. There should be some consideration given to these men who render a community service by fighting fires in the communities in which they live.

Mr. Monteith: I wonder if the parliamentary assistant or the minister could give me an answer to my previous query as to why a businessman or a government member on the front benches who wants to go to the United States will be allowed his expenses on a business trip when he is going to earn income on which he is going to pay taxes. Why should not a professional man be allowed to go to at least one convention in the United States or Europe or wherever it may be?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend has a background, I think, as an auditor and I am quite sure he would never indicate to a businessman client that he would be able to deduct travelling expenses abroad unless he could relate those expenses very directly to the matter of earning profits or income in that business.

Mr. Monteith: Quite right, but would not attending conventions improve a doctor's or a lawyer's qualifications, and as a consequence make him better able to earn income, more income?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to follow up what the hon. member for Kootenay West said just now about some of the workers in his constituency. In the lower coast areas of British Columbia there has been a development in recent years in the logging industry whereby some of the major corporations are now abandoning residential camps. This has resulted in most of the workers having to travel, in some instances up to 25 or 30 miles a day. In some cases the corporations for which they work provide transportation for which the corporations make a charge. In other instances the men have to provide their own transportation and bear the cost of running a car. It does seem to me they should be put on all fours with a businessman who makes deductions for necessary and legitimate expenses incurred in the course of earning his livelihood.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to add something to the remarks I have already made. I am rather surprised that neither the minister nor his parliamentary assistant has attempted to give some attention to the remarks that have been made by me and the hon. member for Perth as well as the hon. member for Hamilton West. Now, it is a matter of allowing scientists, engineers and doctors to go to conventions in other parts of the world, be it the western world or even behind the iron curtain, to acquire certain knowledge. This goes beyond the matter of earning income because presently it is a matter of acute national importance to every country in the western world that scientific knowledge be allowed to spread. I should like to hear what the minister or the parliamentary assistant has to say about removing the two words "in Canada" in this paragraph, even if it is only in so far as scientists, engineers or doctors are concerned.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Before the parliamentary assistant answers, I do not want to adopt the attitude of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that if I cannot have it nobody else should have it. In this case I should like to make a special plea for the medical profession. I think that in my profession we can probably get along without attending the bar convention in Washington or London and still make a very good living. On the other hand, I do not believe the medical profession recognizes any international boundary. The work they are doing will certainly be improved if they are allowed free communication from one end of this world to the other.

I do have a great number of friends in that profession and they tell me that some of the most important conventions they have—perhaps the Minister of National Revenue, who is looking at me, can confirm this—take place in various parts of the world. It would certainly improve the practice of their profession if they were able to attend these conventions and gain the knowledge which is being produced in other parts of the world. I should like, therefore, to make a special plea on behalf of that profession. If the parliamentary assistant is at all inclined to make any type of revision in this piece of legislation before it is brought into the house I certainly believe some thought should be given to the position of the medical profession so that expenses of attending conventions in various parts of the world may be deductible. I say to him it is easy to ask for reasonable proof of the attendance at these conventions, whether they be in Canada or outside, under the practice we have at the present time. I am sure the department could ensure that if anyone is asking for a deduction of that kind he actually did attend such a meeting. If we are going to go forward in the practice of medicine, then I think we should make every effort to assist these people to improve their own position in the country.

Mr. McCann: I am glad to hear a champion of the medical profession, although I cannot agree with him. I may say that it is exemptions that are the curse of the national revenue department on its administrative side. It was because of abuse by the members of some professions that it was necessary to put in a law restricting the deductible expenses to those connected with attendance at conventions in Canada.

Now, the very case that brought this about concerned a man of my own profession. In order to give himself and his wife a holiday, he took a trip to Europe. It is true that when he was there he did attend a meeting of the profession and he called that a convention. The department found it necessary to disallow these expenses and he appealed to the income tax appeal board. The income tax appeal board threw out the case and commented to the effect that they thought all these exemptions were irregular. It is on that account that this section is put in, to regularize what had been the practice for a number of years and which we regarded as within the law. By this section this will become regular and professional groups may claim as an offset to their income the cost of attending two conventions a year in our own country.

I can well understand that it might work hardship on some people in any of the professions. For instance, a man is practising down in the Niagara peninsula. There may be a convention in Buffalo. Costs are not very high, but just the same under the law—the law has to be regular—he cannot claim a deduction there but he can claim a deduction for attending a convention in the city of Vancouver or in Montreal. Therefore, I state again that it is all these exemptions that make so much difficulty in the transaction of business. I say, furthermore, that professional men who can go to Europe and attend a convention are probably men who are making big fees, and they can well afford to pay their own expenses rather than have you and me and the other taxpayers pay, because that is what we are doing. We want to collect X dollars in a year, and if we are collecting them from 4 million people they will work out at a figure, but if we are giving all kinds of exemptions to certain taxpayers, then the same number of taxpayers have to make up that amount and that is one of the reasons why taxes in Canada are as high as they are. If there were no exemptions and if there were a uniform rate the tax rate in Canada would be lower.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has provoked a lot of discussion there.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the remarks just made by the Minister of National Revenue and in his reference to an appeal before the income tax appeal board. I have a reference to such a case that I intend to bring out in a moment or two. At the outset I should like to make it clear, however, that I wish to support the remarks made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with respect to a question that is brought forward by this resolution. My position, like his, is that in the circumstances the proposal here advanced is not expedient, as the resolution suggests, as long as it is going to be a narrow class piece of exemption. It is going to leave out of its provisions a vast majority of the people of Canada. I might perhaps remind you, Mr. Chairman, and through you the minister, that this very point is not a new one for me to rise on. During the last few sessions I know that I have participated in several discussions along the same lines. While the resolution does say, among other things, that it is expedient to do this, there has been no indication on the part of the government that among those other things there is going to be the removal of certain other very discriminatory sections in the application of exemptions in our income tax law. I could very easily go along with the position taken by the Minister of National Revenue in so far as one can agree that what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. But nevertheless the fact remains that the government of which he is a member is bringing in this restrictive form of exemption in regard to conventions, and that the same situation in respect of people whose incomes are earned through wages and salaries is going to apply in this case as applies in certain other examples, one of which was mentioned by my colleagues, the hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Nanaimo in regard to the deduction of expenses of workers.

I have in my hand a copy of the judgment contained in tax appeal board cases, volume 10, 1954. It is the case of John Leonard McLeavy v. the Minister of National Revenue, which was heard before W. S. Fisher, Q.C., on February 19, 1954. This document states that:

> The appellant, an aircraft maintenance engineer, . . . was required by the terms of his employment to supply his own small tools.

He claimed a deduction under section 11 (10) (c) of the 1948 Income Tax Act. The minister disallowed the deduction on the ground that the appellant's income was from salary and as such could not be reduced by any deductions other than those specified in section 5. The finding makes it clear that the judge was quite sympathetic to the position in which this aircraft maintenance engineer found himself because at one point he does say:

> Indeed it would appear that the appellant's claim was a reasonable one in the circumstances.

He goes on to make it clear that the only reason he is disallowing the appeal is that of the existing terms of the Income Tax Act. As he points out in the finding:

> The appellant's income is obtained as an employee and his salary, as such, comes within the provisions of section 5 of the 1948 Income Tax Act under which income from an employment may not be reduced by any deductions other than those specifically provided for in the said act. There is no provision in the act, so far as I can discover, under which the appellant, as an employee, could obtain a deduction in respect of depreciation on the small tools owned by him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under the proposal which the government is here advancing in this resolution the discriminatory features of the Income Tax Act are going to be extended that much farther. I would suggest that unless the minister is prepared to indicate that he will bring in some modification of the act to remove this discrimination against people whose incomes are from wages or salaries so that such people can claim expenses incurred in the matter of earning a livelihood on the same basis as professional people, then I suggest this resolution is not one which should receive the support of this committee.

I know that this is a matter about which there is widespread and growing concern among the organized workers of Canada. I know from my own knowledge of the organized workers of British Columbia that they are becoming increasingly concerned over this discrimination. The particular case to which I have made reference arose I believe from a worker who was employed in the city of Saskatoon. I would suggest to the minister that if he is going to bring in recommendations such as this, allowing deductions of expenses for such things as conventions, he should give serious consideration to a suitable amendment to the act which will put the wage and salary earners of Canada on the same footing as professional or other people as far as deductions of the same type of expenses are concerned.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, the stony countenances of the minister and his parliamentary assistant do not give much encouragement to making requests. I have, however, a very small request to make and I might say I hope I am supported by the Minister of National Revenue. I do want to raise one question about terminology. I have heard nothing said by the minister or his assistant to indicate that the word "business" was to have any unusual connotation. I am assuming that it does not, nor is it intended to include "professional". Now, if I am right in that, then I think it certainly does raise a very serious question. I would think, for example, it is much more important for a doctor to be able to attend a convention than for an ordinary businessman. Quite frankly I am not greatly impressed with the need for an ordinary businessman to attend a convention, but for a doctor who is engaged in a scientific profession I can greatly appreciate the need for his attending. I therefore suggest that we must be clear as to what this word "business" means.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, could I explain to my hon. friend? The interpretation section of the Income Tax Act and in particular section 139 (1) (e) defines "business" and says it includes a profession, calling, trade, manufacture or undertaking of any kind whatsoever, and so on. It is spelled out in the interpretation section.

Mr. Rowe: What about a farmer?

Mr. Benidickson: It is there.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then I come to my second point. I suggest that the minister might look at the words "in Canada". I suggest it might be extended to include Canada or the United States for the reason that it should not necessarily mean any greater expense and it might have a tremendous balance of convenience. Take for example a doctor living in Vancouver with an important scientific convention he wishes to attend being held, let us say, in Seattle and another one being held the same year in Montreal. Obviously there is a balance of convenience that he should be able to go to the one in Seattle, and therefore I do suggest that the words "in Canada" might be extended to read "in Canada and the United States". It should not cost any more, and to me it would be facing much more realistically the facts of the situation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the parliamentary assistant, if I understand the matter correctly, should have said a little more when he was saying that a business by the interpretation of the act included a professional person. Does it not also depend on whether that person is in the self-employed group or on wages or salary?

If I understand it correctly a doctor who is a self-employed person, who collects fees from his patients and pays out office rent and secretarial help and so on will be able to deduct the money he spends out of his pocket to go to a convention. On the other hand a medical doctor on the staff of one of our great institutions who is on salary from that institution would not be entitled to deduct the money he might pay out of his pocket to go to an important medical convention.

Mr. McCann: It is often paid by his employer or should be included in his salary.

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Mr. Knowles: I recognize that that happens in some instances but my point still holds that if he were to pay his expenses out of his own pocket he would not be able to deduct them from his own taxable income and the Minister of National Revenue is saying yes to that which means that it is not a sufficient answer just to say that a business includes a profession. The real distinction is not whether you call yourself a business person or a professional person. The real distinction is the nature of your income, whether it is from self-employment or whether you are on salary or wages.

In that connection, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that here within the group which it is supposed is getting this deductibility there is an element of discrimination. I am not concerned about the charge the hon. member for York West made against me when I complained that some were not getting this and others were. After all, that is the argument we are always making when we ask for equity in tax matters. But even within the group of doctors themselves the fact is there are some doctors, those who are self-employed, who are getting this deductibility and there are other doctors on the staffs of our great institutions—as a matter of fact, I have some doctors and some institutions in mind—who gain just as much medically and professionally and for the good of the country by going to these conventions but will not get this deductibility. In my view those hon. members, who tonight have said that this matter has not been thought through sufficiently by those who have presented it to us have been quite correct.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I have to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think anyone who has ever been involved in municipal affairs realizes that very often because it involves the expenditure of public funds municipalities do not pay the expenses of their professional people who attend conventions where the professional person acquires considerable knowledge and from where he brings back to his job the advantage of the knowledge acquired.

That is not the reason I have risen at this time. I would like to ask the minister a question. I was somewhat intrigued by the case put forward by the Minister of National Revenue with respect to who should and who should not be permitted to deduct expenses for attending conventions, and from long years of experience in attending conventions, mostly at my own expense, I do know that there is a vast difference between the representation at those conventions by individuals and the attendance by employees of large corporations.

What I want to ask the Minister of Finance is this. Does the word "taxpayer" mean corporation? If that is true, when the minister interprets this clause and says that expenses shall be allowed for not more than two conventions, does he mean for one person to attend two conventions or does he mean that a corporation may send up to 25 people to a convention and still deduct the expenses of plush suites and liquor and all the things that go toward entertaining clients—

Mr. Knowles: Ellen, where have you been?

Mr. Rowe: Speak for yourself!

Mrs. Fairclough: —at these conventions.

Mr. Rowe: C.C.F. conventions!

Mrs. Fairclough: As a person who has suffered considerably on my own account and on account of clients by having had tax returns revised by reason of conventions and other things, I might say that it has always irked me somewhat to have my clients penalized if they happened to be proprietors or professional people operating on their own account and to know full well that large corporations were deducting precisely the same expenses manifold and getting away with it all the way down the line. As a matter of fact, under the act it is quite all right—

Mr. Knowles: It is all behind the veil of secrecy, too.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think it is necessarily behind the veil of secrecy.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is ten o'clock. Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with the income tax resolution, the customs tariff resolution and the bill in committee of the whole with respect to the branch line of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the minister when he expects to take the excise tax resolution?

Mr. Harris: After we have made more progress than we have tonight, sir.

Mr. Knowles: That is a cheerless note on which to end.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CIVIL AND ARMED SERVICES—SCHOOL TEACHERS

Question No. 426—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How many former school teachers are serving in the dominion civil service?
2. How many from each province?
3. How many former school teachers are serving in Canadian armed forces?

Answer by: Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State):

1. Information as to the number of former school teachers now employed in the civil service is not available from the records of the civil service commission.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. 770.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 9, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SIMILARITY OF GOVERNMENT NOTICE OF MOTION IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS" TO RESOLUTION ON ORDER PAPER

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish to point out that in Votes and Proceedings for today there is a notice of motion standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce returnable on Thursday next which in its main purpose has precisely the same purpose as a motion already before the house standing as order No. 13, which motion is already in the possession of the house and has been debated. As Your Honour will see, the first part of the motion, dealing with the main substance of the motion that is already before the house, is precisely the same except for minor verbal variations as the opening part of the notice now in Votes and Proceedings.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that an order cannot be placed on the order paper in this way in substitution for an order already there, nor can there be duplicating motions by the government in regard to the same subject. I submit that this is not in any way affected by the fact that there is additional material in the notice now before us. The effect of that would simply be to provide for an amendment of the motion already being debated by the house. I think it is clear that an amendment may not be made in this way. I think it is very clear that as far as proceedings are concerned nothing can be done by indirection which cannot be done directly. I think there is no question about the fact that this procedure would be ineffective, and I therefore submit to Your Honour that the notice now appearing in Votes and Proceedings should not proceed to the order paper tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) speaks, may I ask the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) if he has any authorities to cite which might be applicable to his point?

Mr. Drew: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The effect of this is perfectly clear. Beauchesne's third edition at page 138, rule 351, with the quotations which it gives, simply states this:

> No member may amend his own motion, but with leave of the house he may withdraw it and substitute another.

That is a statement which I submit is directly in point on the question at issue here. Then at page 854 of Beauchesne's third edition there is the reference to Bourinot which was made in connection with an issue that came before the house on March 26, 1928, when, in the discussion, the words were quoted which I would quote here:

> "A motion on the order paper must be in accordance with the notice of the votes; and, should a member desire to substitute another, or alter its terms, he must first obtain the leave of the house."

Mr. Fulton: In addition, may I refer Your Honour to Beauchesne's second edition, citation 387.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I support those who have already asked Your Honour to rule as to whether or not the notice of motion filed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) should be permitted to reach the order paper. I might point out, first of all, that Your Honour is required to deal with a matter of this kind under the terms of standing order 50 which reads as follows:

> 50. Whenever Mr. Speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the house is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the house thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the standing order or authority applicable to the case.

I would draw Your Honour's attention to certain citations in addition to those that have been referred to by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). In particular I would ask you to look at citation 325 in Beauchesne's third edition which reads as follows:

> A motion or amendment cannot be brought forward which is the same in substance as a question which has already been decided . . .

I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that this house has, by a decision of the house, already referred to the committee of the whole a resolution dealing with the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. In other words, the house will be asked—if the present notice of motion reaches the order paper tomorrow—to take another decision similar to one that has already been taken. That is the point which the Leader of the Opposition made. I am merely buttressing it by reference to citation 325.

I also remind Your Honour that on Monday of this week one of the reasons that Your Honour gave for denying the motion for adjournment under standing order 26 which my leader moved on that occasion was that it anticipated a subject in connection with which a resolution was already on the order paper and which the house had already appointed for debate.

I would also remind Your Honour that on other occasions in this session and in other sessions you, sir, have produced an abundance of citations and authorities to indicate that there cannot be two debates on the same subject before the house at the same time. There is already before the house a debate on a resolution with regard to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. Now we have proposed for the order paper another resolution which is in part the very same as the one that is already before us.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a new issue to arise in parliament. There have been previous occasions when the government, after placing a notice of motion preceding a money bill on the order paper, has found it desirable to make a change in the terms of that motion. I have not had time since I received my copy of Votes and Proceedings only a short while ago to do all the homework I should like to do, but I have found at least one such case. It occurred in 1945. Your Honour is smiling and I think that means you have been doing your homework, too. On that occasion—I notice Your Honour now shakes his head. On that occasion Mr. Ilsley, who was then minister of finance, had introduced a resolution forecasting a bill to amend the National Housing Act. The resolution was ordered referred to the committee of the whole house on October 9, 1945.

Later, it was decided by the government that the terms of the resolution, and accordingly the terms of the bill to be based thereon, should be extended. The government did not do on that occasion what I contend it is improperly trying to do now, put on another resolution saying the same thing as the first one but adding some words. Rather Mr. Ilsley, who is now a learned justice of one of the superior courts of this country, introduced another notice of motion which was to the effect that the resolution of October 9, 1945, be amended by adding thereto certain additional words. Subsequently this resolution was referred to the committee of the whole house. It was passed by the committee of the whole house as had been the previous resolution and accordingly a bill based upon the composite resolution was introduced.

It is in my mind that there have been other such occasions. I believe Mr. Ilsley was the mover of another bill in which the same procedure was followed. It is also in my mind that there have been bills dealing with veterans legislation where changes have been decided upon after the legislation was before the house; in some instances perhaps as a result of a recommendation of a special committee on veterans affairs, and as a result of that decision to change the bill a subsequent amending resolution has been presented to the house. I confess that with regard to these instances I am relying on my memory, not yet having had time to locate them in the records, but I think the records will confirm my memory.

Mr. Brooks: Your memory is correct.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Royal is confirming my memory. The point is that in the past the government has, whether on its own initiative or because of debate in the house, before extending the terms of a resolution already presented to the house, followed the proper procedure of introducing an amending resolution amending that which was already on the order paper.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is the proper procedure and accordingly it is my contention, along with that of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), that the present procedure is highly improper. Frankly, I do not see how Your Honour could contemplate allowing debate on a resolution such as that which is now on Votes and Proceedings but not yet on the order paper, in the light of the fact that the house is already engaged in a debate on the previous resolution on the same subject. Your Honour has drawn on the rule about repetition frequently in this session and the last session, and has had occasion to give us a number of authorities and citations on this point. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that you should rule that the notice of motion which appears in the Votes and Proceedings of Tuesday, May 8, in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is out of order so long as the other resolution is on the order paper. Therefore, this second resolution should not be permitted to reach the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that all hon. members are satisfied that the point of order has been well stated.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish at this stage to intervene because the point has been clearly stated both in the arguments that have been advanced and in the citations to which you have been referred; but there is an aspect of the situation having to do with the fact that the matter is now in Votes and Proceedings rather than on the order paper. If that matter has any bearing with Your Honour I would want to be heard on it. I do not want to intervene at this stage because it is perhaps not a point which Your Honour will think material. Therefore, I should like, if I may, to reserve the right to argue further until Your Honour indicates whether you think the point is material or not.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated that he did not have time to do all of the homework that he would have liked to have done on this matter, and the hon. member for Kamloops has just indicated that he is reserving his rights to speak further on another point which perhaps may be raised in this discussion. I say that no hon. member will be prejudiced if we wait until tomorrow when the resolution appears on the order paper. At that time we can have the point finally disposed of. I would imagine that that would be the best procedure because I feel sure that whatever is my judgment today—perhaps I should not say "I feel sure"—but I suspect there might be more arguments to be heard on the same point tomorrow.

Mr. Fulton: If I may, then, my contention is that the resolution should not be allowed to appear on the order paper but in fact should be removed from Votes and Proceedings. If we have to accept the suggestion just made, the available result would be this notice of motion would appear on the order paper where I maintain it should not appear under present circumstances. Therefore, perhaps I may be permitted to say—

Mr. Byrne: How do we know what it is until we see it?

Mr. Fulton: Did I hear one of the hon. members from the Kootenays, the hon. member for Kootenay East, say, "How do we know what it is until we see it?"

Mr. Byrne: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member should perhaps acquaint himself with the facilities which are available to hon. members to find out what is in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Argue: I thought he saw it yesterday morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am listening to the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to know that, Your Honour. I hope you can hear me above some of the rather inane remarks that have been made.

Mr. Speaker: I always hear the hon. member with great pleasure.

Mr. Fulton: It then is apparent that Your Honour has read Votes and Proceedings, which is more than the hon. member for Kootenay East has done.

The question of whether this matter should be allowed to stand over until tomorrow, or whether it should be removed now from Votes and Proceedings is dealt with in a statement that appears in Bourinot's fourth edition on which much of the many citations in Beauchesne's second and third editions to which you have been referred is based. At pages 312 and 313 of Bourinot it is clearly stated that it is the responsibility of the Clerk and the Speaker to satisfy themselves as to the propriety of a notice of motion which is submitted to appear on the order paper. If Your Honour is satisfied that it is not in order then Your Honour returns it to the member submitting it in order that it may be amended or, I would suggest, in order that other steps necessary be taken before it can appear on the order paper.

At pages 312 and 313 Bourinot, where he is discussing the procedure to be followed in dealing with questions submitted to appear on the order paper, and which he makes applicable to notices of motion, says as follows:

> The questions are first handed in to the Clerk or assistant clerk of the house and are then printed among the proceedings and appear in due time on the order paper under rule 25.

And then continuing on page 313, he says:

> The Canadian practice is identical with that of the English Commons—

—and so on. He continues:

> It is the duty of the Clerk to point out any irregularity to the Speaker as in the case of notices of motion and if the latter is of the same opinion he will order the Clerk to communicate with the member, so that he may have an opportunity of amending his notice.

That part of the procedure there being discussed is clearly made applicable to notices of motions and I will merely assure Your Honour and the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) that the resolution of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) appears in Votes and Proceedings under the heading, "Notices of Motions and Questions" so that the issue is indeed properly before Your Honour.

While I appreciate that it is not a point which comes up very frequently and no one is trying to press Your Honour unduly, I submit it is essential that it be dealt with today. Perhaps Your Honour may care to reserve your opinion for a while, although I think the authorities speak so clearly that that is not necessary, and I do submit that whatever may be the time at which you give your decision it should be given today, because in our submission this notice should not be allowed to stand on Votes and Proceedings and should not be allowed to appear on the order paper tomorrow.

For the benefit of other hon. members I would just like to read the citation in Beauchesne's second edition to which I referred, citation No. 387 at page 125, which reads as follows:

> A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the house, such as the subject matter of a bill on the order paper.

And it applies equally clearly to the subject matter of a resolution or motion already on the order paper.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think there is one thing that should be proved. Is government action on the pipe line west of Winnipeg the same thing as the government co-operating with the province of Ontario to build the line from Winnipeg east? It has to be proven that these things are the same, which to my way of thinking requires an outstanding stretch of imagination.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I just say a word on the point raised by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I submit that the matter now before us is on all fours with the instance in 1945 to which I have already referred. On that occasion what was before the house was a bill respecting the National Housing Act and the subsequent decision of the government was to provide more powers under the legislation than had been initially decided upon. In this instance what is proposed by the government is the setting up of a Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. Both resolutions deal with that main purpose. The second resolution merely adds to the powers that the government would confer upon that corporation under the first resolution. I submit that it should be treated in the same manner as was done in 1945.

However, Mr. Speaker, the reason I rose again was to suggest this to Your Honour.

Unlike most points of order that are raised I am not sure that this is one that has to be decided at this very moment. It seems to me that the time when Your Honour must decide whether this proposed notice of motion is to go on the order paper is just before the Clerk sends out the copy for the printing of tomorrow's order paper. In other words, Your Honour has several hours in which to make that decision, and although for my part I do not think it should reach the order paper I am prepared to wait until tomorrow's order paper appears to ascertain what decision you have made. However, in expressing my willingness to let Your Honour make the decision later, I wish to give notice that if this resolution does appear on tomorrow's order paper as a government notice of motion, I will then raise the point of order that—

An hon. Member: You have raised it already.

Mr. Knowles: I now give the house notice that a point of order will be raised against your putting the question for the house to decide that the resolution should be considered at the next or any future sitting of the house.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member permit me to speak and I will give the floor to the hon. member afterwards. I should like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if he has considered that at this session we have had a government bill on the order paper having to do with equal pay for equal work for women. There were two bills on the same subject. There were also two bills dealing with small loans, one by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and one by the government. I should like to hear his comment on those two instances where there have been two bills in each case that were similar.

Mr. Knowles: The member for Winnipeg North Centre seldom declines an invitation to say a few words on procedure. I have given thought to the point which Your Honour has raised and I suggest that there are certain very real differences. In the case of the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) with regard to equal pay for equal work for women and in the case of the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) regarding small loans companies, those private bills were placed on the order paper in advance of the notices of the government bills.

It might be argued that those bills blocked the government legislation, but the answer to that argument is that the rule books contain a provision which is known as the rule of anticipation. This rule establishes an order of priority and provides that certain legislation shall have priority over other kinds of legislation. Government bills are listed as being higher in priority than private members' bills. It is provided in the authorities for a government bill to be placed on the order paper and have priority over a private member's bill dealing with the same matter. That is precisely what has happened. I think it has been pretty well understood that since the government legislation regarding these two subjects appeared on the order paper Your Honour would not permit further debate on the private members' bills. They are now blocked by the higher priority of the government legislation.

But there is nothing anywhere in the rule books that says that there is any difference in priority between one government measure and another. I suggest that the government cannot come along and claim that its second thought has priority over its first thought and that therefore it takes precedence over the resolution already there. It seems to me that the situations are quite different. In this case the government should fall back on the procedure used in the instance to which I referred when Mr. Ilsley had the national housing bill before us and in the other instances which I hope I will be able to give if this matter comes up tomorrow.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that if you permit the notice of motion to proceed to the order paper and to appear on tomorrow's order paper that will not dispose finally of the matter because, as you have been told, a point of order will be raised tomorrow with respect to the contents of the order paper. But that fact of itself does not dispose of the point that has been raised here today. In this respect I wish particularly to speak in support of the point raised by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

I have always understood that, in an obvious case, that is to say where a notice of motion obviously offends the rules, it is the responsibility, in the first instance, of the Clerk of the house, and in the final instance of the Speaker of the house, to decide whether such a motion obviously out of order should be permitted to be printed, first of all in Votes and Proceedings as a notice of motion and then on the order paper of the house for the following day. My understanding is that in an obvious case that responsibility rests upon the Clerk as an officer of the house in the first instance and then on the Speaker. In my submission to you, Mr. Speaker, this is such an obvious case and for that reason it does require a decision today.

As was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, it may be that you do not have to decide the point on the spur of the moment but in my respectful submission a decision must be made by you, Mr. Speaker, today before the contents of tomorrow's order paper go to the printer to be printed.

I wish to enlarge on the point and the reasons why I submit to you that this notice of motion appearing in Votes and Proceedings for Tuesday, May 8, is one of those cases of a notice of motion obviously out of order, so obviously out of order as to call on your part for a direction that it shall not be printed at the expense of the taxpayers of this country in breach of the rules of the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: The similarity of the notice of motion to one already on the order paper is perfectly apparent to all who will look at it. I am not saying it would be apparent to those members opposite who obviously have not read it but it is perfectly obvious to any hon. member who will take the trouble to read it.

Let me draw your attention to this fact. The resolution already on the order paper, which has already been debated one full day and stands by order of the house for further debate on a later day, has three paragraphs to it. If you will compare the three paragraphs word for word with the contents of the notice of motion appearing in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings you will find everything there repeated in the new notice of motion. For instance, the first paragraph of the notice of motion, No. 13 on the order paper, and standing since March 15, has to do in the first instance with the introduction of a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation. That first paragraph in the notice of motion of March 15 is reproduced in full in the first paragraph of the notice of motion that appears in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings.

There are two other paragraphs in the notice of motion of March 15. The second one has to do with empowering the corporation to do things that are conducive to the attainment of the objects set forth in the first paragraph and goes on to provide that the corporation may borrow money to an aggregate amount not exceeding $130 million. You will have already observed, Mr. Speaker, that the new notice of motion has five paragraphs to it and that the contents of the second paragraph of the old notice of motion are reproduced in the fourth paragraph of the new notice of motion. There is one clause in the third paragraph of the new notice of motion which takes care of the only difference, in that provision is also made that the corporation may do such things as are conducive to the attainment of the foregoing purposes.

Then, sir, as to the third paragraph in the notice of motion of March 15, you will find that reproduced verbatim in the fifth paragraph of the notice of motion in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly apparent that there is not only such similarity between the two notices of motion as to be perfectly obvious but there has been reproduced in the notice of motion of yesterday the entire notice of motion of March 15 and all that has been done by the government is to add two paragraphs which appear as the second and third paragraphs of the new notice of motion by which additional provisions are sought to be made in relation to the same measure.

If we are to permit the defeat of the rule of the house embodied in citation 387 of Beauchesne, second edition, which expressly prohibits the anticipation of something that is already on the order paper by something new introduced, then, sir, all that one has to do to achieve that defeat of a well established rule of the house is simply to add a couple of new things or, for that matter, one new thing, to something that is already on the order paper, something that is not only on the order paper but has already been debated by the House of Commons and ordered to stand for further discussion at a later date. That is all that needs to be done. Just add something else and then you escape the rule with regard to anticipation.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the plain rules and well established procedures of the house are not to be defeated in a manner of that kind. It just means that it would be the simplest thing in all the world from this point on to add something to anything that is on the order paper, bring it in in that way and, if you please, put it ahead of something that is already on the order paper. Yesterday the Minister of Finance as leader of the house, in answer to a question I put to him, made it quite clear that it is the intention of the government to take this new notice of motion in priority to the resolution standing on the order paper as order No. 13. So that you have the plainest kind of attempted anticipation, taking something new ahead of something already on the order paper and in this case consisting of precisely the same resolution with the addition of two new paragraphs.

[Mr. Fleming.]

In such a case it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, if I may respectfully say so, that it is the duty of the Speaker of the house to dispose of this question today in view of the fact that the notice of motion appearing in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings is so obviously out of order as being an attempt at anticipation in relation to the notice of motion of March 15 that it is your duty to rule today that that notice of motion shall not be printed in tomorrow's order paper.

Mr. Speaker: May I say first of all that all hon. members who have stated the point have been very helpful in citing authorities and dealing with the point quite fully. There have been several points raised. There is one, however, that I should like to see disposed of immediately. In discussing the point of order some hon. members have emphasized that their view as to why this procedure is out of order is the most obvious one. It is so obvious to them that they do not see anything else but their own view as being the obvious one. Then they go on further to say that it is the duty of the Clerk and the duty of the Speaker to decide in a certain way, as if both the Clerk and the Speaker would not be doing their duty otherwise.

I want to say immediately that I have been associated with the Clerk of the house for over seven years, as Speaker for the last three years and as Deputy Speaker and deputy chairman of committees for four years prior to 1953. In my view no one knows his duty better than the Clerk of the House of Commons. Whatever he does in his capacity as adviser to the Speaker it is not his responsibility. It is that of the Speaker and I fully accept whatever responsibility is mine.

I want to say that whenever a notice of motion goes to the order paper it is dealt with by the clerk of orders and notices, who is a different person from the Clerk of the House of Commons. The clerk of orders and notices has been a member of the staff of the house for over 30 years, has had a great deal of experience and takes a look at these motions before he puts them on the order paper. If he has any doubts he may refer to the assistant clerks, of whom there are two, or to the Clerk himself. If the Clerk has no doubt whatever these motions never come before me but if he has any doubt he may put them before me.

By quoting pages 312 and 313 of Bourinot's fourth edition the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) indicated that the officials of the house have certain duties with respect to the preparation of the order paper. There is no doubt about that fact. That is what they are there for. But someone must take the responsibility and that someone is the one who is occupying the chair. I say again that I take full responsibility for whatever has taken place. Let us have that point clear and let us keep the officials of the house outside the argument.

Now that we are all in agreement on that particular matter, I should like to go one step further. Hon. members have objected to the notice of motion which is now on the notice paper and which normally should appear on the order paper tomorrow as a government notice of motion. They have objected to it on the ground that it anticipated a notice of motion which has already been taken up by the house and been considered in committee of the whole. I should like to inform hon. members that according to Campion at page 176, we find this. Campion deals with the rule that the same question may not be twice offered in the same session and I should like to quote this portion:

> The important points in connection with this rule are:
> (1) Judgment must have been expressed. Consequently a motion which has been withdrawn, or has not been seconded, or has been superseded, may be repeated.
> (2) The rule does not apply as between the various stages of bills. The different stages are intended as so many opportunities of reconsideration. Hence decisions taken in committee may be reversed upon the report stage, and these again on consideration of Lords' amendments.

At page 202 Campion deals with bills that have to be introduced with preliminaries, namely the resolution preceding a money bill. Under the heading "Bills brought in on an order of the house", he says this:

> This is the old procedure, which has been practically superseded except in the case of money bills and bills introduced under S.O. No. 12.

That is standing order No. 12 in the United Kingdom.

> Bills introduced on an order may be preceded by certain preliminary business.

Then he deals with preliminaries.

> With Preliminaries.
> (a) A certain class of bills, whose main object is the expenditure of money or the imposition of taxation, generally called 'money' bills, are still required to be preceded by resolutions passed in committee of the whole house and agreed to by the house on report. In this case the bill is ordered to be brought in immediately after the resolutions are agreed to.

The resolution preceding a money bill is nothing but the order for leave to introduce a bill which entails the expenditure of money. In my view it is part of the bill. A money bill has various stages and the preliminary stage, which is the resolution, is part of the set-up in the bringing in of a bill. When a bill is introduced without a resolution I ask the house the question "Has the hon. gentleman leave to introduce this bill?" The house having acceded to that suggestion then the Votes and Proceedings read "Ordered that the bill be introduced". Then I ask for first reading. When a money bill is introduced, it must be preceded by a resolution and once the resolution is concurred in by the house, the order is for leave to introduce the money bill. That is the position.

What is the position at the moment in this instance? A resolution is on the order paper and the order is "House again in committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution". I stress the word "proposed" because I submit to hon. members this consideration: When does a resolution become a resolution? After it has come out of the committee of the whole. As long as it is in committee of the whole and until it is reported it is only a proposed resolution. As a matter of fact, as hon. members know, a motion preceding a money bill may be amended in committee and it is not even reported with amendments when it is reported. A resolution may be amended in committee of the whole provided the terms of reference of the royal recommendation may allow the amendment in committee. Otherwise a new royal recommendation is necessary. In this case we have on the order paper "House again in committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution" which deals with certain matters. We now have on the notice paper a certain proposed resolution which deals with the same subject matter as does the proposed resolution which is in committee of the whole, plus other matters which require the royal recommendation because of the financial initiative of the crown.

If hon. members will bear with me, I would ask them to look at page 499 of May's fifteenth edition. There they will find this:

> There is no rule or custom which restrains the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject, and containing similar provisions. But if a decision of the house has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions, and such a bill could not have been introduced on a motion for leave. But if a bill is withdrawn, after having made progress, another bill with the same objects may be proceeded with.

This is complemented by what appears in Bourinot at page 548 where Bourinot quotes a reference to the English authorities which is as follows:

> "Whilst a bill is still pending, and until it is completely disposed of, there is nothing whatever to prevent another bill for the same object being introduced."

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when I asked him what was his view of what I consider to be a somewhat parallel situation with respect to two other instances that happened during this present session,—that is in connection with a bill on small loans introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and a bill on a similar matter introduced by the government and also a bill introduced by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) for equal pay for equal work for women and a government bill on the same subject—said there was an order of priority in dealing with the rule of anticipation and that the authorities stated that a government measure has priority over a private member's measure. At this moment I think that he and I will come to an agreement the minute I tell him that the priority which he gives to government bills arises out of certain standing orders to the effect that there are more government days than there are private members' days and that whenever government days are in progress the government, according to standing order 18—it used to be standing order 17—has complete initiative as to what order it will take up. But with respect to the point that the rule of anticipation has established a scale of values, may I say that the scale of values does not apply as between government bills and private members' bills. It applies as to the various stages along the way of a certain bill as against another which may not have advanced so far.

What was the page I quoted a moment ago about the rule of anticipation? I suppose that, while I am looking for this reference, it is for hon. members a pleasant interlude in which to think over what they have said and what I have said.

We will look at the scale of values which has been established by Campion at page 178. He says:

> The anticipation rule, which forbids discussion on a matter standing on the paper being forestalled, is dependent on the same principle as that which forbids the same question being twice raised in the same session. In applying the anticipation rule preference is given to the discussion which leads to the most effective result, and this has established a descending scale of values for discussions—bills, motions, amendments, etc. Thus a bill or other order of the day must not be anticipated by (or more shortly "blocks") discussion of a motion, amendment, or subject raised on another motion, such as that for the adjournment of the house.

While it applies between the various stages of a bill, there is no order of priority as between government bills and private members' bills. Now, before I go any farther I am prepared to give my ruling. I would hope that because of what I have said it would not appear to some hon. members as obvious as they thought it did that I should rule differently than I am about to rule. Would there be something else hon. members would like to say?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Fleming: I do not propose to add to what I said in regard to the point of order, but I do wish most emphatically to say something by way of comment on your opening remarks which seemed to put an interpretation on remarks of mine which those remarks were never intended to bear.

You seemed to suggest that there was some criticism on my part of the Clerk of the house. Let me make it very clear to you, sir, that there was no criticism of the Clerk of the house. No hon. member of the house holds the Clerk of this house in higher esteem than I do, whether as an efficient, painstaking and conscientious officer of this house or as a gentleman whom I personally hold in the highest esteem.

With great respect, sir, I tell you that I am surprised that you should have said anything today that seemed to suggest that there was, in my remarks, any reflection upon the Clerk of the house because there was no reflection therein upon the Clerk of the house. There is no excuse on the part of anyone hearing or reading my remarks for drawing any such inference from them. I want to make that abundantly clear. What I said was this. I thought there was a responsibility that rests on the Clerk who, in the first instance, looks at these notices of motion. I said the ultimate responsibility rests on the Speaker of the house. As I understand the practice, and the proper practice, it is this. In these cases, if it appears to the Clerk of the house or that member of the staff who exercises that function under the general direction of the Clerk, in this case the clerk of orders and motions, that a particular notice of motion is out of order, then as I understand it he discharges his duty by drawing that fact to the attention of the Speaker. I understand that to be the rule and the practice. Then, the responsibility rests on the Speaker to decide in that case whether the notice of motion ought to be printed in Votes and Proceedings of the day.

That is as far as I went in regard to anything I said concerning the responsibility of the Clerk of the house. I regret very much that you should have put on my remarks an interpretation of which, with great respect, my remarks were incapable.

Mr. Speaker: Let me immediately deal with that point. I want to tell the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that it was not my intention to put any interpretation on his remarks different from that which he has acknowledged. I think he has at this moment given the exact relationship which exists between the Clerk and myself.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad indeed to hear you say that because I must confess I had myself wondered whether or not I should take up the matter which has been taken up by the hon. member for Eglinton, but that is probably not now necessary, except to say this. Any attempt anywhere to represent the point of order which has been raised, and our submissions upon it, as a reflection upon any of the officers of the house would, of course, be a most improper course. I relied upon the authority of the quotation I read from Bourinot, who himself was a prominent Clerk of this house, and which makes it quite clear as to where the ultimate responsibility lies. He said:

> It is the duty of the Clerk to point out any irregularity to the Speaker as in the case of notices of motion and if the latter is of the same opinion he will order the Clerk to communicate with the member,—

I have read that citation in full, and it makes it quite clear where the responsibility lies. I wish to make it quite clear, in addition to what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said, that it cannot be taken as a reflection upon any of the officers of the house or indeed upon anyone, when one quotes authorities with respect to the practice and procedures in this house. It seems to me it is difficult to see why, in this quotation or in raising the point, there may be implied any reflection upon anyone in this house.

May I deal with one or two points on the point of order which you have made. In the latter part of your remarks, as I understood them, you were arguing that it was quite in order to introduce another bill to supersede or take the place of a bill already on the order paper, and you relied upon some authorities to substantiate that proposition. You argued that by inference as I understood it, and I am endeavouring to appreciate your argument to the full and not misstate it, it was therefore quite regular to introduce an amendment to a resolution at this stage.

Mr. Speaker: When a resolution is in the committee of the whole stage, it does not become a resolution until it has been reported by the committee and concurred in by the house. As long as the terms of the resolution are in committee, they are the terms of a proposed resolution. They may be amended provided the amendment remains within the ambit of the royal recommendation. We had a case like this last session.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear that restated because this procedure now suggested is not an amendment. It is a new resolution or it purports to be a new resolution. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce had not given notice in Votes and Proceedings but had said when we got back in committee, I propose to introduce an amendment to the proposed resolution, that would be an entirely different thing. However, that course is not being followed. With a proposed resolution already before us and in the possession of the committee, what it is sought to do here is to substitute for it a new and different resolution, not an amendment. This creates an entirely new situation and does not, in my submission, follow from the precedent with respect to bills upon which Your Honour based your argument this afternoon.

It is true that May at page 499, already referred to by Your Honour, does say:

> There is no rule or custom which restrains the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject, and containing similar provision(s). But if a decision of the house has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions,—

I should like to refer Your Honour back to page 383 in which it is said:

> A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the house, whether it be a bill or an adjourned debate upon a motion.

Here we have a motion on the order paper made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and which is being considered, that it is expedient to introduce a bill. That motion is now being considered in the committee of the whole. The Minister of Trade and Commerce proposes by the notice given in today's Votes and Proceedings another motion, not to amend the present one but to introduce a different one, both dealing with the same subject matter, and dealing with the subject matter of a motion already appointed for consideration by the house. Therefore, my first point is that here clearly within the meaning of May at page 383 we have a proposed motion which anticipates the matter of a motion upon the consideration of which the house has already embarked, and the further consideration of which is appointed for another day. That, I think, deals with the question of the difference between new resolutions and amendments.

Now, I go back to page 499 and the citation that you referred to which states that it is in order to introduce a new bill dealing with the same subject matter as another. May makes it clear that if a decision of the house has already been taken on one such bill, for example, then you could not introduce another bill. I submit that while it is not exactly on all fours, my proposition is largely the same; that when a decision of the house has already been taken with respect to the motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce now on the order paper we have decided to commit that motion for consideration by the committee of the whole. That decision has been taken. It is true that the matter has not yet been finally disposed of, but we have had a decision of the house with respect to the motion, and now here we are with another motion coming along dealing with exactly the same thing and we are asked to take another decision. If that does not anticipate a motion already appointed for consideration, and if it does not seek to introduce a matter on which a decision of the house has already been taken, then I do not know the meaning of those words.

I believe that if Your Honour will read the two citations together, the one on page 499 and the one on page 383 to which I have referred you, you will see that there has to be something to reconcile the two which are otherwise in apparent conflict, and I believe I have suggested the only way in which they can be reconciled. That way is, firstly, it is not an amendment; it is a new motion. Secondly, it deals with something on which a decision of the house has already been taken because the house decided that the original motion is the one that should be referred to the committee of the whole. Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is asking us to decide that we were wrong then and it is some other motion that we should refer to the committee of the whole. That is my submission on the point that Your Honour has raised in answer to us.

Whatever may be Your Honour's decision you must recognize, sir, that we advance our point of view with vigour; we believe it to be correct. We may say, in the course of argument, we think it is so clear that a decision is obvious. Surely you will permit us to argue with vigour without saying we are reflecting upon you if your decision should happen to be the other way, however much we disagree with your decision.

Mr. Speaker: May I put the mind of the hon. member at rest by saying that there cannot have been a decision of the house with respect to this resolution precisely because of the terms of standing order 61, which reads:

> If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I think I can do this briefly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I thought it was time to get some applause from the government side and I knew that was the way to get it.

First, it is still my view that Your Honour does not need to make a ruling at this moment. It is still my view that Your Honour has until printing time tonight to make a ruling as to whether or not this new notice of motion should go on the order paper.

The second point I wish to make is this. I hope it is very clear that the only point now being debated, the only point on which Your Honour will rule, whether now or before printing time tonight, is as to whether or not this new notice of motion is allowed to go on the order paper. What I am reserving by making that statement, Mr. Speaker, is this. I feel that if Your Honour does decide that the motion should go on the order paper, we still have the right, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce seeks to move it, to raise a point of order against the question being put to the house at that time, and I shall do so.

The third thing I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, is precisely on the point which the hon. member for Kamloops and Your Honour were discussing just a moment ago. It seems to me that Your Honour and some of those who are interjecting from the government side, like the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, are trying to make too much out of the word "proposed". It seems to me you are trying to make too much out of the fact that it is not a resolution of the house until it has gone through the committee stage, been reported back to the house and approved by the house. What I think Your Honour should consider is that the motion which the Minister of Trade and Commerce will seek to move tomorrow will be asking the house tomorrow to make a decision substantially the same as the decision which the house made on Monday, February 6, 1956, as reported at page 877 of Hansard. It was not just a mere formality that the house went through on that occasion. This is what Hansard says:

> Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:
> That it is expedient . . .

And so on.

Then, after the resolution is printed in full, there appear these words:

> Motion agreed to.

At that time this was not just a formality; this was not just something pro forma that the house went through because it was 2.30 in the afternoon. We made a decision of the House of Commons to refer this resolution to the committee of the whole. That was done on February 6, 1956. It is not only recorded in Hansard; it is recorded in Votes and Proceedings of the same day. I remind Your Honour of citation 252 in Beauchesne's second edition, which says that the Journals—in other words, Votes and Proceedings—are the official record of the house. In other words, this is an official, definitive, substantive decision of the House of Commons on February 6, that this certain resolution be referred to the committee of the whole house.

Now, the minister seeks, by the notice he has given, to move tomorrow a motion which will again read, if it is allowed:

> Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:—

I suppose it has been approved by His Excellency.

> That it is expedient—

And so on.

If the motion is put against our objection tomorrow and if it carries it will have at the end the words: "Motion agreed to", whereupon the Votes and Proceedings, the Journals of this house of February 6, 1956, and of May 10, 1956, will record the passing of two motions which are almost identical. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, with the same vigour, the same belief that I think our position is obvious, as has already been expressed by hon. members to my right; that for the house to do that would be flying in the face of the rule which I quoted when I rose some time ago and quoted citation 325 in Beauchesne's third edition which states that a motion or amendment cannot be brought forward which is the same in substance as a question which has already been decided. This house decided the question to which I have referred on February 6, 1956. The Minister of Trade and Commerce wants it to decide substantially the same question tomorrow. I submit that Your Honour's—I am sorry, I will not use the word that almost slipped out—statement to us in the past regarding repetition in debate and with regard to having two debates on the same subject supports the position we are taking that this motion should not be allowed.

Mr. Speaker: I know he is doing so inadvertently but in my view the hon. member is confusing a decision on the merits or the subject matter of the resolution and decisions of the house which are merely to get things going, these formal procedural motions.

How can a resolution preceding a money bill do anything but what is prescribed by standing order No. 61? We have to go through the procedure to put that resolution into committee because of our own standing order No. 61 which says that before we decide about the merits of the resolution we must go into committee of the whole on it.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask another question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Does Your Honour recall that the motion of February 6 which called for a decision at the next sitting of the house was the subject of a recorded vote in the house when that decision was taken, thus making it a decision of the house which was taken twice?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but the decision taken was that the house did want the Speaker to leave the chair for it to consider the resolution in committee. The fact remains that no decision was ever taken on the resolution itself. Let us not have any confusion about that. The citation in Beauchesne's which the hon. member has read about the amendment to a motion has to do with the subject matter of the resolution itself.

Mr. Knowles: But, Mr. Speaker, neither will the minister's motion tomorrow then, in your terms, sir, be a motion regarding the subject matter of the resolution; it will be a motion for the house to go into committee on a resolution and the resolutions are almost identical.

Mr. Speaker: Of course one can make a long argument about these things but the rules are that if an hon. member wishes to introduce a resolution and especially a money resolution it must be proceeded with by the royal recommendation and 48 hours' notice must be given.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. gentleman has something to say that is of paramount importance.

Mr. Michener: It is not of paramount importance, Your Honour, but I just put this question to Your Honour. If the motion to go into committee had been negatived on this resolution, would Your Honour then consider that the same motion could be made again?

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker would not have left the chair that day but the motion for him to leave the chair could have been made the next day.

Mr. Fulton: Oh no.

Mr. Speaker: Oh yes. Well, hon. members seem to be surprised. The motion is that this house go into committee of the whole at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution. By "next sitting" is meant the next sitting at which the government decides it wants to take it up. If that motion is defeated another motion can be made to reintroduce the resolution because the house may decide it will go into committee of the whole on some other day although it has been decided on a previous day not to go into committee of the whole. The same with the motion on second reading. If the house decides on that day it will not read it it may be read a second time on another day.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: Does Your Honour argue that if the motion that a bill be now read a second time is negatived the government could introduce that motion again during the same session? If the motion that a bill be now read a second time were negatived and the house decided it should not be read a second time, does Your Honour argue that the government could introduce that same motion later during that session on the same bill?

Mr. Speaker: Oh yes.

Mr. Fulton: Oh no.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops seems to be scandalized by my statement to that effect and now the discussion is ranging from one point to another. Hon. members will admit that some of them might have come prepared to discuss this point of order whereas I was not prepared. I am not going to allow myself to go throughout the various rules of the book this afternoon and the citation to which I referred should be easy to find. The citation is to the effect that it is not appropriate for the people opposing the bill to vote against the second reading because all they decide then is that second reading be not now given, and that it be given second reading some other time. That is what the citation says; look at the second reading of bills. See Beauchesne's third edition, citation 656.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I say one word. I presume that hon. members of the government before this was introduced gave consideration as to whether or not this was the right way to proceed and the odd thing to me is that no member of the government has risen to support any argument in favour of considering this. You, Mr. Speaker, have had to carry the burden of the whole argument. I am sure they must have gone into this rather thoroughly.

Mr. Dechene: This is not a debating society.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) spoke for the government.

An hon. Member: It is too complicated for them.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members should not imply that there might have been some sort of a sinister conspiracy in order to organize this.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, Mr. Speaker, do not put that interpretation on my words. I was commenting on the fact that you are the judge in this particular instance and I was expecting arguments pro and con from those who believe that this is or is not the right procedure.

Mr. Speaker: I want to tell hon. members that the resolution which is now on the order paper—I still have to read it. I heard the statement made by the minister the other day in which he explained that he would place another resolution on the order paper and I consider that that is what we are talking about. I have not read it.

It is up to any hon. member to come and consult the officials of the house or even to come and consult me. It is one of the duties of the Clerk to advise the Speaker. While the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) were speaking, the Clerk was good enough to send me some very good references which I had time to read. I listened very attentively to the points made by all the hon. members who spoke. They spoke at sufficient length to permit me to examine the references and I am making my ruling. We are at the point now where we are discussing—

Mr. Knowles: Is Your Honour making a ruling on a resolution which you say you have not read?

Mr. Speaker: I am not called upon to rule on the content of the resolution. I am called upon to rule as to whether or not that resolution should be on the order paper following the rule which says that 48 hours' notice should be given. The resolution will come up tomorrow as a notice of motion and the motion will have to be made to appoint another day in order to have it considered.

Now, I offered earlier to delay the judgment in this case until tomorrow. Hon. members have indicated that they wanted to have a ruling now. I have given my ruling and I think we have had a discussion of sufficient length. I will say this to hon. members. If after reading Hansard tomorrow morning and after consulting with the Clerk there is any reason why something should be done in order to remove the resolution from the order paper, I will see to it that that action is taken; but if, on the other hand, after carefully reading all the arguments that have been put forward and all the authorities that have been cited and after discussing the matter fully with the Clerk and his assistants I have to come to the same conclusion that the matter may still be considered by the house, then it will be on the order paper tomorrow.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I should like to refer the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) to citation 656, which reads:

> The opponents of the bill may vote against the question that the bill "be now read a second time"; but this course is rarely adopted as it still remains to be decided on what day it shall be read a second time, or whether it shall be read at all; and the bill therefore is still before the house, and may afterwards be proceeded with.

PATENT ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING FOODS AND MEDICINES, ABUSE OF RIGHTS, ETC.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 292, to amend the Patent Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Speaker: I would remind hon. members that it is now four o'clock, so under the rules we could not take up starred questions. Probably I spoke too much on the point of order. Standing order 39 (1) (b) reads:

> Starred questions shall be taken up on Wednesdays after the ordinary daily routine of business has been disposed of and not later than one hour after the time of meeting of the house. If proceedings thereon be not concluded at the expiration of one hour after such business has been entered upon, such starred questions as have not been taken up shall stand over until the next Wednesday sitting.

Perhaps we are all responsible for not having stopped in time to permit our taking up starred questions before this, and perhaps with unanimous consent we could set aside this rule for today.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WHARF CONSTRUCTION, BAIE STE. CATHERINE, QUE.

Question No. 51—Mr. Maltais:

1. Is the federal government giving consideration to the construction of new wharf facilities for improved ferry service at Baie Ste. Catherine, Quebec?

2. If so, have arrangements been made with the government of the province of Quebec to construct the road leading to the proposed new wharf?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): This matter is being studied. A connecting road would need to be built to the site considered most appropriate for a new wharf. I have communicated with the government of Quebec asking if they are prepared to build such a road but to date have not received their answer. I have told the government of Quebec that we cannot proceed further with our studies until we know if they are prepared to undertake construction of the road.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BUTTER STORAGE EXPENDITURES

Question No. 382—Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

What was the total amount of money paid to each of the following companies for the storing of butter during the year 1955: Ayer Storage Limited, Montreal, Quebec; Canada Cold Storage, Montreal, Quebec; Federal Cold Storage, Montreal, Quebec; Lovell & Christmas (Canada) Limited, Montreal, Quebec; Manitoba Cold Storage, Winnipeg, Manitoba; National Harbours Board, Montreal, Quebec; Montreal Refrigerating & Storage, Montreal, Quebec; Terminal Warehouses Limited, Toronto, Ontario; Trenton Cold Storage, Trenton, Ontario; Winnipeg Cold Storage, Winnipeg, Manitoba?

ARMED SERVICES—RECRUITMENT EXPENDITURES

Question No. 408—Mr. Hamilton (York West):

1. What was the total cost of recruiting for each of the three armed services for the last 12 months for which figures are available?
2. What is the breakdown of these costs under the following headings: (a) advertising; (b) recruiting centres and offices; (c) travelling teams; (d) other costs?

ORDERS IN COUNCIL—EXEMPTIONS FROM SALES TAX

Question No. 444—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Have any orders in council been passed since January 1, 1946 which exempt any product from sales tax?

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER APPLICATIONS

Question No. 470—Mr. Robinson (Bruce):

1. Were applications for lighthouse keepers called for in connection with Port Stanley, in 1954, and Port Dalhousie and Niagara-on-the-Lake, in 1955?
2. If so, what are the names and addresses of the applicants?
3. Who was the successful applicant for each position?
4. What are the respective salaries paid?
5. Does the department practise promotion within the lighthouse keeper service?
6. If so, was this done in connection with the abovementioned locations?

SOCIAL WELFARE, QUE.—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 472—Mr. Maltais:

1. During each year, from 1951 to 1956, what amounts have been paid by way of (a) family allowances, (b) old age pensions to Canadians having reached the age of 70 years; (c) unemployment insurance, in the county of Charlevoix, Quebec?
2. During each year, from 1951 to 1956, what amounts have been paid by way of old age pensions to Canadians between the ages of 65 and 70 years, in the province of Quebec?
3. During each year, from 1951 to 1956, what amounts have been paid by way of pensions to blind persons, in the province of Quebec?

EDUCATION—FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Question No. 480—Mr. Enfield:

During the fiscal year 1955-56, what sums of money by way of outright grants, bursaries, scholarships and loans were expended by the federal government directly in aid of education in Canada, including grants for assistance to Indians and Eskimos (a) by each department of government in each province, for aid to university students, and including professional training; (b) by each department of government in each province for education on the secondary and elementary school levels?

IMMIGRATION

DR. CORLISS LAMONT—REFERENCE TO REFUSAL OF ENTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Could the minister report to the house, either now or later, on the refusal of immigration officers to admit to Canada Dr. Corliss Lamont who was to deliver lectures in the First Unitarian Church, Toronto, yesterday, and the grounds for such action by these officers?

[Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose.]

Mr. Fulton: Could the minister also say why he has changed his departmental mind?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, although the question relates to an individual case I think it is of sufficient public interest to make it desirable that a reply be made. I may say that Mr. Lamont arrived in Windsor yesterday. According to the information I have received from our Windsor office, before he arrived he advised the United Press, I am not sure whether in New York but at least somewhere in the United States, that he was coming to Canada to give some lectures. The United Press spoke to our office in Windsor and asked what would be done about him when he arrived.

It is quite probable that if these things had not happened there would have been no question raised about his entry into this country, but because these queries were made by the press, queries which perhaps in my suspicious mind might have been inspired by Mr. Lamont, certain questions were put to him. It appeared to the inquiry officer that he fell within the classes of person which parliament saw fit to prohibit entry to Canada under section 5 (1) of the Immigration Act which reads:

> No person, other than a person referred to in subsection (2) of section 7, shall be admitted to Canada if he is a member of any of the following classes of persons:
> (1) persons who are or have been, at any time before or after the commencement of this act, members of or associated with any organization, group or body of any kind concerning which there are reasonable grounds for believing that it promotes or advocates or at the time of such membership or association promoted or advocated subversion by force or other means of democratic government, institutions or processes, as they are understood in Canada, except persons who satisfy the minister that they have ceased to be members of or associated with such organizations, groups or bodies and whose admission would not be detrimental to the security of Canada.

In view of the information which was given to the inquiry officer by Mr. Lamont, and which indicated that he had at one time belonged to a certain organization which the attorney general of the United States had indicated was a subversive organization in that country, I have no criticism to make of the conscientious civil servant who ordered his deportation. Mr. Lamont was informed at once that he had a right of appeal to the minister. Up until a late hour last night he had not exercised that right, but I am told that he filed an appeal about midnight.

Early this morning I began to make inquiries about this matter which I confess had disturbed me. I found that an appeal had been entered and I took steps to see that the material respecting the appeal was communicated to me in an unusually rapid way so that I could make a judgment upon it immediately. Upon considering the evidence in the case I could not satisfy myself that Mr. Lamont necessarily fell within the classes of persons mentioned in section 5 (l), and I accordingly decided to give him the benefit of the doubt and to allow his appeal.

I have been advised that he is on his way to Toronto to fulfil one of the two engagements. I took this course because it did not appear to me that, whatever the letter of the law might be, a lecture given by Mr. Lamont at the Unitarian church in Toronto would be the slightest danger to the security of Canada, and I did not think it was wise to have any unnecessary impression created that we in this country were afraid of listening to people like Mr. Lamont or that we were trying to suppress free speech. I think I might add, however, that it is my own belief, a belief which I doubt if I could support by concrete evidence, that this was a deliberate attempt on the part of a communist front organization to portray this country as a country in which we are afraid to allow free speech.

Mr. Fulton: In view of the serious nature of the minister's last statement, can he tell the house what is the name of the communist front organization about whom he has these suspicions?

Mr. Pickersgill: The name of the organization in question is the national council for American-Soviet friendship.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would he let the house in on the secret of how in the Lamont case—and I am not criticizing the judgment of the minister—it was that they operated so quickly? I should like to get the name of the solicitors who can get action that quickly. Would the minister tell the house?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know, sir, whether that kind of question merits an answer in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I now ask the minister once more, regardless of what he thinks of it, was it the president of the Liberal federation of Canada who did it?

Mr. Pickersgill: The first person who motivated the minister to take any action in this matter was the minister himself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the New York Times says.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration arising out of the last part of his statement in which he replied that Dr. Corliss Lamont had been a tool of a communist front organization in his attempt to enter Canada. I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the fact that Dr. Corliss Lamont was exonerated by a committee of the United States Senate on precisely that charge—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): —and that the charges—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member giving information or is he asking for information?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am asking whether the minister knows, because I am very much surprised if he does not know, but apparently he does not.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps no one would be surprised if the hon. member would ask a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I would be extremely surprised if, when Hansard is examined, it will be found that I said that Dr. Lamont was a tool of anybody. I do not think I used any such expression. I have not made an exhaustive study of his biography and I hope I shall not be obliged to do so.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FURTHER STATEMENT REGARDING IMPENDING SEAMEN'S STRIKE ON GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received an answer to his telegram to the seafarers' international union? If so, have they accepted the offer of the government to provide mediation services?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am sure you will be glad to know that my answer will not be as long as yesterday. In answer to the hon. member's question I should like to bring the house up to date, and I shall be quite brief.

The Canadian director of the seafarers' international union has advised me by telegram that the strike deadline set for two companies could only be postponed by means of another vote which could not be taken in time. However, he promised co-operation in any effort to mediate the dispute. I replied that mediation would be provided on the understanding that the mediator's efforts would be directed toward settling the entire dispute involving the seven employers rather than just the two where a strike is threatened.

Counsel representing the association has also advised me that the companies are willing to participate in any mediation proceedings, despite the strike notice to two companies, on the understanding that such proceedings are between the association of lake carriers and the seafarers' international union.

In order, therefore, to assist the parties in the settlement of this dispute I have appointed Mr. H. Carl Goldenberg, Q.C., of Montreal, as an industrial inquiry commission under section 56 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to act as mediator. Mr. Goldenberg has had many years experience in dealing with labour relations matters and is entering upon this assignment immediately.

RAILWAYS AND NON-OPERATING UNIONS—REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Has the minister now heard from the two parties to the meeting which was discontinued yesterday concerning railway wage negotiations, and can he say what steps he is taking to try to achieve the implementation of the report of the conciliation board that he appointed?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have heard from the two parties. As a matter of fact, I have been in constant touch with the representatives of the two parties. The government is giving very full consideration to this important matter but I am not in a position to make a statement on it today. However, I can assure my hon. friend and the house that I will make a report just as soon as it is possible to do so.

FISHERIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF FLOOR PRICE ON DOGFISH LIVERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the delay in the completion of the discussion of the minister's estimates, could the minister make a statement to the house at an early date answering the question I asked, as recorded at page 1617 of Hansard, with regard to the establishment of a floor price on dogfish livers? I am not asking for an answer today but I should like the minister to make a statement as to what has been decided.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): About ten days or two weeks ago the government did decide to take the advice of the fisheries research board and the fisheries prices support board and offer a bounty of $10 a ton on dogfish delivered to reduction plants on the west coast. At the present time the fishing industry and the fishermen's union are considering the matter with respect to the amount which the industry can afford to pay to supplement that bounty to make the operation an economical one.

EDUCATION

SHORTAGE OF ENGINEERS AND SCIENTISTS—INVESTIGATION BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): I should like to repeat a question I addressed to the Prime Minister the other day on the orders of the day and to which I did not receive an answer. It had to do with what steps are being taken by the government to ascertain how great the shortage and need of engineers and scientists in Canada is.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will have to take that question as notice. I do not know what kind of investigations are being made. I know that there have been communications to the government and that there may be information available about the subject. I will try to get it and communicate it to the house.

PIPES LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has yet tabled the current agreements between the government and the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company which he said yesterday he would table as soon as they had been signed?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I understood that the agreements were to be tabled before the house met today. Perhaps my parliamentary assistant can tell me whether they were. I feel sure they were but if not they will be tabled very shortly.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, they were tabled before two o'clock.

INQUIRY AS TO REPLIES TO MR. MCMAHON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether his inquiries in his department have established whether or not he wrote any letters replying to Mr. McMahon's letters? The minister said he would table them if there were such.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have been rather busy and I have not been able to search my personal files for acknowledgments of letters. However, I have a staff who read Hansard. I assume that my staff noticed the discussion, and I also assume that if there had been any replies they would have been tabled. I have not inquired personally.

Mr. Fulton: Does your staff not usually let you know what they find?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Sometimes, and sometimes not.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—ATTITUDE TOWARD SHIPMENT OF ARMS TO MIDDLE EAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of press reports respecting the meeting of the NATO council. Was any arrangement or agreement arrived at as among Britain, the United States, France and Canada whereby there is going to be a change in the attitude that has been taken by these powers other than France toward the shipment of arms to the Middle East?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker; no such agreement was discussed or reached at the NATO meeting in Paris.

TRADE

GATT—REPORTED TARIFF CUTS BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister give the house any information about the reported tariff cuts that Canada is making within the GATT organization?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received a report from Geneva. I will be glad to announce it when any information comes to hand.

Income Tax Act

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

1. That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years, in the taxation of employees who are beneficiaries under an employees profit sharing plan, (a) gains and losses of the trustee under the plan in connection with investment transactions shall not be taken into account in calculating the income of the employee; (b) such part of any amount received by the trustee as a dividend from a taxable corporation as is taken into account in calculating the income of the employee shall be deemed to have been received by the employee as such a dividend for tax credit purposes; and (c) there shall be excluded in calculating the income of an employee for the period of his first three years as a beneficiary under the plan any amount contingently allocated to him if, within that period, the employee does not become entitled to receive that amount upon his withdrawal from the plan.

2. That for the 1955 and subsequent taxation years a deduction shall be allowed for expenses of attending in Canada not more than two conventions annually relating to the business of the taxpayer.

3. That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years uncertainty regarding the applicability of outstanding regulations respecting depletion allowances be removed.

The Chairman: House again in committee of ways and means on a certain proposed resolution to amend the Income Tax Act. May I remind hon. members that last evening the committee had completed its discussion with respect to paragraph 1 and that when the committee rose at ten o'clock it had been discussing paragraph 2.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, last evening I had made some remarks on paragraph 2 chiefly concerning the fact that the words "in Canada" should be taken out of this particular section. I should like to repeat those remarks in substance again today, Mr. Chairman, particularly in view of some remarks which are reported in the Globe and Mail this morning and which were allegedly made by the Minister of Public Works last night in Cambridge, Massachusetts, at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. I refer to the news item in the Globe and Mail this morning which is quoting the minister as follows:

"We are a nation on the march," he said. "We are a nation keenly in need of the sort of training and skills you are getting here at M.I.T. . . ."

Then further on we find this:

He said Canada faces a great shortage of engineers at a time when every effort is being utilized to develop natural resources.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that some ministers of the government are trying to encourage the training of engineers, scientists and so on, lauding the skills taught at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology while on the other hand some other branches of the government are apparently trying to prevent Canadian engineers or rather to discourage Canadian engineers—I should not say "prevent"; "discourage" is a better word—scientists, doctors and so on from obtaining the advantages of this institution to which I have referred and many other fine institutions in the United States, Europe and elsewhere. Last evening the Minister of National Revenue made some remarks at which I was somewhat surprised when he said that the reason they had limited this to "in Canada", or he infers that the reason the two words "in Canada" were included, was that one doctor had gone to Europe to attend a convention, had taken his wife with him and apparently had gone on quite a spree and tried to deduct the expenses. That well may be the case. Then I believe the minister went on to say that because of certain events such as that—and I would not disagree with the minister in that particular instance—it was decided—

Mr. McCann: Did I say "such as that"? No, I did not.

Mr. Nesbitt: Possibly I may be open to correction but I shall leave the matter to Hansard.

Mr. McCann: I referred to nobody's spree at all.

Mr. Nesbitt: Possibly the minister did not use the word "spree".

Mr. McCann: No.

Mr. Nesbitt: The inference was the same, namely that the doctor had a very good holiday.

Mr. McCann: No. That is your inference.

Mr. Nesbitt: I will stand by whatever is in Hansard with respect to what the minister said. It was to the effect that the doctor had a nice trip or words to that effect. I would be prepared to agree with the minister that in cases such as this the minister is probably quite right. But if scientists, doctors or engineers were going to attend conventions where their own knowledge would be increased and thereby the technical knowledge and skills required in this country, which is apparently in need of them at the present time, it would not seem to me to be too difficult to iron out the matter. For instance, a regulation could be made in the department that they could not take any of their wives or families with them. I think that would help. Possibly there might be some limitation on the expenses that could be deducted for conventions and such like. But simply to say that a certain incident—and that may be possible—prompted this legislation is rather shortsighted, in my opinion, in view of the need for trained scientists, engineers and doctors in this country. Since, as I believe I mentioned last evening, it is difficult to increase the numbers too quickly, the best we could possibly do is to try to increase the skills of those who are already there.

The discussion last evening, Mr. Chairman, seemed to revolve chiefly around the medical profession in particular. I would certainly agree that it is an extremely important profession. Advance in medicine might certainly be helped by our Canadian doctors attending conventions in the United States, South America and in Europe. I do not think any one would suggest that Canada is the sole repository of medical knowledge. A little later on in his remarks I believe the Minister of National Revenue suggested that if wealthy men go to these conventions, they should pay for it. I would quite agree that wealthy doctors, engineers and other scientists can well afford to go to conventions in other places. But by the time that men in the medical profession and in the other professions I have mentioned get to be wealthy they are usually fairly well on in years. It is the young scientists, the young doctors and the young engineers who are interested in getting this additional knowledge, not the old ones, or at least not to the same extent. If you want to encourage our young doctors, scientists and engineers to try to acquire knowledge in their fields and thus help not only themselves but this country when it is in need. I do not think the way to go about it is to discourage them in every way possible. Everyone knows that young doctors, and young scientists on staffs or working on their own often have families and have children to bring up; maybe there is a mortgage on the house to pay off. They have not enough money to go travelling even to fairly close parts of the United States. I think the government could very well help out by allowing any such scientist, engineer or doctor to go to two conventions a year, no matter where they might be, and allow their expenses, within certain financial limitations, as a deduction from income. Of course, this would not apply to their wives and families. I would agree with the remarks made last night in this respect by the Minister of National Revenue; that would certainly not be reasonable.

I cannot see why this restriction is placed in this resolution. As was pointed out by several hon. members last night, a doctor in Vancouver might want to attend a convention in Halifax or in Quebec city, which is a long distance from Vancouver, and his expenses would be deductible. But if there were a convention in Buffalo a doctor living in Hamilton would not be able to deduct his expenses if he attended that convention, yet there would be little comparison between the two items of expense.

I should like to point out one other matter in this regard. A great many young scientists are on the staffs of our universities. Since they are salaried people, I understand from my colleagues who are accountants that they could not make a deduction of their expenses in attending conventions. However, their university could pay their expenses and allow them as a deduction. I think most of us realize, particularly in view of the news in the last few days that universities in Canada have had to raise their fees—which is a regrettable circumstance indeed—that most universities are not affluent. If the universities of this country wish to increase the knowledge of the scientists or engineers on their staffs, then the administrative bodies of the universities should be allowed to send these staff members abroad to gain that additional knowledge. The knowledge in all branches of science, like medicine, is certainly not confined to one country. I would hope that the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary assistant would give some kind of answer this afternoon to explain why there is this restriction, "in Canada", included in this resolution.

Mr. Barnett: I must say, Mr. Chairman, I was rather disappointed a few minutes ago to observe that the Minister of Finance had apparently been called out of the house, because I certainly felt we should have had some reply from him to some of the questions that have been raised before this resolution is carried. I feel that some of the problems that were raised last night in respect to the inequities that, in my opinion, are going to be aggravated by the introduction of the proposal in section 2 of the resolution, do call for some explanation by the government as to why they are going to be allowed to continue. I recognize that the Minister of National Revenue did participate in the debate last night. But I would point out to you, as the minister so often and carefully explains to us, that the minister's function is an administrative one relating to the collection of taxes rather than to policy in regard to the imposition of taxes. His participation in the debate does not really constitute an answer from the government on the policy matters that have been raised.

In regard to the question of the discriminatory features that are in the present section 5 of the act, which I suggested last night are going to be further aggravated by the proposal that is now before us, I mentioned that I had raised this particular matter last year and the year before. I recall that a year ago the parliamentary assistant did make some reply but his reply, in effect, was that he would draw my remarks to the attention of the minister. It would appear that if we get any reply on this matter it is going to be a somewhat similar reply from the parliamentary assistant. I would submit that on a matter which is as important as this, which affects many millions of Canadians, that sort of answer from the government is not good enough. For that reason I think we should expect some statement on these questions from the Minister of Finance which we could accept as a statement of the government's attitude or the government's policy on this matter.

If in their view discrimination does not exist, I for one would welcome some attempt on their part to explain why they take the view the act is not discriminatory now. It seems to me when one thinks of the situation I mentioned last night where you find an appeal being dismissed, and the judge who dismissed the appeal expressing such obvious sympathy with the plight of the appellant, as was the case in the situation to which I referred, that in itself should give us cause for considering the validity of the arguments I have been advancing. I know that it is all very well for me to go to the minister privately, as I did at the end of the last session, and get from him a straightforward private answer, which was really no explanation of policy. It is all very well for me to have to do that again this year, but I submit we have a right to expect some sort of explanation from the government or the Minister of Finance, who is charged with the responsibility of setting government policy on matters of this kind, before we are prepared to vote on the question that is now before us.

Mr. Macdonnell: Before the parliamentary assistant answers, I want to repeat one suggestion I made last night. What is the objection to putting in the words "and the United States", making it Canada and the United States? If my argument last night that that would cost little or nothing was valid, and if the argument was valid that there may be a great balance of convenience in extending the scope of the measure to include south of the line, I ask the parliamentary assistant to give us an answer on that. I would further ask, if it is not possible for him to give us an affirmative answer today, would he at least say to us that this will be considered before the budget bill is introduced.

Mr. Monteith: Last evening the parliamentary assistant had this to say, as reported on page 3704 of Hansard for May 8, 1956, when he was discussing clause No. 2:

> It is proposed here to restore more or less the administrative practice that had been in existence prior to 1955, when that court decision was rendered.

I understand that to mean they were simply reverting to the situation as it existed before. Was it not the practice of the department to allow medical people to attend one convention in the United States at that time?

Mr. Benidickson: Now, Mr. Chairman, probably I could answer some of the points that have been raised in connection with this problem of deductions with respect to expense of attending conventions. It is not unusual for government proposals to be criticized from opposite directions. I think that is the situation we are in today. There are members of one group saying the proposal is unduly restrictive.

Then, we have had the proposal criticized by another group saying that it was unwise to re-introduce this opportunity at all. I do want to say at once to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that he could not have had a reply to his remarks of yesterday from a more qualified person than the Minister of National Revenue, who assumes all collection awkwardness related to tax laws if wise proposals are not contained in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would permit me a word? I remind him that the Minister of National Revenue spoke before I did last night and therefore was not replying to the argument I advanced.

Mr. Benidickson: In any event, he pointed out the difficulty from the administrative point of view of examining and deciding on the merits of exemptions of relatively small consequence in dollar amount. They involve a great deal of detail and cost in the examination of the individual tax returns, and so on.

The hon. member for Greenwood placed quite a specific question forward. He said he wondered why the words "United States" could not be very readily included in the resolution. Well, what is really being done here is of course to provide something that was not secure or certain for the taxpayer in the past. This is really something to the taxpayer's advantage, since the court case technically speaking there was a doubt cast as to the propriety of even allowing the deductions in the past.

Now, part of the thinking that restricts this to Canada is that the merit and advantages to the taxpayer from attendance at conventions outside the country cannot be determined as competently by the tax officials as claims for deductions for attending conventions in Canada. The other is that most people, through their trade and professional associations, probably have some obligation in the matter of attending either a provincial or a national convention in Canada; but it is seldom that those obligations extend to the attending of conventions outside of Canada. If they do extend, it is usual that the person going to a foreign country to attend a convention is an official delegate and has probably been provided with his expenses by the association that he is representing officially. But even if that is not so, the general reasonableness of providing some restriction and limitation I think will appeal to the committee, and I think it stands as something between the criticism that this is unduly restrictive and the criticism that it should not be restored at all.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on this matter. There are the chiropodists. They do not have any colleges in Canada but they generally have a convention in the United States at one or more of the colleges each year. Instead of having just the word "Canada", would it not be possible to put in the words "Canada and not more than 1,000 miles outside of Canada"? That would limit it to the United States. I know of one medical man who wondered whether he could afford to go to a convention in San Francisco.

Mr. Nicholson: Or Florida.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): No, this was San Francisco. There was a medical convention there. He decided he would learn something there, and he went to San Francisco. When he returned to my city a case came before him which he was able to cure. He saved the woman's life because at that convention he had learned something that enabled him to give the woman treatment that he would not have been able to give her otherwise because no one in the district had the knowledge that they had at that time.

Mr. McCann: Andersen's Fairy Tales.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): No, that is the truth.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have one comment to make. I quite agree with the parliamentary assistant about extending this beyond North America. I do not find the answer to my very simple request wholly convincing. Before the bill is brought down will the parliamentary assistant take another look at this in the hope that there might be an amendment?

Mr. Benidickson: That is the invariable practice. Usually there is an interval between the introduction of these resolutions and the preparation of the amending bills in the final form. I assure my hon. friend that invariably the comments of the house at the resolution stage are examined very carefully before the bill is introduced.

Mr. Monteith: May I restate my question? Was it not the practice previously to allow one convention in the United States?

Mr. Benidickson: I think that was true under the administrative practice.

Mr. Monteith: Thank you.

Mr. Holowach: In the paragraph the year 1955 is given as the time in which the expenses of attending two conventions in Canada will be allowed. The paragraph reads:

> That for the 1955 and subsequent taxation years a deduction shall be allowed for expenses of attending in Canada not more than two conventions annually relating to the business of the taxpayer.

Since all of us have made our returns for the year 1955, just in what way will this provision be taken into account? Will provision be made in 1956 for the 1955 convention expenses?

Mr. Benidickson: The intention is simply to keep uninterrupted the tax practice to the extent mentioned in the resolution, anybody who filed a tax return with respect to 1955 in fact had notice of this intention in March when the budget was introduced and prior to the filing of his return.

Mr. Holowach: Will provision be made for those who were not aware of it?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, they can submit a claim for reassessment.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I think the point brought out by the hon. member for Oxford and others relative to medical men is a sound and sensible one. For instance, in my own case my own dentist, who is a very able man in his profession, spends several weeks every year in New York, Chicago, or in some other centre attending clinics which he tells me are invaluable to him in keeping up with and abreast of the latest techniques in dentistry, and it makes a great deal of difference in the kind of treatment he is able to provide his patients. He also does considerable lecturing, and these trips are of great assistance to him in that regard.

As a businessman I have been able to travel extensively in the United States and in other places to gain information for my company and I have been able to write off all expenses without any query. I can see no difference between that and trips made by medical men, scientists, engineers and so on, gaining information which is of great help to them in their professions. I do not think the government has given a satisfactory answer to this. The answer is simply: we do not want to do it, therefore we are not going to do it. I have not yet heard a realistic reason given by either the parliamentary assistant or the Minister of National Revenue as to why such expenses are not allowed to medical men, scientists, engineers and so on. I should like the government either to give a more plausible reason for not granting this request or to go ahead and follow the sensible course of granting it.

The Chairman: Have we completed our discussion of paragraph 2?

Mr. Nicholson: I am not satisfied with the answer the parliamentary assistant gave to the hon. member for Edmonton East. While the Minister of Finance announced his intention in March, this is a new state of affairs when it is taken for granted that laws become effective whenever the Minister of Finance makes an announcement. I think we should at least show the taxpayers of this country the courtesy of telling them they will have to wait until parliament enacts legislation.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the opinions expressed by the Minister of National Revenue last night when he discussed some of the problems that arise in connection with the passing of this legislation. I think it is bad enough to be using it at this stage but I think harking back to 1955 is unnecessary and unfortunate. If taxpayers were able to start with their 1956 returns, that should be all the minister could possibly ask this house to support. Certainly the taxpayers of Canada have filed their returns for the year 1955 and if they have not penalties will be levied. I can see no justification for the minister asking us now to support this section of the proposal which says that whatever has been paid in 1955 can be included.

I wonder if the minister would reconsider this point and decide whether or not he might change the date from 1955 to 1956?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have indicated that I thought there were advantages for the taxpayer in maintaining the practice without an interruption. I would think that a great number of taxpayers who for some years have been making claims of this kind are probably not aware of the exchequer court decision of 1955 and in the regular course of filling out their 1955 returns have in fact claimed this exemption as usual.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, in view of the comment made last night by the Minister of National Revenue to the effect that these various exemptions create administrative difficulties and prompt some people to abuse them, and in view of the statement made by the Minister of Finance some time ago that one exemption begets the desire for another, I wonder whether any consideration has been given to raising the statutory exemption rather than providing these incidental exemptions?

In fact, perhaps the time has come to withdraw some of the little exemptions that we are allowed here and there and replace them by a straight increase in the statutory exemption to, let us say, $1,500 single and $3,000 married. Certainly it would be more acceptable to the average taxpayer and I gather from what the Minister of National Revenue said last night that it would make his task a much simpler one.

The Chairman: Have we completed our discussion of paragraph 2?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Paragraph 3.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word or two about this. My understanding is—and I am reading from the ministers' budget speech at page 2332 of Hansard—that this resolution is really connected with and arises partly because of a supreme court decision known as the Home Oil case. The resolution itself strikes me as a rather amazing departure from the somewhat austere and matter-of-fact wording of resolutions because what we read here is:

> That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years uncertainty regarding the applicability of outstanding regulations respecting depletion allowances be removed.

I would have thought that that could only happen in another and better world but nevertheless it is desirable to have a high objective. It does prompt me to say, however, that the resolution as worded sounds more like a prayer than a resolution.

Now coming back to the references made to the Home Oil case, I read from the minister's speech:

> The reasons for judgment given by the court in the Home Oil case have created some uncertainty as to whether the present law and regulations as amended in 1951 are in sufficiently clear terms to support assessments made since 1951. It is proposed, therefore, to amend the law and regulations now to ensure that the intent of the 1951 amendment shall govern for the intervening period and for the future. This amendment will not deprive any taxpayer of his rights under the supreme court decision for the years prior to 1951.

I take it that the parliamentary assistant will say something on this by way of explanation of the problem which is arising in the minds of oil producers between 1951 and 1956 and I also hope that he will just say a word about the terms of the Home Oil decision so that we may have on the record an explanation of the situation which prompts this resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: It will be noted by the house that it is now proposed that this amendment to the law and regulations shall date from 1956 and not from 1951, which was mentioned in the speech made by the minister as found at page 2332 of Hansard.

As originally announced, it was intended to make this amendment date from 1951 so there would be no uncertainty in the period from 1951 to the present. It was never intended to deprive the taxpayer of his rights under the supreme court decision for the years prior to 1951. However, representations have been made since the budget speech from which my hon. friend quoted to the effect that amending the law effective to 1951 would deprive taxpayers of the right to test the validity of the law and regulations as they now stand and have stood for the period from 1951 to the present and accordingly it is now proposed that the amendment shall date from 1956 only.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question or two to the parliamentary assistant on this particular subject. He states that by this proposed amendment he hopes to clarify some misunderstanding on the part of oil operators and others as to what the department actually means by depletion.

I presume what the department intends to do is to carry on in the future the same general policy followed by the department over the last several years, and that in effect is this: a statement to Canadian oil companies that if they want depletion on their oil producing properties they must quit exploring; however, if they want to gain the benefits of depletion allowance on their producing properties all they have to do is quit exploring for oil and let the exploration job be done by someone else.

It is a fact, sir, that as the regulations are now administered very few—as a matter of fact, less than one-tenth of Canadian oil companies—draw any benefit whatsoever from the depletion allowance. It is also true that while the act or the regulations would indicate a depletion allowance of one-third of net profit is allowed on producing properties, in actual fact benefit from depletion for Canadian oil companies has amounted to less than 1 per cent of the revenue derived from producing properties.

The great question of Canadian policy with regard to depletion has been the cause of a great deal of concern not only to oil companies but also to governments and the general public of this country. For example, I find that the views I have expressed on this particular subject from time to time over the last three years are fully supported by the government of the province of Saskatchewan, a government which, as a socialist government, might normally be considered as one opposed to any form of tax hand-out, if you want to call depletion that, to private corporations. Yet we have a statement by Hon. J. H. Brockelbank, minister of natural and mineral resources of Saskatchewan, which appeared in the Western Oil Examiner of January 15 last. Mr. Brockelbank had this to say:

> Another important point is that due to a special tax concession to risk investment capital in the United States, the American oil and gas industry has enjoyed an advantage over Canadian risk capital in the same field. In coming to Canada, the American oil industry has spent dollars which otherwise would have found their way into the American treasury.
> These dollars, although welcome in Canada, have placed the Canadian investment dollar at a considerable disadvantage because of unequal dollar responsibility.

In its submission to the Gordon royal commission the Saskatchewan government went a little further than that. I think the comments made at that time might appropriately be read into the record of this house. The brief of the Saskatchewan government had this to say:

> The second general question to which the attention of the commission is drawn concerns what appears to be the continuing hesitancy on the part of Canadians and Canadian companies to invest freely in the development of their national assets. The great resources boom that has played such a prominent part in the post-war expansion in the Canadian economy stems in large measure from the substantial inflow of foreign capital, first from the United States and latterly from the United Kingdom and western Europe.
> This has been as true in Saskatchewan as in other provinces, especially in oil exploration where non-resident capital has played the major development role. The inflow of capital has made, and will undoubtedly continue to make, a valued and lasting contribution to the growth of the provincial economy. At the same time it would be highly desirable to secure a more active and expanded participation by Canadians and Canadian capital in this growth. Among the problems mentioned by Canadian companies in this connection, however, is the fact that under the combined impact of United States and Canadian federal income tax laws and regulations, the American-owned companies operating in this country enjoy a competitive tax advantage over Canadian companies. If it is the policy of the federal government to encourage the fullest possible participation and ownership of resources by Canadian capital in the expansion of the domestic economy, a careful review and action to remove any competitive disabilities suffered by Canadian companies should be suggested.

The government of Alberta, which of course is a Social Credit administration, made even stronger representations in connection with this particular phase of the Canadian tax policy to the Gordon royal commission. In his statement to that commission the premier of Alberta was quite clear that the government of Alberta supported the idea of the inflow of foreign capital to that province, which of course has meant hundreds of millions of dollars for the provincial treasury, but at the same time it was said that the government of Alberta would like to see a much greater participation by Canadian companies and Canadian investors. It was suggested that the best way of achieving this would be by a revision of the Canadian tax laws in order to create actually workable and effective depletion allowances much along the lines of those applied under the United States law to all companies in the United States, whether they carry out their spendings in the United States or anywhere else in the world.

The Conservative party has put its views on record in connection with this important matter, and they have been on record for a long time. However, last January the national Conservative association of Canada decided to go a step further and put on the formal record its views on the matter of Canadian tax laws, particularly with regard to depletion. The following resolution was approved by the national Conservative association:

> Whereas it is in the national interest that Canadians be encouraged to participate to the maximum in the development and ownership of Canadian natural resources such as oil and gas and other minerals;
> We urge the Canadian government to amend the Income Tax Act, particularly in regard to depletion allowance and lease acquisition cost write-offs in order that Canadians may compete on a nearer to equal competitive basis in the acquisition and development of Canadian oil and gas and other minerals with Americans who have the advantage of United States tax law provisions.

These things I have read indicate pretty clearly that no matter where the political views of Canadians happen to lie as between a socialist or Social Credit provincial government or the Conservative party of Canada, all are agreed on one thing, that our Canadian tax laws discriminate against Canadian investment in the development of Canadian resources.

Before going any further perhaps I should examine the question of just what is a depletion allowance. Depletion allowances are basically and simply the recognition that an oil well or a mine producing any form of mineral, be it coal, gold, iron or any other, is a wasting asset, is something strictly limited as to the ultimate production which will be yielded. In order to stay permanently in business the owner must continuously explore to replace the reserves that are produced. In principle, depletion allowances provide natural resources production industries with a lower rate of taxation than other industries which do not have the same problem of replacing by exploration the products they produce. Depletion does not apply to what might be termed the normal business phases of such an industry as the crude oil industry. In other words the profits from refining or marketing the oil are taxed at the full corporate tax rate without benefit of any depletion allowance.

Under the present Canadian policy, a policy which has prevailed for some years, those operating oil and gas wells are extended a depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent of the net profits, if any, remaining after all the costs of exploration and development have been recovered. However, because the huge expenditures in recent years have far exceeded the gross production income, only about one-tenth of the Canadian companies engaged in exploration have been in a position to make any net production income against which to apply a depletion allowance. The actual benefit of depletion allowances so far has only been about 1 per cent of the spendings made to replace and increase crude reserves. Therefore the purposes of the depletion provisions have been largely defeated.

Under the present regulations a Canadian company could discover an oil or gas field, and if it were carrying on active exploration work it could produce all the oil or gas from that pool and receive very little if any in the way of depletion allowance. On the other hand, if that company decided to halt or reduce its exploration work it could derive a substantial depletion allowance on the ultimate profits from the operation of that field. There is thus a penalty imposed under the Canadian tax laws upon any company willing to continue large-scale exploration, and that is a most undesirable thing in a nation whose future depends in no small measure upon the continued risking of large amounts of capital on natural resources exploration and development.

In contrast to the limited application of the depletion provisions to Canadian companies which pay out a large part of the exploration development costs in western Canada, there is under the present tax policy a depletion allowance of 25 per cent of gross income extended to the recipients of gross and net royalty interests in Canadian oil and gas wells. In other words those who do not take part in the exploration costs of the oil and have a royalty interest in the production of individual wells are entitled to the full 25 per cent gross depletion allowance. This is allowed to many farmers and others who own mineral rights, and is a much greater depletion allowance than is allowed under the Canadian law to Canadian companies who are bearing the entire cost of exploring and developing these products.

I have suggested in the house at various times in the past that the government should amend its present depletion allowance regulations to provide that the present allowance of 25 per cent of gross production income now permitted to royalty owners in Canada be extended also to those who provide the costs of exploration and development, and that we should use this gross depletion allowance in place of the current allowance of a so-called 33⅓ per cent of any ultimate net profits. Such a step would go a long way toward providing a continuing incentive for Canadian capital to maintain a large-scale exploration program in Canada. In addition, it would also put the Canadian in a more nearly equal position to his competitor, the American, in the drive to develop Canadian resources.

I might say that under United States law United States companies have a choice of the most beneficial to them of two depletion methods. They can either take 27½ per cent on gross production income by way of depletion, or else they may take 50 per cent of net production income for depletion. The proposal I make that our depletion should be 25 per cent of gross production income is still not nearly as generous as that provided under United States law.

In addition to depletion on oil and gas wells, we do have in Canada depletion on our other mineral resources, and there seems to be no consistency whatsoever in the departments's application or determination of the principle of depletion. For example, base and precious metal mines are allowed a depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent of their annual profits. In the case of gold mines they are allowed a depletion allowance of either 40 per cent of their profits each year or else a depletion allowance of $4 per ounce of gold produced in that year. In the case of industrial mineral mines dealing with non-bedded deposits we have a depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent of the profits in each year. In the case of coal mines we have a straight depletion of 10 cents per ton for each ton of coal mined in any given year. There are also in the case of certain types of mines special allowances by way of tax concessions.

But in each of these other mineral industries we have a situation somewhat different from that applying to the oil and gas industry. In the case of a metal mine or a coal mine we do not have the operator of that mine faced with the necessity of huge capital expenditures on exploration and development. In the case of oil particularly the companies, big or small, if they are going to stay successfully in business, must gamble up to many times the gross amount of income they can hope to receive from their properties that are producing at the present time, and the ratio of moneys they must expend for oil exploration compared with their production income is far higher than in the case of base metals or precious metals.

It has been pointed out very ably by a great many executives of various companies, big and small, including executives of United States oil companies, at the recent Gordon commission hearings that we in Canada make it tougher for Canadians to take part in their own resource development by making our depletion regulations in Canada somewhat tougher than those applying in the case of our American brethren. For example, here is a statement made on March 28 at the annual meeting of Canadian Oil Companies Limited, which I believe is the largest single wholly Canadian-owned integrated oil company. Harold Rea, president of Canadian Oil Companies Limited, had this to say:

> The Canadian tax structure . . . gives non-Canadians distinct competitive advantage in our own oil fields.

He went on to say:

> Canadian crude oil must compete with foreign crude, but it is at a disadvantage in such competition if it is developed and produced in a tax climate less favourable than in other countries.

He concluded by saying:

> We risk and lose one hundred cents on every dollar on the cost of unproductive acreage. United States companies risk only the net cost after deducting income tax.

The practical effect, so far as western Canada is concerned, is that there has been an increasing percentage of the proved and potential oil and gas lands of the west going into the hands of foreign companies. That is something we in the west do not blame on the United States oil companies because the fault largely lies right here in Canada, and I believe lies largely in the hands of the federal income tax department. By our policies, particularly with respect to depletion and certain other phases of taxation, we have placed our Canadian companies at a very serious disadvantage in the development of our own Canadian resources.

I may say, sir, that there have been a number of Canadian independent oil companies that have developed in recent years and have done a fairly successful job of growing. But when we examine how they have grown we find that they have grown despite Canadian tax law, not because of any assistance from it. For example, some of our independent Canadian oil companies have been able to expand because they have had men in charge of them who were smart enough to go into new areas in the west ahead of the major companies, and were able to take by reservation large blocks of land. At a subsequent date, when the area became hotter than ever, they were able to make deals with the larger American companies as a result of which these American firms spent money for the exploration of these Canadian companies' lands with a share of the profits going to the Canadian company without the Canadian company being obligated to spend large sums on exploration. That has been one road to success for some Canadian companies, and I hope that road remains open.

Another road to success for some of our Canadian oil companies has been in drilling contracting, in other words going into some of the more normal phases of business and doing work for other companies, carrying out seismograph surveys, drilling oil wells and so on, on a contract basis and earning normal profits which supplement their earning capacity very largely and make it a little easier for them to get into the main job of exploring for and developing oil resources.

Then we have another method that some Canadian companies have followed, namely by going into refining or marketing. Some Canadian companies have been quite successful in that regard despite the stiff competition existing in those fields.

The fourth method by which some Canadian companies have endeavoured to stay alive and grow has been one forced on them, one which I am confident is very detrimental to the interests of this country, namely that of doing the reverse of what the United States companies have been doing. Where American companies have been coming into Canada, we find that Canadian companies have been setting up United States subsidiaries to spend their good Canadian money exploring for and developing oil and gas in the United States in order to gain the advantage of the tax laws of that country. I may say that in recent years there has been an outflow of tens of millions of dollars of Canadian oil money into the northern United States, Texas and Oklahoma for the development of United States oil and gas resources because the tax climate in the United States is far more favourable than it has been and still is in Canada.

I would much prefer, and I am sure these Canadian oil companies would too, to see these dollars spent here in Canada in order to give Canadians a bigger share in their own natural resources. When the government brings in its amendment to the depletion regulations I would strongly recommend that it should not simply try to impose on a firm basis the interpretation of depletion that it had been applying or attempting to apply for some years, an interpretation which the Supreme Court of Canada threw out; but that in place of that it revise its depletion regulations in order to give Canadians and Canadian companies a far better break, to encourage greater Canadian participation in the development of some of our vital Canadian resources.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I should like briefly to support the argument which has just been made by my colleague the hon. member for Calgary South. I was extremely glad that the retroactive features of this legislation—which the budget address of the Minister of Finance indicated would be imposed—have now been withdrawn. However, I think we are still in the position that the depletion provisions of our Income Tax Act which are designed to be incentive legislation, are not acting as they were intended to act. As I understand the thing, their reason for being there is in order to give incentive to people to put money into exploration for oil and gas to develop that industry.

The nub of the matter is that they are not acting in the way they were intended to act because of the way they are applied. I think the matter is summed up concisely in the brief of the Canadian Petroleum Association to the royal commission on Canada's economic future which was presented on February 17, 1956. I should just like to read a paragraph from it concerning this matter:

> The Canadian Petroleum Association submits that the motive behind the present provisions of the Income Tax Act and regulations whereby the operator of an oil or gas well is allowed to deduct 33⅓ per cent of net profits as depletion or risk allowance was to provide the needed financial stimulus to enable the operator to use receipts from production for further exploration and development and still be able to pay a return to the shareholder. However, we also submit that the purpose of the allowance is largely defeated when Canadian producers, now in competition with foreign producers, must first deduct exploration expenditures before making this calculation. Indeed you might say that under the existing regulations the prudent operator is actually discouraged from the re-risking of his profit. This allowance, if properly applied, should result in more money being put back into exploration than would be possible without it. In this way, the efficient operator not only would have the incentive but also the necessary substantial financial boost to keep him interested in taking the risk involved in the search for oil. The chance of having a greater margin after tax would induce both investor and speculator to support our oil and gas industry. With that incentive more sums would be risked, and more lost, but the search would continue.

[Mr. Nickle.]

If we are to have this legislation for an incentive purpose, in order to encourage the search for oil, why not have it in a form which will accomplish that purpose? What is the use of having it in a form which does not accomplish what the legislation is designed to do? I would therefore also strongly urge the Minister of Finance to reconsider this matter and put this depletion allowance on a basis which will enable it to do what it was intended to do, namely encourage the search for oil and at the same time place Canadian operators in a much better position, vis-à-vis United States operators, than they are in at the present time.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, Mr. Chairman. I want to draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant again to the very unusual nature of this resolution. It really gives us nothing definite to bite on. Paragraphs 1 and 2, of course, are quite definite. We know exactly what we are talking about. We have just now heard a powerful comment on this theory of taxation. Before we pass this resolution it would seem to me that we should have a great deal more than we have now. It seems to me that we should have the government's decision as to the whole depletion policy. Surely that would not be unreasonable.

The minister has candidly told us that he is holding over the excise resolution because he has a certain conclusion still to arrive at there. I submit that this might be usefully done here. We have heard this situation reviewed by a man of admitted knowledge in the field. We have heard the statements he has made as to the disadvantages under which Canadian explorers labour. Certainly they are widely believed. The department may have an answer satisfactory to them, but there is no doubt that they are widely believed. There has been more than one submission to the Gordon commission along that line. I ran across one the other day from Husky Oil by a man called Neilson. I think he is a man of standing in the industry.

This resolution at the present time merely expresses, as I say, a pious hope that uncertainty be removed. It is desirable, of course. But what is desirable before we decide is that we know what it is we want to make certain. We have not been able to discuss that matter today at all. All we have by way of material is the Home Oil case. Then we have had what I submit is a formidable criticism by the hon. member for Calgary South. I do not imagine it would be reasonable to ask the government to submit the matter to the banking and commerce committee, but I suggest that it might well warrant further consideration and an income tax resolution, as I said a moment or two ago, sufficiently definite so that we may have a real debate on the question.

As the matter stands now, if nothing further is given to us it seems to me that this will go back to the government without any further suggestions, without any possibility of our criticizing what the government has in mind because, so far as I am aware, we do not know what it is. I have put this suggestion to the parliamentary assistant before he replies in the hope that it may be accepted as a reasonable and practical one likely to give us the necessary material so we can discuss it at the resolution stage.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I really do not think my friend the hon. member for Greenwood has any uncertainty about the word "uncertainty" that is referred to in this resolution. In speaking to the resolution he indicated that he had fully reread the remarks of the minister in the budget speech when the minister explained the nature of the uncertainty that was to be corrected this session.

Although there are only two paragraphs, I do not think it is necessary to read what the minister had to say as reported at page 2332 of Hansard of March 20. It was clear that he was attempting to leave no legal uncertainty as to the regulations or the intent of the government with respect to depletion allowances, even though the Home Oil court case may have created some uncertainty in the minds of certain people.

As to the broader argument with respect to depletion that has been advanced by the hon. member for Calgary South, may I say that I have every respect for his broad and special knowledge of the petroleum industry. However, I think he will agree with me that the content of his speech today varies little from the speeches he has made advocating similar policies not only last year but in previous sessions.

All I can say is that last year, on June 2, the Minister of Finance explained government policy with respect to depletion for the petroleum industry. He did that in answer to similar arguments that have been made here by both the hon. member for Calgary South, and the hon. member for Greenwood, who read editorial comment at the time from the Montreal Gazette. This comment was in support of an argument such as has been advanced again today by the hon. member for Calgary South.

Now, I think everyone who has spoken on this subject of depletion in the petroleum industry has made reference to the Gordon economic commission. Naturally those who advocate changes in the tax laws with respect to depletion allowances in the petroleum industry have quoted from associations that have come before that commission and advocated something similar to their own views. I am not particularly going to take the other side today, because the Minister of Finance outlined his views last year. He received representations along this line again this year, and came to the conclusion that it was not desirable to change the present law with respect to depletion, except to the extent he mentioned in his budget speech at page 2332 of Hansard.

In the meantime, since the last budget we have had the Gordon commission. As I have said, one of the matters about which many representations have been made to the commission is this matter of the depletion allowance in the petroleum industry. The minister came to the conclusion that this year he would not make any changes in the situation with respect to depletion pending some report that might come from this commission. Now, inasmuch as some quotations have been made from briefs presented to this commission, I think it is only fair that I might say there are two views on this subject, just as there are usually on anything else. I myself recently picked up in the press a comment on a submission that had been made by the Bailey Selburn Oil and Gas Company to the Gordon economic commission. They said:

> We believe that aggressive Canadian companies are well able to hold their place and have had a fair opportunity to do so.

I also note that one of our eminent accountants, Mr. J. G. Glassco, made representations to the Gordon commission and presented another view that has not been mentioned with respect to the United States investment, and I think it had a particular bearing on the investments that have been made in the Canadian oil fields. He is reported as having said in his brief:

> The great majority of the recent increase in foreign investment in Canada has come from the United States and the taxation pattern in that country, particularly since 1950, has provided strong incentives to the investment of capital in other countries.
> Reenactment of the United States excess profits tax at the time of the Korean war in 1950, and in force until 1953, brought about a situation where profits taxable at rates as high as 82 per cent could be used to blot up preliminary losses resulting from development of new business. A good deal of such money found its way into Canada, particularly in the case of the petroleum industry.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is what we are arguing.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend may present some aspects of United States tax law that may be more favourable to those engaged in the petroleum industry than might exist in Canada. On the other hand, I would point out to him that there are many features that are of advantage to corporate taxpayers in Canada who are engaged in the petroleum industry that do not apply to somebody similarly engaged in the United States. I refer to the fact that our corporate tax rate is lower than that in the United States. I refer to the fact that the dividend tax credit allowance was introduced in Canada prior to its introduction in the United States. Those are all factors that, of course, are not brought out when the argument is one-sided.

But I do assure my hon. friends that this matter of depletion was again considered this year, and for the reasons I have indicated, particularly because of the economic study, it was not thought any radical changes should be made beyond those that are contained in the budget resolution. I suggest to my hon. friend there is no uncertainty about the limitations contained in that resolution, because they are outlined in the budget speech.

Mr. Nickle: First of all, since the parliamentary assistant has quoted from the Bailey Selburn brief to the Gordon commission, I would say that I happen to have a copy of it here. I did mention in the course of my earlier remarks that a number of Canadian independent companies had been able to go along successfully by the use of devious routes other than the policies laid down by the tax department. Bailey Selburn is one of those which have been notably successful by the use of methods outside the tax policy which I mentioned in my remarks.

The Bailey Selburn brief to the Gordon royal commission, after pointing out that they had been able to succeed by other means than the tax policy in Canada, came out very strongly in favour of amending the Canadian tax laws. Their final submission to the Gordon commission was this:

> It is our opinion that amendments should be made in taxation regulations to permit:
> (a) A fair deduction for depletion of reserves on a gross production basis;
> (b) That lease costs be allowed as write-offs;
> (c) That moneys expended in drilling and exploration be deductible items for individuals and businesses in Canada where losses occur.

In other words Bailey Selburn, the outfit you have mentioned, joined with the rest of the industry in suggesting a change in the depletion laws.

The parliamentary assistant has said that since we have the Gordon commission and the Gordon commission is receiving a great many briefs on this subject and is going to come to some conclusion in the near future, perhaps we should not bother changing our policy on depletion now. Would it not be best, sir, to drop this amendment altogether and let the depletion law of Canada be that which the Supreme Court of Canada decided in the Home Oil case was the intention of parliament back in 1949? In other words, let us have in Canada well by well depletion, as the supreme court said was the intention of parliament in that Home Oil case.

Mr. Benidickson: Would my hon. friend say that has been the law since the regulation of 1951?

Mr. Nickle: The parliamentary assistant refers to the amendments made in 1951, which the minister now wishes to alter in order to avoid the chance that the Supreme Court of Canada will rule the 1951 amendment has exactly the same intent as the 1949 amendment. In other words the department obviously feels the Supreme Court of Canada will rule that in the amendment of 1951 parliament intended well by well depletion, and not this present policy of the department which rules that if you are going to spend money on exploration you cannot have depletion.

I would strongly suggest, sir, that we drop the amendment altogether and leave the law as it stands until we get a recommendation from the Gordon royal commission. In his answers last June 2, the Minister of Finance stated that a change in the depletion law was not necessary because we did not have a capital gains tax in Canada which, I presume, was one of those advantages under Canadian law that did not apply under United States tax law, where a capital gains tax does exist.

Sir, would the parliamentary assistant please explain to me how the absence of a so-called capital gains tax in Canada offers any benefit to the company whose purpose is to go out to explore for, develop and produce oil and gas? Surely the parliamentary assistant is not suggesting that the Canadian oil company makes its profit out of production by spending its money for exploration, then developing production and selling it presumably to the Americans or to anyone else, in order to realize a profit on production that it cannot realize under the existing tax policy of his department.

Mr. Benidickson: As to the latter point, Mr. Chairman, the reference to capital gains, of course, is a broad reference. My hon. friend did advance the argument that Canadians were discouraged from making investments, and particularly in their resources, because of discouraging tax laws. Certainly the absence of a capital gains tax in Canada is of advantage to investors in the natural resources of the country.

Mr. Macdonnell: It may be that I emphasized too much the wording of paragraph 3, but I did think there had been certain recent events which possibly create a situation where this thing might have another look taken at it. I am not going to pursue the argument today. Indeed, my argument is that we are not in a very good position to pursue the argument today. My thought was that in view of the representations recently made to the minister, a situation might have been created where a new look could have been taken at this. Instead of having to debate merely the removal of uncertainty from 1956 on—perhaps the parliamentary assistant will explain the situation with regard to the intervening years—I had hoped that it indicated a somewhat broader approach to the question, and that we might therefore ask to have paragraph 3 held, as the excise resolutions are being held, with the hope that it might be debated on a somewhat different basis and not merely as a question of removing uncertainty.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend knows there is no relationship so far as the statutes are concerned and the presentation to this house of the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. This is the last paragraph of the resolution with respect to the Income Tax Act, and the two statutes are dealt with by the house quite independently.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Before the paragraph carries I cannot help but add my voice to the submission made by the hon. member for Calgary South, in connection with his last remark. Certainly the resolution indicates that it is going to remove uncertainty, but it will obviously remove it definitely to the benefit of the department and not of the taxpayer. It seems to me the least that should be allowed here would be the continuation of the rule as laid down in the Home Oil case, and the taxpayer might be able to risk the chance of an unfavourable decision in the ensuing years, or until such time as the department might make up its mind as the result of submissions to the Gordon commission. When you read about removing the uncertainty it sounds very much as if it is giving some benefit to the taxpayer, and I cannot see that taking place.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Nickle: I should like to repeat one request to the minister; I am happy to see he is back in the house. In view of the fact that the Gordon royal commission has made, among other things, an extensive study of Canadian tax policy as it applies to natural resources industries, including oil, and recognizing the fact that the Gordon commission will be bringing in its report sometime in the next few months, would he consider withdrawing his resolution calling for an amendment to the depletion regulations until after the Gordon commission recommendations are available? In other words, let the definition of depletion allowance made by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Home Oil case stand rather than try now, perhaps for just a short time pending the Gordon commission report, to amend what the Supreme Court of Canada believed was the firm intention of parliament back in 1949.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I hope my presence or my answer will not be taken in any sense as disagreeing with anything the parliamentary assistant has said. I have heard part of what he said from time to time; I am quite satisfied with it. The hon. member for Calgary South ought to bear in mind that what we are doing here is restoring what we consider is government policy. We are not going further than that. We are merely putting government taxation back to where we thought it was before the Home Oil decision was given. Therefore to that extent he ought to be content.

If the Gordon commission makes a recommendation I am sure it will receive careful consideration. In fact I will go further and repeat what I am sure the parliamentary assistant has already said. I assured the members of this business, when they saw me two weeks ago, that the whole subject which I know is under discussion at the moment, would be considered again before the next session of parliament; but it was on the assumption that by that time the Gordon commission would have reported. If it does not, it will be given another consideration. I think my hon. friend ought to accept the situation that the government would at this session put the law back to what it thought it was, and leave the major decision as to whether there ought to be a change for full consideration which could not be given at this time.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, I gather then the decision is going to be something like this.

With regard to depletion for the production years 1949 and 1950 we have the definition of the Supreme Court of Canada of depletion policy which will apply. For the years 1951 to 1955, inclusive, we have the definition of depletion very much in doubt, in as much as so far no assessments have been made on oil companies for those years, and therefore it has not been possible for oil companies to appeal to the courts for a definition of depletion as applied by the tax department for those years. For 1956 we will have presumably a new clear-cut definition of government policy on depletion, but it may be that in 1957 we shall have still a fourth policy based, I hope, upon recommendations to be made by the Gordon commission. We would then have at least three different depletion policies; one certain, 1949 and 1950; one uncertain, 1951 to 1955; and 1956, certain, presumably; and after 1956, most uncertain. Would it not be best in that interim period of 1956 to leave the law as it has been defined by the supreme court and then, after getting the Gordon commission report, review the matter next year?

Mr. Harris: I am sure if the outcome were as indicated all those gentlemen who saw me two weeks ago would be very happy, because they would feel that by 1957 they had achieved as much as possible of what they had been arguing for for some time and they would not be objecting to that as an outcome. However, I think I should say no to my hon. friend's final question. I do not think it would be well to leave it. I think we ought to go on as we have heretofore, and if the lawsuits which I anticipate yield results for the period since 1951, well and good. If they do not, then the law may perhaps be changed in the light of any decisions we may make after reading the Gordon commission report.

I know it would be the act of a lazy man to follow the advice of my hon. friend and leave things as they are, but I think it ought—

Mr. Nickle: Not a lazy man, a fair man.

Mr. Harris: That is a matter of consideration, but I think we should put it back to where it was and consider it another year.

Mr. Nickle: Sir, one last remark, since the minister is now back. I would like to say something by way of congratulation that I did not say earlier during his absence. I would like to express my appreciation of the minister's acceptance of the fact that the principle of retroactive legislation would be highly dangerous. I am most happy that he has acceded to the request of chambers of commerce and other bodies not to impose the retroactive feature on this depletion allowance.

Resolution agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now proceed to a consideration of the customs tariff resolutions. The first deals with schedule A to the customs tariff.

Mr. Macdonnell: As the minister stated in his speech, the changes are not too far-reaching. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant or the minister would make a few observations. There are a few changes, some of which on the face of it require some explanation. For example, I notice the second one, No. 137a, appears to involve a considerable increase and that appears unusual.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, it has been our practice to have you call the tariff items one by one as they appear in the ways and means resolutions which were presented on budget night, March 20, and to which the hon. member for Greenwood has referred by quoting the number of one of the items up for tariff treatment change.

For the convenience of hon. members I might again briefly indicate a method that would be helpful in examining the changes that it is proposed to change legislatively in this way. Generally speaking, a change is indicated by italicized printing. Sometimes italics are not shown in the resolutions because an elimination of words may be involved, in which case that method of scrutiny would not be possible.

We also have two columns. One of which shows the proposed rates that would be effective based on these proposals, and then alongside of this column there is a column showing the rates in effect prior to the rates proposed in this budget.

I think, Mr. Chairman, you could perhaps call the items. I shall be glad to comment upon any item on which hon. members want a special comment when called upon to do so.

The Deputy Chairman: Subject to the approval of the committee, then, for the purpose of discussion I propose to call the marginal numbers of the items as they appear and hon. members will stop me when they reach an item which they wish to discuss. The first item we shall deal with is item No. 13a.

Item 13a agreed to.

Customs tariff—137a. Molasses powder without admixture or mixed only with any necessary anti-caking agent, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 35 cents; most favoured nation tariff, 45 cents; general tariff, 50 cents.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the parliamentary assistant make a comment on the change there?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend will recall that last year we had a very extensive tariff revision of molasses and related sugar items. It does happen that this particular item, molasses powder, was not provided for in last year's statutes. It had been a distinct item previously. The amount of imports is very inconsequential; I think imports amount to only $2,000 a year. The proposed item re-establishes the rates of duty which applied to molasses powder prior to last year, when molasses powder was not provided for as a distinct item in the molasses group.

Item agreed to.

Item 172 agreed to.

Customs tariff—206c. Bottles; tubes, bail bands, labels, corks, stoppers or other closures, for use with bottles, whether or not assembled into units partially filled with anticoagulating solutions or not; filters, drop counters, clamps; all of the foregoing, when imported to be used exclusively for the collection, preparation, storage, transportation or administration of human blood (whether whole or in the form of liquid or dry serum or plasma) and extenders or substitutes therefor; component materials to be used exclusively in making the foregoing articles, anti-coagulating solutions and extenders or substitutes: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Macdonnell: Why is that in at all when there seems to be no change whatever?

Mr. Benidickson: This is a matter of punctuation. A semi-colon has been placed after the word "bottles" instead of a comma.

Mr. Nowlan: There should be a full stop after bottles.

Item agreed to.

Items 219d, 276g, 279, 288b, and 326e agreed to.

Customs tariff—326m. Articles of glass, not including plate or sheet or machine-made tumblers, to be cut or mounted, when imported by manufacturers of cut or mounted glassware, for use in the manufacture of such glassware in their own factories, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, 32½ per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell: May we have a word on that?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend I think knows there was a tariff hearing with respect to certain items of glassware and which altered tariff classifications. Following that decision the previously existing rates were provided by temporary items. This now proposes to make the temporary item statutory.

Item agreed to.

Items 326n, 372 and 376a agreed to.

Customs tariff—390. Castings, of iron, malleable, in the rough as from the moulds, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, with respect to tariff item 390 I am proposing an amendment to the resolution as it appears on our resolution sheet. Items 390a and 390b cover iron and steel castings. In the budget resolutions the words, "in the rough as from the moulds" were added to these items. This change was made for clarification purposes only; no change in duties was intended.

Since the budget it has been brought to our attention that, because of the words "as from the moulds", castings from which excess metal has been removed or which have been heat-treated or repair-welded will no longer qualify for entry under these items. It is therefore proposed that the words "as from the moulds" be dropped.

In the interest of simplification, the three items are being amalgamated under one number by virtue of this amendment. I wonder if the Minister of National Revenue would move that amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. McCann moves:

That resolution No. 1 of the budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff be amended by deleting therefrom items 390, 390a and 390b and by substituting therefor the following:

Customs tariff—390. Castings, of iron or steel, in the rough, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Item as amended agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We proceed to item 402g.

Mr. Benidickson: I wish to say a word concerning item 390a.

Customs tariff—390a. Castings, of iron, non-malleable, in the rough as from the moulds, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on new item number 390a the only change is the deletion of the words, "as from the moulds".

The object is to bring the wording of this item into line with the wording of tariff item 390.

The Deputy Chairman: I am of the opinion that the committee just adopted an amendment affecting items 390, 390a, and 390b.

Mr. Benidickson: When an item number is eliminated, Mr. Chairman, there is an opening in the tariff schedule for a new item of the same nomenclature and this would be a new item 390a. We are utilizing the (a) category under 390 afresh.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. McCann moves:

That resolution No. 1 of the budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff be amended to provide for the further amendment of schedule A by striking out tariff item 390c, the enumeration of goods and the rates of duties of customs set opposite the said item and by inserting the following item, enumeration and rates of duty in schedule A:

Customs tariff—390a. Piston ring castings of iron or steel in the rough: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Item 390b agreed to.

Customs tariff—402g. Welded netting, of iron or steel, coated or not, made from wire of seventeen gauge or heavier, with meshes not smaller than one-half inch by one-half inch and not larger than two inches by two inches, when for use exclusively on fur farms, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell: I notice the British preference there is reduced from 17½ per cent to 12½ per cent. Are we perfectly free with regard to that now? Is there any question raised as to our right to increase the British preference?

Mr. Benidickson: We are free with respect to this item.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wonder if the answer could be given in somewhat broader terms?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, there has been an item in the tariff specially for woven netting at 20 per cent most favoured nation. Representations have been made by fur farmers that they are now using welded netting and that it should be treated in the same manner as the woven netting for use by fur farmers.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—409f. Automatic stock watering devices; barn hay forks, carriage, pulleys and track; barn litter carriers and track; grain crushers; grain or hay dryers; grain or hay grinders; grain loaders; elevators (other than storage elevators); hitches and couplings; hydraulic hoists for unloading vehicles; land levellers; machines and tools for use on tractors, including blades, loaders, rippers, rakes, and related operating and controlling gear; milk coolers; sodium metabisulphite; sprinkler irrigation systems; steel stanchions for confining livestock either in pens or individually, and complete equipment for milking parlors; all the foregoing for use on the farm for farm purposes only; brooders for rearing young farm animals; ensilage cutters; fodder or feed cutters; hay loaders; hay tedders; post hole diggers; potato diggers; potato planters; snaths; stumping machines; all other agricultural implements or agricultural machinery, n.o.p.; parts of all the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Barnett: I may not be correct in rising at this point and the parliamentary assistant may have referred already to the matter on which I want some information. Item 409f contains a long list of farm equipment to be admitted duty free. At the end of the item it is stated:

All other agricultural implements or agricultural machinery, n.o.p.; parts of all the foregoing.

I intended to rise on this item to refer to the position in which the chinchilla breeders of British Columbia find themselves. I have a letter from the Vancouver island branch of the chinchilla breeders in which they ask for the removal of the 25 per cent duty and the 10 per cent sales tax on wire imported for use in chinchilla cage construction. I presume from that letter that for some reason or other the chinchilla breeders are not being classed as farmers in connection with the supplies they import.

Mr. Benidickson: I believe my hon. friend is dealing with item 402g. Again what has been done is simply to put welded and woven netting on the same basis when used in connection with fur farming.

Mr. Barnett: That will meet the request made by the chinchilla breeders, will it?

Mr. Benidickson: No, not if the request was for the complete elimination of the duty. If the rate was 25 per cent it referred to welded netting. The duty has been lowered on welded netting to 20 per cent so both welded and woven netting will be treated equally. There is a reduction on the welded item from 25 per cent to 20 per cent. Both types of netting will have the same tariff rate now.

Item agreed to.

Items 409t and 409u agreed to.

Customs tariff—409v. Steel wall sections, with or without doors incorporated therein, for the construction of steel silos for storing ensilage: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: There is an amendment to the budget resolution as proposed, and I would ask the Minister of National Revenue to move this amendment.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That resolution No. 1 of the budget resolution relating to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom item 409v and by substituting therefor the following:

"409v—Roofs, chutes, ladders, wall sections with or without doors incorporated therein, materials and parts; all of the foregoing, of metal, for the construction or repair of silos for storing ensilage: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Items 410t and 410w agreed to.

Customs tariff—425a. Power lawn mowers, whether or not containing the power unit: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 32½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: There is an amendment here. In the budget resolutions it was proposed that the wording of the existing item be amended to read "power lawn mowers" which is the same wording used in tariff item 425b. It was not intended that there should be any change in the rates of duty. Since the budget it has been drawn to our attention that lawn mowers designed to be drawn or pushed by tractors which were eligible for entry under the former wording of the item "lawn mowers designed for use with motive power" will not be eligible for entry under the proposed wording "power lawn mowers". The proposal now is to delete this item.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That resolution No. 1 of the budget resolutions relating to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom tariff item 425a.

Amendment agreed to.

Customs tariff—425b. Air-cooled internal combustion engines of greater than one and one-half horse power rating, and parts thereof; parts of power lawn mowers; all the foregoing for use in the manufacture or repair of power lawn mowers: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 32½ per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell: I notice there is an increase in the case of the general tariff; could that be explained?

Mr. Benidickson: This proposed tariff item would incorporate two temporary tariff items covering engines and parts of power lawn mowers. It is a tidying-up operation.

Mr. Macdonnell: What interests me is that whereas most of the items show the same rates or a downward revision, apparently this one is upward from 30 per cent to 32½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: You refer to rates under the general tariff only. The explanation is that we are providing the same rates for the two amalgamated items. There are no imports in fact, though, under the little utilized general tariff.

Item agreed to.

Items 428g, 437b, 442, 443, 445m and 446j agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: As the result of a tariff board declaration dated since budget night, namely April 6 this year, tools which have been made to fit specific machines or specific attachments will no longer be classified under the item covering tools, but instead they will be classified as "parts" of such machines or attachments. This will have the effect of reducing the duty on many of these tools which are of a class made in Canada from 22½ per cent to 7½ per cent.

The wording of the new item makes it clear that these tools, even though they may be made for use in particular machines or particular attachments, will be dutiable at 22½ per cent under the most favoured nation tariff if they are of a class made in Canada. Only with respect to such tools of a class not made in Canada will the duty be 7½ per cent.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That resolution No. 1 of the budget resolutions relating to the Customs Tariff be amended to provide for the further amendment of Schedule A by striking out tariff item 446k, the enumeration of goods and the rates of duties of customs set opposite the said item and by inserting the following item, enumeration and rates of duty in Schedule A.

"446k—Tools, wholly or in part of iron or steel, for use in machines or in attachments or accessories therefor, including those made for use in a particular machine or in a particular attachment or accessory therefor:

(1) Of a class or kind made in Canada: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

(2) Of a class or kind not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent."

Amendment agreed to.

Items 462c, 462d, 476b, 476c and 478 agreed to.

Customs tariff—549a. Wool, not further prepared than scoured: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Macdonnell: I take it that this covers the importation of wool in the raw. Would that be for use in manufacturing and will it be of assistance to the textile industry? Also, does it come in in any bulk?

Mr. Benidickson: Since 1950 the duty on wool in this item has been free under a temporary item and it is now proposed to make the item statutory.

Mr. Macdonnell: Since when has it been duty free? According to this it has been 25 per cent under the general tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend must look at the most favoured nation tariff, which is really the operating item, and he will see that it was free in the right-hand column.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am still a little puzzled. As I look straight across I find the items are free, free, free, and then 15 per cent under the British preferential, and then below it is free, free and free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—597d. Harpsichords: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Herridge: What is the reason for the drop in this rather intriguing item? Are harpsichords imported in large numbers?

Mr. Benidickson: I understand that it is coming into use as a musical instrument to a greater degree. It is not manufactured in Canada, and it was felt that the duty should be lowered.

Mr. Macdonnell: Just as a matter of curiosity, where do they come from?

Mr. Benidickson: I understand from European countries such as France and Germany, and to some extent from England.

Mr. Herridge: Were representations made for a reduction?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, that is the usual precedent to an action of this kind.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: I have two amending motions.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Benidickson: We are just about finished. Item 618b introduces a new item not referred to in the printed resolutions. Because of a change in the administrative practices of the customs department which took place early this year, certain tires and tubes previously dutiable at 22½ per cent under the most favoured nation tariff are now classified as parts under end use tariff items which carry rates of duty as low as 7½ per cent.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That resolution No. 1 of the budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff be amended to provide for the further amendment of schedule A by striking out tariff item 618b, the enumeration of goods and the rates of duties of customs set opposite the said item and by inserting the following item, enumeration and rates of duty in said schedule A:

[Mr. Benidickson.]

618b—(1) Tires and tubes, wholly or in part of rubber, for equipment of the agricultural implements and agricultural machinery specified in tariff items 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409h, 409j, 409l, and the tractors provided for in tariff item 409m . . . British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(2) Tires and tubes, wholly or in part of rubber . . . British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, is there an understanding that we are going to go overtime tonight? We want to be in on it if there is. It is now four minutes after six.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I think we only have two or perhaps three items left and, unless there is going to be a debate on them, I would appreciate it if we could deal with them tonight.

Item 696f agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: There is another addition to be made here and it will be numbered item 695c. The Minister of Finance has received some representations that we should facilitate the opportunity to import sculptures of importance and value in a somewhat similar way that we have enabled paintings to be brought into the country. Individual items must first of all receive endorsation as to their quality and desirability from the director of the national gallery.

Mr. Macdonnell: 695c?

Mr. Benidickson: This provides a new item. It is also an additional item to those printed in the resolution.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That resolution No. 1 of the budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff be amended by inserting therein the following item, enumeration of goods and rates of duty:

695c—Original sculptures, or replicas made therefrom, when certified by the director of the national gallery of Canada as being of a cultural character: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Amendment agreed to.

Item 700 agreed to.

Resolution No. 1 as amended agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to resolution No. 2, I think I can satisfy the house very quickly that this requires simple amendments of the French text. The first item is tariff item 328a. This merely rearranges the French words to read in the same sequence as in English. The English text is "parts, unfinished, for the manufacture of spectacles and eyeglass frames". The words were not put in that sense and order in the French text and it is proposed to make the French text identical with the English in the arrangement of the words.

With respect to items 386h and 389d it is an obvious matter of a misprint, and I will give examples. For instance, the French spelling of one word is wrong in item 386h and in item 389 the figure should be ·4 instead of ·04. With respect to resolution No. 3, in the French version it now reads "or" and it should read "and" as in the English version.

Resolutions Nos. 2 and 3 agreed to.

Mr. Macdonnell: Resolution No. 3 amends schedule C to the French version by striking out item 1215 and by inserting something else. That has not been explained.

Mr. Benidickson: I have provided the explanation.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was one step behind you.

Resolutions Nos. 4 and 5 agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the branch line C.N.R. bill first and then the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell the house what the business will be on Friday?

Mr. Harris: We will have estimates. We will continue with agriculture if the items are not all carried tomorrow, and after that we will probably take transport. However, I will inform my hon. friends about that.

It being eight minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

COUNCIL OF HEALTH MEETING—HOSPITAL INSURANCE

Question No. 481—Mr. Brown (Brantford):

At the recent meeting of the dominion council of health, did the Minister of National Health and Welfare discuss with the provincial representatives present the federal proposal on hospital insurance?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

As the dominion council of health is largely made up of technical officers of the federal and provincial health departments it is not in a position to deal with matters of policy that are under study by the governments concerned. However, the Minister of National Health and Welfare did take advantage of the opportunity presented by the recent meeting of the dominion council of health to indicate to the provincial representatives present the importance which the government attached to the recent federal proposal respecting hospital insurance and laboratory and radiological diagnostic services.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 10, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT NOTICE OF MOTION APPEARING ON TODAY'S ORDER PAPER

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to a point of order. I note that a notice of motion which was under discussion yesterday is on today's order paper. Without repeating in detail any of the arguments which were presented yesterday—

Mr. Speaker: Before he proceeds further, may I point out to the Leader of the Opposition that his point of order can properly be raised when we reach the item in question. At this moment the routine proceedings must be gone on with. He can raise his point of order when I call the item "Government Notices of Motion".

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, without debating what you have just said, I would point out that this subject was under discussion yesterday; that there was an extended argument about the effect of the rules with regard to having before the house two motions of the same nature at the same time in the name of the same member; and that the matter stood over. It will not be possible, I submit, in the ordinary calling of the motion to discuss the point of procedure which was raised yesterday. I would submit with deference that it would be satisfactory that the question of procedure be dealt with at this point because, when the motion is called, we shall then be dealing with another matter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might make a comment?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I rose to support your suggestion as to when we should deal with this matter. Although I may disagree with your ruling yesterday which put this motion on the order paper, you made the ruling and it is there. But as I indicated yesterday, when we reach the point where you are asked to put the motion to the house it is my intention to raise the point of order that this question should not be put to the house. I would hope that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) might support me on that point of order when I raise it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no doubt about it, may I say that there will be no question about our supporting the hon. member. I trust that he will support us in the stand that we will take at that time. However, I was pointing out to Your Honour that there is a question of procedure which has been under discussion and which will not, I suggest, be subject to discussion in the same way at the time the motion is called. In view of the fact that Your Honour had this matter under advisement and of the fact that the motion now appears on the order paper, I would again submit for your consideration the advisability, for the purposes of record, of dealing with this question as to whether the two motions should be on the order paper. Then, when the matter comes forward as a motion, we can deal with it on the other grounds.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot rule on a point of order in anticipation. The hon. member knows that, according to standing order No. 15, we must adhere to the order paper, and my duty today is to call the routine proceedings. When we come to government notices of motion, then that is the proper time for hon. members to rise on the point of order if they so wish. I submit that at this moment it is my duty to proceed with the other items on the routine proceedings.

CRIMINAL LAW

CAPITAL AND CORPORAL PUNISHMENT—ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): I wish to rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The joint committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries has been holding sessions in camera for the purpose of considering a report to both houses of parliament. In the Ottawa Citizen of May 8, 1956, there appeared an article headed, "Abolition of Prison Lash Urged by House Committee", which quoted from a confidential document circulated amongst the members of the committee for study and consideration.

While there is no intention of pursuing the matter further, it is my duty to point out that the article in question did not quote the various alternatives set forth in the confidential document, and therefore has tended to mislead the public as no decision has been reached by the committee on these alternatives, nor has any report been made in connection therewith to either house.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine) presented the second report of the standing committee on public accounts, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RAILWAYS AND NON-OPERATING UNIONS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): In view of the request made yesterday and the interest that has been shown by a great many members of the house, and also because of the fact there may be some delay before we reach orders of the day, I should like to make the report I promised yesterday. It is in the form of a message received by the Minister of Labour at 12.25 p.m. today containing a joint statement issued by the railways and the unions regarding the railway dispute. This was reported as being given to the press by the parties within the next hour. I shall quote it as follows:

> Although the meeting held on Tuesday, May 8th, at the request of the Minister of Labour made no progress towards a settlement of the dispute the railways and the 15 non-operating unions, having in mind their responsibility for maintaining uninterrupted railway service to the Canadian public, have arranged for a further meeting tomorrow for the purpose of entering into an agreement implementing the terms of settlement recommended by the board of conciliation notwithstanding that both parties disagree with some of the principles underlying that report.

I have nothing to add, except to say that, on behalf of the Department of Labour, the Canadian government and, I think, every hon. member of this house I express congratulations and appreciation to the two parties to this pending settlement for their patience, perseverance and patriotism. I say patriotism advisedly because I know that, in all the consideration of this dispute by the two parties, the public welfare and the national interest have been paramount as they always must be in free collective bargaining in Canada.

Commendation is due to the board of conciliation for being successful during the long hearings last winter in finding ground on which both sides can now get together.

[Mr. Brown (Essex West).]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT NOTICE OF MOTION APPEARING ON TODAY'S ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: Government notices of motions. Before hon. members rise may I take up the point where I left off yesterday. I quote from Hansard at page 3726, where I said:

> Now, I offered earlier to delay the judgment in this case until tomorrow. Hon. members have indicated that they wanted to have a ruling now. I have given my ruling and I think we have had a discussion of sufficient length. I will say this to hon. members. If after reading Hansard tomorrow morning and after consulting with the Clerk there is any reason why something should be done in order to remove the resolution from the order paper, I will see to it that that action is taken. But if, on the other hand, after carefully reading all the arguments that have been put forward and all the authorities that have been cited and after discussing the matter fully with the Clerk and his assistants I have to come to the same conclusion that the matter may still be considered by the house, then it will be on the order paper tomorrow.

Now, immediately after the termination of the discussion yesterday I asked the Clerk to prepare a written opinion on the matter. As hon. members know, I left the chair at some time after four o'clock yesterday afternoon, and I must admit that I did not have as much time as I would have liked to consider the points that have been raised. There are many witnesses who can testify as to where I was last evening, and I want to say that, like all those who were there, I found the evening most enjoyable. This morning it was my pleasure and privilege to meet two groups, one of students and another of members of a very well known service club in Montreal, and I received other persons. Therefore, I have not had very much time, but the Clerk, fortunately for us, has spent most of his time since four o'clock yesterday afternoon on the matter, and he gave to me around one o'clock this afternoon the following opinion:

> Dear Mr. Speaker:
> With reference to the proceedings on the government notice of motion respecting the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation, the following observations are submitted for your consideration.
> On Tuesday, May 8, the new notice was received from the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and as is usual in every case, I carefully considered the matter before I authorized the printing of the new notice at the back of the Votes and Proceedings.
> The new measure contained provisions not provided for in the original resolution and since it would not be in order, without unanimous consent, to propose the new provisions as amendments to the initial resolution in committee of the whole, the second resolution, in my opinion, presented a new proposition.
> In regard to the moving of amendments to a money resolution, May's fifteenth edition, page 750, states:

"Accordingly, in this case the committee's power of amendment is strictly limited to reduction of the demand thereby made. This limitation on the power of proposing amendments applies equally to ministers of the crown as to unofficial members"—

There is no rule that I know of which prohibits the presentation of two money resolutions relating to the same subject and containing different provisions. In the second session of 1945, two resolutions relating to the Senate and House of Commons Act were on the order paper at the same time. The resolution, presented secondly, was adopted in committee of the whole and, subsequently, the order for the consideration of the one first presented was discharged. (See Journals, 1945, second session, p. 481).

There are several cases where money resolutions have been amended by means of supplementary resolutions before the consideration of the initial resolution was undertaken in committee of the whole. For examples of such amendments see Journals, 1926-7, pp. 213-15; also 1932-3, p. 431; also 1945, second session, p. 370; also 1951, first session, p. 322. On the other hand, an extensive search of the Journals has failed to produce a precedent wherein a supplementary resolution has been introduced to amend a resolution which had been partially considered in committee of the whole.

It is my contention that a money resolution is an integral and inseparable part of a money bill and that the stages of such bills include any necessary financial resolutions. May's fifteenth edition, page 503, in a paragraph entitled "Synopsis of Stages of a Bill", states that "such stages may be taken to include the stages of any necessary financial resolution".

At page 487 of the same authority, it is also stated:

"A certain class of bills, the main object of which is the expenditure of money or the imposition of taxation, must, in accordance with the requirements of the standing orders regarding charges on the people, originate in committee of the whole house".

Beauchesne's third edition, citation 433, in part, reads as follows:

"All bills providing for the payment of salaries or for any expenditure whatever out of the public funds of the dominion must be first considered as resolutions in committee of the whole" . . .

Consequently, in my opinion, a money resolution is subject to the principle which permits the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same object, provided that when a decision is rendered upon one proposal, the other measure cannot be proceeded with.

In the fifteenth edition of May at page 499, it is stated:

"There is no rule or custom which restrains the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject, and containing similar provisions. But if a decision of the house has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions" . . .

Bourinot at page 548 of his fourth edition states:

"Whilst a bill is still pending, and until it is completely disposed of, there is nothing whatever to prevent another bill for the same object being introduced" . . . No objection can be raised to the introduction of a bill into the House of Commons on the ground of there being a similar bill already before the house.

It is the rejection and not the pendency of a bill that creates a difficulty as to the ulterior proceedings" . . .

The memorandum concludes:

In view of the foregoing, it is my duty to recommend that the notice of the proposed new resolution be printed as a government notice of motion on Thursday's order paper.

Respectfully submitted,
Leon J. Raymond,
Clerk of the House.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I submit that in connection with the proceedings before us we have covered the ground fairly fully. There may be many added arguments to be put forward but I would point out that what happens in this case is in effect an amendment to a motion already before the house and under debate.

Whatever may be the form, the fact is that the core of the new motion now put on the order paper is precisely the same; that is, to set up a crown corporation.

The new motion adds certain additional powers or rather proposes that certain additional powers shall be given to the crown corporation, but basically it is a motion to set up a crown corporation for a particular purpose.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the precedents have already been stated that the position is clear that you cannot achieve by indirection what is not permitted by a direct course. In this case it is not possible to amend except by the procedure laid down, as you pointed out yesterday.

I submit that in this case the net result is to permit an amendment rather than a completely new motion, if this motion is actually permitted to stand on the order paper.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the point I wish to take up at first is the point which you yourself mentioned as your first point in the course of the reading of the memorandum from the Clerk.

In discussing this memorandum and the decision made I want to make it quite clear that we are addressing our remarks to Your Honour. As I understand it you have made your decision on the matter as your own decision.

You referred first to a citation in May's fifteenth edition at page 750 in which the question of amending or altering a money resolution was being discussed. You relied upon that portion of the paragraph on page 750 to establish the proposition that it was perfectly within the powers of the house or committee to amend such resolution, although the powers were limited. The extraordinary thing about your ruling in so far as it is based upon that citation is that you stopped at the very point at which, had you proceeded, you would have found that May entirely supports our proposition. Therefore I think I should read the whole paragraph, which is as follows:

> Under the method prescribed by S.O. No. 84, the resolution which has received the King's recommendation is the resolution actually considered by the committee. Accordingly, in this case the committee's power of amendment is strictly limited to reduction of the demand thereby made. This limitation on the power of proposing amendments applies equally to ministers of the crown as to unofficial members.

That is the point at which Your Honour stopped. However, May continues:

> If the government themselves wish to extend, or to accept amendments extending, the charge thus proposed to a committee, it is necessary to withdraw the resolution and submit another containing the desired modification, as was done in the case of the coal mines bill, 1929-30, and the agricultural marketing bill, 1930-31.

Our argument yesterday and today has been that the only way by which the government can introduce a new or modified proposal is to withdraw by whatever method may be open to them the resolution now standing on the order paper, the first resolution standing on the order paper, and submit a new one. I would hope that Your Honour would not base your ruling on the very narrow point that what May was referring to was, to use his words, to extend the charge thus proposed to a committee, in the sense that your ruling would apply only if the government were seeking to increase the amount of money asked for. That would place an entirely unduly restrictive interpretation upon the authority. What the government is seeking to do here actually is to substitute—

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: —hon. members should not be mpatient—for a resolution containing a linitation on the amount to be granted another resolution which provides that while the amount to be loaned by the Minister of Finance to the corporation cannot exceed $130 million, the purposes for which the money can be used are entirely different from the purposes for which the first resolution would give authority to lend money. So in effect you have an extension of the charge and you have a complete extension of the purposes of the resolution with respect to the use to be made of the money to be provided by your bill.

Your Honour has referred us to a passage in Bourinot with respect to bills indicating it is possible to introduce another bill dealing with the same subject as a bill presently before the house. On that point may I refer you to May at page 500? This passage depends, of course, on the passage referred to yesterday at page 499 where May himself says that bills with the same purpose as other bills of the same session may be introduced. But, in giving examples of the occasions upon which members have been allowed to introduce bills dealing with the same subject matter as other bills of that session, May himself points out at page 500 that one of the grounds upon which the Speaker ruled that such a bill might be introduced was that it had been introduced before the decision of the house had been taken on the earlier bill. Perhaps I should read the citation at the top of page 500:

> Objection was taken on 20 July 1870, that one of the objects of a bill then under discussion was to effect the repeal of an act, a proposal which the house had negatived during that session, and that therefore the bill could not be considered, but the Speaker overruled the objection. As he pointed out, the bill had been introduced before the house had arrived at that decision . . .

So he made his ruling there dependent on the fact that the second bill had been introduced before the house had arrived at any decision on the first resolution. Our point here is that the second resolution is being introduced after the house has arrived at a decision with respect to the first resolution, so that the authority of May and Beauchesne with respect to the bills is clearly not applicable in this case, because a decision has already been arrived at with respect to the resolution.

On that point, because I see Your Honour shaking his head—and I take it you disagree with my position that a decision of the house has been arrived at with respect to the resolution—let me go back to Campion, page 178, the reference given by yourself yesterday. It was Your Honour's point yesterday, as I understand it, that no decision of the house has been taken with respect to this resolution, and therefore we cannot rely on our part on the grounds that a decision has been taken, and this new one asks the house to repeat a decision already taken. This, of course, has reference to the rule against anticipation. I want to deal with that at this stage. Campion states:

> The anticipation rule, which forbids discussion on a matter standing on the paper being forestalled, is dependent on the same principle as that which forbids the same question being twice raised in the same session.

Mr. Pickersgill: That applies to the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. Fulton: When the first proposed resolution was committed for decision by the committee of the whole, there was a question before the house. The question was: "Shall the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee on the proposed resolution?" The proposed resolution was before us on the order paper and, that question being put to the house and a division being called, the house by a majority vote decided that question in the affirmative. The question was: "Does this house want the Speaker to leave the chair so that the committee can embark upon consideration of the proposed resolution?" This house decided by a majority vote that it did want that to take place.

Now this house, by the resolution that now appears on the order paper at page 2, is being asked to make the same decision again. The same question is being submitted: "Does this house want the Speaker to leave the chair in order to go into committee to consider a proposed resolution?" The proposed resolution embraces exactly the same considerations as are embraced in the original resolution.

I do not want to take too much of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, but it would be interesting to know just why it is that hon. members say we are not being asked to decide the same question as we were asked to decide before. Let us read the two resolutions and compare them. The resolution that we were faced with on March 15 reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the constitution of the corporation to be known as the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for the purposes, inter alia, of constructing, maintaining and operating a natural gas pipe line between the Ontario-Manitoba border and Kapuskasing, Ontario and of leasing, with an option to purchase, the said natural gas pipe line to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited—

Mr. Tucker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: May I point out that we are now discussing a point of order.

Mr. Tucker: I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Yes; but a point of order cannot be raised on another point of order, I am sorry to say.

Mr. Tucker: Then I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: To continue:

> —and carrying out such leases, including the disposal by the corporation of the said pipe line in connection with such purchase option;—

Mr. Tucker: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) rises on a question of privilege, I am obliged to listen to him.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker, it is a question of privilege, I suggest, arising out of the violation of the rules by the hon. member who has just been speaking.

Mr. Fleming: That is a point of order, not a question of privilege.

Mr. Tucker: He is insisting that the rules be adhered to. I think he should be ready to have the rules applied to him if he wants them applied in this regard. I cite to Your Honour standing order 12 which definitely lays it down as follows:

> Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate.

Mr. Sinclair: Without debate.

Mr. Fleming: It is a bogus question of privilege.

Mr. Tucker: The rule states "without debate". The Speaker has made a ruling in this matter.

Mr. Fulton: No, he has not.

Mr. Tucker: Yes, he has.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I listened carefully to the point raised by the hon. member for Rosthern. So far I have read an opinion from the Clerk. Because hon. members have indicated their willingness to discuss the matter of order, I have acceded to their wishes. I should like to say this, however. Hon. members should be reasonable, should make their point as briefly as possible, and should speak to the point of order.

There is another matter on which I should like to make my position clear. If there are 15 hon. members who would like to take part in this debate on the point of order, I want to say that I will reduce the number considerably. I would point out that I am not obliged to listen to advice on a ruling that I want to give. The standing order says that I may listen to arguments presented. That word "may" is not mandatory; it is permissive. However, in the execution of my duties I have always felt that it was preferable, in order to maintain the good will of the house, to listen to the arguments which may be presented on a point of order that is raised. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) raised the point of order. I understand that the hon. member for Kamloops is now completing the stating of the point of order. I will listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to the leader of the C.C.F. party if he wishes to speak. I will listen to the leader of the Social Credit party if he wishes to speak and to one member of his party besides. I will listen to two members of the party on my right if they wish to take part in this debate. Following that I want to indicate that I will be more than ready to give my ruling.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was just endeavouring—

Mr. Tucker: On a question of privilege, I want to point out to Your Honour—

Mr. Speaker: No, no. At the moment I must tell the hon. member that his question of privilege is a fraudulent one.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the question of whether or not this resolution that we are now asked to commit to the committee of the whole raises the same question as that which was before the house on an earlier occasion. I assume this time that hon. members opposite have read both resolutions, a position which they apparently did not enjoy yesterday. Hence I will not proceed further with the reading of the resolution. However, I will say that a comparison of the two resolutions indicates that they are in exactly the same terms, paragraph by paragraph, with the addition of only one new paragraph in the new resolution. We are therefore being asked to make the same decision as was made on an earlier question, and that is this: Does this house desire that the Speaker leave the chair so that these terms may be referred to the committee of the whole for discussion? Those of us who think that the Speaker should not leave the chair for that purpose and that we should not proceed one day, one hour, one minute or one inch with the government's proposal will be faced with the necessity of making the same decision as we made and on which we voted on an earlier occasion. Those opposite who think that the proposal should be proceeded with and should be proceeded with as soon as possible will be faced with the same question for decision and it is extremely likely that they will be required once again to vote on that question. How then could it be more clear that the same question is going to be before the house again for decision if the motion now standing on the order paper is allowed to stand there and be submitted to the house for its decision in due course?

If Your Honour—as you did—places considerable reliance on Campion with respect to the rule of anticipation and the application of the rule, then I submit on that ground alone, even if the others did not exist, it is clearly out of order for this resolution to remain on the order paper because Campion says that the principle is one which forbids the same question being raised twice in the same session. Hence there are three points, as I see it. The way for the government to deal with the problem is not to introduce an amendment, because that procedure is out of order on the basis of the authority of May; and not to introduce some resolution which raises the same question—for even although something additional may be added to it, there is still the same question for decision—because that offends the rule against anticipation. In short, I submit that the only way for the government to resolve its dilemma is to comply with the rules of order and to rely on the authority of May, page 750, which states the thing more clearly than anything else could state it and with which I will therefore conclude:

> If the government themselves wish to extend, or to accept amendments extending, the charge thus proposed to a committee, it is necessary to withdraw the resolution and submit another containing the desired modification, . . .

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to make it clear that in arguing with the memorandum that Your Honour has read, I am, with great respect, arguing with you rather than with our esteemed friend who prepared the memorandum for you. I am also in the fortunate position, I believe, of being able to address my remarks to the statements which you made in reading from that memorandum. In other words, my homework since yesterday has been along parallel lines. If I may say so, I believe I am in a position to answer all of the points that you made a few minutes ago. I may add, Mr. Speaker, that I will be calling some rather eminent authorities, not only the books to which we usually refer, but I shall also quote either the words or the actions of Right Hon. James Ilsley, Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, Hon. Walter Harris and Hon. Louis René Beaudoin, than whom one could hardly find better authorities.

You said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that this new motion was regarded as containing new matter and therefore as a new motion that it was in a category sufficiently different from the first one that it was proper to place it on the order paper. I am not now arguing with the fact it is on the order paper because that decision has been made, and it is there. What I am contending on this point of order is that Your Honour should not put the question to the house. The fact of the matter is that the new motion contains all that was in the previous motion plus additional matter, which makes it, along the lines of a precedent to which I will refer in a moment, substantially the same as the one already on the order paper.

Your Honour has quoted the authorities and made the assertion that there is no rule against the presentation or the introduction of two bills or two resolutions on the same subject matter. That is a correct statement based on the authorities, but I would point out that in May's fifteenth edition, at page 499 where the quotation appears, the word "presentation" is in italics. In other words, there is a distinction between being permitted to present two resolutions or two bills dealing with the same subject and being permitted to proceed with two bills or two resolutions dealing with the same subject matter. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce is now asking the house to do. The house has already proceeded to a certain extent with this first resolution and he is asking, by the motion which he has now made, to proceed with the second resolution which is substantially the same as the first in that it includes everything that is in the first resolution plus some additional material.

From that point, sir, you moved on to quote a precedent which it so happens is one of the precedents upon which I rely for my side of the argument. When I quote the words of Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, I think it will be made clear that this witness is mine rather than yours. The reference you made, sir, was to the bill amending the Senate and House of Commons Act in the second session of 1945. All members who were here at that time will have vivid memories of that bill which was the one that provided for our $2,000 expense allowance. May I remind hon. members what happened. Mr. King put the resolution on the order paper quite early in the session and it remained there for quite a number of weeks. Finally, after considerable discussion mainly out of the house, the government decided to change that resolution and substitute for it a different resolution which had in it everything that was in the first resolution plus some additional material. I emphasize the fact that that is exactly what is before us now.

In 1945 there was a resolution that called for certain expenditures and a substitute resolution calling for those original expenditures plus something further. The first resolution on this matter went a certain distance and the second went that distance plus a little more. What did Mr. King, that master of parliamentary finesse, do when he had to deal with this matter in 1945? Up until December 12, the first resolution was still on the order paper and it was the only one on the order paper. On the night of December 12, Hon. Ian Mackenzie, who was house leader, in moving the adjournment of the house, said this:

> Tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock the Prime Minister will ask the house to consider No. 7 on the order paper of today—

I have that session's order papers here and No. 7 on the order paper of that day was the first resolution on the expense allowance proposition. Mr. Mackenzie went on:

> —in regard to allowances to members of parliament for expenses incidental to the discharge of their duties. I believe the Prime Minister will ask that the present order be discharged and a resolution relating to both houses substituted therefor.

Accordingly the next day, December 13, under notices of motions, although the second or substitute resolution appeared in Votes and Proceedings only on December 12, the very next day, without waiting the 48 hours, Mr. King who was then prime minister asked the consent of the house to move the second resolution. Now, in your memorandum, sir, you do include the sentence that the first motion was subsequently withdrawn, but please note what Mr. King said when he asked the consent of the house to move a substitute resolution. I will not read all of it because all of us who know Mr. King know the statement would be rather lengthy. This is what he said, as recorded at page 3412 of Hansard for December 13, 1945:

> At this late stage of the session, Mr. Speaker, I may have to ask the house for its unanimous consent to allow me to proceed a little more rapidly with consideration of the motion now before us than might otherwise be the case. When the orders of the day are reached I shall ask that the house allow the motion No. 7, which is now in its possession, to be withdrawn and the order to be discharged.

Note these words:

> I make that intention known immediately so that we may be in a position to discuss the resolution that now appears under government notices of motion.

In other words, Mr. King knew he could not ask the house to proceed with the second notice of motion unless the house was prepared to give unanimous consent to the withdrawal of the first notice of motion. The house took a more liberal attitude toward that subject than it is taking towards pipe lines; consent was given and the house moved on.

So much for my calling Mr. King as a witness. As I say, he was very careful, very astute about these things. He took no chances that the house might use its rule about unanimous consent to block any measure that he was anxious to get through.

Now, I said I would also bring in as one of my witnesses the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris).

Mr. Harris: You had better be very careful of that one.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Finance, when he was minister of citizenship and immigration in 1952, was responsible for certain bills having to do with redistribution. I know someone may say that these were not money bills, but the principle is exactly the same as to whether or not it is possible for the house to proceed any distance at all with two measures that are in the same general field. I do not quarrel with your assertion, sir, that it is in order to present two bills, even though they may be exactly identical, but I do quarrel with the right of the house to proceed on more than one of them. It is my contention that the house has already proceeded to a considerable extent with the first resolution and the motion now before us is that we proceed a stage with the resolution now before us.

On March 10, 1952, as reported at page 246 of Hansard, first reading was given to Bill No. 8 known as the Representation Act. After considerable discussion of the matter in a special committee on redistribution it was agreed in that committee that there should be a different bill, and on June 25, 1952, the present Minister of Finance, in his capacity then as minister of citizenship and immigration, asked for leave to withdraw Bill No. 8 so that he might introduce a new bill, Bill No. 393. I am sure that you, sir, and all the house will agree with me that the Minister of Finance is also very careful; he tries not to get into trouble. This is what he said, as recorded at page 3690 of Hansard of June 25, 1952:

> I presume that if leave is given to introduce this bill it will also be necessary to ask for leave to withdraw Bill No. 8.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that puts the present Minister of Finance in bed with Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, and both of them were quite clear that though two bills, indeed more than two bills, regarding the same matter could be presented to the house, you cannot proceed to deal with bills or resolutions that involve the same proposal contained in a bill on which the house has already proceeded to any extent.

I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that I would make reference to Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley. I do that very briefly because I gave this example yesterday, but I also give it in rebuttal to your statement that no cases could be found of a resolution partially considered and a change being made along the lines that I suggested yesterday. Well, Mr. Speaker, that, too, happened in 1945 because on October 9 of that year, as recorded on page 827 of Hansard, Mr. Ilsley moved a resolution preceding a bill to amend the National Housing Act. Later, on December 3 of the same year, as recorded on page 2829, when the government had decided to extend the provisions of that bill beyond what was included in the first resolution, exactly what the Minister of Trade and Commerce wants to do now, what did Mr. Ilsley do? Did he do what the present minister is doing? No, he brought in a resolution, as found on page 2829 of Hansard of December 3, 1945, asking the house to amend the resolution of October 9, 1945. So, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ilsley joins the company of the elect who have made it crystal clear that you cannot violate the rule of repetition; you cannot violate the rule of anticipation, even if you sit on the government benches.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I said that I would also quote a very outstanding authority in the person of Hon. Louis Rene Beaudoin who, on April 19, 1955, at page 2973, said this to me:

> Well, the hon. member of course will agree that we cannot anticipate a debate which has been put on the order paper for consideration at a later date.

I could of course give pages almost without number, where the same eminent authority has—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be good enough to repeat the page number.

Mr. Knowles: Page 2973 of Hansard for April 19, 1955.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member tell me what was the matter under consideration at the moment? Was that a bill, or a resolution, or what was it?

Mr. Knowles: It has slipped my mind for the moment. I have not room to have all my books here. If Your Honour is asking whether it related specifically to a second resolution or a second bill being proceeded with, I think not. I think it related to repetition in debate, and Your Honour has raised that point a good many times. You have raised it, sir, this year in the debates on small loans; you have raised it in debates on wheat taking place both on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and on the government's bill regarding bank loans. It has repeatedly been Your Honour's contention that there should not be two debates on the same subject before the house at the same time.

Well, sir, what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is asking is that this house by motion instruct the committee of the whole to ascribe on its agenda two debates which are practically identical. They are debates which could not possibly be carried on together without considerable overlapping and duplication.

Oh, yes, I must not fail to give one or two other examples.

Mr. MacDougall: Quote from another one that is in your pocket.

Mr. Knowles: I am awfully pleased to have the interruption of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) because my next example involves him. He too will have the opportunity to join the company of the elect and be with us on the correct side of this issue. On February 7, 1955, as recorded at page 894 of Hansard, it is indicated that a certain order was reached. It was in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and it had to do with war veterans allowances. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, sir, stood up to say one word, just one word; the word was "stand". Your Honour rose to your feet and said:

I do not think I will allow the hon. member to let his notice of motion stand.

You went on, sir, to point out that not only that motion but the motions of several other hon. members—I think three altogether—that dealt with the question of war veterans allowances would be handled in the same way. Since there was a government notice of motion on the order paper having to do with war veterans allowances you, sir, would not even allow the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard to have his notice of motion stand. You said that it had to be withdrawn from the order paper. You quoted the same authority that was thrown at us yesterday, namely, Campion. You quoted from Campion at page 144 where he says that certain items were inadmissible, and this is within quotation marks in your own words on that occasion:

Such as matters anticipating an order of the day.

What more clearly anticipates an order of the day than the motion which the Minister of Trade and Commerce seeks to move at this time?

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member whether he remembers the type of notice of motion? Was it a notice of motion in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, that is what I said.

Mr. Speaker: A private member's notice of motion.

Mr. Knowles: A private member's notice of motion; but there are some rules around here that apply equally to private members and government members, and I think there is no problem here. As I say, this motion was not only dropped from the order paper by your direction from the chair, the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, but the motions of two or three other members were also dropped. Two days later, on February 9, 1955, as recorded at page 985 of Hansard, you gave the same treatment to another one. I do not have it in my notes, but I think it was a motion in the name of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). This year, on January 30, 1956, Your Honour gave the same treatment to a motion in the name of the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy), as recorded in Hansard of that date; and so I might go on. The records are full of instances where such items have been allowed to reach the order paper, but Your Honour has refused to allow them to go one inch farther because of the rule that though more than one bill dealing with the same matter may be introduced, though more than one bill or resolution may be presented, it cannot be proceeded with. That is what the minister now seeks to do. I submit, Mr. Speaker, with the conviction that I am right, despite what you said about such an attitude yesterday, that what this house has already done is to start proceedings on the resolution of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; it has moved it from the government notices of motion stage to the government order stage, and it has moved it a stage farther into committee of the whole, and we have had a debate on it. The house has already proceeded with that resolution. The Minister of Trade and Commerce today—if there is any culprit around today it is, of course, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, not Your Honour—is trying to move up one stage another resolution which is substantially the same; and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that for the government to try to do this is playing fast and loose with the rules and privileges of this house, and we should not stand for it. The rule books point out very clearly that when a controversial issue comes before the house—I believe it is in citation No. 1 of Beauchesne's third edition—the government and the opposition are equalized. I believe what is meant is that they are equalized in the sense that the government always has its majority to rely on and the government can always win in the end by the use of that majority, but the opposition has a particular protection under the rules and forms of the house.

I insist we should have the right not to have the rule which we are not permitted to violate, violated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is my contention.

I have spoken to a good many points of order during the last fourteen years but seldom have I been so convinced as I am today that you should not put this question to the house.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, you were good enough to say that you would see me if I rose at this stage of the debate. I may say that such an irrefutable case has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I have nothing further to say.

Business of the House

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to enter into such a technical discussion and I am afraid I shall not add much to it that will in any way clarify the situation. I assure you, sir, that I have read very carefully what took place in this house yesterday. I listened carefully to the memorandum given to Your Honour by the Clerk which you read into the record today and I have listened attentively to what has been said by those who have attempted to make a case here today.

Again I say it is an extremely technical discussion. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, the authorities that have been cited are at variance one with another. There is no clear-cut case for either side in the argument although I am personally inclined to believe that we had better place our reliance upon Campion rather than upon May.

Our rules, it seems to me, are for two main purposes: (a) for the orderly dispatch of public business and (b) for the protection of the rights of minorities.

I can see no way in which what the government proposes by way of placing this second resolution on the order paper interferes with the rights of minorities; consequently, it would appear to me to be the better part of judgment in such a case to fall back upon the adage that this house is the master of its own procedure, and to settle the whole argument by having Your Honour put the question and give hon. members a chance to say how they wish to vote. When that time comes, Mr. Speaker, I will indicate how I shall vote.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fleming: Has the government nothing to say?

Mr. Speaker: I want to say now that I greatly appreciate the careful preparation of the case which has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think he has proved one point indubitably by quoting at length what Mr. King had done in 1945 because at that time Mr. King was asking the house to proceed with another resolution when there was one on the order paper. Such is the case today. At that time another one was on its way. This illustrates the point that was stressed by the memorandum given to me by the Clerk that there was no obstacle to the presentation of the resolution. No one objected when it appeared on the order paper. No one objected during the 48 hours it was there serving its notice time. No one objected when it appeared on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, just one slight correction.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation—

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Knowles: Just to keep the record straight, there were only 24 hours between the giving of the notice and the time it reached the house on that occasion.

Mr. Speaker: Nevertheless no one objected to having the two resolutions come up and therefore the point was made in the memorandum prepared by the Clerk that there should be no objection to the presentation of two resolutions on the same subject.

The hon. member argued that the resolution which is now under government notices of motions and the other one under government orders are two similar resolutions. The point is made in the memorandum of the Clerk that in his view it is a different resolution. We can argue this at great length but the fact remains that there is, in our standing orders, standing order No. 18. I am not going to use my own version; I am going to take Redlich about whose work in The Procedure of The House of Commons the greatest compliments have been made. I am quoting from volume 3 at page 17:

> There is yet one more regulation as to arrangement which finally establishes the commanding position of the government. Standing order 5—

In the United Kingdom, which is our standing order 18.

> —provides: "On days on which government business has priority, the government may arrange such government business, whether orders of the day or notices of motion, in such order as they may think fit".
> Under this order the government have the power at all times of arranging their parliamentary action in accordance with the political and administrative needs of the moment, without having to ask for the consent of the members of the house, or even of their own party. They occupy the house on government days to suit their own convenience, and in accordance with the requirements of their own political strategy.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask how that is relevant to this particular discussion?

Mr. Speaker: Concerning its relevancy, I say this. Hon. members will recall that earlier I made the point that there should be no objection to the presentation of the resolution—because that point has been made. But now we are faced with the resolution on the order paper and are about to take the motion that the house do go into committee at the next sitting of the house in order to consider the following proposed resolution. Then it will go on the order paper and it will be a government order. The only reason we have to appoint another day for the house to go into committee of the whole at the next sitting is because of standing order 61 and the requirement of the royal recommendation is also contained in the British North America Act.

If the two proposals are similar the government will have two orders on the government order paper. It will have, let us say, No. 7 and No. 15. Are there any requirements under the rules anywhere—

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) apparently did not understand the reasoning I have just presented.

Mr. Coldwell: I am following it very carefully, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot understand the logic of it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member does not understand the logic of it so far but I am very hopeful that he will in the end.

At that moment there will be two items under government orders, let us say item No. 7, the old resolution, and let us say item No. 15, this one. If, then, a member of the government moves that the order be discharged, one of the two—I want to make a distinction. The presentation of resolutions on the order paper by way of notice as our rules require to bring them to a stage where they can be taken up and the proceeding with the two resolutions so as to avoid duplication of debate are different propositions.

I want to assure hon. members they will not proceed with the two resolutions; they will proceed only with one.

Mr. Knowles: But this is a proceeding today.

Mr. Fulton: They have proceeded with one.

An hon. Member: Can the Speaker not be heard?

Mr. Speaker: At that moment one of the two may be superseded. One may be taken up in committee of the whole and a motion may be made that the chairman do leave the chair without reporting, which kills the resolution, or a motion may be made that the order be discharged and, as hon. members know, a motion that the order be discharged is not debatable. I should like to quote a motion moved by Hon. Mr. Stein which appears in Hansard of May 30, 1921, page 4107, as follows:

> Mr. Adolphe Stein (Kamouraska) moved:
> "That the order for further consideration in committee of the whole house of Bill No. 120, intituled 'An act for the relief of Alphonse LeMoyne de Martigny' be discharged, and that the said bill, together with the evidence taken before the divorce committee of the Senate, be referred back to the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills for further consideration, with instruction that the said committee have power to hear further evidence concerning the facts set forth in the preamble of the said bill."
> Mr. Speaker: I think there is no question that this motion is quite in order. Perhaps I had better point out at this stage that the motion is not debatable, under rule 17A.

That is now standing order 32. I would refer hon. members to page 478 of the Journals of 1953-54 where the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) moved:

> That the order of the house in respect of item numbered 6 under the heading, "Government Orders" on today's "Order Paper", be discharged and that leave be granted to withdraw the following proposed resolution:
> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act to provide for the carrying on of research and production activities in the atomic energy field by a minister or by companies reporting to a minister . . .
> And the question being put on the said motion, it was agreed to.

The point at issue is, should the motion to discharge item No. 7, and I am taking a number from the air—

Mr. Knowles: It is order No. 13.

Mr. Speaker: Should the motion to remove item No. 13 on the order paper have been made before the notice of motion was placed? The hon. member says yes. The memorandum which I have read is to the effect that a decision rendered about a certain matter will block the introduction of further legislation, but not the pendency of a measure until its second reading has been disposed of. There is nothing to prevent another bill on the same subject being introduced, and I refer hon. members to page 499 of May's fifteenth edition. I refer also to the following to be found on the same page:

> There is no rule or custom which restrains the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject, and containing similar provisions. But if a decision of the house has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions.

The distinction is between presentation and proceeding. I suggest that as far as presentation is concerned you can go as far as second reading, but as far as proceeding with it and providing the opportunity of debate are concerned, then the rulings of mine which the hon. member has quoted are pretty good. I have made rulings about repetition and duplication and I would certainly rule again if the government should attempt to proceed on a parallel basis with the two items. One would have to be pending at one point or another, there is no question about it; they could not proceed with the two, that is certain.

Mr. Knowles: That is what is happening here. The house is being asked to proceed with the second one.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and all hon. members who have taken part in this debate have done so with the utmost sincerity, but I say to them that I am in exactly the same position. It is my duty to make a ruling and I base my ruling on the information I have received from the Clerk. I concur in the opinion that he has expressed.

Mr. Drew: With deference, I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Knowles: With respect, I do likewise.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Drew has appealed the ruling I have just made. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Before I put the motion—this is merely a technical point—I am just wondering on what the point of order has been raised, because there is no motion before the house. I think that the motion should have been placed before the house, and then the discussion of the point of order should have taken place after the motion was proposed from the chair.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it was an appeal from your ruling that it go on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I think I can put the matter straight now—

Mr. Knowles: I believe we are under standing order—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: —by saying that government notices of motions having been called, Mr. Drew raised the point of order that it is not in order to proceed with a government notice of motion since a similar proposition stands on the order paper for consideration in the committee of the whole. I ruled that it was in order to present a proposition dealing with the same subject matter when it contained additional provisions. From this ruling Mr. Drew and others appealed for the ruling of the house.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

MOTION THAT THE HOUSE DO NOW ADJOURN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under standing order 25 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue):

That the house do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: I am on my feet announcing the result of a division, and I have called the heading "Government Notices of Motions".

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Speaker: I have. A point of order was raised and we were caught between the heading and the motion to be moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Just as I was concluding announcing the result, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was about halfway up on his feet and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, of course, was quicker; he had risen to his full height. Now, at this moment the hon. member is putting me in a very difficult position because it is customary to give the floor to a privy councillor in preference to another hon. member, and—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, standing order 25 is very clear. A motion to adjourn the house is always in order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not made it yet.

Mr. Knowles: I made it, sir. I will move it again. I move:

That the house do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is going to allow the Speaker to do whatever he has to do before he steps in with another motion. The Clerk had not concluded giving the result of the division, and I have to give the result and declare that the motion is either lost or carried.

Mr. Knowles: I thought you had done so, sir.

Mr. Speaker: Yes; I was on my feet; I was still on my feet and the hon. member was on his feet proceeding to read something which purports to be a motion to adjourn the house. I wanted to have the floor to indicate to him that at the moment that he was rising to his feet the Minister of Trade and Commerce was also rising. Now, in my position I have to give the floor either to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and in this instance I recognize the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation to be known as Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for the purposes, amongst others, of constructing, maintaining and operating a natural gas pipe line between the Ontario-Manitoba border and Kapuskasing, Ontario, and of leasing with an option to purchase such natural gas pipe line to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and carrying out such leases, including the disposal by the corporation of such pipe line in connection with such purchase option, and to provide that the Minister of Finance may lend money to the corporation for such purposes.

To provide also that the corporation may, on behalf of Her Majesty, out of moneys advanced by the Minister of Finance, make short term loans to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the construction of a natural gas pipe line from a point on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to the vicinity of Winnipeg, such loans not to exceed in the aggregate eighty million dollars or ninety per cent of the cost of construction of the said pipe line, whichever is the lesser, and to be made upon such terms, conditions and security as approved by the governor in council.

To provide also that the corporation may do such things as are conducive to the attainment of the foregoing purposes, and that in the event of default of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in carrying out any agreement for the foregoing purposes the corporation may take possession and control of any or all assets, rights and undertakings of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and conduct the business and operations of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited with respect to such assets, rights and undertakings, and that if such default should occur prior to completion of the pipe line mentioned in the last preceding paragraph hereof the corporation may complete its construction and manage and operate it and that it may, out of moneys advanced by the Minister of Finance acquire shares of the capital stock of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

To provide that the aggregate outstanding at any time of the amounts authorized by the measure to be advanced for the foregoing purposes by the Minister of Finance to the corporation together with the loans authorized to be made by the Minister of Finance to the corporation shall not exceed one hundred and thirty million dollars.

And to provide further for the appointment and remuneration of directors, officers and employees necessary for the administration of the act.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the position we have taken in regard to this motion, we must oppose the motion just moved.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour—

Mr. Knowles: You have yet not put the question, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION THAT THE HOUSE DO NOW ADJOURN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you put the question, under the provisions of standing order 25, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue):

That the house do now adjourn.

Mr. Tucker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is out of order under rule 21, which reads:

Government notices of motions for the house to go into a committee of the whole at the next sitting of the house when put from the chair shall be decided without debate or amendment.

After the motion is put, Mr. Speaker, nobody has any right under that rule to take the floor until that vote is held.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has cited a rule which speaks for itself, but there is another one which also speaks for itself.

Mr. Knowles: Rule 25.

Mr. Speaker: I shall read rule 25.

A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance), shall always be in order, but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceeding has been had.

Therefore, at this moment what has been done is that I put the motion moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and at that juncture the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is, in my view, in order in moving the adjournment of the house. This is not a debate; it is a superseding motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Do hon. members consider that the members have been called in?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: Would the whip be kind enough to so indicate? Call in the members.

The question is the following:

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) seconded by Mr. Harris, moves that the house go into committee of the whole at its next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:—

Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Some hon. Members: Read it.

Mr. Speaker:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation to be known as Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for the purposes, amongst others, of constructing, maintaining and operating a natural gas pipe line between the Ontario-Manitoba border and Kapuskasing, Ontario, and of leasing with an option to purchase such natural gas pipe line to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and carrying out such leases, including the disposal by the corporation of such pipe line in connection with such purchase option, and to provide that the Minister of Finance may lend money to the corporation for such purposes.

[Mr. Speaker.]

To provide also that the corporation may, on behalf of Her Majesty, out of moneys advanced by the Minister of Finance, make short term loans to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the construction of a natural gas pipe line from a point on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to the vicinity of Winnipeg, such loans not to exceed in the aggregate eighty million dollars or ninety per cent of the cost of construction of the said pipe line, whichever is the lesser, and to be made upon such terms, conditions and security as approved by the governor in council.

To provide also that the corporation may do such things as are conducive to the attainment of the foregoing purposes, and that in the event of default of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in carrying out any agreement for the foregoing purposes the corporation may take possession and control of any or all assets, rights and undertakings of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and conduct the business and operations of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited with respect to such assets, rights and undertakings, and that if such default should occur prior to completion of the pipe line mentioned in the last preceding paragraph hereof the corporation may complete its construction and manage and operate it and that it may, out of moneys advanced by the Minister of Finance acquire shares of the capital stock of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

To provide that the aggregate outstanding at any time of the amounts authorized by the measure to be advanced for the foregoing purposes by the Minister of Finance to the corporation together with the loans authorized to be made by the Minister of Finance to the corporation shall not exceed one hundred and thirty million dollars.

And to provide further for the appointment and remuneration of directors, officers and employees necessary for the administration of the act.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Howe, Port Arthur) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE TO BE FOLLOWED IN CONNECTION WITH STANDING ORDERS 24 AND 25

Mr. Speaker: Earlier today the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) moved that the house do proceed to orders of the day, and later the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) attempted to move that the house do now adjourn. The first motion was moved by virtue of standing order 24 and the other by virtue of standing order 25. I think perhaps I should have listened more carefully to the intervention by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker).

I should like to say that these two motions are superseding motions; therefore a motion should have been before the house first to be superseded by the motion made by the hon. member for Kamloops. It so happens that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was allowed to make his motion to adjourn the house after the motion was moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the house do go into committee of the whole at its next sitting on the resolution. The motion to adjourn the house was in order.

I should like to refer hon. members to standing order 24, which says:

> A motion for reading the orders of the day shall have preference to any motion before the house.

There has to be a motion before the house before that motion can be entertained. Standing order 25 says:

> A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance), shall always be in order, but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceeding has been had.

The words "shall always be in order" must be understood to mean providing there is a motion before the house.

I should like to refer hon. members now to Bourinot's fourth edition, page 322, where he says:

> There is a class of motions, common to all parliamentary assemblies, intended to have the effect of superseding or delaying the consideration of a question. For instance, motions for the adjournment of the house or debate, for reading the orders of the day, and for the previous question, are all in this direction.
> The term "dilatory" is used by most writers on parliamentary law as a convenient means of grouping together such motions as postpone a question for the time being.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Motions of adjournment—When any question is under the consideration of either house, a motion to adjourn will always be in order.

Then he cites rule 39, which is now our rule 25. On page 324 he says:

A motion to proceed to the orders of the day is another mode of evading a question for the time being.

He cites rule 35, which is now rule 24. Then he says:

If a question on the motion paper is under consideration, any member may move, "That the orders of the day be now read," or "That the house do now proceed to the orders of the day," or "to the public bills and orders."

Now, having said that, I think we are protected for the future.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION BY ADDITIONAL PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Could the minister advise the house whether any provinces, in addition to British Columbia and Saskatchewan, have indicated they will accept the federal government's recent offer to provide financial support and technical assistance for a hospital care insurance program?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we received an official communication from the government of Alberta, through its minister of health, saying that they accepted the federal government's proposal in principle.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALASKA—REQUEST THAT SKAGWAY BE MADE A FREE PORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Have arrangements been made for the minister or a senior official of his department to meet with the Alaskan delegate, Mr. E. L. Bartlett, who is expected in Ottawa shortly, to discuss the Alaskan panhandle problem? If so, would they give consideration to putting forward the suggestion that the port of Skagway be made a free port or a port of free entry so as to avoid customs duties and the necessity of goods passing through that port in bond to the Yukon and northern British Columbia.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I understand that the delegate to congress from Alaska is visiting Ottawa informally and unofficially, and there is no question as to official conversations on this matter with him, though some of us hope to have the pleasure of meeting him while he is here. If there were any such conversations or discussions they should, of course, take place with representatives of the United States government.

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon): I should like to ask a supplementary question to the one raised by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. Does the minister not think that the first step should be to set up an international committee composed of men who reside in the areas concerned, who are familiar with it and with the actual problems and conditions?

Mr. Pearson: This is an important matter and should be given careful consideration. I am not in a position now to give my own opinion on what would be the best procedure to achieve the end in view.

WORLD ALLIANCE FOR PEACE—PLAN OF SIR WINSTON CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he would care to comment on the noble and challenging concept that was enunciated today by Sir Winston Churchill of a grand alliance for peace, and whether anything that has taken place, in particular during the recent NATO meetings, would indicate such a change of mind on the part of the U.S.S.R. as to permit of such a concept being implemented?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree that anything Sir Winston Churchill says is likely to be important and imaginative. I think, though I have not read the text of his speech, that, from the press reports, this statement of his would qualify under both categories. I do not believe, however, not having read the statement, I could comment on it usefully at this moment.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REPORTS OF WHEAT BOARD AND GRAIN COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? When does the minister expect to have the reports of the board of grain commissioners and the wheat board before the committee on agriculture and colonization?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The reports of the board of grain commissioners and the wheat board are filed with this house and have been referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE FROM BARTIBOG TO TOMOGONOPS RIVER, NEW BRUNSWICK

The house in committee on Bill No. 248, respecting construction of a line of railway in the province of New Brunswick by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near Bartibog in a westerly direction to the Tomogonops river in the vicinity of Little River lakes—Mr. Marler—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Construction and completion.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this bill was given careful consideration by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. During the course of the discussion in the committee we heard evidence from Mr. S. W. Fairweather, who is the vice-president in charge of research and development for the Canadian National Railways, and because the story he told about this proposed branch line in New Brunswick was so interesting, and I think of such great importance to the whole of Canada, I am trespassing on the time of the committee for a few moments this afternoon to emphasize some of the statements he made.

He told us he was happier over this branch line than he had been over any other branch line of the Canadian National Railways in recent years. Then he went on to point out the significant mineral deposits that have been found in this particular part of New Brunswick. I hold in my hand the evidence taken in the committee, and at page 51 Mr. Fairweather had this to say:

> The area in New Brunswick in which the Heath Steele mine is located has developed into one of the major mineral belts of Canada.

And again, at page 56, I asked him this question:

> I understood you to say that Heath Steele mines was getting established and that you expected that there would be quite a large number of mines in that area? Is that correct?
> A. Yes. I am distinctly optimistic about this area. I would say that we have in this area one of the major mineral deposits in Canada. I think that is emerging. It is a zinc-lead-copper area, and the favourable area, so far as now known for prospecting would extend all the way from—let us say—a point 20 miles to the north of Newcastle up to, let us say, the vicinity of Campbellton, and halfway over to the Saint John river. It is an enormously large area, and we now know that, in addition, Heath Steele mines have proved an area of ore deposits of 7,200,000 tons of ore.
> A few miles away you have the New Brunswick Mining and Smelting Corporation, and they have 50 million tons of ore that have been demonstrated; and in the same general area you have Kennco mines with their prospecting, and the Texas Gulf Sulphur in prospecting, and the New Larder "U" Island mines, and while we have not shown them—

He was referring to the map which he produced in the committee.

> —there are other substantial mining companies which are prospecting in the area and they are, according to my information, getting indications. Therefore I think you can say that this area is one of the prosperous spots on the mining horizon.
> Q. You say that the whole area of mineral formation is lead-zinc-copper?
> A. So far as is known it is zinc-lead-copper, with some gold and silver.

Then on page 57 Mr. Fairweather said:

> This area has turned out in such a short period as has elapsed from the time of the first discovery—it has turned up something in the order of 60 million tons of ore, which moves this area right up into the topnotch areas of the world.

That is very significant evidence and very encouraging not only to the people of New Brunswick but also to the rest of the Canadian people because, as we all know, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have not had the advantage of northern areas through which the great shield in Canada runs, which is so heavily mineralized; and it is almost a miracle that here in New Brunswick these vast deposits have been discovered.

I also asked Mr. Fairweather about the possibility of a smelter to fabricate those ores. The questions and answers are found on page 57. I think this particular aspect of the development is of vital importance, because someone will have to take the responsibility of aiding in the development of a smelter and a refinery, and I believe the dominion government should give a lead in that regard. I asked this question:

> We hear a great deal about a smelter to be erected, and of course if that were done there would be greatly increased freight traffic, I presume. Has your company given any consideration to that possibility?
> A. Oh yes, we have given a great deal of consideration to the location of a smelter. It may be recalled that when I was giving evidence on the Chibougamau line I pointed to the strategic importance of the Saguenay river, and there is now under development a smelter in that area.
> This New Brunswick area is creating quite a problem because the ore is a highly complex ore. The metallurgy is very difficult. But at some stage I am hopeful that a smelter will be located and a refinery will be located, and that is probably as good a place of assured supply as any that I know of.
> From a development point of view we are keenly interested in getting a customs nickle smelter—

I think that is a misprint. I think he said "zinc smelter". I continue:

> —located somewhere in eastern Canada and we feel that from the development standpoint that it is a logical development. We have had talks with many industrialists and they have all agreed that at some stage we should have a zinc refinery—

That is in addition to the smelter.

—a small refinery—in eastern Canada. It is already the hope of the chemical industry, and it is purely a matter of timing; but one of the things that has to be considered is an assured supply of zinc concentrates.

Q. You have that in this area?

A. In this area there is such an enormous amount of zinc that anybody controlling the mining here would know very definitely that for a period of a hundred years at least he would have no question at all as to the supply of zinc concentrates.

That shows just what the possibilities are arising out of those mineral discoveries. We also asked Mr. Fairweather what power would be required for the smelter. For example, I asked:

How would a smelter and a refinery derive their power? Would it be from electricity, or from coal, or from what? What would be the fuel used?

A. A smelter of course is a thermal process and it would be based largely on present knowledge, either on coal or on petroleum, one or the other, as a source of energy.

Of course that is so important because of the coal in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia. By the way, it would not be of much help if oil were used rather than coal for fuel in such a smelter. I continue:

With a refinery, so far as zinc is concerned, you have your choice; you could either use a thermal reduction process, if you want to get high quality zinc, followed by redistillation, or you could use electric reduction, and in the latter case of course you would have to have a cheap source of power. Speaking as a maritimer, I would be delighted if I could see a cheaper source of power developed in the maritimes than now exists.

Q. Would the development of the Saint John river mean power which was cheap enough for that purpose?

The Chairman: Order. May I, with some deference, interrupt the hon. member. I do not wish to interfere with his train of thought, and I think he is in order to deal with this development to show the necessity of building this branch line of railway. On the other hand, under our rules of relevancy in committee, I do not think he should deal too extensively with the power to be used in a smelter. I think he will agree with me that the other line of thought is more relevant.

Mr. Green: I had practically finished, Mr. Chairman. Of course the erection of a smelter and a refinery is of great importance to the railway as well as to the whole of the area there, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I have indicated that that, in my opinion, was quite relevant; but when the hon. member proceeds to discuss the power which is to be used in the smelter, then in my opinion he is straying from relevancy.

Mr. Green: Well, it would appear that there is the possibility of a smelter using coal or oil and a refinery using electric power, or possibly using other fuel. We asked about atomic energy, and he said they were investigating that possibility also. This whole prospect is so promising that I hope the appropriate department of the government is making investigations having in mind taking steps that will encourage the opening up of those mineral deposits and that will also lead to the erection of a smelter and a refinery in that part of Canada.

We have heard Mr. Fairweather from time to time before the committee. I believe he is an extremely competent and reliable official of the Canadian National Railways who is vitally interested in the development of those different Canadian resources. Here, as he said, is a branch line which has excited him more than any other. By the way, I have heard him deal with the branch lines from Terrace to Kitimat, from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, Manitoba, and then in the Chibougamau area and the branch line to lake Manitouwadge in northern Ontario, all of which were exciting in their own right, but I feel there is an outstanding potential in this development in the province of New Brunswick. I hope the Minister of Transport or some other minister of the government will tell us whether there is in mind any policy which will promote the widest possible use of these mineral deposits for the benefit of the people of New Brunswick.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief remarks on the first clause of this bill. As a member of the committee on railways, canals and telegraphs who had the opportunity to hear Mr. Fairweather, who I understand is a vice-president of the Canadian National Railways connected with development and planning—

Mr. Marler: Research and development—

Mr. Herridge: I heard Mr. Fairweather give his evidence in connection with the necessity for the building of this railway. It was most interesting for me to hear his evidence as to the great possibilities in the development of mining in New Brunswick, possibilities which apparently have come to the fore in the last three or four years. and his relation of that development to transportation necessities in the whole area and his reasons for the necessity for building this railroad to take the concentrates from the concentrator to seaboard or to other markets.

I was particularly pleased to notice his opinion that it would be necessary for a custom smelter to be built somewhere in the maritimes to serve the mines that are coming in the future. I must say I think we are very fortunate in Canada to have a gentleman of such high capacity and vast ability as Mr. Fairweather rendering the service he does to the people of this country.

I have had the opportunity, as has the hon. member who preceded me, to hear Mr. Fairweather give evidence on a number of occasions in connection with bills that were coming before the house, and transportation problems. It clearly indicates to me that he is an expert in his field and believes in planning. His evidence is of such a nature that one sees that he believes in relating one set of circumstances to another and acting as a result of a planned and co-ordinated approach to transportation and economic problems. We in the C.C.F. are very pleased indeed to see at least that aspect of C.C.F. policy being given effect by one of the government's most prominent servants.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, the witness, Mr. Fairweather, in giving the information he did, was certainly most free and willing and he did not hesitate to answer any questions that were put before him. I was particularly interested in noting some of his observations with regard to the development that is expected to take place in the New Brunswick region and the part the Canadian National Railways hopes to play in it. I was somewhat disappointed, however, in the point of view the Canadian National Railways is apparently taking today in the development of such regions.

I refer specifically to what in my view should be the purpose of a railway. It should not be simply to develop an area; that is, to project a line into a particular area with the hope of making a profit, especially when it is a government-owned railway. I feel it should be for the purpose of opening up that country. As was indicated by Mr. Fairweather, the railway may in the course of events assist other mining industries; however, the witness indicated to us in his evidence that he did not think it was up to the railway to provide bus transportation, for instance, or other means of transportation from the homes of the miners to the mine as the case might be. The purpose of this rail line was for making a profit out of the concentrates being taken from the Heath Steele mines to the main branch of the Canadian National Railways and off to Newcastle or some other port.

It is my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that while there is a road which the Heath Steele mines helped to build, it is not up to the railway to tell the mining company or the miners that those who work in the mines shall now use bus transportation which is not being provided on that road. If the rail line is going to provide cheaper transportation with respect to hauling concentrates certainly the miners should have the right to expect that other means of transportation by rail should be offered to them as well in so far as getting to and from the mine is concerned, especially when it is considered that a good portion of the concentrates will be sent eventually to Newcastle and out through the seaport there.

The fact that the Heath Steele mine helped the province of New Brunswick build the road indicates that the mine felt some responsibility to the miners beyond getting rid of the concentrates. On page 51 of the evidence we find Mr. Fairweather's own words:

> . . . we had actually to canvass this mining company and convince them that they would be better off if they were served by a railway than if they depended solely upon highway transport.

I have no objection to them making it possible for the Heath Steele mine to reduce the price of the mineral by making available to it the Canadian National Railways transportation system. However, I do object to the fact that we have here an instance wherein all the lucrative cargo is taken from the trucks and the skim or poorer part of it is passed on to a bus company which does not even exist.

When questioned concerning this point, Mr. Fairweather indicated there were automobiles that would transport people from Newcastle to the mine. It was the intention of the mine—and it is a policy that is being followed quite freely in other mining areas today—to have the miners live about 38 miles from the mine, at Newcastle or some other central point, and travel back and forth each day between Newcastle and the mine. It is possible that this in itself would be quite satisfactory, but no means is available today for those people to get back and forth, nor is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to provide such facilities. I feel that some such means of transportation should be made available to them.

I am not suggesting for one moment that the miners would ride back and forth in the trucks that would haul the concentrates, but if the Heath Steele company felt it was necessary to assist the province of New Brunswick in building a road they would in all likelihood continue to feel a responsibility for helping to maintain that particular road. We understand that the province of New Brunswick is in need of assistance from time to time, and the assistance the Heath Steele company would give them in the building of their road would, I am sure, be very much appreciated by the people of that province. If this bill passes and this method of moving the concentrates is accepted, then these people will feel they have no obligation in respect to providing transportation back and forth because of the lack of a road. I think our railway company should accept the responsibility in this matter.

Another matter that arose in committee had to do with agreed charges, and the witness is reported on page 51 as having said:

> We did a pretty fair job, and not only did we convince them that they would be better off with the railway but we also convinced them that they could afford to give us a traffic guarantee of substantial volume sufficient to lift this branch line from a speculative position to a straight business proposition.

There was a guarantee given by the mine to the C.N.R. for the building of the branch line. If they did not carry out their guarantee then I understand the mine would have to pay a penalty to the C.N.R. In other words the mine has guaranteed the C.N.R. that either it will supply sufficient concentrates to be hauled over the line to make it pay for itself within a period of ten years, or in the event of not having the concentrates to ship over the line the mine will pay a penalty. The C.N.R. lose absolutely nothing, but they are not willing to accept the responsibility of providing other means so the miners and other people in that area may travel.

Coming back to this question of agreed charges, Mr. Fairweather indicated that he did not think this was a case of agreed charges. Hon. members of the committee can read his suggestion on page 62 in respect to agreed charges, where he indicated that this was different from the agreed charges normally entered into. Technically there might be some slight difference, but certainly there is an agreement with the Steele people as to the rate they are going to be charged and the traffic load they are going to guarantee, or in the event that the guarantee is not lived up to a penalty will be paid by the Steele people. This in effect means that there are agreed charges.

What is actually going to result is that a group of truckers will be put out of business in that province, truckers who have helped to maintain the road. When we enter into such agreements I think we have a responsibility to find out how many people are going to be put out of business. If small businessmen such as these truckers are going to be put out of business we will not be helping the people there.

I know it is not the responsibility of the C.N.R. to go around and find out what people are being put out of business and then give them jobs, or something like that; but the committee should have information as to how many truckers are going to be put out of business. We have not seen the exact terms of the agreement or how much they are being guaranteed in the way of haulage, but I can well imagine that there will be few truckers left on that road. The result will be that the province of New Brunswick will lose revenue in the form of licence fees and taxes from those particular people.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I sat in on the committee meetings, and like other hon. members I was very interested in the evidence given by Mr. Fairweather. I find myself rather bewildered by the statements just made by the hon. member for New Westminster. If I heard him correctly, the hon. member was suggesting that truckers were going to be put out of business in the province of New Brunswick. My understanding of the evidence given to us is that the particular mine to be served by the proposed branch line is in the development stage and that some time in the future, probably a few months before it is anticipated the branch line will be constructed, they expect to begin stockpiling a certain amount of concentrates. I fail to understand the reasoning of the hon. member for New Westminster in suggesting that truckers are going to be put out of business in the hauling of concentrates that are still buried in the ground within the limits of that mining property.

There is another way in which I find myself bewildered. The hon. member seems to be concerned that the C.N.R. should be hauling people back and forth between Newcastle and the mine. If I understood Mr. Fairweather correctly he intimated that under certain terms and conditions the C.N.R. would be quite prepared to provide passenger service if there were any call for such service. According to the map shown to the committee the proposed route of this line is more or less in the shape of a dog's leg between the mining property and Newcastle, whereas the highway, which I gather is quite adequate to permit people to travel back and forth, goes along the other side of the triangle, a much shorter and more expeditious route for people to travel back and forth.

I fail to understand the reasoning of the hon. member for New Westminster. Where it is necessary and reasonable for a railway company to provide passenger service, by all means they should be prepared to do so; but under these conditions it seems to me the hon. member's argument is a little absurd.

Mr. Hahn: Here is the question I asked of Mr. Fairweather and his answer, as reported on page 56:

> Q. Do they operate their own trucking line at the present time?
> A. No, they hire truckers.

The Chairman: May I take this opportunity to throw out the suggestion that perhaps a discussion of the trucking aspect of this matter is not entirely in order under this clause.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I say a word on the point of order, because I had intended to say a few words later on about that particular matter. In the agreement there is a definite provision whereby the railway is given a monopoly on about 90 per cent of the freight to be hauled, and the question of agreed charges does enter into it. You can call them agreed charges or a guarantee. I hope you are not coming to the point now of saying that we cannot discuss that aspect when it is actually in the bill.

The Chairman: I listened to the hon. member for New Westminster discuss agreed charges, and I felt he was in order, but on the other hand I merely suggest that I do not think we should wander too far afield in discussing the trucking business. This is, after all, a railway bill, not a trucking bill.

Mr. Barnett: I must say with reference to this point that neither as a result of the discussion in the railways, canals and telegraph lines committee, nor here, am I too sure as to whether or not the hon. member for New Westminster and his colleagues are supporting this bill.

An hon. Member: You will find out.

Mr. Barnett: But I did draw some inference from his remarks that in effect he might be suggesting it was advisable that we should not build this railway but that we should let truck lines haul out the concentrates from the mines. If that is the conclusion at which he arrives eventually, I must say at once that I do not agree with him, because on the face of the economies that were admitted to us I am utterly at a loss to understand why he should suggest that the people of the province of New Brunswick should be saddled with the cost of building and maintaining a highway to haul out heavy loads of zinc, lead and copper concentrates when it can be hauled out on a short spur line at about one-fifth of the cost, according to the evidence.

Mr. Hahn: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is quite definitely putting words into my mouth. I suggested no such thing. I was merely asking for an additional service by the C.N.R.

Mr. Barnett: I realize that the hon. member's argument seemed to revolve around two points. One was the fact that the C.N.R. should provide a passenger service, in addition to a freight service, and his other argument seemed to be that the C.N.R. should not provide either. I find it a little difficult to decide which line of his argument I ought to pursue at any given moment. I must say that I do not know how you can have it both ways. If the railway line is not to be built at all, I do not know how you can be expected to provide a passenger service.

However, to come back to the point I was on, I fail to understand why the member shows such concern over the idea of having these concentrates hauled by truck, saddling upon the people of the province of New Brunswick the very expensive job of maintaining a highway adequate to do that job, for the benefit of a few truck drivers. One would almost think all the people of New Brunswick were suddenly going to become truck drivers to haul this ore. To me that just does not add up to plain, ordinary common sense, and for my part I support the measure.

Mr. McIvor: The hon. member for Pictou, the chairman of that committee, brought in his report, and it was adopted. We received a good deal of information, and I think the committee was unanimous in passing it. Like the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I think this bill should go through and we should not have very much more talk about it.

Mr. Bell: This is one time it is a pleasure to agree with the hon. member for Fort William. But two thoughts come to my mind in reading the report of the committee. It was not my pleasure to serve on the committee, but in reading through the verbatim reports of the proceedings a few matters caused me slight concern. First of all I should like to say this. I know everybody has indicated how pleased we are that New Brunswick is prospering with these new discoveries that Providence has provided. We should give credit to the industrialists and promoters who went in and undertook the initial work, and we should give credit also to the aggressive political leaders of that province now.

Mr. Robichaud: When was it started?

Mr. Bell: However, I do want to mention the fact that the real battle has just begun there in the province, as far as this ore development is concerned. Everybody in the province—and I say this regardless of politics—wants to take full advantage of these discoveries. They want to develop them in our province and to gain every advantage from that development.

Having said that, I might add that these two thoughts come to my mind as a result of reading the committee report. I note that there was some discussion about the ports through which the ore concentrates would be shipped.

I was taken aback—in fact, I nearly fell out of my chair—when I saw Halifax mentioned. Coming from New Brunswick and the good old port of Saint John, I realize that reference should be made to that port. The minister certainly appreciates that, because he knows what great facilities we have in Saint John.

I do not have any quarrel with the ports in New Brunswick, the warm-weather ports of Dalhousie, Bathurst and Newcastle, but I want to say that with the government railway concerned in this project in which there is a certain amount of direction of traffic, with cars being made available, discretion comes to the fore and Saint John should be given every preference, because it is within the province. The facilities are provided there, and the government can step up those facilities.

The second matter—and it will only take me a minute to mention—concerns contracts. There was some discussion in the committee regarding the contracts that will be let to construct this railway. We have a difficult problem in New Brunswick with the contracts that are being let for all our new development work. It may be the army camp; it may be the construction of this line, but the problem is this. We do not have large operators down there in the construction business generally. We cannot keep up with the tenders of concerns outside the province, and consequently all we can get for ourselves are small contracts.

Mr. Robichaud: What about the Diamond Construction Company?

Mr. Bell: That is a general statement.

Mr. Marler: I have a higher opinion of your contractors than you have.

Mr. Bell: Well, I do say this, without prolonging the argument, that the contracts for the army camp generally were in large amounts, and our concerns in New Brunswick and throughout the maritimes could not tender on these large $2 million jobs. That is a true statement. I am not saying there has been unfairness. I am simply saying we have to be given a break with regard to these contracts, and those for large amounts should be made available to our contractors. This would apply to the construction of this railway line. We have already had two or three failures, in regard to work on the army camp, of small contractors trying to step up their businesses in order to be able to meet that situation. I leave those few thoughts with the committee and I hope they will be considered, because they mean a good deal to us in the province.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I desire to make just a few remarks on this proposed railway line in the newly developed mining area of New Brunswick. I want it plainly understood that never have we taken the position that the line running into this area should not be gone on with. We are firmly of the belief that it is high time there was some development in the province of New Brunswick.

It is an amazing thing that in New Brunswick, which now seems to have such a tremendous amount of natural wealth, it has taken so long to develop it. A while ago a reference was made to politics. Hence I should not be out of order if I say that under the Liberal regime in New Brunswick and under the present Conservative regime in New Brunswick little progress has been made. New Brunswick is considered to be one of the more unfortunate provinces in Canada having regard to any major developments. I think we can only thank the two administrations that have been carrying on in that province. Don't let anybody say that anything I might state could be construed in any way to prevent the development of the natural resources of the province of New Brunswick.

A while ago the hon. member for Comox-Alberni tried to leave with the committee the implication that the hon. member for New Westminster was adverse to the development of this railway. Of course nothing could be further from the truth. He has never advocated any such thing. However, he has pointed out clearly that in order to have a proper and orderly development in the province of New Brunswick there should be free competition.

I want to speak about that free competition for a minute, Mr. Chairman. In the agreement between this company and the railway, there is a clause which states that before the railway will be proceeded with the company must guarantee to the railway a certain amount of traffic. I believe Mr. Fairweather stated on that occasion that it was something about 90 per cent.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member should either reread the evidence or read what I said when the bill was before the house on second reading or at the resolution stage. There is nothing about 90 per cent anywhere in the evidence. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the traffic guarantee contemplated that the Heath Steele mining company would ship 75,000 tons of concentrates, and that if they failed to do so there would be a penalty which would be paid by the mining company to the railway company. There was nothing about 90 per cent of anything.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I am quite glad the minister made that interjection because if my memory serves me aright, when we were before the committee Mr. Fairweather said the company had agreed to give a certain percentage—and according to my memory it was between 80 per cent and 90 per cent—guarantee to the railway before it would build. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni stated a while ago, when the hon. member for New Westminster was speaking, that the hon. member for New Westminster should remember that this mine would not be developed were it not for the railway. Of course that is not true.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, may I say that I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The mining company have already taken the lead and they have established a going concern there. As far as the railway is concerned, it was stated to us that if there were other forms of competition it would not interfere greatly with the business of the railway because under the present agreed charge—and I am going to call it an agreed charge, not a guarantee, because we must call things what they are—

Mr. Marler: I think the hon. gentleman should follow that rule and not call an agreed charge something that does not even resemble an agreed charge.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When a railway goes in and makes an agreement with a company for a certain percentage of the business—

Mr. Byrne: Where is the election next month?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When the railway goes in and makes an agreement with a company for a certain percentage of the business, that is exactly the same procedure that is carried on in an agreed charge.

Mr. Marler: The evidence does not support that contention at all.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The witness the other day certainly gave that impression. Not only did he give us that impression but he stated it quite clearly.

Mr. Marler: No.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When we were talking about the cost of the railway Mr. Fairweather told us that it would cost about $2,800,000. When I asked him how long he expected it would take to pay that back, he said this, as appears at page 52 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee:

> A. On the present level of traffic on this line—

Not on increased traffic, Mr. Chairman, but on the present level that is there now:

> —we would have amortized our capital in a little less than 10 years.

The expected life of this mine is about 20 years. I therefore think it is quite evident that the railway cannot lose anything on this deal. I am going to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that there should be no agreed charge with the railway. I do not want that statement interpreted to mean that I do not want a railway built into that mining area. I certainly do. But I also want to see the province of New Brunswick in the position where they are going to get some decent hard-surfaced roads so as to develop the rest of the economy in that province. The railways are certainly better equipped to haul concentrates from the mine to the smelter or to the export ports, and there should be no difficulty at all in that matter.

If we are speaking about the trucking industry—and I am not particularly concerned here and now about the trucking industry—I would say they could not compete in the hauling of that type of freight. But certainly there should be no impediment to other forms of transportation entering into the development of this very rich area in New Brunswick which is just now being opened up. I think we are setting a poor pattern in Canada when we allow the railways to do everything in their power to create a monopoly in transportation in this country.

This is just another instance of where the railways—and it does not make any difference to me whether it is the C.N.R. or the C.P.R. —are entering into an agreement and the result of that agreement is that they are pushing all other forms of competition out. Certainly they are pushing them out of that field which would be in a position to give them some return. Those who are engaged in transportation in New Brunswick cannot develop an area in there in competition with a railway which has the whole business tied up.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member suggest that truckers would be prepared to build a highway into this mine to take out the ore without a firm guarantee of revenue from hauling?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Nobody is suggesting any such thing. I do not think the trucking concerns, if we want to confine our remarks to them, should be asked to do such a thing. Under the terms of this bill the whole government of Canada is behind the railway. It would seem that whenever a socialized project—and the Canadian National is a socialized project—is being put into operation, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and others say it should not run any risk. That is what this railway is doing. The business is established there and, in fact is guaranteed. Now, the socialist attitude would be, and the government is getting itself right into that line, that we have to have the line there and we should cut out all forms of competition.

Certainly we want competition. How does the province of New Brunswick or any other province ever develop if it is not through the energetic efforts of private enterprise?

Mr. Argue: Through the efforts of the people.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): My friend from Saskatchewan interrupts. I should like him to explain to this house in what single instance the province of Saskatchewan has ever had any profitable development that has not been developed by private enterprise?

Mr. Argue: Every crown corporation.

Mr. Marler: Let us talk about the bill.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I agree with the minister that we should get along with the bill, but I hate any steps toward socialization and the exclusion of all other forms of transportation.

Mr. Argue: What is your policy on the pipe line?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I will talk to you about that tomorrow, and it will not be on a selfish basis. It will be on a broad Canadian national basis.

Coming back to the bill, I wish the government would consider, when they are entering into a project like this, that every encouragement should be given to free enterprise, I do not care whether it is trucking or what it is. Free enterprise should be given an opportunity. Let me correct that and say private enterprise, so there will be no misinterpretation put upon it. Private enterprise should be allowed to enter into competition in the freight hauling, passenger hauling or any other kind of hauling along this new proposed line, so the province of New Brunswick and particularly the new area which is being developed will be able to expand and give the people of New Brunswick a chance for a better standard of living than they have had to date under the two old line parties.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Robichaud: When this bill was presented for second reading I had occasion to express my appreciation to the government and to the Canadian National Railways for wanting to proceed with the construction of this spur line in connection with the development of the minerals in New Brunswick. I can understand the enthusiasm which was expressed by Mr. Fairweather because it is in line with the report which was made in 1953 when the discoveries of minerals in northern New Brunswick were mentioned as the mining discovery of the year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised to see that the members from the other end of Canada, the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, are somewhat embarrassed by that situation in New Brunswick. The hon. member for New Westminster mentioned that the construction of this railway would have some effect in reducing employment for truckers and others in New Brunswick. I want to make it clear that before the mining companies approached the Canadian National Railways for the construction of this line they made a complete study of the situation. They studied the different ways of transporting minerals to the main shipping points. I have had occasion to have private discussions with certain officials of these companies, and they have been studying even the possibility of transporting minerals by air. But after careful study they decided that the cheapest, most economical way was to use the Canadian National Railways.

So far as this penalty clause is concerned, it has been mentioned as one that might restrict employment. On the contrary this penalty clause is one which means the company will have to have a certain minimum tonnage per year, and I think that will force the company to continue operations, not to curtail them, for if operations were curtailed it would also curtail employment.

Just before the recess the hon. member for Saint John-Albert expressed the opinion that the port of Halifax should not have been mentioned. I agree with him that we have in New Brunswick the port of Saint John, but we do not have to go to Saint John, which is 200 miles from the mine. Only 30 or 40 miles from these mineral deposits, we have shipping facilities just outside of Bathurst harbour. In fact last year two test pits were dredged outside the port of Bathurst as an experiment. It is proving very satisfactory. Should it be that this is not altogether satisfactory to the mines for shipping minerals out of the country after they have been processed, we have at Pokesudi, as I have mentioned previously in this house, only 60 miles from the mine, sufficient depth of water within 200 or 300 feet from the shore to provide for deep water shipping 12 months of the year.

The hon. member for Saint John-Albert also expressed a desire to have the contract given, if possible, to a New Brunswick or maritime company. He expressed the opinion, too, that we did not have contractors able to undertake such projects. Well, I cannot agree with that statement, because in New Brunswick we have such companies as the Diamond Construction Company which already has contracts for $2·5 million in Halifax for the construction of an airport and contracts for over $3 million at Gagetown. We have other companies, such as Modern Construction and Dexter Construction, which could easily undertake such projects. All I would add is that if and when contracts are given by the Canadian National Railways, they should follow the policy of granting the contract to the lowest tenderer, if he is qualified to do the job, and not do as the province of New Brunswick did when the Beechwood contract was awarded.

Mr. Van Horne: New Brunswick is indeed fortunate to be the resting place for the immense deposits of iron ore and other metals which have recently been discovered. I welcome the construction of this railway line, which is sorely needed. I consider it a step forward. I also feel that the Canadian National has shown considerable foresight in insisting on clauses which will serve to incite the mining companies to keep in operation.

I wish to point out also that more planning could be done by the federal government to serve the mining areas in New Brunswick. I heartily agree with the hon. member for Gloucester concerning the establishment of good ports. We have the Jacquet river in New Brunswick, for instance, which is an ideal location for a year-round winter port.

Mr. Marler: This is all very interesting, but it has nothing to do with the bill. I suggest that a winter port is a topic that might be discussed on the estimates of one of the departments, but it has nothing to do with the building of a branch line from Bartibog, New Brunswick.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the question of these ports is very important. Mr. Fairweather dealt with them at some length in the committee, because they have a plan. Part of this plan is how the products of the mine are to be taken to the coast and shipped abroad. For the minister to say there can be no discussion about that, I submit, is entirely out of reason.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister will agree that the establishment of winter ports in New Brunswick is certainly linked and should be in conjunction with the establishment of this spur line of the railway. Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, we in New Brunswick feel that this branch line is a step forward and we welcome the opportunity to support this move.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Chairman, I just have a few brief remarks to make. I want to add my word of appreciation to the authorities responsible for the construction of this rail line. I also would like to express my appreciation of the interest that hon. members from the prairie provinces and the west have shown in the recent developments in New Brunswick. I realize that perhaps they did not appreciate my intervention in western matters earlier this year, but I would not retaliate in the same manner. I appreciate their interest in our eastern developments.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): We are glad to be of assistance.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): However, the hon. member for Bow River did say something about politics, which I do not think really should enter into this discussion. He will find out after the next provincial election that the people of New Brunswick pretty much like the two old line parties.

The building of this railway will enable the mines to ship the concentrates to Newcastle and thence to the other ports of the world by way of Saint John, Newcastle or the north shore ports during certain months.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra put on record this afternoon the evidence given the committee of how vast our findings are. The vast findings are, of course, the reason this railway is being built. Of course other commodities will go over this line; pulpwood, for instance. Pulp boats have been coming into Newcastle and into the north shore ports for a number of years.

I stated earlier in this house that these mining discoveries in New Brunswick would necessitate improvements in transportation. The building of this railway from Bartibog to Tomogonops and to the main line at Newcastle is the first step; the second step is from Newcastle through the proposed Chignecto canal to the ports of the eastern seaboard of the United States. I will only be too happy if western members will show the same interest in the second phase of the transportation of concentrates from these mines by displaying an interest in the proposed Chignecto canal also.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, a while ago the minister made some reference to a remark I had made and said there was no indication whatever in regard to the percentage of traffic that would be hauled over this line under the government's guarantee. On page 59 of the proceedings in the committee I asked the witness this question:

You said that your outgoing traffic would be cencentrates?
A. Yes.
Q. About 90 per cent?
A. Yes.

Mr. Marler: That is of the total traffic, is it not?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I was speaking about their orders; that is, the railways'.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I really cannot leave the hon. member for Bow River under the misapprehension he has with regard to this proposed arrangement between the mining company and the Canadian National Railways. He has referred to Mr. Fairweather's evidence before the committee, and during his remarks he kept insisting on calling the arrangement an agreed charge. Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to read to this committee one of the questions the hon. member for Bow River put during the course of the proceedings before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. On page 53 the hon. member asked the following question:

Q. You have a virtual monopoly on the freight hauled and on the passenger service as well?
A. There will be no passenger service involved in this. We made it quite plain to the company that the highway was a more efficient tool for transporting passengers than the railway; in consequence, we have no position with regard to that.
Moreover, you are in error. There is no monopoly. They do not have to ship one pound of freight over this railway—the only thing is that if they do not ship a certain volume of the production of the mine over the railway they would be obliged to pay us a penalty.

This is the significant question, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Bow River said:

Q. That is practically an agreed charge, is it not?
A. No, it is not an agreed charge. You could not possibly call this an agreed charge.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the face of the evidence from someone who is in the railroad business and who knows what an agreed charge is, the hon. member has been trying to impress upon this committee the idea that the railway here is making an agreement which is tying up all the traffic from the mine. When he spoke about a percentage a little earlier I interrupted him to say there had been no question of any percentage in that. I was quite right. Ordinarily when railways do make an agreed charge there is a condition that the shippers shall give to the railways not less than a certain stated percentage of the freight which they are shipping. The 90 per cent to which my hon friend referred a moment ago, and which is mentioned on page 59, has nothing to do with the contract. These questions were also asked by the hon. member for Bow River:

Q. You said that your outgoing traffic would be concentrates?
A. Yes.
Q. About 90 per cent?
A. Yes.

That means the concentrates represented 90 per cent of the total traffic. Well, now, that is not an agreed charge, Mr. Chairman. I hope the hon. member for Bow River will realize that what is at issue here is a traffic agreement between the Canadian National Railways and the mining company, the purpose of which is to assure the building of the line.

I explained how the traffic guarantee would operate when we were dealing with this matter at the resolution stage and on second reading. In essence what it means is this. The railroad must make an investment of approximately $3 million in order to build this line from Bartibog to the Tomogonops river, a distance of some 22 miles. It is perfectly clear from the bill and from the explanations that have been given that the cost of the work is going to be something slightly less than $3 million, and that money is going to be spent whether traffic flows over it or not.

Once the line has been built the money has been committed irrevocably; and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly logical that the Canadian National Railways, when requested to make an expenditure of this dimension, should say to the mining company which is quite anxious to make use of the railroad facilities—because otherwise they would never honour the agreements—"Will you guarantee to us that you will give us a minimum of 75,000 tons of concentrates each year, or if you do not that you will pay us a penalty" which I think I said the other day was $3 per ton.

I also explained that if in one year the concentrates shipped exceeded 75,000 tons, then the excess would be credited against a deficiency in any subsequent year. What surprises me, Mr. Chairman, when I hear the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for New Westminster, is that they seem to resent the fact that the Canadian National Railways are taking what I regard as an elementary precaution to protect themselves against loss. Ordinarily the criticism is that the loss has been realized and that the railroad has not taken precautions to avoid it. This time the criticism is that we are taking precautions to avoid losses.

The hon. member for New Westminster complains that the railway company is not going to provide a passenger service; yet it is perfectly clear from the evidence before the committee—and the hon. member for New Westminster was present—that the arrangement between the railway company and the mining company expressly excluded any obligation on the part of the C.N.R. to provide passenger service. Why? I think it was the hon. member for Comox-Alberni who explained the geography. First of all it is longer by rail, and second it is much more economical to use a highway for the transport of people from Newcastle to the mine.

Hon. members will recall that Mr. Fairweather explained, too, that it seemed desirable that the community facilities which exist at Newcastle should serve those who would find employment at the mine, and it was much more desirable that those facilities should be used than that they be duplicated by building a community at the mine site itself.

The hon. members for New Westminster and Bow River also seemed to work up a certain amount of sympathy over the situation of the truckers. Is it not elementary, Mr. Chairman, that where we are dealing with such things as concentrates, a bulk shipment, it is natural for such shipments to be carried by rail and not by road? Hon. members know perfectly well that the concentrates, as was explained before the committee, may go almost anywhere once they have been produced; they will probably be sold and they may go overseas, to the United States or to some other part of Canada. They are not, however, going to be carried overseas by trucks, nor are they going to be carried to the United States by trucks.

The next point is that all the sympathy that is being worked up relates to truckers who do not yet exist, because there have been no shipments out of the mine. The hon. member for New Westminster was shedding tears over the unfortunate plight of those truckers who might carry the concentrates if the company decided to ship them by truck. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not ready to join in shedding tears over people who do not already have the business. If the railways were taking it away from them I would have a certain amount of sympathy, but not too much. Here is something that properly belongs to the railways. I do not think my hon. friends should shed too many tears over these mythical truckers who so far have not carried a ton of concentrates.

In essence, Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple transaction. Canadian National Railways is proposing to spend approximately $3 million to bring rail facilities into the heart of an area which seems most promising so far as base metals are concerned. We know how easy it is for truckers to pull up, move their trucks and go elsewhere, but we all should realize it is not possible for the railway to do the same thing. Once the line goes down it would take a great deal of time and effort to get it up, and there naturally would be a great deal of capital lost in the process.

It is for that reason the railways wish to insure themselves against loss by saying to the mining company, "If you wish to have our services and if you are going to be our principal client, then guarantee that you will give us the traffic". If the mining company does not wish to give the railway the traffic and wishes instead to ship by some other means it is perfectly free to do so, but it must make good on the guarantee which they have given to the railway and which is the reason the railway is going to spend approximately $3 million for the building of this line.

There is only one other observation I should like to make, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra seemed to think this was a good opportunity to get in a crack in favour of the dominion government giving the lead in the building of a customs smelter. Well, Mr. Chairman, I know that the words, "Giving the lead" are open to a very wide variety of interpretations. I can just imagine how the hon. member would lift his hands in horror if it were to be suggested that the dominion government was going to finance such a project as that—

Mr. Green: You prefer to finance United States pipe lines.

Mr. Marler: —and with his affection for private enterprise I understand that he would prefer to see it done by Canadian capital as soon as possible; but it seems to me that what we are doing now qualifies for just the sort of thing the hon. member must have had in mind, because I am sure he would not have been thinking about the things I suggested somewhat lightly.

I suggest that the government is giving a lead by seeing that the railway is built. It seems to me that is a function that can properly be carried out by the Canadian National Railways without our being accused of doing something that properly ought to be done by the provincial government, which has the primary responsibility for developing its own natural resources. It seems to me that we are giving the lead in building this line, and all I can add by way of conclusion is that everybody seems to be most enthusiastically in favour of building the line but we have been talking for an hour and ten minutes without getting one clause through the committee. I suggest that if those people would demonstrate their enthusiasm by passing the bill then we could get on and do something about building the line.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister one question because everything appears to have been pretty well covered. I am one of those who want to get on and see the bill passed. This is a forward step for our province. I did not have the privilege of sitting on the committee. A great deal has been said about the guarantee. I wonder if the minister would just explain how long that guarantee is to last. Is it just for the ten years during the amortization period?

Mr. Marler: No, the guarantee is for a period of six years. I think I can best summarize it by saying that in the six years the mining company must ship an aggregate quantity of 450,000 tons of concentrates, and if they do so there will be no penalties whatever payable under the guarantee.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about this. I do not want the minister to think for a moment that I am against the government building the road in there; let us have no misunderstanding about that. What I want to straighten the minister out on, if I can, is that in effect the contract which is entered into is just as effective as an agreed charge and answers the same purpose. I wish to refer to the statement on page 53, where I asked a question. The minister read it a moment ago but I wish to repeat it. I asked the witness this question:

> That is practically an agreed charge, is it not?

And the answer was:

> No, it is not an agreed charge. You could not possibly call this an agreed charge.

The minister left it there, but let me go over to page 62 of the evidence, where the hon. member for New Westminster repeated the question. He asked this question of the witness:

> In what way does it differ from the agreed charge that exists on the line we are speaking of today where the proposed branch line is 22 miles long?

The answer was as follows, and I want you to notice the definition of both these things:

> An agreed charge is a particular definition of a term under which an industry in construction by a company give a certain operation rate and, given a tariff rate, contracts to send a certain proportion of its traffic by rail.

Now, let me add a word there.

Mr. Marler: Let us go on with the next paragraph.

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I will in just a moment. The company agrees to give the railway a certain percentage of its traffic and that is bound up by contracts.

Now then, the next paragraph contains the following question:

> Is that what we are doing here?
> A. No, no, this is quite a different matter, this is a traffic guarantee.

What is the difference between a traffic guarantee under which you have to ship 75 per cent of your goods over the railroad, and a guarantee under which you have to ship at least 75,000 tons over the railroad, and if you do not you pay a penalty? If that is not an agreed charge, if that is not bound up in the same term, I would like to know what it is. Mr. Fairweather continued:

> Under an agreed charge, once a man signs it he has no option. In this arrangement he does not undertake to use the railway at all. If he does not like the colour of our hair or something like that he can stop using the railway.
> Q. Is there not a guarantee?
> A. As I say, if he ceases to ship, he has to pay a penalty.

That is just as effective as an agreed charge or as any other similar arrangement under a different name. The minister must not assume that I am arguing in favour of the truckers. What I am trying to point out is that if we expect to develop all or any part of Canada it should be done on a free competitive basis. These people should be able to compete with other forms of transportation. As the minister has indicated, trucks cannot compete with the railroad in hauling these concentrates. If that is so, why should a guarantee arrangement be made? They could push the truckers right off the road. When the witness was giving evidence before the committee I believe he said that the railroad could haul this traffic for 2 cents where the truckers would have to charge 10 cents. Under those circumstances the truckers could not compete with the railroad in hauling these concentrates, so why tie the thing up under a guarantee basis such as this. I think the thing should have been left wide open so that other forms of transportation could come in and compete with the railroad and thus help to develop New Brunswick.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I rise because the minister seemed to think that I was shedding mythical tears over mythical truckers. If the hon. members will check my minutes I think they will find it is rarely I have occasion to refer to any questions I might have asked in the committee. However, if it becomes necessary at this time I am ready to do that.

The hon. member for Kootenay East has suggested that I am not a New Brunswicker, but I would refer him to Beauchesne's second edition, section 21, where he will find that I have certain responsibilities in this house which I do not hesitate to share with other hon. members.

In respect to the mythical tears which I am supposed to be shedding, I would refer to page 56 of the minutes of proceedings. I referred to this specifically in the committee. I do not say that it was deliberate, but I think Mr. Fairweather misled me with certain of the information he gave. I quote from the evidence as follows:

Q. Could you give us the mileage by road from Heath Steele to Newcastle?
A. It is about 38 miles, as I recall it.
Q. Was Heath Steele mine the only mine contributing to that road which was built earlier?
A. Oh yes, Heath Steele mines to some extent, I understand, contributed to the cost of that highway.
Q. Do they operate their own trucking line at the present time?
A. No, they hire truckers.
Q. You say they hire trucks. You do not know how many truckers are in operation there at the present time?
A. No, I do not.

Mr. Robichaud: Does the hon. member know that the mine has not yet shipped any minerals?

Mr. Hahn: I realize that.

Mr. Robichaud: These trucks are being used to transport equipment to the mines.

Mr. Hahn: I appreciate that question very much. That was my purpose in asking the question, and apparently there was a misunderstanding between Mr. Fairweather and myself as to the interpretation of the purposes of the trucking. His interpretation was that the trucking was as the hon. member for Gloucester has just pointed out, for the carrying of materials from Newcastle to the mine. Today the purpose of the proposed rail line is quite apparent.

I have one further remark to make in respect to my earlier observation to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni referred. Anyone who is at all familiar with the strides we are making in Canada knows the enthusiasm with which I like to see those strides made in any part of Canada, whether in New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia or British Columbia. I am sure all hon. members will be fully aware that I am certainly in accord with the construction of this line, but I would like to see the C.N.R. take full responsibility for everything that is being done.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration (including advisory committee on agricultural services), $670,015.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at ten o'clock last Thursday I was in the process of pointing out some inadequacies in the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I had said that in my opinion the act seemed to be moving backwards instead of forward. I had drawn attention to the fact that I had placed on the order paper at the beginning of this session a resolution which had I had the opportunity to move it would have called for a considerable widening of the operations of that act.

In recent months there have been two events which have caused considerable anxiety in the prairie provinces, particularly in Manitoba, with respect to the small projects or special votes under the act. I had mentioned that one of the arrangements under which a certain number of special projects had been constructed in Manitoba was an agreement between the federal government and the province, involving also the municipalities, under which the federal government paid approximately 50 per cent of the cost while the province shared the other 50 per cent with the municipalities.

While those conditions were appreciated as being better than nothing we found that in many cases, because the full project hinged upon the ability of the local municipality to pay its share of the cost, which ran in the neighbourhood of one-sixth plus the right of way, those municipalities which most needed the drainage or flood control projects were least able to meet the cost. For that reason, in many cases where these flood control measures were required they were not carried out because, as I said, the first move had to be up to the municipality.

Since that time two things have happened that have caused concern in Manitoba. Earlier this year—I think I mentioned this in the house before—the Minister of Agriculture had notified the provincial minister of agriculture in Manitoba that when the provincial government wishes to have a survey made in order to establish the feasability of a particular project with regard to flood control, whereas in the past the federal government was willing to lend the services of the P.F.R.A. engineers at their own cost, in future the province would have to pay for any such survey out of their own treasury.

That in itself, in my opinion, was instrumental in holding back a number of surveys the provincial government would like to have had carried out.

Later on this year there was another change made in the arrangements, and that involved the sharing of the cost. I have also already described this. Under a special vote the federal government was prepared to pay 50 per cent of the cost of these small projects. Later on the federal government took the position that any future joint undertakings of that nature would be carried out under the water conservation act rather than under a special vote of the P.F.R.A.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press dated March 7, 1956, which I think indicates how widespread the concern was in that province. In fairly bold headlines the news item reads as follows:

Ottawa Chops Aid In Flood Projects

It then goes on to describe what had happened in these words:

Ottawa has blasted Manitoba hopes for a possible 100 per cent federal payment on large flood protection projects in this province.

Speaking in the legislature Tuesday night, Premier D. L. Campbell said he understood that in future flood protection and remedial projects would come under provisions of the water conservation assistance act—rather than under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Further down in this news item it describes what the effect of this new policy would be, in these words:

This would cut federal aid by 60 per cent in some cases.

Under the water conservation act, the federal and provincial government each pay 37½ per cent of the cost for projects approved by both parties. The other 25 per cent would be levied against municipalities.

May I just pause there to point out that if this policy is carried out it will be adding a further burden to the municipalities, which already in many cases were not capable of carrying even one-sixth of the cost of these projects, which were very necessary in our province. If this policy is carried through they will be asked to contribute 25 per cent instead of approximately 16 per cent, as was the case before. The news item goes on further in these words:

The change has dealt a serious blow to Manitoba's hopes to have P.F.R.A. undertake at least two large projects, the widening and controlling of the Fairford river channel, leading from lake Manitoba to lake Winnipeg, and some work on flood protection for the Red river valley.

Then it goes on in greater detail. Just in case the Minister of Agriculture might think this is only the view of one of the newspapers of my province—

Mr. Gardiner: I rise on a point of order. The fact is that these particular works of which my hon. friend has been speaking have never been under P.F.R.A. at any time. They are not even within the P.F.R.A. area. They are outside the P.F.R.A. area altogether. They have always been, if they are under any activity from here at all, under the same setup as now. The bill that was passed a few years ago was simply defining what share of the work was to be paid for by the province and what share by the federal government. It was 37½ per cent for each, and 25 per cent was to be paid by the municipality concerned. That never was under the P.F.R.A. at any time. There has been no change in policy, and it has nothing whatever to do with my estimates.

Mr. Zaplitny: If that is the case then certainly the minister of agriculture in the province of Manitoba should be so informed, because I was just about to place on the record the comments that minister made with regard to the very things of which I am talking. That is here in the next day's issue of the Winnipeg Free Press in the following terms:

Manitoba's agriculture minister Hon. R. D. Robertson, Wednesday expressed dissatisfaction of federal government failure to implement a single flood control and soil conservation policy for Canada, or at least for the prairie provinces.

At the same time, he said he was "displeased" over the dominion's new water control formula, under which Ottawa and the province bear equal shares of 75 per cent of the cost of such measures, with municipalities absorbing the remaining 25 per cent.

The minister may say that the water conservation act does not have any direct connection with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, or that these special projects do not come within the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and he may be technically correct.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not a matter of being technically correct at all. There is nothing in the P.F.R.A. estimates that touches anything of which my hon. friend is speaking. The activities in his own constituency, having to do with the Dauphin area, are under an agreement between the Department of Agriculture here and the department of agriculture in Manitoba. There is some money voted for that particular project, but it is not under the rehabilitation vote. The rehabilitation area is defined as the basin of the Assiniboine river, in so far as Manitoba is concerned—not in that section of Manitoba that is represented by my hon. friend from Dauphin. Nothing at all outside the basin of the Assiniboine river comes under P.F.R.A. It is all under some other special arrangement whereby the province does the work.

The Chairman: Hon. members will realize that I am perhaps fairly unfamiliar with

P.F.R.A., but the minister has raised this point of order. A short time after he did so the hon. member for Dauphin proceeded to read from a newspaper clipping which, it would seem to me, would indicate that the expressed point of order is well taken. I would therefore ask the hon. member for Dauphin to confine his remarks to subjects which could properly be taken up under the first item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very glad to follow your suggestion. I shall not need to review what I have already said, but I think we can agree on this much with the Minister of Agriculture, that as he has himself stated just a few minutes ago, certain arrangements have been made between his department and the department of agriculture in the province of Manitoba. Certainly those arrangements must concern the administration of the Department of Agriculture here, and, to the extent they do, I submit that certainly it is in order to discuss those arrangements. I shall refrain from any further reference to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act until we come to that particular item, if that is more convenient.

Mr. Gardiner: We had better get it all understood to begin with. My hon. friend was speaking of the connection between lake Manitoba and lake Winnipeg. That is not in the P.F.R.A. area, and we have no arrangements whatsoever with regard to that. He reads from the Winnipeg Free Press to indicate that at some time or other, P.F.R.A. had taken care of flood conditions around those lakes. P.F.R.A. does not take care of flood conditions around those lakes. Those are under the province, unless they make an arrangement under the act spoken of, which comes under my hon. friend the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and not under this department at all.

Mr. Zaplitny: I fail to see why the minister should raise any further objection to what I am saying, Mr. Chairman, because I have already stated that regardless of what act may be involved with respect to the arrangement I mentioned between the Department of Agriculture here and the department of agriculture of Manitoba, it is a fact that to the extent that this Department of Agriculture is involved in these arrangements the matter comes under the administration of the minister; and without mentioning any act whatsoever, I think it is perfectly in order to discuss that phase of the department's administration.

In any event I have said almost all I need to say about that matter, except to indicate that in Manitoba we have had, over a period of years now, extremely serious flood conditions in different parts of the province. The minister of agriculture of Manitoba has on many occasions stated that what is needed is an over-all policy or an over-all arrangement under which certain projects can be undertaken jointly by the province and the federal government. I agree with him. I am hoping that the Minister of Agriculture here will in the future be able to offer to the province of Manitoba something along that line under which there would not be placed upon the municipalities the burden that is now placed upon them. I want to say to him quite frankly, and I think he is well aware of this fact, that in many cases excellent ideas with regard to flood control projects have gone by the board.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but is this not the very type of discussion which the minister indicated most certainly did not come within the purview of his department?

Mr. Zaplitny: I think you will recall, Mr. Chairman, that only a short time ago the minister said that certain arrangements were made between his department and the department of agriculture of Manitoba. If that statement holds true, then certainly it involves the federal Department of Agriculture. To the extent that it does so—

Mr. Gardiner: If I might explain the position it might help. I think if my hon. friend would keep within the rules he would not get into any difficulty. In the estimates there is an item that covers what my hon. friend is speaking about. There is a particular item under the special votes. When we come to that item we can, of course, discuss the matter with the information here before us.

Practically the only undertaking of the kind which is referred to is the one which is in his own constituency and which results from water coming out of the government park, from the Riding mountains down and across toward Dauphin. There is an arrangement between the provincial government and the federal government—this department—with regard to that one project. But that project is done by the province and our share of the cost is provided for in a definite vote and it is not the appropriate thing to be discussing in general discussion on the first item.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be hard to get along with. I shall be quite content to wait until we reach the item the minister has mentioned with regard to this special vote in order to pursue this matter further. The minister has just said that under this first item it would be more appropriate to discuss general policy with regard to agriculture. In the time I have left at my disposal that is what I propose to do.

One of the matters to which I should like to make reference is the question of agricultural surpluses. From time to time in this house we have been told that we have surpluses of grain or surpluses of other farm products, and various ideas have been put forward as to what can be done about the matter. I notice that at their annual convention recently in Hamilton the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made some recommendations with regard to surpluses. I have in my hand a clipping, under date of January 27, 1956, which refers to one of the proposals in these words:

> Delegates Thursday approved a plan calling for an international surplus disposal agency to distribute food with the least amount of disruption of normal markets.

Then further on:

> The federation advocated an orderly food marketing program through international action and careful consideration of methods to distribute surpluses to needy persons in this country.

The reason I mentioned that recommendation at all is to underline the fact that if this parliament or this government is interested in an international food distributing agency, the first step that must be taken is to have a national food distributing agency which could work in conjunction with the international body. I think there is there a great field that has not been scratched, one in which nothing definite has been done.

While it also of course involves other departments besides the Department of Agriculture, I would certainly recommend that the Department of Agriculture make a study of what can be done first of all in our own country to set up something in the nature of what is referred to as a food bank, or a method of seeing to it that as long as there is need for food in any corner of the country, some method may be found to distribute that food to needy people. Then I would recommend that they take the next step and work out a system of co-operation between the national food bank and an international body in order that food which is produced may be used and utilized to the best advantage.

We often talk of surpluses as though they were a burden or a misfortune of some kind. I think it is time we realized that a good supply of good food is the greatest blessing known to mankind. It is the kind of blessing which is not known all over the world. I think we should turn that blessing to the advantage of the nation rather than to its disadvantage.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Along the same line I should also like to recommend to the department that a great deal more research be done with respect to the utilization of agricultural products other than as food. First of all, I want to say clearly that certainly agricultural products should be utilized as food as the No. 1 use as long as there is need for them in that form. But let us suppose that we have reached the stage in a certain line of product—say grain—where all the needs so far as food is concerned have been looked after both domestically and, so far as we can, internationally; yet we have an absolute surplus. In that case I think some attention should be paid to the finding of ways and means of utilizing these products for purposes other than as foodstuffs.

Some research work has been done by our own national research council and in other laboratories across the country and in the country to the south of us. I feel that all that kind of research is still in its infancy. If a concerted effort were made to do the necessary groundwork, the necessary pure research and then the applied research, I believe we could find perhaps hundreds of ways in which agricultural products can be used for purposes other than as food. It is not, of course a new thing. For example, we know that we are now utilizing sugar beets for the manufacture of sugar. We are utilizing many of our grains for what can hardly be described as food purposes. For instance, our brewing and distilling industries in this country are making a product which, in my opinion, is not a food but which is an extremely profitable product. In fact so profitable is it that those who utilize our malting barley seem to find it quite possible to make substantial contributions to political parties out of their profits.

Mr. Studer: Not in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Zaplitny: In other words—

The Chairman: I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. McBain: At the outset I should like to put on the record a few figures showing how the prices of agricultural products have decreased since 1952. Cash farm income from the sale of farm products and the participation payments in the previous year's grain crops in 1955 amounted to an estimated $2,352,600,000. This was 1·8 per cent below the 1954 total of $2,395,300,000. This figure was 17·4 per cent under the all-time high of $2,849,300,000 in 1952. I think we all agree and realize, as many speakers have stated, that the earnings of farmers are extremely low.

This fact is borne out by the statistics on incomes of the different occupations, and those statistics also make no allowance for the fact that the farmer requires very heavy capital investment. Interest and depreciation on that capital must be deducted from the reported earnings of a farmer if he wants to find out what he has got for his labour. When this is calculated the farmer finds he has been receiving a very meagre hourly wage for his labour.

I am going to take the year 1953, which was possibly an average year. In that year some 205,000 farmers in Canada filed income tax returns showing an average net income of only $2,125. These 205,000 farmers who filed returns paid in taxes some $25 million, or an average of $122. In that same year of 1953 only one-third of those who filed tax returns were declared taxable. I think I would be safe in saying that based on the figures of net return as tabled by the minister in his opening remarks, when the returns for 1955 are filed they will show that a very low percentage of those farmers will be taxable. Where else can you get a better picture of the depressed prices the farmer is receiving today?

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of Canada are now entering the planting time of another crop year. The future, so far as prices and cost of production are concerned, is not by any means bright. The importance of agriculture and of the farmer can well be exemplified by an article by Gordon Sinclair as taken from Liberty magazine and published in the weekly Dutton Advance of April 25, 1956:

> With the bursting of the first furrow to ooze a fragrance of spring Canada's thousands of farmers are heading back to the soil to risk their health, fortune and patience on another crop year.
> These farmers are the captains of the earth. We could do without politicians, bankers, or writers, but not without the farmers.
> There is no urgent need for editors, broadcasters or salesmen. Stenographers are no more essential than are trappers, yacht-builders or diamond-cutters.
> But the farmer is the one essential man without whom no city dweller can long survive. Yet he is often the patsy, the fall guy for costly schemes of someone else's design. He gets no paid vacation, no 40-hour week, no pension scheme and no paid time off for illness. He provides his own parking.
> He has to possess, set up, and work his own business, depending on nature and his personal gifts of intelligence to make it pay. He takes daily risks of both financial and physical nature. Yet he is taken for granted, sometimes looked down upon, and occasionally ridiculed as a yokel or bumpkin.
> No Canadian has more built-in integrity and self respect than the farmer, but he gets the worst deal of any citizen in this rich land.

Mr. Chairman, does the farmer have to wait for an expansion of industry that will provide a large consumer market for farm products and which will provide also employment for that part of the population born on the farm but now no longer necessary as agriculture labour? Mechanization of the farm industry is steadily reducing the agricultural force. In the past 15 years the area under cultivation has increased but the farm labour force has decreased from about 1,300,000 to about 800,000.

The total population and the effect of immigration on that total is a factor that will influence the prosperity of farmers and all Canadians. If Canada had twice her present population, the whole market for farm products and all products would be just that much greater and dependence on foreign markets that much less. I think also the government should take another look at the trade agreements and tariff protection. I am sure many hon. members in this house have received a request from the turkey growers for a more equitable tariff. Why are these turkey producers asking for this more equitable tariff? I think the following figures will show why.

Inspected imports of dressed turkeys up to the week ending April 14 were 944,406 pounds, compared with only 303,605 pounds at the same date a year ago. This is an increase of three times, I would say. Total imports of all dressed poultry at the same date are high, being 3,058,166 pounds, compared with only 911,229 pounds at April 14, 1955. This aggravated the situation further. If this stepped-up trend of imports continues, it is more than likely the entire poultry industry will be adversely affected, as our total potential poultry crop is up. It is about in the same position as the turkey crop, as there were 10·1 per cent more eggs in hatcheries during the past 12-week period than during the same period last season.

At the same time we have had very little export of turkeys. As of April 14 of this year, 3,129 pounds were exported compared to 1,689 pounds in 1955, but none of this would be going to the United States. This whole lot could well amount to only some 150 turkeys weighing about 21 pounds each. For several years past this trade has been a one-way street from south of the border into Canada. The Canadian tariff is 12·5 per cent ad valorem, which on low-priced turkeys is not a reasonable protection. The rate of duty going the other way, from north to south, was a straight 10 cents per pound on dressed turkeys. United States interests readily agreed that it was not an equitable break, and they were largely instrumental in having their duty reduced to 5 cents a pound, a gesture of good will which may come in handy some day though exports to the United States do not appear likely to be on the increase.

Canadian growers of turkeys are looking for some action by the federal government, and certainly are not unreasonable in their request that the present 12½ per cent duty ad valorem be retained and that a minimum of 5 cents a pound be established. This should apply to both eviscerated birds and New York dressed birds.

This heavy tonnage of imported turkey meat affects the economy of Canada in another way. In round figures that tonnage if produced in Canada would consume approximately 1 million bushels of grain, and we have plenty of that which seeks a market at the present time. Consider another point; home dressed turkeys also need equipment and other requisites from hatching egg to grown birds. There is also a market in Canada, we understand, for some United States turkeys. I think in Canada we could probably consume up to 6 million or 7 million pounds a year, and we would expect a reasonable increase each season. But judging by 1955 and the four-month period of 1956, imports are too high and Canadian growers need a modest tariff to protect them against the lower production costs of the United States.

Over the past number of years the Canadian turkey producers' association have done an excellent job of marketing, and have created a market for their product 12 months of the year. I would hope that the Minister of Agriculture, along with the Minister of Finance, would give very serious consideration to this request of the Canadian turkey producers for more favourable tariff adjustment.

Not many years ago federal and provincial governments listened readily to the farm voice, because at that time the farm people made up a large percentage of the population. But that is true no longer. The manufacturing industry has taken over, and it now controls 25 per cent of the labour force as against 15·8 per cent in agriculture. It accounts for 55 per cent of the value of products produced in Canada, as against 15·4 per cent for agriculture. In the year 1901 about 40 per cent of Canada's labour force was engaged in agriculture, with about 16 per cent in manufacturing. The value of products produced was roughly in the same proportion.

What does this all mean? It means that we are becoming more of a manufacturing nation. At the present time Canada rates seventh in production in the world; therefore governments will listen more readily to the manufacturing people. The non-farm people will increase in number and therefore will acquire more voting power, so the government of necessity will turn its ear more in that direction. It is true that more industry will provide more markets and help ease farm marketing problems, but it still will not give the farmers a bigger share of the consumer's dollar.

I have gained the impression that the majority of Canadian farmers are not strongly politically minded; that they are more interested in the quality and yield of their crops and the building up of their soil than in politics. On the other hand, farmers as a whole take more interest and are better versed in the affairs of government than many groups of people. Governments in the past have realized this and have devoted their efforts to helping solve the problems of producing quality products in paying quantities. But the success or failure of each individual farmer is his own responsibility, and this is as it should be. He should be in a position to make his own decisions on both production and disposal of his crops.

But what do we find now? We find that farmers have to depend more and more on the government for the marketing of their crops; but trusting all things to government is like trusting them to Providence. They have to accept whatever happens and console themselves with the thought that it is God's will.

This government is composed of mere men, Mr. Chairman, some of them tired men, men with other things besides agriculture on their minds and other fish to fry. Is their chief concern to keep themselves in office, and is their judgment at times so influenced? I know there are times when the Minister of Agriculture has been sincere in his efforts to bring in measures that would assist farmers and the agricultural industry, but he always has that old alibi that the cabinet will not consider it. I sincerely hope that before the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture are passed he will be able to assure this house and honestly assure the farmers of Canada that they are not entirely forgotten people.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, the question I have to place before the minister for his attention affects the largest number of farmers in the province of British Columbia. I notice in a table compiled in Country Life for the month of April, 1956, that the Fraser valley, which has a population of over 649,000 people has 44,961 devoted to farm work. The particular problem that faces them is this. It was my pleasure to be in a theatre one evening, and the story of the dikes under the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act of 1948 was portrayed. The problems of those people are similar to the problems that we have in British Columbia along the lower mainland.

After seeing the story portrayed in that theatre I felt that what is good for one part of Canada is good for all of Canada, especially since that particular act is in effect in the maritimes, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in the Palliser triangle of the prairie provinces, and certain special grants are in effect in British Columbia and other regions of Canada.

In my own region we have certain problems with respect to diking. There are four diking areas which front on the Fraser river, namely the Derby diking district, the Barnston island, the East Langley region and the south Westminster region. Of those which are subject to tidal water there are the Surrey, the Colebrook and the Mud bay diking districts. The problem in so far as drainage is concerned in this rich agricultural area, which is actually the area having most of the market gardens in the lower mainland, is a very distressing one for farmers. The problem of these people is almost identical in many respects to the problem of the marshland regions of the maritime provinces.

The dikes along the Fraser are subject to three causes of erosion, namely natural river erosion, swell which is caused by the river boats, and certain work left undone following the flood year of 1948, which actually causes the flooding. In the diking areas of Surrey, Colebrook and Mud bay there are two other reasons which make it necessary that this be given practically immediate attention. There is the drop of the land level which is caused by the working of the peat lands, and second the run-off of water has increased over the past few years. The diking areas of Surrey, Colebrook and Mud bay are on the Nicomekl river and the Serpentine river.

Four schemes have been proposed that might be of some help. One is the raising of the river banks to a height of possibly two to four feet. Another is dredging which could be used, of course, in cleaning out the rivers and for filling the banks to the level of two or four feet, whatever the case might be. There is also the possibility of straightening the rivers, and finally there is the diversion of the upland waters.

The minister is quite familiar with this problem, at least to a degree. I have a great deal of correspondence not only in relation to this diking area but in relation to many others. The minister received a brief from the three diking regions I mentioned earlier, namely the Mud bay, the Colebrook and the Surrey areas in which the problem of flooding was drawn to his attention and certain requests were made of him. The brief was dated February 27, 1956, from Cloverdale, British Columbia; it bears the wording "Drainage of Serpentine river and Nicomekl river diked areas in British Columbia," and is addressed to Hon. J. G. Gardiner.

I do not intend to read the brief, but it explains very carefully and in considerable detail the reasons for the flooding of the land. It explains that the slopes above the valley have been cleared of some brush and trees, with the result that the water run-off is much greater than heretofore. It also goes on to explain that there are some 65,000 acres of rich farm land the run-off of which is running into the lower region consisting of some 13,000 acres or more of diked area.

The brief goes on to explain—and this thought struck me as I read the brief and as I remembered seeing the movie I mentioned—how realistic these people are in respect to their problems. I find that they draw attention to what they can see is happening at this time. As I remember the movie with respect to the marshland drainage area it became apparent to the farmers that something had to be done. When the assistance they called for in the form of neighbourly help was not forthcoming a mutual decision was finally arrived at because of the heavy rains that took place.

We have here an instance where the farmers were very realistic. They discovered the reasons for their problems. They have also seen what has happened with respect to their fine rich farm land. They are sufficiently realistic to realize that if something is not done at this time, the danger will be aggravated that much more in the very near future.

The brief goes on to point out that the losses in 1955 were well over $100,000. This is a matter which has not grown up overnight; it has developed over a long period of time. The brief explains that 30 years ago there was no need for dikes. The water run-off at that time was very slow; the hills had trees on them and the snow was slow in thawing. The run-off was very gradual, with the result that no dikes were required. Twenty years ago, however, the problem became somewhat aggravated and as the population increased it became apparent that dikes would be needed.

They began to do some diking. Approximately 44 miles of diking was done in that area, which caused the setting up of the diking boards. Ten years ago there was practically no problem, because the rivers carried the run-off; the dikes served the purpose for which they were built and the increased population, which of course brought about the clearing of trees from the hills, had not reached the point where the problem was affected materially.

Today, because of the tremendous growth in population, every acre of available land in that area is being used to supply the lower mainland with food products, and it has become necessary for the farmers and the government to take note of what diking is required in that area. The farmers are in the same position as they were in 1938 when they first began their diking projects. That is the situation which faces them today.

Let it not be said that these diking boards did not try to help themselves. Surrey has spent $764,976.62 on the building of dikes. Colebrook has spent $70,768.64 on the building of dikes. Mud bay has spent $38,236.51 on the building of dikes. This represents a total expenditure by the three diking boards of $873,981.77.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I enjoy all this but it does not come under my estimates. Any diking which this government does on the Fraser river and other navigable streams is done under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and the other portions are done under the British Columbia government which my hon. friend helped form. I think he ought to talk to them about that part of it.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture, whom I respect very highly and to whom I always enjoy listening because he is the finest skater in the House of Commons, has brought something to light here which I think is very important in relation to this particular problem. In view of the statement he has just made concerning the Department of Trade and Commerce I am rather surprised that he has not referred to that department for their consideration the correspondence sent to him by the various municipal bodies.

I have here a letter from Mr. J. G. Taggart, the deputy minister of agriculture, dated February 6, 1956, referring to this particular problem, which says in part:

> In the third place, if for any reason the services of P.F.R.A. engineers are desired from municipalities or provinces we can make those services available only if the engineers are not fully engaged on their regular duties and on condition that the requesting authority will pay the actual cost of the work. That being the case, if the provincial authority is unable to do the work and wishes to have us undertake any survey work, the first thing to do is for that authority to define the work that is wanted and the reasons they cannot do their own engineering in order that we may indicate whether we can undertake it on their behalf.
> In short, we can authorize our engineers to make general or particular surveys only with respect to projects which come within our field of responsibility directly or as a result of an agreement with the province.

Mr. Gardiner: That is correct. The advice given is that if we have engineers who are not busy and either the province or the municipalities require them, if it is a municipality they would make application to the province to have the work done. If the province said they had no engineers to do the work they would ask us to send engineers who were not employed, and they would agree to pay them. We would send out the engineers who would then become their engineers until the project was finished. That is a provincial and municipal job, it is not ours.

Mr. Hahn: The minister has suggested a certain procedure. The brief I was reading was presented to the minister, and one was also presented to Mr. W. K. Kiernan, minister of agriculture of British Columbia. A copy of a letter which the minister of agriculture of British Columbia sent to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture here, dated March 21, reads as follows:

> The provincial government is prepared to participate in the cost of such a survey, jointly with the diking district and the federal government.
> The changing nature of this drainage basin, brought about by development of the surrounding lands creates a major drainage problem, the magnitude of which is beyond the scope and ability of the diking district.
> A major engineering survey must be made. If the flooding is to be prevented in the future, all further construction work should be done in conformity with such a plan so that the end result of such expenditure would be the completion of a drainage system of sufficient capacity to cope with the total volume of water liable to originate in the drainage basin and run off through the constructed works.
> The provincial government, therefore, endorses the brief of the above diking districts, that is the Surrey, Colebrook and Mud bay diking districts, and solicits the services of P.F.R.A. engineers and the financial support of the federal government in this project.

I think that complies with what the minister has said. That is the reason for my rising on this particular question. Then there is a letter dated April 9, 1956 from the Minister of Agriculture to Mr. Hugh, a copy of which was sent to me. This reads in part:

> I should like to say in reply that this same type of drainage problem has been considered previously by the government and was rejected on the principle that the organization, financing, and administration of drainage areas falls strictly within the field of provincial and local responsibility. In the circumstances it would not be appropriate for me to raise the question again and become involved in direct negotiations with the local authorities on a question of this kind.

The minister was perfectly right in the answer he gave. He says it is not his job, that it is a problem for the local authorities. However, the provincial government have made representations to him. They have indicated that they are not in position to carry out this work and have requested assistance. Assistance of engineers is provided for in the act. It now becomes necessary that representations be made here that such engineers be made available to do this particular survey job.

Someone in this group suggests that it is a case of passing the buck. I would prefer to think that it was a case of the three levels of government not getting together. I am satisfied that if the minister were to give this matter the consideration which he is probably capable of giving there would be a change, and he would indicate to the province that the P.F.R.A. engineers are not too busy and that this is one of the purposes for which they are employed. We cannot blame the municipal diking districts for the problem which is going to be theirs within a very short time.

Mr. Byrne: You have a few unemployed engineers out there now.

Mr. Hahn: The hon. member for Kootenay East made a very interesting point. Everyone in British Columbia knows that our engineers are so busy building roads, railroads and bridge projects that this government has failed to do, has failed to take the responsibility for, that they are not available for this type of work. We have no engineers who have made it their business to be familiar with P.F.R.A. or this special work.

An hon. Member: Send some out.

Mr. Hahn: I am pleased that the hon. member for Victoria suggests—

Mr. Fairey: I did not say a word.

Mr. Hahn: Probably it was the hon. member in front of him.

An hon. Member: Wrong again.

Mr. Hahn: It was suggested that they send us some. That is what we are asking for.

Mr. Gardiner: Will my hon. friend permit me to give him this information? The P.F.R.A. does not operate in British Columbia, it operates only on the prairies or in the prairie farm rehabilitation area.

Mr. Hahn: The Palliser triangle.

Mr. Gardiner: The Veterans' Land Act people have established some veterans in British Columbia in the vicinity of Kamloops and in the Kootenay district. They asked to have some men who had worked on the P.F.R.A. give them some assistance, and offices were established at Kamloops and other places in British Columbia. They were prepared to do work having to do with the settlement of veterans on land. Those engineers are called P.F.R.A. engineers simply because they came from the P.F.R.A. service and have been working in those areas, but their work has to do with work carried on as between the provincial government, the Veterans' Land Act people and this organization which operates chiefly on the prairies.

Because they are there to assist in that kind of work the government naturally suggested that these engineers ought to go and do some other work. However, the position taken by the government here, not necessarily my department but by the Department of Finance, is that when these men go out there they must be paid by either the municipality or the province and not by this government. To that extent they are just engineers who have been loaned by us to one or other of those authorities.

Mr. Hahn: It was stated in the brief that in addition to the huge sum of money which I indicated earlier as being $873,981, the British Columbia government have contributed $10,000 to the Mud bay diking district to assist them in repairing a break in their dike.

Mr. Byrne: What did the federal government pay in 1948?

Mr. Hahn: That was declared to be a disaster area in 1948, and I am quite satisfied that the federal government was quite aware of its responsibility in that instance. No one appreciated that more than we in British Columbia did, but we would like to see them finish the job they left undone at that time. There are certain portions of the dike that have not been completed, and not all these particular ones to which I am referring at this moment. The petition reads as follows:

> We believe that no other organization in Canada is better organized and equipped to make such a survey and report than the P.F.R.A. We wish to ask you to declare the drainage of the Serpentine and Nicomekl rivers to be a reclamation and development project, and to make a grant thereto sufficient to take care of the necessary survey and recommendations for its orderly development.

The minister in his letter, if he will recall, suggested that the province was quite willing to share in that cost, and I think it is only—

Mr. Gardiner: I did not know whether or not the province was prepared to take part in it, except where we made definite arrangements through the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Hahn: The letter dated March 21 from the minister of agriculture for the province, which the minister received some time after that, contains the following:

> The provincial government is prepared to participate in the cost of such a survey, jointly with the diking district and the federal government.

The point I am trying to make is that there is a responsibility here. The diking commissioners realize they are going to have a very grave problem to face in the next short period of time. The fact is that they have a major degree of flooding each year at this time. All that is being proposed by the government of British Columbia in this particular instance is the assistance that we should be expected to get through these special engineers, or through the engineers whose job it is under the P.F.R.A. to work in special regions to get this engineering done. Until such time as they tell us exactly what needs to be done and how best to do it, nothing can be done on this particular project.

As I indicated when I began my address, if it is good for the maritimes to have this marshland rehabilitation act in effect, if it is good for the P.F.R.A. to be in effect in the Palliser triangle, I claim it is just as good—and I am satisfied the hon. member for Dauphin will agree with me—that this should become applicable across Canada, because we have that problem. The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, early in the year, said, "Let us change the name of the P.F.R.A. to the national farm rehabilitation act, and let us make it do a job for the people of this country." I am satisfied that the farmers in this country will thank the Minister of Agriculture if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. Gardiner: It is almost ten o'clock. I think if my hon. friend will bring the matter up on items 44 and 45, those are items where there is money provided for British Columbia. It is not under P.F.R.A. I am just trying to straighten out the committee on what we are talking about. It is not a P.F.R.A. vote.

Mr. Hahn: Before we go any further on that, may I say this. The minister suggested that it be brought up under item 44 or 45. Possibly item 45 would be the better one so far as I am concerned, because the $70,000 suggested under item 44 is hardly adequate to do a reasonably good job across this country.

Mr. Gardiner: I shall be telling you that we have discontinued it, and we have just put in enough to clean up what we are doing.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will remember 1956. It was three months ago today that the minister proceeded to get his estimates approved by the house, and members will recall that that was the date we ran into some trouble with margarine in the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: The minister did.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, the minister did. The rest of us followed the incident with a good deal of interest. Then a week ago today—

[Mr. Hahn.]

Mr. Knowles: He slithered out of it.

Mr. Nicholson: —when we were on the estimates, we had the most unusual experience of finding ourselves discussing estimates without any minister in the house. Since I came here in 1940 that had never happened before. Whilst the minister said that his parliamentary assistant would be able to answer all the questions, it is a tradition that a minister responsible to the crown should be on hand, and it is usually a tradition that another cabinet minister be here in case certain amendments are to be moved.

There was another interesting development last Thursday. At the time when my colleague, the hon. member for Assiniboia, had a chance to speak, there had been four Liberals speaking, a Liberal for every member of the opposition. That is quite significant, because it points up the fact that, in spite of what the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce say about farming being so prosperous, four Liberal members in this house—the hon. member for Wellington South, the hon. member for Norfolk, the hon. member for Kent and the hon. member for Northumberland—all felt obliged to stand up in their places and make speeches which, though not as critical as the speeches we made, were nevertheless speeches that they will be able to take back to their constituencies, and they will be able to say, "When the Minister of Agriculture was before the house, I said so and so".

Mr. Weir: Is that what you do?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is very revealing.

Mr. Nicholson: I am suggesting that private members on the government side are taking out a little insurance so they will be able to—

Mr. Weir: That is what you have been doing all the session.

Mr. Nicholson: I have not had a chance to review what has been said.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Nicholson: I shall have to wait until tomorrow.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance asked me to say that tomorrow we would conclude these estimates and then take up justice and transport.

An hon. Member: In that order?

Mr. Pickersgill: In that order.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CIVIL DEFENCE

Question No. 441—Mr. Castleden:

1. Who is the civil defence co-ordinator?
2. Has he power to veto provincial defence programs?
3. What federal control is exerted over provincial civil defence programs?
4. Does federal civil defence make any financial grants to assist provincial civil defence programs organized to deal with peacetime disaster?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. F. F. Worthington.

2. The federal co-ordinator has no power of veto over provincial civil defence programs. His function is:

(a) to co-ordinate federal planning and action;

(b) to co-ordinate and advise provincial and municipal authorities; and

(c) to maintain liaison with corresponding agencies in the United Kingdom, United States and other countries.

3. No direct federal control is exerted over provincial civil defence programs but every effort is made by co-ordination, liaison and advice to ensure that all provinces are planning, organizing, and developing civil defence programs along suitable and comparable lines.

4. No.

R.C.A.F. TRANSPORT COMMAND

Question No. 457—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What aircraft are operated by the R.C.A.F. transport command?
2. How many air miles did each of these aircraft fly last year?
3. How many multi-engined aircraft are required to make a fully equipped infantry brigade airborne portable?

Answer by: Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence):

1 and 2.

Aircraft operated by R.C.A.F. Transport Command in 1955	Air miles flown in 1955 (Estimated from number of hours flown)
Lancaster	772,570
North Star	4,642,110
C-119	2,709,860
Canso	318,125
Dakota	1,797,690
Expeditor	417,615
Sabre	2,754,450
T-33	627,900
Otter	629,600
Sikorsky-55	327,860
Sikorsky-II-34A	15,210
H-21A	50,720
Total	15,063,710

Questions

3. The number of multi-engined aircraft required to airlift a fully equipped infantry brigade in one operation would depend on the type of aircraft used. If C-119 aircraft were used, the number required would be 148.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—SANITATION, CAMP GAGETOWN, N.B.

Queston No. 462—Mr. Robichaud:

Has any attention been paid by the Department of National Health and Welfare to matters of sanitation at the federal construction project at Camp Gagetown, New Brunswick?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

Officers of the public health engineering division of the Department of National Health and Welfare have been very active in promoting a high standard of sanitation at the numerous construction camps established in the development of Camp Gagetown. This work comes under the Public Works Health Act and regulations which are administered by the department.

During the past year more than 75 visits to these camps were made by engineers of the public health engineering division in connection with matters of water supply, sewage disposal and sanitation. Conditions have been found to be generally satisfactory in the larger camps. Instances of non-compliance with recommended standards are immediately brought to the attention of the authorities directly concerned for necessary remedial action. Camp closure proceedings have been invoked in a few cases where camp operators have failed to maintain the standard of sanitation desired.

NON-CANADIAN MANUFACTURING PLANTS, 1955

Question No. 463—Mr. Boisvert:

1. How many firms from other countries established manufacturing plants in Canada in 1955?
2. How many of the abovementioned were established in Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Saskatchewan?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

1. 134.

PUBLIC WORKS—BUILDING RENTAL CONTRACTS

Question No. 476—Mr. Hahn:

What are the terms of contract agreed upon between the lessor and the government respecting the responsibility of maintenance and repair of buildings leased?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

Normally, but subject to variations depending upon circumstances, the maintenance and repairs of a leased building are covered under the following lease arrangements:

The lessor covenants with the said lessee that the said leased premises are now in a good state of repair and tenantable condition and to keep said premises in good and tenantable repair and condition at all times during the term and, upon notice given by the lessee, to make good any defect or want of repair for which the lessor is responsible, namely major and minor repairs.

That he will pay all insurance, taxes and rates which may be charged in respect of the said property hereby demised and will supply all water and pay all water rates and also supply and pay for janitor service and cleaning during the continuance of the term hereby created;

That he will heat the premises hereby leased in a proper and comfortable manner the minimum temperature to be not less than sixty-eight (68) degrees Fahrenheit, and furnish and maintain, at his own expense, good and sufficient lighting appliances and light for the demised premises;

That he will furnish lavatory and toilet room accommodation and keep the same constantly in good order and sanitary condition;

That he will furnish, operate and maintain in good working order in said building the elevator which . . . to run during the ordinary business hours of every day of the year (Sundays and holidays excepted) and which the lessee shall have the right to make use of in common with the other tenants of the building.

Note: By negotiation any of the above covenants may become the responsibility of the lessee with appropriate consideration given to the rental rate to be paid in such cases.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 11, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HARBOURS

UNGAVA BAY—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? A dispatch in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen indicates that there have been conferences between government officials and Mr. Cyrus Eaton concerning the opening of a harbour on Ungava bay for the transport of ore from the Ungava mineral deposits. Can the minister tell the house what the situation is with regard to this conference?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have not any personal knowledge of the subject which my hon. friend has just mentioned but I shall make inquiries and endeavour to give him an answer as soon as possible.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

DOMINION DRAMA FESTIVAL—INQUIRY AS TO ADVERTISING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if his attention has been called to a letter sent out by the dominion drama festival urging the purchase of the products of a certain distillery? Will the Prime Minister make it known to the dominion drama festival that it cannot use the name of the Governor General of Canada for sales promotion?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my attention was directed to this correspondence and the matter is under serious consideration.

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF CANADA COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question? Is the government also giving consideration to setting up the Canada Council and taking such other steps as may relieve the dominion drama festival from having to rely on this kind of financial support?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): This incident has no direct bearing on the matter of setting up a Canada Council although it does indicate that if it were unnecessary for such arrangements with private interests to be made by organizations such as the drama festival it might be much more desirable.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister advise the house what progress is being made in establishing the Canada Council?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): When there has been sufficient progress made to bring a measure before the house it will be announced in the usual way.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. Has no progress, or very little, been made?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That is a matter upon which my opinion and that of the hon. gentleman would be apt to be different.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REQUEST FOR COMPLETE PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to the rights of the house and the rights of members to full and complete disclosure in answer to an order of the house, and also to point out that the house is entitled to an unexpurgated production of documents. On May 8 sessional paper 174-O was tabled which purported to include a copy of correspondence, telegrams and memoranda of telephone conversations since June 1, 1956 between John Merriam,—I am not going to read the motion.

Mr. Marler: Did my hon. friend say "June 1, 1956?"

Mr. Rowe: 1955.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The number is 174-O, the date is May 8. That return does not contain a full or complete record of the correspondence. Among the documents filed is one purporting to have been sent from the Northern Natural Gas Company on June 21, 1955 to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In the first line of the letter are these words:

> Attached is a conformed copy of a letter proposal which has been today mailed to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited by Northern Natural Gas Company, Peoples Gas Light and Coke Company, and American Natural Gas Company.

No part of that letter proposal was tabled in the house. It is part of the letter, and I submit, sir, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should table the full and complete record rather than selected portions, and I ask him to table what is omitted.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Prince Albert knows that the document which he has mentioned is referred to in the correspondence and wishes to have it produced I would suggest the method would be to put on the order paper a motion for production of that particular document.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the order for production was for all documents. One of the documents filed in pursuance of that order contained an enclosure called a conformed copy of the letter proposal. That conformed copy as part of the correspondence has been omitted. It is to that omission that I direct the attention of the house.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government of course is obliged to table only correspondence which it has in its possession. The conformed copy was not addressed to the government; it was addressed to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company. I told the office to put on everything that we had on our file. Now I will ascertain whether that was overlooked, and if it was I will certainly table it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, everything that the minister had on his files with reference to this was not tabled. The letter indicates that there were certain documents included and sent to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Those documents are of importance and I ask the minister to make a further search so that those very important ones be not omitted.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I am going to surprise my hon. friend very much and say that I do not handle documents that are tabled in the house. I have a staff who undertake that duty. I will find out whether the staff overlooked that particular letter and, if so, I will see that it is tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Fine.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not know what my hon. friend can expect me to say. All this indignation—

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Your responsibility is to see that they are tabled.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Thank you for telling me my responsibility. I enjoy this phony indignation.

TRADE

BUREAU OF STATISTICS REPORT CONCERNING MARCH BALANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce had an opportunity as yet of studying the dominion bureau of statistics report concerning the March trade balance and, if so, would he care to comment upon it?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have done that, yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Have you read this one?

Mr. Knowles: Be careful.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This is the report I received from my officers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I suppose if hon. members opposite would keep all this in their heads they would not need a memorandum or anything of that sort—these clever men sitting in the front row.

Mr. Fleming: Don't lose your temper.

Mr. Rowe: Turn around and look at your own crowd.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Open the private and confidential drawer.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Some of the phoniest discussions I have ever heard in my life have come up in this house within the last few weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I hope that some of the citizens who sent these gentlemen to parliament as their representatives feel they are getting their money's worth.

On the basis of preliminary figures, the value of Canada's merchandise exports for March, 1956, is $333 million, compared with $355 million for the same month last year. This reduction is, in part, the result of the influence of the Easter weekend which this year affected the figures for March rather than April. In addition, March figures were affected by a change in the procedure followed in handling customs documents. This year, the Department of National Revenue have discontinued their practice of having March trade entries from points west of Winnipeg forwarded to Ottawa by air mail rather than ordinary mail. This means that this year there will be some entries carried forward into April which, under the previous procedure, would have been recorded in March.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—OPTION TO PURCHASE PIPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited's option to purchase pipe in the United States related to the export of gas to the United States, as the minister indicated the other day? If so, in what way?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Well, Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to obtain from Trans-Canada the option they have on that United States pipe and my hon. friend can see for himself what the option says.

Mr. Knowles: In other words the minister will table the document when he receives it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

EDUCATION

REQUEST FOR CALLING OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister consider calling a dominion-provincial conference at which representatives of municipalities, trustee associations and teachers associations could be present—

Mr. Gauthier (Nickel Belt): And humane societies.

Mr. Pallett: —to discuss the problem which is facing most municipalities as a result of the tremendously increasing cost of education today?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the matter of having dominion-provincial conferences with the municipalities has been under consideration at various times and so far the decision has always been that, the municipalities being creatures of the provincial governments, our conferences should be with the provincial governments that would have the role of making such representations in connection with everything under their jurisdiction that they felt it was desirable to have made.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—QUALIFICATION FOR GUARANTEED BANK LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I am sorry I have not given him notice of this question.

Do Indians residing on reserves in the three prairie provinces qualify for guaranteed bank loans on grain stored on their reserves?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I really cannot give an answer to that question without consulting the officials of my department and probably officials of other departments, and I am not going to attempt to answer without doing so.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration (including advisory committee on agricultural services), $670,015.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, just before ten o'clock last night I was expressing my thanks to private members on the government side for the support they had given us in drawing the attention of the minister and the house to the very serious conditions threatening agriculture across Canada. I had not reached the hon. member for Durham, but I want to include him. I wish to thank especially the hon. member for Northumberland because it is most unusual to have a parliamentary assistant take part in the discussion of estimates when cabinet changes are being discussed and an hon. member might expect to be given the nod at some time.

I should like to proceed to ask the Minister of Agriculture to pay special attention to the remarks made on Tuesday, May 8, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North who asked the Prime Minister the following question to which he received the following answer:

Since the government is prepared to subsidize foreigners to build pipe lines, is the government prepared to subsidize Canadians to build the Saskatchewan river dam project?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The government has no knowledge of any proposal by Canadians to build the South Saskatchewan dam project.

I have in my hand a letter, not marked private nor confidential, addressed to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture by the premier of Saskatchewan under date of April 28, 1954. In that letter the premier of Saskatchewan refers to the correspondence and discussions which had continued for a long time in connection with the project. The premier stated that the engineers representing both the federal and the provincial governments had reached agreement as to the estimated cost. For the main reservoir and dam the estimated cost was $80 million; for the irrigation system, $35 million; for the power plant, $20 million; a total of $135 million. The premier also referred to the correspondence and discussions about the responsibilities of the federal and provincial authorities. Premier Douglas emphasized again that the province of Saskatchewan does not expect the taxpayers of Canada to have any part in providing power for Saskatchewan. The premier confirmed the discussions that they had previously and came out with the offer for the province of Saskatchewan to pay $73 million and the federal government $62 million of the total expenditure of $135 million.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture to tell the committee whether or not, in his opinion, the people of Saskatchewan should be regarded as Canadians and whether he thinks the discussions between his department and the government of Saskatchewan should not be considered to have been proposals by Canadians. I want to suggest to the minister that he now is in a most important position, and I suggest that he has but one alternative. It is his duty, as I see it, to go to the Prime Minister of Canada and say, "I must take exception to the references you made in parliament on May 8."

Out of a total of $198 million, the federal government is prepared to put up $190 million to build a pipe line, and this pipe-line company is controlled by Americans, who control 83 per cent of the $8 million, which is to go into the pipe line. So the minister should be able to say, if the people of Canada are going to be asked to put up all but about 4 per cent of the $198 million for the pipeline project—

The Chairman: It appears to me that the hon. member is now dealing more with the matter that we shall be discussing later in the session than the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. On looking at the resolutions, I find that there is a resolution, No. 42, dealing with major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces. In the details, I see that there is a reference to the South Saskatchewan river development. Therefore I feel that the hon. member is in order if he wishes to discuss the South Saskatchewan river development under the general item. He might perhaps contribute to more orderly debate if he chose to discuss it under resolution 42. I do express this conviction, that he is not in order when he commences to discuss pipe lines.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have really nothing more to say about the pipe lines. All I am suggesting is that the Minister of Agriculture has a responsibility to his neighbours and citizens in Saskatchewan in telling the Prime Minister to proceed with the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam immediately.

I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture should have no alternative but to offer his resignation to the cabinet if the government is not willing to meet the reasonable requests that the Minister of Agriculture has made so often in connection with the South Saskatchewan dam. I think it would not be a bad thing for Canada if occasionally members of the cabinet resigned, on important issues such as the issues we had during the war, when Mr. Power and Mr. Ralston resigned, or if the Minister of Agriculture, on a matter that is so important to his citizens of Saskatchewan, would say, "My resignation must be made available if the South Saskatchewan river dam is not going to get the consideration it deserves." That is all I am going to say on the dam at this point.

I want to come back to the general position of agriculture across Canada and I should like to refer to two articles in recent issues of the Ottawa Citizen. In the Ottawa Citizen of April 26 there was a story by Norman Campbell following a meeting of the Anglican synod of this area. The Anglican synod reviewed with a great deal of concern the depressed farming conditions in the Ottawa valley. Following that the Citizen sent one of their reporters, Fred Inglis, on an assignment to see some of the farmers. In the area north of Renfrew he saw a Mr. Waite, a 40-year-old farmer, near Almonte a Mr. Steele, over at Carleton Place a Mr. Timmins, and then a retired farmer at Hazeldean. All these farmers told the same sort of story about the price squeeze which is pushing farmers off the farms and forcing them to go to the cities.

When the minister's estimates were under discussion some little time ago he spent some time discussing the lack of accurate statistical information regarding the farm share of the national income. I agree with part of what the minister said but there is enough information available to anyone who wants to seek it to establish firmly that farmers in all parts of Canada are not getting a fair share of the national income. I realize that you cannot establish exactly the number of farmers who depend entirely for their income on their returns from farming and that it is not possible to establish their position exactly to the last dollar, but we have information regarding gross national income, gross farm income and net farm income.

The bureau of statistics has come up with some figures giving the index numbers of the commodities and services used by farmers. They take the period 1935 to 1939 as a base, and on the basis of 100 for that period you find that by 1951 the prices of the commodities that farmers have to use had increased to 230 and by 1955 had increased to 237. There has been a further increase of 3·4 per cent in that four year period when farm prices were going down.

If you take the index for farm prices of agricultural products and use the same base you find that the figure for prices received by farmers was 296·8 in 1951 and in 1955 was 226·2. In other words, there was a drop of 24 per cent in prices for agricultural products while at the same time there was an increase of 3·4 per cent in the prices of the things that the farmer has to buy. Between 1955 and February of this year there was a further drop to 218·3 in the prices of agricultural products.

We find that the drop in prices received by Saskatchewan farmers has been even greater than the drop for Canada as a whole. Our prices in Saskatchewan dropped from 268·7 in 1951 to 187·6 or a drop of 30 per cent. Between 1951 and 1954 net farm income for Canada as a whole dropped from $2·1 million to $1·1 million, or 48 per cent, but for Saskatchewan the drop was 77 per cent.

The disturbing feature about this whole business is that while the farm squeeze goes on corporation profits continue to increase. While in the period from 1951 to 1954 net farm income for Canada dropped 48 per cent corporation profits after taxes only dropped 10 per cent, but in 1955, when agriculture continued to be depressed, corporation profits literally shot up. In 1954 corporation profits, after taxes, were $1·2 million; in 1955, $1·6 million or a percentage increase of 30 per cent.

Now, this situation is serious. The farmers of Canada are a very patient and long suffering people. They do not want too much. But they would like to have at least a kind word from the Minister of Agriculture. Surely, that is not too much to expect, and yet we get nothing from the Minister of Agriculture or his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce but these bombastic statements that those of us on this side of the house are talking through our hats, that the farmers of Canada have been more prosperous in the last five years than they have ever been in any five-year period before. Nearly every country in the world is up against the same general proposition, but with this difference. Canada is the only country of which I know where the responsible ministries of the government fail to recognize the situation.

In the United States the situation is serious. I noticed an article by Joseph and Stewart Alsop which appeared in the Telegram of March 13 headed, "Farmers Less Prosperous". The article starts out by referring to a speech by an Arkansas senator in which he referred to the decline and fall of the Roman empire. Apparently the language used by the senator could not appear in the Toronto Telegram but the Alsops say:

> The decay of Rome quite certainly began when the hardy farm-citizens whose valour had made Rome great, ceased to be able to maintain themselves and their families by farming their small holdings. In hardly more than a generation, over great areas of Italy, the family sized farms were swept away. They made way for vast, consolidated, slave operated, absentee-capitalist holdings, that were the equivalent in those days of what we now call "industrialized" farms.

Then, the Alsops give us statistics which are available in the United States, and which are comparable to Canadian statistics. I shall have something to say to the minister in a few minutes about his ability to make preparations for compiling comparable statistics in Canada. The Alsops say:

> The people who are not prosperous are the folk on the family sized farms. They are so unprosperous, in fact, that this nation is virtually beginning to be divided into two nations. A single statistic tells the story. Per capita farm income has now declined to the level of $860 a year, whereas the per capita income of Americans off the farm now stands at the level of $1,922. Farm folk are much less than half as well off as other folk in America.

In Canada the position of our farmers is relatively a good deal worse than the position of United States farmers. I suggest the Minister of Agriculture has failed in performing a valuable service by ignoring these United States statistics and ignoring the fact that the Canadian farmer is in a much worse position than his United States neighbour.

I continue quoting from the article:

> If this condition persists for very long, it can produce only one result. All the ambitious, able-bodied members of farm families will do what the Roman farmers did. They will give up the life they have been trained to. They will pull up stakes. They will go to seek better opportunities elsewhere.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, while these conditions exist down in Dorchester county in New Brunswick, and in Ontario, the Minister of Agriculture says we do not know anything about it. Nobody knows how badly off the Canadian farmer is. The Minister of Agriculture could go to his colleague the Minister of National Revenue who could give him some useful information. The Minister of National Revenue could tell the Minister of Agriculture that of the 601,000 farm families in Canada only 69,000, just over 10 per cent, in the best year the farmer ever had, had enough money to pay income taxes. I ask the hon. member from New Brunswick if he is aware of the fact that in the year 1953 there was not a farmer in New Brunswick who made enough money to pay income taxes? That is the information the Minister of National Revenue provides.

In the same year there were 130 farmers in Prince Edward Island out of 10,000 who paid income taxes. In Nova Scotia there were 110 farmers out of 24,000 who paid income taxes. In Quebec there were 750 farmers out of 133,000, and in good old Ontario there were 11,000 out of 159,000. Coming to my own province I have to say that in the year 1953, the last year for which statistics have been compiled, almost half of the farmers who paid income taxes in Canada were in Saskatchewan. In that province 31,000 out of a total of 90,000 farmers paid income taxes.

An hon. Member: They must have been making money then.

Mr. Nicholson: Conditions were better, I admit, but Mr. Chairman, in spite of the fact—

Mr. Studer: That we had a socialist government.

Mr. Nicholson: —in spite of the fact that farmers in Saskatchewan who paid income taxes represented almost half the number of farmers who paid income taxes in Canada as a whole, there were just about one-third of the farmers in Saskatchewan who were fortunate enough to be able to pay income taxes. It is peculiar that the members of this house who happen to have cousins or neighbours who have gone west and made good never say anything about the two-thirds of our people in Saskatchewan who have never had enough money to pay income taxes. Those farmers have never been able to come back home and spend a little money to demonstrate to the neighbours that the west is a land of plenty. I am suggesting to the Minister of Agriculture that if he really wanted to give his party a shot in Saskatchewan—

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Rosthern had that.

Mr. Nicholson: —I mean a shot in the arm, at this late date, he could remove the present leader and lead the forces in Saskatchewan on the ground that if he were the premier of Saskatchewan again they could build the Saskatchewan river dam out of their own resources and regardless of what Ottawa would do.

Apart from the situation I have been discussing, the Minister of Agriculture could get the information that I have given here and which is available from the Minister of National Revenue, to demonstrate that the farmers in Canada are in a position where 90 per cent of them have never had enough income to be able to pay income taxes. Now, that is something that no member representing an agricultural constituency could accept with any degree of pride or satisfaction. While that is happening, companies like international nickel increase their net profits from $29 million to $65 million; Distillers Corporation increase their profits from $24 million to $33 million. All down the line we have the large corporations of Canada in the position where each year is a bigger year and a better year than the year which preceded it.

I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he take time off to read what his own department says about agriculture abroad. On a previous occasion I compared the work of his department in agriculture abroad with the work done in Washington. I offered some criticism on the ground his department did not tell us the whole truth and nothing but the truth as the Washington department does. His department is very careful to keep out of print the information as to what farmers get for wheat in the other countries of the world. Washington does not mind telling the farmers that this is the situation:

Wheat Production and Prices, 1954-55

Country	Price per bushel
Chile	$4.50
Switzerland	4.19
Finland	3.95
Norway	3.43
Italy	3.05
Uruguay	2.96
Portugal	2.85
Spain	2.73
West Germany	2.72-2.83
Argentina	2.72
Algeria	2.64
Morocco	2.64
Tunisia	2.64
United Kingdom	2.30
United States	2.24
Canada	1.40

Why does the Minister of Agriculture not instruct his very able officers to work out the prices producers abroad receive.

Mr. Gardiner: I certainly would not report that. As everyone knows, the $1.40 is not correct.

Mr. Nicholson: Well—

Mr. Argue: At Fort William.

Mr. Nicholson: —that is the initial price and we are waiting impatiently to find out what the final price will be. Perhaps the minister would also be able to give us the final price for the 1954-55 crop.

Mr. Gardiner: Being such a good accountant, you ought to be able to figure it out.

Mr. Nicholson: No; the minister has the information, I have not. I would be happy to have the minister say what it is. Certainly, whatever the final price is going to be, the Canadian price is going to be away down compared with the farm prices in other parts of the world. But in this issue for April of this year the department has a very good article on the Argentine, on Cuba, on New Zealand, on the Soviet union, on the United Kingdom and on the United States. The previous one had articles on Australia, the Argentine, Italy, Denmark and again the United States and United Kingdom. Now, his department has access to the same information that is available to the United States, and I submit that the minister should give instructions to his department that when they are giving this information they should tell us the whole story, tell us how badly off the Canadian farmer is in comparison with our competitors.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that there is an easy solution for the situation which is so general when all these countries I have mentioned are using public funds to bolster up that sector of the economy that is living in a depressed condition, and when our exports of wheat represent a relatively large percentage of our production compared with the percentage that the United States exports represent of their total production. I admit very frankly that poses a real problem. The United States can give away every bushel of their surplus production without any serious impact on their economy. I do not think that Canada could embark on a long-term program of giving away her surplus production. I admit those facts very readily.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Nicholson: The Chairman can call time when it is up. He is always most anxious to watch the clock and I will sit down when my time is up.

Mr. Argue: They do not like it.

Mr. Nicholson: I realize that to a Liberal member for a rural riding who has not spoken, and who is not going to speak on these estimates, this is bitter medicine. I suggest Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Agriculture should do something about the situation which is reported and which says that there are no figures anywhere to show what the farmer's share of the national income is.

The Chairman: Order. As the hon. member pointed out just a moment ago, it is my duty to call time and I now advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, it is not very often that a member of one party congratulates a member of another party, especially when that party is a bitter rival, but I am going to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Mackenzie, who has just taken his seat, on turning in what I regard as a superb performance. His speech, from the standpoint of western farmers, is a masterpiece and is utterly unanswerable.

An hon. Member: Are you in a position to judge?

Mr. Blackmore: I think I am able to judge pretty well; I have been in the game a long time.

I am glad that the hon. member spoke before I did because it will not be necessary for me to elaborate upon these matters which are vital to all farmers and to all farm-representing members throughout this nation. I will, therefore, direct my attention to another matter, but before I do so may I put this question once more to all members of this committee and to all the newspapermen who will read the reports of Hansard, and to all the people who will in any way read Hansard and become aware of what is going on in this house. What is the answer to the problem which the hon. member for Mackenzie has propounded? Can that problem go on unanswered without spelling utter disaster to Canada? These two questions have to be answered by every responsible member. There are plenty of hon. members in this house who are not responsible, I am sorry to say, and instead of facing facts they try to evade them, they try to make smart aleck remarks that will get into Hansard. They try to minimize the problems, but they do not solve these problems by minimizing them or sidestepping them or being dishonest in respect to them.

I think every hon. member in this committee recalls that on several occasions in time past I have advocated what I think probably affords a temporary solution. As the hon. member for Mackenzie has said, no responsible person in Canada would suppose that we can go on producing enormous amounts of wheat and other agricultural commodities which we are now producing and subsidize the export, or the gift abroad, of those commodities. It is easy to see how a country like Uruguay or Chile or some other country in which agriculture probably constitutes relatively a small proportion of the economy might stand the taxation necessary to subsidize their agriculture and their exports abroad. It is easy to understand why the United States with her stupendous industrial and economic strength can stand to do this kind of thing for a year or so; but even the United States will not be able to stand this burden indefinitely. She is indicating that quite clearly by taking various measures to reduce the production and in other ways alleviate the problem which is bearing so heavily on the economy.

Now, what can Canada do? In the first place I would say this: whatever Canada decides upon as a long-range solution, the Canadian people have no show of right in any way to leave the farmer to bear the rap for the unhappy position in which he finds himself because he has done his job too well. Consequently, while we are readjusting our agricultural production by devices which we may deem to be best suited to the situation, there are temporary measures which ought to be taken and which every responsible member of this committee will acknowledge must be taken to take the burden off the farmer so that he can go on living, so that he will not be utterly destroyed.

I have advocated in times past, and I do not hesitate to advocate today, that the solution to the problem in a general way temporarily is based upon storing the commodities on our farms, paying the farmer the price he should receive for the commodity, and making provision for the permanent storage of that commodity on the farm where it can be only a blessing to us, while we take measures which are necessary in cooperation with the farmers, the provinces and every other agency concerned to determine how to reduce our production or to divert the production into some other line.

Before going on with what I have to say may I quote a passage from the pen of the man whom the minister and the Liberal party generally are quite happy to quote. They seem to find the claims of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture altogether to their liking. Let me quote a statement from the opening remarks of the brief presented to the royal commission on Canada's future economic prospects by Mr. H. H. Hannam by whom the Liberals appear almost to swear. This statement was made on March 5, 1956 and I read from Mr. Hannam's words:

> In the light of conditions and problems facing agriculture, we have set down our views in respect to policies which we believe will be needed—to maintain agriculture in a balanced position in our economy > —to assure those families needed to man our farms a standard of living which compares favourable with those performing a service of comparable value to society . . .

That is all they are asking; that is all the hon. member for Mackenzie is asking; and that is all—I am going to say once more, the courageous, persistent and effective fighters of the C.C.F. party—are asking. I do not hesitate to say that these men have turned in a magnificent job this year. I do not hesitate to say in support of my own party that if the C.C.F. group had not been here and had not been in a position to get the floor first, the Social Credit party would have turned in exactly the same performance because the Social Credit party represents farmers who are suffering just as are the farmers in the constituencies from which the hon. gentlemen in the C.C.F. come.

I interrupted the statement at the words "value to society" and I am going on to quote further:

> —to enable farmers to adopt and practice soil conservation measures adequate to build and maintain soil fertility as a vital national asset.

I do not think for one moment that the Minister of Agriculture would be out of harmony with those statements. I want to make it abundantly clear that I do not blame the Minister of Agriculture for the difficulties with which the farmers are now faced. The minister is a member of a cabinet representing all of Canada and his voice is the voice of only one member of that cabinet. His will can prevail only to the extent his fellow cabinet members are willing to permit it to prevail. Let everyone judge the Minister of Agriculture in that light. On the basis of what he has already done, what he has already said, and what he is planning to do, I believe he is just as ready to give the farmers of western Canada a fair deal as are we who, like the minister, come from various federal constituencies in western Canada.

I have no use for people who blame others for things which are beyond their control and who neglect to give credit where credit is due. I do not hesitate to say there is a great deal of credit due the Minister of Agriculture. I doubt very much whether any man in the country could have done any better in the position in which the minister is placed.

I know the minister will not say that he disagrees in any respect with the objectives set down here by H. H. Hannam of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, but the minister must make the very best he can of the very ugly picture which confronts us by reason of the situation in which he finds himself placed.

I wish to have hon. members also bear this in mind. I am as much opposed to the Liberal party as a man can be but I realize that the Liberal party and the Liberal administration represent the whole of Canada. When they draft a platform in respect to agriculture or when they introduce a measure pertaining to agriculture, that measure must commend itself to the people of every province in this country including Quebec and Ontario, which are largely industrial areas, including British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and other provinces which have nothing like the problems which face western agriculture.

When we are dealing with this problem let us be realistic, honourable and honest. Let us give credit where credit is due. I am endeavouring to do that. I do not hesitate for a moment to say that if the Minister of Agriculture were free today and if he were sitting in the seats occupied by the members of the C.C.F., he would be saying the same things that group are saying and with just as much vigour, effectiveness and pertinacity.

I now wish to go on with the statement:

> Looking ahead: We want a prosperous, permanent and stable farming industry.

Is there anyone in this house, no matter where he comes from, who will disagree with that statement? There is not one. Certainly the Minister of Agriculture is in complete harmony with that objective. Proceeding with the statement:

> We want conditions which will be conducive to building a fine rural citizenship—a farming industry attractive enough to hold its share of the best of our farm young people.

Is there anyone who supposes that the Minister of Agriculture is not in favour of that? Is there anyone who supposes that there is any individual in this nation who is not in favour of that? I do not think there is an hon. member in this house from any party who would not agree that the best young men and women who enter the social structure of any nation are those who are born and trained on farms. They are people of sound judgment, sound minds and sound bodies. That is the kind of people the farms have always produced. The more we cut down the normal healthy agricultural population of this country the more we will be cutting down these young people of stable minds and bodies who make up the very core of the nation, who make the great soldiers in time of need, who become the great statesmen, the great teachers, the great law makers, the great preachers, and the greatest of every division in society. The more we turn the affairs of this nation over to people bred in cities—

Mr. Hees: Hey!

Mr. Blackmore: I am not saying anything against the cities; let me continue. This cannot be said in just a few words. The more we turn the affairs of this nation over to people bred in cities where they have no contact with reality, the weaker our social structure will become.

As a parent I have found it very difficult to raise my sons the way I should like to have them raised because being a school teacher and a member of parliament I cannot put them on farms where they would have to get up at 5.30 in the morning and take care of the pigs and cows and do all the other things which ordinary farm boys and girls do and thus gain a genuine contact with reality, the thing it takes to produce anything of value.

The people who grow up away from farms have the tremendous disadvantage of not being in constant contact with reality, and they feed themselves with their own vain imaginings. Consequently, they become susceptible to communist propaganda and false notions of many different kinds. I say once again that if we cut down the percentage of our young people who grow up on farms we endanger the permanent stability of this nation. I am sure that every hon. member in this house will agree with what Mr. Hannam said in the last paragraph on the first page of the brief:

> We prefer to see a continuation of the type of farm program which is based on co-operative self help procedures.

We all agree with that, but the main question is: How are you going to bring these conditions about in the time in which we live and in the nation where we live?

Once more I say that as a temporary measure I believe the solution of our problem on the farms in large part is the storing of surplus goods on the farm, paying the farmer what he ought to receive for his goods.

If we paid the farmer what he ought to receive for his farm-stored goods he would be put in a position where he himself could keep those goods instead of being paid for permanent storage, the cost of which payment would probably wreck the nation financially. More especially it would leave him free to go forward producing whether or not we might be able to sell abroad. I submit that this method of farm storing is far better than giving away products to those who might not want them. It is far better than putting products on the market as the United States is doing. They are subsidizing their prices to such an extent that they come into destructive competition with producers all over the world. There are complaints coming from all sections of the world by reason of what the United States is doing.

We can understand why they are doing it. It is because they have taken over the ownership of these products and are at their wits' end to find where to store them and how to pay the cost of storage while they are finding some way of getting rid of the products. I do not favour that kind of thing for Canada. I am positive that there is a different way to go about it. I have already stated what my ideas are concerning this matter, first on November 17, 1953 and at various times, at least once while we were discussing wheat marketing this year.

May I go on with another little thing which I believe supports my general position. The Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, May 9, contained this press dispatch:

> Study stockpile of NATO food.
> Washington (AP)—The North Atlantic Treaty Organization countries are considering creation of a NATO food stockpile plus emergency food reserves in each member nation, mobilization director Arthur S. Flemming disclosed Tuesday. The proposal, which American officials view as a possible outlet for some U.S. farm surpluses, will receive intensive consideration at a meeting on November 15 of the NATO senior emergency civil planning committee.

November 15; the farmers can starve to death between now and then! The very first thing that these NATO planning people will be faced with when they sit down around the table will be how they are going to pay for these goods. Will anyone pretend that the NATO nations, most of which have an insecure and unstable economy, can stand the taxation which would be necessary to provide the money with which to buy our surpluses to store in their countries? Will anyone pretend that? That would be a most unrealistic proposal.

Then how are these stores to be provided and paid for? If people suggest an international bank, an international agency to create world money to be spent in buying the products of Canada, then according to our orthodox thinking which nearly all hon. members would rather die than surrender—if such an agency created the money it would feel that it would have to lend it. It could not get it out of its hand unless it did lend it. Tears of despair! Who is going to borrow it from that international agency? How is that person who borrows it going to repay it, when the only way in which he can repay it is either by taxing people who are already taxed nearly to death or by sending goods in repayment, which the international agency would not accept?

I have said enough now to indicate that while this NATO proposal sounds beautiful, it is just as fallacious, it is just as unsubstantial as the sun dogs in the winter sky that we see sometimes.

What, then, is going to be the solution? How are we to provide those NATO people with our surpluses in order that they may store them? I do not propose to go into any detail because everybody in this house can see that the proposal under discussion is illusory, that it is a sham, that it is foredoomed to defeat, that it will be stillborn.

Here are intelligent men. We hear about the "three wise men" who have been appointed to guide the destiny of NATO, one of whom is in this house, but whom I have never heard express any wisdom concerning economic affairs. Would he know how to provide the money in order to supply these surpluses to the NATO nations? If he did know, and if he did advocate it, he would upon his return get into plenty of difficulty with the Minister of Finance and with all the interests in Canada for whom the Minister of Finance speaks.

What I have said on previous occasions, and I am positive that this is sound, is that the Bank of Canada is able to create all the money which would be necessary to buy all the farm products that can be stored in Canada at prices which the farmer ought to receive. It can provide the money necessary to build the required storage facilities to house all these surpluses. That will not cause inflation any more than inflation would be caused if some outside nation bought those same commodities with its own money. When that money got here we would change it into Canadian money and spend the Canadian money in Canada, just as we would spend Bank of Canada money.

I submit that here is the germ of a possible idea that offers a way out. I do not think there is an hon. member in this house who will say that the Bank of Canada is not empowered with all the necessary discretion it needs to do just exactly what I have suggested. If we should then want to supply some of these surpluses to NATO nations so that they might store them, then I say that would be an admirable proposal and one which should have been proceeded with long ago. If we are proposing to let our farmers store the goods having paid for the commodities ourselves with our own credit, we can send those commodities over to NATO nations so their farmers can store them instead of ours with no cost to the taxpayer and no danger of inflation of our economy.

The only question we have to ask ourselves when we are considering whether or not the Bank of Canada can create the amount of money I have indicated is simply this: Are there at the present time enough commodities in Canada and enough producers of commodities to produce all the goods which would be consumed if that money were spent on the goods of Canada? The answer certainly has to be yes because if we have not enough goods to absorb the money which the Bank of Canada would create we would not have enough goods to absorb money that might come in from Russia or any other source. That is as simple as A, B, C.

May I suggest in all seriousness, realizing my responsibility and knowing that these words are going into Hansard and may be quoted against me in future generations, that we should go to work at once to provide an extensive and comprehensive farm storage scheme. Let me indicate for a minute or two the kind of things we could store in Canada. We could store wheat in superabundance. I ask, what could be of greater value than wheat in times of disaster? When war occurs, or acts of nature create disasters, the first thing that people need is wheat, food. Blessed would be the nation—angelical, almost, would be the nation—that had plenty of food to send in time of need. We have an opportunity to put ourselves in exactly that happy state, if we only have the intelligence and the honesty and the vision to see that we have the possibility.

We can produce a superabundance of oats. If we are now producing too much wheat, let us direct our farmers to produce oats, tell them the price we shall pay them, and give them a firm promise to pay them a price just as good as the price they can hope to get from wheat raised on the same acreage. Then we shall get all the oats we could dream of.

Now turn to barley. Barley is one of the most valuable of human foods. We can produce limitless supplies of barley, all that we can produce with our land and our climate.

Rye, a staple food in many countries, is very valuable as a human food and very valuable as a food for certain kinds of livestock. We can produce any desired amount of rye and store it. Flax is one of the most valuable foods, and it can produce oils of great value and residues of great value for stock. We can produce any amount of flax we want and store it, and it will remain safely stored if it is kept dry.

We can produce a tremendous amount of beans. We cannot produce as much beans as wheat, because a great deal of our land suitable for wheat is not suitable for producing beans, and the climate is not suitable in many areas, but in this nation there are areas that can produce beans with great success.

The same applies to peas, corn and grass seeds. I shall stop there for a minute or two. Suppose now that we should become victims of a hydrogen bomb attack.

An hon. Member: We are now.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes. I congratulate the hon. member for appreciating what is going on now. In case we had a hydrogen bomb attack, how much of the present grass land afterwards do you suppose would be producing grass? How much of our grass today would be alive? And what would be the very first thing we would need to restore that grass? Would it not be grass seed? Of course it would. How, then, could we possibly be more provident than by producing great quantities of grass seed—timothy, brome, rye grass, alfalfa—and storing them where they will be safe, on farms in suitable storage?

Many areas can produce sunflower seeds with success. Sunflower seeds are very valuable food, not only for human beings but also for certain kinds of animals. All areas of Canada are not suited to producing honey, but many of them are. I should imagine that in Ontario you could almost bury the land in honey.

With regard to sugar, I do not think Canadian citizens realize the potentialities of producing sugar in Canada. By building the factories which the irrigated land we now have in southern Alberta would support, we could produce two and a half times the sugar the whole Canadian population could possibly use every year—in southern Alberta alone. In addition, we would take out of production much of the land that is now producing crops that are a burden to us. Why not produce and store great quantities of sugar? It is easy to store. It is easy to build great bins, something like silos, in which factories like the Canadian Sugar Factories of Lethbridge riding store great quantities of sugar. The sugar will remain there, I should think for centuries, perfectly safe.

The Chairman: I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him his time has expired.

Mr. Blackmore: I greatly appreciate the privilege of having spoken.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, representing, as I do—

Mr. Gardiner: Before my hon. friend starts, may I say this? I have been looking up the records, and I find that the last speaker had already made a speech on this subject on February 10. I hope that everyone is not going to speak two or three times.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Well, I have not made a speech on this first item of agriculture so far this year. As I say, representing a very important and productive district in southwestern Ontario, and knowing that my farmers face problems too, I thought I should like to discuss some of the problems affecting those particular farmers and probably make some suggestions that might assist in solving some of our agricultural problems all the way across Canada.

As has been intimated by practically every speaker who has spoken on this item, except the minister himself, agriculture is finding it difficult to retain its economic position in Canada. Innumerable speeches have been made in this house, as I have indicated. A great many editorials and news items have been carried in our daily newspapers. Briefs from our farmers' union, our federation of agriculture and practically every other farming organization have indicated, as has the monthly review of the Bank of Nova Scotia, that the farm problems are in contrast to business expansion.

It is rather hard for the farmer operating his own farm when he picks up his daily newspaper, looks over the news items, looks over the financial page and sees that Canada is enjoying one of the greatest booms ever experienced in the history of this great country of ours—it is rather hard for him, as I say, when he has difficulty sometimes in even getting the necessities of life, when he has difficulty in paying the interest on his mortgage, when he has difficulty meeting his tax payments, to understand just why he is in such a situation.

Naturally, he wonders what is wrong. Naturally, he is discouraged. Naturally, more and more of our farmers are leaving the land. Particularly, young farmers who have been raised on the farm and who know how to farm are finding that it will not be profitable for them to carry on the business so well set up for them by their fathers. Naturally, it is hard for them to understand these things. Many of these young men want to be farmers and would make good farmers as the years go on.

Not only are young farmers forced to leave the land. Many young farmers went overseas in the last war and fought for the way of life that they wanted and, when they returned, used their war benefits and gratuities to that end. But what happened? Many have had to leave the farm and go out and get other positions to augment their farming incomes so that they could meet their current expenses of taxes, living expenses, mortgage payments, interest payments, and so on. Hence their farming operations have not been as good as they should have been.

We have had a great many statistics quoted in this house, both from the government benches and the opposition benches, as to just what is the situation with regard to the farmer. Why is there so much talk about the income of the farmer having dropped to such a great extent I do not wish to add to the great statistical haze that has floated around the house practically ever since the opening of parliament, but I want to call the attention of the committee to an article in the Country Guide entitled, "Why the Squeeze on the Farmers?" The article is written by Dr. E. C. Hope and there is one part of it to which I should like to refer that directs attention in a most concrete way to the conditions facing the average farmer. It reads as follows:

> Another basis of comparison is net farm income. In 1951, the average net income per farm from farming operations was $3,520. Preliminary calculations for 1955, after taking into consideration the value of the large crop of last year, show an average of $2,524 per farm. Even considering that 1951 was an above normal year for prices, a drop of $1,000 since 1951 is very substantial.

As I say, it is rather hard for our farmers, who have always felt that the providing of food and agricultural products of all kinds was an important industry in this country, to understand why they are being subjected to this squeeze. As the article indicates, there has been a drop of $1,000 in net farm income since 1951 for the average farmer. How many other segments of our economy could, with the present high standard of living, have continued to exist with such a substantial reduction in individual income, whether it be the man working in the factory, the small businessman, the office executive or the worker in an office? There would have been cries to high heaven that the situation be changed and that something should be done.

Of course, I think we all realize that part of the reason for the decline in agricultural income is directly or indirectly due to the fact that in the past few years we have been blessed with unprecedented crops of grain and feed in our western provinces. It is also partly due to the reason that the government has been very ineffective in competing with other nations of the world in the disposition of our wheat. Canada no longer retains her position as the greatest exporter of wheat and feed grains that she once enjoyed in the markets of the world. No part of the world can live unto itself today, and probably the fact that salesmen from other countries have been more aggressive and more capable of dealing with world situations than our own Canadian officials is reflected in the condition of the entire agricultural industry of Canada.

As I said before, no part of the world can live unto itself today so no part of Canada can live unto itself. The result is that we find that the western farmer, who has been unable to sell and market his products, has been faced with the necessity of turning to other means of getting cash to carry on his operations. This has spilled his problem into other parts of Canada and has had a very marked effect on the income of feeders of hogs and cattle in southern Ontario. In fact, not so long ago the western farmers were advised by members of the government to do that very thing. They were told that they should not try to keep their eggs all in one basket, that they should get into more than one type of farming. What has been the result? I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the Rural Co-operator of March 27, 1956 dealing with a brief presented to the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects. The article reads in part as follows:

> The brief, prepared by Cecil Belyea, O.F.A. economist, pointed out that livestock production in 1952 increased over 1951 by 49 per cent in the prairies and 27 per cent in Ontario. Though partly due to better 1951 hog prices, the increase in the west was also caused by the above normal grains harvest, it suggested.
> Ontario farmers fear the tendency of western producers to feed more livestock when there are large supplies of unsold grain, the brief said. To supply meat for a predicted population of over 8 million in the province in 1975, Ontario farmers will have to depend to a large extent on western feed grains, the brief stated.

I sometimes feel, along with a lot of other members of the house from eastern Ontario, that the western farmer gets all the breaks. He has got his Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, his Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and this year an act was passed by the house making available to him $32 million for the provision of loans on his farm stored grain. I do feel that if the government does not take more definite steps to rectify these mistakes and assist the farmers the depressed condition is going to affect a great many other segments of our economy. In confirmation of this, I have in my hand an advertisement by the Steel Company of Canada which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator of March 17. In a big headline at the top it says, "Best Customer", and the advertisement goes on to say:

> The steel industry's best customer is the farmer. Directly, the farmer as an individual is a buyer of steel and on the farmer's prosperity rests the prosperity of the farm implement business, which is one of the three Canadian industries using the most steel.

We have had indications in the last few days of extended lay-offs by some of the manufacturers of farm machinery and agricultural equipment. Last week the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose put on record figures which indicated that even in Alberta people producing hogs are doing so at a loss. I have in my hand figures prepared for me by the manager of the Arthur district co-operative with regard to pork production in our part of Ontario. These are approximate figures as of February 18, 1956. The cost of a weanling pig is $8. The cost of 100 pounds of pig starter is $4.80 and the cost of 600 pounds of hog grower at $3.40 per hundred is $20.40. Therefore the basic cost of the pig and the feed is $33.20. A fair average selling price was $36.20, making a gross spread per pig of $3. Then there are the expenses directly connected with hog raising such as interest on capital, depreciation on buildings and equipment, veterinary expenses, the normal loss ratio and labour cost. Then in this magnificent sum of $3 which the farmer makes per pig he also has to allow for disease, price changes and general misfortune. This is the situation with regard to hogs and I may say that the same situation exists with regard to cattle production in southern Ontario.

I should like to make a few suggestions as to some things that might be done to alleviate the situation. In that connection I should like to read part of the policy statement of the Ontario marketing conference which was held on March 13 and 14, 1956 by the Ontario federation of agriculture. Item No. 4 of their policy statement is as follows:

> To recognize that the only type of government agricultural policy that can be effected is one which is comprehensive and which takes into account all aspects of our Canadian agricultural economy. We recommend that the federal government give immediate consideration to the establishment of a "granary program" involving outright purchases of sufficient western grains to lessen the danger of western farmers marketing their unsold grain through hogs and other livestock. Grain is a more easily stored commodity than meat.

In the same connection I should like to refer to a bulletin issued by the Ontario retail feed dealers association in which they indicate that the situation was foreseen. The bulletin reads in part as follows:

> The costly situation eastern agricultural interests are now encountering was foreseen by the trade early last fall. As a result of Canadian wheat board policy it was clearly apparent at that time that sufficient stocks of feed grains would not be moved into winter positions to care for the needs of eastern feeders.

In this article the feed dealers also indicate that more feed grain should be shipped during the fall season while the boats can carry the grain at a cheaper rate than that charged by the railway companies during the winter. In fact our feed merchants and feeders are finding a very definite problem in that connection right now. As a result of the late spring, the farmers are having to feed their cattle a longer time in their own barn.

Another situation that has arisen in connection with the farm industry is brought to our attention by an article in the London Free Press which indicates that the farmer gets only 46 cents out of the food dollar that is expended by the housewife when she goes to buy her weekly requirements. I sometimes think that situation could be improved through research. I feel that this government should spend more money, engage more scientists, and do more experimentation in agriculture so that varieties of produce could be developed which would move to the consumers with less processing and less waste.

In that same connection there is an article in the Rural Co-operator of Tuesday, January 31, entitled, "Ask Research":

> In addition the federal government will be asked to undertake research to determine the relative food values of all grades of beef including dairy beef carcasses, with a view to improving sales value.
> To improve hog quality the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was asked to work with the Canada department of agriculture to determine the type of program required to produce more "A" hogs in Canada.

The farmers should be provided with this information so that they will know the best types of feed to use and the best animal strains to be developed which will grow faster and be ready for market in a shorter period of time, thus reducing their costs of feeding and operation.

In connection with this matter of research I would go along with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kindersley last week that there should be additional research into the question of combatting disease in farm animals and the control of obnoxious weeds which costs the farmers millions of dollars each year. In connection with this weed study business I do feel that some steps should be taken to ensure that more effective methods of grading feed grain would be used to eliminate the danger of carrying obnoxious weed seeds from western Canada to eastern Canada, and to improve the types and grades of feed grain being shipped into southern Ontario. Some samples taken from cars that have been shipped to southern Ontario are hardly fit for animal consumption and should never have left the elevators in western Canada.

I feel also that if the farmers of this country felt that we enjoyed a greater diversity of markets for their products they would not be faced with the problem of their products arriving at disposal points when prices are depressed owing to carryovers. If this were the case, farmers could produce more and would have a greater income to carry on their operations. I feel that steps should be taken to get our agricultural products back into the United Kingdom market once more.

In that connection, I should like to quote from a Searle Grain Company report of February 15. This is a little item entitled, "We Wonder Why".

> According to a recent press report, a prominent government spokesman after referring to Canada's large world war trade with the United Kingdom in bacon, cheese, and eggs, added:
> "But between 1947 and 1950, they cut off every bit of it. I accepted their reasons but I felt a bit put out when they suggested that we should buy more goods from them."
> For the life of us we cannot see why we in Canada should be put out when one of our best agricultural customers suggests what is axiomatic; namely, that the interchange of goods is the very essence of trade and that trade cannot flourish on a one way street. Time and time again officials from Britain have suggested—and even as we write the British Prime Minister, now in Canada, is stressing the point—that if Canada wants to do more trade with the United Kingdom she must be prepared to buy more British goods in return. There can be no quarrel with that, surely?

Once more we have found it is not good policy to have all our eggs in one basket. Every year in the United Kingdom there are millions and millions of people to be fed, whereas the United States, upon whose markets we have come to depend, produces practically the same products we do and also has great exportable surpluses. In the matter of trade, the Toronto Evening Telegram of Monday, May 7, contained an article by James S. Duncan entitled, "Our Trade with Britain". I should like to quote one paragraph from that article:

> Obviously it is to our advantage to develop and extend overseas markets throughout the world. But the British market is especially important to us as its normal requirements are the primary products of our basic industries and as it provides the largest single market for our wheat.

We have been told that we do not enjoy the British market because they do not have the dollars. This article would indicate that there is a possibility that Britain could be provided with these dollars if we bought more of the merchandise she has to offer.

So I feel, Mr. Chairman, that although this government has done some things for the farmers of Canada during this session of parliament through the medium of amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Canadian Farm Improvements Act, that is not the answer. The answer is not to make it easier for farmers to get into debt to carry on their operations, debts which they are going to have trouble repaying. The answer is to take definite steps to assure the farmer a profit on the sale of his products so he will be able to enjoy this great, booming Canadian economy. There is another article in the Steel Company of Canada's magazine which is headed at the top, "The Right Price". At the bottom it says:

> The right price for Canada, then, must include a profit for investment in our future growth.

Certainly, the farmer is entitled to a profit so that he may make an investment and carry on the investment that has been carried on for so many years by himself and his forefathers. I sincerely hope that this government will give immediate consideration to these and other suggestions so that the present disparity between the farmers' income and that of other segments of our economy may be changed, and that our farmers will once again find a place in the sun. I hope that the small farmer will continue to enjoy a sound financial position—because I feel that he has made, and will continue to make, a very definite contribution towards supplying agricultural products for the use of Canada and the world—and will also continue to be the backbone of our municipal government. After all, the majority of farmers are proud of the heritage handed down by their forefathers who came to this country, built roads, schools and churches and were always ready to take their place in every organization in the community. I feel that every medium that can be used should be used to assure the continuance of this situation.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for Elgin and so many other members in this house, that the turkey growers be given a more equitable tariff so that they might compete—and this is true of all the poultry raisers in Canada—with the products from the United States.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on this first item, especially after listening to the mutual admiration society on the other side in which members from the Social Credit party praised C.C.F. members and vice versa for their stand on the farm situation in this country. The hon. member for Mackenzie made a very interesting speech in which he referred to some extent to the province of New Brunswick. It seems that at this particular time New Brunswick has ceased to be just popular and has become the rage. The members of the two parties I have just mentioned are showing a great interest in things in that province.

We in New Brunswick have been governing ourselves down there since 1784, which was long before your provinces had parliament buildings, and we are quite capable of looking after our own affairs without intervention from the west coast. I should like perhaps to clarify something that the hon. member for Mackenzie said about farm income. I know he did not mean to make any statements that would not be very complimentary to New Brunswick, but perhaps he just does not understand the situation in our province with respect to farm income. Because of the nature of the terrain our farming down there is somewhat different from farming in Ontario and in western Canada. In New Brunswick farmers for the most part have sidelines, or what would be called sidelines in other parts of Canada. Under their set-up perhaps half the farm is cleared and the other half is woodland, and the farmers cut a considerable number of logs and pulpwood to act as a cash crop or a cushion. As you can see from looking at the map, the provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have long coastlines. Some of those provinces are almost islands. Along the coast the farms border on the sea. Those farmers, like the farmers inland in New Brunswick, fish in certain seasons of the year, perhaps during the lobster season and the herring season, for a cash crop. It is not strictly agriculture but it gives an indication of the over-all view of farming conditions in New Brunswick as the farmers carry out their operations there.

I hold in my hand the revised estimate of farm cash income on the sale of farm products for the year 1953. In New Brunswick the largest farm cash income crop is forest products. That is amazing, but the largest cash crop from the farms of New Brunswick is forest products, with $12,305,000. The second largest crop is dairy products, with $11,300,000. In Nova Scotia forest products amount to $7,289,000. In the Dominion of Canada the total is $83,637,000, which means that in New Brunswick, as compared with the rest of Canada, one-seventh of the cash income is derived from forest products. The total cash income from the sale of all farm products in New Brunswick amounts to $46,141,000. The total cash income for the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island is $109 million out of a dominion total of $1,713 million. When you consider the size of our province and its population of half a million, I think that is a fairly good showing.

I have been talking to some western members who have visited my province and were very much taken with it. One remark that interested me greatly was that New Brunswick was about the size of their ridings in the west. When that is considered I think the figure of $46 million as farm income is nothing that we should be ashamed of in New Brunswick. With respect to the percentage of forest products making up the total farm income, the total farm income is $46 million and of that $12,300,000 is from forest products. This means that one-quarter of the farm income of New Brunswick is derived from the forest.

The statistics of income from fishing by farmers along the coast, and especially in my county, is not shown. In the province of Prince Edward Island fishing income as a supplement to farm income is even greater.

Last week, along with the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, I had the opportunity of meeting two of the main agricultural societies in our area, namely the Wake federation of agriculture and the officers of the Canadian federation of agriculture. At this meeting we discussed floor prices. The agricultural societies in New Brunswick commended the government on the establishment of the 58-cent floor price on butter and its continuance for two years. They also told the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and me that they commended the government on the stand it had taken with regard to the sale of butter and the extra stocks of butter on hand at that time. They agreed with and commended the government on the other support prices for pork and the like. Another matter which was of interest to them and on which they commended the government was the favourable freight rates from the west to the maritimes and New Brunswick on feed grains, which are very important to us in the matter of raising livestock.

One thing was discussed there that I am interested in, namely, a resolution they had and which they asked us to support on the better labelling of meat products. I am going to quote the words of the manager of the Maritime Co-operative Services Limited in Moncton, who summed it up in this way, as quoted in the April issue of the Wool Grower:

> Constructive comments and additional suggestions come from Roy Grant, assistant manager of Maritime Co-operative Services Limited. Noting that meat eaters in the maritimes decreased their buying of lamb because they found it difficult to get good lamb, Mr. Grant told of a labour leader of his acquaintance who had suffered disappointment. "Later", he writes, "I found that he had been buying his lamb at a cut-rate store where they featured very low prices. I happened to know that this store regularly bought D and E grade lambs. No wonder the man did not like lamb."

Further on in this report he says this with respect to feed:

> As far as eastern Canada is concerned, too many people in the trade today are selling, for instance, choice or prime western beef and including in it a whole lot of western cows. Some of these same people will be shoving mutton in with lamb at every opportunity. It is my feeling that, if this job is going to be done, it had better be done by the producers themselves, particularly in view of the fact that they are the ones who will pay for it. Then, we can develop our own program and it should provide for sufficient consumer education so that a demand would be created for grade identification of all meats through to the consumer, as far as that is practicable.

At that time I told these gentlemen that I certainly thought this would be a good idea and that when I returned to Ottawa I would bring it to the attention of the department.

The hon. member for Mackenzie made some reference to income tax paid by farmers in New Brunswick. After I have put on record some figures concerning the cash income of farmers in New Brunswick, perhaps another look at the tabulation may show that farmers may be classified as lumber operators because, as I have pointed out, one-quarter of the farm income in New Brunswick is from the forests; or they may have been classified as fishermen because a large part of their cash income is derived from the month or more during which they operate in the fishing industry.

We are very proud of the job the farmers in New Brunswick are doing pretty much on their own. The farmers appreciate the price support and other forms of assistance given to them by the federal government.

The total cash farm income in New Brunswick was $46 million last year. You can readily see that if we gave $32 million to the agriculture of New Brunswick as we did in the case of the western agriculturists the income of the farmers in New Brunswick would be almost double. It would be a matter of sending it down. If any hon. member wants to send $32 million to the agriculturists in New Brunswick I am sure they would be only too happy to pay income tax on it. We never mind paying income tax in New Brunswick when we make the income.

In my riding there are several large chicken hatcheries and poultry growing plants and I visited one piggery in Westmorland county owned by a farmer who raises 2,000 pigs. In Moncton we have the plant of the Swift Canadian company which is an inducement to the farmers in our area to raise livestock which they can readily market.

That concludes the remarks I wish to make at this time. I simply wanted to clear up some false impressions that may have been left, although not intentionally, by hon. members who perhaps are not too familiar with the mode of farming in New Brunswick.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on the agricultural estimates I think I should perhaps first qualify my position in this house in that regard because there are some hon. members who feel, since Peel is adjacent to the great metropolis of metropolitan Toronto, that the agricultural industry is of minor importance and therefore it is considered in that light in relation to Peel county. I wish to assure hon. members of this house that that is not the case.

It may be of interest to hon. members to know that in this area we produce just about every agricultural product that is produced in the Dominion of Canada. We produce wheat and mixed grain crops, including hay, oats, rye and barley. We have an intensive production of vegetables. We have some of the finest orchards in the Dominion of Canada and an extensive production of smaller fruits. Our livestock and hog production is distinctive because we have many of the world's champions in this county. Our production under roof is startling because we produce 25 per cent of everything that is grown under glass or under roof in the province of Ontario including mushrooms, rhubarb, flowers and other indoor-grown products. It is from that position, Mr. Chairman, that I address my remarks to the house today.

We in Peel appreciate that under a free enterprise system you cannot always have every part of the economy in equal balance with the other parts. To do so would involve forgoing many fundamental rights which are of much more importance to the individual than his temporary financial position, but we also recognize that no country can allow any part of its economy to remain in an unfavourable position for any extended period of time.

Mr. Chairman, it is one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, before the noon recess I was referring to the fact that the farmers welcome a free enterprise system but they realize that under such a system there are economic ups and downs. I was pointing out that where one part of our economy is depressed the other parts must recognize that fact and be ready to assist the depressed part to take the necessary steps to recover its position and in that way bring about a fair return under our present economic system. At noon I was reminded that perhaps I should mention to the house that I can speak from personal experience about the economic position of the farmer, having some direct knowledge of returns from our own farm during the past few years.

The farmers of this country, like other groups, are quite capable of taking care of themselves and in their present position they will formulate ways and means of coming back into their rightful position, but along with other groups they look for and expect responsibility on the part of governments in assisting them to carry out their policies. In the case of labour there is a recognition of the right to organize under our system; in the case of our manufacturers there is the recognition that certain industries need certain types of protection. These are drastic examples of how governments have assisted at various times in our history. I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture and to the house as a whole that the government must be responsive to any suggestions that come from agriculture at this time and which are put forward in an effort to bring agriculture out of its present position.

I was rather interested to hear an hon. member decrying the fact that the sons of farmers are leaving the farm. I think that has been the case with every generation. I do not particularly decry that, as I believe it will work to the benefit of our economy as a whole and of our country as a whole. No individual farm can continue to maintain all of the family raised on that farm. There is a natural movement cityward and perhaps that has a tendency to improve the quality of our city populations.

However, for those who remain on the farm and are playing a vital part in the economy of this country of ours there must be a recognition of their importance.

Statistics placed before the house show that there is decreasing importance of agriculture in relation to the gross national product. Any manufacturer knows that when he loses part of his market he goes from a profit position to a loss position. When the manufacturers of this country lose that part of their market which has been occupied by the farmers those manufacturing concerns are going to start showing a loss rather than a profit. Apparently the importance of agriculture in the whole economy is diminishing but nevertheless agricultural purchasing power is of the utmost importance to preserve in order to maintain that profit-loss balance. It is with a selfish interest that we try to assure that that purchasing power is maintained. As I have said, a small reduction in the purchases from manufacturers will reduce their position from a profit to a loss position. This condition will be immediately reflected upon the condition of other workers who are directly or indirectly connected with the supplying of products which our agriculturists buy.

It is easy to put these facts before the committee and many other speakers have done this more aptly than I could, but there is more to this matter than just placing the situation before the committee to be considered. We should urge the minister—I have not heard it said in any speech that first of all the government should be prepared to acknowledge that agriculture is not enjoying the fat living which the government would have us believe it is enjoying—to admit frankly that there is a problem. If that were done we would at least have some consolation that the government admit that the problem is there and are at least thinking about it. They should give us some indication that they are showing concern rather than just passing it over. If the farmers of this country do not need the government in order to restore them to their economic position, this government may one day need the farmers.

I think one program which should be adopted, both by agriculture and by the government, is the greater use of "buy Canadian" slogans. There are just as many vitamins in tomatoes as there are in oranges and yet how many of those who prescribe diets suggest that tomato juice be drunk instead of orange juice. There are many other angles that could be developed on a national scale. Leadership in this regard must be on a national scale as this is something that can be developed only with the leadership of some federal agency.

Another thing which might be done, and this has been suggested already, is to have more research in agriculture. A tribute must be paid to those presently engaged in this and I think both the federal Department of Agriculture and the department of agriculture of Ontario are to be congratulated upon their approaches to this problem.

But there is one phase of research which has not been fully explored and which I believe would provide an answer to our immediate problem. Our research in the past has been concerned primarily with production. This has paid off because the productivity of agriculture is continually increasing. However, the need now is for research into new marketing methods and new uses for agricultural products. If the same energies were devoted to that end as have been devoted to the other phase I am sure that beneficial results would follow.

Speaking of markets, how much easier it would be for a farmer—I am dealing with the local situation—to deliver his eggs to the county town and sell them there than to pack them for shipment overseas.

Now let us build this country on a home consumption basis, and on that basis I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture had better get together with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration so that we may obtain an increase in the population for home consumption. It is far easier, I suggest, to deliver your goods to local consumers, if you have the local consumers. He would be helping not only the consumption end of agricultural products but also the productive capacity of the community as a whole.

I wish to make just one final remark at this stage. There have been recent developments to which our attention has been directed and which may have quite a far-reaching effect upon the farmers in Ontario. I strongly urge that the minister have drafted and ready for submission to this house the necessary legislation to take care of any contingency that may result from the finding of the recent reference before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: During my brief remarks I intend to deal particularly with some of the problems of the farmers of British Columbia. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made from various sides of the house during discussion of this item, and particularly the remarks made by my colleagues.

I support the policies of the Canadian federation of agriculture. I do not think there is any necessity for me at this stage to repeat the excellent analysis of the international and domestic agricultural problems made by the previous speakers of this group. I think even the Minister of Agriculture will admit that I am not a repeater, except at meal times.

I speak with some knowledge of the problems of the ranchers of the interior of British Columbia because during the greater part of my life I have been a rancher on a somewhat microscopic scale and I know the problems of these people from the early days. We never discuss these estimates without my having certain nostalgic memories of the pioneer days in my constituency. I am happy to say that I have known and know the majority of the pioneer farmers and ranchers in the constituency I have the honour to represent.

I have lived through a period when the type of farming that largely prevailed in Kootenay West was known as "subsistence, existence and persistence" farming. We survived that period and are now in a more prosperous stage. I remember the days when we lived largely on tradition, scenery, promises from governments, and hope. So far as some of my constituents are concerned, they are still hoping that this government will take some action to remedy things that they can remedy if they are willing to give consideration to their problems.

I cannot pass on without saying that many people come to mind when I am speaking in a debate like this. To indicate the type of people I represent, I might say that just before I came to Ottawa I met a dear old gentleman of 85, a splendid type who has farmed for many years in Kootenay West. He said to me, "You know, Mr. Herridge, I am 85, but I would willingly die happy. I have done all the things that any virile and worth-while man would want to do. I visited Paris when I was 21, I played cricket at Lord's and golf at Saint Andrews, had a perfect hand in crib, had the opportunity to serve the empire in war, and have lived in the Kootenay district for 50 years." That is the kind of people I remember when I think of the early days in my constituency.

I shall also never forget that on another occasion another gentleman came to me who had not farmed prior to coming to this country. He asked me to come to his dairy farm and help him out. We had some very cold days in the winter. He was a very kindly man, and he made some horse-blankets for his cows. In addition, he made puttees out of gunny sacks to put on their legs, to keep out the cold. He wanted me to help him to adjust these puttees, because the puttees on the hind legs would not stay on.

Mr. Stick: He should have put them on the tail.

Mr. Herridge: Many of those people did some odd and comical things, but they have been the backbone of the part of the country I have the honour to represent, and they have performed miracles considering the difficulties they had to overcome.

Whilst many Canadian farmers, particularly those residing on the prairies, depend on the international market largely, we in British Columbia have an excellent market at home. In fact, we are in a particularly favourable position so far as markets are concerned. At the present time the farmers of British Columbia are able to supply only about 50 per cent over-all of British Columbia's agricultural food requirements, and in my constituency only something slightly over 25 per cent.

We have the finest climate in Canada; we have excellent soil; and we have this unfilled domestic market at our doors. One would think under those circumstances that the farmers of British Columbia could not help being prosperous. As a matter of fact, the reverse is the case. On that account I find, in my constituency, the young people leaving the farms and taking the more attractive jobs in industry, in business and so on. This afternoon I am going to try to illustrate, or shall I say diagnose, the problem. I shall deal later very briefly with the cure for the economic ills of the farmers of British Columbia. I expect that some time later in this debate the hon. member for Nanaimo will deal with the political medicine necessary to remedy the situation.

Now I am going to quote some figures to make my point. These were prepared by the secretary-manager of the British Columbia federation of agriculture, Mr. C. E. S. Walls, who has been doing an excellent job for the farmers of British Columbia for a number of years and who has made a close study of this situation.

Before passing on, I must pay tribute to the British Columbia federation of agriculture. I remember it from the day it was first organized. In fact, I helped in my own district to promote its first membership and have done so since. This organization is a solid, responsible, sound organization which is trying to do something effective for the farmers of British Columbia.

I have said that our domestic market is unfilled. In that connection, I should like to read briefly from a paper presented to the British Columbia natural resources conference by the superintendent of Summerland experimental station. Having dealt with agriculture in general, he then says, in part:

> With these pictures in my mind I realize that prospects for the sale of B.C. agricultural produce in export markets are very discouraging. Fortunately, the situation with regard to home markets is quite different. During the past ten years there has been a 40 per cent increase in the population of B.C. Large scale pulp mills, aluminum plants, celanese factories and many other industries are now being established in this province. This rapid industrial expansion indicates that our population will continue to increase at a similar or accelerated rate during the next ten-year period. Although the agricultural production of B.C. has been expanding steadily, this province still imports large quantities of beef, lamb, pork, poultry and dairy products. We also import quantities of fruits and vegetables especially in the early part of the season when locally grown products are not available.

Then in concluding the statement he has this to say:

These trends may be stated very briefly as follows: 1. Export markets for B.C. agricultural products are decreasing. 2. In contrast, home markets are expanding rapidly. 3. On account of the high wage scales which prevail in B.C., consumer preference in these home markets is for high quality produce.

We have a large market for good produce.

4. In an endeavour to produce high quality produce at reasonable cost, progressive farmers are making effective use of labour saving equipment, fertilizers, irrigation and agricultural chemicals.

Then he goes on to deal with certain other aspects of the situation. There it is. The market is there for high quality produce and farmers are ready to produce it. Yet under present circumstances, and I will illustrate by figures, the farmers of British Columbia are in an even less favourable condition than the farmers of most other provinces in Canada. These tables are prepared from figures supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics. I give first the index numbers of farm prices of agricultural products in Canada for the year 1954. They are the latest year available. The table is based on the period from 1935 to 1939 equalling 100 and is as follows:

Index Nos. of Farm Prices of Agricultural Products

Province	Annual Index 1954
Prince Edward Island	194·8
Nova Scotia	244·3
New Brunswick	211·7
Quebec	264·8
Ontario	252·8
Manitoba	218·4
Saskatchewan	197·0
Alberta	222·2
Canadian Average	232·1

What do we get out of those figures? I get these facts from them. While cash income from the sale of farm products in Canada declined a further 12 per cent in 1954, this did not apply to British Columbia where farm income was $200,000 above that of 1953. The index of farm prices of agricultural products in British Columbia was the second highest in all Canada and yet according to figures I will present later British Columbia farmers had the lowest net income.

I come to table No. 2 which deals with farmers' net income as a percentage of farm cash income. The source of the figures is the dominion bureau of statistics and the year is 1953. The table is as follows:

Province	1953
Prince Edward Island	55 per cent
Nova Scotia	50 per cent
New Brunswick	61 per cent
Quebec	68 per cent
Ontario	58 per cent
Manitoba	51 per cent
Saskatchewan	63 per cent
Alberta	62 per cent
British Columbia	39 per cent
Canadian Average	61 per cent

This table shows that the proportionate net return in British Columbia is by far the lowest in Canada which proves that the cost of production there is proportionately the highest. I am sure that these figures are rather startling to anyone who comes from the province of British Columbia. Having now found the reason for the individual farmer's poor returns in spite of relatively high selling prices, namely, unusually high costs of production, we will try to find out the factors which are causing British Columbia's unfavourable position at this time. First of all we will deal with taxes because farmers always consider taxes one of the main costs of production. What do we find? Here is a table showing taxes paid as a percentage of farm cash income:

Province	Percentage
Prince Edward Island	2
Nova Scotia	7
New Brunswick	8
Quebec	4
Ontario	5
Manitoba	4
Saskatchewan	2
Alberta	4
Canadian Average	4

The figures for taxation indicate that the percentage thereof with respect to British Columbia farmers' cash income is not much higher than the Canadian average. Therefore we can conclude that high taxation is not a serious reason for the average British Columbia farmer's economic position generally. There may be some local conditions resulting in a difference from the general British Columbia figure but generally speaking we cannot say in British Columbia that taxes paid as a percentage of farm cash income very seriously affect the economic position of the farmer.

Now we come to another table. Labour is a considerable factor in farmers' costs. What is the relative labour cost in British Columbia compared with other parts of Canada? The table indicates the following situation:

Hired Labour Wages as a Percentage of Farm Cash Income

Province	Percentage
Prince Edward Island	12
Nova Scotia	20
New Brunswick	14
Quebec	5
Ontario	6
Manitoba	7
Saskatchewan	4
Alberta	7
British Columbia	17
Canadian Average	6

These figures show that wages are one of the causes of the difficulties of British Columbia farmers, but the difference is not sufficient to mainly influence costs, especially when we see that for some unknown reason the percentage in Nova Scotia is 20. Therefore we can see that labour costs are not the most important factor affecting farmers' net income in British Columbia.

The British Columbia federation of agriculture made an investigation as to the use of fertilizers by farmers of that province and fertilizer prices, and they found that this factor did not have a serious effect on the farmers' net income. They found that fertilizer prices were possibly below average. They found that in 1953 British Columbia farmers spent $2,483,000 for fertilizer while the farmers of little Prince Edward Island spent $2,844,000. Therefore the amount of fertilizers used was relatively small in percentage and the cost was generally found to be lower than the Canadian average. The cost of fertilizers thus did not have a very serious effect upon the net income of the farmers of British Columbia.

Then we come to an analysis of another situation. In British Columbia there are poultry producers, livestock producers, dairymen, and on that account and because we are not a grain growing province a great amount of feed grains and mill feeds have to be imported. Mr. Walls began to examine this situation and this table indicates what he found. The table only relates to that portion of farm income that is derived from livestock, dairying, poultry and eggs, and is as follows:

Feed Cost Percentage of Cash Income from Livestock, Dairying, Poultry and Eggs

Province	Percentage
Prince Edward Island	27
Nova Scotia	44
New Brunswick	39
Quebec	44
Ontario	31
Manitoba	12
Saskatchewan	12
Alberta	12
Canadian Average	30

You can see how the figures change as you come to the prairies. In British Columbia feed cost is 60 per cent of cash income of those farmers concerned with livestock, dairying, poultry and eggs. After analysing all these various costs, taxation, labour, fertilizers, Mr. Walls found that the cost of feed is the most important production cost of those farmers engaged in the production of livestock, dairying and poultry products in British Columbia. That is a very serious situation and, strangely enough, it is one that the federal government can do something to correct. Here we find the principal answer to British Columbia's high production cost for the farmers I have mentioned, with British Columbia farmers having to purchase twice the Canadian average, of grain and mill feeds.

Now, what can the government do? This is not a question of international markets or export markets, this is a problem existing in British Columbia, which is a province in Canada adjoining the prairie provinces. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have analysed this situation and I have quoted figures from tables provided by the British Columbia federation of agriculture. I think Mr. Walls has done an excellent job in sifting through the figures to find what is the important factor in British Columbia with respect to net returns at present received by livestock producers, dairymen and poultry producers. As I said before, I expect my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo will deal with the political medicine necessary to correct this situation, but I do want to say this before concluding. That this is a problem that could be to a considerable extent remedied by action on the part of this government.

I suggest briefly this government could do two things. First of all, I must say the present freight assistance is a help and the situation would be much worse if that assistance were not there. It is unfortunate that last year the government had to reduce that freight assistance to British Columbia farmers. In addition to that assistance, my first suggestion would be that this government could take some action to deal effectively with the milling combine in Canada because farmers and farm organizations buy their grains and mill feeds from the milling organizations in western Canada. I have seen a number of cars of grain unloaded, and I have noticed the poor quality on occasions. I have raised that question in this house before and I raise it again. I urge the minister to have his inspectors watch that situation very closely, indeed.

Now, what else can the government do? I might mention I think, to indicate the difference in price being received by the producers on the prairie and the prices being paid by the farmers of British Columbia, that if my information is correct at the present time the farmer is paying $90 a ton for No. 5 wheat. I wonder what the prairie farmer is getting for that wheat? Why is there this abnormal spread between the producer and the consumer? I maintain this government could do something to correct that situation.

My second suggestion is that arrangements should be made by this government for farmers' organizations and co-operatives in British Columbia to buy their whole grain—wheat, oats and barley—directly from the prairie farmer, but through the wheat board. I would not for a moment suggest doing anything to undermine the proper functions of the wheat board. It was established to protect the interests of the prairie farmers, the grain producers of western Canada, and I would not for a moment suggest undermining its over all authority and its work in that connection. In making this suggestion I have the support of a good many farm organizations in British Columbia. It is unnecessary to have this extra burden of costs caused by shipping to the elevators and then re-shipping through the milling companies to the farmer, placed upon the farmer.

We suggest that if this government would make it possible for farm organizations and co-operatives to buy direct from the farmers through the wheat board—it is only a matter of paper work—the farmers in British Columbia would be saved a considerable amount. In doing that the government would only be extending the functions of the wheat board, by not only protecting the interests of the prairie farmer but protecting the interests of the farmers of British Columbia, Ontario and the maritimes. Now, I have dealt briefly with this question. I urge the minister to give consideration to our representations in this respect. I think this situation, in British Columbia and in eastern Canada, does offer an opportunity for the government to take action to improve the economic position of the farmers without disturbing the over-all benefits that are now flowing to prairie farmers from the wheat board, and of course without disturbing any present legislation. That would in the end be to the general advantage of all farmers and the people of Canada.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I have always been a little bit slow in speaking on agriculture, but recently I have been fortified by a trip around my constituency and attendance at an agricultural meeting. I have also been fortified by the knowledge that western members, who may know something about agriculture, do not hesitate to speak on mining in New Brunswick about which, as it was proven yesterday they know nothing.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It is a good job your constituents are making you wake up a little bit. You should have some more meetings.

Mr. Bell: You can continue coming down to New Brunswick, and you will find out on June 18 where you belong.

Two recent statements have been made about agriculture that are in line with the general tone nowadays, and they were startling to me. First of all, the president of the maritime board of trade said that the Atlantic provinces spend 30 per cent of their income on food products, yet over 70 per cent of those said food products come from outside the Atlantic provinces. Then, the second statement that was rather startling to me came from one of the gentlemen who spoke with most authority at this agricultural meeting to which I referred a minute ago. He seemed to have some knowledge of the tax situation in his area because he said that out of 50 farms, nowadays only 25 of those farms were being taxed for agricultural purposes, but the whole 50 were still farms. Though the statement is true, and I am sure it is, it was simply a case of their still being on the farm, but the agricultural interests for tax purposes had been drastically changed. They had been reduced 100 per cent in this case.

In his opening remarks, the minister made some reference to the situation in Canada generally. I have forgotten exactly what the details were but my impression was that in New Brunswick the agricultural situation was not out of line with the rest of Canada. I am not going into the details but I want to refer to one or two things that were presented to the Gordon commission by the province of New Brunswick two weeks ago. First of all the statement was made that the capital investment in farms in New Brunswick is lower than any other province in Canada. They went on to make the statement that farm incomes in New Brunswick are very low. I do not think they are the lowest, but they are very low. I believe I read in a table of statistics that the increase in farm cash income in New Brunswick has not kept up with the general increase in Canada. It is not really out of line, but it certainly has not kept up.

The only other fact of significance in the report I think is that the changeover that is taking place in farming generally in the country has been much lower in New Brunswick. It is quite reasonable to assume that in the west, with the concentration of farming, they would be quicker to take advantage of the changes and the modernization.

Now, I ask, what can the government do in this matter? I say that the government should increase its technical aid. This has been mentioned by other speakers. Of course, they could easily step it up in areas such as New Brunswick where the economy needs a little stimulation. This could readily be given through marketing and food growing policies and also in assisting in the erection of additional cold storage facilities. An example comes to my mind, Mr. Chairman. The marshland reclamation project has been completed; at least the main dam in Albert county has been completed. I do not intend to go into the details of that, although I may have several questions to ask when that item in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture is before the committee. However, I do wish to say that so far as general policy is concerned, the government has gone ahead with the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, and has spent upwards of $10 million in the maritimes on that project. In my constituency we have the largest part of that reclamation project. I think the amount spent there is well over $3 million. I for one have never been as pessimistic as some others about the project. I feel that it is quite an investment for the future, and the government deserves considerable credit for going ahead with it. I mention this to the minister because I feel it is important so far as the government is concerned. The government began the project; the land has been reclaimed. I was out there the other day. There has been some criticism of the way in which some of the contracts have been let, but to me it looks like a fine, commendable piece of work. But what is to be done with the land, Mr. Chairman, now that it has been reclaimed? The federal government must definitely line up a policy. The land is there; the farms are abandoned. There are over 5,000 acres of rich land which could be used for beef growing or for the resettlement of farmers or for the settlement of new farmers from overseas. I understand that the possibilities of growing grain are good there. I leave this thought with the minister today, Mr. Chairman, as one tangible way in which the government could use those lands to step up and stimulate the faltering agricultural economy.

Some forward steps have to be taken in that area. The farmers are watching and waiting. The government, in order to get the continued co-operation and good will of the farmers, must bring forth a forthright, progressive plan for the development of agriculture in the marshland area.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Gardiner: If the item is not carried, may I make a short statement to my hon. friend who has just spoken. The arrangement which was made with the maritime provinces, both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, was that we would build the dike or the dam, as the case may be, the aboiteau and things of that kind, in order to prevent the sea from getting in on the land, but all the activities behind those operations are to be carried on by the province. That is only natural, because the lands and resources belong to the province, and the assistance we give is to keep out the sea, and then the province carries on the other activities behind the dikes.

I am afraid we would require some different understanding from what we have now if we were to undertake the settlement of those particular lands. The understanding at the beginning, of course, was that the farmers who were already there would be encouraged to utilize the land so far as possible by extending down into the flats where they could not operate before, but a land policy is generally a provincial matter.

Mr. Bell: I appreciate that, Mr. Chairman. It is the word "encouragement" that bothers me. Where is that encouragement to come from? I appreciate the fact that there is divided jurisdiction. I agree with everything the minister said, but it is the word "encouragement" that I take exception to. How is that encouragement to be brought about, and who is responsible for it?

Mr. Gardiner: I would think the encouragement of settlement is the responsibility of the province. Where they desire us to take some part in it is another question. The whole question as to what the province thinks can be developed successfully is one which they should determine, not we.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to make some general remarks on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture because, while I agree quite readily with the remarks made by the hon. member to my right who has just taken his seat, it seems to be most difficult to get this government to recognize the fact that agriculture is in a depressed state. That is one of the first problems that we of the opposition groups have to contend with. This government appears to be drunk with power. It seems to be completely indifferent to the conditions facing our farmers from coast to coast.

We of the prairies have from time to time indicated that since 1954 agriculture in the prairie provinces has been receiving a continued set-back in so far as its financial standing is concerned in comparison with the general economy of the country.

The last few days four or five members from the government side of the house have risen in their places and indicated that in the provinces of Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia real problems are facing the agricultural producer, and we no longer have the apple polishers of the government's agricultural policies. Whether or not it is the intention of these individual members to make statements in the house so that they can indicate to their constituents, particularly those in the back concessions, that they have taken some opposition to the do-nothing policy of this government in respect to agriculture, and perhaps indicate that they have put forth policies which would assist the farming people in their efforts to maintain a decent standard of living, I do not know. However, I wish to say it seems very difficult to convince this government that some remedial policy is needed to rectify the conditions facing agriculture today. Just recently I returned from western Canada.

Mr. Byrne: On a point of order, this is the second time in this debate that hon. members from the C.C.F. party have imputed motives to members on this side of the house who spoke on behalf of their constituents, and I think it is about time they were called to order in that regard.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of imputing motives to anyone. The members on the government side can always rise in their places and state their ideas and we are very happy to hear them. The unfortunate thing is that on most of the issues facing the country we do not find them too ready to rise except when they wish to condone such actions as took place yesterday when the government was prepared to take immediate action in order to railroad through issues which should more properly be put to the people of Canada.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will of course realize that his remarks were out of order and perhaps should be withdrawn.

Mr. Byrne: On the point of order, both hon. members have said that the members on this side of the house are speaking only for the purpose of taking their speeches back to their constituents. I say that is imputing motives. I am sure that hon. members on this side of the house speak with a genuine desire to help solve the problems of this country, and not simply for political purposes, as was suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I never said any such thing.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kootenay East is quite right but the hon. member who has the floor said that he had no wish to impute motives, and I think we can accept that statement.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, the important thing is that while agriculture perhaps relatively does not hold the important place in the Canadian economy that it did a number of years ago, it is still the basic industry of Canada and I maintain that the prosperity of that industry will have a direct effect on the entire economy. When it is recognized that there is a total of $9,593 million invested by way of capital investment in farm land, buildings, equipment and livestock as compared with a total of $8,470 million invested in all manufacturing industries, I think it is clear to all hon. members that agriculture does rank as an important industry in Canada. I have never heard hon. members of this house criticize the farmers of Canada in terms of their being inefficient. I might say that the present condition facing the western farmer is largely due to his efficiency. He has been able to produce extremely efficiently and his surpluses bring about the problem which faces him today. He cannot market the large volume of produce he has been successful in growing. I suggest to the government that not only wheat—which is perhaps not fully under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture—but all farm products are between 20 and 40 per cent under a fair equity price as compared with the farmer's cost of production. That is the number 1 problem facing the western farmer.

When one considers that entire communities in western Canada are dependent upon the prosperity of agriculture, one can readily recognize that today our farm communities and municipalities are in a position in which it is difficult to carry on.

I was talking to some of the leaders of the farm implement industry in western Canada and they told me they have not experienced such difficulties since the hungry thirties. The sale of farm implements and the problem of carrying on efficiently is extremely serious in many cases.

I wish to point out to the Minister of Agriculture that while we have had prosperity from 1945 to 1952—we had in that period some of our most productive years—we have recurring droughts in the bread basket of the west, namely the Palliser triangle. Our temporary post-war prosperity has been largely cancelled out by the conditions prevailing in the last two or three years during which farm costs have gone up, and this government has failed in its policy—

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have in my hand a copy of Hansard dated February 10, 1956. On page 1083 there appears the speech made by the hon. member on that date. He is repeating it today almost word for word. If he does not agree that that is what he is doing I will read part of it to him.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Go ahead.

Mr. Gardiner: Very well.

> The reference is to machinery repairs and parts. In that connection I may say that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, as reported in the wheat pool report of January 1956, asks that tariffs be cut on certain items the farmer must buy—

And so on. Then:

> The situation in respect of the whole western economy is getting worse. It is affecting our merchants, our retail sales trade and also the livelihood of the people.
> . . . In 1954 sales of all farm implements across Canada dropped 38 per cent, or more than $92 million. Even the sales of repair parts were down 14 per cent, an even surer indication that farmers are pressed for ready cash. In reference to Saskatchewan it says: "For instance Saskatchewan sales last year dropped by more than one-half. Alberta's by 45 per cent."

And so on.

The hon. member continues with the same kind of thing he is repeating today. One of the important rules in connection with debates in this house is that there must not be repetition and certainly when an hon. member is for the second time taking up his 30 minutes in committee and thus delaying the passing of this particular item I think he will understand before he concludes why there ought to be closure in this house.

Mr. Byrne: This makes three times the hon. member has made the same speech in this house.

The Chairman: After listening to the words of the Minister of Agriculture may I say I think he made a very good case concerning repetition. Perhaps I should arm myself with a copy of Hansard for February 10 also.

Mr. Byrne: Get a copy of his speech.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): First of all, I want to say that I think it is sometimes extremely valuable to have repetition in this house; perhaps it will lead to a conviction on the part of the government to take some action. On the other hand I might say that the statement I am making is not from any notes I used previously and it is a coincidence that there is any resemblance to what I said formerly. The statement still stands, however, that agriculture is today in need of direct action on the part of this government.

I would suggest a number of things. First of all I suggest that something has to be done to rectify the cost price squeeze facing the producers of this country. The hon. member for Kootenay East spoke about the condition amongst the fruit growers in the Okanagan and we listened to an hon. member from the province of New Brunswick state the situation in which farmers in his constituency and province find themselves. For some years now I have suggested in this house some policies which I think would serve as a solution to the problem facing the producers.

Once the producer has done his job of producing efficiently he is frequently completely helpless in that he has no method by which he can receive a fair price for what he has produced. I submit that the responsibility in this field rests with the federal government. Manufacturers are in a position to ask the public to pay a price which will give them a fair return and in relation to the marketing of farm products there is a problem which must be solved by government policy.

In the last few years we have lost the British market and there are indications in the press that our trade with Britain has fallen drastically again this year. This can only lead to a smaller trade of farm products with Britain. I suggest that this government take upon itself the responsibility to find markets for our farm products. In the past I suggested that in this country we produce only one year's normal food supply for our country and for export. It seems to me that we should have adequate storage for grain and other surplus produce within our country so the producers would not necessarily have to take anything but a fair price in return for their produce.

In Canada we have room for the storage of 580 million bushels of grain at various points outside of the farm points. I submit that could be extended into a food and fodder bank. We could have food storage facilities and fodder storage facilities similar to granaries where these products could be stored for any contingency which might arise.

There are other aspects of this problem to which this government has paid little attention. We have a good-neighbour policy with the hungry peoples of the world under which we are attempting to exert western influence and show the people in undeveloped countries that the people of the west are their friends. By this means we endeavour to counteract Soviet expansion.

In addition to this use of our foodstuffs there is a great opportunity for the industrial use of farm products. I am speaking now particularly of chemurgy. In order to use our surplus foods for other purposes the government should explore that field and perhaps it could come up with some answers concerning the chemurgic use of our farm products.

I was quite interested in something which was brought to my attention recently which indicates that not only is the farmer taking the rap with respect to the tremendous increase in prices in Canada but also the consumer is victimized. One item which illustrates the situation is farm livestock products. Today the consumer is still paying high prices for choice meat cuts. The records of the Winnipeg stock exchange show that the farmers are getting 16 or 17 cents for choice beef.

Then there is the matter of the by-products. Taking the 1935-39 period as an index figure of 100 we find that the wholesale price index of raw hides, including sheep and calfskins, increased from 103·8 in 1939 to 114·4 in 1955. But when these hides are turned into boots and shoes we find that in that same period the index rose from 101·8 to 204·4. It will be seen that while in many cases the prices received by the farmer have gone down the consumer is paying higher prices for the things manufactured from farm products.

I have here an article which appeared in the Journal of April 21 entitled "Why the Farmer Complains" and I should like to read one short paragraph as follows:

> D.B.S. states that in 1955 farmers in Canada received 46 cents of the consumers' food dollar, two cents less than the 1949-54 average. But while 1955 retail food prices were 11 per cent higher than in 1949 the farmer received 3 per cent less and marketing costs were up almost 25 per cent.

I just want to leave this thought with the committee, that while the government may be self-satisfied with the rather buoyant economy evident in our industrial, oil and mineral development, we find this great segment of the Canadian economy, and I refer to agriculture, facing perhaps one of the most serious situations since the hungry thirties. I suggest to the government that we still have in Canada the possibilities of doing something for the farmer. There are many old age pensioners living on $40 a month and in many cases they do not have the kind of food they should have. I suggest that some way should be devised to get some of this surplus food into the hands of our old age pensioners and families in the low income brackets. Some policy should be evolved whereby the standard of living of such people could be increased so that they could buy more of the food which is now in surplus in Canada.

I have investigated some of the policies carried on by the United States government. They have a school lunch program under which school children are given milk and dairy products. The federal government in the United States is undertaking a $5,000 million program to guarantee the farmers a fair price as related to their costs of production. In this country the government has done nothing. It has its defence production program and other development programs but is quite satisfied to leave the farmer out of this prosperity in Canada.

Our farmers gave the war effort everything they had and yet today we find these same people in this price-cost squeeze. Many returned men came back and went on the land but today find themselves loaded with debt. Unless something is done to straighten out this cost-price squeeze they will find themselves in the position in which their fathers were when they came back after the first world war. Those men went on the land under soldier settlement schemes and many of them lost their farms.

There is a definite need for the Minister of Agriculture to meet with his colleagues. I think this matter is just as important as the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines or any other issue that may face this government. I suggest to the government that now that this grain has been produced the farmers should not be forced to sell it at a price which does not bear a fair relationship to their costs of production. Their farm machinery costs and other costs are increasing and they face the possibility of being saddled with debt.

It is not satisfactory just to pass legislation to give the farmer the right to go to the bank to borrow money on a long-term amortization arrangement. What we want in this country is a more prosperous farm economy. In this house we talk mostly about monetary policies, but there is this other important and nonetheless tangible aspect of our economy. We must give a fair deal to the people on the soil. The strength of this nation has been in the people on the land and today those people are worried. They are filled with apathy. The young people are leaving the farms to go into industry where they can obtain more lucrative employment.

I do not want to delay this item but I do want to impress upon the Minister of Agriculture that he has a real job on his hands to convince this government that they should act. All we have to do is to look at some of the corporation profits that have been made and the buoyant economy which has been indicated by the Minister of Finance. An article in the Toronto Star of April 19 indicates that profits in 1955 hit $1,656 million, up 35 per cent. But the farmers of this country, the people who are the backbone of this country, find their standard of living is going down. So I do hope that we will have a real answer by the government to this problem which is facing the farmer.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two remarks in connection with the points just raised and which I think should be answered. It is suggested that we should have a milk program in connection with the schools such as they have in the United States. Everyone in the committee knows that there are milk boards in every province and anything that is going to be done to put milk in schools must be done by the provinces.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Don't pass the buck again.

Mr. Gardiner: Those governments ought to do their job. If that should be done the government of Saskatchewan is not doing its job in connection with that matter. If you want milk in the schools they are the ones who should be carrying out that program. We made an investigation of this matter and we thought we might be able to assist in putting machines in the schools such as they have in the United States so the students would be able to get milk instead of other drinks that might be served in the schools. That idea has been supported right along but as yet no province has taken it up.

Our schools in this country are run by the provinces; our milk boards are run by the provinces, and the distribution of milk is within provincial jurisdiction. If that kind of thing is to be done, that is where it should be considered. This government would be prepared to co-operate in any plan of that kind.

It has been suggested that this government ought to do some of the other things that are being done in the United States. There is a 58 cent floor under butter in this country and there is no such thing in the United States. The price of butter in this country has been higher for some time than in the United States. When hon. members compare the situation in this country with conditions elsewhere they ought to recite the good points as well as the bad, if there are some bad points related to a particular matter. The 58-cent floor for butter has established a very good control over the price levels for other dairy products across Canada.

I have scores of letters in my office—and other members of this house have them as well—from farm organizations right across the country, indicating that that is the case. We extended the 58-cent price for two years just recently. Comments came in from all across the country indicating that that was the best thing to do for the dairy industry in general and that it was very helpful.

On the other hand, we have a floor price on eggs. We have the 38-cent price which is paid when eggs are in storage, in December of the year. There is not a provincial government, I am not speaking of Saskatchewan alone, but there is not a provincial government which has taken that as an opportunity to establish prices within the province. It can be done. We guarantee them as to their position. They cannot lose, at a rate which is based on 38 cents for stored eggs in December. They can establish a price based on that, but we cannot establish that price. We have not the authority under our constitution to do it, but any province can do it if it is not working to their satisfaction. If some people are getting less than they should for eggs, they can control that.

I only wish to point out that in a country like this that is working under a federated form of government, where there are ten provinces where their authority is somewhat different from that of the states in the United States, this government must depend on the wishes of the people who are operating in the provinces as to what we should promote and what we should not promote in the way of production. If we went to British Columbia and said, "Produce twice as many apples as you are producing now," they would tell us, "You had better go and market them," because they have difficulty in marketing what they are producing now. If we said to Ontario, "You should produce twice as many eggs as you produce now," they would say to us, "You had better find some place to market them." The authority for agriculture is divided as between the provincial and the federal governments, and we leave it largely to the provinces to say what they think ought to be produced within the province, and to set up systems under which that production can either be held at some normal rate or be increased or even reduced a little, depending on what they desire to have done. Our administration not only attempts but succeeds in doing what is best and has been succeeding in doing it over a long period.

Mr. Charlton: I have just one short question. The minister made reference to a policy regarding the supply of whole milk to school children across Canada. I wonder if he would tell the committee what that policy is and whether the provinces have been made aware of this policy.

Mr. Gardiner: We have indicated to provincial officials and ministers who come here from time to time to the conference and advisory committee that has been spoken of here, and others, the investigations we have made in the state of New York and elsewhere as to how the program is carried out. We have suggested we are prepared to consider with any of them any system that they desire to put in and to consider even the possibility of giving some assistance in connection with the obtaining of the kind of machines used there in general practice, where something is put in a slot and a bottle of milk is obtained.

Mr. Charlton: Then the truth is that no definite policy has been arrived at? It has just been considered with the provinces. No actual policy has been handed to the provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: A better way to state it is that no province has devised a policy to make use of it.

Mr. Charlton: The federal government has never offered them a policy.

Mr. Gardiner: We cannot distribute milk in the provinces. As a matter of fact, they will not let us have anything to do with the administration of milk boards. That is their responsibility, and they take it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): May I ask the minister whether there is any definite commitment as to the financial obligation that the federal government would be prepared to undertake in respect to the plan he has indicated?

Mr. Charlton: No.

Mr. Gardiner: If any province will make a proposition to us that they want it done, we shall submit to them at once what we are prepared to do.

Mr. Rowe: I do not wish to delay the house at any length. I do feel that it is interesting to listen to the discussions and observe the more or less nonchalant complacency of the government and its supporters with reference to agriculture generally. However, I am glad to learn today that the dairy men have learned that there is a new slot-machine policy being established in their interests. It may be of some real help. The minister has not said whether he will supply the slot machines or the milk, but it is something at least for them to hope for in future.

No doubt there have been great changes in agriculture generally, and its importance and place in our Canadian economy. I make no apologies for mentioning its place here, on the first item, because that is about the only item on which we might be able to make observations as to the position the farmers are in throughout the dominion. That is why those, especially, who do not belong to the government have felt probably they should make vigorous statements at such times and have tried to place before parliament the position of their farmers in their respective districts.

I believe, independent of party, every hon. member in this house realizes the very important place of Canadian agriculture in the life of this dominion. It is true that that place is not as prominent on a percentage basis in our national production as it was a few years ago. In fact, it has changed very greatly. The figures have been placed on Hansard very often to show that the percentage of our whole industrial development has increased in other lines, while today agriculture has only about half the importance on the basis of percentage of gross national production. Indeed, those employed and obtaining subsistence from the agricultural industry are greatly reduced in numbers in view of machinery and other developments. That tends to make some people doubt the importance of agriculture.

Some hon. member this afternoon has used the term that many of us have used at times, that agriculture is the backbone of Canadian prosperity. We have used that term in the past and some of us now doubt whether it is so much the backbone. In fact, at times one would think the back was almost broken by the change in this part of our whole prosperity. The industrial development of our country and the numbers of people employed in our industrial and commercial enterprises in Canada are now increasing much more rapidly than agriculture. In fact those in agriculture, as I have said, are reduced in numbers. But I believe the government, as well as some people such as I have mentioned, seems to have more or less let the chances of agriculture grow more and more haphazard. Policies have been tried of handouts here and handouts there, subsidies and fixed prices, and it is struggling for a solution, but more or less with the attitude that we shall get along all right whether agriculture is prosperous or not.

Now we are beginning to see the effects. We see now that there are already many people unemployed in Canada today and many are looking for other jobs, whether you would call them fully unemployed now or not, because of the reduced purchasing power of the Canadian farmer. In the small towns and villages across this country, farm tractor sales have been reduced very much this spring. I believe hon. members will find in their respective districts that farm tractor salesmen will tell them that they are not selling any farm tractors where they sold ten last year. In fact, in some districts it is even worse than that proportionately, even to the extent that in some districts the price of the heavy draught horse has increased because the farmers feel they cannot afford to repair their tractors or buy new tractors. That has happened in several districts.

I do claim that we seem to overlook the importance of sound national policies with respect to agriculture. Just as agriculture affects our whole national economy, so did the fiscal and national policies of the government in power affect agriculture. The greatest hope for Canadian agriculture, and it is often overlooked, is the development of our home markets here in Canada. There is no market in the world that offers more hope for Canadian farmers than our own home market, the home market of your own district, Mr. Chairman, around Orillia, the home markets of our own home counties, the home markets around Kitchener, Waterloo, London, Quebec city, Three Rivers, Brandon, Lethbridge, Vancouver and all the other places.

These home markets are our best markets and have always been our best markets. The minister said this afternoon that he is not going to go out and encourage the production of this or the production of that just because we have too much of something and cannot sell it. I remember when he told people around London a few years ago to get more sows and produce more pigs. They produced more pigs and inside of two years they did not know what to do with the little pigs. He has learned his lesson. No man can be in politics as long as he and I have been without learning something, even though in both cases it might be limited.

I quite agree with that, but I say the government have never had a sound fiscal policy. They have ridden the gravy train for so long that they feel they do not need a policy. They rode into power years ago in the same way, and went out of power after they had lost the world markets. The Minister of Agriculture and his friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce have been in politics a long time, but if they are no longer employed in politics after the next election they had better not hang out their shingles as butter and egg salesmen.

The Minister of Agriculture will say that he has guaranteed a price and that there is not too much butter, but never have we had so much butter in store as we have at the present time. We have more wheat than we have had on any other occasion except one, and our surpluses of these products are increasing. We have more or less lost the world markets for these products.

I have listened in the house for many years to chidings, jibes and rumblings from the Liberal party about fiscal policy. They tell us that we must sell if we are going to buy. Well, I have watched the very same party over a quarter of a century selling more and more to the United States of America, where they have ever-increasing surpluses of the very same products to sell.

I have watched the government encouraging that policy. I have watched it all during these years and have read about it in earlier years. We have bought less and less percentagewise from the greatest market for farm products in the world, the British market, and today we have a favourable trade balance with the old land, the British Isles. Last year we had a favourable trade balance. Ever since 1900 we have had a favourable trade balance; down through the years we have accumulated several billions of dollars of favourable trade balances. Yet we are told that the reason we should buy manufactured products from other countries is so we can sell our agricultural products.

From the great republic to the south we are buying the finished products made by their workers who are eating beef produced in the United States and butter and eggs produced in the United States, and who are selling us their finished products to the extent of many billions of dollars. I do not like to repeat figures too often, but this situation has been emphasized in the last few days. Every hon. member is aware of it and I know that the Minister of Agriculture, even though he has more to do than just deal with agriculture, and the other members of the government are properly disturbed at the present time because every day we are buying from the United States almost $3 million more than we are selling to them. Eighty-five per cent of their products are fully manufactured, and their production helps to establish home markets in the United States for the farmers of that country.

I have listened for years and years to people talking about how we are going to solve the problem. I have listened to people say that we must buy where we can buy the cheapest and we must buy if we are going to sell. But, Mr. Chairman, it is very hard to reconcile that as sound fiscal logic if we are going to buy $3 million a day more than we are selling, from the country that has the largest surpluses of what you are trying to sell of any country in the world.

These are the things that are hitting right at the heart of our Canadian agricultural prosperity. Our home markets will take our potatoes and our fish from the east. I do not know whether you can call fish an agricultural product altogether, but it does provide work and food for Canadians. Our people will take our dairy products, our poultry and egg products. They will take our beef and pork products and some of that huge surplus of butter the Minister of Agriculture is piling higher and higher. But the government is not giving leadership by way of a sound fiscal policy.

Surely when we are trying to get rid of wheat it is not the time to import United States turkeys into Canada. Three times as many turkeys are coming in now as came in three years ago. Enough turkeys were imported into Canada last year to put almost every turkey man in Canada in the mood to retire from the industry entirely. I have many in my own riding who have written me letters saying they wondered whether the government was going to allow the same thing next year, and if it was they did not think they would continue in the turkey business. You are trying to sell wheat, yet you are importing a million bushels of wheat in the form of turkeys. If all the turkeys consumed in Canada were produced in Canada they would consume at least a million bushels of wheat. Of course, what is a million bushels of wheat to this government? They cannot see the problem because they cannot even see over the piles of wheat.

Why do the government hesitate to do what they have been asked to do by those who understand the industry? Why do you hesitate to put on a tariff of 5 or 10 cents a pound against turkeys coming into this country when the United States, the country that is sending turkeys into Canada as a surplus product produced in a warmer and better climate where it is easier to produce them, put a tariff of 10 cents against the importation of our turkeys? There would be no reflection on you if you recanted. Why do you not drop these old dusty shackles of free trade and do that for these turkey producers even if you will not do it for anybody else?

Why do we need to import cheese from warmer climates where cheese can be produced so much cheaper? I do not know how much is going to come in this year. Three million pounds are sneaked in at one time and five million pounds another time. If you ask about it you are apt to be told it is not in the public interest to give any information, at least until the cheese is eaten. It is like other things. You cannot get any information from the government. Perhaps we would get through the estimates more quickly if we knew something about what is going on. In all my experience in parliament I have never known a government to sit so quietly and say nothing on everything. However, it is no wonder because the members of the government are always applauded when they refuse to answer.

We have canned meat coming into Canada from countries that can produce meat cheaper than we can. We are even having canned rabbit coming into the country to take the place of beef, the production of which is increasing in Canada.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, it goes far deeper than what you are going to do with a slot-machine policy to try to increase the sale of milk. It goes far deeper than what you are going to do with a wheat policy that has already lost this country hundreds of millions of dollars. It goes far deeper than that. As has been put on Hansard this afternoon, the farmers of almost every country in the world are receiving higher prices for their wheat than is the Canadian farmer. We are told there are millions of people in the world who are starving, yet we have millions of bushels and pounds of surplus foodstuffs in Canada.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to hold up this item except to urge the government to look a little further through this haze or maze or cloak of complacency which seems to envelop them, because if they do not that cloak will become their shroud before they are through. Right now we are on the verge of changed conditions in Canada unless we are more careful and give more attention to a sound policy for agriculture. We cannot continue with ever-increasing adverse balances of trade such as we have mounting up at the present time. There is continual harping about the farmers' income dropping 17 per cent in one year, 12 per cent in another year, and so on. Indeed, the farmers' income is down more than the income of any other major branch of Canadian life.

The agricultural industry is not sharing in the increased prices, increased wages and increased general prosperity of the last few years. The fact is that the automobile dealers are beginning to worry; the farm implement dealers are already worried; the farmer himself is worried; the farmer's wife is worried, and the girls and boys going to university are worried because the farmer has these heavy overhead charges and the balance between the cost of production and his sale price is small. He is caught in a squeeze play that is very critical indeed.

I believe that the future of Canadian agriculture, and the future of other industries in Canada, is generally bright, Mr. Chairman, if we have sound fiscal policy. I warn the government that unless it has a change of attitude, agriculture may face very critical days. You know very well, Mr. Chairman, that if agriculture faces difficult days and this situation grows worse, then the merchant, the manufacturer, the dealer, the labouring man, will feel it just as they have felt it every time agriculture has gone into a recession if not a depression.

I would urge the government to take another look at this adverse balance of trade. In fact they should look at it every night before they go to bed, because it is increasing every day. I say again they should not be ashamed to adopt some of these dusty old theories they had in the past, even if it does mean putting on a protective tariff. We have heard a lot about the tariff on turkeys coming into Canada, on potatoes, on fruits and vegetables. We have heavy investments in all those industries in Canada now. There are people throughout this country today who for 15 years have made the production of turkeys the branch of agriculture upon which they are solely dependent. We have others, many in my own district, who are dependent on fruits and vegetables for their revenue. We have others in the meat business.

The Minister of Agriculture well knows, and I know every hon. member even from the western provinces realizes now as they are diversifying their industry, that mixed farming does help. If we can feed more of our grain to livestock, diversify our whole production and increase our population, thus increasing our home markets, then with sound fiscal policies we will have the best market for agricultural products.

This market has always been the best. The British market has always been the second best. The United States market has always been the most doubtful, the most dangerous and the most unpredictable. The only one in which we are following a practice of buying in order to sell is the United States market, and we are buying more than we are selling. The second best market has been lost, just as it was lost by the same party from 1921 to 1930. The one that is best of all is the one that is least thought of, and the least assisted, because of lack of fiscal policy and unsound general policy dealing with our whole trade situation.

Mr. Jones: Before the resolution carries there are just one or two remarks I should like to make. First of all, the last speaker suggested the farmers could get out of their difficulty with diversified farming. In general that could be true, but so far as the farmers of my constituency are concerned it could not be done because their farming is of a variety that cannot be alternated year after year. Once these trees are planted they are there for 10, 20 or 30 years. The diversification of crops is, therefore, very difficult if not impossible.

The problem of marketing is more intense, in my opinion for the farmers of my constituency than the diversification of their products. I am not going to repeat all that has already been said because the minister has attended conventions, he has received representations and he is fully conversant with the problems affecting the fruit and vegetable growers. I would ask him to pay special attention to the unfair competition these people have suffered for several years. The facts are known to the department. Fruit and vegetable products from the United States are dumped, particularly in the west, at absurd prices just before our own fruits and vegetables are ready for market. This paralyses the market in many cases. Last year potatoes had to be left in the ground because it did not pay to dig them up.

The loss of the United Kingdom market was a severe blow to us. I hope the government will go out of its way this coming year to try to increase the shipments of our fruit to England, particularly apples. I say this because through government assistance we have more and more fruit lands coming into production. These lands were purchased by veterans under the D.V.A. and developed with government assistance. The government therefore has a responsibility to see that the products produced on these government-sponsored lands find a ready market.

My real reason for rising was to express my appreciation of the work done by the experimental farm at Summerland. I spent some time there last summer going through all the various departments and watching them at work, carrying out their operations and trying to solve problems that affect the fruit growers and canners of the valley. I can say this, that I have never come across a staff working so sincerely and earnestly as the staff at that experimental station. I did feel that they were sorely cramped for space. The buildings are old and in many cases obsolete. I understand the government is contemplating erecting new buildings to house at least some of the laboratories and so on. I hope the minister will tell us later on what is actually being done and when it will be done.

I can assure him that the fruit growers and apple producers of the Okanagan valley are pleased with the work done under cramped conditions at the experimental farm at Summerland. But the loss of the British market created a serious problem in connection with our small apples. The British market prefers small apples to any others. Therefore this year we are forced to destroy or get rid of all our Cee grade apples, the 180's in all varieties except Winesaps and Newtowns. From now on these apples are to be classified as culls. They are the type of apple they like in Britain because of their small size. In many instances the trees were pruned and planted to grow that type of apple for the old country market. Now these are to be added to the normal culls this coming year, which are culled because of their lack of colour or other blemishes, size development and so on. These small good apples are cull apples now. That is one of the problems with which we have to deal in the Okanagan valley.

There is a limited market for our apple juice, and we have an excellent product which has found a market practically all over North America. The limited outlet for this apple juice does not take care of all the new culls plus the normal culls that will come into the packing houses because of the new ruling. We have also processed some of these apples for pie filler and that kind of thing. It has been done with the help and assistance of the experimental farm, but these outlets do not take care of all our cull apples, and certainly will not this year.

At the convention held in January the British Columbia fruit growers' association passed this resolution:

> Be it resolved by this 1956 British Columbia fruit growers' association convention that this association conduct a comprehensive program of research into the possibilities of utilizing apples, particularly into the prospects of developing the making of cider into a subsidiary industry in the Okanagan.

This resolution was carried unanimously. Naturally the farmers are looking to the experimental farm to carry out the necessary experiments to produce a good cider. I have been given to understand that to have a marketable cider it should contain about the same alcoholic content as beer, namely roughly 8 per cent proof and 4 per cent by weight. Then to make it really marketable it has to be clarified and carbonated, and that is where our problem starts.

I am going to suggest to the minister that this is a place where he could combine with the Minister of National Revenue and possibly give some assistance to the farmers. Some 25 or 30 years ago his predecessor in the same office authorized experiments to be carried on at the same experimental station in the making of liqueurs. They produced some excellent brandy and other liqueurs from peaches and apricots. They had a fine still and were doing a remarkable job of research, and everything was ready to be transferred to commercial use when lo and behold the revenue department came in and smashed the still and all the samples. I hope the minister will not have the same trouble with the present Minister of National Revenue that his predecessor had.

Cider clarified and carbonated calls for an excise tax of $2.50 a gallon. This tax would kill the sale of apple cider, especially in competition with imported wines and so on. To satisfy the revenue department it has to be classified as champagne, of all things; no other wine, just champagne, and that is why it bears that tax per gallon. Without being carbonated it is a dull cider containing only 7 per cent alcohol, less than beer, but it would have to pay an excise tax of 50 cents a gallon. I realize that with this alcoholic content it would have to be sold in liquor stores and beer parlours, which would lower its sale considerably; but at the same time I believe it would afford a wholesome drink in competition with some of the beer that is now being sold.

I have been asked by some of the growers in my riding to make inquiries to see whether the revenue department and the agriculture department could not get together and allow a low grade alcoholic cider to be sold in grocery stores. I do not know whether it is feasible; I am just passing on the suggestion made to me. I have been given to understand that in California, New York and some other states a low alcoholic content cider and other fruit juices are being sold through ordinary grocery and similar channels. The growers who have written to me suggest that something of that kind should be possible in Canada. It would be merely a soft drink made out of apples but presumably it has to contain a small amount of alcohol to keep it from deteriorating, not exceeding 2 to 2½ per cent.

I also pass on another suggestion. Commercial alcohol can be made from waste fruit. We have waste fruit that is not even worth putting into cider but it could be made into commercial alcohol, of which a considerable quantity is used in Canada. I have made inquiries to find out where the present alcohol comes from and in what quantities. I find that seven or eight different types of alcohol are brought into Canada each year. Two of the main types can be and are sometimes made from fruit waste. These two types combined amounted to 1,816,949 gallons which we brought into Canada last year, mainly from Germany.

That alcohol could be manufactured from waste fruit products right here in our own country. At Hood River in Oregon there is such a plant that has been operating profitably for many years making commercial alcohol out of waste fruit. When I made further inquiries as to the possibility of establishing such a plant in the Okanagan valley I found that the first thing you do is to send a bond to the national revenue excise branch for $100,000.

An hon. Member: Is that all?

Mr. Jones: Yes; followed by a licence fee of $250 plus a special type of building erected to their specifications. Then you require a provincial licence as well, so the capital outlay makes it practically impossible to entertain the idea of manufacturing straight commercial alcohol.

Owing to the fact that Canada is dependent on imports of nearly 2 million gallons annually, I would suggest that the department consider carrying on experiments at the experimental farm to find out whether alcohol cannot be produced cheaply by some other means than the expensive way the revenue department demands at the present time.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, about a month ago when these estimates first came before the house, I spoke for about four minutes. I waited until the last moment to see whether somebody else would say what I wanted to say and I would not bother rising at all, but there are a few points that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I should like to tell the minister that I have always held the very highest regard for him because he comes from the county of Huron. He was raised there, and it was too bad that he moved away. I am sorry he went to Saskatchewan, because if there is one thing more than another we do not need it is a Minister of Agriculture from Saskatchewan.

Just to show how discouraged people in other walks of life are with respect to farm prices, may I say that the Ontario provincial chamber of commerce at its annual meeting approved a revised policy for agriculture, stating that international trade has placed many Ontario farmers in a hopeless competitive position. It went on further to state that official announcements on agricultural earnings should be made on a basis of net rather than gross income to avoid erroneous impressions of farm prosperity. The chamber of commerce was disturbed because of the decreased purchasing power of 600,000 farmers across Canada and the decided effect it would have on the economy of the country as a whole.

I think people in all walks of life will agree that as long as agriculture is prospering the rest of the country will share in that prosperity, because agriculturists are the best spenders we have. The labour movement is also becoming alarmed at the decline in farm income. They know perfectly well that if their wage rates are to be maintained at the present high levels the farmers must have an increase in income or everyone will suffer. They tell me, as proof that this is true, that Massey-Harris has let out 200 men in Woodstock and Brampton and another 800 in Toronto. That is a total of 1,000 men. If that industry is letting out men surely other industries will begin letting them out before too long, because Massey-Harris is only one of many important industries.

Up to now the general public has not felt the pinch. The farmers are the only group who have not enjoyed the economic boom in this country. I realize that before the minister gets through he will endeavour to tell us how well off they are. He has been telling the farmers that for two or three years, but the fact remains that agricultural income has dropped continuously over the last three years despite what figures the minister may put on the record. It is not good for the farmer or for anyone else, because so many people depend on the farmer. I should like to read an item which appears in an article printed by Free-Market Farming, written by W. M. Curtiss:

> The political approach to the solution of farm problems is a proven failure. The way to improve farm income and farm prices is to reduce, not increase, government interference in the pricing and production of farm commodities.
> For nearly 30 years, we have tried political schemes of all sorts to solve the farm problem. It is time to try a plan that we know will work—one that has been time tested over nearly a century and a half—a free market for agricultural products.

I know you cannot boost up agriculture with subsidies and then declare it a free market, but the fact remains that as soon as any political group starts interfering with trade they get into trouble. Take the cheese industry for instance. The government tried to market surplus cheese and what happened? The government was not able to do anything. The cheese producer went to work and sold his own products. I do not have the press clipping here, but I read that recently the minister advised the cheese producer to cultivate the home market and not bother with England because it would lower the price of cheese. I thought that was poor advice coming from the minister, because when the government had a chance to sell surplus cheese for Canada the price kept going down until the government could do nothing with it. The cheese producer took over and did a splendid job.

As soon as the cheese producer took over the government brought in six million pounds of cheese by way of imports. I do not know for what reason the government did this, unless it was an attempt to discourage the cheese producer altogether. My advice is to leave the cheese producer and the farmer alone and not interfere in any shape, manner or form. They would do better themselves and through the years they have done just that. The principle of supply and demand will look after farm conditions better than any measure of which I have knowledge.

Let us take the sugar beet industry, for instance. We have two sugar beet factories in Ontario, one in Wallaceburg and one in Chatham. Unless the producers get a certain acreage of sugar beets the factories are threatening to close down. The minister knows as well as I that you cannot grow sugar beets without help. The only chance you have of growing them successfully is to have sufficient help to look after the crop. It is not a case of price at all, and that is not the reason for the decreased acreage. They do not have sufficient labour to look after the crop, and unless a change is made the sugar beet factories will have to close down because they cannot carry on. I think it is a pity that this part of our agricultural set-up should cease to exist.

We have a number of Dutch people coming into this country, entire families of them. In many cases they pool their resources and go into the business of growing sugar beets or some other product. Because the whole family is engaged in the business they can take care of the crops, but ordinary farmers have to depend on hired labour. Hired labour is now so expensive that farmers cannot compete, and the result is that they must get out of the sugar beet business.

Many immigrants come to Canada each year, but they do not stay on the farms for long periods of time. Immigrants came here who were supposed to stay on the farm for at least one year. I tried to tell the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a few years ago that this part of the law should be changed. Immigrants should be required to stay on the farm for a period ranging from three to five years. We were getting many immigrants who were not farmers at all. They came to Canada because they thought they could put up with farm life for one year in order to earn their freedom. If they had been required to stay on a farm for three or five years they would not have come to Canada at all, and we would not get that type of immigrant. If a clause were put in the Immigration Act even now which required an immigrant to stay on the farm for at least three years these people would know before they came here that they were expected to follow the occupation of farming for at least that period of time.

One really cannot expect a man to stay on a farm and work ten or twelve hours a day when he can receive twice as much money in industry for an eight-hour day. That is what happens; the immigrants stay for a month or two and then go off into industry in order to benefit from the high wages.

We have heard quite a lot about turkeys today, and I do not intend to repeat what has been said. I wish to state that I agree with the hon. member for Elgin, who placed some figures on Hansard. I do not intend to repeat the figures he quoted, but I have one or two points to make.

Why should our turkey producers be subjected to a difference in tariff as between Canada and the United States, and why should the government permit United States turkeys to come to Canada at a lower tariff. I cannot understand why the government would stand by and allow this sort of thing to happen. I hope there will be some correction in that regard. When it is taken up with the cabinet I hope the minister will consider giving the turkey men an even break. They do not want any special consideration; they simply want an even break.

We had a resolution concerning the farm loan act before the house a while ago. I do not intend to speak about that act other than to state a few facts in regard to what it has had to do with agriculture. Our difficulty in the past has been that the farmers were not able to get any money because they had to have such gilt-edged security. The clause which has been put in is simply window dressing, to give the farmers the idea that they are going to receive special consideration.

Those who are administering the act should be permitted to be more flexible and generous with those to whom they are lending money. There is no use putting extra clauses in the act. There have been no losses for years under this act. The government could not lose money, because farm values have more than doubled. I hope the administrators of the act will take that fact into consideration when they are lending money to farmers who are trying to get along. Some of these farmers are fairly hard up, but they are not so hard up that they would not be capable of paying back a loan. It is not in operations like these that money is lost; money is seldom lost when loaned on farm land. I hope there will be a little more flexibility in the administration of this act. I do not think I shall say anything more at this time, but I may have something to say on particular items.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, when I spoke earlier today I found I needed more time than I had, and I have not finished saying what I wanted to say to the committee. I was taking the position that it will be impossible to solve the problems of agriculture in Canada at the present time if we consider them from a short-range point of view without having some system of farm storage for grain and other commodities. The storage charges would be paid to the farmer and the storage facilities would be established on the farm. The farmer would take care of the grain or whatever other commodity is placed in farm storage.

In that way we would be able to take surpluses off the market and we would not have to worry about selling them abroad in competition with the highly subsidized United States exports. At the same time we would be building up a superb supply of different varieties of commodities which we in Canada can produce. These supplies would be of inestimable value in any kind of emergency arising from war or from disaster based upon natural occurrences.

I was naming various commodities which could be stored easily for years. I had dealt with sugar and had pointed out that in southern Alberta alone from High River to the border we could build sugar factories and raise and process sufficient sugar beets to provide two and a half times the amount of sugar consumed annually by all the people in Canada. There are three splendid sugar factories in my constituency, producing in the neighbourhood of 25 per cent of the total Canadian consumption. This sugar could be stored all over the Dominion of Canada so it would be available in case of disaster.

I really fail to see how it is that the Canadian people do not sense this danger and this possibility of overcoming the danger. We hear a great deal about civil defence. Surely the first thing we would need if we were in danger would be food supplies readily available all over the land. We would not want to have to ship wheat from Winnipeg to Edmonton in order that people in Edmonton who may be stricken would be able to live. I maintain that we would be treading upon absolutely sound ground if we had a nation-wide system of farm storage for various commodities which we can produce.

I should like to go on to name three or four other commodities which could be stored easily, and then go on to deal with other matters which may have some bearing upon this problem. In this wonderful age in which we live we have learned to dehydrate many of the things we use. The field is almost limitless. As everyone knows, we can dehydrate eggs. Milk has been dehydrated with great success, and milk powder can be stored in any dry place and will remain good for I do not know how long, but I imagine for some time. Nothing could be of greater value in time of disaster than plenty of milk powder. Meats can be dehydrated with great success and preserved for a long period of time. Practically every kind of vegetable can be dehydrated, and practically all fruits can be processed in this way with success. All these things could be stored at not too great an expense.

There is no reason why we could not store hay in drier areas like those to be found in certain parts of British Columbia. Great quantities of hay could be stored at not too great an expense. If disaster struck we would need hay for any of the animals that happened to survive. It would be of great value.

Those who are familiar with the beet sugar industry know that in the manufacture of sugar from beets there is a residue called beet pulp which is of great value as a stock food. This beet pulp can be dried and stored in ordinary sacks and shipped to far places to be preserved for an indefinite period of time. It is one of the most nutritious of stock foods. I see no reason why substantial quantities could not be stored in Canada. I would be surprised if similar products could not be made from other root crops. I think that is enough to say about the possibilities in respect of the storing of foods.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: I know there are always some who will say "Hear, hear" but they would be first to scream in case of disaster. Such people sometimes do not have the intelligence to look beyond the end of their nose.

Now the all-important thing which we are going to have to face is the method of financing. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe spoke about the home market, which he said was the most valuable market for our products. But the home market is no good unless the people in that home market have the dollars with which to buy the commodities that are being offered. Most hon. members, and even the fine hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe with all his experience in this parliament, fail to go beyond the point where they start talking about this matter of finance. That is leaving the job just where it should be begun. He tells us the things we already know and leaves us bewildered regarding all the rest.

This morning I commended the C.C.F. for the very fine showing they made in fighting for the farmer during this last winter, but, as I recall it, the C.C.F. said not a single word about what they proposed should be done.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Yes, we did.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall leave one of you to say something about it after I have finished. As far as I can recall there was constant complaint against the government for what it had not done. They constantly told how prices should be stabilized and all that kind of thing, once more what everybody in the house and everybody in the country knows.

What they did not say was how the money was going to be obtained to do all this. The only thing the C.C.F. has said, as far as I can recall, is that they can tax the people to get the money. They implied it, although they did not say it. The taxes would begin to fall heavily on the corporations that had been making big profits. I commend the hon. member for Mackenzie for his fine speech, but the only thing he implied was that the big corporations making big profits would be required to share their profits with the government, and from that source we would be able to obtain the funds with which to finance the schemes of the C.C.F.

Mr. Ellis: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Blackmore: That is very good. We are in committee, and hon. members can say all they like right after I have finished. I want to put my case, and I am sure they want to put their case, uninterrupted. If they let me put my case so it will be understood, I shall listen most attentively while they put theirs.

As far as the C.C.F. economic proposals are concerned, I oppose them on every point because I believe their whole concept of running a country is fallacious, and if they were able to put their program into operation they would not be able to get the production, much less the distribution.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): We are getting it in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Blackmore: Private enterprise is getting it in Saskatchewan. The farmers all over the country, every one of them, constitute private enterprise, and they are simply pouring the wealth out. The same applies to oil or gas developments. You have to have private enterprise come in and do it. If you do not do that you will not get the results. It has been demonstrated beyond a doubt in Alberta. We have invited private enterprise to come in. Then instead of treating it as an enemy whom we wanted to destroy and whom we hated because it made profits, we endeavoured to clear the way and help private enterprise. As a result we have reaped a rich harvest, and we have a grand prospect of further development just as long as we continue to do so.

In Alberta the private enterprise system is producing abundantly. As I have said many times in this house before, the private enterprise system in America has produced so much that we do not know what to do with it. Our problem now is to learn how to distribute the goods. Certainly in order to distribute the goods it would be most illogical for us to destroy the effectiveness of our productive system. That is exactly what we would do if we began to cultivate the C.C.F. ideas of state socialism, or whatever kind of socialism it is they favour.

So I say that although these people have fought vigorously for the farmer, they have never given us one inkling of what could be done to improve his lot even if they were in charge in Ottawa. The same is true of others. The Conservatives have put up an admirable case for the farmer; I have heard a dozen or more excellent speeches this year from the Conservative benches. But, once more, they have never shown us how the matters were to be remedied financially.

The Liberals this year for the first time have given voice to their ideas, and we have had some very good speeches from Liberals. I have no doubt that if the Liberals were on this side of the house and any one of the parties on this side were over there, the Liberals would be very vocal, energetic and insistent, and still never give any idea as to how to do what they proposed could be done. So I think it is important for us to spend a minute or two on the matter of where we are going to get the money.

This morning, as a result of the announcement that it was proposed that grains and other foods should be shipped to NATO and stored in NATO countries, I asked the question, "Where is anybody going to get the money to buy the goods from Canada and other nations and store them in NATO countries?" Is it proposed that a NATO cabinet should be set up and a NATO premier appointed, and that on top of all the murderous taxes we are enduring in all the countries contributing to NATO we shall have another tax imposed with the object of raising money to buy our goods to store them for NATO? I do not think so. I dealt with that matter this morning to some extent.

If we can manage somehow or other to get money that does not have to be borrowed and paid back, and does not have to be taxed from people, then we can conceive, if we have a sufficient amount of production, how we can do these fine things we want to do for agriculture; for example, store our grain and pay for it. I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that under the Finance Act of 1914, the Minister of Finance created in 1917, during the first world war, $50 million Canadian dollars. He did not borrow them from anybody; he created them; and with that money he bought $50 million worth of Canadian produce—wheat, horses and other things which Britain needed in the war. He sent those goods to Great Britain at no cost whatsoever to the Canadian people nor to the British people. Britain in due time repaid the loan, in much the same way as lend-lease operated during the last war, by 1927.

All those who are interested will find an account of this in the report of the royal commission on banking and currency for Canada published in 1933, on page 22, paragraph 47. And right good reading it makes. I would commend that reading to all the members of this house who so earnestly are seeking for a way in which to solve our agricultural problems.

If the minister could create money like that, there is no reason why he could not create money and put it into the hands of the consumers to enable them to buy, and so to realize the home market. There is moreover, no reason in the world why he should not create such money and pay part of the price of the goods, so the consumers could buy, say, a $10 article for $8. When one begins to talk along those lines, he is talking sense. He is talking about something that has been done and could be done, and something that is logical.

One may ask, "How much could he go on printing? $50 billion?" No, he could not, because the limit to the amount he could create is the amount of goods there are in the country to absorb it. The limit is the amount of goods and services there are in the country available for purchase.

That is simple enough for people to understand. There is I repeat no reason why he could not create that money and give a discount on the price of the goods so that, say, a $10 article could be bought for $8. By doing that kind of thing he could increase these home markets, he could utilize them and take advantage of them.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have listened to the hon. gentleman for perhaps longer than I should without interrupting. I will admit that he is endeavouring to connect his discussion of monetary policy to its effect on agriculture, but I think perhaps the hon. gentleman would be willing to give some weight to the authority I have in my hand, which is entitled, Blackmore's Speaker's Decisions. In it I find several quotations which I think are pertinent to the situation in which we find ourselves at the moment. At page 168 I find the following:

> An hon. member must limit himself to the question. . . . It is not in order to raise a discussion not relevant to the question before the house. . . . An hon. member must confine himself to that which is relevant to the question of debate.

The hon. member will doubtless say to me that matters of money are relevant to the success of agriculture. I would agree with him, but I must also say that matters of money are relevant to every other department of government, whether it be public works, transport, mines and technical surveys or anything else. But there is a responsibility on me somewhere to say that the subject the hon. member is discussing is primarily monetary policy and not primarily agriculture.

I think the hon. member for Lethbridge will agree with me that the time the discussion of monetary policy is pertinent is really only, if at all, on the estimates of the Department of Finance, so he will permit me to request him to come back to the real question before the committee, which is shall we or shall we not vote some $670,000 for the administration of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I do not know how I am going to thank you enough for letting people in this house know that there have been Blackmores who knew something. As to there being a responsibility incumbent upon you to call a halt at some point, I confess that readily, and I do not hesitate to tell you that I know of no chairman who has performed in this house who has been fairer and more considerate of everyone concerned than yourself.

In consideration of all these things I shall endeavour to end my remarks talking strictly on agriculture. May I say that all will agree that conditions in agriculture are very, very bad. I am sure too, that every hon. member of the house will agree that something has got to be done about it. Furthermore I am sure every hon. member in the house will agree that in a country as wealthy as Canada in all kinds of food, clothing, shelter, anything you want to name, it will be a disgrace to the country if we do not do something about it.

I raise the question once more to everyone in the house, what is that something and how is it to be financed? I think somewhere some wise man said in literature, "Who can advise may speak".

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Huron made a statement a few moments ago to the effect that we had had three ministers of agriculture from Saskatchewan in a row. I was not listening to him too carefully—

Mr. Cardiff: I did not say three.

Mr. Gardiner: —and I was not at all sure whether he said there were two from Huron, the last two—

Mr. Cardiff: No.

Mr. Gardiner: —but the last two were from Huron and the third one, of course, was from Lanark originally before he went to the west. One reason one might say that it would be quite natural for a number of them to have come from Huron back to Ottawa is the fact that when I went west first the common saying was, "In what part of Huron and Bruce is Ontario?" Most of the people out there seemed to come from one or the other. Therefore there is nothing unusual about that kind of thing happening.

The suggestion that has been made by quite a number that we should be doing something for agriculture is answered by the fact that in the last 20 years we have spent very considerably more on agriculture than was ever spent in any previous 20 years. As a matter of fact we are and have been for a considerable length of time spending ten times as much as was ever spent by any other government, either Liberal or Conservative.

Mr. Lennard: You have it to spend. That is the reason.

Mr. Gardiner: In view of the fact that we have been spending that much we are at least attempting to do something for agriculture.

Mr. Lennard: Whose money is it?

Mr. Gardiner: It is the money of the people, and some of it is farmers' money.

Mr. Lennard: You would think it was Liberal money.

Mr. Gardiner: No, it is not Liberal money. Neither is it Conservative money. When the Conservatives were in power they did not spend very much on agriculture.

An hon. Member: They did not spend very much on the people, either.

Mr. Gardiner: I have a graph here, and if I have the consent of the committee I should like to have it put on the record. I do not have time to read it. It gives a picture of conditions, and if everyone in the house could see it I would not suggest putting it on the record.

Mr. Rowe: They have all seen it.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, they have all seen it? If they have all seen it, their speeches do not correspond to the picture.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Lennard: You are getting three or four times as much money in taxes today as any government ever got before.

Mr. Gardiner: Down here in the low left corner of the chart is where the farm income was when the Conservatives were in power, and ever since the Liberals have been in power it has gone constantly right up and up to the top right hand corner of the chart.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Lennard: You have taxed the people to get the money to spend.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course we have taxed the people to get it.

Mr. Lennard: You are taking more in taxes than any government ever did before.

Mr. Gardiner: When my hon. friends were in power they had the people in such a condition that they could not get any taxes or anything else out of them. There just was no money left after paying their costs to take from them.

Mrs. Fairclough: After the Liberals.

Mr. Lennard: After the Liberals in 1929.

Mr. Gardiner: Agriculture in this country is not—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, it is five o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member for Bruce wanted to ask a question.

Mr. Gardiner: Everybody has been trying to get to five o'clock. We are there now and we will have the question some other day.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): There are a few divorce bills on the order paper for second reading. Is it agreed that the second readings be taken in one motion?

Mr. Philpott: May we have the exact numbers of the bills?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Orders Nos. 46 to 50, Bills Nos. 293 to 297 inclusive.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 293, for the relief of Edith May Robertson Thompson.—Mr. Henderson.

Bill No. 294, for the relief of Hans Christian Anderson.—Mr. Henderson.

Bill No. 295, for the relief of Raffaele Polissena.—Mr. Henderson.

Bill No. 296, for the relief of Hilda Evelyn Charlton Carlson.—Mr. Henderson.

Bill No. 297, for the relief of Dorothy Pilkington Wilson.—Mr. Henderson.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF ANNUAL HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 211, to provide for annual holidays with pay for employees.

He said: The idea or proposal contained in this bill is not a new one to be suggested on the floor of parliament. However, I think it may be breaking new ground in that, so far as I know, it is the first time an actual bill has been presented to parliament proposing, as this bill does, that by statute all workers in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction be given two weeks' holidays per year with pay after one year of employment with their employer.

Hon. members will realize that it is not many decades ago when holidays with pay, particularly for wage earners or industrial workers, were very unusual. I am sure many of us in this chamber have memories—if they are not memories of our own personal experience they are memories of those who have gone before us—of industrial workers or wage earners who never knew during their working lives what it was to have a vacation with pay. True, there were vacations which industrial workers in bygone decades had, but they were vacations due either to illness or to unemployment, and on such occasions there was no remuneration of any kind.

Mr. Speaker, one of the marks of progress of our society is that we have come to recognize, to some extent at least, that all who toil should be entitled to a period of vacation; and it is not a vacation worthy of the name unless one's pay or wage continues during that period. The right to vacations with pay is something for which the trade union movement has fought hard for a great many years. It has carried on that fight at the level of collective bargaining, and many collective agreements in force now between employees and their employers contains provisions for vacations with pay.

These provisions, of course, vary considerably. In some cases the employee gets a vacation with pay after not too long a period of service. In other cases the period of service has to be much longer. The length of the vacation with pay that is provided varies from agreement to agreement. But at any rate, it is fair to say that thanks to the efforts and the struggle of the trade union movement, many workers today do enjoy vacations with pay under their collective agreements.

However, with respect to this issue, as with respect to all issues affecting the position of wage earners and industrial workers generally, it has been the feeling and the experience of the trade union movement that a battle of this kind has to be fought on the legislative front as well as at the collective bargaining table. Organized labour, therefore, has sought legislation so that all employees might get at least a certain measure of this right, namely vacations with pay. As a result of these efforts in the legislative field progress has been made in a number of the provinces in this country.

At this point I might remind hon. members that when we are dealing with labour relations in Canada we are dealing with a matter that is under two jurisdictions. There are many employees, indeed most of the industrial workers of this country, who come under provincial jurisdiction. But there are also a large number of workers whose labour relations are under federal labour jurisdiction. Naturally the bill I propose, since it seeks the enactment by this parliament of a federal law, relates only to those who come under federal labour jurisdiction, but I think it is important both as a matter of history and as a basis for my argument that the house should know what progress has been made in the winning of this kind of legislation, and also that the house should know the number of provinces that provide for vacations with pay.

As I say, a number of them have such legislation. I mention first of all, six out of the 10 provinces. These six, if I may name them in geographical order, are Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. There is one other province that has some legislation in this field, and I shall mention it in a moment. The reason I shall mention it separately will be obvious.

First of all may I say with respect to those six provinces on the statute books of which there is legislation compelling employers to grant vacations with pay to their employees, in the case of two of them, namely British Columbia and Saskatchewan, the legislation requires that the vacations with pay be two weeks after one year of service. With respect to the other four provinces, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta, the requirement is just one week's vacation with pay after one year's service. I should add that in Alberta the law requires that employees be given two weeks vacation with pay after two years of service. I should also add that in Manitoba the legislation requires that the workers be given two weeks' vacation with pay after three years' service. There are other details that one could spell out, but I think that is sufficient to indicate that some progress is being made in this important and desirable field so far as the wage earners of this country are concerned.

I said that in addition to the six provinces I have named, all of which have vacations with pay legislation which is general in its application in that it applies to all employees in those provinces, it is also to be noted that a seventh province, namely New Brunswick, has a limited provision which gives one week's vacation with pay after one year's employment to those engaged in mining or in construction. It could be that in recent months some changes have been made in some of those provinces, or that other provinces have joined this group; but so far as I can ascertain my information is up to date. Indeed, those who come from British Columbia will recognize that I have included in my information the fact that although British Columbia until recently provided only one week's vacation with pay after one year's service, that province, along with Saskatchewan, now provides by statute two weeks' holidays with pay after one year's service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill obviously seeks to provide under federal law the best of the provisions that already obtain so far as a number of provinces are concerned. This bill, in other words, is somewhat like unto the legislation in the two provinces where they have the best legislation in this field, namely British Columbia and Saskatchewan. I say to any who may study the details of this bill that it is patterned, for the most part, after the legislation in Saskatchewan, although I did take one or two sections out of the new British Columbia bill which it seemed to me it was desirable to include in my proposed bill.

In drafting the bill I drew on the legislation in the two provinces to which I have referred for the general provisions as to vacations with pay. I also drew on certain federal statutes in order to put the bill in proper form. For example, with regard to what employees this legislation might cover, I copied exactly the appropriate section in the legislation known as the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. That is the section which indicates what employees would be covered, and again it reflects the provisions in this regard which are set out in the British North America Act.

That pretty well indicates what this bill proposes, Mr. Speaker. It proposes that all those employees, all workers, industrial workers, wage earners and others in Canada, who come under federal labour jurisdiction should now have at least two weeks' vacation with pay each year. It proposes that this should come into effect after one years' employment. There is a provision in the bill to make it clear that this bill supersedes any custom or collective agreement or arrangement that gives to any employees anything less than two weeks' vacation with pay after one year. It also makes it clear that it does not interfere with any custom or collective agreement or other arrangement which gives to any employees anything better than is in this bill.

There is also a provision for prorating the period of vacation with pay that might be given to an employee if he is with an employer for more than one month but for any period less than one year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, other than referring to those details, I do not think I should say too much about the further details of the bill, for two reasons. One, of course, is a very good one in your eyes, namely that on second reading one is not supposed to refer to the sections of a bill. The other is equally good, namely that—I think incidentally this perhaps underlines the reason for that rule—what we are concerned about on second reading is the principle. I invite hon. members to give their attention not so much to the particular details as to how one goes about administering or working out vacations with pay, but rather to the principle that all employees in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction should have this right as part of what goes with living in Canada at the present time.

I would point out, sir, since you might be interested in the point, that in my bill I have stayed away from provisions that obtain in some of the provinces such as Manitoba, which involve the government in the selling of stamps, or in any other administrative features that could involve expense. Obviously there is a good reason why I stayed away from those provisions, in order that it would be the kind of bill that a private member might introduce; but even apart from that, I think it is better to have it this way. If the Minister of Labour and his department have studied the bill, as I am sure they have, I hope they may agree with me that it would be better to have it on as simple a basis as possible.

There are in the bill certain provisions for enforcement which involve the minister; but, as I say, the details could be left for further study. My hope is that in this year of 1956 it will not be too hard to persuade the House of Commons of Canada that the workers of Canada should have two weeks' vacation with pay a year, and that the House of Commons of Canada will therefore approve second reading of this bill; whereupon I, of course, would move not that it go to the committee of the whole right away but rather that it go to the standing committee on industrial relations so that it might be studied very thoroughly in that committee. In the course of that study I would be most happy to accept suggestions from the Minister of Labour, or from anyone else, as to changes in the details. In fact the administrative set-up could be altered considerably and I would not be concerned. My concern, and I think that is obvious, is with the general principle that we should now make it statutory that all employees of Canada under federal labour jurisdiction should have two weeks' vacation with pay.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, in spite of my insistence that what we are dealing with now is the principle, I felt it was incumbent upon me in presenting the bill to the house not to leave the administrative aspect of it in blank form, but rather to show, as I have done in the sections that are in the bill, that such a provision can be worked out and put in practicable form.

As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, organized labour has for years fought hard for this provision. It has carried on that fight at the level of collective bargaining; it has also insisted that gains won at the collective bargaining table should be written into the various statutes of the country. In addition to the fact that the demand for legislation providing for two weeks' vacation with pay after one year was in the platforms of principles of both the former labour congresses of this country, I would point out that it was included in the major 29-point platform of principles which was adopted at the recent founding convention of the Canadian Labour Congress which was held in Toronto during the last week in April. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, what I present to the house at this time is directly in line with the request with this new million-member labour congress, namely national legislation providing for a minimum of two weeks' vacation with pay.

I feel, too Mr. Speaker, that in this matter, as in other matters, the federal parliament of Canada should be giving a lead to the country.

I confess that it is a bit disappointing and a bit frustrating to have to make that plea and feel that so often as far as hon. members opposite are concerned, at least those on the treasury benches, it falls on deaf ears; yet how often we have to do that, particularly in the labour field and in the field of social security, pensions, provision for superannuated civil servants and so on. Every time we argue that the federal government should be a good employer and should be giving a lead, those on the treasury benches sit back as though it was simply their job to follow, as though it were perfectly all right for them to come along with legislation of this kind only when everyone else has it.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that already some vacations with pay legislation is on the statute books of six—yes, seven—of the provinces of this country. I use the figure seven, including New Brunswick. All these seven provinces have vacations with pay legislation to the extent I outlined a moment ago. I recognize that in the case of only two provinces, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, is that legislation like unto my bill, namely two weeks' after one year. But something is being done in seven out of our ten provinces. I hope we can persuade this House of Commons and the federal government that it is time a lead in this matter was given here.

I know that one of the arguments which will be used—oh, how often we hear it in relation to labour matters—is to leave it to collective bargaining. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is an argument I could go into at length, but I content myself with saying that if the trade union movement thought there was any merit to that argument they would not be bothering with these constant resolutions and platforms of principles calling on legislatures and the parliament of Canada to deal with these matters.

Indeed, if one takes the trouble to look through the 29 points that are in the platform of principles adopted by the Canadian Labour Congress one will find that most of them call for legislation by the federal parliament. One will also find that a great many of these points have been proposed from this corner of the house, in speeches or resolutions or bills such as the one I am presenting at this time.

I earnestly hope that if what I said at the beginning is true, that this is breaking new ground in that it might well be the first time a bill on this subject has been introduced, it will not mean it will have to be shelved for a year or two or five or ten or twenty, as things go around here. Progress has been made in the thinking of people across the years. Progress has been made from the days when an industrial worker worked the whole of his life without ever enjoying a holiday with pay, without ever getting a holiday unless it was due to illness or unemployment. We are proud of the progress that has been made socially in Canada. We are proud of the progress that has been achieved because labour fought persistently for a better deal for the workers of Canada, both organized and unorganized. Indeed, that is one of the reasons that labour advocates legislation in this field; so that the provisions that are won for some by collective bargaining might be won for others, even those outside the ranks of organized labour.

It is an extremely important matter, Mr. Speaker. It is an extremely important item of social progress. No one, not a single hon. member of this house, would stand up and say that industrial employees should not have a vacation with pay every year. Everyone will agree that every employee should have a vacation with pay each year. All right, Mr. Speaker; that being the case, let us say so by supporting the principle of this bill, by voting for it unanimously on second reading and letting it go to the committee on industrial relations for study, whence it can come back to this house to be passed.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at the outset without any equivocation that it is my intention to support this bill. In the remarks which were made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on second reading, he made one rather gross oversight, in my estimation, and I am sure he realizes I could not let this pass without commenting upon it; the oversight being a lack of recognition of the fact that the first vacations with pay legislation not only in Canada but on the North American continent was brought in by Hon. George Drew as premier of Ontario in 1944.

Mr. Macdonnell: You should not have overlooked that.

Mr. Knowles: I certainly did mention that Ontario had legislation in this field.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, but just in passing. That legislation not only included a provision for vacations with pay but also a provision with regard to hours of work. It is interesting to note the speed with which we have progressed within the last decade, because at that time the reduction of working hours to 48 per week was considered to be a tremendous step forward and was greeted in many quarters with opposition. To introduce legislation today restricting hours of work to 48 hours per week would, I think all hon. members will agree, be greeted with derision from most quarters.

It was in 1936, if my memory serves me well, that the I.L.O. adopted its convention on vacations with pay, and in the meantime a great many countries, whether or not they have implemented the convention, have given it recognition.

In reading the bill which is proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I was amused to notice the clause which dealt with notice of the holiday period, not because of the clause itself but because of an amusing story I read quite some time ago. The story concerns a commercial traveller who found himself snowbound in a remote area. He telephoned his employer and asked him for instructions. The employer, who was noted for the tenacity with which he hung on to every dollar, said, "Yes, I have some instructions—start your summer holidays at once." I am sure it is the possibility of such an occurrence which prompted the hon. member to include in his bill the provision which requires at least two weeks' notice of the holiday period.

I must, however, differ with the hon. member when it comes to his comments with regard to the use of stamps or some other such method of determining holiday pay. It has been my opinion that the holiday book and stamp system has worked very well in the province of Ontario. From my perusal of this bill I take it that the employee, upon the termination of his employment with any one employer, would receive at that time the equivalent of the proportion of holiday pay which might be coming to him because of the period of his service.

The situation is a little different in Ontario. The holiday books are purchased and the employer places therein stamps, for which he pays, covering the amount of money owed to the employee on the basis of the vacation. This has the effect that if an employee in the course of a year serves a great many employers—if he is in the type of business, notably the construction business, where he might work for several employers—he might, by keeping this book and having inserted therein the stamps which signify the amount of holiday pay coming to him, accumulate a full holiday pay which he may then procure by turning his book in to any of the banks in the province of Ontario. I do not think this is a very important point, but inasmuch as the hon. member said that he differed with that method of determining the amount due I must say that I agree with the system which has been set up because I know from practical experience the manner in which it has worked.

I must agree with him that the virtue in the legislation is that it covers all workers, whether or not they are members of unions or negotiating groups. The main argument against leaving arrangements of this sort to negotiating bodies is that those workers who are not unionized are left out and do not enjoy the privileges which may be extended to those who belong to unions.

I think we all agree that everyone deserves a holiday after working a year, though probably a good many of us in this house have not had as many as we should have had in the years we have been here. Working conditions improve as the years go by and they improve because of the interest not only of labour organizations, which deserve a large share of the credit, but of legislators who interest themselves in the conditions under which the people of this country labour.

For all these reasons I propose to support this bill. I know that my support will be echoed by my leader, who is unavoidably absent at this time. I know that if he were here he would have some remarks to make on this legislation, because it would bring back to his mind the period when he was premier of Ontario and so keenly interested in the plight of the workers in his province, and the extent to which he promoted progressive labour legislation in that province.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have read this bill with great interest, and again it indicates the well known diligence of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He stated in his remarks that he believed this was the first round in so far as the federal ring is concerned, and I think that is true.

Both he and the hon. member for Hamilton West referred to the fact that in the earlier part of this century vacations with pay were a matter which did not receive anything like the consideration and interest which has developed since the end of the last great war. Certainly there were vacations, but too often they were vacations without pay or without any sign of employment to call a halt to the vacation. It was those long series of forced unpaid vacations which led the federal government to request that the British North America Act be amended in order that there might be something in the way of a backlog during these unpaid vacations which would offset the hardship imposed.

I do not think anyone will disagree with the principle that all who toil hard and consistently are entitled to vacations, and that if conditions warrant those vacations should be paid for. At the same time I think all of us should realize that paid vacations must be related to many other factors which enter into arrangements between employer and employee. For instance, there is the number of statutory holidays to be allowed and the number to be paid for, there is the length of the working week and how many days in the week are to be paid for, there is the amount of overtime to be worked and the payment for same, and half a dozen other factors that could be listed.

As I said, Bill No. 211 brings before the house for the first time some interesting questions for debate. I hope the debate will be full because I am sure it will be profitable. The bill proposes that all employees in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction shall be granted at least two weeks' holidays with pay after one full year of employment.

For a number of years before the last war we had legislation providing for the settlement of disputes in industries under federal jurisdiction, and since 1948 we have had the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act which replaced the former legislation. That act covered the regulation of some collective bargaining aspects of labour relations as well as dealing with the all-important matter of providing the means or technique for the settlement of labour disputes.

Since I became Minister of Labour in 1953 we have brought in two additional measures. One was the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, which prohibits discrimination in employment because of race, colour, national origin, religion or creed. At this session there is to be introduced legislation to provide equal pay for female employees as compared with male employees. But I think Bill No. 211 differs from those two measures in that it proposes to set a specific minimum standard in respect to one aspect of working conditions, namely annual vacations with pay. That fact makes it somewhat different from the legislation I have mentioned.

Federal industries are of course those works, businesses and undertakings which come under federal jurisdiction, and in spelling these out in the act my hon. friend has very kindly used the language of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act.

Mr. Knowles: If you will just take the rest of the bill as well that will be fine.

Mr. Gregg: The validity of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which is applicable to the federal industries listed in the bill, came before the Supreme Court of Canada only last year and was upheld in a judgment given on June 28, 1955. Perhaps I should run over the industries listed in order to make the record complete. They include transportation and communications, including railways, shipping and stevedoring; air transport; international trucking and bus lines; telegraphs; telephones in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia; broadcasting; terminal elevators and the processing of western grain; banks, and grain companies.

The total number of employees in these industries is just under 400,000, which is not a large proportion of the roughly 5,000,000 paid workers we have in Canada. As federal Minister of Labour I recall that figure from time to time with a great deal of satisfaction, because within 400,000 workers there cannot be nearly as many labour disputes as might be involved in the several million workers.

Employees in those industries, taking them as a whole, are much more highly organized than employees generally, and about 70 per cent of them have their conditions of employment set already by collective agreements, as compared with 39 per cent for all the other industries in Canada, which come under the provincial jurisdiction. If, then, parliament should indicate a specific minimum standard in respect of a matter such as annual vacations, it will be passing a law on a subject which is normally dealt with by collective bargaining for a large proportion of the employees affected.

In spite of the comment by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre on that factor being brought up from time to time, nevertheless I believe it is an important factor for any federal minister of labour in approaching a measure such as this.

Legislative standards on matters normally dealt with by collective bargaining may sometimes be necessary, usually as a means of ensuring that unorganized workers are not deprived of all the protection they should have. I am sure in the great industrial province of Ontario that was certainly one of the factors responsible for the legislation in 1944. But I am sure that as members of the federal parliament we would want to move with a certain caution, particularly when a large proportion of the employees under federal jurisdiction have established these standards by the process of collective bargaining.

In the present instance the question arises as to how adequately the employees affected are already assured of paid vacations after one year's full work. A recent estimate of the number of workers under federal jurisdiction was, as I said, just under 400,000, of whom 47 per cent now meet the standard sought to be established by this bill. An additional 2 per cent qualify for two weeks' vacation after two years' service, an additional 44 per cent after three years' service, and an additional 1 per cent after five or more years' service.

Therefore less than 1 per cent of employees under federal jurisdiction are known not to receive two weeks' vacation at any time, while for the remaining 6 per cent, for the most part in the stevedoring industry, the information available is not sufficient to determine the length of their annual vacations.

Mr. Speaker, I have done some homework putting this out in chart form, and I should be very glad to give it to the house. The chart is headed "Estimated distribution of employees under federal jurisdiction according to service required for two weeks' vacation with pay". The subheadings across the top are, first, "Industry", giving the industries under federal jurisdiction; next "Coverage", giving the total number covered; then "Service requirement for two weeks' vacation", with subcolumns for one year, two years, three years, five years and more than five years. The next column is headed "Do not get two weeks' vacation"; the final column is headed "No information". Under each heading there are two columns, one giving the number and the other the percentage. I can give a few of the headings to the house now if hon. members would like to have them.

For the steam railways, including telegraph operations, the total number is 196,800. The number with one year's service is 44,900 or 22·8 per cent. There is nothing listed for two years' service. The number for three years is 151,900, and that is 77·2 per cent. There are none for five years or more than five years.

For shipping, including stevedoring, the total is 34,200. With one year's service, 12,200 or 35·7 per cent; with two years' service, 1,400 or 4·1 per cent; with three years, 1,500 or 4·4 per cent; with five years, 1,600 or 4·7 per cent. These are the first ones who do not get two weeks' vacation of any kind, and there is a total there of only 600. Included in this group are a large number of whom we have no specific information, the number being 16,900.

Of those who work in air transport, there are a total covered by agreements of 10,700. After one year there are 10,700, or 100 per cent.

In motor and all other transport industries, there are 10,900. After one year there are 2,800 or 25·7 per cent; after two years, 3,000 or 27·5 per cent; after three years, 4,300 or 39·5 per cent; after five years, 800 or 7·3 per cent.

In terminal elevators, the total under agreement is 3,200, of whom 2,500 are after one year, or 78 per cent; and 200 after three years or 6 per cent.

In manufacturing, that is under federal jurisdiction only, there are covered 17,500. After one year, 2,600 or 14·9 per cent; two years, 3,300 or 18·9 per cent; three years, 6,900 or 39·4 per cent.

In Canadian National hotels there is a total of 2,600; and after three years all of them are in the one group.

In the banks there are 48,200, all after one year's service.

In government enterprises not included in preceding classifications there are 6,800, all after one year's service.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to put this schedule on Hansard, if I may.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman consent to place the schedule on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gregg: The schedule is as follows:

Industrial Relations

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if I may ask a question at this time. We have been dealing simply with the federal field, but does the minister happen to have, to complete the picture, corresponding information about those who come under provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Gregg: I have not that in hand at the moment, but I did have before me, when working on this, some information coming forward from our research branch. I shall undertake to bring what might appear to be useful when this bill comes before the house again. The statistical estimates which I have just placed on record make it clear that about half the employees now under federal jurisdiction already obtain paid vacation leave which meets the standard proposed by this bill, and that over 90 per cent qualify for two weeks' vacation after three years' or less service.

On the other hand, looking at vacation provisions in the Canadian manufacturing industry, we find—and this will partly answer my hon. friend's question—that whilst 92 per cent of the plant employees eventually qualify for two weeks' vacation, only 15 per cent of such employees qualify after one year's service; a further 11 per cent after two years; 27 per cent after three years; 35 per cent after five years; and 4 per cent after other periods of service with their employers.

I have that part of the information desired by my hon. friend, but I wish to point out that covers only the manufacturing industry. Mr. Speaker, if I have permission, I should like to place this on Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman consent to place this on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gregg: The table is as follows:

PERCENTAGE OF PLANT EMPLOYEES IN CANADIAN MANUFACTURING ELIGIBLE FOR TWO WEEK VACATION WITH PAY

	Oct. 1 1949	Oct. 1 1950	Oct. 1 1951	April 1 1953	April 1 1954	April 1 1955
Eligible for two weeks with pay	81·0	84·9	89·2	92·6	92·0	92·4
After: 1 year or less	10·2	12·3	14·2	14·9	15·5	15·6
2 years	6·6	8·3	9·3	9·6	10·3	11·4
3 years	6·4	11·5	16·2	22·5	25·5	27·0
5 years	54·8	48·6	46·2	40·4	35·2	34·7
Other	3·0	4·2	3·3	5·2	5·5	3·7

There seems to be no doubt that in the last ten years there has been a steady trend toward longer vacations after shorter periods of service in industry generally, and particularly in the federal industries. As a matter of fact this very item is a most important one in the agreements that are being reviewed in Montreal this very day. I think we must consider this trend in determining whether there is any real need for federal legislation on this matter. It seems to me also that there are other implications to be considered in setting specific standards for working conditions in our federal industries.

Where working conditions for a large proportion of employees in any jurisdiction, are already established by collective bargaining, it could very well be that standardization through legislation is not desirable. When working conditions are left to collective bargaining there is the ability to inject into them a flexibility in determining standards which is lacking when any government introduces minimum standards. In some instances an increase in wages or salaries or an improvement in some one or more fringe benefits may be more acceptable to the employees than a longer paid vacation leave. I am sure one can let his imagination run and realize how that could happen. I should like to emphasize also that it is not only the length of the paid vacation that such legislation would standardize but a number of other important conditions relating to it.

If a vacation pay law is to deal clearly with the ancillary matters which frequently arise in the administration of a vacation plan, it would have to cover such factors as (1) length of service required to qualify for vacation privileges; (2) the effect of interruptions of service on such privileges; (3) the methods of determining vacation pay, for example, a percentage or proportion of normal weekly earnings or average weekly earnings; (4) the time when the vacation is to be taken; (5) whether or not vacations are to be termed an accrued monetary right so that an employee who terminates his employment before taking his vacation is to receive pay in lieu of such vacation. One could go on and name others which are not as important as those I have named.

The bill before the house deals with some of these points, and there are probably others that would need to be taken care of by legislation. Legislation means standardizing practice in all these particulars as well as the length of the vacation, and the arbitrary rules that would have to be set in the legislation might not be as acceptable to the employees concerned as the freely negotiated rules they have worked out with their employers by collective bargaining. This would be particularly true in industries such as shipping and longshoring, where vacation benefit arrangements peculiar to the conditions in those industries are now in effect and are only in effect after a great deal of study and arrangement between the two parties concerned.

Another point I wish to make is the difficulty of arriving at a minimum standard if one is to be set. As I have already indicated, there is considerable variation in the federal jurisdiction both in the practice that has been established in industries where collective agreements govern conditions of employment and in others where vacations with pay plans are part of the personnel policy of the employer.

I have here a summary of what is happening in the various provinces of Canada. That has been summarized by both hon. members who have preceded me. I think I have one or two slight variations from what was set out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and if I were to put what I have on Hansard perhaps it would be a matter of controversy. Therefore I shall take the opportunity to read his speech in Hansard to see where we disagree before I start anything approaching a battle.

Mr. Knowles: May I suggest to the Minister of Labour that he be very careful in arguing with my information, because most of it I obtained from a document put out by his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Gregg: Then I will say that I did not quite catch one point only with respect to which there appeared to be a disagreement in small detail with the information I have obtained from exactly the same source.

This is my summary of the provincial programs as they stand now. Two weeks after one year of employment is a standard at present in effect in only one province.

Mr. Knowles: Which one?

Mr. Gregg: The province of British Columbia.

Mr. Knowles: Saskatchewan has had it for several years.

Mr. Sinclair: You are misinformed again, Stanley.

Mr. Gregg: That is the only point on which the statements disagree, and I want to look up the source before pressing my point. It is also clear that one week after one year of employment is the prevailing minimum standard set by provincial legislation, especially considering that it is the minimum standard set in Ontario and Quebec, the provinces in which the bulk of industrial workers are employed.

On motion of Mr. Gregg the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: Could we have the business for Monday?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It is our intention to have called on Monday the resolution concerning the pipe line, No. 16 on today's order paper.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

2. The following benefits and privileges are now available for the Indians governed by treaty No. 6:

(a) The use of reserve land set apart for the Indians.

(b) Schools.

(c) Hunting and fishing for food on reserves and unoccupied crown lands to which Indians have right of access subject to federal laws and regulations.

(d) An annuity of $5 a year to each Indian.

(e) An annual salary of $25 to each chief and $15 to each subordinate officer (councillor).

(f) A suitable suit of clothes every three years to each chief and subordinate officer (councillor).

(g) Ammunition, nets and twine in the amount stipulated.

In addition to the benefits and privileges accruing to the Indians under the terms of the treaty, the Indians are eligible to receive benefits under social legislation, such as, the Family Allowances Act, Old Age Security Act, Old Age Assistance Act, Blind Persons Act, Disabled Persons Act, Veterans' Land Act, and other legislation respecting veterans for which they qualify. Assistance in housing construction and repairs is provided for the aged and the destitute on the basis of need, and relief and special welfare assistance is also provided when necessary. Seed is distributed, livestock improved, and related assistance given where necessary to help the Indians become established in agriculture.

Questions

The Indians may apply for revolving fund loans for the purposes provided by section 69 of the Indian Act. In accordance with the provisions of the Indian Act, the Indians are exempt from taxation on real and personal property situated on a reserve, and their real and personal property on the reserve is not subject to seizure.

RADIO RECEIVING SETS

Question No. 451—Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. How many radio receiving sets are there in Canada at the present time, by provinces?
2. How many radio receiving sets were in Canada in the years 1941 and 1951?
3. How many radio receiving sets have been manufactured in Canada in each of the years 1941 to 1955 inclusive?
4. How many radio receiving sets have been sold by manufacturers in Canada in each of the years 1941 to 1955 inclusive?
5. How many radio receiving sets have been imported into Canada in each of the years 1941 to 1955 inclusive?
6. How many households in Canada have at least one radio receiving set, by provinces?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

1. Information not available. Number of households with one or more radios as of September, 1955—3,712,000. Distribution is as follows:

Number of households in Canada with at least one radio and showing number with one, two, three, and four or more, by provinces, September, 1955 (not including automobile radios).

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Third report of special committee on estimates.—Mr. Tucker.

First report of special committee on research.—Mr. McIlraith.

ESTIMATES—MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move:

That the name of Mr. McCann be substituted for that of Mr. Lapointe.

That the name of Mr. White (Waterloo South) be substituted for that of Mr. Garland.

That the name of Mr. Meunier be substituted for that of Mr. Hanna.

That the name of Mr. Beaudry be substituted for that of Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare).

That the name of Mr. McWilliam be substituted for that of Mr. Robichaud.

That the name of Mr. Michener be substituted for that of Mr. Churchill.

That the name of Mr. Monteith be substituted for that of Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).

That the name of Mrs. Fairclough be substituted for that of Mr. Hodgson.

That the name of Mr. Pallett be substituted for that of Mr. Rea.

That the name of Mr. Macdonnell be substituted for that of Mr. Small.

That the name of Mr. Zaplitny be substituted for that of Mr. Regier; and

That the name of Mr. Knight be substituted for that of Mr. Ellis on the special committee on estimates.

That the name of Mr. Regier be substituted for that of Mr. Bryson on the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO PROCEED TO THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That we do now proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): A decision has not been announced on the other motion. In order to maintain our position with respect to the position of the minister on the estimates committee I would say that it carries on division in so far as the name of the minister is concerned.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa moved a motion and, if I heard him aright, the Minister of Finance moved a superseding motion that we do now proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles: Is that what the minister said?

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? The question is on the superseding motion.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Speaker: The question is the following one. Mr. Weir moved, seconded by Mr. McIlraith:

That the name of Mr. McCann be substituted for that of Mr. Lapointe.—

Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Harris moved, seconded by Mr. Pickersgill:

That we do now proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. Sinclair: Question.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question? Would Your Honour indicate what the effect of that motion would be? What would it do to the motion made by the government whip and also to the motions on the order paper between this point and the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is that we now proceed with the orders of the day. It supersedes the present motion which is under consideration, and if it is defeated we carry on with the routine proceedings on the order paper. If it is agreed to we immediately proceed to orders of the day. To me it is as simple as that.

Those who are in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Fulton: Will we now have questions on the orders of the day?

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Fulton: No questions?

Mr. Speaker: The motion having been carried, we now proceed to orders of the day.

Mr. Fulton: Before the order is read may I ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

Mr. Sinclair: No, you cannot.

Mr. Fulton: As I apprehend the situation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet and the hon. member has asked if he can ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration—

Mr. Fulton: On the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but we are not on orders of the day. We are proceeding to orders of the day by virtue of the motion that has just been carried and therefore the question time does not take place today.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, was not the motion that the house do proceed to orders of the day and not that a particular order be now read? That motion has been carried and the house has now jumped the intermediate stages and come to orders of the day at which time, by custom, questions of the ministers are allowed. If the motion had been that order number so and so be read, I think the question to the minister would not be allowed; but the motion was not that. The motion was that we proceed to orders of the day; so the orders of the day being called, it is in accordance with the usual custom to permit hon. members to ask questions of the ministers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that questions are always asked before the orders of the day are called. Hon. members stand up and say, "Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to direct a question . . ."

Now, the orders of the day have been called by virtue of the motion which has just been carried by the house.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) moves, seconded by Mr. Pearson, that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation to be known as the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation—

Shall I dispense?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The point of order which I raise at this time is that this question should not be put to the house unless something else, to which I shall refer in a moment, is done first. May I make it perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a repetition of the point of order which was discussed and decided in this house on Thursday of last week.

An hon. Member: We are glad to hear that.

Mr. Knowles: That is crystal clear by the terms of what Your Honour said when you told the house what your ruling was, and it is also crystal clear by the terms of such citations in Beauchesne's third edition as 113, 114 and 115.

Mr. MacDougall: You mean crystal-ball clear.

Mr. Knowles: Citation 113 reads:

The Speaker decides questions of order only when they actually arise and not in anticipation.

In other words, on Thursday of last week Your Honour made a ruling with respect to what was before the house at that time. The ruling of last Thursday does not apply to what is before the house at this juncture and what is before us, I confess, a little sooner today than I thought would be the case. The government's move in that connection is rather transparent.

When you made your ruling last Thursday, sir, you said, as reported at page 3762 of Hansard, first of all that the point of order had been raised that it was not in order to proceed with the government notice of motion since a similar proposition stood on the order paper for consideration in committee of the whole. Then Your Honour said this in very clear language:

I ruled that it was in order to present a proposition dealing with the same subject matter when it contained additional provisions.

I think it is quite clear, both from those final words that Your Honour uttered on that occasion and what you said in the course of the discussion on that point of order, that you were referring to the presenting of a similar proposition as distinct from proceeding with a similar proposition. On that occasion you and I differed as to whether or not what was being done on Thursday was a proceeding. Whatever may have been our difference of opinion on that occasion it seems to me that it is crystal clear that today at a later stage we are being asked to engage in a proceeding. It is my contention and my very strong submission that this house cannot properly proceed with a motion or resolution which is substantially the same as one that has already been proceeded with and has already been considered by the committee of the whole house on the instruction of the house itself.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member permit me to interrupt him at this point just so we may have an understanding right from the start. On Thursday, as reported on page 3752 of Hansard, I read an opinion by the Clerk of the house on which I based my ruling. I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member to the third paragraph in the opinion of the Clerk, which reads:

> The new measure contained provisions not provided for in the original resolution and since it would not be in order, without unanimous consent, to propose the new provisions as amendments to the initial resolution in committee of the whole, the second resolution, in my opinion, presented a new proposition.

I based my ruling upon the opinion of the Clerk. Is it a new proposition or is it not? The hon. member contends that it is not, that it is substantially the same as the one already on the order paper whereas the opinion gives an indication to the contrary. If it is a new proposition then we are going into committee on a new proposed resolution.

Mr. Knowles: I thank Your Honour for your interjection and since it was made at that point I take it that you are not quarrelling with my contention that we have now passed beyond the stage of presenting something and have reached the point where the house is being asked to proceed with a proposition. The question is now raised as to whether order No. 16 is substantially the same as or different from order No. 12, which are the order numbers given to the two similar resolutions on today's order paper.

May I remind you again of one of the precedents which you and I both cited in our arguments last week, namely the proposal to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act which was before parliament in the second session of 1945. Let the house see how exact the parallelism is. On that occasion the first resolution provided for the payment of $2,000 expense allowance to members of the House of Commons. The second resolution provided for the payment of $2,000 expense allowance to members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate.

In the case now before us the first resolution provides for the setting up of a crown corporation to assist in the building of a pipe line in northern Ontario. The second resolution provides for the setting up of a crown corporation to assist in the building of a pipe line in northern Ontario and in western Canada. Could anything be more exactly parallel than those two sets of resolutions? Yet in 1945 Mr. King recognized that before he could start to discuss the second resolution he had to make it clear to the house that he was prepared to ask for unanimous consent to withdraw the first resolution. Only a few column inches in Hansard from that point, Mr. Bracken, who was then the leader of the opposition, indicated that he was prepared to give that unanimous consent so that the second resolution might be discussed rather than the first one.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member permit me to interrupt again? There was unanimous consent required because the 48 hours' notice had not been given to the second resolution.

Mr. Knowles: Several cases of unanimous consent were required on that occasion. There was the one to which Your Honour has just referred, and it also took unanimous consent to deal with two stages and get first reading on that occasion, but Mr. King—

Mr. Speaker: You must state which one you think Mr. King was asking unanimous consent for.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. King made it very clear when he said, on page 3412 of Hansard for December 13, 1945:

> When the orders of the day are reached I shall ask that the house allow the motion No. 7, which is now in its possession—

Just like No. 12 before us is now in our possession.

> —to be withdrawn and the order to be discharged.

I emphasize these words of the late Mr. King:

> I make that intention known immediately so that we may be in a position to discuss the resolution that now appears under government notices of motion.

In other words, Mr. King knew that he could not go ahead with the second one unless there was an understanding between him and the house that the first one was going to be withdrawn.

Last week, on both Wednesday and Thursday, between us we referred to a number of instances. I do not think I need to go further with the case of the $2,000 expense allowance proposition in the second session of 1945 except to emphasize that never were two cases so completely parallel as are these two. Yet on that occasion Mr. King sought the consent of the house to proceed in the proper fashion, and on this occasion the Minister of Trade and Commerce sits in his seat and has nothing to say on this important procedural point.

We also dealt with Mr. Ilsley's treatment of the National Housing Act in 1945. We also dealt with the redistribution bill of 1952. I mention that because there is one further word that I should say about the redistribution bill of 1952. I gave full credit for the proper handling of that incident to the Minister of Finance, and I do not detract for a moment from the credit I gave to him, but I should have added that he must share the credit with the Prime Minister. I find that actually the first of those redistribution bills was moved by the Prime Minister. Later the Minister of Finance indicated that a second bill had to be substituted for the first one and he asked the unanimous consent of the house to withdraw the first bill so that the house could proceed with the second one. There was some delay the first day. The then member for Lake Centre, now the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), objected, and so the matter was put off for a few days. When it came up a few days later, it was the Prime Minister himself who made the motion for the withdrawal of the first bill.

So, to the names of Mr. King, Mr. Ilsley, the Minister of Finance and yourself, whom I listed the other day as being on the correct side of this way of doing things, I must also add the name of the present Prime Minister. The other day, in the memorandum that you read to the house—I repeat that I treated it as your memorandum, sir—you indicated that, in addition to the instances with which I was familiar, there were two or three others, which you indicated only by page numbers in the Journals. Therefore on that occasion I was not able to deal with them. However, since that time, I have looked them up. Every last one of the page references that you gave on Thursday of last week supports my side of the argument.

First of all you quoted one involving Mr. Dunning. We must add him to the company of the elect. This was in the session of 1927. The matter before the house at the time was a long resolution for the building of branch lines by the Canadian National Railways. It was a resolution of many parts—oh, a dozen or fifteen; I have not taken the time to open the volume for the moment—and Mr. Dunning—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member and I are not in dispute on that point because that part of the memorandum treats only with having introduced two resolutions or two bills on the same subject. That part deals with the introduction. It strikes me that the hon. member is taking up arguments which he used last Thursday. The first day we discussed this matter was last Wednesday. It was my contention that no point of order should have been raised then but the next day, and the hon. member was inclined to agree with me but hon. members insisted that the discussion take place on Wednesday. On Wednesday I gave a ruling.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Then on Thursday the point was allowed to be discussed again, and as far as the ruling I made on Thursday is concerned I think that what I said on Wednesday and what I said on Thursday must be taken together. In any event, the house had a chance at that time to pronounce itself on the ruling that was then made. If we are going to have another ruling today based on the same arguments as were made last Thursday, it seems to me that we were either right when we discussed the matter then or we were wrong. If we were all wrong we spent a great deal of time for nothing. We should not have held the discussion. But having held it last Thursday, and the house having been called upon to render its decision on an appeal taken from my ruling, I do not think we ought to go back to the decision that was made last Thursday.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I agree with your contention that we should not rediscuss the ruling of last Thursday. The house made its decision sustaining your ruling despite the view I had and still have about it. What I am now taking up is another motion which was not before the house last Thursday and which in my submission is a case of proceeding further with the second resolution while the first one is still on the order paper. I am citing these examples to show that former cabinet ministers have recognized in the house that you could not proceed with a second resolution while the first one was still on the order paper unless you either amended the first one or got the first one off the order paper. If I have erred in suggesting that I was arguing with your use of these citations in support of the position you took last Thursday, I withdraw that, but I am submitting these references in support of the position I now take which is that we cannot now proceed with this further stage so far as this second resolution is concerned.

Mr. Dunning on March 10, 1927, as reported at page 1061 of Hansard, sought to substitute a new paragraph 8 in a very long resolution. He moved it as an amending resolution. At that time he said:

> I would like to say that this is an amendment to section 8 of the resolution already standing in my name, with which I hope to go on today, and in view of that—

Notice the care that these ministers exercised.

> —I would ask that it be substituted for section 8 of the existing resolution in order to enable discussion of the whole program today.

Have we had any request from the Minister of Trade and Commerce to substitute this resolution for the other one?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know the hon. member has studied the matter very carefully. Would the hon. member be good enough to say what the minister could have done if the answer to his request for unanimous consent had been "no"?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to answer that question but I should like to answer it just a few minutes from now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce gets a great deal of laughter out of these fine points of order—

Mr. Speaker: May I ask all hon. members to compose themselves and let us have all discussion strictly related to the point of order.

Mr. Knowles: My reason for asking you to consent to my answering that question a little later was that I felt that I was justified in adding briefly one or two other references in support of my contention.

The next reference—and again I found the page because Your Honour was kind enough to give it to me last Thursday—involves Sir George Perley who had before the house a motion with regard to the purchase by the Canadian radio commission of certain C.N.R. radio stations. Sir George Perley asked the consent of the house to change the wording of his notice of motion so that he might be able to proceed with it. Similarly, if I may jump down to still another reference which Your Honour has drawn to my attention, the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) in 1951 asked the unanimous consent of the house to change the wording of a resolution respecting a piece of veterans legislation so that the house might proceed with it that day.

Mr. Speaker, I have cut short what I intended to add by way of support to the argument because I think that the point has been made and that it is crystal clear. You asked what could the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) do if he asked for unanimous consent to withdraw the first resolution and the house denied that consent. First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I ask with all respect whether that is a good question.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member immediately because I did not ask him what the Minister of Trade and Commerce could do in this instance. He was referring to Mr. Dunning's asking unanimous consent and at that moment I was asking him what Mr. Dunning could have done if the house had refused him unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, what Mr. Dunning on that day could have done and what the present Minister of Trade and Commerce could have done long ago and thereby saved all this procedural discussion is very simple.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: If my hon. friends want to refer to it, it is set out in citation 695 in Beauchesne's third edition. As I say, what the Minister of Trade and Commerce could have done in the first instance, if he had wished to do it, would have been to ask the house for unanimous consent to substitute the second resolution for the first one. I presume he was not too sure he would get unanimous consent for such a substitution and therefore did not ask it. But that does not release him from the responsibility of finding some way in which to get the first resolution off the order paper. The second way would be for a motion to be made that order number so-and-so be withdrawn and discharged. If the government feared that that process would run into difficulty—if there was fear that it might result in a procedural argument or a debate or a vote—there is another process which might be followed and it is very simple. It is set out in citation 695 and I suggest that Your Honour propose this procedure to the Minister of Trade and Commerce today. Citation 695 reads as follows:

> 695. The proceedings of a committee on a bill may be brought abruptly to a close by an order: "That the chairman do now leave the chair" or by a proof that a quorum is not present. The chairman, in such cases, being without instruction from the committee, makes no report to the house. A bill disposed of in this manner disappears from the order paper, though it can be revived by an order of the house.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will look at page 3761 of Hansard he will find that I dealt with all possible alternatives to get rid of the first one, and that alternative was included. There are two others.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, you and I have at last reached a point of agreement. If you and I and the Minister of Trade and Commerce can just get together, maybe we can bring this discussion to an end. The matter is quite clear. For a moment today when the Minister of Finance moved the unusual motion that we proceed to the orders of the day, I wondered whether perchance he had not decided to do just this. I listened very carefully when orders of the day were called, thinking that maybe the Minister of Finance had decided to call order No. 12, whereupon we could go into committee of the whole to continue the discussion on resolution No. 12, at which point a cabinet minister would merely have to move that the committee rise. That motion would not be debatable. When that motion carried and the committee rose, resolution No. 12 would be off the order paper and the house would then be in a position to go ahead with resolution No. 16 in a proper manner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is just as simple as that. I remind you, sir, of citation 104, which reads in part as follows:

> The Speaker is responsible for the due enforcement of the rules, rights and privileges of the house, and when he rises he is to be heard in silence.

I am sure you would like me to emphasize those last few words. I continue:

> In accordance with his duty, he declines to submit motions to the house, which obviously infringe the rules which govern its proceedings. If the Speaker is made aware that a member—

The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a member, too.

> —proposes to bring forward a motion, or to engage in a proceeding—

Certainly this is a proceeding. We are asked to proceed with this all day and all night, so far as I know.

> —which would infringe the rules and usages of the house, he deals with the matter, if it seems desirable, by conveying to the member an intimation regarding the irregularity of the course which the member proposes to follow.

I suggest to you, sir, with all respect, that you consider proposing to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he adopt one of the procedures that have been set out. If you do not wish to adopt the one I propose, I suggest you take one of the others. I suggest that you propose to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he follow one of those courses.

This is an important matter, on which it is recognized a great deal of controversy and feeling exists. Nevertheless, I suggest that you advise the minister that he deal with it according to proper parliamentary procedure. After all, this needs to be said to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is not only important to get things done; it is important to do them in the right way.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I want to indicate our support of the points of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and of the proposition that this is a new point of order, and not the same one that was raised on Thursday last. The propriety of raising this new point of order is based on the same grounds on which you made your ruling on Thursday last, which applied particularly to the stage we are at today.

The hon. member has already read one or two of your remarks. I should like to read one of two more to show that you based your ruling on Thursday last on the ground that at that time we were not proceeding but were merely dealing with the presentation of a resolution. Your Honour emphasized that, and emphasized again that while it was in order to allow the presentation of a resolution which was a duplicate of one already on the order paper, it would not be in order to proceed with it. What we are asked to do today is to proceed with it.

At page 3760 of Hansard appears this passage in your ruling:

> This illustrates the point that was stressed by the memorandum given to me by the Clerk that there was no obstacle to the presentation of the resolution.

Again, on page 3761, the following appears: This is the point on which I submit the situation today rests and must be disposed of:

> The presentation of resolutions on the order paper by way of notice as our rules require to bring them to a stage where they can be taken up and the proceeding with the two resolutions so as to avoid duplication of debate are different propositions.
> I want to assure hon. members they will not proceed with the two resolutions; they will proceed only with one.

Now, sir, we have already proceeded with the resolution appearing as order No. 12. A decision of the house was taken and we proceeded with it for one day in committee of the whole. A vote was taken. That was a question of the house. Another stage then took place, namely, a consideration of the proposed resolution in committee. That being dependent on a decision of the house, the question cannot be held to be other than a proceeding. We proceeded with the resolution. Having had a second resolution presented, we are being asked to proceed with it. Since the two resolutions embrace exactly the same terms, how can it be then said that the particular point which Your Honour made has not now arisen; that is, if we proceed now we shall be proceeding with two resolutions dealing with the same subject matter at the same time? How can it be held that it is not duplication of debate? Your Honour is concerned with the rule against repetition, and rightly so. How can we avoid repetition when we are being asked to proceed with a resolution with which we have already dealt but which we have not finally disposed of? So that, accepting for the moment, as I have to do, because it was upheld by a decision of the house—and I accept it on that basis—the validity of Your Honour's previous ruling, I say that that ruling having been made, based on the argument which you used, makes it unavoidable, in my judgment, that Your Honour has to rule now—we are asked to proceed with this new one—that you must apply your previous argument and say this is entirely out of order, which would put the government in the position where they must follow the proper procedure, which I am sure has occurred to them before. Why they did not do it, I do not know unless they wanted once again to bulldoze the house as they have done the cabinet, regardless of what the rules say.

But, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce marshals his majority he is going to get his way, but let him at least try to respect the rules of the house so that procedure will be in accordance with proper practice and not improper practice.

Mr. Speaker: Well, in my humble view, hon. members have not added very much to what had already been said. I want to tell hon. members that at first sight I could very easily find quotations in the authorities which would indicate that at this particular moment before one proceeds any farther with the resolution that is on the order paper—that is, with the one that is now called upon to be committed—the one that is there now has in the past been discharged before the new one was proceeded with. I find some of those quotations in May, and the general tenor of the principle is that no two subjects substantially the same should be offered in the same session for discussion; that one, if already there, should be discharged or, if a decision has been taken, a motion to rescind should take place before the new one is embarked upon.

Now, the points that have been made ever since the notice appeared on the order paper for the second resolution have been subjects of a great deal of concern as far as I am concerned, and I have discussed the various points that have been brought out fully with the Clerk of the house. After the discussion last Thursday, I may inform the house that for a moment we were in disagreement. We finally rallied and came to the same view. I would say that he persuaded me that the point we expected would be discussed today should be dealt with according to his own way of thinking, which is mine at the moment.

Now, a great deal of confusion took place last Thursday and is taking place today as to the rule of anticipation with respect to debate and the rule having to do with two motions substantially the same being offered for a decision of the house. I have made rulings to the effect that repetition in debates should be avoided and I will continue to make them. I have made rulings to the effect that if a debate has been engaged on, let us say, a resolution in the name of the hon. member for a certain constituency and therefore having been taken up becomes a public order, if another motion on the same subject is to be called and the hon. member proceeds to take it up, it necessarily anticipates a motion that has already been discussed and taken up by the house.

What we are called upon to do today is to commit a proposed resolution to the committee of the whole. The house has not taken any decision at all on any resolution pertaining to the subject matter of the present resolution. I cited the parallel the other day of the bill concerning equal pay for equal work for women and also the bill of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on small loans. The Clerk has just given me the details about where the bill of the hon. member for Assiniboia was when the bill concerning the Small Loans Act was introduced by the government.

Bill No. 3, the bill of the hon. member for Assiniboia, was on the order paper at the stage of resuming debate on the motion for second reading on February 6 when Bill No. 51, the Small Loans Act moved by Mr. Harris, was introduced. Bill No. 51 received second reading on March 8 and was referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. The bill of the hon. member for Assiniboia is still on the order paper. The other day when we were calling public bills and we called the bill of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), I suspected that perhaps she would take it up because of the discussion that had taken place and she would have been allowed to take it up and discuss the second reading of her bill concerning equal pay for equal work for women.

At this moment we are dealing with the motion for leave to introduce a bill. When a money bill is introduced it must originate in committee of the whole and the resolution, once reported from committee of the whole, concurred in and agreed to by the house, becomes an order for leave. This is the only stage at which we are at the moment.

If hon. members will look at May's fifteenth edition, page 487, they will find the following:

> A certain class of bills, the main object of which is the expenditure of money or the imposition of taxation, must, in accordance with the requirements of the standing orders regarding charges on the people, originate in committee of the whole house.

When the resolutions have been reported and agreed to by the house, a bill is ordered thereon, or upon some only of the resolutions.

This, therefore, is an order for leave. When we introduce a bill on which charges on the exchequer are not involved we merely put the motion in these terms, "Has the hon. member leave to introduce the said bill?", and then that being agreed we move first reading. When it comes to a money bill we must go through the requirements of some of our standing orders, both those regarding 48 hours' notice and those relating to standing order No. 61 which says that instead of proceeding with it immediately we must appoint another day for taking it into consideration and then the day having arrived we must commit that resolution to committee of the whole.

I have made the point that a resolution is a proposed resolution until it has been reported from the committee and adopted by the house. I would refer hon. members to citation No. 491 of Beauchesne's third edition, which is clear on that point:

If a resolution is amended in the committees of the whole, supply or ways and means, the chairman does not report it "with amendments", because it had not been discussed in the house, when the Speaker was in the chair, prior to being referred to the committee. The resolution is not considered by the house in the same way as a bill which, under standing order 75, is read twice before committal. The terms of the resolution are submitted for the consideration of the house for the first time when the resolution is reported from committee. As the house up to that moment has not considered the merits of the resolution, the committee's amendments do not change anything that has been done by the house and no matter how much the resolution has been altered by the committee, it is reported with all its alterations but without the mention of amendments.

The hon. member has said that before proceeding with this one—proceeding meaning one that is entered in the Journals of the house, so the minute we make a move it is 'proceeding'—it should have been amended. If one reads the new resolution one realizes there is a difficulty there. The minister himself could not have amended the resolution in committee of the whole. He required a new royal recommendation for the additional amount of expenditures which are contemplated in the additional part of the resolution. He could not have amended. One cannot amend because of the financial initiative of the crown. One cannot amend the resolution which will extend the expenditures which have already been covered by the royal recommendation and therefore a new recommendation would have been necessary in any case for that additional part which is given in the new resolution.

Now, the point at issue between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself and the hon. member for Kamloops and myself is this. Must the order of the house which is "house again in committee of the whole on proposed resolution No. 12"—must that order be discharged before consideration is undertaken on the new proposed resolution, No. 16?

The hon. member is contending that unless No. 12 is removed from the order paper we cannot commit No. 16 and go into committee of the whole on No. 16. That is the point at issue at the moment. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has cited several instances where precisely that was done. I have not had the opportunity of studying all the instances which the hon. member has quoted. The one pertaining to the resolution involving an increase of indemnity which Mr. King proposed is one the reference to which I looked at in the Journals but I had not read the details of the presentation in debate which Mr. King had made very fully. I read the beginning and it seemed to me, if my recollection is right, that the unanimous consent he asked for at that time could address itself just as much to the fact that he did not want to let the 48 hours' notice go by—only 24 hours in this case—and he wanted to proceed that very same day to take it out of the Votes and Proceedings and go ahead with it that day while he had the first resolution pending on the order paper under government orders. Does that clearly make the point that you must ask that the order be discharged in the first resolution before you can proceed with the second if they are substantially the same?

With respect to the motion for discharge, I indicated to the hon. member that according to precedents I have seen the motion is not debatable. There is in Beauchesne a citation which cannot be overlooked when you consider a motion for discharge. Is it a motion or is it not? If it is a motion, all motions must be decided in the negative or the affirmative, but according to the citation in Beauchesne's third edition a motion to discharge is one in a very special category. Beauchesne's third edition, citation 154. The first citation is to the effect that you can move that the order be discharged, but you must have unanimous consent. Without unanimous consent the motion to discharge is of no value whatever. I cannot find the particular citation and perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has that before him.

Mr. Fulton: We accept the point.

Mr. Speaker: I want to make it good before the hon. member accepts it. Perhaps when I am through he will not want it.

Mr. Harris: Is it 323?

Mr. Knowles: While Your Honour is looking up that point perhaps I could answer some of the others you have made.

Mr. Speaker: The point is very easy to detect. The hon. member has said that before a motion is put for the house to go into committee of the whole on this resolution, order No. 12 must be out of the way. That is what he has said. He has cited instances where cabinet ministers have wanted to propose different resolutions from those already on the order paper and had proceeded to ask that the first order be discharged before they proceeded with the second one. That is the point we are trying to deal with at the moment.

Mr. Harris: I think it is 323.

Mr. Speaker: No, that is not the one either. It may be that I have hidden that one.

Mr. Knowles: I think Your Honour will find what you are looking for in citation 454 in Beauchesne's second edition.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member be good enough to read it?

Mr. Knowles: It supports Your Honour's point that there would be difficulty in following some of these other procedures, or maybe there will not be, depending on how you read it. It reads:

> The member who has proposed a motion can only withdraw it by leave of the house, granted without any negative voice. This leave is signified, not upon question, as is sometimes erroneously supposed, but by the Speaker taking the pleasure of the house. He asks "Is it your pleasure that the motion be withdrawn?" If no one dissents, he says: "The motion is withdrawn;" but if any dissentient voice be heard, he proceeds to put the question.

Mr. Speaker: That is not the one; I think it is citation 381 of Beauchesne's third edition. The one I have in mind is that there is such a thing in our procedure as a motion to discharge. Beauchesne's third edition, citation 154.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister used that procedure on the redistribution bill.

Mr. Speaker: It has been used several times, but in the opinion of the hon. member is it not so that if you are allowed to make a motion you are also entitled to have a decision in the negative or the affirmative? Is that not right? Will the hon. member also agree that no motion could be allowed if that principle is not going to be maintained? That is a principle conceded in Magna Carta and it is embodied in our constitution in section 49 of the British North America Act, that a motion must be decided in the affirmative or the negative and that the majority rules. If that is right, and we all agree on that, then there should be no difficulty in making a motion to discharge the order.

Mr. Knowles: Why did he not do it last Thursday?

Mr. Speaker: The second point, the one where the authorities are at variance, is whether the motion is debatable or not. The other day I quoted precedents to the hon. member, one of which was, and I quote from page 3761 of Hansard:

> That the order of the house in respect of item numbered 6 under the heading "Government Orders" on today's "Order Paper", be discharged and that leave be granted to withdraw the following proposed resolution.

At that time Mr. Speaker said that the motion was not debatable. But there again there does not seem to be enough consistency or a sufficient number of cases to establish the procedure clearly one way or the other. There is one thing quite sure and certain, there cannot be duplication of debate. We agree on that. If the government changes its mind it should be entitled on a government day to use the procedure in order to consider its idea, that instead of the old one they should have the new.

The hon. member says that we cannot consider the new one unless the old one is discharged. There is a citation in Beauchesne which I will find a little later where he talks about the motion to discharge but he says it must be agreed to unanimously, that is confusing with asking for consent to withdraw according to the citation the hon. member referred to a moment ago and standing order 49. I think there is a difference between asking unanimous consent to withdraw something which is in possession of the house, when permission to withdraw must be given while the debate is going on and not so as to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, and a motion to discharge an order.

The only thing that is before the house with respect to resolution No. 12 is that the chairman rose and reported progress and asked leave to sit again. The consequence of that was that the house ordered consideration of that proposed resolution at the next sitting. That is the decision which was taken. Now it is contended this resolution will be considered only if the motion to discharge No. 12 is made. Is it agreed that the motion for discharge is not debatable? Is it agreed also that if the motion to discharge is made it is made according to the principle of majority rule and not according to the unanimous consent requirement?

Those are points to be considered. Another point raised in the opinion of the Clerk which I read the other day is that there is in fact an additional element in this resolution which in his opinion would make it a new resolution. I have concurred in that. Furthermore in his view it has been customary on several occasions to ask for unanimous consent to remove an order.

But there is one principle which must be preserved according to our rule. From this moment on if the government chooses to go into committee, say on order No. 16, in my view they would never be able to come back to order No. 12. That is the point. There must not be duplication of debate.

As to the other points that are being made, we have the bill of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) and a government bill dealing with equal pay for equal work for women. We also have a bill moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and a government bill dealing with small loans companies. Once the decision is made there should be no repetition or duplication of debate. Hon. members know that the hon. member for Assiniboia has moved the second reading of his bill and if he had attempted to make the same speech on the second reading of the bill introduced by the government I would have intervened under the rule of relevancy, and I consider repetition as being akin to irrelevancy.

Mr. Knowles: I really do not think that we need to quarrel, you and I at any rate, sir, over the various methods of getting resolution No. 12 off the order paper. There are some difficulties in the way of one method that do not obtain in the case of another.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member permit me to say this? I have found the citation for which I was looking. It is citation 154 of Beauchesne's third edition. If the hon. member agreed to some of the points I made a moment ago, I would like him to consider, as I had to consider in analysing these various points, the effect of this citation:

> When the sponsor of a bill does not want it to be proceeded with, he may move, when it is called, for second reading, "That the order be discharged and the bill withdrawn". Such a motion may be made without notice, is not debatable and requires a unanimous vote.

Since when is a motion allowed to be proposed and is not debatable but requires a unanimous vote? That is disallowing the principle of the majority deciding the motions that are proposed in this chamber.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on that point, since you have raised it at this juncture, is not the reason why unanimous consent is required for that kind of motion related to the fact that it is made without notice? In other words, it is just another way of saying that without proper notice a matter cannot be withdrawn unless there is unanimous consent. What I was starting to say when I was on my feet a moment ago was that I do not see that we need to argue over the methods of getting order No. 12 off the order paper. I think there is a method that is simpler than any of the others, and in my view that method should be pursued.

The point at issue, where we still apparently are in rather strong disagreement, is as to whether or not it is in order to proceed with No. 16 as long as No. 12 is still on the order paper. As to a method of getting rid of it, it is as simple as this. The government can stand up and say, with regard to order No. 16, which has already been called and read by the deputy clerk, "Stand." Then the government can call No. 12 and we can go into committee on No. 12. A minister can then move that the chairman do now leave the chair, or he can move that the committee rise, omitting the words "and report progress and ask leave to sit again." That motion is not debatable and would be carried by the committee; there is no question about that.

Mr. Pearson: How long would it take?

Mr. Knowles: The Secretary of State for External Affairs asks, "How long would it take?" Thirty seconds, and order No. 12 would be off the order paper and the house would be in a position to proceed properly with order No. 16.

Mr. Rowe: Thirty seconds of embarrassment.

Mr. Knowles: I am not going to take the time to discuss the question of the bills in regard to equal pay for equal work for women and in regard to small loans companies. It seems that the question of government bills having priority over private members' bills deals with that. I am not going to argue, because there is no argument between us, as to whether or not this is a proceeding. This proceeding is identical with the proceeding that was taken at this stage of the house on order No. 12. On that occasion there was not only a decision of the house; it was a decision on the basis of a recorded vote, and I believe there will be another recorded vote today when we have reached that stage. In other words, the house will have recorded itself twice in taking the same decision. As for saying that there are difficulties in the way of doing it, surely Your Honour is not arguing that because it is difficult to do it the right way, therefore the Minister of Trade and Commerce must be permitted to do it the wrong way.

Your Honour says you have not had the time to read all the instances to which I have referred. Some of them were page references I got from you, sir. But I will make the statement from a considerable amount of study of this matter that there is not a case in the 89 years' history of the Canadian parliament where the government has even attempted to go ahead with a second resolution similar to a first one without either moving the second as an amendment to the first one or getting rid of the first resolution.

Your Honour said it would have been difficult to move the second resolution as an amendment to the first one because that would have required the Governor General's consent. That is exactly what Mr. Ilsley did in 1945 with the bill amending the National Housing Act. The first resolution was presented with the Governor General's approval. Later he brought in a resolution seeking to amend the resolution of such and such a date, and announced that he had the Governor General's approval to that amending resolution. The ways of doing it are as simple as that. It can be done in no time, but for some reason or other the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to want to sit tight and not be concerned about the propriety of parliamentary procedures and doing things the right way. I suggest that Your Honour should invite the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister, whoever is in charge of this matter, to deal with this in a proper way.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just so that there will not be any doubt about the government's intentions, may I say that it is not our intention to proceed with the first resolution which has been spoken of by the hon. member. We intend to proceed with the second resolution, the one which is now called.

If, after the discussion that Your Honour has had with members opposite, it would appear that it is possible to obtain the discharge of an order from the order paper without having unanimous consent—because I doubt that we would have unanimous consent, for one thing—and if the circumstances are such as have been outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—and I must tell him now that I read the citation early last week to which he referred, with respect to the proceedings in the committee of the whole—I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we shall do all we can to see that the first resolution is removed from the paper.

However, we are not in a position to do that now until after this one begins. Under those circumstances, I hope that Your Honour would find it possible to make a ruling, so that we can proceed. I shall then consult afterwards, however, in the usual manner, with those who are concerned in these affairs and see whether we can work out a solution to the problem.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope that Your Honour, in making any decision, will not be affected by the statement that has just been made. All that it amounts to is a statement that it is not the intention of the government to proceed with the first resolution, which stands on the order paper as No. 12, but that it is the intention of the government to proceed with No. 16, which is the longer resolution based on the same subject matter. It was not the intention of the government originally to proceed with this resolution. It was their intention to proceed with the other. We do not know that, when the uproar across Canada against this procedure—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —becomes sufficiently vocal, they may not decide to go back to the first. That is the very reason why this should not be a matter of intention but it should be a matter of clear practice, and I submit a decision should be made on the basis of practice and not upon a basis of intention.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the Minister of Finance for making the request that he did.

Mr. Harris: I did not make any request.

Mr. Coldwell: That was implied.

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Coldwell: What I was going to say is that, whatever your ruling is, sir, I hope that you will not rule so that the government may do what the minister said they wanted to do. I hope your ruling will be clear-cut and on the point.

As has already been said, I do not think there is a single precedent for the procedure that has been suggested by the government, and as for letting this through today and then withdrawing No. 12 afterwards, the proper procedure surely is to withdraw No. 12 now and then proceed with No. 16 afterwards. Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will protect the rules of the house and not, as the government did, do something entirely outside the rules, and I say that with all respect.

Mr. Speaker: I have indicated to hon. members that I have gone into this thoroughly—

Mr. Coldwell: I thought you said the Clerk had gone into it.

Mr. Speaker: I have gone into the whole thing with him, because I take the responsibility for what I say here and, even if it comes from the Clerk, I must make up my own mind. I have gone through all the details of this thing. It has been of some concern to me because the procedure is a difficult one. When hon. members say there is no doubt that the proper procedure is to have the first one withdrawn all I can say is that I have no power to force anyone to do a certain thing which he does not want to do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: What I can do is do what I have done. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has quoted several instances involving private members' notices of motion. He has referred to the fact that when they are taken up they become public orders and that, having been taken up, I have said no to other hon. members wanting to proceed with notices of motion on similar subjects. We will be in the same position now.

All we are doing is committing a proposed resolution to the committee of the whole. No decision has been taken yet. We do not know what goes on in the committee unless the resolution is reported and agreed to by the house. Therefore, as far as the house is concerned, we have no knowledge of what takes place. All we know is that item No. 12 on the order paper under government orders is "House again in committee of the whole." Then we have another order, item No. 16 on the order paper, which is "In committee of the whole".

The motion is being made that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole upon the latter resolution. I say that the minute that resolution is committed to the committee of the whole the government will not be able to do what the Leader of the Opposition feared they might do, go back to the resolution now item No. 12 on the order paper. In my judgment the government will not be allowed to proceed with that resolution. That is the situation.

The only reason why I do not want to make a ruling that before proceeding with the resolution in item No. 16 they must discharge item No. 12 is that I am puzzled about the citation I have just read in Beauchesne, third edition. Is it to be understood that a motion to discharge is synonymous with a request to withdraw? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made an interesting point. It may be because of the notice that is required. It is made without notice, but if it is made after 48 hours' notice then where does it go? Under routine proceedings? Then it will be debatable. If it is debatable, what is the purpose of trying to get rid of something in order to propose the substitution of another proposition?

The Clerk and I have gone into the matter and it is because of these doubts that I should like to make a decision which will not bind us forever on that particular score. The matter has got to be clarified for the future but I would not want to have to make the decision now. The Clerk is of the opinion that the situation in this regard is no worse—and I emphasize the words "no worse"—than that which obtains when two similar bills are on the order paper such as the bills of the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Hamilton West and the government bills on the same subjects. The only difference in the case of this government measure is that it must originate in committee of the whole because it is a money bill and therefore a few more stages of procedure have to be followed. But no decision has been taken by the house. What we will have to make sure of is that there is no duplication of debate and that they do not go from one to the other. If they take up one they will have to proceed with only one and not with the two. Is the hon. member appealing my ruling?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Speaker. With respect, I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question is on an appeal from a ruling. Mr. Knowles raised a point of order to the effect that it was not in order to proceed with order No. 16 on the ground that there was another resolution on the order paper dealing with the same subject matter.

I ruled that a resolution containing a provision different from the one partially considered by the house could be proceeded with.

The question is on the Speaker's ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot). Had I voted, I would have voted against your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the motion that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the proposed resolution.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, in order that the Minister of Finance may have the opportunity of doing now that which he said he would consider doing later, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair):

That the house do proceed to another order, namely order No. 12.

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the hon. member that I cannot accept his motion because the order that is now before the house is a government order, and the other order that the hon. member now considers we should proceed with is order No. 12, which is another government order, and government orders may be moved only by the leader of the house. I would refer hon. members to standing order 18(2). There is also citation 136, which reads:

All motions referring to the business of the house should be introduced by the leader of the house.

By virtue of standing order 18(2) the government has full jurisdiction over its own orders. Standing order 18(2) reads:

Except as provided in standing order 56, government orders may be called in such sequence as the government may think fit.

Therefore, I cannot accept the hon. member's motion. Do hon. members wish to ask for the yeas and nays on the motion that I do now leave the chair?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

The house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): —on Tuesday, when I attempted to outline the considerations that caused the government—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order. I ask Your Honour to take note of the fact that the committee of the whole house is now being asked to consider and proceed with a resolution which is similar to one that this same committee of the whole house considered and proceeded with on March 15, 1956, as recorded in Hansard of that date and also as recorded in the Journals of that date.

It has been said that the house does not know what the committee is doing, but no one can deny that the committee knows what it is doing. This committee knows that on March 15 of this year we considered a resolution and reported progress on the same, that resolution being similar to the one which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is now asking this committee to endorse.

It has been said that after having proceeded with order No. 16 we could not then go back and consider order No. 12, so I submit by the same token that since we have considered order No. 12, since it is already along the way, we cannot now consider order No. 16. I need not make the point that I could speak at length on this, for I believe that is all I need to say. I ask Your Honour's ruling as to whether or not it is in order to proceed with this resolution at this time.

The Chairman: These are points which have been discussed at considerable length in the last few days. May I point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that there are substantial differences in the resolutions to which he is referring. May I also point out to him that we are in committee of the whole constituted today for the particular purpose of considering this resolution. We have gone into committee of the whole for that purpose. This committee has nothing to do with a resolution of another kind. Therefore I cannot find in favour of the hon. gentleman's point of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I appeal your ruling to the house.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

When the committee of the whole was considering a resolution respecting Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. Knowles raised a point of order that the committee could not proceed with the consideration of the resolution since there was under consideration a similar resolution. I ruled that the committee of the whole was constituted to consider a specific proposition and had no knowledge of any other proceedings. Whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from the ruling of the chair.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

In the committee of the whole, when it was considering a resolution with respect to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. Knowles raised the point of order that the committee could not proceed with the consideration of the resolution since there was under consideration a similar resolution. The chairman ruled that the committee of the whole was constituted to consider a specific proposition and had no knowledge of any other proceedings. Whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from the ruling of the chairman.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming. Had I voted, I would have voted against the chairman's ruling.

And the house having resumed in committee:

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, on Tuesday, when I attempted to outline the considerations which caused the government to bring forward this new resolution, loud laughter greeted my use of the rhetorical question, "What was to be done?" That response to a serious consideration of practical problems suggests a vacancy of mind, or a refusal to face facts—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): —or the easy irresponsibility of those who need not produce a workable course of action.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The course of action the government proposes is based upon certain inescapable facts. The first of these is that if the western part of this pipe line system is not started this year it probably cannot be started before 1958. The second is that for the Alberta gas and oil producing industry, and for consumers eastward from Alberta to Montreal, 1958 or 1959 is uncomfortably far away for a start to be made. The third is that there is only one agency which can be placed in a position to build the western part of the pipe-line system this year.

Nothing that can be said in this house can change those facts. Nothing that can be said here is going to end the world shortage of steel plate suitable for making large diameter steel pipe. No words uttered here can convince the owner of capped gas wells in Alberta or the would-be gas consumers in Manitoba or Ontario that there is no hurry about building the all-Canadian gas pipeline system. In this connection I would refer hon. members to the attitude taken by the Ontario government, which recognizes that time is of the essence. No criticisms or tags such as "chosen instrument" here cast upon Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited will alter the fact that only that company has gathered together the gas purchase and sales contracts, the governmental permits, the organization and the access to pipe which make possible a start this year upon the pipe line.

We all have to deal with those facts, and we have to deal with them now. The government believes that the way of dealing with them which it proposes will turn them to the advantage of the country, and that delay in dealing with them will result in serious damage to the country.

I am not going today to repeat the history of the all-Canadian pipe-line project which I outlined here on March 15. Bear in mind, though, that in December of 1953 the government of Alberta asked this government's assistance in bringing together the Canadian-sponsored company which proposed to transmit gas to Winnipeg and thence to the United States, and the other company, sponsored largely by United States citizens, which alone had proposed to bring Alberta gas to central Canada. Having encouraged the merger of these two groups, this government agreed to permit exports south of Winnipeg concurrently with service to central Canada under the company's plan to allocate, out of the 500 million cubic feet per day which the Alberta government would permit it to export, 200 million per day for export at Emerson, and the balance for central Canada in so far as the central Canadian market could absorb it. It was on this basis that the new company prepared its engineering and financing plans.

Last autumn, when it became apparent that sales in central Canada would not be sufficient in the early years to attract the private capital necessary to build the whole line, this government in association with the government of Ontario agreed, subject to approval of the respective legislative bodies, to construct and temporarily own the section from the Manitoba boundary to Kapuskasing, known as the northern Ontario section. The Ontario legislation was approved unanimously by the provincial parliament.

In passing, I note that members of the opposition have fallen into the habit of calling this the unproductive section. I suppose that when such hon. members water their gardens, they turn on the tap and walk down the garden path with the unattached nozzle in their hands. They would regard a connecting hose as unproductive.

Leaving that aside, it could reasonably be expected, and still can, that with the northern Ontario section removed from the initial capital requirements of the project, the whole project could be financed as soon as the export contract with the United States customers was approved.

We did not at that time expect extended delay in the approval of that contract by the federal power commission. Perhaps we should have, although I do not believe we could properly have assumed that there would be so long a delay. However, there has been, and there is no end clearly in sight. This is another fact with which we must deal. As I said on Tuesday, the government has decided so to arrange matters that the all-Canadian pipe line can proceed without awaiting the action of any agency of another government.

At first glance there might seem to be a number of ways in which this could be done. On closer examination, the practical choice is very limited.

We have heard a good deal in recent days about the McMahon proposal. Although it is now history, having been withdrawn, I should like to suggest to the house some of the reasons why it was never formally put forward by its sponsor, and why it could not have been accepted had it been presented formally. The immediate and overwhelming objection to his proposal was that it involved the export from the outset of 400 million cubic feet per day at Emerson, as compared to 200 million under the present plan. This would leave only 100 million a day for eastern Canada, an amount clearly insufficient to attract capital to construct the pipe line eastward from Winnipeg and quite inadequate for central Canadian requirements.

Second, Mr. McMahon had no gas purchase contracts, no sales contracts, no permits and no pipe. As you will have seen from the correspondence which has been tabled, he attempted to reassure me on the score of pipe, but the quantities and diameters he was able to specify were simply not consistent with the construction, even on a patchwork basis, of a line to central Canada in the time he specified.

The only way in which Mr. McMahon could have acquired the necessary contracts, permits and materials would have been to buy out Trans-Canada. Since he was backed by the U.S. firms which are opposing the present plan for marketing Canadian gas in the U.S. middle west, and since the gas producers with whom he would have had to do business to acquire gas supplies are the principal present shareholders of Trans-Canada, his prospects in that regard were not bright.

Mr. McMahon was optimistic about the price his United States associates could pay for gas, and assumed that they could, without delay, obtain federal power commission approval of their proposed contract with him. One of these associates, Northern Natural Gas Company, applied in January of 1955 for permission to import gas from Trans-Canada at a lower price than Mr. McMahon was proposing. That hearing was adjourned sine die mainly, it would appear, because of objections of some of the customers of Northern Natural that the price of Canadian gas was too high. We should by now have learned that it would be unwise to base Canadian action on a guess as to the outcome of any application before the federal power commission. Mr. McMahon himself would be the first to agree, in the light of the history of the Westcoast project. Incidentally, McMahon is selling his gas at 22 cents at the United States border, whereas the Trans-Canada contract calls for 25½ cents and upward.

All this being so, there was not much use pursuing the matter further, but there were other points on which I was sceptical, one being that Mr. McMahon never disclosed the proposed sources of his Canadian equity capital, or the definition of "Canadian" which would be applied to it. This proposal was never a starter, but it has confused the issue now before us, and it has confused the opposition in particular. If any hon. members have studied it as closely as I have they will, I am sure, agree with Mr. McMahon that it had now best be forgotten. The Ontario government apparently came to the same conclusion several months before we did.

Public ownership still seems to us to be unattractive. I have stated previously that the government foresees grave difficulty in trying to operate a pipe line on an economic basis with its constituents and shareholders at the producing end demanding higher field prices, and its constituents and shareholders in consuming areas demanding lower sale prices.

It also doubts the propriety of using taxpayers' funds to operate a gas business in competition with the privately-owned coal and oil industry. A study of gas pipe-line financing in North America and elsewhere discloses many examples of government assistance to private enterprise in the form of loans or cash contributions, but I have been unable to find any example of direct operation by a government of any extensive gas transmission system. In short, it would appear that all governments have reached the conclusion that the long range transmission of natural gas is a field for private enterprise, with government assistance if necessary, and not a field for government ownership and operation.

It may yet prove necessary for us to attempt government enterprise in this field, but we believe that every prudent alternative should be explored first. We are therefore not prepared at this time to take over the enterprise of Trans-Canada and go into the gas transmission business.

I have implied that taking over the enterprise of Trans-Canada would be the only way for us to enter immediately into this business. That is precisely true. If we were to start from scratch to build a government gas transmission system we would, like the McMahon proposal, face the time-consuming business of setting up an organization, securing permits to remove gas from Alberta and from the board of transport commissioners to construct a specific pipe line. We would have to acquire gas supplies, negotiate gas sales contracts and, if we wished to export gas, start the federal power commission procedure all over again. If we could do all these things overnight we still could not build a pipe line until 1958, because we could not get the pipe.

That brings me back to the third hard fact I stated when I began. There is in Canada only one agency which can be placed in a position to build the western part of the pipe line this year. That is Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. Some sections of the press, and some hon. members, are in the habit of referring to Trans-Canada as the government's "chosen instrument". The government has no chosen instrument. Trans-Canada is the only usable instrument available.

Perhaps because they are impatient with the delays that have occurred, some hon. members claim Trans-Canada has defaulted on its obligations. It is the only company which has permits from the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board to move gas eastward from Alberta. It is the only company which has a permit from the board of transport commissioners. It is the only company which has under contract gas supplies adequate to serve the central Canadian market and also an export market. It has sales contracts with many Canadian consumers. It has an organization of men experienced in pipe-line construction and operation.

Above all, it has pipe of the required 34-inch diameter ready to be delivered. As a result of the foresight of three of the main sponsors of Trans-Canada, namely Tennessee, Gulf Oil and Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas, this pipe was ordered last November and is now being produced and stored in the southern United States. It is owned by these three companies and an option on it is held by Trans-Canada, good until the end of the 1956 construction season. Unless that option is exercised, pipe will not be available for construction of the western section before the 1958 construction season.

It is very fortunate for all concerned that the pipe was ordered last November; otherwise today we should have no alternative but to wait. The present owners in ordering it took on an obligation of some $40 million in order that there would be no delay in starting construction and getting gas on its way to market once financing had been arranged. The option on the pipe was originally related to the approval by the federal power commission of the contract between Tennessee and Trans-Canada. It is now being formally altered to give Trans-Canada an option relating to the financial responsibility of Trans-Canada, that is, its ability to pay for the pipe when delivered, in accordance with informal understandings previously agreed upon between Trans-Canada and the owners of the pipe.

The effect of all this is that Trans-Canada, and Trans-Canada alone, now has all the factors other than money necessary to start construction this year. Financing by normal methods cannot be arranged in the absence of validation by the federal power commission of Trans-Canada's contract with Tennessee.

We are not content to wait further for the federal power commission's approval; we are not equipped or willing to build the line ourselves; we desire that the line be started this year, rather than in 1958. Therefore the only practical arrangement is to finance a start by Trans-Canada this year. That is what is proposed by the new part of this resolution. Trans-Canada might well have preferred to take its chances on securing federal power commission approval, completing its financing, and constructing its project in due course. In the absence of any alternative project, it might well have counted on success in this.

Trans-Canada did, in fact, express some reluctance to accept the terms on which we propose to finance the 1956 construction of the western section. Perhaps when hon. members study those terms they will understand why. Each shareholder is required to put at risk his full investment in the company in order to build a long stretch of pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg, which is a losing proposition unless it is completed to the United States or eastern Canada. The revenues from the sale of gas in western Canada will barely pay the operating expenses of the line, far less the interest and the depreciation. The company knows that unless it goes on to complete the line either southward or eastward by the spring of 1957 it stands to lose most, and perhaps all, of its investment. The investment now totals in excess of $15 million, and will be more before the western section is completed.

This is not a "heads I win, tails you lose" proposition for Trans-Canada. I have never been associated with any government policy of that kind and I never will be. Trans-Canada stands to lose several million dollars if it does not succeed in paying off the loan and building beyond Winnipeg.

If it does succeed in paying off the loan and building beyond Winnipeg, it has still a long way to go before it begins to reap any profit on its investment. If this were a sure thing I know plenty of people who would be only too willing to finance Trans-Canada today. The picture of this proposal as a scheme to provide vast profits for Texas buccaneers is a fantasy insulting to the most ordinary intelligence, and grossly insulting to the men who have sponsored this project with hard cash and hard work where most Canadians have been unwilling to venture.

As for the government, it is nothing out of pocket if the loan is repaid with interest at 5 per cent. Indeed, it makes a modest return on its investment. It is not by any stretch of the imagination a subsidy to Trans-Canada or a subsidy to the building of the pipe line. On the other hand, if the loan is not repaid the government gets the western section of the line, which would have to be built in any event, for 90 per cent of the cost. I consider that a bit of a bargain.

The legislation which this resolution seeks to introduce is in two parts: (1) A first part, identical with the original proposal, which would authorize the formation of a crown corporation to construct and lease to Trans-Canada the northern Ontario section of the all-Canadian natural gas pipe line. The agreements relating to this part of the legislation have already been tabled and fully explained. As the house is aware, I tabled some days ago the amendment extending this agreement to November 1, 1956, to conform to the extensions previously granted by the Alberta conservation board and the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. (2) A second part, authorizing the Minister of Finance to make an advance to Trans-Canada of 90 per cent of the cost of construction of the western section of the pipe line at going commercial rates of interest, and to take appropriate security.

When the legislation is approved the position will be as follows: (1) The government will be in a position to advance to Trans-Canada 90 per cent of the cost of construction of the western section, secured as I have described; (2) the advance will be made at going commercial rates for bank financing of a similar kind. Trans-Canada will undertake to repay this advance by April 2, 1957. (3) In the event of failure to repay by due date, the assets and shares of Trans-Canada will be taken over by the government, and the government will have the option of taking over the company as a going concern, on the terms I have stated, or of returning the unwanted assets and shares. The government is not required to take over Trans-Canada. It has a right to do so, but is under no obligation; (4) in the event that the Trans-Canada company is unable to repay the advance for the western section, the government will, as soon thereafter as possible, bring before parliament its further plans to ensure the completion of the all-Canadian line; (5) the government hopes, however, that the Trans-Canada company will be able to arrange the necessary financing for the whole line before the advance for the western section falls due. In that event the advance will be repaid and the government will proceed, as originally planned, to construct the northern Ontario section, which it will finance jointly with the government of Ontario, and to lease that section to Trans-Canada as part of the over-all project.

This is the proposal which the government commends to the house after prolonged and exhaustive study of every possible alternative. It offers an opportunity for an immediate start on construction. It gives the Trans-Canada company an adequate opportunity to demonstrate that it can finance the whole of the line. It ensures that the completion of the all-Canadian pipe line will not be further delayed by uncertainties about the decision of the federal power commission. It does not commit the government to public ownership, but it recognizes that if there are proven to be too many handicaps in the way of private enterprise, the government may have to take over and construct the whole of the line as a national enterprise.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Chairman, hon. members of the opposition appear to be greatly distressed by the fact that the capital which has so far been put into Trans-Canada is predominantly from the United States. They profess to see in this a "sell-out" of Canadian interests, and they have applied to those of the sponsors who come from the United States terms which one might expect to hear from a banana republic revolutionary, but not from any Canadian statesman.

Those who cry "sell-out" and "Texas buccaneer" are misrepresenting the facts. Also, as they have already found, apparently to their own surprise, they are scaring the goose that lays the golden eggs.

Mr. Rowe: Some goose!

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I repeat that the pipe line will be built wholly within Canadian territory. It cannot be built without a permit from the board of transport commissioners. Not a cubic foot of gas can be exported to the United States without a permit from the Canadian government. Prices to United States customers, by the terms of the export license itself, cannot be more advantageous to the buyer than those offered to Canadian customers. The entire project is subject to Canadian law. Parliament can at any time legislate whatever further regulations are considered to be in the national interest. In other words, an all-Canadian pipe line, whoever may own it, is completely under Canadian control.

The confusion of the Leader of the Opposition is illustrated by his complete misunderstanding of the really important and unusual provision which is being made by Trans-Canada in regard to its share marketing program. When I described this provision on March 15 the Leader of the Opposition sneered at it, using the terms "shallow pretence". He foresaw some juggling of share issues which would result in the offer of 51 per cent of the common stock to Canadians becoming meaningless. Now, I am more or less accustomed to the Leader of the Opposition accusing me of misleading the house, that being his idea of statesmanship, but his inability to understand a straightforward proposition continues to amaze me.

I wish to state again the proposal which Trans-Canada has made with regard to the issuance of shares. I shall do so in the words of the agreement among the sponsors. Section VI of that agreement states:

> Trans-Canada declares and agrees that its arrangements for the financing of the costs of construction of the west-east natural gas transmission line proposed to be built by Trans-Canada will include a public offering in Canada of common shares of Trans-Canada's presently unissued capital stock in an amount not less than 51 per cent of the total number of common shares of Trans-Canada to be outstanding after such offering has been made including the shares covered by such offering, and that it is Trans-Canada's intention to effect a wide distribution of such shares throughout Canada.

This is a solemn covenant, laid before this house and this country by the responsible companies who are sponsoring Trans-Canada. To suggest that its intent can be perverted by subsequent share issues is to reveal ignorance of the fact that before mortgage financing can be arranged, the equity capital must be stated and the related share issue registered and fixed in the trust deed or mortgage indenture.

Whenever I have mentioned this 51 per cent offer, I have taken care to point out that it does not guarantee control by Canadians. We cannot force Canadians to buy the shares or, having bought them, to keep them. Short of public ownership there is no way of guaranteeing Canadian control of the shares. If public ownership is what the official opposition want when they demand Canadian control, let them stand up and be counted with the party to their left, who at least advocate public ownership out of intellectual conviction, not out of intellectual confusion. I hear, however, that intellectual conviction on the part of Saskatchewan socialists stops short at gas and does not extend to cement plants.

If the Progressive Conservatives are not prepared to vote with the socialists, then let them have the grace to admit that this undertaking by Trans-Canada is most unusual in the provision it makes for whatever Canadian equity capital may desire to join in the venture. I repeat that, short of public ownership, it goes as far as could reasonably be asked to protect the Canadian interest.

In summing up, I submit that this is a prudent and practical proposal. Its purpose is to hasten the day when Alberta will have an adequate outlet for its surplus gas, and the day when the cities, towns and industries of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec within economic range will have access to this fuel. It is an undertaking of truly national scope, which we must either launch now or see languish for years to come. The means proposed are flexible, adaptable either to development by private enterprise, which is in keeping with the tradition and spirit of this country, or if necessary by public ownership, which though less attractive can still be moulded to our national needs.

Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that some hon. members prefer to obstruct this motion rather than debate it; therefore I beg to give notice that at the next sitting of the committee I shall move that the further consideration of this resolution shall be the first business of the committee and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. Knowles: The guillotine!

Some hon. Members: Dictatorship!

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this house has heard the threat of dictatorship this afternoon. This house has heard an expression of the concept of parliamentary procedure that is held by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Trade and Commerce a few minutes ago said, "Let the Conservatives admit that this proposal is most unusual". We do; without hesitation. We admit it is not only unusual, but we submit that it is the worst proposal ever put before this house and one which will damage Canada in the years ahead if it goes through.

An hon. Member: Is that why Premier Frost supports it?

Mr. Drew: There have been occasions recently when we have seen that the minister does not always prepare the statements which he reads in this house. Today it is quite certain that he did prepare this speech. No one else would have written it. No one else would have brought together such a complete confusion of conflicting statements about the subject that is now before us.

Last Tuesday the members of this house, including the Prime Minister, heard these words from the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> The action proposed today is another declaration of independence by Canada.

What tawdry and nauseating inversion of the truth. Those words and the self-conscious-evidence of highly organized applause which followed them were simply a clear and effective declaration of political and moral bankruptcy of the Liberal party. Whom do they really think they are fooling? This is a complete and clear sell-out which has no relation whatever to the original proposal, bad though that proposal was.

Since this chosen instrument of the government was embraced in the loving arms of the Minister of Trade and Commerce every step has been shrouded in chicanery, mystery and evasion. Not even the Prime Minister knew about the communications from Mr. McMahon until they were discussed in this house and until after Mr. McMahon had received instruction from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We still are waiting to hear what took place between Mr. McMahon and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We only have the communications from Mr. McMahon to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We do not know what the replies were. We do know there were replies. Today the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that Mr. McMahon was trying to reassure him in regard to the supply of pipe and other details. Reassure him? Why? Because the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been discussing these details with him here in Ottawa and elsewhere.

We saw no acknowledgments of those letters. Was there no statement to Mr. McMahon that would have interested this house, and above all was there no statement that would have interested the Prime Minister, the nominal head of the government? He had not heard of them. Everybody else had been reading about them in the press but he had not even heard about them from the minister who sits next to him. The minister of mines and resources—and after all these are resources—had not heard about them either except through the press.

An hon. Member: Get the title fixed.

An hon. Member: There is no minister of mines and resources.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys had not heard about them; yet that would certainly come under his department. As a matter of fact it would be much better under his department than under the present department. That would be a much more logical place.

The statements which have been made today are further examples of the way in which this house has been dealt with in regard to this whole subject. As far as this chosen instrument of the government is concerned, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is quite correct when he says that only one agency has been placed in position to proceed this year. He has taken good care of that. He has taken very good care of that. No one else has been permitted to take any part in these discussions. He talks about the difficulties that are being encountered, and he tells us that there are still great difficulties about obtaining permission from the federal power commission in connection with the export of gas to the United States. His words were, "There is no end clearly in sight."

Let us see just what that means. That means that in the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself there is nothing to indicate the possibility that financing can be arranged on the basis of permission to sell gas in the United States. Let us just examine what has actually happened in this case. We had before us for some time a resolution on the order paper to provide that a crown corporation be set up to be known as Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for the purpose of building a bridge through northern Ontario, which we were told was the difficult part of the line. Any suggestion that this area presented difficulty was not put forward in the first place in this house by any member of the opposition; it was put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as the only justification for that first proposal that public money should be put up to finance this venture.

Now we have something different; now we have something very different. We have a motion before us incorporating the same provision that the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation is to be set up for the purpose, amongst others, of constructing, maintaining and operating a natural gas pipe line between the Ontario-Manitoba border and Kapuskasing, Ontario, and of leasing with an option to purchase such natural gas pipe line to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and carrying out such leases, including the disposal by the corporation of such pipe line in connection with such purchase option, and to provide that the Minister of Finance may lend money to the corporation for such purposes.

The purpose is to set up a crown corporation to build this northern pipe line. Now we have something which completely defeats that purpose. We are told that in addition there is going to be an arrangement by which the money advanced to the crown corporation can be used for another purpose. That money, the money of the Canadian taxpayer, can be advanced to build a line in western Canada. Up to $80 million of the $130 million that will go to this crown corporation can be used for that purpose. Therefore the crown corporation will not have money left to proceed with the northern Ontario bridge. What is now before us defeats the very purpose that was first incorporated in this resolution.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has talked about a declaration of independence. This is a declaration of complete dependence. Why is the Minister of Trade and Commerce so interested in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines? Why has he refused to consider anything else? Why is that alone the chosen instrument of the government? Why will that alone be heard in any discussion that takes place? The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just told us in the last few minutes that closure is going to be moved tomorrow, that the guillotine is going to be applied.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I want to place on record the fact that Liberal members behind you and to the right are shouting "Hear, hear."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I repeat, there are loud "Hear, hears" from the Liberal members to the suggestion that closure be applied. I want that recorded in Hansard, because I want it known that it is not only the Minister of Trade and Commerce but that it is the Liberal party as a whole—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Well, one thing that is left without any uncertainty is that every Liberal member of this house shares the responsibility for the denial of ordinary parliamentary rights to the members of this House of Commons.

Mr. Garson: The Liberal party as a whole does not want another Drew power shortage in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Rowe: You created the shortage, your party in Ontario.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Justice knows as little about this as he knows about most other things of which he speaks. I am not going to remind him of certain power shortages there were in the province of Manitoba at a time he had some responsibilities there. There was a war on, and that had something to do with shortage of supplies—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That was long before.

Mr. Drew: —and that affected a great many people. But as far as the question of power shortages is concerned, may I say, in spite of the interference of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, we were able to build up power supplies in Ontario very satisfactorily under a Conservative government at that time.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has suggested that we should make perfectly clear where we stand. I shall make it perfectly clear. I made it clear on March 15, the one other day in this whole session when we have been permitted to debate this subject on a motion. This is what I said at that time, as recorded at page 2182 of Hansard:

> I want to put certain suggestions before the house and for the consideration of the government, in the hope that they may be prepared to listen to the words of the Prime Minister when he told the house last year that he did not like this method. First, refer the whole question immediately to a committee of this house to obtain the facts and make appropriate recommendations. Second, insist upon the reorganization of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines as an all-Canadian company which can proceed immediately and under Canadian control. Third, if Trans-Canada cannot carry out its undertaking, then open the whole matter and permit new interests to make their proposals for an all-Canadian line, Canadian controlled. Fourth, if it can be shown, and I doubt that it is so, that part of the pipe line must be built as the government asserts on this occasion, then instead of building a part which could become an orphan under certain circumstances in the future, let them build the whole pipe line and lease it for operation under Canadian control.

By one of these methods, Mr. Chairman, Canada's main gas pipe line can be returned to the control of Canadians as it should be. This is our chance here in the House of Commons to mark a turning point in the greater control by Canadians of their own resources. Let this be a declaration not only in relation to natural gas but in relation to our great resources generally, not in any spirit of selfishness, not in any narrow approach but rather with the idea that as trustees for future generations of Canadians, along with any export that may be carried out under wise and appropriate conservation and control, our main purpose will be the future welfare of Canadians themselves.

I repeat those words today. They are clear, they are understandable and they state our position. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines came into this with certain assurances. Let those assurances be carried out. They came into this whole venture with certain clear and explicit promises. Let those promises be carried out. In so far as that is concerned, if they cannot carry out those promises then let us have some alternative method.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce suggests now that there is dreadful urgency. We are waiting to hear from the Prime Minister. I hope that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce moves closure he will not shut off the Prime Minister. We have been waiting for four months to hear from the Prime Minister as to what are his views. We have a right to know his views. We have the right to know why it was he said last July that he did not like this third method, but he still is now going along with it and with an infinitely worse proposal that has been placed before us for consideration today.

After all, while we know that the real and effective head of this government on this occasion is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Prime Minister is the nominal head. The Prime Minister is answerable to the representative of the crown and to parliament, and in that capacity he has a duty to tell this house, and to tell the country through the ordinary channels available in this house, why he has changed his mind since last July and why he is now prepared to approve this improper proposal.

This house met on January 10, four months and four days ago. In the speech from the throne read that day the government stated clearly that there was going to be placed before this house a provision that would carry out the incorporation of a crown company to build a northern Ontario section of the pipe line. Here we are on May 14, and here we have this motion before us for the very first time; yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, "You will not have any debate; we shall move closure right away".

Any delay there has been has been the delay of the government. The issue that is now raised is the authority of parliament itself. Any member who is prepared to support a closure motion tomorrow denies the authority and responsibility of parliament and accepts something in the form of dictatorship in this house. Nothing could better expose in all it ugly nakedness the real concept of parliament held by the Minister of Trade and Commerce than that threat uttered today when there had not been one single speech made in response to his own.

Mr. Rowe: The first time since confederation?

Mr. McCann: How about 1932?

Mr. Rowe: No, you debated for weeks.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, where does all this idea of haste arise? This government forced through the incorporation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, its chosen instrument, in 1951, over five years ago.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, that is not true.

Mr. Drew: What is not true?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We did not do it in 1951. It was done in 1953, or 1954.

Mr. Drew: It was certainly incorporated in 1951.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Trans-Canada was, but the amalgamation was not.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is referring to something else. He is referring to the shotgun wedding that he performed between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and Western Pipe Lines. As sometimes happens in those cases where the bridegroom carries out the undertaking with a gun at his head, the bride is called upon to accept the name of the bridegroom, and that was what happened in this case. It was a shotgun wedding, and in these unholy bonds of matrimony Trans-Canada Pipe Lines moved forward under the blessing of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as the sole and only chosen instrument of this government. The sign was up for everybody else to keep off the grass, just as it was up for Mr. McMahon last week. We are still waiting to hear what that conversation with Mr. McMahon was when he so suddenly decided to withdraw his offer. We know he was warned off. We know he was told that the chosen instrument was going to be the only organization that would be permitted to go ahead.

Mr. Dickey: How do you know that?

Mr. McCann: That is a guess.

Mr. Rowe: You certainly do not know anything about it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): How do you know?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, how true it is when the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that only one agency has been placed in a position to proceed this year. Only one agency has been in a position to proceed at any time.

I want to refer to some of the comments made about Mr. McMahon in the speech by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He was rather scornful of Mr. McMahon today. Mr. McMahon is no fly by night promoter. Mr. McMahon happens to be the only Canadian who has financed a gas pipe line in Canada. Of course he is dependent on the government for certain considerations, and on that account he may be called upon to exercise certain caution in some of the things he does. But Mr. McMahon has actually been responsible for financing Westcoast Transmission, a venture that involved $153 million. He brought in a large amount of capital from the United States.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is bad.

Mr. Drew: May I hear what was said?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I say that is bad according to your views.

Mr. Drew: No, that is untrue, utterly untrue. That is another typical misrepresentation by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: And all the rest of you over there.

Mr. Drew: I am glad he has made that statement in front of me so I may brand it as a falsehood to his face.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall quote your Hamilton speech before we get through.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Rowe: You never read it. You just misrepresented it.

Mr. Drew: —apparently has been telling some people about that speech as well, I would gather from some of the things that have been said publicly on different occasions, and telling them inaccurately as is his custom. I would point out that in that Hamilton speech to which he refers I emphasized my belief that we should assure full protection to United States investment in this country but that I did not think it was anti-American for Canadians to show some concern about their own resources and their own welfare in the years ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his scornful reference to Mr. McMahon today says that Mr. McMahon never disclosed his definition of "Canadian". Mr. McMahon knows what a Canadian is. Perhaps that is what is wrong. He is a Canadian, born in Canada. He can define what a Canadian is by everything associated with his own life. He does not need any artificial definition of the word "Canadian".

Mr. Pickersgill: Some baby!

Mr. Hees: Well, if it isn't fisherman Jack.

Mr. Drew: It is worth while to have some lighter interjections in this debate by such comments as that just made, but this subject is not one that invites levity when you realize what the government is doing in handing over control of one of our greatest natural resources to investors outside of Canada.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): He will start braying pretty soon.

Mr. Drew: Just whom is this government trying to fool or, shall we say, whom is the Minister of Trade and Commerce trying to fool?

Mr. Dickey: Nobody.

Mr. Drew: On the one hand, he came forward the other day with a great show of boastfulness when he talked about what the government was willing to do and got some applause from some of his supporters when he talked about the possibilities of development under public ownership. He backs away from that today. He tells us today that he does not know of any case where there has been successful operation by a government of a gas pipe line. Of course he admits that he might be prepared to consider it if all else fails.

But I was interested in the fact that this was thrown forward as more than a casual remark. Just whom is he trying to fool? Trans-Canada Pipe Lines? His associates in the government? His supporters? I agree with the hon. member opposite who said he cannot fool anybody. In the end I think everybody will come to that conclusion. Nobody is being fooled by this pretence now before us. This is a sell-out under the power of the government. We were told on different occasions that Canadians could not finance this project. Just today we have been told of the reluctance of Canadians to support this venture. Well, Canadians are going to be forced to finance it. That is what the government is doing. Canadians are going to finance it, and then if Trans-Canada Pipe Lines are able for the first time to carry out one of their undertakings they will be in a position to benefit from the investment of Canadians. It will not be the Canadian investor who will benefit. Canada, through the agency of this government, will put up the money, and then an organization owned in the United States to the extent of 83 per cent is going to get the benefit of the Canadian investment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot fool us on that.

The minister came back again today to that fraud about the 51 per cent being offered to Canadians. There is no such provision. The agreement is clear on that point. It is obvious from some other public statements that have been made that others have been misled by the statement of the minister in that respect. There is no assurance whatever of Canadian control of this company, and there is not a chance that there would be Canadian control.

When we speak of control we have made it clear that we are not suggesting for one moment that we do not welcome investment. On the occasion when the Minister of Trade and Commerce introduced this motion I then, in response to an interjection by one of the Liberal members, referred to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I pointed out that in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway most of the money had come from outside Canada, in that case from Great Britain. In so far as investment from the United States is concerned, we welcome that investment and, as a matter of fact, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce makes the statements he does about my being opposed to investment from the United States he knows there is not a word of truth in them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: He knows that perfectly well because he remembers that when I was head of the government of Ontario I was effective in bringing into this country very considerable investment from the United States, with the result that new towns have grown up along the north shore of lake Superior where pulp and paper mills are operating today.

Mr. Rowe: Right near his own riding.

Mr. Drew: It is close enough to his own home for him to know what the facts are. He knows what the facts are and he knows perfectly well where that investment came from.

Mrs. Shipley: Will the Leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Drew: Certainly.

Mrs. Shipley: I should like to ask at what specific time the Minister of Trade and Commerce ever said or implied that the offer of 51 per cent of the stock to Canadians would guarantee control.

Mr. Drew: The minister again today repeated the statement that 51 per cent would be offered in Canada, and I repeat that is not so.

Mrs. Shipley: I refer to the guarantee of control that you just mentioned.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is adding a statement that was not made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I have repeated again that the minister has repeated his statement that there is an assurance that 51 per cent will be offered to Canadians, and there is no such assurance; and I repeat—

An hon. Member: You just said it now.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has placed clearly on record what he said and it is wrong, and the inaccuracy has been repeated again today. This proposal before us is certainly as neat a piece of juggling as we have seen in this house.

I hope the minister will reconsider his decision to have closure tomorrow; I hope the minister will reconsider his decision to apply the guillotine, because we should like to hear from some of the ministers opposite as well as the Prime Minister. I should like to hear the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys tell us about how ardently he supported this proposal when it came out. I should like to hear from the Minister of Transport the extent to which he expressed his belief that this was a good idea. Of course this matter might well be under the Department of Transport, because it is transport. I should like to hear from the Minister of Finance just how enthusiastic he is about this proposal. I should like to hear from him how well he likes the idea of Canadian taxpayers' money being put up to assure the control of one of our greatest resources by investors in the United States.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We should like to hear from the hon. member for Calgary South.

An hon. Member: We should like to hear from the premier of Ontario.

Mr. Drew: We should like, first of all, to hear from the Prime Minister, and I trust that we shall hear from him. We have a right to hear from him, because after all it was a statement of the government that this measure was going to be introduced in its original form, a form he told us last July he did not like. Now we have a new form, a much more objectionable form, and we certainly are entitled to an explanation by the Prime Minister as to why this measure is before us in its present form.

But let us go back to the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in trying to compare with others this undertaking where he juggles the funds of the crown corporation to be used for the building of the northern Ontario pipe line so that they are to be used for something entirely different.

Let us just examine this proposal. He compared it with the great venture of the development of the St. Lawrence. There is no comparison whatever. Canada and the United States are working in effective partnership on that project. Then some have compared this proposal with the great venture of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is a great difference there. The one thing Sir John A. Macdonald was at all times determined would not happen was that the Canadian Pacific Railway would be tributary to the United States or United States interests. He was determined that it would be a Canadian venture for the benefit of Canadians and that it would not funnel our resources into the United States as will this venture which has been the result of the shotgun marriage performed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There could not possibly be a greater contrast between two enterprises than between the development of the Canadian Pacific Railway—that great Canadian venture under the guidance of Sir John A. Macdonald—and this shabby sell-out to interests in the United States at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. MacDougall: That is for you to prove.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I shall be continuing my remarks after the six o'clock recess, but before then I want to make one thing perfectly clear. This well-trained noise and intervention by hon. members on the opposite side—

Mr. Knowles: On which there is no closure.

Mr. Drew: —and the organized applause of statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon which there is no closure certainly will not deter us in any way from asserting our position. We have heard the boasts of the Prime Minister and his supporters about the support they have in the country. Very well. Let them test that support.

Mr. Rowe: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: The people of Canada have had no chance to assert an opinion in regard to this matter.

Mr. Rowe: You can't put closure on them.

Mr. Drew: The people of Canada are still in a position where this government cannot invoke closure in their case. The people of Canada are still free to assert their opinion. Let it be remembered that when the C.P.R. was under development the people of Canada did have a chance to express their opinion, and they expressed it in no uncertain manner because they knew it was a Canadian venture.

An hon. Member: They threw the Tories out.

Mr. Drew: It was started by Sir John Macdonald. Sir John Macdonald spoke on behalf of that venture as I hope the Prime Minister of Canada today will speak with regard to the measure that is now before us.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: We have heard many of these boasts from the opposite side. Let us have a test of their vaunted courage.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock I do leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the unusual procedure followed by the government today in indicating closure tomorrow gives a different direction than might otherwise have been the case. As I had occasion to point out earlier, this subject was first placed before members of parliament on January 10. We waited until March 15 for the subject to be brought forward by the resolution which now stands as No. 12 on the order paper. There was one day's debate on that resolution to set up a crown corporation. We had waited since then until May 14 for the new resolution to be brought forward. The opposition has indicated over and over again that it wished to discuss this subject. It has sought information. By questions it has tried to find out what was going on. It is true that there have been procedural discussions based on various questions that have been raised and also on the formal introduction of the motion, but this is the first day in a session of over four months that we have even been seized of the motion which is now under discussion.

There is no precedent in our parliamentary records for the course which is now to be followed. Not only was there haste in indicating closure on the very proper discussion as to whether it is or is not advisable that this form of measure be introduced, but even before the minister who introduced the motion had completed his first speech on the motion he indicated that debate is to be terminated.

Closure has taken place in this house before. It was first applied in the discussion of the navy bill in the session of 1912-13. That bill was introduced on December 5, 1912. Those who have followed the history of our parliament will recall that there was a prolonged debate carried on most vigorously on both sides, and closure was applied only on April 10, 1913. Then in 1917 there was a bill guaranteeing certain Canadian National Railway bonds. In that case closure was applied on third reading and only on third reading, after the whole processes of debate had been exhausted in the ordinary way.

Again in 1917, closure was applied on second reading of the wartime elections act, and later in the committee stage and on third reading. In the first session of 1919 the Canadian National Railways bill was before the house and closure was applied after there had been a full discussion on the second reading stage and in committee of the whole. Again in 1921, on an interim supply motion, closure was applied when it was made clear that the opposition was not going to allow it to go through. Again in 1926, in the debate on the address, there was closure. In 1932 closure was again moved. In that instance it was moved after there had been considerable debate.

An hon. Member: What was the subject?

Mr. Drew: The subject was a very interesting one, I am sure, to the hon. member. It was unemployment relief. The unemployment relief bill had been introduced by the Bennett government and at that time it was being opposed by the Liberal party.

Mr. Lesage: Twenty cents a day.

Mr. Rowe: Your party would not give them a 5-cent piece.

Mr. Lesage: Twenty cents a day.

Mr. Rowe: You would not give them five cents.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): One at a time.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Blast your way into—

Mr. Drew: I have mentioned this, recognizing that closure has been applied in this house as it has been applied at Westminster under certain circumstances. But there is no single case where a minister has come forward in the very initial stages and said: "We place before you the proposition that it is expedient that this bill be introduced and we are going to move right away to stop any debate on this subject".

Mr. Robichaud: After seven votes.

Mr. Drew: I hear an hon. member opposite say after seven votes. If the hon. member was in the house—

Mr. McIlraith: He was.

Mr. Robichaud: And voted seven times.

Mr. Drew: —he knows perfectly well that those votes were not taken on this motion.

Mr. Lesage: It was obstruction.

Mr. Rowe: He never noticed that.

Mr. Drew: I think some of the hon. members opposite—

Mr. Robichaud: Taken to prevent debate.

Mr. Drew: —have been unaware of what has taken place.

Mr. Rowe: They usually are.

Mr. Hees: They just do what they are told.

The Chairman: Order. I must remind hon. members that the Leader of the Opposition has the floor and he may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. MacDougall: The Leader of the Opposition himself is laughing at that one.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am in the fortunate position where I shall be able to make my point without being forced to proceed with any haste, just in case any of the hon. members opposite may not be able to hear me. Should it happen that at any time I feel they are not likely to hear me I shall make appropriate pauses.

Mr. Dickey: The pause that refreshes.

Mr. Gardiner: You are preventing every other one from speaking.

Mr. Rowe: You have done all right; you have put on closure.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Agriculture, the expert on Hansard—

Mr. Gardiner: He will be on Hansard a long time after you are forgotten.

Mr. Drew: —has just made an interjection which I have no doubt will not be expurgated in this instance; but he has interjected the remark that I am making it impossible for others to debate. I am not making it impossible for anyone to debate.

Mr. Gardiner: The longer you speak the fewer people will be able to speak.

Mr. Drew: I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be able to persuade the Prime Minister to withdraw the guillotine and permit continued debate on this very proper motion now before the house.

Mr. Hees: They do not talk much.

Mr. Drew: In any event, there is going to be the opportunity tomorrow before the guillotine falls for those who wish to do so to express their opinions and I, of course, am counting on hearing from the Prime Minister at that time. I would not for a moment follow a course that was going to deprive us of that opportunity.

Mr. Gardiner: That is what you were just threatening to do, waste time.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman. As reluctant as I am to do so, I cannot help noticing the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture that I am trying to stop debate. Who introduced the closure motion? I think he must have been dreaming.

Mr. Gardiner: You did it last Thursday.

Mr. Hees: He was not in the house.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I voted on all those occasions.

Mr. Fulton: Back in 1917.

Mr. Drew: There was no closure motion, and there was and is a full opportunity for every member of the government to have his say in an orderly debate in regard to this subject.

Mr. Rowe: Not now.

Mr. Drew: And I certainly would hope that the Minister of Agriculture would avail himself of the time that may present itself this evening to persuade the Minister of Trade and Commerce to permit him to tell us just why he was so keen on this strange new device.

Mr. Gardiner: I will tell you a lot of other things if I get up.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Chairman, every one of us knows the minister would talk about a lot of other things, because he never talks about the thing that is on the order paper when he does get up.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is certainly an example of the pot calling the kettle black.

Mr. Gardiner: I usually keep in order, in any event.

Mr. Rowe: You keep in order but you do not get in order.

Mr. Drew: We will let Hansard speak as to that. What would be interesting, though, would be to hear the Minister of Agriculture get up and explain exactly why he thinks the government should transfer funds that were to be allocated to a crown corporation set up for the purpose of building a northern Ontario pipe line—

Mr. Gardiner: You tell us why it shouldn't; you have the floor.

Mr. Drew: —to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines for the construction of the western segment of that line. I would like the Minister of Agriculture to get up and explain how he reconciles that with the refusal of this government to spend the money that is necessary on the South Saskatchewan river dam, to give some assistance to his own province. The Minister of Agriculture has been dangling that bait before the people of Saskatchewan for several elections, but he has not been as successful in forcing his ideas through the government as has the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

An hon. Member: He is losing his grip.

Mr. Drew: There are some of us who do not live in Saskatchewan who believe that the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project is long overdue.

The Chairman: Order. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would agree with me that a discussion of the South Saskatchewan dam is not in order under this resolution which has to do with pipe lines, and I would ask him to co-operate with me in that respect.

Mr. Drew: Oh, Mr. Chairman, it might easily be very important, because if the Minister of Agriculture were as successful in persuading the government as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been, who knows but that the power developed by the South Saskatchewan dam might be used for some of the operations of the pipe line that will be passing through Saskatchewan? Oh, no; it is quite possible that the two might be complementary.

In any event, we have on the one hand the mad haste of this government to end the debate even before it has started—

An hon. Member: You call this a debate?

Mr. Drew: —and to deny to the people of the minister's own province consideration by the government in regard to something which the people of that province feel is just as important as this venture that is now being undertaken. I am glad the Minister of Agriculture has shown this interest, and I hope there will be an opportunity to hear from him at some later stage during this debate an explanation of his support of this project.

Now, Mr. Chairman, had it not been for this utterly unprecedented foreclosure of debate—and I use the word foreclosure advisedly—

An hon. Member: They will do it four times.

Mr. Drew: —because this is an attempt to mortgage the rights of free speech in this house without the opportunity of redemption; because of that course I find it necessary to review at greater length than I had intended some of the proceedings that have taken place and which should be on record before the axe falls.

We have come today to another stage, and only another stage, of the twisted and devious dealings of this government in connection with the building of the gas pipe line from Alberta to Montreal. At no stage of these proceedings right up to and including today has the government been frank with the members of this house. At no time has that lack of frankness been so conspicuous as it was today.

This session began with the statement to the members of this house that there would be the construction of a line across northern Ontario to connect the lines in western and eastern Canada. May I recall to hon. members the exact words that were used in the statement by the government right in the speech from the throne. Trans-Canada was, and I quote the words, "to build connecting lines in western and eastern Canada". Then this northern Ontario bridge was to connect them.

Where has any of that construction gone ahead? Where is there any suggestion of it going ahead? We have been waiting for a long time to see some evidence that it would go ahead on the basis of the completely unqualified undertaking given by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines when they were incorporated five years ago. There was no possible justification for the course originally indicated in the speech from the throne. We made that clear when this came up on March 15; but if that was unjustified, what is to be said of this weird proposal now before us?

Let us recall the agreement that was made available to the members of this house at the beginning of this session. On January 11 an agreement between the government of Canada and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was made available to hon. members of this house. These words appeared in the preamble:

> And whereas Trans-Canada proposes to construct between October 1, 1955, and November 1, 1956 a 34-inch pipe line from a point on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to the vicinity of Winnipeg, Manitoba, with a lateral line from the vicinity of Winnipeg to Emerson, Manitoba, and a 24-inch pipe line from Sheridan to Brooklin, Ontario, and a 20-inch line from Brooklin to Ste. Anne de Bellevue in the vicinity of Montreal, Quebec, with a lateral from Morrisburg to the vicinity of Ottawa, Ontario;
> And whereas Trans-Canada proposes to construct between October 1, 1955 and November 1, 1957 a 30-inch pipe line from the vicinity of Winnipeg, Manitoba, to the Manitoba-Ontario border, and from the vicinity of Kapuskasing, Ontario to Brooklin, Ontario;
> And whereas Trans-Canada proposes to arrange for financing of all its costs and commitments in connection with the said program of construction prior to May 1, 1956;
> Now therefore this agreement witnesseth
> 1. Trans-Canada will diligently take steps to secure all necessary financing, materials and supplies for and, having obtained same, will carry out the aforesaid program of construction and particularly will cause to be constructed in conjunction with the construction of the said northern Ontario section of the said all-Canadian pipe line the portions thereof from the vicinity of Winnipeg, Manitoba to the Manitoba-Ontario border, and from the vicinity of Kapuskasing, Ontario to Brooklin, Ontario, so that all portions of the said pipe line to be constructed by Trans-Canada will be ready for operation at the time of completion of the northern Ontario section.

All the conditions now present were known at the time the agreement was tabled on January 11. The difficulties of obtaining permission from the federal power commission in Washington were fully known, just as fully known as they are today. Trans-Canada has failed in the basic undertakings upon which the whole agreement was predicated. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that Trans-Canada has all the factors other than money. They have the desire, but not the money. So the government is going to provide the money, the taxpayers' money of course. Trans-Canada has all the factors other than the money.

What was the reason Trans-Canada got the franchise in the first place? It was because they had the money. That was the reason, not because the government liked the colour of their eyes or their names. All the fondness for some of these individuals that has been displayed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce would hardly indicate any explainable reason why they got these special concessions.

We are now presented with a new agreement extending the earlier agreement and proposing something so foreign to every assurance given by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines in the first instance that it is extremely difficult to believe we are dealing with the same organization when we discuss this subject.

What is now proposed is that we go through the form of approving the creation of a crown company to build the northern Ontario bridge. That is not what we are actually considering, of course, under this new proposal. What we are actually considering is a double shuffle by which the government goes through the motions of setting up a crown corporation, asks parliament to authorize the advance of $130 million and then makes the further provision that from that $130 million $80 million may be advanced, not by the minister as he said this afternoon but by the crown corporation to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, for the construction of part of the western line. That is what is being done.

In the very process of advancing that $80 million they deny themselves the possibility of constructing the northern Ontario pipe line because they will not have the money to do it. That is the situation. Of course we know perfectly well what would happen. We would be asked for another concession at some future date. Remember, this is not the whole pipe line to tie up with the northern Ontario pipe line. This goes as far as Winnipeg, so there is left a stretch of 110 miles. What is the government going to do about that? Trans-Canada has everything but money, so when the 110 miles are to be built doubtless they will come back for money again. I wonder what patriotic appeal the Minister of Trade and Commerce will make at the time that application is before us.

No, this proposal is one that defeats the intention of the original resolution. This proposal is one that takes away money needed for the northern Ontario line. In spite of anything that may be said inside this house or outside of it, what is now proposed delays the construction of the northern Ontario pipe line.

Before we proceed further let me refer to the reasons I have indicated for hearing from the Prime Minister. We have a right to know just exactly why the government even goes through this pretence. Why does the government not simply ask for the authorization to advance money for the construction of the pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg? Why go through this mumbo-jumbo of setting up a crown company and then authorize that crown company to do something that is not contemplated in its declared purposes, advance money for the construction of a pipe line in another part of Canada?

According to the government, the reason for the setting up of the crown company in the first instance was that this was a difficult venture. We were told that this presented the same difficulty that the C.P.R. had had to overcome, but that problem was faced with courage by Sir John Macdonald and that railroad was completed under private enterprise without any double dealing of this kind.

In this particular case they cannot even follow the normal method for building the easiest part of the whole line from the Alberta boundary to Montreal. Of the whole line this is the easiest part and they cannot finance that, though in the first instance they were going to finance the whole thing. When we are confronted with this it becomes necessary, unwilling though we may be to take the time to do it, to review the grounds upon which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines got this authority. Even if it is necessary to repeat some of the things that have been said, that must be done to keep the context of the record in such shape that no one will be under any misapprehension as to why this chosen instrument of the government is in this peculiarly favoured position at the present time.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines came before this house in 1951, as I pointed out earlier today. They undertook to build the line without government assistance. There was no suggestion that money would be put up by the people of Canada. When the matter was before the house the house was told that this would be done without any financial assistance from the government. One of the things it is essential to remember is that when Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was incorporated it was incorporated for the purpose of building a line entirely within Canada and simply for the supplying of gas within Canada itself. The government must accept full responsibility for the support of that proposition at that time. Export only came later after the shotgun marriage. Up to that time the whole proposition had been one that was based upon the sale of gas in Canada.

Therefore we have an entirely different situation today, and one which raises many issues. What has come up today and what is now proposed raises a number of issues which should be borne in mind by the members of this house as well as the people outside. First is the authority of parliament itself, challenged as it has been in such dictatorial manner by the threat of closure at this stage of the discussion of the motion.

Second is the fact that Canadian taxpayers' money is to be used to finance the venture, of which 83 per cent is owned in the United States by United States gas interests whose primary concern is the sale of gas in the United States at the lowest possible rates to the United States consumers.

Third is the fact that a bad proposal which the Prime Minister said last July he did not like has been made unbelievably worse.

Fourth is the delay in proceeding with the venture. The government has had five years to arrange the details, and now with a deadline of June 7 parliament is confronted on May 14 with a new and strange device without precedent in the history of the Canadian House of Commons.

Fifth is the refusal to let Canadians have a chance. At least two very responsible Canadians have made proposals at a time when Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was in default. It is certain that if the extraordinary terms now suggested had been known publicly, many Canadians would have welcomed those terms.

Sixth is the fact that although we were told that Canadians could not finance this venture, it is now clear that Canadians are going to be called upon to finance the whole venture and turn over the benefits to an organization owned by United States investors to the extent of 83 per cent.

Seventh is that the present proposal assures no continuing pipe line into eastern Canada, and instead of expediting the construction of the line that will bring gas to eastern Ontario and Quebec, it merely constructs that part of the pipe line which will assure the facilities for export to the United States.

Eighth, and perhaps most important, is that the government proposes to use Canadian taxpayers' money to hand over control of one of our basic resources to gas and financial interests in the United States whose main concern is the gas market of the United States and not the sale of gas in Canada or the welfare of the people of this country.

There are other issues which arise, but there are eight clear issues which arise out of what has come before us. Canadians were not given the chance. Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce, does the Prime Minister, or does any member opposite suggest for one moment that if a public statement had been made that anyone who undertook this venture was going to get 90 cents on the dollar of the taxpayers' money to finance it, there would not have been a rush of Canadians asking for the chance to build this pipe line? Are we so devoid of initiative as a people, are we so completely incapable of undertaking great developments, that Canadians would not have welcomed a chance of that kind? Of course the answer is no. On all sides we see Canadians who are carrying out great developments.

We are told over and over again that while there is considerable investment from outside of Canada in this country, some 83 per cent of the capital invested in Canada since the war has come from Canadians. That is true, but the trouble is that a very large part of that 83 per cent is in static developments like houses, factory buildings, highways, power plants and things of that kind, but the use of resources and the opening of new ventures has very largely been the result of investment from outside Canada.

One of the reasons so much capital from outside of Canada has gone into those investments, while Canadian capital has been going into what might be regarded as more secure ventures, is that the tax policies of this government favour foreign operators as against Canadians. This government well knows that foreign operators competing in Canada against Canadians are allowed a higher write-off on their capital possessions, are allowed favourable tax considerations, which place those people from outside of Canada at an actual advantage here in Canada as against Canadians trying to do the same job. This government has actually been helping people outside Canada not merely to invest in Canada but to take work and business from Canadians by their unfavourable tax legislation. No, this is something in which Canadians would have welcomed the opportunity.

Then again, we are told about the need for haste, that we cannot even wait beyond tomorrow to have this resolution dealt with. We have been waiting for over five years and, as far as this session is concerned, we have been waiting for over four months. Now for the first day we have this motion before us, and we are told that this will be our last. That is just how urgent this was. Of course, the deadline is June 7. What humbug! Does anybody think for a moment that June 7 will be the limit if the debate is not completed by that time? These people are getting the money. You can just see them waiting to get it.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): With their tongues hanging out.

Mr. Drew: Their tongues are hanging out. Their pockets will be hanging out, as far as Canadians are concerned, if this goes on. But in the meantime let nobody be impressed with these artificial deadlines. This government has had this in its hands for over five years, and it is to be hoped that no hon. member in this house and no Canadian outside it will be impressed by this bogus haste that is now put before us.

An hon. Member: Mr. Frost.

Mr. Drew: Let us also hope, in spite of some of these interjections, some of which I have no doubt Hansard cannot quite get, that we will not hear any more twaddle about the opposition being opposed to investments from the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: What, again?

Mr. Drew: It would not have been quite right if the anvil chorus had lacked the voice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It did not in that case, because I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce giving the lead to the senseless noise that was made just now when I said those words. No, the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows perfectly well that any suggestion that we have opposed such investment is utterly untrue and deliberately untrue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: No well-informed Canadian is unaware of the fact that this country has been dependent upon outside investment, not only from the United States but from Britain and from other countries as well. We are not talking about investment from the United States on this occasion. We are talking about investment of Canadian money, the Canadian taxpayers' money, in a venture which is then to be handed over to United States control by this government. That is what we are talking about.

An hon. Member: Unquote.

Mr. Drew: Once again may I ask if any of the members of this house, in spite of the sounds they think it is appropriate to make under the circumstances, really think that any such proposal as this for the advancing of United States funds to finance a similar Canadian venture in the United States would even be heard on the floor of congress in Washington? Even the loudest and noisiest of the members opposite knows perfectly well that any such proposal before the congress of the United States would be greeted with laughter that would be heard by the Americans on the D.E.W. line in the north.

Mr. Rowe: It would not even be heard on the streets of New York, let alone in congress.

Mr. Drew: I have said that the first issue raised is the authority of parliament itself, and that is before us in all its reality. Every hon. member knew that the agreement with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines called for the completion of its financing by April 30. Certainly it was of the utmost importance to the members of this house, and particularly to the government, that any alternative proposal should be made known and given consideration.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has gone out to find the McMahon letters now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: That is pretty cheap.

Mr. Hees: Let us know if you find them.

Mr. Drew: I hope he will find them, and I hope he will find the replies he sent to Mr. McMahon. We would have liked to have that information, and I think the Prime Minister might have liked to have it.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Agriculture would have liked to have it too.

Mr. Drew: Nevertheless, in answer to a direct question in regard to proposals from Mr. Frank McMahon of Calgary—

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Drew: I hear from someone opposite, "Who is he?" Ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has been dealing with him for some time.

Mr. Rowe: Does he not tell you anything?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Some hon. Members: Ask Frost.

Mr. Rowe: Does he not tell you anything at all?

Some hon. Members: Ask Frost.

An hon. Member: You had better brighten up.

Mr. Rowe: Has the minister told you?

The Chairman: Order. May I remind hon. members once more that it is very difficult to hear the hon. member who has the floor unless they give him complete order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I shall do my best to make sure they hear me. I assure you I shall pause an adequate length of time so that my remarks may be heard.

An hon. Member: Until ten, George?

An hon. Member: You are going to pause after the next election too.

Mr. Rowe: You just pause naturally for noise. You have nothing else to contribute.

Mr. Drew: Actually it is restful to have these pauses once in a while, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: In answer to a direct question in the house the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he had no written communications from Mr. McMahon. I think we are still owed an explanation by the Prime Minister with regard to that statement, which was incorrect and which deserves an explanation in the house.

An hon. Member: It was private and confidential.

Mr. Drew: Later it turned out that in addition to personal discussion of the subject on different occasions, not just on March 27, Mr. McMahon had written to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on April 4, on April 16 and on April 24, making the most positive proposals.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Ask Frost.

Mr. Drew: May I suggest to some of the hon. members that they get a copy of the correspondence and read it so they may find how positive these proposals were. May I remind them also, as I have on earlier occasions, that the man we are discussing is the only Canadian who has yet organized and financed a gas pipe line in Canada, and he has done so successfully. May I also point out that his undertaking was sufficiently positive that he gave an unqualified undertaking to post a $500,000 personal bond for the fulfilment of that undertaking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I hear laughter.

An hon. Member: He withdrew after that.

Mr. Drew: The Prime Minister suggested that this was not such a very large sum in relation to such a big venture. It was just exactly $500,000 more than anyone connected with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has pledged in connection with the line.

An hon. Member: That is not correct.

Mr. Dickey: They are pledging $15 million.

Mr. Rowe: What's a million to your crowd anyway?

An hon. Member: Here comes "what's a million" Howe.

Mr. Drew: The nature of the communications makes it perfectly clear that they were not private and confidential, no matter what appeared on the letters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: That is the way you treat it.

An hon. Member: It would not be to you.

Mr. Drew: I hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has just returned, say "It would not be to you".

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. Drew: I am told it was one of his supporters who made the statement. It was one of the parliamentary assistants who made it. The fact is that these were not private and confidential. No writing of "private and confidential" on them could make proposals to a member of the government anything but public proposals, and no one knows that better than the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In any event, if he felt himself under any such limitation his duty then was to do what he did on May 3 and ask for the withdrawal of any limitation. He knew he could get it. He got it very quickly on May 3.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I received lots of withdrawals.

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes, the minister got a lot more than a withdrawal. He got Mr. McMahon out of the way as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: It was the duty of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he felt he was under any limitation, to communicate with Mr. McMahon, who had demonstrated his ability in this field, and tell him that these were communications to a government. Of course, as far as that is concerned, they had not been kept private and confidential. The minister had officials of his department in on the discussions. This matter had not been private and confidential. It was in the press.

An hon. Member: You had a copy?

Mr. Drew: It was being discussed by everyone except the Prime Minister, who did not know about it. This was public knowledge. It is certain that at any time the minister could have had that undertaking removed, just as he so successfully did on May 3.

But there is a good deal more to this than the contempt of parliament displayed by the reply of the Minister of Trade and Commerce which was so contrary to the truth. At the very time these discussions were taking place and the Minister of Trade and Commerce was receiving positive proposals, the government was considering the fact that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was not going to be in a position to carry out its undertaking. Surely that was a time when the Prime Minister should have been informed that a man who had had some experience in financing pipe lines was asking for the opportunity to take some part in this venture, at a time when they were discussing new arrangements. That was the very time he should have known. Yet we have the strange situation that although the government were meeting almost daily in council the Prime Minister was not informed about these positive proposals, although a new arrangement with Trans-Canada was then under discussion. I am not arguing on behalf of any individual or any company.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no?

Mr. Drew: I do say that there were two proposals put forward by two responsible Canadians, and that those or any other proposals deserved the attention of the government at a time when it was extending earlier agreements and particularly at a time when it was considering the possibility of asking parliament to put up the Canadian taxpayers' money to finance an undertaking which would hand over the control of one of our greatest resources to a company which is now owned to the extent of 83 per cent by investors in the United States.

I have no way of knowing what the discussions were that took place with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do know that Gairdner and Company, who made one of the proposals, are a very responsible financial organization. I do know that it was an organization sufficiently responsible that this government sought its voluntary services during the critical days of war in very important activities. I know that their proposals, whatever they were, whether they were proposals which should or should not have been accepted, deserved consideration. In fact I think proposals from any responsible Canadian at a time when the whole thing was in the air certainly deserved consideration, and that we as well as the Prime Minister had a right to know something about them. For all we know there may be other proposals which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is keeping to himself.

But certainly the proposal of Mr. Frank McMahon deserved consideration, whether that consideration would have led to a favourable or unfavourable decision from his point of view. I say that simply because he is a man with experience in that field and had set out to the government in detail where he was going to get 34-inch pipe this year, where he was going to get 30-inch pipe next year and the 24-inch pipe as well. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said nothing which in any way challenges the accuracy of this statement.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, he has.

Mr. Drew: Mr. McMahon had that experience. Mr. McMahon had lived up to some of his undertakings. I think also when we are told about the formidable barrier through northern Ontario, most people who have seen them will agree that the Rocky Mountains present just as rugged a barrier as do the stretches of northern Ontario. That was carried out by private investment. To those who still are following the instructions given in caucus last Wednesday about the way in which they should applaud the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Fulton: Last Tuesday.

Mr. Drew: —or last Tuesday, may I tell them just how positive some of those statements were in case they have not read them. The opening paragraph of Mr. McMahon's memorandum of April 4 to the Canadian government indicates clearly that this was no casual and general discussion. These were the opening words of that formal memorandum:

> 1. I will finance and construct an economically feasible gas pipe line from Alberta to Montreal and complete the same by 1958 without federal or provincial ownership or debt guarantee.

Whether or not that can be carried out, it was not vague and uncertain, and at least the man who was putting that proposition forward had enough confidence to undertake to put up a $500,000 personal cash bond. Mr. McMahon then goes on in that memorandum of April 4 to say that he would complete a 34-inch pipe line to Winnipeg by late 1956 or early 1957. That is the statement of the man who has done the organizing and financing of a gas pipe-line company and who knows more about it than does the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who pooh-poohed that suggestion today.

He also spoke of contracts for gas production and said their organization was in a position to put up $40 million to $45 million in equity capital and to arrange loans to provide for some $80 million required for the construction of a pipe line to Winnipeg. The Minister of Trade and Commerce brushed that off scornfully today. This is the man who did put up equity capital in the case of Westcoast Transmission, and who got a large and important investing organization in the United States to put up their money in the belief that it was a sound venture.

An hon. Member: American capital.

Mr. Drew: Certainly it was American capital, and it was very sound American capital coming in here under an organization which, contrary to this arrangement, retained control of the organization in Canada. That was a definite enough proposal.

Whether or not it was the best proposal, we do not know. The Minister of Trade and Commerce may have another one up his sleeve along with a letter from his sister. We do not know that. However, we know that he held one back, and we know that he has had two offers which should have been discussed. It certainly was a proposal that, above all other times, should have received consideration before April 30. It certainly was a proposal that should have been indicated to this house as well as to the Prime Minister.

At the very beginning of this session, and several times since then, I have urged that this whole matter be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, which is the committee to which such matters are referred; or, if the government preferred a select committee to obtain all the facts, then that they appoint a select committee. If that had been done the facts would now be available. If that had been done we would have known of the McMahon proposal long ago. If that had been done we would have had a chance to have evidence before us prior to April 30, and so would the Prime Minister. We also would have been able to consider the Gardiner proposal. Furthermore, we could have considered any other proposals that would certainly have come before us if that committee had been set up for this purpose.

Perhaps once again we shall have some question raised as to Mr. McMahon's withdrawal. We all know why Mr. McMahon withdrew. He was warned off. That is the reason. That in itself should be a warning of the danger in the present situation, and the danger in the power exercised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mrs. Shipley: Prove that statement.

Mr. Drew: If there was one person who had a right to know about that proposal before any extension of the Trans-Canada Pipe Line agreement was completed, it was certainly the Prime Minister himself and the other members of the government associated with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In fact, one thing about which this house deserves some information is why the Prime Minister showed so little interest in this subject. It is not only worthy of comment but it is worthy of explanation.

What we see disclosed here is personal government, one-man government; and it is time to mention something else that is raised by this fact. Centred in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are a number of activities that have no place in his department, and this is one of them. We have T.C.A. under his department when it should be under the Department of Transport. We have under his department other activities which should be in the hands of ministers whose responsibilities are associated with those activities. We have the Minister of Agriculture sitting silently by waiting for announcements by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to the marketing of wheat, and so it goes. The great Pooh-Bah of the government has all these activities under his control.

Now that we have here an example of the unwisdom of centring these activities in the hands of one man who has so little respect for parliament, it would be a good time for the Prime Minister to consider the reallocation of activities under the proper headings of the departments themselves. This is personal government. The real head of the government decides when he will and when he will not inform his colleagues, let alone the members of the House of Commons. Having been denied the information to which we are entitled, we are now confronted with the suggestion that, bad though this proposal is, it demands our acquiescence because anything else would cause delay. If this is wrong, we have no right to expedite a wrong. We have no right to approve a wrong course with a gun at our heads, and we will not do so. If there is any delay, that delay is the complete responsibility of the government.

Perhaps the members of the government may say it is the responsibility of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Certainly there are one or two of them who would do so. But the fact is that it is the responsibility of the whole government, and the Prime Minister is responsible for the operation of the government. The time has come for some insistence on the observance of the obligations of ministers in this house. The government knew last year that some new arrangements were going to be necessary. As reported at page 2165 of Hansard for this year the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say:

> After negotiations with the government of Canada and the industrial development bank, the company announced on March 17, 1955, that it had been unable to negotiate a type of financial assistance which did not result in an agency of the government of Canada being in a position to control the company, and that such an arrangement made it impossible for the company to purchase its gas requirements.

If that was clear in March of last year, what have we to say about the situation now? If control of the operation of the pipe line by a government agency was going to prevent financing then, what about today? The government has been dawdling along failing to come to grips with this subject for more than a year, and now it is suggested that we must agree to a proposal, no matter what it is, presented to us at this late date. Without any basic information through the ordinary channels of committee inquiry which are a part of our parliamentary procedure.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Since this proposal calls for financing with Canadian funds a venture that is controlled in the United States, surely it is necessary for us to examine carefully just what were the grounds upon which this company obtained its rights. On March 15 of this year, as reported at page 2164 of Hansard, the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say:

Hon. members will recall that in 1951 parliament enacted the original statute incorporating Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. The original sponsors of this project believed that a pipe line designed to serve the Canadian market only was economically feasible and the statute of incorporation restricted the company to activity within Canada. Through the merger of the original Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited with Western Pipe Lines Limited in early 1954, the plan was broadened to include a substantial export of gas at Emerson, Manitoba, which was possible under the Western Pipe Lines charter.

Thus we see the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the charter and the franchise were obtained on the assurance that a pipe line entirely in Canada serving Canadians was economically feasible, and they were obtained on no other grounds. To use his own words: "The statute of incorporation restricted the company to activity within Canada". It was only three years after 1951, in 1954, that the two companies were merged. It thus becomes necessary, as I said before, to examine some of the details. The sponsor of the bill here in the House of Commons that incorporated this company said on February 27, 1951—and I am placing this on record again so it may be in the context of this story—as reported at page 736 of Hansard:

It is an all-Canadian route and, with the total volume of gas consumed in Canada, complete control will be ensured in this country.

It was with that assurance and with that understanding that this company was incorporated. The next stage was when the bill came before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Mr. Frank Schultz represented the company before that committee on March 6, 1951. In seeking the support of the committee for their proposal he had this to say:

The second consideration was that it should be an all-Canadian project, that it would be Canadian gas transported over an all-Canadian line, and that 100 per cent of the consumption would be in Canadian cities.

If anyone says today, "Oh, well, it is absurd to think that this could have been done", what he is really saying is that those people obtained a charter and a franchise on the basis of reckless statements they knew to be false. I do not suggest that for one moment. I feel sure that these men were speaking responsibly at that time. Certainly they were making definite enough statements.

Then again, before the same committee, the committee to which we have sought to have this subject referred during the whole of this session, the same Mr. Frank Schultz said on the same day, March 6:

You may be interested to know about the marketing situation. We are satisfied at this stage that adequate markets exist in the eastern part of Canada to consume all the gas that we can produce and move through this line.

Nor were these the only statements. Counsel for the company, also speaking before the committee, had this to say:

The relative ruggedness of the terrain between Kenora and Sudbury has given some people the idea that this project is a little bit difficult or even impossible, and for that reason we have today the engineer who made the survey on behalf of this company. I think he will be able to give you some enlightening comments on the type of country that these pipe line builders have met in other countries and that the shield country of Canada is not as formidable as we have been led to believe, largely because of going over it by train and plane.

Then Mr. Floyd Waterfield of the Pipe Line Engineering Company and the Oklahoma Contracting Corporation, a man of some 31 years experience in the field, had this to say, following the statement I have just read. These were his words:

So, everything being considered, that so-called south route as I have referred to it along the (great) lakes provided some quite difficult construction problems—but I have seen worse in our country in Pennsylvania. There are certain sections of that country which are difficult particularly across the Tuscarora mountains and in West Virginia. That is a pipeliner's hell there. So there is nothing in this pipe line construction that is insurmountable. It is just big. Some of it is going to be difficult construction but the average over-all cost comes to a very reasonable and reconcilable figure.

We see nothing of that in the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce today. Where was this easy construction that we heard about before the committee and in this house? Where was the certainty that this could be done without government assistance and without any outside financing other than private financing when this was before the board of transport commissioners? Oh, no; no difficulties at all. Everything was rosy, and that was the ground upon which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines got their right to proceed.

Then we know that as recently as last year Mr. Clint W. Murchison, who was writing—not "personal and confidential"—to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, on that occasion had this to say:

We first came into western Canada about five years ago and at that time we heard of pipe lines to Chicago, Minneapolis and other points south of the Canadian border. We immediately conceived the idea of an all-Canadian pipe line, knowing in the beginning that anyone would take the routes into Minneapolis and Chicago as being much more remunerative and easier to finance, but feeling that the Canadian citizens were of such patriotism that they wanted a fuel system within the confines of their own boundaries to the extent that they would not be subjected to the vicissitudes of American politics. We frankly gave no serious thought to anything but the trans-Canada pipe line and tossed the other routes out as impractical in so far as it concerned the people of eastern Canada.

Nor was it Mr. Murchison alone who was so optimistic at that time. On March 13, 1953, as recorded at page 2929 of Hansard, we find these words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I want these words recalled in the light of the statement made today:

> Therefore the policy that has governed the export of electrical energy since 1907 must apply, within reason, to the export of natural gas. Canada has consistently refused to authorize firm contracts for the export of electrical energy, and this in spite of great pressure at times from producers of electrical energy. That consistent policy has paid large dividends to the Canadian economy, in that our sources of electrical energy have been preserved to our economy.

Then there is the even more important statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce of last year. On March 8, 1955, just 14 months ago, he said; in a letter tabled in this house:

> All studies indicate that the line is capable of being financed privately and it has been decided to defer construction for one year and let matters take their normal course.

That was just over one year ago. Then we had this strange presentation made today without any apology, without any explanation of why a man who was so sure a year ago that this could be done by private enterprise without government assistance now finds that the governments must not only build the northern Ontario section, but must put up the money for the construction of the western section as well.

In the face of that statement made just over a year ago, how can this government come before the house and ask us to approve the strange proposal now placed before us, without this subject at least being referred to the appropriate committee of the house to obtain the facts which have changed the situation so dramatically since March of last year? Nor do we need to go back a year to see strange differences in the situation. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce was presenting the resolution for which this present resolution was substituted he had this to say, as reported at page 2165 of Hansard of March 15 of this year:

> After negotiations with the government of Canada and the industrial development bank, the company announced on March 17, 1955, that it had been unable to negotiate a type of financial assistance which did not result in an agency of the government of Canada being in a position to control the company, and that such an arrangement made it impossible for the company to purchase its gas requirements.

If that were so on March 15, what is the position of Trans-Canada going to be after June 7 under the arrangements now put forward? If there was any validity whatever in the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on March 15, then what is now proposed would completely tie the hands of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines in regard to finance. Why, every stage that follows is one which defeats the very purposes that have been declared.

Then we also recall that in March of this year, when the building of the northern Ontario bridge was under discussion, the Minister of Trade and Commerce explained that the government had sought some reasonable proposal to lay before parliament which would bring about an early building of the line and assure that it would be privately owned. I quote from page 2167 of Hansard for March 15 of this year:

> Such a reasonable proposal has now been brought forward by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. This government is sufficiently impressed by its merits and prospects of success that it is prepared, subject to the approval of parliament, to enter into the construction and temporary ownership of a portion of the proposed pipe line.

That was on March 15. The rest was to be privately owned, and today we are told of this strange and extraordinary device. Surely there must be some explanations that have not yet been given. We know what will happen. We know that with the advance of the money for the western line the crown corporation will not have the opportunity to go ahead with its financing of other activities. Alice in Wonderland never produced anything stranger than the weird picture we have before us now.

The government tell us that they are not going to build the bridge; before, that was the important consideration. Suppose Trans-Canada builds the pipe line to Winnipeg; what happens after that? What happens to the line from Winnipeg to the Ontario border? What happens to the line from Kapuskasing to tie up with the Ontario arrangements? What happens to the other parts of the line? That we do not know, because the government have not let us in on the secret of their next step in this strange and tortuous operation.

There are a number of interesting features about this new agreement. The Minister of Trade and Commerce told us today that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines would have to put up a substantial sum of money before there was any advance. The agreement states that Trans-Canada is to expend $7,500,000 before there is an advance. Oh, but you would not expect anything to be all clear sailing in any agreement in this affair; and it isn't. It is not $7,500,000 they are going to spend; not at all. The agreement states there is to be deducted from that $7,500,000, and regarded as part of the expenditure, any expenditure already made which could be properly attributable to that western section. How much is that? We do not know. The only way we could find out would be if this whole subject were referred to a committee, as I suggested to the Prime Minister. We have a right to know exactly the amount that is going to be attributable to that western section, and to know how much is actually going to be paid under this clause of the agreement.

This is typical of the kind of device which makes it so essential that we place this matter before a committee. Time? Certainly there is time, if that is the right course, and we know the only right course with a bill of this kind is to place it before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines or a select committee, whichever the government prefers, so the information can be obtained.

There are, of course, a number of other details which do not need to be enlarged upon at this time, but there was one statement made in the house last Tuesday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that was interesting. These were his words:

> My officers inform me also that the earliest delivery date for orders for 34-inch pipe placed now would be not earlier than the fourth quarter of 1957. Therefore to abandon Trans-Canada in favour of any other private group was to abandon any hope of a start on the western section of the pipe line in 1956 and perhaps in 1957.

What does that mean? Does that mean the Tennessee gas interests are holding a gun to the government's head? That is what it means if it means anything at all. It means that they say, "We have the pipe and nobody else gets it". How about this government for once dealing on a basis that would represent the interests of Canada, and not being told by interests in the United States whether we will or will not have 34-inch or any other type of pipe for an undertaking of this kind? If 34-inch pipe is not available to us the only people who are to blame are the members of the government of Canada. If that pipe is available then these people who have received so much consideration are morally bound to deliver that pipe to this government. Unless they were prepared to do so then I should think any further negotiations with them would hardly be negotiations with a party who was prepared to deal on terms of fairness and equity with our government. The Tennessee gas interests and their associates are calling the tune. It is the Tennessee gas or nothing. That is the kind of independence which this government has declared.

Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce made perhaps his most interesting statement as reported at page 3664 of Hansard:

> In my view the prospect of public ownership of a natural gas pipe line is not one that should arouse enthusiasm.

That is an understatement if I ever heard one.

> On the other hand if public ownership is the only way in which this great national enterprise can proceed, we should not refuse to grasp the nettle. In a country like Canada it is of the greatest importance, however, that private enterprise should be given an adequate opportunity and every reasonable facility to do the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I hear a triumphant chorus of "hear, hear" from hon. members opposite.

Mr. Garson: This speech is getting better every minute.

Mr. Drew: Are you hear-hearing for public ownership or private enterprise, because they are both included in that?

An hon. Member: You tell us.

Mr. Drew: It would be interesting to know which you are really supporting.

Mr. Rowe: Some blow hot and some blow cold.

Mr. Drew: We do not believe that Canadian private enterprise has been given an adequate opportunity and every reasonable facility to do this job. We know that private enterprise has been trying to get a chance to participate in this undertaking, and it has been denied.

Let us go back to the words which preceded these:

> . . . if public ownership is the only way in which this great national enterprise can proceed, we should not refuse to grasp the nettle.

These were the words that received the most applause from the organized cheering gang opposite. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce talks about fairness to Trans-Canada, may I suggest that the promoters of Trans-Canada examine those words. What was behind the applause? Was it a tip-off that there really was not much chance of Trans-Canada completing this portion by next March; that everything would be quite all right, and that they were really going to be forced into public ownership at that time? I think it is about time Trans-Canada looked at this matter, because the government is trying to put two sides of a coin before their people and get approval of both sides.

If Trans-Canada cannot put up the money to build the easiest part of the line now, how are they going to build the rest of the line?

How are they going to repay this money and complete their financing by next March, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce and everybody else tells us that the federal power commission certainly will not have given approval by that time? What was the Minister of Trade and Commerce really driving at? If the statement means anything, it means that nobody can count on what the government says.

We do not know whether there will be a further extension. Certainly on the basis of the past record that would be likely, but on the other hand hon. members opposite indicated that they had some inside knowledge about the statement in regard to public ownership. Members opposite obviously thought they knew what those words meant. If that is the purpose let it be declared openly and frankly in this house, and not kept for the secret information of any private members. May we hope that this government with all the tortuous twistings that have taken place will not try to do by indirection what it is unwilling and afraid to do by direction.

While Trans-Canada may not know what is going to happen one thing is certain, that members opposite and all members of this house do not know either. At each point Trans-Canada's rights have been extended, and perhaps that may happen again. It should be remembered, of course—and may I emphasize this—that if those rights are extended next March and they have not been able to repay the money, then the crown company will not have the money to build the northern Ontario section next year. This blocks the northern Ontario section. In this case the government is embarking on something wholly unrelated to the northern Ontario bridge. It is committing the taxpayers of Canada to an arrangement which is exclusively to the advantage of investors in the United States.

What nettle was the Minister of Trade and Commerce speaking about? Was it the hopeless confusion into which he has plunged this whole operation? Quite apart from some explanation of the particular meaning of the word, I think many of us would be interested in knowing who suggested that literary allusion. Since this was so unlike the ordinary statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce perhaps it would be well to recall where the words come from. Shakespeare did use them first, not the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What were the words that Shakespeare used? He said:

—but I tell you, my lord fool, out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety.

Those words might well have come from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Undoubtedly the safety to which he was referring was political safety. He was making it quite clear that this was a political manoeuvre and that he was hoping to be able to wangle it in that way.

Once again even at this late stage I urge the Prime Minister to refer this matter to a committee. There is no measure that has come before this house that has had even a small fraction of the importance of this measure that has not been referred to a committee of the house for examination. That is the regular practice; that is parliamentary procedure. I ask the Prime Minister to refer this whole subject to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, or to a select committee if he prefers that. Of course the standing committee would be able to operate immediately.

Once again I urge the Prime Minister to refer this to an appropriate committee. I ask him what reasonable explanation there can be for not following this proper course. I would point out to him that there are other vital and important reasons why this committee should have the right to inquire. We have had the statement made that this gas is being sold more cheaply to United States consumers. That may be right or wrong; we do not know, and there is no hon. member opposite who knows any more than we do. But a committee of inquiry would give us the facts. Besides, the statement has been made that the Canadian taxpayers are going to be mulcted to the extent of more than $2 million a year by a deal which is in favour of the United States consumers. Let us have this before a committee where the facts may be obtained.

Above all I ask the Prime Minister tomorrow to tell us his position in regard to the whole affair. Above all I urge that this should not proceed in its present form. This is a vital resource. Gas is a vital part of our national development. We want the pipe line constructed just as soon as possible. We have been urging its construction for five years. We want action taken that will produce positive results, under some coherent plan. We do not want Canadian taxpayers' money to be used in this way to finance United States interests and to give control of Canadian resources in this manner.

In simple terms this government now proposes to put up 90 per cent of the cost of the construction of the pipe line, all Canadian taxpayers' money, for the purpose of handing over this whole operation to a corporation which is 83 per cent owned in the United States.

Just before the six o'clock recess I was referring to certain comments that had been made in this house. Time elapsed then, and

I shall return to those remarks. We have heard the boasts of the Prime Minister and his supporters. Let us have a test of the vaunted courage of this government. Let the government give its supporters something really to believe in, in the form of decisive action. Let them call an election immediately and let the people of Canada decide. We have been told that this is a great venture; we have been told that this is one of the most important developments in Canada, yet it is being financed with Canadian taxpayers' money and handed over to United States promoters. This is the money of the Canadian taxpayer. It is our economy and his future that is at stake. Let the government go to the people and let the people decide on this issue.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon in almost the opening sentence of his speech the Minister of Trade and Commerce accused the opposition—I take it the whole opposition—who are opposing this particular project of having vacancy of mind. I do not know when I have seen such a vacancy of vision as this government has exemplified before this house. I want to say again as I have said before that this whole proposal is an outrageous proposal. It places in the hands of powerful United States corporations one of the great resources of this country. The Leader of the Opposition said over 83 per cent; it is 83·4 per cent, according to the figures in this particular report.

The Hudson Bay Oil and Gas, a good Canadian name but a United States controlled company, 17 per cent.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Twenty-five per cent owned in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Coldwell: Possibly, but still United States controlled. Canadian Gulf Oil, a Canadian corporation established by the American Gulf Oil and Gas Company, 17 per cent; Tennessee Gas Transmission, 17 per cent; Canadian Delhi Oil, another Canadian company established by a United States Corporation, Delhi Oil, 25·8 per cent; International Utilities Corporation, New York, 6·6 per cent.

Add them together and you get 83·4 per cent; and yet this government had the audacity this afternoon to come before the house and through the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that we are not going to be allowed to discuss this proposal at any length, that closure will be moved tomorrow to end this particular debate. That is what will happen if as I suspect closure is proceeded with.

I want to tell my hon. friends that never in the history of this country has a debate in this house been brought to a close in this manner. The debate had not begun when the minister moved closure. All he was doing was introducing the motion, and then he moved closure to stop all the rest of us from discussing it in the manner in which this proposition should be discussed in this house.

I say this was a most atrocious proceeding, unknown in a Canadian parliament at any time in the past. Not for 24 years has closure been moved in this house. It was moved 24 years ago, and what did the leader of the Liberal party do at that time? He made this chamber ring with his protests. He denounced the autocracy of the government then in power. He said this was a negation of democracy. Perhaps I had better use his own words.

Mr. Argue: And he won the next election.

Mr. Coldwell: I am reading from page 1626 of Hansard of April 1, 1932. This is what Mr. Mackenzie King said:

> They bring in the weapon of closure, and with that weapon they strike at the very heart of this House of Commons thereby stifling all further discussion on a great question having to do with the very foundations of parliamentary government and the constitution of our country.

Those words may not apply. They are not now striking a blow at the constitution of our country, but striking a blow at parliamentary government in this country.

> They say, "We will not even allow you to discuss in committee matters which relate to the control by parliament of expenditures;

As a matter of fact this particular resolution involves the control of expenditures, because it is the money of the taxpayers of Canada that is going to be placed at the disposal of this American-controlled company. Whether we take the whole project; whether we take the bridge across northern Ontario—$83 million from this government, $35 million from the province of Ontario—that is $118 million, and if it is intended that we shall appropriate 90 per cent of the cost of the prairie section of this line, not to exceed $80 million, separately—which I suspect is the real intention—we shall be in effect appropriating nearly $200 million of Canadian public money. What for? To promote the profits of a United States corporation.

Let there be no mistake about it. I say with the Leader of the Opposition that this government dare not face the people of Canada at this time with such a proposition. There never has been anything like it in the history of this country.

I have said before and I shall say again that, while we may not agree that what Sir John A. Macdonald and his friends did at the time was the best thing for Canada, yet they were actuated by entirely different motives from the motives actuating the present government of Canada. They would not allow United States financial interests to control that great band of steel which was to unite this great country from one end to the other, economically and socially. Read the biography of Sir John A. Macdonald. Read the letter he wrote to his friend in which he made that abundantly clear.

Come down through the years and you will find that Canadian statesmen right up to the present time have endeavoured to protect the integrity of this country. I want to say that if this trend continues—the trend of the control of our industries, the trend of the control of our economics and, most of all, the control of our great resources like this one by the United States—our political independence one day will disappear, and the people who will have been to some degree responsible will be the hon. gentlemen seated opposite us on this occasion. Make no mistake about it. Then Mr. King went on to say this—

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, I shall permit a question.

Mr. Garson: In the course of his research into the building of the C.P.R., did he come across any figure for the Canadian investment in that great venture at the time it was built? Could he tell us what that was?

Mr. Coldwell: I certainly did come across the figures. The figures of Canadian investment at that time, the Canadian population at that time being about 4 million, was relatively small. The bulk—

Mr. Garson: What percentage was it?

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. gentleman asked me to give the percentage. I cannot give him that, but I can tell him this, that the bulk of that investment came from the United Kingdom, and at that time Canada was a dominion within the British commonwealth. Canada today is not a dominion, nor is it a nation, I hope, within the North American union of the United States. The two things are entirely different. I do not know the percentage.

Mr. Gardiner: What part of the early development of railways and industries in the United States was financed by Great Britain?

Mr. Coldwell: I know that.

Mr. Pearson: Did it make them a colony?

Mr. Coldwell: I know perfectly well that a great part of the development of industries of the United States was financed by Great Britain. I agree. But as the years went by the British investments diminished. The trouble with us is that, as we are growing stronger, United States control increases. That is the difference.

Mr. Pickersgill: The statistics do not bear that out.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not resume his seat the minister may not ask a question.

Mr. Coldwell: I have resumed my seat twice, which I think is quite generous, and I want to say this to the Minister of Agriculture; that he and his government can find almost $200 million, if my estimate is right—and we shall subtract the $35 million of Ontario money from it, of course—for this United States corporation, but they could not find $50 million, $60 million or $70 million to build the South Saskatchewan dam. Nor can they find money to help the depressed areas in the maritime provinces. Nor can they carry out the plan recommended by General McNaughton in connection with the Columbia river basin. Nor can they find money to improve the conditions of the old age pensioners of this country. Nor can they find money for a national health plan. But they can find nearly $200 million for a United States corporation. Let us take a look at Mr. Mackenzie King again and see what he says.

Mr. Knowles: His ghost will haunt the cabinet tonight.

Mr. Coldwell: He said:

> They say, "We will not even allow you to discuss in committee matters which relate to the control by parliament of expenditures; we will not allow you to say another word in regard to this right, under the peace, order and good government provision, which we are claiming, to be independent of parliament and to legislate as we please, whether parliament is in session or not. They have used the weapon of closure twice in the course of a short debate—

It was a pretty long debate by the standards of this debate.

> —in order to end all discussion and debate on the most important question which has engaged the attention of parliament since this ministry was formed.

I want to say that the closure motion indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon closes debate on the most important question from the point of view of Canada's economic independence to come forward since this ministry was formed. I do not think there is any doubt whatever about it. I say that this motion today to introduce closure before the debate began, as the debate was being introduced, is something I do not think the people of Canada will swallow. This is a parliamentary institution and the opposition, yes, the private members of the house, have a duty to perform. They have a duty to scrutinize carefully every proposal of the government and to use every means, including those laid down in our parliamentary procedures, to bring about a proper and adequate discussion. That is what we have been trying to do of late.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what we have been trying to do of late, and we are well within our rights in doing it. May I say that I have read the debates between 1930 and 1935; and what the opposition has done to this government today, in the months gone by and in the years gone by, is nothing to what the Liberal party did to the government in office between 1930 and 1935. Make no mistake about it, because I have read the debates.

An hon. Member: That was a good opposition.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): You do not like your own medicine.

Mr. Coldwell: I see there are ministers on the other side who were here then, and who are grinning as they remember the incidents of that time.

An hon. Member: They will not be grinning after this is over.

Mr. Coldwell: What stage have we reached in the discussion of this project? As the Leader of the Opposition has already said this evening, when this company came before the House of Commons and the people of Canada what did it say? It said that it was prepared to build an all-Canadian pipe line and to utilize the gas for the benefit of Canadian towns and cities. I have the pamphlet they put out at the time, and apart altogether from what they said before our committee or what the mover of the original resolution said in the house they said this in their pamphlet:

> An all-Canadian route for the pipe line, and with the total through-put consumed in Canada, ensures complete control in this country.

That is what they said. Now they come to us and they want us to build the prairie section to Winnipeg or to the vicinity of Winnipeg in order that, if they get permission from the United States federal power commission, they can export gas profitably to the United States, gas that will be used in United States industry not only to compete with Canadian industry but to aid in the establishment of United States industry to compete with Canadian industry in the markets of the world. That is what they are after. Looking at this pamphlet that they put out I see that they even enumerated the towns in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec that they were prepared to supply with Canadian gas.

We are told that the government does not have control of the pipe to build this pipe line. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that this afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines did not have control of that pipe, that the pipe is in the hands of the United States companies. I do not think it is too strong a statement to make to say that those companies are holding a pipe at the head of the Canadian government. I do not think under those circumstances that my term the other day was too strong when I said that in that way these people are economic buccaneers. I used that term before and I use it tonight. I want to say that I use it, too, with some knowledge of the background of some of these oil companies in the United States over the years and their activities within that country.

There is only one alternative, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave it this afternoon. I took down his words and he said that short of public ownership there is no way of guaranteeing Canadian control. I took down the minister's own words.

Mr. Dickey: Canadian control of the shares.

Mr. Coldwell: No way short of public ownership of guaranteeing Canadian control.

Mr. Dickey: Of the shares.

Mr. Coldwell: Of the shares? Well, what is the argument with regard to the shares? It is that 51 per cent of the stock will be made available to the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: At least.

Mr. Coldwell: Then he went on to say that was no guarantee—

An hon. Member: Of control.

Mr. Coldwell: Of course of control; that is what I am talking about. I am not so interested in the ownership if Canada has control, and Canada has not control under this agreement.

Mr. Dickey: Certainly it has.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member contradicts me. He will have a chance to make a speech in reply tomorrow.

An hon. Member: He will not.

Mr. Coldwell: Let him do it. I am quoting the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said this afternoon that short of public ownership there was no way of guaranteeing Canadian control, and I do not care whether it is Canadian control of the stock—

Mr. Dickey: Control of the shares.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not care whether it is control of the shares, because control of the shares will mean control of the company, if you will, or at least to some extent control of the company and there is no way of guaranteeing Canadian control of the shares.

Mr. Dickey: But that leaves control of the pipe line in Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. gentleman can make his speech tomorrow. He will have 20 minutes to make his speech tomorrow if closure goes through, and he can make it before one o'clock in the morning of the following day if he so desires.

Mr. Knowles: If he is still awake.

Mr. Coldwell: But I am citing the statement the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this afternoon. We want to see this gas in Alberta utilized. We do not want to see it go to waste. We want to see it available to the people of all Canada, but we want to see it made available in a manner that will ensure to the Canadian people control of this resource and control of the charges that will be made for this great resource. We do not want to see a large percentage of the gas go into the United States. We do not want to see it go to Chicago to be used by the steel mills of that city, we do not want to see it go to Minneapolis to be used by the mills there, we do not want to see it go anywhere else before the needs of the Canadian people and Canadian industries are fully met. That can only be assured to the extent that we are able to control this whole project through this elected House of Commons.

Mr. Harris: No; assured by control of export permits.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member says control of export permits. That is something a bit new.

Mr. Harris: No, no.

Mr. Coldwell: Wait a minute. We have been told time and time again that the economic feasibility of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines plan depended on the federal power commission of the United States; not on the granting of export permits from Canada but on the granting of import permits by a United States authority. That is what we have been told.

Mr. Pickersgill: Both are necessary.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what we have been told. These people have said that they cannot go ahead with this plan unless they can get the right to import into the United States. This government have at no time, as far as I know, placed in jeopardy their right to export gas. Never, as far as I know, have they placed it in jeopardy. It is the United States federal power commission which is placing in jeopardy the importation of gas into that country. That is a far different thing.

Once again in that respect we are at the mercy of a foreign commission, no matter how friendly our American friends may be. I am not anti-American; I am pro-Canadian; and I do not want to see the control and usage of this great resource alienated by the federal government. Nor do I want to see it made possible to export this great resource by those powerful corporations, whether it be done incidentally by the federal government alone or in co-operation with the government of Ontario, which I think is equally blameworthy in agreeing to this proposition at the present time.

There is much one can say in connection with the proposition. As a matter of fact, as to this prairie section, the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon told us that the company would have an investment of $15 million of their own against some $80 million in that section of the Canadian people's money and, if they proceed with the bridge across northern Ontario, $118 million of the Canadian people's money. In addition, as has already been pointed out, there are 110 miles between Winnipeg and the Ontario boundary that are not accounted for. How are they going to build that? Who is going to pay for it? Once they get this line built to Winnipeg they will probably come to us again and say, "We have done this. We have an investment there. You would not expect us to lose that investment. We require some help or some support in order to complete that 110 miles between Winnipeg and the bridge you are going to build with the Ontario government". And I suppose that once again we shall be faced with a resolution of this description to guarantee their bonds or to lend them money or to do something for them that they will want at that particular time.

Mr. Rowe: And they will have to put closure on it.

Mr. Coldwell: And they will have to put closure on it if they want to get it through.

I now want to bring my remarks to a close, Mr. Chairman, but I want to repeat what I said at the very beginning, namely that this is a most outrageous proposal. It is outrageous any way you care to examine it. It is outrageous coming as it does from a government, as I have said, that has refused to do some of the things for our economy within our provinces that the government should have done. I believe that the members of this House of Commons are justified in using every means at their disposal to block this pernicious agreement.

An hon. Member: It is democratic government.

Mr. Coldwell: "Democratic government" someone says. We have heard a great deal about totalitarian states, but if ever a totalitarian move was made in this house, it was made this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles: Totalitarianism of the first order.

Mr. Coldwell: I suppose that because, unfortunately for this country, over the last 20 years or so a government has been in power with an opposition that was relatively weak in numbers, they have therefore built up through the years the idea that they were able to put through this house anything they desired to put through.

Mr. Knowles: "Who can stop me?"

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; the Minister of Trade and Commerce on one occasion turned to the opposition and said, "Who is going to stop us".

Mr. Rowe: Now he is stopping himself.

Mr. Coldwell: Today we had a demonstration of "Who is going to stop us?". We cannot stop them. But one thing we can do is this. We can expose them. When I was a boy we used to sing another verse of the national anthem. Do you remember it?

> Confound their politics,
> Frustrate their knavish tricks . . .

Tonight I can say that very sincerely. If the Canadian people had an opportunity they would confound their politics, frustrate their knavish tricks. Then we could say "So save us all".

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock and move the adjournment of the debate?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Weir: Mr. Speaker, may I have the privilege of reverting to motions?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. gentleman has not unanimous consent, he may not revert to motions at this time.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East) moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with this discussion.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.59 p.m.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT ADMINISTRATION

Question No. 465—Mr. Houck:

What progress has been made in implementing the clauses of the Food and Drugs Act (as revised in 1954) which require sanitary inspection and inspection of records of food manufacturing and drug manufacturing establishments?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

Re drug manufacturers: Following proclamation of the Food and Drugs Act on July 1, 1954, a complete survey of the drug manufacturing industry was undertaken by the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare. This survey was completed in 1954-55, more than 350 preliminary inspections having been made. The pharmaceutical industry in Canada is relatively small, but there is great variety in the products, the size of the companies and their production and distribution facilities. Of principal importance in drug firms is the existence of a record control system which enables the manufacturer to trace his products in the course of manufacture and to check on the raw material used in his products.

As a result of the preliminary survey and because of the limitation in number of staff available for the work, priorities were established. Particular attention was given in 1955-56 to private formula manufacturers, manufacturers of injectable drugs and drug manufacturers in general, as distinguished from distributors and wholesalers. Fewer inspections—253—were carried out in 1955-56 but on each inspection more time was spent making recommendations, and repeat visits were made to a number of establishments.

Progress has been noted in many cases, particularly among some of the smaller manufacturers who were not aware that their manufacturing procedures and record systems did not constitute good commercial practice. With particular reference to injectable drugs, a number of manufacturers agreed voluntarily to discontinue manufacture of these products when it was pointed out that their facilities were inadequate to ensure complete safety of the products.

Re food inspection: Inspection of food factories under the provision of the sanitary clauses of the act has been accelerated during the past months. The factories visited were chosen from those industries which previous surveys had shown demanded immediate attention.

The nature and scope of the work to be done in this field is indicated by the fact that the inspectors of the food and drug directorate made over 2,300 visits to food factories during the past year. A continuation of this heavy program is planned for this year.

This work has been carried out in close cooperation with other interested federal, provincial and municipal agencies. In the case of provincial agencies who are particularly interested in local problems, an effort was made to keep them fully informed of the department's findings and actions.

Evidence of substantial improvement has been noted as a result of this program.

INCOME TAX—CHARITABLE AND MEDICAL DEDUCTIONS

Question No. 469—Mr. Nicholson:

What is the estimated additional revenue which would accrue to the treasury if no income tax deductions were allowed for (a) charitable contributions; (b) medical expenses?

Answer by: Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue):

No information available.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 15, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

EXPROPRIATION OF PART OF CAUGHNAWAGA INDIAN RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in view of reports in yesterday's papers indicating that experienced real estate agents feel that the values being paid for properties on the Caughnawaga Indian reserve are well below their actual values, whether the minister is prepared to defer the expropriations or to reassess the prices which are being paid for land in that reserve.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to stay within the rules of the house for the precise purpose of having a debate on this subject, a purpose which has been obstructed by hon. gentlemen opposite. For that reason perhaps I may be allowed two sentences to state what is the position. The first is that the expropriations have already taken place. The second is that no person can suffer any prejudice whatsoever by virtue of that fact. I have assured the house before and I give the assurance again that anyone who is dissatisfied with what he has been offered will have the opportunity of having his case heard by the courts. This work has to go on and the fact that it has to go on is apparent to everyone. In order to avoid every possible hardship we have made arrangements with the seaway authority whereby they will make advances, without prejudice to the final settlement, to those who are not satisfied with the offers being made.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

NEW WESTMINSTER—PROVISION OF RAIN GEAR FOR LETTER CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, further to a question which I asked the minister on April 12 respecting the need for rain gear at New Westminster, at which time he indicated that the gear had been sent, I wonder if he would inquire into this matter. I have received word that it is raining to beat hell and they have no rain gear.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): I shall be very pleased to make inquiries.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. On May 2 this house passed a motion for the production of papers as follows:

> For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the province of British Columbia, or any ministers thereof, since January 1, 1956, with respect to the trans-Canada highway.

Can the minister inform the house if he is now able to table that correspondence?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Yes. I have just received a letter from the minister of highways of the government of British Columbia agreeing, with certain reservations regarding correspondence he would like to have considered as personal and privileged, to have me table the correspondence.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the minister a supplementary question relating to the answer he just made to the hon. member for Kootenay West. Under what rule does the minister say that the permission of a provincial minister is necessary before correspondence can be tabled in the house? Is not the rule rather that as a matter of courtesy a provincial minister is informed of the intention to table and asked if he has any objection? If he does object, then the decision rests with the minister here as to whether or not he will table the correspondence. Is not the position that the minister cannot table an expurgated edition, that he has to decide whether or not he will table the correspondence?

Mr. Winters: I understand the rule is one of courtesy. I simply acquainted the house with the information that was imparted to me by the minister of highways of British Columbia in a letter I received today. I have not yet tabled the correspondence, and I am in the process of giving consideration to that point now.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HARBOURS

UNGAVA—STATEMENT AS TO POSSIBILITY OF DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) on Friday last by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) concerning conferences which have taken place between Mr. Cyrus Eaton and government officials concerning the proposed development of a harbour in Ungava bay. The situation is that on April 10 I met with Mr. Cyrus Eaton, Jr., Mr. W. R. Daley and Mr. L. C. Turnock, Jr. On April 11 these same gentlemen met with officials of the Department of Public Works, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of Transport, under the chairmanship of the deputy minister of public works, to discuss the possibilities of harbour development in Ungava bay in connection with iron ore operations in the area.

Local conditions and possible sites for a suitable harbour were discussed. They were shown the hydrographic charts and other information prepared by representatives of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys last summer in that area. After discussion it was suggested that the International Iron Ore Company should appoint private consulting engineers to continue studies of suitable sites and methods of developing a harbour. I understand that the company has done this. The Department of Public Works engineers will be available to provide information in accordance with usual government practice.

The officials of the Department of Transport and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys similarly undertook to make available to the consulting engineers information in their possession.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Public Works concerning this proposal to develop a harbour in Ungava bay. Does that include an extension of the present railway line from Knob Lake, I think it is, to Ungava bay?

Mr. Winters: I understand that is not visualized now.

BRIDGES

LUBEC, MAINE-CAMPOBELLO ISLAND, N.B.—INQUIRY AS TO PREPARATORY SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the government of New Brunswick requested the federal government to authorize it to participate with the state of Maine in a survey preparatory to building a bridge from Lubec, Maine, to Campobello island, New Brunswick?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): There has been an exchange of correspondence between the deputy minister of public works for the province of New Brunswick and the deputy minister of public works in the federal government, in which the former has informed us that they are very familiar with this crossing and have met with several committees from Campobello and Lubec, Maine, to discuss the various matters involved.

The government of New Brunswick has been informed that there are certain considerations that have to be cleared with the international joint commission, as well as under the terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, but that the federal government is quite prepared for the government of New Brunswick to undertake the joint survey with the state of Maine.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

DOMINION DRAMA FESTIVAL—INQUIRY AS TO ADVERTISING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Has the Prime Minister any further statement to make in regard to the matter I questioned him about on Friday, having to do with the improper use of the name of the Governor General of Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the important factor, I think, in the hon. gentleman's question was with respect to the use that had apparently been made, by an organization of which the Governor General is a patron, of the fact that he was the patron of the organization. As the hon. gentleman knows, the extension of his patronage to organizations for the encouragement of the arts or to similar organizations is a personal prerogative of His Excellency the Governor General, and the hon. gentleman knows, as I do, from the publicity that has been given by the newspapers and also over the radio that His Excellency is dealing with the matter himself.

IMMIGRATION

THERESA ANITA FERNANDES—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF DEPORTATION ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in regard to the case of Theresa Anita Fernandes, the adopted daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Fernandes of Toronto. Will the minister reconsider the decision made either by himself or the officials of his department on the appeal against the deportation order?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The hon. gentleman was good enough to indicate that he had hoped to ask this question yesterday. In view of the great publicity given to this case, I think I should say that the first time I ever heard of it was when, like the hon. gentleman, I read the Toronto Star. Since then I have been looking at the particulars, and I am giving the case further consideration.

TRADE

GATT—REPORTED TARIFF CUTS BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister in a position to give the house any information about the tariff reductions which Canada is reported to be making under GATT?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): No. In due course I expect that my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce will deal with it in the house, but at the moment I have nothing to say.

AGRICULTURE

PRODUCER MARKETING BOARDS—JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister state whether a decision has been reached by the Supreme Court of Canada in respect to Ontario's producer marketing boards and, if so, what decision has been reached?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer to the hon. gentleman's question is no.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXTRA HOURS OF SITTING—OVERTIME PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. What arrangements are being made for overtime pay for employees of the House of Commons who may be required to work extra hours tonight and possibly on two or three other occasions this week and next?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping it would be unnecessary that they should work overtime, and that we might complete our work by ten o'clock tonight.

Mr. Knowles: If the government does not withdraw the closure motion and we go on, will consideration be given to the matter I have raised?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Your Honour and the internal economy commission will consider every factor they ought to consider in connection with the good work our staff are doing.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGES IN REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have the officials of his department had discussions recently with officials of provincial departments with respect to the regulations under the Disabled Persons Act? If so, have any changes in the regulations been made as a result of these discussions?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fulton: A short answer, now.

Mr. Martin: It will be short, accurate and informative.

Mr. Knowles: And probably disappointing.

Mr. Martin: The trouble with my hon. friend who has just interjected is that he always thinks that because he has been a cheer leader any achievement of the government results in his having scored the touchdown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: As the Leader of the Opposition said last evening, I have all day. There has been such a conference, and the federal government is now awaiting the reaction of the various provinces to the discussions. I do not think we will be in a position before next September to make any final decision. I might say, however, that when the disability allowance program was announced we estimated that we would have on strength about 25,000 disability pensioners. I am happy to say that as a result of the initiative taken by the government that figure has been exceeded.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—DISPATCH FROM CANADA OF CF-100 SQUADRONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? He has not had one for a long time.

An hon. Member: He has his wrong ear to you.

Mr. Pearkes: Are the CF-100 squadrons which are being sent to NATO to be in addition to or to replace the squadrons of the air division now in Europe?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): The number of squadrons in Europe at any given time will remain at 12 as at present. The four CF-100 squadrons which will replace four Sabre jet squadrons will do so in succession, but the over-all number will remain the same.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—QUALIFICATION FOR GUARANTEED BANK LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I wonder whether the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is prepared to answer the question I asked last Friday regarding the eligibility of Indians to apply for bank loans against wheat stored on reserves?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I have given some consideration to this question and it is a good thing I did, because it is exceedingly complicated. As I am sure the hon. member knows, section 88(1) of the Indian Act provides that real and personal property belonging to an Indian, which property is situated on a reserve, cannot be attached or seized except at the instance of another Indian, and I do not think the chartered banks were chartered as Indians.

If I may summarize the information I have, it would appear that if an Indian stored his grain off the reserve and applied for a loan he would be eligible like anyone else but that the banks might properly say, if the wheat were stored on the reserve, and they could not realize, that the conditions did not meet with the terms of the bank loan legislation.

Mr. Fulton: Does this means that with respect to bank loans the minister is an Indian giver?

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—OPTION TO PURCHASE PIPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has yet been able to obtain a copy of Trans-Canada's option on the pipe in the United States to which we both referred last Friday?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it had not come to hand when I left the office this morning. I will table it as soon as it does. I have asked for it.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

Mr. Speaker: Before I leave the chair, may I say that the house is in such good humour today that I hate to go.

Mr. Knowles: You'll be back.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 14, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Howe (Port Arthur)—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation to be known as Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for the purposes, amongst others, of constructing, maintaining and operating a natural gas pipe line between the Ontario-Manitoba border and Kapuskasing, Ontario, and of leasing with an option to purchase such natural gas pipe line to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and carrying out such leases, including the disposal by the corporation of such pipe line in connection with such purchase option, and to provide that the Minister of Finance may lend money to the corporation for such purposes.

To provide also that the corporation may, on behalf of Her Majesty, out of moneys advanced by the Minister of Finance, make short-term loans to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the construction of a natural gas pipe line from a point on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to the vicinity of Winnipeg, such loans not to exceed in the aggregate eighty million dollars or ninety per cent of the cost of construction of the said pipe line, whichever is the lesser, and to be made upon such terms, conditions and security as approved by the governor in council.

To provide also that the corporation may do such things as are conducive to the attainment of the foregoing purposes, and that in the event of default of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in carrying out any agreement for the foregoing purposes the corporation may take possession and control of any or all assets, rights and undertakings of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and conduct the business and operations of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited with respect to such assets, rights and undertakings, and that if such default should occur prior to completion of the pipe line mentioned in the last preceding paragraph hereof the corporation may complete its construction and manage and operate it and that it may, out of moneys advanced by the Minister of Finance acquire shares of the capital stock of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

To provide that the aggregate outstanding at any time of the amounts authorized by the measure to be advanced for the foregoing purposes by the Minister of Finance to the corporation together with the loans authorized to be made by the Minister of Finance to the corporation shall not exceed one hundred and thirty million dollars.

And to provide further for the appointment and remuneration of directors, officers and employees necessary for the administration of the act.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, pursuant to notice given yesterday I move:

That at this sitting of the committee of the whole on the resolution respecting the constitution of a corporation to be known as Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, the further consideration of the said resolution shall be the first business of the committee and that the consideration of the same shall not be further postponed.

Mr. Knowles: Shame.

Mr. Drew: The club.

Mr. Rowe: The guillotine.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Motion Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) agreed to: Yeas, 122; nays, 73.

Mr. Fulton: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of addressing an inquiry to you. The inquiry is, was the Prime Minister and leader of the Liberal party a member of the committee who voted in favour of the guillotine?

The Chairman: I think the hon. member will agree that that is not a true point of order. I am not here to identify the members of the committee.

Mr. Fulton: Probably you could give me a simple answer.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that we are not in favour of closure. It has always been our practice to have as much free discussion as possible in the house. It may be necessary, when it is clear that there is or will be obstruction to a measure, to enforce closure. Certainly we think closure should not have been put on at this time, and that a considerable amount of time should have been allowed for free discussion. I am only making that statement at this time, Mr. Chairman, because as a result of the conspiracy between the leader of the Conservative party and the C.C.F., we were prohibited from putting forward our views on this matter last evening before ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: On a question—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Coldwell: On a point of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I understand the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is rising on a point of privilege.

Mr. Coldwell: On a point of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman; the hon. gentleman has tried to leave the impression that I prevented him from speaking last night. I rose at half past nine and spoke for 30 minutes, which was my right. I resent very much any implication to the contrary being placed on the records of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order. I presume the Leader of the Opposition is also rising on a point of privilege.

Mr. Drew: Now that the trained seals are silent, that is what I intended to say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should rise on a point of privilege myself. I do not think, at the commencement of a debate which promises to be most interesting, it is appropriate for one member to say of other members that they are trained seals. Perhaps we could start our proceedings this afternoon by the hon. Leader of the Opposition withdrawing those words.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I regret that Your Honour was not so conscious of the noise which prompted that remark, and I do not propose to withdraw the words.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Chairman: Order. I am conscious of the noise which prompts these remarks and we are, of course, all very conscious of the tenseness which pervades the atmosphere of the chamber at times like this.

In view of that fact, it is my duty to attempt to allay heat when heat is rising and I believe these words should be brought to the attention of all hon. members at the very outset of the debate. I think most hon. members will agree that this expression "trained seals"—

Mr. Fulton: What about the word "conspiracy"?

The Chairman: —is not one that one hon. member of this house should apply to other members of this house. I may be wrong, but I feel I am on pretty sound ground.

An hon. Member: Use "untrained" then.

The Chairman: May I ask hon. members to refrain from further demonstrations of any kind. I feel I am on sound ground, and I feel that the Leader of the Opposition, after these perhaps futile attempts to allay heat, will agree with me and I hope he will co-operate with me to the extent of withdrawing those words, which I do not feel have a place in this House of Commons.

Mr. Fulton: Well, what about the word "conspiracy"? ,

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Chairman, I will go so far as to point out that I rose and before I even had an opportunity to express the circumstances under which I rose there was such bedlam in unison that I felt the words I used on that occasion were appropriate having regard to the circumstances. I shall not repeat them on this occasion, and I shall now proceed to deal with the question of privilege that has been raised.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but the question has gone beyond that. I have asked in as kindly terms as possible for the co-operation of the Leader of the Opposition. I feel he will agree with me that an expression of this kind is bound to raise heat. It is my duty to see that this debate proceeds in an orderly fashion. I am now asking the Leader of the Opposition once more to withdraw those words which I am sure he must agree have no place in this honourable chamber.

Mr. Fulton: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I want to point out to you that the reason for the heat is the outrageous conduct of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: —and the words I used which described, I feel accurately, what has taken place have been used before and have not been challenged. Under those circumstances and in view of the provocation I do not intend to withdraw the words and I leave the matter in your hands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: I recall another occasion when the Leader of the Opposition used the same words when I was in the chair. At that time they did not raise the heat which they raised today.

Mr. Drew: It is a question of temperature.

The Chairman: I must point out to hon. members that it is the fear of disorder which may arise in the chamber which causes those of us who occupy the chair to rise from time to time to attempt, as I said before, to allay some of this heat. At the beginning of such a debate as we contemplate for today, I do not propose to allow the debate to commence on a disorderly basis, and I must ask the hon. member to withdraw or I shall have to report the matter to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming: Shame.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, may I with respect suggest that this is an occasion on which we ought to be very careful that we allow all the time possible to the person who has the floor to get on with an extremely important debate. I say that without in any way suggesting it was improper for the leader of the C.C.F. party to raise his question of privilege. I also agree it was quite in order and probably expected that the Leader of the Opposition would do likewise under those circumstances.

Of course there is no reason in the world why we could not be sure that the hon. member who has the floor should have his full time; however, we are about to engage in a rather lengthy debate in which, as I understand it, the speeches are limited to 20 minutes. I would hope during that time the committee would give the greatest attention to what is said with the least interruption.

As it happens, when the Leader of the Opposition rose I thought perhaps the remarks and the noise which greeted him were spontaneous rather than trained, but that might be a matter of opinion. I also recall on more than one occasion the Leader of the Opposition having used the phrase "trained seals". I have never taken the trouble to see if it is in order or out of order according to the book. I think we all discount that phrase, because everyone in this house knows that all parties practically invariably follow a single party line, with some exceptions which may or may not be evident later.

A reference of that kind is only a general reference, sir, to the party warfare which goes on; and while it may be offensive to some of us toward whom it is directed, I have long since felt that it did not bother me personally.

While I realize your duty is to report the situation to Mr. Speaker, I wonder if under the circumstances it might be possible for us to continue with the debate subject to that and subject to our seeing if there is any precedent which would bear this out; not that I question your judgment or your authority to make a ruling under these circumstances. It occurred to me, however, that we might proceed with the debate and leave the matter as it stands, so that if a report to the Speaker is necessary that report could be made at a later time.

The Chairman: I think perhaps the minister has succeeded in allaying the heat which I attempted to allay a few minutes ago. As a matter of fact, when the Leader of the Opposition rose I did not have an opportunity to hear his question of privilege because the words in question were spoken early in his remarks. Perhaps I should hear his question of privilege before commenting further on the matter raised by the minister.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the question of privilege that I proposed to raise was very brief. The question I would have raised, if I could have been heard at the time, was simply this. When I spoke yesterday I explained it was because the situation demanded a long speech and I spoke within the rules. I do not believe there is any right on the part of any hon. member to challenge the propriety of an hon. member using the time provided by the rules for discussing a subject of importance which is before this house.

The Chairman: Order. The question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the Leader of the Opposition I think is well taken. I am sure the hon. member for Bow River would not wish to leave on the record any implication other than that they had availed themselves of their privileges as hon. members of this house. I therefore expect that the hon. member for Bow River will withdraw any implication such as has been objected to in the questions of privilege raised by these two hon. members.

I hope further that the Leader of the Opposition will co-operate with me. He has already said that he will refrain from using the words objected to a short time ago. I hope that will close the question.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I meant no offence and I withdraw any offensive reference. I was stating that when the Leader of the Opposition spoke until exactly half past nine and then the leader of the C.C.F. continued until ten o'clock it was quite obvious that we were cut off—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is a matter of fact.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, when I came back from the television station last night I was told I should probably wait until after nine o'clock, that the Leader of the Opposition would likely make a long speech. I came down to the house shortly after nine o'clock and the Leader of the Opposition sat down at 9.30. I sat down at one minute to ten, and I think I was fully within my rights in doing that, as was the Leader of the Opposition in taking all the time he could under the rules of this house.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Bow River is entitled to speak in the committee, and he has been recognized. I wish to make it clear that I consider the points of order raised by these two hon. members to be well taken, and we should not have any further reference to the time taken last evening.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order. In view of the fact that the time we have lost is due to the utterances of the hon. member himself, and in view of the fact that we are under a time limit today, how many minutes—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: —will the hon. member for Bow River be given?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I should like to start my remarks this afternoon by referring to the resolution. The resolution before us is to set up a crown corporation to be known as Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. The resolution has two main purposes. The first is to build the northern Ontario section of the line with the two governments putting up approximately $118 million. The Ontario government is to advance $35 million and the federal government $83 million. When the line is constructed it will be leased to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited with an option to buy.

The second part of the resolution deals with the building of the western portion of the trans-Canada pipe line. The corporation will be allowed to lend $80 million to Trans-Canada at 5 per cent. This is a federal loan at 5 per cent, which would appear to be a good business transaction.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

There is a guarantee attached to the contract which states that if the company fails to comply with its terms the government can take over the whole project.

Let it be clearly understood that we favour an all-Canadian pipe line under Canadian control. We have expressed that on numerous occasions. We have no favourite as to any company in Canada or anywhere else. We certainly do not offer special favour to nor are we married to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited or any other company. At the moment that is the only proposition that is before the government. If we are to have a pipe line running across this country within the next two years it must be Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

We want to make sure that the federal government is not handing control over to another country. The minister has indicated that there is certain federal control, that the federal government has absolute control over all export permits. On top of that the federal government has control through legislation passed by this parliament to do whatever they think is right and proper in the interests of Canada. Then in addition there is the control exercised by the province of Alberta in the matter of exporting gas from that province.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding in regard to control remaining in Canadian hands we would make three recommendations to the government. First, we would recommend that 51 per cent of ownership shall remain in the hands of Canadians at all times. Second, we recommend that the majority of the directors of the company shall be Canadians at all times. Third, we recommend that the company make available to Canadians 51 per cent of the stock which shall be negotiable in Canada only, and that the portion not purchased by Canadian subscribers be purchased by the federal government to be held in trust and made available for purchase by Canadian citizens in the future.

If the government will give consideration to those recommendations, along with the other controls which exist, I am sure there could then be no opposition and no question as to the complete control of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines being in the hands of Canadians at all times.

We are pleased to note that at long last the government has decided to go ahead with the construction of a trans-Canada pipe line. Certainly they have, and I think they will admit, caused a good deal of delay in the construction of this pipe line. But now we are pleased that they are about to permit construction of this line. We are pleased in this regard because the people of Alberta and others have invested a tremendous amount of money in the development of oil and gas in that province.

We as Albertans started out in 1935 to develop the resources in our province. We made a policy statement at that time that as far as the supply of gas and oil was concerned, Alberta's requirements must be met first, then Canadian requirements, and then when there was sufficient quantity to warrant it exports should be allowed. We have reached that point now, and we think it is high time there was some means of exporting this gas to the other provinces of Canada.

There has been a great deal of questioning here, particularly by the C.C.F., over the fact that there has been United States investment in the development of these natural resources. It will be recalled that in 1935 the then premier of that province, the late Mr. Aberhart, along with Mr. Manning and the leader of this group here came to Ottawa to see if they could get Canadian capital to develop those natural resources. That was impossible. They then went over to Great Britain to see if they could get assistance there to develop those natural resources. That was impossible. They then went to the United States, and they were able to get the required assistance for the development of these resources. If it had not been for that assistance we would not be in a position today where we are discussing the building of a trans-Canada pipe line across this country.

Saskatchewan too is in need of a trans-Canada pipe line. The development of their resources has been done by private investment and private enterprise. I am amazed at the attitude taken by the C.C.F. so far in this debate, particularly by the leader of the C.C.F. who opposes the development of these resources by private enterprise. Certainly he cannot be forgetful that the resources in Saskatchewan have been developed entirely by private enterprise. He so stated in the debate the other day. Let me read what he said, as reported on page 3886 of Hansard of May 14:

> There is only one alternative, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave it this afternoon. I took down his words and he said that short of public ownership there is no way of guaranteeing Canadian control. I took down the minister's own words.

Let me point out to him that if that is so, then United States organizations and financial interests have complete control of the development of oil in Saskatchewan. There is no question about it. Even the premier of the province of Saskatchewan favours private development. In a letter dated April 21, 1949, addressed to "Dear Mr. Newkirk" he had this to say:

In response to your request for a statement of the policy of the government of Saskatchewan on the matter of mineral and petroleum development, I desire to reiterate the stand which we have taken and which has been expressed on numerous occasions in the past.

The government is desirous of encouraging mineral and petroleum exploration, development and production to the greatest extent possible, and to that end it has embarked upon a program designed to lend technical assistance and advice to bona fide persons and organizations able and willing to proceed with this work. In addition, it gives a firm understanding that no steps will be taken to expropriate or socialize the mining or petroleum industry in the province.

At the same time, the government will take all necessary steps to protect the public interest, and to that end the mineral rights in certain areas will be defined and reserved in advance to the use of the crown, and royalties will be fixed guaranteeing to the people of the province a fair return from the mineral wealth produced.

That is exactly what has taken place in Alberta. Saskatchewan has followed that plan and as a result of following Alberta's plan they have been able to develop their natural resources. They will benefit from the construction of this trans-Canada pipe line. The premier of Saskatchewan gave the assurance that there would be no socialization of these projects, yet the C.C.F. have the audacity to stand up in this house and say they oppose the construction of this pipe line by private enterprise which will provide further development of their natural resources.

I want to read further from the budget speech of the late—no, not the late, but I suppose he will be after the election—Hon. C. M. Fines, provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan, on Monday, March 5, 1956. They talk about lending money to private enterprise for the development of resources. Look at page 20 of this speech:

In just about five years, it has assisted in bringing to this province such industries as a pipe mill, a plywood factory, a generator winding plant, a garment factory, a farm equipment manufacturing enterprise, a cement plant—to name but a few. The industrial development fund, which a few years ago counted a $50,000 loan to a new company as a major transaction, is expected this year to lend up to $500,000.

How can they stand up and object to the government on this occasion lending $80 million to a private concern at 5 per cent interest? I wish they could be a little consistent.

I turn my attention for a second to the Conservative members of this house. I never saw such a mess as they are in now. They say it was a shotgun wedding that was performed in the amalgamation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, but I would call this close association with the C.C.F. as almost a companionate marriage, because they see no other alternative. I do not think I could outline the stand taken by the Conservatives better than it is expressed by the Montreal Gazette of May 14, which expresses my opinion exactly. It says:

Poor Relations:

Poor liaison has caused a rift between the federal Conservatives and the party's Ontario provincial organization.

How mute was the leader of the Conservative party when he was asked to give Mr. Frost's ideas on this. He stood up here as though he were paralysed, and he never made a suggestion.

The coolness developed at mid-week. Conservative M.P.'s—

I want to emphasize that it was all the Conservative M.P.'s except the one from Calgary South.

Conservative M.P.'s had been hammering away at trade minister Howe and the Liberal government for more than a week for failing to give Calgary oil promoter Frank McMahon and other interested Canadian groups a chance to pick up the torch from the failing hands of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and build Canada's transcontinental natural gas pipe line.

Spilled:

But while the Conservatives were preoccupied with developments in parliament, Queen's park abruptly yanked the rug from under them. Ontario's Conservative government announced blandly its complete satisfaction with the Howe proposal to rush further financial aid to Trans-Canada. As for the McMahon offer—

Notice this. This was the main point the leader of the Conservatives had to offer yesterday in regard to this matter:

As for the McMahon offer, Ontario authorities scoffed at the suggestion that it deserved serious consideration. Ontario, they said, had itself canvassed the field of potential Canadian investors last fall—McMahon among them. And all it had found was a wide open space. The Ontario pronouncements didn't utter a single critical word about the stand taken by the federal Conservatives. But the implication was clear and the effect devastating.

Committed:

Indications are that opposition leader Drew and his followers in parliament (including the Ontario M.P.'s), will, however, persist in their stand. They are too deeply committed to it, in any event, to backtrack in the face of the new pressure from Queen's park. Their battle against the continuation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited as the "chosen instrument" of Canadian pipe-line policy will remain, it is said, a fight to the finish.

A fight to the finish of what?

An hon. Member: The Conservatives.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): A fight to the finish to prevent the construction of the trans-Canada pipe line, good or bad. That is their position. Let me state further the Conservative policy as exhibited in the Ottawa Journal, and let me tell you that this is the underlying core of the whole thing. On April 7 the Ottawa Journal in its editorial had the following heading:

Why All the Mad Rush Over This Alberta Gas Line?

I want to emphasize those words "this Alberta gas line". The editorial stated:

Mr. Frank McMahon, described as "Alberta's multimillionaire oil and gas promoter", bobs up to say—

I like that word "bobs".

—that he and his associates will undertake to build an all-Canada gas pipe line without government assistance.

Note this. Here follows the crux of the whole thing:

But even if some delay did occur what vital difference would that make? Reading certain newspapers and listening to certain politicians one might get the impression that if this Alberta gas pipe line is not built within the next two years half the people in eastern Canada are going to freeze to death for want of gas fuel and most of our manufacturing plants close down for the same reason.

This is plain nonsense; almost a form of hysteria. No one in eastern Canada, Toronto or elsewhere, will perish from cold and not a factory chimney will go smokeless if not a single cubic foot of Alberta gas reaches the east this year or next year or the year after; there are too many other available forms of fuel.

That is exactly the same position the Conservative party in this house is taking. They do not want Alberta gas down here to assist the provinces in western Canada. They do not even want to have that cheap fuel here for industry in Ontario and for the assistance of the people of Ontario. There is their whole argument in a nutshell.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired. May I say that I charged up a goodly portion of the time consumed on the point of order to myself and a small proportion to the hon. member.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am only about half way through. I shall take another opportunity to finish it.

Mrs. Shipley: As most hon. members know, I come from the part of Ontario that has caused a good deal of the difficulty in the financing of this line. You will well understand how keenly interested I am. During the course of the discussions I watched all the changes and disappointments very carefully. There were no stages that were not of keen interest to my people. We have had power shortages in the province of Ontario before, as is well known to the Leader of the Opposition. At the present time the government of Ontario is determined that this shall not happen again.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Today, at this particular stage of this debate, I wish to deal primarily with the criticism of the opposition. I have noticed—and I have been in this house for only three sessions—that the weaker the position of the official opposition and the fewer their arguments, the more vicious becomes the attack of the Leader of the Opposition. Yesterday, I would say, he reached an all-time low. His paucity of arguments reduced him to personal attacks on our leader and our cabinet ministers.

I was very pleased today to hear the chairman call a halt to such terms as "trained seals." I gather I cannot refer to that particular term again. I think it has been ruled out, but I was including that statement. I want to refer to the abuse that has been heaped on the backbench members of this party by the Leader of the Opposition. I see no reason in the world why the men and women of Canada who have been elected to come here because their constituents felt they were capable of looking after their business, should have to sit here, and simply because we show loyalty to our leader and unity amongst ourselves, be called "trained seals", "an anvil chorus", "sheep" and an "organized cheering gang" and told that we are "toeing the party line".

The Chairman: Order.

Mrs. Shipley: Am I out of order?

The Chairman: May I express the hope that the hon. member will refrain from this type of discussion. I found a short time ago that we reached an impasse very quickly in that regard, and I should like to express the hope that she will confine herself to the terms of the resolution.

Mrs. Shipley: Mr. Chairman, I had armed myself with quotations from this debate and previous debates where all these statements had been made by the Leader of the Opposition and I thought I would be in order, but I shall certainly agree to do exactly what you tell me.

An hon. Member: Trained seal.

Mrs. Shipley: Oh, I would never do anything that you might suggest. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, I may refer to the shout that went up yesterday when closure was announced. We heard shouts of "dictatorship" and so on. I had heard closure mentioned a few weeks ago and I wondered what it was all about. I took the trouble to read about it.

Mr. Fulton: Who mentioned it first?

Mrs. Shipley: It is unfortunate that it did not suit the purposes of the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party to use the terms "mother of parliaments" and "cradle of democracy", with which these halls would have been ringing yesterday, because closure is a common practice there.

Mr. Fulton: Not on the first day of debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Even before the first day.

Mrs. Shipley: I do not understand how they can use the term "dictatorship" when such is not the case. I went to the trouble of counting the number of times closure has been used in England and in the last seven years it has been used an average of 21 times per session, so, so much for your dictatorship. Furthermore, we were informed by one of the would-be leaders of the official opposition—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mrs. Shipley: I will tell you in a minute.

Mr. Dickey: You are covering the waterfront now.

Mrs. Shipley: This hon. member announced in Toronto several weeks ago, I believe, that if we thought we had a filibuster last session —of course he did not use that awful word; he called it something else, but that is what he meant—we had not seen anything yet. Therefore it is a little late, I would think, for the opposition to suggest for one moment that they did not intend to engage in obstruction of the discussion of this subject rather than debate.

Mr. Fulton: Remember what happened last session. The government retreated.

Mrs. Shipley: There is one other point to which I think I may refer. Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition used the expression "tawdry and nauseating inversion of the truth." When I examined Hansard this morning I was delighted to note that even he could not stomach the word "nauseating" because it has now been changed to "insinuating".

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, changing Hansard.

Mrs. Shipley: From the beginning of this debate there has been misrepresentation of fact, misrepresentation of what the minister has said, from start to finish. I have watched it and have made many notes by way of proof. Yesterday I asked the Leader of the Opposition to state at what time and where the Minister of Trade and Commerce had ever said or suggested that the offer of 51 per cent of the stock to Canadians would guarantee control by Canadians. Of course, as all hon. members know, the Leader of the Opposition said he had not said such a thing. I want to refer to page 2172 of Hansard of March 15 of this year, where I find that the Leader of the Opposition had this to say:

> He said that control of this company is open to Canadians. That statement is a shallow pretence. That statement has no meaning and is not borne out by the facts.

At other places he said it was an attempt to deceive the Canadian people. Here is exactly what the minister said when he made his statement to the house a few minutes before the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition to which I have referred. As found at page 2166 of Hansard of March 15 the minister said:

> This offer has, to my surprise, been met with criticism, even derision, on the ground that it provides no guarantee that Canadians will buy the stock. Of course there is no such guarantee. Short of public ownership . . . I know of no means by which control by Canadians could be guaranteed.

The minister has been most meticulous in making that specifically clear any time he has ever mentioned the subject. Then every time any reference is made to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines it is referred to by the members of the opposition as our "protégé" or our "chosen instrument". Again and again it has been said, Mr. Chairman, that we did not choose the company. The company was chosen by the province of Alberta. At the time Alberta had surplus gas and was about to permit the export of that gas beyond its provincial boundaries there were two companies and two companies only that applied to the province of Alberta for such permission. Alberta was not quite satisfied that one company alone would be able to finance and handle the surplus gas, so ultimately there was an amalgamation or a shotgun wedding; I do not care what you call it. There was an amalgamation of the two companies.

Therefore at no time did we select the company. It was the only company with permission to export gas from Alberta, therefore if we wanted an all-Canadian pipe line there was no other company with whom we could deal. The federal government is the one that stipulated that the pipe line must remain on Canadian soil, and the people of northern Ontario are very pleased and happy that this was done. While I am on that particular point I should like to say that it is true there are not enough customers through that long stretch of land to make the line economically sound at the present time, but I venture to say that long before I am dead and gone it will be a happy day for Canada that the gas line came through that area.

It has been said again and again that there were other Canadian investors, but the only ones who have been named are McMahon and Gairdner. It has been pointed out again and again that they have no permits either from Alberta or to export abroad, that they have no customers and no pipe. What is more, they have no gas. It would be foolish to start at this late date and attempt to let a new company conduct the necessary negotiations. What they would do about the millions and millions of dollars that have already been spent by Trans-Canada on surveys, the development of customers, and so on, I do not know.

The suggestion was made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party that the owners of the pipe, by not making the pipe available to McMahon, Gairdner, or anybody else who might want it, were holding a gun or a pipe at our heads. Who ever heard tell of people who pretend to be businessmen or who know anything about business even suggesting that a company in the United States that controls pipe, which is not only non-existent in Canada but is in very short supply and in great demand in the United States, should be told by the government of Canada to hand over the pipe to McMahon or somebody else. These arguments simply do not hold water, and it is a pity that the time of the house is taken up in having to listen to them.

With respect to closure, as I told you before I am a new member, but so far as I can see from my experience in the house closure will mean only one thing. We will have to listen to the same arguments from the same speakers probably six or seven times instead of 20 or 30. Already in the two addresses we have had from the Leader of the Opposition we have heard the same thing over and over again, and his arguments are just as unsound every time.

As to the McMahon proposal that we heard so much about yesterday, may I say this. There is something rather peculiar about that proposal. I would not like to say what it is, of course, but one could ask one or two questions. Here was a strange thing. A personal and confidential letter was sent to the minister concerned. The opposition pooh-poohed the fact and contended that it was not personal and confidential. May I say to them that if that is the way you run your business, that is your business; but we consider a personal and confidential matter to be personal and confidential unless we are released from that restriction, and I hope we continue to do so.

Here is correspondence, marked personal and confidential, in the hands of our minister concerned. But what happens in the meantime? Members of the opposition obviously have complete copies of that document. The newspapers in Canada obviously have full copies of that information. There is something extremely peculiar about that. When it became evident that the confidential information had been given freely to everyone else, our minister said it must be released. What happened? Within five minutes the offer was withdrawn. If that does not seem peculiar to you, may I say that it seems extremely peculiar to me.

I shall not refer to the statements reported in the Globe and Mail of May 10 made by the premier of the province of Ontario, but I should like to refer to what was said by the Leader of the Opposition in this house the first time this matter was up for debate. Then I should like to cite what was said prior to that time and available to everyone, in the legislature of the province of Ontario. This is what was said by the Leader of the Opposition as reported at page 2179 of Hansard:

> The Minister of Trade and Commerce spent some time speaking about the position of Ontario. It is well known that Ontario made another recommendation to this government. It is well known that Ontario prefers another method. It is well known that Ontario only adopted the course they have adopted because they want gas in Ontario. They have no control over this.

I suppose the same kind of pressure was put on the premier of Ontario that it is contended was put on Mr. McMahon. Now let me refer to what was said in the house by Mr. Frost; and may I say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not sitting behind him telling him what to say. I assume he said it of his own free will. I know the gentleman well, and I know that he says what he means. This is what he said, as reported at page 390 of the official report of the debates of the legislature of Ontario:

> I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, these difficulties are not small.

He was referring to the difficulties.

> It was not an easy matter to negotiate the agreement at all.

In reference to his first proposal—that is with regard to the five or more provinces coming in—he said:

> Apparently the Trans-Canada Pipe Line agreement provides for the quickest and most effective way of bringing gas to Ontario. I think the Glassco report—

That is the report of Clarkson and Gordon, one of Canada's most reputable investigating companies and one which was used frequently by the present Leader of the Opposition when he was premier of Ontario.

> —and the investigations made by our own agencies, show that in connection with an all-Canadian pipe line, owned and financed by the governments concerned, federally and provincially, there could be at least four provinces which would occasion delay—as set out in the Glassco report—if indeed agreement among the five governments could be reached.

That is Mr. Frost. Then he said:

But if it gets down to a point where the Trans-Canada line falls down, would we then participate in a publicly-owned carrier line from Alberta to Ontario? I would say the answer is "yes", although I cannot overemphasize the great commitments we have already made, and I certainly express the hope that such participation will not be necessary.

That is exactly the feeling of this government. Then further, as reported at page 389 of the official report of February 21, 1956; he said this:

Mr. Speaker, if private enterprise can do the job, I would say it is altogether in our interest in Ontario, and, indeed, in the interest of Canada, that it should do it.

That is the position already publicly stated by the premier of Ontario at the time the remarks I have just read you—about it being well known that Ontario this and Ontario that—were made here. Further, to clinch the attitude of the premier of Ontario, in the periodical "Ontario Government Services" put out by the Ontario government, here is a quotation from Mr. Frost:

The government of Ontario has entered wholeheartedly—

Mark that word.

—into this agreement with the federal government in the fervent hope that the deal will be carried out as scheduled. The provincial government is aware, however, that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited might not be able to carry through its part of the project. In this event, new ways of attaining the same end will have to be investigated.

As has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Bow River, a public statement by Premier Frost was just read with regard to the resolution now before this house.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise her that her time has expired.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to comment briefly on two statements of the hon. member for Bow River. The hon. member for Bow River need be in no uncertainty whatever as to what the policy of the Conservative party is with regard to this pipe line. All he needs to do is read the speeches which have been made already in this house on three occasions by the Leader of the Opposition in which that policy was made crystal clear. There should therefore not be any uncertainty in anyone's mind as to what that policy is.

An hon. Member: What is it? Tell us what it is.

Mr. Harkness: When the hon. member for Bow River attempts to interpret Conservative policy himself from newspaper clippings, all he does is becloud the issue and try to confuse people's minds as to what is the clear position we have taken.

An hon. Member: What is it?

Mr. Harkness: It has been clearly placed on the record and I have not time to take it up again. I have some other remarks to make. The other point is this. The hon. member for Bow River made a completely ridiculous and untrue statement to the effect that the Conservative party does not want a trans-Canada gas line built at all—

An hon. Member: It looks like it.

Mr. Harkness: —and this in spite of the fact that this was the very first party to propose a trans-Canada pipe line.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: It was the first party to try to get a trans-Canada pipe line proposition going in this House of Commons and in the railway committee, and that at a time when the Social Credit party would not permit the export of gas from Alberta, so no gas line was possible at that time.

Mr. Dickey: Why do you give up now?

Mr. Harkness: That is the situation with regard to that. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the insults and attempted insults in his speech yesterday do absolutely nothing to make a bad proposition more palatable. I might say that the unpleasant effect of his attempts along this line is heightened by the fact that his attempted witticisms and sarcasms always partake much more of the character of the meat axe than of the rapier. The minister's supreme insult to parliament, however, was his notice of his intention to move closure; and this, Mr. Chairman, before one single opposition speech had been made. Then he implemented that notice by actually moving closure at the beginning of today's sitting.

We have had in this house many examples of the arbitrary and dictatorial attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but this is the supreme example. It is another of the fantastic developments in this whole pipeline picture, and there have been many fantastic developments in it. It is almost unbelievable that the government should be backing a proposition such as we find in the Trans-Canada Pipe Line and be prepared to force that proposition through this house by closure. My home town paper, the Calgary Herald, wrote a long editorial outlining the pipe-line proposition and headed it "An Unholy Mess"; and it is an unholy mess. I am not going to read this long editorial, but I think the heading at the top of it, "An Unholy Mess" is well substantiated by the editorial which follows. I would read only one sentence:

> It is almost impossible to believe that the Canadian people will permit their government n Ottawa to get away with its current proposals in regard to the east-west natural gas pipe line.
> The plain, ugly truth is that not only is the Liberal government prepared to allow control of a vital natural resource to slip out of Canadian hands, but is actually prepared to finance more than half the cost of turning that resource over to foreign control . . . with the tax dollars of all Canadian citizens.
> It is an incredible situation—

I repeat, it is fantastic. Now, in its simplest terms what the Canadian taxpayers are being asked to swallow in the legislation now before us is this. Out of a total expenditure on this projected pipe line of $350 million to $375 million, well over half or approximately $200 million is being put up by the taxpayers, and being put up for what purpose? It is being put up in order to assist a small group of United States oil and gas men to control the transportation, marketing and export of one of our great natural resources. The proposition, Mr. Chairman, is as simple as that. The minister and others in his party can make all the arguments they like to try to becloud the issue, but the issue is just as simple as that. The sell-out is just as apparent as that, and I believe the great majority of Canadian people see it in those terms.

Now, when it comes to the men in control of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, these United States companies, it is only natural and human nature that these men will control it in such a way as to promote their own best financial interests. That is going to be the first object in their minds. The second object will be to serve the needs for gas in their own country; and third and last, to meet Canadian producers' needs for a market and the demands of Canadian consumers for gas. In other words, Mr. Chairman, Canadian interests will inevitably be at the bottom of the heap. Of course Canadian producers and Canadian consumers will get a poorer deal than they would under any reasonable scheme controlled by Canadians and operated primarily for the advantage of Canadians.

The members of the Liberal party seem to be intent on trying to heap as much scorn and ridicule as they can on Mr. Frank McMahon. As was pointed out yesterday, however, he is the only Canadian to build any large natural gas pipe line, or to finance it and have it under construction. I feel, therefore, that he can be considered as more of an authority on these matters than any of the gentlemen to your right. In his memorandum to the minister on the basic faults of the Trans-Canada plan, Mr. McMahon had this to say; and this is a statement of the realities of the situation, not the cover-up we hear now from the minister and others. These are the realities of this proposition:

> 2. Trans-Canada as presently constituted is controlled by United States financial interests and is dominated by Tennessee Gas Transmission Company so that the principal interests behind Canada's pipe line is dealing with itself as the principal purchaser in the United States. Trans-Canada, so influenced and dominated, proposes an uneconomic plan to favour Tennessee Gas to the detriment of Canada and at the same time requests the governments of Canada and Ontario to subsidize a $122 million pipe line "bridge" across northern Ontario in order to make it possible to put the proposal into effect.

Those, I think, are the realities of the situation. Any gloss the minister and others attempt to put over the facts I think will be detected for what it is.

Since that memorandum was written by Mr. McMahon the government has put forward the proposal now before us to lend Trans-Canada $72 million to $80 million to construct the easy part of the trans-Canada pipe line from the Alberta boundary to Winnipeg. The government has thus made what was an improvident proposition infinitely worse. The minister has attempted to offer a sop to Canadian sensibilities in regard to United States control by saying that 51 per cent of the stock of Trans-Canada would be offered in Canada, and thus control would be or could be kept in Canadian hands. What a palpably weak and unconvincing attempt in the face of the realities of the situation as outlined by Mr. McMahon, to which I have just referred. Does anyone in this chamber or anyone in Canada believe for a moment that the United States controlled companies which control Trans-Canada will not buy sufficient of this 51 per cent of stock to maintain that control? Does anyone believe for a moment they will ever, under any circumstances, voluntarily relinquish that control? It is another of the fantastic assumptions which the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others apparently would like to have us accept. It is just not in the books.

I should like to consider for a moment the position of the producers of gas under this present scheme. Is it more advantageous to the producers of gas than the alternative schemes which have been proposed? The answer is no. In that regard I refer once more to the evidence of Mr. McMahon, as found in that same memorandum. I should like to put point No. 4 on the record:

> 4. The existing pipe-line companies and utilities in the great plains-midwest area of the United States are the logical markets for Canadian gas and are best able to pay a fair price and purchase large volumes for their present markets. Instead of selling gas in this market to the existing companies, Trans-Canada proposes to sell its gas to a company which cannot pay a fair price because it does not control the market and must construct millions of dollars of duplicating facilities to market Canadian gas and unnecessary pipe line link to its system in Tennessee merely to comply with the policy of the United States requiring the use of Canadian gas only as a supplemental supply. This is shown by the fact that the Tennessee company will pay Trans-Canada some $2 million a year less for Canadian gas than would have been paid by Northern Natural Gas Company an existing pipe line from the United States, under its proposal to purchase approximately the same volumes.

Mr. Dickey: But they were turned down by the federal power commission.

Mr. Harkness: They were not turned down by the federal power commission, because Canadian gas was not available and was not going to be available for some time.

Mr. Dickey: They were turned down because the price was too high.

Mr. Harkness: I think there is no doubt that from the producers point of view we have, in this present proposal, a plan which will give the producers a lesser price in order to benefit the United States, the Tennessee company. The minister attempted to confuse this issue also by pointing to the example of the Westcoast Transmission Company, where you have a totally different situation and where the federal power commission as a matter of fact tried to put the Westcoast Transmission Company at the mercy of the United States producers, by refusing to allow it to carry the gas across the boundary. When you try to compare the price the company is getting under those circumstances with the price you might be getting at Emerson, that is a wrong type of comparison.

In addition to all this, the success of the Trans-Canada plan is dependent upon the United States federal power commission giving permission to Tennessee to import Canadian gas at Emerson and at Niagara. It is abundantly clear that this permission will not be secured for some years, if ever; yet in the face of all these facts which I have been talking about the minister in announcing the proposal now before us said at page 3665 of Hansard for May 8:

The action proposed today is another declaration of independence by Canada, affecting the building of an all-Canadian pipe line.

I would say it is hard to imagine any statement on the pipe line which contains such utter nonsense as that. The Winnipeg Free Press in commenting on that statement on February 9 characterized it as poppycock and went on to say:

Under the new plan, all we will have without United States approval is a hopelessly uneconomic pipe line. The taxpayers of Canada will have spent $80 million on a white elephant.

Surely the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not so hopelessly confused on this issue as to believe his own statement which I have just read. If he is that confused I do not think many other Canadians will suffer from what we should perhaps call equally childish mental processes. The thing is so palpably wrong and ridiculous that I wonder how the minister could ever make such a statement.

To turn to another phase of this matter, the chief argument and bait put forward by the government and its supporters in favour of this scheme seems to be in regard to the urgency of getting the pipe line built at once. They say in effect that this must be done immediately, that this is the only scheme under which it can start in June in order to have the Alberta-Winnipeg leg completed this year. This line of argument, these cries on the part of the government, remind me of two phrases which we used to hear very frequently before the last war. These are phrases which all hon. members will remember; "peace in our time," and "peace at any price".

Mr. Hosking: The Conservative slogan.

Mr. Harkness: If we paraphrase those slogans we would have "a pipe line this summer", and "a pipe line at any price". These seem to sum up in slogan form what the government are saying and the arguments they are advancing.

As far as the first slogan is concerned, I think all Canadians would like to see the first part of the trans-Canada pipe line built this year. But I do not think many Canadians are in favour of a pipe line at any cost; at the cost of United States control of this great resource; at the cost of reduced returns to the producers, and at the cost of an uneconomic line. The cry of the government now is the absolute urgency of getting the pipe line started. In view of that it may be well to ask who has been responsible for the delay of some six years since this project was first talked about. To begin with, the Alberta Social Credit government held it up by refusing to permit the export of gas from Alberta.

Mr. Blackmore: Why did they do that?

Mr. Harkness: Therefore the first responsibility for delay lies with them. In spite of anything they may say, the first responsibility for delay lies with the Social Credit government of Alberta. Since the time Alberta agreed to permit export the responsibility has been shared by the dominion government and the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company. The latter failed to live up to the assurances it gave when it received its charter, and did not succeed in its financing. For a long time the government could not make up its mind what to do. Finally the Minister of Trade and Commerce performed this shotgun marriage of the original Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company and another company.

The new company failed to finance once more, and the government did not know what to do. There was another long delay and a lengthy period of indecision while the government was trying to make up its mind. Then it brought forward the proposal for the northern Ontario bridge to help the company. The latter still failed to get going. And now in the past few weeks we have the government labouring mightily to try to reach a decision as to what is to be done. Finally the present scheme is put before us and after all these weeks, months and years of delay and indecision on the part of the government, we are asked here in the House of Commons to rush the thing through immediately. It is suddenly urgent and must go through without any delay whatever. The Minister of Trade and Commerce moved closure even before anyone else had a chance to speak on the matter.

It is quite apparent, Mr. Chairman, that the real urgency in this matter is political. I have not time to go into that, though I had hoped to do so to some extent. That is the real urgency as was stated in another editorial in the Calgary Herald of May 4 which says:

> There will almost surely be a general election next year. And the Liberal government has no stomach for that fight if it has to go in to the ring with a half-dead pipe line project around its neck.
> It is plain that the urgency is political, not urgency to do the proper thing in the national interest. It's important to remember that.

I think Canadians will remember that. I am sorry I cannot go into what is the actual emergency in regard to this matter from the economic point of view. There is some real urgency as far as Alberta is concerned to get a market for its gas; there is no question about that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: I hope you will not deduct this outburst from my time, Mr. Chairman. That is the only real economic urgency there is, to assist in the development and exploration of Alberta gas and oil resources but—

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that he has exceeded his time.

Mr. Beaudry: Mr. Chairman, it is a great pity—

Mr. Hees: Well, this is strictly for laughs.

Mr. Beaudry: Is it not a great pity, Mr. Chairman, that the Leader of the Opposition has selected this occasion and the topic of pipe lines to play Don Quixote and joust with windmills, especially with windmills of his own fabrication?

Mr. Hees: It did not go over; no laughs on that one so far.

An hon. Member: That was a dud.

Mr. Beaudry: The time, the place, and the subject hardly call for the levity of mountebanks—

Mr. Hees: There is nothing flatter than a joke that does not go over.

Mr. Bell: Who wrote that one?

Mr. Beaudry: Mr. Chairman, did I hear "once upon a time" Hees?

Mr. Hees: Still very weak laughter.

An hon. Member: You mean "once too often" Hees.

Mr. Beaudry: —or the petulant, puerile and often pompous plea for procrastination.

Mr. Hees: No laughs at all on that one.

Mr. Beaudry: We are talking about a fairly serious matter, at least on this side of the house. I would like to believe that the concern of the Leader of the Opposition for the ownership of natural gas pipe lines by Canadian majority interests stems from both a sense of realism and a sense of public duty. Having failed to convince one, at least, of his followers—and that one the most likely to best assess the situation and the weight of his leader's views—I fear he will also fail to convince this house and the country. The country will not forget that if at this time in our political history it is possible for anyone to even suggest that a billion dollar project should be undertaken or could be undertaken with Canadian capital only, it is precisely because Canada has made such tremendous economic strides in recent years, and this under the very aegis of the sponsor of this resolution and of this government. As between the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Trade and Commerce this country has good and sufficient reasons for believing in the deeds of the one rather than in the flow of words of the other. There has been no equivocation as to that since 1935, and still less since 1948.

The Leader of the Opposition will not convince the country because he omits to mention that his bosom pal, "autonomic" Duplessis, has just sold to what I believe to be United States interests the exploitation of—fancy that—the gas branch of Quebec hydro. He will not convince the country because the current president of the Conservative federation and the immediate past president have not yet determined which theory or speech sounds best, and where, when, and which version is best suited for Quebec, for Ontario and elsewhere, and which one of Duplessis' Ungava policies or of Bennett's hegira to London is best adapted for public wooing.

There is natural gas in Alberta, and approximately one-sixth of it is going to waste daily because it is not being tapped and is seeping out and vanishing into thin air. There is natural gas in Alberta. Alberta is one of the ten Canadian provinces, and it is the duty of Canada to help exploit a natural resource. So far this seems to be sound, even to the opposition, the more so since a large part of Canada will benefit from the advantage of gas. This would eliminate imports of natural gas and would be particularly interesting to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, because it would reduce our imports of United States coal by approximately $200 million a year. To achieve this a pipe line has to be built.

But in the many words of the opposition we should not have a pipe line yet because the Canadian people would have to endorse a note for $72 million redeemable on April 2, 1957 and carrying a 5 per cent interest charge. Is there any security? Yes, there is the pipe line and all movable and immovable assets of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. But to the Leader of the Opposition that is hardly enough. It is not substantial and concrete enough. He would rather ask for names on a board. The need for a pipe line is urgent. The hon. member for Calgary North has just stated that. Many Canadians realize the need is vital, but all the opposition, whether Conservative or C.C.F., seem oblivious to one thing.

We of the Liberal party who constitute the government are the ones, and the only ones, to whom for 21 historic years the financial, economic and social advancement of this country and the stewardship of Canada's patrimony have been entrusted. We are, and we have been for better than two-thirds of the life of confederated Canada, the country's trustees for what is good and sound for Canada. I have seen many elections, and in all the elections since the advent of the present Leader of the Opposition we have been happy to have our policies, our concept of Canadianism and our administration scrutinized and I trust approved by the six million-odd citizens of Canada who in the final estimate select those who occupy these seats.

Come that time of scrutiny, and fortunately it will be soon enough that no one may have forgotten this debate, neither the protagonists of the pipe line nor the antagonists, whatever the premise may be for their views, we on this side shall have this to say to our fellow Canadians: Entrusted by you with the task of safeguarding your interests, moral, physical and financial, now and in the future; satisfied that the future of Canada and of each Canadian, old or new, lies in the fruition of each of the natural assets with which providence has endowed Canada; believing in deep conscience that one of the ten provinces of Canada, Alberta, offers undeveloped natural assets, the exploitation of which would enhance the economic position of a great number of Canadians, if not of the majority; fully conscious of the responsibility which devolves upon us through the trust placed by you in us to implement your hopes for a greater Canada by deed, by constructive deed and by effective and speedy deed, we deem it our duty to Canada, to the vast majority of Canadians who have told us by their ballots to look after their interests, to do this and to say this: "There shall be a pipe line; it shall be constructed as of early June this year; the means: whatever is best for the purpose of speedy, efficient construction in the interests of Canada, and not the means advocated by dilatory parties for dilatory purposes and for spurious reasons."

If all Canadian capital is not available today and if the money of the taxpayers is required and if construction should start today —and construction must start today—let us use all sources of capital. The origin of the capital is relatively unimportant provided we do not lose sight of the country's interests. What is important, what is essential and what is paramount is that we act now. We shall; and we will stand on our doings come the next election.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, the matter we are discussing today is without doubt one of the most important matters that has come before the House of Commons for many years. What is the House of Commons set up for? What have we a parliament for? My idea of parliament is that it is a debating ground, a place where policies are hammered out. The government presents its policies to the house; the house has an opportunity to debate such policies and by its decision indicate what it thinks are proper policies. In my short time in the House of Commons I have seen the odd time when the government has recognized as good some ideas that have come from the opposition. That has not been very frequent, but they have accepted some of those ideas. But on this most important matter—no debate. If the government had been faced with a long debate where it had got to the point that there was a repetition of speeches by the opposition, they might have had some excuse to put on closure. I think there is absolutely no excuse for putting on closure the second day, and this government will live to regret the action it has taken.

When I prepared my speech I put it in two parts. The first part was to discuss this company, and the next part was to discuss the policy we in the C.C.F. thought the government or the people of Canada should put into effect. Under the 20-minute rule our leader was not able last night to bring out the policy of the party in this regard as well as cover the other matters that are in the resolution.

However, first of all I want to protest against the unholy alliance and this wildcat scheme the government has at the present time. What is the position of Trans-Canada today? They want to build a pipe line on a shoestring. They do not have any money. They want the people of Canada to build a pipe line for them; then they will operate it, control it and make the profits that are to be made out of it.

This company came before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in 1951 and made a number of commitments. I had intended to put some of those commitments on the record, but I have not time to do that. A great many of those commitments they have not been able to carry out. The whole picture has changed. From what they said in 1951 the picture has changed very materially. To be brief, I claim that this company after five years has shown a total inability to fulfil its contract. It is not worthy of any further consideration, and should be ruled out of the picture at the present time.

Now I want to deal with what the minister said about the only other alternative policy. I am one of those who recognize that the province of Alberta has a tremendous amount of gas it wants to sell. We realize that, and we want them to have the opportunity to get rid of that gas. We recognize also that power and heat are needed more and more as eastern Canada has been growing so rapidly, and we want to see these two brought together. But to do that we have to have something more than a company that is built on a shoestring.

The minister, speaking yesterday, made the statement that there was only one other alternative, and that he did not want that because it would not be very popular with some people. I do not think "popular" was the word he used. This is what he said, as recorded on page 3860 of Hansard:

> No criticisms or tags such as "chosen instrument" here cast upon Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited will alter the fact that only that company has gathered together the gas purchase and sales contracts, the governmental permits, the organization and the access to pipe which make possible a start this year upon the pipe line.

There is no indication there that this line will be built to Winnipeg this year, but the minister says they are the only ones who can make a start. I just want to analyse that short sentence, "the fact that only that company has gathered together the gas purchase and sales contracts."

This company cannot fulfil its contracts. This company cannot fulfil those contracts it made with the province of Alberta. The province of Alberta is going to sell that gas to whoever has the pipe line. There is no question about that. If the government set up a crown corporation to build that pipe line right through Canada, would there be any doubt that the province of Alberta would sell that gas? They have to get rid of it. Then I come to the sales contracts. Do you mean to say that people in eastern Canada are too much interested in who is going to operate the pipe line, as long as they get gas?

An hon. Member: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Campbell: No, I will not.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Campbell: Does the minister or anybody on the other side of the house—and they may follow me whenever they like—say that the people who want to use gas in eastern Canada are going to turn down the possibility of getting gas if it is operated by a government agency? Absolutely no. Those contracts are just as good for a pipe line operated by a crown corporation as they are for the present company, which cannot fulfil its commitments.

An hon. Member: Who is going to get a permit to transport it?

Mr. Campbell: That is all right.

Mr. Fleming: Speak at the proper time.

Mr. Campbell: Just keep your mouth buttoned up for a while. The minister says this is the only company that has access to pipe, and that they have an option on this pipe. Surely if anybody takes out an option on something, it does not matter what it is, and if they cannot take up that option, what happens? Is that option going to continue forever? No; there is a time limit on all options. When those options expire, the pipe company is in a position to sell its pipe to somebody else. The government says it will perhaps take until 1958 to get pipe. That pipe was made for the trans-Canada pipe line, and the company that made the pipe will sell the pipe to whatever agency builds the pipe line.

I want to say something about private ownership. I believe the people of Canada will be better served under a public ownership system such as the minister has himself been talking about, because a government agency or a public utility is set up for the purpose of providing that public utility at as low a cost as possible. We have had illustrations of public utilities in Canada for many years. This year the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, which had a wonderful period of success, are celebrating their fiftieth anniversary. I want to read to the house just two of the congratulations that appeared in today's issue of the Globe and Mail to Ontario hydro on their accomplishments during the past years. I just picked out two at random. The Davis Lumber Company said:

> We wish to extend our best wishes to Ontario hydro on the celebration of their 50th anniversary and to offer our congratulations on their magnificent accomplishments through the years.

I just wonder how many congratulations we can offer to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines today on the accomplishments they have made during the past years, and I wonder whom in the next 50 years the people of Canada are going to congratulate—

An hon. Member: C. D. Howe.

Mr. Campbell: —on their accomplishments. Are they going to have an opportunity to congratulate a crown corporation that has given them gas at cost, or as near cost as it is possible to offer it, or are they going to say, "We wish we had never seen Trans-Canada Pipe Lines"?

Another statement of the minister's about which I wish to say something is the one he made about the organization of this company. The minister said:

> It has an organization of men experienced in pipe-line construction and operation.

I wonder just how much of an organization these people have. These people have been drilling oil and gas wells. That is the kind of organization they have. They have got an organization to drill oil and gas wells.

I want to say something about what has been done to give the minister an idea of what can be done. In the province of Saskatchewan we found gas only two or three years ago. What did we do in Saskatchewan? The government decided that the best policy, the policy that would suit the interests of the people of the province, would be for the government to build the pipe lines. The government did not have an organization but it did not take very long to set up an organization. They set up their organization. They got an experienced contracting firm with experienced men from the United States to come to Saskatchewan and build their pipe lines for them. The people of Saskatchewan, especially the people in the city of Saskatoon, were amazed at the speed with which the pipe lines were built. Within the next year our cities will all have gas and we are rapidly approaching the point where every fair-sized community in the province will be served.

I want to say something else to support my contention that the federal government should have its own crown corporation go ahead and build the pipe line. It is quite significant that the Toronto accounting firm of Clarkson, Gordon and Company, who were appointed by the Ontario government to look into the economics of the whole pipe line, declared in their report that "an all-government owned pipe line would be economically feasible even though no sales were made to the United States."

Other advantages of a publicly built line are obvious. The government can build the line much more cheaply because it has the ability to raise money more cheaply than a private enterprise firm. The interest rate factor is extremely important. A crown corporation with government guarantees could raise money at 3 or 3½ per cent, while private firms would have to pay, for a construction project of this kind, almost double the interest rate on money borrowed.

The annual carrying charges on a government owned project have been estimated at 6 or 6½ per cent and on a privately financed project 13 to 14 per cent, or about double. It is quite apparent that, apart altogether from the important fact that a government owned line would place the control of this vital energy resource in Canada, it would also mean a substantial financial saving to Canadian consumers.

Again, an income and a sales tax apply to privately financed projects but not to a project built by a crown company. Further, government backed schemes can be amortized for a period as long as 40 years while privately financed schemes can only be amortized for about a 20-year period. As a result, for the publicly financed scheme carrying charges over the period can be reduced approximately by half.

I should like to make an appeal to the Prime Minister that he and his government reconsider the attitude they have taken, that they reconsider the closure motion and that they tell us before eight o'clock tonight that closure has been removed. I should also like the Prime Minister to talk over again with his ministers the idea of stopping this wildcat proposal and bringing in another resolution which will set up a crown corporation for the purpose of building this pipe line.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, you have had a list of the speakers who are supposed to speak for our party today and the next speaker on our list is the hon. member for York-Humber. I should like that understood and I think she should be given the floor.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra raises as a point of order the order in which speakers are called from the chair. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the committee as a whole will realize that officially there is no such thing as a list and that the chair is not bound by a list. I am going further perhaps than my responsibilities at the moment go because I consider that it is fair to all that the situation in which I find myself at the moment should be known.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra as spokesman for the official opposition—I do not mean to say this personally—states that a certain member was the next speaker on the list for his party. I may say that it had been my intention, and I think it would be the intention of whoever was occupying the chair, to call that member when the next understood turn for the official opposition came around. In the ordinary routine, which is not a matter of order and not binding either on the chair or on the house, it would not at the moment be the turn of the official opposition. It would be the turn of another party.

I may say that all the whips with the exception of one—I have not seen the Social Credit whip today—have indicated the order in which they wish their members to speak, and all the whips have agreed on the persons who should speak in the time unofficially allotted to their particular parties. Any time taken by the hon. member for Calgary South, who as a member of the house has full right to be heard in the same way as any other member, and it is the duty of the chair to call him, will not be charged up to that unofficial time which as a matter of courtesy, is allocated to the party for which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra speaks.

Mr. Green: On the point of order, I take it then that I am to understand that this time is being allotted by the Liberal party?

The Deputy Chairman: I may say first to the hon. member that the question of the order in which persons are heard is not a matter of order other than that it is the privilege of anybody to rise to his feet and move at any time that a certain hon. member be heard. That motion, as I understand it, is always accepted. But as there is no desire whatever to put the party of the hon. gentleman who has raised the point at a disadvantage, I may say that I would most likely have seen a Liberal member at this time if I had not seen the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Green: As long as we understand it.

The Deputy Chairman: However, the matter is not a point of order. I answered the point because the hon. member who raised the question quite obviously thought that an injustice was being done to the party to which he belongs.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): As a matter of information, it is a little difficult to hear and I should like to ask you, Mr. Chairman, if the acting leader of the Conservative party is now ruling out one of their own members from the right to speak?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: The government has already ruled out a great many by their infamous closure motion.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, I trust that the time that has been devoted to the discussion of the point of order in the last two or three minutes will not be charged against the 20 minutes allotted to me. I rise to support this resolution providing for government assistance to get the trans-Canada pipe line project rolling this year. I support the plan not because I believe it to be the best solution but because the only other politically possible alternatives to it would involve more long delays, higher costs, a further denial of industrial and population growth particularly in western Canada, and a far heavier burden upon the whole Canadian economy than the present plan.

I deeply regret that some have chosen to inject various elements of emotionalism based largely upon inaccuracies of fact and also upon misunderstandings of the basic problems at issue. The necessity for this present resolution stems from just such elements in the months prior to the 1953 Canadian general election. The disregard of economic factors then has, to some extent, carried on to the present. Efforts to make political hay now for the 1957 general election by similar strayings from the realm of fact into emotionalism might win some votes, but at the expense of lasting damage to Canada's future.

I deeply regret that I am at variance with my Conservative colleagues in this house on the issue now before us, for I firmly believe in the basic principles of the Conservative party, and believe also that, for Canada's sake, it is logical and essential that the Conservatives rather than some other party should succeed the Liberals as the government of our country. But where the application of political expediency is contrary to what I honestly believe are Canada's best interests, I have no alternative but to disagree.

Later in my remarks I will deal specifically with various points raised in this house and in the press, criticizing this particular resolution and the Trans-Canada company. I hope these facts in rebuttal will be of some value to this house in its deliberations.

I mentioned earlier that there are possible alternatives to this present pipe line plan. Regretfully, I can no longer include among prospective alternatives the policy of soundest economic planning of pipe line routes and markets, of which I have been an advocate for several years. That must be ruled out as an alternative—at least now—because neither the major advocates nor the major opponents of the proposals now before us are willing to back away from their commitment to the costly and uneconomic northern Ontario pipe line route as a prime requisite of the first pipe line east from Alberta. I am confident that we would not now be debating this resolution had it not been for that requirement, for a major gas pipe line reaching into eastern Canada by a more economic route would have already been financed by free enterprise, and would have been either in the final stages of construction or fully in operation.

Who is to blame for this situation? In part, blame must be assessed on the Clint Murchison interests of Texas, original proposers of the trans-Canada pipe line, for coming forward with a proposition based on meagre engineering and economic studies, one dependent for "financeability" on a tight squeeze at both ends of the pipe line—low prices to producers, high costs to consumers—and a greater willingness than normal on the part of insurance companies and other investors to put up about $275 million without real assurance of any normal return. I might point out that the present Trans-Canada company is a far different proposition than it was in the days that Murchison was the sole owner. Murchison and his interests have now been reduced to a minor interest and will become a much more minor interest after public financing when they will be replaced in large degree by a large measure, I hope, of Canadian public investment.

But, Mr. Chairman, even greater blame for the present situation lies upon those in politics—and they come from Liberal, Conservative and socialist parties—who quickly leaped without looking upon an "all-Canadian gas pipe line policy" bandwagon in the preliminaries to the 1953 general election. You may recall that it was in March, 1953 that I first took public issue with my party and the government and pointed out that a gas pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada confined to a Canadian route and to Canadian markets was not economically feasible, and urged a careful reappraisal of that and more economic alternative plans. The request was disregarded.

During the 1953 election Liberals and Tories rather solidly committed themselves to and sold the Canadian public on the "all-Canadian route and market" idea, in some of their statements going well beyond even what the agents for Murchison were willing to commit themselves to. So did the socialists but they, unlike the two major parties who favoured private ownership, plumped for a socialized project with all the evils that I am confident a socialized project would involve.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I submit that the hon. member is reading every word of his speech from a prepared statement.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Ellis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I submit that the hon. member is reading every word from a prepared statement, contrary to the rules of the house.

The Deputy Chairman: I think it is fairly well known in this committee and in this house at the present time that so far chairmen and Speakers have found it impossible to enforce any rule against the reading of speeches.

Mr. Knowles: But there is such a rule, is there not, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I am following extensive notes. I would far rather follow notes for the short time left to me and deal with this subject in detailed form than talk blindly without them.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

In 1953, nearly all blindly ignored evidence that eastern Canadian gas distributors objected to the proposed high selling prices under the "all-Canadian" plan and that western Canadian gas producers also objected to selling their product at a somewhat lower price than available through another proposed pipe line that would initially serve Canadian prairies and United States markets, and at a later stage serve eastern Canada. Worst of all, none of the advocates of the so-called "all-Canadian" policy, which was essential, they claimed—and still do, and there is a good deal of merit in the argument—to the national interest and to the industrial development of northern Ontario and to which they were publicly committed, were publicly willing to admit any obligation of the nation and particularly the province chiefly benefiting, namely Ontario, to relieve producers, consumers and investors of any part of the extra burden imposed by the national policy. I refer, of course, to the much higher capital costs and lower potential earning rate of the politically desirable project as compared with the most economic pipe line route and market development plan.

The delays in starting construction—to which gas purchase and gas marketing contracts, and finances are essential—stem primarily from the slow descent from the clouds of patriotic emotion to the ground level of economic fact-facing by Canada's political leaders. Also a major factor in the delay has been the rising cost of the "all-Canadian" project, now up a cold $100 million to an estimated $375 million. The biggest part of the cost increase is due to rising labour, steel and other material costs; the balance to a change to bigger-diameter pipe, and route changes in northern Ontario. Pipe, labour and other costs are going higher, making more urgent an early start of construction.

Meantime, out in western Canada—particularly in Alberta—new discoveries of natural gas reserves have been piling up surplus, shut in for lack of markets, at an average rate of some 4,000 billion cubic feet per year. So far, some $150 million in hard cash has been invested by a host of Canadian and foreign companies in gas lands and wells which have no market and no income and are eating up interest at a rate that could soon crush some of the smaller Canadian companies and seriously curb even the big firms if the bars to export are not quickly torn down by the construction of pipe lines.

The successful results of gambling large sums of money on gas exploration, and the growing knowledge that only the surface of our west's huge gas potential has been scratched, are rapidly convincing more and more Canadians in high places that our national gas policy should be based on recognition of long-term surplus and not fear of shortage, a stand I have urged in Alberta and in this house for several years.

The Social Credit government of Alberta and the Liberal government of Canada have become increasingly realistic in their recognition of gas surplus, and thus their growing willingness to allow a larger—but still tiny—percentage of the rising surplus to go into markets outside Canada. This government also now realistically recognizes—although I regret some of my colleagues in the Conservative ranks apparently do not—that the larger the volume of gas sold by Trans-Canada into American markets, the more economic will the project become, for the benefit of Canadian consumers and producers, by reducing the transport cost of gas moved between Canada's west and east.

There is also another vital fact that is realistically recognized by this Liberal government and by the Conservative government of Ontario, even though some of the Conservatives and Socialists in this house seem to be unwilling to concede it. That fact is that no pipe line company, no matter who its backers are, can hope to secure full finances from the insurance companies, banks and private investors—Canadian or foreign—until it ties up sufficient gas purchase and sales contracts, and necessary government export and import permits, to ensure an adequate minimum of income at least to service its bonded indebtedness.

The present Trans-Canada company which has been greatly increased in financial strength and vastly altered in its pre-public-financing ownership, has since the changes a few months ago made a tremendous amount of progress in gas purchase and sales contract negotiations. Its gas purchase contracts in Alberta now amount to almost 100 per cent of requirements, and the small balance will be arranged for very shortly. Sales commitments in eastern Canada and the prairies now amount to over 90 per cent of the required minimum. A firm contract has been entered into with Tennessee Transmission company for large volume highload factor sale of Canadian gas at Emerson, Manitoba, at most satisfactory prices, contrary to some erroneous reports, and for short-term import of American gas at Niagara for use in the buildup of Canadian markets east of Toronto as far as Montreal.

Trans-Canada also, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out yesterday, has the only available guaranteed supply of pipe to be found to do the job this year. One vital factor still stands between Trans-Canada and its ability to publicly finance the quarter of one billion dollars it needs for the portions of the pipe line in Canada not covered by the northern Ontario government project. That is, of course, the federal power commission approval in Washington of its contract with Tennessee. Particularly important is the $8 million per year minimum that approval of the United States import would provide Trans-Canada for transport of gas between the Alberta-Saskatchewan border and Emerson, Manitoba. This income is after deduction of the purchase price of gas at the Alberta border. This anticipated income was a major factor in enabling Trans-Canada to reduce its proposed selling prices to Canadian customers to a level that made signing up of customers possible within recent months. Without the assurance of that minimum income from transport of gas for export, it is unlikely that Trans-Canada, or any other company, can raise money for construction, unless the consumers of eastern Canada would be willing to boost their prospective gas bill by $8 million yearly or the Canadian and Ontario governments would be willing to provide annual subsidies of that amount. Both of these alternatives are highly unlikely.

I am not as riled up about the federal power commission hearing in Washington or as pessimistic about timing of imports approval by the federal power commission as some members of this house. I believe, approval is not only inevitable, but that the odds now favour a decision before next spring. The actual construction of a pipe line across the prairies this year, assuring the federal power commission that the availability of Canadian gas at Emerson is a reality and not the pipe dream it was during the abortive federal power commission hearings of an important application over one year ago, is the best guarantee possible by Canadian action to win the desired result. This proposed export at Emerson, which the government approved despite strong resistance from some in this house, takes a sizeable part of the burden off Canada in making an all Canadian route pipe line financeable. Canadians are the beneficiaries, regardless of whether Canadians or foreigners own the shares of the pipe line.

Another step to help make the project feasible is one of those involved in the government's resolution, the joint federal-Ontario construction of part of the northern Ontario pipe line, for leasing to an ultimate purchase by Trans-Canada. Under the contract involved, the government company will get less than normal return of interest and depreciation during the initial tough years of eastern Canadian market buildup for gas, thus greatly improving the financeability of the over-all project, but is guaranteed a return of at least 3·5 per cent on investment plus depreciation by levying a first charge against profits of the whole balance of the privately owned pipe line system when that system gets into a profit position. Over the term of the lease, Trans-Canada is going to average out with a cost saving of only the difference between 3·5 per cent and normal commercial interest rate, which would amount to around $1,250,000 yearly, although the deferred portion of costs during early years will in effect provide a greater aid during the early years.

Contrary to some claims, the Trans-Canada company will not get the benefit from the interest saving. All the benefit, and more, will go to the gas consumers of Canada, with the principal benefit going to the Ontario consumers. This is because, as a direct result of the government plan, Trans-Canada has been able in recent months to reduce its contract charges to Canadian gas purchasers by an amount that will exceed $2,500,000 per year during the first few years, and by progressively larger amounts as Canadian gas purchases increase.

The second phase of the resolution involves a federal government short-term loan, at 5 per cent interest, of 90 per cent of the cost of construction of Trans-Canada's pipe line as far east as Winnipeg in order to get it done this year and, among other things, meet the urgent need for gas at Winnipeg. Trans-Canada itself will provide about $7,500,000 of the cost, boosting its total investment to over $21 million by this year end. The plan is sound, from the government's point of view, for if the company cannot complete its full quarter billion dollar financing by next April 1, the government takes over a going pipe line for 90 per cent of cost, plus the very sizeable other assets of the company in the form of gas purchase and sales contracts, rights of way, engineering data, and so on.

The prairie pipe line, so long as it is confined to prairie markets, will earn operating costs from gas sales, but cannot earn interest charges. The $4 million a year interest will, however, be money well invested; for if the pipe line is not built this year at current steel and labour costs, it will cost an additional amount to build in future years far greater than the interest lost. If the company finances its project in full by next spring, which I am now quite hopeful of, it will pay off the government with full interest. If it fails in its earnest efforts the government gets a pipe line and other assets at far less than cost, and the companies who now back Trans-Canada will take a financial licking 30 to 40 times the mere $500,000 that Frank McMahon offered as a performance bond.

The Deputy Chairman: It is my duty to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Nickle: I shall carry on the next time I have the opportunity.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for York-Humber. It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville) moved the second reading of Bill No. 291, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in this bill the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is seeking authority to build a branch line of railway for a distance of some 20 miles southerly from a point near Brocket, Alberta. As most hon. members probably know, all railway companies must come to parliament for authority to build a branch line which is longer than six miles, by virtue of section 183 of the Railway Act. Brocket is situated in the southwest corner of the province of Alberta and is on the secondary main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway between Vancouver and Medicine Hat, which runs through the Crowsnest pass.

The branch line will be built in a southerly direction to a property owned by Canadian Gulf Oil Company, where at the present time a plant is in the course of erection to process the natural gas developed from the Pincher Creek field by the Canadian Gulf Oil Company. It is not expected that the construction of this line will cause any great difficulty. The first five miles of this line will pass through the Peigan Indian reservation and I understand satisfactory arrangements have been made between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Indian band on that reservation.

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that one of the significant sources of natural gas in Alberta is in the Pincher Creek field in the southwest portion of the province. This field has been discovered and developed by the Canadian Gulf Oil Company.

The gas at Pincher Creek is a sour wet gas. In other words, it contains approximately 10 per cent hydrogen sulphide. In the formation the pressures are in the order of 5,000 pounds per square inch. Because of these pressures, and because of the large percentage of hydrogen sulphide which the gas contains, the gas is very corrosive.

[Mr. Nickle.]

In its natural state this gas cannot be placed in transmission lines for sale as a fuel. It must first be stripped or purified. Purification means removing all the hydrogen sulphide, almost all the carbon dioxide, and a large percentage of the liquefiable hydrocarbons. From the process of purification the following products will be obtained: sulphur, propane, butanes, natural gasoline and condensate.

The removal of these products requires the installation of a plant of considerable magnitude, and involves the installation of precision equipment. As a matter of fact, two plants must be built. One will recover the stabilized condensate and the hydrogen sulphide. When these products are removed the other plant will recover the elemental sulphur from the material taken from the hydrogen sulphide gas. At the initial stage, of course, the purified gas thus obtained will be reinjected into the formation on which the sour gas was obtained.

Construction of the Gulf plant at Pincher Creek began on April 1, 1956, according to the information I have. It is hoped that the plant will be completed by September 1 of this year.

The important purpose of establishing the plant now at Pincher Creek is to recover the elemental sulphur. A company known as Northwest Nitro Chemicals is now completing a plant at Medicine Hat, Alberta. This plant will produce a fertilizer with an ammonium base. To produce this fertilizer, sulphuric acid will be required. The acid will be manufactured from the elemental liquid sulphur supplied by Canadian Gulf Oil Company. This elemental sulphur will be shipped in a liquid state, in tank cars, from the Pincher Creek plant to Northwest Nitro Chemicals at Medicine Hat.

It is expected that the sulphur will be produced at the rate of 225 long tons per day. The stabilized condensate which will be another by-product of the purification will be produced at the rate of 76,650 imperial gallons per day. This condensate will be shipped to refineries at Calgary.

While the immediate customer for sulphur is the new fertilizer industry established at Medicine Hat by Northwest Nitro Chemicals, there will be a market for the additional sulphur produced by Gulf in the pulp and paper industry to the west and to the south of Pincher Creek. Northwest Nitro Chemicals plant will be in production, it is expected, by about September 1, 1956.

I am also informed that the only feasible and practical way to ship the volume of these by-products from the Pincher Creek gas field is by rail. The sulphur is, of course, in molten form and must be transported in special tank cars. Furthermore, owing to the severe winter season in Alberta, highway service would be erratic because roads are frequently impassable because of heavy snow storms. Transportation otherwise than by rail would require multiple handling of the product and would be quite expensive. It would appear that transportation by rail is imperative in these circumstances.

If this bill is now given second reading, Mr. Speaker, I propose that it be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Representatives of the Canadian Pacific Company and the Canadian Gulf Oil Company will appear as witnesses before that committee and will explain in further detail the various aspects of this proposed project.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that this short branch line from the Canadian Pacific Railway's Crowsnest pass line, extending from 20 miles south to the area of the Pincher Creek gas field, is going to be built. As indicated by the sponsor, primarily it will make possible and assist in the development there of the sulphur and petro-chemical industry which will be of considerable value and importance in southern Alberta and, as a matter of fact, as far as Canadian industry generally is concerned.

Whilst that is the primary reason for its construction it will also provide certain services as far as the agricultural economy of that section of the country is concerned and as far as grain and cattle producers are concerned.

As the bill is going to the committee where we will get the details concerning exactly where it will run and what stations or trackage will be provided, and information concerning the purposes it is expected to serve, I think there is no need of my saying anything further about it at the moment.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) closes the debate on second reading I wonder if he could give the house the positive assurance that this 20-mile line of railway will be built wholly within Canada and that the company will not come back five years from now seeking a 90 per cent loan of a large sum of money?

Mr. McCann: That is too smart.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say very much concerning this project at the present time. Undoubtedly hon. members will have more to say in the committee. I do, however, welcome this proposed extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway into the southern part of Alberta because there is an area there which needs the outlet now and will particularly need it after the chemical industries which will come about as the result of the exportation of gas are located there. This bill will certainly do a great deal to improve the financial status of that part of southern Alberta, and we certainly welcome it.

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) speaks, would he tell the house whether any consideration has been given to building this branch line out of the town of Pincher Creek? I understand that the town of Pincher Creek has made some representations asking that the line be connected to that town.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, answering the question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, may I say that representations have been made by the chamber of commerce of the town of Pincher Creek as to whether or not it would be possible to have this line run from Pincher Creek rather than from Brocket. As a result of those representations the chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company investigated the matter and made certain findings.

He came to the conclusion that owing to the heavy grading that would be required by this other route and the necessity of crossing highway No. 8 an additional expenditure of $170,000 would be required, and in addition there would be an extra maintenance cost per year of $20,000. Taking all things into consideration, it would appear that the best route to be followed would be the one proposed.

In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), may I assure him that if he looks at the map of the province he will find Brocket and will note that a point 20 miles south is still within Canada.

Mr. Knowles: But we remember the assurance you gave five years ago.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING THAT ADVERTISING SHALL STATE COST OF LOANS

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon) moved the second reading of Bill No. 213, to amend the Small Loans Act (advertising).

Small Loans Act

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this bill I should first like to put on the record the explanatory note, which reads:

> The purpose of this act is to amend the Small Loans Act, so as to require any money-lender or small loans company, in any advertising in which the amount required by way of monthly or periodic payments in order to repay a loan is indicated, to state what the cost of such loan amounts to in terms of percentum per annum.

In my opinion the significant words in that explanatory note are "terms of percentum per annum". The matter at hand concerns advertising by small loan companies which in my opinion is sometimes deceptive. For some reason or other there has been considerable interest at this particular session in the operations of small loan companies. I think this is the fifth bill which has been listed this year. First there was a bill moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue); then there was the bill sponsored by the Minister of Finance; then there was Bill G5 of the Senate which was a private member's bill to change the name of a loan company and to increase its capitalization; then there was Bill H5 of the Senate to incorporate a new small loan company which was sponsored by an hon. member of this house; and then we have Bill No. 213 to amend the Small Loans Act with respect to advertising.

If the records of this house are any indication, small loan companies are becoming more important in the lives of individuals and families. I am not discussing today whether or not that is a good thing, but I have my own opinion about it. The discussion today concerns the advertising by these loan companies and in my opinion there should be some restrictions upon that advertising.

I think it is a rather sad commentary on our society that we have come to accept commercial advertising as certainly exaggerated. I think I can go further and say that most of it is misleading and some of it is dishonest. It is important to our economic life. We have the ridiculous type of advertising claims for cars which we see in every magazine we pick up. We have the advertisement of one cigarette company claiming that their cigarettes will cure the sore throats caused by the brand advertised on the previous page. Fortunately some of us have built up a resistance against that particular type of advertising.

The small loan companies sometimes use that type of advertising. They make statements such as those which were quoted by the hon. member for Assiniboia when he was dealing with his bill. We see references about small loans being the happy answer to your money needs, that they are our pals and such things. We see pretty pictures of children under the Christmas tree revelling in the proceeds of a 26 per cent loan obtained the week before from a small-loan company. No one of course would be naive enough to pay any attention to that type of advertising.

But there is a more dangerous type of advertising, probably because it is not so patent. For example, we have the statements by one loan company that banks are not equipped to handle this kind of business, and then there is another statement in the same brochure that credit unions are poor places to go for that particular type of loan. Statements like that are perhaps plausible to some people but they are manifestly untrue. Here is a quotation from one of these advertising pamphlets:

> Would you hazard a guess as to how much money we do make on small loans only?

They give the answer as one-fortieth of one per cent. Of course that is a plain lie, and there is no other term that could be applied to it. It is an ingenious method of advertising, a method once employed by a great packing company which had been accused in this house of falsifying its profits in that type of advertising. This is the profit on the dollar lent, which, of course, is a completely different thing from the profit on the funds invested. But the type of person borrowing this sort of money usually does not look into that.

Here is another statement under the heading of "The Rates We Charge". This, of course, is another complete falsification. My hon. friends on the other side will say that the government gets blamed for everything. They are blaming the government for this one. They say:

> The charge presently stipulated by our federal laws is 2 per cent per month on the outstanding balance of a loan to $500.

If I have any knowledge of the English language in general, and in particular of that word "stipulated", I would characterize that as not even a white lie but a deliberate one, with the deliberate intent of fooling the customers.

The third type of advertising is one which I wish to speak against this afternoon. I am not intending at the moment, as I say, to criticize the loan company. I would be out of order, possibly, if I did so. That has already been done in speeches in the previous debates. Their operators have been called harsh names in this house.

They have been defended, may I say, in all honesty by my Liberal friends, who have with one or two exceptions leaped to their defence valiantly both by voice and by vote in this house. They must look upon these companies as being a beneficial part of our economic lives. I am sorry I cannot agree with them. They were in favour of incorporating that new company and they were in favour of granting a change in name and increased capitalization.

Of course, one might say that those things were being done completely within the law. We had, too, the fact that the national chairman of the Liberal party was mixed up with a couple of these small loan companies. We on this side of the house were frankly surprised that a man of such eminence and connected with this great party that has formed the government here for all these years should bother with such small potatoes, as somebody said, battening upon the misery of the poor. However, I see the Speaker looking me over, and I shall proceed no further in that particular direction.

Mr. Philpott: You have been out of order for five minutes.

Mr. Knowles: That rule has been thrown out the window.

Mr. Knight: The assumption is then, and I am going to accept it for today, that these are legitimate concerns doing legitimate business under the law. I am prepared to admit that for the moment, and it may be that the operators of these legitimate concerns are also honourable men. They may be all honourable men; I do not know.

Mr. Knowles: So was Brutus.

Mr. Knight: At any rate, as such they have something to sell. They are advertising their wares in the public press and they should be willing, if they are honourable men, to make clear the price of their product and the conditions under which that product is sold. If these honourable men, then, are under the shadow of the law and in fact countenanced, and indeed encouraged—it would appear from the debate that took place in this house—by this government, we would expect them to be open and honest about their operations.

I should like to talk for a while about advertising generally and about some of the ridiculous things that we do about advertising. I am thinking of liquor advertising, for example. There is a foolish idea that you must not advertise liquor on a bottle. It is all right to put it on the label but not on the bottle, because that makes a difference in law. We hear about magazines transferring from some "holier than thou" province to certain dens of iniquity in order that they might be able to carry on the business of liquor advertising in magazines and that sort of thing. We have so much of this sort of thing in Canada, and we have an historical background for it all. We have so much of that rationalization. I could use a stronger word, but I shall not.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend is pretty rational.

Mr. Knight: Some may say that we should hesitate about telling people how to run their businesses and what they should or should not do. This has come up in regard to this bill. Some classical student may quote at me the words "caveat emptor", or "Let the buyer beware". In other words, they may say it is up to the user of the product to decide whether or not this particular bill is to his advantage. But I would point out to you, sir, that there are members of the public who are in need of protection. We do not allow people to use motor cars, for example, to run roughshod over everybody; we regulate the traffic. We are not supposed to sell liquor and tobacco to minors. We have an interference there with their liberty, surely. Under the Food and Drugs Act, I take it, labels are placed on all products to make the contents clear so that there is no doubt as to what you are buying.

After all, when the customer goes into an ordinary store, there is the piece of goods in front of him, and there displayed on it is a price ticket, so that he knows what he is taking. In other words, that particular buyer does not have to beware so much, because he has a chance. He sees what he is buying, and he knows what he has to pay for it. However, in the case of small loans, what is the situation? The one big point I wish to make here is that this small loans advertising never actually shows the interest in terms of rate per annum. You may ask, "what does it show?". It shows all these nice little things that I have been reading about and which have no significance, but it usually shows a scheme for repayment. You may say, "People ought to be able to figure that out." They do not. As a matter of fact, these people who will become the victims of small loan companies are usually people who are distraught about something. They are in serious financial trouble. They are in no condition to argue, either about the amount of interest or whether or not it is beneficial for them to take a loan at all. It seems so horribly easy. You just go down and you get the money on the same day, or, if you telephone a little ahead, you can get it when you go there. It all seems so terribly easy.

Further, a great many of them are, educationally speaking, incapable of working out the cost. I do not know whether you have noticed those advertisements, but they are very seldom in terms of round figures. There is always a balance of 73 cents or 99 cents or something awkward that is indivisible by almost anything, and it is a difficult proposition because you have 12 months and that is the thing that they do not realize.

The type of advertisement to which I particularly object and which I would like to see amended, together with this Small Loans Act, is the type of advertisement which shows the repayment month by month and does not show the rate of interest charged. By design or by mathematical accident, it may well be, these things are almost always stated in odd numbers which make the arithmetic difficult.

Lest I be misunderstood, I want to take a simple example, and I have given an example in a previous debate. I will put the matter in simple figures and I am thinking of the situation that existed some time ago before Bill 51 imposed certain restrictions on the interest. Let us say you are going to borrow $1,200. The advertisement says that you get $1,200. We will say that at the end of the first month you repay $112, at the end of the second month $112, until you get down to the twelfth month. We will assume that the loan is for a year. At the end of the 12 months you look the matter over and you discover that for the use of that money—I am saying nothing further for the moment; I am not mentioning the terms—you have paid $144. The person who is none too adroit at figures and who is perhaps not too particular because of the trouble he happens to be in will say that he has paid $144 for the use of that money and that looks like 12 per cent. He will say that is pretty high but that he needed the money and that maybe it was worth 12 per cent to get the money.

The catch is, of course, that it is not 12 per cent. It is not even double 12 per cent, or 24 per cent. It is more than double the 12 per cent that on its face it appears to be. The explanation is perfectly simple. Actually he only had the use of $1,200 for one month. At the end of the first month he repays $100 and at the end of the second month another $100, at which time he only has the use of $1,000. So it goes down the line until he gets down to the last month when he only has the use of $100 for the final month but pays exactly the same amount of interest. No, I did not say the same rate. He pays the same amount of interest each month but in each month on a different and decreasing amount of money. Therefore, it does take something of an arithmetician to sit down and calculate exactly the rate of interest he has paid.

Personally, I have had complaints about these things. People get into these jams and they come to me or to some other member of parliament and talk about their troubles. I have had these complaints and people have said to me that they never realized they were getting themselves into anything like that. You see, they had read an advertisement saying something like "just come to us and end your money troubles." A so-and-so loan "ended my worries." Look at how this man's worries were ended. He had been paying $60 or $65 a month on furniture or something else and discovered he could not do it. So he went to the loan company and he says, "You know what they did for me? Not only did they lessen the amount I had to pay back each month but they actually gave me some more money to take home with me." They lowered the amount he had to pay each month and he was a happy man. Of course, the thing that he neglected was that his troubles were not ended but were just beginning because he had contracted to double the time of his contract and repay a somewhat smaller amount per month than he had been paying.

For that reason and for the other reasons I have stated, I think that the government would be justified in passing a bill of this sort. Here is a class of people who in the first place are perhaps somewhat underprivileged. They are a class of people who need protection, and I think something should be done because there is no doubt that these people are being victimized. It is the type of people who want very small loans who are the worst victimized.

Even under the new government legislation, Bill 51, which I welcome, the interest rate on such small loans is untouched. It is still legal to charge a rate of 2 per cent per month. On loans between $300 and $500 the situation is not much better. It is true that the rate is perhaps something like 2 per cent per annum less but actually there is not much difference in the case of loans under $500. The situation is still pretty bad. These companies claim they have to have that amount of interest on account of their losses, and so on. That has been said before but I do not think they can justifiy their position on that basis because their actual losses are very small.

I ask this simple question. Why do these companies not disclose the actual interest rate in their advertisements? Is it because they fear that if the actual rate in percent per annum were disclosed the public would shy away from them and that would be detrimental to their profits? I ask a further question. Is it honest to conceal the rate? The purpose of the bill is to have the cost of the loan to the customer stated in the advertisements in terms of per cent per annum.

When a man can see that there will be some excuse then for saying caveat emptor, let the buyer beware, because what it is going to cost him over the period that he is using the amount he borrows will be printed plainly in front of him.

I would plead with the government to take action. I do not expect any particular action at this moment but I think this is a matter that does deserve consideration along with what has already been done by Bill 51 in making some small reduction in the interest rate.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give a certain amount of qualified moral support—

An hon. Member: Be careful now.

Mr. Philpott: —to the hon. member for Saskatoon. Let me say at the outset that I agree entirely with his main point. I definitely think that in all advertisements of small loan companies and similar institutions which are directly or indirectly in the business of lending money the effective rate of interest should be plainly stated in the advertisement. I think if we were to do the one thing with respect to our small loan legislation that would probably be of the most benefit to the public we could not do anything better than to stipulate that one simple thing and to say that everybody who lends money must state in his advertisements the actual rate of interest which he charges. When Bill 51 goes before the banking and commerce committee and we have competent witnesses before us who can give us evidence on the matter I certainly hope that we will have evidence on this particular question.

But I should like to submit in all earnestness to my hon. friend opposite that the method of getting this thing applied may not be quite so simple as he seems to think. I suggest that this whole question of small loans is tied up with a vast amount of the business life of Canada. For instance, where are you going to draw the line between small loans actually made by lending institutions and loans made indirectly by furniture companies, electrical companies, automobile companies, and all the rest?

Earlier this year we heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) give some examples of what he thought were exorbitant interest charges. In doing so he did not refer at all to the small loan companies but referred to Simpson's, Eaton's and some of the other big mail order companies in this country. I should like to submit that if we want to even bring into the discussion the charges made by these admirable institutions, who have such a wide measure of support in the house, some of the charges made by credit unions would not compare any too favourably with the charges made by some of these small loan companies.

Mr. Argue: There is none over 12 per cent.

Mr. Philpott: I can remember going to the old Toronto Globe as a very young working newspaperman some 30 years ago when they had a kind of benefit society which we would now call a credit union and which they probably now call a credit union. The society used to make loans against our pay on a short-term basis. Had the law been in effect which my friend the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) wants and which I agree with him we should have in Canada, and had we been forced to advertise the actual rate of interest charged, that would have been an exorbitant rate of interest indeed. A little earlier in my life I remember having a job for nearly two years and having some 20 salesmen under me selling electrical appliances. In the thousands of cases where we sold electrical appliances and in the years I was with that particular company, which was a very fine company, I had only one salesman ever tell me that any one of his customers ever sat down with pencil and paper and did all the intricate figuring that would be necessary to prove exactly what effective rate of interest she was paying per year. But when I listen to some of the remarks we have heard in this house this year, I wonder whether there is not another side of the story. For instance, we have been told about the poor borrower of money, about how he is getting soaked, and about how he is paying far more in the rate of interest than he deserves to pay. I do not know whether the hon. gentlemen opposite always listen to the same radio broadcasts to which I listen, but coming over the radio I hear "Something-Something Jewellers, nothing down"—

Mr. Knight: Credit Jewellers.

Mr. Philpott: —four years to pay". But when you go in to check up the price, you find that they are paying exactly the same price for the product as is the poor deluded creature who goes in and pays cash. I sometimes think that the forgotten citizen of Canada is the good old citizen, raised on the principles of Scots thrift, who believed that it was a sin to go into debt, that you must pay cash on the line for everything you bought. I sometimes think that our great merchandiser Timothy Eaton, who founded a great business on the principle of paying cash and paying less, must be turning over in his grave if he knows that people are going up and down the streets in the suburbs of Toronto, knocking on the doors and asking people to open charge accounts and to go more into debt every month. So I say let us remember that there are two sides to this story, even on the question of these credits and on the question of debts.

I for one hope that when we get this Bill No. 51 into the banking and commerce committee we can have competent witnesses there first of all to show us how much the effective interest rate is and, second, to show us whether or not this advertising which is being used in showing the amount of repayment per month is deceptive. I submit that this is a big and complicated question, intertwined and involved with all the question of merchandising and time payments in Canada over which this federal parliament has little if any control. I submit that you might be putting our whole small debt legislation in jeopardy if you were to take an unwise step which would be held to be invalid.

Mr. Argue: Are you for or against the bill?

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest and pleasure to the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) because I observe that he discussed this problem and the men who carry on the business on the basis that they were honourable men carrying on a business which is under supervision and which honourable and decent men could carry on. It seems to me that the idea he has in this measure is sound and that no fair-minded man should object to it. I will therefore vote for the measure. I am impressed, however, by the difficulty which has been outlined by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). I think there will be difficulties. However, I shall not spend time in discussing them now because I think we can do that to much better advantage before the banking and commerce committee. But when we are considering this measure I suggest that we do not overlook the fact that the problem is perhaps not as easy to solve as it appears to be on the surface.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of this bill has indicated, we have had several debates recently in the broad field related to small loans legislation. This is a fairly recent proposed amendment. It was introduced after the Easter recess. I was much interested to hear the sponsor say that, having regard to the fact that a government bill had received second reading by this house this session and was soon to receive the attention of the banking and commerce committee, he surmised it might be appropriate not to press this particular legislation at this time prior to the intensive type of review that all hon. members know is available when a bill is referred to a parliamentary committee.

As I have said before in discussing this subject in a broad way, this legislation in this small-loan field is of relatively recent origin. It had its beginning as a result of activities in parliamentary committees which examined private bills in the first instance seeking incorporation for small loan companies. From those discussions it finally appeared to be desirable to attempt to legislate in this field under the authority of the section in the British North America Act which gives the federal parliament certain rights with respect to the subject of interest. Early in these parliamentary inquiries, not only to the parliamentarians who were giving this subject attention but to the officials in the department of insurance to whom the administration of any of our legislation was likely to be referred, it became evident that very possibly there could be a legal difficulty owing to the possibility of a rather thin legal line between the rights of the provinces under section 92 of the British North America Act and any rights that were extended to the federal parliament on the subject only of interest. Very early in these discussions the superintendent of insurance was sufficiently impressed with this factor that, in his annual report, he commented upon this matter of legal jurisdiction. I refer to appendix B to his 1936 report on small loan companies, page 117. There the superintendent of insurance, who at that time was Mr. Finlayson, had this to say:

> It will be apparent from the foregoing that there may be question as to the relative jurisdictions of parliament and the provincial legislatures in regulating the total charges for loans of money to borrowers. Section 91 of the British North America Act assigns "Interest" to the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, but there is nothing in that act to say what charges, other than interest so-called, are to be regarded as interest in disguise. Section 92 of that act assigns to the exclusive legislative authority of the legislatures of the provinces "property and civil rights in the province" and it is conceivable that the regulation of some class or classes of charges in connection with loans of money may fall within that heading.

I am referring to this matter in order to show that, even with respect to any imposition of a cost or charge to a prospective borrower, there was some considerable uncertainty as to whether or not all costs could be placed within the definition of interest. My hon. friend, in the legislation he proposes, would go further than that and, under the guise of dealing with the subject of interest, suggests that it is appropriate for this legislature to pass a law respecting the field of advertising.

My hon. friend has referred to advertising in some other lines of business. In doing so, he was referring to the general question of caveat emptor. He said that laws have been passed dealing with advertising in the field of dispensing liquor. He indicated that there were certain fair trade laws under which misrepresentation or anything misleading in the field of ordinary merchandising was prohibited. He referred to certain laws with respect to the driving of cars and other things. I point out to my hon. friend that in every instance to which he referred with respect to existing laws relating to advertising, those laws were passed within the federal system, operating in this country, by provincial legislatures under the general jurisdiction of the provinces for legislating in the field of property and civil rights.

This question, as I say, has been constantly in the mind of anyone who has been giving careful consideration to the small-loan field. The superintendent of insurance, both the gentleman I quoted, Mr. Finlayson, and later the present superintendent of insurance, Mr. MacGregor, after consultation with the Department of Justice, have expressed some doubts as to whether or not it would be proper for this parliament to legislate with respect to the style of advertising permitted in the small-loan field. When they considered this problem, of course, they have always pointed out that while it is open for the Department of Justice to give an opinion and it is open for the superintendent of insurance to act upon that opinion in the advice he gives to the government with respect to the sponsorship of any government legislation, the final decision on the legality or otherwise of action of this kind would have to be made by the courts.

I have pointed out that there was some doubt in the late thirties as to how far in the legislative authority over interest it was possible to go and define interest as inclusive of all forms of charges on borrowing. The house is aware that subsequently the legislation in the small-loan field has been tested in the courts with respect to this matter of all charges. It was established that mortgage costs, legal costs and anything else associated with these loans were properly to be considered as in the federal jurisdiction as something in the nature of interest in the borrowing of money. But I would suggest to the house that we are going to have an excellent opportunity to examine something that was not examined as carefully as it might have been in the late thirties, namely, regulations respecting advertising. I am quite sure the banking and commerce committee would be able to call as witnesses officials of the Department of Justice. Of course, an essential witness in any committee meeting considering the Small Loans Act will be the superintendent of insurance. I think hon. members will have an opportunity of forming an opinion as to whether or not we are going a step farther than the courts might support if we were to accept the legislative proposal advanced by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). If this parliament goes farther than the courts will uphold, then of course the danger is that the base legislation, as worth-while as the Small Loans Act has proven to be, might as a whole, be termed ultra vires and we would not have legislation at all.

My hon. friend has referred to certain types of advertising that have been made by companies operating in this field.

Mr. Knight: Might I ask my hon. friend one question. Does he remember the action that was taken here under federal jurisdiction in regard to the striped packages for bacon, and the prohibition put upon the people in the bacon trade?

Mr. Benidickson: But that was with respect to a special statute on the marking of goods under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. That is something my hon. friend will have every opportunity of examining the deputy minister of justice upon.

Now, falling short of placing on the statute something that might weaken the act itself and the whole basis of our legislative action, the superintendent of insurance has from the very beginning of the administration of this act gone as far as he thought he could go in the matter of advertising. I see I have not the time to give the full details of his memorandum to small loan companies to the house, but I could quickly give the reference to it and the hon. members will be able to look it up for themselves. I refer to the introduction to the 1940 report on small loan companies at page 11. There is a memorandum there indicating the direction, which is of long standing, from the superintendent of insurance to the people in this field and it says what would be and what would not be regarded by him as offensive in this field.

On motion of Mr. Benidickson the debate was adjourned.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Howe (Port Arthur)—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation to be known as Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for the purposes, amongst others, of constructing, maintaining and operating a natural gas pipe line between the Ontario-Manitoba border and Kapuskasing, Ontario, and of leasing with an option to purchase such natural gas pipe line to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and carrying out such leases, including the disposal by the corporation of such pipe line in connection with such purchase option, and to provide that the Minister of Finance may lend money to the corporation for such purposes.

To provide also that the corporation may, on behalf of Her Majesty, out of moneys advanced by the Minister of Finance, make short term loans to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the construction of a natural gas pipe line from a point on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to the vicinity of Winnipeg, such loans not to exceed in the aggregate eighty million dollars or ninety per cent of the cost of construction of the said pipe line, whichever is the lesser, and to be made upon such terms, conditions and security as approved by the governor in council.

To provide also that the corporation may do such things as are conducive to the attainment of the foregoing purposes, and that in the event of default of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in carrying out any agreement for the foregoing purposes the corporation may take possession and control of any or all assets, rights and undertakings of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and conduct the business and operations of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited with respect to such assets, rights and undertakings, and that if such default should occur prior to completion of the pipe line mentioned in the last preceding paragraph hereof the corporation may complete its construction and manage and operate it and that it may, out of moneys advanced by the Minister of Finance acquire shares of the capital stock of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

To provide that the aggregate outstanding at any time of the amounts authorized by the measure to be advanced for the foregoing purposes by the Minister of Finance to the corporation together with the loans authorized to be made by the Minister of Finance to the corporation shall not exceed one hundred and thirty million dollars.

And to provide further for the appointment and remuneration of directors, officers and employees necessary for the administration of the act.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Miss Aitken: Mr. Chairman, the first few words of the resolution before us read, "Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure;" —resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure that will enable the government to use the taxpayers' money to build parts of a trans-Canada pipe line 83·4 per cent of the control of which will be in the hands of United States interests.

To be expedient, according to the dictionary, is to be suitable, fitting or convenient. We in this party do not consider it suitable, fitting or convenient to surrender our economic independence to a foreign country no matter how friendly that country may be. We do not consider it suitable, fitting or convenient that our business or the future of our national resources should be dependent on such foreign bodies as the federal power commission. We do not believe there is anything expedient in this resolution. I think the best description has been given by the Toronto Star which referred to it as a Canadian tragedy.

I wish to read the last paragraph from an article which appeared in the Toronto Star on March 17:

The Trans-Canada deal is so bad that it deserves to be laughed out of parliament. But with the government standing pat, and the Liberal majority evidently ready to fall into line, it is no laughing matter. The stage is being set for a Canadian tragedy.

This is what might be called the third plan for an all-Canadian pipe line. I call it a plan rather than a policy because the government does not appear to have any policy, even today, five years after the first plan emerged.

What is the government's policy in building an all-Canadian pipe line? First, the Minister of Trade and Commerce selected Trans-Canada as the chosen one, the white-haired boy. Trans-Canada sold itself on the basis of its ability not only to finance and build the pipe line but to operate it without financial assistance from the government. Then it became obvious that Trans-Canada could not finance and build the line without financial assistance. Not only does this company need help to build the uneconomical part of the line, but Trans-Canada cannot even build the easiest part of the line from Alberta to Manitoba without help.

During the five years we have waited for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to get going on the pipe line, several suggestions have been bandied around in parliament and in the press. The first of these is that the government might guarantee Trans-Canada bonds. There were hints that the minister liked that idea but that some of his colleagues did not like it. Then another idea emerged, that Trans-Canada should borrow from the international development bank. Nothing came of that idea. Now, finally, there is this resolution, that the government will build parts of the pipe line, the most difficult part and the easiest part, and Trans-Canada will lease-purchase the government-owned parts and eventually own them.

Where does that leave us? According to a well-known Canadian oil expert whose name has been mentioned several times today in this house, Frank McMahon, it leaves us with a pipe line subsidized by Canadian public funds and controlled by United States financial interests. The chief concern of those interests will be to sell gas as cheaply as possible in the United States. It is a government sell-out of Canadian resources to powerful United States interests.

Yesterday the minister accused the opposition of scaring the goose that lays the golden eggs. Well, Mr. Chairman, we in this party are only too happy to sell the golden eggs. But I believe the government is not killing the goose that lays the golden eggs; instead it is putting it on a silver platter and handing it to the United States.

Mr. Rowe: And they are not even getting the platter back.

Miss Aitken: Let us look at the bewildering facts. Five years ago this house was asked to grant a charter to Trans-Canada to build an all-Canadian pipe line. Parliament was given assurance by the officials of the company that the undertaking could be achieved without government assistance. A representative of Trans-Canada appeared before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to say that this project, and I quote, "would be entirely economic and go along by itself". And so, in 1951, the parliament of Canada gave Trans-Canada the franchise to build an all-Canadian pipe line on the company's own assurance that it would be entirely economic and would go along by itself.

A moment ago I suggested that we look at the bewildering facts; today we must look upon them not as facts but as fiction. Today, without any detailed facts, with no clear explanations, we can only assume that this project, so economically sound in 1951, is no longer entirely economic, nor can it go along by itself.

If Trans-Canada cannot fulfil its undertaking, why does it still have the exclusive franchise to build the pipe line? Why were Canadian companies not encouraged to finance it? The government has given us no evidence that this project cannot be financed in Canada and nothing will convince me there are not a good many Canadians who would be only too happy to take on such an attractive project, one part entirely financed by the government and the other part 90 per cent financed by the government.

One has only to look at the entire pipe line business during the past eight years to feel confident a trans-Canada pipe line could be financed by Canadian enterprise. Millions of dollars have been spent in building pipe lines in Canada and handsome profits have been made by all concerned—builders, investors and operators. The government ignores these basic facts which are not fiction.

I believe there is an overwhelming national opposition to this plan whereby foreign industry grows fat at our expense. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is showing complete contempt for that national opposition just as he is showing contempt for parliament in introducing closure. But I believe that better men than he have seen the wisdom of changing their minds. Indeed, one of the most interesting examples of this sort of thing—not a man but a newspaper in this case—occurred recently when a newspaper changed its mind, therefore showing bigness. The newspaper in question was the Calgary Herald, which was mentioned earlier today.

Last month the Herald reversed its previous editorial stand declaring that this may yet be one of the most important issues of our generation. In explaining its reversal, the Herald admitted that nationalist sentiment is more important than pure economics. The Minister of Trade and Commerce obviously has no intention of changing his mind nor has he any intention of listening to the voice of parliament.

An hon. Member: He changed it last year.

Miss Aitken: The guillotine has been introduced. Earlier today I detected something of a sensitivity in the back benches of the Liberal party when they were being called trained seals. I am not going to call them trained seals because I think it is an extremely sad state of affairs that there is no opposition in the government ranks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: The only divided party is the Tory party.

Miss Aitken: There are no trained seals over here. What has happened to the great Liberal party of yesterday?

An hon. Member: It is united.

Miss Aitken: Surely there must be at least a baker's dozen in that vast Liberal majority who have the courage to speak up for the future of Canada.

Mr. Hees: No, not one. They are all dead; all gone. Pouliot has gone.

Miss Aitken: Surely there must be ten men, five men, or even one man with the intestinal fortitude to say, "No, C. D. Howe".

Mr. Harkness: You would think so but it just is not so.

Miss Aitken: I find it sad that today this great Liberal party of yesterday is nothing more than a caricature of Hollywood yes men. What has happened to the Liberal breed that it has degenerated into rubber stamps?

Mrs. Shipley: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. This afternoon I was refused the privilege of commenting on similar remarks which had been made by members of the opposition. I submit that hon. members of the opposition should not be permitted to continue in that same vein if we are not to be permitted to refute such comments.

Miss Aitken: Mr. Chairman, I can say in all truth, in sorrow more than in anger, that it is a sad thing for Canada that no man in this Liberal government today will show the vision and courage and faith of his forefathers. With this resolution before us today we have indeed come a far way from the vision and courage of our forefathers. In his history of Canada Stephen Leacock called the building of the C.P.R. one of the greatest triumphs of our history. Today the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is telling us that it is expedient to bring about one of the greatest disasters of our history.

Our leaders of the 19th century had the courage of their vision. They began building a trans-Canada railway when there were only 24,000 people in British Columbia. Winnipeg was a town of less than 8,000 inhabitants. Regina was what the Indians called a pile of bones. Calgary was not even on the map. Despite those handicaps of geography and population we built that trans-Canada railway. We invited foreign investors to help us. We welcomed their help and we gave them profits. But we made sure that control of the railway stayed in Canada. We invite foreign investors to help us build a pipe line. We will welcome their money and we will make profits for them, but let us make sure that control of that pipe line stays in Canada.

If this resolution goes through, I should change that and say when this resolution goes through, or when this resolution is forced through, we will have a pipe line it is true, or at least we will have part of a pipe line. The only thing Canadian about this pipe line will be its geographical location. Public funds are to be used to ensure private profits for foreign investors. Public funds are to be used to ensure that United States consumers get Canadian gas through an all-Canadian pipe line cheaper than Canadians can get it.

I do not believe that any other country in the world would put itself in such a position, not even a country less richly endowed than Canada. For instance, in India back in 1948 Mr. Nehru saw the danger of economic domination from outside and he issued this warning:

> We would rather delay our development, industrial or otherwise, than submit to any kind of economic domination of any country. This is an axiom which is accepted by everyone in India.

We believe that the time has come for Canadians to assert authority over their own resources. No longer should we stand by and watch foreign industry control our resources. Presumably the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and indeed I imagine the entire government, must be aware of the widespread resentment against United States capital dominating our pipe line while public capital takes all the risk. I do not believe that any Canadian government, or perhaps any government, has ever subsidized private enterprise in this way. No Canadian government, in fact no government anywhere has subsidized private foreign enterprise in this way. Whoever described this plan as one of the most bungled government transactions in Canadian history spoke truly.

The minister has said more than once that he is assured by Trans-Canada that more than half the common stock of the company will be made available to Canadian investors if they care to subscribe to it. That brings us to the question which has been brought up here more than once. Is the right hon. minister talking about a Pickersgill Canadian, someone born in Canada, or is he talking about someone who has a postal address in Canada? Is that a Canadian? If so, then the wholly-owned United States subsidiaries in the pipe line scheme are Canadians.

What we are facing today is not merely the building of a pipe line; we are at the crossroads in Canada's future. We are being faced with a basic policy which the Liberal party is trying to ram down Canadian throats. That policy can be summed up in five words: United States first, Canada second.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask the hon. lady a question.

The Chairman: May I point out that the termination of this debate is fixed and I think it might be preferable to refrain from interrupting.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, I rise in this debate to speak as a Canadian who comes from a province which will be neither a buyer nor a seller of any of the gas that will go through Trans-Canada's pipe line. I believe it is my duty as a Canadian to rise on this occasion because I have no axe to grind in any way whatsoever.

An hon. Member: You made a good messenger boy for the last day or two.

An hon. Member: What about that political axe?

Mr. MacDougall: I think I have been quiet when some of the opposition members have spoken but, as far as I personally am concerned, I do not care if they howl their heads off. They can call me all the trained seals they like, stool pigeons, and what have you, and it makes no difference whatsoever to me. I have listened for a long time to certain members of the opposition party—not all—crying blue ruin and damning the government because of the fact that the government attempts to run parliament. I am welcoming this action by the government in finally taking the bit in its teeth and determining to run parliament.

Mr. Harkness: You mean "run over parliament."

Mr. Garson: There is a witticism for you.

Mr. MacDougall: I have heard some good speeches from some members in the opposition, but I listened to a magnificent speech from the gas expert for the Tory party. I never thought I would see the day however when my learned friend from Vancouver-Quadra woud get up and attempt to prevent free speech in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

The Chairman: Perhaps I may be allowed to say a word. The hon. member will realize that again this evening we shall see opportunities to interfere with an hon. member's speech if the debate should get out of hand, and I feel I should rise immediately to ask him to co-operate with me by revising those words he has just uttered with regard to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, who is not in the house tonight.

An hon. Member: Yes, he is.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, you were not in the chair this afternoon when this incident arose. I pointed out to the chairman at that time that he had the name of the hon. member for York-Humber as our next speaker on the list, and he finally admitted that the hon. member for Calgary South was being put on in place of a Liberal member.

The Chairman: I do not think I should allow a repetition of an occurrence which took place this afternoon. As soon as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard uttered words which I thought would be objectionable under our rules, and not seeing the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in the house, I immediately rose to my feet with the intention of asking the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard to withdraw those words. I am sure he will be happy to do so.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, what words do you wish me to withdraw?

The Chairman: I must ask the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard to withdraw the words that another member attempted to prevent free speech in this house.

Mr. MacDougall: I am very glad to comply, because the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I have been friends for a long time. I do not think that there is any invidious meaning. I said that I never thought that a Tory member would do anything like that.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. MacDougall: I withdraw.

The Chairman: I do not think any member could ever have received a more spontaneous withdrawal.

Mr. MacDougall: The hon. gentlemen on my left would prefer that I crawl back into my hole, but I am not prepared at this time to do that.

Mr. Harkness: Your party has just withdrawn free speech from the whole parliament.

Mr. MacDougall: May I be allowed to go on?

An hon. Member: Go on.

An hon. Member: Have you anything to say?

Mr. MacDougall: More than my hon. friends to the rear. Prior to the introduction of this resolution that is now before the house, I have witnessed possibly some of the most absurd attacks upon our Prime Minister and two or three of our ministers that I have ever heard in the years I have been here.

Mr. Ellis: Why does he not answer for himself?

Mr. MacDougall: As far as I am concerned, I am 100 per cent in favour of the closure that was invoked by the administration. Now, if I am not completely drowned out by the magpies around me, I would like—

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. MacDougall: —to point out a few salient facts with respect to the addresses that have been delivered by my good friends, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

I was stumped, and I am sure all members of the house were stumped, in trying to find exactly what policy, if any, the Leader of the Opposition had in mind on the various occasions when he addressed this house.

An hon. Member: He never had any.

Mr. MacDougall: It is quite evident, according to their tenets of faith, that the socialist party stands for public ownership. I can quite understand their attitude and the attitude of their leader on that occasion. But if the day ever comes—and I hope it will not—when the people of Canada and the government of Canada will of necessity have to take over the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, I can assure this house that they will do a much better job than has been done by so-called crown companies in the province of Saskatchewan. I should like to point out that there have been five crown companies in Saskatchewan that have gone down the drain. There have been more than that, but I am only including five in my remarks tonight. They are the leather products factory, the box factory, the woollen mills, the fish board, and the tannery.

Mr. Ellis: Tell us about the insurance company.

Mr. MacDougall: I have pointed those out, and I also want to say that it is a most intriguing thing for me that, when the socialist government of Saskatchewan has been asking and receiving foreign aid to come and develop the resources of that province for the past two and a half years to the extent of approximately $50 million a week, some of my socialist friends here from Saskatchewan get up and condemn it. Now that we all recognize, Mr. Chairman, that that great race horse, Citation, is dead, now that we have invoked closure, I am very happy to see that for the duration of this debate citations are also largely dead.

With that idea in mind I should like in the few minutes at my disposal to satirize the situation as far as my good friends of the Tory and C.C.F. parties are concerned. About the most concrete suggestion we have had from the Leader of the Opposition has been that we might consider running the trans-Canada gas line on railway property from Alberta to Quebec. I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition has ever considered for a moment how volatile gas is, and how much additional insurance the railroad companies would have to bear if by any chance this suggestion as to the route of the trans-Canada line were ever carried out? So to me it has been most difficult to plot what might be considered a statement of policy on the basis of any of the utterances of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Harkness: You are always a little dull, Jack.

Mr. MacDougall: I admit it. The only unfortunate part about that interjection on the part of my hon. friend is that he is a great deal duller than I am.

Mr. Hees: Grade 5 humour.

Mr. Ellis: Another Bob Hope.

Mr. MacDougall: It has been stated that the rules have largely gone by the board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDougall: That condition now being a matter of history, I wonder whether I might be permitted to summarize and satirize the positions of the government and the Tory and C.C.F. parties by naming batteries for these opposing teams in the House of Commons. If that is permissible, Mr. Chairman, for the government side I would announce as pitcher that veteran speedball artist, C. D. Howe, and as catcher—

Mr. Fleming: He is throwing curves.

Mr. MacDougall: —that pipe line specialist, the Conservative gentleman who sits behind me—Carl Nickle. For the opposition it is a little more difficult to select the battery mates but I cannot help remembering that the other night the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar nearly burst a button—

An hon. Member: Is that all?

Mr. MacDougall: —when he rose to speak on the resolution after the Leader of the Opposition. I think his closing word was "buccaneer". Therefore, for the opposition I am naming as pitcher "buccaneer Coldwell" and as catcher "I am working on the railroad Drew". There is a gentleman behind me, Mr. Chairman, who said he would like to play outfield. I should like to play shortstop or second base on the government team because I am quite sure I would be able to put across many double plays.

An hon. Member: This is a real double cross.

Mr. Harkness: This government is expert in double plays already.

An hon. Member: Double shuffles.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, as I said when I rose, I am not going to go into the intricacies of gas distribution in Canada.

An hon. Member: You have not.

Mr. MacDougall: I profess to know very little about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDougall: I wish that some of the gentlemen to my left were as honest as I in that admission.

Mr. Dickey: They prefer to prove it to everybody else.

Mr. MacDougall: You know, it is a very nice thing to have friends in all parties, and when one does not indulge in smears I do not think it is a very difficult thing to do. I speak as a Liberal who has no axe to grind, political or otherwise, with respect to the pipe line. The Leader of the Opposition suggested yesterday that he would like to hear a Canadian speak on this matter. I think that without exception we are all Canadians but I happen to fall into a different category. I am what might be termed a neutral Canadian as far as the trans-Canada gas line is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacDougall: I am neutral in this respect, that as far as my own province and city are concerned if and when we get natural gas in Vancouver and the province we will get it through the medium of the Westcoast Transmission line. Further than that, I believe it is well that a so-called neutral viewpoint on this question should be expressed. Originally I was raised on the prairies in the province of Saskatchewan, and I want to tell you without fear or favour that the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba are crying today for the admission of natural gas from the province of Alberta. There used to be an old saying in our schoolboy days—

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. MacDougall: —that trade follows the flag. I did not call time on you, Doug.

Mr. Harkness: I did not say a word, not a word.

The Chairman: It is my duty to call time and advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there comes from our province of Manitoba a Liberal who is in the cabinet. He is a gentleman who sometimes, whether he likes or not, blurts out the truth. He did that yesterday noon, according to this evening's edition of the Ottawa Citizen—

Mr. McIvor: He always tells the truth.

Mr. Knowles: —when he was speaking to 180 high school students taking part in an adventure in citizenship. The press report tells us that he told them that democratic government is still on thin ice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: That same minister came back to the house yesterday afternoon and saw his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, endeavour to push democracy through that thin ice. The Minister of Justice also stated at that meeting yesterday:

> One of the possibilities which make our times so interesting and fateful is whether this great innovation will survive and expand or fall back into thousands of years of bondage.

Some hon. Members: Boo, boo!

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the use by the Minister of Justice of that word "bondage" made me wonder whether he is aware of the famous words attributed to John Pym who said this centuries ago:

> Parliaments without parliamentary liberty are but a fair and plausible way into bondage. Freedom of debate being once foreclosed, the essence of the liberty of parliament is withal dissolved.

That is what this government is seeking to do, Mr. Chairman, under the alleged excuse of necessity. What is that necessity? That necessity arises from the fact, so far as the government is concerned, that it has already signed a contract with a private company. The make-up of that private company has already been described in full. In that agreement this government has virtually pledged that parliament will get this measure through in time for the required amount of money to be turned over to this private company by June 7. In other words, Mr. Chairman, this free and independent parliament of a sovereign nation is bound by a commitment that the government of this country has made to a private company.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Knowles: It is because of that commitment that the government has made that we are now under not the threat but the fact of closure. I remind hon. members of what my leader drew to their attention last night when he indicated that Mr. King in 1932 had certain fairly strong words to say about closure when it was put in effect after a debate had been going on for a month. In this instance closure is announced the very first day on which the debate is in progress. As recorded at page 1626 of Hansard of 1932 Mr. King said this:

> They have used the weapon of closure twice in the course of a short debate—

I do not know how many times we shall get it in this still shorter debate.

> —in order to end all discussion and debate on the most important question which has engaged the attention of parliament since this ministry was formed.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

I should like hon. members to note the next sentence Mr. King used on that occasion:

If ever in this world there was evidence of an autocratic power used to the 'nth degree, we have it in what we are witnessing at the present time.

If there is anything in spirits and ghosts walking this earth after a man like Mr. Mackenzie King has passed on, I am sure his ghost must be haunting every cabinet minister every night during the course of this debate.

Necessity they say; necessity arising from the commitment that this government has made to a private company. May I remind them of another famous quotation by William Pitt in the debate on the India bill in 1783 when he said this:

Necessity is the argument of tyrants; it is the creed of slaves.

Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes that are at my disposal may I come to the issue that is before us at this present time, namely the issue of the across-Canada gas pipe line. As a Canadian, Mr. Chairman, I am intensely interested in this great national project of an across-Canada natural gas pipe line so as to make available to other areas in Canada this economic fuel of which there is such a tremendous abundance in the province of Alberta. Further, Mr. Chairman, as a Canadian from the city of Winnipeg I am particularly interested in the immediate building of a pipe line across the prairies so that, without further delay, this economic fuel might be available at cost of production and distribution to the people of that city as well as the people of other cities and towns in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

We in the city of Winnipeg have learned that there are times when you must look at certain propositions a second time. We recall to our sorrow what our city fathers, the city council of Winnipeg, did in the year 1881. It is familiar to all of us in Winnipeg but I happen to know something about it because, when I was on the city council myself in the early part of the 1940's, we took the first steps to try to do something about the mistake the city council had made in 1881. What was that mistake? In order to get the Canadian Pacific Railway to build its main yards, so far as Manitoba was concerned, in the city of Winnipeg it passed a by-law in 1881 and made an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway—

Some hon. Members: This is the pipe line.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —which made that railway free and exempt from all municipal taxes, rates, levies and assessments of every nature and kind. For how long? For ever. Mr. Chairman, the city of Winnipeg has since tried to find whether there was not some way to change that arrangement, which has cost us many millions of dollars. The matter went through all the courts of this country, to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the privy council but it has been ruled that that bad deal which the city council of Winnipeg made in 1881 binds us in Winnipeg in perpetuity, for all time, for ever—and then some.

Mr. Chairman, it is because of our experience with bad deals like that, that we in Winnipeg—much as we want gas from Alberta in our city as soon as possible—realize that we must take a second look at any proposition that is presented to us, particularly when it is presented to us by the present Liberal government. When we look at this present proposition, what do we find? Do we find that it is in the main a way of getting gas to the cities and towns of Saskatchewan and Manitoba and eventually into Ontario and Quebec as well? No; we do not. We find that this is a proposition to aid Tennessee Gas and its associates in its gamble, its effort to try to break into a lucrative, profitable American market. That company knows that if it could get cheap gas from the inexhaustible supplies in Alberta and get that gas into the central and mid-western American market, it could compete with the other companies that are distributing gas in that area and make huge profits. That company has found that it cannot get a permit from the federal power commission to import gas into the United States. That company has the notion that, if it had the line built from Alberta down to Emerson, its case for getting a permit to import gas into the United States might be that much better. But despite the fact that the company believes that its case might be that much better, it has not been able to persuade private investors that it is a gamble worth putting private money into. People with private money are afraid that the federal power commission's permission will not be given and so it would be money put into a white elephant. So this same Tennessee Gas company comes along and asks the people of Canada not only to let it have Alberta gas as a pawn in its competitive game but asks the taxpayers of Canada to put up $72 million or $80 million—actually up to $200 million—to enable them to get into a position to strengthen their case in applying for a permit from the federal power commission.

Mr. Chairman, this parliament of Canada is being asked by this bill to put Canadian gas and Canadian taxpayers' money on the chess board as a pawn in the game of a group of private financiers who are not interested in getting gas into the towns of Saskatchewan or Manitoba and who are not interested in getting gas into Ontario or Quebec. They are interested only in the profit they might make out of our gas and our taxpayers' money. That is the reason that we in Winnipeg, with the experiences we have had in the past, anxious as we are to have a pipe line built—and perhaps we are more anxious than anybody else because of where we are situated with respect to the line that is supposed to be built this summer; indeed it was promised for last summer —despite our anxiety we realize that this is a bad deal and that we should demand something better.

But, Mr. Chairman, we do not believe that it is necessary to wait for something better. We believe that a better way can be entered upon this summer just as readily as can this plan which is proposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We say that this plan which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is trying to bulldoze through this parliament is one that is almost sure to fail. He practically admitted that himself in his speech yesterday. He referred time and time again to what would happen if the company were to fail, and talked in terms of the government taking over as if it were almost a certainty that was what would happen. If the plan succeeds we will be at the mercy, in Canada, of a private monopoly controlled by financiers mainly foreign, and a monopoly that will not be interested in getting gas to the consumers of this country at a reasonable price. They will be interested only in the profit they can make out of the project and our consumers will be charged the limit. If they fail, the project will end up under public ownership. Someone says, is that not what you want? Why do you not go along with this plan and get public ownership that way? We want public ownership, but we want to come at it directly and honestly, not indirectly and dishonestly.

Furthermore, we know from our history and experience in this country that when the government takes over an outfit that has defaulted and become bankrupt, far too often there are financial arrangements made that set up a capitalization that provides a false picture for years to come and the people really do not get the value out of public ownership which they get when we go in for it first, directly and honestly as we propose. So, Mr. Chairman, we say that the time for action on this question is now, this year, 1956. We are not fooled and the people of Canada are not fooled by the assertion made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that if he does not let this private company do it he cannot get it done until 1958. The minister does not know his own strength, his own power, his own capabilities for organization. This minister organized Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Polymer Corporation at Sarnia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: This minister, whom the Liberals are so happy to applaud, knows very well that if he would shake off these shackles that are blinding him to the possibilities of public ownership he could do something for Canada with respect to this great national project that would be a star in his crown far brighter than any of the others that his Liberal colleagues like to boast about when they are singing his praises.

Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that we could not get going with this proposition unless we put it in the hands of this favoured company, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I am not sure that it will be done even if we put it in their hands. We still have not got a clear statement from the minister as to what are the terms of the option this company has on the pipe that is still in the United States. I asked him as recently as 2.30 this afternoon whether he had yet obtained a copy of the option, and the answer was no. Yesterday he told us the option was being altered. Here we are within four hours of a vote forced upon parliament by this dictatorial government and we still do not know who has this pipe or whether the option is any good at all. So, Mr. Chairman, I ask you to note the attempt that the government is making not only to bulldoze us but to force this thing through without our having all the facts that are involved.

I say to the minister that if this company is in the position that he says it is to proceed with this project this summer it is only because of the favours the company has received from this government and the constant extensions it has received from the government and the board of transport commissioners; it is only in that position because of the loan that is involved in this proposition now before us and of the proposal by the government to build the line through northern Ontario for this private company.

If this company, as I say, is in this favoured position because of what the government has done for it then the government owes it to the people of Canada to take over that company now and start building this project for the people of Canada, a trans-Canada pipe line across western Canada and completed to Winnipeg before this year is out. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made a great many references in his speech yesterday to the question of public ownership. He kept insisting it had been looked at, but so far as he was concerned he could not recommend it to parliament. I noticed, Mr. Chairman, that the minister made it very clear to this house that he knows, he, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce knows, and said so yesterday afternoon, that public ownership is a better way. Dealing with this proposition yesterday at page 3864 of Hansard for May 14, 1956, the minister said:

> I repeat that, short of public ownership, it—

Referring to the plan he is trying to push through parliament.

> —goes as far as could reasonably be asked to protect the Canadian interest.

What is that, Mr. Chairman, but an admission by the minister that public ownership goes farther than this present plan in protecting the public interest. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says he knows of many instances of public ownership. Yes, he is responsible for some of them. He is the proud father of some of them. In so far as gas is concerned, he does not know of any. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce so old that he has lost his pioneering spirit? Is he so lacking in vision in so far as this Canada of ours is concerned that he is not prepared to make the venture into a gas pipe line under public ownership? Knowing some of the things he has done I call him, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as the best witness in this house to the assertion that public ownership is a better way rather than bulldozing this parliament into voting for a proposition that is little more than placing Canadian gas and Canadian money as pawns in the hands of United States financiers.

I call upon him instead to withdraw this proposition. It is not too late yet to withdraw the order that is on the order paper today, No. 17, and to withdraw No. 12 as well. We will do our part in giving unanimous consent to do it. He could then bring in a new proposition to provide for public ownership of this tremendously important national project so the Canadian people may get real value from the gas we have and the labour power we could put into it, so our economy could reap full benefit from such a project. This is an extremely important issue. We are being led down the garden path by a minister who has it in his power to lead us to tremendous advances in our economy. I call upon him tonight to withdraw this motion and bring in one he himself knows would be infinitely better, a motion putting this whole project under public ownership for the people of Canada.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to take too much time of the house tonight on this subject because I feel it would be advisable to allow as much time and latitude as possible to the perpetrators of the filibuster to have their say, because if we should take a few minutes then they are going to go out in the country and say they were denied any right to speak on this.

Mr. Ellis: What filibuster?

Mr. Low: Of course, hon. members who are shouting "What filibuster" have just given us an example of the histrionics of which they are capable on such occasions as these.

To begin with, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the statement he made yesterday. I thought it was straightforward and it was factual. I congratulate the government on bringing in this measure. I want to say right off that we in this corner support it. We will go along with it and we do not intend to contribute in any way to a filibuster on the matter at any stage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: I would like to examine for just a few minutes the validity of the position that has been taken by the dog that attempts to wag its Conservative tail, and the tail as well, because I think it is important for us to see what is going on. It must be remembered that both the Conservatives and the C.C.F. served warning before this measure ever came on the floor of the house that they were going to filibuster and completely destroy it if they possibly could. Now, under those circumstances and in the light of the demonstrations which we have had in this house over the past three or four days, let nobody say the Conservatives and the C.C.F. did not bring what has happened upon themselves.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the Conservatives should know better because the Conservatives have not very much of a case. In tribute to the C.C.F. I will have to concede that I think they are quite honest in their proposal concerning nationalization of the pipe line, but the Conservatives are doing nothing but scraping the bottom of the barrel. They are like a cat on a tin roof trying to find some dirt and manufacture for themselves an election issue. They have been so utterly bankrupt of ideas and propositions that they have to grasp at straws. They are trying their level best to make an issue out of this. I am going to tell them this and I am saying it particularly for the benefit of my friend the hon. member for Calgary North who spoke in this house this afternoon. He will find out what it means to kill or be killed. He killed himself in Alberta and when the next election rolls around he will find out exactly what I mean. The people of Alberta are going to question the position he has taken.

Mr. Bell: What about you in Quebec?

An hon. Member: Leave Quebec alone.

Mr. Low: Let me say that as I listened to the Leader of the Opposition last evening I could not help feeling that the hon. gentleman, much as I respect and admire him personally, was proceeding in his address on the assumption that if he made exaggerated and unfounded statements often enough and loud enough they would eventually become true. I should like it to be known that I like the hon. gentleman and I want him to know that. All throughout his speech he continued repeating time after time statements he could not back up, statements that are completely unfounded and which I think he should be called upon to prove or to keep quiet about.

Now, as far as the C.C.F. is concerned, let me say this. As I said, I think they have honestly put forward their view with respect to nationalization of the pipe line but let me hasten to add I do not think they have a moral right to base a filibuster upon the principle of nationalization and I will tell you why. The C.C.F. have been putting forward this argument and this principle for the last 20-odd years in Canada and in every election campaign nationalization has been one of their major platforms. Election after election the people of Canada have turned down the principle and the proposition overwhelmingly. Under the circumstances I do not attempt to deny them the right to put forward the principle of nationalization of the pipe line here but I do say that morally they do not have the right to base a filibuster on it in an attempt to kill this bill.

One thing which interests me about the C.C.F. argument is the fact that they have closed their eyes to a lot of realities. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who just finished speaking closed his eyes to realities when he said the government could go ahead this year and build a pipe line under government ownership. He knows better than that. The government could not possibly start a pipe line this year and I will tell you why. If the government of Canada were to enter into a nationalization program for the building of a pipe line today it would be up against the problem of getting a supply of gas and I am telling you they would have a very difficult time getting a supply of gas.

Mr. Ellis: So that's it.

Mr. Knowles: Aren't you a Canadian?

Mr. Low: I am a Canadian. I will tell you why the government would have a difficult time obtaining a supply of gas.

An hon. Member: Talk to the Alberta government.

Mr. Low: It is not a question of the Alberta government at all. If we can keep the goon gang quiet for a moment I will continue. I want to tell you briefly why the proposition of nationalization of the pipe line is untenable. I heard mention here today of a similarity between the Ontario hydro and a nationalized pipe line. There is no similarity at all. The fact of the matter is that in the case of Ontario hydro you have a government enterprise that manufactures the service and the product it has to sell to the consumer. In the case of a pipe line, if the government were foolish enough to try it, the government would not own the supply and it would have to make a deal with a dozen private enterprise producers in my province and other provinces in an effort to obtain a supply of gas.

Now, that is not all. If the government were ever foolish enough to attempt to go into the nationalization of a pipe line of this kind it would find itself confronted with the producers on the one hand. The producers are attempting to get a return on the risk capital they have put into the exploratory work to get gas. They want to have a fair return on that gas. All they ask is a fair return and I believe they are entitled to it just as the government of Saskatchewan has already acknowledged that private enterprise developing its oil and gas also wants a fair return. As I said, the government would be between that group and the great group of consumers in eastern Canada. Let us never forget that the producers in Alberta look upon the proposition this way.

The number of consumer voters in Canada would be 50, 60 or 100 times as numerous as the producer voters in this country. Whom are the government going to consider first in any case where it finds itself in a squeeze between the consumers and the producers? The producers of Alberta are quite certain that no government with any sense of reality would put itself between a group of consumers 50 times as numerous as the group of producers and have to make a decision as between the two groups with respect to price.

The producers in Alberta do not want to be in that position. I do not want them to be in that position and the government does not want them to be in that position. For that reason and for many other reasons which I could cite, the people who are producing gas in western Canada today do not want to be in the position of having to sell or of being ordered to sell gas to a nationalized pipe line. Not only that, but the government of Canada does not own any right of way. It would have to get a right of way and to do so it would have to negotiate in exactly the same way as a private company. It would take a long time. The government would have to secure a licence to export gas out of the province of Alberta. The government would also have to get a lot of other things all of which would take time.

If we should take the principle of nationalization—and God forbid that we ever do—it would probably delay the realization of a pipe line and a market for Alberta gas for a good many years to come. There is urgency, Mr. Chairman, in securing a market for Alberta gas. Let us see what that means. I wonder if the Conservatives who are playing fast and loose with other people's money today in this filibuster realize—

Mr. McGregor: Have you gone nuts?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Low: I wonder if they realize that the position they are taking actually means $50,000 a day to the people of Alberta in return for their gas. It does mean $50,000 a day. But that does not phase them a particle. Some of them will stand up and say, "Oh, well, it will not hurt to set this back one, two, three or four years". I want to tell hon. members of this house that there is a real urgency to get a market for Alberta gas and to get it at the earliest possible time.

Not only is it a question of dollars and cents to the actual producers of gas, and there are many hundreds of them in Alberta; it also means that there is waiting today in the province of Alberta a $100 million industrialization expansion program which depends upon the finding of that market for gas. Every day that this filibuster goes on that program is set back and made more difficult of realization. Any time industrialization takes place in the province of Alberta it helps not only the people there but the people of all Canada. We have to look at it in that way.

We have not been wholly satisfied that the government policy has been 100 per cent sound right from the beginning, but we decided at the beginning to go along with it because we felt it was in the interests of Canada to accept that policy and try to work for its realization.

An hon. Member: How much money is Alberta putting in?

Mr. Low: You are forcing us to put in $50,000 a day which is now going up in smoke. Not only that, but there is something else that should be told to this house.

Mr. Harkness: The Social Credit government held it up for three years.

Mr. Low: If you will just dry your tears, sister, I will answer you in a minute. There is a very important matter which I think hon. members should consider. The exploration in future years will be set back materially and perhaps for all time unless we do get busy soon and get a market for Alberta gas. We have something like 16 trillion cubic feet of reserves which we think will supply the needs of Alberta, the needs of the population of eastern Canada and the needs of the United States market if it is realized for some 25 or more years. But if a proper market is found for Alberta gas it is more than likely that further exploration will be stimulated which will result in the extension of those reserves at a rate of not less than one trillion cubic feet a year for the next ten years.

It is important that we get a market as soon as possible in order to realize something like the full potential of that tremendous gas field. We need to be put in a position to be able to export some of our surplus to our neighbour to the south in order to balance up our unfavourable balance of payments which in the current year amounted to one billion and thirty million dollars. That is one argument which we need time to develop and I do not intend to do it tonight. I shall have further comments on another stage of the bill.

Before I close, may I just answer the hon. member for Calgary North. He mentioned the fact that Alberta had been responsible in the initial stages for the delay. I deny that most emphatically. May I tell him that the only delay that ever occurred in the province of Alberta with respect to the export of gas was in those days more than 5½ years ago when the province was determining by careful exploration the extent of their reserves. When they knew the extent of those reserves Mr. Manning and his government came out and announced the government's policy and it was followed immediately by an announcement by this government. The hon. member for Calgary North does not know what he is talking about and he will find that out when he gets back home.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, faced with one of the most important measures ever to come before this house, the Canadian House of Commons has been gagged and fettered in this debate by a despotic government. This is indeed a black day in Canadian parliamentary history. The government has inflicted lasting humiliation upon parliament.

The moving of closure has been resorted to only half a dozen times since confederation, the last time being 24 years ago on April 1, 1932. At that time a Liberal statesman, the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, applied these adjectives to closure, which will be found at page 1611 of Hansard of that date:

. . . the most coercive and arbitrary act of which a government is capable . . .

I wonder if the present Prime Minister has forgotten those words. It must be remembered that when closure was applied in 1932 it was after days and days of debate; it came only at the final stage; it came only after the house had gone through various stages of a money bill, in committee, first reading, second reading and then finally in committee on the later sections of the bill. It was only then that closure was applied after weeks of debate.

But here this despotic government announces closure in the opening speech by the minister introducing the resolution in committee. This is a money bill. The amount of money involved in the present bill is $130 million, and the bill before the Canadian parliament in 1932 involved $140 million. Yet the debate on that occasion ran to the final stages. Listen to these words of Mackenzie King:

I submit that the discussion of a matter of such colossal proportions and so all-important to the taxpayers of this country should not be restricted under closure within a day and a half of the time it has been entered upon.

He was speaking only of the final stage.

Action so extreme in character has never been taken by any British government in regard to public taxation. The action of the present administration reduces parliament in its most essential functions to mere futility and complete farce.

What would he have said if the government of that day had imposed closure in the opening speech of the minister introducing the resolution instead of weeks after that stage? We have seen today a gagging and fettering of parliament by the government, aided and abetted by every Liberal member of this house and now supported by the Social Credit. Every Liberal in this house has toed the party line today and this synthetic enthusiasm we have seen on the Liberal benches remains completely unconvincing.

The hon. member for Peace River has made reference to a filibuster. This debate started yesterday and closure was announced before the debate was even begun. Yet we hear talk of a filibuster. Did you ever hear such rubbish as we heard from the member for Peace River tonight? Yesterday that same member was busy disowning the announced alliance in the province of Quebec between the Liberal party and the Social Credit l'union des electeurs. Now we find the same Social Credit leader, not only carrying his followers into the Liberal camp but actually engaging in a warm embrace. Politics indeed makes strange bedfellows. This is an extraordinary alliance between the Liberals and the Social Credit.

In the kind of mentality exhibited by those who have forced closure upon this house today we see an attempt to create a situation in parliament where there is no place for an opposition. They do not want an opposition. Yet I would remind you that the function of an opposition is of the very essence of our parliamentary institution. The minority in the house does not speak by leave of the majority. If that were the case it would be the end of the freedom of speech. No, the minority in a free parliament speaks as of right. What has been done today has been to deprive the minority in this house of their right. When you tamper with that right you are jeopardizing the institutions that have proven themselves the bastions of democratic freedom, and destroying the rights of the minority in the house. This is but a lighthearted assassination of free institutions, and it is perpetrated now by those who call themselves Liberals.

This stratagem was not given birth in any democratic mentality. It is the evil spawn of a fascist mentality. But assassinations always must be performed quickly. It was Macbeth who, on the eve of one assassination, said:

If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well
It were done quickly.

That is the mentality of this government. Having decided to perpetrate this assassination of free institutions, they decided that if it were done when it is done, then it were well it were done quickly. That is what their intention is now.

Is time of the essence? Well, they have let five years run by and, if their memories are so short, let me remind them that this house met on January 10 in this session, over four months ago. Even in his first speech of the session, the Leader of the Opposition called for the reference of this subject to a committee, in order that the facts might be laid before the parliament and before the public. This is a deliberate action now. No Cromwell could more swiftly and devastatingly have showed his complete antipathy to parliamentary institutions than the Prime Minister and his government have done here yesterday and today.

We hear a great deal about the function of the committee on money bills. It is one of our parliamentary safeguards in relation to one of the most important functions of parliament, to protect the public against oppressive taxation. Yet what do we see here? The house is not given an opportunity to obtain information. This whole proceeding of the resolution before a money bill has been made a farce by this government. Here is a major project, one of the most important ever to come before parliament, involving the expenditure of millions of dollars, and parliament is not to be permitted to pursue its duty to seek information upon it. Information is not what the government wants parliament or the people to have.

If there were a committee, as there should have been, witnesses could have been called before it, papers could have been called for. But the government will not face a committee. They fear to face the revelation of the facts that will be exposed in a committee and they do not want to discuss it according to parliamentary processes. They do not want to produce letters, correspondence and memoranda. The time factor in this debate is entirely of the government's own creation.

We come now to shameful paradox No. 1. The more far-reaching the issue, the less debate is to be permitted by the government upon it. The more important the measure, the less parliament is to be permitted to know about it.

What of this project? Here we are engaged on a measure in relation to the vital subject of development of resources in Canada, the construction of a pipe line across half of this great country from Alberta to the markets in the east and particularly the market in Ontario, by this Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company, over 83 per cent of whose stock is owned by Americans and will remain under United States ownership, make no mistake about that. As regards this fictitious argument that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has trotted out twice already, that under clause 6 of the agreement there is to be an offering of stock in Canada, I do not think any child is going to be misled by that kind of eyewash. In a public offering in Canada, Americans will have full opportunity to come in and order what stock they want through Canadian brokers.

This company entered into two solemn undertakings at the outset: first, that they could finance this project without government assistance and, second, that they could finance it without gaining the right to export gas to the United States. They have not fulfilled their obligations. They are in default.

This is a continuing default. In the face of this the government has simply temporized. They have dilly-dallied, they have entered into undercover deals, secret negotiations, and the secrecy was carried further by their denials of the existence of correspondence when correspondence was already in existence in their files.

What does this government's proposal amount to? It proposes to use public funds drawn from Canadians in all parts of Canada from British Columbia to the maritimes, and it is going to use that money first of all in constructing at public expense that portion of the line in northern Ontario. Even that portion of the line which should be easiest to build—on the prairies—they are going to use the money of the people of all Canada to build. If this company has any hope of honouring the undertakings into which it entered at the outset, surely it could have financed the construction across the prairies, but the government is coming to its rescue, and the company set up to construct a line through northern Ontario is to be denuded of its capital by this measure in order to finance the construction across the prairies. It is a wild venture on that basis. If the company cannot even finance the construction across the prairies, then I am afraid it is useless for any hon. member to expect this company to be able to finance the repayment of $80 million by April 2 next. It is a wild venture as it stands right now. The house is invited to take a wild leap before looking. There is no assurance of the financing by the company. It would not only be irresponsible on the part of the house, it would be utter madness to take this wild jump. The company is years in default. Has that not registered on hon. members opposite?

So we come to shameful paradox No. 2. The bigger the scale of default, the more aid this government gives. The longer the delay and the longer the continued default on the part of this company, the more benevolence this government is prepared to extend to it at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer. We do not believe in policies of that kind, and we shall fight them. This policy on resources, indeed, is in its essence a proposal to put the money of the Canadian taxpayer at the service of United States investors, and I for one do not think that is the right or duty of any member of this Canadian parliament.

There are alternatives. In view of that company's default, why is not the door opened wide to allow others to come in who may be prepared to finance it? There was Mr. McMahon. It would be interesting to know, —and we could find out in a parliamentary committee—just why he was scared off at some stage. There is the Gairdner proposal. That ought to be given very serious consideration. There may be others available if the government would stop making a political football of this.

We well know the way in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has for a long time now wielded his big stick over business, terrorizing business. If you wonder why more offers have not been forthcoming, you will find the reason in the big stick of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

They have money aplenty to hand over to the assistance of United States investors but they have not money for Canadian municipalities. They have not what is needed to help Canadian municipalities—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —in the matter of housing and other essential services. Interest rates are going up, and many municipalities are going to find it infinitely more difficult than in the past to finance their essential services. Yet the government can find ample money to assist these United States investors. They are not Canadian philanthropists.

Who is the author of this infamous proposal? I say to you it is the same minister with the same mentality who sought a year ago an extension of absolute power at the hands of the house; who remains unrepentant over his own lust for power; who is indifferent to the fact that we are buying from the United States nearly $1 billion worth of goods every year more than we sell to that country; who will not lift a finger in the face of the growing concentration of Canadian trade in the American basket, who views with equanimity and indifference the growing United States economic influence over Canada, who demands of his followers that they toe the party line, who is up to his ears in unsold wheat, who has made such a monstrous botch of the marketing of wheat and now would make a botch of the marketing of natural gas in Canada, who wants to play fast and loose with a great national heritage, who will not have a committee because he does not think it is good for members of parliament, including his own followers, to know very much about the facts because they are only troublesome and unnecessary people, to whom communications are not communications and whose statements indicate, as I do not need to remind hon. members who have sat in the house this session, let alone memory going farther back, that he does not know so often what he is talking about.

So, sir, we see events reaching their inevitable climax. Here is the toeing of the party line. It is this same minister who said, "If we wanted to get away with it, who would stop us?" Now we will see the full fruits of that kind of attitude, that kind of mentality, on the part of a despotic minister.

But it is not only the Minister of Trade and Commerce, for others share the responsibility with him and principally the Prime Minister who sits silent in this house in the face of a major issue, who voted for closure today, who has retired in all but name, who is not doing his duty in this house in sitting silent and allowing measures like this to be perpetrated upon the Canadian parliament, who is hiding behind a reckless Minister of Trade and Commerce. Behold the wantonness of power!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Trade and Commerce concluded his words on May 8 with this sentence:

> The action proposed today is another declaration of independence by Canada . . .

That is an interesting expression. There never was a declaration of independence in the history of Canada, but there was a declaration of independence in the history of the United States. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is confused, you see, as to what country he is supposed to be serving. What the Minister of Trade and Commerce really meant to say was: "The action proposed today is another American declaration of independence with Canadian assistance."

So I say to you, sir, in conclusion—would that I had more time!—that it is the duty of free men in a free Canadian parliament to assert Canada's independence of United States economic domination. That right was won for Canada by Sir John A. Macdonald in the construction of the C.P.R. as a Canadian enterprise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: It was won for Canada in the national policy of 1878. It was preserved by Sir Robert Borden in 1911, and if there is any—

An hon. Member: What about 1930?

Mr. Fleming: —respect for freedom in this country, Mr. Chairman, that right of Canada to preserve her economic independence will be maintained and assured to her not by the worn-out government opposite that has forgotten all sense of responsibility, but by those who value and understand the meaning of freedom and are prepared to struggle in this House of Commons to preserve freedom and to resist every arbitrary measure inflicted upon it by a despotic government headed by a Prime Minister who is not doing his duty.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, for a few quieter moments I propose to place some facts on the record about this project, the greatest national project that has come before parliament in our generation. I should like to review the development of the gas industry in Alberta. In 1901 gas was discovered at Medicine Hat. In 1912 the first pipe line was built from Bow Island to Calgary. It was a 16-inch line and about 170 miles long. At that time it was an outstanding feature of pipe line construction on this continent. It was later extended to the Foremost and Turner Valley fields.

The second major pipe line in Alberta was from the Viking-Kinsella field to Edmonton, which was later extended to other nearby communities. The first major era of gas production in Alberta came with the discovery of the Turney Valley field. Turner Valley gas is wet gas. In other words, it contains a large amount of by-products in addition to the methane or dry fuel gas.

The flares of gas which burned in Turner Valley for 30 years are a black mark in the history of conservation and use of our resources. From the discovery of Turner Valley in 1924 until 1952 more than a trillion cubic feet of gas from that field was burned to waste with nearly all the by-products also lost. This represents a loss in equivalent heat value of 40 million tons of good grade coal.

The discovery of oil and gas in Alberta was no accident. The exploration which eventually led to the discoveries was based on painstaking and careful study by the geologists of the geological survey of Canada as well as by private companies and to some extent provincial governments.

The knowledge of the geology of the western provinces was built up over a period of 50 years by the geological survey of Canada. Their maps and reports have always indicated that western Canada was a very promising area for production of oil and gas. In 1947, following the discovery of Leduc, the men of the geological survey of Canada became very concerned lest the history of the waste at Turner valley be repeated. Dr. Hume, director-general of scientific services of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, in an article published in the magazine, Western Business, for November, 1947, discussed the prospects and had this to say:

> It would seem highly improbable that a gas pipe line southeastwards from the Peace river area to Edmonton would be feasible in view of the gas supplies already available there and at Athabaska. On the other hand, an outlet to Vancouver has many desirable features, such as a large market and the obvious advantage from the national standpoint of greatly assisting the development of the whole Peace river country. Such a plan would also have the further advantage of leaving the gas from central and southern Alberta available for other enterprises and if the reserve was found to be adequate it might be piped even as far as the industrial part of Ontario, supplying various prairie cities, including Winnipeg, en route.

The pattern of pipe line development that he suggested at that time is now being followed. In 1948, before I had the honour to come to this parliament, the Minister of Trade and Commerce asked the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to make a survey of gas reserves in western Canada. That survey was undertaken by Dr. Hume and Mr. Ignatieff and their estimate of gas reserves in 1948, in Alberta and Saskatchewan alone, exceeded 3 trillion cubic feet. At that time there were no proven reserves in British Columbia, although discoveries had been made in the Alberta part of the Peace river district. Their report indicated, however, that the prospects in British Columbia were excellent. Many thought at that time that their report was overoptimistic but subsequent developments have proven that it was very modest indeed.

In November, 1953, the conservation board of the province of Alberta stated that reserves in Alberta as of June 30, 1953, were 11½ trillion cubic feet. I believe that the hon. member for Peace River said this evening that they are now 16 trillion cubic feet. The Alberta government then stated that there was an excess for export over Alberta's needs. The Alberta conservation board placed Alberta's needs for the next 30 years at 4·45 trillion cubic feet. Up until November, 1953, the dominion government had no gas with which to deal. There has been a great deal of loose talk about the five-year delay by this government. The hon. member for Bow River this afternoon charged that this government was guilty of delaying this project. I repeat again that this government had no gas with which to deal until Alberta declared a surplus late in the year 1953. That was less than two and a half years ago. In anticipation of surplus gas from Alberta the policy of this government was clearly stated on March 13, 1953 as recorded at page 2929 of Hansard of that year by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I quote in part his words:

> Therefore the policy of the government of Canada is to refuse permits for moving natural gas by pipe line across an international boundary until such time as we are convinced that there can be no economic use, present or future, for that natural gas within Canada.

This government has never deviated from that policy. In 1951, shortly after I became Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, an American company known as the Murchison group came to Ottawa to consult with the geologists of our department about the gas reserves in the western provinces and indicated their interest in building an all-Canadian gas pipe line. The information of our department was made available to them and it was suggested that, in order to speed up the establishment of reserves, they should enter into the exploration field in Alberta. They subsequently incorporated a company known as Canadian Delhi Oils Limited, which company became actively engaged in the exploration for gas in Alberta and with considerable success. I am somewhat at a loss to know why the hon. member for Calgary South this afternoon ridiculed that company. I know that in any approach they made to our department they never suggested anything but building an all-Canadian pipe line and they said it was entirely feasible.

On February 26, 1951, that particular group applied to the House of Commons for a charter. The bill was a private bill No. 75 introduced by the hon. member for Vegreville. It was a bill to incorporate Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. During that debate and subsequent ones an all-Canadian route won general support from members of all parties in this house. About that time another company was incorporated known as Western Pipe Lines Limited, whose stated objective was to export gas to the United States. This company was not interested in the central Canadian market.

On January 12, 1954, in response to a question from the Leader of the Opposition the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement which I shall quote in part. It is recorded at pages 1017 and 1018 of Hansard:

> . . . it has been anticipated for some time that Alberta would have a surplus of natural gas which could be made available to the eastern part of Canada. Three or four weeks ago Mr. Manning, accompanied by two members of his conservation board, called on the Prime Minister to say that the board had found that there is in fact an exportable surplus at present of three and a half trillion cubic feet of gas. It is anticipated by Mr. Manning that the surplus will grow at the rate of ·75 trillion cubic feet per annum for the next five or ten years . . . Mr. Manning stated he had received two applications for export of the gas from the province and that the board feels that at the present time neither application satisfies its requirements. Mr. Manning suggested to this government that if the two applications could be combined into a single project the government of Alberta would be prepared to grant an export licence to the single applicant.

Mr. Regier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Is it within the rules of the house for a minister who is not responsible for the resolution to be reading his speech?

The Deputy Chairman: I think perhaps I might just answer that question by pointing out that even a minister is a member of the House of Commons and is treated in the same way as is any other member. The same point was raised earlier.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I have been quoting from Hansard. To repeat the last sentence of that quotation from Hansard:

> Mr. Manning suggested to this government that if the two applications could be combined into a single project the government of Alberta would be prepared to grant an export licence to the single applicant.

This initiated the merger of the two companies I have mentioned.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of talk about a so-called "chosen instrument", and to the effect that the Trans-Canada company is the chosen instrument of this government. I should just like to say that the record proves that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, as it has existed since that amalgamation, is the chosen instrument of the Alberta government. It holds the only permit from the province to export gas from southern Alberta and that right to export surplus gas from southern Alberta is exclusive.

The reserves in western Canada have been increasing at the rate of two to three trillion cubic feet of gas per year. The hon. member for Calgary South places the figure at four trillion cubic feet. Hon. members might be interested to know that the total production of gas in Alberta, including wastage, since 1901 amounts to 2½ trillion cubic feet. Of this amount about half has been wasted. Only about half of that gas, since it was first discovered, has been used. Since the discovery of oil and gas in the Leduc field in 1947, the amount of gas burned to waste in the production of oil has amounted to 158 billion cubic feet. In order to indicate at what an alarming rate this wastage is increasing, may I point out that in 1953 this wastage was over 17 billion cubic feet and that in 1955, just two years later, it was over 37 billion cubic feet. That is an increase of 20 billion cubic feet in two years. These figures indicate how important it is to find a market for this gas in order to prevent this wastage.

An immediate market for surplus Alberta gas is extremely urgent, first, to prevent wastage; secondly, to release the large amounts of capital which are at present tied up in unproductive wells; and thirdly, as an incentive to exploration.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

The government of the province of Ontario says that new sources of energy are urgently needed to supplement hydro power. With the development that is taking place in this country, partly at least due to the good government we have here in Ottawa,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: No comedy, please.

Mr. Prudham: —it is my opinion that this gas will be needed to supplement existing sources of energy rather than to replace them. It is expected that when western natural gas is first introduced into Ontario and Quebec, there will be some slight dislocation of the coal industry by the replacement of coal with natural gas. However, in Ontario the coal that is used is largely imported from the United States. The growth of requirements for energy in Ontario is such that, after the initial adjustment, the gas that the Trans-Canada line will provide will be needed to supplement rather than to replace existing sources of energy.

During the last few days I had the honour of travelling through northern Ontario with the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I had a chance at first hand to see the great storehouse of resources in that part of the country. No member from northern Ontario need apologize for the extra cost of building the line through that area. In that part of the country we have one of the greatest storehouses of mineral resources in the world. Natural gas will provide the key for unlocking those great resources.

Incidentally, the amount of gas that Alberta has dedicated to the project is 4·3 trillion cubic feet, which is equivalent to 174 million tons of coal. The delivery rate in the early years of the line is estimated at 300 million cubic feet of gas per day. And that is the equivalent of about 4 million tons of coal per year.

Mr. Chairman, the points with which I have dealt emphasize the need for an early start on the construction of the trans-Canada line. The proposal now before the committee provides the only possibility of getting the line under way this year. This project must be under way during the month of June in order to complete the construction of the first section this year. The company, by accepting the proposal, agreed to make an immediate start and to finance the balance of the line by March 31 of next year or failing that to forfeit its right to build the line as well as a substantial equity. If it does not perform within the time specified, this government is committed to seeing that the line is completed by other means. In the interests of conservation, in the interests of the orderly development of our resources and as the minister representing Alberta in this cabinet, I say let us get on with the job.

Mr. Churchill: We have witnessed in the House of Commons one of the strangest acts ever performed by a government of Canada, the imposition of closure at the virtual commencement of a debate. Yesterday in his introductory speech, the Minister of Trade and Commerce set out the arguments for the resolution now before us and gave notice of his intention to move closure. Today, he imposed it. In effect, closure was threatened and imposed before the subject matter before the house had been considered.

Now, closure was never intended to be used in this way and has never been used in this way before. In its origin in the 1880's, in Gladstone's time, it was introduced into the British House of Commons to prevent the wilful obstruction of the business of parliament by a small, irresponsible minority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: It was not designed in the British House of Commons to restrict the official opposition. When closure became part of the rules of the Canadian House of Commons in 1912, Sir Wilfrid Laurier raised the most strenuous objection. He gave four examples of the obstruction of the business of government in the period from confederation to his day. He suggested that in the interests of free speech and the liberties of parliament it was better to endure periods of obstruction than to impose a rule as severe as closure. He said that a government, faced with obstruction, would do better to dissolve and settle the problem by an appeal to the people.

On the other hand, the Queen's government must be carried on and occasions have arisen infrequently in the history of our parliament when the government of the day has imposed closure in order to force through the house some business which it considered of vital importance. But those instances of closure occurred only after extended debate and not, as on this occasion, before the debate had commenced. This is indeed a serious misuse of a very powerful weapon. Only a government drunk with power would stoop to the immediate use of closure in order to prevent discussion in this house. It is doubly serious to curtail debate on an issue such as the one before us which is so complex, so ill-devised and so improvident. If ever a measure before the House of Commons required complete and careful consideration and examination, it is this one that provides millions of dollars as a handout to foreign capitalists.

The minister responsible for this is the very one who, during his career, has been ignorant of parliamentary history, impatient with parliamentary procedures and disdainful of the customs and usages of the House of Commons. He is the one who last year attempted to usurp full power and was checked by a vigilant opposition. This year he is determined to have his way and to use the forms of parliament in order to destroy the substance of our liberty. This is a black day in the history of the Canadian nation. All of this is being done on the plea of urgency, which is a specious plea.

We have been told that the pipe line must be started by July 1 if it is to be built this year, and that Trans-Canada company must have the handout of taxpayers' millions by June 7. After five years of bungling delays everything has to be decided by parliament in twice five days. This is coercion. The argument of urgency to pass this legislation is misleading. The pipe line could be started this week if the company had any initiative and was prepared to substitute deeds for words. There is no need for such an arrangement as an agreement that this legislation must be passed by June 7 before the company will undertake its part of the contract. It is misleading to suggest that if this legislation is not forced through the house by June 7 the company cannot proceed.

Apparently the company requires a loan of about $80 million. The work will take an estimated four months, and that is an average of about $20 million per month. In all likelihood the first month would be used in preliminary activities for which perhaps much less than $20 million would be required. The precious pipe, cornered by the Tennessee gas company, is worth $30 million. It cannot be put into the ground all at once. The option to purchase it runs until well into the fall and payment is required only on delivery. The company is reported to have $8 million in cash on hand. There is nothing to prevent the company from starting immediately. Certainly, it is right to press on with the construction of the gas pipe line this year, but to do that it is not necessary to mislead parliament or the people of Canada. It is not necessary to confuse the issue or to bypass normal parliamentary methods.

Why such a sudden concern on the part of this government for the people of Manitoba? Where was the concern last year or at any time within the last five years? They are now concerned that gas shall be provided for Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and they are anxious that Winnipeg shall have it this year. So are all of us who live in Manitoba, but Manitoba has been sold down the river by this government. In 1951 a charter was granted to a Canadian company to build a gas pipe line to Winnipeg. Had the Minister of Trade and Commerce not interfered, Alberta gas would have been delivered to Manitoba three years ago.

An hon. Member: Have they an export permit?

Mr. Churchill: Manitoba now has had to wait and apparently it will have to continue to wait. In addition to that it must pay a subsidy through taxation to get gas and to bail out the Minister of Trade and Commerce and assist his American friends. The urgency is not so much the desire of this government to get the Alberta gas to market nor is it a matter of getting gas to Manitoba this year. The real urgency has been summed up extremely well by Blair Fraser in an article published in a recent issue of Maclean's magazine, and I give you his words:

> They are determined that they will not enter an election campaign next year still carrying an inactive American-owned pipe-line company on the back of their necks.

The American masters of the Minister of Trade and Commerce do not understand our parliamentary system and the minister cannot explain it to them because he does not understand it himself. They do not trust him—

Mr. Garson: We do.

Mr. Churchill: —hence the agreement that the commencement of the work depends upon the passing of this legislation and hence this muzzling of parliament. Some of the minister's American masters perhaps may think Canada is still being ruled by Great Britain—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, on a question of personal privilege, I have no American masters and I suggest the hon. gentleman withdraw.

Mr. Churchill: I will withdraw that and substitute masterful American friends.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, once a louse always a louse.

Mr. Fleming: You ought to know.

Mr. Churchill: It is time they learned the facts of life. Perhaps they think that the House of Commons is like their House of Representatives or that our Senate is as powerful as theirs. Some of them may think the proposals of our government run the danger of being rejected by parliament. Perhaps they think that somewhere in the background is the power of veto.

What they should be told is that once our government has made up its mind to lend money to the oil barons of Texas and has cracked the whip over the Liberal caucus all that remains is to debate the issue in the House of Commons, that that debate may run for several days or weeks but can be choked off by closure and therefore once government policy has been announced and legislation introduced into the house the green light has been given to the pipe line project and the money will be forthcoming in due course. The Trans-Canada pipe line company will get its handout of $80 million from this government, for this government is not only all powerful but is fully determined to pursue this wretched course of paying tribute to Texas oil barons, and nobody can keep them from their folly. All the opposition can do, to use the very apt phrase of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, is to expose them, and because of fear of exposure the government has clamped on closure.

The issue confronting us may be summed up in one sentence: Because the Tennessee Gas Company has cornered the market in 34-inch pipe, the Canadian people must now be taxed to pay tribute to Texas oil barons and the House of Commons is being muzzled by an arrogant oligarchy.

American influence on Canadian life has permeated right into our House of Commons. If it were not for this unwise, unnecessary and improvident arrangement to pass legislation by June 7 our parliamentary customs and usages would not now be in jeopardy.

Let us see what has happened to our customs and our usages. Not only has closure been applied at an unprecedentedly early stage in our proceedings, but yesterday the Minister of Finance, relying on the government majority, abrogated the customary procedure of questions before the orders of the day. The question period is one of the most valuable privileges of the House of Commons. Had it not been for the question period during the last several weeks we would have known even less about the pipe line problem than does the Prime Minister. We are witnessing here a continuation of the serious undermining of the power of parliament. The system is but imperfectly understood. People are under the impression that the opposition can prevent the government from carrying out its policy. The government, preying on those misunderstandings, uses its present methods to stifle debate and committee investigation and prevents full disclosure of the facts. The government pretends that closure is necessary this week. It is a thoroughly bad precedent that is being set and I hope it will not be forgotten. That is the seriousness of the situation as I see it; this erosion of the institution which is the centre of our democracy.

In the book entitled "Parliament" by Professor W. Ivor Jennings which is a standard work on the British parliamentary system and which every hon. member of parliament should study—

Mr. Fleming: Especially the government.

Mr. Churchill: —he sums up the function of the opposition in parliament. He points out very clearly that the power of the opposition itself rests only on sufferance. There is nothing whatever in the constitutional machinery that prevents the opposition from being suppressed. The government, being as powerful as it is, could wipe out the opposition if it so desired. The opposition cannot out-vote the majority; it can only defy it and appeal to the people.

An hon. Member: And expose it.

Mr. Churchill: What are the checks and balances in this system to offset an all-powerful government? There are three main checks; the freedom of election, the freedom of assembly and the freedom of organization. If you can have free elections and if you may assemble freely, and if you have the freedom to organize, you can effectively check a government which tends to be all powerful. The checks and balances are mutually interdependent; one alone cannot be overthrown. As long as they remain it is the function of the opposition not only to see that they operate but also to prevent gradual and insidious encroachments. We have witnessed here today a gradual and insidious encroachment, unprecedented and completely unnecessary.

We should have been permitted the right to conduct our examination of this resolution as we do all other resolutions in this house. We should be permitted on second reading to conduct a full debate when we reach that stage. When we reach the stage of committee of the whole house after second reading we should be permitted to fully examine the bill then before us, item by item, and receive answers to questions. We should have the chance at that stage to raise amendments and perhaps succeed in having the government agree to some of our proposals. Similarly we should have the chance on third reading to conduct a full debate. What faces us now? Closure; no debate; restricted debate.

An hon. Member: What are you doing now?

Mr. Churchill: We are restricted to 20 minutes and the subject matter is worth a two-hour discourse.

Mr. Harris: You are doing very well.

Mr. Churchill: We are restricted to 20 minutes on an issue like this that touches upon our rights and privileges in a free country. We are restricted to 20 minutes and even those 20 minutes are restricted by unnecessary interruptions—

Mr. McIlraith: Irrelevancies.

Mr. Churchill: —such as the one by the hon. member for Ottawa West. Let him get up and talk on this subject. Why is he not a defender of the liberties of the people?

Our parliamentary system has grown up over the centuries. The British people have gone through all forms and known types of government and have decided upon the parliamentary system as being best suited to their needs. We settle matters by debate, by majority rule; we settle matters by using the ballot, not the bullet. In the development of our parliamentary system the majority has learned not to ride roughshod over the minority.

Some hon. member said tonight that he was glad that the government had now determined to rule the opposition, or rule parliament, or something like that. Parliament is the union of forces; the government on the one side and the opposition on the other. There is give and take in the procedure. Under normal conditions the government would change and those on this side would change places with those on the other side. We have had 20 years of what has become almost one-party government and the people are forgetting the basis upon which our parliamentary system was founded.

It is unfortunate that we have reached the stage where parliament cannot be conducted as it was in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mackenzie King, Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Bennett.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, it is almost presumption on my part to take part in this debate after the big guns we have heard have spoken. I should like to hear some member of the opposition, and I expect it would be the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, stand up and speak without calling the government or cabinet ministers by certain names which are undignified.

I had been on the committee of railways, canals and telegraph lines since the beginning and I cannot forget those first meetings. I see again the right hon. minister standing up and making his statement and saying, "We want an all-Canadian pipe line." He wants to get it. He told us then that that was a government policy. It is government policy yet.

As I listen to the opposition I see that the official opposition and the C.C.F. are agreed on two things. They are agreed that we should have an all-Canadian pipe line. They are agreed also that the government is not doing it the right way. If the government did it according to the official opposition the C.C.F. would be up two, three or four at a time. If the government did it the way the C.C.F. want it the opposition would be telling them off. Perhaps they would be right in doing so.

I agree with the hon. member for Peace River when he says that the opposition have brought this closure on themselves because of their attitude. In the last two days we have had seven obstruction votes. An hon. member sitting on this side of the house cannot help but wonder why an hon. member would call another vote when he knew perfectly well how it would turn out.

Some years ago the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was called a dictator, but I think that name would be more honourable to him than would LL.D. He was blamed for selling out to the United States when it was announced in some papers that Canadair had been sold. He was accused of selling out to the United States. But he said that a United States company had only got an option and that if there was anyone in Canada who wanted to buy Canadair they could do it. Those who called him a dictator then were no more right than are those who call him that today.

The reason we have this pipe line is because the people want it. I can remember when the right hon. minister was called home from Ottawa to Port Arthur and Fort William. The two city councils and a delegation including the mayors and representatives of nearly every municipality around met with him. It was just after the minister had got the two companies to co-operate. I asked the delegation why they were asking the minister for this thing and the whole chorus was, "We want it." They did not have anything to offer in the way of cash, but they wanted it and they still want it.

Then I asked the minister if when these two companies had come together the last hurdle had been cleared but the minister just shook his head. He knew far better than I did. I remember in the early debates in committee there was one hon. member who impressed me very much. He knew far more about oil and gas than I did. I refer to the hon. member for Calgary South. I congratulate him upon his courage. No doubt he told his caucus what he was going to do. That seemed to be quite evident today. He had the courage to stand up and support the dictator.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Well named.

Mr. McIvor: I congratulate the right hon. minister upon his outline of the plan when he stood up. I do not need to repeat anything because I think it would be difficult for anyone to stand up now and say anything new. I congratulate the minister upon being clear and clean of Mr. McMahon. If I were forced to do so I could give my personal reasons for saying that, but they are not money reasons.

Another thing that I got up to say tonight is that a while ago we heard the opposition criticizing the government for not having work for the unemployed. Now this plan will give employment for 600. There is a good deal of unemployment in Vancouver and in Toronto and other places. Surely that is a good argument for going ahead with this plan.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think the Minister of Labour would be able to contradict that.

Mr. McIvor: I think the Minister of Labour, when he speaks, will speak honestly and tell me very decidedly what he knows. But it will take about 600 men who will be employed in the work of this pipe laying. I shall repeat the report that I have that there are a good many unemployed in Vancouver and in Toronto. Why not get those men employed, instead of keeping them on relief? The minister who spoke said that northern Ontario will need gas. He knows and I know that northern Ontario is going ahead, and it will certainly need gas. I congratulate the minister on having the backbone to stand by his policy of putting this national gas line all across Canada. I just wish him good success and sweet sleep at night.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss some aspects of this Colombo plan for Texas tycoons. The first thing I should like to know is, what is the government afraid of? Why does it have to shut off the debate? What is it trying to hide?

An hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): If you are not hiding anything, why are you afraid to send this to a committee of the house where the whole matter could be investigated? What sort of skullduggery is there that you are afraid to discuss? That is an interesting question, and I should like to ask the Prime Minister, "Why not, if there is nothing to hide, present this legislation to a committee of the house for investigation?" There is no answer, naturally. I challenge him to do it. There is still no answer, because the real Prime Minister, as a matter of fact, has left the house.

Mr. Dickey: You do not like action.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have heard the ministerial assistant pop up like a gopher time after time. It is possible that his interruptions may have been intelligent, but it is doubtful. If he is under the illusion that he is a wit, I can assure him he is only 50 per cent correct. As I was saying before I was interrupted, I do not like venality but I can understand it. I might even have some appreciation for venality on a massive scale but what I cannot appreciate is stupidity, and this legislation which is going to come before us and which is forecast in this resolution is unmitigated, undiluted and unadulterated stupidity.

Of course, this legislation is also the love child of the minister, spawned in the most dubious areas, spawned in an area of fiction and fantasy, in a dream world or, to put it in Anglo Saxon, an area of lies. I rather think that, if Baron Munchausen were to come to earth, (a) the minister would clasp him to his bosom and (b) he would make him deputy minister in charge of pipe lines, because this whole story has been marked clearly by lie after lie. I intend to put some of them on the record right now. This is from the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines which sat in 1951. As recorded on page 8 of the proceedings, Mr. Tolmie, counsel for these pipe lines, said:

> The project, Mr. Chairman, as all members probably know by now, is to build a gas pipe line from Alberta east as far as Montreal, and with the possibility and the hope that it can be extended further east from Montreal at a later stage when the capacity is fully utilized.

You will note that it is an all-Canadian pipe line, with no suggestion of exports to the United States. Then let us take the evidence of Mr. Frank Schultz, the vice-president of Canadian Delhi Oil Limited, on page 11:

> You may be interested to know about the marketing situation. We are satisfied at this stage that adequate markets exist in the eastern part of Canada to consume all the gas that we can produce and move through this line.

There is no question of a line to the south. It is an all-Canadian project. On page 15 the same man again said:

> Our only interest is bringing Alberta gas to the eastern part of Canada.

They were not interested in making money; they were not interested in having a pipe line to the United States. They just wanted to serve eastern Canada. Mr. Shattuck, who represents a firm of marketing engineers, had the temerity to present certain financial statements to the board of transport commissioners and, I suspect, to the government. When I see an engineer getting mixed up with financial statements, then God help us all. As recorded on page 23 of the same minutes of evidence, Mr. Shattuck had this to say:

> Our work has gone far enough so that we are assured that, at any rate, the market would absorb one hundred billion cubic feet of gas a year at prices that will service the pipe line, pay the operating costs, and service the debts necessary to finance construction.

On the basis of these lies, the committee gave approval to that legislation. But then there was the time when the company had to appear before the board of transport commissioners. In June 1954 we had the chief commissioner asking a witness certain questions. The witness was a man named Mr. Tanner, who was at one time a cabinet minister in the social credit government of Alberta and then went to his reward with the oil companies. Mr. Tanner is so convinced of the financial strength of this company and the future of this company that, of the millions of shares, he has subscribed for two of them. Mr. Tanner was asked by the chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners if construction would begin by June 1, 1955. Mr. Tanner said:

> Yes, we feel rather confident of that.

He had no doubt. He was quite confident. Then, on page 3525 of the evidence, Mr. Tanner said:

> We will start construction early in 1955. We shall be in a position to deliver gas to Winnipeg by November 1955. Pipe laying east from Winnipeg will be taken care of in 1956.

There were no ifs, ands and buts. It was a certainty. This was going to be done. The company deceived the board of transport commissioners and they kept on deceiving them with other statements. For instance, Mr. Tanner said:

> We can undertake the building of the line in the spring of 1956, completing it during that same year.

Again there was no doubt. But what was perhaps the deciding factor with the board of transport commissioners was one of the minister's boys who was sent there to make a statement before the board of transport commissioners, and I hold the minister responsible for he cannot pass the buck to him for it. This civil servant said:

> An export outlet such as Minneapolis may mean reduction in laid down price in eastern Canada.

When this emissary of the minister was making that statement, by then the company had already filed certain statements of its own. The company said that the price in Manitoba in 1955-56 would be 36·7 cents to the company which was going to deliver the gas to the consumer and that at the Manitoba border the price would be 34 cents. They never envisaged that by 1955-56 the line would be in the east. But we get another projection with respect to 1958-59. By this time the price of gas in Manitoba, instead of being down as the minister forecast, would be up to 40·7 cents, a 4-cent increase, while the price to the Americans at the portal at Emerson would be down to 32·9 cents. The hon. member for Saskatoon says that Canadians are subsidizing the Americans, and that is precisely what is happening.

But these were not the final figures. I have figures here which are perhaps more definite but I doubt if they are definitive. Now the Winnipeg price is going to be 33 cents to the distributor but the price at Emerson is going to be 25 cents per thousand cubic feet to the United States importing companies. In other words, there is going to be an 8-cent spread between us in Winnipeg and Emerson, 60 miles away, and this is being done, in the words of the Free Press, to confer great industrial benefit upon the people of Canada. Here is an 8-cent differential and yet Winnipeg is 60 miles nearer the source of gas. And so this company is determined to subsidize United States industry at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers with the help of the Liberal government made up of members of the Liberal party who insist on selling Canada down the river.

There is another aspect to this feature of cost. The minister is going to get this through. We know it. And he is going to get it through in a hurry. It is going to be done as rapidly as possible and it is going to be done in a mood of damn the cost. But the Canadian taxpayer is going to have to pay these costs sooner or later. The government has had months to make up its mind what it was going to do, if indeed it was ever possessed of a mind at all, but it deferred it, it put it off until finally, almost at the last stage in the game, it brings forward this legislation and then the minister gets up and moves closure. I have a very high personal regard for the Minister of Trade and Commerce but there are times when he should not be allowed within a thousand miles of any democratic legislature.

Let me go on with some of the representations made by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. Mr. Tanner said to the board of transport commissioners:

> In five years we would be able to build up a market in the east of approximately 500 million cubic feet a day.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

The board of transport commissioners believed him and I do not blame them but I do blame the board when time after time this company went back to get its application renewed, although the board knew it had been lied to, although the board knew it had been deceived, the board still assented because a minion from the minister said, "It has got to go through; the boss has spoken." And so the company was given permission to extend the permit still further, and we see the result of the board's credulity in the judgment of the chairman of the board. He mentions Trans-Canada's hopes and says:

> Trans-Canada hopes to commence construction early in 1955, deliver gas to Winnipeg and Emerson by November, 1955, complete the line to Toronto in 1956 and to Montreal in 1956 or 1957 at the latest.

The board believed that because they made the mistake of believing the witnesses who were heard. Dealing with the capital cost again the chairman of the board had this to say:

> The estimated cost of construction of the line and facilities is $299,139,000. . . . The board is convinced that such estimates have made reasonable allowance for foreseeable contingencies and have been prepared by skills and reliable estimators.

This was in 1954. Two years have passed. The cost of living may have advanced in those two years but not by the 30 per cent increase with which we are now confronted by these skilled and reliable estimators. How skilled can they be when, having taken into consideration all contingencies, we find now that the cost of the line will probably be $100 million more? How reliable are these people upon whom the board relied? Their unreliability is more than obvious. Then, again, we were told in the judgment of the chief commissioner that there would be no question about financing. The financing was to be done on the American basis of 75 per cent in first mortgage bonds, 12½ per cent in debentures and 12½ per cent in common stock.

The committee will note the 12½ per cent in common stock. Why is it so small? Because history shows that these gas pipe lines in the United States have been gold mines and after paying off a nominal sum in interest to the debenture holders those who have had common stock have had their snouts thoroughly stuck into the gravy trough. In addition, as I will show later, this company is going to be in a position where it can pay a dividend of at least 20 per cent on the common stock, whether one takes the first fanciful figures submitted or the less fanciful ones which the minister got a month or two ago.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Then we are told about the economic feasibility of the project. The board of transport commissioners had no doubt whatsoever about the economic feasibility of this line. Of course, doubt has recently arisen that it is not economically feasible, but the whole argument of the government now is based in no small measure upon the necessity of the lateral from Winnipeg to Emerson so that gas can be sold to the United States in order that the financing can be more readily arranged.

But what was the position of the counsel for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines in 1954 when he appeared before the board of transport commissioners? This is what Mr. Tolmie said:

> The Emerson lateral is not a separate line and it, of course, cannot be proceeded with or even contemplated by itself. It may be that it can come in at the beginning as an added feature . . .

In other words, this so essential feature today was at one stage in the game merely an added feature, something of no consequence, something of no importance, something which could be sloughed off. But now this added feature apparently is all-important because American industrialists have got to be supplied with cheap gas and Canadian citizens have got to pay for that subsidization. Mr. Tolmie said:

> It may be that it can come in at the beginning as an added feature and assist greatly in the financing towards the initial return.

Of course it would assist but I would call the committee to witness again that this lateral to the south was not an essential feature of the first plan. It has only become an essential feature in later days. Why? Because this company has no intention of having its sales to the United States restricted to 200 million cubic feet a day. The minister may not have liked McMahon's idea of 400 million cubic feet but this company is going to try to get it because it wants the gravy. This company is not going to sell in Canada to industry because its price will not be competitive so far as industry is concerned but is going to sell to the luxury trade. It is not even going to be competitive down here with oil. It is going to sell to the Cadillac group, to the ministerial class who can afford to pay that price.

I have already mentioned the Winnipeg price. Again the board of transport commissioners was fooled, and apparently they love being deceived for time after time they renewed the permit. The chairman said:

> We noted that the price to be paid Trans-Canada at Emerson by Northern Natural is 34 cents per 1,000 cubic feet and is 2 cents per 1,000 cubic feet less than the anticipated price to gas distributors in Winnipeg . . .

Two cents at that time, now 8 cents. Does the government pretend for a moment that this is a provident suggestion to the people of western Canada? Does the government think for a moment that we like to pay 8 cents more in Winnipeg than American industries are going to pay south of the border? Yet that is what we are being asked to do by this legislation.

Let me deal with another matter if I have time, and if not I will deal with it at another stage. I want to discuss the balance sheet which was presented to the board of transport commissioners to show the financial solidity of the company. Assets are shown as $361,215,000 and liabilities are of course the same amount. But what is interesting is that the common stock at that time was $37 million. Here is the projection made by a firm of engineers to October 31, 1961, showing common stock of $37 million and earned surplus at that date of $32,765,000. That is not a bad showing for five or six years. There is also submitted a profit and loss account of this company projected to 1961. This profit and loss amount shows $13 million available for dividends after all bond interest has been paid and after all income tax has been paid. Of that $13 million, $2,190,000 goes to the preferred shareholders or the debenture holders, call them what you like, and the balance is left available for the ordinary stockholders. Mr. Chairman, this thing is a veritable gold mine. Why then have the Americans to come to the Canadian government to get it financed? What is the catch in the whole thing? Obviously either those who submitted this proposal and this balance sheet and profit and loss account to the board of transport commissioners knew what they were talking about or they were liars. I suggest that they had no idea at all as to what they were talking about, that they were trying deliberately to deceive the board of transport commissioners, and that they succeeded. The pity is that they succeeded not only the first time but on every other occasion.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I am sorry too, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: —but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, I propose to deal mainly with the only issue which is before this house in this whole debate—

Mr. Ellis: Closure.

Mr. Philpott: —and that is whether this house and this government shall proceed with the construction of an across-Canada pipe line now on the basis that is proposed or whether at some hypothetical date in the not-named-distant future we should have a pipe line under public ownership. There is only one issue before this house and that is the proposal made by the C.C.F. opposition and the proposal now made by the Liberal government of Canada, the Frost Conservative government of Ontario and all of the intelligent Conservatives that are left in the Conservative party, including the hon. member for Calgary South who had such a hard job getting on to make his speech today. It is not necessary for me to dwell on the advantage of this general scheme. It has been better and more briefly summed up by the Premier of Ontario, the Hon. Leslie Frost, than by any other person. As recorded at page 389 of the Ontario legislature Hansard he said this:

> We think there has never been, since the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the great opportunity to do an outstanding job for our country as there is at present.

Then he went on to give reasons why he was endorsing this scheme 100 per cent. Just in passing, may I say that I was very much surprised at the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who made that vitriolic attack on the Frost government of Ontario for teaming up with the Liberal government of Canada to put through this much needed national enterprise, for failing to point out that his own lone supporter in the legislature of Ontario had voted with all of the Conservatives in the legislature of Ontario and all of the Liberals in the legislature of Ontario. The lone C.C.F.'er, Mr. MacDonald also voted for this bill because the vote was yeas 88 and nays nil, and Mr. MacDonald voted. So I address myself to the only issue that is before this house in this debate, namely whether we proceed now with the building of the trans-Canada pipe line under the contract which is now proposed or whether at some nebulous time in the unstated future we go ahead under public ownership. Public ownership is something that every political party in Canada can take some credit for. Even the Leader of the Opposition, with whom I do not always agree, certainly has to his credit achievements in the field of public ownership. This government—and in my opinion thanks to the Minister of Trade and Commerce more than to any other man in this house or in the country—has made an outstanding success of public ownership enterprises such as the Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines, Polymer Corporation and so on down the line. I do not need to mention the C.C.F. The C.C.F. has had some successes and some, shall I say, non-successes in the field of public ownership in Saskatchewan. Social Credit, which I think is probably the party in Canada least inclined to public ownership, is making quite a creditable success, through the government of British Columbia, in the management of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway in the field of public ownership. Hence I think we can all say that when public ownership is suited for the job, we are all in favour of public ownership. But if there is any virtue of which this government can boast it is that this government has picked as the chosen instrument for each particular job whichever kind of enterprise seemed to be better suited for that particular job.

I submit that public enterprise is not what we should proceed with now for obvious reasons. The most obvious reason, I think—as anyone with any common sense will agree—is that there would be years of delay. In order to build a pipe line, whatever else you must have, you must have pipe. If we were to abandon the Trans-Canada company now in order to go into some unstated public ownership proposition, the government of Canada would immediately be faced by this problem: Where are you going to get the pipe to build the line? While I have no doubt that in a year or perhaps two years they could get the necessary amount of pipe, there is certainly no guarantee whatever that they could get that pipe by the year 1957 or the year 1958; and in my opinion it would be extremely doubtful whether you could complete a public ownership pipe line within two years after the end of the time that you could complete a pipe line under private enterprise.

The second reason, in my opinion, why we should not go ahead with a public ownership project at this time is that public ownership at this time would result in substantially higher gas bills for the users in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa and all other centres in central Canada. I am able to talk on this particular matter with some knowledge of gas bills. I have been the user of a gas furnace in the city of Vancouver ever since 1942. We, of course, have to manufacture gas. This winter, one month my bill was $38.18. I will say that we had a very cold winter in Vancouver. The next one was $35.08. Last week I received a notice saying that as a result of the coming to British Columbia of the natural gas pipe line my heating bills will be reduced 52 per cent. I see the Leader of the Opposition is smiling. I have no doubt he is thinking that this gas is coming to Vancouver by reason of the enterprise of a gentleman named Mr. Frank McMahon. Let me point out that in this particular case the whole project would have been completely impractical had they not sold the major block of gas to the United States. So, when I talk to my academic friends opposite whose slogan seems to be socialism or bust, public enterprise at any cost, at any time, wise or unwise, common sense or no common sense, let me tell them that in my opinion the whole public ownership proposition of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines would be an extremely difficult proposition to make on an economic basis. How is the government of Canada,—

Mr. Fulton: How is the government of Canada?

Mr. Philpott: —let us ask ourselves the practical question, if they are going to have to sell a big block of gas—the hon. member for Kamloops is good at obstruction, but his obstruction days are over now.

How is the government of Canada, which would require to sell big blocks of our natural gas to the United States in order to be able to serve eastern Canada at reasonable prices, going to go about selling gas in the United States? Do the hon. gentlemen opposite foresee the government of Canada going hat in hand and saying, "Please, Mr. Uncle Sam, will you buy our Canadian gas?" How ridiculous can you get?

So I say that, first we should not proceed now with the nebulous public ownership plan until we have tried every other avenue. A public ownership corporation would not be in the best position to try to sell gas and unless we do sell that gas it would result in higher bills for the actual consumers in Canada.

Now, what shall I say about that strange partnership, the other wing of that strange partnership? When I saw that strange alliance beginning last week, an alliance first of obstruction, I thought back to the year of 1932. We have heard today about 1932 when there was closure in this house and great protest about it. I remember another country in which there was a tie-up between the extreme right and the extreme left, namely Prussia. In that country the extreme right and extreme left, by tactics much the same as were attempted here last week by two gentlemen whom I shall not name, the extreme left and extreme right tied up and parliamentary government went down in that country. It was because the government of the day did not have the gumption or perhaps I would be forgiven the plain word "guts" to deal with that kind of obstruction as it should have been dealt with by parliamentary processes. Just for the benefit of the opposition may I say that the filibuster which they have been attempting so often in recent weeks is a United States institution and that closure is a British institution.

As the hon. member for Timiskaming pointed out, in the last seven years the British House of Commons, that old mother of parliaments, has applied closure on an average of 21 times every session.

An hon. Member: By agreement.

Mr. Ellis: Tell the whole story. They do it by agreement.

Mr. Philpott: What shall I say about the old wing of that strange alliance? I think that the weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth which has been most characteristic of the federal Conservative speeches and the federal Conservative attitude in the past week—they have obstructed and they have filibustered and used every expedient to prevent intelligent debate, for the obvious reason that they had nothing to say. Why have they nothing to say?

Mr. Harkness: Why did you put on closure then?

Mr. Philpott: Because the federal Conservatives have been defrosted; because every argument made by any hon. member of the federal opposition has been answered in advance by the premier of Ontario. For instance, at page 390 of Ontario Hansard he said:

> We have taken a generous view with the federal government and recognize their position in this matter has not been simple or easy. I have no intention here of making it more difficult for the federal government to carry its arrangements through. If I did that I would be doing a disservice to this country . . .
>
> We must recognize that in working out an agreement with the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited the federal government has obviously been faced with many difficulties. It was not an easy matter to negotiate the agreement at all . . .

Then on page 391 he said:

> Apparently the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines agreement provides for the quickest and most effective way of bringing gas to Ontario.

When I hear my old Tory friends over there trotting out this old, shabby, broken-down, moth-eaten horse on which they rode to victory in 1911, no truck or trade with the Yankees, I say let us see what Mr. Frost said about that.

Mr. Harkness: You are the last people who should be talking about horses.

Mr. Philpott: On page 392 of Ontario Hansard, Mr. Frost said:

> Since the very beginning of this country we have recognized there is a price to pay for Canadian independence. If we had not recognized that, certainly there would be no Canada today. In addition to what has been said about the control of this company, whether the Canadian shareholders had the opportunity to take 51 per cent of the stock, or anything of that sort, the fact of the matter is that the construction is in Canada, wholly within the jurisdiction of our country, and is subject to the legislative enactment not only of the government of Canada but of the provinces through which it passes. That in itself is the real essential of control.

Then he goes on to speak about the benefits of foreign capital in Canada.

Mr. Martin: The opposition is frostbitten.

Mr. Philpott: The reason why the Prime Minister of Canada, great statesman that he is, the greatest—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Philpott: —the greatest statesman that this country has yet had, will not agree to the request of federal opposition for an election now is that he knows if he did there would not be six federal Conservatives elected between the Ottawa river and the Pacific coast.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, this is a unique occasion in the life of this parliament. This is an issue that deeply concerns the people of Canada. As evidence of that it seems very few have noticed before that the galleries are so full some ladies have been standing and hundreds have been turned away from the door as is the case on budget night. Why all this excitement? Because, Mr. Chairman, there is no one who has been long enough in this parliament to witness a spectacle such as we have seen yesterday and today. No one has sat here long enough. These little junior squeakers at the back have no idea of the importance of parliamentary freedom and responsible government. Never in the history of this government, and I will venture to say never in the history of any democratic government, have we seen a resolution moved—

An hon. Member: A revolution?

Mr. Rowe: —and closure put on at the same time. You could not even start a revolution. You never even drew up a resolution, let alone talk about a revolution.

After having mentioned this proposed resolution in the speech from the throne, it has lain hidden in the dusty alcoves of this old smug, complacent government all this time. Then, Mr. Chairman, it is brought out and presented in a hasty climax by that old man in a hurry to wind up what has been going on for five slow years in records filled with secrecy, mystery, changes, misrepresentation and uncertainty. Talk about private enterprise—

Mr. Pickersgill: Talk about an anti-climax.

Mr. Rowe: You have been an anti-climax to more of your own climaxes than anybody else.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Chairman, this is neither private enterprise nor public ownership. It is a nondescript, mongrel amalgamation of the two. It is private enterprise for United States interests with nothing left for private enterprise in Canada except public ownership as everyone knows, because the minister told us that yesterday. It is private ownership controlled by United States interests and the only alternative left in the resolution is that when it now looks almost impossible for trans-Canada to complete it you propose to have public ownership next year. You have already stifled every private enterprise in Canada concerning this project and you have offered bonuses to United States enterprise.

You ridiculed the group to my left as being champions of public ownership when we in the Conservative party have been the real champions of private enterprise since confederation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce laughs and the Prime Minister says nothing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Why are you linked with the C.C.F. tonight?

Mr. Rowe: We are not linked because we are both opposing you. There are many people in Canada who are opposing you tonight who are interested in Canada. We are interested in the people of Canada. That is why you and your silent, acquiescing Prime Minister are afraid to go to the country. That is why the Prime Minister is afraid to rise and speak in this issue because he has already said that this is the worst proposal of the three.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I would rather be silent than speak like you are doing now.

Mr. Rowe: The Prime Minister has already said that this proposal is the worst of the three. No wonder he does not speak.

An hon. Member: He does not dare.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Agriculture can talk about the Saskatchewan river dam out in Saskatchewan at the next election. These great Liberal champions of private enterprise have stifled Canadian private enterprise and squelched the offers of every Canadian company which has ventured an offer. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration says that we are the Canadian babies. He is the last one who should speak about that. He looks more like a baby than anyone else I see in the house. The Canadian baby who did propose this was the only Canadian who built a line in Canada for $153 million.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, someone said we have had 20 years of one-party government. How long, oh Lord, how long are we going to be confronted with a one-man party government in the future?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It did not take you long to put one government out of business.

Mr. Rowe: What was that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It did not take you long to put a government out of office, the one of which you were a member. How long were you a member there?

An hon. Member: Six weeks.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Six weeks?

Mr. Rowe: I do not mind telling you that I do not have to apologize for that government. We had a leader at that time who has been chided for introducing closure. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration asked me to mention that tonight. When I sat here in 1932 from February 26 to March 23, your cohorts, the men who are not now associated with you because you were leaning toward being Conservative at that time—all the men you were not associated with at that time made the rafters ring in this house. I remember the Right Hon. Mackenzie King as prime minister walking out in front of the house and saying that the parliament of Canada had lost its supremacy and he almost shed crocodile tears. He talked about his dear old grandfather and how he had fought for Canada.

He said all this because the matter had been debated from February 26 to March 23. You great champions of the unemployed and the poor were voting against giving relief to the unemployed and the farm relief which was necessary because you lost every market during the time you were in power.

The only other time closure was put on was in an important session back in 1912 when Sir Robert Borden was trying to give Great Britain three dreadnoughts in her dire time of need as she was preparing for the first world war. Every Liberal henchman in this country for four solid months from December until April 5 sought to defeat doing this. They sat up at night, Mr. Chairman, and the Clerk told me at that time he thought he was going to collapse because he had to sit here day and night while discussion on that naval bill went on. In other words, the Liberals at that time said they were not going to send any dreadnoughts to old England and Sir Robert Borden finally put closure on. Compare these instances, Mr. Chairman. Why have you put closure on? You have put it on to force the Canadian taxpayers behind the dirty shrouds of closure to pay a bonus to United States interests which will help them control one of our most vital natural resources. How can the government compare those two examples of closure?

You talk about haste. In 1951 you told us there was an incorporated company going to build the pipe line in three years in Canada. For three years all that took place was a courtship between the two and finally you made it a shotgun marriage. Then they came back to you and said, "Mr. Howe, we are married now but we cannot get along without a little bit of help and a line is difficult to put through your country around Fort William in that rocky part of the nation. That is the hardest section of the line. Will you give us some help?" And the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, "Yes, we will give you some help," and so he arranged for $130 million. After he arranged for that they came back and said, "Now that you have given us $130 million, will you let us use $80 million of it to build the softest part of the line?" So you bonused them to build the hardest part and let them use the same money for the softest part, and if they build the softest part, you will have to introduce closure again to get some more money for them to build the hardest part. What an unholy mess this has become. As has been mentioned, the taxpayers of Canada are being victimized and the crown company which has been organized will be disabled by this very move.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce says this company had great foresight. Yes, it had great foresight. It ordered 180 miles of 34-inch pipe. I believe he said it was ordered from the National Tube Company of McKeesport, Pennsylvania. They ordered it, however, on the condition that the federal power commission in Washington would accept delivery of the gas. As the minister said yesterday they had to know what they were going to get before they were going to deliver it. Now he says there is a change and they have ordered 600 miles of pipe. How did that come about? That is not what I call foresight.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This is the greatest piece of fiction we have heard tonight.

Mr. Rowe: This so-called foresight—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is not a word of truth in what you are saying.

Mr. Rowe: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to listen to any lectures on truth from a man whom we have heard misrepresent the facts more frequently than any hon. member during the session. Mr. Chairman, they ordered the pipe because the Canadian taxpayers were going to have to pay for it, and the government is hiding behind closure in order to force the issue. I can well understand why the Prime Minister gives his silent acquiescence. He has already told them what he thought about it. He said that of the three propositions it was the worst one. Eighty-three per cent of the control is in the hands of United States interests. Ninety per cent of the cost is to be paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. The taxpayers of Canada are paying for 83 per cent of the dividends and profits which go to United States interests.

We were told that a government agency might interfere with the federal power commission accepting gas. Now we have a government agency established to build the hardest part of the line and there is a 90 per cent mortgage on the whole thing.

An hon. Member: Why don't you tell the truth?

Mr. Rowe: If this was not such a tragedy it would be ridiculous enough to be amusing. We were told tonight by one of the ministers that this is the greatest national project which has ever been put before this House of Commons.

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. Rowe: It is so important that the government does not want anyone to speak about it. The government is afraid to send it to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, as was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister seems to be afraid to speak about it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is afraid to let the rest of us speak about it and the Liberal party is afraid to go to the country. I challenge you. You are afraid to let the people answer. You cannot put closure on the people because they will defeat you.

Mr. Hees: That a boy!

Mr. Rowe: The Prime Minister is ashamed to speak about it. Closure was brought in, Mr. Chairman, because the date was fixed at Washington. The date was fixed by United States interests and we in parliament were told not to talk in order to please our friends. I am reminded of the old days when we were told that we must not provoke the United States. Our party has stuck solidly to its traditional policies. I am not concerned about those little henchmen or the ridiculous gibes from the front benches or the backbenchers. Down in the province of Quebec we have seen how you and the Social Credit are married in that province and are running a honeymoon up here. I am not a bit concerned about this.

If there ever has been a time in the history of this country when a man was more maligned and more misrepresented than the Leader of the Opposition it is—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: You cheap propagandists have gone out and misrepresented him and said he was not in favour of developing our resources when our party brought more United States capital into Canada than your party has ever done. It was the Canada first policy of R. B. Bennett in 1930 that brought plants from England and the United States to this country. My little friend from Manitoba does not understand, as he has not been here long enough. That is what has happened down through the days of Macdonald, Borden, Bennett, and now—

An hon. Member: Drew.

Mr. Rowe: Drew in the province of Ontario. You gentlemen laugh but you do not understand it. I know the young hon. member has not been in the house long enough but he applauds when he does not know what he is applauding about. That capital was brought to the province of Ontario, some of it to his own district. The Leader of the Opposition encouraged $200 million of United States capital to come in here by his policy of development, not for Americans but for Canadians.

I am not disturbed by the empty laughs of those who know no better; I am not disturbed by the gibes of the backbenchers who have made a custom of it. Those are the facts that history has recorded.

Mr. Benidickson: Where did the dividends go?

Mr. Rowe: They did not go to the United States of America as they are going to do in this instance.

An hon. Member: That is strike two for you, Benidickson.

Mr. Rowe: We are told that this is another declaration of Canadian independence. Oh, dear, surely that should have been corrected in Hansard. Why did not the Minister of Agriculture correct that and call it Canadian interdependence?

Mr. Gardiner: I was not the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Rowe: The government has now presented in a hasty, reckless, haphazard form a resolution which has been hidden for four months by a government which has refused to answer questions. Yesterday we were prohibited from asking questions. Now they bring out a resolution which is dusty and moth-eaten. The hon. member for Vancouver South said it was a moth-eaten horse. I know enough about horses that he has ridden more political horses than anybody in this country.

Now we are told we are to have closure, the guillotine is going to be applied, the axe is to be swung by the Liberal government. Are these the people who bow at the shrine of Laurier? Is that the attitude taken by the Right Hon. Mackenzie King? Where are you now? Those are the men who fought for the supremacy of parliament. They would turn in their graves if they knew what was happening. What would the great Laurier say? What would the great Mackenzie King say? They were great men.

They are no more silent tonight, as they sleep in peace I hope, than the Prime Minister has been since the session started. This is an issue that concerns the rights and hopes of our people, in this country. This country is filled with resources of oil, iron and everything that makes a country great and rich. I urge the Prime Minister to rise and shuffle out from that smug complacency that prompts this government to do nothing about anything. I urge the Prime Minister to speak before one o'clock because he knows the country is interested. These things belong to the people of Canada. If you do not think that we are presenting this in sincerity I ask you to rise and tell us why you are silent. I know you are not afraid to speak; I know you can speak; I know you are not too old to grasp the problem. You may be afraid to go to the country but I know you are not afraid to rise in parliament.

If the Minister of Trade and Commerce is afraid to have an open debate on this and let us talk more than 20 minutes, and if you are afraid to speak, then get the cabinet together and call an election tomorrow and let the people speak. You can gag, as you have done tonight, and guillotine your opposition—

The Deputy Chairman: I think I must remind the hon. member that he should address his remarks to the chair.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that I have not reflected upon your able chairmanship. The government has gagged the people's representatives in the opposition but they cannot gag the voter at the ballot box. I urge them to trust them. I remember the words of the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King who said that we should trust the people. He said, "We trust the people, we are the champions of the supremacy of parliament." You are afraid to do either. So I urge you now, if you are afraid to debate it in parliament, go to the country. It is a nice time of year. If you are as powerful as you think you are, as you boast here that you are, and as you have been boasting for the last four years, go out and face the people. You will be defeated just as surely as any other government was defeated that imposed closure so clumsily without giving parliament a chance to express itself.

I believe that my time has expired and rather than have you call me to time I will conclude my remarks.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to match my lungs against those of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, nor do I intend to match my lungs against the noise in the chamber. I shall hesitate when that is required. Hon. members of the Conservative party have said that this filibuster began only an hour before this motion was moved. Filibuster on pipe lines began in this house in 1949 and it was begun by members of the Conservative opposition. Never since that time has actual common sense been spoken when gas transmission has been discussed except on occasions when hon. members such as the hon. member for Calgary South or hon. members on this side of the house have spoken, particularly the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce.

When the filibuster began as it did in 1949 the chosen instrument for gas transmission at that time—it was the chosen instrument of the Conservative opposition—was Westcoast Transmission. What has been the result? An hon. member says "rubbish". I can quote speaker after speaker from Hansard saying that the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited has been the only company prepared to build the pipe line entirely in Canada. It was an uneconomic route, but, nothwithstanding that, it was a company that at all times was prepared to build an all-Canadian line.

That was the story of the official opposition. Nevertheless the actual facts were that two or three of the companies applied for charters, and at least two received charters, who were prepared to do basically the same thing, but they were prepared to build a pipe line to British Columbia where it would serve the people of British Columbia. The present pipe line has been brought to fruition because of this silly outlook with respect to the transmission of natural gas. Half of the consumption of gas in British Columbia will be lost. The east and west Kootenays in British Columbia would have consumed as much natural gas as the greater Vancouver area. Those were facts brought out in committee.

Nevertheless, a gas line is going to the west coast and, as the hon. member for Vancouver South has shown here tonight, the gas bills for those people will be cut in half. The gas bills for those people would have been cut another 20 per cent if the gas line had followed an economic route. Certainly the gas bills and the fuel bills of the people of Trail, Kimberley and the Crowsnest area would have been equally well served. However, that became the basic policy for all parties, and the Westcoast Transmission Company received its charter on the basis that it was going to serve all-Canadian consumers first. But the result is that natural gas will go to the west coast and serve a small number of consumers, and about 90 per cent of the gas will be exported to the United States. This is against the policy of the all-Canadian consumers being served first.

As I have said, that was the chosen instrument of the Conservative party, and that was the policy which was to be undertaken by the president of Westcoast Transmission. Now what do we find? This great exponent of the policy of serving Canadian consumers first, last and foremost comes out with a proposal to transport natural gas to eastern Canada when it has already been shown that another company has the plans ready, the supplies at hand and the sale spoken for. But, as has been shown, unless a large proportion of that natural gas is sold in the United States, they are not able to finance it at the moment.

Mr. McMahon, president of Westcoast Transmission and the new proponent of a gas line to eastern Canada, makes a proposal and promises us in a confidential letter that he will personally post with the government $500,000 cash to complete the project by 1958, subject only to being able to obtain the necessary materials. You might note that he was not too sure of being able to obtain the materials, although he had said in other letters that he would obtain them. Half a million dollars is not a very great deal of money to this gentleman, as many of you may know. But what is the crux of the plan that this great exponent of the policy of serving Canadian users first proposes? A volume of 400 million cubic feet is to be exported into the United States, four-fifths of the total amount of natural gas that the provincial government of Alberta has authorized for export. If that is the understanding on which Mr. McMahon was prepared to go ahead, is is any wonder that he has been asked to pay up or shut up? It seems to me that that is what should have been done with a person who has made such a spurious offer.

Mr. Fleming: Has the hon. member ever heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that was a spurious offer?

Mr. Byrne: I certainly heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that it was not, in his opinion, a firm offer.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Fleming: But has the hon. member ever heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce say the offer was a spurious offer?

Mr. Byrne: I have said that this project proposed by Mr. McMahon would export four-fifths of the entire amount of gas that has been permitted for export from the province of Alberta. Now what has become of the policy of Canadians being served first and foremost?

There has been a great deal of discussion regarding the control of the companies, and comparisons have been made between the McMahon offer and that of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. At least Trans-Canada Pipe Lines are proposing to move natural gas to eastern Canada. The McMahon proposal is to move gas to the United States. It may be true that with Trans-Canada more of the incidental profits will be paid to the bondholders in the United States, but in the other case much of the profit again will accrue to bondholders in the United States but there will be no gas in eastern Canada. We certainly may have control in Canada, but no gas. I should estimate that the great International Nickel Company in its smelters would use almost half of the amount of natural gas that would be left for consumption in eastern Canada should this proposal have been accepted.

That is not all. The proponents of Canada first at all costs, that is, mainly the official opposition, have said at all times that the main line must be built entirely within Canada. We have had bills passed here day after day, week after week, with the same silly argument being put forward. When a gathering company was being incorporated and gas or oil were being brought to one central location for transportation to a given area the official opposition have always insisted that the main line of the gathering system be built entirely within Canada to connect with the main transmission line regardless of whether it meant that the gathering line would be 100 or 200 miles longer. The principle is there.

What does Mr. McMahon propose in this case? Mr. McMahon finds that there are some basic faults in Trans-Canada's plan, and the third one is the following:

> The Trans-Canada plan contemplates the sale of gas to Tennessee Gas Transmission Company and a subsidiary at Emerson, Manitoba, and Niagara Falls, Ontario. Gas sold at Emerson would be used by the Tennessee Company in the great plains-midwest area of the United States to invade the duly franchised market areas of the present pipe line companies . . .

Isn't that just too bad? It is going to interfere with some of his friends. But that is not all. I want to point out that the official opposition are supporting this proposal as the only alternative to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company. Mr. McMahon proposes to build a 34-inch pipe line to Winnipeg and a 30-inch pipe line from Winnipeg to eastern Canada. Where is the main line being built? Four-fifths of the natural gas is, according to his plan, to be sold in the United States and 100 million cubic feet per day is to go to eastern Canada in a smaller pipe. It would be very interesting to hear from the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra who has always felt that this principle must be maintained at all costs. I am waiting anxiously to hear what he has to say about this matter.

I should like to say one word about the question of closure. I have said earlier that this pipe line filibuster began in 1949. We went through it in the session of 1949 and the session of 1950. Two gas company charters were refused because of filibusters and the whole gas line policy of Canada was confused. The newspapers carried articles as long as four months ago indicating that the official opposition had stated they were going to filibuster this pipe line measure. One of their members even said that it would be an example of eternity, and certainly the members of the C.C.F. party have made similar statements. We are facing a position in which the minority are attempting to obstruct parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Fleming: That is what you said last year.

Mr. Byrne: This is a very important matter and it has been shown that unless the financing can be assured by the end of this month the pipe line policy will be further confused and will be for another two years. It is my opinion that we should pass the legislation and get on with the job that we were sent here to do.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, on one thing I am sure we can all agree this evening and that is that we have had a very interesting and exciting day. Perhaps if the House of Commons had days like this more frequently we would be far more popular with the general public in the galleries than we have been in the past. However, I should like to speak very seriously tonight on some features of the debate on the question before the house.

The first is that within a little over an hour the axe will fall and debate will be stopped on this stage of the measure. That action is unprecedented in the parliamentary history of Canada, and I am sure that when members on the other side of the house have the opportunity to think over what has been done in the last two days they will realize that a very grievous blow has been struck at our institution of parliamentary government in this nation. The Prime Minister has not been in public life for many years. He has never been, and I say this in all kindness, a House of Commons man, and I do not believe he realizes tonight the serious implications of the step he has allowed his senior minister to force on him in moving closure, not after there had been an extensive debate, but at the end of the very first speech when the minister introduced this particular measure.

The Prime Minister obviously has condoned that step and he must accept the primary responsibility before the Canadian people and in the history of Canada for what he has allowed to be done in this debate. Closure is particularly atrocious under these circumstances when we remember that in the speech from the throne on January 10 this pipe line measure was announced and it was understood then that it would be the main question before the house during this session. The resolution preceding the legislation appeared first on February 3, but debate was not brought on until March 15 and then it was cut off after one day. An amended resolution was brought in, came up for debate yesterday for the first time and the Minister of Trade and Commerce moved closure. I think that action can be fairly summed up in these words, that Liberalism as exemplified in the House of Commons in May of 1956 is synonymous with contempt of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: Let me analyse the resolution which is under debate. It precedes a measure to set up a crown corporation to be known as Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation which will have the power to construct a gas pipe line from the Ontario-Manitoba border 675 miles east to Kapuskasing. The corporation is to have the power to lease that pipe line, with an option to purchase, to this chosen instrument of the government, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. In addition, the corporation is now to be given the power to lend to this same company for a line from the Alberta-Saskatchewan border 575 miles east to the vicinity of Winnipeg a sum not exceeding $80 million or 90 per cent of the cost. The aggregate for all this work is to be not over $130 million.

I point out that the original resolution referred only to the northern Ontario line and it contained the same figure, $130 million. The cost was estimated to be $118 million, of which Ontario was to put up $35 million leaving $83 million for the dominion. If $80 million of that $130 million is now to go into the western line it is obvious that unless and until that sum is repaid there will not be enough money to build the northern Ontario line. That line will just have to wait in the meantime. The resolution is very misleading because it should contain a figure of $210 million rather than a figure of $130 million. Remember this, Mr. Chairman. Under the government's proposal no share whatever of the profits, either of the western line or the northern line, is to go to Canada.

Then we must consider too the agreement made a week ago, on May 8. It gives further details of this proposal. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is to repay on or before April 2, 1957. That means the company will have a further extension until April 2, 1957 to prove financial ability. Already within the last few weeks the government has extended the time for that to November 1, 1956. It means, of course, delay in the northern Ontario line, delay in the line from Winnipeg to the Ontario border and delay in the line in southern Ontario and into the province of Quebec.

Now I point out four important features which I suggest should be considered by hon. members and by the Canadian people. The first is that the government went to this chosen instrument hat in hand, an amazing thing for the government to do. On May 8, as reported at page 3664 of Hansard, the minister said this:

> I emphasize that the approach came from the government, not Trans-Canada. Trans-Canada was not in default.

Actually Trans-Canada was in default and badly so. I need only remind you, Mr. Chairman, that on September 15 of last year the minister's representative, Mr. Sharp, appeared before the board of transport commissioners in support of an application the company was then making for an extension of time. The newspaper dispatch reads as follows:

> Sharp said Trans-Canada and its bankers have given the federal government assurance that it will be able to build the balance of the pipe line.

That is with the government completing the northern Ontario section.

> "The government of Canada is proceeding on the assumption that Trans-Canada now will be able to accomplish this objective and that construction will commence in 1956 and be completed in 1957," Sharp said.

In the agreement itself between the government and Trans-Canada dated November 21 of last year, we find this clause:

> And whereas Trans-Canada proposes to arrange for financing of all its costs and commitments in connection with the said program of construction prior to May 1, 1956; . . .

What is happening is this. The government keeps bailing them out. If there is default on April 2, 1957, I believe the government will again step in and bail out this company. When the minister spoke yesterday he was very careful to point out that the government is not obliged to take over the Western pipe line next year if there is default. He made it clear that while that power is taken, it does not have to be exercised. So I repeat this first feature is that the government has gone to this company hat in hand. What possible chance is there of Canada getting a good deal under those circumstances?

Then the second feature is this. These American companies are in the saddle, particularly the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company. Make no mistake about it, this plan that is being forced on the House of Commons is a Tennessee Gas plan. The minister has never denied that fact. What have they done? They have just refused to put up the money for the western section. On March 28 of this year they were told by the board of transport commissioners to go out and raise the money to build that section. I have here the judgment. It contains this paragraph:

> The board has suggested to the applicant that the latter might further pursue the possibility of raising the necessary capital through private sources to permit of the immediate construction of this part of the line, the cost of which it is estimated would amount to between $70 million and $75 million.

On April 12 a newspaper dispatch indicated that it was expected that this company would be advancing the money to build the western section of the line. Remember this, Mr. Chairman. These are wealthy companies. When the Tennessee Gas company came into the picture last fall, we were told that it was a pipe line giant. A dispatch then said this:

> The $826 million Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, which operates the world's largest natural gas transmission network in the United States, is to be a full partner in the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited line . . .

But they are not doing any gambling. They can get out of this deal next spring with very little loss. Tennessee Gas is not on any covenant to repay the government loan. The covenant is with the government's own chosen instrument, namely Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. The government is going to pay $80 million and these promoters only have to pay between $8 million and $9 million.

Just three or four days ago the counsel for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited went before the board of transport commissioners. What did he say? According to this newspaper clipping this is what he said:

> Trans-Canada's counsel, Ross Tolmie, said the government's agreement to provide the $80 million will be used as evidence of financial ability to build the link.

[Mr. Green.]

Then in the third place, Trans-Canada will not be moving to complete the line—that is into eastern Canada and to Montreal—unless and until the federal power commission gives a permit to export gas to the United States. Throughout, from the beginning and right to the bitter end, so long as this Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is the company involved, the government's plan for a completed pipe line from Alberta to Montreal has depended and will depend on this permission from the federal power commission of the United States, a body set up in a foreign country to protect the interests of that country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made the position clear when he spoke on May 8. As reported at page 3663 of Hansard he said this:

> In spite of their best endeavours, however—

He was referring to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

> —they have not been able to obtain guarantees that the money necessary to finance either the whole of the line, apart from the northern Ontario section, or the western section, would be forthcoming in advance of approval by the federal power commission of their contract for the sale of gas into the United States.

Then, when speaking yesterday, he again made the position clear when he said this, as reported at page 3861 of Hansard:

> However, there has been and there is no end clearly in sight.

He was referring to the granting of a permit by the federal power commission.

The company has made no agreement to complete the whole line without a permit from the federal power commission. There is no explanation by the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the effect on the over-all plan if the federal power commission fails to give approval. He is delightfully vague when it comes to telling the house and the people just what is to be done if the federal power commission fails to grant a permit for import into the United States.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, control of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines remains in the head offices of these American companies, and primarily, of course, in the head office of Tennessee Gas. No real attempt has been made by the government to ensure Canadian control. When they were renegotiating or when they were making this contract which was signed a week ago today, one would have thought that they would have included some provision which would have made it certain that there would be absolute Canadian control of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. But there is nothing of that kind in the agreement. The minister himself has intimated he considered it hopeless; that there was no use trying to get terms of that kind included. No matter how the minister twists and turns he cannot get away from the fact, and none of his supporters can get away from the fact, that this Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is and will be dominated by United States oil and pipe line companies, and that the Canadian government is subsidizing them in the construction of a major national project at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer.

I conclude my remarks by this statement, and I make it after careful consideration. I believe that this measure now proposed by the government is the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people since confederation.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman, I rise to take part in this debate and being a member from Alberta I am vitally concerned with the issue which is before us now. We have had occasion tonight to listen to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys as well as the hon. member for Peace River, the Leader of the Social Credit party, and both of these gentlemen are Albertans. So far as Alberta is concerned, they have placed before you the hard facts of the urgent need for the export of gas from that province as soon as possible. Figures have been quoted, and I do not intend to repeat them now, but the fact is that Alberta sustains a loss every day because of the wastage of gas resulting from the lack of export. At the same time this lack hampers our industrial development.

There are many producers in the province of Alberta. We have individuals; we have small companies and larger companies; we have syndicates. We have Canadian companies and we have United States companies. But by far the greatest producers in Alberta are the people of that province. They are the ones who have the greatest stake in this issue. This debate so far has been very interesting and very hot at times. I feel it is the duty of the opposition not only to criticize, but if necessary to oppose government policy. But that is not enough. It is also their duty to offer not only an alternative but a better alternative.

What has happened on this issue? The hon. member for Eglinton has suggested that the Liberals and Social Crediters have formed an alliance. What about this strange alliance that has taken place in this house? We note that the free enterprising Tories and the socialist C.C.F.'ers have got together. We have heard of the grand alliance. We have heard of the holy alliance, but it seems to me that this is the most unholy alliance we have yet witnessed in this house. At least the C.C.F., though I disagree with what they have to offer, have come out with a policy which is consistent, that is of public ownership. I still would like to know what alternative the Tories have to ensure that, in the face of the facts before us, at least the prairie section of this pipe line will be commenced and completed this year. It appears clear to all of us that the only alternative they have to offer is delay, not only to embarrass the government but in my opinion to embarrass the people of Alberta.

Furthermore from the consumer point of view, Premier Frost has indicated the importance of getting gas into Ontario as soon as possible. Yesterday we had occasion to listen to the Leader of the Opposition who spoke for about two and a half hours but who has not given this house any alternative, nor has he mentioned one word regarding the stand taken by Premier Frost on this matter. After all the leader of the official opposition was at one time the premier of Ontario and certainly he must have the welfare of the people of Ontario at heart. But as one who aspires to become the Prime Minister of Canada, I think he should also have the welfare of the people of Alberta at heart. It is essential to Albertans that we have the export of gas as soon as possible.

Much has been said in this house, especially by the C.C.F. group, in favour of public ownership. The Leader of the C.C.F. party has challenged this government to call an election. I doubt if the Canadian people, in a matter of a few weeks, would change their views and come out in favour of public ownership. They have rejected it before, and certainly they would reject it now. I should like to quote the views of one authority on this matter of public ownership. He says:

> If the governments attempted to operate the line themselves they would face considerable difficulties. In the first place governments have no experience in gas pipe line operation and they would have to employ experienced operators, without being able to give them the incentive of ownership or part ownership of the line. Secondly, the governments would be in the position of having to balance the consumer and producer interests and there might be a division of opinion between the governments of gas-producing and gas-consuming provinces.

We have heard the hon. member for Peace River express his view and he has pointed out the difficulties in this respect.

> There are few objective standards by which it could be determined whether the producers were getting too much or too little for their gas on the one hand, or whether the consumers were paying too much or too little on the other.
> Even if the governments rented the line or turned over its management to some private organization, so long as they owned the line they could hardly escape some responsibility for the policies of the private organization. Therefore, any such arrangement with a private organization would probably only be satisfactory in the short run.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

This quotation is taken from a report to the treasurer of Ontario by Clarkson, Gordon and Company and known as the Glassco report. It seems to me that the essentials of a sound natural gas policy are, first of all, that the main pipe line run all the way through Canadian territory. To this policy, this government is dedicated. Secondly, in allocating gas, priority must be given to the needs of the Canadian consumer, whether it be for industrial or domestic use. The export of the gas must take second place, and again in this respect the government is dedicated to this policy.

The third essential is that it must be under effective Canadian control, and again in this respect the government is dedicated to this policy.

Some reference has been made to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway company and to some of the statements made by Sir John A. Macdonald. Of course, all Canadians have great admiration for Sir John A. Macdonald, but was it not necessary to give land grants to encourage the Canadian Pacific Railway to build?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, and they kept it Canadian.

Mr. Decore: With regard to effective Canadian control I would like to draw to the attention of the house a statement which appeared in the Financial Post Corporation Service, page 10, card dated September 23, 1955. It reveals that as of December, 1954, the combined stocks or the voting strength of shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway by countries was as follows: At that time Canada had 12·20 per cent; the United Kingdom and other British countries, 46·31 per cent; the United States—and note this—had 33·38 per cent or nearly three times as much as that of Canada; and other countries, 8·11 per cent.

I think these are very interesting figures. They show that the voting strength of the combined stocks held by Canadians was only 12·20 per cent; yet did this mean that the Canadian Pacific Railway company is not being effectively controlled by the people of Canada? Does it make the Canadian Pacific Railway company less Canadian than it should be? We Canadians feel that we can make sacrifices and I think we should be prepared to make them, to assure that this is an all-Canadian pipe line. Surely we could have taken the easy way out and allowed this pipe line to go south of the great lakes rather than north of them. In that event we would not have been called upon either to build the line ourselves through public ownership or to adopt the stand we now adopt. I say, let us be realistic.

[Mr. Decore.]

I do not think there is an hon. member in this house, including the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who feels the trans-Canada pipe line project is completely ideal; but as the Edmonton Journal of May 10, 1956, put it:

> Of all the schemes proposed for distributing Alberta natural gas, the trans-Canada pipe line project seems, in balance, the best. It is to be hoped that parliament will ratify it without undue delay, so that construction may commence this year.

I have read just the last paragraph of that editorial.

Much has been said during the course of this debate with reference to closure. The fact remains that before the Minister of Trade and Commerce even had a chance to speak to this resolution we had to undergo seven votes in this house. I think the opposition gave their notice of intention concerning what course they wished to follow; in other words, they asked for it.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke tonight about the freedom of debate I think we witnessed a bad example in his attempt to prevent the hon. member for Bow River having his 20 minutes which is allotted by the house. I think, Mr. Chairman, this is a fine example of a closure within a closure.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I did not try to detract from the 20 minutes of the hon. member for Bow River. I just did not want the time he caused the house to spend on the point of order to be taken from the rest of us, including my hon. friend from Vegreville.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman, the fact remains that nearly 20 minutes was taken by that argument, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did get up and say that time should be counted within the 20 minutes.

Mr. Knowles: Who was responsible for it?

Mr. Decore: In other words, you tried to prevent the hon. member from expressing his views within the 20 minutes allotted to him.

Mr. Fleming: Nonsense. The rules of the house have to be upheld.

Mr. Decore: Of course the same thing can be said with regard to what happened this afternoon when the Conservatives made an attempt to prevent the hon. member for Calgary South from speaking.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has made a statement which he must know is entirely untrue. There was no attempt made to stop any hon. member from speaking this afternoon. The time taken by the member for Calgary South was provided by the Liberal party out of the time allotted to it in debate and was not taken out of the Conservative opposition's time. It was all done by the Liberal whip.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, I think May 15 will be remembered as the date on which we witnessed democracy reach its lowest ebb in Canada since confederation.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It is the 16th.

Mr. Castleden: It will be a sad day only if it is forgotten. Today we witnessed the denial of the rights of the representatives of between one-third and one-half of the Canadian people to speak in parliament. Seldom in Canadian history has there been such a betrayal of Canadian rights and Canadian interests and never has democracy in this Canada of ours been so brutally set aside to perpetrate that betrayal.

Forty-five years ago the Canadian government, dealing with a matter of reciprocity between this country and the United States, after debate in this house took that question to the highest court of the Canadian people in the land, and therefore they voted as to whether or not Canada should carry on trade with the United States, whether there should be restrictions and a cutting down of tariffs for both countries to permit the free trade of goods. At that time the government believed the proper thing to do was to let the Canadian people decide the issue on those grounds.

Some 30 years ago the Liberal party applied closure in this house but it was only after there had been weeks of debate.

Yesterday we had notice given that closure was being applied in this house even before the resolution had been introduced by the minister who introduced it. What is this resolution? The Canadian people should know what this resolution contains. It calls for about five things. Under this resolution the Canadian government in co-operation with the Ontario government is building through a government corporation a pipe line from the Manitoba border to Kapuskasing which will cost the taxpayers about $113 million. After it is built it is to be handed over to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company with an option to buy it after a number of years. If it is a paying proposition, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines picks it up; if it is not, then the Canadian people can have it and pay for it.

On top of that, this resolution makes arrangements for the Canadian government to loan to Trans-Canada 90 per cent of the cost of constructing the pipe line from Alberta to a point near Winnipeg, a sum totalling between $70 and $80 million. There is a specific provision under the arrangement to be set up following the adoption of this resolution for a lead-off of 200 million cubic feet of natural gas per day from Manitoba at a point near Emerson. The corporation to be set up is to have the power to do such things.

In case the company defaults, the government is to take over the assets of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and operate the whole thing as a government enterprise. The government thus admits that there is a possibility that they may have to operate this as a crown corporation. In heaven's name, if they are building the eastern portion of the line and lending the company 90 per cent of the cost of building the western portion, they should take it over for the benefit of the Canadian people.

That is the indisputable argument which this government cannot escape. If Trans-Canada Pipe Lines wishes to build this line, then it should be allowed to operate it. If the government intends to build it and to provide the money for building it, then the government should operate it. This infamous resolution calls upon the Canadian people to lend the money to build it and then it is to be handed over lock, stock and barrel to United States interest.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce built the Polymer Corporation with Canadian money for the purpose of making artificial rubber during wartime. The government did not build the Polymer Corporation and then hand it over to the Canadian rubber companies. If they had done so the Canadian people would have objected. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not build up a fine Trans-Canada Air Lines and then hand it over to Canadian Pacific Air Lines. The Canadian people would have objected strenuously if he had done so.

What do the Canadian people think of this proposition? We are going to practically build this line and then hand it over to United States interests, the big world oil combine boys from Texas who own and control such vast quantities of the world's supplies of oil. Canada is to help them out.

Who is this fine favoured friend called Trans-Canada Pipe Lines? I had hoped that the hon. member for Vegreville would have told us something about them in his introduction of the bill to establish Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in 1951. At that time he told the house that this was to be an all-Canadian company, it was to build an all-Canadian pipe line and there would be 100 per cent consumption of gas by Canadian consumers. That was the commitment made to the house, that was the commitment made to the committee which listened to the representatives who came here to tell us what a great company it was.

They brought in their men of money from New York who said that money would offer no difficulty at all. They had the engineers who had engineering know-how. They told us that there were difficulties and they told us how they could overcome them with their know-how. They had the money and all they wanted was the opportunity to provide this great service to Canadians. They assured the committee and they assured this parliament that they did not want to have anything to do with it unless it was to be an all-Canadian pipe line with all-Canadian consumption. That is a very vital point.

Something happened after they were granted their charter in 1951. This company fell under the control of a number of large United States oil and gas companies. A return tabled in the house a short time ago gave the details of the ownership of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. Some very revealing facts were given. Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, part of a large United States company, holds 327,000 shares of stock. Canadian Gulf Oil Company of Calgary, Alberta, part of a parent company in the United States, owns 327,000 shares. Tennessee Gas Transmission Company of Houston, Texas, owns 327,000 shares of stock. Canadian Delhi Oil Company Limited of Calgary, part of a parent organization in the United States, owns 497,000 shares of stock. International Utilities Corporation, 44 Wall Street, New York, New York, owns 127,000 shares. Those are the blocks over 100,000 shares. N. E. Tanner, who I believe was formerly minister of natural resources in the Social Credit government of Alberta, holds two shares, and Sarah I. Tanner, Calgary, Alberta, owns 9,999 shares.

The thing I want to point out to this house and to the people of Canada is that when this company came under the control of United States oil companies every promise they made to the parliament of Canada was violated. They no longer said that this was to be an all-Canadian proposition. They said, "You get no gas in eastern Canada unless you arrange to have a lead-off in Manitoba to supply 200 million cubic feet of gas per day to the United States of America."

When they did that they violated their contract and their word to this parliament. They should have been repudiated at that point. But no, this company which had gold-bricked this parliament, which had deceived the Canadian people and their representatives in this house, instead of being repudiated were met with open hands and offered even more. What noble achievements has this company performed that it should be selected as the favourite son of the Canadian government to be granted these special privileges? What noble record of integrity and of honour has this company that it deserves such gifts? What foreign prince has come to our midst that we should take a natural resource of this country and hand it over? Why should a private corporation receive these gifts and have control over a great natural resource of this country?

I ask you to think carefully over what is going to be the ultimate result of the handing over of the control of our gas to this company. What is it going to mean? It will mean ultimately that the Canadian consumer of gas in eastern Canada will pay the price dictated by these people, while the United States consumer will get it at their price. Canadian gas will be sold to the Canadian people at a price which the United States people dictate. They will be able to give their own industry a favoured price. How can Canadian industry compete when the whole thing is stacked against them in that way?

We in Canada are asked to submit to this. This is being forced upon us. Excuses have been made. The stand of this party is quite clear. There is only one honourable thing to do and that is to operate this natural resource as a crown corporation so that any profits accruing shall not go down to the large gas and oil companies but will be paid back to the Canadian people. In heaven's name, by what right should a great natural resource of this country be handed over to foreign industrial, gas and oil magnates? Is there any excuse for it? How can this government excuse its actions in handing this over to United States private enterprise?

That is what we are being asked to do. Opposition members who dare to raise their voices in opposition are told that at one o'clock closure will be applied and whether or not we want to speak the resolution stage will be passed. No wonder we rise in protest. This company, which violated its promises to this parliament, which broke its word, is now handed some more privileges. It did not get its pipe line built in 1951 or 1952, and it did not get it started in 1953. It violated its contract. The Canadian government, through the board of transport commissioners, granted it an extension of time. When it lost its nationality and became a United States concern, further extensions were granted. It has not built one foot of pipe line in five years. The government says it has to apply closure to get this through because it has made a contract to get the money out to these American people by June 7. If we endorsed this, we would be betraying the trust of the Canadian people. This is not only a betrayal; this is an insult to the Canadian people, and it is our duty to protest against it with everything we have.

On March 15, the ides of March, the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought in a resolution to this house proposing only the setting up of the crown corporation to build the eastern portion of this line. It created such a storm of protest that the government dared not bring the matter back into the house. From March 15 until the other day, nothing was heard about the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. Now they have bunched together a proposition under which we shall build the eastern portion of the line together with the western portion of the line and they say, "Boys, get it through by June 7", when the caucus was called last Tuesday, and the committees of this house were called off in order that it could meet. Then they came back into this house. Apparently the Minister of Trade and Commerce had sold the cabinet a bill of goods and the cabinet told the members what could be done and that they had to toe the line to a man. I appeal to those members to think over their responsibility to the Canadian people.

They have sat here for 20 years with some of the largest majorities that the Canadian people ever gave to a government of Canada. Did the people who elected them say, "You can govern as you wish and give away the natural resources of Canada to a United States pipe line company. If you cannot get the bill through, apply closure." Is this the way you are to treat a democracy? It is colossal nerve. That is the only way in which we can describe the attitude of a government that would ask parliament to pass such a bill in the face of all the facts, a bill to pay for 96 per cent of the Canadian pipe line. To hand over control of a great asset, when you know you can operate it as a crown corporation, is nothing but an affront to the parliament of Canada. We would be traitors to Canada if we were silent. We would be traitors to the cause of democracy if we did not raise our voices in protest. We shall continue to raise them in protest throughout this whole debate.

Canadians for generations are being sold out today. What about the people of tomorrow? What about these great resources of western Canada and their value to the whole Canadian economy? What about the industries along this line that will be called upon from this day on to compete with United States industries? How can Canadian industry compete? This is a sell-out of Canadian interests such as Canada has never seen before.

That would be bad enough but, when the Prime Minister and his cabinet lay their oil-soaked hands on the altar of democracy and defile it by closing off the opposition, the people of Canada will remember. For the second time in 89 years of confederation, the banner of liberalism has been dirtied with the stain of dictatorship. Today we are witnessing a portion of democracy dying. Today this government is betraying those who sent them here in trust with our resources and in trust with the sacred Canadian democracy.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Thomas: If the gas that has been spread around here by the Tories and the C.C.F. were volatile, we would not need any importation into Ontario for the next ten years. Unfortunately, it is empty, it has no effect and no power.

A short time ago, when speaking, the hon. member for Vegreville said that he could not understand why the official opposition should join with the C.C.F. in this union. I think I can tell him why. The Tories have been looking around for a good long time, because of their lack of any basic policy, for something with which to jump on the government, and they thought this was it. In their blind groping, they found themselves attached to the dusty pink shirt-tails of the C.C.F. party, and they are stuck with it.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe was talking about marriages a few moments ago. I want to tell him that the results of this union at least are that it is going to bear fruit that will be for the benefit of all the people of Canada. I am glad that he admits we are young enough to have a honeymoon. At least we are not in the decrepit position of the official opposition. Whether they know it or not, they are in a rut, and the only difference between a rut and the grave is the dimensions.

The main reason why I am rising tonight arises out of a television broadcast seen on Monday night that was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, in which he discussed this question. I have never seen a program more shot through with half-truths, misrepresentations and falsehoods. It is the type of thing that could produce disastrous results if the people of Canada were to pay any attention, and thank goodness they will not. In this broadcast, as well as on the floor of the house, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that this $80 million was a payment for the building of the trans-Canada pipe line section between Edmonton and Winnipeg. He did not tell the people it was a loan at 5 per cent and that it would be repayable in nine months. He did not say either that 5 per cent interest on a $80 million loan was a very high return indeed; and it is a very good investment.

Mr. Wylie: I doubt if he could even figure that.

Mr. Thomas: He spoke too, as did the Leader of the Opposition, about 83·4 per cent of the capitalization belonging to United States concerns. That may be true at the moment but that has absolutely nothing to do with the final figures when the final capitalization has been put through.

An hon. Member: Then it may be 100 per cent.

Mr. Thomas: We have the assurance that 51 per cent of the stock will be made available to the Canadian people, and if the government is willing to accept the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Bow River this morning we will have absolute control of the stock in Canada.

Mr. Ellis: Wishful thinking.

Mr. Thomas: As far as controls are concerned—

Mr. Pallett: More of that funny money, I guess.

Mr. Thomas: —many times during this debate the controls have been indicated to the house, federal export permits, export permits from Alberta and permits from the board of transport commissioners. The arguments that are being put forward in the house about selling out to United States capital, the same arguments as were used the other night by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on a television program, are absolutely at variance with the facts. I remember very well that earlier this session the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar set himself up as the champion of free speech in this country. I want to remind the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that when you have freedom you have certain responsibilities as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thomas: One of the most important responsibilities that anyone has is that of truth, and the minute that anyone, a member of the House of Commons or anyone else, steps over that line he has gone beyond freedom and into licence. I have absolutely no use for that type of thing at all.

An hon. Member: He always tells the truth.

[Mr. Thomas.]

Mr. Ellis: His reputation is far better than yours.

Mr. Thomas: No man, Mr. Chairman, has a right to hand the Canadian people the type of tripe that was handed to them on that television program the other night.

Mr. Ellis: It is true, nevertheless.

Mr. Blackmore: It is not true, not a word.

Mr. Thomas: I can understand why the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the other members of the C.C.F. party are so absolutely opposed to this measure. It is because they are absolutely opposed to private ownership of any kind.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Thomas: All you have to do is to read the last paragraph of the Regina manifesto.

An hon. Member: You read it.

Mr. Ellis: Have you ever read it yourself?

Mr. Thomas: You will get that later, too. This idea of public ownership of a line such as this is absolutely impractical. As pointed out by the hon. member for Peace River tonight —

Mr. Ellis: And by the Liberals.

Mr. Thomas: —under such a condition the government would be caught in a price squeeze between the producer and the consumer and it would become the greatest political plaything this country has ever had. Every political party in the country would be out campaigning for higher prices at the wellhead in Alberta and cheaper gas in the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. No self-respecting government would ever allow itself to be put in a position where it would be forced into that kind of situation.

Mr. Ellis: You are defending the American gas companies.

Mr. Thomas: The C.C.F. have mentioned several times during this debate, as have the Tories, that if the government cancels the franchise of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines all the government has to do is to form a crown company and pick up the option on the pipe. That is not correct.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Thomas: Because if Trans-Canada Pipe Lines forfeit their option the manufacturing company can go to any part of the world and sell the pipe to any company, and we have no guarantee that it will come to Canada.

An hon. Member: They do not understand that.

Mr. Wylie: We will put it down in writing for them.

Mr. Blackmore: And hire a teacher for them.

Mr. Thomas: Having said that, apparently I have made some enemies on this side of the house but I am not finished because the government itself is not without blame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thomas: It is as a result of their fumbling, bumbling and lack of decision that the present step was made necessary.

Mr. Ellis: No applause now.

An hon. Member: We can take it as well as hand it out.

Mr. Thomas: If we had allowed Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to go ahead without any interference during the last four years we would have had the pipe line built now, built by private capital all the way through and without any trouble at all for the government. We have to realize that because of this fumbling and indecision the government have taken the only action they could have taken under the circumstances. I would not be surprised but what one of the greatest causes of indecision within the government was the attitude of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I say that because he has attempted all through the years to squash anything that would bring any credit to the Social Credit government of Alberta. It is quite possible that by his arguments he led some of the junior members of the cabinet to go along with him.

We also know that over the years it has been the expressed policy of the Liberal party in the province of Alberta that there will be no export of natural resources. They have opposed the export of coal, the export of oil, the export of gas. Now the whole thing has come down to the present situation. The government has made a mess of things. They have made it impossible for the company to get private financing. Now the government is in a hurry and it is imperative that this project should be commenced immediately. I want to point out to hon. members that for every week the line is being held up 1 billion cubic feet of gas are going to waste in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Nesbitt: Why do you not build it with rubber money?

Mr. Thomas: This is gas that should be used for the welfare of the Canadian people. I can assure hon. members of the Tory and C.C.F. parties that the holding up of the legislation will result in the loss of millions of dollars to the province of Alberta and the people of Alberta, is going to result in the loss of the availability of millions of cubic feet of gas to the people of Ontario and Quebec and is going to mean irreparable damage to the entire economy of this country.

An hon. Member: Who held it up for the last five years?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Be calm now.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Do not lose your temper.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I think this must be one of the strangest enterprises on which this parliament has ever been asked to embark. We are asked to bail out an American controlled company which has among its shareholders some of the richest oil companies in the country. We are asked to bail them out because they have failed repeatedly in carrying out what they proposed to be able to carry out and we are asked to allow them to use the money of the Canadian people with which to speculate. It is a question of heads I win, tails you lose. They can use this money and if things turn out well for them, then they can go ahead and make further money with it. But if things do not turn out well for them, they hand it back to us. That is one feature of this strange proceeding.

The second one is this. In order to carry it out, this democratic assembly is faced with a situation with which it has never been faced before, that is to say closure applied in the way which has been discussed. It is another instance—with which we are becoming all too familiar—of the disregard of parliament. As I watched yesterday, I noted some of the people who were applauding closure. I think some of them were people whom, not so long ago, I would have regarded as real liberals. I do not mean Liberals with a capital "L". I mean real liberals. Yet yesterday they were vigorously applauding closure. It made me realize what I have often realized before, but perhaps never more than tonight, namely what happens when we go on as we have been going on, year after year and when the rights of parliament are disregarded.

The situation is similar to that which confronted us a year ago. A year ago we had a situation where the Minister of Defence Production at that time was determined to have his way, his whole way and nothing but his way. That is what kept us here for nearly a month last summer. We now have a situation different in some ways but in other ways very much similar indeed. A year ago the difficulty was overcome. The government apparently got itself out of the impasse by getting the minister to go on a fishing trip. Now the fishing season has again arrived and it may be that the government could get itself out of this jam because I think it is quite possible that members of the government do not like what they have been forced into doing. At any rate, it is possible that the fishing season again might help us out of our trouble.

A year ago we thought we really had learned the ultimate on the question of the disregard of parliament. But a year ago we did not have this situation. A year ago we were allowed to debate at considerable length in what Liberals like to regard as liberal tradition. Reference has been made to the former prime minister. Let me give him full credit because in all his years here he never applied closure. He was a House of Commons man. However much we may have differed with him in many ways, we knew that he had a regard for parliament. He might almost have said, like Churchill, that he was a child of parliament.

As I said, the question now is in one way astonishingly similar to what it was a year ago. It is a question of power for this minister whose work is respected in many ways but who, as somebody said tonight, should never be allowed within a thousand miles of a democratic assembly on certain occasions, and I think that is probably right. There is this difference between last year and this year. Last year the minister at least allowed us to know what was going on. There was no mystery about it. There was no mumbo-jumbo. There was nothing behind the curtain. But of course this year we have had a most extraordinary situation—a situation which one would not have believed could have happened—where the minister has carried on the business of the country in his inside pocket, where he has had certain documents. I should not call them documents. They were said not to be documents. They were just letters. It is a very interesting distinction that is made. When the minister was asked if he had documents, he said no. But when he was asked if he had letters—That was a little bit too hard for him, and he said "yes, but not such as you can see". So we learned there, as I say, that documents are not letters. I have asked my lawyer friends and I doubt very much whether the minister could get an opinion on that point.

At any rate, after many months of indecision—and let us remember that—and of considering various proposals—the government a week ago brought down this measure. They had, we understand, spent months in considering it. There was plenty of gossip —and I think it was probably well informed —that there had been grave difference in the cabinet. At any rate the thing went on for months and there was delay and delay as I have said. But there was one place where there was no delay. Once it got beyond the cabinet and into the caucus, there was no delay there. It took them only an hour or two to swallow the whole thing. Theirs not to reason why. It would be interesting if we could get an account of what took place in that caucus just as it would be interesting if we could get an account of the conversation between the minister and Mr. Frank McMahon, but we probably never will.

Mr. Sinclair: Or between Premier Frost. That would be very interesting.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister is always very helpful and I am very grateful to him now.

Mr. Sinclair: Have you consulted Premier Frost as well, and Premier Manning, your Tory colleague in Alberta? That is much more interesting.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the minister still speaking?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister is still standing?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes. I am asking a question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is asking a question. I should like to ask—

Mr. Rowe: He has only 10 minutes to go. Let him continue.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Greenwood, who has the floor, cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member for Greenwood has only 10 minutes to go.

Mr. Sinclair: I rise on a point of order. I should like to ask you to ask the hon. member for Greenwood—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If the Minister of Fisheries is not rising on a question of order or privilege, the hon. member for Greenwood may continue.

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not know what happened in this caucus—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Is the Minister of Fisheries rising on a point of order?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Then he will state the point of order.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to ask the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Sinclair: I have a good point of order.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to know whether the hon. gentleman is asking rhetorical questions or real questions. If they are real questions I will answer them.

Mr. Rowe: That is not a point of order. It is just an interruption.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If the committee of the whole will kindly keep order for 30 seconds, I will dispose of this matter. The minister has not raised a point of order. The hon. member for Greenwood will continue.

Mr. Macdonnell: You must not pay any attention to the Minister of Fisheries. He is just one of those Rhodes scholars.

Mr. Sinclair: I know that. I am asking whether these are real questions or rhetorical questions. If they are real questions, they will be answered. If they are rhetorical questions—

Mr. Rowe: It is too late now.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: Is this a real turtle or a mock turtle. If you are a Rhodes scholar, act like a Rhodes scholar.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was just making reference to the caucus which we all would have liked to be at.

Mr. Sinclair: You were asking questions which you do not want answered. You do not want any answers. You asked questions and you wanted some answered. If you want answers, ask me.

Mr. Fleming: Do you know anything about the rules over there?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: He is asking questions but he does not want answers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinclair: He would not know an answer even when he asked a question.

An hon. Member: Better apply closure on the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Macdonnell: Before the Minister of Fisheries began his speech I was trying to say something about the caucus.

Mr. Sinclair: You were asking questions and you did not want answers.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think we can all imagine what did happen there. After all, one can well believe that those gentlemen I see opposite and to my right did not need a long period of study to understand this question. They were able, in an hour, to grasp the whole thing. The argument was, "Good old C.D."; that was the argument. After all, the minister is the hero of 1,000 contracts and 100 caucuses. He carries great weight and even his private and confidential correspondence we hear about, even that no doubt had its place.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: As I said a few minutes ago we had difficulty last year, but the government did pluck up its courage when the minister went fishing, and perhaps he may go fishing again.

I want to say a word about closure. There is evidently quite a misunderstanding about closure in England. It has been stated it occurred 21 times in a session, and that may be true, but that is not this kind of thing. It is done by agreement. It is not done against the will of the opposition for the purpose of closing them off. This closure is used in that way. No one who saw the way closure was applied could doubt for one moment that it was applied as the absolute antithesis of the whole principle of free discussion. It was applied in, what shall I say, irritation, almost in anger and with the feeling, "We will show you; if you want to have discussion, we will show you it is not so easy to have discussion."

I can understand quite well why the government wanted closure. It does not need the minister's crystal ball to know that. The reason they want closure is that they do not want disclosure. The last thing in the world they want is time to be given so the people can understand what this is about. They remember what happened a year ago. They remember that when the press got hold of what was happening, which they did not do quite as quickly as they have done this year, the government had to slow up and we got a measure of concession. That is the last thing in the world they want. Mr. Chairman, I believe they can read and when they do read they will know what the press is saying.

Mr. Sinclair: That is what my learned friend is doing, he is reading.

Mr. Macdonnell: The whole idea—

Mr. Sinclair: He wanted parliamentarians, not readers.

The Chairman: Order. It is impossible for me, even at this short distance, to hear the hon. member and I am sure it must be more difficult in other parts of the chamber. I wonder if we could have less noise.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Sinclair: It must be very obvious, Mr. Chairman, with his manuscript in his hand, that he is reading.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: No wonder you fell off the ladder.

The Chairman: Order. In parliamentary debate, the hon. member must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I hope these interruptions will be taken off my time.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: I also have a complaint because I was really getting on quite well until this began.

Mr. Sinclair: Put your manuscript down and speak from your heart. You have had an expensive education and you should be able to speak from your heart.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I want to say—

Some hon. Members: It is one o'clock.

The Chairman: I hear some hon. members saying, "One o'clock". May I draw their attention to citation 227 in Beauchesne's third edition, and to the new time in standing order 33 which is advanced from two o'clock to one o'clock. The citation reads:

> If a member has taken the floor at 1.55 o'clock, he is entitled to speak for 20 minutes, but no member "shall rise to speak" after two o'clock.

The hon. member for Greenwood took the floor at 12.43 and his 20 minutes would accordingly have expired at 1.03. Thereafter, in accordance with standing order 33, the question shall be put and no other member shall rise. I am taking it for granted that I have taken a minute or a minute and a half of the hon. member's time, and I propose to remind him that his time will expire at 1.05.

Mr. Macdonnell: Now, Mr. Chairman, after all this I have just one other point I should like to make. I have tried to make clear the curious manner in which this business was done and I should like to read here a question and answer addressed to the Prime Minister which gives me a picture of the action of the cabinet. It is very delightful but rather confusing. On page 3482 of Hansard for May 2, 1956, the hon. member for Prince Albert asked this question:

> Will the Prime Minister table the offer of Frank McMahon and his associates. If the offer is confidential, will he ask McMahon to release the confidentiality so the terms of the offer may be brought before the house?

The Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, I have seen no offer from Mr. Frank McMahon. I will have to inquire from my colleagues if they individually have received a confidential offer. No offer has been brought to the attention of the cabinet.

I mention that because it gives me a curious picture of the Prime Minister going to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and saying, "Have you got a confidential letter?" No. The Minister of External Affairs? No. The Minister of Finance? No. And so he proceeds right across the cabinet. It is a picture that I like to think about but the point I want to make is this. The Leader of the Opposition has been asking for months to have a committee. Why did he want that? So that we might have some knowledge about this, independent knowledge, knowledge from experts. At the present time, we are asked to take a whole lot of unsupported statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now, I have a great respect for the Minister of Trade and Commerce apart from his views on democracy, but I do not think we should be asked to take his or anybody else's unsupported views on these important matters. First of all, we are asked to take his view that Trans-Canada are the only people who can do this. That is not an open and shut proposition. I have heard arguments which would drive a coach and six through that. The facts are not as clear as the minister would indicate. After all, Trans-Canada has gone from one position to another. First of all they were going to build the whole thing. Then the question of the northern Ontario bridge came up; they wanted that and finally they wanted to have the western line built for them too.

As far as the committee is concerned, I suggest there is a whole series of what are now questions which should be turned into matters of fact. For instance, what will be the cost to the eastern consumer? I notice in one of the papers a positive statement that the cost to the eastern consumer will be higher. The next is the statements with regard to McMahon. After all, the minister has made him sound like a fly-by-night, a thing which he is not. He has been represented as if he were a kind of trivial creature that one should not consider seriously. His letters certainly do not suggest that. There are other things, too, which in my opinion should not be dealt with by this house until they become proved matters of fact. I think it is perfectly clear that the Liberal caucus dealt with this whole matter in the most casual manner because they only had it before them for about an hour.

Some hon. Members: We want Sinclair. We want Sinclair.

Mr. Macdonnell: My very last point is this. I should like to draw to the attention of the committee one or two opinions expressed in the press. We are not alone in this; indeed, it is heartening to us to realize the extent to which public opinion seems to be with us.

Mr. Sinclair: It only seems to be, for the first time in 40 years.

Mr. Macdonnell: In fact, it is rather astonishing.

Some hon. Members: We want Sinclair.

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall read some brief expressions of opinion that were quoted in the Toronto Globe and Mail today.

Some hon. Members: Time.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

According to the latter part of standing order 33, which I shall read:

> ...and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

The question to be decided is the following one:

> Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation to be known as the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for the purposes—

Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is it unanimously agreed that I dispense with the reading of the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hees: Never.

The Chairman: Those in favour of the resolution will kindly rise.

Resolution agreed to: Yeas, 156; nays, 58.

The Chairman: I declare the resolution carried.

Shall I rise and report the resolution?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution is carried, there are a few observations I should like to make.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Rowe: He is rising on a point of order.

The Chairman: Under standing order 33 may I point out that all questions must be decided at the expiration of the time of the last speaker at one o'clock and the only thing I can do is to put all questions to decide this matter. If the hon. member wishes me to, I will put the next question which is moved by Mr. Harris that I do now leave the chair and report the resolution with respect to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, now on a point of order—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, does Your Honour—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I wish to explain my vote—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak to my pair—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am speaking to a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Gauthier (Nickel Belt): Take your point of order home.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Fulton: No question of privilege is allowed at this stage.

The Chairman: I am entirely governed by the provisions of standing order 33, the last part of which I will read once more:

> ...and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

I have already put one question. I now propose to put the second question which is—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I have been paired.

Some hon. Members: He was paired in his vote.

Some hon. Members: A pair.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South and I inadvertently rose and voted. I would ask you to withdraw that vote because I have a pair with the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

The Chairman: I regret very much that it is impossible for me to order that the vote be withdrawn but your remarks will appear in Hansard.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, do I understand Your Honour to rule that no hon. member can take the floor after one o'clock?

The Chairman: That is the ruling I have made.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I submit that it is not—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order. I have already ruled that I am bound by standing order 33. I must put this question immediately.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, I submit—

An hon. Member: There is no point of order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I submit that Your Honour has no right—

The Chairman: The hon. member must resume his seat while I am standing.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Chairman: The terms of the standing order are perfectly clear, that no member shall rise to speak after that hour but that all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall be decided forthwith. I have put a question and I now propose to put a second question:

Mr. Harris moves that I do now leave the chair and report the resolution with respect to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Fulton: The minister cannot make that motion because you have already ruled that no one can speak after one o'clock. I now desire to speak to a point of order and I insist upon my right to speak.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order. The hon member will kindly resume his seat while—

Mr. Fulton: I insist upon my right to speak to the point of order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Another gag.

Mr. Drew: Another form of closure.

Mr. Rowe: Can a member not speak to a point of order?

The Chairman: I have already expressed myself on three occasions. I think the standing order is perfectly clear, and I read again from the standing order:

...but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

It is not a question of one member or another speaking after one o'clock, it is a question of deciding those matters which must be concluded in accordance with the standing order. I propose to put the question immediately.

Mr. Fulton: I protest; I demand the right to speak on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I am not to be bulldozed by the Chairman as this house is being bulldozed by the government. If Your Honour will look at the record of past years he will see that many points of order have been raised at the stage at which I am raising this one. I demand the right to be heard.

The Chairman: If necessary I shall direct the hon. member to resume his seat.

Mr. Fulton: You may do so, but I refuse to be bulldozed.

The Chairman: I direct the hon. member to resume his seat.

Mr. Fulton: I submit—

The Chairman: If the hon. member will not resume his seat I must report the matter to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: I will make one more endeavour—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I will make one more endeavour to reason with Your Honour. I wish to be heard on the point of order. You may say that the minister has moved a question but I wish to be heard on a point of order before the question is put. Your Honour should permit me to put the point of order before the question is put. The point of order is this—

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Order. I indicated that I was bound by the terms of the standing order and that I proposed to put the second question. I can do nothing else if the hon. member—

Mr. Fulton: May I point out to Your Honour—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: May I point out to Your Honour—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Fulton: It has been permitted on previous occasions—

The Chairman: I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. If the hon. member does not do so I must report to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: May I point out—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Fulton: —that points of order have been permitted at this stage.

The Chairman: Order. I am reducing the question to writing in order to report to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rowe: Another closure.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: I am in the course of reporting this matter to Mr. Speaker and until that is done I have no further—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon when you were—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: This is more disgraceful than closure.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The hon. member will kindly resume his seat while—

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon when you were at this same stage you accepted advice from the Minister of Finance. Why is it you accept advice from the Minister of Finance and you will not accept advice from this side?

An hon. Member: The majority are on this side.

An hon. Member: The majority rules.

The Chairman: Order.

And Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair:

Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, in committee of the whole when considering the resolution with respect to Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation Mr. Fulton attempted to raise a point of order and I ruled that in accordance with the provisions of standing order 33 no member shall rise after one o'clock a.m. I directed the hon. member to resume his seat; I did so after putting the question with regard to concurrence in the resolution and immediately prior to attempting to put the question that I do leave the chair, and the hon. member declined to do so.

An hon. Member: He rose on a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: I think it should be pointed out that I rose on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops realizes of course that I must take the report from the chairman as I received it.

Mr. Fulton: I object to the report; the report does not accurately state the facts.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wish to place before you the fact that the report is not an accurate report—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: And that Your Honour on a point of order should hear the hon. member for Kamloops state exactly what did happen.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order. My point of order is based on standing order 6(3) which deals with the time of adjournment. It is now well after ten o'clock, and this house under your speakership cannot continue to sit without unanimous consent. You have no option but to adjourn the house.

Mr. Speaker: I can see that hon. members have had a very good day, and so did I. Now the hon. member claims that I cannot even resume the chair.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: Having resumed the chair you must adjourn the house.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has cited a standing order but I would have preferred to have him cite standing order 6(4) which reads:

(4) When it is provided in any standing order that the business under consideration at the ordinary time of adjournment be forthwith disposed of or concluded, Mr. Speaker shall not adjourn the house until the specified proceedings be completed.

Mr. Knowles: Is there any standing order that specifies that the matter raised by the report from the chairman—

Mr. Speaker: At this moment I am not going to be called upon to decide a matter which must be dealt with in committee of the whole. Standing order 59(4) says:

The chairman shall maintain order in the committees of the whole house, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the house; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the house, on receiving a report thereof.

Now this is the situation in which I appear in the chair at the moment. I have received a report from the chairman of the committee of the whole in which he said:

In committee of the whole, when considering the resolution with respect to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. Fulton attempted to raise a point of order.

The chairman ruled that in accordance with the provisions of standing order 33 no member shall rise after one o'clock a.m. and directed the hon. member to resume his seat. Mr. Fulton declined to do so.

That is the end of the statement that I received from the chairman.

Mr. Fulton: Now, Mr. Speaker— —

Mr. Speaker: I know that the hon. member does not accept the report as being an accurate one, but I have no knowledge of what goes on in committee. I have no control over the committee of the whole. The house in committee of the whole controls its own affairs. The chairman directs order according to standing order 59. By virtue of standing order 59 (4) he reports that this disorder has happened in committee, and that can only be dealt with by the house. I am only the pipe line through which this report is presented to the house. It is up to the house to deal with it.

An hon. Member: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. Speaker: What am I going to do about it? If the hon. member looked at the authorities he would see that once a report has been submitted to the house it is up to the house itself to do whatever it pleases with the report. In these instances may I suggest that the leader of the house has a part to play?

Mr. Fulton: I rise on a point of order. I know that although this matter has been raised before, it has not been dealt with before and it has not been disposed of. I have read the debates on closure and the proceedings thereunder since 1913, and though the point has been raised before—

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I know. The hon. member now is trying to debate before me the matter which he attempted to debate before the chairman of the committee of the whole.

Mr. Fulton: No, I am dealing with the question of an inaccurate report, and what I am saying here is that so far as I am aware at this stage of the proceedings there has been no decision on the question of what happens when a report alleged to have been inaccurate is presented from the chair under circumstances such as this. My point of order now is that Your Honour, before you say, "The house has received the report", should give the member who is the subject of the report, an opportunity to state the facts as they actually occurred when an allegation is made, as has been made in this case, that a report is inaccurate, and I request the right to state to the house what the facts were—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says there were instances of a report having been corrected. Would he be good enough to give me the citation of whatever authority he has for that statement?

Mr. Fulton: I do not say that, but I refer to the debates of 1913—I think it is. It was one of the occasions when closure was moved in committee, and a point of order having been raised, members of the committee objected and said to the Speaker, "You are receiving an inaccurate report", and the Speaker did not deal with the question.

Mr. Speaker: What is the instance? I am quite prepared to do the very best that can be done in the circumstances.

Mr. Fulton: I refer to page 9590 of Hansard for 1912-13, in which it was stated by a number of members then sitting on this side of the house that the report was a false report, and that question was simply not dealt with by the Speaker. I claim the point should be dealt with and the member who is the object or subject of the report should be given an opportunity to state what the facts were.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, you were kind enough to suggest that I might have some responsibility in this matter, and I accept that, having in mind the fact that it is now 1.30.

An hon. Member: Do you want to go?

Mr. Harris: I am quite prepared to stay as long as the hon. member. It seems to me that the chairman of the committee of the whole was called upon by the hon. member for Kamloops to consider a point of order which the chairman did not feel he could entertain, having in mind the wording of the rule.

Once again, I do not question at all the decision or the judgment of the chairman of the committee of the whole, but I am sure that we would save time if we heard the point of order in the committee rather than before Mr. Speaker in the house and that then, if the point of order is well taken, there might or might not be an appeal to you, sir. If there is no appeal we could dispose of the question in the committee of the whole and sooner or later we could come to the conclusion of whatever we are doing.

On the other hand, if there is a report made to Your Honour, as there has been, and Your Honour feels that the matter rests with the house, we might take a considerable time discussing the report. If my hon. friend's point would be met by reverting to the position as it was in the committee of the whole, so that the point of order might be made and a ruling made on it, then I presume he would be content. Whether or not this point was accepted would really make no difference in the long run, because he would have the right to appeal to Your Honour in the circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: Is that satisfactory to the hon. member?

Mr. Fulton: I was desirous of making a point of order in the committee—in my submission, a valid point of order. Naturally I am prepared to make that point of order in the committee. All I can suggest is that, if the leader of the house would restrain his colleagues in the cabinet as well as in the house, these difficulties would not arise—and I am perfectly prepared to go on in committee.

Mr. Speaker: If the house is so disposed as to deal with the report that has been made to it through me in the fashion that has been indicated by the Minister of Finance and agreed to by the hon. member for Kamloops, all that the house can do now is to resume forthwith the sitting in committee of the whole.

And the house having resumed in committee:

The Chairman: Hon. members will realize that this procedure is somewhat new. I have drawn hon. members' attention to the latter part of standing order 33, which I shall read once more:

> ...and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

I had put one of the questions which must be decided, being the resolution itself. Then I put the other question. I asked if it were agreed that I should leave the chair to report the resolution, and some hon. members said no, as I understood it. I therefore proceeded to put the other question which must be decided in accordance with standing order 33. That question is the following one, that I do now leave the chair and report the resolution with respect to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

I considered and I still consider that I am bound by the strict terms of the standing order in putting the two questions at this time. On the other hand, as I said, it is a new question and I have in effect received instructions from the house. Therefore, I will be glad to hear the hon. member for Kamloops on the point of order, but since, after all, I must actually decide these points without debate, I hope he will confine his remarks to the problem as I have outlined it and what I think is the crux of the problem.

Mr. Fulton: I accept your terms of reference subject to one amendment, and that is that you will decide it without debate, but I hope you will listen to debate before you decide it. My point of order relates directly to the last words of standing order 33 under which you have said that you and the committee are now operating. These words are:

> ...and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall be decided forthwith.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

In my submission the postponed consideration which was before us was the question which Your Honour said was the question before the committee, and I took down your words. You said, "The question to be decided is the following one" and you then put the question on the resolution.

The Chairman: May I interject at that point? Some months ago we had a discussion here one day when hon. members entered the committee while voting was taking place. I indicated at that time that with respect to future votes in committee I would preface the question by saying, "The question is the following one", and if you will read Hansard you will find that I said that at that point hon. members would then no longer have the right to enter the chamber and vote. It was not that I indicated that there was only one question or that I wished to indicate that there was only one question to be decided. It was following a precedent which I thought I had established some months ago.

Mr. Fulton: In my submission there is, of course, only one question before this committee at the time when closure was moved and that question was: Does the committee approve or disapprove the proposed resolution? The motion to report is a separate motion and it was not before the committee when closure was moved. You cannot have two questions before the committee at the same time. There was no amendment moved and in the absence of an amendment how could it possibly be argued that there were two questions before this committee?

There was one question for decision. Upon the result of that decision depended another question. If the resolution had been defeated the question you now propose to put would not have arisen. If the resolution had been defeated you would not be suggesting or inviting a motion to report because there would be nothing to report. Therefore, the whole question with regard to the report of the committee is an entirely separate question from the question on the resolution itself, and that question was not before the committee. The matter or reporting was not and could not have been before the committee when closure was moved.

It is well established and well understood that the terms of the closure motion apply only to the question for consideration, debate on which is to be resumed at the time when the closure motion itself is moved. I point out to you that the notice given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday afternoon at the beginning of the debate certainly did not include the question of the report of the committee. It included only the resolution then before the committee.

May I point out to Your Honour, who, I see, is receiving considerable advice, that my second point follows from the first and is to this effect, that it is not open, as you yourself have ruled, to any hon. member to rise and speak after one o'clock unless that member happens to have taken the floor a few minutes before one and carries over after one. But after that member has spoken it is not open to any hon. member to take the floor.

A little earlier, before we had what I may call the misunderstanding which resulted in the Speaker resuming the chair, you put the question which you proposed to move in these terms: "Mr. Harris moves that I report the resolution". Of course, it takes a motion by an hon. member that you report the resolution. My second point therefore is that it not being in order for any member to take the floor, as you made very clear to me, it is not possible for the Minister of Finance to take the floor to speak in order to say: "I move that you report the resolution".

You may argue, sir, anybody over there may argue, and I am quite prepared to meet the argument, that in that case there is a flaw in the drafting of the closure rule. I am quite prepared to accept that. This point that I am raising has never been raised before and therefore it has never been dealt with before. It has never been disposed of before.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no other way of getting out of committee.

Mr. Fulton: I am putting it to you as a proposition which requires a decision at the present time. It is made clear in Beauchesne that the report of the chairman to the house cannot be based otherwise than on a motion to report. Therefore, I say that the motion to report cannot be made at this stage and the motion to report is not the question which was before the committee when closure was moved because it is a motion which depends entirely on the decision of the other question, that is, do we favour or do we oppose the resolution? Therefore, the motion to report is not one of those motions which must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration. The only postponed consideration was the resolution itself.

Therefore, I state that you are not in a position to make any report at this time to the house even if the house were in a position to sit and receive it, which I question, but your report must be made at some later stage, probably at tomorrow's sitting.

The Chairman: I have listened with care to the hon. member for Kamloops and I must draw his attention once more to the provisions of standing order 33 which govern us at the present time. This time I will read the entire standing order.

Immediately before the order of the day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the house be in committee of the whole, or of supply, or of ways and means, any minister of the crown who standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause, or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or tiles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than 20 minutes in any such adjourned debate; or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

May I point out the words "and shall not further be postponed". May I also point out to hon. members the words in the latter part of the clause:

...all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

As to the question of hon. members rising in their places, the words of the standing order to the effect that no member shall rise to speak after that hour must be considered in the light of the words:

...all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

May I also draw to the attention of hon. members Beauchesne's third edition, citation 227, which reads as follows:

227. If debate is on an amendment under closure, and a division takes place on that amendment before two o'clock in the morning,...

Under the new rules, of course, it is one o'clock.

...a new amendment may then be proposed, but the speeches thereon will be limited to one for each member who has not already spoken and shall not be longer than twenty minutes. A division may again take place on this new amendment, and another one be again proposed, and so on until two o'clock. The government members, in order to prevent the opposition from proposing such amendments, may keep up debate until two o'clock in the morning,...

And here are the words which I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members:

...when all questions connected with the main motion have to be decided forthwith.

In my opinion,—as I attempted previously to rule—the question of leaving the chair and reporting the resolution is so intimately connected with the main motion that it is part of the proceedings which must take place tonight. I consider myself bound by what I must say are the clear terms of the standing order, and I so rule. If the hon. member wishes to appeal that ruling, I should be glad to report the matter to the house.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I wish to appeal your ruling to the house.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, may I make a point of order?

Mr. Knowles: Order.

The Chairman: Order. While I am having the question reduced to writing I hope I shall not have any further questions of order raised.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

In committee of the whole when considering a resolution with respect to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. Fulton raised a point of order to the effect that when closure was adopted, there was only one question before the committee and that the question that Mr. Chairman rise and report the resolution was not covered; and further that since it was not open to any member to take the floor after one p.m. the second motion was not in order.

Mr. Chairman ruled that, according to standing order 33, all questions which must be decided in order to conclude such postponed consideration must be decided forthwith and that since the motion that the chairman report the resolution is essential for disposing of the resolution, it must be disposed of in accordance with the standing order.

Whereupon Mr. Fulton appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question is the following one. In committee of the whole, when considering a resolution with respect to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. Fulton raised a point of order to the effect that when closure was adopted, there was only one question before the committee and that the question that Mr. Chairman rise and report the resolution was not covered; and further that since it was not open to any member to take the floor after 1.00 a.m. the second motion was not in order.

Mr. Chairman ruled, that according to standing order 33 all questions which must be decided in order to conclude such postponed consideration must be decided forthwith and that since the motion that the chairman report the resolution is essential for disposing of the resolution, it must be disposed of in accordance with the standing order.

Whereupon Mr. Fulton appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee:

The Chairman: Mr. Harris moves that I do now leave the chair and report the resolution. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Those in favour of the motion will kindly rise. Those opposed to the motion will kindly rise.

Motion agreed to: Yeas, 156; nays, 55.

The Chairman: I declare the motion carried.

Resolution reported.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order. Standing order 6 (3) reads:

> At 6.00 o'clock p.m. on Wednesdays and Fridays and at 10.00 o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, unless hereunder otherwise provided, Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the house without question put until the next sitting day.

This is, or it was when it started, a session of Tuesday, therefore it should be adjourned by the Speaker at ten o'clock. I point out that it is now well after ten o'clock and therefore the house should be adjourned. It is my contention that unless there is unanimous consent no further business can be done by the house at this sitting which started yesterday and is still going now at 2.15 a.m. Your Honour may wish to call my attention to standing order 6 (4), which reads:

When it is provided in any standing order that the business under consideration at the ordinary time of adjournment be forthwith disposed of or concluded, Mr. Speaker shall not adjourn the house until the specified proceedings be completed.

May I point out that Your Honour has said on a number of occasions, in fact you said it within the last hour, that the house does not know what goes on in the committee of the whole. Earlier in these proceedings when another matter was reported to Your Honour you, sir, used these words: "I have no knowledge of what goes on in committee of the whole." Therefore Your Honour cannot know, although I am pleased to inform you—I should say that will inform you; I am not pleased to do it—that in committee of the whole today there was moved by the government a motion of closure under standing order 33. I not only give Your Honour that bit of distasteful information, but I point out that the motion for closure, which was moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, was "that further consideration of this resolution shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed". The only decision taken in our committee of the whole, of which Your Honour has no knowledge, was that there be closure in the committee on the resolution.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member to notify him that I have no knowledge of what goes on in the committee of the whole until it reports. The committee has just reported and I know what has gone on.

Mr. Knowles: Your Honour knows that the committee has reported but you do not know the trouble the government went through to get that resolution before the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us have a discussion on the point of order that the hon. member started to state; let us not go into what happened in the committee of the whole on previous proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the only reason I made that other reference to the committee was so that no one else would introduce the question of closure and claim that it applied at this stage. As Your Honour says, what you now know—

Mr. Speaker: I do not intend to apply standing order 33.

Mr. Knowles: That is fine; you have saved quite a lengthy part of my speech. We are now at the point where the committee of the whole has reported. That report has not yet been received by the house, neither has there been a motion for concurrence in the report nor have there been any other proceedings that might follow thereafter. It is my contention that none of those proceedings should be taken by the house tonight for the reason that we are four hours and seventeen minutes past the time when the house should be adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has brought to my attention the standing order which has to do with the ordinary time of adjournment. Standing order 6 (3) reads:

At 6.00 o'clock p.m. on Wednesdays and Fridays and at 10.00 o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays,...

I emphasize the following words:

—unless hereunder otherwise provided, Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the house without question put until the next sitting day.

Then standing order 6 (4) reads:

When it is provided in any standing order—

I stress the words "any standing order".

—that the business under consideration at the ordinary time of adjournment be forthwith disposed of or concluded, Mr. Speaker shall not adjourn the house until the specified proceedings be completed.

I would direct the hon. member's attention to standing order 62 which was approved last year and which reads:

Whenever a resolution is reported from any committee of the whole, a motion to concur in the same shall be forthwith put and decided without debate or amendment.

I should like also to point out to the hon. member who has raised the matter of the sitting day—he said that we are four hours beyond the sitting day that we started on—that the sitting day starts at the moment that we parade in with the mace and stops at the moment we parade out with the mace. I would refer the hon. member to Bourinot at pages 212 and 213 in which he states that a full parliamentary day is one that is a sitting of the house. A sitting of the house is from the moment the house starts at 2.30 until it is adjourned. I quote:

If it is intended to meet earlier next day, a formal motion should be made previous to the adjournment of the house, as in the case of holidays or church festivals. Sometimes the house has two or three distinct sittings on the same day. In such cases each sitting is considered a full parliamentary day, and bills of supply can be advanced stages without objection.

In this case we have not done that. We have not divided our sitting to make two or three sittings in one sitting day. We only have one sitting day which started at 2.30 and which will not conclude until the mace is paraded out.

Under the circumstances and basing my ruling on which I have said, specifically on standing order 62, I am left with no alternative but to forthwith put the motion for concurrence. I am bound at this moment to ask the house if it agrees that this resolution be now concurred in.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Howe, Port Arthur) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion to concur.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman leave to introduce a bill based on this resolution?

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the motion you now propose to put would be an entirely new proceeding. I appreciate that Your Honour has ruled that, under the provisions of standing order 62, whenever a resolution is reported from any committee of the whole, a motion to concur shall be forthwith put and decided without debate or amendment. That has been done. In my submission that ends the proceedings with respect to the making of the report, the receiving of the report and the motion for concurrence. Now we are starting a new proceeding related to the introduction of a bill. I go back to standing order 6(3) which provides that at 10 o'clock on a day like today, unless hereunder otherwise provided, Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the house without question put. If Your Honour should then suggest that the provisions of standing order 6 (4) govern, I would point out that it reads as follows:

> 6. (4) When it is provided in any standing order that the business under consideration at the ordinary time of adjournment be forthwith disposed of or concluded, Mr. Speaker shall not adjourn the house until the specified proceedings be completed.

It was under that provision, as I understand it, that you acted to receive the report and the motion for concurrence in the report because standing order 62 says that the motion to concur shall be put forthwith. Our point now is that these proceedings are concluded. The committee's report has been received and concurred in. Now the minister seeks to make a separate motion related to the introduction of a bill, which is a new proceeding which was not before the committee or the house arising out of the previous stages. Therefore the provisions of standing order 6 (3) apply and the house is not at liberty to embark on these new proceedings because the government has moved and the house has accepted no motion altering the ordinary time of adjournment. The ordinary time of adjournment having passed, it is not within the competence of the house, except with unanimous consent, to take up any new business. In case Your Honour or the government should be under any misapprehension, I can assure you that such unanimous consent would not be given.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at length on this particular point of order. It seems to me that the arguments made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) are quite clear. In line with the argument which I made at the previous stage I might say that in addition to the fact that standing order 62, which Your Honour quoted on the last point of order, relates only to the presentation or the receiving of and concurrence in of a report, the introduction of a bill is provided for in a separate standing order, namely standing order 71, paragraphs 1 and 2, and also in two or three other standing orders after that. I mention the fact that the introduction of a bill is completely separate from the resolution in support of the contention that has already been made that we are now at a new proceeding. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not think all of this discussion is necessary at all. I think all I need to say is "Ten o'clock".

Mr. McCann: Who are you?

Mr. Speaker: When the hon. member says that all he needs to say is "Ten o'clock", he is repeating a point which he attempted to make earlier.

Mr. Knowles: What time is it, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The time is a quarter to three. If the hon. member to whom I have listened—as I always do—with great reverence will be kind enough to listen to me, I will make my point, following which he will know exactly what his recourse may be.

I am not going to go back at great length to his point that because it is now twelve minutes to three he can call it ten o'clock and I should leave the chair. The hon. member knows very well that when a resolution has been reported and concurred in by the house it is customary—and I repeat "it is customary" —to take—

Mr. Knowles: Provided the house is still in session.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, if the hon. member wishes to go back to a point that I thought I had already settled, we shall have repetition. Rules of procedure are the discipline which hon. members are prepared to accept for themselves and the authority which they are prepared to give their Speaker to enforce them. That is the situation. The citation No. 1 which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred to me the other day in Beauchesne's third edition is one that would apply in the circumstances because it states very well what the position is. The point is that the minute the resolution is concurred in, an order issues for leave to introduce the bill. I am going to make the point again. The authority will be found at page 165 of Beauchesne's third edition in which is outlined the procedure on bills day by day. On the second day the bill goes through the stage of a motion under government orders on the order paper and so on and finally the Speaker says "When shall this bill be read a second time?" "Next sitting of the house". That is what Beauchesne explains to be the procedure on the second day for the consideration of a bill. I say that when the house has concurred in the resolution on which a bill is to be founded, an order issues for the introduction of the bill. I am not going to say that without indicating what the authorities say on the point. There are bills that are introduced upon an order of the house and those bills are either preceded by certain preliminary proceedings or they are ordered in without any preliminary proceedings. At page 490 of May's fifteenth edition he deals with bills that are ordered in without any preliminary proceedings and he says this:

> In the absence of any preliminary proceedings, a motion may be made that leave be given to bring in a bill.

And then at page 487 he deals with bills preceded by certain preliminaries—he says this:

> A certain class of bills, the main object of which is the expenditure of money or the imposition of taxation, must, in accordance with the requirements of the standing orders regarding charges on the people, originate in committee of the whole house.
> When the resolutions have been reported and agreed to by the house, a bill is ordered thereon, or upon some only of the resolutions.

On that same point Campion at page 177 has this to say under bills introduced with preliminaries:

> A certain class of bills, whose main object is the expenditure of money or the imposition of taxation, generally called "money" bills, are still required to be preceded by resolutions passed in committee of the whole house and agreed to by the house on report. In this case the bill is ordered to be brought in immediately after the resolutions are agreed to.

Therefore the resolution having been agreed to, an order of the house does issue for leave to introduce the bill.

Mr. Fulton: Would Your Honour permit just two observations?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: At the beginning of your remarks, Your Honour stated that it is customary to introduce immediately a bill based upon a resolution. In reply, may I point out that it is customary for the house, for instance, to permit the government whip to revert to motions if he wishes to announce changes in committees the next day or for cabinet ministers to revert to motions. It is the custom for the house to permit that, but it is not mandatory upon the house to do so and if the house objects then leave to revert to motions is refused and that is not permitted.

Now, my point based upon that is that although it is customary to follow the passage of a resolution by the introduction of a bill, it is customary only because that almost invariably takes place before ten o'clock. It is now after ten o'clock and we have cited standing order 6(3), which must have some application. We submit it has application now and therefore we are entitled to say we are now in a position where we do not have to follow the usual custom and where, in fact, it would be improper to follow the usual custom. We refuse unanimous consent to do so.

If standing order 6 has any application, and unless Your Honour rules that the introduction of a bill is the same thing exactly as the receipt of a report, a proposition which I find it difficult to believe Your Honour would advance, then we are at another proceeding and we are entitled to refuse consent and do so refuse and the custom may thus be suspended for this occasion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot invoke standing order No. 6 because at ten o'clock he could not call it ten o'clock. He was at that moment under standing order 33.

Mr. Knowles: Your Honour does not know that.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I do, because the committee has reported. If the hon. member wants to play with words—

Mr. Fulton: We might have given unanimous consent to sit after ten o'clock in the committee.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think this evening I will convince very many hon. members, who apparently are not apt to be convinced and it is their privilege, but I must rule on the points that have been advanced. I have allowed hon. members to make their points, and I would be very happy if they would now allow me to make mine.

I say that the minute a resolution is reported a chain of events must take place, and they usually take place when a better climate prevails, let us say. I use that expression just so hon. members will understand. It is not unusual for leave to be granted, bills to be read the first time and the day appointed for second reading at 10.05 p.m.; 10.10 or 10.15. It is customary and unanimous consent is not necessary because as soon as the resolution is reported standing order 62 takes care of the motion for concurrence. Then, if it is true, as Campion and May say, that as a result of the motion being concurred in, an order for leave does issue, I will even make the point that the motion for leave is not necessary. This is so true that when some bills are founded on resolutions which have been agreed to in committee of ways and means and the bills are not ready, they are therefore prevented from being introduced immediately after the resolutions are reported because of another standing order which says that a bill cannot be introduced in a blank or imperfect form—those bills are introduced later without notice. They do not even appear on the order paper. I have four instances right there on the desk that I can quote to the hon. member.

I will quote them immediately because I have the references here. He can look at the Journals for Saturday, December 8, 1945, page 455; Friday, August 9, 1946, page 669; Friday, June 6, 1947, page 496; May 12, 1950, page 372. All of those bills, founded upon ways and means resolutions, were introduced days and sometimes weeks after the resolutions were concurred in by the house and they were introduced without notice. Their introduction could not follow concurrence of the resolution because of standing order 72, which is to the effect that no bills may be introduced in a blank or imperfect shape. I will quote it at length:

> No bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape.

When the Clerk gave me the result of the division a moment ago I asked him, "Do you have the bill?" He said, "Yes". It is only because I received the bill that I hold in my hand, and I can see it is not in blank or in an imperfect shape, that the order which does issue must be taken advantage of, and that is the ruling that I make at the moment.

Those who are in favour of the motion that leave—

Mr. Fulton: With respect, Mr. Speaker, because I appreciate your patience at this late hour and because I regret that I am in fundamental disagreement with your ruling, I respectfully appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I forgot, and if the hon. member allows me I should like to quote one more precedent which I think might be interesting in connection with what I said, following which if he still wants to appeal I will be delighted to grant him that right. In 1921 a motion for closure was moved by Mr. Doherty on a motion for interim supply. You will find the motion at page 2076 of volume III of Hansard for 1921. At page 2094 you will see that the motion was agreed to, that the resolutions were reported and concurred in and that at that moment it was past two o'clock because closure was applied at two o'clock in those days. We were kind to ourselves when we amended the rules last year and inserted one o'clock instead of two o'clock. Once the supply resolutions were reported from the committee and concurred in, the house went back into committee of ways and means, reported the resolution and concurred in the ways and means resolution. Then a bill was introduced, the motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

Mr. Fulton: But Your Honour will agree that the point of order was not raised.

Mr. Speaker: No point of order was raised, but it just indicates that notwithstanding the fact the point of order was not raised, at 2.25 a.m. they were dealing with these motions which at the time were much more numerous than those we have before us.

Mr. Knowles: May I make one brief comment? The brief comment I wish to make is that some of the references that you read the time before last when you were on your feet indicated that there have been bills, I believe they were budget bills, introduced on a day later than the day on which the resolutions were passed and reported to the house. In other words, although Your Honour's statement is correct that it is customary for a bill to be introduced and given first reading immediately after the resolution is reported, it does not always happen that way and therefore it is not mandatory. It is on that basis that we feel that this is a separate proceeding.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says it does not always happen that way. It does always happen that way whenever the bill is ready. When there were so many amendments in the ways and means resolution that the bill could not be ready for introduction as soon as the resolution was concurred in, the bill was introduced later, and as I say they were introduced without notice.

There is one case this session in which a resolution of the Minister of Finance was reported and concurred in and the bill has not been introduced yet. It is not ready. Whenever it is, there will not be 48 hours' notice for that bill to be introduced because an order of the house did issue. There was never any notice given in the cases I have cited in the Journals. Let us not discuss this forever. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has appealed my ruling. Those who are in favour of sustaining my ruling will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

May I ask hon. members—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no,no.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members are now saying "order", but because of the previous noise I was not allowed to start putting the question. May I ask hon. members to realize that if noise prevails in the chamber it will be most difficult for the Clerk and the Clerk Assistant to proceed with the taking of the division. I would ask them to co-operate in this regard.

Mr. Fulton raised a point of order to the effect that when the resolution under closure had been adopted, reported and concurred in it was not in order to proceed with any further business unless unanimous consent was obtained. I ruled that with the concurrence in committee of the whole an order of the house should then issue for leave to introduce a bill and that it was customary to introduce such a bill forthwith. Whereupon Mr. Fulton appealed to the house from my ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: The question now is on the motion for leave—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia:

That the house do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows that the motion for leave to introduce a bill is a non-debatable motion. If it is non-debatable, how can he speak even to move this superseding motion?

Mr. Knowles: Standing order 25 says:

A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance), shall always be in order, but no second motion to the same effect—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask hon. members to allow the member who has the floor at the moment to be heard not only by those who are sitting around him but also by the Chair.

Mr. Knowles: I was simply reading standing order 25. Perhaps I had better read it again:

A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance), shall always be in order, but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceeding has been had.

Obviously the part in parentheses does not apply, and obviously the last few lines do not apply. What does apply is the very direct statement that a motion to adjourn shall always be in order. I submit that "always" means always.

Mr. Speaker: But I submit to the hon. member that standing order 25 must be read in conjunction with standing order 44. I must confess to the hon. member that following certain superseding motions that were moved recently I have gone into this question very carefully, namely the relationship between standing orders 24, 25 and 44, concerning these superseding motions. They are always in order providing something is under consideration, something is under debate. Standing order 44 says:

When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the house.

At this moment what is before the house is an undebatable motion, a motion that cannot be debated.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in standing order 25 that says that it depends upon standing order 44. In the previous discussion we had, Your Honour was able to cite the words "unless otherwise provided hereunder, with respect to another standing order. There is nothing to that effect in standing order 25, and there is nothing to that effect in standing order 44. Therefore I contend that the motions referred to in standing orders 24 and 25, namely a motion for reading the orders of the day or a motion to adjourn, are in a different category from the other motions that are referred to along with those two in standing order 44.

Standing order 44 does not say that motions to postpone to a day certain, to read the orders of the day, to adjourn the debate or to adjourn the house can be moved only when a question is under debate. Standing order 44 puts it in the very reverse. It says rather that when a question is under debate that debate cannot be superseded or interfered with, except by these various motions. I submit that it is quite clear that standing order 44 does not say that a question has to be under debate before these other motions can be put. Along with that is the very clear language of standing order 24 and also of standing order 25, which is the one we are under at the moment, which says that a motion to adjourn shall always be in order.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member a question? He will have time to look up another reference that he is trying to put his finger on at the moment. In his view, is the motion for leave to introduce a bill a debatable motion?

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member, who has been kind enough to answer my first question, be kind enough now to answer my second? If the motion for leave to introduce a bill is not debatable, even if what he says about the motion under standing order 25 is right, how can he utter a single word in order to move that motion?

Mr. Knowles: In the same way—

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay East will have an opportunity after the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated his point.

Mr. Knowles: The question is a good one. The answer is that one gets the floor to move the adjournment that is always in order, even though we are on an undebatable motion, in just the same way as one gets the floor to raise a point of order. It is always in order to do that, even on an undebatable motion, as has been done several times tonight. I submit very strongly that there are certain things, such as raising a point of order, raising a point of privilege and moving to adjourn the house, which are clearly spelled out in our standing orders as always in order, and there are no strings attached to that fact.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, you made your ruling on Thursday last, at which point you said that a motion to adjourn is a dilatory motion, that is, that when a motion to adjourn is made a question must be under consideration. For a matter to be under consideration, the members must be prepared to fix their minds on it with a view to careful examination, that is, they should be prepared to think on it with care.

The question at the moment is not debatable, that is, the motion that is before the house is not debatable. A division simply is being taken. Therefore members are not to rise. They must hear the Speaker in silence. The other day the hon. member referred—

Mr. Fleming: Filibuster.

Mr. Byrne: —to citation 104 of Beauchesne, third edition, which reads in part as follows:

> The Speaker is responsible for the due enforcement of the rules, rights and privileges of the house, and when he rises he is to be heard in silence.

Mr. Fleming: Liberal filibuster.

Mr. Sinclair: Envy will get you nowhere.

Mr. Byrne: This matter has been gone into quite thoroughly and it is quite clear who may move a motion for adjournment. A member who has moved adjournment of the house is not entitled to move the adjournment of the debate as he has already spoken to the main motion which in effect means that he can only rise and move the adjournment if a matter is under consideration and if he has spoken on the question he cannot move the adjournment of the debate. It simply means that there is no matter before the house for consideration so the member is completely out of order when he moves the adjournment of the house at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for Kamloops rises, he is probably looking at page 332 of Bourinot where he will find precisely what I wanted to quote to him and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It is not very pleasant for me to make this ruling because I find that I am correcting a ruling that I made not very long ago which I consider wrong. If Bourinot is right, then I would say that whenever there is a controversy between Bourinot and Beaudoin I will take Bourinot any day.

But I would like hon. members to consider this. Bourinot is dealing with dilatory motions and under "motions of adjournment" he says:

> When any question is under the consideration of either house, a motion to adjourn will always be in order. The 39th rule provides . . .

Then he reads the 39th rule which is our present standing order 25. Its purpose is the same as what is provided in standing order 24, which has to do with a motion to proceed with the orders of the day. It is a superseding motion. Mr. Speaker Sevigny—or Rhodes—in 1917 said that standing order 24 had to be read in conjunction with standing order 44. Of course, the rules did not bear the same numbers then. He said:

> That rule must be read in connection with rule 36, which I will read, as applying to this case.
> "When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it" . . .

And so on. That is standing order 44. Perhaps the climate is not as good as it might be in order to make a point that appears new in view of the fact that I have so recently given a ruling which is at variance with the one I should like to make at the moment. I am not going to press the point now. I would imagine that another occasion will present itself and we will have more time in the meantime in order to examine the point further. It seems to me to be unreasonable for the one rule to defeat the other. According to our rules we have a stated definition that a motion for leave to introduce a bill has to be decided without debate or amendment. All that is permitted is a succinct explanation when a bill is introduced after 48 hours' notice and that is not the type of bill that is preceded by a resolution concurred in by the house.

If a motion of that type is not debatable, how can anyone stand up and even utter one word to say: I move such and such a motion. As I say, I will not make a ruling. I will accept the hon. member's motion and I will put it to the house. I hope that after this one is dealt with we will either go home to have a good rest or we will proceed with the next step.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles) which was negatived on the following division:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. 298, to provide for the constitution of a crown company to construct a pipe line, make short-term loans, etc.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it. Call in the members. Do hon. members consider that they have been called in for the purpose of this division? I notice that the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir), the whip of the party to my right, has so indicated, and so has the whip of the Conservative party. Is that generally agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson) take notice?

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Martin: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

Mr. Knowles: Never.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we shall take the resolution in committee of the whole on the National Housing Act, then second reading of the bill to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act, second reading of the bill to amend the Canada Land Surveys Act and second reading of the bill to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Mr. Fulton: Have you been scared off?

Mr. Harris: On Thursday we shall take second reading of the pipe line bill.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.42 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NATIONAL DEFENCE

R.C.A.F.—CRASH OF JET PLANE AT ORLEANS, ONTARIO

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I crave your indulgence to say how deeply shocked we were to hear of the tragedy which occurred last night at Orleans, near Ottawa, in which several persons were killed and others were seriously injured. On behalf I think of all hon. members, as well as on my own behalf, I should like to express the most sincere sympathy to this distinguished community of Grey Nuns of the Cross and to the relatives and friends of the unfortunate victims of the disaster, including of course the two gallant airmen who were aboard the ill-fated jet craft. I am sure we all trust that the number of victims will not increase beyond that actually known at the present time, and I know we will all wish the injured a very complete and prompt recovery.

Perhaps the Minister of National Defence will have some information which he can give the house, because I know this has shocked all hon. members and that we are all deeply sympathetic with those who have suffered from this terrible tragedy.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of the house will wish to learn such facts as have so far been ascertained in connection with the appalling accident about which the Prime Minister has just spoken. Before giving those facts I should like to express the heartfelt sympathy of all the members of the Canadian armed forces, as well as my own, to the relatives and friends of those who died last night when a Royal Canadian Air Force aircraft crashed into the Villa St. Louis convalescent home operated by the Roman Catholic religious order of the Grey Nuns of the Cross near Orleans.

The exact number of persons in the building at the time is not yet known with certainty, but it is believed that between 15 and 20 persons, including the crew of the aircraft, have lost their lives in the explosion and fire which resulted from the impact of the aircraft. In addition several members of the religious order were injured. I have just returned from the scene of the accident, and from the facts which so far can be ascertained, pending the findings of the official court of inquiry which is now undertaking a full investigation, the details briefly are as follows.

An R.C.A.F. CF-100 jet interceptor aircraft, flown by a pilot and navigator, took off from Uplands airport at 9.30 last night as one of two aircraft ordered to intercept an aircraft detected by the radar warning system but not immediately identifiable. The mission is one which airmen of our nine CF-100 squadrons across Canada perform constantly in their task of protecting this country from possible hostile aircraft attack.

Before the interception was carried through to finality the identity of the unknown aircraft was definitely established by the ground control system, through the aircraft's flight plan, to be an R.C.A.F. transport aircraft returning from the Arctic.

Following identification of the unknown aircraft, at about 7,000 feet, as friendly, the two interceptor fighters climbed to about 33,000 feet to carry out practice interception manoeuvres with one another, which is a normal air defence procedure to build up training experience while using up excess fuel load, which is a necessary practice for safe landing.

Continuing under radar control from the ground, one of the two interceptor aircraft returned normally to its base and the other reported by radio from 33,000 feet altitude that he still had some excess fuel on board and would remain airborne longer. This was the last transmission received from this aircraft, following which it rapidly disappeared from the radar screen and within a couple of minutes crashed near the town of Orleans, at about 10.17 p.m. All evidence so far available points to the likelihood that the aircraft descended in a steep dive out of control from a high altitude, crashing directly into the convalescent home. The violent impact resulted in an explosion and fierce fire which completely demolished the building and the aircraft.

Up until the time of the aircraft's last radio transmission no indication of trouble was given by the pilot. The cause of the accident at present remains unknown. There is no trace of the two aircrew members having abandoned the aircraft by parachute prior to its crash; therefore it must be presumed that their remains are buried in the debris of the demolished building which is at present being searched.

R.C.A.F. equipment and crews have been on duty at the scene of the crash all night and are continuing to co-operate with provincial and local authorities, and officers of this department are doing whatever is within their power to assist the bereaved.

At this time, I am sure the hearts of all members of this house and, indeed, of all Canadians go out to those bereaved by this terrible accident. Despite his best endeavours and the ingenuity of modern science, man's mastery of machines can never be complete. It is a cause for profound sorrow that this accident has taken the lives of so many selfless members of a religious vocation and two members of a service whose mission it is to do everything within its power, by day and night, to provide security for the Canadian way of life.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to join in the expressions of sympathy to the members of the religious order who have been bereaved, the friends and relatives of those resident in the convent who died and those who are injured, and to the relatives and friends of the gallant members of the air force who died on this occasion.

As has been said by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, the extent of this tragedy does emphasize the terrible nature of what has occurred. It also emphasizes the continuing magnitude of the task that is assumed in preparing for the defence of this country.

As our sympathy goes out to all those who suffered personally or through the loss of loved ones there is also, I am sure, recognition of the fact that the members of our air force are carrying out their services magnificently in every way and that these terrible and unavoidable accidents are simply a reminder of the extent of the effort that is being made to defend the freedom of every Canadian.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have spoken for all of us. Nothing remains for me to say except that we join in extending our sympathy to those who are bereaved, the members of the religious order and the relatives of the airmen, and I am sure this will be generally shared by all the people of Canada.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the Prime Minister and others who have spoken in expressing sympathy to the community of the Grey Nuns where this tragedy happened last night. We find no words to express the sorrow we feel, and we join with the Prime Minister in expressing the hope that those who were injured will experience a speedy and complete recovery.

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Monsieur le président, je désire remercier le très honorable premier ministre, as well as the leader of the Conservative party, the leader of the C.C.F. party and the leader of the Social Credit party for expressing their sympathy on this very tragic and sad occasion. I want to join with them in expressing my condolence in the name of all the citizens of my constituency to the mother general and all the members of the congregation of the Grey Nuns as well as to the families who have suffered as a result of this sad and tragic accident. I also wish to thank the Minister of National Defence and the members of the air force for doing everything possible. I was there at 11.15 last night, and every care and precaution were taken to help in every way. I also thank the Minister of National Defence for the sympathy he has expressed. All the Canadian people are very sad on this occasion, and I am very sad because most of the nuns who were there were the best friends of my wife and my family, and many of them come from my constituency of Russell.

NATO—DISPATCH FROM CANADA OF CF-100 SQUADRONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question supplementary to one asked yesterday by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) in connection with the replacement of R.C.A.F. fighter squadrons in Europe. Are the squadrons being returned to Canada to be re-equipped and, if so, with what type of plane?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the basic facts of the matter are well within the knowledge of the house. We have 12 squadrons in Europe equipped with Sabre jets. We propose to equip four of those squadrons with CF-100's instead. The first squadron will be sent over this year and we hope the other three will be sent next year. It is not a question of more or fewer squadrons; it is a question of change of equipment.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): As a supplementary question, are not personnel of the present squadrons in Europe being withdrawn when the four CF-100 squadrons are sent to Europe; and if so, what type of plane will they be equipped with in Canada on their return?

Mr. Campney: The personnel of the four CF-100 squadrons which will replace the four Sabre jet squadrons are being retrained. Headquarters have worked out a system of retraining and substitution in the air force. As the hon. member knows, air crew in the air division in France are constantly being replaced and changed. There will be no particular change in the system except that a greater number of air crew will have to be trained to operate CF-100's.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): As a further supplementary question—after what I have listened to I am sure it is not asking too much—would the minister inform the house what disposition is being made of the Sabre aircraft which are still in Europe as a result of the re-equipment program?

Mr. Campney: There are several possible dispositions which can be made of these planes. I am not in position at the present moment to say which one of them will be followed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT AS TO PROVISION FOR PERSONS DENIED BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, earlier in this session I gave undertakings to make some further statement by the middle of this month on the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The commission has continued to study and analyse the results of these operations under the new act, which has now been in force during the past seven months. This period has not yet been sufficient to form anything like final conclusions with respect to all of the factors involved.

As to the factors related to section 45 (2), as outlined in my statement of the 18th of April, Hansard, page 3038, a decision on any amendments affecting the claimants referred to in that statement must be deferred until later, pending the outcome of the analyses of the commission and of the actuary.

From these studies it is clear already, however, that to forestall unintended consequences under section 45 (2) that would otherwise affect insured workers next fall and early winter, I shall want to recommend, before the session ends, a corrective amendment to the act in that connection.

Such an amendment would apply only to a person who had a seasonal benefit claim and who, within 104 weeks after the beginning of that claim, again becomes unemployed and files a second claim, this time for regular benefit, and who may fail to qualify because he may not have made 30 contributions in the preceding 52 weeks. Of course any amendment I may find necessary to propose will be submitted to the unemployment insurance advisory committee so that its relation to the stability of the fund may be considered.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, while I followed the minister's statement as carefully as possible, I wonder if he would advise the house whether or not steps have been taken to do anything for those people who are at present suffering because of the interpretation placed on section 45 (2)? As I take it, his statement referred to arrangements which are being made to take care of those unemployed next winter. What about those who are at present suffering?

Mr. Gregg: Those to whom I referred on April 18, as I indicated at that time, or by far the largest number of them were under seasonal benefits then. I cannot give my hon. friend the exact details but I know that most of them are now back in employment again. Hence it is to the future we are looking at the present time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may ask the minister if we may take it for granted that before he brings before parliament amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, in addition to discussing them with the unemployment insurance advisory committee, he will also discuss them with representatives or officers of the Canadian Labour Congress?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, that has been my practice in the past and will continue to be so in the future.

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour? I understand that something like 70,000 people were affected by this section. Can the minister tell us how many are still left without employment or benefits out of that 70,000?

Mr. Gregg: I cannot do so this afternoon but I will get the information for my hon. friend as soon as may be.

STATEMENT AS TO APPLICATION TO FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I promised also to make some further statement with regard to fishermen.

We have also been continuing diligently our investigations to find out to what extent, if any, the Unemployment Insurance Act might apply to a reasonable number of those who are engaged at sea in the fishing industry, many of whom are self-employed.

I hope to have a further report to make on this topic before many weeks. Even though it should be found that a plan could be formulated to provide coverage for fishermen generally, it will take a good deal of time to work out anything like a practical detailed plan. If a practical plan can be devised, while its effect upon the fund must be considered by the unemployment insurance advisory committee, it may not require an amendment to the act but may be put into effect by regulation under the authority of the governor in council.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour in connection with a statement he made earlier on the Unemployment Insurance Act. Can the minister assure the house that the changes which are being made by regulation in connection with the inclusion of fishermen will be made during the current session of the house so that hon. members will have an opportunity of discussing the proposals that are brought forward?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I can make no promise regarding the time factor, but I can assure my hon. friend that since I have the unemployment insurance estimates still to be completed before the estimates committee and before the committee of supply of this house there will be plenty of opportunity to discuss his point.

RESEARCH

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved that the first report of the special committee on research, presented to the house on May 14, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

STARRED QUESTIONS

BRAIN-WASHING RESEARCH, MCGILL UNIVERSITY

Question No. 52—Mr. Fulton:

1. Were any payments made to McGill University or any agency or department thereof by or on behalf of the Department of National Defence, the defence research board or any other agency of the government of Canada for research in connection with "brain-washing", in each of the years 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954 and 1955?

2. If so, what amount was paid in each of these years?

[Mr. Gregg.]

3. To what departments or agencies of the government have the findings, or any of them, been made available?

4. To what outside individuals or agencies have the findings, or any of them, been made available?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): The answer to parts 1 and 2 of this question by years is as follows: 1951, $4,178; 1952, $8,502; 1953, $4,320. No payments were made in this connection in 1954 or 1955.

The answer to part 3 is the Department of National Defence.

The answer to part 4 is in the United Kingdom, the admiralty, air ministry and the ministry of supply. In the United States, the navy, army, air force and the central intelligence agency.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SASKATCHEWAN—TOTAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Question No. 453—Mr. Studer:

1. What was the total expenditure in the province of Saskatchewan for the fiscal year 1954-55, by the federal government, including the statutory subsidy and tax rental agreement payments?

2. What was the total expenditure during the fiscal year 1954-55 in Saskatchewan by each federal government department and agency?

3. What is the estimated amount that would be payable to Saskatchewan under the proposed national health plan?

4. What was the total amount of expenditures in Saskatchewan by all federal government departments and agencies since April 1, 1944?

MILITARY AIRCRAFT REPAIRS AND INSPECTION

Question No. 471—Mr. Pearkes:

1. When the Royal Canadian Air Force, or the Royal Canadian Navy aircraft stationed at (a) Sea Island; (b) Comox; (c) Patricia Bay, require repairing or major inspection, where is this work carried out?

2. What percentage of the work is carried out by Fairey Aviation Company of Canada at Patricia Bay?

3. What buildings, if any, at Patricia Bay airport have been sold or leased to Fairey Aviation Company of Canada?

4. What is the total area at Patricia Bay occupied by Fairey Aviation Company of Canada?

COLOUR ADDED ORANGE IMPORTS

Question No. 475—Mr. Hahn:

1. Are any oranges, labelled "colour added", permitted entry into Canada?

2. If so, what is the source of these oranges?

3. What quantity entered Canada last year?

4. What is the composition of the substance used to colour such oranges?

5. Can orange peels so treated be safely used in making marmalade?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WHARF CONSTRUCTION, BAIE STE. CATHERINE, QUE.

Motion No. 77—Mr. Maltais:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, maps, agreements and other documents exchanged, during the past six months, between the government of the province of Quebec and the federal Department of Public Works, regarding the construction of a new wharf at Baie Ste. Catherine, to improve the ferry-boat service between Tadoussac and Baie Ste. Catherine, Quebec.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Subject to the usual reservation, Mr. Speaker, about first communicating with the government of Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION—PERSONNEL SUSPENSIONS AND DISMISSALS, QUEBEC CITY

Motion No. 79—Mr. Dufresne:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents in the possession of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, dealing with the dismissals or suspensions of all temporary or permanent employees of the department, in the city of Quebec, since the 1st of January 1954, including those referring to William Georges Rodrigue, 625 Bonaventure street, Quebec 8, Quebec.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this motion would not be objectionable in so far as it might refer to any correspondence from persons outside the public service. In so far as any correspondence between members of the department or between members of my department and any other department is concerned, those documents would be privileged. I suggest, however, that perhaps the hon. gentleman, on consideration, would consider dropping the motion because in fact if it were passed it would have no practical effect at all because no person was dismissed at Quebec from January 1, 1954, to the present date, and only one person was suspended and that for only one day.

I know the hon. gentleman has in mind the fact that we did not re-engage the services of a temporary seasonal employee and that particular person, whose name is cited in the motion, did write 13 letters to me which he marked "Personal and confidential". Before the hon. gentleman laughs, I should like to say that so far as I am concerned I could not care less whether these letters were published or not, but they do refer to this unfortunate man's private affairs and I would be very hesitant about making them public. If, however, he wants to give them to the hon. gentleman who represents Quebec West, I have no objection whatever. So far as I am concerned there is nothing personal or confidential about them, but they are about his affairs and I do not like to treat his personal and confidential affairs as public affairs.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, the minister claims there was only one man who has not been re-engaged.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that.

Mr. Dufresne: The fact is that many in the city of Quebec—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Dufresne: —in this department have not been re-engaged. I should like to have the correspondence between the department and these unfortunate people who are still starving today on account of this injustice. I do insist on having this correspondence tabled.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, sir, I am within my rights in making a correction in the hon. gentleman's statement. I did not say there was only one person who had not been re-engaged. I said there was only one person who had been suspended and that for only one day. I made no statement whatever about the number of people who had been re-engaged, except about this one unfortunate man.

Mr. Brooks: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: At this moment we have a motion that is not debatable. Because of the lengthy explanation of the minister I allowed the hon. member for Quebec West, who was the sponsor of this motion, to make a few comments but at this moment the house must make up its mind about this motion. Those who are in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed to this motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it and the motion is lost.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT REGARDING SETTLEMENT OF SEAMEN'S STRIKE ON GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he give any indication to the house of the progress toward settlement of the dispute between the seamen and the shipping interests on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river, particularly as this seems to be becoming an extensive lockout by the shipping interests?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I had an indication before coming into the house that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) was going to ask a similar question, so I can reply to both hon. members at the same time.

The house will recall that I made a long statement on this last Tuesday, followed by a shorter statement on Wednesday. In that shorter statement I said that Mr. Carl Goldenberg had been appointed as a mediator in the dispute. Mr. Goldenberg met with the parties that same day, Wednesday, and they met for discussions on Thursday morning at 9.30. Since 9.30 on Thursday morning discussions have been going on almost continuously, with the exception of Sunday, of course, and some good solid progress, so it is reported to me, has been made. Those discussions are going on today.

I cannot report beyond that. But I should like to state to the house that it has appeared to me that the impression has gone abroad that most of the grain ships on the lakes are tied up. That is not true. Of those that were in operation, or coming out of winter tie-up for operation 10 days ago, the vast majority are still in operation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REASON FOR APPLICATION OF CLOSURE ON PIPE-LINE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister what was the tremendous and compelling urgency to bring the debate to a close yesterday by the application of the closure rule, in view of the fact the government is not prepared to go on with the debate today and the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not away fishing?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the very courteous way in which the hon. gentleman has put his question, I will tell him that the reason it was not suggested we should go on today with the second reading of the bill was so that hon. members would have an opportunity to consider it before second reading was called.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question. Since it is obvious that time is not pressing, why was closure applied to bring the debate to a conclusion yesterday?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I think we have had a full discussion and a full explanation of the reason closure was applied. The government felt that it was in the public interest that this legislation be passed so a start could be made on the construction of the pipe line this year. It had become quite evident from statements which had been made over many weeks that resort was going to be had to every procedure that could be provided by the rules to retard and prevent the adoption of such legislation. We had many examples of that and it became quite evident that if we wished it to be done the only practical way was to take the responsibility of asking for the application of another standing order of this house.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—REQUEST FOR COPIES OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the desire of the government that hon. members have a chance to study the bill that we are to debate tomorrow, will he make available a sufficient number of copies of the agreement with Trans-Canada so that all members may have it. If I may state this as a question of privilege, I personally have obtained a copy of the agreement, so I speak not for myself. But I do know that only a few copies are available.

I did not raise the matter earlier because I thought the agreement would be included in the bill as a schedule. Actually I think it should have been, but that is a point to be argued later. Since it is not included in the bill as a schedule, and since only half a dozen copies are available in the office downstairs, would the minister arrange to have copies of the agreement made available to all hon. members before second reading of the bill is discussed tomorrow?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the usual number of copies were tabled. If any hon. member finds that he cannot get access to the tabled copies and will get in touch with my office we will try to help him out.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. I may say I got a copy of the agreement, but I did not have it in my possession for very long before the office downstairs asked me to return it because there were so many inquiries for it. I did return it without, I may say, having given it sufficient study. If the minister has copies in his office could he make them available to members of the house in the usual way? I think it would be well if we could get copies.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am not sure what the situation is about copies. I know that I have complied with the rules of the house. I was asked to table the agreement and I tabled it. I imagine we have extra copies, and if we have I shall be glad to provide them.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC—PERSONNEL SUSPENSIONS AND DISMISSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a question arising out of the motion for the production of papers by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) with reference to the dismissal of William Georges Rodrigue, Quebec city. The matter of the veterans' preference was entirely ignored by the minister in making this appointment. This man had had considerable experience in this work when he was dismissed from the service, and should have been considered as a permanent appointee.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that this is the kind of question that should be asked when the estimates are before the committee, but in view of the incorrect statements made by the hon. gentleman I think those incorrect statements should be answered. This man was employed by the department on a seasonal and temporary basis. He was not dismissed, he was simply not re-engaged for another season. The reason he was not re-engaged was that, unhappily and unfortunately, through no real fault of his own he was incapable of doing the work. I think it is rather a shame to try to make a victim of a poor unfortunate man like that.

Mr. Brooks: He was made a victim by your department.

HOUSING

PROVISION FOR CONTRIBUTIONS TO MUNICIPALITIES, HOME LOANS, HOUSING RESEARCH, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 26, consideration in committee of Bill No. 215, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954—Mr. Winters—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Home extension loan.

Mr. Green: A day or two ago I received a letter from the Vancouver housing association which I think the minister will agree is a reliable and worth-while organization. They point out that over eight months ago the city of Vancouver requested the senior levels of government, which presumably would include the dominion government, to construct a 130-unit housing project for senior citizens at 47th avenue and Knight road under section 36 of the National Housing Act.

Then they go on to say that the plans for this project have been stalled in Ottawa since that time for the reason, it is understood, that the federal government is reluctant to participate in a project designed solely for a single age group meaning, of course, for the senior citizen group, while the city council does not wish to provide more family housing at the present time.

As I read the National Housing Act, there is no provision of that type in the act. If the complaint made in the letter is accurate, the difficulty seems to be in the policy that has been adopted by the government or by the crown corporation. I need not point out to the minister the great need there is for housing for the senior citizens. That has been dealt with quite fully in the earlier stages of this debate, and it is a particularly important matter in British Columbia, where we have a larger percentage of senior citizens than any other province of Canada. This question is vital in that province. There are different organizations, such as service clubs and churches and other organizations, which are doing very good work in helping with the construction of homes for senior citizens, but the need will never be met until the government steps into the picture more fully than it is doing at the present time.

I notice that the resolution preceding this bill did not include any amendment having to do with the question I am raising today, but it did refer in the last paragraph to providing for a number of administration and other changes deemed necessary for the more efficient administration of the act. There are some changes in the act which I think would help with regard to housing projects, but the difficulty here seems to be deeper than that, in that there has been a policy adopted somewhere in Ottawa against going ahead with projects where the people who would be benefiting are in one group, such as a group of senior citizens.

Once again I ask the minister to explain the situation. It seems to me that on this particular problem of getting decent housing for senior citizens there is not enough leadership being given here. There does not seem to be the energy behind any move sufficient to meet that problem in an adequate way. I hope I am wrong in that belief, but it does appear to be the situation at the present time. Perhaps the minister could explain why it is the government is against the policy of helping a housing project for a group such as senior citizens.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, might I ask what clause we are on now? Am I right in assuming we are on clause 1?

The Chairman: Clause 1.

Mr. Winters: That deals with home extension loans. I should think I would not be in order under the rules of the house in answering the hon. member, and I would like to be guided, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the minister raises this particular point, I think, more frequently than any other minister in the cabinet. He must know that it has been the rule here that on the first clause of a bill the discussion has not been limited solely to that clause. That is a right which the opposition cherishes and which in the long run means that legislation gets through much more quickly, because if that were not the case it would mean more extended debate on the other clauses.

My question to the minister has to do with his policy; not the particular wording of any clause, but the policy with regard to projects for housing senior citizens. I suggest that I am in order in asking it.

The Chairman: This is a matter which raises a difficult problem in view of the fact that we are governed in committee by the strict rule of relevancy under standing order 59 (2). The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in his remarks, I believe, used the word "rule" and he also used the word "right". I cannot concede that there is any "rule" allowing a broad debate such as he apparently has in mind, in view of the very clear language of standing order 59 (2).

I might say that in my personal opinion we are governed by the relevancy rule. I have been able to make, up to date, only a partial study of the "custom" in that regard. I have some material in my office and would be very glad to make an enlarged statement on it at a later date. In the present instance, I think the hon. gentleman from Vancouver-Quadra will agree that he is in effect attempting to discuss an alternative. He shakes his head as if he does not agree with that statement; but an alternative, I presume, would be more appropriately discussed when we are discussing the principle of the bill.

I do not wish to say, and in fact I cannot say, anything more at this time except to indicate that I have been giving the question some consideration and would be glad to lay something before hon. members at a later date when I have had a chance to study it more fully.

Mr. Fleming: I think it will be agreed that in the earlier stages of this discussion the house has been fully co-operative, and I do not think anyone wants to see the discussions and progress today impeded by too technical considerations. The point raised by my colleague from Vancouver-Quadra does give rise to certain questions regarding policy that have a bearing on section 36 of the act. Instead of renewing the discussion we so often have as to whether the rule of strict relevancy is to be applied or whether the custom should prevail of permitting general discussion on the first clause, might I suggest that we are going to lose time by standing on any rule in this matter and that we shall make much more rapid progress if we follow custom and dispose of questions relating to policy on this first clause of the bill.

The Chairman: Order. I might say that the result of the meagre inquiries I have made to date into this matter neither establishes nor denies a custom, but until I can make a lengthier and more comprehensive statement to hon. members I am inclined to agree with the position taken by the hon. member for Eglinton, and I believe if hon. members co-operate we can perhaps make progress in that way at the present time. I must say to hon. members that until that statement has been made I hope they will not consider that we are establishing a precedent for the future.

Mr. Green: Perhaps I could now have the answer to my question.

Mr. Winters: I do not mind answering any questions, Mr. Chairman, when they are in order. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is perhaps labouring under a misunderstanding. Normally when a bill is introduced there is a first clause which is rather general in nature. For example, in the housing act the first clause is:

> This act may be cited as the National Housing Act, 1954.

I understand that in such a case it has been customary to have general remarks and questions on the first clause. This bill seems rather different, in that the first clause is very specific in having to do with the deletion of the home extension loan provision under part 4 of the act. I therefore questioned whether I was in order in answering general questions under a specific clause. I do not think there has been any practice established in the committee which would indicate that that is the situation, but where a bill has been introduced with a first clause of a general nature I do acknowledge that a practice has developed. But if the committee wishes me, subject to the reservations you have stated, to comment on the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I am quite willing to do so.

The situation is that several members of the housing authority in Vancouver and members of the city council saw me when I was in Vancouver last December and discussed this point with me. Subsequently there has been an exchange of correspondence with respect to it. Their request was that we make provision under section 36, which is the federal-provincial partnership section of the act, for the building of projects to be assigned exclusively to aged citizens. I told them I had some doubts about the policy of having any housing project assigned exclusively for any particular group of Canadian citizens.

We are constantly asked to build housing projects for this or that ethnic group or this or that economic group. I personally think, and I believe my view is shared by the corporation, that it makes for better housing arrangements and for better all round citizenship if there can be incorporated into housing projects a good cross-section of the Canadian way of life. For that reason we have always stated that we have no objection whatever to having any federal-provincial project incorporate a percentage of aged citizens or any other class of Canadians.

I did remind the citizens of Vancouver that under other provisions of the act such as the limited dividend section, where a limited dividend company, which is a private organization, takes the initiative and asks for a loan from the federal government and that loan is approved, they are then free to house any people they choose. That device has been used successfully in Vancouver and elsewhere to house senior citizens.

Mr. Green: Does the minister not think there is a great difference between say a group of one racial origin being put in a housing project and a group of senior citizens? I do not see that there is any similarity there at all. There is a great need for help for our senior citizens. Why should the dominion government lay down a policy of that kind which certainly is not contemplated under section 36 of the act? There is nothing of that kind set out in that provision or in any other section of the housing act that I can find. I hope the minister will adopt a policy that deals specifically with senior citizens.

Certainly there is a demand in British Columbia for projects of this kind to help our senior citizens, and I think that demand should be considered quite apart from any other demand. Let them be treated on their merit. Here is a demand that has great merit and has public support. People in all our cities are in favour of steps of this kind being taken, and I believe the minister, in laying down the policy that he will not give assistance to a project for senior citizens, is running counter to the spirit of the act itself. I hope he will reconsider that stand.

It is quite evident that the statement made by the Vancouver housing association in its letter of May 14 is correct and that there has been and is delay now because of the policy adopted by the minister. I must protest it. I think it is very unreasonable and unfair to the people in Vancouver who are trying to work out a scheme of this kind, and particularly unfair to the senior citizens of this country. They deserve far better treatment than they are getting under a policy of this type. Goodness knows they have a hard enough time to get along on their meagre payments even in British Columbia, where they can get $60 a month. I do not know how people are able to live on that amount, and surely they should not be deprived of the benefit of this act by the policy which the minister has explained today is in existence and which is entirely contrary to the terms of the legislation itself.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, as I have had a good deal of correspondence with the minister on this very matter for a good many months past and for some months before this letter came to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and myself, may I say that to me the minister's answer makes it very clear that there is no conflict between the policy he is trying to pursue and the policy suggested in the letter from the Vancouver housing association, where they say in paragraph 3:

> There are no doubt good grounds for objecting to the segregation of old people in large projects, but if the projects are broken down into smaller units and scattered over different neighbourhoods, as our association has suggested, this objection no longer holds good.

That is exactly what the minister told me many months ago with respect to his objection to the plan proposed by the Vancouver city council subcommittee under Alderman Anna C. Sprott. His objection was that he did not think it was wise to have too many of what he called islands of housing for old people alone, and it was partly in view of what the minister had written me that I tried to make the strongest plea I could, on the occasion of an earlier reading of this legislation, for action for old people's housing under the limited dividend section.

I personally think we are going up a blind alley by putting all the emphasis on section 36 of the act. It does not seem to me that section 36 is the best section under which to proceed with housing for old people, and that if everybody inside and outside the house really put their shoulders to the wheel and got interested service clubs, churches, branches of the Legion and so on to take the initiative under the limited dividend section we would have a lot of old people's housing that we have not now.

As I see it, under that act they cannot possibly lose. For the whole lifetime of the entire project their loans are under the government guarantee. In other words I think there is no conflict between the views held by the minister and the views held by the Vancouver housing association. They both favour these small units scattered over the whole neighbourhood, and not great big islands of old people's housing.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a few words in support of what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. As a matter of fact I think we are many years behind other countries in this question of looking after the housing for our old people. I have brought the matter up previously in connection with veterans across Canada. I think some effort should be made not only to provide homes for our old veterans but to provide homes for the old people in general. I know the sentiment or feeling among many people across Canada today is that our old people are not being fairly treated.

Today we have perhaps many more old people in isolation than formerly on account of our social legislation. They are put in what are called nursing homes; they are isolated; they are off by themselves; they have no community life of any kind. I believe this is one of the important problems confronting us here in Canada. It is not only a local problem in Vancouver; it is a problem all across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

In the city of Saint John a short time ago a decision was made, I believe, to establish homes for old people. When I was overseas many years ago I recall that in certain sections of England homes for old people had been established. They were a sort of community homes. If an old man and his wife were living together a home was provided for those old people. There was a place for them to go. There was a place also for old bachelors and others. There was a definite community, and over this community there was certain supervision. For instance, there was a nursing organization that looked after the health of the old people. There was a recreation centre where the old people could have recreation.

I believe there is a great need for that sort of thing in Canada today. I think the minister's department could very well take this matter under consideration. In centres all across this country some provision should be made so the life of the older people of this country would be made happier and more contented instead of, as I say, putting them away in a nursing home, in a room away back in the country or in some city, somewhere by themselves where they are unhappy and where they are obliged to live out their last days in loneliness and almost in privation as far as social life is concerned.

I think this is a great question. As I said before, I have raised it in connection with veterans' housing. It also applies to other old people. I am in hearty accord with what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has brought out this afternoon. We are behind other nations. We are behind Sweden, Great Britain and most European countries as far as this problem is concerned.

Mr. Henderson: I should like to say a few words on this bill and on the topic under consideration which has been discussed by those who have spoken previously. I might say that I am pleased that in the city of Kingston we have a group of public-spirited citizens of all races, religions, creeds and politics who have joined together to take advantage of the limited dividend provision of our legislation in order to provide good low-rental housing for senior citizens. At the same time, I think most of our senior citizens like to enjoy that feeling of independence which comes from feeling that they are paying for what they are getting.

With respect to this Bill No. 215, I might say that I am pleased to see that the limitation is removed from part III whereby that part would apply only to low or moderate cost rental housing or for municipal, provincial or federal public purposes. I am glad to see that part III can now be made use of, upon the approval of this bill, so that blighted substandard areas may be put to the best use.

That is most important in older cities like Kingston, for instance, which I represent. In many of these old cities, though they have many historical parts, possibly the early planning has been interfered with by the growth of our country. Many municipalities are looking for an equalized assessment whereby certain areas may be used for either commercial or industrial use in order to increase the assessment where other assessments for an increased number of homes at the beginning cost the city a great deal more money than the tax return. The removal of this limitation certainly will assist the municipalities looking for these features in removing their blighted and substandard areas and putting them to better use.

I am also pleased that the bill provides that the administration of the National Housing Act will pay one-half the municipality's cost of acquisition and clearance as such costs are incurred, rather than waiting for a long period of time. This removes a considerable burden from the municipal authorities who enter into a scheme like this.

In conclusion I might just say that I should like to congratulate the minister and those charged with the administration of the National Housing Act. May I say that their far-reaching thoughts by this bill keep the National Housing Act not only in step with the growth of our country but in particular with the growth of our cities as our country grows. Once again I feel that I can endorse it as very good legislation.

Mr. Knight: I should like to say a word or two on this topic, Mr. Chairman. I think it is a good thing in our modern society that more and more we are beginning to assume our responsibilities toward our older citizens. It is, of course, the fortunate fact that people live longer nowadays, but for that reason a problem is created in that there is a longer spell of, shall we say, leisure life which must be provided for. As to these projects that have been mentioned in connection with old people's housing, may I say that we also have some of them in my city and my province, and that everybody is extremely happy about that fact.

I think an important thing is this. When something is being done in the nature of a project of this sort, somebody must start it. There must be local participation. I think that local participation should be encouraged. It is a fine project for service clubs and people of that sort. With regard to private homes, of course the private individual puts up the necessary money that Central Mortgage and Housing does not put up and the matter proceeds. But someone must take the lead in projects of the type mentioned here by two or three of the hon. members who have spoken previously. I want to stress the idea that encouragement should be given to local participation so that people will go out actively to start these projects which are, as I see it, one of the greatest needs of our modern society.

I am going to suggest to the minister that there is a way in which he could encourage such projects. I do not know his own opinion about the matter. I do not know whether or not he considers that these are good things. I know we did have a bit of a struggle to get some of them started, or to have some of them considered by Central Mortgage and Housing, but my suggestion is this. Where people are prepared on a local basis to go out and put up their own money through public subscription—let us say the Kiwanis Club come to me and say they want to get another of these homes for senior citizens started, am I prepared to give them $100 toward this project—I think that money should be considered as a charitable donation and should be deductible for income tax purposes.

I know the minister may say, as many ministers have a habit of doing when you get tied up with two departments, that it is the responsibility of the other department. I am well aware that the Minister of Finance has to be persuaded about this. I think the minister to whom I am now addressing myself has a responsibility, being in charge of housing, for bringing some pressure to bear on his colleagues so they will endorse that particular proposition. I know that a definite attempt has been made, and I know that in my city we are lacking one of these homes for elderly people today as a result of the fact that the government has not seen fit to agree with that particular part of my argument. I think if the ordinary private individual, professional man or worker, is prepared to put up a couple of hundred dollars of his own earnings in order to benefit the community in general and in particular that section of the community which is unable to help itself, that man should have consideration and the donation should be considered as a charitable gift for the purposes of income tax deductibility.

I want to be a little careful about the word "charitable". I do not want it to be understood that anything we do for these senior citizens who, certainly in our western provinces, have contributed so greatly to the wealth of this country, should be considered as charity, if there is indeed any stigma attached to that word. I merely use that expression because it is the technical one in connection with deductibility for income tax purposes. I would plead with the minister to collaborate with the Minister of Finance to see if that could be brought about. I think perhaps it would solve to some extent a problem which has been in the minds of many municipalities, particularly the cities throughout the country.

I have heard Vancouver mentioned, and I am surprised if the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has found that his municipality is unable to get this type of loan. I am sure my hon. friend's information must be correct. Was that my hon. friend's statement, that in Vancouver he has discovered it is difficult to get money for this particular type of home?

Mr. Green: The hon. member has asked me a question. I pointed out that eight months ago the city of Vancouver submitted a plan to the two senior governments, the provincial and dominion governments, for the construction of a 130-unit housing project for senior citizens, and nothing has happened. Mind you, there are other projects in greater Vancouver, some of them financed by churches or service clubs, but here was a case where there was a specific proposal put up which has been stalled and I am trying to find out whether it has been killed and just why this is so. It looks as if the dominion government is responsible.

Mr. Knight: I think my city has been more fortunate in that regard. We have not, as my friends suggested, these big places where a great number of people are isolated. Our projects are smaller and are scattered here and there throughout the city. The elderly people themselves are so happy about it. I am quite sure if the minister would follow our suggestion he would find a happy solution to the problem. I know of one particular case where they are just waiting to go out and fill up the subscription list if they could get the amounts made deductible for income tax purposes.

Mr. Philpott: Make the contributions through the churches and then take them off income tax.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's comments on the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra lead me to say something about it. The city of Vancouver has asked that steps be taken under the provisions of section 36 of the housing act to provide housing accommodation for elderly persons. The minister in his statement has taken the position that the proper way to handle a situation of that kind is by resort to the limited dividend housing corporation sections of the act. While on the one hand it is suggested that the provisions of section 36 should be used for the purpose, I take it that the policy view indicated by the minister is that if anything is to be done by way of providing special housing accommodation for elderly citizens it should be done by the use of the limited dividend housing corporation provisions.

The minister raises the further point that the idea of the segregation of elderly persons is not in harmony with the policy of the government in relation to housing for elderly persons. It is quite true that the limited dividend housing corporation provisions of the act have been used in a number of cases to provide housing accommodation for elderly persons. No doubt where that is possible it is a useful way of meeting the need, but it is quite evident that those provisions are not adequate to meet the entire need. There are many places where the local support, financial and otherwise, is not adequate to sustain the incorporation of a limited dividend corporation for such purposes. I would join my colleagues the hon. members for Vancouver-Quadra and Royal in urging that use should be made of the provisions of section 36 in such cases.

I cannot follow the minister's argument in relation to segregation of elderly persons. There certainly could be some forms of segregation that would be quite intolerable if applied to housing accommodation constructed under the provisions of section 36 or any other provisions of the act. "Segregation" is a baneful word and has many nasty connotations that I am sure are not in the minds of any of the hon. members in this house, but there surely is no reason in principle why housing accommodation should not be constructed specially for the use of elderly persons. I do urge that there should be an abandonment of any rigidity in the policy of the government in this regard. I do not think it is a case for a rigid policy at all. It is rather a case for the application of a policy designed to make the provisions of the act as effective as possible for meeting the needs that parliament recognized in enacting the provisions.

The needs of elderly persons are in many areas the most acute needs, and particularly those who have nothing to provide for their subsistence except the old age pension. I think the minister will agree that in the case of such deserving persons, if we are to wait until there are enough local resources and enough local initiative to make use of the limited dividend provisions of the act, then such persons are going to continue to suffer and will not have any opportunity of living in decency in their declining years.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I associate myself with the remarks of my colleagues and urge that the department and its agent, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, should not allow rigidity to characterize their approach to needs of this kind. The need is there; the need is paramount in the consideration of parliament. Parliament is not going to be niggardly or carping in its approach to questions of this kind. Let there not be rigidity because, it seems to me, in the face of considered requests such as those which come from the city council of Vancouver, what is needed is an understanding and a flexible approach, not a rigid one.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, briefly I want to support the pleas of the previous speakers for flexibility in the act to provide for the needs of our senior citizens; but I rise particularly to ask the minister a question. It has not to do with policy; it has more to do with purpose so far as this act generally is concerned.

In the city of Trail for a good number of years they have been plagued by the Canadian Pacific Railway track running through the centre of the city. Consideration has been given throughout the years to changing this situation, particularly in the Rossland avenue area. Plans have been considered for the redevelopment of this area, the relocation of the yards and the freight sheds required for the business people of the district in one particular place, and the removal of the necessary houses and their transfer to another location. At the present time this problem is being considered on the basis of financial co-operation between the city and Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, with the Canadian Pacific Railway more or less looking after its own track removal and things of that sort.

Would a redevelopment scheme of that nature come under the terms of the amendments to this act at the present time? I am speaking of the relocation of the yards, the relocation of those persons who have to be moved from certain areas because of the poor type of buildings and the necessity to move them, and so on.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, there is a specific clause in this bill, namely clause 23, under which I think this could appropriately be discussed. I would refer my hon. friend to it so that he can peruse it and have its provisions in mind when we reach it. I think that a reading of the clause will answer some of the questions he himself has raised. If it does not, then I shall be glad to deal with it when we come to the section. We are on a specific section now, namely section 1, having to do with home extension loans, and we were diverted into a discussion of housing for aged citizens in Canada. I have just been asked to ensure that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not become too rigid in its application of government policy. I can assure hon. members it will not.

I remind the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, who is mistaken in some of his statements—I am not too concerned about that because the general principles are the same—that when he says there is a proposal before us, there is not. This has been a matter of discussion, but no specific proposal has been put before us so far. The situation, as I said in reply to him, is that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as well as myself believe it is quite in order to house a percentage of senior citizens in any federal-provincial project. Generally speaking, and without being rigid about it, we think it is all right that about 20 per cent of the tenants of any such project should be senior citizens, and that has been a part of the policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I have statistics which show that, as at the present time, the total percentage of senior citizens in relation to the total population—and when I say "senior citizens" I mean those over 65 years of age—is 7·73 per cent. As against that we are agreeing that it is quite in order to house up to 20 per cent of senior citizens in a federal-provincial project.

At the same time we say that if anybody else wishes to show the initiative that so many already have shown to develop limited dividend companies and obtain a loan from Central Mortgage and Housing, then it is their responsibility to house anybody they wish within the appropriate income range. They are simply the borrower, and they have all the rights and privileges of administering the project as they see fit and of housing anybody they deem desirable.

Therefore rather than discriminate against the senior citizens, which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra might have implied without actually saying so, I think quite the reverse is the case. I am quite sure that my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare could make quite a convincing statement and assert to the satisfaction of all members of the committee that the senior citizens in Canada have not been discriminated against but, on the contrary, the government has gone a long way in meeting the needs of this very worthy group of Canadian citizens.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, that is all very well, but here we have one specific case. If the minister did not get a written application from the city of Vancouver, at least his officials have been discussing this particular project with the city for a matter of eight months. I am told by reliable people vitally interested in housing, and working on a community service basis on this problem, that this project has been submitted to the government; a 130-unit housing project for senior citizens at 47th avenue and Knight road in Vancouver under section 36 of the act.

Now, there is an actual application; and there is a possibility for 130 senior citizens to benefit if the project goes through. What I should like to know from the minister is whether or not that particular project can be approved by the dominion, or is he going to follow the policy that not over 20 per cent of the people going into one of these projects can be senior citizens? If that is the case it is obvious that there is not the slightest chance of this plan which has been put up by the city of Vancouver becoming a fact.

I think that would be a great tragedy. The city is actually prepared to step into a plan of this type which will help 130 people, and I hope the minister is not taking the broad position, that he will rule against that plan because it is a plan exclusively for senior citizens. Apparently that plan has been worked out by the city of Vancouver in the belief that there is a need that should be met. Section 36 of the housing act obviously could be used for that purpose if it were not for this ruling by the minister which, with all due deference, is very rigid, since he said a few minutes ago that he will not allow more than 20 per cent of those living in one of those projects to be senior citizens. What is the minister going to do with regard to this particular project? It has been delayed now for a matter of months.

Mr. Winters: There is no official project before us.

Mr. Green: The minister himself said he had been discussing it with the council of the city of Vancouver.

Mr. Winters: We have been discussing general principles.

Mr. Green: What was the minister discussing if not this project?

Mr. Winters: The hon. member should not make such assertions.

Mr. Green: Does the minister say that he has never heard of this project?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I understand that officials of the city have discussed a suggested proposal with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They have brought it forward in the nature of a feeler to see what the reaction would be. There is no specific proposal. Nothing has come forward from the province, as is required under section 36 of the statute. I wish the hon. member would not mislead as much as he does.

Mr. Green: If a proposal to implement the plan I have been discussing were submitted, would it be considered by the government and would there be any chance of it being accepted?

Mr. Winters: How could I say when I have not seen it?

Mr. Green: The minister is just evading the issue.

Mr. Brooks: What cities and towns have made specific provision for this 20 per cent? I understood the minister to say that 7 per cent had been provided for already.

Mr. Winters: I am afraid the hon. member for Royal did not hear my statement. I said that the percentage of old people in the total population was about 7·73 per cent, and that as a general rule, without any of the rigidity which my hon. friend tries to associate with us, we have been telling the local housing authorities that we see nothing wrong with allowing up to 20 per cent of the total in any of these joint projects to be senior citizens.

Mr. Brooks: What cities have submitted plans to the department?

Mr. Winters: I would say that there are federal-provincial projects in about 50 cities across Canada.

Mr. Brooks: Is that to provide for older people?

Mr. Winters: Older people and other classes of citizens; not exclusively older people.

Mr. Brooks: Did the city of Saint John recently make application for accommodation for older people? I saw in the press some time ago that they had.

Mr. Winters: I have no knowledge of any proposal from the city of Saint John to house older people exclusively.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I have a comment to make regarding homes for senior citizens arising out of the comment made by the hon. member for Vancouver South in which he referred to islands of housing for older citizens and suggested that this was not a good policy. I suggest that the need for housing for senior citizens is very great and that the main thing is to get some form of housing provided.

In our own province we have recognized the advantage of getting away from multiple units, the institutional type of housing, and have provided more of the cottage style self-contained units. In answer to the inference drawn by the hon. member for Vancouver South and I believe by the minister, may I say that in my belief the main thing is to do everything we can to increase housing for senior citizens. They are the ones in the community who are generally unable to take advantage of the provisions of the act. Those who are working and with years of life ahead of them are possibly in a position to build homes, but many of our senior citizens have no savings and are unable to pay the 10 per cent required by the act.

I think the main thing is to provide housing for senior citizens. I gathered from the minister that there was some hesitancy or reluctance about going too far in the provision of housing for a particular group of citizens, and those to whom he was referring were our senior citizens.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two comments regarding the situation in Saskatchewan. There seem to be three points where there is a difference of opinion between the government and the people in Saskatchewan, but these points apparently are receiving further consideration by the department.

One point at which we were at variance was as to the number of hostel units and the occupancy of those units. As hon. members know, we in Saskatchewan have put a different interpretation upon the act and have been building hostel units on the basis of one hostel bedroom unit for every ten general units. That has been done under section 16 of the act and does not apply to other provinces. In spite of that we were restricted to a 50 per cent occupancy of hostel type units. We believe that should not be the case, and I understand the government is now giving serious consideration to the request of Saskatchewan. I hope the minister will look with favour upon that request.

The second point had to do with double occupancy of hostel units. Again I understand the government is giving serious consideration to this request.

We asked that June 1 as a cut-off date for applications for limited dividend type accommodation be extended until October 1. I understand that this request is being given serious consideration by the government.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Mortgage insurance fund.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the remarks made today with respect to senior citizens, and this subject formed the main part of my remarks during the debates on April 23 and April 26. During the debate on April 26 I asked the minister if there had been large commitments under the insurance fund, and he indicated that there had not. There are some other questions I should like to pose and a suggestion I should like to make in respect to the fund.

What is the present amount in the insurance fund? Is the fund in liquid form, or has it been paid out to other insurance companies? I understand from the minister's previous answer that there are no commitments, so it would appear that the fund is bigger than it need be. If the fund is in liquid form, and as the rate of 2 per cent on mortgages running up to a total of $1 billion would return something like $20 million a year, I would suggest that the money be reinvested in homes for senior citizens at reduced interest rates.

Mr. Winters: The fund stands now at something over $12 million. There have been no charges against it so far. It is liquid and is invested in government securities, the interest from which accrues to the fund under the provisions of the statute.

Mr. Hahn: Has consideration been given to reinvesting it in a scheme of homes for senior citizens wholly owned by the dominion?

Mr. Winters: No consideration has been given to that, and I think it would be difficult to carry out. This is an insurance fund to guarantee certain obligations, and I think we are under an obligation to keep it in liquid form so we can discharge quickly any commitments which might arise. The hon. member knows that a substantial change was necessary in the Bank Act before we could induce the banks to lend against the security of residential mortgages, and this is one of the provisions that made that possible.

Mr. Fleming: The fact is that the government could not lawfully use the insurance fund for the proposed purpose.

Mr. Hahn: I am satisfied with the statement of the minister that the fund must be kept solvent at all times and that my suggestion would require a change in the Bank Act, but I would draw to his attention that when making these particular changes—we know that we pay our senior citizens a regular income—that there could be an automatic charge on the old age pensioner in the way of rental and so continue keeping the fund itself solvent. Certainly, as it is indicated at this time that there is no demand on the fund we can only hope that conditions will remain such that the demand will not be too great and that the fund should not become too great in itself.

Therefore I contend that some consideration should be given to this other aspect of the reduction of the interest rate. I am not sure that the fund has been in operation long enough for the actuaries to determine whether a reduction could be contemplated at this time, but what consideration is being given to the reduction of this rate? Would the minister say that possibly the fund has not been in operation long enough to determine that at the present time?

Mr. Winters: I would say the latter is the case. We have obligations against the fund of over $600 million worth of residential mortgages, and I would be hesitant to do anything that would run the risk of making the corporation unable to meet any obligations that might possibly come against this fund. I do not foresee any. The Canadian economy is strong and the fact that we have had no charges against the fund now indicates that mortgages are in a healthy position, but I do not think $12 million to guarantee a total amount of over $600 million is too much at this stage of our experience.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Aggregate maximum of four billion dollars.

Mr. Fleming: In clause 5 we have a provision that section 13 of the act is to be changed in order to raise from $2 billion to $4 billion the aggregate amount for which insurance is to be provided under the mortgage insurance fund scheme of the act. Would the minister give the committee a report as to how far the fund is committed, and how this figure of $4 billion has been chosen as the desired increased amount?

Mr. Winters: At the end of 1955 the figures I have indicate that commitments have been given of more than $1 billion, and that undertakings are being made at the rate of about $600 million a year. The present ceiling of $2 billion would be reached about the middle of next year.

Mr. Fleming: If the present rate continues, then, the new $4 billion ceiling would be reached probably around 1960?

Mr. Winters: That is right, because I thought it was logical that the ceiling should be set at such a level that the minister would be required to come back to the house during the course of the next parliament.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if there should not be a little more control on the administration than that? After all, the doubling of this huge amount would mean, even if the present substantial rate of commitment continues, that the $4 billion fund would be ample to meet all current requirements at least until 1960. That means it would not be necessary in the ordinary course, so far as one can foresee, for the government to come back to the house for another four years.

I wonder if that is not too long, with a view to maintaining strict parliamentary control while at the same time affording every opportunity to make financial provision adequate for all foreseeable needs, and in that way to make the provisions of the act as efficacious as possible. I ask if it would not suffice to increase this already substantial total ceiling to, say, $3 billion. In the ordinary course that would mean that the $3 billion limit would be reached, say, about the beginning of 1959. Surely that is quite long enough when we are dealing with substantial amounts of money like this. After all, $2 billion is still a large amount of money, in spite of the astronomy that we resort to in this house at times in regard to expenditures and commitments.

I raise that point quite seriously, as to whether all apparent needs would not be fully provided for and at the same time more effective guarantees of parliamentary supervision and control preserved by making the new ceiling $3 billion instead of $4 billion.

Mr. Winters: I am sure the hon. member is aware that these figures we are talking about are not government expenditures at all. They are just ceilings of commitments by the lenders.

Mr. Fleming: But the principle of parliamentary control is involved. It is a question of commitment rather than expenditure.

Mr. Winters: I think parliament should have adequate opportunity to scrutinize the operations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and its administration of the terms of this statute. The hon. member will see, as we get through the various sections of the bill now before us, that we are making provision to give parliament more scrutiny than it has had before of the operations under the statute, and particularly those provisions that involve the expenditure of moneys provided by parliament.

This is simply our authority to guarantee mortgage lending up to that level, and I personally am of the opinion that $4 billion is a reasonable figure in relation to our present commitments and the rate at which mortgage loans are being guaranteed at the present time. I might say to the hon. member that at the outset there was a feeling that the figure should be somewhat higher, but after we gave a great deal of consideration to this particular point we decided that $4 billion was reasonable in relation to the present ceiling of $2 billion and the rate at which loans are being guaranteed now.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think the point the minister is making is nearly as sound as he seems to think. What we are dealing with is the right to make commitments that are binding upon parliament, binding upon the public treasury. It is quite true that we are not dealing with expenditures. It is not as though we were voting money in the estimates for expenditures; nevertheless it is clear that we are permitting the creation by this section of public liabilities.

Let me give you those figures briefly again. Already the commitments to December 31, 1955, amount to $1 billion. The present commitments are coming in at the rate of $600 million a year. The present ceiling of $2 billion will be reached in the ordinary course about the autumn of 1957. If an increase of another $1 billion is permitted, that at the present rate is going to provide for all foreseeable needs until the beginning of 1959, and I see no necessity for adding another $1 billion of possible commitment to that before the government must come back to parliament for review of this matter and to seek, if the conditions then warrant it, the right to increase these commitments.

We are dealing with vast sums of money here, and the right to make huge commitments binding upon the public treasury of this country. Surely we do not need to make a provision of this kind that far into the future. I press the point upon the minister that it is quite adequate and quite in keeping with the generous attitude the house has shown with regard to the provision of funds to assist housing under the various parts of the National Housing Act if we increase the ceiling from $2 billion to $3 billion instead of $4 billion. Will the minister not accept that suggestion?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can add to what I have said. In the light of the best judgment we could bring to bear upon the matter $4 billion seemed reasonable. I must say I thank the hon. member for his comments, but in our judgment we will stand on the $4 billion in the bill.

Mr. Vincent: Was any consideration given to the possibility of insuring the borrower instead of the lender? At the present time I think the lending institutions are well protected, but on the other hand if the borrower does not make his mortgage payments he can be foreclosed. If the borrower were insured his monthly payments would be insured. Therefore I do not think the fund would require to be as large because the government would not be called upon to pay bulk sums of money. Instead, the government would only be called upon to pay in cases where the borrower could not meet his obligations. It is not to be assumed that the borrower could not meet his obligations indefinitely, because after all we do not assume that the country would be in such a crisis that we would have to pay the monthly instalments for years to come. In other words, if foreclosure should take place, instead of the government having to pay $8,000 or $9,000 on a guaranteed loan, if the insurance were paid by the borrower for the borrower instead of being paid by the borrower for the lending institution we would arrive at a proper solution whereby the borrower would benefit from the insurance premium he has paid and at the same time the lending institution would be protected.

I do not think there is any lending institution in Canada that wishes to take back any property on which it has made a mortgage loan. They are not in the lending field for the purpose of engaging in the administration of property. They do not wish to take back property on which they have lent money. Consequently if we insured the borrower his monthly payments would be insured and at the same time the lending institutions would benefit and would be protected. Therefore we would not arrive at the improper situation where the borrower would have paid his fee and at the same time would face foreclosure after five or six months of non-payment on his part. Should some crisis arise in Canada we would be faced with an unfortunate situation whereby many people would have to vacate their homes after having paid a 2½ per cent insurance fee. The lending institution is protected but the borrower, the home owner, is not protected.

What consideration has been given by the government to this matter in order that the insurance will protect both the borrower and the lender? I think the limit of $4 billion would be sufficiently high, because we would not have to pay out bulk sums of money and put out on the street people who have already paid an insurance fee to protect their homes and mortgages.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member may recall that the former member for Spadina made a good speech in the house several years ago in which he advocated a program of equity insurance. That matter was explored very fully. The question is often asked why we insure the lender and do not insure the borrower. That is followed by a supplementary question as to what the borrower gets for the insurance premium he pays. The obvious answer is that he gets mortgage money which he would not otherwise get, so by paying the insurance premium there is assurance that he will get mortgage money.

That was the only basis on which the banks could come within the provisions of this statute, as my hon. friend is well aware. The other side of the argument has to do with just what is an insurance principle under the operations of this statute. There have been very few cases indeed of foreclosure, certainly not enough to make an equity insurance principle one of general application, and since the 1954 statute was enacted there has been no call to charge against the insurance fund at all. Therefore it is a very difficult concept to think in terms of asking all borrowers under the statute to pay into an insurance fund to protect the relatively few cases out of all the thousands of borrowers who have had mortgage money under the National Housing Act.

I think the number who have been subjected to foreclosure would be much less than 100. In other words the percentage is negligible. Therefore that is also a consideration when one thinks in terms of an insurance principle and the charges that go with asking people to contribute to an insurance fund. In reply to the hon. member's specific question, the answer is that this matter has been given a great deal of consideration but that at the present time the government believes the insurance principle is warranted only to guarantee an adequate flow of mortgage money into residential housing.

Mr. Vincent: The life of such mortgages being 25 years, I think the principle should be studied still further and that some consideration should be given to the situation. Last year I spoke to the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, who is in the house today, and placed the problem before him. It may not be a very vital problem today or a measure that is essential at this moment, but I think we should look into the future and that the officials of C.M.H.C. should not just drop the question but should keep on studying the matter to see how the insurance principle could work in case it should be needed in the future.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Contributions to municipalities for clearance of substandard areas.

Mr. Bell: I should like to refer specifically to the situation in Saint John. May I say at the outset that we have a difficult slum clearance problem there because of the fact that Saint John, New Brunswick, is the oldest city in Canada. We also had a fire which completely destroyed the city. The entire city had to be rebuilt and naturally the houses are all of the same age and at the same stage of depreciation. What general plans are being negotiated at the present time with respect to slum clearance?

I should also like to ask this specific question. In the city of Saint John I understand that the municipality is planning to investigate slum clearance and planning generally, and that they have asked some experts from Toronto to come to the city this summer and conduct a program in that respect. I was wondering whether the minister could say whether the costs of these experts, if there are costs, can be charged up to this section. I have just those two thoughts in mind, namely the general program and the specific cost of planning.

Mr. Winters: Under part V of the present statute we have made a grant to the city of Saint John to conduct a study of housing conditions there. The relationship is that the federal government pays 75 per cent of the cost of making the survey. I understand that it is either under way now or will be very shortly. Saint John has done quite a good job in public housing. They have an extremely active housing authority there. Several projects have been developed, all of which have turned out successfully, in my opinion, and have met a need. This is one of the places in Canada where I think good progress is being made in accommodating a class of citizens that perhaps otherwise could not have had the type of decent accommodation with which we have been able to provide them under the partnership arrangement provided by section 36 of the statute.

Mr. Ellis: In the explanatory notes of the bill I note the statement that the main part of the bill has to do with part III. I was wondering whether the minister could tell me how many projects were undertaken under the old part III, the part III that this act will supersede.

Mr. Winters: There have been only two cities in Canada that have taken advantage of the slum clearance section of the statute, although a good many cities, as I said before, have taken advantage of section 36 which is related to this matter dealt with in this bill before us now. The two cities that have taken advantage of the slum clearance section of the statute are Toronto, which has developed that large Regent Park North project, and St. John's, Newfoundland where a good job has been done in removing some of the slums that existed in that city.

Mr. Ellis: I was just trying to assess the result of the change suggested in this bill. I note that the main change seems to be in the formula under which the government will provide assistance to the municipality concerned. I note that under the present part III the government makes provision for a contribution based on the difference between the cost of the clearance and the eventual price realized from the project, and that under the proposed change the government will make the contribution on the basis of the over-all cost and will recover later.

My question is this. How will this affect the over-all contribution made to the municipalities? Will it have any effect—that is my point—or will it still mean that the government is making roughly a 50 per cent contribution under either formula?

Mr. Winters: I think the big contribution this section will make to the redevelopment of cities is in the end use of the redeveloped land. The present statute places a limitation on what the redeveloped land might be used for. This amendment opens that considerably. In many places where there is substandard housing it often happens that the area does not lend itself to redevelopment for housing purposes, as I said before in the house. I think that has been one of the obstacles in the way of civic redevelopment. We are saying now that redeveloped land may be used for its best purposes. That is spelled out in the section. It envisages that an area which is now given over for residential purposes can be used for commercial, industrial or other purposes, whichever is the highest use for which the area is envisaged in the over-all civic plan.

On the monetary side of it, the general formula is the same but the change in application I think is important. The old formula provided for a grant which was half the net cost of acquiring and clearing the land, and a grant was made after the operation had been completed. That meant that the municipality was obliged to finance the undertaking from the outset until final completion and to carry all the charges that go with financing. Under the bill now before us it will be possible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to pay as the costs are incurred, and thereby relieve the municipality of quite a bit of the heavy onus of financing the project during the course of acquisition and clearance.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I can appreciate that slight effect, in that a municipality will perhaps be spared the carrying charges on a certain sum of money which under the present section it would be obliged to provide. However, I am concerned about the 50 per cent formula, because in answer to my previous question the minister intimated that there had been only two cities in Canada which had been able to take advantage of this assistance or which have seen fit to do so.

I hardly believe that cities in Canada are not anxious to avail themselves of any assistance. I am quite certain that cities throughout Canada would be most anxious to undertake projects of this type. I can only conclude that their failure to do so is based on their inability to finance their share of the cost. My suggestion therefore is that while the change will be of some slight benefit, I am not too certain that as a result of this new bill we shall get any substantial increase in slum clearance throughout the country. I hope I am wrong in that respect, but judging from the past record I think we have no real reason for believing that the municipalities are going to be in any better position now than they were a few years ago to undertake the tremendous burden of 50 per cent of the cost of slum clearance.

With reference to the statement made by the minister that under the new section, the removal of the limitation in the existing part III which requires that this land be used for low-cost or moderate-rental housing or for federal, provincial or municipal public purposes will perhaps provide a further incentive to municipalities to clear blighted areas, may I say that we are concerned about housing. While I say it is highly commendable that municipalities across the country should undertake the removal of blighted areas, nevertheless if they are simply going to reassign that area to commercial purposes, for example, we are still not getting to the heart of the matter, which is the provision of adequate low-cost housing.

I am just wondering now whether the minister really feels that the elimination of this previous restriction is going to assist—and I should like to know the manner in which it is going to assist, if he feels it is going to do so—the building of additional low-cost housing units in those cities.

Mr. Richardson: Perhaps before the minister replies to the hon. member for Regina City I might make an observation and ask a question. First of all, there may be some difference of opinion between the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, representing Bonavista-Twillingate, as to which is the older city in Canada, but certainly one who comes from Montreal as I do would believe that Montreal is the most mature city in Canada.

The question I should like to ask is whether, in view of the agreement which has been entered into by the three authorities in respect of the rehabilitation program in Montreal, there is anything we on the federal side may do to expedite the matter? The very fact that it has been brought about recently, does not that partly answer the question raised by the hon. member for Regina City?

Mr. Winters: Perhaps I might answer this question and thank the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George for his contribution.

I know he is interested in the so-called Dozois plan, which is one of the big projects for development under this section. The other large redevelopment now moving forward is Regent Park South in Toronto. I do think this section will overcome most of the barriers that have been in the way of civic redevelopment. I am sure my hon. friend from Regina City has cause to know that the problems are not always of a fiscal nature. In the city of Regina some time ago interests there favoured a federal-provincial housing project. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation thought it had merit, but the local taxpayers themselves turned that down.

Mr. Ellis: Actually I campaigned for it.

Mr. Winters: Often it is the case that local problems dealing with civic administration or what might be called local politics are more severe than local financial problems. We found that to be true in many municipalities across the country, and it is quite understandable. I have no criticism to make of civic administrators who find great difficulty in uprooting citizens who have lived in a certain area for a long time, in demolishing their homes and having them go to live elsewhere. Sometimes these problems have been so severe locally they could not be overcome regardless of the financing arrangements we might have made.

I think this new approach to the financing problem will help in so far as financing is an obstacle in the way of redevelopment. The hon. member made an observation as to whether or not we were really coming to grips with housing rather than redevelopment for commercial and industrial purposes. The answer is that we have tried to keep squarely before us that this is a measure to assist housing. If the hon. member will read the various sections of the clause, for example paragraphs (c) and (d), he will see that great emphasis is placed on housing. In fact paragraph (d) says specifically:

> A substantial part of the area at the time of acquisition was, or after redevelopment will be, used for residential purposes.

Paragraph (c) delineates even more specifically the government's intention that there shall be adequate housing for those people who are displaced through any redevelopment.

As to the Montreal plan, there has been a proposal made to us by the city and I understand that a statute of the provincial government of Quebec has authorized the city to act as its agent in entering into a slum clearance operation with us under section 36. I would imagine that under provincial statutes there will need be an order in council. We have no knowledge that the order in council has been passed. There has been no direct communication from the Quebec government to the federal government to indicate that they have authorized the city to act as its agent. But as I said before, I do not see any barrier that will develop there. The proposal is with us now and we are giving it very careful study. I assume that whatever steps will need to be taken as between the government of Quebec and the city of Montreal will be taken so this project can go forward without any delay.

Mr. Vincent: I would not like the opportunity to pass without saying a few words on part III, because I happen to be representing a constituency which really needs housing redevelopment. I think the minister is aware that within the last month or so Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have opened an office in my constituency. I must comment very favourably on the outcome, and on the achievements of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, especially in the constituency of Longueuil which needs redevelopment. We have made great strides. During the four years before the new act came into force approximately $7 million worth of loans were made in all seven municipalities in my constituency. In the past two years this amount has risen to $8,500,000, and municipalities which previously had not obtained loans have obtained loans under the new act. I think that in this respect Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the National Housing Act, 1954, have really played a big part in housing in my area.

Nevertheless I think the problem of housing redevelopment is still very acute. We have, for example, in the city of Jacques Cartier a population of approximately 38,000 people. Up to a year ago the city unfortunately did not have sewage or water facilities. Now the population has spent about $12 million and has a proper sewage and waterworks, so they are ready for a real redevelopment program. Consequently I hereby advise the minister we will be knocking at his door to have some plans approved for slum clearance and the replacement of substandard homes by new homes. Certainly the city will take advantage of this act in order to develop a plan whereby the present situation will be cured.

Before sitting down I should like to know from the minister how the estimates of the cost of acquisition of land and clearance of the area are arrived at. In other words, who does the estimating and how are those estimates made?

Mr. Winters: The hon. gentleman's question was who makes—

Mr. Vincent: Subsection 4, paragraph (a) says:

> An estimate of the costs of the acquisition and clearance of the area;

On what basis is the estimate made and who makes it?

Mr. Winters: If the project develops along the pattern that has prevailed so far, a committee is set up composed of representatives from the levels of government concerned. In Toronto it was the civic, the provincial and the federal government levels. They constituted a committee and made estimates. In Montreal, where the provincial government indicated to the city that it would be empowered to act as its agent, there was a committee with membership from the city of Montreal and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The estimate was compiled under the general supervision of that committee. The initiative in the first place must come from the civic authority, as my hon. friend can well appreciate. The bill provides that it must be done with the knowledge and authority of the provincial government concerned. So I would imagine the city authorities would be communicating with the provincial government, and then it normally flows through that channel to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I asked a question on section 1 and the minister advised me to read section 23. Well, I have read it two or three times and I am not quite clear as to the interpretation; therefore I am going to repeat my question. I said the city of Trail has been concerned about removing the tracks of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which pass through the centre of the city, to a location at the north-west end of Rossland avenue, removing certain houses, some of which are not quite good and others not so suitable, making a yard at the end of Rossland avenue for the unloading of freight and the building of warehouses, and so on.

This matter has been very carefully gone into and it is suggested that the relocation of the tracks, the building of the railway yard and the provision of warehouses, and so on, could be provided for by co-operation with the city and financial assistance from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

My question is this. Would this section apply under those circumstances; that is, would any agreement be affected by the fact that the company was willing to bear a share of the cost and the Canadian Pacific Railway the cost of moving the tracks and doing certain things in connection with the yards? Will the minister explain to the committee what procedure the municipal council should adopt in making representations with respect to the use of this section?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, it is pretty hard for me to sit here in Ottawa and judge whether or not a project in Trail could qualify under this statute. I do not know enough about the local conditions. There are certain elements about it, however, as expressed by the hon. member, which would raise doubts in my mind as to whether it could qualify. On the other hand he said that part of the area is now given over to housing which needs to be redeveloped. Perhaps that part could qualify. We would have to make a study. I presume the city of Trail would be prepared to initiate some investigation as to whether the project they have in mind could qualify under the statute. I refer the hon. member for Kootenay West particularly to paragraph (d) of clause 23, which reads:

> A substantial part of the area at the time of acquisition was, or after redevelopment will be, used for residential purposes.

We must keep in mind, as the hon. member for Regina City said, that this is housing legislation.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to mention that the Minister of Fisheries visited Trail recently and I think raised their hopes considerably, which is quite normal procedure for cabinet ministers. What should I suggest to the council? Should I suggest that the council would be well advised to present the whole scheme to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Winters: Yes, I would suggest that.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I referred a few moments ago to the removal of the limitation which exists in part III where slum clearance is a factor in the agreement between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the municipality. I was quite aware, as the minister pointed out to me, that 3(b) and 3(c) in particular of section 23 refer to the fact that where the buildings in an area have to be torn down and the area made available for perhaps industrial purposes, or whatever purpose the municipality sees fit to use it for, alternative accommodation must be provided to those who are dispossessed at reasonable rents.

I note that the section calls for provision of this housing through either sections 16, 19 or 36; but I suggest that if the municipality is going to pay 50 per cent of the cost of slum clearance of a blighted area, and then be called upon to make a contribution with respect to construction of low-rental housing, presumably under section 36—because certainly it is difficult to believe that under the other sections housing could be built, which would provide for the needs of people who are in those blighted areas—I think the minister realizes that limited dividend corporations are not going to charge the type of rents that the people who are now living in blighted areas can afford to pay. I know rents in the limited dividend housing dwelling units—low-rent housing they call it—are often in excess of $60 a month. Certainly people living in slum areas in our large cities are not going to be able to pay that amount of rent. Therefore I suggest it will have to be brought about under section 36, in which case of course the municipality is again going to be making its contribution.

Now, in the event of slum clearance, if the houses on that land bring a sufficient return to exceed the cost of the purchase of the land, it means that the municipalities are going to be put to an extra expense. I am trying to make my point quite clear. If the municipality went ahead under section 36 I am suggesting that it might well be that under subsection 3 of section 23 of part III of the act the municipality would find itself in a position where it was paying more as a result of the diversion of this property to industrial or commercial purposes. Perhaps the minister can reassure me on this point. This is the doubt that exists in my mind at the moment.

Mr. Winters: I feel that the municipality has a great deal to gain from these projects. It almost invariably develops that the land redeveloped produces more revenue than it did previous to the redevelopment. I believe that when municipalities make detailed studies they will find that they are the level of government which really stand to benefit most directly from any of these redevelopment projects. And rather than having the weight of the financial burden bear on them I think they are in a very favourable position to benefit from those redevelopment projects.

Mr. Regier: Since I noticed that these amendments would be before us today I looked up what the minister had to say at page 3332 of Hansard. I should like to read what he said:

> . . . the Liberal aim, namely, to provide adequate housing for every Canadian.

Then I read on in his comments, and I am going to relate this to part III in a very few moments. He pointed out that the average down payment in 1955 was $2,821. He further indicated that in 1955 some 490 loans had been made to people whose income was under $3,000. When we consider that the average down payment is $2,821, and that out of 100,000 housing units fewer than one-half of one per cent were purchased by those whose income was under $3,000; and when we consider that there are more people in Canada whose income is under $3,000 than those in excess of $3,000, I think the minister will agree that we are not providing as much housing for the people of Canada who really need the housing as both he and the rest of us, I am sure, would like to see us provide. I feel that the act is in effect being used to help build houses for people many of whom would be able to build their own houses without assistance. So far as that statement is correct the whole act is falling short of its original objectives.

We now have part III, which is headed "Urban Development". I do not intend to express any opposition to the proposed amendments, but I do feel they will take away our attention from what the real purposes should be. I realize that this new part will serve a useful purpose. We on the lower mainland can certainly use it if we can persuade our ratepayers to co-operate. However, I feel that an extensive use of this new part and the leeway which is to be granted will take away our attention from the real need, that is the providing of more housing for people in the low income brackets.

I do not know what all the answers are, but I do know the local government is expected to take the initiative under the new part. What does that involve? The minister referred to the citizens of one Canadian city who were faced with a plebiscite and who voted out a proposed redevelopment scheme. I can sympathize with the local taxpayer who resents the taxes on his home being increased in order to meet an obligation which he feels should be assumed by society as a whole and not be the direct responsibility of the real estate which he owns within that municipality.

I know the minister is anxious at all times to expand home construction, and I feel that perhaps the provincial governments are more to blame than the municipal and federal governments. I should like to ask the minister whether any efforts have been made by his department to persuade the provincial governments to assume more responsibility, to carry on a little more education and to make it easier for the municipal people to endorse redevelopment undertakings?

Has the department made any effort to induce the provincial governments to assume more of the initiative? I realize it is hard for a department in Ottawa to assume much of the initiative in removing a blighted area in a city perhaps thousands of miles away, and which may not be of such immediate urgency in Ottawa as it is back home. Yet the taxpayer back home feels he is being overloaded; he does not want to take the initiative, and the provincial government places the blame on the municipal and federal governments. Have any efforts been made along these lines?

Mr. Winters: Yes. I am sure all hon. members are aware of the section of the British North America Act which makes property and civil rights a provincial responsibility. Housing and property associated with housing are clearly matters of property and civil rights; therefore the provincial governments have a definite responsibility where the housing of their citizens is concerned. I think generally speaking all provincial governments recognize and accept that responsibility.

When section 35, now section 36, of the housing act was being developed in 1949 I visited every provincial government accompanied by the then president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We had a number of discussions with the appropriate ministers about housing and about what could be done to house the class of people who could not normally contemplate their own houses under the home ownership provisions. I found there was quite a keen interest on the part of the provincial governments, which has manifested itself to a considerable degree in the utilization of section 36 of the present statute.

Apart from that we are in constant communication with the provincial governments. A warm and friendly relationship obtains between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the various provincial agencies. There is a quite active and close co-operation, but I think this is a matter in which the local citizens could play a prominent role. They should try to assume a measure of responsibility and initiative and to create an awareness by the proper level of government of the need for doing something in these fields, where private citizens are not capable of building or owning their own homes.

Mr. Regier: If I may pursue that a little more, I believe the other day the minister listed the Canadian cities in which blighted areas had been redeveloped. Is there a provincial government in Canada which has paid more than the municipal government in the carrying out of such redevelopment schemes? I realize the federal government pays a portion of the cost and assumes some responsibility for losses that may occur in connection with the operation of such a scheme. Is there any provincial government that is offering to its municipal governments that it will pay more than the municipal government will be asked to pay? If so, what are those provincial governments?

Mr. Winters: The sharing between the municipal and provincial governments seems to vary from province to province. For instance, in connection with the project at St. John's, Newfoundland, the provincial government has paid a full 25 per cent of the cost. Regarding the other big slum clearance development in Canada, Regent Park South, the provincial government paid $1,000 per unit whereas one-half the cost of acquiring and clearing the land, which was paid by the municipality, would be of the same magnitude. In addition the municipal authorities stood the cost of building the project over and above the $1,000 per unit. That is all the information I can give the hon. member, because there have not been any other slum clearance projects in Canada. I hope this legislation before us now will stimulate further activity in that field.

Mr. Regier: Would the minister have information about the large housing development in Vancouver that was built under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation auspices? What was the relationship between the two levels of government there?

Mr. Winters: In the Little Mountain project?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Mr. Winters: The federal government paid 75 per cent as provided by the statute. To the best of my knowledge, the municipal government and the provincial government divided the remaining 25 per cent equally, paying 12½ per cent each.

Mr. Ellis: I wonder if the minister has any information on the relationship between the cost of clearing blighted areas and the value of the land after the clearance had taken place on the two projects to which reference was made a short while ago.

Mr. Winters: What is the question?

Mr. Ellis: I was asking the minister if he could state the relationship between the cost of clearance of the two blighted areas that were discussed a few moments ago—I believe one was in Newfoundland and the other was the Regent Park North project in Toronto—and the value of the land. I would like to get the relationship between the cost of the clearance and the value of the land if it is going to be used for industrial purposes.

Mr. Winters: In Regent Park North, which is the one developed so far, the end value assigned to the cleared land was $1. I have forgotten for the moment just what the arrangement was in Newfoundland. I am not sure I fully understood just what the hon. member is seeking to find out.

Mr. Ellis: A few moments ago the minister suggested that municipalities would be in a stronger position as a result of this change in that the blighted area, when it is cleared of buildings and made available for sale for perhaps commercial or industrial purposes, is going to yield a sufficiently high price that the municipality is going to benefit, and I presume the government will benefit to the extent that under some circumstances it is not making any grant at all to the project.

Mr. Winters: I am still not quite clear. Perhaps the hon. member and I could have a private chat about this. Normally when the land is redeveloped its value is higher, as in the case of Little Mountain, where the property as it stands now is much more valuable than before the housing project was built.

Mr. Ellis: That is the information I wanted. I wanted to know whether the minister could give some specific information. He has made some generalizations, but I would like to know if he has something specific.

Mr. Winters: I have no specific figures of land values before me.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

On clause 9—No liability after loans aggregate $200,000,000.

Mr. Fleming: In clause 9 we have another of those clauses in which the amounts provided for in the existing act are being increased. This time the aggregate amount provided by section 26 for guaranteed home improvement loans and guaranteed home extension loans is being increased from $125 million to $200 million. I wonder whether the minister could give the committee the figures upon which this increase has been calculated?

Mr. Winters: Under this section so far we have insured over $30 million of loans. I expect that with the higher level of loan we are going to make possible, if parliament approves this bill, the rate of home improvement loans will run considerably higher, and we estimate that the ceiling here would be reached at about the same time as the ceiling for insured loans, which we discussed a few moments ago.

[Mr. Ellis.]

Mr. Fleming: I do not wish to repeat what I said on the earlier clause. The significance of the minister's answer is that the amount now proposed, namely $200 million, will provide all the requirements of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in this respect until the year 1960, in other words four years in advance. I think that is too long a period for parliament to be making provisions of this kind in advance. I believe we shall maintain parliamentary control much more effectively with a shorter period than the one contemplated. A period of four years is too long in provisions of this kind. I think it is altogether desirable that there should be more frequent parliamentary review in regard to such financial provisions. The minister was not prepared to accept my suggestion in discussion of the earlier clause, and I take it he is no more amenable to persuasion on this one, seeing that the dates contemplated in both sections are approximately the same, but I wish to repeat what I said in the interests of strict parliamentary control.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Limitation.

Mr. Fleming: In clause 11 we have a provision extending the time within which proceedings may be instituted for an offence. Whereas under the present section the limitation period is six months, under the new clause it will be three years. I should like to ask the minister what experience has given rise to this proposal.

Mr. Winters: There have been experiences where, in connection with false statements made in obtaining a loan, six months has proved too short a period to allow the bank to catch up with the statements. It seemed to the corporation that in the interests of good administration we needed a longer period than six months to overtake the fraudulent efforts that occur from time to time. Six months is a rather short period, as the hon. member well knows, and in the several instances when it needed to be applied it has proved too short.

Mr. Fleming: I can follow the minister on that, but he has not told us why it needs to be three years. In the particular case to which he refers, within what period was discovery made of the alleged fraud?

Mr. Winters: The official of the corporation informs me that three years is the period they consider necessary in the light of the experience they have had, and also in the light of the longer risk period that we are providing for in the bill before us now.

Mr. Fleming: That does not answer the question. The minister purported to base his earlier observation on some specific experiences of the discovery of the evidence of fraud. What was the period in the particular cases within which the evidence was discovered?

Mr. Winters: I am told that in one instance a period of some eight months had elapsed, and in other instances there has been a longer period, but I have no specific information before me now as to just what the periods were in the cases we have had.

Mr. Fleming: I do not require greater persuasion to believe that the period of six months is short and should be enlarged, but I think the committee has been left quite in the dark as to why the period should be enlarged to three years.

Mr. Winters: Another reason, as I said, is that under the present statute the term of the loan is three or five years, depending on the amount of the loan. We are extending the period of the loan to ten years which, it seems to me, has some bearing on the argument I am advancing that we should be allowed a longer period for overtaking these attempts at fraud.

Mr. Fleming: It is a little hard to see what the length of the loan has to do with the period within which any fraud should be discovered. What possible relationship does the minister see between those two factors?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, as I said at the outset I am basing my reply on the experience of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Fleming: But their experience falls so far short of what you are asking.

Mr. Winters: Just in that one instance where it was eight months against the six months allowed now, but there have been other instances where they have not been able to overtake these attempts in that time. In the light of their experience they believe they need three years to achieve effective administration of this section of the act.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, with all respect for the judgment of the officials, I believe that is a quite inadequate reason for making a change in the statute law of this country, and I think we should be given some better reason. As I have indicated, I do not require a great deal of persuasion to yield to the suggestion that the period should be increased from six months, but we have had one case only, apparently, where the period of limitation prevented prosecution. In that case the alleged fraud was discovered eight months after the period of limitation began. That is no reason at all for extending it to three years. I think it is quite evident from the minister's last answer that the suggestion that there is any connection whatever between the length of the loan and the length of the period within which the officials of the corporation ought to be able to discover fraud, if there is any, is just too far-fetched to have any bearing.

Unless there is some better reason for extending the time I do not think the minister has made out a case at all for extending it to three years. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has had a good deal of experience in a professional way with the criminal law. I think he would not be lightly disposed to support a lengthy increase in the period of limitation in a section like this without some better reason than has been given. Surely what we want here is to maintain and keep before the officials of the corporation at all times their duty to be vigilant and alert, and if the impression gets around that there is plenty of time and that they do not need to worry because they have three years, I do not think this sort of provision is going to keep before these officials the necessity for being vigilant and alert.

Surely what we want in this respect is twofold. First of all we want the sanctions of the law there to restrain potential lawbreakers from breaking the law. In the second place we want effective and early enforcement so that if there are wrongdoers who do break the law those who are charged with the responsibility for enforcing the law are going to be swift in the discharge of their duty in executing the law; and surely to give them a nice comfortable feeling that they have three years to work on is not going to achieve the kind of results that we as a parliament should be seeking.

Mr. Lesage: I have one observation. Why should parliament give to the man who is guilty of fraud the comfortable feeling that if he is not caught in one or two years he will get off the hook? That is what my hon. friend proposes now.

Mr. Fleming: No, it is not.

Mr. Lesage: That is what I understand he proposes now. After all, why should a man guilty of fraud under this section—I understand it is a question of fraud through false statements.

Mr. Fleming: It is offences under the section. We have talked about fraud.

Mr. Lesage: When it is a question of false statements and fraud it is quite possible it will take more than seven or eight months.

It may take a year and a half or two years. I believe it is only reasonable to make the period three years. Why should a man who is guilty of fraud get off the hook because it has taken more than six months to discover his fraud? I do not believe that is reasonable; and from the experience I have had, as my hon. friend knows, I believe that under the circumstances three years is a reasonable limitation.

Mr. Fleming: Let us bear in mind that we are dealing here with a section which has been in effect and which has set the period of limitation at six months. That was put forward by the government. Let there be no question about where the responsibility lies for the idea as to the length of the period of limitation. This was put forward as government legislation and presumably the government was satisfied at that time to set a period of six months on the limitation of prosecution in offences of this kind. As I understand it, the reason for setting a period of limitation is to impress on those who are charged with the responsibility for enforcing the law the need for being alert and vigilant.

Mr. Lesage: That is the reason.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, and it is a very good reason. Apparently it was good enough to commend itself to the government in putting the provision in the legislation in the first place, and good enough to commend itself to the judgment of all members. Now the period is to be considerably enlarged. Nobody wishes to make the role of the lawbreaker any easier or the problem of the law enforcement officer any more difficult. Wherever there is wrongdoing we wish to see it discovered and those responsible dealt with properly, but I think we are all very conscious of the necessity of keeping before those who are charged with the responsibility of enforcement the duty of being alert in the discharge of their duty. It strikes me from what we have been told today that three years will give the officials a very comfortable feeling.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I feel that if a change such as this is to be put forward by the government the minister should be in a position to tell us how many prosecutions have been launched under the section and how many prosecutions were not launched because the time limit provided now had expired. Unless we have such information I do not think it is fair to any of us to have to make a decision whether this is a proper period of time or whether it is not.

I am not directing these remarks in any particular way, but I am always a little surprised at how soon after people in the legal profession come to this chamber they become administrative-minded and begin to think about how much easier it would be for the department to carry on with a little extension of this type.

I am not thinking of people who are guilty and who are going to get some benefit out of this. I am thinking of the numerous people who are put to the trouble of a defence under a section of this kind and in many cases are found innocent. As a matter of fact I am reminded that sometimes the evidence is lost in the meantime and witnesses are not available because of lapse of time.

Mr. Lesage: There is no limitation for most offences under the Criminal Code.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That may be so; but if we have a continuation of this type of legislation then I assume that we will have a general extension in all types of legislation. Therefore I say I really feel that the minister should have statistics which will show how many prosecutions have been launched, when they have been launched, and how many have not been launched because of failure to come within the period of time set out here.

Mr. Winters: I am sorry, but I do not have those statistics before me. However, as I am sure hon. members know, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not become aware of this condition until the banks inform them of it, and there is usually a lapse of time in that connection. The banks themselves may not know of misrepresentation until a default occurs, and this may not occur till many months after the offence. I do not wish to ask for a longer period than seems reasonable under the circumstances. The officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, from their experience in the administration of this section, have informed me that in their best judgment three years is a reasonable time in tracing down these cases of false statement and other frauds which come to us, as I am sure hon. members know, through the banks. The cases do not come to us directly in the first instance. A sufficient space of time must be allowed so these matters can develop and then be referred to us by the banks when they become aware of the false statement or fraud.

Mr. Fleming: I do not wish to prolong this discussion, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to make this concluding observation. I intend no disrespect for the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation when I say this. I would have the same observation to make about any government officials, or at least about their judgment, if a similar statement were made by any minister in advocating any legislation that he was asking the house to pass.

When ministers come before the house asking the house to approve legislation we ought to have something more than simply a statement that the officials, in their experience or in their judgment, think this is the kind of legislation that parliament should pass. Parliament has a more far-reaching responsibility than that. Whatever the opinion of the officials may be, what parliament wants is the information upon which the officials reached their judgment. Parliament may or may not arrive at the same conclusion as that arrived at by the officials. It is not enough —indeed it is far from being enough—simply to be told that the officials have arrived at certain conclusions. The officials may or may not have taken into account all the factors that parliament may think ought to be taken into account. The officials may or may not have attached to the various factors the weight that parliament, with its experience, thinks ought to be attached to them. If we are to be asked to support legislation of this kind, I think we want more information given to us than we have been given here this afternoon; and in particular we want something more than just to be told that the officials, in their judgment or in their experience, think that a three-year period is required.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the period has been extended just in order to give the department more time in which to look into the fraud situation. I think it has been extended in order to impress the borrower, so that he will feel responsible. If a fraudulent borrower feels that within six months he may be caught but after six months he is free, he will not be too scrupulous with regard to his business dealings. He will feel that by waiting six months he can get away free. But if he feels that the department has three years in which to catch up with him, he will be more careful with regard to his actions.

I think that is the reason the period is being extended to three years. I do not think it is in order to give the department more time. I think it is in order to impress the borrower with the fact that there is a period of three years during which he can be caught up with. I think the period of three years is all right.

Mr. McIvor: No one knows as much about the act as do those who are required to put it into practice. I think we should listen to their advice.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, we like to hear their advice and I think that is what we are here for. They should be here with the information, and should give it to us directly, not on the basis that they have come to some conclusion. In this respect I am a little disappointed that we do not have the statistics we should have in order to make an adequate decision.

Mr. Fleming: Surely the hon. member for Fort William is not suggesting that we should abdicate our legislative function to the officials?

Mr. McIvor: Certainly not.

Mr. Fleming: Why must we accept their judgment without knowing the grounds upon which they have arrived at it?

Mr. McIvor: I have seen a mechanic on a machine that was extremely hard to run. After he had run it for a year he know more about it than did the people who bought the machine.

On clause 12—Home improvement loan insurance fund.

Mr. Regier: This clause deals with insurance on home improvement loans. What I should like to ask applies as well to insurance on the ordinary National Housing Act loan. The complaint that is so widely made is that this is one-sided insurance, that it is insurance for the lender while there is no insurance for the borrower.

In some other debate—I believe it was at the time of consideration of the minister's estimates—I mentioned the fact that there was a feeling that the department should be able to arrange, with relatively little inconvenience, an insurance scheme which would be a little more extensive than the present scheme and which would provide protection for the borrower as well as for the lender. I had in mind particularly mortgage insurance, so that if the purchaser, or whoever had the home improvement loan or the N.H.A. loan, should pass away, the mortgage would be paid off; not the company paid off and the family lose the home.

I wonder whether the minister can tell us whether his department has given any consideration—either a year ago or recently when they drafted these amendments—to the possibility of extending the insurance feature in that respect. If so, what conclusion was arrived at?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I have already answered that question. I answered it when it come up under another section. I think it was when we were discussing matters of general interest.

Mr. Regier: In that case I will read it in Hansard. I was obliged to be absent from the chamber for the purpose of attending a meeting.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister this question. Suppose a municipality had a rather peculiar and difficult problem something like the one I suggested previously. Under this section can they call upon your people to come in, look it over, advise them and make a study of it?

Mr. Winters: This is the section under which I think it would be appropriate for them to approach the corporation in that regard.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you.

Mr. Regier: Would this be the section under which a municipality might ask the federal government to undertake the study of housing conditions where people live on land owned by the federal government or on water that is under the jurisdiction of the federal government, and whereby a municipality might be able effectively to invite the federal government to do something about these slum areas that are definitely under federal jurisdiction?

Mr. Winters: Before answering that question I would have to know more about what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Regier: I am sure the minister has had representations made from Vancouver at various times with regard to people living on the flats. They are living in Burnaby as well. They live on federal government land. Many of them live in houseboats. Some of the conditions under which these people are obliged to live—and I am not blaming those people—are beyond description. I believe on a number of occasions appeals have been made to the federal government to assume its responsibility and supply these people with more adequate housing, but no action has ever been taken or no responsibility has ever been assumed by the federal government. On looking over this section, I might say that it looks as though it would be a wonderful section in that it would provide the municipality with a vehicle for appeal to the federal authorities. Am I right?

Mr. Winters: I do not see any reason why, quite outside the terms of the statute, the municipality could not bring that problem to our attention if it is one for our jurisdiction and responsibility. I shall be glad to bear in mind what the hon. member has said.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS CHANGING NAME, AUTHORIZING SUPPLYING OF OTHER UTILITIES, ETC.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 250, to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I made some general remarks in regard to this bill during the resolution stage, so I shall have very little to say at the present time. However, after having received the bill and studied it to some extent I have been wondering about the position of possible private operators who may wish to establish public utilities of any sort in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. An examination of the bill by no means makes their position clear.

I am wondering particularly whether the bill as drawn places what will now be known as the Northern Canada Power Commission in a position where it has complete control of public utilities of any kind in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. In other words I am wondering whether it is possible for a private company or individual or even a municipal district to establish a public utility of any sort except with the consent of the commission and under its control. That is the one general point which I thought perhaps I should mention, and perhaps we might have some explanation from the minister.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I did not have an opportunity to make a contribution to this debate when we were at the resolution stage, Mr. Speaker. It deals with an item of tremendous importance to Canada, because I feel that the bill before us, which is an attempt to broaden power development in our north land, is perhaps one of the most important steps that could come before this house.

In recent months there has been renewed attention given to development in the northern part of Canada. This has largely resulted from the fact that we have been building up our defence resources in the north, as far north as the extreme Arctic area. I think it is only fitting that we should try to bring the right balance to bear upon the subject by shifting the emphasis to activities that will have more positive results, the general problem of development in northern Canada.

In a statement to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects the subject is summed up very nicely. In referring to the matter of the development of Canada's northland, the writer of this note used the following words; he was comparing the extent of development in northern Canada to similar development in the northern regions of the U.S.S.R.:

> Canada has not done as much. This is not a reflection of discredit. Our population is much less; we have had an enormous work of development in the south; and our belief in private initiative and freedom of enterprise has caused us to refrain from the policies of government direction and control that have determined the lives and work of people in the Soviet union. We must, however, be fully alive to the importance of our northern frontier and of the resources—many known and many as yet unknown —that lie within it. It is not necessary, nor, it is submitted, is it at all desirable, for us to wait inertly for economic forces alone to set the terms and the pace of our action. Entirely in line with sound economic progress, a great deal can be done by national policy to hasten and extend our northward development. In a region as vast as the Canadian north, with problems of distance and climate, developments cannot occur with the speed they do in smaller countries or in the southern part of Canada. If we are going to want and to need the resources of our northland in 10 or 20 years, the time to begin the work of getting them is now.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that quotation sums up very precisely the attitude this parliament should take toward the development of that northern part of Canada. Now, the bill we have before us—

Mr. Lesage: May I just ask a question of the hon. member? Was he quoting from the submission by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories to the Gordon commission?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, the Northwest Territories submission.

Mr. Lesage: By the commissioner of the Northwest Territories, who is also the deputy minister of the Department of Northern Affairs?

Mr. Dinsdale: That is correct. Basic to the type of development outlined in this report is the development of our power resources. If we are going to be able to exploit the rich resources of the north it means that power must be available. From time to time in this house we have discussions as to whether power should be developed by public or private endeavour. Certainly, so far as the northern power potential is concerned, it would seem to be the responsibility of the national government to take the initiative in this regard. Only when we have power available can we expect the private investor to become interested in the northern part of Canada.

I could go on ad infinitum to place on record the tremendous power resources that are available there. I noticed in a report on this matter in the external affairs bulletin for December of last year, the Yukon river alone has the staggering waterpower potential of 4·5 million horsepower, which is one quarter of the present developed capacity of all Canada. There certainly is, therefore, plenty of opportunity and scope for increased and vigorous action in this regard. In the long run the power, of course, will be used to develop the rich resources that have been stored in the Canadian shield. It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that most of the territory that we refer to as northern Canada is contained within the Canadian shield region, and this Canadian shield is one of the great mineral-bearing regions of North America.

Before you can develop your natural resources, one of the important problems that must be met is the population difficulty, which has been one of the major deterrents to development in all parts of Canada. We are a large geographic area. We have unbounded material resources; we have all the things that are necessary to make Canada a truly great industrial country. We lack one thing. This is a truism; it is almost a cliche these days. We lack adequate population resources. Lack of population is the great obstacle to Canadian development.

This is particularly true in northern Canada. While we have all the power and natural resources there, it seems to me that because of the transportation difficulties, it is going to be necessary to stimulate the settlement of that country and that, of course, will be interconnected with the development of power, and the development of power in turn will mean the development of our natural resources. The U.S.S.R. are away ahead of us in this respect. They have established several large cities in the northern part of that country. Admittedly they have a much longer history behind them.

This bill is at least a realization that we have to become much more active in the northern region of Canada than we have been in the past. So far as maintaining population is concerned, the argument is invariably put forward that climatic and soil conditions in what we refer to as northern Canada are not very suitable for supporting a large population; but as the result of recent geographical exploration and as a result of the increased interest in that territory we now know that there are 1½ million acres of arable land available for settlement. We also know that climatic conditions in large areas of northern Canada are quite agreeable to living a reasonable existence in that part of the country. For example, since 1947 we have had an agricultural experimental station at Fort Simpson.

While I am referring to the general problem of population I would not want to ignore the special difficulties faced by the native population. We have had discussions in this house from time to time—

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but he has been dealing with the general question of northern development, and he is now touching on the difficult human problems facing the indigenous population of the north. We are discussing second reading of a bill regarding the Northwest Territories Power Commission, and I respectfully remind you, sir, that we should deal with the principle which underlines a bill which has nothing to do with the problems of the native population of the north.

Mr. Dinsdale: I do not quite understand the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was merely going to say that we have had—I heard the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce say something. He made some comment about not understanding.

Mr. Pickersgill: Continue.

Mr. Bell: That goes without saying.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was going to say that we are faced with this indigenous native population problem and it seems to me, in reply to the query raised by the minister, that the bill, by encouraging the promotion of power potential which in turn will lead to the development of our resources, is going to be a much more positive way of handling the native population problem than by direct relief. I raise that issue merely by way of further support of the principle of the bill.

Finally, I should like to ask a question which the minister can perhaps deal with more directly when we come to the sections of the bill. I should like to present it to him at this time so he will have the reply ready. I am particularly interested in the fact that the principle of the bill extends to areas outside the Northwest Territories. I presume, Mr. Speaker, the benefits of the bill can be extended to certain provincial areas if those provincial areas are interested in developing the power potential of their northern regions.

I mention this because the prairie provinces have certain areas that might be regarded as being within the Canadian north. Those regions are also a part of the great Canadian shield and contain tremendous power resources as well as natural resources. If the benefits of this bill could be made available to certain of the northern areas of the provinces it would go a long way toward implementing some of the recommendations that have been made by this group, which has suggested that before we can develop resources by private means public authority should make available the power potential. I should like to have the minister comment when we come to the particular sections of the bill.

On motion of Mr. Herridge the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We will take second reading of the pipe line bill tomorrow.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

D.E.W. LINE PLANES—STRUCTURAL ALTERATIONS

Question No. 434—Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo):

1. Have any planes licensed to carry freight for the D.E.W. line construction project been structurally altered subsequent to licensing?

2. If so, have they been permitted to fly without further inspection after structural alterations?

Answer by: Mr. Langlois, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1 and 2. Section 215, subsection 2, of the air regulations, 1954, reads as follows:

A certificate of airworthiness is not in force during any period of major repairs or major modifications or under such other circumstances as may be specified by the minister, and does not come into force thereafter except after inspection and certification of the aircraft in accordance with any directions of the minister in that behalf.

The department has no reason to believe that any plane carrying freight for the D.E.W. line has been structurally altered contrary to the provisions of the above regulation.

NATIONAL REVENUE—PERSONNEL STATISTICS

Question No. 442—Mr. White (Middlesex East):

How many persons are employed by the Department of National Revenue in Canada; (a) customs and excise division; (b) taxation division?

Answer by: Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue):

The number of persons employed by the Department of National Revenue in Canada as at April 30, 1956, was as follows: (a) Customs and excise division, 7,554; (b) taxation division, 7,454.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—HOSPITALIZATION STATISTICS

Question No. 443—Mr. Pommer:

How many Indians were hospitalized in each of the years, 1953, 1954, 1955, for (a) tuberculosis; (b) other conditions?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

	(a) Tuberculosis	(b) Other conditions	Total
1953	3,008	32,339	35,347
1954	2,893	36,780	39,673
1955	3,343	31,156*	34,499*

* Figures are not yet available for Indians treated under the British Columbia hospital insurance service.

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS, 1955

Question No. 448—Mr. Hodgson:

1. What was the total amount of income tax collected in 1955, by provinces?

2. What was the total cost of collecting same, by provinces?

Answer by: Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue):

COAL SUBVENTION STATISTICS—NOVA SCOTIA-UNITED KINGDOM

Question No. 497—Mr. MacEachen:

1. How many tons of Nova Scotia coal have been moved to the United Kingdom with subvention assistance?

2. What is the average subvention rate per ton?

Answer by: Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys):

1. 265,609 net tons.
2. $2.34.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 17, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVATE BILLS

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck):

That the petition of Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited for a private bill, presented on May 14, 1956, together with the clerk of petitions' report thereon of May 15, 1956, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SASKATOON—REQUEST FOR CONTRIBUTION TO COST OF DRAINING SLOUGH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the recent consideration which he has given to the matter, is the minister now prepared to state if the Department of National Defence is prepared to share part of the responsibility with respect to drainage of the slough known as Hudson Bay slough which borders on national defence property at the airport north of Saskatoon?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I visited Saskatoon recently and this matter was brought to my attention. Since my return to Ottawa I have been looking into the background of the situation. As a result I am satisfied—and this was the point at issue—that the presence of our airport at Saskatoon has added somewhat to the drainage problem that existed there, and I am making certain suggestions to the mayor of Saskatoon with a view to meeting the situation.

GRAIN

GREAT LAKES SEAMEN'S STRIKE—TRANSPORTATION OF WESTERN FEED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the great lakes shipping strike. Can the minister say generally what quantities of feed grains are now available in eastern Canada and whether adequate rail shipments can be secured in order that eastern farmers may be assured continuing supplies of western feed grains?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Of course I have not the quantities at hand, but to the best of my knowledge there is no shortage of feed grains at the moment. Movement from Fort William and Port Arthur is continuing. A certain amount of grain is shipped down the lakes each day and I think that will continue to be the case. As far as rail movement east from the lakehead is concerned, small quantities of grain are being shipped every day and the quantities could be stepped up very readily. Movement east of Port Arthur is not being taxed to capacity, and I see no reason at all to suppose that there will be any difficulty about either domestic supplies or supplies for export during the next two or three weeks.

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What arrangements have been made to maintain the immediate highway approaches to the federal vehicle bridge, and the bridge itself, over the Burlington channel to help maintain this secondary highway after the completion of the new Burlington channel bridge by the provincial government of Ontario?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I think the hon. member is aware that the government has been maintaining the bridge. One side of the bascule bridge was destroyed some time ago and was replaced by a permanent structure which has been maintained by the federal government. Regarding the federal government's present attitude with respect to the permanent nature of the structure, I think a reference to the correspondence tabled in the house exchanged between the Ontario government and ourselves will indicate our views on that point.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO LANGUAGE USED IN DEBATE OF MAY 15

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him if he intends at this stage in our proceedings to make any comment with regard to his obnoxious language as recorded on page 3939 of Hansard, and I should like to ask him whether his reference to a "louse" was to himself or to me.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just a trained seal.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There was a good deal of offensive language at that time. I take deep offence at this reference to myself and I am far from satisfied with the correction, which is equally offensive. The remark I made at the time was a first reaction to the hon. member's remarks and expresses in somewhat unparliamentary language the feeling I had about the situation.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, with this precedent now before us, perhaps it will be permissible as well as appropriate to describe this government as lousy.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT REGARDING SETTLEMENT OF SEAMEN'S STRIKE ON GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister give this house any information on the progress being made in the settlement of the dispute between the seafarers' international union and the steamship owners?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Nothing in addition to what I gave yesterday, Mr. Speaker, except to say that the negotiations are still moving forward with good hopes.

FREIGHT RATES

FEED GRAINS—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the government give immediate consideration to the necessity of raising the present $4.50 freight rate subsidy on feed grains to the original $6 rate? Owing to the extremely late spring and the tie-up of shipping on the great lakes the eastern Canadian farmer finds himself faced with the necessity of buying additional feed which has become costly and scarce.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government a year ago gave full consideration to the freight rates assistance which is given on the shipment of feed grain from the prairies to other parts of Canada and equalized them as among the different sections of Canada to the point where we think they may be justified.

WATER RESOURCES

UPPER THAMES VALLEY AUTHORITY—INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION IN ESTIMATES

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the government as yet reached any decision with respect to an appropriation in the supplementary estimates for the upper Thames valley authority?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.—The Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order relates to the form of the bill, second reading of which has now been called. In the first place I would direct Your Honour's attention to page 357 of Beauchesne's third edition where there are given a number of rules of the House of Commons having to do with bills.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I immediately inform the hon. member that at one time I went into what he calls the rules of the House of Commons pertaining to the preparation of bills. This is a report from a committee of this house at one time but the report was never concurred in by the house. It may serve as a guidance to draftsmen but it is not binding on the house.

Mr. Knowles: All right, Mr. Speaker. I will not press that aspect of my point of order.

Mr. MacDougall: Quote from the Simpsons-Sears catalogue.

Mr. Knowles: So that those who read the record will know what you and I were talking about, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that rule No. 4 to which I referred calls for bills to be accompanied by explanatory notes opposite each clause of the bill. The bill before us has no such explanatory notes on any of the right-hand pages explaining any of the clauses of this bill.

The other aspect of this bill, as to its form, which I submit makes it impossible for us to proceed with it at this time, is that in the bill there is a reference to an agreement; yet the bill does not contain as a schedule thereto the agreement referred to in the bill.

I point out for Your Honour's consideration that the wording in this bill is quite different from that in some other bills in which it is said that the government may enter into an agreement. Rather, the wording here implies the existence of an agreement. I remind Your Honour that there are any number of statutes on our books, such as the Canada Shipping Act; the Great Lakes Fisheries Convention Act; the Bretton Woods Agreements Act; the Terms of Union with Newfoundland (Approval) Act, and a number of others I have listed, such as acts regarding income tax agreements with certain countries, in which parliament was called upon to deal with agreements that had been made by the government with another body or another jurisdiction. In each of those cases the agreement that had been made was made a schedule to the act so that parliament was brought into the picture.

In this case, though the agreement has been tabled and is known as sessional paper No. 174-P of the House of Commons, and though there has been plenty of reference to an agreement, and though some of us have copies of it and know what is in it, this agreement is not made a schedule to the bill. The bill makes reference to some of the conditions that would have to obtain in an agreement between the government and Trans-Canada, but the conditions set out in the bill that that agreement would have to meet are very few. I want to stick directly to the point of order, but just as an example may I point out that there is nothing in the bill that says the agreement must have in it a date by which the western leg of the pipe line is to be completed; there is nothing in the bill which says that the agreement must have in it a date by which the short-term loan is to be repaid.

Mr. Speaker: Could the hon. member tell me how these so-called omissions make it impossible at this moment for the house to consider second reading?

Mr. Knowles: Because, Mr. Speaker, it is a well established principle of our parliamentary institutions that parliament, indeed the House of Commons in particular, has complete control over the expenditure of money. If we are going to be asked to consider a bill which gives the government the power to make an agreement, the terms of which are not included in the bill, we are thereby giving the government power that properly belongs to the House of Commons.

In that connection, I remind Your Honour of some very important quotations that have been read to this house before by none other than the late William Lyon Mackenzie King. May I refer you in particular to page 159, volume 3 of Redlich, one of the authorities with which Your Honour is quite familiar. He says this:

> At first glance there does not appear to be much to learn from tracing the history of the forms of financial procedure. The motive power in financial development is not to be found in procedure, but in the growth of constitutional principles, in the acquisition by parliament of the sole right to grant taxes and in the further evolution of the predominance of the commons as the true representatives of the nation.

Later on the same page he says, and I ask that you take particular note of these words:

> Soon after the great change made at the end of the 17th century, political experience showed that a second principle must be established before the foundations of parliamentary government could be regarded as secure. It was necessary to gain for the commons full and unrestricted control over the destination of the money spent, to enable parliament to check its application and to see that expenditure corresponded to the grants made.

Similarly Mr. King on one occasion made reference to Durell's volume entitled, "Parliamentary Grants". In fact I note that certain passages on page 3 of this volume are marked with a pencil and for all I know they may be Mr. King's pencil marks.

> It is one of the old standing principles of our constitution that the House of Commons should control the finances of the country. In other words, the cardinal principle on which the whole of our financial system is based is that of parliamentary control, and by this is understood not the control of parliament in its constitutional sense as composed of sovereign, lords, and commons, but control by the commons alone.

Mr. Speaker: I indicate immediately that no one can contradict those basic principles; but how does the hon. member relate those principles to the bill and the second reading of it?

Mr. Knowles: Thank you for that question, Mr. Speaker. In my thinking the relationship is very direct. We have been given the right to look at an agreement made between the government and Trans-Canada but, as a parliament, this bill does not involve us in that agreement. In other words, after the passing of this bill the government can amend that agreement or make some other kind of agreement which would not have to provide for the repayment of the money or that the company be regarded as in default in the event of failure to achieve construction by a certain date. Therefore, because the agreement is not annexed to this bill as a schedule, because parliament is not made a party to this agreement, we cannot be sure that it will not be altered, amended or substituted, as has already happened in relation to this company.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, we are being asked to part with our control over the ultimate destination of this money; we are being asked to part with control over the guarantee of repayment; we are being asked to part with control over the terms and conditions under which the company would be regarded as succeeding or defaulting. And it is because we are being asked to part with that control that I submit that by this bill in its imperfect form we are being called upon to violate some of these basic principles to which I have already referred.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that though the bill itself does provide certain conditions that must obtain in the agreement, those conditions are far less than are contained in the existing agreement that is circulating amongst us; but we as a parliament are not a party to the agreement circulating amongst us and we will not be a party to it unless it is included in the bill as a schedule thereto.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in view of all the changes, the extensions and so on that have happened in the past, we have the right to feel that unless parliament itself is involved in this agreement, unless we are a party to it, unless it is in the bill, we have no guarantee that the agreement will not be changed by the two parties to it, and I feel that under the basic principle of the right of parliament to maintain control over the voting of money, over the destination of that money, we have the right to have before us a bill which is more than something pretty close to a blank cheque; we have the right to have before us a bill which includes in it as a schedule something that we vote on or in other words the very agreement that is going to be implemented so far as this whole proposition is concerned.

I am not denying the bona fides of the parties that made the agreement that is before us as sessional paper 174-P. The important point is, so long as it is only a two-party agreement those two parties can change it. What we need, if parliament is to be asked to vote for this, is a three-party arrangement. We have to be in on it, too. I submit that for reference to be made to this agreement, for it to be tabled, for it to be discussed by the minister who is sponsoring the bill and yet to keep it apart from the bill so that the government and Trans-Canada can amend it or change it as they wish to is being unfair to parliament and to that extent I suggest this bill is imperfect in its form; that it violates the basic principles of parliamentary control over the expenditure of money and that Your Honour should not allow the minister to proceed with it at this time. Indeed, under the provisions of citation 634 of Beauchesne's third edition, I suggest it is quite clear what Your Honour should do. Citation 634 reads:

> If the Speaker finds that the bill is in blank or in an imperfect shape, he will decline to put the question and will return the bill to the member who must take another opportunity of bringing it up in conformity with the rules.

Because of the extent to which this bill is blank in that it does not have the agreement attached to it as a schedule, and because of the imperfection in that it violates the principle of parliamentary control over expenditure, I submit that Your Honour should return the bill to the hon. member who is seeking to move it and ask him to correct these imperfections.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: There is a point of order before the house now. The hon. member cannot rise on a point of order when there is one point of order already before the house.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated that the bill has no marginal notes and no explanatory notes. The explanatory notes are not a part of the bill nor are the marginal notes. The bill has no marginal notes and no explanatory notes and they are not a part of the bill. The bill consists of the various clauses that are there. In order to judge whether a bill is in blank or in an imperfect shape, it had to have blanks when it was introduced and given first reading. There were seven consecutive sections.

The hon. member should perhaps remember that when the motion is made for first reading, the motion in fact has become so purely formal that we do not ask that the bill be now read a first time and be printed but in fact that is being ordered by the house to satisfy the requirements of standing order 74 which says:

> All bills shall be printed before the second reading in the English and French languages.

Standing order 72 applies to the introduction and prior to first reading. It says:

No bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape.

Therefore at that moment the hon. member cannot raise that point of order because he does not have a copy of the bill. The bill has not been printed. It is my duty, however, to satisfy myself. My satisfaction must be made on a very summary basis because hon. members cannot expect the Speaker to study every bill in an effort to find out whether or not something has been omitted. Hon. members have taken care of that situation themselves by insisting in their procedure that after second reading all bills be referred or committed either to one of their standing committees or to the committee of the whole and even if a bill goes to a standing committee it must be committed to the committee of the whole.

In the committee of the whole proper amendments may be moved, new clauses may be inserted and schedules may be inserted and that is the manner in which it is being done. To raise a point of order and say the second reading of this bill cannot be put because there is an omission in it is not correct. I think the hon. member will admit his point as to explanatory notes is not a good one and I do not think he would insist on that point.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in order to clear the ground for the more important objection, I will withdraw the first objection. But I press the second one.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's main objection is this. It is his contention that, because this bill refers to an agreement and the terms of the agreement not being a part of the bill and not being printed in extenso in the bill, the control of the house over the expenditures which may be involved therein is being denied. That is the way I would summarize the point the hon. member has made.

Control of parliament over expenditures is exercised through the financial initiative of the crown. The crown must recommend any expenditures which have to be passed through the house. The way the crown signifies its recommendation is through the Speaker now announcing that a royal recommendation has been given to a resolution that outlines the expenditures involved. When we are not dealing with a money bill, the case does not obtain. In this instance we are dealing with a money bill. The exigencies of the control of the house over expenditures have been met, in my view, by the fact that a resolution has preceded this bill, a resolution which was accompanied by the royal recommendation. These are the requirements of the British North America Act. These are the requirements of standing order 61.

We have done exactly what must be done in relation both to the section of the British North Amercia Act and to standing order 61. We have gone into committee of the whole. We have examined the resolution, which does not contain any details of the various sections of the bill but just gives an outline of the exependitures contemplated later in the bill. At this moment the bill has received its first reading, and it was ordered to be printed. Now it is up for second reading. If the hon. member's point was right, a new resolution would have to be introduced, because that is the only way to correct something missing in a bill in which the financial initiative of the Crown is involved. If that is not the point, then it can be corrected by the proper amendments being moved when the bill is in committee of the whole being studied, clause by clause.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I just say one word in support of my hon. friend? As far as the amendment of the bill in committee is concerned, that is problematical because often amendments moved in committee are rejected by the committee and therefore are not reported to the house.

Mr. Speaker: May I just say to the hon. member that surely he cannot expect the Speaker to rule on the probability that amendments may not be adopted.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not ask you to rule on that. I simply made the remark, which I think is perfectly correct, in regard to what happens in this house. This particular bill refers to an agreement—an agreement, moreover, made with the approval of the government of Canada before or after the coming into effect of this particular measure. We have no knowledge of that agreement other than that it was tabled and circulated through the house by request of members. This agreement is one of the most important agreements coming before the house in my time. In my opinion, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, this house should not only be apprized of what is in this particular agreement but this house should approve of the agreement when this bill is before the house on the second reading. We should be given that chance on the second reading.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

I submit that the bill was imperfect in the sense in which the rules require and that this bill should not be allowed by Your Honour to be proceeded with this afternoon. It is defective in a number of particulars. I am not going into them now. If we proceed, I shall go into them a little later on. But I think it is perfectly obvious that the main point of my hon. friend's objection is that the bill is imperfect because the House of Commons will not be giving by legislation approval of this very important agreement, which to my mind is fundamental to the whole discussion at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: I just want to say that, notwithstanding whatever sympathy I may have with the points that have been brought up, I cannot accept them as being a valid point of order at this stage in order to prevent the second reading being proposed by the Chair.

We are not dealing with the details of the bill at this moment. The second reading of the bill, according to citation 656 from Beauchesne's third edition, is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

It is precisely because there may be some imperfections in the bill that may be corrected after debate and motions proposed for the purposes of amending, which means either deleting or adding that the bill must go into committee of the whole. Sections cannot be referred to during the debate on the second reading. Therefore I must put the motion.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, are you ruling that this bill is in order?

Mr. Speaker: I am ruling it is in order now to put the motion for second reading of the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Then, sir, I appeal your ruling to the house.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. McIvor: More obstruction.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Knowles raised a point of order as I was proposing the question on the second reading of this bill, intituled an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, to the effect that the provisions of this bill violated the principle of parliamentary control over finances since the agreement referred to in the bill was not being submitted to the house. I ruled that since the requirements of the British North America Act and of standing order 61 in respect of financial measures had been met, and since further it was customary not to include agreements in bills providing for the carrying into effect of these agreements—and I would refer hon. members to chapter 71 of the statutes of 1947, an act to provide for carrying into effect treaties of peace between Canada, Italy, Roumania, Hungary and Finland, in which none of the agreements were inserted in the bill—it was in order to proceed with the motion for the second reading of the bill.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the ruling sustained.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): We expected that.

Mr. Fulton: During the discussion of the point of order just raised I sent to the table for a copy of Beauchesne's third edition.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Why don't you get Bourinot?

Mr. Fulton: When the volume arrived—and I now have it in my hand—I found in it a document which I hold up so you can see it. This document in the book coming from the table contains, in handwriting in pencil, the following words:

That Mr. Fulton, member for Kamloops, be suspended from the service of the house for—

Then there is a blank and some dots in pencil, then underneath:

—the remainder of the present sitting.

Mr. McCann: Pretty weak.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should take this as a reminder or a threat or whether I should take it that the government feels that it is not going to get the measure through the house without such threats. But I want to assure them that—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —they will not work.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: Did the Minister of Finance write the note?

Mr. Harris: —I think that privately I would say that I did not, but publicly I wish to say that it is not a document in the possession of the house and therefore could not be a matter for comment. May I just add that any suggestion that the government might be considering that this action would be an advantage is not well founded. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am delighted to have the hon. member here because he helps us on many occasions.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on earlier occasions—

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: I see that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is also on his feet. Is it either a question of privilege or a point of order to which he wishes to speak?

Mr. Barnett: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Just when the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) rose in his place I was rising simply to say that I was paired with the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted against the ruling.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken on the matter referred to in the bill on two earlier occasions and on those occasions I have discussed the subject matter of the bill. On this occasion I should like to speak first about the nature of the project of which this is a part. The project is far larger than the building of a pipe line from the Alberta-Saskatchewan border down to the vicinity of Montreal. The cost of the pipe line itself with its appurtenances is some $375 million which is of course a sizeable amount. But incidental to the building of the pipe line and the operation of the pipe line, a much larger expenditure is involved. It approximates $1 billion. The pipe line itself, of course, is not usable unless branch distribution systems are provided in the cities and towns along the way.

A great number of these cities and towns have already taken out franchises for gas distribution within the community and are only waiting to have the supply of gas definitely fixed before proceeding with their local development. In the province of Alberta a great number of gas wells must be drilled to make deliverable the gas that has been proven there, and also chemical plants must be built to remove the sulphur, butane and other liquids to make the gas suitable for the pipe line. It is a project that should appeal, I think, to the Canadian people, a project extending across five provinces and a project which means the replacement of great quantities of fuel presently imported from the United States with lower cost fuel produced within Canada.

The production of gas in Alberta goes back a good many years. I lived in Alberta for quite a period more than 40 years ago. The house which I occupied was equipped to use natural gas for heating and all other purposes. At that time gas had been brought into Calgary from the vicinity of Medicine Hat and the cost of heating in Calgary had been greatly reduced as a result of that service. Later on gas was brought into the city of Edmonton by a group headed by Mr. Ray Milner, whom I knew very well in Dalhousie. I was on the staff and he was a student. He was able to get financial help from the United States and, over the years, has built up a distribution system within the city of Edmonton.

However, the major discoveries of gas have occurred in recent years as part of the development of the petroleum industry. The natural resources of Alberta, of course, belong to the province, but licences have been issued to private industry to develop certain areas and the gas that has been developed and proven up is the property of those licensees of the Alberta government. Who are the principal holders of gas in that province? The largest is Canadian Gulf. Canadian Gulf is the owner of about one-third of all the proven gas supplies. The second largest holder is the Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company, which is working in co-operation with the Hudson's Bay Company in developing the mineral rights that are controlled by the Hudson's Bay Company. The third largest is the Standard Oil of California and the fourth largest is the Canadian Delhi Company.

It is interesting to note that the largest holder of gas in Alberta, the second largest holder of gas in Alberta and the fourth largest holder of gas in Alberta are the principal sponsors of the project that we are discussing today. It has been suggested in this house that these men who control Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited have been offering gas for export at less than the most favourable prices available. It seems rather extraordinary to me, and I think it will seem extraordinary to every hon. member in this house, if these companies have been offering gas, which they own, for export at a price lower than that obtainable from other sources.

These men have become interested in the pipe line so that they may obtain an outlet for the gas they own and for other gas available within Alberta. This has been the reason for their sponsorship of the project. The group that is sponsoring the program have bought shares to a value in excess of $15 million, and bought them for cash. They bought them at a price of $8 per share. This is one project in Canada in which there is not a single share that has not been bought at $8 or, if bought recently, $8 plus interest from the time the group was formed.

These men have been undertaking the work that is necessary before a project of this kind can move. They have been making the surveys of potential markets. They have retained consulting engineers who have prepared the engineering for the project. Earlier the group provided funds to build a gas line from the Niagara river to Toronto in order that a start could be made upon conversion to natural gas in the Toronto area and in order to develop additional markets there. They have acquired rights of way, and particularly the right of way across western Canada from Calgary to the Manitoba border. They have been working for the greater part of two years doing the necessary preliminary work for the building of the pipe line which we are discussing today. What has the government done to help? Absolutely nothing in a financial way. Not one cent of government money has played any part in the development up to the present time. What is the government's interest in the project?

Well, it seems to me a very definite interest in the project arises out of the government policy affecting energy produced in Canada. This policy was announced some five years ago in the House of Commons, and was that the policy in connection with natural gas would be parallel with the policy on energy in the form of electricity, namely that energy in the form of gas must be made available to Canadian consumers and that only quantities of gas that are clearly in excess of the present or future needs of Canadian consumers could be permitted to move outside Canada. Having announced that policy the government, in my opinion, has some responsibility for seeing that the means of moving gas to markets available in Canada should be provided. Certainly, we had an interest in that project and we have taken an interest, not a financial interest but we have moved to the extent that we could to encourage the planning of this pipe line.

Early in the history of this scheme a proposal was made, not by the present group but by another—the hon. member for Calgary South will remember—that instead of moving gas from Alberta to these markets by a pipe line, we should allow gas to be exported south from Calgary and recovered in the vicinity of Toronto on an exchange basis. The government was unable to consider that proposal. Then a proposal was received that instead of an all-Canadian pipe line the sponsors be permitted to follow the route of the oil pipe line from Alberta; that is, a route down through the United States. There again the government rejected that proposal and said that gas must be brought to eastern Canada by an all-Canadian pipe line. That position was rather resented in Alberta. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) has spoken about it in the House of Commons. It is claimed that we are putting an improper tax on the owners of the gas and making the project of supplying that gas to Canadians in eastern Canada uneconomical.

I went to Calgary at the invitation of the petroleum institute and addressed its members there at a dinner meeting. I was warned beforehand that I must submit myself to questioning after the meeting was over. I went there for the purpose of explaining why it is in the national interest that eastern Canada be served with Alberta natural gas through an all-Canadian pipe line. I had the honour of having my friend, the hon. member for Calgary South, sit beside me on that occasion. Whether I was able to convince him that evening, or whether he has seen the light since, I am not sure. But I think perhaps at some stage we have made progress in a meeting of minds on the proper method for distributing western Canadian gas. I explained the need for an all-Canadian line. I admitted that it would be more costly than alternative plans, but I said the added cost is one of the penalties we must accept for Canadian nationhood. I remember my words. I said: "There is a price on Canadian nationhood. If we always looked for the cheapest way of doing things here in Canada there might have been another state in the United States but there very likely would have been no Canada. From confederation the people of Canada have been very jealous about accepting any monetary advantage that would in any way jeopardize the control by Canada over her own resources."

It was that line that I pursued in my discussion before the petroleum institute. I must say that that position seemed to be accepted by the industry that was gathered there on that occasion; for, following the meeting, there did not seem to be any subject about which they wished to question me; at least, no questions were asked. Since then the government's requirement for an all-Canadian pipe line has been accepted as a national necessity by the industry.

Then, naturally, I have followed the efforts of the sponsors of the pipe line to finance their project. I have discussed the problems with the sponsors themselves, with their bankers and with others who have attempted to assist in carrying out the project. I may say that Premier Frost over several years has been just as interested as I have been to bring about the delivery of gas into his province, and on two or three occasions I have met him, together with representatives of the pipe line company, in an effort to assist the project.

A study of the financial situation indicated that to finance the whole line across Canada, the type of line that we feel is needed for the purpose, would not be possible unless some means could be found to bridge the first three, four or five years of build-up in eastern Canada. Eastern Canada, which has never used natural gas, which in the main had no facilities for using it, presented a problem where time would probably be required before we had a financeable project to place before the banks. Well, how could the government assist in that situation? It was found that by removing the financing of the northern Ontario section, as covered by a section in the bill before us, the remainder could be financed from the inception, and given three, four or five years, the project would be in an earning position that would enable it to buy the government section. An arrangement was worked out by which the government could not possibly fail to recover its investment over a period, which would provide for the building by the government and the use by the company of the northern Ontario section, which would result in an easing of the financial burden in the early years to be recouped when the earning period began. That provision is contained in the bill.

The government of Ontario indicated not only an interest but a real financial interest in that section of the work. It is estimated to cost $118 million. The proposal was that the province of Ontario would share one-third of the cost up to $35 million and that the federal government would provide the remainder of the money required to build the section of the line from the Manitoba border to Kapuskasing. Then the company undertook to finance the line. Part of the revenue on which we had been counting at all stages was revenue derived from the export of 200 million cubic feet of gas which was found to be in excess of present and future Canadian requirements. The company dealt with interested parties in that connection. They first had a contract for a smaller amount with the Northern Natural Gas Company which supplies the Minneapolis and northern Wisconsin area. That contract called for a rate of 29 cents, which was satisfactory to the sponsors of Trans-Canada.

Northern Natural made an application to the federal power commission and immediately ran into a storm of protests from their customers in the area, on the grounds that the offered price was too high and that the offer would involve higher rates to the present customers of Northern Natural Gas. The protests of the customers were effective with the federal power commission and the result was that the hearing on that application adjourned sine die. The contract with Natural Gas had a clause permitting either side to cancel unless the contract was implemented within a certain short period, I think it was one year. The time had elapsed. The Trans-Canada sponsors were unable to obtain a renewal of the contract. It was said that a lower price would be required, but Northern Natural have never named that lower price that they would require, and since no progress could be made with Northern Natural, Trans-Canada, to leave itself free to deal with others, cancelled the contract under the terms thereof. Then we had representations from a group including Northern Natural, People's Gas and American Pipelines Company. It was represented that this group would be able to make a proposal that would be attractive for the export of gas. The group met with me. I told them I had nothing to do with making a contract for the gas, that they should prepare their proposal and submit it to the sponsors of the Trans-Canada company. Later on I received a letter from them in general terms. I wrote back and said I hoped they would be successful in reaching an agreement with Trans-Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: A confidential letter?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Can we not proceed without jests for a few minutes? My hon. friend is very humorous but this may not be the moment for it.

Mr. Fleming: It depends on who is doing it, eh?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That letter has been tabled, incidentally. Mr. Merriam of the group went to Calgary and met with the sponsors of Trans-Canada. It was reported to me that he had no firm proposal to make. Shortly after that a proposal was received from Tennessee Gas Transmission. That proposal was a firm proposal. It had several advantages other than the sale of gas. True, the price was lower than in the contract it superseded. The price was 25½ cents per thousand cubic feet. The load factor was 95 per cent and the proposal contained an escalation clause which provided for an increasing price year by year during the term of the contract, which proposals by the other group did not contain.

In any event the sponsors decided the Tennessee proposal to be the most favourable received and a contract was signed with that company. Application was made before the federal power commission by Tennessee to implement the contract and the hearing on that application has been proceeding now for some seven or eight months.

The application has probably met with the most violent opposition in the history of the federal power commission. The results of the hearing are still unknown and that fact has seriously interfered with the financing of the pipe line. Had the application been approved, the line would have been financed and under way long before this.

Hon. members complain that we have been late in bringing down this bill. The reason we have been late is that we were hoping a compromise would be arrived at which would permit an early decision by the F.P.C. In that we were disappointed. We also hoped that temporary financing could be arranged which would make government assistance in the western section unnecessary. In that we were disappointed. After we decided that direct government action was necessary if we were to get a program under way this year it took some time to work out the details of the program as represented by the bill before you and the agreement that has been tabled with the bill. So much for the position today.

The question has been asked: "Who was pressing for action?" Well, I think I can throw some light on that subject. We have received several letters. The letters I will read have all been tabled and are available to hon. members.

The first letter I will read is dated April 24, 1956, from Premier Manning of Alberta, addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent):

My dear Prime Minister:

Passing through Ottawa today, I had hoped to have an opportunity to discuss with you the serious situation developing as a result of the prolonged delay in getting the trans-Canada pipe line project under way. This was not possible due to your engagement in Toronto, and as previous commitments prevent me staying over until tomorrow, I had a brief discussion with your colleague, the Right Hon. Mr. Howe, and am writing this letter to outline some of the thoughts I had hoped to discuss with you personally.

My colleagues and I have become increasingly concerned over the serious threat to the whole national gas development and gas utilization program occasioned by the repeated frustrations and delays that have attended the proposed trans-Canada pipe line project. For the following reasons, in our opinion the situation has reached the point where any further delay in commencing at least the western section of the line may well prove disastrous to the entire project.

Mr. Fleming: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): April 24, 1956.

1. If the project is delayed another year, all present permits, both federal and provincial, and all contracts entered into by the company will lapse by default. It will be extremely difficult to grant further indefinite extensions of the government permits, and almost impossible for the company to retain existing contracts with gas producers.

2. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and the Alberta Trunk Line Company have made arrangements for the large dimension pipe necessary for the project if it proceeds this year. If it is delayed another year this pipe, in all probability, will be allocated to some other project. If this happens it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the company to make firm arrangements for the delivery of the necessary pipe in time to commence construction in 1957.

3. Another year's delay in providing a market for Alberta gas will have a retarding effect on the development of both the oil and gas resources of the province. Millions of dollars of investment capital already are immobilized in gas wells which are capped because no export market is available. A program involving over $100 million of new development for gathering lines, processing plants and auxiliary industries which large scale export of gas will make possible is being held in abeyance, and each further delay is undermining confidence in the future prospects to a degree that is damaging to both the provincial and the national interests.

4. Public acceptance of the present national gas policy which dictates that Canadian consumers be given first priority in the use of Canadian gas is being weakened by the prolonged delay in getting western gas to eastern consumers. A policy impossible of practical application in a reasonable period of time cannot indefinitely command public endorsation and support. Over two years have lapsed since the present trans-Canada project was formulated as a vehicle to implement national policy with respect to natural gas. To date western producers have not been able to sell one cubic foot of gas for delivery to eastern consumers. Living with this situation every day, we are very conscious of the extent to which the uncertainty created by repeated delays is undermining the confidence of investors and producers, and of the public generally.

For these reasons we believe it is of the utmost importance that at least the western section of the proposed line be constructed this year. In fairness to the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company, I believe it rightly can be said they have complied with every condition and requirement of the national gas policy laid down by your government. They have encountered temporary difficulty in financing their part of the project only because of the delay before the federal power commission at Washington, which is something entirely beyond their control.

Under these circumstances, we feel your government would be fully justified in taking whatever steps are necessary and in your judgment proper to ensure the immediate start of the Trans-Canada project within the framework of the national policy that precludes consideration of other markets until eastern Canada is served.

I respectfully submit these observations for your consideration, with the sincere hope that you will be able to make an early announcement that construction of the line will commence this spring.

Yours very sincerely,
Ernest C. Manning,
Premier of Alberta.

An hon. Member: What does the opposition say about that?

Mr. Fleming: When you give us a chance we will have plenty to say.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Then a letter from the Premier of Manitoba dated May 15, 1956:

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I am writing you concerning the discussions taking place regarding the transmission of natural gas from Alberta to Manitoba and eastern Canada.

As I have indicated to you on previous occasions, the availability of natural gas in Manitoba at minimum economic rates can have an important influence on the economy of this province. There are now a number of important developments in Manitoba which are being held up pending the arrival of natural gas.

At this time I would like to reaffirm Manitoba's interest in this matter and to stress once again that it is imperative that construction of the pipeline between Alberta and Winnipeg be completed this year. For this reason I trust that whatever solution is agreed upon will assure the arrival of natural gas in Manitoba in 1956.

Yours sincerely,
Douglas Campbell.

Then a letter from Mr. Porter, which I received this morning, dated at Queen's Park, Toronto, May 14, 1956. I may say that this was written in reply to a letter of mine asking whether the province wished to extend the arrangement for building the northern Ontario section of the pipeline.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister going to read his letter to Mr. Porter?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have it here. I can read it if you wish. It is a rather long letter.

Mr. Fleming: Should it not be on the record?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is tabled.

Dear Mr. Howe:

I beg to acknowledge your letter of May 11, in which you outline the present status of the project for trans-Canada gas pipeline, and the financial arrangements recently concluded between your government and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in order that construction of the western section will commence this year.

As we have frequently stated, a trans-Canada pipeline is, of course, a federal responsibility. A provincial government is in no position, constitutionally, to assume any responsibility for decisions as to the construction or the financing of a national undertaking that crosses the boundaries of several provinces. We have, however, from the outset concurred in the policy of a line that would be built entirely within the boundaries of Canada, within Canadian jurisdiction. As a provincial government we are particularly interested in the potential benefits for northern Ontario that would undoubtedly follow the building of a gas pipeline through that portion of the province. Generally, in view of our rapid industrial expansion, coupled with the fact that our hydro-electric power resources are now approaching their maximum limits of development, the necessity of new sources of fuel for our industries and our domestic consumers is becoming increasingly urgent. We agree with you that further delays in the construction of this project would have very adverse consequences. Time has become of the essence. Every day's delay invites the most serious consequences to the development of Ontario, and to the national economy. In these circumstances, it would appear essential that the western section of the line be completed during the year 1956. To accomplish this, we understand that actual construction must be commenced not later than July 1. We understand from your letter that your financial arrangements with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited are designed to accomplish this purpose.

You will recall that our agreement with your government, as set out in the correspondence of November, 1955, provided for the incorporation of a crown corporation to build the northern Ontario section of the trans-Canada line. The conditions upon which we agreed to lend money to such a corporation, to the limit of $35 million, were as follows:

1. That our investment would be returned to us out of rentals based upon the through-put of gas, with interest at the going rate, so that eventually this investment would involve no cost to the taxpayers of Ontario.

2. That we should not be called upon to advance money under commitment until you were able to assure us that all other portions of the entire trans-Canada line from Alberta to Quebec would be completed and operated.

3. That by reason of the terms of the agreement between your government and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, our commitment would terminate if the company were unable by May 1, 1956, to show financial ability to carry out their entire undertaking.

In any matter of such complexity and magnitude, we recognize that it may become necessary to consider changes in arrangements from time to time. At the last session of the legislature an act was passed, by the unanimous recorded vote of the house, giving authority to enter into such arrangements. The act allows for certain flexibility so as to meet changing situations as they may arise. Section 1 of the act is as follows:

"1. For the purpose of implementing the arrangements made or to be made between the government of Canada and the government of Ontario to facilitate the construction of a connecting link through northern Ontario of a pipeline to transport natural gas from Alberta into central Ontario, the treasurer of Ontario is hereby authorized to loan from time to time out of the consolidated revenue fund any sum of money, but not more than $35 million, to a corporation constituted or to be constituted on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada and having as a purpose the construction aforesaid."

Upon condition that the construction of the western section begins not later than July 1, 1956, we are willing to concur in the extension of time that you request. Subject to this change, we shall continue our commitment to participate in the financing of the northern Ontario section.

Yours sincerely,

Dana Porter.

An hon. Member: Frost on the Drew line.

An hon. Member: He did not suggest closure, did he?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It has been suggested, although by far the greater part of the capital provided by the sponsors is being provided by Canadian companies, that because those Canadian companies are financed with capital from the United States in whole or in part there is no Canadian control of the pipeline project. I do not know whether or not the 83·4 per cent that was suggested as United States capital will be altered by the fact that the British-American Oil Company, a very old Canadian company, is in the process of acquiring all the Canadian interests in Gulf, but I suggest it would make a difference. The purchase has been made of Gulf property by the British-American Oil Company.

An hon. Member: They are owned 60 per cent by another company.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, just as Standard Oil owns 70 per cent of Imperial Oil. However, a good deal has been said in this debate about the Canadian Pacific Railway. Does anyone doubt that the Canadian Pacific Railway is under Canadian control? It is not controlled through stock ownership. I believe that Canadians own about 11 per cent of the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway at this time, and I doubt that the Canadian holding has ever been higher than 15 per cent, and certainly never as high as 20 per cent. Canadian control in that instance does not depend on stock ownership. It depends upon the fact that the railway is located in Canada, subject to Canadian law, subject to regulation by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada.

Mr. Ellis: Page the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, you live in Regina. We will let Winnipeg look after itself. The situation is exactly the same with the pipeline project. Who will control the pipe line? The pipe line will be controlled in Canada. Why? Because it is located in Canada, because it is subject to Canadian laws, because it is subject to regulation by the provincial authorities of Canada and over-all regulation by the board of transport commissioners. The reason I asked for the provision in the agreement giving Canadians the opportunity to buy shares in the company was not to assure control of the company in that way for Canada. I pointed out at the time that ownership of 51 per cent of the shares even though it existed, did not carry a guarantee it would always exist, and did not in itself mean actual control of the pipe line. Control of the pipe line we have because of the fact that the pipe line is wholly built in Canadian territory and is subject to Canadian laws and regulation by the provinces and the board of transport commissioners. Therefore let us not worry too much about Canadian control.

It is unfortunate that the pipe-line discussion has come up in the midst of this wave of anti-Americanism on the part of the official opposition.

Mr. Drew: Oh, nonsense!

Mr. Fleming: That is a complete distortion.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Anti-American sentiment has been expressed.

Mr. Drew: The usual disregard for facts.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What was the United States ambassador complaining about?

Mr. Fleming: Did you write the speech for him? You spent the previous week with him.

Mr. Bell: How about the speech last night by the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Pearson: Why don't you read it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This idea that businessmen who have made large investments in Canada to develop Canada's natural resources by arrangement with the provincial governments of Canada should be called Texas buccaneers and similar names is all very well if the official opposition thinks that is the right thing to do and wishes to continue that name calling in this parliament.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, at no time has the official opposition used the expression "Texas buccaneers". It is customary for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to make statements of this kind. On no single occasion has such a term been used.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We will check Hansard and find out.

Mr. Fleming: Why did you not check it before you started?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It was the leader of the C.C.F. party. I will withdraw and say the leader of the C.C.F. party, but certainly I have heard a good many remarks from the official opposition not complimentary to American participation in the pipe line. The remarks have extended to myself. Snide remarks have been made in this debate referring to me as a second class citizen for the reason that I was born in the United States. I have lived in Canada for 48 years, I have been a citizen of Canada for 42 years, and I think my record in Canada will stand up with anyone else's.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sit down before you fall down.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

An hon. Member: Again?

Mr. Drew: —I would point out that where the minister attributes statements of that kind, which have certainly not been made by the official opposition—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: —he should identify those statements.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I point out to hon. members that a member who is speaking is entitled to make his speech without being interrupted. May I point out further—

An hon. Member: If he is inaccurate?

Mr. Speaker: Would hon. members please be good enough to let the Speaker make his point. I do not think that the house is gaining anything in decorum by interjecting remarks when the Speaker is trying to make a point relating to order. I must say that recently in reading the blues containing what I have said I have found that in almost every sentence I have uttered there is an interjection by someone. I say that the member who has the floor is entitled to make his speech without interruption. If he says something which is not accurate, which is different from what is claimed to be the fact by another hon. member and another hon. member is misrepresented, that hon. member does not have the right to stand up immediately and interrupt the member who has the floor. He must first make sure that the member who has the floor will permit him to make a correction. If not, he has the right to make the correction at the end of the hon. member's speech. Let us have that well understood. As long as there is consent on the part of the member who has the floor the other hon. member may do so immediately. If not, he has the right to do so at the end of the speech. That is standing order 37, paragraph 1.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to apologize to you. I withdrew my remark about "Texas buccaneers" too soon. I have a clipping here—"Texas buccaneers won't control gas line, Diefenbaker."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have stated the urgency of the situation as expressed by three provincial premiers. Incidentally, one was a Social Credit premier, the second was a Liberal premier and the third a Conservative premier. Therefore it is not a political issue in the provinces. They have expressed the urgent need as seen by the responsible governments of those provinces.

Obviously the opposition takes the view that there is no urgency, no need to get on with the project at all. So far there has been much more debate on points of order than there has been discussion of the merits of the project. On motions to adjourn alone I think that more time has been consumed than has been consumed by Liberal speakers since the debate began. I do not know what hon. members expect the government to do when faced with obstruction of the type we have had.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What we have done is apply the rules of the house that were established to protect—

Mr. Fleming: Something Mackenzie King refused ever to do and which he denounced.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): —both majorities and minorities. Hon. members opposite are fond of quoting the mother of parliaments. What does the mother of parliaments do? Every debate in the British parliament is limited from the time that the debate is moved. If it cannot be done by agreement it is done by closure, and for debates where agreement could not be arranged it has been necessary to exercise closure an average of 21 times a year in the past five years.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fleming: Mr. King said it had never been done in the British parliament on a money bill. You know he said that in 1932.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Some say that it has not been the practice in Canada. Why? Because it is only in the last two years that the government has been faced with filibusters openly declared.

Mr. Fleming: You did not like last year, did you?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): When the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) gets out on the stump he is free with his remarks. I read a statement he made to the effect that this would be a filibuster in perpetuity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister is not resuming his seat. Once the minister concludes his remarks the hon. member can put the matter—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I simply rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: All right, the hon. member rises on a question of privilege, but I want to point out to him—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say that statement is not true.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member raises a question of privilege and it turns out that his question of privilege is a fraudulent one—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker!

Mr. Speaker: The expression is being used regularly in the United Kingdom House of Commons.* I have not the reference here with me but for the edification of the hon. member I will bring it to the house. Sir Winston Churchill himself used it. He rose and said: "Mr. Speaker, have these fraudulent points of order and fraudulent questions of privilege not become a scandal in this house?"

The point I simply want to make is this. The hon. member who has the floor is entitled to make his speech without interruption except, of course, these quick interjections which go on the record. But when a member stands up and wants to take the floor away from the one who has the floor, it is either on a point of order or on a proper question of privilege but never to make a correction or to debate an argument or a point advanced by the member who has the floor. He has a right to do that at the end of the member's speech.

*(For references see page 4032.)

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Then we had the threat made in this debate that the C.C.F. would use every legal method under the rules for obstructing debate.

Mr. Coldwell: Not obstructing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They have done it to date. I will give them full marks.

Mr. Coldwell: Not for obstruction; to ensure proper discussion under the rules.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You can use your words; I will use mine.

Mr. Rowe: No one would want to use the ones you use.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not know that I need to speak any further at this time. I may have an opportunity to do so in committee or at some later stage. However, I want to say that I am proud of the fact that I am on the constructive side of this argument.

Mr. Fleming: It does not matter to you whether you destroy parliament in the process.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): By inclination and by training I am a builder, and I am happy in the fact that I am a member of a government that is a building government. This government is always ready when it sees a great national need or a great national urgency to move in to do its share in meeting the situation—

Mr. Fleming: And parliament be hanged in the process!

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): —as it has done on this occasion. We know of the urgency and the need for action. Perhaps hon. members opposite will tell us the need for delay through obstruction. Personally I should like to know what it is and who are the sponsors of this obstruction and delay with which we are being faced.

Mr. Fleming: The people of Canada from whom you have no mandate to do what you are doing. Just give them a chance.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We will in due course. We have given them several chances in my time.

Mr. Fleming: You have no mandate for this at all. If you think you can get one, go to the people.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the other day I was not privileged to be present—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You were speaking, though.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was that wise observation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I said that you were speaking.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was removed for a few hours from the conflicts of political life, and I missed the performance in this house the other day.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Diefenbaker: If my friend the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) would just contain himself for a few moments, I should be obliged to him. After all, I am going to ask him after a while whether, in virtue of his peculiarly favourable position, he has been able to communicate with his former leader in an extra-terrestrial sphere and to secure his opinion on the attitude of this government in the application of closure the other day.

Mr. Knowles: It is on the pages of Hansard of 1932.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We want to get it right up to the minute.

Mr. Garson: Let us keep to attacks on the living.

Mr. Fleming: Then you cannot talk about this government because it is dead.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I read the arguments that were advanced the other day on behalf of the application of closure. I never believed that it would be brought in under the circumstances under which it was brought in. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is one man in this house who I never believed would tarnish his record by the application of closure in the way in which it was effected, not for the purpose of interfering with unnecessary debate but rather designed to secure silence—

Mr. Harris: Nonsense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and to use parliament as an institution in which the government may produce what it will, is able to propound any proposition it likes and, because of its majority here to know that, regardless of whether or not there is any support for it, the majority will carry it through. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister this question: Why is it that you have not risen in your place as leader of this house, whose responsibility it is to explain when the rights of parliament are being filched away in this manner? Why did you not rise? I say to him: I never believed that you were indeed the captive of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who recently said in effect, "After all, rules never concern me very much". When I listened a moment ago to the lesson read by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

An hon. Member: It was not read.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —on Canadian investment and the lack of danger in Canada from an uncontrolled investment from another country—

An hon. Member: What about the C.P.R.?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I wondered whether or not he had read those words of Mr. Lapalme, the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, who today goes up and down the province of Quebec arguing that to too great an extent the resources of Quebec are being shipped out of that province. Here are his exact words:

> I am not opposed to the investment of American capital . . . In fact, I am in favour of foreign investment. But first we must be sure that the interests of the province are protected . . . The riches of the province are being carried away in boats flying the Stars and Stripes.

Mr. Speaker, as to these proponents of closure, what attitude do they take? They have one type of speech in parliament and then those three musketeers—the three ministers of this cabinet—go down to the province of Quebec and, chameleon-like, change their attitude as they campaign in a provincial election. I need not say who the three are. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) leads them. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) follow. These are the ministers of the government—

An hon. Member: You missed one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —who speak with one voice here and another voice there.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the Prime Minister this question: Will you explain that capacity for double talk? I commence with that.

Mr. Garson: What has this to do with the pipe line?

Mr. Rowe: It seems to have something to do with you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Talk to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not believe that closure would be applied. Of course, I did not realize this fact. As was said of Wolsey in the biography of Henry VIII, I did not realize that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not only head of a number of departments but also the actual man in control of the cabinet. I know of no other person in history since the days of Wolsey who ever occupied that position. These are the words in the life of Henry VIII:

> He (Wolsey) stood at the crossroads of every negotiation and openly demanded his perquisites.

The perquisites here are that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should abdicate his belief in democratic principles and deny those in opposition the right to advance their arguments and to educate public opinion or to find out why there is such solicitude on the part of the members of this government. For five long years this pampered pet, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, by deviation, by change of direction, by protestation, by alteration in course, has postponed that estimable end of securing a market for Alberta gas and the making available to other parts of Canada of that necessary form of energy. I ask the Prime Minister today to tell this house why he is so fearful of the facts; why he was afraid to allow the true facts of this nefarious scheme to be elucidated? I ask why he found it necessary, and the members of his government found it necessary, to muzzle the representatives of the people in advance of anything in the nature of a filibuster or an interference on the part of the opposition with the policy and program of the government. I ask him to explain that today, for certainly the day of silence is past. Are they afraid of the truth over there? Is that why they hide behind the caricature of parliament which they have substituted by the adoption of the parliamentary form of closure in a way that it has never been adopted before? Only once in history was it ever adopted in our country during the progress of a resolution, and then only after more than 10 days of debate.

Mr. Rowe: A month from the time it was introduced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And after some 10 days of debate. Why did they adopt this measure in anticipation? The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that I had made some statement. The statement I made was this. We in the opposition would see to it that this indeed would be no skirmish if the rights of parliament were in any way to be interfered with. They are afraid of the truth, afraid of an election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, they are afraid and we challenge them, sir, through you, Mr.

Speaker, to submit this ramshackle caricature of national development to the people of Canada.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that after all it really does not matter where the money comes from or where the control is so long as the laws of Canada are on the statute books. Then, a few moments ago he told us that the reason nothing had been done in recent years was that we need markets in the United States, and because of the opposition before the federal power commission this important project had been held back. In other words, regardless of the laws of Canada the disposal of a great Canadian resource is to depend on the caprice of a foreign board. One can quote Mr. Mackenzie King over and over again when it comes to parliamentary procedure. He spoke on this subject over and over again, but we will go back a little farther than Mr. Mackenzie King. I quote from Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux, once the holder of the distinguished position that you occupy, sir. This is what he said on August 30, 1917 and it is so applicable to what is happening here:

> This is nothing else but a raid, and it is because it is a raid perpetrated on the Canadian treasury that it has to be done by closure.

That was closure adopted after days of argument.

> A raid must be made quickly and sharply, it must be done in the dark far from inquiries . . .

Is that the reason closure was applied? Were you afraid of public discussion? Did you fear the examination of this project? The Prime Minister will be able to give his answer, other than the general answer of yesterday which was the first one pried from him at any time during this debate. What is parliament without debate? Sterilized, it maintains the form and not the soul. Is the government afraid to submit this absurdity to the examination and revealing process of analysis by parliament? Why the adoption the other day of closure in anticipation of debate, a dangerous expedient at any time and an inexcusable one when adopted under the circumstances, before there was any debate in this house or any consideration whatever of the measure?

What is the position of the opposition? The position of the opposition, Mr. King stated over and over again, was the position of a vigilance committee to assure that measures brought before parliament by an overwhelmingly powerful government would not be translated into legislation, when it appeared in any way a raid on the treasury, without a full consideration by parliament. One of the great writers on this subject, Redlich, page 49, volume 1 of his book on parliamentary government, says this:

> The feeling of the universal benefit conferred as a rule by strenuous and powerful opposition is one which centuries of experience have worked into the very flesh and blood of the English nation.

Some mention was made today of the fact that in Britain from time to time they apply closure. They have a means in the House of Commons in Britain of securing the facts from any government. They have the right at their disposal, at adjournment time, to move for the discussion of any matter in respect of which they have not received the information that they desire. If closure is brought into effect, it is brought into effect after consultation and determination as between the parties and the Speaker and is designed to assure full discussion while preventing anything in the nature of continuous, unjustifiable opposition to government measures.

Having said that, I repeat that it is a matter of wonder to me that the Prime Minister should have allowed himself to be dominated in the way he must have been to have permitted this inexcusable affront to parliament and this denial of parliamentary rights.

I am now going to discuss something of the nature of the proposals before the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the record of this company, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited? For five long years we have been waiting for action. Throughout that entire period this company has played a monopoly game without chance. Its attitude has been one of artful juggling. It has changed its front from year to year. From year to year this cobweb of colourful finance has been spun.

They started with the idea that they could finance themselves. They said they needed no government help. They secured an incorporation on that basis, and having designedly made the allegation that under no circumstances would they ask for assistance, they began that tortuous course they have followed ever since. First they said, "We will ship directly to the Ontario and Quebec markets and provide the necessary pipe line." Their next attitude was, "We will change that; we need United States markets and we will build a spur line to the United States boundary and that spur line will supply the great needs of the middle west."

They were able to contact in the United States three companies named by the Minister of Trade and Commerce who were prepared to pay a real price, a price far in excess of what is to be paid today by the Western Pipe Lines company. Today the Minister of Trade and Commerce says the reason this was not gone ahead with was that there were complaints from the consumers. Nothing of the kind. That statement is unjustified, for after a lapse of a few months and consideration being given by the federal power commission, suddenly the whole matter was dropped by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

Their next proposition was that they would have to get some assistance in order to bridge northern Ontario. No; I am ahead of myself. As a matter of fact it is difficult to follow this company in the labyrinth of financial manipulation, and one is apt to forget the changes of front that have been made. First they asked for a guarantee of assistance from the industrial development bank, and that was denied. Then they came along with a new proposition, a complete change of front. They said they would need assistance by way of the creation of a crown corporation to bridge that area of northern Ontario which would be unprofitable.

So the changes have gone on. Throughout that entire period, whatever change of front this favoured corporation has made, how often it has altered its course, it has still been able to command the benediction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and today he is joined with the amens of every member of the cabinet. Why? Why does this corporation enjoy such a peculiarly favoured position in the heart of this government? Why are competing corporations given no opportunity even to submit a proposition? Those are questions on which we require information; those are questions on which we have a right to obtain information.

Let us follow the course of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In March, 1953, he said this was economically feasible to build. He was the man who was able to secure the merger of Trans-Canada and Western Pipe Lines. He said, "There is no danger at all; there is no reason for delay. In March of 1953 he said, at page 2929 of Hansard:

> The policy of the government of Canada is to refuse permits for moving natural gas by pipe line across an international boundary until such time as we are convinced that there can be no economic use, present or future, for that natural gas within Canada.

A little later on in that speech he said:

> This government has reason to believe that it is economically feasible to build a gas pipe line from southern Alberta to Toronto and Montreal, serving the intervening Canadian cities.

And then this master of optimism said this on December 1, 1954: "I believe that the construction of Trans-Canada will begin in 1955; that the building of the pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg and south to Emerson will be completed in that year and the complete line will be built to Montreal in 1956."

What was the justification for that optimistic attitude? Why the continuing enlargement of the period within which this favoured pet of the government is prepared to extend and extend again the time of completion? I ask, why this change of front? Why has the government—and I ask the Prime Minister to give an answer on behalf of this government—displayed such solicitude, such a keen feeling of regard for this corporation? Why has the permission to extend been granted over and over again? Why, after the delay of five long years, this unusual rush for action in 1956? Why? This is a question that has never been answered.

A while ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce described the men who are connected with this company, the founders, as it were; the Clint Murchisons of Texas. While Clint Murchison has not the controlling interest today, he is the owner of Canadian Delhi and, through that company, he will own over 25 per cent of all the stock of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. According to the records today, of the 1,928,183 shares Mr. Murchison, as the head and owner of Canadian Delhi, will have 497,000 shares. It is true, as I said a moment ago, that he is no longer on the executive of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

Who is this man Murchison, this builder, this man who is so interested in Canada? His biographical sketch was written in 1954. It is a revealing one. It begins by saying: "According to affectionate legend, he has found and has been able to add $1 and $1 and get $11 million." That was two years ago, before he improved on that previous record. It says in his biographical sketch:

> He possesses the popular Texas ambition of buying the rest of the United States.

That was two years ago. While the biography was being written, and since it has been written he raised his sights. It goes on to say, and this is a great description of this man, this beneficiary of Canada:

> His companies are as varied as a pirate's treasure.

That is an appropriate description. The mention of pirates does not require too much amplification. It adds:

> He juggles multi-million deals with the unconcern of a racetrack teller counting $2 bills.

Then it quotes him as saying, following the success that he has had over the years:

> Cash makes a man careless.

Well, that is one part of the biography that certainly is not lived up to unless the cash comes from the Canadian government. "Cash makes a man careless." It goes on to say that his life is given to spinning new companies. Then it states:

He expects no trouble in having Trans-Canada Pipe Lines built by 1955.

He still has 25 per cent. Here is a revealing statement, sir. He is asking how he does his financing and this is his secret of finance: He has a system of "financin' by finaglin'."

Mr. Speaker, this is the man who more than anyone else conceived this plan for Canada's gas. This is the man, along with those who are now connected with him, to whom this country is asked through the medium of closure to turn over monopoly control of one of Canada's great and exhaustible resources. Yes, this is the man who was accepted at face value by this government through the years, and who even today is in a position where by virtue of the stock percentage he controls he would be able to go a long way to control the company.

Now, sir, I am going to read for a moment something of the record week by week and almost day by day of the announcement of this company since 1951. On February 22, 1951, the Toronto Star said:

J. R. Tolmie, counsel for T.C.P.L. outlined plans for a 2,200 mile pipe line from Alberta to Montreal. The company plans to spend $250 million on the project. Mr. Schultz said that the initial outlay would be subsidized by United States capital. It was planned to split the Canadian firm from the United States company as soon as possible, and Canadians would be given an opportunity to buy stock.

Then on January 2, 1952, again from the Toronto Daily Star:

A spokesman for Mr. Schultz denied a statement by Hon. W. S. Gemmell, Ontario provincial minister of mines—

And said—

. . . that his company were satisfied, that if they could only get permission to carry the gas out of Alberta it would not need any government capital investment.

A little later on, on April 3, 1954 the Toronto Daily Star said:

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines expects to build the proposed pipe line from Alberta to Ontario and Quebec, without direct government help, vice president Frank Schultz said today. His firm would not contemplate getting less consideration than the Interprovincial Oil Lines in regards to sales tax and other concessions. His firm expects a pretty rough time at the start, but it expects to walk on its own feet. He said that signed contracts with distributing firms were expected to provide enough guarantee to make bonds acceptable to insurance companies, and the company did not need a government guarantee for its bonds.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

The record year by year is one of deceptive finance, false promises and unjustified hopes. The Toronto Daily Star of May 14, 1954, said:

N. E. Tanner—

—he is now president—

—said that construction of the pipe line will start early next year. Gas is to start moving no later than December 31, 1955. He expects it to be feeding Winnipeg by late 1955, Toronto and Montreal to be hooked up by 1956.

Then on June 15, 1954, the following appeared in the Toronto Daily Star:

Nathan Tanner, president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, said . . . construction is due to start July 1st this year. He said that some pipe had already arrived. He stated that now the transport board in Ottawa had assured his company that they would get the necessary authority for the Trans-Canada line, plans are under way to get construction started in the spring of next year. He said that the financial success of the whole Trans-Canada project would not be affected if his company was unable to get the necessary permit from the United States federal power commission in Washington to sell gas in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Surely, sir, the ramifications inherent in statements like that are not a foundation upon which to build faith in a company with a record as uncertain as has been the record of this company.

Then on June 18, 1954, it is reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail:

J. Ross Tolmie, counsel for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, said that it wanted to make a start next spring on the first leg of the line from the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to Winnipeg, and then south 60 miles to the American border. He asked for interlocking permit similar to that granted the company by the Alberta Natural Gas and Petroleum board.

On July 29, 1954, the Toronto Daily Star reported:

Mr. Tanner announced that newly formed company Bechtel, Mannix and Hester will be in charge of design, engineering and construction of the pipe line. Granting of the permit by the transport board was all the company had been waiting on to go ahead with the Alberta-Montreal line. The contract with Bechtel, Mannix and Hester calls for the completion of the project by the end of 1956. The company will be selling gas in Saskatchewan, as far east as Winnipeg, and to the Minnesota area by next fall—

That is the fall of 1954.

—and Toronto and Montreal a year later.

And so on, page after page of statements, promises and things hoped for, whose only purpose could have been to delude; yet all through this picture this government, having been deceived over and over again, still continued to give its benediction and continued to deny alternative companies the opportunity to have their plans made known to parliament.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

On August 10, 1954, the Toronto Daily Star reports Mr. Tanner as saying:

> The construction of the pipe line will start next spring. It will be completed to Winnipeg and Emerson for exporting to Minnesota by November 1955 and to Toronto and Montreal the following fall.

Then on September 23, 1954, the Toronto Daily Star reported:

> Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has concluded an agreement for the sale of gas from pipe line to Northern Natural Gas Company, a distributor servicing the Minneapolis and St. Paul area of Minnesota, it was stated by N. Tanner. The company had agreed to sell and Northern to buy 100 million cubic feet of gas daily, starting fall of 1955. The following year, the agreement calls for stepping up delivery to Northern to a rate of 150 million cubic feet daily.

Then on October 22, 1954, the Toronto Star reported:

> Mr. Tanner assured Transport Minister Howe—

That is the way the description appears in the paper; there is a mistake in the portfolio.

> —that plans for financing gas line $300 million will be completed by December 31 deadline drawn up by transport commissioners. He assured the minister that financing plans were proceeding satisfactorily. Surveys were being completed in the west to determine the completion of the line. The pipe line will get under way next spring as planned.

What manner of foolish deception is this? Has this company in the last few weeks sprouted the wings of determination that will result in the early completion of this line when for five long years it has followed a course of continuing to issue optimistic statements which it must have known there was no hope of achieving?

The Toronto Daily Star of November 9, 1954 reports Mr. Tanner as saying:

> . . . the proposed pipe line was a sound project, and construction would start in spring of 1955. Gas producers, pipe lines and municipal distributors were all going to have to take a little less in the first year of operation of the pipe line. Both Canadian and Alberta governments were encouraging the company to get on the job.

And so on since. Everywhere, day by day through 1955, statements were issued that everything was being done. On April 18, 1955, in the Toronto Daily Star:

> Trans-Canada plans to build a 370-mile pipe line (24" diameter), from Toronto to Montreal this year, at a cost of approximately $29 million. This company had not abandoned plans to extend into Ottawa this fall, but this might depend on whether the market could be built up sufficiently beforehand.

On June 9, 1955 in the Toronto Daily Star:

> A natural gas pipe line from Toronto to Montreal may be built this year, said A. P. Craig, vice president in charge of sales Trans-Canada Pipe Lines said today.

All those statements indicate the labyrinth of financial twisting and turning which has characterized this company. Now, in 1956, the government finally says that something must be done, and it is going to advance up to 90 per cent of the necessary money to construct the first portion of the pipe line. The company is required to repay, as provided for in the agreement, within a period of some nine months.

This brings me to the point raised today by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. There is something very strange about this bill. Whilst one cannot refer to clauses in particular, nonetheless a reading indicates that this bill is to be implemented by agreements already completed or which will be signed after the bill is passed by parliament.

What does that mean? Here is another example of a loophole whereby this company will be able, because the actual agreement is not incorporated as an appendix, to evade its responsibilities with the assistance and connivance of the government. A new agreement can be entered into, other terms can be substituted, alterations can be made, and regardless of any term in that bill as to the date of completion, the changes that can be made will enable this government to grant to its favourite an extension over and above the period fixed in the bill. That clause clearly indicates that future agreements can be made; and if they can be made, it means that parliament is asked to accept and ratify in anticipation any changed agreements that are made at any time between the government and this company.

There has been a change recently. Mr. Gardiner Symonds has come into the picture. I am not going into particulars with regard to this gentleman, except to say that he too has a biography that is set out in detail in Business Week. It indicates that this man has indeed been a tremendous success in bringing together various pipe-line companies in the United States, and also in establishing and building new ones. In 1954 his company marketed 6 per cent of all the natural gas marketed in the United States, and that amount has been increased in 1955.

It is interesting to know, as far as Mr. Symonds is concerned, the man who is to be the guardian of Canadian interests, that he has already made a deal in anticipation with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, a company of which he will be one of the major shareholders, whereby Mr. Symonds' companies in the United States will benefit to the extent of $2 million a year for 25 years. Already he has made that arrangement. Already the price that is to be paid by Midwestern Pipe Lines company in the United States is so much lower than that offered by Natural Gas and the other two companies associated with it that Mr. Symonds will reap a profit on the basis of the anticipated supplies of this pipe line of approximately $20,000 every day in the year.

That is the kind of thing that demands to be looked into. That is the kind of thing that demands investigation, examination and consideration by parliament. That is the kind of thing that this government is trying to avoid and tried to avoid in the resolution stage, when it would be possible to ask questions, by the application of closure, thereby denying that investigation in which parliament has the responsibility to engage when so vast an undertaking as described by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is being foisted upon this house and the legislation forced through by that dangerous medium of the closure.

Yes, it is interesting to know this. We in parliament tried for days and days to find out any alternative plan. We tried to find out the McMahon plan, which was referred to in the press. We endeavoured to secure information in that regard, but strangely enough we could not do so. I am not going to read the record, but it is a record of recklessly false statements made by the government in denying the existence of these letters. Parliament was treated as a pawn to be ridiculed by the government. We asked for production. "There are no documents," was the answer. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce had desired to rely upon the confidentiality of those letters, he would have said, "They are personal and confidential." But nothing of the sort. He said, "There are none."

Then you ask us why we on this side of the house view with some concern and suspicion the amazing solicitude of this government for this chosen instrument which for five years has fooled this government and the Canadian people. Parliament could not see the documents. These documents were personal and confidential. Apparently the delusion that was perpetrated on this house by that denial of the existence of those documents was removed only when it transpired that there were two other copies, the existence of which caused such terrible annoyance to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Then, in his annoyance that there were other copies, he revealed the existence of these copies after a communication by telephone, at the suggestion of the opposition that Mr. McMahon might consider the removal of the veto of confidentiality.

But what about Mr. Symonds? He knew what was in those letters. He knew what the McMahon plan was. He was in Ottawa early in April. Parliament is denied the existence of the letters, but oh, not Mr. Gardiner Symonds, described as the supersalesman of this generation. During the period of his visit he made a speech at a luncheon meeting of the Canadian Club of Montreal, and in the Montreal Star I find a report of what he had to say. First of all he dealt generally with the plan and how beneficial it would be to Canada. Then there is the following in the report:

> Mr. Symonds also noted that the Canadian system would be able to take advantage of the storage facilities for gas available to Tennessee in the United States—

It is the Tennessee Corporation in the United States, of which he is the head.

> —and which were superior to storage available in Ontario. Commenting on reports that a rival group was putting in a bid to build the trans-Canada pipe line, Mr. Symonds said, "I don't think it is serious."

Well, it was serious enough for Mr. McMahon to visit Ottawa on two occasions. It was serious enough for him to set out his plan in detail. It was serious enough for him to point out in the correspondence with the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines plan would be ineffectual and inoperative and that it could not be implemented.

Strangely enough the Prime Minister never heard of the McMahon plan. I believe him, as all of us will believe him; but is that not a terrible commentary on the fact that this government has one minister who carries around in his pocket an alternative plan for this magnificent development, as it was described today, this development that according to the minister even exceeds the St. Lawrence waterway? With McMahon having submitted a plan, having pointed out the shortcomings, the impossibility of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines ever doing what it had promised, surely further proof was not necessary after five long years of changing course, of crab-like advance. Then Mr. Symonds went on to say:

> The announced competition came from Frank McMahon, an Alberta multimillionaire oil and gas promoter. Mr. Symonds said he had looked over the facts and figures presented by the McMahon group and could not see how they could be taken seriously.

Who showed them to him? Was he shown them when he visited Ottawa?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, sir.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was he given a peek? That is the kind of thing we want to know. That is what closure was designed to preclude and prevent. Yes; hide the documents; deny their existence, then plaintively appear in the House of Commons when you find they have become publicized, because there were two other copies, and in indignation describe how unfair it was that they became public property. We want to know how Mr. Gardiner Symonds found out about this. You can be sure McMahon did not show it to him, because he was a competitor. Who did? He knew when he spoke in Montreal on the 10th day of April what the McMahon plan was. He knew, the man who is going to make these millions I mentioned a while ago, the man whose plan will not assure to the producers of Alberta the same high return that would have been assured had Northern Natural Gas and the other companies been given an opportunity to carry out the plan they offered and the arrangements they produced.

Mention was made by the minister of the Northern Natural Gas Company of Omaha and these other companies. I asked for the production of documents, and certain documents were produced. It is very strange to read these documents. These companies are the major companies in the middle west. They are not in the position of raiders of a territory already allocated to them in Minnesota and adjacent states. They are there. The great fight today before the federal power commission is with the Gardiner Symonds' company, Midwestern, which is the raider interfering with and overrunning the area which these three companies and others are serving. They already had the marketing potentialities. They were there. They offered to take tremendous amounts of gas.

A reading of the documents indicates that some unusual things took place which suddenly altered the course. The minister says today that he was approached by them and that he said, "Of course I have nothing to do with this", and asked them to get in touch with the representatives of Trans-Canada. This is very interesting. Read the letters. On July 21, 1955, there is a letter from Northern Natural Gas Company, John F. Merriam, president, to Right Hon. C. D. Howe, which letter reads:

> Attached is a conformed copy of a letter proposal which has been today mailed to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited by Northern Natural Gas Company, People's Gas, Light and Coke Company and American Natural Gas Company. It is the hope of the three companies that the proposal will be helpful in providing a solution to the natural gas export problem. We will be glad to discuss this with you further, or with anyone you would designate, if it would be of assistance.
> Yours very truly,
>
> John Merriam.

To that letter the minister replied as follows:

> Dear Mr. Merriam:
>
> Thanks for yours of July 21 sending me a copy of your letter to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I had a talk with Mr. Tanner and some of his associates this morning and understand that he will have a discussion with you shortly. I am hopeful that a program can be worked with you and your group that will make it unnecessary to deal with others proposing to serve your territory. I will let you know if there would be any purpose in your group coming to Ottawa for further discussions.
>
> Yours sincerely,
> C. D. Howe.

That is quite a different matter from the coloured description given by the minister today. A plan was set out in detail whereby the three undersigned companies would organize and own a new company which would propose to receive natural gas from Trans-Canada at the United States-Canadian border south of Winnipeg in the fall of 1956 in such authorized quantities as were available. The three companies would propose to absorb in their three billion cubic feet per day pipe-line systems such volumes of natural gas delivered to them as were not required for delivery in eastern Canada, in the Windsor-Sarnia area. They proposed to spend $30 million to build a 400-mile connecting pipe line from the Winnipeg border to the one billion cubic feet per day pipe-line system of Northern Natural Gas in the Minneapolis area.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Does it say what price they were going to pay?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The price was set out earlier in detail. I do not have it here but I think it was 29 cents per thousand cubic feet.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That was formally withdrawn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the figure I have in my mind, and I am not usually mistaken about numbers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a great deal higher than is being offered today by the Midwestern company that has no sales area under its jurisdiction. That is a raiding corporation. If the federal power commission of the United States follows its judgments given in the past, it will deny to any other company the right to come in there because the system in effect in the United States, as recognized by the supreme court of the United States, is that it is in the best interests in public utilities, so long as the public interest is protected by powers such as the transport commission, that no area should find itself competed for when those occupying and serving that area are rendering reasonable service and are not mulcting the consumers.

Mr. Nickle: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has already received the commendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I do not want to interfere with that favourable relationship. I would suggest that any information he has to convey personally or by questions be conveyed to the minister and not to me.

An hon. Member: The gag.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member who has the floor cannot, of course, be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This letter concludes in this way:

> We wish to repeat that our three companies are the only ones who can either build a major pipe line all the way from the Winnipeg border to eastern Canada for maximum volumes, or build piecemeal in smaller steps to handle minimum volumes.
>
> No one else can do this.
> We are prepared to extend to you and the Canadian authorities the full co-operation of our companies in working out the program of handling the gas supply question in the best possible manner for the public interest of our two countries.

What I have quoted to you is from letters tabled in this house which indicate that at least an offer was made that caused the minister to say, "I hope you people can come to an arrangement". Then in order to show on what affable terms things were conducted I read you first the telegram from Mr. Tanner to John Merriam, president of Northern Natural Gas Company and dated August 8, 1955:

> Am unable to advise more definitely at this time. Use your best judgment regarding proposed study.
> Eldon.

That telegram is signed "Eldon", a fact which indicates a fairly friendly relationship at that time. Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, "I hope you people get together". In his letter he said he hoped they would get together and that "a program can be worked out that will make it unnecessary to deal with others proposing to serve your territory". Then on August 15 we have the following wire:

> Mr. John Merriam:
> Further to my wire to you August 8, Trans-Canada has executed a contract which meets its requirements.
> N. E. Tanner.

That telegram is signed "N. E. Tanner". What happened between those dates? What things transpired? What changed the "Eldon" relationship to a business relationship? Why the alteration in course? The minister tried to give an explanation today to the effect that they could not get together or something of the sort. Actually, it is interesting that it was at this point that this master salesman Symonds entered the picture.

Those are things we want to find out about. Those are questions that must be asked. If we ask them of the government and if we get the kind of answers that we received in reference to the McMahon letters, the replies will not be as valuable as the facts might warrant. Yes; what about Mr. McMahon? He made an offer. He set it out in detail. He showed what he would do. That statement is contained in his letter of April 24, 1956, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, detailing every possible eventuality, giving the particulars that only a definite offer would possibly include. It was naturally marked "private and confidential". It is to be communicated to the government. The letter is addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is addressed "Dear C.D.".

Mr. Rowe: What a darling he is!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; "Dear C.D." That is where the mistake was made. The letter is addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce—"Dear C.D."—setting the matter out in detail. He did not want the plan he was offering made public to every possible competitor in this country. He was offering this to the government, the only instrument of government that he could communicate with. Yet the Prime Minister does not hear anything about it. There are pages of plans—

Mr. Rowe: All confidential.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —submissions, and detailed criticism of Trans-Canada; but none of that letter ever came to the attention of the man who is Prime Minister who, after all, in his being represents the government of Canada. Private and confidential? Can you not see the minister going down side streets with the document hidden in his pocket marked "private and confidential", super-secret? With a document like that, I wonder he did not have a bodyguard protecting the revelation. My, what solicitude! We were told by the minister, "I never got a letter; there is no document." He knew "What I am carrying in my pocket, as I deny in the house, is just about twelve pages of plans and schemes and offers and quotations." Yet he says, "I have no document".

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Speaker, we want to break through that wall of secrecy that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has built not only around himself and parliament but around his colleagues in the cabinet. I shall just read a few lines in the letter—there is a long letter of April 4—which starts off in this way:

I appreciated the opportunity of seeing you on March 27 in Ottawa to discuss an alternate proposal to supply Alberta natural gas to eastern Canada. Confirming my representations to you at that time, I am prepared to undertake a Canadian-owned, privately financed project to construct an economically feasible gas pipe line from Alberta to Montreal if Trans-Canada is not immediately able to present a suitable proposal and some plan to break the present deadlock which is preventing the construction of the eastern Canadian pipe line.

What more do you want? "This is my proposal", he says. How else do you submit a proposal before it is actually translated into the formality of a legal document? Then he goes on to say this:

The closest and most logical market for surplus Canadian gas is in the existing pipe-line companies and distributors in the great plains-mid-west area of the United States. The three companies which presently serve this area, the American Natural Gas Company, People's Gas Light and Coke Company, and Northern Natural Gas Company, are prepared to purchase from a truly Canadian pipe line 400,000 mcf per day of gas at Emerson, Manitoba, under a 25-year contract to supplement their own supplies of gas. With this sale an all-Canadian pipe line project is economically feasible on a sound business basis without government financing or debt guarantee.

Had not McMahon proven that before? Had he not proven his capacity? He had already done that in another company.

Then it goes on to say:

With this sale an all-Canadian pipe-line project is economically feasible on a sound business basis without government financing or debt guarantee. These companies want no stock-interest in the Canadian pipe line company and in fact they desire that international dealings be on an arms-length basis.

Then he says:

It is further evident that Trans-Canada is controlled by United States financial interests and that it is influenced and dominated by Tennessee Gas Transmission Company. The plan proposed by Trans-Canada strongly favours Tennessee Gas Transmission Company to the detriment of Canada.

Was it because these letters contained that damning indictment that they were hidden? Is that the reason? After all, McMahon had established his right to know. He says:

I am firmly of the opinion that the Trans-Canada proposal to receive governmental subsidy through the crown corporation "bridge" and to sell gas for underground storage in the United States rather than to use southern Ontario underground storage to the fullest extent is not in the best interests of Canada.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker, when you are asking as to what is in the best interests of Canada, don't you believe that a Canadian could possibly give you as good advice as those from the Tennessee corporation in the United States?

With this in mind, I am enclosing a second memorandum which outlines the basic fault of the Trans-Canada plan.

The Prime Minister was never allowed even a peek at it, yet the cabinet had to decide which was the best. Apparently they had no benefit of any criticism of the plan that was submitted to the cabinet, although the responsible minister had the document in his pocket. It does look strange. It does ask for the opening of the gate just a little bit. It does demand that the searchlight of investigation be permitted to light up these darkened places. Never before has a pocket been such a dark place.

He goes on to say:

The three customer companies in the United States are strong organizations and are prepared to employ all of their resources to effect my alternate proposal. I am assured that necessary authorizations can be obtained in the United States in sufficient time to make possible an adequate supply of natural gas in Saskatchewan, Manitoba eastern Ontario and Quebec by the fall of 1957 and the completion of the entire pipe-line project by the fall of 1958.

Then he sets out a memorandum for the Alberta to Montreal pipe line. He says:

I will finance and construct an economically feasible pipe line from Alberta to Montreal and complete the same by 1958 without federal or provincial ownership or debt guarantee.

The other day the Prime Minister ridiculed the fact that he had offered to put up $500,000 as a bond to carry out that promise. Mr. Speaker, that was $500,000 more than this favoured Trans-Canada company has ever offered to put up or has put up.

As soon as Alberta and Canadian federal authorizations are obtained, and while authorizations in the United States are being obtained, I will place sufficient equity money and arrange for interim loans to permit the construction of the 34-inch pipe line from the closest gas fields in Alberta to Winnipeg to supply gas to Saskatchewan and Manitoba by late 1956 or early 1957.

What about the minister's bogey today that unless we accepted this plan we would not get gas into Winnipeg? On the one hand there is a company that has carried out its promises, McMahon, and on the other hand there is this Trans-Canada Pipe Line company that over the years has carried out no promise except to promise to do something at an unknown date in the future, whenever it gets assistance from the government.

Then, the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, what does it matter after all where the money comes from? What did Mr. McMahon say?

> We have oil and gas production and properties valued far in excess of $100 million considering only contracted production income, and we are in a position to put up $40 million to $45 million into equity and arrange interim loans to provide the some $80 million required for the construction of the pipe line to Winnipeg as the first phase of the complete project to Montreal.

What is wrong with that? I ask the Prime Minister, why do you evade McMahon and his plan as if he were the plague? Is there something wrong? Was there something untouchable about him? He says:

> The project will be Canadian controlled with not less than 70 per cent of the equity owned by Canadian companies and individuals.

That was an alternative not placed before the Prime Minister. I continue to quote:

> The capital cost of the project will be financed without government ownership or debt guarantee.

I ask the Prime Minister, when he speaks, to say whether he would have done what he has done if that same document had been brought to his attention and McMahon had shown his financial responsibility. Why come to parliament and ask us again to bail out this company? This reminds me so much of the ne'er do well nephew who over and over again is bailed out by the doting uncle. He says:

> The pipe line will sell, under long-term firm contracts at Emerson, Manitoba to American Natural Gas Company, People's Gas, Light and Coke Company and Northern Natural Gas Company, a volume of 400,000 cubic feet per day.

Some hon. Members: 400 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: These large figures are a bit disturbing, but what is a million anyhow?

> These companies are in a position to pay the best price for surplus Canadian gas to supplement their supplies.
> The pipe lines of these United States customer companies are already or are easily interconnected, so that only minor additional facilities are required, making it possible for them to pay a higher price at the border than any other company.

Would the Prime Minister not have given consideration to the McMahon plan if he had known that this company, already established and not dependent upon the illusory possibility of confirmation of plans by the federal power commission, was prepared to pay more than any of these other companies? Surely, Mr. Speaker, this document that remained ensconced in the bosom of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if it had ever been revealed to the light of day would at least have been an argument to be considered by the cabinet. But no; the Prime Minister honestly told parliament, "I never saw it".

Now we come to the last part of this momentous document, the memorandum re basic faults of the Trans-Canada plan:

> An all-Canadian pipe line can be built from Alberta to eastern Canada on a sound business basis without government financing or debt guarantee provided that the pipe-line company is constituted to further the interests of Canada and sell surplus gas in sufficient volume at an economic price to the existing pipe lines which now serve the great plains-midwest area of the United States.

The right hon. gentleman says that we are anti-American. We are not; we are pro-Canadian. That is the difference. We think it is pro-Canadian to get the largest possible price from an available market rather than turn over this natural resource to the vagaries of decisions by a foreign board. Sir, Trans-Canada as constituted at the present time is controlled by United States financial interests—this is what this memorandum says—and is dominated by Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, so the principal interest behind Canada's pipe line is dealing with itself as the principal purchaser in the United States. I continue:

> Trans-Canada, so influenced and dominated, proposes an uneconomic plan to favour Tennessee Gas to the detriment of Canada and at the same time requests the governments of Canada and Ontario to subsidize the $122 million pipe line "bridge" across northern Ontario in order to make it possible to put the proposal into effect.

Has there ever been an indictment of the plans of any company to equal that, Mr. Speaker? It is detrimental to Canada and detrimental to the producers in Alberta, since the price they will receive will be less because these companies that are to be preferred in the United States, the dominated puppets of Gardiner Symonds, are dealing with themselves. Now we begin to understand why it was, as I mentioned earlier, that he stood to make $20,000 a day for his parent company.

Here is his position. He has a dominating influence in Trans-Canada, the vender that is supposed to get the best price, and dominating interests in three western pipe-line companies that are trying to get gas at the lowest possible price. In the clash of interests like that I ask the Prime Minister who would win?

Mr. Hodgson: Heads I win, tails you lose.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It says this:

> The Trans-Canada plan contemplates the sale of gas to Tennessee Gas Transmission Company and a subsidiary at Emerson, Manitoba, and Niagara Falls, Ontario. Gas sold at Emerson would be used by the Tennessee Company in the great plains-midwest area of the United States to invade the duly franchised market areas of the present pipe-line companies and the utilities which they serve.
> The existing pipe-line companies and utilities in the great plains-midwest area of the United States are the logical markets for Canadian gas and are best able to pay a fair price and purchase large volumes for their present markets. Instead of selling gas in this market to the existing companies, Trans-Canada proposes to sell its gas to a company which cannot pay a fair price because it does not control the market and must construct millions of dollars of duplicating facilities to market Canadian gas and an unnecessary pipe line link to its system in Tennessee merely to comply with the policy of the United States requiring the use of Canadian gas only as a supplemental supply.

Surely that is reasonable. In 1951 the United States supreme court decided that no pipe-line company should be granted the right to invade an area already occupied. Weeks, months have gone by as the 120 interveners have appeared before the federal power commission in Washington to oppose the application of Midwestern Pipe Line Transmission Company. Suppose the federal power commission decided in their favour—and there is no record of a similar decision having been made to permit invasion and raiding. There is an appeal to the United States supreme court which in 1951, in the Pan Handle case, decided that there could be no invasion.

This memorandum goes on to say:

The Trans-Canada project requires that the federal power commission of the United States authorize the sale of Canadian gas at Emerson and Niagara and approve the construction of facilities in the United States required to transport the gas to market. It is highly questionable whether this necessary authorization for the sale at Emerson can ever be obtained because the Tennessee Company is seeking to raid the market that is now being served by Northern Natural Gas Company, American Natural Gas Company and the People's Gas, Light and Coke Company. These three companies, with combined assets of over $1·5 billion provide over 3 billion cubic feet per day of gas service to 15 million people in the great plains-midwest area.

Finally, and I think there is so much truth in this—it is page 3 of the secret report—

The best market for Canadian gas in the United States as well as the most logical one is the existing pipe-line companies and distributing utilities in the great plains-midwest area.

A Canadian-controlled company interested primarily in the marketing of gas in Canada can readily negotiate a satisfactory arm's-length arrangement with these companies which will make possible the construction and operation of an all-Canadian pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada on a sound business basis without government financing or debt guarantee.

I ask you, sir, at the expense of reiteration, why was that hidden from the government?

Now, sir, I wish to move to a conclusion, and to say this. Here is the situation. In the shadows is Murchison, a man whose sights at one time were levelled high enough that he believed the day would come when he would dominate all of the United States for Texas. Now he raises his sights just a little. He has a 25 per cent interest; and this group of financial wizards whose financial manipulations in the last few years should have denied them any credibility—I refer to those who introduced this at the beginning, the Murchisons and those allied with them—come along and say, "Now, we are in a position where we cannot finance." These mendicants come to parliament and say, "You give us the money and we will build as far as Winnipeg."

Mr. Speaker, who would not build as far as Winnipeg with the government supplying everything? We have not had this answered, though. In view of that particular portion of the bill before this house which allows for further agreements, what are we going to do if they default?

Mr. Fleming: There will be more extensions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will there be more extensions? Will this benevolent organization once more be a beneficiary of government solicitude? Surely there is reality in this.

In the United States, Midwestern has little chance of getting within months, even within the next couple of years, the permission of the federal power commission. What are you going to have? You will have the construction that McMahon would have done without this government's guarantee. You would have had the completion of that portion of the pipe line by the end of 1956. You would have had the premier of Manitoba getting what he asked for and what the legislature of Manitoba has asked for, and not all this pussyfooting by this government and none of this dawdling on the part of Trans-Canada.

The minister says, "Oh, I have a provision that 51 per cent will be controlled by Canada." He had better read some of the evidence that some of the boys are giving down in Washington today. Charles S. Coates, a United States citizen, executive vice president and general manager of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, gave evidence there on February 29, 1956. We have this agreement of February 8, 1956, this massive agreement between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, Tennessee Gas, Canadian Gulf, Hudson Bay Oil and so on, and it says this:

It contains this paragraph:

Trans-Canada declares and agrees that its arrangements for the financing of the costs of construction of the west-east natural gas transmission line proposed to be built by Trans-Canada will include a public offering in Canada of common shares of Trans-Canada's presently unissued capital stock in an amount not less than 51 per cent of the total number of common shares of Trans-Canada to be outstanding after such offering has been made including the shares covered by such offering, and that it is Trans-Canada's intention to effect a wide distribution of such shares throughout Canada.

Well now, how do they do that? The Prime Minister having been a great corporation lawyer, I would like his explanation as to how they are going to succeed in that and what control they will have over these shares if they are purchased by dupes or by decoys. Let us hear how Mr. Coates debunked the whole thing. He was asked:

Is there any agreement or understanding other than an actual allotment under which Tennessee would have the right to purchase additional shares of common stock of Trans-Canada?

Hon. members know that today Tennessee with its subordinates controls over 50 per cent. Mr. Coates replied:

Yes, Tennessee and all stockholders. As our money needs arise, the stockholders are obligated to furnish the money that we need to operate with, and to do what work it is necessary for us to do prior to public financing, and they will pay in their money at $8 a share and take shares of stock on a pro-rata basis for what they now own.

Does that not let the cat out of the bag?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What was the last?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the evidence of Mr. Coates.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Read it again.

Mr. Fleming: Pay attention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That evidence was given on February 29, 1955. The minister asked me to read it again. Well, if the minister had been listening instead of reading a paper or pretending to read a paper he would have heard it. Now he can look at Hansard.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would rather read the paper.

Mr. Rowe: He says he would rather read the paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That rather reveals the minister's contemptuous attitude. I have heard him read lectures to members on the other side of the house. Yes, that is such a revealing answer as to the extent to which the minister, in his omnipotence and his belief in his infallibility, looks upon the House of Commons as a place to debate; but as far as he is concerned the plan is a secret in his pocket. The secret is in his soul. Never in all history was such a monumentally important document concealed for so long from a cabinet which should have had it, and from a parliament which deserves to have it.

I say, sir, there are many questions that have to be answered. There is much information that deserves to be secured. The minister mentioned in a glib way that after all, what did it matter who owned the shares. What does it matter? Well, I simply ask him this, if it is not in the nature of a declaration of independence—the expression he used the other day—what would happen in the United States Senate and House of Representatives if the position were reversed and a situation such as was envisaged in an editorial in the Toronto Telegram were to be placed before that body? This was a very short editorial which appeared on May 12, 1956, and it is sound, analytical sense couched in lissom language:

Should the pipe line situation be reversed, a Canadian company might make the following firm, definite, and unconditional offer to President Eisenhower:

The Canadian all-American pipe line company will build a pipe line from Old Faithful in Yellowstone national park to pipe hot water to every bathroom and kitchen in the United States of America, providing it gets Canada's okay to pipe the surplus over there.

All-American is confident it can finance the whole project, providing the United States government puts up the money.

The All-American Pipe Line Company is all-American, providing 83 per cent control by Canadians.

All-American is dedicated to the development of a great all-American resource in the national interest, providing it can be sold cheaper to Canadian users than to Americans.

All-American will be happy to retain ownership and to operate the pipe line, providing it is profitable.

All-American will unconditionally hand the pipe line over to the United States government, lock, stock and barrel, on demand, providing it loses money.

All-American is confident that the American taxpayer will be glad to accept these terms, providing he is crazy.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) should get in on that one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think that editorial pretty well analyses the whole situation. I have placed but a few general matters before the house, and other hon. members will fill in the details. How are we going to get this information? Will we get it in committee of the whole? Well, if the information we might get there is as reliable as the information we got regarding the letters that were in the minister's pocket, the information we receive will not be too helpful.

Mr. Fleming: It will be worthless.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will we get only that which the government in a spirit of benevolence will vouchsafe to the opposition? After all, the steamroller has to roll. Why? Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister that question. What is there to hide? What is there to conceal? What other documents are there in whose pockets? What happened in July of 1955, when there was that great somersault in connection with the plans of Northern Natural and the other companies and the offer to buy Canadian gas at about 5 cents a thousand cubic feet more than the price that is to be offered by the Gardiner Symonds company?

What happened then? Why did McMahon withdraw his offer? We might ask the minister in committee what happened during the course of that telephone conversation, but he keeps no records.

Mr. Fleming: His memory is not too good.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think McMahon would recall the circumstances as to what happened that day if he were given a chance to speak.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If closure were removed from McMahon's lips by letting him come before a committee of parliament we would have the answer. Let us ask him a few questions. Let us ask Gardiner Symonds what enabled him to say in Montreal on April 10 that McMahon's plan was no good, that there was nothing to it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You had it at that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement, Mr. Speaker, is as false as the statement the minister made when he denied the existence of those letters.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am going to sit down.

Mr. Speaker: It is now past six o'clock. May I revert to an expression I used earlier and which caused some surprise, at least to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I will accept the motion later on. I want to make a point because I think it is important. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking, and at one point the hon. member for Prince Albert rose in order to correct the statement that was being made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I said, "If the hon. member raises a question of privilege, and it turns out that his question of privilege is a fraudulent one—". At that moment, the hon. member for Eglinton exclaimed, "Mr. Speaker," indicating his surprise, and I went forward and said that the term had been used in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fulton: Will you let us use some of the other terms that have been used there?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member was not here when I said earlier that when I am trying to make a point, hon. members should hear me in silence, as I try to do when they make their points. I should like to refer to United Kingdom parliamentary debates, volume 503, July 1, 1952, columns 275, 276 and 277, where Sir Winston Churchill said:

> I am bound to say, if I may make a diversion, that I do not think there is any practice of the house which is more a subject of abuse than this raising of points of order of an unreal or even fraudulent character.

Later in the discussion the deputy speaker said:

> I am in absolute agreement with the first comment. The points of order raised at the moment can certainly be described as fraudulent in my opinion.

Later he explained what he meant by that. The deputy speaker said:

> The word "fraudulent" was not used in that context at all.

Meaning that there was no reflection on the Chair. He explained further:

> The word "fraudulent", as I understand it, was used against points of order which hon. members raise, when the minister or the hon. member who is speaking refuses to give way, and think that the only way they can get their word in is by raising a point of order. It happens time and again and, in my opinion they are fraudulent points of order. I hope they will be stopped.

On June 18, 1952, Sir Winston Churchill rose and said (volume 502, column 1198):

> Is not this abuse of the phrase "On a point of order" becoming a scandal in this house?

It may be that a point of order or question of privilege used in that way should not be called fraudulent, but I may say that I took the example in the United Kingdom Hansard.

Would the hon. member for Prince Albert send me his motion? I think hon. members will bear with me so that I may propose it from the chair. Does the hon. member for Prince Albert wish to send it to the Chair now?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Shall I read it now, sir? I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was about to conclude when the recess took place at six o'clock. There are two or three other references I should like to make. One is that in addition to hearing from Mr. McMahon and from the representatives of the three companies in Minnesota who deliberated with the representatives of Trans-Canada, I think we should also hear from Gairdner and Company to ascertain something about their representations.

In addition, it would be of interest to know the answer to the question to which the Department of Trade and Commerce was unable to give an answer on March 15. I had asked what was the parent company or corporation of each of these companies, Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, Canadian Gulf Oil Company, Canadian Delhi Oil Limited, Tennessee Gas Transmission Company and the Western Pipe Lines group. Then I asked a further question, which was in these words:

> What proportion of shares in each of said companies is held by a non-Canadian parent company and what proportion by the Canadian public?

In reply the Department of Trade and Commerce gave the following answer:

> Questions 3 and 5 relate to the distribution of the shares of the various participating companies. Information relating to these matters is not available from government records.

Information should also be available to enable us to consider the meaning of section 7, subsection 1 of the bill, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not any agreements between Her Majesty and Trans-Canada, made after the coming into force of the act, could alter, change, deviate or in any way derogate from the terms of the agreement which for some reason is not attached as a schedule to the bill or as part of the bill.

At the same time, as I have already stated, we could hear the evidence of Gardiner Symonds and also that of Mr. Tanner or other officers of Trans-Canada to ascertain the reasons for the repeated changes in front and the revolving alternatives that Trans-Canada has offered for so long. Consideration could also be given to the most peculiar anomaly of all, namely that if Montreal is served the Canadian people will find themselves in the position that through one form of subsidy the government of Canada will persist in putting gas into Montreal there to compete with Nova Scotia coal, which also receives a direct subsidy from the Canadian people.

Finally, very full consideration should be given to the Midwestern plan to ascertain whether or not this company can, within an assignable time in the future, develop or secure a market, what are the possibilities generally with respect to the rendering of a decision in that litigation of unpredictable length now in the course of proceeding before the federal power commission, and also to ascertain how much time will elapse before the hearing of evidence and submission of argument by counsel representing some 118 competing and opposing interests are even completed.

All these matters demand the setting up of a committee to ascertain these facts, and in order that this may be done, and to find out the peregrinations of the missing McMahon submissions and the reasons why they were maintained in such concealment and in cold storage for so long, I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew):

> That Bill No. 298 be not now read the second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a remark that the project of the building of a trans-Canada pipe line should be one which should appeal to all the people of Canada, and I want to say that I am in accord with that statement.

There are certain provisos that I would make. First of all, of course, it should be shown that the pipe line would be economically sound from the point of view of Canada. I believe that can be done. Then, too, there is a vast quantity of gas in the province of Alberta which should not be allowed to go to waste and which should be utilized as speedily as possible. I think all Canadians would agree with that, because while that gas is in the province of Alberta it is indeed a resource that in reality belongs to all the people of Canada and should be utilized for the benefit of Canada.

One of the objections I have to the proposal now before us is that the success of the trans-Canada line from the point of view of the present project and company depends so largely on a decision of the federal power commission of the United States. I do not think that is a very dignified position for the country to be in, and I believe we should consider the alternatives to this plan. In my opinion there is only one alternative, and that alternative is that we shall build and operate the pipe line as a public utility. I do not say that the line should be built by the federal parliament of Canada alone if the provinces wish to co-operate in the building of the line.

If on the other hand a better plan would be to build the pipe line wholly under the jurisdiction of this federal parliament of Canada, then the provinces could take the gas from the line and distribute that gas in their own provinces under their own plans. The provinces that today have power commissions could distribute the gas through their own power commissions. If any one of them wished to distribute through a private enterprise organization, that would be the decision of the province concerned. But to my mind it would be an economically sounder proposition in every respect for the government of Canada, which can raise the finances much more cheaply than can a private company, to undertake this plan and do it by itself.

The bill before us falls into two parts. The first part of the bill deals with the setting up of the crown company. I want to say immediately that when we are undertaking a major project of this description, I think a crown company is the proper way in which to do it, a crown company that can be brought before the appropriate parliamentary committee and questioned on its operations, but that operates independently of day to day interference and control of the House of Commons.

As I have said, the bill falls into two parts. It sets up for the purposes of the act a corporation to be called the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. Then it provides for the officers of that corporation. We know that the corporation will be the agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada. That is all to the good. Then I think the bill is spoiled by saying that this crown corporation is authorized and expected to do certain things for the company to be known as Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, a private corporation which, as has been so often demonstrated already in this debate, is under the financial control of powerful United States gas and oil companies, and the majority control of which is held in the United States.

I recollect over the years the manner in which we have been told from time to time—and I remember statements by Mr. Mackenzie King, of course in another connection, for example in connection with the setting up of the Bank of Canada—that those who controlled the financial affairs of the country in reality controlled the country. Although the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon tried to tell us something different, I am still of the opinion that the real control of any corporation or any organization lies in those who are in control of the finances of the corporation.

So then we have the two parts of this bill. First there is the principle of the bill setting up this crown corporation and giving it certain obligations and certain powers. Then there is part II of the bill which deals with the building of the western section of the pipe line from the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to Winnipeg or a point in the vicinity of Winnipeg; and in the building of that part of the line we have undertaken an obligation, according to the bill, to finance that section to the extent of 90 per cent, not to exceed $80 million, and the company itself—so the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us the other day—would have an investment of some $15 million initially.

Hence in reality what we are doing is handing over to this new corporation—which as I say is an American corporation—some $80 million to build that part of the pipe line. It may be said, of course, that the company will be obligated to pay 5 per cent interest, but the interest rate is not the real factor. The real factor is the amount of money we are putting into this project, namely $80 million. The bill also provides that the crown corporation shall be able to expend, lend or otherwise dispose of some $130 million altogether.

When you look at these provisions you see what we are doing for this company. While we with the province of Ontario are obligated to build the bridge across northern Ontario and with them are going to appropriate $118 million for that purpose, there is still left the gap between the city of Winnipeg or a point in the vicinity of Winnipeg and the Ontario-Manitoba border. We do not know how that is going to be financed. If the company cannot finance the first leg—which is an easy leg and which should be a productive leg—from the Saskatchewan-Alberta border to Winnipeg, how is it going to finance the more difficult piece of territory from Winnipeg to the Ontario border?

I am not so much interested in an argument as between the companies that were involved in the discussions which led up to the trans-Canada pipe line. For example, I do not think the record of Mr. McMahon, who has been talked about this afternoon, is one which recommends him to the attention of this House of Commons or this parliament. From what we know of his operations in Canada and elsewhere I think there is little to choose between Mr. McMahon and some of the other people whom we at times have referred to as economic buccaneers. I cannot see anything to choose between them. If Canada is going to be skinned, I would just as soon be skinned by an American as by a Canadian financial man.

I therefore do not think it is worth while to enter into a discussion of the relative merits of Mr. McMahon, Mr. Murchison or any of these other gentlemen. However, I want to say this to the government. I cannot understand part II of the bill. I cannot understand why part II of the bill refers to an unidentified agreement. I cannot understand why part II of the bill states:

> Pursuant to an agreement in that behalf made, with the approval of the governor in council, before or after the coming into force of this act, between Her Majesty and Trans-Canada . . .

And so on. I cannot understand why this is spoken of as an agreement. Any agreement that has been made between the government of Canada and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited should be identified, at the very least. Of course I think my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was perfectly right this afternoon when he argued that the agreement should form an integral part of this bill and be appended to it.

I know there are hon. gentlemen sitting opposite and in the cabinet who have had long experience in public life in this country and two of whom have headed the governments of their respective provinces. I doubt very much whether either of them, in conducting the affairs of their respective provinces at that time, and in making an agreement similar to this with a private company and bringing in a bill, would not have appended the agreement to the bill so the legislature—and as we are now, this parliament—would have the right not only to discuss the agreement but to decide upon it and have a firm understanding of it.

As a matter of fact, when we look into this particular section of the bill what do we find? We find certain deficiencies in it. In this bill no date is named for the completion of the western section that we are financing, and no date is set for the repayment of the loan of some $80 million which we are making. Why are these two important details not included in the bill itself, as well as in the agreement which should be attached to the bill? As a matter of fact I think one could argue from the wording of this section of the bill that the governor in council might have the power to vary this agreement, to enter into an agreement with the other party to extend the time, or to extend the payments, or to do other things which we do not expect will be done and which certainly should not be done without the consent of this parliament. So I say, then, that part II of the bill now before us is deficient.

I would say to the government that when this bill goes into committee I think the government should move to have any agreement which has been signed made an appendix to the act which this bill will become when it is passed. I think that would be wise. It may be said, of course, that the government has no intention of varying the agreement, and no intention of varying the two important features to which I have just referred, namely the date of the completion of the western part of the line and the date of repayment of the loan. I know the government itself may feel this is unlikely, but supposing something happened and we had a general election and a new government in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, wait a moment. Supposing that was the government of my hon. friends who sometimes say they are going to sweep the country at the next election, the Social Credit party.

Mr. Blackmore: All would be well, then.

Mr. Coldwell: All would be well then? I was going to say, then Canada would be sold down the river. I say while I think there is no likelihood of that, nonetheless this parliament has an obligation to safeguard the country against anything happening which might be injurious to this country. Consequently we should insist, and I think the government would be wise to agree, on having this agreement which we have before us tonight taken from the table of the house and made a part of the bill.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated this afternoon, looking over the legislation of the past, that when agreements were brought in under a bill of this description those agreements have been made appendices to the legislation. I say that should be done. I think, too, this house should insist on that because in reality by leaving those things out we are giving to the government what the Liberal party in 1932 objected to very strenuously, something in the nature of a blank cheque. We have not filled in these two details, and these two details are important in any cheque or in any note, the date of repayment and the fulfilment of other obligations that may be inserted in the note. I think we should insist that this should be done.

Then the principle of the bill setting up the crown company, if it were of a different character and without these other details in it, would I think be generally satisfactory. As the matter now stands it is a most unsatisfactory proposal, and as I have sometimes described it, it is outrageous. May I say to the government that what is even more outrageous is the fact that steps have been taken to preclude any detailed discussion of the bill, and particularly of the resolution which introduced the bill.

This afternoon the minister said there was obstruction. Well, the resolution was introduced one afternoon and the Minister of Trade and Commerce immediately gave notice of closure, before there was any indication in the house of obstruction.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There were five divisions.

Mr. Coldwell: Perhaps there were five divisions during the afternoon. I am not sure whether they were all before the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. Argue: Now he does not want us to vote.

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, those motions that were moved were not motions of obstruction, because they were as much within the rules of the house as was the closure motion moved by the minister. Moreover, that motion was agreed upon by the cabinet and by the minister long before what he calls the obstruction motions were ever moved.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is not true.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that closure was not agreed upon before the minister moved it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member asks me a question. It was agreed closure would be applied if necessary, but it was agreed that if there were no evidence of obstruction it would not be applied at that time.

Mr. Coldwell: I noticed the tail of the minister's sentence, "at that time". I want to say this to my hon. friends of both the Liberal and Conservative parties. I find it very difficult to understand why they are so opposed to this project being undertaken as a public utility. As a matter of fact both parties have supported the setting up of public corporations to operate public utilities. I do a good deal of reading of biography. I am rather fond of it. Some time ago I was reading the biography of Adam Beck, so I took it up again since this debate began. As a matter of fact I find that the Conservative premier of Ontario said this as long ago as 1906, when the Ontario hydro-electric was being proposed:

> The water power at Niagara should be as free as the air, and more than that, I say on behalf of the government that the water powers all over the country shall not in future be made the sport and prey of capitalists and shall not be treated as anything else but a valuable asset of the people of Ontario, whose trustees the government of this people are.

That was said 50 years ago, and there was very bitter opposition to the setting up of Ontario hydro. Many of the arguments that are being used today against the establishment of a pipe line of this description under public ownership were being said then. Premier Whitney had powerful support, of course, from certain newspapers and particularly the Toronto Telegram under the editorship of John Robinson. Incidentally I believe his daughter wields the pen today from the galleries of this House of Commons, and does it very effectively in the same cause.

A little later, in 1910, the same premier said this:

> We have been attacked, vilified and slandered. [Mr. Argue.]

I am thinking of some other governments that have set up public corporations to try to protect the people of the province from exploitation.

> Large sums of money have been expended in creating and fomenting prejudices and ill feeling against us. And still larger sums have been expended in conducting a campaign against us outside of Ontario. Our opponents left nothing undone that could be done, and men and influences, from the humblest man in the land up to the prime minister of Great Britain, were approached in the endeavour to destroy our power legislation, and render it impossible for this wonderful new force to be used and enjoyed by the people except on terms laid down by individuals.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is Sir James Whitney.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes. And that is exactly the position we are in today. Why should those great resources of all the people of Canada—true, they are located in Alberta—not be used and enjoyed by the people except on terms laid down by individuals; and those individuals, incidentally, beyond the borders and the jurisdiction of our own country?

I remember, of course, when it was first suggested that a plan might be adopted which would have government representation on the directorate of a new company to bring those resources to eastern Canada, and the president of the Gulf Oil Company, an American, said he would have nothing to do with a project in which governments had any control. He would have nothing to do with the use of his resources, as he put it—the resources of the people of Canada which had been alienated to him by a provincial government in this country—in a project in which governments had any control.

As for the Liberals, well, many and many a time I have heard over the years Liberals supporting the public ownership of certain utilities. In 1911 when the hydro-electric had become something of a success, Mr. N. W. Rowell, the new leader of the Liberal party, said this:

> We believe in and will support public ownership and operation of public utilities and especially the utilization of water powers throughout the province for the generation and distribution of electricity; also the acquisition and operation of telephone lines.

Mr. Carrick: Will the hon. member permit a question? I am wondering whether he has seen the report of Mr. Glassco of the Clarkson company, who was asked to investigate the feasibility of public ownership in this case, and the difficulties that he pointed out would exist?

Mr. Fulton: That is not Walter Gordon's partner, is it?

Mr. Coldwell: Just a moment. I read it; I read the entire report, and Mr. Glassco said that public ownership was feasible; that it was economically sound. Then he went on to say that he did not think in these circumstances it was advisable. That is what he said. I think I have quoted him accurately; but he gave the view that it was economically sound on the basis of his knowledge of economics and as an accountant. The latter point was simply this. He gave his opinion as an individual and outside his particular job. I know my hon. friend is one of the spokesmen for the gas companies in this house. I know that. I am not going to argue with him.

Mr. Carrick: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Carrick: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has the floor, and if the hon. member wishes to correct something the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, the hon. member who wishes to do so must first make sure that he has consent. If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not wish to give consent the hon. member has the right to make a correction once the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has concluded his speech.

Mr. Carrick: Am I not permitted to rise on a question of privilege at this time?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: If it is a question of privilege I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Carrick: On a question of privilege, I am objecting to the hon. member asserting that I am the spokesman for an oil company.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have heard that much, and this is what I am trying to indicate to all hon. members. Too many of these questions of privilege are being raised for the purpose of correcting statements made by hon. members in debate. As I said earlier, an hon. member has the right to make a correction at the end of another hon. member's speech, but he cannot do so under the disguise of a question of privilege unless he has consent.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, my remark was based entirely upon the—

Mr. Carrick: Will the hon. member give me consent?

Mr. Coldwell: I think, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Ellis: Who wrote his speech for him?

Mr. Coldwell: If the hon. gentleman will just wait until I finish I will satisfy him. What I was about to say was that I had read his speeches in the house and that was the conclusion I had come to. If I am wrong in my conclusion, then the hon. gentleman has the right to say so.

Mr. Argue: He can make another speech.

Mr. Coldwell: As I say, I want to see Alberta gas used, but I want to see the project completed under a proper agreement, under a proper act of this parliament with no alienation of our resources and our rights to any corporation, particularly not to a group of corporations over whom we have very little control because they control the finances of the organization.

The agreement which is not attached, but which has been circulated and therefore is worthy of notice at the present time, has some very interesting features. I look at section 6 on page 3, which reads as follows:

> Trans-Canada shall be in default hereunder subject to any delay as may be occasioned by force majeure defined to mean acts of God.

Then they go on to spell out almost every conceivable thing that may happen in this country to justify the delay and therefore the extension of the agreement. I do not think I have ever seen as many interferences specified as I see in this agreement. What are they?

> Strikes, lockouts or other labour or industrial disturbances, civil disturbances, arrests and restraints from rulers and people, interruptions by government or court orders, future valid orders of any regulatory body having jurisdiction, acts of the public enemy, wars, riots, sabotage, blockades, embargoes, insurrections, failure or inability to secure materials or labour by reason of priority or similar regulations or orders of the government, epidemics, landslides, lightning, earthquakes, fires, storms, floods, washouts or explosions, provided that such event shall be beyond the reasonable control of the party concerned and not due to its fault or negligence,—

Mr. Rowe: Is closure there?

Mr. Knowles: Everything but a general election.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Finish the paragraph.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, I will finish it.

> —but not to include any orders, rulings, or actions, or absence thereof, by the federal power commission of the United States of America—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Go on.

Mr. Coldwell: All right.

> —the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, or the petroleum and natural gas conservation board of Alberta or tribunals having similar jurisdiction.

The federal power commission is excluded, and why would it not be excluded when it is the great uncertainty in connection with this whole project?

One other thing I want to ask is this. How do we know that this company has the necessary pipe to do this job? We have seen no evidence of it at any time in this house. Last Friday my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked for a copy of Trans-Canada's option on pipe. The minister said he would table it. Again on Tuesday the same question was asked and the same answer was given; and today, just before I came into the house this evening, it was asked for, and still it is not available. We have no evidence—

Mr. Fulton: I wonder why.

Mr. Coldwell: —that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company has any option on the pipe which I believe is owned by one or more of the American corporations who are interested in this particular project.

Therefore, you see, while we adequately protect the company by enumerating all the possible things that may happen to prevent the company carrying out its obligation by the 1st or 2nd of April, we have no assurance that the company can carry out the obligation of providing the pipe, and that is not included in this particular bill nor have we seen any evidence of it.

Mr. Enfield: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Regier: Mr. Tanner has only two shares.

Mr. Enfield: Have you read section 14, clause (b)?

Mr. Coldwell: This is the agreement; I am talking about the bill. As far as the bill is concerned and as far as this house is concerned we have no assurance; and this agreement is not a part of the bill. We have no assurance whatsoever.

Mr. Enfield: You were using the agreement to back up your former argument.

Mr. Coldwell: There are other features of this bill which I could discuss at some length, but I do not propose to do so. One other thing I want to say is this. When this matter was brought before the appropriate committee of this house some time ago all kind of assurances were given by the officers of the company that this would be an all-Canadian project and would be financed by Canadians in the usual way. From time to time they have gone before the government and asked for a variation of the contract. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, I think this house is justified in using every means within its power to—

An hon. Member: Obstruct?

Mr. Coldwell: —to find out everything in connection with this deal. I am therefore in accord with the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert and I shall vote for it.

But I think when we send the subject matter to the committee we should do more than that. We should consider what is the only alternative as I have already stated it. We should have a thorough investigation into the economic feasibility of the whole plan, if you will, and particularly of public ownership; for I am convinced that in the capitalization of the line, capital can be obtained by parliament or the national government of Canada at a rate of interest far less than it can be obtained by any private corporation, and that the costs of financing and raising funds by the private corporation will probably be twice the cost of raising finances by the government of Canada.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

> That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding thereafter the following words:
> "so that consideration might be given to the advisability of recommending the construction and operating of a trans-Canada natural gas pipe line under public ownership."

I want to leave it at that tonight, Mr. Speaker, having placed on record what I believe to be the only feasible alternative. I think we can at least say that we have been consistently advocating this particular kind of plan to bring gas from western Canada across the country to eastern Canada from the very outset.

Mr. Carrick: Mr. Speaker, may I now rise on a question of privilege? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in the course of his speech said that I was a spokesman for the oil company.

Mr. Ellis: The whole government is.

An hon. Member: Quiet, fog-horn.

Mr. Carrick: I want to assure the house I am not the spokesman for any oil companies and I have no connection, financially or in any other way, with any oil companies.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not suggest that.

An hon. Member: Yes, you did.

Mr. Carrick: In the speech I delivered in connection with the speech from the throne

I was simply stating what was my own honest opinion of what course was best for Canada in connection with the matter under consideration in this bill.

Mr. Ellis: Who wrote the speech for you?

An hon. Member: Who wrote yours?

Mr. Carrick: I wish to assure the hon. member that the speech was entirely my own. I hope to have the opportunity of speaking in this debate later.

Mr. Knowles: Provided the government does not put on closure.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Social Crediters in this debate is clear and unequivocal. We want the pipe line built at the earliest possible moment—

Mr. Ellis: For the benefit of United States companies.

An hon. Member: Oh, dry up, you!

An hon. Member: Pipe down, fog-horn.

Mr. Blackmore: —and in order that the pipe line should be built at the earliest possible moment we want this bill put through the house at the earliest possible moment.

There are two reasons for our taking this attitude. In the first place, Alberta as a whole and as part of the Dominion of Canada needs to have this pipe line built; consequently the bill must be put through as quickly as possible. In the second place, Ontario and Quebec need this pipe line built at the earliest possible moment; first, in order to enable them to have adequate fuel as a source of energy in time of peace and second, in order to have a fuel supply secured in case of war.

An hon. Member: Which war?

Mr. Blackmore: Let us examine the situation in which Ontario and Quebec would find themselves in case we became involved in war, a war in which guided missiles would be predominant as a weapon. How long would it take before we would have our hydro installations in danger of being blown up? What would that do to the economy of Ontario and Quebec? Then again, how would it be possible for us to have a normal supply of coal coming in from the United States, up from Nova Scotia or down from Alberta, when it is possible to blow every train off the track and sink every ship? I think it is time every hon. member faced up to that problem.

In Ontario and Quebec we use a great deal of fuel oil which comes in from the United States. In the event the United States became heavily involved in war and needed fuel supplies for war operations, does any hon. member suppose she would not divert much of that fuel oil from Ontario and Quebec? I ask you to consider what effect that would have on every household in Ontario and Quebec and every industry in those provinces, including the war industries.

In the face of that fact, which I think should be obvious to a 14-year-old child, I find it utterly impossible to conceive how any hon. member who looks upon himself as being as responsible—as do the Conservatives and members of the C.C.F., every one of whom is grown up and over 30 years of age—is able to justify himself in doing everything in his power to block this bill and consequently to block the construction of the pipe line as long as possible.

I should like to ask one more question. What do you suppose at the present time would be the major objective of Bulganin of Russia in respect of this bill? He would want to delay the passing of the bill as long as possible, and consequently the construction of the pipe line, for the reasons I have already indicated concerning Ontario and Quebec in time of war.

An hon. Member: A good idea—

Mr. Blackmore: The trouble with these people is that they have men's voices but children's brains. I would like to turn my attention to some of the observations made by some of the hon. members who have thus far spoken. Let me take the case of the hon. member for Prince Albert. The hon. member spent a good deal of time in his speech saying outrageous things that could not possibly be supported by the facts, things which he believed would get into the press and create confusion throughout the land. For example, he spoke of this whole Trans-Canada Pipe Lines proposal as a nefarious scheme. Just weigh the word "nefarious".

Mr. Ellis: A good word.

Mr. Blackmore: What an outrageous thing to say. The hon. member could not support that statement with one iota of argument or evidence. Yet he can say this and get publicity all over the country and be believed by many admirers who will never be able to examine the facts of the situation, who will rely on the hon. member for Prince Albert and so be deceived. Next he spoke of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company as being "the pampered pet", and he made that remark notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said distinctly that it was not at all the government's pet or instrument. It was not chosen as the instrument in any way by the federal government. It was chosen by Alberta.

Mr. Knowles: $80 million.

Mr. Blackmore: I have an idea a good many hon. members do not pay attention to what other hon. members say. All they can think of is their own particular line of nonsense. He spoke of this pipe line company as being "a favoured corporation". What I said regarding the other matter is just as true concerning this one. As evidence that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was correct when he said that the government of Canada has not chosen the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company at all, may I read from a document which was placed on the record by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon, namely a letter written by Premier E. C. Manning of the province of Alberta, no longer ago than April 24, 1956. On page 2 of that letter we read the following words:

> In fairness to the Trans-Canada Pipe Line company, I believe it rightly can be said they have complied with every condition and requirement of the national gas policy laid down by your government.

In other words, the Dominion of Canada has laid down the policy, and the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company has complied with every detail. It is not true that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company is in any way a favourite or pet of the government of Canada. It is simply the instrument chosen by the Alberta government, and it has done everything it possibly could to comply with the request of the dominion government.

> They have encountered temporary difficulty in financing their part of the project—

Note those words and, incidentally, hit yourselves on the heads so you can get this:

> They have encountered temporary difficulty in financing their part of the project only because of the delay before the federal power commission at Washington, which is something entirely beyond their control.

That ought to settle the matter once and for all. You will remember that I asked you a few minutes ago what you would think would be Bulganin's attitude toward this bill. It is easy to find members who are riding along with Bulganin's policy.

Now we shall go on to other remarks made by the hon. member for Prince Albert. He made many grossly offensive and misleading remarks of many kinds in addition to the ones to which I have already referred. He described this scheme as "a raid". Let me recall to hon. members in the house that it has been laid down that all the money that is being advanced by the dominion government is only being loaned, and it is loaned at an interest rate of 5 per cent, a right good interest rate on an amount of money as large as that. Yet the hon. member for Prince Albert, considering himself a responsible and capable man, makes an outrageous remark of that kind. Besides that, it is agreed and stipulated that the money must be paid back within nine months. Whoever called a loan like that a raid, except the C.C.F.'ers and the Conservatives?

Mr. Ellis: What about that free money you speak of?

Mr. Blackmore: As a guarantee that the money will be repaid, every single asset of the company is mortgaged in order to cover that loan.

An hon. Member: There are no assets.

Mr. Blackmore: What foolishness! Men's voices and children's brains! The hon. member for Prince Albert mentioned "alternative proposals". What does he think? There was a good deal of questioning about the Frank McMahon proposals. The general idea obtaining in the minds of my Conservative friends seems to have been that notwithstanding the fact that this Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company has a contract with the federal government and has kept every single item in that contract, yet the federal government should with impunity break the contract just because a fly-by-night like McMahon comes forward with a proposal.

I should like to ask the hon. member for Prince Albert, a great lawyer, whether he would like to defend the government against a suit for damages, which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines could easily bring against the dominion government for that breach of contract. For members of parliament like the Conservatives, who pride themselves on being people of responsibility, to advocate by implication the dishonouring of a contract when one party to the contract has honoured its side in every single respect is something beyond the comprehension of anybody who is still sane. To back up what has been said, you will remember that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had said specifically that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company "is not in default". I propose to read the words, and I hope, this time they are read, that somehow or other they will get into the minds of C.C.F. and Conservative members, who need so much to have these things in their minds.

Then the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made a remark to the effect that the government was handing over a great quantity of money, but in reality the "handing over" is the lending of that money at 5 per cent interest on the most perfect security that could possibly be obtained to back up a loan.

Mr. Regier: Where is the security?

Mr. Blackmore: He said the government was going to be "skinned." I maintain that in the light of the facts remarks of that sort are simply a disgrace to the members who make them.

Mr. Regier: Where is the security?

Mr. Blackmore: They are utterly irresponsible, utterly misleading and completely out of place.

Mr. Regier: Where is the security?

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to—

Mr. Ellis: Who wrote that speech? The Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Blackmore: I wish to read three or four short excerpts from speeches by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On May 8, as recorded on page 3664 of Hansard, he used these words:

> I emphasize that the approach came from the government, not Trans-Canada.

In other words this Trans-Canada company is not the "pet" of the government.

> I emphasize that the approach came from the government, not Trans-Canada. Trans-Canada was not in default.

I hope the members of the C.C.F. party can read English well enough to know what that means.

Mr. Ellis: What have they done in the last five years?

Mr. Blackmore: That is perfectly clear. I wish to read another passage found on page 3862 of Hansard of May 14, which shows that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is the only instrument available. It is not that the government has any particular tenderness for this company. The fact is that the company is the only instrument available. Let me read the minister's words.

> There is in Canada only one agency which can be placed in a position to build the western part of the pipe line this year. That is Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. Some sections of the press, and some hon. members, are in the habit of referring to Trans-Canada as the government's "chosen instrument". The government has no chosen instrument. Trans-Canada is the only usable instrument available.

Once more, those words are just as plain as the English language can possibly make them. Once more, I should like to read an excerpt to show that Trans-Canada is not responsible for the present inability to finance. Ordinarily when reference has been made to the inability of the company to finance we have had an outburst from the C.C.F. resembling the "yakking" of a lot of jackals; no sense whatsoever, just crazy noise. On page 3862 of Hansard, column 2, we find these words of the minister:

> Financing by normal methods cannot be arranged in the absence of validation by the federal power commission of Trans-Canada's contract with Tennessee.

An hon. Member: Who said so?

Mr. Blackmore: That is just as plain as words can make it and those are the words of the responsible minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Ellis: Responsible?

Mr. Blackmore: —a man who knows more than 70 men like the hon. member.

An hon. Member: Attaboy, John.

Mr. Ellis: Cross the floor, John.

Mr. Blackmore: Those are the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who knows all there is to be known about the trans-Canada pipe line, yet we have these people questioning his word! It is simply an amazing thing. On the same page and in the same column I read these words:

> Therefore the only practical arrangement is to finance a start by Trans-Canada this year.

But when we finance the start the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says we are being skinned.

Mr. Ellis: Who is putting up the money?

Mr. Blackmore: Now, can you get sense out of that?

Mr. Knowles: They are getting dollars.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member for Prince Albert said some things to which I have already referred.

An hon. Member: How much will the "Socreds" get out of it?

Mr. Blackmore: I wish to spend a minute or two more on Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. In the first place, let us take the president of the company. Let us give him a little bit of attention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Once more the jackal chorus is going; just jackals, that is all! Hon. N. E. Tanner was minister of lands and mines in Alberta commencing in January, 1937.

An hon. Member: He went to his reward.

Mr. Blackmore: He served as minister until September, 1952. He resigned his position in 1952 and asked his constituents—I went around with him to every meeting—in the constituency of Cardston to release him from further service as their M.L.A. He covered the whole constituency speaking in support of E. W. Hinman, who has since become provincial treasurer of Alberta. He stated frankly why it was that he desired to withdraw from serving the people. He said that he had served them for 17 years, and he felt that the time had come when he should be able to engage to some extent in private affairs of his own in order to build up some sort of competency for himself and his family.

Mr. Ellis: How many shares of Trans-Canada has he?

Mr. Blackmore: He established a company in Calgary called Merrill Petroleums. That company under the management of Hon. N. E. Tanner have been a surprising success. They are very effective as a business organization in every possible way.

According to Premier Manning's letter of April 24, 1956, Hon. N. E. Tanner apparently did not take over the presidency of Trans-Canada until about two years after he withdrew from the government of Alberta. He was occupied earlier with his own company, Merrill Petroleums. From page 1 of Premier Manning's letter of April 24, 1956, I read the following:

> Over two years have lapsed since the present Trans-Canada project was formulated as a vehicle to implement national policy with respect to natural gas.

Yet we have the hon. member for Prince Albert trying to give the picture that this company had been going on for years in a tortuous manner, and trying to indicate that the company had been poorly managed and was dishonest. These words from the pen of Premier Manning himself ought to settle the matter once and for all—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: —and will for all honourable men.

Mr. Ellis: How many shares did Mr. Tanner have in Trans-Canada?

Mr. Blackmore: What difference does that make—

Mr. Ellis: Two shares.

Mr. Blackmore: —except to jackals?

Mr. Ellis: $16.

Mr. Wylie: How many shares have you?

Mr. Blackmore: Our C.C.F. friends are certainly worrying about the people of Alberta. The people of Alberta have slapped them in the face and kicked them time after time after time, yet they think they must be the little white-winged saviours of the people of Alberta, just as if the people of Alberta did not know something about these matters themselves.

In order to give some idea of just how badly Alberta is injured by the private enterprise we have there, which has done so much in the development of our industry and of course has aroused the greenest envy on the part of the C.C.F. people, may I tell the story, as far as I have the opportunity to tell it in the time at my disposal, of one of the gas reservoirs in the province of Alberta. This one is in the riding of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) about 25 miles from where I live, and is near the town of Pincher Creek. It is called the Pincher Creek wet gas field. In order to tell the story properly I should like to lead up to the discovery of the project by telling something about the history of the gas and oil industry in southern Alberta, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce did this afternoon.

From Peace river to the border and from the Rocky mountains to Saskatchewan, Alberta is already dotted with scores of gas fields and single well gas discoveries. For those who have never seen one of these fields, may I try to give some sort of idea of the kind of deposit these fields are in and the kind of job a company has to do in order to discover gas. What is a gas and oil field deposit like? It is like an unopened oyster shell lying on its side and buried in the ground. That is a fairly good picture of what a gas field is as nature left it. There is a large stone-like structure around the oval space and the oil body lies in the bottom of the oval much as soup will lie in the bottom of a soup tureen, lying on the floor of the oval chamber, so to speak. In above the gasoline and oil, between the surface of the gasoline and oil and the ceiling or roof of the rounded stone structure, gas has collected down through the ages; and because of the way in which it collects it comes to exert an enormous pressure on the surface of the oil which lies at the bottom of the oval structure. The gas presses on the oil. As soon as the drill goes down and pierces through the upper shell, we will say of the oyster, and goes down far enough, then the pressure of the gas on the oil surface forces the oil up through the pipe and out where people can get at it.

Now we come particularly to the wet gas field of Pincher Creek. This wet gas field—and I am thinking now in terms of the oyster shell—is seven miles long and about three miles wide at its widest place. The porous Madison limestone reservoir is buried two and a half miles deep—two and a half miles deep is the oyster shell—in the foothills of the Rocky mountains about 15 miles north of the Canadian and American border between Pincher Creek and Waterton Lakes national park. The ridge containing the reservoir—the ridge itself—lies buried more than one and a half miles below the surface of the great Pacific ocean that rolls its way 500 miles west beyond the Rocky mountains. Just think of the task involved, first of all in finding where that oil deposit lay and second, in getting down to the oil deposit and bringing the oil up.

The pool contains about 2,400 billion cubic feet of raw wet gas—just think how much that is—a mixture of natural gas, gasoline, condensate and light crude oil, sulphur, propane, butane and ethane. The difference between wet gas and dry gas is that wet gas contains all these substances which I have mentioned, while dry gas contains none of them but is practically ready to be used as gas immediately.

The worth of the whole mass of content of this field is more than half a billion dollars. Of this, 2,400 billion cubic feet of raw wet gas, 37½ per cent or 1,920 billion cubic feet, worth $211 million itself, would be dry gas. The other 62½ per cent of the value could not be recovered until the 1,920 million cubic feet of dry gas was disposed of, or marketed which means that even after the company gets down and finds the gasoline and finds the gas it is unable to use that gasoline and the contents of the gas until it can sell the dry gas after they remove the other substances from the wet gas.

Now hon. members can see how difficult a position the company is placed in unless it can first of all find a market for the dry gas. They cannot take up any of the contents of that great body of value until they can get a market for the dry gas. But the Conservative and C.C.F. members of this house are doing everything in their power to prevent them from selling their gas so they can take out the sulphur, butane, propane and all the other substances in that gas, and the whole quantity must lie there as an absolutely dead asset.

They are brilliant Canadians, these C.C.F.'ers, and these Conservatives, in trying to block the development of great values of that kind. Their only excuse is that they just do not know what they are doing. If they knew one-fiftieth of what they think they know, they would be brilliant; I think they would all be in universities. Unless and until Alberta and Canada are able to market the dry gas from the Pincher Creek wet gas field there will be in that field frozen assets of Canada—belonging to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland just as much as to Alberta, but equally useless to Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, British Columbia as to Alberta—until the field can be developed. That is what we are struggling about now, to be able to develop the field.

In the field there are the following; sulphur, some 7,400,000 long tons, estimated to be worth $163 million; condensate and light crude oil, 38,400,000 barrels worth $126 million; natural gasoline, some 9,800,000 barrels worth $24,700,000; propane, some 12,700,000 barrels worth $21,300,000—I hope the C.C.F. can understand what dollars mean—butane, some 10,400,000 barrels worth $16,300,000; the total value of these frozen assets being $351,300,000. All of this the noble Conservatives and the equally noble C.C.F.'ers are trying to prevent from being realized. Is it not a brilliant record? Yet they call themselves Canadians, they call themselves intelligent, and they consider themselves to be responsible.

That is the gift which the great Creator prepared for North America in the district between Pincher Creek and Waterton Lakes park. If it had not been for this private enterprise which the C.C.F. seem so much to abhor, that gas would have remained in that field for perhaps another thousand years, because there is only one kind of organization that has the money to make it able to dare risk the cost of discovering a field like that. The only kind of concern that has that money is really a giant, and the only place you find such giants is in the United States.

Let us see who it was that found this great deposit. From the time away back in the 1890's when two old-timers, Lafayette French and Kootenay Brown traded some Indians a horse for a certain slough from the surface of which neighbouring Indians had long been skimming a brown oily liquid with a vile smell and certain useful properties—from those days on—the idea lingered that oil could be found in southwestern Alberta; but it was only the idea. I can remember distinctly how they used to talk about it when I was a small boy.

In 1901—we are now tracing the development of this story up to where we have this wonderful field now all ready to be used—French and Brown showed three Calgary pioneers, namely A. P. Patrick, John Lineham and George Leeson, their slough and gave them the idea of oil. We were getting a little nearer. The Rocky Mountain Development Company was formed. A forest of tents sprang up around the slough, drilling started, the first Alberta oil boom got under way and suddenly collapsed.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Why? Largely because there was not a company strong enough to carry on. Between 1901 and 1920 at least a dozen wells were drilled in the Cameron brook area—Cameron brook is a brook in the Waterton Lakes park not far from this field—near where Lafayette and Kootenay got their idea. Through the years within a 25-mile radius of the present Pincher Creek wet gas field some 27 wells were drilled with big and small companies, Canadian and American, participating in the costly and lengthy hunt. But they had not yet found the oil.

In 1941—we are coming up to the great outburst which resulted in the discovery of oil and gas in a big way in Alberta—the Canadian Gulf Oil Company, a unit of the big Gulf Oil Corporation of Pittsburgh, decided to embark upon an Alberta program. One of the things at stake in this great debate now is this. Are great companies like the Gulf company of the United States to be discouraged into thinking that no matter how much money they spend in developing great projects like this, there will be simpletons in the Canadian House of Commons who will block every effort to enable them to market their goods or are we going to act in such a way as to give them confidence?

Let us go on with the story. First, Gulf Oil had one of its geologists start a preliminary reconnaissance. In 1942 Gulf Oil set its scientists to work with seismographs and gravity meters in a hunt for structures and information, following clues over 9,000 square miles in southwestern Alberta. By 1946 they had poured over $4 million into the hunt but had not probed into the earth except with shotholes of seismograph crews and shallow structure test bore holes. The company scientists, even after this high cost search, were not at all sure of success. The best prospect they had located was a deeply buried anticlinal structure or ridge south of Pincher Creek and not far from the shallow drilling of nearly half a century before. We are taking steps to show how much we need the great, powerful concerns of the United States to discover our oil.

Gulf Oil had to consider whether or not to take a very risky gamble and drill to test whether gas or oil lay below the Madison limestone formation, which is the productive core of the Turner valley field 100 miles to the north. This core would have to be reached and pierced. They knew that the Madison limestone could be anywhere from 11,000 to 14,500 feet underground. The cost of the necessary deep drill tests might be $1 million. The odds were at least 10 to 1 that the Madison might not be productive when it was penetrated, and all that money might be spent in vain.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Gulf decided to take the gamble and in January 1947, a few weeks before Imperial Oil discovered the Leduc field, Gulf announced that it would drill its Pincher Creek No. 1 wildcat. Gulf Oil gathered itself for the challenging effort. It contracted for one of the most powerful drilling rigs then in existence, capable of cutting a hole 15,000 feet deep through hard rock, at a price of nearly $1 million. All this goes to show how helpless we would be in getting this development if we did not have powerful concerns ready to take the risk.

Mr. Ellis: Why does not the government do it?

Mr. Blackmore: Why does not the hon. member show a little common sense instead of talking so much talk?

On April 23, 1947, Gulf began to drill and the battle was on. Eight months went by, months of unremitting strain for all concerned. Then the crew reached the Madison limestone at a depth of 11,700 feet, over two miles into the foothills of the rockies. Fifty-five feet into the Madison they bored and they struck porous lime, the container for oil, gas or water. If it was water, then of course all their efforts would have been in vain. They drilled 45 feet farther and halted at 11,800 feet, having set a North American record for an open hole.

The danger to the well was extreme. The pressure on a nine inch diameter hole at over two miles of depth is tremendous. Surface casing extended from the top to a point 440 feet down, but below that were 11,360 feet of hole unprotected except for the mud coating left by the drilling mud which was kept continuously circulating through the drill pipe to bring rock cuttings to the surface. In order to protect the well a seven inch casing was run and cemented to 11,755 feet.

Then on December 28, 1947, a drill stem test was run to determine the contents of the porous rock. The drill stem test proved that the field was under enormous and very dangerous pressure; second, that there was a highly gratifying deposit of wet gas. This was only the beginning, Mr. Speaker, of the tremendous story of the discovery of gas in Alberta.

Let me ask hon. members of the Conservative party at least, who do make a pretense at having sense; why run the chance of discouraging companies who would come into Alberta and Canada to find field after field like this, greatly to the blessing of the whole Dominion of Canada and perhaps the means of saving us in case of a war? Can you afford to take the chance of delaying this bill, delaying construction of this pipe line and perhaps destroying this company, thus rendering almost impossible the build-up of another company, with great loss to this nation?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think for the time being I shall defer the remainder of this story and tell it at some future time.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in rising—

Mr. Knowles: Now we will hear about the Saskatchewan dam.

Mr. Gardiner: —to speak on the second reading of Bill No. 298 I wish to confine my remarks largely to what I consider to be the real issue we are discussing. In the first place, we have heard a lot of references to matters that do not have a great deal to do with the building of a gas line at the present time. Speakers from the official opposition have allowed their minds to run back to the time of Sir John A. If it had not been for Mr. Creighton's book I am afraid they would not have had anything to talk about. The activities of Sir John A. had to do with something that is very important in a country like this.

This is one of the largest areas that is under one government anywhere in the world. There are probably two other such areas, and one would be a little doubtful as to whether either is fully organized under one government, but two other countries have a larger area. The United States is not one of those. This country has a larger area than the United States. On this continent, therefore, one of the most important activities has always been that of connecting one section of the area either in the country to the south or in this country with another area in the same country.

The great issue at the time of confederation was as to how we were going to link the east with the west, the west at that time being British Columbia. The first effort was a transcontinental connection between the two areas in the form of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, I suppose our Conservative friends can justify the position they take that this was one of the greatest undertakings, and perhaps one of the most successfully carried out, of all of the operations that have had to do with the connecting of this area into one country.

While we talk about a great many other things when we are trying to establish wherein Liberalism has meant most to the Dominion of Canada, when it comes to the question of uniting our country and making it possible to broaden out the base upon which it is built, perhaps the second great effort was the building of the second transcontinental railway across this country. Then it is probably right to say that the third greatest effort that has been made in uniting this country has come about as a result of the latest discovery of a power that makes it possible for us to have aeroplanes driven by internal combustion engines carry us in a few hours from one end of this country to the other.

That effort, too, was set up under not only the Liberal government but under this present government.

Mr. Knowles: Publicly owned.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; I am coming to that in a minute. Then again we have had activities connecting the southern areas with the northern areas, and many of those activities have been carried on by provincial governments in different parts of the Dominion of Canada.

Now we come to another method of transporting what used to be freight, what we used to carry on cars, in so far as oil was concerned on railway cars of a type built for the purpose. Oil today is largely being transported by pipe lines. And now that we have gas in quantities which can be transferred from one end of the country to the other, that again is being made possible through the construction of pipe lines, so this question of putting in the first transcontinental pipe line, you might say, although it does not quite extend from one coast to the other, is naturally a very important issue in this house at the present time.

Someone said something about government ownership. I am not going to go into the details with regard to why it is difficult to apply government ownership to this project. That was very successfully done by the minister who has charge of the bill and also by the leader of the Social Credit party when they spoke on the resolution. Therefore I do not think it is necessary to put anything further on the record in that regard; but something said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar stirred certain memories, and I should like to refer to them in relation to government ownership of utilities, and do it in just a few words.

The hon. member said in this house, Mr. Speaker, that there were two members of the government who had been leaders of governments in the provinces; that both of them had had something to do with the setting up of publicly-owned utilities, and he thought we should have known better than to have allowed a bill to be brought down of the kind that was brought down here. The best claim he could make for that statement was that the agreement was not attached to the bill. Well, the bill keeps on referring to the agreement, and I suppose it would be a little more easily found if it were attached to the end of the bill, but I do not think it would make any particular difference either to the legality of the bill or to its effectiveness in making a project of this kind possible.

I had the privilege of either sitting behind or sitting in the government of all the premiers of Saskatchewan, or sitting in opposition to them, except the present one; and I sat with the present premier in this house. Therefore I know a little about the activities of those times. The first public ownership scheme in the province of Saskatchewan was the telephone system, which was set up in 1906, the year after the province was formed. We have had government-owned, controlled and operated telephones practically all through the history of the province, set up under the Liberal government of Hon. Walter Scott.

Then sometime later, while I myself was premier of the province, I had the privilege of setting up the power commission in the province of Saskatchewan that established government ownership, operation and control of power in that province. And now my friends come along and say that the Liberal members of this house, the Liberal members in Saskatchewan and Liberals in general, have been very critical of their activities in setting up organizations there which are under the same kind of control and operation.

Well, I am sure my hon. friends will agree with me when I say that practically all the profits they have ever made under government ownership and government control—socialization, so to speak—have been made from the telephones and the power commission set up by the Liberals while they were in power. They have tried out the boxes; they have tried out the fish; they have tried out the timber; they have tried out a great many other things, and now they finally have made up their minds that even they are convinced that is not the proper way in which to set up organizations to deal with the resources of the province.

I hold in my hand the prospectus of the Saskatchewan Cement Corporation Limited, the submission which they have made to the public in order to sell shares. Let me read this one sentence from it. This will sound good to you when I read it:

> The company's bankers have agreed to purchase $5,500,000 guaranteed first mortgage 5½ per cent 10 year serial bonds at 99·25, subject to the same being guaranteed by the provincial treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan.

Well, my hon. friends, having tried the application of public ownership and control to making boots, to making blankets, to making a lot of other things, and having cast them all into the discard, have now come back to following exactly the same plan of organization that has been followed in order to set up part, and only part, of this particular pipe line. Therefore I call their attention to the fact that they themselves have done all the answering that needs to be done; they themselves have given every answer.

Mr. Ellis: You yourself have sabotaged it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You can't take it.

Mr. Gardiner: The night before last I attempted to ask a question of the leader of your group. He refused me the right; therefore I think I have a perfect right to go on with my speech.

This afternoon when there was some comment made by the leader of the C.C.F. party to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the midst of that discussion the minister called attention to the fact that certain things had been said and afterwards the minister himself produced proof of what he had been saying. I hold in my hand the statement made by the hon. member for Eglinton of the official opposition. At page 3935 of Hansard of May 15, 1956, he is reported as having said:

> The Minister of Trade and Commerce concluded his words on May 8 with this sentence:
> "The action proposed today is another declaration of independence by Canada . . ."
> That is an interesting expression.

May I say we have been listening here for some days to speeches being made and terms being applied to members on both sides of the house, and I would just like to submit my opinion with regard to what really does give a person the right to rise in his place on the floor of this house and raise a question of privilege. I am quite certain that when the leader of the C.C.F. party said to my friend back here that he was representing certain corporations in this house, if there is no privilege in connection with that then there is no privilege in connection with anything.

That was a real question of privilege. No hon. member has the right to come to this house to represent here any particular corporations, or any particular individuals for that matter. He represents a constituency, and on being elected he comes here to speak for all the people in the Dominion of Canada on these different issues. If he is accused in this house by another member of being here to represent some particular corporation or industry then, of course, he has the right of privilege to bring it up, and such statements ought to be withdrawn. But I think this one with regard to the Minister of Trade and Commerce caps them all:

> The Minister of Trade and Commerce is confused, you see, as to what country he is supposed to be serving.

Now, what is that based on? That is based on the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was born in the United States. He goes on to emphasize it. Well, I would like to suggest to this house that at least 25 per cent, and probably more, of all Canadians we have in this country were born in some other country and came here. I would also like to suggest that statements of this kind do no credit to this house, and certainly do no credit to those who send members here who make that kind of statement. There are a lot of people in Canada who will remember statements of that kind and see to it that some of those who make them do not come back again.

Mr. Ellis: Call an election now.

Mr. Gardiner: There is one thing, however, the people will always remember regardless of what party they belong to, what country they were born in or what part of Canada they live in. They will all remember that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has performed a greater service for this country than anyone else in his time. Not only that, even taking into consideration what has to do with the placing of a measure like this before the house, they will remember he has done at least as great a service in that regard as he has done in a great many other instances since he has been in this house. Why do I say that?

Miss Aitken: Yes, why?

Mr. Gardiner: All the discussions which have taken place here relate back to one or two questions. They say, "Just why did not the Minister of Trade and Commerce bring to council and start a detailed discussion on the terms of the McMahon proposal?" Well, if any minister who already knew the opinion of the government on the main issues raised by a proposal of that kind were to carry all such proposals to the government, he would not be in the government very long. There is only one man in this house whom I can see before me who ever served in a federal, non-Liberal government in Canada.

An hon. Member: For six weeks.

Mr. Gardiner: Anyone who has ever served in a federal government knows that every minister receives proposals every day, sometimes marked confidential and sometimes not marked confidential, which he does not take to council. If that were not the case we would get no business done at all.

What is the position in connection with this particular project? Well, in the first place there are two points of importance. The first is that this line must be kept on the Canadian side of the border for certain reasons, and anyone in this house can easily determine what are those reasons. The second point is that in so far as the gas is needed in this country it must be kept on this side of the line.

If anyone wishes to determine why certain steps were taken about which questions were raised this afternoon all they need do is refer back to those two facts, both of which were basic in Sir John A.'s beliefs. After all, as was stated a few moments ago, gas was discovered in Alberta some time ago in considerable quantities. The government of Alberta quite properly said in the beginning they wanted to make absolutely certain there was going to be sufficient gas reserved within the boundaries of Alberta in order to make it possible to develop industry there and maintain it to the extent which is necessary. After further development, and after examining the available supply, they could confidently say some 500 million cubic feet per day could be exported from Alberta. That matter was, of course, discussed by the federal government, and it was discussed in relation to a pipe line.

It was suggested by some people that we build a pipe line down to Winnipeg and from there to the south, making no provision whatever for the building of a line beyond Winnipeg to the central part of Canada, and merely to allow a company to continue selling gas in the United States until they made enough money to build the line through the northern part of Ontario and on into the eastern part of Canada. Questions like that were discussed by the government, and the government came to the conclusion that this kind of thing could not be allowed to happen.

Why? In the first place, if you allowed that gas to go down across the line at Emerson into the United States and on down to Minneapolis and Chicago—it was even suggested that we try to push it around to Detroit and into eastern Canada—you would establish there private interests which would be interested in the retention of the gas in that section of the country, interests which you could not discard in future without causing a great deal of trouble with the country to the south. The government naturally decided that any system that was set up had to be on a basis which would keep a certain amount of gas for this country. The figure struck was 300 million cubic feet per day which could be used in this country and therefore had to be retained here for our use.

Of course a question arises as to what is going to happen in the future. That will depend on the further production of gas and its distribution. Before they can get any increase of gas across the border they must get a permit from this government in order to take it across. In other words it has been made absolutely certain that any gas which is required in this country is going to be kept on this side of the line and used here. Many people say it has something to do with the cost. That reminds me of some things which took place in my own province. Great boasts have been made about the fact that gas is to be taken into two of our cities under a government-owned and controlled system.

Mr. Ellis: Are you opposed to that?

Mr. Gardiner: I am just going to tell you something you will be opposed to before you pay for it very long. That gas is costing 83 cents in Regina and 83 cents in Saskatoon.

Mr. Ellis: There is no gas in Regina yet.

Mr. Gardiner: —and 84 cents in Prince Albert, and under this plan gas is going to be sold in Winnipeg for 30 cents. I am sure you will be saying a great deal about that if you decide to reside permanently in Regina. That is something that is happening under government ownership and control, and about which our friends do not tell us the whole story.

Provision is being made under this system to keep gas on this side of the line, and to build only an arm of the line to take out whatever surplus gas there is, which we are sure we can allow to go into the United States without interfering with conditions here and without creating vested interests on the other side of the line which we cannot maintain. All that is protected by this scheme.

Let me ask you this question. When Mr. McMahon came along and offered to do this job and said he could finance it, what were the conditions in the offer? He could finance it if we would allow him to ship 400 million cubic feet of gas per day into the United States for 25 years. That would cut us down to a supply of 100 million cubic feet per day, one-third of what we require in this country. Once having established that situation on the other side of the line, how could the government or anyone else change it?

Talk about placing control on the south side of the line. If you want to establish control over anything on this side of the line just make it possible to ship it down there and establish vested interests on the other side of the line; then try to take it away and you will find out whether or not you are under the United States control. It is a matter of keeping the gas here. We must not create vested interests we cannot continue to supply.

It makes no difference where the Minister of Trade and Commerce had that proposal; whether he had it in his inside coat pocket as my friend the hon. member for Prince Albert would lead us to believe, whether he put it in the safe or, for that matter, whether he put it in the fire. The minister knew when he read that proposal the government of Canada would not accept it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: All these principles I am mentioning were discussed in the cabinet, no matter what proposal they applied to. They have been discussed over and over again. The one reason this company we are talking about now, that we are assisting somewhat to finance the building of part of the line—

Some hon. Members: Somewhat!

Mr. Hees: Somewhat? Oh, brother!

Mr. Gardiner: Even this particular organization knew what the situation was in that regard, because they wanted to do that at an earlier stage, ship the gas to the United States, sell it as fast as possible, get the finances on account of it and then build the central section. They learned from the government long ago that was not permitted, and it is not permitted now. So the gas is being kept to the extent that we need it on this side of the line.

This particular bill proposes to assist financially on two different sections of the line that is to be built. The first is a government-owned project, as my hon. friends of the C.C.F. say it ought to be.

Mr. Ellis: The whole project ought to be.

Mr. Gardiner: Are they going to vote the bill down because that is in it? Well, that is in it. It provides that the government of Canada and the government of Ontario, working hand in hand, one being Liberal and the other Conservative, are prepared to build that line across northern Ontario. If that line were not built across northern Ontario the only objective there would be in building the line from Alberta to Winnipeg, beyond providing Winnipeg with gas, would be to build a line to Emerson and on into the United States. So this bill provides for the setting up of the northern Ontario section, financed by the two governments.

Then it provides for the setting up of the next section west, the one from the Alberta boundary down to Winnipeg. In spite of what my hon. friends say, there is provision for the carrying on of the line until it connects with the northern Ontario section. That connection will make a line from Alberta to the eastern section of Canada, where the greater part of the gas will be required in this country. The suggestion is made that we should not have agreed to loan some $80 million to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines so that it will be able to go ahead and build this year with that financial assistance. I understand they are putting some $15 million-odd into it themselves, and that the government is loaning them some $80 million, which the government gets back next March.

Mr. Fleming: Maybe.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says "maybe." That is true of every kind of loan, even the one he borrowed from somebody. There is always a provision under those circumstances under which somebody can come and even take the bed out from under you, if necessary, in order to make you pay it back. There is the same kind of provision in this bill and in this agreement whereby the government, if not paid by next March, then will be compelled, in meeting the situation that has been presented to this house—probably not compelled in the sense that some might use the term, but they would be compelled—in playing fair with the people of this country, to take that line over and see that it is built and kept on this side of the line to deliver gas to eastern Canada.

Having kept it on this side of the line and having seen to it that the gas is put into it, they must see to it that there is law provided in order to control the situation which exists and thus keep the entire control in Canada under the agreements that are talked about.

I wonder sometimes what our friends have in mind when they are talking about them. I was not here yesterday; I was around at some other places. I met three or four people who insisted on talking about this matter to me. After a while I discovered that one of them was an ex-American. He is a Canadian now, a very effective worker in business. The other two happened to be born Canadians, and they all seemed to have much the same opinion. That opinion did not agree with mine in every particular, but I have no hesitation in saying here that I attempted to convince all three of them that they were a little wrong and that the situation could be much better than they thought it was.

I simply recite that in order to say that people are getting opinions, as we discuss this in the house, from what they read in the newspapers; and they recite those opinions. But after they have recited them they say, "We are not sure whether or not we are right. We want to find out." Here is the statement given to this house by the minister on May 14, 1956, as recorded on page 3864 of Hansard:

> I repeat that the pipe line will be built wholly within Canadian territory.

That is No. 1. This is No. 2:

> It cannot be built without a permit from the board of transport commissioners.

No. 3:

> Not a cubic foot of gas can be exported to the United States without a permit from the Canadian government.

No. 4:

> Prices to United States customers, by the terms of the export licence itself, cannot be more advantageous to the buyer than those offered to Canadian customers. The entire project is subject to Canadian law. Parliament can at any time legislate whatever further regulations are considered to be in the national interest. In other words, an all-Canadian pipe line, whoever may own it, is completely under Canadian control.

That is the situation until March of next year. If under those conditions the whole project can be financed in such a way as to make it possible for this money to be returned to the people of Canada, then of course Canada is not subsidizing anybody. It is doing what my hon. friend from Greenwood has done for so long as I have known him, and I have known him for quite a while. He has been managing a company that has just been doing this kind of thing with the Canadian people. It has loaned them money. It has made them pay interest for the use of the money and then, if they could not pay the interest, sometimes—and very seldom, in the experience I have had with them over many years—they go out and take the man's property. They only did that when it was an absolute necessity, and often in order to carry out something the man wanted to do himself.

With all the experience of these hon. members, more particularly in the official opposition, I find it difficult to understand their attitude. I do not wonder very much that some C.C.F.'ers like the hon. member for Regina City shake their heads. I doubt very much if he ever gave a loan or got one. He cannot be expected to do anything else but shake his head. It is a terrible thing for him for anybody to lend anybody money; and it is a terrible thing when they try to collect it again. However, provision is made in this legislation so that if the company has not paid back the money, then the government can step in; and no one should be better pleased about that than our friends of the C.C.F. party, because that is what they would like to see happen now. Provision is in here that it may be done.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Minister of Agriculture adjourn the debate or has he concluded his speech?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I think I shall have ten minutes tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. Gardiner the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this debate tomorrow.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TRANSPORT VEHICLE STATISTICS

Question No. 474—Mr. Hahn:

How many trucks, road tractors, semi-trailers, and trailers, have been in operation in each of the provinces of Canada for each of the years 1951 to 1955 inclusive?

Questions

MCGILL UNIVERSITY—COAL-FIRED GAS TURBINE PAYMENTS

Question No. 498—Mr. MacEachen:

1. Have any payments been paid to date to McGill University in connection with the development of a coal-fired gas turbine?

2. If so, what amount?

Answer by: Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys):

1. Yes.

2. Total of payments to date, $562,394.53.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 18, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FINAL PAYMENT ON 1954-55 POOL OPERATIONS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement regarding the final payment on 1954-55 wheat pool operations. On May 3 I advised the house that the Canadian wheat board was making a cut-off as at May 4 covering the 1954-55 wheat pool account, and that I would be in a position at about this time to announce to the house the amount of the final payment and the rate per bushel for each grade of wheat delivered to the pool by producers.

Producers' deliveries of wheat to the pool were 318·4 million bushels. A total of 164·1 million bushels, including 42·9 million bushels of sales contracts, were transferred to the 1954-55 pool from the 1953-54 pool as at April 29, 1955. Deliveries from other than producers amounted to 600,000 bushels, bringing the total volume of wheat in the pool to 483·1 million bushels. Completed sales to the close of business on May 4 amounted to 321·7 million bushels. Therefore there remained as at May 4 a balance of 161·4 million bushels. These stocks included 112 million bushels covered by sales contracts and unsold stocks of 49·4 million bushels.

In closing out the 1954-55 pool the sales contracts were transferred to the 1955-56 pool at contract prices and unsold stocks were transferred on the basis of board selling prices for May 4. The final operating surplus in the 1954-55 pool is $62,588,000 from which must be deducted the interim payment made earlier this year. This payment amounted to $22,261,000. After providing for P.F.A.A. levy on the interim and final payments and after allowing for final payment expenses, the surplus for distribution to producers as a final payment is $39,680,000.

On producers' deliveries of 318·4 million bushels the average final payment is 12·461 cents per bushel.

The final net payments to producers on the principal grades of wheat are as follows:

No. 1 northern, 14·815 cents per bushel.
No. 2 northern, 15·143 cents per bushel.
No. 3 northern, 12·163 cents per bushel.
No. 4 northern, 11·440 cents per bushel.
No. 5 wheat, 6·553 cents per bushel.
No. 6 wheat, 8·533 cents per bushel.
Feed wheat, 10·513 cents per bushel.

Prior to the deduction of the P.F.A.A. levy the net price realized by producers for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver will be $1·65066 per bushel.

As in the case of the 1953-54 crop, the Durum wheat position continued very strong in 1954-55 and again in the present crop year. The final payments on Durum wheat grades are as follows:

No. 1 Amber Durum, 58·653 cents per bushel.
No. 2 Amber Durum, 58·653 cents per bushel.
No. 3 Amber Durum, 62·118 cents per bushel.
No. 4 Amber Durum, 48·753 cents per bushel.
No. 5 Amber Durum, 31·083 cents per bushel.
No. 6 Amber Durum, 32·073 cents per bushel.

Prior to the deduction of the P.F.A.A. levy the net price realized by producers for No. 1 Amber Durum will be $2·34498 per bushel.

There will be a final payment on all grades of wheat delivered to the pool. However, the final payments on the feeding grades of wheat, grades that did not participate in the interim payment referred to, will not be as large as the final payment on the milling grades. Hon. members will appreciate that it was necessary for the board, in disposing of stocks of low-grade wheat delivered to the 1954-55 pool, to sell the grain at levels competitive with prices for similar qualities of wheat being offered from other countries and, to a degree, in competition with other types of feeding grains. I am very pleased, however, to be able to report to the house that the board's marketing efforts in connection with low-grade wheat delivered to the 1954-55 pool account were successful. After taking into consideration sales contracts, practically no stocks of low-grade wheat are involved in the transfer of stocks to the 1955-56 pool.

Carrying charges were again a factor of considerable importance in the handling of the 1954-55 pool account. Although somewhat less than in the previous year, carrying charges per bushel were incurred to the extent of 16·83 cents. These charges were partially offset, however, by a credit of around 7·30 cents per bushel representing the participation of the 1954-55 pool account in the moneys received by the board under the provision of the temporary wheat reserves act. The effect of the latter credit was, therefore, to raise the final payment to producers by an average of around 7·30 cents per bushel on the 318·4 million bushels delivered by producers to the pool.

The board intends to commence mailing cheques early next week and hopes to complete the payment to producers by the first week in June.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

TORONTO—INQUIRY AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF MUNICIPAL SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Public Works, or both, what action, if any, the government proposes to take in view of the intimation from the Toronto board of control that unless the federal government is prepared to make payments equivalent to taxes on federally-owned property, the city will be obliged to withdraw municipal services from federally-owned property at an early date?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I read the newspaper report, which was somewhat to the effect the hon. member for Eglinton has mentioned, but I have had no communication from the board of control, and I think until I have I should not say anything.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LOW—REFERENCE TO NEWSPAPER REPORT OF DEBATE OF MAY 15

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I rise on a question of personal privilege. I hold in my hand a copy of the Calgary Herald for Wednesday last, May 16, and on page 14 of this paper is an article which is a complete perversion of the reference which I made in the debate on Tuesday night. The Canadian Press dispatch on page 14 is headed, "Nickle has Killed Himself says Low". The article goes on to say:

> Social Credit leader Low said Mr. Nickle has "killed himself in Alberta and when the next election rolls around he will find out exactly what I mean."
>
> "The people of Alberta are going to question the position he has taken."

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Speaker, Hansard for Tuesday last reports that I said that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) had killed himself. So that there would be no misunderstanding at the time, I pointed my finger directly at him and called him the member for Calgary North.

BRIDGES

NEW WESTMINSTER—REQUEST FOR EARLY START ON QUEENSBORO BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, notice of which I sent him earlier this day and the relative information for which I communicated to him by telephone. In view of the urgency of making an early start on the Queensboro bridge and representations made by me asking for a decision on this matter, and in the light of the publicity given the fact that the public works minister has asked the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) to meet with interested parties and make a recommendation, will the minister make a complete statement in an effort to clarify the matter and indicate whether it is the policy of the government to send an outside Liberal member of parliament into a neighbouring area to make his recommendations.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the situation is that some time ago the city of New Westminster made application under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for permission to build a bridge to replace, as I understood it, the present Queensboro bridge. The department has been considering the very important navigational aspects of any such structure and has made certain suggestions which it was hoped would benefit navigation, such as a wider span. It was also contemplated the present bridge would be removed when the new bridge was completed.

Shortly after the application was received other interests communicated with us protesting about the nature of the design and in particular the British Columbia Electric Railway Company informed us that they had not yet arrived at a satisfactory arrangement for their rails over any bridge to Lulu island. The application has not, therefore, been approved. In the meantime the officials of the British Columbia Electric have been speaking to us, as have other interested parties. Some days ago the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond telephoned me. As hon. members know, he is very interested in all things respecting the welfare of British Columbia. He asked me how the matter stood. I told him that the point had still not been decided, particularly between the B.C. Electric and the city of New Westminster, and that as he was going out there he might wish to speak to the officials of the B.C. Electric company just to satisfy himself on the points we discussed on the telephone. That is the situation as it obtains respecting the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. In the meantime, the mayor of New Westminster sent me a telegram on May 9, I think, which was replied to on May 17, and yesterday, or the day before, I received a letter from him which is in the course of being replied to at the present time.

Mr. Hahn: May I ask a supplementary question? Am I to take it that the minister did not ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond specifically to make recommendations in respect of it?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, I do not recall that I specifically asked him to make recommendations. He said he was going to British Columbia and I did suggest that, for his own information, he might wish to discuss the matter with the officials of the British Columbia Electric company. I will nevertheless be interested to receive his comments.

BURLINGTON, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Has the government reached any agreement with the government of Ontario regarding the maintenance of the low level bridge over the Burlington channel?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker, this has not been a matter of recent discussion. When we discussed in the initial stages federal government participation in the Burlington high level bridge it was on the understanding the government of Ontario would assume full responsibility for all vehicular traffic in that area.

Mr. Lennard: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was there not an understanding that the federal government would contribute towards the building of the high level bridge under that agreement?

Mr. Winters: A part of the discussion involved federal government financial participation in the high level bridge. The provincial government subsequently told us they do not anticipate they will require federal government financial participation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT REGARDING SETTLEMENT OF SEAMEN'S STRIKE ON GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): In view of the questions that have been asked with regard to the seamen's strike on the great lakes, Mr. Speaker, I might bring the house up to date with the situation. The terms of settlement of the dispute between the seafarers' international union and the association of lake carriers were agreed to in discussions between the parties and the mediator, Mr. Goldenberg, at an early hour this morning. But because of a new development in the situation an adjournment was taken until three p.m. today to give the mediator and the representatives of the parties some rest. During the past few days conferences have been going on almost continuously.

The new development to which I refer arose out of the fact that there are two other unions, representing deck and engine room officers respectively, involved in disputes with the same employers, and while they are not jointly carrying on negotiations with the seafarers' union and the employers' association there is a tacit agreement between the three unions to support each other, and representatives of the two officers' unions have been present as observers at the conferences presided over by the mediator.

The disputes between the two officers' unions and the employers have not yet gone through the conciliation procedures provided by our legislation but it is the desire of all the parties concerned that a settlement be reached at the present time resolving all three disputes in order to avoid the possibility of another work stoppage at a later date involving the ships' officers.

It is to this problem that Mr. Goldenberg, the mediator, has to address himself this afternoon and I have every confidence that he will be as successful in this endeavour as he was in the other.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF EARLY ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the general interest of the people and the indignation of all of us across Canada, has the Prime Minister given consideration to the calling of an early election?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister feels that there is a responsibility to the whole of Canada to deal with many other matters before any dissolution of parliament could be considered. In particular, there is the implementation of the proposed fiscal arrangements that have been made for the provinces that we feel must necessarily be dealt with. Another matter is that we feel it is in the interests of Canada generally that there be a start made this year on the construction of the pipe line, and the calling of an election is something which would make that quite impossible.

Mr. Fleming: You have no mandate for what you are doing.

Mr. Rowe: You should get a mandate.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The hon. gentleman will have his opportunity to state his views.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—OPTION TO PURCHASE PIPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister yet in a position to table Trans-Canada's option to purchase pipe in the United States which a week ago today he promised he would table?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, I am very happy to say that the document arrived in my office this morning. In the meantime, the option has been translated into a firm contract, and the contract has attached to it certain mill orders and other documents which are now being examined, and I hope to be able to table the contract either today or Monday.

TRADE

GATT—REPORTED TARIFF CUTS BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister in a position to give the house any information about the possible tariff reductions which it is reported Canada is making through GATT?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the announcement of the result of the GATT negotiations will be released in all countries shortly. I am unable to make any announcement until the release date arrives.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I understand I have nine minutes left which I wish to use in summing up my remarks of last night. In order to do that I wish to say that early delay and the necessity now for speeding up to meet the deadline of June 7 can be explained on the ground that it was necessary to make certain no vested interests in gas are created on the United States side of the line which would rob this country of supplies of gas and transfer control south of the border.

Once the government had decided it was necessary to keep at least three hundred million cubic feet of gas on this side of the line, it would have been absolutely foolish for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to have been running to council with proposals to take from 400 to 500 million cubic feet of gas out of this country.

The government, for the same reason Sir John A. decided to build a trans-Canada railway, decided to build a trans-Canada pipe line, or to have a trans-Canada pipe line built. To build a line to Winnipeg without making sure there was an all-Canadian connecting link between the prairies and the industrial east would have resulted in building a line south to market gas. This would not only have drained a source of power out of Canada but would have drained the young men and women out of the part of the country which needs increased population, not decreased population. Population certainly would follow a gas line into every industrial centre from Emerson through Minneapolis, Milwaukee, Chicago and Detroit, and vested interests would have taken control of the gas entirely out of the hands of Canada.

The C.C.F. say, "We agree with all that but let the government build the line". We point out there are fields in which government ownership is essential. We prove it by the success of hydroelectric power put in by Conservatives in Ontario and telephones and power put in by Liberals in Saskatchewan, but we point out that the present Saskatchewan government has proven, when they attempted to apply the principle of public ownership and control generally, that it has its limitations.

We recognize that under private enterprise there must be legitimate profits and sufficient risk must be taken out of any national project to make legitimate profits possible before it can be financed.

Now therefore we join with Ontario to build the bridge across northern Ontario just as we paid $7 million to bridge the freight costs over the same area. But benefiting from the experience of Saskatchewan we encourage private enterprise to develop a billion dollar development in Alberta and eastern Canada. There is provision in the bill to allow private enterprise to take over the whole project if that is found feasible, but there is also provision to bring the whole line under the government if that is necessary to retain both the line and control on the Canadian side of the line.

It is not bad for United States capital to come in here from a friendly nation any more than it was bad for United States independence that British capital came in from an unfriendly nation in the early stages of United States development. It would have been bad to get quick sale for Alberta gas to the United States which would have created vested interests in the United States and drained our population south. This plan protects Canadian interests in every possible way and permits the entrance of United States capital into the development of our industry in a manner which increases friendship and wards off enmity.

Mr. Manning of Alberta, Mr. Campbell of Manitoba and Mr. Frost of Ontario say that time is of the essence. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) speaking for the Conservatives, and numerous C.C.F. members from the west, have boasted, one to ward off United States domination and the other to bring in socialism, that they are going to use every device possible to prevent this measure going through.

They have used every possible device which the rules permit them to delay the bill. They have delayed estimates by talking, they have prevented debate and have wasted time by calling a total of 15 votes within the last week. They have used every device the rules of the house permit to delay the passing of this measure. We are using the one device available to us, and it is a device the Tories gave us in 1912, by making closure possible. They have used it four times; we may have to use it four times. They have compelled us to do this. We are simply using a rule they gave us to overcome their use of the rules. They could have discussed this matter for 15 days if they had not followed the procedure they have been following of avoiding discussing it at every opportunity they could. By using the rules of this house they have deprived themselves of the right to discuss the bill. They have deprived themselves of the right to discuss a pipe line across this country. Yesterday the hon. member for Prince Albert denied a member of his own caucus the right to get up and put him right on something he was stating to this house. They are following every possible device to delay things with regard to this matter and to prevent it getting before the people of Canada and have to date succeeded fairly well in wasting most of the time that has been made available to them.

In summing up what I had to say last night with regard to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who is in charge of the measure may I say that as I look across at my C.C.F. friends I realize that close to a majority of them were born outside of this country. When I look at my friends immediately across the aisle I remember that one of their ablest members, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), was born down there. In view of the fact that I had my elementary education in the United States, although I was born in this country, I am beginning to think that we are not a bad bunch of people. Although there may have been early influences on our lives down in the United States, since we have become members of this house we have done nothing but try to serve the best interests of the people of Canada and, as I said last night, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been a leader among us.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. During the course of his remarks last evening in the speech which the Minister of Agriculture has just completed he made some comments about myself and certain references which prompt me to rise now on a question of privilege. The Minister of Agriculture referred to a remark of mine found at page 3935 of Hansard of May 5, as follows:

> The Minister of Trade and Commerce is confused, you see, as to what country he is supposed to be serving.

Then the Minister of Agriculture went on to say, as found at page 4059 of Hansard of yesterday:

> Now, what is that based on? That is based on the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was born in the United States.

The minister used that in relation to what he said was a question of privilege. Let me make it very clear, Mr. Speaker, that I had no reference to the place of birth of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have never yet judged any man on the place of his birth—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: —because the man is not born yet who has any control over the place of his birth. Let me make it quite clear that this was no reference to the place of birth of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When I said what I said I was purporting to judge the Minister of Trade and Commerce not on where he was born but on his actions, his attitudes and his policies. In saying, as I did, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —is confused as to what country he is supposed to be serving, I was discussing—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —the policies, attitudes and actions of the minister. I had no reference to the place where he happened to be born.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to the fact that was not a question of personal privilege and that the hon. member has now spoken in this debate.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks just made I think I should have the privilege of referring again to what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton. I did not read it all last night and I will read it all this time. As found at page 3935 of Hansard of May 15 the hon. member for Eglinton said:

> The Minister of Trade and Commerce concluded his words on May 8 with this sentence:
>
> "The action proposed today is another declaration of independence by Canada . . ."

Then follow the remarks of my hon. friend.

> That is an interesting expression. There never was a declaration of independence in the history of Canada, but there was a declaration of independence in the history of the United States. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is confused, you see, as to what country he is supposed to be serving. What the Minister of Trade and Commerce really meant to say was: "The action proposed today is another American declaration of independence with Canadian assistance."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend wishes to read anything else into that but the statement that I made last night—

Mr. Rowe: No relationship at all.

Mr. Gardiner: —all I can say is I am quite sure that every member of the house, even my hon. friend's own members, took the statement at the time it was made as an intimation that the minister was born in the United States—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Gardiner: The statement has no meaning and did not carry any reason for being made other than that.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture cannot change the facts. I have made a statement as to the meaning of my remarks and nothing that he says can change the fact. I say that the comment I made at that time had to do not with the place of birth of the Minister of Trade and Commerce but with the effect of his policies, actions and attitudes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, since we first had the opportunity to discuss this measure on the resolution introduced last Monday which resulted in the bill now before us, we have heard from a good many hon. members, the majority of whom represent constituencies which will be affected directly by the construction of a pipe line from the Alberta gas fields to Toronto. I come from a constituency which cannot possibly receive any direct benefit from the pipe line, and my constituency is by no means the only one which will not have any direct benefit accruing to it from the construction of the pipe line. There are also those on the maritime seaboard, on the Atlantic coast, who will reap no benefits.

I am interested to note that the title given to the bill, namely, an act to establish Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, is far more realistic than the grandiose name chosen by the company which will obtain the loan and the greatest benefit from this crown corporation when it is set up. Just fancy, this company has the audacity to call itself Trans-Canada Pipe Lines! Trans-Canada indeed! Why, there will be no pipe of this company laid within a thousand miles of my constituency. Yet it calls itself Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. That shows the degree of knowledge of geography that the promoters of this company have although perhaps that might be excusable so far as American directors are concerned, who might not be expected to know too much about the geography of Canada. But listen to what the venerable member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) had to say as found at page 3942 of Hansard of May 15. These are his words:

. . . putting this national gas line all across Canada.

All across Canada! What misrepresentation! The hon. member must know better than that. He must realize that the pipe line is not going to the Pacific coast, that the pipe line is not going to the Atlantic coast. Perhaps be is daring to insinuate that British Columbia is not a part of the Dominion of Canada. I never heard such nonsense before.

What is the reaction of the people in those parts of Canada that are not going to be served by the pipe line? I do not think there is any enthusiasm for the construction of the line on the part of people living where they are not going to be directly served with the gas. Do you realize that under private enterprise in British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, we have already had constructed an oil pipe line from the Peace river district through the mountain ranges to the Pacific coast? That has already been constructed and we did not come with our hands outstretched saying: "Give us a grant from the federal government."

Then we have a gas pipe line under construction at the present time and we have not come running to the federal government asking for millions of dollars for that project. In the part of our country where it is being constructed it is infinitely more difficult to construct a pipe line than around the northern part of the great lakes. I wonder whether I should appeal to the minister and the government to make a grant of a few million dollars to run a spur line from this gas pipe line over to Vancouver island. Why not do that? You might just as well make a contribution for that purpose as to make a contribution to this so-called trans-Canada pipe line around the northern shore of lake Ontario.

An hon. Member: Lake Superior.

Mr. Pearkes: Lake Superior. I suppose it goes around lake Ontario too. I wonder whether it would not be possible for the government to send some of their ministers out to Vancouver island to explain why my constituents must make a contribution towards this northern Ontario pipe line.

I should like the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to go out to Vancouver island and to explain to the old age pensioners of my constituency—and there are a great many of them—that the federal government cannot raise the pension of $40 a month which it gives them because it would cost money, and that extra money is required for the wealthy promoters of this gas line.

I should like to send out the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and let him go to the Legion branches on Vancouver island and tell them the reason the government cannot put an addition on to the veterans' hospital in Victoria—something which the Legion branches all over the island have been asking for—is that they need that money to construct a pipe line to Winnipeg and to Emerson.

I should like the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters)—who I notice is in the house—to go out there and explain to the fishermen around the Pacific coast that he is not able to provide the necessary harbour facilities and safe berthing for their vessels because the money which would be required to put up those protective measures is required to help finance this pipe line.

I should like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) to go out to the west coast and explain to the mariners there that he is not able to give them an adequate life-saving service because the money is required for this pipe line rather than to be put into life saving apparatus.

I should like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) to go out to the west coast and explain to the municipalities that he is still obliged to go on taxing them on everything they purchase because the $20 million or $30 million which would be lost to the treasury by the removal of that sales tax is required to build this pipe line. Let him tell the school boards that he must still go on taxing them on the supplies they buy because that money is needed for the construction of this pipe line.

Then I should like the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to go out there and meet the superannuated federal civil servants, those who have worked for this government over the years and who made their contribution believing that their superannuation pension would purchase a standard of living that they would enjoy when they retired, only to find that the inflationary policies of this government have not permitted them to obtain that standard of living which they anticipated. Let the Prime Minister tell them that he has no money with which to augment their superannuation pensions because that money is required for the construction of this pipe line or to assist in its construction.

All those groups of people on the Pacific coast to whom I have referred are taxpayers. All of them will be obliged to make their contribution towards the construction of this trans-Canada pipe line, and they will be obliged to tighten their belts in order to do it. I do not want to give the impression that we are an insular people and that we are not prepared to play our part in the development of Canada. Far be it from that. But we do not like to feel that a government is playing fast and loose with our money. We want to be quite certain that any scheme in which we invest is an economically sound one.

There was a time, Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago, before this government came into power, when the Canadian was represented as Johnny Canuck, a bronzed, strong figure wearing a Stetson hat, with sleeves rolled up ready to take on any job at all. You do not see Johnny Canuck in any of the cartoons today. What have you in his place? You have a miserable little man who is downtrodden, whining and grumbling, and wrapped up in a barrel: "UNO Who".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearkes: It is all very well to laugh, and I know that these caricaturists exaggerate. However, these caricatures are an indication of national character. Have we after 20 years of Liberal government changed from Johnny Canuck to "UNO Who"?

Last year I thought I saw a small flickering flame of national pride in the federal government. When they rose in their wrath for a few days and protested against the action taken by the Social Credit government of British Columbia in, as they put it, "selling out" Canadian water to the United States through the Kaiser dam. How strange it is, 12 months afterwards, here you have the Liberal government and the Social Crediters—

Mr. Rowe: In the same bed.

Mr. Pearkes: —allies here, thinking about sending out by pipe something far more valuable than even the water resources of British Columbia.

We should like to examine this all-Canadian pipe line and to see whether it is worth our while investing the money that they will take from our people in taxes. In 1951, five years ago, Mr. Tolmie came down here representing the trans-Canada pipe line company and he put forward the argument that this was a simple proposition, that there might be some little difficulties and some lean years—three lean years, in fact—after they had the pipe line constructed until such time as they had built up the market in eastern Canada. At that time there was no reference whatever to the necessity of exporting any gas. The markets would soon be available in eastern Canada. There would be only three tough years, according to him, and the only interest he had was to build a pipe line across Canada to bring Alberta gas to what he described as fuel-hungry parts of eastern Canada. With those representations, it was not unreasonable that the government, feeling that it would be an excellent thing to have a pipe line in Canada rather than for the gas to be sent across to the United States, agreed and gave a franchise to this company to go ahead.

Then it became evident to the company that it would be necessary to export some of the gas to the United States. A proposition was made that two-fifths of the daily amount of gas passing through the pipe line could easily be spared and could be exported with advantage to the United States. It was said it would be better to do that south of Winnipeg rather than send it directly south from the gas fields of Alberta. A branch line was to be built from Winnipeg to Emerson and through that branch line there would be some 200 million cubic feet passing daily. Reasonable—yes; we will authorize that.

Then, they had to look for a distributing agency in the United States and this chosen instrument of the government selected the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company to be the importing and distributing agency in the United States. But then difficulties were encountered because there is a law in the United States, a very reasonable law, that any organization importing gas into the United States must obtain a permit from the federal power commission. Nobody could take any objection to that, so an application was made to the federal power commission to see whether 200 million cubic feet a day might not be imported into the United States. Proceedings were held before this commission, and the commission had certain responsibilities to the other distributing agencies in the United States. It soon became evident that if the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company imported gas into the states immediately south of Manitoba, they would be conflicting with other companies such as Northern Natural Gas; People's Gas and Coke and American Louisiana, distributing companies already in that area or with projects already laid out for the distribution of their supplies into the area into which Tennessee was entering.

They made strong representations to the commission, and as they were powerful companies there was every indication that the proceedings would be very, very long. Of course, there are other interests too. There are the coal mining interests in the United States who have been selling their coal to Ontario for many years. They do not want to lose that lucrative market, so they are also making their representations to the federal power commission. There was no likelihood in the immediate future of the Trans-Canada company being able to get enough money from their exports to the United States to construct the portion of their line between Winnipeg and Toronto around the north shore of lake Superior.

It was then desirable to re-organize the finances of the company to see whether, by bringing in other powerful interests, other high class salesmen, they might not be able to interest United States and Canadian investors in this company. They must raise the money somehow if they were going to build this pipe line. But the Canadian and United States investor was not interested. He was not at all sure that this would be a paying proposition if, by any chance, Tennessee was not able to import and sell the gas in the United States. He was not at all sure there would be a market even for the 300 million cubic feet per day in eastern Canada. I do not know whether any consumers have already declared their intention to buy the gas in eastern Canada. Anyway, there was a great deal of uncertainty and the public was not going to fall for it. So the company came to the government again and said, "Will you construct this difficult portion of the line around lake Superior?" The government, anxious to fulfil their promises, agreed to construct this line between the Manitoba boundary and Kapuskasing, together with the Ontario government, for something over 118 million.

Then what happened? I think you begin to see the sinister workings that there are behind this whole scheme. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company got a corner on all the available pipe and the pipe is safely stored in the yards of the United States manufacturers on the other side of the border where the Canadian government cannot get hold of it and where no other Canadian company could possibly reach it. It is under guard on the other side of the border. They have cornered all the pipe that is available, all the pipe that is required.

Then, what happened? They came back to the Canadian government to say, "If you want that pipe line built this year or next year, we are the only people who can do it; we are the only people who have got the pipe." Now, then, hand out another $80 million, and the poor little Prime Minister and "UNO Who" crept down into the barrel, scraped the bottom of it and handed out to the blackmailers another $80 million. Mr. Speaker, I think that these transactions are worthy of Horatio Bottomley. If you remember, Horatio Bottomley during the first world war, who under the guise of being a patriot, fleeced the British people of millions of their money. Oh, he was quite a character. He had a very attractive personality, so attractive that although he had robbed the small British middle class people, he could still come back to them and with a smile they handed out their money again. Oh, he was quite a sportsman. He kept a string of race horses and he used to breakfast every morning on kippers and champagne. I do not know whether the Prime Minister breakfasts on kippers and champagne, but there are certain characteristics which are not dissimilar between Horatio Bottomley and the present government. Horatio Bottomley ran a newspaper, you may recall, entitled John Bull. Signs were posted up all across the United Kingdom during the first war: "If you see it in John Bull it is so". That is akin to the propaganda which is now being put out by this government: "If we say it is so, it is so". There is no need to ask any further questions. If we say that it is a matter of great urgency to build this line and that it must be done this year, it is so, John Bull says so. One dares sometimes to question the urgency of this construction. Must it be done this year? Remember, I am speaking for people who have to help pay for this line and are going to get no benefit from it. Must it be done this year? That gas, that oil in Alberta, has been there for centuries. Fifty years ago, when I first came out to this country,—and I was born in another country; I was not born in this country, but I have been here for over 50 years—I saw the gas coming out of the ground in Medicine Hat and the flame burning. It has been there all those years. It seems to me that Toronto has been a big industrial city for a long time and they have got on very well without this Alberta gas. Oh, if it is really necessary, let us know. Why is it so imperative that it must be started this year? Are all those factories around Chicago in desperate need of this gas this year? They can get gas from other directions. Is Fort William so urgently in need of gas? Is northern Ontario? Are the people going to freeze to death there? They have been living in that district for a very long time.

What about Winnipeg? I have lived in Winnipeg. We did not have any gas then and everybody seemed perfectly happy. I passed through some of the defence establishments within the last few months. I noticed great piles of coal and elaborate and excellent heating arrangements for the burning of that coal at Rivers, at Shilo, at Fort Osborne barracks. Is it necessary to change all this coal heating apparatus over to the burning of gas right away? No, I do not think so. I cannot see the urgency of this proposal. I think it would be much better—and I am quite certain it is the opinion of all those people who are not receiving direct and immediate benefit from this pipe line—to have the whole problem reviewed.

Suppose we do have to wait for two years in order to get a sound scheme worked out; suppose you do in the end have to go to some form of public ownership, would it not be better to take that time? What is the rush? Is it because some people connected with Alberta are anxious to reap the benefits from the distribution of this gas during their lifetime? I am not at all sure that it might not be well to store up this gas. It is not all going to be burned up and wasted. Leave this oil in the ground. Let the future generations of Canadians have some opportunity before we rush in some madcap scheme to dispose of the gas and the oil immediately. Might it not be perhaps possible or even wiser to consider the advisability of moving some of those industries out from Toronto to the prairie provinces so that the industries can move to where the fuel is rather than going to the expense of bringing this fuel all the way across the country?

From time to time in this house we have heard various arguments advanced and pious hopes expressed regarding the decentralization of industry. Might it not be worth while to investigate and see whether it would not be more practical to do this instead of going to the expense of bringing this fuel all the way across the country? Personally, I do not see the need for this urgent, mad rush. Why should my constituents be asked to dig down into their pockets? Why should they be denied all those advantages and improvements that they consider are so essential for their well-being in order to develop, without full consideration, this scheme which is now proposed. I appeal to the government to give this further consideration. Let us have a second look at it. It is not such a likely or lovable scheme. Even the Prime Minister expressed doubt about it the other day. I do not believe any member of the government is really happy. It is a form of duress, it is a form of blackmailing that is being put up to them. Do you have to build this line now? Let us have another look at it; let us do something for the economy of all parts of Canada rather than for the small privileged section of two or three provinces.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I feel that in this debate an important section of Canadian history is being written. I believe that throughout the debate it is of paramount importance that at all times the interests of the 16 million Canadian people be uppermost in our minds. I further feel that I owe a debt to the thousands of people who have sent me here to use all the weapons at my command to attempt to persuade the government to change its mind about the proposal which it now is placing before parliament. If the Prime Minister was convinced about what the people at home in my constituency think of this matter, if the Prime Minister is unwilling to call a national election—I noticed the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) participating in this debate: I would challenge him to persuade the Prime Minister to assure us an immediate by-election in our two respective ridings and I will oppose him either in his riding or in my riding on this issue, and I am sure two C.C.F.'ers will be returned in those by-elections.

Mr. Philpott: You have a strong urge for suicide.

Mr. Regier: I would in that case permit the hon. member for Vancouver South to appeal to the people on behalf of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and I shall tell the people about anti-Canada pipe lines limited.

In the time at my disposal I intend to show that we need a survey of Canada's resources in the matter of energy that is available and may be made available. We need a survey of the needs of Canada during the next 25 years as far as energy and power are concerned. Until such an analysis has been made on a national scale I feel it is not correct for the government to take from the public purse hundreds of millions of dollars for a scheme that is looked upon in many responsible circles as a doubtful scheme at best. The very fact that private enterprise seems unwilling to risk its capital in what is usually a most lucrative enterprise should give us cause for serious consideration.

I mean to argue in support of public ownership of the line, if a line is necessary. I maintain that this entire proposal is solidly against the national interest. I feel that even the agreements which have been entered into by the minister with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited are not agreements to which any responsible businessman in Canada would apply his signature. The agreements are so one-sided and full of loopholes that the public interest is not being looked after.

I said I felt a survey of Canada's energy resources and requirements is badly needed. We have atomic energy rapidly developing. We do not know and we are not being told what role atomic energy is likely to play within the next 25 years. Many of these vast expenditures we are making may be entirely unwarranted and unnecessary. We need to be told what is taking place and what we have reason to expect. A survey should be made of our coal resources. In the interests of all those who need coal, the people of Canada as well as the people who mine the coal, consideration must be given to what is the future role of that fuel. We have huge resources in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan and also in the maritime provinces. What is the future of oil in supplying the energy needs of the Canadian people? What future is there for hydroelectric energy and, finally, what is the picture in relation to natural gas? We need to know what supplies there are of these energy producing resources. We should know how much we need, what are the best and most economical means of transporting energy to where it is needed, what is the relationship of these resources to unemployment, what is the relationship of our energy resources to national development, the decentralization of industry, methods of distribution and what should be the role of private enterprise versus public enterprise. We should know what is the future role of atomic energy, what should be our policy with regard to the export and import of fuels, what must be done to preserve our heritage, what conservation measures are necessary, what is the relationship of the production of energy to irrigation and how it relates to our future population. Some study should be given to price structure, measures of government control and the subject of taxation.

I feel the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has often rendered a service to this country in emphasizing the need for the early setting up of a national fuel policy board that will have its fingers on such problems as I have outlined. It is scarcely good enough that we are continuing to pursue the matter in this haphazard fashion whereby individuals, and foreigners at that, move about the country and look at where they can make a rich grab with little regard for the consequences to the people of Canada and the future welfare of this country.

There is much to be said for public ownership, Mr. Speaker. The most convincing argument for it in this case is that the people are going to pay for the line in any event. The minister is now offering to build the western leg and to entirely own the northern Ontario section. If the people have to pay for it by means of taxation, the people have a right to claim ownership. I have never before heard of someone having to pay for something and not being able to claim possession of that for which he has paid.

The Ontario and Saskatchewan governments are on record as being in favour of public ownership. Manitoba has its publicly owned hydro system and I am sure the province would not be averse to entering into an agreement whereby it also might become a shareholder in this public enterprise. There is plenty of evidence on the record that the Alberta government is most anxious to sell gas and I am convinced that is their desire. Judging from the letter of the premier of Alberta which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) put on the record yesterday, the government of that province is anxious to sell gas. The last paragraph of that letter reads in part as follows:

> . . . we feel your government would be fully justified in taking whatever steps are necessary.

I think that indicates how anxious the Alberta government is to get rid of its gas.

There are other advantages to public ownership. Public ownership allows proper conservation measures to be exercised and it allows for distribution in the national interests. If private enterprise owns the line it will build the line where and when it can make the most money. It will build the line only to such places as will provide it with the greatest revenue. No consideration whatever is given to the national needs. On the other hand, public ownership allows for the equalization of rates to consumers in smaller communities with those in larger communities. Private enterprise will not even bother servicing smaller communities because there is no money in it for them. They simply want to service areas where there is mass consumption.

As has already been pointed out by my colleagues, public ownership will mean lower capitalization costs and can ensure that the national heritage of the people will be preserved.

Private enterprise means the establishing of a monopoly. It is our contention that when a monopoly exists, whether through necessity or otherwise, that monopoly should be subject to public ownership and in this case to direct public ownership. I feel direct public ownership would give the government a splendid opportunity to aid the lower levels of government, in that many municipal governments would be able to undertake their own distribution and thereby relieve taxation on real estate in their municipalities. That situation exists in the case of hydro. In many municipalities in Canada the local government is able to relieve taxation by looking after its own hydro distribution.

I feel the present proposals are unacceptable to the people and against the national interest. The taxpayers are asked to run the risk and if the thing turns out to be an uneconomic venture the taxpayers of Canada will have lost hundreds of millions of dollars. If it is not a paying proposition Trans-Canada will never buy that northern Ontario section; it will be a white elephant on the hands of the taxpayers of Canada. If there is money in this northern Ontario section the company will be pleased to buy it and reap the profits. The people have everything to lose and nothing to gain. It is not in the national interest because control over one of our basic natural resources is being handed over to foreigners.

The export of energy may be vital to our development. We should have a policy whereby we will export only surplus energy and not energy vitally necessary for our national development.

By and large the bill is a poor bill. It sets out a poor policy because it gives almost unlimited power to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He can tear up these agreements next week and sign new ones. Many Canadian people may have the utmost confidence in the present Minister of Trade and Commerce but I would point out that one agreement is for a 25-year period. I certainly hope that the minister will be hale and hearty and living in retirement in beautiful Burnaby 25 years from now, but I certainly do not believe he will still be Minister of Trade and Commerce at that time. Regardless of the confidence Liberals may have in the minister's integrity, it should be borne in mind that this legislation may be administered in some future year by a Conservative, a C.C.F. or even a Social Credit Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Liberals in this house may yet regret that they wrote out a blank cheque to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The management of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited have no personal stake whatever in this operation. I am not at all surprised that Mr. Tanner saw fit to resign as a cabinet minister in the Social Credit government of Alberta. By buying only two shares in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited he is given the management of hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money which is being handed over by a grateful federal Minister of Trade and Commerce. This is certainly a good deal for Mr. Tanner, much more lucrative than any cabinet position in the province of Alberta.

I am given further faith in my theory that this proposal is unacceptable to the Canadian people by the fact that large sections of Canada will have to pay for this pipe line without getting anything out of it. The people of British Columbia are having to pay for their own pipe line in the price they pay for gas delivered by Westcoast Transmission, and why should they be called upon to pay for a pipe line to serve other provinces of Canada? We feel that that is a double imposition upon them.

If this is to be a trans-Canada pipe line in fact and not just in name, it should include in its set-up the line now being built by Westcoast Transmission so that we could also reap benefit from the taxes that Canadians in other parts of Canada will have to pay.

I wonder what the miners down in Nova Scotia will think of this bill. When this gas arrives in Montreal it will throw them out on the streets. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has always refused to accept responsibility for the unemployed. Those miners will be thrown out on the streets and yet they will have to pay taxes for the very thing that is causing their unemployment. I cannot see the Liberals winning many seats in mining areas in Canada.

The limitation of $130 million in the bill upon the amount which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) can lend the crown corporation means that it will be financially impossible for the corporation to build the Ontario section or even begin to build it until the company has repaid the loan in connection with the western link. That also is not in the public interest. If we are going to start building a pipe line we should be starting to build the whole pipe line, not just the western link.

Much has been made of the need of United States capital in Canada. A lot of people who know little of economics have been making some rather wild statements. They have been saying that Canadian national development will be seriously handicapped if United States capital does not continue to enter Canada in the large amounts in which it is presently coming to this country. That is an absolute falsehood as less than 10 per cent of our overall investment in 1956 is dependent upon United States investment. To even argue that we could not curtail our expansion program by 10 per cent is most ridiculous, especially as it is expected that our capital investment program will be 20 per cent greater this year than last.

The agreements themselves constitute a piece of bad business. First of all, the bill is a blank cheque. Then I notice the minister's method of doing business. I have a copy of the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Ontario. The government entered into the agreement with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited on November 21 to arrange for the section through northern Ontario, yet it was not until the day after that Mr. Porter of the government of Ontario signed a letter agreeing to the terms of the contract for the northern Ontario section. In other words, the minister went out on a limb; he ran the risk of this agreement not being sanctioned by the government of Ontario at the time he signed it. I think that is an indication of how he does things. The "great C.D." is a quotation we often hear, but we find that he makes agreements by telephone or otherwise and signs his name on the dotted line before he has the sanction to do so by the government of Ontario.

The agreement provides for the gift of the line by whoever may be Minister of Trade and Commerce to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. In a period of about 15 years, if the line is found to be a paying proposition, the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have the right, if he so wishes, to sell the northern section to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines for the sum of $1. The agreement provides for that. The agreement says that the minister may charge 70 per cent of the original capital cost as defined in the agreement; the company has no right to purchase unless it is willing to pay 70 per cent of the capital cost. However, there is nothing in the agreement to stop a federal minister of trade and commerce selling this line to the company for the sum of $1. I submit that that should be remedied before any federal government builds this pipe line.

I fail to understand the logic of insisting on an interest rate of 3½ per cent on our investment in connection with the northern Ontario section. This is a 25-year deal, this is long-term money which usually carries a higher rate than short-term money, but this government turns around and offers a short-term loan at an interest rate of 5 per cent. I see no logic in that. There is no financial logic whatsoever in that type of deal. We are satisfied to let them have money for 25 years at 3½ per cent but on the other hand when we give them a loan for ten months we insist on 5 per cent.

The first agreement regarding the northern Ontario section is already a dead agreement because the company has already violated it in many respects as to dates of meeting obligations. The company is also—this is another serious loophole in that agreement —under no obligation to use the pipe line at all. They can allow the government to build the pipe line and they may use it but they do not have to use it. It may be a white elephant from the very day it is completed. If this company is going to build a larger pipe line south of the border which it will own I see no reason why it should want to use the government pipe line and have to pay a high rental on it.

The agreement with regard to the western section allows the minister to make a maximum loan of $80 million. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), however, may lend to the corporation $130 million. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) created the impression that if the government had to take over the company because the company defaulted the shareholders and investors would lose money. There is nothing in the agreement to assure the taxpayers of that. The agreement says that the minister may buy the shares and he may even buy options on shares. He may take over the assets and rights of the company if it defaults in its payments but he may also take over all the undertakings of the company. In "undertakings" we can safely include the undertakings that the company has with respect to its shareholders. In other words, if the government needs to take over the company at the end of the ten months or at the expiry date of the loan there is no assurance to the Canadian people that the scandalous deal by which the shareholders and stockholders of all the bankrupt railway companies of Canada were bailed out by a government and the C.N.R. loaded with a terrific and unnecessary capital overhead will not once again be repeated and we will have a similar shemozzle.

When the minister takes over Trans-Canada he even has the power to pay back to them the $15 million he says they have already spent. I am wondering how much of the $15 million was a contribution to the Liberal campaign fund in 1953. There is nothing to block Trans-Canada Pipe Lines from making another heavy contribution to the next Liberal federal election campaign, and there is nothing to stop the Minister of Trade and Commerce from assuming all the indebtedness of the company with the taxpayers' money. I feel that these agreements have far too many loopholes to be sanctioned by any responsible minister of the government.

Much has been said about the C.C.F. being in an unholy alliance with the Conservative party on this subject. My reaction to that is that we of the Conservative and C.C.F. parties are Canadians all and Canadians first. The Conservatives may well represent only the monied class, the huge industrialists of Canada and what have you. I shall fight the Conservative party on their own ground at the proper time. However, so far as this problem is concerned I recognize the loyalty of my political opponents when I see it, and I have never yet accused the Conservatives of not being, as well as the C.C.F., a loyal and honest Canadian political party. The day will come when we will have in Canada what the people of Great Britain have, a loyal Conservative party and a loyal C.C.F. party.

Mr. Knowles: The Liberals will have gone down the pipe line.

Mr. Regier: I have no use for this party that is neither fish nor fowl, that lives on political expediency only. That has been the history of the Liberal party and if it were not for the lack of political development on the part of the Canadian people, who are too busy building up the country to take much interest in politics, the Liberal party would not be able to exist. They feed on the lack of interest of the Canadian people in political matters.

The Liberals are in serious disagreement on this issue. They are floundering around. If it had not been for last Thursday's caucus meeting the Liberal party would have been unable to present this proposal to the House of Commons. That caucus meeting saw the cracking of the party whip. In the C.C.F. ranks we do allow for freedom of conscience, and I want to state here that my leader has told us in more than one caucus that our first responsibility is not to the party but to our own individual conscience. That is a lesson the Liberals have never learned and I do not think ever will learn. They are not only exercising the whip on their own members but they are exercising the whip on our democratic institutions.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Are you talking about the Conservatives?

Mr. Regier: Those cabinet ministers who could not agree with the Trans-Canada proposal should have had the honesty to resign from the cabinet as they do in Great Britain on each and every occasion when a cabinet minister finds himself in disagreement with a decision of the majority of the cabinet. But that is not so in Canada. Political expediency rules the roost and rules the Liberal party. It always has. I am also very surprised at the position taken by the Social Credit party—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Go easy, now.

Mr. Regier: —although it may be understandable. After all, they have waited for 25 long years for $25 a month. They were elected on that platform in 1935 and they have been striving for it ever since. They sold out their oil heritage to United States interests in order to lay their hands on immediate cash.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Saskatchewan did the same.

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. Regier: Saskatchewan sold its oil rights under lease, and ten years from now the revenues of the Saskatchewan government from oil will exceed those of Alberta by far because Alberta sold outright. Saskatchewan said: We will take less cash and we will leave some return for those who will follow. I am not surprised at the hon. member for Bow River being loyal to the Alberta government. However, I am surprised that the four Social Credit members from British Columbia show greater allegiance to the treasury of the Manning government than they do to the welfare of the Canadian people. All the Social Credit party has done in the house is to put up a terrific fight on behalf of the producers. We were once told that there were thousands of them but Hansard shows us that they now only claim about a dozen.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): You had better watch Saskatchewan. It is a little shaky.

Mr. Regier: We are rather accustomed to the Liberals and the Social Crediters taking the same philosophical outlook.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): And the C.C.F. and the Conservatives.

Mr. Regier: In British Columbia the Liberals and the Social Crediters are still fighting right now for the patronage of the liquor, lumber and B. C. Electric interests.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): There is nobody else left to fight there. There is no C.C.F. party there any more.

Mr. Regier: The statements of the minister to the house are a mass of bland assertions and even of contradictions. His greatest argument is that the pipe line must be built this year or otherwise we will have to wait until 1958 at the earliest. Only today he admitted on the orders of the day that the pipe was now under firm contract to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. As found on page 3862 of Hansard of May 14 he said:

> I have implied that taking over the enterprise of Trans-Canada would be the only way for us to enter immediately into this business. That is precisely true.

The minister himself first tells us we cannot go ahead this year and then in the same speech he tells us, "Yes, if we take over Trans-Canada pipe line we will be able to go ahead immediately". He now has admitted today that the pipe is under firm contract, so if we took over, if we expropriated this company now, we would have the pipe to go along with the deal. We would also have the technicians, the engineers, who are engaged by this company working for the taxpayers of Canada as a whole.

As reported at page 3863 of Hansard he made another statement which is interesting. He said this:

> Trans-Canada stands to lose several million dollars if it does not succeed in paying off the loan and building beyond Winnipeg.

The minister has never yet assured this house that Trans-Canada will lose. Under the bill he has power to pay back every cent they have invested whether they have invested it legally or illegally for election purposes or for purposes of public relations. He has that authority. He has never yet assured the house that Trans-Canada will lose a cent if they refuse to pay back the taxpayers' money at the end of 10 months. He says that Trans-Canada stands to lose. He does not say that they will lose anything.

Then in another part—yesterday I believe it was; I have my notes, for Hansard is not yet available—he said something else. Referring to the top four American companies he said this: Why should they offer gas below normal prices to American firms? Then in the same speech he admits that the price to Tennessee Gas is 25½ cents and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) last night told us that the price to the distributor —not the consumer—in Winnipeg is supposed to be 30 cents. Right there from two cabinet ministers we have the admission that Winnipeg is to pay 4½ cents more than foreign interests will pay in order to help develop a country which in many respects is not complementary to ours but is in fierce competition with ours.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is a national tragedy that we go into the taxpayers' pockets and take out $600 million to build a seaway—for what?—so that iron ore that belongs to Canada can be taken into the heart of industrial United States. Now, to make matters worse, we are again going to dip into the taxpayers' pockets. What for? Not to help Canadians but to supply the energy from the west so that the Americans can smelt that iron ore and our own Canadian boys and girls can go out on the sidewalk unemployed in the winter time looking for work while this minister and this Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who are supposed to look after the welfare of the Canadian people say to the local municipalities, "You look after our Canadians when they are sick or when they are unemployed". I think that is a disgrace and I am willing to fight the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) if the Prime Minister will assure us of an election in our two ridings on that issue. I can assure him he is going to lose his shirt in that by-election.

Mr. Philpott: You have a strong urge for suicide.

Mr. Regier: I feel that the situation is a disgrace. We have hundreds of millions of dollars available for Texas multimillionaires. However, as to our arts council, we cannot afford it. Our arts are obliged to go to the liquor interests in order to survive or to live. There is no money for old age pensioners, for the Saskatchewan dam, or for family allowances. We cannot afford these things. As to health insurance, what do they bring forward? Just hospital insurance. That will not help me in British Columbia one whit. I already have what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is going to offer. There is no money to develop the Atlantic provinces or no money for education. University fees must be raised. There is no money for the development of British Columbia, or no money to pay decent wages to civil servants. Yet there are hundreds of millions of dollars for foreigners at 3½ per cent. When Canadians build N.H.A. homes or when farmers or fishermen borrow government money the rate is 5 per cent. When Canadian business wants to expand and, through the industrial development bank, wishes to use government money, the rate is 6 per cent. But for these foreigners, on hundreds of millions of dollars with which to rob us of our natural resources, the rate is 3½ per cent. I think the deal is a bit too raw and I can easily understand why even such a man as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes)—who usually speaks so slowly, sedately and wisely —showed such heat in his argument today. He is one of the most loyal citizens Canada has, but he is incensed to the core. Every good Canadian should be incensed to the core. Simply because the Liberal party has got itself into a muddle is no reason why they should take it out on the backs of the taxpayers. I have faith in the ability of the Canadian people—with their brains, brawn and the amount of money at their command—to develop our own resources when and where we need them, to develop our own country, to give employment to our own people, with proper regard for our heritage so that when we are gone from the scene our history books will not record a shameful incident of the giving away of one of our greatest natural resources to people outside of our own borders.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle).

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am the next Conservative speaker on the list.

Mr. Hahn: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. member for New Westminster is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Hahn: That is right, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member who just took his seat, namely the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), indicated that all the four Social Credit members of parliament from British Columbia, of whom I am one, have shown allegiance to the Manning government ahead of their allegiance to the Canadian people. My question of privilege is this. I owe my allegiance not to any particular government. I was elected by the electors and I realize my responsibility. I shall consider his remarks as being those of a man who is under the influence of a sense of egotistical emotionalism far out of proportion with his sense of reason.

Mr. Knowles: Is that a question of privilege or a speech?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Do I understand that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) is also raising a question of privilege?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker. I am raising a point of order. This question arose a day or two ago, and I should like to know why it is that our time that has been allotted to us is being curtailed. We have given Your Honour a list showing our next speaker. We have the position that two Conservatives are asking for the floor. I should just like to know from Your Honour whether this is a case in which Liberal time is being used up, as it was the other day, or whether it is the time of the Social Credit party which is being allotted to the next speaker, or just what the position is. We might as well get the matter straight now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I refer the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and other hon. members to citation 214 in Beauchesne's third edition. This citation reads as follows:

> 214. The succession of speakers is left entirely to the Speaker. If his call is disputed by some member who thinks he rose before the Speaker's choice, a motion may be made under S.O. 35, that "he be now heard".

Standing order 35 is now standing order 29, I believe. Standing order 29 reads:

> When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen "be now heard", or "do now speak", which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

When the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) resumed his seat after making his address, three hon. members rose to their feet, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn). The hon. member for Calgary South rose to his feet first; the hon. member for New Westminster was second and the hon. member for Broadview was third. I, therefore, in accordance with the rules gave the floor to the hon. member for Calgary South. I then learned that the hon. member for New Westminster wished to raise a question of privilege and I granted the floor to him for that purpose. I thereafter granted the floor to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra who rose on a point of order, and I have explained that. I am recognizing the hon. member for Calgary South unless the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra wishes to make a motion under standing order 29 which I will, of course, allow.

Mr. Green: Your Honour knows as well as every member in the chamber—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: —that the time is allotted among the parties in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think I have dealt with the point of order sufficiently and either the hon. member must now make his motion or I must call on the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Nicholson: In connection with this point of order, in view of the fact that a great many members have not yet had a chance to speak and the hon. member whom you are now recognizing has already spoken, it would appear to me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am quite certain I have heard sufficient to decide the point of order. The rule is quite clear. I am now waiting for a motion or if no motion is forthcoming then the hon. member for Calgary South may proceed.

Mr. Quelch: Perhaps I could help to clarify the situation. Normally, we would have had the next turn for a speaker but we agreed to give up our place to the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Green: I rise on another point of order. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has just taken the position that his party is entitled to put up one speaker for every speaker put up by the official opposition. Now, they have between one-third and one-quarter the number of members we have, and I should like to know from Your Honour whether or not that is the case. Is the Social Credit party entitled to put up member for member with the Conservative party?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I assure the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that I knew nothing of the question raised by the hon. member for Acadia. I also refer him to citation 214 in Beauchesne and some previous citations, I think 212 and 213, which are absolutely binding on this point. Now, we cannot have a discussion here of political parties and political parties' time. The matter is left entirely to the Speaker who must be in a position to recognize who rises first. There is another citation which says that it is desirable that the Speaker recognize first a pro and then a con and I think hon. members will agree the Chair attempts to do that.

Now, that is all I can say. The citations are clear and the rule is clear. Do I understand that the hon. member is advancing a motion or not? If not, the member for Calgary South.

Mr. Fulton: A one-man filibuster.

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): May I first of all express my thanks—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Did I understand the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) to interject, "A one-man filibuster"? May I ask if he was referring to the Chair?

Mr. Fulton: Far from it. I was referring to the hon. gentleman who now has the floor.

Mr. Nickle: I am not an expert in filibusters, but I must say a one-man filibuster could perhaps not be as effective as a 49-man filibuster.

Mr. Bell: We do not go behind the curtain for our filibusters.

Mr. Nickle: Nor will I.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Nickle: I should like to express my thanks to the Social Credit group in this house for assisting me by giving me the opportunity to present my views to this house. I am going to discuss the one general subject, "fable versus fact". Before getting down to that subject I want to briefly reiterate something I said on an earlier occasion. I am supporting this government legislation not because it is the best solution to the problem but because the only other politically possible alternative to it would involve more long delays, higher costs, further denial of industrial and population growth, particularly in western Canada, and a far heavier burden upon the whole Canadian economy than the present plan.

Mr. Speaker, the need now for government assistance stems of course from political interference with the normal process of economic planning for gas transport and marketing systems, which would have involved a much more substantial degree of international routing of pipe lines and international interplay of markets served by those pipe lines. The best proof of this lies in a comparison or contrast between the development of oil pipe line marketing systems over the last few years—

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker, facing the realities of the situation as it now exists in Canada and the position of government and political parties that a northern Ontario route for the first gas pipe line east from Alberta has top priority, then the government's present proposal for assistance to Trans-Canada offers the fastest, lowest cost means of getting the project under way. I support it for that reason, and for that reason alone. Let me therefore very briefly outline the main arguments which have been used against the plan by its opponents in this house and among Canada's press. Because some of the same arguments come from various sources I will name no particular source, but merely try as best I can reasonably to answer the arguments.

The summary, sir, might well be called "fable versus facts". Some may disagree that what I call facts are such and argue also that what I may call fable is indeed fact. Whether they be members of this house or editors, I think Canada's public has every reason to expect some reasoned and accurate rebuttal from them on the specific points I will mention rather than vague generalities and loose charges and damnation of Americans, of which there has been so much.

The first fable, Mr. Speaker, that I should like to mention is the claim that Americans are going to get natural gas at bargain prices while Canadians will pay more. The facts, sir, are these. With load factors and the type of gas sale taken on the same basis as between Canadian and American customers of Trans-Canada, sales over the border will actually be at the same, or slightly higher, prices to the Americans than to Canadian customers in the same area. To be specific, Manitoba is the nearest Canadian market area to the point of export at Emerson. As to customers in Manitoba communities taking gas at 100 per cent load factor—by "100 per cent load factor" I simply mean taking gas at exactly the same maximum volume every day of each year—under the existing contracts those customers big and small in Manitoba will for 25 years get a flat price of 26·2 cents per thousand cubic feet. The sale to Tennessee Gas Transmission Company at Emerson for resale in the United States at the same 100 per cent load factor involves an average price payable during the 25 years of that contract of 27·07 cents per thousand cubic feet if the volume of gas sold is 200 million feet a day; or would increase to 28·73 cents a thousand feet if the total volume exported were 400 million feet a day. This indicates, sir, a difference in favour of the Manitoba consumer at this particular load factor rate of at least one cent per thousand feet differential favouring the Canadian customers. I might say that the same approximate difference in favour of the Canadian customer in Manitoba carries through under the existing contract at any other load factor condition of sale you want to take into account. Later in my remarks I will place on the record the specific details of the various contracts entered into by Trans-Canada, both in Canada and with American customers.

Now, the other form of sale to the United States that is involved is the sale of excess gas; that is, gas that cannot be sold during the summer months to any Canadian customer in Ontario or Quebec. This is to be sold, if it is available, at Niagara to Tennessee for storage during the summer in Pennsylvania storage fields. This will be sold at a price comparable to the central Ontario prices for summer interruptible gas supply, which is now under contracts already entered into priced at 33 cents to 34 cents per thousand feet.

The next fable that I want to deal with, sir, is that the McMahon plan would involve the sale at Emerson to the United States at prices from 5 cents to 7 cents per thousand cubic feet higher than the prices under the present Tennessee plan. The facts are simply these. McMahon claims that he can get about 30 cents per thousand feet for up to 400 million cubic feet daily at a 90 per cent load factor for a 25-year period. This remains to be proved; for a vague offer is not a firm contract. Even, however, if his price could be validated by signed contracts it would be only one-quarter of one cent per thousand feet higher than Tennessee's average price under its firm contract, which would be on the basis of 90 per cent load factor 400 million feet a day sale, 29¾ cents per thousand feet under the price escalation contract covering the next 25-year period.

The third fable, sir, is that Trans-Canada would not be under Canadian control. The facts in answer to that are simply these. No matter who owns shares, any pipe line company in Canada is always under most adequate government control in our own country. At the producing end of the pipe line governments of producing provinces have complete authority over the volumes, prices, equitable market sharing among gas well owners, and so forth, related to gas supply for the pipe line system, whether that pipe line markets its gas in that producing province only, in Canada only, or internationally. Provincial authorities in the consuming provinces through such bodies as the Ontario fuel board, the Alberta public utilities board and similar organizations in other provinces, have full control over rates, charges to consumers by gas distributors, over the rates of earnings permitted distributors, thus providing strong provincial check-reins over gas transmission companies as well as contracts with the distributors in each of those provinces. The federal government has complete control over the transmission company no matter who owns it and regulates not only the rate of earnings that company can make—of course it does not guarantee the company against loss—but also has full control at all times over export or import permits, including the terms of volume and price involved in contracts for which export permits or import permits are required.

The fourth fable, sir, is that Canadians will not be given a chance to invest in a large way on fair terms in this proposed Trans-Canada pipe line. The facts again are simply these. When public financing becomes feasible, which it is not now, Canadians can buy at least 51 per cent of the total issued capital of Trans-Canada at comparable prices to the present cost of stock held by the current shareholders, but without taking the heavy risk which is now involved for the present shareholders of that company.

The fifth fable, sir, is that there is not even any assurance that Canadians will constitute a majority of the directors of the board of Trans-Canada. Trans-Canada, sir, is a special act company incorporated by an act of parliament and that act prescribes that the company is bound by section 155 of the revised Companies Act of 1934. That section, sir, reads as follows:

> No person shall be elected as a director unless he is a shareholder owning shares absolutely in his own right, and not in arrear in respect of any call thereon; and the majority of the directors of the company so chosen shall, at all times, be persons resident in Canada, and subjects of Her Majesty, by birth or naturalization.

Therefore, Trans-Canada, regardless again of who may have the majority of shares, must at all times comply with section 155 of Canada's own Companies Act and have a majority of its directors both residents of Canada and subjects of Her Majesty.

Now, I might say, sir, of the present board of Trans-Canada of some 17 men, 10 of them are Canadians. I think all 10 are men who will be regarded by most thinking Canadians as pretty solid citizens. I am going to mention their names and their locations because I think it would be most unfair to have these types of Canadians unfairly labelled, as the company has been, as being made up of "Texas buccaneers" or some other such thing.

The 10 Canadian directors of Trans-Canada are: N. E. Tanner, Calgary; Hon. Edouard Asselin, Montreal; E. W. Bickle, Toronto; M. A. MacPherson, Regina; J. K. McCausland, Toronto; H. R. Milner, Edmonton; A. D. Nesbitt, Montreal; G. P. Osler, Winnipeg; Jules R. Timmins, Montreal; and J. Ross Tolmie, Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, the next fable is that the proposed federal-Ontario government northern Ontario Crown Pipeline, for lease under purchase option to Trans-Canada, is a subsidy or handout to the Trans-Canada shareholders.

I think the facts can be described in this way. Trans-Canada will gain a major deferment of carrying charges during the early tough years of market build-up in Ontario or Quebec, but these deferred charges become a first charge against profits of the over-all Trans-Canada system when it reaches a profit position. The actual net saving to Trans-Canada will be an average annual interest saving of about $1,250,000 for the years until the Crown Pipeline is purchased by Trans-Canada, at depreciated value plus 3½ per cent annual interest, plus depreciation.

Even this is not a handout to Trans-Canada shareholders, but rather a cost saving to Canadian gas consumers. The Northern Ontario bridge plan has been taken into account in recent reductions in sales contract prices to Canadian distributors. These price reductions, with Ontario the principal beneficiary, will amount to over $2,500,000 annual savings to Canadian consumers during the early years and progressively larger annual savings as consumption expands in eastern Ontario.

To give you a specific example of the type of savings which will result to eastern Canadian consumers specifically as a result of this bridge plan of government assistance, also aided by the proposed sale of gas at Emerson, Manitoba, I would like to quote the contract price proposed two years ago in the H. K. Ferguson (Shattuck) report to the board of transport commissioners in June 1954. At that stage, which was prior to the contemplation of any government assistance, the average weighted price for gas to be sold in the province of Ontario to all types of consumers was placed at 51½ cents per thousand cubic feet. As a result of various measures of export and government assistance the new contract prices in Ontario work out to an average weighted price of 46·6 cents per thousand cubic feet, a saving of 4·9 cents in the weighted average cost. This saving has made a world of difference in the extreme difficulty of distributors in competing with other fuels and their ability to successfully compete with natural gas at competitive prices. The same type of comparison could also be made for other provinces.

The next fable is that the proposed $75 to $80 million loan to Trans-Canada to cover 90 per cent of cost of the 1956 pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg is a handout to the company or a subsidy. The fact, sir, is that this is a short term, 9-month loan at a full commercial interest rate of 5 per cent. Security for it is the pipe line itself which will cost $7 to $8 million more to build than the amount of the government loan, and will be worth an additional $7 million based on expected higher steel, freight and labour costs if construction is delayed beyond this year. The other assets of Trans-Canada, including rights of way, engineering, purchase and sales contracts, et cetera, which represent a multi-million dollar investment, are also security for the government. Should the government have to foreclose next spring owing to the inability of Trans-Canada to complete its quarter billion dollar financing program, the government will receive an operating pipe line and a start on an Alberta to Quebec pipe line system at a bargain price.

The next fable is that the government will make a handout of up to $200 million to Trans-Canada. The fact is, sir, that that argument is as phony as a $3 bill. First, no handout is involved at all. Second, the Winnipeg line loan would be fully repaid before Ottawa and Ontario start the northern Ontario pipe line section and the federal government's share of that would likely be under $100 million; thus there will not be more than $100 million of federal money involved at any time, and no part of that is a handout or subsidy.

The next fable is that somebody other than Trans-Canada could build a pipe line this year and the fact, sir, is that no private company, no matter who backs it, could be organized, get the necessary government permit, gas purchase and sales contracts, engineering, rights of way, finances or pipe in less than two years; nor could any crown company, even if the federal government was willing to commit itself to a capital expenditure of some $400 million. Nor could it be done if by some miracle, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta could be quickly persuaded to join in such a venture.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

The next fable, sir, is that there is no urgency for a start on construction this year. The facts are that the governments of Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario and the government of Canada all say that a start is urgent. So, too, say the Alberta producers who have already made a tremendous $150 million investment and have been hog-tied mainly by politics for several years. Common sense also dictates urgency, for the costs of pipe, labour, and freight are going higher, reducing the economics of the project. Actual pipe line construction is needed to spur a United States decision in favour of gas import from Canada.

The final point indicating the urgency of a start is the long delayed development in the prairie provinces of a great by-products industry based on the by-products of gas, and the petrochemical plants, sulphur plants and other industries and the population boost in the west that will accompany these plants. All of these things are urgently needed in the west. The sooner dry gas can get into the market the sooner will the west have new plants of many kinds using the by-products of that gas, employing many thousands of Canadians and paving the way for a much broader and sounder economy in that part of Canada.

The next fable is that Trans-Canada would syphon off gas to the United States to the detriment of eastern Canadian consumers, and the government investment in the northern Ontario pipe line. The fact is that there are several reasons this could not possibly happen. First, the federal government has control over the volume and terms of export at all times. Second, the company will initially have about $175 million of private capital invested in the pipe line system east of Winnipeg, over and above the government investment in northern Ontario, and the huge private investment can only bring earnings if large volumes—as much as can be sold—are moved into eastern Canada through the system. The third reason is that the government-owned section leased to Trans-Canada involves as part of rental payments a first charge on profits of the entire Trans-Canada system. Thus any failure by the company to get maximum markets in eastern Canada by diverting gas south of the border from Manitoba would result in the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation draining off Trans-Canada's export profits as rental payments on the government "bridge" pipe line.

The fourth reason, sir, why we need not fear the draining off of gas to the United States is the vast size of the present shut-in gas reserves in Alberta and the huge rate at which this surplus is expanding. This dictates that every possible market within economic reach be served. Pressure of gas surplus alone guarantees that eastern Canada will never be denied all the gas it is willing to buy.

In some of the discussions in this house, Mr. Speaker, and in some Canadian newspapers I have noticed some strange contradictions in statements by these newspapers or by political party spokesmen. I should like to comment on a couple of these. First, there have been examples of parties or papers supporting the McMahon plan and at the same time arguing that the export of large volumes of gas to the mid-western United States would be damaging to Canada because United States industry would then get Canadian gas and hurt eastern Canadian industry. First of all, sir, the latter argument is fallacious. But even if it were valid those who support it could hardly in conscience urge that the McMahon plan be considered as an alternative to Trans-Canada, for McMahon proposes export to the United States midwest of 400 million cubic feet daily, double the volume for which Trans-Canada has gained a Canadian export permit.

The second strange contradiction is the support of the proposal made by the Northern Natural Gas Company last July by those who at the same time accept the policy that the first requisite for movement of gas east from Alberta must be a pipe line laid entirely over Canadian territory. Northern Natural Gas Company's plan, which was referred to in the debates on this present measure, is directly contradictory to Liberal, Conservative and socialist policy although much closer, I may say, to my personal views on the most economic planning. Northern proposed last July that a three-phase program be undertaken. The first point was an Alberta-Winnipeg-United States midwest pipe line to sell large volumes of gas in the American market through Northern and associated pipe lines in the midwest. The second was the movement of American gas into Ontario and Quebec through Windsor to build up markets in eastern Canada. The third was the building by Northern of a connection between Emerson, Manitoba, and Windsor, Ontario, over United States territory. Acceptance of this plan, therefore, would eliminate a pipe line through northern Ontario. How many members of the house, sir, of all parties would be prepared to back that plan in lieu of a pipe line across Canadian soil?

In the few moments remaining, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on the record some of the exact terms of contracts entered into by Trans-Canada with gas distributors in various parts of Canada and in the United States. I feel that placing these figures on the record may be of some value to all members of the house in their further deliberations on the matters now before us. First of all, sir, in connection with contracts with Canadian gas distribution companies, all contracts between these companies and Trans-Canada are for a 25-year period with prices for the full period of the contract to prevail at the current level without escalation. On the other hand, prices to the export customer, Tennessee, at Emerson increase one cent per thousand cubic feet every five years. That escalation, of course, will result in an increase in the differential between the price paid by the American company and that paid by the Canadian companies.

The distributors in each of the centres or zones which have been set up by Trans-Canada have a choice between four schedules of general service rates dependent, of course, upon the load factor each distributor believes he can achieve in the type of market he serves. A predominance of space heating market, that is, winter sales, would involve, of course, a low load factor. Year-round sales to industry and interruptible sales to industry during summer months make possible higher load factors and hence lower average cost of gas to the distributor. Load factors will, therefore, vary widely between markets of the various distributors in each rate zone across Canada. For example, the industrial market available in the Toronto area and adjoining communities will result in a much better load factor than will be possible in some of the smaller purely home heating markets to be served in some of the areas near Toronto. There will also, therefore, be a considerable difference between the average price paid in the city of Winnipeg, which has a fairly sizeable industrial market, and the average price paid by smaller communities in the same province, despite the fact that all of the customers in each of the six zones across Canada have exactly the same contract in terms of load factor. There is no special advantage to any one town, village or city over any other community in the same rate zone.

I am going to quote first of all the 100 per cent load factor prices for each of the six zones that have been set up across Canada. In the province of Saskatchewan any customer who can take gas at a 100 per cent load factor, the same amount of gas every day of the year, will get his gas for a price of 21·3 cents per thousand cubic feet. In Manitoba, covering all of that province served by the pipe line, the 100 per cent load factor price is 26·2 cents. In western Ontario, the area from the Manitoba border east to a point north of Nipigon, the 100 per cent load factor price is 34·5 cents. In northern Ontario, between Nipigon and Cobalt, the price is 43 cents. In central Ontario, from Cobalt to Whitby, and this area of course includes Toronto, the 100 per cent load factor price is 44·5 cents. Then we have the eastern zone which runs from Whitby, Ontario, through to Montreal where the 100 per cent load factor price is 46·6 cents.

Communities in each of these areas who can take gas at a 75 per cent load factor would have these prices: Saskatchewan, 22·4; Manitoba, 28·3; western Ontario, 37·7; northern Ontario, 47·5; central Ontario, 49·3, and the eastern zone to Montreal, 52·1. I will quote one other set of load factor prices. I might say that the detailed rate schedules are available if any hon. member would care to consult them. I will take one other set at a 50 per cent load factor for the six zones. These are the figures: Saskatchewan, 26·6 cents; Manitoba, 35 cents; western Ontario, 46·5 cents; northern Ontario, 59 cents; central Ontario, 61·4 cents and the eastern zone, 65·7 cents.

As would apply to other firms, these goods and services would be available during the summer months. The pipe line would still have to pay its carrying charges and so on and therefore it is ready to sell to distributors for resale to Canadian industry surplus gas that cannot be absorbed in these markets in any other way. That dump gas will be sold at fairly low prices, of course to the benefit of industries which are prepared to use the gas on an interruptible basis. I should like to give a few of these figures.

In Saskatchewan, excess gas will be available during the summer months at a price of 21 to 22 cents per thousand feet. In Manitoba excess gas will be available in the summer months at 23 to 24 cents per thousand feet. In western Ontario the price will be 28 to 29 cents per thousand feet. In nothern Ontario the price will be 32 cents per thousand feet. In central Ontario, including Toronto, the price will be 33 to 34 cents. In the eastern zone to Montreal the price will be 33 to 34 cents.

To be more specific, what will be the price to individual communities under these contracts? Of course the load factors are the all-important thing. Winnipeg has signed a contract on a take-or-pay basis for a minimum 60 per cent load factor. At that particular load factor the Winnipeg fuel cost will be 32·9 cents per thousand feet. As the load factor mounts the price of course will go down. At a 75 per cent load factor the price would be down to 28·3 cents. If they got up to a 100 per cent load factor Winnipeg would pay only 26·2 cents. Winnipeg will also have gas available during the summer months, seasonal off-peak gas, at 25 cents per thousand feet and excess gas on an interruptible basis at 23 cents.

Toronto has signed a contract for a minimum 75 per cent load factor. Toronto's price at that load factor will be 49·3 cents at the city's gates. Toronto will have gas available during the summer months at a seasonal off-peak price of 35 cents, and also can get excess gas on an interruptible basis at 33 cents.

Montreal expects to use gas at a minimum load factor of 75 per cent, and with that load factor the price will be 52·1 cents per thousand feet at Montreal's gates. Montreal will also have seasonal off-peak gas available during the summer months at 35 cents, and excess gas on a completely interruptible basis at 33 cents.

As to the terms of export sales, the contract with Midwestern Gas and Transmission, a subsidiary of Tennessee Gas and Transmission, is in two sections. Contract No. 1 is a high load factor, firm sale, take-or-pay contract for 200 million cubic feet of gas per day over a 25-year period. During the first three years only gas may be accepted by this company at the United States border at a 75 per cent load factor, with a price payable of 27·27 cents per m.c.f. During the balance of the contract, that is the remaining 22 years, only 95 per cent and 100 per cent load factors apply. I may say that with the higher load factor on a take-or-pay basis this importer of gas from Canada, like all Canadian distributors, will have to take or pay if it is unable to actually sell the volume of gas for which it has contracted. A heavy penalty is involved if they fail to meet the minimum take-or-pay commitments involved in the contract, which makes all the more important the very high load factor of 95 per cent which Tennessee's subsidiary has entered into with Trans-Canada.

At 100 per cent load factor, in other words the actual use of 200 million cubic feet per day, day in and day out, year after year for 25 years, the price paid by Tennessee's subsidiary would be 27·27 cents. During the first five years the price on a 100 per cent load factor basis paid by the buyer would be 25·08 cents; at a 95 per cent load factor the price would be 25·42 cents. For each of the remaining years the contract price increases one cent per thousand each five years in each category.

When and if Canada and the United States agree to increasing the volume of sales to the United States and when and if the United States can absorb an amount beyond 200 million feet a day the second contract between Tennessee and Trans-Canada would come into effect. That contract, unlike the offer reported to be made by McMahon and associates, provides for the initial price under the new contract for the second 200 million feet per day to be immediately increased by three cents per thousand cubic feet. The result would be that for the second 200 million cubic feet per day Tennessee could import gas on a 100 per cent load factor at an average price of 30·4 cents. During the first three years of that contract Tennessee is required to take or pay on the basis of a minimum 75 per cent load factor. The price for the first three years with that load factor would be 31·05 cents per thousand cubic feet. During the first five years at 100 per cent load factor the price would be 28·04 cents. At 95 per cent load factor, which is the minimum take-or-pay provision, the price would be 28·52 cents. Those figures increase one cent per thousand feet for each five-year period thereafter.

There are additional special contracts, one of which covers the southwestern Ontario area from Hamilton through to the Sarnia and Windsor areas. This area is served by the Union Gas Company. Union Gas has an advantage over any other distributor in eastern Canada in that it has gas storage fields available in the area of the market which it serves. As a result Union Gas Company is going to take its gas from Trans-Canada mostly during the summer period when it is available at the excess gas price. They will take two-thirds of their gas during the summer months, put it in storage in these fields, then during the winter put it back into its pipe line and serve the area it covers. The other one-third of Union Gas Company's purchases will be delivered to it during the winter months near Hamilton and will be used in that community. As a result of having those special facilities in the way of storage fields Union Gas Company will pay an average price during its 25-year contract of 39 cents a thousand.

I might say at this time that the suggestion has been made that the storage fields in southwestern Ontario should be put to use in order to make gas available from them to such places as Toronto and Montreal. Unfortunately those storage fields are located some 170 miles south or southwest of Toronto and are—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired, unless he has unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, it is rather obvious that this legislation was conceived in the era of giant give-away programs. We have the $64,000 question and the $100,000 question on television, where individuals may win fantastic amounts of money by answering correctly certain questions. Obviously this government decided that it would go in for a bigger and better give-away program than had ever been conceived. It decided that not only would the prize be much bigger, but the question would be much easier.

These are the questions you must answer to qualify. First: Are you a corporation which is predominantly owned by foreign interests? If you can answer "Yes" to that question, the second question is: Have you defaulted on your undertaking which was the basis for your being awarded a government franchise? If you have answered those two questions correctly, this government will do almost anything to bail you out of any financial difficulty you might run into, or build your whole project for you.

However, if you happen to be a Canadian province, for example Saskatchewan, and apply to the federal government for assistance to build a dam which will irrigate half a million acres of farm land, and provide you with enough hydroelectric power to industrialize your province and increase the standard of living of your people, then you know of course that you are going to be turned down flat.

Or if you happen to be another Canadian provincial government—for instance the government of New Brunswick—and you happen to be applying to this government for federal backing for your power development bonds which, if granted, will not cost the federal taxpayer or the federal government one penny, but will simply make it possible for you to borrow the money you need to build your project at a great deal lower rate of interest, and thus save your taxpayers millions of dollars a year, then, Mr. Speaker, of course you know that once again you are out of luck, and that you can count on being turned down flat.

It has become fairly obvious, Mr. Speaker, that if you want to get anywhere with this government, you must first of all be a foreign-owned corporation and, second, have the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) wrapped around your little finger. If you happen to qualify on both those scores, then you know that the sky is the limit and that there is absolutely nothing that this government will not do for you.

Let us have a look at this legislation, Mr. Speaker, and see what it will do. First of all, it will provide 90 per cent of the capital to build the first third of the line. Then it will provide 100 per cent of the capital to build the second third of the line. So, by simple arithmetic, we find that this government is providing 95 per cent of the capital to build this whole line.

Up until a year ago, this chosen instrument of the government, this Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, professed over and over again its ability and intention to build the whole line unassisted by the government. Then suddenly, a year ago, the company came to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, cried on his shoulder, and professed inability to finance construction. Of course, without question,—it being his chosen instrument—the Minister of Trade and Commerce did exactly what the company wanted him to do. He believed everything they said; did not question them in any way; and agreed to build the northern Ontario section of the line for the company. He did it, of course, with the money provided by the taxpayers of Canada.

Then, spurred on by that initial success, a little while ago Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited again came to the minister; again cried on his shoulder and said, "We cannot finance the building of the prairie section of the line". Once again the minister listened to everything they said; believed it without question—because, after all, it is his chosen instrument, it is his baby; the company cannot do anything wrong in the eyes of the minister—and agreed to give them everything they asked for. He agreed to put up 90 per cent of the cost of building even the easiest section of the line.

The worrying part about this matter,—bad though it is so far—is that there is no doubt about it that when this line reaches Kapuskasing, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited may be counted on once again—spurred on by those two initial successes; after all, it has been so easy, why not try it again?—to come to the minister and cry on his shoulder a third time; and as he did without question on the first two occasions, he will say, "Certainly; if you want it, I will finance the construction of the remainder of the line". Hence we shall see this whole line built by the government.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made an amusing statement this morning. He said that the Conservative party objected to United States capital coming into Canada to build this pipe line. Mr. Speaker, we do not object to United States capital coming into Canada to build this line. We object to the fact that there is no United States capital coming in to build this line. We object to the fact that the capital is to be provided just about 100 per cent by the Canadian taxpayers, while the wealthy United States interests that control and own this pipe line will be free to reap all of the profits from it. That is what we object to. We should like to see United States capital come in, but we object to seeing the whole line being built by the Canadian taxpayers and all the rewards and profits being reaped by the United States interests that own and control this company.

What is the reaction of the people of Canada, Mr. Speaker, to the expenditure of public funds in order to enable United States interests to take over the transportation and marketing of a large proportion of one of our vitally important natural resources? The answer to that question was given by a nation-wide Gallup poll which reported as follows on May 2 last. I quote from the official report of the Gallup poll:

45 per cent of the people of Canada favour a pipe line built and run by private Canadian investments.

29 per cent favour a line built, financed and administered by the government.

17 per cent favour a line built partly by the government and partly by private investments from Canada and the United States.

8 per cent had no opinion.

One per cent gave various and sundry other answers.

Of the 17 per cent who favoured a line built partly by government and partly by private interests, more than half opposed this proposal if it meant the possibility of American control.

It is therefore clear that, because Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is owned and controlled 83·4 per cent by foreign interests, only 8 per cent of the people of Canada are in favour of the present government plan for building this line. That leads us to the logical question: Why should a policy that is favoured by less than one out of every twelve Canadians be thrust down the throats of the Canadian people? It is simply because one man, namely the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is determined to have his way. This is the same man, the same minister, who a year ago was determined that parliament should grant him unlimited and unchecked power. That power was denied him for one reason and one reason only. That reason was that the Conservative party was determined that no minister and no government should be granted power of that kind. Today, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party is just as determined that this minister and this government shall not impose their will on the overwhelming majority of Canadians who oppose this legislation.

The attitude of the minister, and the arrogant, bungling and bulldozing methods of this government, were described about as well as I have ever heard them described, in Ottawa a week ago today at a luncheon given by the Canadian Club which was addressed by a distinguished Canadian journalist, Mr. Max Freedman. Mr. Freedman, whose sentiments are clearly Liberal, and who has had ample opportunity to observe the operations of this government while working for the Winnipeg Free Press here in Ottawa, and the Manchester Guardian in Washington, describes this government's approach to matters of policy in the following words: "They are often in error but never in doubt". I think those words describe the attitude of this government just about as well as I have ever heard it described.

Mr. Dickey: The Tories are always in doubt and always in error.

Mr. Hees: Before I was so rudely interrupted, Mr. Speaker, I was just going to say that I feel that Mr. Freedman, who is usually right, is slightly in error in this case, because in this case I think it has become fairly obvious that the government, besides being in error, is also in doubt. If it was not in doubt, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would have had the courage, on behalf of the government, to stand up and accept the challenge thrown at him by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to take this matter to the people. Of course, he would not do it because he and the members of his government, as well as the members of his party, know quite well they would get the pants beaten off them. They know quite well there would not be one in three of them who would come back. They know that not only the newspapers of the country, but the people as well, are against the project. The gallup poll, which gives us a most accurate guide to the opinions of the people, has demonstrated that less than one in twelve of the people in Canada are in favour of this proposal.

Up to the present time, there are a number of aspects of this extraordinary proposal that have remained a mystery. One of them is the result of the fact that there has never been any attempt made by either Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to explain why, after claiming for four years and getting their franchise on the basis of being willing and able to build the whole line without government assistance, suddenly the Trans-Canada company comes to the government and claims it cannot build two out of three sections of the line, and the government has to bail them out. Last fall, as I said, the minister simply made an announcement, without any explanation, and we are still waiting for it from him, from the Prime Minister or the company, that this line would be built across northern Ontario by the government. A short time ago, it was announced here in this house that the government proposed advancing 90 per cent of the capital needed to build the prairie section of the line, which is by far the easiest section to build.

Mr. Speaker, to be a shareholder in a corporation which is financed by the government, and is free to make unlimited profits after the work has been done for the corporation by the government is nothing short of an investor's paradise. This government is making such a paradise out of a company, not a Canadian company, which is owned and dominated to the extent of 83·4 per cent by wealthy United States financial interests. The only possible explanation is that somehow or other the Minister of Trade and Commerce has become mystified and is under the domination of the wealthy United States interests who control Trans-Canada. When they snap their fingers, the Minister of Trade and Commerce jumps to do their bidding. What we on this side of the house object to is that he is using the money of the taxpayers of Canada to do their bidding.

Now, how did all this take place? The Minister of Trade and Commerce refuses to tell us any of the secrets that are kept hidden in his breast pocket, so we have to speculate upon what happened.

Mr. Dickey: You have not done anything but speculate since you got on your feet.

Mr. Hees: It is rather obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the wealthy interests controlling Trans-Canada simply got together and said, "Let us see if we can get old C.D. to build the northern Ontario section". You can just see the boys sitting around the room, cutting up a melon in advance. The question would come up, how do you think we can get good old C. D. to build that northern Ontario section? Most of the financial interests would say, No, I do not think we can because after all, it is quite obvious this is a money-making proposition. We got the franchise on the basis that we will build the whole line, and C. D. knows that this is a plum; there is a lot of money to be made out of it. We have finances to put up to do the job. One of them, probably the largest shareholder, got on the telephone—that would be Mr. Murchison—and sold the minister a bill of goods to the effect that the company could not build the northern Ontario section. The minister said, certainly, I do not want you to be unhappy about this; we want you to make a nice thing out of it, and we want to keep everybody happy, so we will build the northern Ontario section.

The same thing happened with regard to the prairie section. There has been no explanation as to why the government has had to put up 90 per cent of the financing—

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is he now relating facts from his own knowledge or from his imagination?

Mr. Hees: If the hon. member had been paying attention, I said we have for a long time been trying to get some information from the minister as to why these two sections are being built by the government, instead of by the company which holds the franchise. They received the franchise on the basis they would build the whole line unassisted. I submit if he had been listening he would have heard me say that, because the minister will not let us in on these mysterious conversations he has had, we have to try to speculate on them for ourselves, and that is exactly what I am doing at the present time.

Mr. Dickey: You are one of Canada's foremost novelists at the moment.

Mr. Hees: Another thing that remains a mystery is the conversations and dealings between the minister and Mr. Frank McMahon. After an interview with the Minister on March 27, Mr. McMahon submitted very detailed proposals to the government in a letter dated April 4. He made the following very definite and positive proposals:

> I am prepared to undertake a Canadian-owned, privately financed project to construct an economically feasible gas pipe line from Alberta to Montreal if Trans-Canada is not immediately able to present a suitable proposal.
>
> This line can be operated on a sound business basis without government financing or debt guarantee, but requires only remission or deferment of import duties and sales taxes.
>
> I will personally post with the government $500,000 performance cash to complete the project by 1958, subject only to being able to obtain necessary materials.
>
> The project will be Canadian controlled with not less than 70 per cent of the equity owned by Canadian companies and individuals.
>
> I am further prepared to arrange interim financing to permit starting construction this year of a 34-inch pipe line from the nearest Alberta gas fields to Winnipeg to supply Saskatchewan and Manitoba by late 1956 or early 1957.

An hon. Member: Where would he get the pipe?

Mr. Hees: If the hon. member who asked, "Where would he get the pipe?" had read the full submission of Mr. McMahon, he would know that Mr. McMahon set out in detail where he would get his pipe. He had enough pipe lined up to build the line as far as Winnipeg, and he had no doubt he would be able to get sufficient pipe after that to complete the line.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Macdonnell: And he has a record of performance, not of failure.

Mr. Hees: He happens to be the only man in Canada who has financed and built a successful pipe line. The minister used the "private and confidential" which was placed on this letter and two subsequent letters of April 16 and April 24, as justification for doing what I consider to be a preposterous thing, standing up in this house and denying he had ever received any communications from Mr. McMahon.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We might as well be accurate. I never said that. I said I had never received a proposal from Mr. McMahon.

Mr. Hees: Well, when I say he had received a communication I was referring to the proposal with regard to this pipe line. What the minister should have done—and he knows he should have done it—was immediately to get permission from Mr. McMahon to remove the "private and confidential" designation, and immediately submit that proposal or those proposals to his cabinet colleagues and to parliament as a comparison with the present extraordinary proposal being put forward by this government for having the line built.

Mr. Dickey: Do you support the McMahon proposals?

Mr. Hees: The McMahon proposal looks like an excellent one. Yes, I certainly do. I think it is obvious that the minister had no desire to see any other proposal put up against the proposal of his own chosen instrument, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, and particularly a proposal of this kind which offers to build a line without government capital or debt guarantee.

If the minister did not think this was a good proposal, then why did he not bring it before parliament and explain to parliament that he had received this proposition, and why it could not be accepted and why it is not a good proposition and proceed in a straightforward, open-handed way, instead of this cloak and dagger treatment that we have seen. The Prime Minister was not even told that this proposition had come forward. That is not a straightforward way of dealing either with your cabinet colleagues or with parliament. If there was nothing to hide in this matter, why did the minister not bring it forward and let parliament know what was going on? There is no answer, of course, except that the minister did not want to. He was determined that his proposition, put up by his own chosen instrument, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, should be the only one that would be accepted.

In his telegram to the minister immediately following a mysterious telephone conversation with the minister, Mr. McMahon said that he did not wish to be considered as being any more interested in building the pipe line from Alberta to Montreal because, as he said, he found now that he was far too busily committed with his Westcoast Transmission line. That, of course, is an explanation that no sensible person can accept, because anybody familiar with this situation knows perfectly well that Mr. McMahon is the kind of person who delights in being busy.

Mr. McMahon is not the kind of man to go to the time and trouble of working out the details, arranging and lining up the financing, of a proposition as big as this, and then all of a sudden back away because he is too busy. When he made his original proposition he knew perfectly well how much time he was going to have to devote to the Westcoast project. No, there is no doubt about the fact that there was a great deal of pressure brought to bear on Mr. McMahon by this government to withdraw his proposition so that they would not be embarrassed any further by a proposition which was one that certainly should have been considered by the government. As yet, there has been no explanation as to why it was not so considered.

Now, what about the provinces that are not going to benefit from the expenditure of public funds to build this pipe line? These provinces have a perfect right to demand the same kind of consideration that the five provinces that are going to benefit from the building of the line are getting, in developing power within their own borders, which they need just as much as do the five provinces that are going to benefit from receiving this natural gas. I ask the minister, I ask this government, what about their attitude toward helping the province of British Columbia with developing power on the Columbia and the Fraser rivers? What about the developing of power on the Saint John river and in the Passamaquoddy bay in New Brunswick; or, in Nova Scotia, by developing electric power by new and cheaper methods from coal; or in helping the province of Newfoundland develop power from the Hamilton river? Mr. Speaker, these are great potential developments that are simply waiting for assistance from the government; developments that cannot be proceeded with without assistance from the federal government because those provinces do not have the financial resources to proceed alone with developments of this magnitude.

If this government can hand out $100 million, $150 million, $200 million, $300 million or maybe $375 million before it is through, in helping a corporation which is 83·4 per cent owned by American financial interests, then it can certainly provide the very modest financial assistance which has been asked for by Canadian provincial governments to help them develop power and other natural resources within their borders, which will materially increase and improve the standard of living of their people.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say this. Let this government stop using the taxpayers' money in bailing out the shareholders of American corporations which have defaulted on their undertakings, and support financially the development of Canada by Canadians for the benefit of Canadians.

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview, who has just taken his seat, mentioned in one of his remarks a challenge that had been issued to the government to call an election. This is the most empty challenge that I have ever heard, and I shall tell you why. All hon. members know that if an election were called today it could not be held until long past the date when it is necessary to get this pipe line under construction, and no sensible government could possibly do that. I said it was an empty challenge because the Tories have no policy on which to go to the people.

Mr. Montgomery: So say you.

Mr. Weaver: And you will hear more on this pipe line question. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) has taken the only realistic stand on the Tory side of the house in this debate. As far as the Socialist party goes, they also issued a challenge, but they know what would happen. They have fought election after election in Canada on the policy of socialism and they have been defeated many times.

This is the first time in this parliament that we have heard the Tories throw out the challenge of an election. They have been very careful not to because no one wants an election less than they do at the present time.

Mr. Cardiff: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Montgomery: Why do you not call one, then?

Mr. Weaver: And even when they did throw it out this morning they were so fearful that there might be some possible way that it could be accepted that they waited until the C.C.F. had already issued the challenge.

Mr. Montgomery: Go ahead and call one.

Mr. Weaver: In the very interesting debate that took place on the resolution there were 26 speakers. The first day, of course, was taken up by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell). The next day, the day on which so much was said about closure, there were 23 speakers. Not since I have been here have so many speakers taken part in a debate in a single day. It was a very interesting debate; it was a debate in the proper sense. The issues were clearly defined. In the years since I have been here the Liberal majority, as is usual, has been large and we had either to spend a year around here or we had to restrain ourselves because there was no restraining either of the opposition parties. As an example of that, about four sessions ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did a great deal of speaking and I took Hansard for that session and I counted the lines in it, and I calculated that if every one of the 265 members in this chamber had taken the time of the house that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre took, it would take us three years to finish one ordinary session. The opposition have been talking about closure. Without closure there would be no bill passed in time to get construction of this line under way this year, and all hon. members know that.

An hon. Member: Why did you not bring in the resolution in January?

Mr. Weaver: There would be no gas in Winnipeg this year. The government would have been frustrated within the rules of this house had closure not been adopted. I am satisfied the vast majority of Canadians—and I mean Canadians who support all parties, not just those who support the Liberal party—feel that when a government is elected its job is to govern. If a government does not govern then it does not have a right to the confidence of the people. In this particular case the government is only doing its job; it is governing.

When government speakers mentioned that the United Kingdom use closure on many occasions the opposition interjected that it was closure by agreement. The opposition knows that if they had desired it there could have been closure by agreement on this issue; a time table could have been drawn up which would have permitted the bill to pass in time for construction to begin on schedule but the opposition turned down what they profess to call closure by agreement.

In speaking further about the necessity of having a fixed schedule for this debate, I would like to point out that the date has been fixed not by individuals or the government but by the cold hard facts of Canadian weather. This is something which must be considered in Canada to a greater extent than in any other country. Our construction season is short. In the case of a pipe line it has to be buried in the ground. All hon. members know that our ground is frozen for many months of the year.

An hon. Member: So is the government.

Mr. Hosking: Particularly in Manitoba.

Mr. Weaver: But come July 1 and you will see the pipe line being constructed.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) this morning with great indignation decried the name Trans-Canada saying that the pipe line did not extend into British Columbia. He neglected to point out that British Columbia is already served by Alberta gas and has a gas pipe line. The hon. member went on to ask why his part of the country should pay anything toward this trans-Canada pipe line. The answer is that they will not pay anything. This is not a gift, it is an investment. There is nothing in our estimates having to do with this. This is an investment by the people of Canada. As is the case with all investments, certainly there is a risk involved. I do not believe for a moment that it will happen, but if we ever have to pay anything as a result of taking this risk, since it is a risk for the good of all Canada it is only right that all Canada should share in it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Who said it is for the good of all Canada?

Mr. Weaver: You will find out a little later on. Mr. Speaker, I fully accept the responsibility in this instance as well. Last spring there were many rumours about where this pipe line might go. There was one rumour to the effect that the pipe line would go east to Winnipeg then south to the border, delivering gas to the western United States. It was rumoured that at some time in the future a line would extend across northern Ontario if markets were built up. In the meantime there would be a line travelling south of the great lakes which would carry the Alberta gas. True, it was just a rumour, but rumours can be disturbing.

On more than one occasion I mentioned to various hon. members of this house that this would be a shameful and terrible thing to happen, because if the pipe line followed that course we might never have an opportunity of bringing the pipe line north of the great lakes to more fully unite this country. I said to more than one hon. member that any government which could not take the responsibility of seeing that this was done could not have my full confidence. I was very pleased when I heard of the arrangement whereby the line would go across Canada north of the great lakes, and in this issue the government has the fullest support I can possibly give it.

Another reason for my astonishment at the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich this morning is this. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was built across western Canada, no one in the Canadian west objected to the great land grants which were given to the railway to enable it to reach British Columbia. At that time our fathers saw no benefit which would come to us. It was many years later when we on the prairies realized the value of Vancouver as a great grain port. I want it to be plain, Mr. Speaker, that we in the west expect to see the Canadian Pacific Railway agreements lived up to.

One last thought in connection with the speech of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. If it were true, as he claims, that Trans-Canada has with malice aforethought cornered the only available pipe, then the government by this bill is taking the one action that could smoke the pipe out from its storage hole south of the border and bury it on the western prairies for our benefit. However, I do not accept the truth of the hon. member's proposition.

The name of Sir John A. Macdonald has been invoked several times during the course of this debate, and rightly so. I believe that practically all Canadians are prepared to pay tribute to him for the part he played in the political history of this nation. He saw what had to be done and he was responsible for doing it in order to further the building of this young nation which at that time was at a much earlier stage of development. I feel he would be one of the first to disown the antics that were engaged in earlier in this debate by those who now bear the party name he bore.

Sir John A. Macdonald undertook to see that the Canadian Pacific Railway was built across our country, linking the then relatively thickly populated areas of the St. Lawrence valley and the Niagara peninsula with the Canadian prairies and the west coast, thus providing a transportation artery to nourish a young nation. I want to say one thing very emphatically, because it may surprise some people. Deep down the west is grateful for the assistance it has received from the east in its development.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Deep down where?

Mr. Weaver: It would have liked this assistance to be greater than it has been, but without that assistance the west would not have reached the point it has now reached. In a similar way all Canada is grateful for the assistance it has received both from Great Britain and the United States toward the development of the whole nation. Now the time has come when the west is in the position through its resources to repay some of the assistance it has received from eastern Canada.

Gas is power and gas in a pipe line is flexible power, and the power that will be spread from the Alberta gas fields right across the country as far east as Montreal will be equal to the power of nine Niagaras. I may say that a portion of the power of those nine Niagaras will go south into the western United States.

Power is the foundation of industry. Power is the foundation of man's rise from aboriginal life to life in the twentieth century. Power is the foundation of that ever-rising standard of living to which every party in this house subscribes. This particular reservoir of power has been stored in the ground in western Canada for millions and millions of years waiting for our discovery and our use in the mid-twentieth century.

When I say for our use I include the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. The fact that the line as envisaged reaches only as far east as Montreal does not mean that the Atlantic provinces will not benefit in some form. It will be all Canada's duty to see that the Atlantic provinces do receive adequate benefits from the construction of this line, even though those benefits may be indirect.

Mr. Brooks: Is that a promise by the government?

Mr. Weaver: I said it is up to us. When I say it is up to us I mean the Conservatives in this house, I mean the C.C.F.'s in this house, I mean the Social Crediters in this house, as well as the Liberals in this house.

Mr. Brooks: It has been up to the government for 20 years and they have done nothing.

Mr. Weaver: Three years ago this house passed a bill to incorporate a company known as Niagara Gas Transmission Limited. Hon. members will perhaps recall that that bill had a stormy passage. It was eventually arranged that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines would build a pipe line from Niagara to Toronto, importing gas from the United States which would temporarily relieve a gas shortage in eastern Canada and serve to build up eastern markets for western gas. This was a temporary alleviation of the power requirements of Ontario and Quebec. I want to emphasize that it was only temporary because, power being the vital key that it is, no thinking person can rely on having this power permanently delivered from another country.

Mr. Frost realizes that this is only temporary, but the Conservative party under the leadership of the present Leader of the Opposition ignores this temporary feature. Eastern Canada can wait for one, two, three or perhaps four years for western gas without being hurt, but let us look at the position of western Canada. A large percentage of this gas is being burned daily because of a lack of markets. There is no pipe line to carry it away. This is a waste of a precious asset, and every day it continues to go to waste is an unhappy day in Canada's history.

Over and above the amount which is being wasted is the development which is being held up by the lack of markets, and this is tremendous. Southern Saskatchewan is hungry for power, and there is no pipe line to bring temporary power from the United States to southern Saskatchewan. In Winnipeg a Winnipeg gas company has already gone to great lengths in preparing for the arrival of this gas. That city is hungry for this power, and there is no pipe line built so the city of Winnipeg can get temporary gas.

This applies in a greater degree to that wasp waist of Canada north of the great lakes where they are less favoured as regards power than are other parts of Canada. They have all kinds of resources there in the pre-Cambrian shield, but they have not the power with which to develop those resources. At the present time there is no pipe line to bring them gas temporarily from the United States and thus serve those communities. Yet the official opposition in this house will smugly say that western Canada can wait. Is it any wonder that holding such views that party has reached the present low ebb?

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) referred yesterday to the pipe line which was originally proposed to carry gas from the Alberta fields to Winnipeg and then south to the border, and which was later united with the first Trans-Canada gas company. He did not mention that this line was to be constructed of small diameter pipe. In other words he was expressing the western Canada Tory view, "We will look after western Canada and let the devil take Ontario." The official opposition representing Ontario in this house are saying, "We are all right, let the devil take western Canada."

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The Liberal government let the devil take everything.

Mr. Weaver: You may think so and that is your privilege, but I am proud to be associated with the Ontario Liberals on this issue because they, together with their Quebec compatriots, are looking beyond their own doorsteps and recognizing that their welfare is best served by serving the welfare of all Canada. I am afraid I must admit that after sitting in this house for the past several years I am not surprised at this Conservative viewpoint, because they have demonstrated time and time again that they have no understanding of our western problems. They have never demonstrated it more convincingly than on this occasion, when they have dragged their loyal western supporters into such an indefensible position.

The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) is the only one who has taken what could be described as a normal Conservative position on this issue. In the final analysis there is only one issue: Is the pipe line to be built by private enterprise, or are we to rely entirely on public ownership? This is a time when the Tories should be saying, "Me too," and saying it honestly. The Canadian people would have given them full marks for saying it.

In his speech on the resolution the hon. member for Calgary South stated most emphatically that he was out and out for private enterprise based wholly on economics, without allowing any margin for national considerations which might arise because of the economics of the bridging time necessary to build up eastern markets until the line across north of the lakes could be completed. He was always for exporting as much gas as possible to the western United States. Fortunately our nation was not built on that philosophy. However, the hon. member has always been consistent. He knows and he has stated that delay at this time would cost far more than the cost of the northern Ontario section. This in itself indicates the measly cost of this northern Ontario section when placed against the value to the nation of the whole project.

Canada is developing at a more rapid rate than any 15 million people have ever developed in all history. They will need this power which is stored beneath the western prairies for their continued development. I do not say they should not export any of it to the United States, but I do say they should be cautious and examine carefully any export of something so vital to their future. Canada has demonstrated before that she recognizes obligations beyond her boundaries and that 15 million people cannot sit on treasures of the magnitude of our Canadian treasures with a dog in the manger attitude, but we must scrutinize carefully the export of power.

This attitude has always been taken by all governments in this country, and it has been taken also by the United States. That is the reason so much time is being taken in scrutinizing the power question by the United States federal power commission, which has delayed this project up to the present time.

Last night the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) gave some figures on gas—this was for the benefit of the C.C.F. party—and power in cities in Saskatchewan. I do not have time to go into why these costs are so high. I shall leave that for C.C.F. speakers, but I should like to say that in Edmonton the lowest rate, which of course is a commercial rate, is 17 cents per thousand cubic feet. When the amount used is from 10,000 to 42,000 cubic feet per day the rate, and this is still a commercial rate, goes up to 19 cents per thousand cubic feet. The domestic rate is 25 cents. These figures are vastly different from those we heard the Minister of Agriculture give with respect to that socialist province right beside the province of Alberta.

As I said earlier in my address, there is only one real issue at this time and that is public ownership versus private ownership. Assuming that we could get all the pipe needed and that all other things were available that are not available from other companies, I want to give the reasons why we cannot afford the luxury of public ownership in this instance. We have already heard that the gross national product of Canada this year will be somewhere between $26 billion and $28 billion. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has already announced that it is estimated that capital expenditures in Canada this year will be $7½ billion. This is a record percentage for any nation at any time, and I do not exclude Russia.

Serious doubts have been expressed as to the ability of our economy to find the goods and services to accomplish this capital expenditure. This means that there is danger of serious inflationary pressures within our economy. Canada is fortunate in being next door to the United States so these inflationary pressures may be cushioned by spilling over into their much larger economy. The mechanics of this spilling over involve the importation at such a time of United States capital for development.

I am one of those who have constantly urged the maximum rate of development for our country, with particular emphasis on the Canadian northwest; and since I have so constantly urged the maximum rate of development I again want to say that I support as strongly as I am able the procuring of the wherewithal to expedite this rapid development. When our own resources are being used to the maximum extent, we must do all possible to encourage the importation of outside capital. This outside capital is not just paper money; this outside capital is orders on goods and services from beyond our borders.

In the case of the proposed pipe line the outside capital which we hope will go toward its construction will be orders for pipe of various sizes, heavy construction machinery, and the know-how of citizens of another country. These are things we lack, and we are grateful to be able to procure them for our benefit. If the line were publicly owned we would have to obtain these things with Canadian dollars. Canadian dollars are not orders on goods in another country, and we would have to purchase United States dollars to obtain these goods and services. At this time this would add further inflationary pressures, and if we insisted on carrying on this project without that outside capital the rate of our development would have to be slowed down.

Since the pipe line is vital, the government has indicated that it will be built as a public ownership project if necessary, which is proper; but if it became necessary to accept this proposition it would be with heavy hearts on the part of those who are most anxious for development. However, I have every confidence that it will not become necessary. I want to see United States capital come into our country, and having said that I want to put this idea on the record; that from personal observation I have noticed that not only people immigrate to a country but capital immigrates in the same way. A satisfactory share of the United States capital that has come into our country in the past has become nationalized as Canadian capital, and a satisfactory share of the United States capital that is coming into our country in the oil and gas fields will become Canadian capital. Whatever rewards we as Canadians must pay for the capital that enables us to develop our country, will be paid willingly and I hope with an expression of gratitude to those who are willing to express their confidence in us.

We have done a great deal about our own development but it has not all come about because of our own efforts. We have received assistance from others. However, I am pleased to say that having been assisted we have justified that assistance by continuing our development more and more through our own efforts. In proportion to our gross national product the use of outside capital is diminishing. Our gross national product is rising at a very great rate, and while more and more outside capital is coming into the country the ratio between the two is lower and will continue to diminish.

I should like to leave this thought with the house. All Canadians whom I know are devoting all their spare money to some form of endeavour in this country, and the only way we can do more is by getting additional capital from outside the country. Reference was made to the loan for the construction of the prairie section of the pipe line. We all know that the reason a loan is necessary is that the financial institutions have not been able to grant loans in the ordinary way. But let me ask this question. Who is responsible for that situation? It is the members of this house who bind the banks in their lending and say under what conditions they can lend. We also say under what conditions the insurance companies and other financial institutions can lend money. We do so because these organizations are not always lending their own money but are lending the resources of the Canadian people. If the conditions with which we have bound them are such that they cannot lend for a short term the money that is required to get construction of the line under way this year, who more than the members of this house ought to see to it that the project is not halted because of that fact?

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Calgary South. I thought he gave the house a great deal of assurance that he knows what he is talking about—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He does.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): —and while I was listening to his words I had occasion to look at the Parliamentary Guide and read his biography. I think I need say no more than that to indicate that this hon. member should know something from his point of view with respect to what he is talking about. I shall just refer to a portion of what I find here. The hon. member is indicated to be a publisher and editor and oil operator, the publisher of Nickle Publications Limited, president of the Pump Room Limited, director general of Petroleums of Canada Limited, president of Conick Petroleum Limited, a director of Superior Oils of Canada Limited, a director of Selburn Oil Company Limited, vice president of Anglo-American Oils Limited, and then it continues with other phases of his activities.

Mr. Nickle: I might say all Canadian-controlled or wholly-owned companies.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to say that I consider this proposal before this house to be the sinister brain-child of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is a monstrosity of indiscretion, and in my opinion is a desperate plan by a desperate government to foist upon the Canadian people a private monopoly in the name of political expediency to the glory and edification of private enterprise.

This chosen instrument of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is presumably too weak to do this job. Since 1951, when plans were mooted for the building of a trans-Canada pipe line, this company has repeatedly failed in its undertakings both with this house and with the government. However, under the tutelage of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the government intends to continue to foster and nurture this company wtih Canadian taxpayers' money. It will be bottle-fed to the tune of perhaps $80 million for its first feeding, and in all probability the later diet will be included so it will have approximately $130 million.

I want to say this, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion, by the time this instrument of the government, this brain-child of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, has come into complete control of this utility, it will then begin to flex its muscles and no longer will need the aid of the government. It will then be in a monopoly position to exploit the people, the Canadian consumers of gas in this country, wherever it serves the Canadian public. So I want to discuss this afternoon the viewpoint which I take in connection with this important project, which I think should be a public utility.

I feel that the issue is the one which was pointed out just a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Churchill. The issue is whether this will be a private enterprise or whether it will be a public enterprise. I, together with my colleagues in the C.C.F. party, feel it is essential that this be a public undertaking, so the Canadian consumers of gas will not be fleeced by a monopoly in that field.

As far as I am concerned I am not blaming or casting reflections upon the people of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines or others who perhaps may be interested, on a private basis, in constructing this line. I think it is somewhat unfair to charge those people with having ulterior motives. I think it is up to this government to decide how much private enterprise and how much public enterprise we should have in this country. I think it is up to the elected representatives of this country to decide where private enterprise and where public enterprise fit into the economic plan of this country.

I for one support those who have suggested that here is a program for the transmission of gas from the fields of Alberta through to Winnipeg, as proposed under this plan, which should be under public control.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

The plan is, of course, to extend that pipe line from the vicinity of Winnipeg. While nothing is said at the present time about the 110-mile line from the vicinity of Winnipeg to the Ontario-Manitoba border, I expect that once again this Liberal government will come to this house and ask for more public money to finance this 110 miles of pipe line. In addition, there is no question about it that the Canadian public will be obliged to put up the money, in the initial stages at least, to build the long pipe line through Ontario to Toronto. Hence I say that here is an issue that is of utmost importance to this house and to every Canadian citizen, namely whether or not we should at this time launch upon the proposal put forward by the minister and the government to put in the hands of United States investors the right to control the transmission of gas to the various consuming centres in this country. I say that it is a sell-out of one of the most important natural resources in this country.

I and the members of the C.C.F. party are not alone in our criticism of the government proposal. I have here an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of March 17, 1956. It is entitled "A Canadian Tragedy?" and reads in part as follows:

> Right Hon. C. D. Howe made a spirited defence of the government's pipe-line policy in parliament, but analysis of his arguments reveals them to be self-defeating. It becomes evident that the government is holding stubbornly not to the best of all pipe-line plans, but to the poorest of three alternatives.

Further on it goes on to say this:

> But national policy is apparently as immutable as the Medean law on this point, so Mr. Howe discusses only two alternatives: the government's present plan versus outright public ownership.

Further on again it continues:

> According to Mr. Howe, this plan has "a better chance of working" than public ownership.

It is now speaking of the proposal in the bill before us of building a private transmission line with public funds. The editorial continues:

> But his arguments against public ownership of the whole line are singularly weak.
>
> He says that gas is only one of several competing heat and energy sources, and it would not be in the public interest for the government to subsidize gas transmission and provide unfair competition to coal and oil producers.
> What else is the government proposing now but to subsidize gas transmission? The difference is that its present plan would subsidize (or at least put up money) for the benefit of a private company, whereas public ownership would be subsidization for the benefit of the Canadian public.

I say that is what it should be. If we are going to use public funds on this important matter, then it should be a public enterprise and any subsidization should be for the benefit of the Canadian public.

In addition I have here another clipping taken from the Ottawa Journal of May 11, 1956. It is entitled "Loans to Trans-Canada Makes a Bad Deal Worse" and it goes on to show that this is a bad deal, that the present plan of the government is not in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer but is an enabling measure to help United States promoters of oil and financiers build a pipe line. Hence we have criticism coming from newspapers and from sources usually supporting the Liberal party in connection with their programs.

I want to deal more particularly with the issue of public ownership. We know full well that this party stands for the eradication of the capitalist system of monopoly enterprise as we have seen it in the past. We believe in private ownership, we believe in co-operative ownership, and we believe in public ownership. We feel that in this country there is a proper place for all these types of ownership. In the province of Saskatchewan from which I come we have endeavoured, since 1944, to launch upon a program which would change our provincial economy from what it was at that time—which was 94 per cent dependent upon agriculture—to one which would be diversified. From the very time the people of Saskatchewan saw fit to elect a C.C.F. government in that province we had the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the former leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, now the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) going up and down the province trying to scare away enterprise, trying to indicate that we had a government which was going to take over all the enterprise in the province and which would not allow private enterprise or anything but public ownership within the province.

After the dust had cleared away private enterprise knew full well that there had been a lot of misrepresentation, there had been a lot of lies told and a lot of half truths, with the result that in the past 10 years in the whole province of Saskatchewan we have had over 300 per cent more enterprise than in any previous 10 years. I want to go into some of the progress we have made in the province, because it has a direct bearing on what we are doing here.

Formerly we had in that province an economy under which, as a result of the vagaries of both prices and weather, our people were finding it very difficult to maintain any degree of prosperity. The planning we have done has encouraged private enterprise to come in, but the people of that province were assured that their natural resources would not be stolen from them. We now have private enterprise coming into that province as never before. I take this occasion to bring this matter before the house because I was in the chamber last evening when the Minister of Agriculture, with his usual misrepresentation of the facts, tried to indicate that the province had undertaken programs which had been complete failures and that our whole program was frightening away industry. On page 4058 of Hansard for May 17, 1956, the minister said:

> Well, my hon. friends having tried the application of public ownership and control to making boots, to making blankets, to making a lot of other things, and having cast them all into the discard, have now come back to following exactly the same plan of organization that has been followed in order to set up part, and only part, of this particular pipe line. Therefore, I call their attention to the fact that they themselves have done all the answering that needs to be done; they themselves have given every answer.

On former occasions the Minister of Agriculture has seen fit to go through Hansard and make some corrections. I hope he will make an apology to this house when he comes back and will admit quite frankly that he was too all-inclusive in the statement he made in this chamber last night. In addition, anyone reading what he said or hearing him in this chamber could only come to the conclusion that the program the Saskatchewan C.C.F. government had undertaken had been a failure. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Before launching into that I just want to say there is a difference between what we are proposing to undertake in our province and this proposal. I sat in this house in 1945, after the war, and I saw plants sold that had been built with the taxpayers' money under public ownership. There was Research Enterprises which was sold to a firm at fire sale prices. There was a plant at Welland which was sold to the American Cyanamid people at fire sale prices, a company which had been indicted on three counts under the anti-trust laws of the United States. We saw one fertilizer plant after another sold to private industry so that we had a monopoly in the fertilizer industry of this country. Every program in which there has been any relationship between public and private ownership with which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has had anything to do has been one of selling out the rights of the people of this country to monopoly enterprise. There are a few exceptions; I want to be fair about this.

We have the fertilizer industry of this country now under monopoly control. We have the cement industry of this country under monopoly control, and about 85 per cent of it under the Canada Cement Company. We have a new plant that a company is proposing to construct at Regina.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask my hon. friend a question? When you had the opportunity and you were providing the money for the cement plant, why did you not keep it under government control?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): That is a good question and a fair question. It is because we do not believe in all public control.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): In our province we believe there is a place for private ownership, there is a place for public ownership, and a place for co-operative ownership. If we can help it we are not going to allow monopoly in this country to operate in such a way that the consumer gets skinned. The whole need in our province was for a cement plant from which we could get cement for our Saskatchewan people at fair prices. I can remember when cement was bought for 50 cents a sack, and today you pay $1.50 for it. There should be lots of cement in this country, as the minister knows, but often you are skinned and have to pay $2 or $2.50 a sack for it. It was for that reason we tried to encourage private enterprise in our province. Here, the issue today is one of—

Mr. Mang: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Sit down.

Mr. Mang: Closure.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Go ahead.

Mr. Mang: If the hon. gentleman will permit a question, do I understand from the remarks that have just been made that he repudiates entirely the basic principle upon which the C.C.F. is founded, that is state ownership and state control of the means of production, distribution and exchange, which is the heart of the manifesto?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The heart of the manifesto is that the C.C.F. party will prevent monopolies in this country from exploiting the Canadian people.

Mr. Mang: You repudiate it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I answered your question.

Mr. Mang: You are repudiating it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I am not repudiating anything. We are preventing the exploitation of resources or of any industry by monopoly. The Minister of Trade and Commerce left the impression in this house last night that we had discontinued the program of public ownership in Saskatchewan, and that the industries undertaken by that government had been failures. I want to indicate to the house some of the figures in that respect.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I rise on a point of order. I said nothing about the industries under the control of the Saskatchewan government.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Pardon me; I meant the Minister of Agriculture. As I said earlier, the program undertaken by Saskatchewan has been one of trying to bring about an industrial economic balance in that province. In the early stages of our government in that province in 1945 we did undertake the construction of certain industries under public ownership. We have a number of industries which have been under provincial ownership as crown corporations. I have in my own constituency, Mr. Speaker, a briquette plant which is not publicly-owned. It is a privately-owned plant at the present time. Two of the western provinces along with this federal government put into that plant over a million dollars and then turned it over to private enterprise for $1, another sell-out.

What we have tried to do is illustrated by the case of the brick plant which is in my constituency. We took over that plant and renovated it. We put money into it and put 50 or 60 men to work producing bricks for the people of Saskatchewan. Only about two years ago the issue came up as to whether or not it should be enlarged to meet an expanding market, whether they should continue on the present basis or perhaps discontinue altogether. I am going to tell this house that there was not a person at the meeting which was held in public in the town of Estevan, who when asked what he thought should be done did not think the brick plant should continue to operate as a crown corporation in that area. Today that brick plant, which was defunct under private ownership, is producing bricks and employing men, utilizing the clay and supplying the people of Saskatchewan with brick at fair prices.

Then, of course, we did have our boot and shoe factory. We started a boot and shoe factory perhaps too early, and as far as that is concerned it was a failure. But in the 1930's we had children in the province without shoes; we had hides that were not worth enough to transfer them to the tannery, and we started to make shoes for Saskatchewan people.

Here is another example of private monopoly, in the shoe manufacturing field. The Bata Shoe Company has a monopoly and gets a royalty on every last which goes into the manufacture of shoes. They did in fact prevent us from making that enterprise a success. We are on the march in Saskatchewan today. The industries we have are giving service to our people.

Then we have a woollen mill at Moose Jaw. This woollen mill is now operating under private enterprise, but it means that we have a garment factory in that province. It means that another industry is coming into our province and functioning, which we never had before. The net result is that from 1945 to 1956 the crown corporations in the province of Saskatchewan—I am including all the crown corporations, our power commission and our telephones—have had a total surplus to date of $8,118,000. The total accumulated deficits, including all losses to date, amount to $1,746,000 which leaves over $6 million of profit to the people of Saskatchewn to give our people other services. In addition to that it has employed 3,000 or 4,000 people, with a payroll of over $1 million. These things bring businesses and other enterprises to the province, so the net result of these good undertakings are hard to estimate exactly. The hon. member for Saskatoon says that it is a better record than private enterprise. It is estimated that this year we shall have a net earning in these corporations of over $1 million, which is better than 10 per cent on the investment.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Is he aware that the largest and most successful socialized industry is Saskatchewan is owned by the federal government?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): That is all right. I am speaking now of the particular issue before this house, which is another matter which should be under public ownership and control. I am not arguing that there are not some things today under public ownership and federal control, but I am showing what can be done in a small way in our province, where we have undertaken to equalize and level out our economy so we shall have a balanced economy.

Now then, let us go to oil industry in the province. The Minister of Agriculture had the audacity to get up in this house and, either through ignorance or otherwise, say that he did not think the clay of Saskatchewan was suitable for making cement. I can only come to the conclusion that statements of this sort are trying to hurt our province. The present leader of the Liberals in Saskatchewan, I guess under the tutelage and direction of the present Minister of Agriculture, said this when he spoke to a Toronto businessmen's club:

> We in Saskatchewan have missed the boat. We have not taken advantage of the opportunities for progress in the last 12 years. Investors hesitate to enter Saskatchewan while a C.C.F. government was in power.

What nonsense. I am going to indicate what is taking place in the province. I hold in my hand an article entitled:

> Saskatchewan's southeast oil fields designated "hottest" discovery area.

This is an article by Leslie Orr Rowland, reprinted from "Oil in Canada". He is certainly not a supporter of the C.C.F. I think this gentleman is trying to report the facts of the case. He says:

> Saskatchewan is practically bursting at the seams with crude oil productibility as the prolific southeastern corner has turned in the past 15 months into the hottest oil search and discovery region in the whole of western Canada outside of the Pembina field.

Then again, from the "Oil Era" we get this:

> In writing of oil and gas development in Saskatchewan in the article reprinted on this page, the editor of "Oil In Canada" concludes his appraisal with this bright forecast:
> These reserve figures, for both oil and gas, are the vital clue to the future of Saskatchewan development and further wildcatting. The province is entering an era of rapidly growing stature as a major oil reserve region, with important future implications for general industry as well as the oil industry. The construction of a pipe mill in Regina, to be completed this year at a cost of $3 million or more, is a symptom of this shape of things to come.

So we have people who wish to report the facts, Mr. Speaker, indicating that in our province there can be a program by the government to protect the rights of the citizens of that province; that we can have an economy which will lend itself to public, private and co-operative ownership. In the province of Saskatchewan in connection with oil we have undertaken to promote one of the finest ideas to be evolved in human relationships, and that is the co-operative principle of ownership. We have the federated co-operatives, who are producing oil at the oil fields under a crown contract. The oil is taken to the co-operative refineries at Regina and is sold, of course, to the farm people and other co-operators. So right from the fields to the consumer we have the handling of that very important product. That is the kind of thing we should endeavour to promote in this country, because the people who are the most important factor in connection with any program are given the opportunity of sharing on an equal basis in the exploitation of the natural resources of this country.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Thomas: Saskatchewan co-operatives have three producing wells in the Leduc oil fields.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I think they have. In Saskatchewan in 1944 we gave notice that no private enterprise was going to come to our province and skin the people through the exploitation of the natural resources. On the other hand, people who are good businessmen are now coming in on what can be termed a fair basis, and in our province we have perhaps one of the greatest oil searches and oil booms taking place anywhere in Canada at the present time.

So far as public enterprise is concerned, Mr. Speaker, this is a thing which I believe should be in the interests of all members. I feel that when we allow those natural resources to be exploited, they should not be controlled by any private companies, whether it is a pipe line or anything else. If we do, we are doing a disservice to the Canadian people. It will mean, in the case of the trans-Canada pipe line when it is finished, that we will have no Canada power authority to see how much the gas is going to cost the consumer. Today the board of transport commissioners can only say where the pipe line is to go.

I think it is useless and futile at this time to argue in the house what is to be the price of gas bought by the consumers under the government's proposal. It will be whatever the traffic will bear. It will be the price they are able to exploit from the consumers of gas, and today that is not good enough.

The hon. member for Churchill said he believed that we should welcome American capital into this country. I do, too; but I do not think anyone outside or inside this country owning private capital should be given the resources of this country to build up a monopoly and then skin the public. It reminds me of a story which I think is quite applicable. It is said that a farmer found that his chickens were being killed nightly by the foxes. Some smart fellow said: "Why don't you get a skunk and put it in the chicken coop?" Well, he did, and very shortly he did not need to worry at all because there were no chickens.

That is the sort of thing that is happening to our natural resources. More and more they are being sold down the river to private enterprise. I believe private enterprise has a place in this country. As a farmer I am a private enterpriser, and I believe that small businessmen are also private enterprisers. We do not, however, want monopoly enterprise and that is the thing which is being aided and abetted by the federal government in proposing to give $80 million or 90 per cent of the cost of this western pipe line to this company. Then this company will have to come back to parliament and say, "We will have to have some financing for the leg of the pipe line from Winnipeg to the Ontario-Manitoba border." And we will certainly have to pay the shot for what is sometimes termed the uneconomic leg of the pipe line across northern Ontario. What a sell-out.

This government had already moved closure before debate had taken place. The government say we have to get this through by June 7. After five long years of hesitation and delay it is suddenly necessary to rush this thing through. I believe it is necessary to get the pipe line built as soon as possible, because I appreciate the situation of the Alberta oil producers. They have gas being flared off and wasted. I think the hon. member of the Social Credit party should have joined with the C.C.F. in advocating public ownership of the pipe line as a public utility.

There is no reason why the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with the powers vested in him, could not have obtained pipe for the pipe line. It is a lot of nonsense that this company has control of this pipe. We could get pipe from other places if we were unable to get it from that source. That is a pretty weak and feeble argument.

What we are saying is that if it had the will to do so, this government could do the job under public ownership. However, the government does not want to do this. It prefers to allow a private company to come in and use public funds which will be taken out of the public treasury for the construction of this economic line, something which was not heard of a few months ago. It suddenly popped up in this house just about a week ago at the same time closure was moved by the government, and now we have a deadline on the discussion and we cannot adequately investigate the merits of the case.

The government will not allow this issue to go before a committee of this house. After five years' delay the government say that this must be put through in a week or two. Well, I do not think the government is going to sell that bill of goods to the Canadian people. The government is trying to force its desperate plan upon this house and the Canadian people. This desperate government does not want the company which has been hanging on to its coat tails for five years to be still there when the election is called in 1957. The government wants to get the thing through. It is ready to take a chance, and it hopes that perhaps the public will have forgotten about it by election time. Well, that program must be sweet music to the old party members in this house and also perhaps to my Social Credit friends because what this may become is a pipe line of party funds, election campaign funds. There is no doubt in my mind that after it is built a lot of political party funds will be coming the way of certain political parties in this country.

I remember the Beauharnois scandal. I think it was Mr. Sweezey or someone who made the statement to the committee that the company was always prepared to pay certain moneys to both the old parties. On that occasion I think the Beauharnois corporation paid $200,000 to the Liberal party and a tidy sum to the Conservative party.

We have instances—

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I think the hon. member—

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am nearly finished. The hon. member can rise later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. The hon. member for Royal wishes to speak on a question of privilege.

Mr. Brooks: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said the Beauharnois company paid to the Conservative party certain moneys from their funds. It is well known that moneys were offered to Hon. R. B. Bennett and he refused to accept them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I think it was decided earlier in this debate that this type of correction is in order but at the conclusion of the speech of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say one further word. I think it is dangerous to have too much private ownership and monopoly control. When we consider the recent scandal in connection with the breweries in Manitoba, the investigation reveals that the three parties, Conservative, Liberal and Social Credit, did receive approximately $30,000 of campaign funds. When you have a large corporation such as Trans-Canada is expected to be there is a chance that graft and political skulduggery will occur. In a crown corporation the possibility of this occurring is somewhat reduced.

What is perhaps more important is the fact that if we were to have this set up as a public utility the government could decide on a price that would be fair to all, just as we are doing in our power corporation in the province of Saskatchewan. There are many people in that province who would like to get a cheaper rate if they live in a preferred area. Our government says it is going to treat all the people in the province on a fair and equal basis in connection with that power. We have a plan under which our farm people and the people in our towns and cities get a fair deal. No great corporation is able to say it will give power at cheap rates to the main cities or to the big industrial centres, thus permitting the rural people to suffer or go without facilities. We are building our province for the people of Saskatchewan on the basis of equity. I wish the government would build for all Canada on that basis.

In conclusion I just want to say I am terribly disappointed that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government refused even to consider letting this matter go to a committee, where different people would perhaps be able to put before the government a better proposal than the ill-conceived proposition facing us at this time.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate today with mixed feelings. It is the first time since I have been in parliament that I have seen closure used to bring about a useful debate. If I may do so for just a moment at the beginning, I would like to comment on some of the observations I have made. I feel these were brought about partly by the interesting topic before the house and partly by the rules of the house.

I shall begin by speaking in defence of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle). I would like to read the record of the hon. member, who was referred to by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough). The Canadian Parliamentary Guide outlines the hon. member's record as follows:

> Publisher and editor, oil operator; president, C.O. Nickle Publications Limited; president, The Pump Room Limited; director general, Petroleums of Canada Limited; president, Conick Petroleum Limited; director, Superior Oils of Canada Limited; director, Selburn Oil Company, Limited; vice-president, Anglo-American Oils Limited; director, Calgary Y.M.C.A., 1951-52; N.C.O. 1939-44, lieutenant 1944-48, Calgary Highlanders.

I suggest to the hon. member for Moose Mountain that it is a good thing for this parliament that we have men of that calibre here. The hon. member went on to say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had sold out the rights of his country and that the pipe line is a sinister brain child. I would remind him that some of the boys who were overseas and had the opportunity of using the beautiful Bren guns the minister produced will not think well of him for saying that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would sell us out. The boys who flew the Mosquito planes, those marvellous planes which Canada supplied during the war and which were produced under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Defence Production, will not appreciate the hon. member standing up and calling him a sell-out. Those of us who had the opportunity of going down to Montreal to visit the plant of Canadian Vickers to see that beautiful sub-chaser, a ship which is regarded around the world as one of the most modern pieces of fighting equipment for its size that has been produced by any country, really appreciated what was being done under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Brooks: How did the other nations come to have it?

Mr. Hosking: This man who has done all these things has to sit here in the house and listen to a person who has made very little contribution to this country accuse him of being a sell-out.

Then the government are accused of putting on closure and we have heard all sorts of things said about closure. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked, "What is parliament without debate?" Then he answered, "Sterility." The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in referring to the government, said it does not matter whether you destroy parliament in the process or that parliament be hanged in the process. Those are the terms which have been used in referring to closure.

Those hon. members who were here last Tuesday, and certainly the people who were in the galleries or who wanted to get in but could not, heard one of the best debates that has taken place in the house. This vehicle of closure has contributed more to the behaviour of parliament in the last few days than anything I can remember since I have been a member. I want to point out a few other things that happened last Tuesday.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seemed to be interested in seeing that the staff got off at one o'clock and that they got paid for their work; and we then proceeded to sit here from one o'clock until four o'clock.

An hon. Member: Five.

Mr. Hosking: We saw obstruction in every shape and form, and the poor staff had to stay on. I just wonder whether there was any sincerity in the concern as to their welfare.

An hon. Member: Lip service.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not take any objection to the arguments or any adjectives the hon. member may wish to use but I do not think Your Honour should let an hon. member question the sincerity of another member of the house.

[Mr. Hosking.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is not without merit. In the heat of debate there are quite often many accusations and a great deal of criticism, but I think it is pretty well understood that an accusation of insincerity is not regarded as parliamentary. I was listening carefully to the hon. member and I do not think he made the accusation of insincerity. He expressed doubt. I do not think it was the intention of the hon. member for Wellington South to go beyond the rules of the house and I have no doubt that he will take occasion now to make that clear.

Mr. Hosking: I was merely pointing out how careful the hon. member for Winnipeg South was in looking after the welfare of the staff, and then how his actions in frustrating and applying all the rules he possibly could—

Mr. Knowles: If the hon. member is going to criticize me he should at least use the right name for my constituency.

Mr. Hosking: I am sorry; Winnipeg North Centre. Then when the Deputy Speaker was in the chair the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said that he would not withdraw a statement. That was quite within his rights, but if there is anything that preserves parliament it is that members obey the rules of the house. When the Leader of the Opposition stands up and defies the Speaker he does more to destroy parliament—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I intervene at this moment with considerable hesitation and unsupported by citations or authorities, but I express the opinion that it is not in order on a debate on this motion to discuss in detail decided points of order which were raised previously in the debate. I may be wrong, but I do not think I am.

It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston) moved the second reading of Bill No 300, respecting Ogdensburg bridge authority.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, may I point out that this bill was received only this afternoon. It may be that there will be no opposition to the bill, but I suggest to the sponsor that it be allowed to stand until we have had the opportunity to look at it.

Mr. Henderson: The bill is quite short, as it incorporates only small amendments to the bill introduced in 1952. On behalf of the principals I would appreciate if it could be considered tonight, providing there is no objection by my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the sponsor could make his statement and then the debate could be adjourned so we would have an opportunity to study it.

Mr. Henderson: This bill will be sent to a committee where it can be considered. There are only three minor sections.

Mr. Green: I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the house will permit me for a moment, the bill being on the order paper I could not order it to stand as a point of order, but of course the Chair will be glad to accept whatever arrangement the parties come to. I rose at this time to ask whether the hon. member for Kingston had concluded his statement or whether he was merely asking permission of the opposition to continue, because if he had not concluded his statement he should be permitted to do so before adjournment of the debate is moved.

Mr. Henderson: I had not concluded my statement. I only rose to support having the bill before the house now, and I would appreciate the opportunity to make a statement so that hon. members will fully appreciate the purposes of the bill.

This company, the Ogdensburg bridge authority, was incorporated by a special act of the parliament of Canada in 1952 for the purpose of building a bridge from Prescott, Ontario, to Ogdensburg, New York. At the time the act was introduced the best estimate of the cost of the bridge was in the neighbourhood of $10 million to $12 million. As a result of this estimate which, of course, was necessarily based on incomplete information, the right of the company to issue debentures was limited to $10 million under section 16 and $12 million under sections 12 and 17.

Since the company was incorporated plans for the construction of the bridge have been prepared and more complete engineering data have been obtained, with the result that it now appears that the cost of the bridge will be at least $15 million. I might mention the fact that the legislature of the state of New York has just approved a bill authorizing the sum of $15 million to be lent to the company to be secured by debentures and to be used in the construction of this particular bridge. In an abundance of caution, and to ensure that the principals will not have to return to parliament for a further amendment after the commencement of construction, this bill has been brought before the house amending the three sections of the original act referred to above in order to provide for the issue of $20 million in debentures. The wording of the sections remains precisely the same except that the amount of debentures is increased to $20 million.

I might say that the company's act of incorporation provides that when the cost of building the bridge has been retired, that portion of the bridge over Canadian soil shall revert to the public authorities of Canada and that portion in the United States of America shall revert to the public authorities of the United States. In other words this is not an undertaking for the financial gain of private individuals.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, as I said a few moments ago, we have not had an opportunity to study this bill which has come to us from the other place, and I am hoping that the sponsor will have no objection to the adjournment of the debate until next Tuesday so we can look into the bill. It does bring up the question of just how the proposed bridge will affect the St. Lawrence seaway and where the St. Lawrence seaway authority fits into the picture. I am presuming that everything is all right and that the bill deserves support, but I would move that the debate be adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Green the debate was adjourned.

GRAND FALLS CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 301 (letter Y-9 of the Senate), intituled: "An act to incorporate Grand Falls Central Railway Company Limited".—Mr. Ashbourne.

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that copies of this bill have not yet been received from the printer and thus have not been made available to hon. members, I suggest that the bill stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

LA CORPORATION DU PONT DE TROIS-RIVIERES

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 302 (letter Z-9 of the Senate), intituled: "An act respecting the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence river near the city of Trois-Rivieres".—Mr. Boisvert.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I understand that copies of the bill have not been distributed yet but I should like to have the same privilege as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and, after making a few remarks, move the adjournment of the debate on the bill until next week. If I am permitted to do so, I should like to present the explanation this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Boisvert moved the second reading of Bill No. 302, respecting the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence river near the city of Trois-Rivieres.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to obtain authority to build a bridge over the St. Lawrence river between two points, one on the north shore above Three Rivers and the other on the south shore below Nicolet. As the bill concerns my riding, which is 100 per cent French in origin, I intend to give my explanation in French, which before this house has equal standing with the English language, the learning of which I enjoyed very much.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the bill now before the house, I should like to give a bit of history.

The proposed bridge will serve two very important districts, that of Three Rivers and that of Nicolet.

Historically speaking, the city of Three Rivers is one of the oldest in Canada. It was the second one to be founded after Quebec. Originally it was a fur trading post. That trade led two men from Three Rivers, following their expeditions into the far north and into the Hudson bay area, to go to London and set up, with British capital, even under the French regime, the Hudson's Bay Company which contributed to the development of the far north and the Canadian northwest.

Later, Three Rivers was the site of the first iron working industry, under the French regime. Everyone has heard of the Three Rivers ironworks. As everyone knows, iron developments in the province of Quebec are getting more and more important; it was at Three Rivers that a powerful ironworks industry was born and its memory is perpetuated by one of the Canadian Iron Foundry plants.

Later on, the city of Three Rivers became a railway centre and one of the main pulp wood centres of Canada. Today, its mills are among the largest and most important in the country.

Around Three Rivers, such cities as Cap-de-la-Madeleine, Grand-Mère, Shawinigan and La Tuque, have developed, and all are located in central Quebec.

Now, on crossing the river to the south shore, we find the county of Nicolet, which also dates back to the early days of colonization; it has always been a wholly agricultural district. However, at one time there was a little seaport there known as Port St. François, operated by a company located at Sherbrooke, with an office in London. For many years, immigrants from England landed at Port St. François. This sea port has now disappeared following the construction of highways and of a railway line.

On the south shore, the district serves and will continue to serve Victoriaville, Thetford Mines, Richmond, Sherbrooke, Drummondville, St. Hyacinthe and Sorel. Therefore, we readily see the importance of connecting the two shores of the St. Lawrence river at the points I indicated a few moments ago in English, that is one on the north shore a little above the city of Three Rivers and the other on the south side, some ten miles below the town of Nicolet.

We hope, for the county of Nicolet, that the Imperial Oil Company, which for many years has made explorations for gas and oil, will eventually make borings to a greater depth and find such research profitable.

We also look forward to the day when the little port of St. Francois, which has played an important part in the historical development of our province, will be able to resume its former activities. The channel on the St. Lawrence river is but a few hundred feet from the bank and there is there a site ideally located for the establishment of a sea port.

The construction of that bridge is urgently needed. In fact, last year, almost a million pedestrians and 400,000 vehicles had to take the ferry boats, in the middle of the summer and in extremely difficult conditions, to cross the river.

When this bridge is built, it will connect the eastern townships, the county of Nicolet and the city of Three Rivers with the American boundary, which is only 120 miles away from this town, apart from the fact that construction of a highway between the important harbour of Portland, on the coast of Maine, and Three Rivers, will make this a shortcut from the United States to the heart of Quebec.

The bridge is to be built by a private company. It will be 5,000 feet long and will cost almost 15 million dollars. It will be a toll-bridge, but experts who have studied the project are in no way worried about the future of this bridge, and claim that even now they are sure to obtain the required building capital. The structure is a necessity for the local farmers whom I represent, and also for the development of the city of Three Rivers. Sixty per cent of the food products brought into Three Rivers come from the county of Nicolet-Yamaska and, thanks to this bridge, farmers will certainly benefit considerably.

Hon. members know that it is generally not possible to build a bridge in a province. Within a province, bridges, like highways and railways, are recognized to be under provincial jurisdiction. When a bridge is to be built on the St. Lawrence river, under chapter 140 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, no permit may be awarded unless an act is passed by parliament, authorizing the construction of this bridge over the navigable waters of the St. Lawrence. This bill aims at obtaining this permit. According to plans already prepared, the arches of the bridge will have to be high enough not to impede navigation, and plans thereof must be approved by the governor in council.

We are confident that, if this legislation is passed, the Three Rivers and Nicolet area will be provided with a highly modern bridge that will facilitate the heavy traffic which, especially in the summer months, goes through that area which is at the very heart of Quebec and, in addition, is one of the finest of the province.

Three Rivers is half way between Montreal and Quebec city on the north shore, while Nicolet is half way between Montreal and Quebec city on the south shore.

The Three Rivers harbour is increasingly important. It ranks fifth for the volume of shipping and the bridge will only serve to increase its traffic. In my opinion, the reasons I have given in the course of my explanation—I could give a thousand more if it were necessary—warrant the passing of the bill now before the house.

(Text):

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is the intention here, as in the two previous cases, to adjourn the debate. May I move its adjournment?

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell the debate was adjourned.

DIVORCE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: There are several divorce bills on the order paper. Shall they all be considered in the one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, there are 36 divorce bills. I have some comments to make on 12 of them. I shall either make my comments now or as you call the bills individually, whatever is the pleasure of Your Honour and of the house. My remarks will be fairly short, but I am anxious to oblige you.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be good enough to indicate the number of the first bill to which he wishes to address some remarks?

Mr. Nicholson: Bill No. 308 is the first one, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Then let us deal with the second reading of Bills Nos. 303, 304, 305, 306 and 307.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 303, for the relief of Dorothy Nesbitt Ward Pratt.—Mr. Henderson.

Bill No. 304, for the relief of Nichita Tomescu.—Mr. Henderson.

Bill No. 305, for the relief of Lilly Katoffsky Schwartz.—Mr. Henderson.

Bill No. 306, for the relief of Rita Beryl Gwendolyn Scott Darlington.—Mr. Henderson.

Bill No. 307, for the relief of Dorothy Christie Bradley Cunniam.—Mr. Henderson.

SAMUEL MARKS STIRLING

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston) moved the second reading of Bill No. 308, for the relief of Samuel Marks Stirling.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, now that Newfoundland is a province of Canada we have some additional problems which are brought to our attention. This divorce case is one that involves a petitioner who resides in the city of Montreal but the respondent lives in Corner Brook, Newfoundland. The evidence in this case indicates that one of the detectives who appears frequently in connection with these cases apparently had an interesting trip to Newfoundland. The divorce was granted on the evidence given by this detective who works for an agency known as the Reliable Detective Agency. He features here quite frequently. He made certain discoveries.

However, it is a little difficult to understand why the father of five children—the father lives in the city of Montreal while the children are in Newfoundland—is not more concerned about the welfare of his five children. If the information given by the detective is correct, it would appear to me that the father should have been quite concerned about leaving these five children in that sort of environment.

I do not wish to impose upon the house but I did not want this bill to pass without mentioning the fact that one party lives in Montreal and the other in Newfoundland, and that this fact poses some new problems for us.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

SHIRLEY ANN JOSS LE BOEUF

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston) moved the second reading of Bill No. 311, for the relief of Shirley Ann Joss Le Boeuf.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, Bills 311, 312, 313 and 314 are of a similar nature and if it would accommodate the house I would be glad to make all my remarks on these four at this time. I think it would probably save a few minutes. All the bills I have mentioned are going through by a new streamlined process that is interesting.

In this case before us it would seem unnecessary to engage detectives. Those who read the evidence find that the two housewives who came there really gave as satisfactory evidence as the detectives who sometimes get their stories twisted. Here the respondent also came. It now appears to be quite a simple matter, if both parties are agreed that the divorce should be granted, and if both will come and tell the truth and indicate that there is no collusion but that they are not living together and they do not forgive one another. If it is impossible to repair the damage, then the divorce can be granted.

The chairman of the committee, His Honour Senator Roebuck, thought to begin with that the petition was inadequate. He said it was utterly unfair to the respondent because it did not tell him when he was accused of the offence, nor how, nor where, nor anything else. Under the circumstances, when the respondent was there to establish the fact that everything that was charged was true, there was not much argument.

In so far as Bill No. 312 is concerned, the co-respondent appeared and the respondent also appeared. The respondent indicated that he just got tired of living with the woman he had undertaken to support for better or for worse, and then he started living with another woman. By the time the case was heard apparently two children were born. The mother of the two children appeared and admitted that she was the mother and the respondent was the father. They were living happily together, and apparently if this divorce is approved it will be possible for the respondent and the mother of these two children to become married.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Bill No. 313 is also concerned with a similar case in which there were not any hired detectives. The respondent appeared in person. There has been a good deal of travelling involved in connection with this particular case, but it would appear as if the respondent got tired of living with his wife and started living with someone else.

The same is true with respect to Bill No. 314. There were no paid detectives in that case. In connection with Bill No. 317, His Honour Senator Gershaw tried to find out what seemed to have been the trouble in this particular case. Here you had both the petitioner and the respondent appearing and judging by the evidence they were both quite intelligent, bright young people. His Honour Senator Gershaw asked:

> Q. Tell me something more. You are young, your wife is young. Why could you not get along together? What was the trouble between you?
> A. I cannot continue to live with her after what she did to me.
> Q. But that was before. How did you get along together from 1952 to June 1954, were you quarrelling?
> A. We were quarrelling because I knew about—

Mr. So and So. Bill No. 322 is another case in which there was no paid detective. Bill No. 327 is concerned with a rather unusual case. Again, the petitioner did not appear. The petitioner is living in Sweden. This couple apparently were married in England and the respondent is living with another woman and has been living with this other woman for some time. Last year he travelled to Sweden to see the petitioner in this particular case. It does not come out in the evidence what the discussion was all about, but she has proceeded to petition the Senate and the House of Commons to grant a divorce. The respondent very obligingly came along and his lady friend also came along, and she established the fact that she had been living with the respondent. I would gather that when this divorce is granted they too will be married and I hope they will be able to live happily, more happily than this man lived with his first wife.

Similar comments might be made on Bills 334 and 337. In summing up, I think there is a trend away from the hired detectives, which is to be commended. I think there would be people who could find some of their neighbours who are familiar with the problem to come here and tell a straight story so we would get away from the fabrication of evidence which was so apparent in many of the cases which previously came to us.

I am not asking for a recorded vote on any of these bills, but I think we should pause here to commend the new trend where the evidence is provided by the correspondent.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND HOURS OF POLLING

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 205, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (hours of polling).—Mr. Noseworthy.

Mr. Knowles: I ask unanimous consent of the house to have my name substituted for that of the original sponsor of this bill so that I may move the second reading today.

Mr. Speaker: By leave Mr. Knowles moves, seconded by Mr. Nicholson, that his name be substituted for that of Mr. Noseworthy as sponsor of this bill. Is the motion agreed to?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 205, to amend the Canada Elections Act (hours of polling).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the house for agreeing to the substitution of my name as the sponsor of this bill which was introduced and given first reading on Monday, March 19, by our late friend and colleague, Mr. J. W. Noseworthy. As hon. members will realize, the bill seeks to make a very simple change in the Canada Elections Act, but we feel it is one of those changes that are desirable. The proposal is simply that with respect to by-elections that happen to be called during the period of the year when daylight saving time is not in effect the polls should not close until seven o'clock in the evening.

The situation with regard to general elections seems to have taken care of itself so far as the problem raised by this bill is concerned. The reason I say that situation seems to have taken care of itself arises from the fact that six out of the last seven general elections in Canada have been held during the period when daylight saving time is normally in effect. There are in the papers once again today rumours about the next election.

As a matter of fact, rumours of that kind are quite common around here, and I think it is to be noted that everyone seems to expect the election to be held next year, and everyone expects that it will take place during the time of year when daylight saving time is in effect. In fact the general expectation now seems to be that it will take place on June 17, 1957.

However, may I point out what happens so far as general elections are concerned with respect to employees who are at work and have to take advantage of section 47 of the Canada Elections Act regarding time off for voting. Section 47 makes a slightly different provision than was in effect for quite a number of years. As hon. members will recall, the elections act used to provide that every employee had to be given two hours off on election day for purposes of voting. Many difficulties arose, difficulties of interpretation, as to what was meant by that two-hour clause. That ambiguity and uncertainty were cleared up to some extent when the provision was changed to read as it now does that every employee must have three clear hours during the time the polls are open in which he can vote.

It is clear from the provisions of section 47 now that if an employee has three consecutive hours of his own time during the period that the polls are open he does not get any time off work; but if he does not have three clear consecutive hours his employer has to give him whatever time is necessary so the total time he will be off while the polls are open adds up to three hours. Thus, if the polls close at six o'clock and an employee would normally get off work at five o'clock it is considered that he has one hour of his own time. The employer has to give him another two hours. If there are cases where the employee is at work during the whole of the period that the polls are open, of course he has to be given three consecutive hours by his employer. Any such time off has to be given without loss of pay.

Now, with general elections taking place during the period of the year when daylight saving time is in effect in most parts of Canada, the pattern is reasonably satisfactory. There are always complaints about these matters, but I think it is correct to say that the pattern is reasonably satisfactory in that during the period when daylight saving time is in effect the election is still run on standard time. Therefore the requirement that the polls close at six o'clock standard time turns out to be seven o'clock daylight saving time. Accordingly, that means that for most employees it is simply a matter of being let off, under the provisions of section 47, at four o'clock.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Now, there are a great many factories, shops and stores where five o'clock, or 4.30 o'clock, is the normal closing time. Perhaps five o'clock is more general than 4.30 o'clock but, at any rate, in the cases of shops and stores where the normal closing time is five o'clock all the employer has to do is let his employees go at four o'clock so those employees have the three clear hours between four o'clock and seven o'clock.

I suppose that in reciting this picture I am conscious of the fact that that is what obtains to a very large extent in my own constituency, indeed in the city of Winnipeg as a whole. For example, the railway shops which employ a large number of workers in the city of Winnipeg have accepted it now as pretty routine practice that on election day the shops close at four o'clock so that employees get the three full hours to which they are entitled by virtue of section 47 of the Canada Elections Act. Actually, the employer is giving his employees only a half hour or an hour, depending upon what time the particular shop is normally closed down; but at any rate, that pattern seems to have established itself and is reasonably satisfactory so far as general elections are concerned because of the fact that they usually take place when daylight saving time is in effect.

However, Mr. Speaker, when a by-election is called, particularly when a by-election is held during the winter season, during the period of the year when daylight saving time is not in effect, actually two problems arise. In the first place, since standard time is in effect it means that the polls do close at six o'clock instead of at seven o'clock. That means that if an employer is going to let his employees off in time to get the full three hours he has to let them off at three o'clock in order to meet the requirements of section 47.

Well, employers do not go around looking for ways to let employees off even for the exercise of the franchise; but it becomes a particular problem in by-elections, particularly when they take place in an urban area, because working in a plant or in a factory will be a few employees who live in the constituency where the by-election is held, whereas the majority of the employees probably live in other constituencies in that same area, and in those other constituencies a by-election is not being held. That applies particularly when a by-election is held in an urban area like Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg or Vancouver. As a result of that situation employees are a little reluctant to ask for time off when they know their fellow employees cannot make the same request, and employers put up a certain amount of resistance to it as well.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this problem could easily be solved if a provision such as is proposed in Bill No. 205 were written into the Canada Elections Act. The proposal is simply that during the period when daylight saving time is not in effect, in the case of a by-election, the polls should remain open until seven o'clock in the evening. If that were done then we would have the same situation that applies in most general elections. Section 47 could be met by letting employees off at four o'clock rather than having to let them off at three o'clock in the afternoon. To be sure, the employees would rather be off at three o'clock than at four o'clock, but the fact is that in by-elections they do not get off at all in many instances. Reluctance and resistance go together, and the result is that the rights granted under section 47 of the Canada Elections Act are not enjoyed by those voting in a by-election.

It might be argued by anyone who sought to oppose this bill that provisions such as these should be made to apply to general elections as well as by-elections. I would say, Mr. Speaker, if it were at all the rule for general elections to be held in the winter months the change should perhaps be made to apply to general elections as well as by-elections, but as I have already pointed out six out of the last seven general elections in this country have been held during the months when daylight saving time was in effect and the chances are the same will be the case for the next election year.

It might also be contended that in making special provision for a by-election one is paying too much attention to the exceptions rather than the rule, since after all the act is for general elections rather than by-elections. In answer to that I would point out that the Canada Elections Act already contains a number of special provisions that apply to by-elections but do not apply to general elections. One or two occur to me immediately. First of all, the period of time during which the enumerating takes place is two weeks shorter in the case of a by-election than it is in the case of a general election. Indeed, there are even some other provisions with regard to the lists of electors that apply to by-elections which are different from those which apply in the case of a general election.

There is also a special provision in the section of the act as to what would happen if the Monday chosen for an election turned out to be a holiday. In the case of a general election that holiday would have to be a national holiday before the result would be the putting off of the election until Tuesday, but in the case of a by-election regard is had as to whether the holiday is national or provincial in character.

I need not go into any further detail on that. I just mention those one or two things to point out that the act already contains a number of provisions that are exclusively for by-elections as distinct from general elections. Indeed, the definition section defines general election and it defines by-election, and there are differences running through the act. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is not only a simple request but it is a very justifiable one. The suggestion that a change like this be made, as a matter of fact, has come out of the experience of certain by-elections that were held recently, when a number of employees found they could not get to the polls by six o'clock for the very reason I have given; namely, that it was difficult to get sufficient time off. In fact there were many people, so I am told, in one recent by-election who did not get to the polls because they had become accustomed to the idea of federal elections closing for all practical purposes at seven o'clock because of the fact that general elections are usually held when daylight saving time is in effect.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is an extremely reasonable and sensible suggestion to put forward, and I hope it will be given consideration by the house. I remind hon. members again that when we are dealing with the Canada Elections Act we are dealing with something that is in a particular way not the property of the government nor even the property of parliament. In a particular way it is the property of the people of Canada. It seems to me that on as sensible and rational a basis as we can, we should make it an act that will make possible the fullest exercise of the franchise not only at general elections but at by-elections as well.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have pleasure in commending the provisions of Bill No. 205 to the house.

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in introducing this measure on behalf of the late Joseph Noseworthy, who was the original sponsor of this bill. I think I may take advantage of this opportunity to again express sincere sympathy on behalf of us all. When we heard during the last Easter recess of the death of the late Joseph Noseworthy a sense of great loss was felt by every hon. member of this house.

The fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has accepted the sponsorship of this bill is a further demonstration of his interest in the Canada Elections Act, because the hon. member already has on the order paper another bill which also provides suggested amendments to this act.

I must say first of all that I am in agreement with what the hon. member said at the conclusion of his remarks, namely that the Canada Elections Act is not the property of the government. It is a matter which belongs not only to parliament itself but to every hon. member of this house. For this reason I would think an amendment such as the one which is now being proposed, even if it is very simple, should first of all receive the attention of the members of the house in committee when the time comes for the committee on privileges and elections to meet and study the revision of the act. On the other hand, and I do not think I am mistaken in saying this, the subject matter of this amendment has never been discussed by the members of the committee on privileges and elections to my knowledge. Possibly it has not been discussed because it does not appear, to me at least, to be a necessary remedy.

Under the act as it now stands there is a very clear provision which applies both to general elections and by-elections. In section 47 to which my hon. friend referred are to be found both the obligation and the right of the employer and the employee. The section provides that three consecutive hours will be made available by the employer to the employee in order to exercise his right to vote. These hours must be consecutive. This applies to both general elections and by-elections. The section also provides that:

> . . . no employer shall make any deduction from the pay of any such employee nor impose upon or exact from him any penalty by reason of absence from his work during such consecutive hours.

In subsection 3 of section 47 is provided a penalty for the employer who does not allow the employee the benefit of three consecutive hours in which to exercise his right to vote.

I am afraid I did not understand very clearly the distinction the hon. member attempted to make between a general election and a by-election. It seems to me the fact that general elections have been held in the last four or five instances during that period of the year when daylight saving time is in effect is not a reason for making a distinction between the two. In other words the voter has as much right to vote in a by-election as he has in a general election, and the employer must carry out his duty in both cases.

To say that in urban districts it may be difficult in some cases for the employer to make these hours available to the employees to me is not enough to justify the amendment of the act to cover by-elections only. Surely the time elapsing between nomination day and polling day, a period of 14 days, should be sufficient for the employer and employee to discuss arrangements so the employee may be allowed time off as provided by the act in which to exercise his right to vote. A by-election in itself creates interest, and that should be enough to make the employer aware that among his employees there are one, two or possibly a greater number who have the right to vote and who should have time off. Arrangements can be made so the employee will have the benefit of the three consecutive hours provided by the act.

It is the duty of the employee who wants to vote to see to it that he is given the necessary time in which to exercise his right to vote. I do not think my hon. friend will contradict me on that. If the employee does not make the necessary arrangements with his employer, if he does not want to take advantage of the fact that he is entitled to three hours and that the employer must make those hours available to him, I do not think he will exercise his right to vote simply because the act is amended to give him an additional hour on polling day.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): What about the situation where 25 per cent of the employees in a certain plant are entitled to vote in a by-election and the remaining 75 per cent are not? The act is quite clear that the 25 per cent must be given the right to vote, but is it not so that the 75 per cent would have no protection under the act? The employer might decide that as 25 per cent of his employees were going to be away for part of the day he might just as well close down his plant, and the 75 per cent of the employees would lose a certain amount of pay and would have no recourse under the act.

Mr. Pinard: My hon. friend has given an example. In a general election 100 per cent of the employees would most likely have the right to vote and the employer must make it possible for them to vote on polling day. Under such conditions he makes arrangements so there will not be too great a disruption in his operations. He arranges for his employees to go and vote without disrupting the whole operation.

To my mind the extending of the period by one hour in the case of by-elections will not create any more interest on the part of the employer or employee. If the employee is not convinced that he should exercise his right to vote, I do not think that giving him another hour on polling day will change his mind.

Mr. Barnett: That may be quite true, but would the minister not agree that if an employee knew that by exercising his right to vote his pal Jim or Bill might lose three hour's time he might decide not to vote?

Mr. Pinard: I do not think that consideration is strong enough to warrant an amendment of the elections act. In any event I submit that this should be submitted to study by members of parliament in a committee. When the committee sat last year on the revision of the act it would have been an excellent time to have brought up this matter. I do not say that I am absolutely opposed to the amendment, but I submit there should be no distinction made between a general election and a by-election.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister not realize that that is precisely where there may be a distinction? We want the polls to close at seven o'clock in by-elections just as they do in general elections. The effect of the law is to make a distinction. When by-elections are held in the wintertime the polls close at six o'clock, but in the case of general elections they usually close at seven o'clock.

Mr. Pinard: My hon. friend is basing his statement on the assumption that general elections will always be held when daylight saving time is in operation, but a general election might be held in the wintertime and then we would have amended the act to cover by-elections only and would find ourselves faced with the situation where in a general election you would have the same inconvenience, if the inconvenience exists. In other words, I submit that both general elections and by-elections should be covered. However, I do not say that should be done, because I feel that it would not create any interest for an employee who had decided not to vote by merely extending the time for voting by one hour.

On motion of Mr. Pinard the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday we shall continue with the pipe-line discussion and any other second readings we may have time for.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 21, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

TRIBUTE ON OCCASION OF CELEBRATION OF BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, today Canadians in every part of this land are celebrating officially the birthday of our gracious sovereign, Queen Elizabeth.

As members of this house we will, as in other years, be demonstrating our devotion to Her Majesty by carrying out our duties as the representatives of Her Majesty's Canadian subjects and giving our attention to the public business of the nation.

However, before proceeding to the business of the day, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and I would like to suggest, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, that we all stand and sing together the first verse of "God Save the Queen".

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang

God Save the Queen

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PIPE LINES—NOTICE OF MOTION THAT DEBATE BE NOT FURTHER ADJOURNED

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice, pursuant to standing order 33, that at the next sitting of the house, immediately before the order of the day is called for resuming the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and on any amendments thereto, I will move that the said debate shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. Fleming: Shame.

Mr. Drew: The gag again.

Mr. Fleming: Why don't you do away with parliament entirely?

Mr. Knowles: What a way to honour the Queen!

MOTION FOR PAPERS

LOW LEVEL BRIDGE, BURLINGTON, ONT.

Motion No. 80—Mr. Lennard:

For a copy of the original agreement with the province of Ontario or other authorities regarding the maintenance of a low level vehicle and pedestrian bridge over the Burlington channel.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): To my knowledge, there was no written agreement. The only undertakings were oral, as set forth in the correspondence tabled in the house and as indicated in Votes and Proceedings for Thursday, May 17.

Mr. Lennard: No, Mr. Speaker, I have reference to the original agreement, which might have been 60 or 70 years ago. I refer to the original agreement relating to the original bridge that was built over the Burlington channel.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES INVESTMENT IN CANADA—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Has the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs been drawn to the report of a speech by the Earl of Home, the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, regarding United States investments in Canada and would he not consider, in view of the circumstances now existing in Canada, this to be an intrusion into Canadian domestic discussions?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my attention has been drawn to the statement in question. It was made, not as part of a speech but as an answer to a question at a press conference. I think my hon. friend attaches too serious an importance to the statement in question.

INQUIRY AS TO SALE OF FIGHTER AIRCRAFT TO COLOMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister the following question. Has the government given consideration to and approval of the sale of six super jet fighter aircraft to the republic of Colombia?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yes. When I saw the short note in the newspapers I anticipated that there might be a question about it and I obtained the precise information. An application was received from the Canadair Company for the export of six F-86 aircraft and spare or maintenance parts to Colombia as part of an arrangement which the company was making with that country for supplying and servicing such military aircraft.

This application was examined very carefully in the light of the situation in the area and in the light of the policies of other countries toward the export of this type of aircraft to South America. It was considered by cabinet and approved on March 22, 1956. Export permits were then issued covering six F-86 aircraft at a value of $2,086,540, and parts valued at $1,095,620.

VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT OF INDONESIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister give us any information with respect to the visit to this country of the president of Indonesia which has been referred to recently in the press? I should like to know when he is coming, what parts of Canada he will visit and so on.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the president of Indonesia will be visiting Canada, I think next week, where I know he will be most warmly welcomed. A program is being prepared covering his visit to this country which will be made public within a day or two.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF NEW SUCCESSION DUTIES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Finance if it is the intention of the government to introduce a new succession duties act at this session?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I am hopeful that we can introduce a new succession duties act, but it would depend on the length of the session whether we can pass it at this time.

[Mr. Churchill.]

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

DATE OF COMPLETION—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Was there an agreement between the United States and Canada as to a definite date for the completion of the seaway? My question is based on an article in the London Free Press to the effect that the United States would not complete the Detroit channel until June, 1962.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know of no agreement between the United States and Canada setting a definite date for the completion of the seaway. I did not quite catch the second part of the hon. gentleman's question. If he would repeat it, perhaps I could deal with it.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): My question was based on an article in the London Free Press stating that the United States would not complete their part of the Detroit river channel until June, 1962.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, the answer is that the Detroit river channel does not form part of the works being undertaken as the seaway project.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO EXPORTS OF WHEAT AND FLOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce give an explanation to the house of the situation regarding Canada's exports of wheat and flour for the first eight months of the present crop year in view of statistics which indicate that Canada's exports are the lowest in a five-year period and that our share of the world's markets continues to decline?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the explanation is that our sales for the first 3½ months of this crop year were at a very low level indeed. I made a statement in western Canada indicating that confidence in North American prices had been destroyed and that buyers were holding off their purchases. Along about the middle of November buying commenced and sales at this time are considerably ahead of sales at this time last year. Shipments picked up during the winter months. We had a record movement from the maritime ports and very close to a record movement from Pacific ports in that period. But, as hon. members know, Canada is not well equipped to move export grain when the St. Lawrence and Hudson bay are closed. All we can do is work to the capacity of our winter ports. I am told that there are boats now waiting for berths on both coasts, and I look for very heavy shipments from our ports during the remainder of this crop year. I can assure my hon. friend that over-all clearances of wheat from Canada during this crop year will be greatly in excess of the record of the past two years.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SCHNEIDER—REFERENCE TO CARTOON IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF MAY 18

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. C. Schneider (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, rising on a question of privilege I wish to register a protest against this cartoon in the Globe and Mail of Friday, May 18, which depicts our beloved peace tower as a guillotine with biased knife falling toward the war memorial chamber with its revered book of remembrance.

Quoting from Canada's national capital series book, we read:

> Here, embodied in stone, is the spirit of the Canadian people. Here Canadians may pay tribute to the service, sacrifice and achievements of their countrymen of the first great war.

The peace tower is a national shrine.

My question of privilege is this: Is nothing sacred to cartoonist Reidford in expressing his dislike of everything pertaining to this duly elected government of Canada?

This cartoon is a sacrilege, and I quote from the table dictionary:

> Sacrilege. Robbery or profanation of sacred building, outrage on consecrated person or thing, violation of what is sacred.

I protest this cartoon, which is not only in very bad taste, but it will also defeat efforts such as the Rotary adventure in citizenship which promotes respect and reverence in our children for the national capital and particularly our beloved peace tower.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it might have been well if the hon. member who has just spoken had added: "Is nothing sacred for this government?"

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RECENT AIR ACCIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Has the parliamentary assistant any statement to make to the house concerning the two regrettable air accidents over the week end in which the R.C.A.F. was involved?

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I have no statement, Mr. Speaker.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY INTO FISHERMEN'S UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice in the absence of his colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg).

Has the attention of the minister been drawn by his colleague to some correspondence which he received from the united fishermen and allied workers' union of British Columbia in connection with the launching of the inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act which affects that union organization? If so, could he give the house a statement on the matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend did not give me notice of his question, but like the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) I anticipated that this type of question might be asked and I accordingly made inquiries and would reply as follows.

The general rule is that no information is given out as to whether or not an inquiry is being pursued in a particular industry unless and until a report is made to the minister by the restrictive trade practices commission and duly published. In this particular case, the parties themselves appear to have made public the fact that there is an inquiry and, in any event, it has been made public by the fact that some of the parties have sought an injunction in the supreme court of British Columbia to restrain the inquiry upon the ground that section 4 of the Combines Investigation Act applies and have sought a declaration that it does apply. Section 4 provides that:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

If on the facts of this matter section 4 does apply, then, of course, there is no contravention of the Combines Investigation Act.

The purpose of the inquiry, which was commenced as a result of a formal complaint under section 7 of the act, is to ascertain whether fish prices are being fixed and the liberties of fishermen are being interfered with by arrangements amongst persons who are not covered by section 4 or in a manner that is not sanctioned by section 4. There is no intention to interfere in the proper activities of any trade union.

In view of all the circumstances, including particularly the court actions that are pending, I believe that is all I should say for the present time.

REDISTRIBUTION

REQUEST FOR CALLING OF COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam). When is it intended to convene—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Read your rule book.

An hon. Member: You read it.

Mr. Knowles: When is it intended to convene a meeting of the committee on privileges and elections to deal with the subject of redistribution according to the understanding reached in the committee last year?

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, as yet the report dealing with information as to what systems are in use in other commonwealth countries has not been tabled with the committee. There is also another matter. There has been a great deal of what I might describe as criticism about the number of committees now sitting and I hear nothing but protests to the effect there are so many committees sitting now that hon. members cannot attend. However, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the committee is conscious of this important work and I think at the very earliest opportunity the matter will be brought up and dealt with in the committee.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State—

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the report which is being prepared at the moment on procedure followed in other commonwealth countries is not completed yet.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

MAPLE SYRUP PAIL SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Finance would be good enough to let me know when I may expect an answer to question No. 283, which I placed on the order paper on March 9.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Certainly.

WATER RESOURCES

REFERENCE TO DIVERSION FROM ALBANY RIVER BASIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like to inquire of the Secretary of State for External Affairs when I may expect an answer to the question which I asked regarding a suggested diversion of water from northern Ontario to the great lakes system.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer confirms the opinion I stated at that time that no representations on this matter had been received.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Friday, May 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, when at five o'clock on Friday the house went to the consideration of private and public bills I was referring to the remarks about closure which had been made in the house. They were much the same as we heard today, such as the axe has fallen, the guillotine, and the end of free speech. During the debate we have heard remarks such as destroying parliament, hanging parliament, the rights of parliament being taken away and muzzling the representatives of the people. I mention these remarks because I submit that the interest which has been taken in this debate and which has been shown by spectators in the gallery since closure was announced last week has indicated that we have had a better parliament during this time than has been the case for some time. I should like to compare the coverage given by the press to the introduction of closure with the coverage given to some of the actions which have taken place in this house and which were more likely to destroy parliament than anything the government has done. I do not think the refusal of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to withdraw at the request of the Deputy Speaker a statement which he had made is the type of thing that would create confidence in parliament.

Mr. Fleming: Order.

Mr. Hosking: And on the following Tuesday we had another example—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is dealing with something which came before the house last week in connection with a point of order. This point of order was dealt with at the time and now the hon. member is referring to it again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Once a point of order is dealt with, it is dealt with. This point of order was dealt with last week and the hon. member wants to go over it again.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member knows, I was conversing with an hon. member of the house and did not hear what the hon. member for Wellington South said. According to what the hon. member for Eglinton tells me, the hon. member for Wellington South was dealing with a point of order which had been ruled on last week.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Wellington South be good enough to tell me with what he is dealing at the moment?

Mr. Hosking: I was comparing the remarks made by the opposition about parliament being destroyed by the action of closure with the action of the Leader of the Opposition in refusing to comply with the request of the Deputy Speaker. That bad example which he set was followed by the hon. member for Kamloops who did exactly the same thing, who was supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the leader of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Fulton: It is so ridiculous, don't bother about it.

Mr. Speaker: May I join in now and tell the hon. member for Wellington South that these points that have been brought up on earlier occasions have been the subject of rulings at the time, rulings which I believe were appealed and dealt with by the house? Whilst they might have been dealt with in a different manner, I do not recall exactly what has taken place, because I take only whatever takes place in committee of the whole at the very far end, but I should imagine that speeches should be relevant to the second reading of this bill and that we would all do well to address our remarks not to several episodes relating to order which might have taken place before but to the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Hosking: I was only comparing the methods of destroying parliament. One is, as the opposition say, by our bringing closure, which has created this interesting debate to which we have listened for the past week; and the other is their behaviour in defying the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hosking: It is quite in order. I know the hon. gentlemen do not like it, but it is true. In my opinion their behaviour does more to destroy parliament than anything else.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the hon. member will now address his remarks to the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Hosking: I shall be pleased to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps he will try to be a little less silly.

Mr. Hosking: This is probably one of the most important bills that will come before this house in my lifetime, unless we happen to have the misfortune to be engaged in another war. I believe that the building of this pipe line will do more for Canada in the next 20 years than any other thing we could propose. In making this statement, I should like to substantiate it by quoting a few figures regarding the power shortage which likely is to occur in the province of Ontario and which presently is being felt in the province of Quebec.

Some of my good friends in the province of Quebec tell me that the second thousand kilowatt hours of power in that province, for the first time, costs more today than the first thousand. It has been a standard practice, both in Ontario and in Quebec, to set hydro rates at a certain amount for the first thousand kilowatt hours and at a cheaper rate for the second, and possibly at a still cheaper rate for the third thousand kilowatt hours. In order to conserve power in the province of Quebec, they have now raised the rates on the second thousand. This is a very effective way of saving power in a power-short province.

The province of Ontario has a very similar situation. We have had large increases from our hydraulic power, and also from thermal power, but it would be wise to look at future developments in the province of Ontario. I should like to point out that 25 per cent of the province of Ontario is below 500 feet in elevation. As we know, when we are using our water energy to develop power, we collect the rain that falls and pass it over elevations and through water wheels to produce electric energy. So, when we have a very flat province such as we have in Ontario, with 25 per cent of this area below 500 feet, 67 per cent of it below 1,000 feet, and 100 per cent of it below 2,000 feet, we have developed at Niagara and various other falls most of the available hydroelectric energy.

When you look at the province of Ontario on a map and see that the great lakes system forms almost one side of that province and that the drop in elevation from the westerly tip of lake Superior to the easterly tip of lake Huron and Georgian bay is only 21 feet, you can see that the production of electric energy from the fall in that length is almost impossible. From lake Huron to lake St. Clair we have a drop of only six feet, and from lake St. Clair to lake Erie we have a drop of three feet. This means that the whole side of the province of Ontario is practically level and that our hydroelectric potential from that part of the province is nil. Then we have in Ontario, between lake Ontario and lake Erie, a drop of 326 feet. This is where we produce most of the hydroelectric energy in the province of Ontario. From lake Ontario down the St. Lawrence—and we are going to develop some hydroelectric energy—there is a fall of 246 feet. We are told that, before the energy which we shall derive from the development of the St. Lawrence seaway is ready to be used, the available electrical energy in the province of Ontario will be consumed.

This pipe line which is going to carry gas from Alberta, and which the province of Alberta is anxious to have used in a useful way, will carry nine times the energy of the hydroelectric development at Niagara falls. It is true that some three times the energy developed at Niagara falls will be siphoned off to the United States. But again I should like to mention the fact that when the hydroelectric energy was developed at Niagara falls, a proportion of that energy had to be supplied to the United States. I recall just a week ago looking at my television set and finding that, as the voltage dropped during that storm, the pictures disappeared but you could still hear the voices. We were watching a program from Buffalo and the announcer said, "Something has happened to our supply of electrical energy but as soon as it is resumed your picture will be returned". This incident indicated to me that Buffalo was receiving energy from the same source as that from which I was receiving it. In other words, they were receiving power from Niagara falls. So when we ship some gas to the United States, we are doing exactly the same as was done when hydroelectric power was developed years ago at Niagara falls. In order to make that development economical, it was necessary to sell to the market in the United States which was available. Hence this bill has the same principle; we propose to sell 200 million cubic feet of gas to the United States.

This source of power is something that the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec require. We require it for the good reason that our records tell us that there is a total of 5,407,000 horsepower of electrical energy available in the province of Ontario at mean minimum flow. The equipment installed to develop electrical energy in the province of Ontario, is 4,006,668 horsepower. In other words, we are prepared to take advantage of three-quarters of the available power that we can produce from our water resources in the province of Ontario. When the total is used the province of Ontario will be a power-starved province.

We need only look at the situation of the people in the province of Ontario and Quebec in order to see that the people have found jobs and have chosen a place to live where cheap power was available. We have in the north country—and I spent some eight years in Kirkland Lake—an area known as the golden mile. I think possibly God gave more riches to that golden mile in Kirkland Lake than to any other mile in the Dominion of Canada. However, there are only some 23,000 people there. Then we go down to Sudbury, and we see that tremendous asset that Sudbury has in nickel. Yet it has attracted very few people to the area of Sudbury. Then when you go to Noranda, you see the tremendous quantities of copper and other minerals there. Yet the population in those centres that I have spoken about is very small compared with the population in the southern part of Ontario and in those parts of Quebec where power is available. So I want to point out just how necessary it is that we bring to Ontario and Quebec six times the available power which we derive from Niagara falls.

It was not to assist our government that Premier Frost has supported the building of this pipe line. Neither was it to hurt the Conservative party in the federal house that Premier Frost has offered to assist in the building of this line. It is in order to benefit the people of the province of Ontario that he has taken his stand that it is necessary to get on with the job and build this pipe line. I should like to point out to the house, through you, Mr. Speaker, that every Liberal member from the province of Ontario was here a week ago when this debate was taking place on this bill, and that every cabinet minister was in his seat during this debate and during the votes. That fact should indicate to the house and to the people just how important the Liberal members and the government think this bill is when it requires each and every one of them from our province to be in the house.

About the power which we shall derive from the pipe line there is another thing that has not been mentioned in the house and it is one of the reasons why there is some urgency in building this line. Gas is different from electricity. If we build a power plant at some waterfall, the minute that the power is available from the generators you could connect it into the grid system and it would be ready for use. But gas is not one of those types of power. In order to build up a market for gas the individual houses that heat their water with electricity will have installed in them a different type of unit to heat the water. This means that the owners of the present houses, with their electric water heaters, will continue to heat their water in their houses with electrical power. But in the new houses or in the new buildings, when gas is available—because it will be cheaper—you will find those houses and buildings being equipped with gas water heaters and in a great many cases the cook stoves will be gas cook stoves. Hence it is going to take a considerable length of time to take advantage of the power which this gas line is going to supply.

It will not mean a quick change in industry. Many of the electric furnaces in the industries in this country will continue to operate with electrical energy after they have this gas power at their door. But over the years, when their electrical equipment wears out or becomes obsolete, it will be replaced by gas burners. It will take several years for this pipe line to lift the load which hydro is carrying and which in five or six years' time will be too great for hydro to handle unless it is augmented by a source of energy such as this. Hence, Mr. Speaker, there is great urgency that this project should be got on with right away. It is with great respect that I pay a compliment to our Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) for the move which he has devised to see that the pipe which is now being formed in the fabricating plants of the steel mills is going to be put to its use in Canada.

It is easy for a person who does not understand the problem to get a wrong impression. It takes about a month to change over a rolling mill from rolling shapes for I beams and channels to rolling flat plates and developing it into pipe. If this order at the rolling mills were cancelled so that it was necessary for the plant to change the equipment back, it would take them a month's time before they could change back again, then if the orders were renewed a whole season would be lost. You cannot afford to shut down a rolling mill and change it from rolling one shape to another at the whim of some inexperienced person who does not understand the cost of making such a change. It was, therefore, absolutely essential that if this pipe was going to be used this year some move had to be made to have the plant continue rolling it. Great credit should go to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) for this move.

Most people in this country realize that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has done many things very similar to this. I do not need to mention again T.C.A. and the Polymer plant as well as all the other plants that he has taken under his wing to ensure that the people of Canada would have what they required when it was needed. He did this during the war. I mentioned on Friday about the way he constructed these magnificent aeroplanes from wood which revolutionized the bombing of Germany. The Mosquito program of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe was known not only in Canada but all over the world. This planning of his to see that we do not lose the opportunity of getting the pipe laid from Calgary to Winnipeg this year is almost the direct equivalent of the development of the Mosquito bomber, the Polymer plant and Trans-Canada airways.

The city from which I happen to come has its own problem. We have a public utility there which sells gas developed from coal, but the plant is old and the city council will be deciding this year whether or not they should dispose of that public utility and sell the system to a free enterprise company. There are good reasons why the public utilities should be sold, but I am not going to give an opinion one way or the other. I am merely pointing out that in my city we have a public utility used for producing and distributing gas, and the government of the city is considering dispensing with that method of handling the gas situation in Guelph. For that reason, I would be very hesitant about recommending to any government that we should get into a public utility to handle gas. I should like to commend the minister for trying to devise a method of having free enterprise build this gas line, so the government of Canada will not be in the same position, in a much larger way, in which my city is, with all the problems and difficulties that they have and know about.

Before I leave that aspect I would like to say that the city of Guelph is most anxious that they get this gas from Alberta just as soon as possible so that they will not have to spend $200,000 in replacing the plant which is just about worn out. They have been watching anxiously for the time when they would be able to tap into this source of energy which the people of Alberta are so anxious for us to have.

Now, I should like to make one other comparison, Mr. Speaker. We have had Ontario hydro held up as a good example of a public utility. I am not so sure that the engineers of this country are convinced that hydro has been such a good public utility. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) started a program of which I approved, and that was converting the power in the province from 25 cycle to 60 cycle. This has been a very costly move. It has cost the people of Ontario more than it will cost to build the pipe line from Alberta to Montreal, but it was a necessary expenditure. I am not criticizing anyone for doing it. It is something that had to be done. I might criticize the way they are doing it and the extra money that is being spent in doing it, but still the taxpayers have to pay the bill, amounting to about $400 million.

The reason they have to pay this large amount of money is that the government of the day when hydro power was just started said they would have 25 cycle current. There was no real reason why we should have 25 cycle current, but they started with that and they continued to produce it in every new plant which was built until a few years ago.

If we had had free enterprise in Ontario with two companies developing power, one 25 cycle power and one 60 cycle power, there would have been no 25 cycle power sold in the province. It is very simple to understand why that would be so. A motor using 25 cycle current costs about one-third more than a motor that uses 60 cycle current. If we had had two companies under a free enterprise system, there just would not have been any 25 cycle current sold and the taxpayers of Ontario would not have needed to make an expenditure of some $400 million in Ontario to correct the mistake which the government made in producing 25 cycle current.

We have other examples of free enterprise versus government enterprise or public ownership. We find on looking at Saskatchewan and Alberta that Alberta, under a free enterprise system,—they are the most free enterprise government in Canada except for the Liberal government of the dominion—has boomed and grown. People have invested their money in that province because they knew it was a good place in which to invest their money. It was safe there. No one was going to take it over and take it away from them by turning it into a public utility. There were millions of dollars poured into Alberta to the advantage of the people who live in that province. Compare that with Saskatchewan where we have a socialistic government, and where no one would invest any money.

An hon. Member: Under the Liberals.

Mr. Hosking: No, I am not talking about when it was under the Liberals. Then, it was the best province in western Canada. We cannot say that today. Saskatchewan produced the most wheat under a Liberal government, and was the best province in the west under a Liberal government. Since I came to this house in 1949 we have had redistribution and the population of Saskatchewan has shrunk to such an extent that they lost five members. Compare that with the province of Alberta. There is only one reason why that is so, and that is the socialistic government of Saskatchewan. There were no oil companies moved into Saskatchewan because they had no assurance they would own the plant after they built it.

Mr. Ellis: Wait until June 20.

Mr. Hosking: You socialists have yourselves to thank for that. This is the province the representatives of which have to come down here with their hat in their hand and beg for relief, beg for support, and there is no other person responsible for that. God was just as good to your province as he was to Alberta, but it has not had the same management. During those years when there was a Liberal government in that province, it was the best province in western Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us go back to the bill, now.

Mr. Hosking: I see my time is nearly up. Before I resume my seat I wish to mention two other things that happened in this debate. One was, we were accused of bringing in the resolution for the construction of the northern part of this pipe line, that part that runs from the Manitoba border to Kapuskasing, four months ago, and that since then we have just sat and waited and have done nothing. Now we bring in this bill and are prepared to see that it goes through the house in some two weeks' time by using closure.

There is a very good reason for that. I do not think it is to the advantage of the members of the opposition to suggest that there is some sinister motive in bringing in this bill. During the past four months Trans-Canada Pipe Lines were striving to get a ruling from the federal power commission of the United States which would permit them to take some 200 million cubic feet of gas into the United States. During those four months they have made strenuous efforts in that regard. Had they been successful there would have been no need for this bill. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there is a very good reason for the delay in bringing in this bill. It would not have been necessary had the federal power commission of the United States approved the import of 200 million cubic feet of gas from the province of Manitoba.

The four months' delay was a very sound piece of business. It is unfortunate that the federal power commission of the United States has not completed its report so that this pipe line could have been built without a loan. It is not assistance; it is a loan from this government.

The action of bringing in this bill has called from the opposition numerous requests for an election. To me this is a rather interesting venture on their part; first, because they have not done very well in elections; and secondly, we have been in power for only two years and nine months.

Mr. Fleming: The government has no mandate for what it is doing.

Mr. Hosking: This is not a very long time. I hear the hon. member for Eglinton passing some comment. I would just like to tell him that when he spoke—

Mr. Fleming: The government has no mandate for what it is doing.

Mr. Hosking: The government has no mandate for what it is doing?

Mr. Studer: Has the opposition a mandate for what it is doing to the Liberal government of the day?

Mr. Hosking: The Liberal government of the day has a mandate to do the right thing for this country at any time, and that is what it is doing.

Mr. Fleming: It is to laugh.

Mr. Hosking: I would just like to draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that when he spoke on this pipe line bill he never said one single thing about it except to deal with procedure and various rules and regulations and he made references to the guillotine and so forth. There was nothing directed constructively to the debate on the pipe line. He did not say whether we were doing right or wrong; he did not say a word about building the pipe line and he did not suggest any alternative method.

Mr. Studer: Why does the hon. member for Eglinton not resign?

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Speaker, there is just one thing I should like to suggest. When Trans-Canada Pipe Lines make their 51 per cent stock available to the Canadian people I would like through you, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the people of Canada who believe in free enterprise to the fact that this is their opportunity to save Canada as a free enterprise country. We have given to them the opportunity to invest their money in free enterprise, and this is a challenge by the government to them to protect free enterprise.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the opportunity of taking part in this debate at this time just after the guillotine fell again today from an unexpected source, from an expert at throwing out the lifeline, as was evidenced last week on a couple of occasions. To have the motion come from him was rather astounding. Of course, he is the house leader. I am also going to remark on what was said recently. In the course of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I hope to deal with some aspects of the situation that have not been fully covered. I come from western Ontario, where we have had gas for years.

Let me say at this time that it might be of interest to hon. members to know that, in the particular county from which I come, Petrolia is of historic importance. I remind hon. members at this time when so much is being said about gas and oil that it is in that area that oil was first discovered on this continent. Of course, we in southwestern Ontario have always been oil and gas conscious. It may surprise some hon. members to know—it will not surprise the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie) or the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Huffman)—that our counties are surrounded by lakes and rivers and several thousand acres of the water area of the rivers and of lakes Huron, St. Clair and Erie have been leased for the exploration of oil and gas and, incidentally, with some success because I noticed just recently that 19 wells have come in within the last few months in the water area. Those who have been to the west coast, of course, know that it is not unusual to see oil and gas wells in the ocean; but perhaps in western Ontario it is unusual and I think rather exciting at the moment because it places us in the position where we do not know exactly where we stand. We have always had gas to a certain extent in that area but not enough to supply our requirements.

As I shall point out in a moment or two, we have been importing around 5½ billion cubic feet of natural gas per year, and we now have an application before the authorities to increase that to some 15½ billion cubic feet. I want to refer to that. I must comment on what was said by the last speaker when he rather lamented the fact that we and the press are criticizing the placing of closure on this legislation. He expressed the hope that the persuasive powers of the Minister of Trade and Commerce would brain wash the members of the press gallery. He may have brain washed his own members, but he certainly did not brain wash the members of the press gallery and certainly not the members of this party or of the C.C.F.

When the hon. member speaks about the gas used in his particular area for industrial purposes, I wonder whether he knows the rates that would be charged even in our area which would be one of the areas in Ontario which will receive a lower rate because we have had storage facilities in our area for a generation or two and we are able to get gas during the summer at a lower rate.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the committee that had before it the application of this company and other companies to obtain charters from this government to build pipe lines. It was an interesting experience, as I have again learned from reading over the evidence, and I am sure the same thing must have occurred to others who were on that committee. Perhaps we were a bit hasty. We received bland, blatant assurances from Mr. Schultz in connection with the gas companies and from the big banking houses from New York and engineers and others. We were told that all they needed to do was to get a charter from this government and they would build for Canada and for Canadians an all-Canadian pipe line which would be economical. They needed no help from the government. I express regret that we did not take more time on these applications. We should have inquired into many phases that we are now faced with in connection with the distribution and the cost of the gas to the consumer and the price paid to the producer. People of this country forget that in the distribution of gas in the United States the gas is piped through a pipe line, as is done in this country.

The price to the producer at the well head is a great deal more than it is in Canada and the price to the consumer in most cases is even a great deal less because they do not have the same length of pipe line as is proposed for Trans-Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we do not want to deceive ourselves in this house nor do we want to deceive the people of Canada with the figures that are being put on Hansard concerning throughput and the load factor and all that sort of thing. These are the very figures that deceive most people. We have an illustration where one accountant makes a statement which is denied by another speaker. It is a question of interpretation. Surely it is a question of the load factor, but one hon. member can get up and convince everyone that because of a certain load factor we will get gas at a certain price in one area and in another area a higher or lower price will be paid. For that reason we know perfectly well if the gas is to go south from Emerson to the steel mills in Chicago and the Minneapolis and St. Paul area they will get their gas at a much lower price than in Sault Ste. Marie, which is approximately the same distance from Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Why is this true? I am sure we will have an accountant speak on this subject before the debate is over. The amount of gas going to St. Paul and Minneapolis at 200 million cubic feet per day is a large throughput and they will be able to get gas at a lower price. Figures have already been put on the record which indicate the price is much lower than it is at Sault Ste. Marie. Notwithstanding what has been said, we are subsidizing United States industry which is probably producing the material we hope to produce in this country.

I want to refer to something which I think should be put on the record on this occasion. I am referring to a statement made by Mr. Schultz before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and reported at page 45 of the evidence. Referring to an all-Canadian line Mr. Schultz said—and this was long before Western Pipe Lines merged with Trans-Canada. I think this is very important. Western Pipe Lines were granted a charter to go from Winnipeg to the south in the Minneapolis area, and Trans-Canada intends to go both ways. One reason there is so much opposition before the federal power commission is that Trans-Canada is raiding areas now serviced by opposition groups. Mr. Schultz said:

> Well, our experts have never claimed that we needed any help in doing this job. I would not contemplate that a project of such national importance should receive less treatment than the set-up which interprovincial or any other important project has received in the way of sales tax and duty remissions. But even without that I do not think that we have to have it, because I think that we can make it work; and it all goes back to what we have always said: that this project would have three rough years, and that as we got a market built up, the project would be entirely economic and go along by itself.

A moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I referred to the price of gas at Minneapolis as compared with the price at Sault Ste. Marie. I think the figure I quoted should be emphasized but the important thing to our economy is that in this country we are endeavouring to build up our industries from infants to full-grown industries, and we should not be subsidizing any foreign industry of a similar nature through government policy. I think that is absolute folly and I am sure I am not the only one who holds that view.

I am going to refer for a moment to one of the most startling statements ever made in this house. The statement to which I refer was made last Friday by a minister of the crown. The Minister of Agriculture was speaking at that time and I am sorry he is not in his seat; however, Hansard speaks for itself. The minister was referring to closure at that time. I certainly want to put this on the record because I believe it will be a revelation to many people who perhaps overlooked it. This is it, as reported at page 4069 of Hansard:

They have used every possible device which the rules permit them to delay the bill. They have delayed estimates by talking—

I am going to speak about double talk here in a minute.

—they have prevented debate and have wasted time by calling a total of 15 votes within the last week. They have used every device the rules of the house permit to delay the passing of this measure. We are using the one device, and it is a device the Tories gave us in 1912, by making closure possible. They have used it four times; we may have to use it four times.

Listen to this:

They have compelled us to do this. We are simply using a rule they gave us to overcome their use of the rules. They could have discussed this matter for 15 days if they had not followed the procedure they have been following of avoiding discussing it at every opportunity they could. By using the rules of this house they have deprived themselves of the right to discuss the bill.

Imagine that coming from a minister of the crown in 1956.

Mr. Fleming: A minister of a fashion.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Continuing, he said:

They have deprived themselves of the right to discuss a pipe line across this country.

I am asking you, Mr. Speaker, and every hon. member of this house, how low can some people get regarding the duties and functions of parliament? Never in my experience in this house have I heard such an expression coming from a minister of the crown and I hope no hon. member of this house will ever again hear such an asinine statement.

I am going to say what was said by your former leader at whose shrine you worship.

Mr. McIlraith: Tell us what he said.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): I hear the hon. member for Ottawa West and I have heard more intelligible noises from the cradle.

Mr. McIlraith: That is a great answer.

Mr. Dickey: How dignified you are.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): We have had closure on seven occasions and I hope some hon. members will put them all on record.

An hon. Member: All Tory.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): I am going to quote now what the Liberal leader said in connection with some of these debates. I want to do so now just in case the Prime Minister will extract himself from behind that wall of solitude and give us some of his ideas. He may have some respect for his former leader because, after all, it was his former leader who tapped him on the shoulder and said, "Now you are my heir".

Mr. Hellyer: Whose heir are you—Bridey Murphy's?

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): The first occasion I want to refer to is August 30, 1917. Hon. George P. Graham was speaking on that occasion. Incidentally Mr. Graham was defeated in one of the Essex ridings about 1925, I think, and I was living there at the time. This is in connection with the 1917 closure which certain hon. members opposite know all about without my referring to it. I do not think they want me to discuss it to any great extent. Mr. Graham was noted for his expressions and he said:

Mr. Speaker, in the midst of this very serious discussion—

He was a member of the opposition at that time, of course, and was sitting on the opposition benches where the present government will be sitting if it still has any members after the next election.

—if one sits on this side of the house, one cannot but be really amused at the plight in which members on the government side have found themselves. Stringing up a beautiful rope with a noose on the end of it for the benefit of hon. members on this side, they find themselves dangling with their heels in the air at the end of their own rope.

This is the reference to closure, of course.

The minister of finance himself,—

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

In this case, of course, it is another minister.

An hon. Member: A Tory.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): I am sorry you do no follow what is being said.

—anxious to tell the world that he has jammed this measure through by use of the closure, finds himself gagged.

Mr. Graham went on to say that he did not accept the gag very gracefully and I do not think the Minister of Trade and Commerce would accept it any more gracefully. A year ago the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) bailed him out after he had gone fishing. This time he does not dare go fishing because of the likelihood of being bailed out again.

The amazing thing is that that was a Liberal member; and now we find Liberal members in full accord with what was then done. Since the capitulation by the government they have been just as enthusiastic about the other end. Mr. Graham continued:

He did not accept the gag very gracefully; it seemed to stick in his throat—

Maybe that could be applied to the Prime Minister now because we have not heard from him.

—but the gag was there, made by himself. It is not such a serious thing, you know, if you put up a good fight and are killed by somebody else, but it is a terrible thing to find yourself in such a state that you are committing suicide. The Minister of Finance, in his anxiety to prevent the rest of us from making a few observations, discovers all at once that he has fallen into his own trap and been caught. Perhaps next time he will be a little more careful and reasonable.

That was the statement made at that time by Hon. George Graham, and yet when that closure was applied it was weeks after the resolution had been introduced. But that is not so in this case. Before the minister sat down after introducing the resolution he moved closure. There is no precedent for that in Canadian history and I hope there will never be another one. Then I should like to quote what was said by a well known Liberal, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux on August 30, 1917, as reported on page 5185 of Hansard. Referring to closure he said:

This is nothing else but a raid, and it is because it is a raid perpetrated on the Canadian treasury, that it has to be done by closure. A raid must be made swiftly and sharply, it must be done in the dark, far from inquiries, far from the surveillance of the elect representatives of the people.

They do not want the newspapers of this country to quote what is going on in parliament. They would rather brainwash the people and brainwash their own members. They have been successful at that. I do not mean members of the press gallery, but their own members. I should like now to give a quotation which indicates the attitude of a former Liberal leader toward closure. I hope the government which is now forcing closure down our throats will listen to what a former leader (Mr. King) said, as reported on page 1617 of Hansard of April 1, 1932:

But what those of us on this side have strenuously opposed is the sanctioning of a course which torpedoes all that there is in the way of established parliamentary practice and procedure, and submarines the very constitution of our government.

And at page 1610 Mr. Mackenzie King is reported as follows:

I shall content myself therefore by saying that the action of the administrators at the present time reduces parliament in its most essential functions to a mere futility and a complete farce,—

That is what we have been saying.

—and that we of the opposition do not intend to lend ourselves to participation in any step of that kind.

And then at page 1627:

I want to make it perfectly clear again, Mr. Speaker, that the battle that has been put up in connection with this measure is not merely over the rights of minorities or the rights of majorities; it is true that it has to do with the rights of both; rights, which in the case of the majority no less than in that of the minority are threatened, it is concerned with the rights of something greater than either, namely, the rights of parliament and all that parliament stands for in a free country.

May I just comment on that. As far as we of this party are concerned, facing as we do the huge majority of the government in this house, we would rather be right and be in the minority than be wrong and be in the majority. Then on May 9, 1932, as reported on page 2719 of Hansard, Mr. King said:

Closure has a proper place with respect to measures which may be brought before parliament, namely, to see that a measure that is appropriately and properly before the house is not unduly obstructed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Yes, hear, hear. The brain-washed are at it again. Never in the history of our country have we been faced with such a procedure, and I hope that never again will any government have the audacity to bring in closure when introducing a resolution. I continue:

Closure has a proper place with respect to measures which may be brought before parliament, namely, to see that a measure that is appropriately and properly before the house is not unduly obstructed.

I repeat that observation for those who do not hear very well.

But the closure cannot properly be used to prevent a House of Commons from seeing that the constitution itself is not being undermined by any measure that may be under consideration. It is because the most important of all the achievements under British government has been the final and complete control of the commons over all grants that it may make, over taxation, and the right and power of the commons to follow to the last degree the control of public expenditure, that we on this side feel so strongly about not parting with so fundamental a right even, as an exception, in connection with a measure which may relate itself to so important a question as the relief of unemployment.
