What is a prima facie case? The Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council said that a prima facie case was just a case of first impression, or on the surface. That has nothing to do with what a prima facie case is, and it is a disgrace for a minister of the Crown to come before the House and say that is what a prima facie case is. A prima facie case is a case which, unless answered by cogent evidence to the contrary, stands.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Lalonde: That is not what Mr. Speaker said. You should listen to him.

Mr. Rae: I am relating my point to the question of what is prima facie case. I might say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) that perhaps because I have just come out of law school, I am more acquainted with the law than he is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I point out that perhaps this is something he might have forgotten to learn in law school when he was there a few years ago, but this is not what I was referring to just now. I was referring only to a statement made by Mr. Speaker in the House this afternoon when the hon. member was present. If he had heard what Mr. Speaker said in the House he would know what Mr. Speaker had meant in the statement he made earlier this afternoon when he invited hon. members to respect his ruling and the implications of his ruling.

Mr. Rae: All right. That was not really a point of order, it was a point of argument. But I will let it pass and I will respond to the argument.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: Ça va. That is not what a prima facie case of privilege is. I stand to be corrected, but I will be happy to read the transcript later this afternoon. What Mr. Speaker referred to is the relative functions of his job as compared with the functions of the House of Commons. I say to the Minister of Justice and to members that a prima facie case is a case which has to be answered. I submit that the rhetoric, the selective arguments, and the argumentative use of certain evidence given at the McDonald inquiry by the President of Privy Council, however skilfully it was done, and it was done very skilfully, is not a sufficient refutation of a prima facie case. Once a prima facie case has been raised, it must go to a committee for investigation.

The contempt, if that is not too strong a word, which this government shows for the privileges and concerns of members of the House, is beyond belief, because what ministers are saying in this matter is, "Leave it to us, boys; we know what the evidence is. We know what our ministers have said, we know what the contradictions of Commissioner Higgitt are, we do not need any kind of committee to tell us whether or not the privileges of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham as a member of this House have been interfered with." If that is not behaviour that is contemptuous of members of the House, I do not know what is, because Mr. Speaker has said quite clearly, on the basis of the evidence that was before him, that there is what is called a prima facie case which—I say this with respect to the Minister of Justice—cannot simply be refuted by either the Deputy Prime Minister or himself rising and saying, "This is what the substance of the case is all about and this is how we will rule."

With great respect to the Minister of Justice, he has not conducted an inquiry into how these letters came to be written. He has not conducted an inquiry into precisely what was said to the Solicitor General with respect to this correspondence. He has not conducted an inquiry into the practice of civil servants with respect to all sorts of inquiries which go from members of the House to members of the government. Quite clearly that is a question for the committee. It is not a question of security; it is not even a question of the RCMP; it is a question as to how we get our mail answered, how answers are drawn up by the other side, how civil servants brief ministers, and what is the responsibility of ministers for the statements and letters they send out that turn out to be misleading. I submit that that is precisely the kind of case which, following the citation in May that the categories of privilege are not closed, has to go before a committee for investigation.

I submit that if in a moment of non-partisanship the Minister of Justice or anybody else on the front bench would consult other members of the House on his side, he might find that there might be members there who would be concerned to find out how this process went on and precisely what responsibility was being taken by the minister for answers that were given which turned out to be misleading. I submit that those are the issues before the House in this matter, and I also submit that those are the only issues.

The President of Privy Council spent his entire speech doing two things. The first thing he did was to make fun of the letter, to make fun of the constituent, which is an easy thing to do for the government, and to make fun of the RCMP, a very easy thing for this government to do. The second thing he did was to go into the substance of the correspondence and to say, "I have conducted an inquiry. I have looked at the evidence and I say there is not a prima facie case."

I think it was Stalin who said, "How many battalions does the Pope have?" That is precisely the attitude of this government toward the views of Mr. Speaker, because what this government is saying is, "It does not matter what the prima facie case is, it does not matter what the evidence is, it does not matter whether there is a dark grain of doubt at the back of every member's mind. What matters is that we have done the investigation and we have decided that the standing committee will not be allowed to look at this matter." If that does not show contempt for rational argument, for the legal process and for natural justice, I do not know what does.

The final argument used by the President of Privy Council was that there was no accused. He said there is not an accused and there is not an unaccused, therefore there would be contempt for natural justice if we referred the matter to a standing committee. I submit that that is an intellectual confusion of a very elementary kind. We are not accusing anyone. A member has raised a matter of privilege as a result of a letter he has received, and he simply wants to find out how these kinds of letters get to be written. If he does not know, it is only because of the essentially anonymous nature of this government, and only because cabinet ministers are not prepared to take responsibility for their statements and for the mistakes they make.

If there are no accused over there, it is because they do not have the guts to stand up and take the responsibility for what they have done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: So do not come to us talking about natural justice. The fact of the matter is that there is no accused. There is a motion on the floor that there be an investigation, that this matter be investigated by a committee of the House. You cannot confuse it with the McDonald royal commission because it has nothing to do with the work of the commission. We have never suggested that the royal commission stop its work. What it has to investigate is the matter of how, in this particular instance, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham was given a letter which was not the full truth.

I find it absolutely astonishing that the government is not prepared to look at the matter and say, "All right, it may be embarrassing; somebody may have been lying, someone may not have been telling the truth, but we are sufficiently concerned about the truth and about the way in which we reveal our information to members of the House and to members of the public that we are not afraid." Instead of which we get the same old language of cover up and gobbledegook, evasion and the excuse that this is going before the McDonald inquiry and therefore is not a matter for this House.

This government has so emasculated the House of Commons that it has taken away all its powers and ability to deal not only with estimates but also with its privileges, and it is now saying that we will have to wait until the cows come home for the McDonald inquiry to come down with a report. It is not even going to deal with the question raised by the hon member for Northumberland-Durham.

● (1732)

The McDonald inquiry, I do not have to tell the Minister of Justice, is a general inquiry into matters of security in Canada. It is a general inquiry into not only past but future determinations of how the security forces should be conducted and how political responsibility for security forces should be handled. It has very little to do—I was going to say something else—with the direct inquiry which has been raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. It has to do with a little letter which the Deputy Prime Minister can laugh at and make fun of, saying it is just a card. That is his privilege. You can laugh at the Speaker saying it is a prima facie case, and you can conduct your own inquiry into your own ministers and say you have satisfied yourself that it has been carried out, but the only people you are fooling in the long run, the only people the government is fooling in this matter is the government itself.

Any government or group of individuals who do not allow themselves to be governed by the rule of law, who bend and twist concepts of law, such as the concept of a prima facie case, to suit their own needs, and who become judges of their own case and use the simple power of numbers to decide whether an injustice has been done, are a group that have shown themselves unworthy of being believed by the people of Canada. I suggest to this government that is precisely what has happened.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote a short statement which appears on the fourth line of paragraph 113, on page 102 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition:

> A question of privilege ought rarely to come up in the House.

And for a very good reason, Mr. Speaker. As a newcomer to the House, I have been somewhat shocked by the remarks made this afternoon, especially by Progressive Conservative members. I have been deeply disappointed by what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has said, and I consider absolutely unacceptable to question the credibility of the McDonald commission. Mr. Speaker, we must not overlook the fact that this royal commission of inquiry was set up under an act of parliament. The Inquiries Act allows the governor in council, through a ministerial decree, to establish a commission whose terms of reference are described in the order in council. This commission subsequently reports to the government and issues recommendations.

I think it is unfair and unacceptable for hon. members of the House to suggest that this royal commission would not cast light on the practices referred to by the hon. member who rose on a question of privilege. Mr. Speaker, either we respect our institutions or we do not! Clearly this royal inquiry commission has a legal mandate under a federal law passed by this parliament and consequently, it must be respected. Mr. Speaker, we must now deal with its terms of reference in order to determine if there is a real possibility of a parallel inquiry and this is the gist of the question.

We heard many superficial arguments from the Conservative members today. We heard many innuendos, we heard what I would call nonsensical, silly, political remarks, Mr. Speaker, but nothing really serious which would enable us in parliament to decide whether the motion should be referred to a committee or not because we should not forget that parliamentary procedure is very simple on this point. Notwithstanding all the remarks which have been made up to now by hon. members on the opposition side, Mr. Speaker himself felt it was necessary to call us to order in this debate, and the Deputy Prime Minister also described the problem very accurately.

In the same fourth edition of his Parliamentary Rules and Forms, on page 95, citation 104(2), Beauchesne says the following:

It has often been laid down that the Speaker's function in ruling on a claim of breach of privilege does not extend to deciding the question of substance whether a breach of privilege has in fact been committed—a question which can only be decided by the House itself.

That is exactly what is happening, Mr. Speaker. The House is settling the matter, despite the antics of the hon. member who has just left, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), and I regret having used the name of a member for whom I have a lot of respect, but despite his antics today to prosecute us prima facie, it still is not misleading, it is not difficult—prima facie, that means at first glance, by the looks of things, superficially—if it is not a slur on the Chair to say that it gave a prima facie decision, since when do we insult someone because he is bound, procedurally, to the way things appear, to the way they seem superficially, on the surface? What is less acceptable, however, Mr. Speaker, is that members of the opposition in a serious debate which is meant to decide the issue should make such superficial speeches as the ones we heard till now, with the exception, of course, of the statement made by the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Mr. Speaker, Beauchesne, at page 102, citation 113, adds the following, and those are premises I want to read into the record in support of my argumentation. He says:

It should be dealt with by the a motion giving the House power to impose reparation or apply a remedy.

So, Mr. Speaker, the motion now before us, if it were ultimately decided upon by the House, should seek a remedy, should seek, as Beauchesne says, reparation. Keeping those principles in mind, let us take the motion as written. I am talking about the new motion, the one drafted by the parliamentary staff, the clerks who are at the table with the hon. member raising the question. There are two things in that motion. First, it proposes that the letter sent by the solicitor general of the day to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) on December 4, 1973, and second, the testimony of former commissioner Higgitt, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation and report.

The motion before us can be interpreted in two ways: either it is interpreted restrictively or it is interpreted in a general, liberal way. If it is interpreted restrictively—which is what the hon. member has in mind today—it is to refer to a committee of the House for investigation and report a letter and a testimony, the letter he received from the solicitor general in 1973 and the testimony of Mr. Higgitt before the McDonald commission. That is all he wants. If we were to limit ourselves to that, if we were to give the motion a restrictive interpretation—and I agree entirely with what the President of Privy Council mentioned—the hon. member who raised the motion of privilege is only quoting a paragraph from the letter he wants to have referred to committee and he only used a short part of Mr. Higgitt's testimony before the McDonald commission.

Earlier I heard the new member of the New Democratic Party talk about natural justice, and before he goes behind the curtain, I would like to tell him that the principle of natural justice requires that our search for truth be as objective and as complete as possible. And to search for truth as objectively and as completely as possible, you do not take passages out of context from evidence or a document and interpret them subjectively. This cannot bring out justice or the truth. I understand that the hon. member did not suggest that he would do such a thing himself, but I maintain, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Rae: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is asking the parliamentary secretary if he would allow a question.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to accept a question from the hon. member when I am through.

To come back to what I was saying, and this is very serious, the hon. member was talking about natural justice. What the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has done by moving such a limited and restrictive motion is to take out of context part of the evidence given by Mr. Higgitt by selecting a short paragraph of the letter written to him by the solicitor general in 1973. If we are interested in finding the truth, Mr. Speaker, we cannot ask a committee of the House to limit its examination, its inquiries and its report to such selective passages because the results would be unfair for all members of the House. This goes against the principle of natural justice. It would be unacceptable that the terms of reference of a committee be limited to only part of the evidence. As the President of Privy Council has said, all the evidence has not been given before the commission. Mr. Higgitt has not even been cross-examined, Mr. Speaker.

The inquiry where he stands as a witness is not even concluded and they expect that members who are elected to represent the people and show examples of justice, members who enact legislation, they expect members to go along and waste their time discussing excerpts from letters and shreds of evidence at the very moment when an inquiry is under way to shed light on those incidents, including the letter about which the member who presented this motion today has complained.

In the circumstances they interpret the motion liberally, generally, and consider that even if the motion has been revised and corrected, it still empowers the committee to inquire generally into everything related to that letter and the evidence given by Mr. Higgitt before the McDonald commission. Then, Mr. Speaker, what is related to the letter and what is related to Mr. Higgitt's statement? Obviously, the letter was sent to a Progressive Conservative member by a solicitor general in 1973, so there will be reference to that solicitor general in this committee and he is related to the terms of the motion. Here is the paragraph of the letter that has been underlined by the hon. member and taken out of context. I quote:

● (1742)

[English]

I have been assured by the RCMP that it is not their practice to intercept the private mail of anyone and I trust that the above explanation will set your constituent's mind at ease.

[Translation]

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, it will be related to the RCMP. The RCMP is mentioned in that paragraph. Immediately, the solicitor general and the RCMP are involved. And let us not forget the principles I mentioned earlier. The committee will seek a remedy and a sanction against those who are related to the incident referred to by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

I consider that it does not take much courage and I wonder why the Progressive Conservative members have been so reluctant to say it. It does not take much courage to say that in fact the hon. member who proposed the motion of privilege, wants a sanction against the solicitor general or the RCMP, or both. It is as simple as that, Mr. Speaker. That is exactly what he wants. He seeks a remedy and a sanction against a politician, the solicitor general or someone in the RCMP. There is no one else involved in the letter mentioned in the motion or in the evidence given by Mr. Higgitt before the McDonald commission.

Mr. Speaker, this is precisely where the argument concerning the parallel inquiry is important. Why would this institution—so respectable and with its many tasks ahead—waste its time and engage in overlapping by investigating on the same people and the same facts through a parliamentary committee and the royal commission of inquiry set up by a federal act?

Mr. Speaker, in order to make my point fully understood, I will have to remind you what is the mandate of the McDonald royal commission of inquiry. This commission was set up by an order in council on July 7, 1977. Let me quote a very short extract from this order, which will show to what extent what is actually done by the McDonald commission would be done the same way by the committee which would be examining the letter and Mr. Higgitt's testimony. According to this order, its mandate is to conduct such investigations as in the opinion of the commissioners are necessary to determine the extent and prevalence of investigative practices or other activities involving members of the RCMP that are not authorized or provided for by law. And, in this regard, to inquire into the relevant policies and procedures that govern the activities of the RCMP in the discharge of its responsibility to protect the security of Canada. That is the essence of the mandate of the McDonald royal commission of inquiry, that is to look into the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

● (1752)

Such is the essence of the terms of reference of the McDonald royal commission of inquiry: to inquire into Royal Canadian Mounted Police activities. What the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is asking for is that the standing committee inquire into a letter he received from a solicitor general, wherein it was stated the practice was not for the RCMP to open the mails. What the hon. member is asking for is that a standing committee therefore inquire into RCMP activities, the same thing exactly that is under investigation by the McDonald commission.

Mr. Speaker, what the member is asking for is a parallel inquiry. This is unacceptable. We have no time here to indulge in duplication, to ask members of parliament, public figures to sit, to make inquiries, when we already have legislation providing for royal commissions to do the work much more objectively, much more fairly, in a much less partisan way. Surely, were a committee of this House to go into the same matters the McDonald commission is now investigating, it could be seen that although the matter under review by both inquiries would be identical, even though the facts would be the same, the procedure and conduct of those two investigating bodies would be quite different, and clearly doubts could be entertained as to which of the two inquiries would shed more light and justice. As far as I am concerned, I have no doubt the McDonald commission is in a position to assess in the least partisan and the most objective way the facts in particular that pertain to the complaint made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, and the facts in general that pertain to RCMP activities.

Mr. Speaker, there is something else of significance in this whole debate. Under our parliamentary procedure, in order for the committee to seek remedy, harm must have been suffered, and I wonder how the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham can now suggest, in 1978, he was harmed by a 1973 letter, when in this House, on November 9, 1977, which is nearly a year ago, in answer to his own question, the then solicitor general, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox) had an opportunity to supply him with answers which, to anyone with even minimal intelligence, meant that the last part of the letter could not have been accurate.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, and I give him the benefit of the doubt in due respect for his intelligence, had every reason in the world last November 9 through the answers given to his questions and those also provided to many other members on the other side on that same issue by the then solicitor general with respect to the opening of the mail by the RCMP. Mr. Speaker, the member cannot therefore make a plea of ignorance. He had been aware since November that the information provided to him by the then solicitor general was no longer correct. Yet he did not complain at that time, Mr. Speaker. Why? Because he suffered no prejudice; it is as simple as that. Another time when he could have made us aware of any such prejudice and when he precisely chose not to do so because he indeed suffered no prejudice was on February 1, 1978, before the Keable commission in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I took part in the debate before the decision made by the Speaker of the House and I have already alluded to and tabled before the House the testimony of Mr. Higgitt, given on February 1, 1978, before the Keable commission in Quebec.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the letter referred to in the motion that we are presently debating had been tabled before the Keable commission as exhibit P 142, and that in this testimony reference was made to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. When I recently referred to this extract of the testimony of Mr. Higgitt before the Keable commission, testimony which referred to the member for Northumberland-Durham and which has been the object of the letter he is complaining about, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) said: Yes indeed, but you cannot expect the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham to understand the proceedings that have taken place in Quebec because they are conducted in French.

Mr. Speaker, the testimony which I read in English the other day was not a translation. What was read in the House was an excerpt from the testimony as given in English. Well, Mr. Speaker, in case the Conservative members are unaware of it, in Quebec legal procedures are heard in both official languages, as provided in our constitution and recently confirmed by a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. So when I referred to the testimony of Mr. Higgitt before the Keable commission, that evidence was given in English. Therefore, the point made that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham could not be aware of it, because it was in French, is not valid. Secondly, the public inquiry dealt with that excerpt. And when the name of a member is mentioned during a public inquiry on an issue of such current interest as the activities of the RCMP and that, in addition, the letter in question today sent by a former commissioner of the RCMP to that member is tabled, I think that one must be an ignoramus, some kind of fool or simpleton not to understand that the words contained in the letter from the solicitor general could prove inaccurate.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, that is the second instance where the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham could have complained about the fact that the letter addressed to him in 1973 was inaccurate in the last paragraph. But he did not complain then. And that for two reasons, either one of those reasons. Either he really was not aware of what was going on publicly, in English, in the province of Quebec, and on that account I am not blaming him although I feel it not very likely, but I give him the benefit of the doubt. I do not question his word. Or he was aware of it one way or another but did not feel prejudiced. He has not been prejudiced. In view of the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, that is the second instance where the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham could have raised the matter of prejudice for which he is asking redress today.

The motion under study today is very simple. He is asking, for reasons I do not know, that a committee of the House do exactly the same work as the McDonald Royal Commission of Inquiry. He is asking that a committee of the House consider a letter already tabled before the Keable commission and a practice of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which is now being looked into by a royal commission of inquiry, namely the McDonald commission; he wants us to discuss the testimony given by Mr. Higgitt on November 1 and October 24 before the royal commission of inquiry, when in fact his testimony has yet to be completed, when it has yet to be contradicted though, in principle, it could be, when I am sorry to say, that testimony is ambiguous and contradicted by its own author who could in turn be contradicted by other facts or testimonies; in short, before the inquiry has not been completed.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, the crux of this debate is to determine whether serious hon. members can, by virtue of our procedure, decide on a matter of privilege through a vote on the motion now before the House. I feel that our first duty is to ask ourselves whether our institutions, as imperfect as they may be, whether our institutions allow us to assign individuals to inquire simultaneously, on a parallel basis, on exactly the same facts, situations and circumstances. Secondly, I wonder what such a committee could do in terms of applying remedies or sanctions when, it really seems, in fact, that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham suffered absolutely no prejudice because, were it otherwise, he would have complained about it last November or in February of this year. Mr. Speaker, there is another important, in fact, very important principle involved here. Namely, the danger that we abuse our institutions, that we arrive at contradictory reports. The royal commission of inquiry has been requested to bring in a report; it is its duty to make recommendations.

It could very well be, Mr. Speaker, that in light of a much more exhaustive inquiry and after having heard a much greater number of witnesses and studied a lot more documents, it could very well be that some time from now the royal commission of inquiry arrive at recommendations which are different from those which could be made by the committee to which we would now like to refer a letter or part of it which was quoted, and to which we would also like to refer part of a testimony. The parliamentary committee, Mr. Speaker, could very well make findings and conclusions clearly different from those made by the royal commission of inquiry, and I am convinced it is not part of the terms of reference of members of parliament to overlap and make contradictory decisions. It would be a nonsense and a procedural abuse to vote in favour of this motion.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is six o'clock and if you wish to interrupt me, I will let you do so.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) on a point of order.

Mr. MacKay: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I presume we will be continuing with this tomorrow, so I should like to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It has already been called six o'clock. That is no problem. The speaker who just had the floor called it six o'clock and, even if he had not, it is still six o'clock.

The hon. member for Central Nova has raised a point of order which I was going to inform the House about in any event. We have found ourselves in a situation which resembles the disposition of motions pursuant to Standing Order 43, prior to the question period. It resembles it only in this sense, that we face a situation we have not faced previously.

We have a motion on the floor at the present time. Proceedings on that motion are automatically interrupted by the ordinary hour of adjournment which has now arrived. I have therefore a choice, it would seem, of how to dispose or deal with this matter on the order paper. One way is to list it under motions, and the other is to list it under government orders pursuant to some of the Standing Orders. I am not clear as to which way it ought to be done and we have no precedents to guide us. It is a motion in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), and it is a privilege motion. I have therefore opted in favour of treating it on the order paper as a motion. That is the way it will appear on the order paper. I do so, however, subject to a point of order which I do not think we should deal with at this hour, because I cannot really expect anybody to be prepared, and certainly we are not prepared to deal with it at this point.

This is my preliminary choice and those are the brief reasons why I have done so. I do so subject to a point of order which can be raised tomorrow before this matter is resumed.

Mr. Lawrence: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, among the other personal undertakings broken by the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) before this House was one today in which as he lightly castigated some of us on this side for having no courage. He indicated he was going to table the correspondence, at the same time asking why I did not do it. He knows full well, of course, that under the rules of the House I have no authority to do that. My understanding is that he has not yet tabled that piece of correspondence. I would ask the President of Privy Council to do so. At the same time I would ask the hon. gentleman, as he indicated that there was a very selective taking out of testimony of former commissioner Higgitt, that he also table, if he would please, the complete testimony of former commissioner Higgitt, of October 24 and November 1, 1978. This is referred to in the motion before the House.

● (1802)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to table the letter. It is in my office and if the hon. gentleman would give me a moment, I will be happy to get it.

* * *

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-7, an act to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Korea and Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and an agreement between Canada and Jamaica for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

* * *

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—MINISTERIAL CORRESPONDENCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lawrence:

That the letter sent by the Solicitor General of the day to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham on December 4, 1973, and the testimony of former RCMP Commissioner Higgitt on October 24 and November 1, 1978, before the royal commission of inquiry (McDonald commission) concerning the practice of the RCMP in preparing letters for the signature of the Solicitor General, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation and report.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, I would be pleased to table a copy of the letter from the solicitor general to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. The letter is dated December 4, 1973. I am happy to comply with the request and I regret that following the applause which greeted my speech I forgot to table it at that time.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.07 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 7, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

• (1407)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF EDWARD SCHREYER—RETIREMENT OF JULES LÉGER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to advise the House that Her Majesty the Queen, this morning in London, approved the recommendation by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that Mr. Edward Schreyer be appointed the next Governor General of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Those of us who have served in the House of Commons for a period of time well remember the vigorous young member who served the interests of his province and region so well during the four years he spent in Ottawa before returning to the west to become premier of Manitoba.

At only 43 years of age, he now takes on the deep national responsibilities of a new office which symbolizes such a vital link between the different parts of Canada and gives evidence of the cultural and linguistic character of the country.

Mr. Schreyer's background itself is almost a manifestation of the Canadianism, if I may use that word, which developed as this land was being settled. He was born during the depression to a Manitoba farm family of German descent. While growing up in the west, he became familiar with German, Polish and Ukrainian and while serving as a member of parliament was quick to take advantage of the opportunity to learn French, a language in which he is now fluent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: In his political career, while lending his efforts to improving the conditions of daily life for Canadians generally, he has always had a particular concern and compassion for the native people and those whose opportunities have been limited by factors outside their control.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Schreyer has a feeling for all of Canada and possesses qualities which I am sure will bring the same sense of understanding and excellence to this high position as was possessed by his predecessors.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, to his Excellency the Right Hon. Jules Léger, and Madame Léger, we would offer our deep gratitude and affection for their warm and enthusiastic contribution to our country and its unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The word "distinguished" is the exact description of their performance, and I think all members would wish to salute their courage and dedication in the past five years. We extend to them our best wishes for many more happy years together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to receive, as I am sure the House is, the announcement by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) of the approval of Her Majesty, this morning, of the recommendation by the Prime Minister for the appointment of Mr. Schreyer as next Governor General of Canada. I am sure he will do a good job in that role, and on behalf of my colleagues I want to wish him well.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to pay a tribute to Madame Léger and the Governor General for the services they have rendered to Canadians during difficult times.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members will understand why I am particularly pleased to congratulate our new Governor General and, if I may say so in this context, the Government of Canada for its very wise selection.

As the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) has already indicated, Edward Schreyer—a man we know well as Ed—served not only in a distinguished way in this House for a number of years, but in an equally distinguished way performed his responsibilities as premier of the province of Manitoba.

As has already been indicated, I think it is very important at this particular point in our history that we have a Governor General who not only speaks our two official languages but who is, himself, not of either English or French ancestry but comes from that broader, third dimension in Canadian history which is so important to our past and will be so important to our future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I should only add that the personal qualities of integrity and commitment to the common good in Ed Schreyer will be a continuation of the tradition that has been firmly established by his predecessors, notably by the Right Hon. Jules Léger, the man he will replace in this important task for our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I join the two previous speakers to praise Mr. Schreyer. Members of the Social Credit Party of Canada are quite pleased with that appointment, because Mr. Schreyer served in the House for four years and throughout that period he was constantly the champion of the humbler classes and the average man. He was also the defender of both official languages and I am sure he will continue to be as Governor General of Canada. Before concluding, we must thank more particularly their Excellencies the Right Hon. and Madame Jules Léger for what they did for Canada during the five years Mr. Léger has served as Governor General.

* * *

● (1412)

[English]

RAILWAYS

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MAINTAIN NEWFOUNDLAND RAILWAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the enthusiastic and determined public meeting of 700 Newfoundlanders, held at St. John's Tuesday evening, including the MPs for St. John's West and Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), five cabinet ministers of the government of Newfoundland, and some 20 members of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland representing all parties, representatives of the NDP and of the Newfoundland Federation of Labour and the St. John's city council, all of whom resolved unanimously that the Newfoundland railway continue in full operation, supported directly by funds from the Government of Canada and with new and invigorated management, and in view of the commitment contained in a telex message from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) that the government will grant direct financial support for the continued operation of the railway, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the government pay all rigorously audited and proven losses of the Newfoundland railway each year and provide necessary capital expenditures and that the government instal active and aggressive business management dedicated to attracting business and competing, so that the jobs of several thousand Newfoundlanders and the rail mode of transportation in Newfoundland be maintained and strengthened.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

IMMIGRATION

ENTRY INTO CANADA OF LANTOS FAMILY FROM HUNGARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency and necessity concerning three Hungarian refugees, presently in Austria, with relatives in my constituency, namely, Ignac Lantos, Sr. and his sons, Ignac Lantos, Jr., and Laszlo Lantos. In so doing, I would sincerely like to compliment the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) for the interest he has taken in this case and the telexes he has sent to Vienna in an effort to facilitate their entry into Canada, but at the same time strongly criticize Canadian bureaucrats in Vienna who are moving slower than the pace of a turtle in dealing with ministerial instructions.

I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That in view of the dire straits in which this refugee family finds itself, in view of the fact that Canadian relatives have guaranteed to sponsor them financially in every way, and in view of the fact that Hungarian authorities are trying to entice them back over the border where they would be in severe danger, that the House appeals to the Minister of Immigration to issue an immediate ministerial order permitting entry to Canada of the Lantos family, thus enabling them to finally join in safety their relatives Mr. and Mrs. Larry Sherman of Brockville, Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REQUEST CORPORATION PROVIDE ADEQUATE FACILITIES FOR MOVEMENT OF FREIGHT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter that is not only urgent and pressing but is some 90 years old.

In view of the fact that CP Limited has used money earned from gifts by the Canadian people to expand Marathon Realty, in the United States, and to purchase Baker Commodities of Los Angeles, Syracuse China of Syracuse, N.Y., and Amtel Inc. of Providence, Rhode Island, but refuses to invest in new and repaired railway cars to move grain and other commodities, and since the situation is now so bad that the Canadian Wheat Board, in a desperate, last resort effort, called for tenders for 2,000 hopper cars at the farmers' expense, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House request the government to have the Canadian Transport Commission enforce section 262 of the Railway Act, namely, to require the CPR to 'furnish adequate and suitable accommodation for the carrying, unloading and delivering of all such traffic.'

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

BILINGUALISM

USE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE IN TRAINING COURSES FOR QUEBEC AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of vital importance for all French Canadians and the future of our country.

In view of the fact that this government has always claimed to be in favour of a just society; considering the alarming and unacceptable discrimination which was denounced recently by 16 Quebec students who are undergoing training as air traffic controllers in Cornwall with the consent of the Department of Transport, and that such discrimination runs contrary to any concept of national harmony, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle):

That the House urgently appoint a parliamentary commission to carry out an on-site investigation and make recommendations to hon. members as soon as possible, so as to put an end to this national scandal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

• (1417)

[English]

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PERMANENT HOURS OF WORK EXEMPTION FOR COUNTRY ELEVATOR AGENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the terms of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent national importance.

In view of the early lapse, on January 1 next year, of the temporary exemption of country elevator agents from the hours of work regulations, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the Minister of Labour make permanent the hours of work exemption under the Labour Code and thus remove this potentially serious impediment to the movement of grain.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the terms of the Standing Order, unanimous consent is required before such a motion can be presented. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FORESTRY

TASK FORCE REVIEW ON FUTURE OF CANADIAN FORESTRY SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, to present a motion regarding the crucial importance of the Canadian Forestry Service to the forest industry in our country, on which a million Canadians rely for their jobs and which is our most important export earner. I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the Minister of State for the Environment be required to implement a resolution passed on December 6, 1978, by members of the Canadian Institute of Forestry, and presented to him today, providing for the immediate establishment of a task force to review and make recommendations about the future of the Canadian Forestry Service and the federal contribution to forestry in Canada; that the members of the task force be representative of the forest industry, labour unions, the provincial forest services, the universities, the Canadian Institute of Forestry and the Canadian Forestry Service; and that the task force should be as representative as possible of the geographical regions of Canada; that this task force be established immediately and submit its report, with recommendations, before April 1, 1979; and that pending the submission of this paper, the recently announced cutbacks in the Canadian Forestry Service be deferred.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the introduction of such a motion for debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

HOUSE OF COMMONS

USE OF AIR PASS BY SECRETARY OF STATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In light of news reports that the Secretary of State and his wife may accept a free CP Air flight to the Far East, valued at $6,000, and will use the occasion to study cultural policy and freedom of information matters, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House request the minister to make a statement on motions upon his return outlining what new ideas he has learned about freedom of information from such model democracies as Burma, Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

FINANCE

RIGHT TO DRAW ANNUITIES ON P.R.S.Ps—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 and due to the fact that a provision in the budget bill of April, 1978, prohibits persons under 60 years of age who are disabled, or otherwise physically unable to support their families, from drawing an annuity from their registered retirement savings program to which they may have contributed for several years, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. Crosby):

That this House do instruct the Minister of Finance to so amend the budget bill to restore to people who are under the age of 60 who are disabled, or otherwise physically unable to support their families, the right to draw an annuity from their registered retirement savings programs to which they might have contributed for years, so that these unfortunate people may look after and raise their families without being a liability to society.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

● (1422)

GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard):

That this House extends its sincere appreciation and best wishes to Their Excellencies, the Governor General and Mrs. Jules Léger, for their devoted service to Canada and all Canadians for the past five years, and that this House congratulates—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member or put him in an awkward situation, but I think he will recognize that I have consistently rejected the use of Standing Order 43 for this kind of purpose.

Furthermore, the hon. member must surely recognize that the spirit of his resolution has already been entirely accepted by the House through the remarks which have been made. I put them, as a matter of priority, before any other business today, to announce the appointment of the new Governor General and to wish him well, and also to extend on behalf of all parties the congratulations of the House to the new incumbent and, of course, the present incumbent of that office.

* * *

AIR CANADA

CALL FOR REINSTATEMENT OF FLIGHT 562 TO MONCTON, N.B.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the greater Moncton area of New Brunswick is a large distribution centre; whereas in order to retain employment and an effective distribution system it is necessary to maintain expeditious transportation services for freight, cargo, mail and passengers in and out of the Moncton area by air, rail and highway; whereas Air Canada has just discontinued an absolutely necessary cargo and freight services to southern New Brunswick, flight No. 562, which operates regularly into Moncton in the early hours of the morning; and whereas this decision will have a very damaging and deteriorating effect on the economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That the Minister of Transport and Air Canada be directed to reinstate immediately this special cargo and freight service, flight No. 562, to Moncton, as well as to improve passenger scheduling and service.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the House will agree that the oral question period should continue until ten minutes past three.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

IMBALANCE IN CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the intended President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, the virtually supreme economic commander in the cabinet. It touches on the current account deficit of this nation which was disclosed yesterday, of $1.3 billion, our highest quarterly deficit as far as current account is concerned.

This means that there has been a deficit of over $17 billion run up by the government, in our foreign position, since 1973, the worst such record of any major industrial nation in OECD. Would the intended minister indicate what steps he has in mind to try to correct this serious imbalance in our current account deficit with the rest of the world?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if I will be able to give answers on a daily basis on what is obviously a medium and long-term problem to be solved.

I think the generality of my responsibilities and the responsibilities of the proposed Board of Economic Development Ministers will be detailed when we can find House time to bring forward for debate the resolution which is already before hon. members in terms of being public. However, the debate will probably be scheduled on the return of the Prime Minister some time next week, at which time the general functions of this board will be made clear to the House.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister, the would-be economic czar in Canada. The $17 billion cumulative current account deficit since 1973 to which I have referred represents an interest cost flowing out of the country, which is required to finance that type of deficit, of $1.5 billion.

Has the intended minister any plans to work with the government, with industry and with other groups to stem the outflow and, most importantly, the interest deficit we are accruing as a result of covering the deficit by the funding to which I have referred?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that the balance on our merchandise trade account is encouraging to all of us. He knows the other problems to which he referred are long-term. Indeed, I will not spin-off an answer to a question in the question period on the kind of long-term, medium-term solution which we will endeavour to find, because it would be absolutely ridiculous to suggest that there is a short-phase panacea answer to these kinds of questions that has any real validity.

• (1427)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the minister. In view of the fact that great uncertainty has been brought into the marketplace concerning the government's attitude to our floating dollar—which is again under pressure today; it is brushing 85 cents—would the minister, who hovers over all the other economic ministers, indicate whether we are going to have a pegged dollar, as suggested by the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, or does he support the Minister of Finance in floating the dollar, notwithstanding the fact that the government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars a month doing exactly what government members have said they are not doing?

Mr. Andras: The Minister of Finance clearly speaks for the government on that kind of question, which is in the area of economic policy, and he has given his answers to the House on many occasions. I doubt very much if he would have given a different answer today if the question had been addressed to him. I will note the question and refer it to the minister to see if he wants to elaborate further on another occasion.

* * *

TOURISM

PREDICTIONS RESPECTING BALANCING OF TOURISM BUDGET

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce: it is in connection with the deficit in the current account balance of payments.

With respect to the figures on tourism for the first three-quarters of 1978, our cumulative deficit is $1,387 million, the worst in our history. Last year, for the first three-quarters, it was $1,314 million, and the deficit in the tourism account for the first three-quarters of 1976 was $898 million. On February 26 of this year, when speaking at the Liberal party convention in Ottawa, the minister stated that Canada should come "awfully close" to balancing its tourism budget this year, after two years deficit.

My question is this: does the minister expect that there will be a surplus in the tourism account for the last quarter of this year of at least $1,300 million, so we will be "awfully close" to balancing our tourism budget; or does he agree with me that his predictions should be extinct, just like the great auk and the Newfie Bullet?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I do not know whether the Newfie Bullet should or should not be extinct, but I like to think it could provide a tourist attraction if more members of the hon. member's former government supported it.

With regard to the tourist deficit, if one looked at the figures for the past three years one would see that the growth in that deficit has definitely declined.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The Leader of the Opposition taps his desk and says, "Isn't it terrible that nobody wants to listen to me today?" I could play the game, too, with all the laughter and merriment on that side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to embarrass the hon. gentleman. I am sorry he has become crotchety because of my question. The deficit in the first three-quarters of this year was $63 million more than in the first three-quarters of last year, so I do not see how it can be declining.

My supplementary question to the minister is this: on June 10, the minister said, as reported by Canadian Press, that he would recommend to cabinet a package of promotional measures designed to reduce the lag in tourism and keep travelling Canadians at home. Perhaps handcuffs and leg-irons might do the trick.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: He said he was waiting for the recommendations of the special committee, which reported to the minister on August 30. My question is this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: You do not like it, I know, but my question is this: has the minister now made his recommendations to the cabinet, and when will his promotional measures be announced which will correct this tourism deficit, this lag which we came "awfully close" to conquering in the first three-quarters of this year?

Mr. Horner: I do not know where the hon. member has been for the past year, but everybody in Canada knows that we have made great strides in convincing Canadians to travel across Canada. Every travel agent in Canada knows—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: —and every one of my counterparts, every minister of tourism in the provinces, knows that in fact the Atlantic provinces and western Canada have benefited a great deal from the additional charter flights and the low-cost travel by rail that was brought into being by myself and announced last February.

Newfoundland, in particular, benefited a great deal because of the additional 314 charter flights which were made available to Canadians to travel within Canada this past year. We hope to upgrade them. We hope to have better co-operation from some of the major airlines. They have co-operated, but they have assured me that they will co-operate in an even better way next year.

[Mr. Horner.]

• (1432)

POST OFFICE

CANCELLATION OF NEXT-DAY DELIVERY SERVICE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the more Canadians travel around and see the country, the less popular Liberals become: perhaps there is some connection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: My question is directed to the Postmaster General: it concerns a report on the Post Office which appeared in today's press, concerning the assured next-day delivery service. According to this report, not only has this assured next-day delivery service been cancelled, but it has not been in existence for more than 18 months and Canadians have not been told about it.

Is it true that the assured next-day delivery service is not functioning, according to the minister's own departmental officials? If it is true, why were Canadians not told that the program was officially cancelled?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it is simply because Post Office people are very realistic about the service they can provide. Some time ago, when we did not have the same volume, when we did not have the same difficulties with transportation and all that, we guaranteed 24-hour delivery. Due to increased volume and various matters, we now know that we cannot give 24-hour service in all cases. Instead of lying to the people, we say that we will pick it up unconditionally. In many ways we can provide 24-hour delivery, but in certain circumstances we cannot.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General has not dealt with the question of the deception involved in this. As the minister knows, on the mailboxes which are within a couple of hundred yards of this building, Canadians are urged to make a distinction and wrap their bundles of mail in different ways, with the expectation that within 24 hours, if they mail at certain times, it will be delivered elsewhere in Canada.

Will the minister tell the House why Canadians were not told 18 months ago, when the program was cancelled, that it was cancelled?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, this program has not been cancelled; it is just phasing out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: It is.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Gong Show.

Mr. Lamontagne: May I explain why it is phasing out?

Mr. Hopkins: The Tories are phasing out.

Mr. Lamontagne: It is phasing out because for some time we had double mailboxes: one was for regional mail and the other was for local mail. Now that some of our plants have been automated, we do not need the double mailboxes. Being automated, the selection is done very rapidly at the plant. In localities where the mail is hand-sorted, there are still two boxes. There is nothing funny about phasing out a service which we do not require any more because of automation.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the program is not cancelled: it is just like the government, dying on its feet.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister said that in some parts of the country, apparently, it is still being continued. Considering that the inventor of the automated postal system—which I understand was reponsible for the complications—very recently admitted publicly that the entire system has not worked, has caused delays in the delivery of mail and has created labour problems of immense proportions, why does the government not recognize reality and cancel all the mechanical changes which have been a misapplication of technological change on a grand scale?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should get his information straight concerning the inventor. He means Mr. Porter. I know very well what was written in the newspapers. He wrote a letter to me, which I can table if the hon. member wishes, excusing himself: he said that he was misquoted, he overreacted, and that he was involved in the Post Office 25 years ago. He excused himself for saying some things that were not completely true.

* * *

[Translation]

BILINGUALISM

USE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE IN TRAINING COURSES FOR QUEBEC AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Since the Transport Canada training institute at Cornwall has decided to give courses and exams only in English, which is most unfair for the 16 Quebec student controllers in training at the institute, and since that will certainly not help improve the Canadian linguistic situation, I ask the Minister of Transport whether or not he is aware of that state of affairs and what he intends to do to have things change.

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on the general question of examinations, of course, it is obvious that air traffic controllers will have to work in English as well as French in those areas where working in both languages is involved. However, the more serious question was referred to by the hon. member in preliminary remarks on his motion under Standing Order 43.

Simply, I should like to say that I have seen indications, through the press, of certain suggestions of bias or unfairness. Obviously, that cannot be treated lightly or disregarded. But on the other hand, it would be unfair to all kinds of people to assume there was truth in the allegations until there had been a chance to investigate and to obtain the facts. That investigation is now ongoing. As soon as I have any information, I will be glad to tell the hon. member.

[Translation]

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES MINISTER WILL TAKE TO CORRECT SITUATION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just told us the courses should be bilingual. Can he then tell us first of all whether he will see to it that this matter is taken care of for, to my mind, it is most discriminatory against French Canadians and secondly, whether he will ask that courses and exams are bilingual at the air controller institute?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the question about examinations may depend somewhat on the subject, the entire nature of the course and the program. I will also attempt to obtain more detail for the hon. member on that matter.

* * *

LOTO CANADA

PURCHASING ARRANGEMENTS FOR LOTO SELECT PROGRAM

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport: it relates to the government's ill-fated Loto Select program.

Three times yesterday my leader asked the minister if she would tell the House what involvement, if any, other departments or agencies of government had in negotiating for or arranging the purchasing for the government's Loto Select program, and three times he received no answer. I wonder whether today the minister will tell the House what involvement, if any, other departments or agencies of the government had in this particular program.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, that was not the question asked by the hon. Leader of the Opposition yesterday. I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition was questioning the functions of Crown corporations. In answering the question of the hon. member for Peel-Grey-Dufferin, or whatever it is—

Miss MacDonald: It is in Ontario.

Mrs. Campagnolo: —first of all, I should like to apologize to him for endowing him with a lawyer's degree, which I understand he does not have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Second, the lottery corporation, Loto Canada, was in contact with the Department of Supply and Services with regard to the letting of the contract to General Instruments, to make sure the contract was in all respects properly compiled with respect to the Government of Canada.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in response to my question about whether there was a cancellation clause included in this particular contract, the minister refused to answer on the ground that there was a secrecy clause which prevented her from so doing. What was the reason for the inclusion in that contract of a secrecy clause which forbids Canadians knowing the provisions of the contract for $23 million to provide computer services?

● (1442)

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is really a repetition of the question asked yesterday. When the contract is completed, and when General Instruments have reached an end to negotiations with Loto Canada, as I have said, I will be pleased to table in the House of Commons the information which will provide the answers the hon. member is looking for.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that this minister is not prepared to disclose to parliament why the secrecy clause was included; therefore, I would like to address my supplementary to the Minister of Supply and Services.

In view of the fact that his department was partly responsible for negotiating this costly contract, will he tell the House what possible justification there could be for the inclusion in the contract of a secrecy clause which denies Canadians the right to know the provisions of that $23 million contract, including whether or not there is a cancellation clause in it?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions since the Loto Select file was opened my department has been involved in various aspects and stages of the issue; further, when we started negotiations with the General Instrument Corporation, they refused to give us specific details on the unit cost because of its—

[English]

—pricing strategy and its price in competition with other firms. What we did succeed in obtaining, though, is what we call the best price for the best customers. I have been convinced by officials in my department who have looked at the last transaction and other lotos which have been concluded by some states in the United States that we did obtain the best prices.

[Miss MacDonald.]

As the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) has said, we have not yet wrapped up everything, but I can assure the House that after everything is settled, in order to protect the legal rights of the state I will publish every detail of that transaction.

* * *

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—RESOURCE MANAGEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. At the recent federal-provincial conference of first ministers, on the economy, the minister when speaking of fisheries' development said, "they resisted chasing pie in the sky in the sea", which reminded me of a statement made by a former Social Credit leader when he said, "If this issue catches fire, it will snowball all the way across the prairies." The minister also said that the value of the fishing industry depends upon what is done on shore, and that in this area there was little or no action being taken by the provinces in spite of the fact that it came within provincial scope.

In light of the fact that the provincial minister of fisheries for Newfoundland, the hon. Walter Carter, has announced a program of resource management up to 1985 covering harvesting, the development of an inshore, midwater and offshore fleet, plus upgrading the quality of fish and the training of fishermen; in fact, a program that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crouse: I would ask the minister how he can say that no attention is being paid by the provinces to the problems of fishermen, and when can we expect an announcement of federal participation toward the carrying out of the plan announced in Newfoundland?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member had not taken the pie in the sky example, because I consciously put it in there to bring to the attention of some people a very simple reality, namely, that the 200-mile zone and the oceans, if we take care of them, will help us; but we cannot expect them to support every aspect of the economy. It was one way of underscoring that fact, and I thank the hon. member for helping me to do so.

I also wish the hon. member had read the entire text of what I said at the premiers' conference, because he would find that the message I was trying to get across was that if the provinces—which are generally responsible for what happens to fish on shore—were discharging these responsibilities, then the real wealth of the 200-mile zone would be realized, because that is where the great development will take place.

With regard to the program brought forth by the province of Newfoundland, I think it contains many positive elements and I am happy to see that that government is moving closer toward the policy I have been advocating and which we published in 1975.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, would the minister tell the House if he has examined the primary handling and distribution centre concept put forth by the Newfoundland government following in-depth studies by the Canadian Kellogg Company, which will revolutionize fishing and plant operations on the Avalon Peninsula and the east and northeast coast of Newfoundland and which will put an estimated 4,500 people to work? If so, does the minister agree with it, in light of the high unemployment rate in this area, and will the federal government be participating financially in the development of this plan?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, leaving aside rhetoric, I agree with a number of measures contained in the plan, as I have indicated.

There are a couple of areas where I disagree, and I will give the hon. member a few examples. For examples, part of the proposal is based on a large fishmeal operation for capelin. This was probably quite acceptable 1½ years ago, but with the condition of stocks at the present time I have some doubt that it is now feasible.

The other matter is that the plan presupposes that fish would be caught, frozen at sea and then delivered to plants where it would be thawed out, processed and refrozen. The economics of that operation are not yet convincing; in fact, they are so unconvincing that the industry has been very shy about this sort of operation for a number of years. Obviously, this can be examined and weighed against social implications in terms of job creation, etc. This approach should not be considered as the panacea for all the ills of the region.

* * *

[Translation]

PENITENTIARIES

IMPLICATIONS OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF HOUSE COMMITTEE PERTAINING TO IDENTIFICATION OF GUARDS AND INMATES

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, to whom I sent notice of my question on November 22, since it is never too late to do things properly. During a visit I made to the Laval maximum security penitentiary I noted that some inmates did not carry identification while only one out of three guards carried some, and this is one of the things recommended by the justice and legal affairs subcommittee. Could the minister tell the House how many of those recommendations have been implemented up to now, how many are left and finally could the latest budget cuts be detrimental to prison security?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. When I appeared before the parliamentary commission last week I explained what progress we had made as regards implementation of the subcommittee's recommendations. There are 38 recommendations which have been or are about to be implemented, Mr. Speaker, and one of them deals with identification tags for guards and identification cards for prisoners. We have had problems in making sure that guards wear their identification tags, but the recommendations have been accepted and we are putting all our efforts in ensuring that identification requirements are adhered to by both inmates and guards. As for security, I remind the hon. member that one of the main functions of the Canadian Penitentiary Service is the provision of security measures. No budget cut can have the effect of hindering security in the penitentiaries.

* * *

● (1452)

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS BY BOARD

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, regarding the Wheat Board's decision to use the money of farmers for the purchase of hopper cars.

There were discussions last Tuesday afternoon at the National Farmers Union convention with officials of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Grain Commission. Canadian Wheat Board officials said they did not want to buy the cars, but were forced to do so as a last resort in order to protect grain exports and our grain handling capability, because the government and the railroads refused to buy the necessary cars.

In view of the fact that one of the most urgent problems is hopper car supply, and since it is projected that the railroads will continue to phase cars out of grain service at the rate of 1,800 per year for the next several years, will the minister now require the railroads, as requested by the Wheat Board, to purchase 4,000 hopper cars and repair 5,000 boxcars in order to provide suitable facilities for the hauling of grain; and failing that, will the government do it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked me to require the railways to do something. It is a request which I am not at all sure I have the power to carry out. My first difficulty, therefore, is that he asks me to do something for which I do not have the necessary legal power.

The fact is that there is a very complicated argument about the number of cars required in 1979 and 1980 to carry grain. It is possible to take a cautious, different attitude with regard to that matter. The CPR has maintained that it has enough cars to carry its share of our projected 23 million tons of grain. I have indicated to them that I have some concern about that conclusion. I am considering the powers of the Canadian Transport Commission and of myself in relation to it, should it not prove to be a fact. I have done that particularly in the context of their failure to agree to repair additional boxcars, half at our expense and half at theirs.

In the case of the CNR, there was not that measure of disagreement, and the CN had earlier agreed to repair 1,000 boxcars, half at our expense and half at theirs. After the CPR refusal, CN agreed to repair another 1,000 boxcars. We will be entering into an agreement with them in order to pay one-half of that cost as well. The Canadian Wheat Board, wanting to be sure—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre on a supplementary.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in order to help the minister continue his speech, I will ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister, a former dean of law, has some doubts about his legal capacity, I would refer him to section 262 of the Railway Act.

Since the Canadian Wheat Board urged the purchase of these cars and the repair of another 5,000 cars, as we are told by the minister, supported by the CNR and refused by the CPR, I ask the minister if he will require Canadian Pacific, under the provisions of the Railway Act, to cease investing money in the United States for the purchase of other property and provide suitable and adequate facilities for the movement of traffic in Canada on their railway lines.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said he was not a lawyer and I recognize that fact. The problem, which I thought I made clear to him, is that as long as a railway can maintain that it has adequate equipment, then some of the powers which may lie under the law in other circumstances do not apply.

I think it is important to recognize that in this case the Canadian Wheat Board take the view that they want to be absolutely sure about having the equipment. That is the basis of their decision. We have the same difficulty with regard to terminal facilities, where terminal companies are cautious about expanding facilities because they like to use what they have to the full before they move to the expansion that the Wheat Board and this government urge upon them.

* * *

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PERMANENT HOURS OF WORK EXEMPTION FOR COUNTRY ELEVATOR AGENTS

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Labour which deals with a contentious issue in western Canada, namely, the hours of work of the country grain elevator agent-managers?

Can the minister announce an exemption, preferably a permanent exemption, from the provisions of part III, relating to hours of work, of the Canada Labour Code for the grain buyers of western Canada?

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member probably knows, an exemption is now in place and will terminate on February 1, 1979. This question is on my desk. I think we all understand that until some five years ago elevator agents were considered managers. That status was upset by a judgment of the Canada Relations Board on due process. Since then, efforts have been made to work out a suitable hours of work regime for persons now classed as employees and who, therefore, come under the protection of the law as parliament passed it.

I am trying to find a balance between the interests of farmers, particularly at seeding and harvest time who have need for essential elevator services, and people who perhaps work hours well in addition to the normal. I am trying to balance those interests with the interests of persons as employees. I trust a satisfactory method can be found to balance these interests.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport, in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board? In view of the understanding he left with the western farm groups this fall, that that exemption would be granted, would he use his good offices to persuade his colleagues to grant a permanent exemption under the act?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague just demonstrated his very full grasp of the problem and indicated that he had the matter before him at this time. I am confident of the wisdom of the solution which will emerge.

* * *

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

TWO MARKETING SYSTEMS FOR GRAIN

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport, responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, in an area that concerns the Canadian Wheat Board?

The chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board has been quoted as saying that the two marketing systems, that is, the open market system and the Wheat Board marketing system, cannot operate together, certainly not as they are presently set up. Does the minister agree with the statement of the chief commissioner? Could he inform the House if the Wheat Board, or the government, are giving consideration to changes in the Wheat Board system of marketing in Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree that the way the systems were operating in the early part of last autumn made it difficult for them to operate successfully side by side. The end of switching, particularly the kind of switching which was not related to a sale at the country elevator, however, has gone a long way toward improving that situation.

I believe other things can be done of a minimal nature in trying to improve the system, but I do not see any basis for terminating the general approach of an open policy with regard to feed grains. I have told those who want to terminate it that they should first have an answer to the question we were asking in 1971 and 1972 as to how we could have fair pricing in feed grains across the country. If they come up with another solution to that problem which is superior to the open market system we now have, I would, of course, be happy to consider it.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are the government or the Canadian Wheat Board giving consideration to ideas being put forward in western Canada to introduce more competition at the elevator level in order to allow any aspect of the elevator companies to have more say in the control of boxcars, for example? This has been suggested by the United Grain Growers and one of the pool organizers. Is this idea being considered, and could the minister comment on whether anything will be done about it?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would say, generally, that the whole question of the control of cars and the maximization of their use is under consideration, both because the consultants will be looking at that aspect and also because it is obviously of vital importance to the whole question of grain movement.

● (1502)

I think that over the years the Wheat Board has tended to give preference to non-board grain, because it was controlling the cars and did not want to appear to be favouring its own grain. With the importance of non-board grains of a variety of types, this becomes a questionable procedure and some alternatives may certainly be required in that regard.

* * *

NARCOTICS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO REDUCE HEROIN ABUSE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

On Friday, my colleague from Fraser Valley East asked the minister whether there were any federal funds available, or about to be made available, to the province of British Columbia to assist in the health entry program, a program for the treatment of heroin addicts. The minister indicated there were not. If that is so, why was it the former minister of justice, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, stated four weeks ago that there would be money available, and why is it there is a letter to the former minister of justice from the attorney general of the province of British Columbia complaining that the word of the government has been broken in this regard?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that part of the question which has to do with the accountability of my colleague, the former minister of justice, should be asked of him. I do not know what the statement was. I can explain my contribution and responsibility.

As Minister of National Health and Welfare for Canada, responsible for health in Canada and social services, I stated that there is no way in which we can give to one particular province an additional $16 million—which was the original request—when, if I remember correctly, that province is now being given close to $586 million in block funding for health purposes only, plus another amount for social services, which it can apply to any new hospital facilities it wishes to develop for the treatment of drug addicts.

Under what is really left to the federal government, namely, experimental development, I have offered to the province a special, additional fourth year extension of the program called Alternatives. That is what I referred to last Friday in this House.

Mr. Fraser: Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Reports and information have been received that a commitment was made by the former minister of justice that there would be funds, not for the government's Alternatives program but for this particular program which British Columbia is launching because British Columbia has the largest number of heroin addicts in the country; consequently, it has incurred greater cost in dealing with them.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether the government, through the former minister, made a commitment, or did the government not make a commitment? I understand perfectly the problems of the Minister of National Health and Welfare; however, I think the people of British Columbia are entitled to know whether a commitment was made or not.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the situation is quite clear. The Minister of National Health and Welfare speaks for the government with respect to matters within her portfolio. She has already indicated the position with respect to her responsibility.

Mr. Fraser: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, the question directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare was not adequately answered; that is why it is now being put to the government.

The question remains, did a former minister of this government make a commitment to the province of British Columbia to assist, or did he not? Surely that is a question the Deputy Prime Minister can answer. That is the allegation; that is the suggestion; that is the information I have obtained. Surely the Deputy Prime Minister can give an answer to that question. I do not want to hear anything more from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, because she does not have an answer.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add to the obviously incomplete answer that I gave earlier. The first request from the government of British Columbia came to me, as Minister of National Health and Welfare of this country. It was for $16 million. The British Columbia government, which split on that issue, finally decided to have a program costing only $4 million. It is still split on this issue.

I have said there is no way in which a particular province is going to use one particular disease or special circumstance, such as having more drug addicts in the province, to ask for more money, because each province has particular circumstances of one sort or another which are covered under the very generous block funding agreement on the health side.

* * *

[Translation]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

RESPONSIBILITY OF PROVINCES FOR FEDERAL FUNDS USED FOR TEACHING OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and it deals with federal-provincial agreements on financing to support the teaching of the country's official languages.

Since this question has been raised on numerous occasions by myself and other hon. members, I would like to know if the provinces will be made accountable for the federal money used to teach the official languages. As these agreements will be terminated in March, 1979, can the Secretary of State tell us when the negotiations on that matter will begin and if he intends to demand that the provinces be accountable for all federal funds spent for teaching our official languages?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations to renew these agreements with the provinces will start early next week.

[English]

Obviously the House would not expect me to lay out in detail what it is we would be suggesting. I want to assure hon. members that the government does not intend to diminish its efforts in this area. We are concerned about having greater accountability, greater reporting, and success in meeting the objectives of the agreement. We will be proposing a rather strong shift away from the present emphasis on formula payments, to the non-formula side. I think that is about all I can say as to the position we will be taking at the conference.

[Mr. Fraser.]

NARCOTICS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO REDUCE HEROIN ABUSE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister, since it deals with the obligation of the government to keep its word.

Was a commitment made by a former senior member of this government to the province of British Columbia with regard to the heroin addiction program? Is it the intention of the government to keep the word of that former senior minister? If the Deputy Prime Minister does not know, will he give us an undertaking to find out all the details? Also, will he tell us whether it is a matter of policy of this government to keep the word given by senior ministers to provinces such as British Columbia on questions of this kind?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition realizes that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is the minister speaking on behalf of the government with respect to such a program.

If, indeed, a commitment had been given by any member of the government, carrying the authority of the government, it would be known and supported by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I can understand that the former minister of justice, as a minister from the province of British Columbia, might have exhibited, as I do on many occasions with respect to my province, a sympathetic and forthcoming attitude to support particular projects. However, it does not constitute, and ought not to be taken as, a commitment on the part of any minister when such a sympathetic attitude is put forward. Policy with regard to departmental responsibilities is obviously expressed by the minister who has the statutory responsibility for these programs. In this case, it is the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Clark: Just to be clear on this, Mr. Speaker, is the Deputy Prime Minister saying that when the former minister of justice made that commitment on behalf of the Government of Canada, he was not speaking on behalf of the Government of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition asked whether there was a commitment. Now he has stated there was a commitment. He ought not to ask questions on matters about which he has already informed himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1512)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: I have received three notices with respect to questions of privilege, but I am conscious of the fact that we are in the process of debating a question of privilege at the present time, and I really do not see any way in which I can interrupt one question of privilege to take into account another.

Yesterday, although there was some doubt about the status of the matter we were debating, I indicated that my disposition was to consider the matter as a motion and that it ought to remain as a motion, and that therefore, when we reached routine proceedings today, we would resume debate on that matter. I cannot see how other matters can be dealt with until we get to that point. However, there are items under routine proceedings, called normally every day, which bring us to the consideration of motions, and we ought to go through those steps.

There is a difficulty about the reporting of the decision I made yesterday, with regard to which I shall have something to say to the House a little later. For the moment, I would call those items under routine proceedings which will take us into further discussion of the motion in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

POST OFFICE

TABLING OF LETTER FROM MR. PORTER

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as regards the question put by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I mentioned that I was going to table a letter to complete his information, considering that without this additional information the question might raise confusion or be subject to a wrong interpretation.

That is why I will be pleased, Mr. Speaker, to table Mr. Porter's letter which clearly defines his position as regards the Post Office.

* * *

INTERNATIONAL TAX AGREEMENTS

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-7, to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Korea and Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and an agreement between Canada and Jamaica for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, be read the first time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

* * *

[English]

THE PRESS

The Press

GROSSLY AND FUNDAMENTALLY INACCURATE REPORTING OF MR. SPEAKER'S DECISION ALLEGED

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have indicated I would not interrupt the continuation of the debate on the matter raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) by any procedural matter, neither questions of privilege nor points of order which arose during the question period, nor indeed, by reference to any of those three matters of which I have received notice. There is one question of privilege before the House and I think I ought to give it priority over other proceedings of the House at this time.

Having placed the subject on the order paper, under motions, the House should return to the consideration of the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham which we were in the process of dealing with yesterday at six o'clock. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) had the floor at six o'clock and a few minutes were left to him in which to continue the discussion. That will be the situation when I conclude the remarks I want to address to the House in a moment.

The House will know that the subject which was under discussion yesterday, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, had one or two rather special features attached to it. I was at great pains to mention one of them, both on November 9 and yesterday: it was a departure from some of our practices in the past where, in circumstances of this sort, attacks had been made directly upon a minister or the government with respect to a communication of this sort.

I do not think it was my function, in reaching a decision, to indicate that in some way, in the course of debate on this question, the government was immune from attack. I certainly did not do that. Neither did I say, nor was I invited to say, by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham or by others who participated in the discussion, that the hon. member was misled by the government of the day or that he was deliberately misled by the government of the day. As a matter of fact, one of the points that I made was that we were not, as had sometimes been done in the past, holding the minister accountable in this process but that we were going around the minister to deal with this official.

In the contributions which were made to the debate from both sides of the House there were several arguments and submissions that the action complained of was one whereby the solicitor general of the day may have been deceived. I am carefully trying to avoid coming to conclusions about this, but I think I ought to review the discussion to keep it in context, and that was that the solicitor general of the day may very well have been deceived by the action which was the subject of the complaint by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

I was making the point that by going around the minister to get to an official who may have first of all deceived the minister and, through the minister, deceived the member, and therefore the House, we were embarking upon a procedure which was unique in that respect.

I can therefore only express my shock and dismay when the reporting of that decision seems to indicate that I had somehow found an element which not only was I not asked to find but which, of course, I did not find, and that was that the member had been misled by the government and, in turn, the House had been deliberately misled by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I want simply to say, not by way of any procedural point, that since we as a parliament are at great pains on both sides of the House to support and maintain a press gallery whose function it is to stay here and observe the proceedings of the House, obviously with a view to examining and reporting accurately and carefully the proceedings of the House, and since that particular decision seemed important enough to attract a large amount of attention to it, it is particularly disturbing that, when it does attract that kind of attention, the reporting of it should be so grossly and fundamentally inaccurate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—MINISTERIAL CORRESPONDENCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, December 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lawrence:

That the letter sent by the Solicitor General of the day to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham on December 4, 1973, and the testimony of former RCMP Commissioner Higgitt on October 24 and November 1, 1978, before the royal commission of inquiry (McDonald commission) concerning the practice of the RCMP in preparing letters for the signature of the Solicitor General, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation and report.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to pursue the points I was making yesterday; I note that following your remarks only members on this side of the House and the New Democratic Party approve. For my final argument, I want to go back to the remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has the floor.

• (1522)

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, here is what the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham said yesterday, speaking of the solicitor general in 1973 who wrote him the letter he wants deferred to the committee, and I quote from page 1860 of Hansard for that day:

—he should be given an opportunity in the committee to tell us his side of the question.

I am talking of the then solicitor general. He should be given the opportunity to make known his side of the question in the House, if we are genuinely seeking the truth with regard to this matter without partisan consideration. On that ground alone members who support the government should examine their consciences as they vote on this motion this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, that type of statement and insinuation is really irresponsible on the part of any hon. member who would be honourable and courageous to any degree. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham was here in the House when, on November 3 last, I had occasion to quote excerpts from the testimony of the solicitor general in 1973 (Mr. Allmand) before the Keable commission in Quebec on February 15, 1978, and I can only refer you to Hansard for November 3, 1978, on page 786, where I quote the replies of the then solicitor general who unequivocally and categorically denied that he was aware that the RCMP opened mail, contrary to the allegation contained in the letter written to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. The hon. member who presented a motion of privilege yesterday, when he asked that the former solicitor general appear before a committee of the House, knew full well that the then solicitor general had made known his position on the matter, and that, unequivocally. I therefore submit with all due respect that it is unfair for that former solicitor general to insinuate and indicate that he never took a stand, never committed himself and to refuse to comment on the matter.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to refer you to the statements I made in the House on November 3 this year in the presence of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, at which time I quoted excerpts from the testimony of Mr. Warren Allmand before the Keable commission on February 15, 1978. I quote:

—the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) referred this morning to the testimony made by the same Solicitor General on February 15, 1978 before the Keable commission. He quoted only one answer but he could have added the two following answers on pages 50 and 51 of the document he referred to. The then solicitor general, Mr. Allmand, said, and I quote:

'No, I was told on every occasion that they did not open mail.'

And a little further during the same inquiry, the solicitor general said, and I quote:

'The first time I found out that they did open mail was when it became public after I left, you know, in recent months.'

Mr. Speaker, this is evidence the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham should have considered yesterday before insinuating that a committee of this House should be formed, if only to hear the account of the former solicitor general. As the result of such statements, implications of unkind innuendos, untrue and incorrect newspaper reports and headings have appeared and it is due to the irresponsibility of some Conservative members in the House that quite often certain media absolutely destort the facts. Mr. Speaker, we only have to refer to the decision you made yesterday and to quote a very clear excerpt. On page 1856 of Hansard, while rendering your decision whether there was a prima facie case for a question of privilege to allow the House to go further, you stated in your decision, I quote:

> The complaint which is the subject matter of the question of privilege is not directly a complaint about the minister.

Mr. Speaker, it could not be clearer. I cannot understand how certain media and members could possibly disagree and suggest or print the following heading as did Le Devoir: "Member of parliament deliberately misled by Warren Allmand". Mr. Speaker, this is irresponsible and absolutely untrue as you mentioned in the House yesterday afternoon. Again, Mr. Speaker, I quote the ruling you made yesterday:

> The complaint which is the subject matter of the question of privilege is not directly a complaint about the minister. Indeed, if is founded on the fact that it is one of the minister's officials who has calculated to contrive this deliberate deception of the House.

Mr. Speaker, one has to be completely ignorant to interpret your statements and your decision as certain media did yesterday and in particular as a journalist of Le Devoir headed his article. The exact opposite happened in the House and it is an insult not only to the House but to all Canadians to say such unpleasant and unacceptable lies.

Mr. Speaker, another fact bears stressing. We should debunk what the Progressive Conservative members are trying to achieve with this question of privilege in the House. Nobody here wants to avoid truth, nobody wants to hide facts. We know that the McDonald commission exists under a federal act, I said so yesterday, and we all know that it is under the Inquiries Act and section 4 of that act that the commissioners are empowered to question ministers, to call them before them and to make recommendations about them once the inquiry is completed.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat in this House what I have already said: the former solicitors general who are directly or indirectly concerned by the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for that period, all those former solicitors general and the present Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) are anxious to be called before the McDonald commission and tell their version of the facts, and more particularly former solicitor general Allmand. On February 15, 1978, before the Keable Commission in Quebec city, he already denied under oath, categorically and explicitly, that he had been aware the RCMP was tampering with letters at the time he wrote his letter to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. And this member, Mr. Speaker, has shown irresponsibility when he required yesterday that a parliamentary committee be set up to enable former solicitor general Allmand to take position.

Mr. Speaker, the former solicitor general has made his position clear. He has nothing to reproach himself; he categorically denies all allegations about irregularities and he is ready to testify again before the McDonald commission. Therefore it should not be suggested to the Canadian public nor insinuated in front of the people who watch us that the former solicitor general, his successors or the government want to hide the truth. On the contrary. They are prepared to testify before a democratic institution established under a law passed by this parliament. They want to do it in an atmosphere as objective as possible, Mr. Speaker, devoid of all petty politics and partisan tendencies, which would not be the case of a parliamentary committee where hon. members amuse themselves by taking out fragments of evidence and letters to make demagogy of the worst kind, as was shown by the statements generally made by the Progressive Conservative members on this irrational question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude my remarks by saying simply that the main reason why we on this side want this question of privilege to be dealt with is that we understand well the evidence, the parliamentary process and the well documented decision you gave yesterday. We know that whether there is a question of privilege or not is not decided by you but by the House. All hon. members will have to vote on the motion which is presently before us. All you have to do under the parliamentary procedure, and you explained this properly but apparently some media did not understand it, is to determine whether according to some allegations there is a prima facie case of privilege, whether superficially there is an important matter to enable the House to discuss the substance of the matter and to decide whether there is a question of privilege or not.

It is a little similar to a preliminary inquiry before the courts, Mr. Speaker. In the preliminary inquiry, the judge does not rule on the substance of the matter. If there are prima facie facts which lead to believe that charges should be laid against the accused, the doubt is at that time against the accused. It is only during the trial itself that the principle of the benefit of the doubt is in favour of the accused, and the preliminary inquiry enables the judge to observe prima facie evidence. We know very well that nine times out of ten, during the preliminary inquiry, the judge decides charges should be laid against the accused who is afterwards entitled to the benefit of the doubt, during his trial. By analogy, Mr. Speaker, that is what you did yesterday. You said, at first sight, I will not go into details, you will discuss it, the motion is debatable and you will settle the matter, for my part, I think that prima facie it is sufficiently founded, there is enough evidence to allow a debate on the matter to take place and I allow the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham to move his motion. That is all you did and it is correct, it respects the rules of procedure. As for us, members from both sides of the House, yesterday and today we accept our responsibilities, we respect parliamentary procedure and we decide whether or not there is ground for privilege. We are the ones who will rule on the question of privilege, as it is our duty to do so.

Following the interventions that have been made, we realize it would be pernicious, unfortunate and ridiculous to establish a second body to inquire into facts that are already being investigated by a commission created by parliament itself. The argument of parallelism, of the parallel existence of two parliamentary bodies investigating the same matter, and possibly leading to contradictory reports, the principle of avoiding two parallel inquiries should, by itself, suffice to justify an intelligent act, that is to reject the motion before us. It is inconceivable, Mr. Speaker, that on the one hand parliament be allowed to ask judges to inquire into the activities of the RCMP and that on the other hand this same parliament say: "Yes, but we do not believe in that too much, and that may take time, so we will not take any chances, we will use parts of the evidence and set up a little committee composed of members from the various parties, and make our own little inquiry at the same time, and if our report comes out before the McDonald commission's report, well, let us just hope that it comes to the same conclusions as ours".

This shows, Mr. Speaker, the absurdity of this whole situation. It seems to me that Canadians are now faced with enough serious problems that they have a right to expect a much more responsible behaviour on the part of the members of this House than what has been shown since yesterday, especially among the Progressive Conservatives. It is this same Progressive Conservative party, Mr. Speaker, which was complaining that we were not proceeding quickly enough with the consideration of the motion to create the new department. It is at its insistence that we wanted to debate the motion yesterday, that we wanted to put it on yesterday's order paper. But it is also because of its attitude that we were prevented from doing so, because we had to debate a question of privilege which is not finished and which we are still discussing today, Mr. Speaker.

No doubt that the serious people watching us will come to two conclusions. First, that the Progressive Conservative party is wasting the time of the House and that of Canadians, because the government is ready to move on to other matters and, therefore, the Progressive Conservative party is not assuming its responsibilities and could not care less about the Canadian people; and second, that the Canadian public will have the opportunity to realize that the government has assumed its responsibilities. What the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is complaining about, namely the illegal opening of the mail, is the subject of an inquiry just now, and the government certainly assumed its responsibilities when it set up this inquiry commission which is currently working very seriously, and which is empowered to call in as witnesses not only the people of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but politicians, past and present solicitors general as well. A royal commission will soon make its report. Why ask it to duplicate the efforts of another institution and waste its time by studying the same facts simultaneously, as I said earlier?

Mr. Speaker, this in short is the situation I wanted to explain on behalf of the government and this is why we want to settle the matter, as provided in our parliamentary procedure, by voting against this motion to avoid a duplication of efforts, to avoid the danger of contradictory reports, to avoid bringing ridicule on this institution since it has already passed legislation to establish a royal commission which is doing its job and its duty, as well as to show some respect for the former solicitor general who has been subjected to all sorts of charges and suspicions. Moreover, as hon. members will have seen, I wanted in concluding my intervention to make a rectification and call to order certain irresponsible people who have publicly spread lies, rumours and misrepresentations of the facts, especially as on the first page of Le Devoir of today we can see the title "Member of parliament deliberately misled by Warren Allmand". Mr. Speaker, this shows a total lack of responsibility or complete ignorance of the facts. Mr. Speaker, I consider the person who gave such a title to this article a fool, a simpleton or an ignoramus. He has lost contact with reality, he shows no respect for the very clear observations that you made in your ruling yesterday, he is completely divorced from reality, he has falsified what has happened in the House of Commons and misled the Canadian public, and he should be reprimanded publicly as I am now doing, Mr. Speaker, in closing my comments on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

• (1532)

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I was just checking with the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert to see if he wanted to precede me but, if that is not the case, I will continue briefly.

I consider it a privilege to be able to take part in this debate. I must say that I am disappointed by the attitude of my fellow Nova Scotian, the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who more and more frequently appears to intervene in the House and to use his great parliamentary talents in an attempt to restrict the activities of members of the House trying to uncover information.

I listened with great care to the speech made by the minister's parliamentary secretary, which I thought, if I may say so with all kindness, to be rather repetitious. It seemed to say, in effect, that what we should do is abandon our responsibilities as the House of Commons to the McDonald commission. Implicit in that was the question, to use his terms: what more democratic institution is there than the McDonald commission? That may very well be so, but I would have thought that the House is at least as important an institution, at least as democratic an institution, as the McDonald commission, and certainly much more important and much more long lasting.

I was intrigued also by the fact that so far the government has been represented only by the Deputy Prime Minister and by his parliamentary secretary. Without in any way reflecting on the quality of what they have done and what they have said, I would have thought that since we have such a plethora of former solicitors general in the House, who presumably are very interested in the background of the matter, we would have had an intervention from at least one of them, if not from the present Solicitor General (Mr. Blais).

I do not really believe that anyone suspects, that the solicitor general in question who wrote the letter—at least I do not—deliberately misled anybody, in the technical sense. I have felt, and I am on the record in the House as suggesting, that a number of solicitors general, perhaps through their own negligence, have not fulfilled their statutory responsibilities in keeping themselves informed as to what the true situation is with respect to their duties.

Section 5 of the RCMP Act is very explicit. I will quote it, it is very brief. It states:

The governor in council may appoint an officer to be known as the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who, under the direction——of the minister, has the control and management of the force and all matters connected therewith.

I emphasize the word "direction".

In this particular instance it is very obvious what has happened. Someone prepared a letter for the attention of the then solicitor general, the contents of which caused that hon. gentleman to give the wrong information to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), and that is what we are debating here in essence.

Just as in the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) who had a similar, valid, prima facie case of privilege, as found by the Chair, we find the government, instead of allowing the proper committee of parliament, which is the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to proceed with its duty and look into this important matter, using all its resources to block this procedure. Just as it did in the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, no doubt we will see the government mustering every vote possible to keep the committee from looking into the background of a matter which, I would think, using logic, the former solicitors general and the government would very much want to see. They should want to see what really happened and who was at fault.

If the then solicitor general is not culpable, then somebody is, and surely nobody over there would want to allow that sort of serious misconduct to go unpunished, or at least unreprimanded. Right now we in the House have no idea how this happened, and what better body than the committee to find this pertinent piece of information?

I have been concerned, as I said before, about the attitude of the government and of various solicitors general. This particular case, involving as it does privileges of members, is not a unique one. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) had occasion at one time to be concerned about a letter that was inspected by the technical unit of the RCMP. I do not know whether or not he ever received an adequate explanation for it.

The same thing happened to me, and I wrote to Your Honour about it. As the letter indicates, I did not wish to make a big fuss about it but I was curious as to how this innocuous letter addressed to me, containing one piece of paper, was inspected by the RCMP technical branch. I am sure it is coincidental that the letter dealt with the concern of the writer for the treatment handed out to Peter Worthington of the Toronto Sun. It is probably just a coincidence. However, all I wanted to find out, sir, from the Solicitor General—since there was a place in the stamp that was affixed, presumably by one of the technicians of the force, for a signature and a date on which the letter was inspected—was, when this occurred and, if possible, the name of the officer or the technician who did it so that I could have a chat with him. After exchanging a lot of correspondence, I am no further ahead now than when I started. That is the kind of co-operation that members get in this chamber from the government.

An hon. Member: You don't know how to write a letter.

Mr. MacKay: A member says I do not know how to write a letter. I would have accepted a most rudimentary letter, even if it was full of misspellings and so on, from the government in response to my, perhaps, poor efforts. The solicitor general said that he took this up with the commissioner. I will quote from his letter to me of July 19 in which he said:

The commissioner further informs me that the points which you have raised have all been noted with interest by senior force personnel. Additionally, the commissioner has directed, as a result of your correspondence, that the mail screening operation at the Parliament Buildings be the subject of an examination in an attempt to alleviate any existing deficiencies, and to generally improve upon the operation whenever possible.

● (1542)

I do not know whether that is reassuring or not. I accept it in the spirit it was written, but I am still no further ahead.

The attitude of the government toward civil rights and toward the concerns of members of parliament and ordinary citizens leaves an awful lot to be desired. On February 7, 1977, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question relating to this subject. As reported at page 2777 of Hansard, he replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I for one, as a Canadian, would not admit that we have lesser rights than the Americans. They may have more abuses there and that is why, perhaps, they have to have corrective measures. I do not think the people suspect the RCMP of conducting themselves as the FBI do.

That was a gratuitous insult to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the FBI, two fine police forces. Why did he give such a nebulous answer? Since that time, that statement of the Prime Minister, as so many of his have been known to do over time, has not really stood up. We find in fact that the RCMP have recruited people from the FBI to come and work in Canada, such as Mr. Hart. I find no fault with that. The only fault I find is the manner in which they treated him, and the way they are so determined to keep him from testifying, so far at least, before the McDonald commission of inquiry.

I should like to contrast that with what is going on in the United States. In a recent edition of the Globe and Mail the following appeared:

Who says the Canadian system is better than the American?

In the United States, the government is giving $1,000 cheques to citizens who had their mail intercepted by the CIA.

What a beautiful way to stimulate the economy, if we knew how many Canadians have had their mail intercepted.

Mr. Lawrence: It would cost too much.

Mr. MacKay: I suspect that is the truth. The article continues:

In Canada the victims of mail monitoring by the Mounties are getting beans all. Thus far the government has not even divulged who the victims were.

As I mentioned in my speech last week, certainly there has been a systematic attempt over the years, a highly sophisticated one in nearly every major city in the country, by the security service, authorized at highest levels, to intercept the mail of some people. In many cases I am sure the abuses would boggle the mind, if they were all brought to the attention of Canadians.

It continues:

Recently a federal appeals court affirmed a decision requiring the U.S. government to make payments to three people identified as targets by the CIA.

Citing this as the test case, attorney Melvin Wulf is now asking the government for the same $1,000 settlement for the "tens of thousands" of others who had their mail snitched.

It is incredible that up to a few months ago the then postmaster general, the present Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), stood up in the House of Commons and solemnly assured us that mail was not being opened, as one of his predecessors assured the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. I am making no reflection on the Solicitor General deliberately misleading anyone. But indeed, there was a facade or a front used to mislead people in this country and in this parliament, for one reason or another, for years and years and years, about mail openings.

I do not intend to speak long. I am sorry the Solicitor General is not present because I wanted to ask him a question. I should like to explore what was going on concerning the activities of the RCMP vis-à-vis the Parti Québécois in the last few years. I doubt there is anyone in the House of Commons who has any sympathy whatsoever with the political aims of the Parti Québécois. However, it is a legitimately elected party. This is not Iran; this is not a country where repressive measures are taken on the basis of political disagreement. At least I should hope not. In fact, we received some assurance in a letter from the right hon. Prime Minister to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) last year. Page 4 of that letter reads as follows:

No person in Canada is immune from observation, surveillance or detection, if it is determined that such person has been or is engaged in activities that are defined in the Official Secrets Act as being subversive.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Prima facie, I am sure no one can complain about that. We recognize that the enemies of our country, who are doing things which they should not, should not be immune from surveillance or punishment simply because they belong to any organization, or because they happen to be members of the House of Commons, the Senate, or any other institution. I want to be fair, and if my impression is wrong I want members to correct me.

Based on my perusal of Hansard and my recollection of past statements by various members of the government, I have the impression that as far as the security service and the government are concerned, it was stated the Parti Québécois was never punished or harassed as such simply for being the Parti Québécois. There may have been some concern about terrorist elements attached to it going back to the 1960s, or infiltrating the party. The Prime Minister went on record and said that it was a very acceptable party, that it was democratically elected, and so on. As a matter of fact, on October 31, 1977, the then solicitor general said the following:

No democratic political party of any stripe can be, should be or ought to be the object of systematic surveillance by the RCMP. That has been made clear time and time again in this House by the Prime Minister.

He was replying to a question which was asked by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). He continued:

As to the other part of the question, where I think some confusion arises, the Prime Minister is obviously referring to the fact that this question concerning the computer tapes on which the lists of members of the Parti Québécois were included was brought to his attention at the end of last week or at the beginning of last week. I think it is as simple as that and the confusion once again rests in the mind of the reader.

At that time the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party was concerned, as he had every right to be, about the democratic process and what pressures, if any, were being brought to bear on the Parti Québécois which were improper, in so far as its legitimate political activities were concerned.

Personally I have no time for the Parti Québécois, but I should like to put some information on the record which may be of assistance, if it is not already known. Perhaps in some ways it will contradict the impression which I and other members of the House have as to what went on respecting sympathizers of the Parti Québécois. Perhaps some members are aware that there is a file called MC-83. As people with some knowledge know, it is the code name of a top secret file in the RCMP. Some of the contents of this file may have been disseminated to newspapers. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but I have every reason to believe that as far as the security service activities directed against the Parti Québécois are concerned, indeed there was a PQ desk in G section of the RCMP. It was a specific desk in G section devoted to the Parti Québécois. This is a very interesting situation.

The member who was in charge of that desk, Sgt. Maurice Goguen, may have testified already respecting operation HAM at one of the inquiries. But the situation is a little more intriguing than that. The RCMP source or contact with whom he was particularly concerned, was well placed in the provincial ministry of cultural affairs. The honourable François Cloutier was a member of Robert Bourassa's government. Mr. Cloutier moved on to some other cabinet responsibilities, and I am sure the situation continued. Serge Raymond, the RCMP source contact in this ministry, was used by the force to assist in eradicating Parti Québécois elements in the Liberal party, as far as federal and provincial government departments were concerned. His handler, an RCMP member named Michel Papineau, who incidentally is no longer in the force, would go to Mr. Raymond and designate or finger someone who was not acceptable. It was Mr. Raymond's job to get rid of that person, using his political connections.

A lot of concern was expressed by serving members of the RCMP that this process may have been abused. One can see readily the tremendous capacity for abuse in this type of situation. I do not believe that the Solicitor General is aware of this situation, as far as I know. Certainly if he was, he had ample opportunity to put this on the record when he was questioned.

● (1552)

The implications of this are mind boggling as far as I am concerned. To think that this sort of situation could be permitted to exist on the basis of someone being designated, without any opportunity to defend themselves—perhaps not even knowing about it—relates back to the same sort of mentality we saw in this House in the operation of the so-called "black list" which was distributed, apparently, to his cabinet colleagues by the then minister of supply and services.

I hope that the Solicitor General and the McDonald commission will take the opportunity to look into this and ask these men, Messrs. Goguen, Papineau and Raymond, some very pertinent questions about what was going on. Perhaps the Keable inquiry will do it.

Getting back to this particular motion, we must keep in mind that what is asked here is that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for action and decision. It was the government that talked this matter out last night. Why is the government so reluctant to carry out this straightforward exercise? Why do we have such a committee in the first place, if access to it is so jealously guarded by the government majority for what surely can only be for political purposes? After all, they control the committee. Does the Deputy Prime Minister or his parliamentary secretary hold a committee in this place in such little regard that they do not trust it to look into a matter such as this, particularly when it is dominated by their own colleagues? Obviously, as in the case of the question of privilege by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the government seeks to use its majority to block a very necessary function of parliament.

I urge members opposite to reconsider their position. If precedents such as this are allowed to pile up, they will not only be counterproductive to the operations of this House but they will undermine, to some extent, the status of the Speaker, who made the ruling, in the first instance that there was a "prima facie" question of privilege. If the Speaker makes such a ruling—and I agree that perhaps some unfortunate implications have been drawn from this matter, which is the only thing I can agree with in the speech of my friend opposite who spoke just before me—and it is systematically blocked by the members of this House, there is no point in making a ruling. It becomes a very trivial and redundant procedure when it should not be, and it reflects on the Chair.

The people of Canada who are watching right now the proceedings of what many have called, with some justification, the highest court in the land, must wonder what we are now doing here. The member opposite has said that we are wasting our time. I disagree. I think that this is one of the most important debates that this parliament has had recently. The only way we could be wasting our time would be if it becomes apparent that this government will not allow the opportunity for this important matter to be looked into by a committee set up for that purpose and staffed by members of this House from all parties. What could be more logical than that? What could be more illogical than the action of this government in impeding and undermining a very important parliamentary process, which ultimately undermines the position of the Chair as well?

Mr. Raines: Will the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) permit a very brief question?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, I would be glad to accept a question.

Mr. Raines: Mr. Speaker, I found the argument put forth by the hon. member for Central Nova very persuasive. If this was a matter that was more clearcut, that is, if it was simply between the Solicitor General or anybody in the cabinet and any member of the opposition, then I could see that it would be a matter which could go before the committee on privileges and elections for decision. However, in this case we have an alleged link between the RCMP, a member of cabinet, and a member of the opposition, and if there were an inquiry before the committee all the witnesses would be needed. There is already an exhaustive inquiry in process, the McDonald inquiry. I am sure that the hon. member is not denigrating the McDonald inquiry, but in light of all these facts why would he want to bring this matter before a committee of this House?

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, that is a very fair question. Of course I am not denigrating the McDonald commission, but neither am I upgrading it to the extent to where I think that it should be allowed to be equal to parliament in dealing with the privileges of the members of this House.

With regard to the link, it is simply this: the Solicitor General is one of us in this House and he has been apparently misled by our national police force. As a consequence he has, in turn, done something which has affected the privileges of another member of the House. I believe that such a situation is definitely within the jurisdiction and ambit of this place and is definitely of interest primarily to this place. The McDonald commission may not even be constituted at this time next year. It is a very worth-while body, but it comes and goes, as do all other royal commissions.

We have a fundamental problem here as to what will happen to this country—and I mean no disrespect to the Solicitor General, the government or the RCMP—if our national police force or any members of it are allowed to act as if they were a law unto themselves. If there is one thing we cannot afford in this country it is to have our national police force operating out of control, and when they mislead a minister of the Crown they are coming awfully close to that situation. That is why I think that we should be looking at the matter in this House.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at the outset that it is always a pleasure to follow the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), who does so well in misleading this House of Commons about what the essential issues are in any debate. In fact I would be prepared to say that he is quite conceivably the best debater in this House of Commons. I would even go that far, keeping in mind that debating techniques only occasionally touch on questions of truth.

The Deputy Prime Minister has to be seen throughout his career in this House as the master of the irrelevant argument, and if we ever had a performance which would lead to that conclusion, we had it yesterday. People who were here and watched that performance saw as clearly as it could possibly be demonstrated—and those who will read Hansard will be able to see even more clearly because they will not be encumbered by the drama, and I use that word loosely, of this place—the irrelevance of the debate by the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister spent almost half of his time yesterday, not on the substance of the motion, but on poohpoohing the nature of the original letter which was intercepted and which gave cause to the erroneous letter that was sent from the former commissioner to the solicitor general and then on to the hon. member who has raised this question of privilege. He then went on to spend a good part of his time in raising an irrelevant comparison with the task of the McDonald royal commission, somehow implying that this question of privilege, and the way in which we have established procedures and methods of dealing with privilege, in this particular case would be duplicating in some sense the work of the McDonald commission. It was all absurd and irrelevant to the central question.

He then thought that his clinching argument, which was sufficient only for the minds of the backbenchers of the Liberal party in defence of government bad guys, that Mr. Higgitt, the former commissioner of the RCMP—

Mr. Raines: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to advise the Leader of the NDP that I have the utmost respect for him. In the years I have been here I have listened to him with a great deal of interest. I am looking forward to what he has to say now. I think this is an important question. But I happen to sit in the back row, Mr. Speaker, and after four years I have just about had enough. I would like to have mutual respect from any member of this House. From time to time we have these little lines about "another race," perhaps, and it is easy to fall into that habit.

● (1602)

An hon. Member: If it is that bad, quit.

Mr. Raines: Oh, no! With the utmost respect, Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear what the hon. member has to say, and I am sure he will take into account my seat in the back row of this House.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I sincerely apologize if I conclude from what the hon. member has said that he interpreted my comment as casting some kind of criticism on backbenchers. If that is his interpretation, I sincerely withdraw it. I said it in the context—and I shall not withdraw this—of what I regard as a profoundly misleading and dramatically interesting performance yesterday by the Deputy Prime Minister. The people who were cheering were backbench members of the Liberal party, and I will not elaborate on that.

I paid him the compliment of saying that he is perhaps the most effective debater in the House of Commons, but debate, as the Deputy Prime Minister knows, has only occasionally something to do with facts, and that is particularly so on the other side of the House. He raised a number of interesting, at times charming, and other times not so charming points, all of which, except for the clinching argument which I will come to, were basically irrelevant to the very serious question that the House is now debating.

The question that we are debating was put yesterday by the Speaker in the following words, and I want to repeat them and deal with the substance of the argument. In dealing with the fundamental question of privilege that is at stake, Mr. Speaker said:

> That leaves us with the complaint of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham respecting the testimony of former commissioner Higgitt—and I assume there is no further argument to be addressed to this matter at this time—to the circumstances in which the Solicitor General's letter dated September 4, 1973, was drafted. Does that lead us to the conclusion that, by virtue of an act or omission, the House, or a member, has directly or indirectly been impeded in the performance of its functions or his duty, or that there has been a tendency to produce such result? If I so find, then I really have no choice but to find, prima facie, that a contempt has been committed.
>
> Having considered the whole question with extreme care, I come back to the simple testimony of former commissioner Higgitt when he said:
>
> 'That is not, that is not an assurance the RCMP is giving to the minister at all, and as a matter of fact, the practice was in matters of this kind—the practice was very often ministers' letters were not exactly drafted on precise statements of fact.'

Then the Speaker concluded making his ruling with the following words:

> I can interpret that testimony in no other way than meaning that a deliberate attempt was made to obstruct the member in the performance of his duties and consequently, to obstruct the House itself.

That has absolutely nothing to do with the McDonald inquiry. It has nothing to do with the nature of the original plastic or non-plastic letter that gave rise to the case. It has absolutely nothing to do with most of the matters that the Deputy Prime Minister spoke about in the House yesterday. The Speaker in the chair yesterday was unequivocal in his assertion that there was a prima facie case of privilege involved because of the evidence that had been produced. It was pretty clear from this assertion that a member of the House had not been informed on the facts in the way that he ought to have been, and that information was being withheld that ought not to have been withheld.

If that is a conclusion of the Speaker, then how are we to deal with this case? There is the Standing Committee on Privilege and Elections, whose very reason for existence is to consider prima facie cases of privilege. That is the purpose of the committee. It is not for this chamber, for members of the House of Commons at this stage of consideration of a question of privilege, to make a final decision on it. Not at all. We do not call witnesses, Mr. Speaker. We cannot call the former commissioner of the RCMP before the House. We cannot call the former solicitor general, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand). In short, we cannot do the kind of job that the committee exists to do.

Once we get through the maze of irrelevant argument presented by the Deputy Prime Minister and come to his fundamental argument, we find a flaw in his judgment when he concludes, as he did yesterday, that it is the purpose of the House and not the purpose of the committee to reach a decision at this point on this matter. That is precisely the argument the Deputy Prime Minister made yesterday. I want to use his exact words because I certainly would not want to distort his argument. I refer hon. members to page 1865 of Hansard where the Deputy Prime Minister is reported as follows:

> The Speaker is obliged, under our rules, to find whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. Prime facie means on the first impression, on the surface, or at first blush. Beauchesne goes on to say that it is the responsibility of the House of Commons to find in substance whether there is in fact a breach of privilege.
>
> So today, when the government is saying that it does not propose to support this motion, it is not saying to the Speaker that we have no confidence in his finding. It is saying that Mr. Speaker having done his duty, we have probed beneath the surface and found that there is contradictory evidence—

Mr. Speaker, I say the Deputy Prime Minister was wrong on both counts. First, he was challenging a ruling of the Chair. I would argue, because he knows better than most of us as he has been here longer, that there have been only two occasions since 1965—one just a matter of weeks ago, and the one now brought before the House—where the government has challenged a Speaker's ruling.

The Speaker has looked at the evidence on a prima facie basis, and brings to the House a recommendation which a standing committee of the House should consider further. Mr. Speaker pointed out quite correctly in the House today that he did not make a final decision yesterday. He did not condemn the government, nor did he condemn a minister. He said there was a prima facie case, based on a sentence, and the President of Privy Council singled out this one sentence. He asked how the Speaker could possibly base a decision on one sentence. I would point out to him that some people are married for their whole lives after saying one sentence. People who perjure themselves in court frequently do so on the basis of one sentence. His is not a very persuasive argument when he says the decision was based on only one sentence. It was not very persuasive for the Speaker, nor for people on this side of the House. He has challenged the traditional position of the House of Commons, the traditional position of decisions reached by the Speaker.

In my view, if it is appropriate to comment on decisions and, I think, indirectly it is, the Speaker quite correctly reached the right conclusion on the basis of the evidence that there is a prima facie case. He has put this to the House, and if the House had any sense at all we would not be debating this now. We would have let this matter go where it ought to go, namely, to a committee to consider whether there is something beyond the prima facie case. After considering the matter, hearing expert testimony, calling Mr. Higgitt and others, if it turns out there is no question of privilege, and I would find that strange although it is possible, the committee could come back to the House and make its recommendations. At that point, what the Deputy Prime Minister says is true. At that point the House of Commons should make a final decision as to whether we have or do not have a real question of privilege.

● (1612)

To put it bluntly, the Deputy Prime Minister has it ass-backwards. He is saying that the House of Commons should be deliberating and passing judgment without evidence and without testimony. If there is an affirmative decision, he then wants to go to the committee. How absurd.

We say that the Speaker's ruling should be respected. We say there is indeed a prima facie case here, that an hon. member has been misled. This matter should go to a standing committee of this House which has been constructed to look at such matters. We say in the final analysis that the government is wrong, that it is challenging the decision. If this is perpetuated, the whole function of that committee, the whole raison d'être, goes out the window.

An hon. Member: And the Chair.

Mr. Broadbent: I am coming to that. Not far down the road Speakers' rulings will become irrelevant if they are not in accord with the majority view of this government.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member will permit a question.

Mr. Broadbent: Certainly.

Mr. MacEachen: I have been following the hon. member's very interesting address, but from his comments he has obviously forgotten what the Speaker has asked the House to do, namely, not to draw him into the argument by saying that in reaching a decision, with each member of the House making up his mind on the motion, that that in any way is casting a reflection upon him, because he has done his duty and it is now up to the members of the House to do their duty. That is what I was doing in making my statement. I wonder if the hon.

member has taken to heart the advice the Speaker gave by saying, leave that part of the argument alone, it has been settled.

Mr. Broadbent: With all due respect to the Deputy Prime Minister, I am not challenging or questioning the Speaker's judgment. I am commenting on the logic of the government's position. Whether the Deputy Prime Minister wants to put it that way or not, it is indeed questioning the Speaker's ruling. When the Speaker says there is a prima facie case, that is his ruling.

Mr. MacEachen: Absolutely.

Mr. Broadbent: Before we had this government, the traditional practice of the House was to deal with such a ruling in a perfunctory way, instead of debating it and having the House perform as a committee. The Speaker surely knew, although I obviously did not discuss it with him, the normal procedure would be for a government which respects the Chair to respect that decision and have it referred to the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I am not saying the government is not showing respect for the Chair. I am saying that the government ought to let this go to the committee so it can do its proper job and, after it makes its recommendation, let the members of this House, then, and only then, make the final decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to intervene briefly in this debate, not from the point of view of an expert on the rules and Standing Orders of this House, nor from the point of view of a great legal mind, because I am neither.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): At least I recognize my own limitations, which is more than some members do. I rise in this debate to put in my own crude words the point of view of the ordinary man on the street who must be confused by this debate. I am an ordinary person who represents the common people, in this House of Commons.

I take offence with the remarks made by the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Broadbent), who is more often a clown than an intellect, a quality which he displayed admirably today. The hon. member's remarks with regard to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) were not only wrong, but outrageous. That should be on the record of the proceedings of this House.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby stated that the Deputy Prime Minister was challenging the Speaker's ruling. That, of course, is arrant nonsense. He also stated that we who occupy the back benches on this side of the House will do whatever we are told. That, too, is arrant nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is nice to hear the guffaws from the other side. Over the years since I have been here, we have been called all kinds of names, such as trained seals. At least we do not flap our flippers.

Mr. Benjamin: Good line!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I am surprised that the main proponent of illogic in this House, the leader of the New Democratic Party, would dare to comment on the logic of the government's case.

In his opening remarks the leader of the NDP referred to the ability of the Deputy Prime Minister to mislead this House. That is an affront to every member of the government party and, in particular, to the Deputy Prime Minister, who is known throughout this country as a man of honesty and integrity. I suggest that the leader of the NDP withdraw that specious remark. It has merit neither in fact nor in logic.

● (1622)

I want to deal with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). I did not find them offensive. However, I want to comment on them in the perspective of the man on the street who is not trained in the rules of parliamentary procedure or in the legal arguments of counsel.

The first comment which concerned me was that someone has caused the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) to misinform the House. That is a very serious statement. I am sure the hon. member made it very seriously and without any facetiousness. If that in fact occurred, and that seems to be the crux of the ruling which was made yesterday, it is indeed a matter of grave concern, not only for us here but for all Canadians. If it did occur, there are several questions that arise.

If someone caused the Solicitor General or any minister to misinform this House, who is responsible for this misinformation? Is the Solicitor General personally responsible, is the government collectively responsible, or is the person who misinformed the Solicitor General responsible for this misinformation? From the point of view of common sense, it would seem that the person who misinformed the person who passed on the information is responsible.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party said we cannot call the commissioner of the RCMP before this House. That is nonsense. We can call before the bar of this House anyone we wish to call.

Mr. Orlikow: When did we last do it?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It does not matter when we last did it. The fact is we can do it and, if we must, we should. I understand, Mr. Speaker, there is still some space in the Peace Tower.

I do not believe any resolution of this question can be arrived at until all the information is placed before the committee. I agree with the House leader that the best way to get all the information is to await the report or, at least, the further proceedings of the investigation which is currently going on into the activities of the RCMP. As I understand it, the accusation made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) is based upon testimony before that commission given by the former commissioner of the RCMP. If that is indeed the case, it seems to me that in the name of common sense we should wait until we hear the rest of the testimony of that former commissioner and until we hear the results of the cross-examination of that witness before the royal commission.

Mr. Baldwin: It is going on in camera. How can we hear it?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) seems to want to build a reputation on certain aspects of security, availability of information, and so on. I do not blame him for that. In fact I applaud him for it. He wants to know how we can find out what is happening when the proceedings are taking place in camera. Well, it is obvious we should await the report of the royal commission; the House could then deal with the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. The fact that he waited for five years before raising it indicates to me that there is no urgency attached to the matter at this point.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baldwin: We might never see the report.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member interjects to say we might never see the report. Well, I, at least, expect to be around here longer than that, and I expect to see the report. I know it is the government's intention to make the report public because, obviously, the government does not appoint a royal commission and then hide the report the commission makes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You haven't been around here very long.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The concept of ministerial responsibility is important to us, and there should be no question that parliament is the highest court in the land. The government has proven over and over again that it is determined to find the whole truth in this matter. It has proven this, first by forbidding ministers of the Crown to go before the Keable commission in Quebec—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): —to give that commission documents which were outside its authority. Subsequently the government established the McDonald commission to inquire into the RCMP. This commission has the legal status to look into all the activities of the force and report on them fully and completely. That is something we would never have received from the Keable commission, as should be obvious to everyone.

Statements have been made to the effect that the government will not allow a report to be made. That is a specious argument. It is entirely sensible that we should wait until we hear the evidence before the McDonald inquiry. The worst aspect, from the point of view of the question under consideration, is that no matter what that evidence may be, no matter what the decision of this House may be with regard to the ruling made yesterday by Mr. Speaker, the reporting, or I should say, the misreporting of what happened here yesterday, has convicted the government of the day in the minds of the people of Canada of, and I quote, "deliberately misleading the House."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That is not what the Speaker ruled yesterday, and every member over there knows it is not what the government ruled yesterday.

An hon. Member: The government?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): When they sit there now and say, "Hear, hear" they are only adding to the deliberate misrepresentation of the facts to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): They say, "Hear, hear" to that, too. They agree they are trying to misrepresent the facts to the public. That is the position I take in this debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I was not here yesterday afternoon and I was not aware of the fact that a debate was to take place on this subject. It is always difficult to take part in a debate simply on the basis of reading Hansard. However, I am glad the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has let the cat out of the bag. He said the people of Canada today believe the government is guilty. Well, never did the people come to a conclusion more in conformity with the facts! I am very happy that in his dying words he was able to make very clear that the people of Canada as a whole think this government is guilty. That has made this debate worth while. If he had not participated, there might have been some doubt. After that participation I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) will not recommend him for appointment to a ministerial post.

Having said that, I want to deal with one or two matters in very short form. The motion before the House reads:

That the letter sent by the Solicitor General of the day to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham on December 4, 1973, and the testimony of former RCMP commissioner Higgitt on October 24 and November 1, 1978, before the royal commission of inquiry (McDonald commission) concerning the practice of the RCMP in preparing letters for the signature of the Solicitor General, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation and report.

If they have nothing to hide, Mr. Speaker, why not agree to that motion? There is nothing more trying for a conscience which has anything to fear than the thought that what it has to fear might be revealed. I came here this afternoon without any preconceived ideas. Now I am convinced that this government is covering something up. That is not unusual for this government.

● (1632)

There are two matters at stake here. The McDonald commission is dealing in general with certain activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I say at once that I take second place to no member of this House in terms of the number of cases in which I have been involved over the years and in which the Mounted Police took part. In all those cases I have known of only two in which any one of the Mounted Police endeavoured to deceive the courts.

I am very deeply concerned about what has taken place in connection with the representations which are being made and the innuendoes which have been spread in the evidence before the McDonald commission. The RCMP is the most honest, straightforward police institution in all the world. That is its reputation, even though there may have been one or two cases in which there has been obvious wrongdoing, and that should be rooted out.

The royal commission will make its findings. Those findings will have to do with general activities and proclivities which were allegedly wrongful.

The second matter at stake is that the House of Commons is its own judge and must remain the judge of the conduct of its members. No commission has the right to interfere with the right of this House to determine what took place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If there is no truth in the allegations which have been made, why not set up a committee of the House on the basis of unanimity? As has happened in past cases, the majority of Liberal members are again united behind the Deputy Prime Minister. With a majority of members of the Liberal party on the committee, do hon. members think there would be any danger that a report detrimental to the Government of Canada would be given? If that took place, it would be the first time, and I have been here almost 39 years. I have never noticed an example in which Liberal members did other than sing the Hallelujah chorus whenever any matter came up, no matter how detrimental it was. Why not set up this committee? What are hon. members opposite so worried about? What are they so concerned about?

I think the McDonald commission sits behind closed doors. I am going to see Mr. Justice McDonald. He has asked to see me tomorrow. The McDonald commission sits behind closed doors. Is the government afraid of what will be revealed? I think the government has every reason to be, but it pretends to be very anxious to have this matter cleared up. When will the McDonald commission report? There is no indication that it will report before at least six or eight months from now, according to what I read in the press.

Mr. Nielsen: After the election.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who never at any time is politically minded, says that the commission will report after the election. I do not know why the government is worrying about the result because, no matter what it does, it is going to be defeated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us have the situation cleared up. Let us absolve alleged wrongdoers, if they deserve to be absolved, but why—I repeat, why—is there such a desire on the part of the Deputy Prime Minister—and a similar message has been indicated by other Liberal members who have spoken—to deny the people of Canada the right to know what took place?

It has been part and parcel of the policy of the Trudeau government from the beginning, to hide facts and conceal facts from parliament. I will give a simple example. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wanted a swimming pool, philanthropists provided $200,000. Would hon. members not think they deserve to be anointed by public opinion? Are they to receive their rewards only through the Order of Canada? When we asked for information, the Prime Minister said, "I won't give you that information." That has been the answer all along with regard to anything which would be embarrassing to the government.

I will now speak of the Deputy Prime Minister. He has been in the House a long while. I have that admiration for him which one develops for those who have unusual parliamentary ability. He has that. That is generally admitted. He blushes about it because he knows that that is the general feeling. With that massive reputation for parliamentary perfection, does the Deputy Prime Minister not think it would be nice to be able to say, "When parliament asked for action, realizing that something should be revealed, I did not take the advice of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), nor did I adopt his attitude to parliament"? Would it not be nice to be able to say, "I decided that we would reveal the facts"?

If there is nothing to hide, why hide it? If there is nothing to conceal, why conceal it? Why not reveal the facts? Some hon. members who have spoken have said that the people of Canada have already convicted this government on this matter. Of that, those hon. members have better knowledge than I have, because apparently they have been in touch with their constituents and know what is going to happen to them.

Speaking about headlines, I suppose I have been the subject of as many press misquotations as anybody in this House. Sometimes I think I have a record in that connection, but having read Hansard and having watched television, I can say that I saw nothing wrong with the headlines.

Headlines do not go into full detail. One headline read, "Liberal Government Letter Misleads M.P., Speaker Rules". I have the letter here, and it is false. One hon. member asked,

"Do ministers have to assure the truthfulness of what they say?" Yes, they do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are not automatons.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I didn't say that. You are dissimulating again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member speaks with the authority which ignorance permits him to speak.

Never during the course of the years I was Prime Minister would I ever have signed anything which had not been thoroughly examined. Otherwise one would have to pretend that the civil service is responsible. I will read this letter from the then solicitor general, only in part. I would read it all, but I do not want to waste the time of the House. The present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) is a thoughtful and very careful man. At least that has been the experience in other matters. The letter was to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), and reads in part as follows:

Dear Mr. Lawrence:

This will refer to your letter dated November 21, 1973 and enclosure concerning allegations made by Mr. Wally Keeler regarding invasion of privacy and disruption of the mails by the RCMP.

● (1642)

Then it goes on to explain what the computer had to say, and adds:

As you can see, the text was sufficiently suggestive of a possible security matter to warrant an investigation by the RCMP.

Every time this government is in difficulty and wants to hide anything, ministers say it is a matter of security. The one security they are concerned about is their own security. All too often they use that for an excuse.

It goes on to say:

This investigation led by Mr. Terrence Woolf of Sudbury . . . assumed responsibility for the communication. His explanation that this was the private form of communication used between members of the People's Republic of Poetry was thought by the RCMP members to be rather far-fetched but was sufficient to convince them that this matter should be treated as a nuisance rather than a breach of security.

So it was only a nuisance. It has become more than that since.

It goes on:

On this note the RCMP investigation was concluded. The communication has been returned to the post office department. I have been assured by the RCMP that it is not their practice to intercept the private mail of anyone, and I trust that the above explanation will set your constituent's mind at ease.

What was the purpose of that? The purpose was to delude and to deceive. Why not let us get at the facts of this? I would like to see the former solicitor general, at present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, on the witness stand. I would not want to cross-examine him. I would refrain from doing so because of our personal relationship, but somebody else could ask him questions. He is not anxious to get on the stand.

Mr. MacEachen: He has been there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, he has been there on other matters, but not on this. He is not anxious to get on the stand, because if he were to admit that he did not know what he was talking about, he would be an inefficient minister. If he were to admit that this letter was placed before him and he signed it without consideration or knowledge, the result would be anything but a halo for him.

Mr. MacEachen: There are very few halos in politics.

Mr. Gillies: How right you are!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will repeat it, and that is all I will say in this connection: if you have nothing to hide, why hide it?

Now I will refer to the views of a gentleman who is often referred to in the better Liberal circles today as they view the Gallup polls. If only John Turner was available!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will read you what John Turner had to say two years ago when he was speaking in Winnipeg. He said this:

Where secrecy or mystery begins, vice or roguery is not far off.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What immortal words! How truthful! I am sure that will appeal to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), and even to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) who is smiling and apparently approves of that. I say to the ministers, they have to be very careful today, because if John Turner hears that they disregard him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —what the future will hold for them will not be most hopeful.

Mr. MacEachen: We are quaking in our boots!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I repeat these words: "Where secrecy or mystery begins, vice or roguery is not far off." That is what happened here—secrecy, concealment, a minister protecting himself under pretence that the civil service is responsible. The call for secrecy has a hollow ring; it is always the call of those who are in difficulty. The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) is in that group. He has an appetite for secrecy. I wish he were here because I would be able to point out to him one or two examples. The appetite for secrecy has become a characteristic of this government.

The government says, "Wait until the McDonald commission makes it findings." I am not speaking about the rapidity with which the commission is meeting or their thoroughness, nor about the fact that a great portion of their meetings is held behind closed doors. But without having any special knowledge of the matter, I say that I do not think the report would come in before July or August, but rather after the election.

Mr. MacEachen: We will still be here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All this government is thinking about is that nothing be revealed between now and the election—they have enough trouble the way it is. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to say very much in this debate because I think the matter involved in the issue is fairly simple and straightforward, and no doubt the House could decide on the issue and consider that it has heard enough, particularly now that it has had the advantage of the words of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I presume that no Conservative member at least would wish to demean the importance of a message from that voice by following him as though there were anything more to be said on the matter. So, as I say, I hope the question will be put before the House very soon.

There are a number of questions of fundamental fairness which, it seems to me, hon. members on the opposite side have sluffed over and ignored in their urging that an affirmative answer be given to this motion. The fact of the matter is that some of those members are perhaps somewhat careless and carefree about whether what they say and do has an adverse impact upon a particular person involved in politics, even when they themselves admit that there is no basis for the slur, the innuendo, or the aspersion being passed.

We have seen headlines which Mr. Speaker himself noted to have been quite unfair and quite wrong in the light of what he had said and in the light of what had gone on in the House. There has been no suggestion that a minister whose letter was involved had wanted to mislead in any way any member of the House.

Let me point out that in the early part of the debate on the question of privilege, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) himself agreed that that was so, and he is nodding again now in affirmation that he was not making that accusation.

Mr. Lawrence: That is right; we do not know.

Mr. Lang: But at the time I was making that point and asking him to confirm it, I also made the point that it was unfortunate that the same hon. member had used expressions which could have left the impression that that was what he was saying. It was unfortunate that he would say that a minister's letter misled him or, as reported at page 779 of Hansard:

—I was deliberately misled by a letter—

I said then, and I say again now, that the fact he admits that the minister did not deliberately mislead him, that he is not making any such accusation, should have led him to be far more careful with his words, should have led him to make it very clear at the time that he was alleging an error in the letter but not imputing to the minister that he was deliberately misleading him. It is very misleading to so use words that you leave a public impression that it is the minister whom you are charging with deliberately misleading.

I say the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham was careless in what he did to the reputation of a colleague and a politician in the way he used those words. That is unfortunate. It is not surprising that, as a result, we have innuendo creeping into press reports. I am sure this is the kind of thing which hon. members opposite would enjoy engaging in, if this matter were debated further, here or in committee. That is a wrong which they do. It would be a wrong done not only to the minister but, in due course, no doubt to others who would not be there to defend themselves either. As the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) said, there is a broad, sweeping accusation, without a named accused, or without any knowledge or suggestion as to where that error crept into the document.

• (1652)

Mr. Gillies: That is why it should go to committee.

Mr. Lang: So says the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), that is why it should go to committee. When there is a suggestion of wrongdoing, an investigation by careful investigative process is the right method. Public debate, analysis, accusation, and broad brush depiction of wrongdoing is not a process which is in our tradition.

As attorney general in days gone by, I knew the care with which an investigation should take place, before public comment or allegation is made to suggest wrongdoing. It is simply improper to use the broad brush approach, which is used time and time again in this political arena.

There is an important matter before the McDonald commission. Surely the matter which this motion seeks to put before committee, in the view of any rational person, would confuse the public and the entire process, in terms of what is happening here today, what will happen tomorrow in the McDonald commission, and then what will happen before committee. It would be difficult to maintain some semblance of the fact the innocent should not be made guilty by innuendo before any evidence is put forward. That guilt by innuendo is what we saw in headlines as a result of the deliberations yesterday. Also it is what we heard in the words of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham when he raised his question of privilege. That is a wrong we ought not to contribute to, by taking this type of sweeping issue before committee, when no wrongdoing against a member or minister is alleged.

Mr. Railton: It should not be allowed in parliament.

Mr. Lang: In the course of argument on a question of privilege, I made a point which I should like to elaborate on now. From time to time in the House, a minister or other member will state something as though it were a fact, which turns out on later examination to have been an error. It is one of the fine traditions of this House, as soon as that is discovered, that the member or minister will inform the House he has discovered the error. Obviously the statement made in error could in one sense be argued to be an issue of privilege in relation to members and how they are affected, as indeed is the pith and substance of the argument relating to this letter. Even when it is a matter of privilege, the tradition of the House is: when a member or minister makes an explanation and gives the House the correction or information upon which he was acting, it is accepted and the matter is treated as at an end.

Specifically that is what happened in this particular case, but in a much more broadly sweeping manner. A number of answers were given in the House which were not far different in substance from what the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham alleged was contained in the letter as a part of an answer. There were members in this House, ministers or solicitors general, who had a belief which they indicated in the House and in other places in open testimony, that certain practices were not being engaged in by the RCMP. Based on that belief, obviously their answers and perhaps this letter gave assurances which either touched that question or indicated their belief in that regard.

As soon as it was discovered that those answers had been given in error—and no member suggests the error was deliberately expressed to the House—the then solicitor general clearly indicated that indeed it was an error. All matters founded upon that false understanding by solicitors general, at that point effectively were dealt with by the solicitor general of the day, as though a matter of privilege but in the tradition of the House, putting the matter to rest by making clear the error. At that time we took the more fundamental step of referring the entire question to a commission for inquiry.

Apart from the arguments put forward by my colleagues as to whether this was privilege, and the arguments by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council indicating that the House could well judge beyond the prima facie level that it was substantially not, the House received an explanation that a series of answers, including the part of this one which is of the same sort, was based upon an erroneous belief on the part of solicitors general. The moment the true fact correcting that erroneous belief was made known, it was brought to the attention of the House, and in that sense completed.

Therefore, even if it were a substantial question of privilege, as distinct from simply a prima facie one, the motion does not present the course of action which the House should follow. The matter of any misleading by a member or minister, albeit innocent, was put to rest as far as the traditions of this House are concerned by the clarification of that error by the solicitor general of the day, as soon as it was known to him that there were facts other than those upon which his predecessors had based themselves.

As far as the House is concerned, this matter should be considered closed. Substantial questions relating to police activities are before the McDonald commission, and they will be dealt with there. In terms of privilege, the matter is closed. There is no need to deflect or distract attention from the proceedings in one place, to recreate the confusion by having a House committee and a commission alternatively dealing with some of the same issues, to the great disadvantage of the public. Certainly we know from yesterday's experience, when the press was not able to handle a fairly straightforward analysis by the Speaker of a question of prima facie privilege, the chance of misreporting. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert said a moment ago, that need not happen and we need not have further innuendo on colleagues in the House. The right hon. member claimed the record for misquotes and misguided references. I believe that makes clear why I will vote against this motion. With the facts I have recited, I consider the issue closed.

• (1702)

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I will take only a few minutes—

An hon. Member: Dear God!

Mr. Laprise: I hear someone saying "Dear God!" I think he had better rise and take the floor than say: "Dear God!"

Mr. Speaker, this debate is taking a rather surprising turn. One side is asking that a parliamentary committee be established to throw light on revelations dating back to 1973 which eventually proved to be inexact. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make long comments on that matter. I merely want to say that I agree with the motion to allow the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to throw light on that issue.

I read yesterday's Hansard and I listened to the proceedings this afternoon and I have been particularly encouraged to take the floor in support of this motion by the speech made by the Deputy Prime Minister and his parliamentary secretary. They were eloquent enough to convince me that this motion is really needed because of their determination to oppose it. Mr. Speaker, I understood that the government had something to hide concerning that letter and what was said as well as concerning the revelations made sometime later before the McDonald commission by commissioner Higgitt. Mr. Speaker, in the last few years there have been surprising revelations concerning the activities of the RCMP, its methods of investigations, its actions against a large part of the Canadian people and, considering those events and the actions of that police force which we used to consider as the best in the world, these revelations have undermined our trust in that police force.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have reason to believe and to demand that the matter be clarified, in spite of the argument that a royal commission was set up to shed light on those activities, the fact still remains that the House of Commons is the supreme tribunal in Canada and parliament has all the rights to shed light on points where it considers it necessary or useful. And that is indeed an important point.

In his argumentation yesterday, the Deputy Prime Minister said this, and I quote:

—that you say there has been a contempt, a deceit, and that is what the House is asked to find today, and the person or persons alleged to have brought about the deceit are left unnamed.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, in the letter the solicitor general sent to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), he does not mention the sources of his information. And that is precisely what we want to know.

The solicitor general of the day who was here in the House and listened to the debates all afternoon is now responsible for another department. He could probably, have risen and set things straight but he did not want to do so.

Mr. Speaker, that is why we are asking that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so we can question him to know the name of the person who misinformed the minister, and later on, through the minister, misled the House of Commons. The Deputy Prime Minister concludes by saying, and I quote:

In this case, we neither have an accused nor an unaccused.

Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely certain that a committee of the House of Commons, be it the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or another, is not a court of justice, but a committee to inquire into certain revelations that were not entirely made. We want to know all the facts, and this is what the motion put forward by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is all about.

I do not see why government members do not wish to shed light on this if they have nothing to hide.

Mr. Speaker, we support the motion. We hope the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections will have all the help it will need to bring the matter under full light. I hope it has the complete staffing facilities needed to complete the inquiry.

It is my hope the government will recognize this is a valid motion and let the committee clarify this whole matter. If it so happens that there is nothing wrong, so much the better. The mover will lose face and support the consequences.

It is therefore my view that hon. members should support the motion so that we may finally know the facts.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) just addressed the House a short while ago, and at that time he implied that after he had spoken the matter was so very simple it required no further debate. I notice that he is being consistent in that he has folded his tent and stolen away. I agree with him that the matter is a simple one, but I come to the opposite conclusion. I think that this motion ought to be passed and that all members of this House should support it. To turn it down, and I am not unaware of what the Speaker himself has said, would be a reflection on the Speaker, would undermine his authority and, as such, it would be a blow to parliamentary institutions generally and to the proper conduct of this House.

[Mr. Laprise.]

In addition, once the Speaker has held that there is a prima facie case of privilege by a member of this House, then the investigation of the facts by a committee of this parliament is essential. That is precisely the situation we are in now. The proposal to defeat this motion could only be based on a contempt for the privileges of the members of this House, and, indeed, of parliament itself.

Why is the government trying to hide behind the arbitrary rule of a majority? What does it have to conceal? What has it to fear in having a committee look into what the Speaker has held to be a prima facie invasion of its privileges? Do the government supporters not trust a committee of this House, upon which they are represented by a majority, to determine the facts without bias? I think the suggestion that they are not a fitting tribunal to do so is a reflection on the government members of the House, as well as on others.

The government party calls itself the Liberal party. The essence of true liberalism is respect for parliament and an openness and a willingness to look into the facts impartially, particularly where there may be some breach of the law or rules of parliament. I suggest that a refusal to carry out the normal practice of sending this matter to the committee on privileges and elections is a betrayal of all that is best in the philosophy of liberalism. I am not a member of the Liberal party, but at least I am enough of a liberal to say that what is being done in this particular debate constitutes a denial of liberal principles. It is time that the supporters and every member of the Liberal party elected to this House decided whether to be governed by principles or by a narrow view of their own interests and also perhaps by an ingrained habit of secrecy in respect of public affairs.

• (1712)

I know it is perhaps naive and over optimistic to hope, but I do hope that some Liberal members recognize that what we are seeing today, if the arguments put forward by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) are to be accepted and this motion voted down, is the destruction of a party which, with all its faults, has served this country.

The argument of the Deputy Prime Minister that the motion is based on one sentence is, of course, nonsense. It makes not the slightest difference whether one, two or 50 sentences are the basis of a prima facie breach of the privileges of the House. If we have any doubt about whether that sentence—two sentences put together—subject to further investigation and consideration, did in fact constitute a prima facie breach of the rules of the House, we have the ruling of the Speaker to take as the principle which should enlighten us in this respect.

It is further suggested by the Deputy Prime Minister that the federal McDonald inquiry into alleged RCMP wrongdoing should prevent an inquiry by this House into a breach of its own privileges. This seems to me to be highly specious. I concede the ability of the Deputy Prime Minister in argument, but no argument is going to persuade me, where the privileges of this House are concerned, that this House is not the primary tribunal in which to determine those matters.

Perhaps I am wrong, but what I think I see is part and parcel of a general tendency to cover up and keep secret anything that could be embarrassing to the government. I think these arguments should be repudiated by this House, as I am sure they will be by all Canadians who have a sense of the dignity of parliament and respect for its institutions and privileges.

The prima facie case is there, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Transport says that he is fully confident that the McDonald commission should inquire and that it be left to them. I leave apart the question of the inevitable delay. This parliament is the highest court of justice in the land and it is this parliament to which responsibility is given to protect the privileges of all its members. The orderly way of doing it is to designate a committee to look into the facts.

The McDonald commission may do very well pursuing its appointed course, but it does not have the overriding authority to determine questions of privilege of members of this House. It is the duty of the House to deal with this matter and, after dealing with it in an orderly way, to send it to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I do not think this is an unimportant debate. I think if this debate pursues the course it appears to be going, and if members of the government use their majority to defeat this motion, it would be an example of the fact that parliamentary democracy is decaying because of the actions of the government of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, it is with regret I note that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has left the chamber. This is one of the few occasions in the six years that I have been here that I have found an issue upon which I could agree absolutely with the minister. He went on at some length and in a very convincing fashion to indicate the dangers to which a debate such as this can lead. I could not agree more. Had he been here I would have given him the opportunity of solving the potential problem by agreeing, without further debate, that this matter go to committee.

The minister and I acknowledge all the problems that can be created in a debate such as this, but apparently our solutions are different. For some miraculous reason he felt the solution would be to defeat this motion. I am not as sophisticated as the minister. I can only relate this to the problems in my part of the country. There are a lot of farmers among my constituents and many of them produce livestock. Any livestock producer will tell us that there is a byproduct of that occupation which goes under various names. I think if I use the word "manure" most people will know what I mean. This presents a problem for which there are various solutions. The main solution in my riding is that producers knuckle down to a pretty tough job and restore that manure to the land so that it may in turn become productive. What they do not need is the solution of the Minister of Transport—to go out and shoot all the livestock. That would end the problem immediately and forever, and that is what the Minister of Transport is urging, that we shoot down this very important issue.

Today the Chair was very concerned about press reports and the way the media treated this matter. I only saw one or two reports but I certainly saw the words "deliberately misled." I thought that is what this is all about. I am not disagreeing with the Chair's interpretation of the reports.

We only have to read yesterday's Hansard regarding the evidence of former commissioner Higgitt and the correspondence my colleague received from a former solicitor general relating to these matters. As reported at page 1857 the Speaker said:

> I can interpret that testimony in no other way than meaning that a deliberate attempt was made to obstruct the member in the performance of his duties and, consequently, to obstruct the House itself.

I agree. I agree that there is only one possible interpretation, as the Speaker found. I agree that the only conclusion is that there had been an attempt to obstruct, and that attempt had been deliberate. I agree that the attempt to obstruct was directed at a member of the House, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). It was not an attempt deliberately to obstruct the then solicitor general, although that could be possible. This was a letter from that solicitor general, signed by him, and directed to my colleague.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has no idea who was misleading him, and I am sure he agrees with the Speaker that, whoever it was, it was certainly deliberate. I thought that would be the function of the committee. The hon. member received a letter which deliberately misled him. He has never said, and I think all those who have participated in this debate agree, that the then solicitor general deliberately attempted to mislead him.

• (1722)

Mr. Pinard: He did say that.

Mr. Jarvis: He said the letter misled him. There is no question that the letter was signed by the then solicitor general. I hope no one is denying that. However, the instruction that was perpetrated was perpetrated by a deliberately misleading statement. Surely there is no question about that. The Speaker has ruled on that. We surely are not appealing that.

The letter that was signed by the solicitor general of the day was directed toward a member of this House. That is far different from correspondence that may be the subject matter of the McDonald commission investigation. We remember the letter from the then minister of national revenue, now the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), directed to the then solicitor general, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), relating to RCMP access to confidential tax files. That gives rise to no question of privilege. That is far different from what we are talking about here. That was a letter from one minister who was very concerned about the legality of certain operations in which his department was involved, directed to his cabinet colleague who was responsible to the agents of government that were involved in that particular seeking of information from confidential files. That is far different in terms of the rights and privileges of members of this House from a letter from the then solicitor general to a member of this House, in which the Speaker has ruled there was a deliberate attempt to obstruct the hon. member in the performance of his duties and, consequently, a deliberate attempt to obstruct the House itself. The Speaker went on to say yesterday, as reported at page 1857:

—I cannot conceive that there is any one of us who would accept the argument that this House of Commons has no recourse in the face of such an attempt to obstruct—

What is the recourse? The government is saying the recourse is the McDonald commission. What is the McDonald commission? I regret I have to give a lecture in government to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). In order to determine what the McDonald commission is, the parliamentary secretary need look no further than the very clear statement of Mr. Justice McDonald contained on pages 6 and 7 of his statement of November 13, and I quote:

The governor in council, in creating such a commission as this, asks this newly and specially created unit of the executive branch of government to examine some particular aspect of the government, that is the executive. The executive branch, through its chosen executive instrument, is examining itself. This must not be forgotten by those who expect the commission to do as they wish and as it wishes.

Mr. Justice McDonald went on to indicate that he was part of the instrument created by the executive to examine itself. He pointed out that this was a very difficult and delicate position in which to be. Therefore, certain things must attach to it. It must not only appear that the commission is operating with some independence, but in fact it must so operate without interference.

Mr. Justice McDonald went on to say that it could not be directed by a minister. With all of this, I agree. If the executive creates an instrument to examine itself, and if it is to be anything more than pure sham, certain very special conditions must attach its operations. Still, however, as Mr. Justice McDonald pointed out, the commission remains an instrument of self-criticism.

The McDonald commission is not an instrument of the House of Commons. It was not created by the House of Commons. Its terms of reference were not approved by the House of Commons. None of its rules, practices or procedures are influenced in any way whatsoever by the House of Commons. It does not report to the House of Commons. The commission's terms of reference can be amended, not by the House of Commons but by order in council, the executive, the cabinet. Its very existence can only be maintained or terminated, either directly or indirectly, by the cabinet.

Mr. Nuss was originally counsel for the solicitor general of the day. Subsequently, and this is not at all clear, even to the McDonald commission, because Mr. Justice McDonald specifically said so, that counsel enlarged his clientele to include all ministers of the Crown. That means the Privy Council, with one possible exception, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) in his capacity as Attorney General. It is very uncertain whether Mr. Nuss is counsel for the Attorney General of Canada, but it appears now that he is counsel for the government and not just the Solicitor General.

Mr. Nuss's arguments some-weeks ago were to this effect. Once the Privy Council decides that such a document or such and such evidence is not to be produced in public, that decision should be binding upon the McDonald commission. Fortunately that was rejected out of hand by the commission in its statement. If that argument were to prevail, and thinking how the government can terminate indirectly the existence of the commission, it could put the commissioners in such a position that in order to maintain any vestige of integrity they would be forced to resign.

If I recall correctly, Mr. Justice McDonald said that even if the government changes the terms of reference, the commission would be forced to re-examine its position. I agree. However, it is certainly within the power of the cabinet to terminate indirectly the very existence of the McDonald commission, a power that this House would not even presume to think it had in these circumstances.

I do not think we need go any further in terms of the relationship between the cabinet and a commission than to look to the Mackenzie commission. Hon. members will recall that the Mackenzie commission reported to cabinet, not to the House of Commons. Subsequent to the Mackenzie commission report, there appeared, and I believe it was tabled, an abridged report of the Mackenzie commission's findings. I do not know what was deleted. I doubt that any member now or then sitting, unless he was a member of the cabinet, has any idea in the world what was deleted from the MacKenzie commission report. Therefore, it is absolutely clear that commissions such as the McDonald commission, which according to the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is the answer to this question of privilege, bear no relationship whatsoever to the House of Commons or its individual members. The only relationship which exists is that between the commission and the cabinet.

● (1732)

Hon. members will recall that very early in the hearings of the McDonald commission submissions were made arguing that counsel should be permitted to appear on behalf of other groups in Canada. One of those groups happened to be the party I support. Those requests, not only by our party but by other groups, were rejected upon the basis of vigorous opposition by government counsel.

Compare that situation, the situation of the McDonald commission, which is simply the executive examining itself, with the position of the House of Commons. From my earliest days as a student I understood that parliament was the watchdog of the executive. It is interesting to note there has been some dialogue during this debate with respect to the role of the backbencher; a point of order was raised today with regard to it. With respect to the McDonald commission, the backbencher has no role to play although, of course, he can ask questions about it. But as a watchdog over the executive, each member has a role. No matter where he sits in the House or what party he represents, he is entitled to fulfil that role as a watchdog of the executive. I hope that role is not questioned by anyone here.

Is the McDonald commission charged with determining whether or not there was a deliberate attempt to obstruct a member of this House? Never. That is not within the terms of reference of the commission. Indeed, I believe the commission would be horrified to find that this was its responsibility. Is it being alleged that the McDonald commission will investigate this particular situation? Well, I would want some very strong assurance from the President of Privy Council or from his parliamentary secretary that such an investigation is to be carried out. Does any government spokesman intend to assure me that the McDonald commission will investigate the circumstances leading up to this correspondence, this letter directed to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham? Are they going to find out who drafted that letter and bring that person forward to give evidence in public? Are they going to determine who gave information to that person and bring him, too, before the commission to give evidence in public? Are they going to determine who placed that letter in front of the solicitor general and bring that person forth to give evidence in public?

I would welcome assurances along these lines if they could be given, and I would accept them. But that is entirely hypothetical because such assurances will never be given. I would also want to know whether that evidence would be deleted from the report when it is finally made, as in the case of the Mackenzie commission report—it is within the power of the Privy Council to take such action. Suppose the commission were to decide to take this evidence in camera but to include it in the report. What assurance do we have that this particular part of the evidence would not be omitted? How could we be sure that we were not getting an abridged report as in the case of the Mackenzie report? We have no such assurance.

There is only one forum in Canada capable of dealing with a deliberate attempt to obstruct a member of this House, and that is the House itself through its committees. No one else can do it. No one else has the authority to do it. The circumstances leading up to the letter which was written to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham are an important issue, but not the only one. The hon. member himself put the matter clearly when he said the job of parliament is to do all it can to make sure this does not happen again. Can the McDonald commission give us that assurance? Never. It lacks the ability, the authority, to give such an assurance. Only the House itself can do that.

What has the response of the government been? I have read and re-read the speech made in this debate by the President of Privy Council and the reasons he gave for voting against the motion. I noted five. The first was that the motion had been "sprung upon the House". That is a surprising comment, coming from the expert "springer" himself. Then he said he and his hon. friends proposed to vote against the motion, not because they had no confidence in the Speaker but because they had "probed beneath the surface". Amazing. They had no idea this matter was coming up; it was sprung upon them. Yet within minutes the President of Privy Council had been able to probe beneath the surface. This meant that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were going to judge the issue. They were going to judge themselves.

The third reason he gave for voting against the motion was that it represented a plea to close down the McDonald commission. Good heavens, it was the government's own lawyers who said on its behalf: We, the Privy Council, want to decide whether the proceedings should be in secret or not. Just six weeks ago it was the government's own lawyer who said in an impassioned speech before the commission that the Privy Council wanted to determine what portion of the inquiry should be held in secret and what portion in public, what documents were to be made public and what documents were to remain secret.

● (1742)

I am sure the minister's lawyer did not just dream this up by himself. He had to be acting on instructions when he said that the government would take away the most vital part of the commission's role, that of deciding what is to be secret and what is to be open. The minister says this motion is a plea to close down the McDonald commission. That is nonsense.

The fourth reason given is that this is a sensitive matter relating to the security of Canada. What garbage is this? It has absolutely nothing to do with the security of Canada, and to allege the contrary flies in the face not only of fact but also of reason. If he had said that this is a matter of the security of this government, that at least would have been honest and we would have debated the matter on that basis. I do not know whether I should accuse the Deputy Prime Minister of confusing the security of the country with the political security of the party he represents, but to allege that this motion and its subject matter should not go to a committee on the basis that it represents a security threat to Canada is about as ridiculous as republishing 59 documents containing so-called top secret information and being for Canadian eyes only and distributing them all over Parliament Hill and Ottawa.

The fifth reason given was that the committee would be a political forum. For heaven's sake, what else would it be? Certainly it would be a political forum. The role of watchdog is to watch a political institution. Certainly the committee would be a political forum, and so it should be. Perhaps the minister meant by that that on the eve of an election it would be all partisan. That is what we expect in committees. Sometimes committees go that way. Sometimes they go other ways. I understand that, but to say that the matter should not go to a committee because the committee would be a political forum invites us to extend that to its logical conclusion and to suggest that nothing should go to a committee.

The Deputy Prime Minister contented himself with those five reasons, but his parliamentary secretary came up with a couple more for urging his colleagues to vote against this motion. He said that the motion questions the credibility of the McDonald commission. Months after the commission began operating a government lawyer appeared before it and said that from that point on the Privy Council wanted the right to decide what the commission should hear in public and what it should hear in private. That makes this question of credibility look pretty weak. Frankly, that is like comparing a demi-tasse with a swill bucket. It just makes no sense at all. As recorded in page after page of commission proceedings the government's lawyer argued that the Privy Council should be deciding what should be public and what should be private. That in itself questions the credibility of the McDonald commission. Does the parliamentary secretary mean to tell this House that a committee investigating a deliberate attempt to obstruct a member in the performance of his duties creates a question regarding the credibility of the McDonald commission? Nonsense.

Finally, the parliamentary secretary made a long and impassioned argument regarding the lack of urgency of this matter. Allegedly, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham should have raised this matter a long time ago.

Mr. Boulanger: Right. That is a weakness.

Mr. Jarvis: That is a good argument, and do hon. members know what it is good for? It would have been a good argument regarding a prima facie case. At that point that argument should have been made. It would have been a good argument. Many questions of privilege have been refused on the basis that there was no prima facie case because of lack of urgency. I agree that that is an excellent argument, but although there was all the opportunity in the world almost a month ago to argue lack of urgency, that argument was not made.

However, once a prima facie has been established, it is too late to make that argument. Hon. members opposite missed their day in court in that regard, and to raise it now, to go over it time and again and to suggest that government members should vote against this motion because of lack of urgency, simply does not hold water. Hon. members opposite profess not to disagree with Mr. Speaker and not to question his ruling, but then after a prima facie case has been found, they turn around and argue that there is lack of urgency. That simply will not wash. It is too late for that. When hon. members make that argument at this point, they challenge the competence of Mr. Speaker. When they make that argument at this point, that is exactly what they are doing.

Mr. Boulanger: No, sir. Explain.

Mr. Jarvis: Who are they who might be tempted to vote against this motion? I cannot name them, but they are those who wish to perpetuate the cover-up, the stonewalling, the delay and the whole litany of procedures the government has practised for months respecting the broader issue of security service operations which led to the setting up of the McDonald commission. Ample evidence regarding that issue has been forthcoming for months now, not just in this debate. There have been questions during question periods, speeches and questions of privilege for months and months.

At first there was supposed to be one isolated incident. Then there was contradictory evidence, and we went on and on. There was an attempt to cover up. Prima facie cases having been established, there have been only two incidents since, I believe, 1965 in which government members voted against sending matters to committee. It is a remarkable coincidence that those two instances related to this particular issue. One would have to be very naive to believe that that is coincidence.

Who else might be tempted to vote against this motion? There are those who wish to have the executive proceed without accountability to the highest court of this country, this parliament. In the interests of expediency and efficiency there might be some who would say that executive action need not be accounted for to anyone. I believe that is the philosophy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It has been the philosophy of many political leaders, none of whom were very successful over the long run and most of whom were regretted in terms of history. However, that philosophy appears to be very much the philosophy of this government.

It has been said that ministers should be expected not only not to know about day to day operations but that they should virtually and deliberately avoid knowing. That is one of the most outstanding statements I have ever heard in terms of its repugnancy to me. It is absolutely unacceptable in terms of all I have come to know about parliamentary democracy. It is unacceptable by any yardstick because its logical extension would be that there should be government by the executive branch alone. I cannot accept that.

Nor can I accept the establishment by the executive of a special agency to examine the executive, such as the McDonald commission, as a replacement for accountability to parliament. With all its inefficiencies, with all its lack of expediency and with all the frustrations there may be, accountability to parliament has been the best system ever devised. If someone can show me a better system which eliminates the need for having the executive account for its actions and which at the same time protects the interests of the people it is set up to serve, then I would be the first to change my mind; but for centuries of parliament the fact that such a system exists has never been successfully argued.

● (1752)

Finally, there will be a group which might be tempted to vote against this motion. This group would be those who wish the rights and privileges of members to take second place to political expediency and political cover-up. Now, sir, in a pre-election period, as we all know, atmospheres change, attitudes change, performances change. That is part of the system. But that does not mean that one changes one's integrity. It does not have to mean that one compromises one's principles.

It does not have to mean that the very root of parliamentary democracy, that of accountability, has to take second place. Even from the crassest, most partisan political viewpoint, I cannot understand why we would deny a committee the right to investigate what Mr. Speaker calls a deliberate attempt to obstruct a member. To say that the privileges and elections committee is a parallel committee to the McDonald commission is about as absurd as anything I have heard. It boggles the mind. It just does not wash.

Once it is found to be a prima facie case that there was a deliberate attempt to obstruct a member—and Mr. Speaker found that that was the only conclusion to which he could come—the only conclusion was that there was a deliberate attempt to mislead; it was not negligence, carelessness or an inadvertent act, but a deliberate attempt to mislead and obstruct a member.

There is no question in Mr. Speaker's mind that it was intended to obstruct and mislead when he found there was a prima facie case, and there is no doubt whatsoever that it was a member who was being deliberately misled. No one is accusing anyone here. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has no idea in the world who was perpetrating the deliberate obstruction, and he has never alleged that it was the previous solicitor general. That is a possibility because, as my colleague the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) points out, he signed the letter. That is something which I would hope the committee would come to grips with immediately.

Let me say in conclusion that I implore members of the House to think about the role of the committee as the watchdog of executive action, not to try to crucify the government politically but to be the watchdog of executive action, the one form of accountability that the cabinet has to use. Why should we not have the right to discharge that function properly?

Mr. Nielsen: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Mr. Boulanger: Oh, oh!

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have to put up with it, as well as with a good many other things before he is through. I know we are a nuisance on this side. I also know the regard on the other side for this place is such, as has been indicated by the participants in this debate, that it is a complete misconception of what it is all about.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): That is an old cliché.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member does not understand this place.

Mr. Railton: It is too bad.

Mr. Nielsen: It is too bad, as the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) says.

Mr. Railton: It is too bad you people do not understand it too.

Mr. Nielsen: It is too bad hon. members opposite do not understand this place.

Mr. Railton: It is too bad the hon. member is making a travesty of parliament.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a travesty of parliament to suggest that the privileges of this place and of the members of this place—

Mr. Railton: It is too bad the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen)—

An hon. Member: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member should address himself through the Chair. The hon. member for Yukon has the floor.

Mr. Railton: Tell the hon. member not to talk back.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I was not interrupting while the hon. member was talking; it was he.

Mr. Railton: Get down to the subject.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a travesty of this place when hon. members opposite suggest the McDonald commission would have the power to decide the privileges of members of this chamber. I cannot conceive of a more distorted idea than that which seems to be prevalent in the minds of government members. It is not in keeping with any logic whatsoever or with any traditions built up over the years. We hear from members opposite that the privileges of members of this place should be decided by the McDonald commission.

Mr. Boulanger: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: That is exactly what they have been saying.

Mr. Boulanger: The hon. member is stretching it.

Mr. Nielsen: I am not stretching it at all. That is exactly what they have been saying. They have said that we should not conduct a parallel inquiry in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of this House, because the McDonald commission already is determining these matters. I suggest they fail to appreciate the nub of the question of privilege raised, that members of parliament have been misled by the government.

I sympathize with the remarks of Mr. Speaker today when he commented respecting the treatment which the procedure of this place was accorded in the press yesterday. According to the blues, Mr. Speaker said, "As a matter of fact, one of the unique points that I made was that we were not, as had sometimes been done in the past, holding the minister accountable in this process but that we were going around the minister to deal with his official."

● (2012)

With the greatest of respect, I do not share the view of Mr. Speaker when he made those remarks. Because we are dealing with the government and a minister of that government whose reply in a letter to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) binds that government in a situation where there was a deliberate misleading of the House.

Mr. Boulanger: You mean one paragraph of the letter.

Mr. Nielsen: I do not care whether it is one paragraph or two words, it makes no difference.

Mr. Boulanger: It makes a big difference.

Mr. Nielsen: If the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen)—of whom I will have something more to say in a moment—were shot to death, for example, and I were on trial for his murder—and God knows, sometimes it is difficult to tell whether the President of Privy Council is dead or alive, and the same applies to a good many of the members over there—and I was asked the question in my trial, "Who killed him?" and I answered, "I killed him", those three words would surely constitute rather compelling evidence for a jury to bring in a verdict of guilty.

Mr. Boulanger: C'est un argument simpliste.

Mr. Nielsen: C'est ça. Mr. Speaker went on to say, "I am carefully trying to avoid coming to conclusions about this." That is to say, whether there had been any misleading of parliament. He went on to say, "I ought to review the discussion to keep it in context and that was that the solicitor general of the day may very well have been deceived by the action, which was the subject of the complaint by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. I was making the point that by going around the minister to get to an official who may have first of all deceived the minister, and through the minister, deceived the member, and therefore the House, we were embarking upon a procedure which was unique in that respect."

He is quite correct, but hon. members will note that Mr. Speaker is very careful in his choice and permissive use of the word "may", because the other conclusion, which many in this country have already arrived at, is equally as applicable, that the minister himself may have deceived the House. That is what the motion is all about, to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for the purpose of conducting an investigation.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was quite accurate in his contribution to this debate when he said that the normal procedure would be to have the subject matter referred to the committee where an investigation would be conducted, and after the committee had reported to the House, the House would then make a decision as to the substance of the motion itself. However, the government has plugged its ears and decided that it is not going to committee, even though it has nothing to hide, but instead the decision will be made by a vote against the motion for referral.

Mr. Boulanger: You're playing a game.

Mr. Nielsen: This is more important than a game. I suggest to the hon. member and to the hon. member for Welland—

Mr. Railton: You're just playing a game, Nielsen. Don't kid me.

Mr. Nielsen: I have been accused by the hon. member for Welland of playing a game.

Mr. Railton: That is my opinion.

Mr. Nielsen: I am not going to take objection because my hide is a little thicker than to be offended by his remark, but I am surprised that the good doctor would say such a thing because this is no game.

Mr. Railton: I thought that the lawyer from the Yukon was more sensible.

Mr. Nielsen: This matter concerns a member of this House who has been deliberately misled.

Mr. Railton: Baloney.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not baloney.

Mr. Railton: It is baloney.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, the evidence is clear, was told in a letter which was signed by the solicitor general that there was no practice extant of opening the mail of citizens of this country. That is not baloney, that is fact.

Mr. Railton: That is baloney because both you and he have made up your minds to carry on this sort of debate. That is all it is, just a debate. You have no real reason for it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Once again I would remind hon. members that if they wish to seek the floor they must rise in their place.

Mr. Nielsen: He must also take off his hat, Mr. Speaker. I find it very difficult to believe that members opposite would have that kind of view, that they could come to that kind of conclusion.

Mr. Railton: You know what you can believe and what you cannot believe. You have given a good demonstration of that in the last six years as far as I am concerned. You can believe almost anything.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may have had too much dinner.

An hon. Member: More than dinner.

Mr. Nielsen: Maybe more than dinner. There was an occasion in this House about five or six years ago when I rose in my place to complain about wiretapping. I related an experience that I had had with my telephone in my parliamentary office. I was conclusively led to believe that my telephone was being tapped, and I complained through the grievance procedure here in the House.

At that time the former member for Vancouver Quadra, Mr. Deachman, moved a motion that the subject matter of my question of privilege be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. We agreed that it should be referred. I received a letter from the distinguished chairman, who is still chairman of that Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, requesting me to appear before that committee to testify. I said that I would be delighted to appear but for the sake of order perhaps the solicitor general should appear first to explain the policy of the government, and that members of the RCMP should appear following him to explain their activities. Once that had been done I explained that I would be most delighted to appear.

They did not call the solicitor general or the members of the RCMP to testify. The matter had ended and the committee had come back nulla bona, as we say in law, with nothing to report. Their tactic clearly was to "MacCarthyize" me on that committee, and when that opportunity was not available to them they stopped. They were very quick in those days to refer this kind of matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections but only if they could obtain political advantage. Yet we hear the hypocrisy of the President of Privy Council saying that we are taking this action for political purposes. We are not doing that at all.

Mr. Railton: Beautifully done. I should congratulate you.

Mr. Nielsen: We are taking this action for the purpose of determining who is telling the truth. There have been all sorts of contributions in this debate as to whom we are to believe. We are told by members opposite that once a minister stands in his place, then by the traditions of this House we must believe him. Yet we are confronted with the testimony before the McDonald commission which throws doubt on that belief.

We are not alone in coming to these conclusions. This has been a subject matter for the press throughout the country for a good long time. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is not in the House, I am sorry to say. He complained about headlines in the press to the effect that the Speaker ruled that a government letter misled members of parliament. That is exactly what he ruled—the prima facie case that is being submitted to parliament to refer to a committee. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) shakes his head in a negative manner.

● (2022)

Mr. Goodale: Did you hear him speak?

Mr. Nielsen: I heard him speak. I have been sitting here throughout this debate. The hon. member for Assiniboia has not. I have heard every word and have gone to the trouble of getting the blues so I know precisely what was said today and yesterday. I assert that the press stories are perfectly true. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham was misled; there can be no question about that.

Mr. Railton: He is easy to mislead.

Mr. Nielsen: He was told that mail was not opened.

Mr. Railton: Five years ago.

Mr. Nielsen: I heard that too from the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), but the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham did not find out about this until the testimony came forth in the McDonald inquiry. Then he raised it at the first opportunity. There is no doubt—

Mr. Railton: It took five years.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Welland says it took five years. How can he complain about something that does not surface for five years? The hon. members received that letter in 1973 and did not learn it was false until the testimony was given before the royal commission that we set up to look into these matters.

Mr. Railton: It is not false yet. Who says it is false?

Mr. Nielsen: It is patently false. He was told in that letter—

Mr. Railton: It has got to be true. You are making a lot out of nothing.

Mr. Nielsen: If what the hon. member for Welland says is true—that what the solicitor general said in the letter was true—then we would not be going through this exercise.

Mr. Railton: Yes, you would. You would do it anyway just to mislead us and the country. That is what your main line is, to mislead the country.

Mr. Nielsen: This is the old line, that we are a nuisance over here, a thorn under their saddle and we should be abolished—get us the heck out so that they can go on their own sweet way.

Mr. Railton: The country is wising up to this.

Mr. Nielsen: Indeed, they are! That is reflected in certain headlines I have read in the last two or three days.

Even the hon. member for Welland should concede that the letter from the solicitor general was false. He signed it. If we were to believe that he did not know what he was signing, I suppose he could well have sent a copy of the Lord's prayer to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and have adopted it as government policy.

Mr. Railton: I don't know how he would know.

Mr. Nielsen: There is a certain exposure there which might be beneficial to those on the treasury benches, of course!

The second point I want to make with reference to these things that are perfectly true is that, in order to be a prima facie case of privilege, the action had to be deliberate. Hon. members opposite have been delivering barbs and, indeed, some members on this side have been making excuses that the then solicitor general did not know the letter was false. But he signed the letter, Mr. Speaker. Ministerial responsibility has to begin and end somewhere. It had to be deliberate. When he signed that letter it had to be deliberately misleading. It was misleading; there is no doubt about that.

The letter, emanating as it did from the solicitor general, emanated from the government. It came from the solicitor general. He signed it. He made the misleading statement; therefore, the government has mislead a member of the House and, as Mr. Speaker has said, that is a contempt of the House itself. Therefore, I say that the press treatment of this proceeding is perfectly correct. That letter deliberately misled the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and deliberately misled this House.

The Prime Minister's predecessor in 1963 suffered from what we called at the time "selective amnesia". As long as remembrances occurred which might be embarrassing to the government with respect to the Rivard affair, the furniture matters or Munsinger matters, ministers conveniently forgot the circumstances. They could not remember; it was selective amnesia. The former prime minister travelled back from Prince Edward Island on a plane with the minister of justice of the day—God rest his soul—and he was told about certain things that he afterwards did not remember.

That was an affliction which dogged the government of that day. It seems to be a peculiarly Liberal affliction. They are no longer suffering from selective amnesia, but rather what I might call self-inflicted blindness, which is a theory that holds that by seeing no evil, its reality can be denied. Over and over again we have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say in this House—and I have quotations by the ream—that, of course, government is responsible for setting the policy of the security service.

Mr. Railton: You should write children's stories.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Welland has more ability to write children's stories than I.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You have the ability.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi really should not speak about ability after his dismal performance in the debate this afternoon. I have never heard anything more inane in my time in the House than his so-called contribution to the debate. He asked, as did the President of Privy Council, "Who misinformed?" He wondered about responsibility being attached to an individual for misinforming the House. He did not know who it was.

I just put the question, Mr. Speaker: Who signed the letter containing false information sent to a member of parliament? Who signed the letter that deliberately misled the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham? It was the solicitor general of the day, and I am glad to see him in his seat. He has been peculiarly silent. One might have expected he would take part in this debate and attempt to set the record straight. That is the simple answer to the question.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Very simple. That is the problem.

Mr. Nielsen: Very simple and very accurate. When a minister signs a letter one assumes he has read it. One also assumes that if the statement was made in that letter that mail was not being opened, he would recognize the seriousness of signing such a blanket assurance without asking questions. It is completely inconceivable to any logical, reasonable individual to conclude that the government operates a security service without any knowledge of what that service is doing in the country.

● (2032)

I believe that the letter contained information sent to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham which deliberately misled him, and that was the finding of the Speaker as well.

The motion calls for an investigation, but members over there do not want an investigation because the former solicitor general would have to appear and give testimony. The government majority would then have to exercise its usual effort of stonewalling. Even so, some damage and embarrassing evidence would emerge. That is what the motion calls for.

The President of Privy Council has tried to leave the impression that the House must make its decision here. When the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby made his contribution to the debate, he was absolutely correct in outlining the normal procedure that should be adopted when the House is considering matters of this nature. The matter should be referred to the committee, the committee should hear and consider evidence and then report to the House. Then and then only should the House make a decision.

Instead the government members, on instructions that the whip has laid on, are plugging their ears. They do not want to hear anything. They have decided the matter is not going to committee, that we are not going to get information, so that the matter will die here. They will be successful because of their majority. The facts will not be exposed.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Let me give one educated guess for the benefit of the hon. member. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi during his so-called contribution to this debate spoke about trained seals. I might remind the hon. member that those members over there are precisely that, sir. They are trained seals. There is not an honest, independent initiative among all government backbenchers, no matter how important the matter is to parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member opposite claps. Let me remind him of what his leader, the Prime Minister of this country, said of Liberal backbenchers in the days when he was not in this place. He described members like the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi as trained donkeys seeing how fast they could get to the trough. That is a paraphrase but it is damned accurate in respect of the Prime Minister's words.

An hon. Member: He didn't say that.

Mr. Nielsen: He said that. He did not say it since he became Prime Minister but when he was a member of the NDP.

An hon. Member: He said that before he saw the light.

Mr. Nielsen: I wonder what light they see over there that blinds them to the natural course this parliament should be taking on this issue.

Let us consider the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) who used to be the minister of justice as well. Not only was he the minister of justice, he was the dean of the law school in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: Does that bother you?

Mr. Nielsen: It doesn't bother me at all. What bothers me is that students who went to that law school to learn the fundamental principles of law were subject to the influence of the kind of thinking to which the Minister of Transport is prone.

I can remember an occasion here in the House when we considered a statute which said in one of its clauses that payments "shall" be made to wheat farmers on a specific date. The Minister of Transport stood in his place and argued—I think he argued sincerely—that the word "shall" could be construed to mean "maybe". That is exactly what happened and the government held up those payments to the wheat farmers even though the statute said implicitly that they had to be made.

I remember the present Prime Minister standing up in the House, in February, I think, of 1968, when we defeated the government by two votes on a money measure, arguing that this really was not a lack of confidence and the government had every right to subsist and survive. He also used to be a law professor at a notable university in Montreal. No wonder we say that hon. members over there do not understand this place. They cling to power like a cat clinging to the hide of the Canadian people, whatever the cost.

An hon. Member: What do the Canadian people say, Erik?

Mr. Nielsen: I think the Canadian people are pretty disgusted. The hon. member opposite reminds me of Bryce Mackasey. I forget his riding, whichever one it was he represented from time to time—Verdun at one time, and a recent attempt at Ottawa Centre. He always tried to portray himself as the man going to work with a lunch bucket. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi thinks he is the only member of this House who has an understanding of what he calls the common, ordinary man in the street. I have news for him. There are other members of this House, on all sides, who are just as keenly aware of the guy who uses a wrench as that hon. member. He asks me what the Canadian people think. I would presume that what the Canadian people think is that those members over there are trammelling the rights of parliament. If the President of Privy Council were to have his way, we would have the gag rule. If the Minister of Transport had his way, it would be the gag rule, and that is the fact.

An hon. Member: The people seem to be happy in my riding.

Mr. Nielsen: I have lived in the hon. member's province for quite some time.

An hon. Member: It doesn't show.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry if it does not show. I went to university in the hon. member's neighbouring province and I lived in that area of the country for six years.

An hon. Member: You better go back and refresh yourself.

Mr. Nielsen: I wonder if the hon. member has ever been to the Yukon. Let me tell him that I have lived permanently in every province and territory in the country, and I do not think that is a statement he can make. As a result, I think I am just as keenly aware of the feelings of Canadians as he is.

Canadians are going to get the impression from this debate and the exposure the question is receiving that the government, through the former solicitor general, is misleading members of this House. The Minister of Transport would like to see the debate terminated. He said the debate was closed and that this was a political attack. I have already given members the wiretapping example. It seems to me that if government members vote against this motion—

An hon. Member: We will.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member says they will. The phrase immediately leaps to my mind: My mind is made up; don't confuse me with the facts. Hon. members opposite do not want the facts because they are embarrassing. This is yet another example of their total lack of regard for this place, and an example of the extremely low regard in which they hold the parliamentary process, the subject matter of the debate here last Tuesday.

● (2042)

I am really disappointed. I have sat here several years listening to the President of Privy Council. Usually I have a very high regard for his participation in debates of a procedural nature. However, every time he opened his mouth yesterday, he was doing so for the purpose of placing yet another restriction on members, yet another gag on members of parliament.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised a point of order last night with regard to the words used by the President of Privy Council. During the debate today the President of Privy Council rose and tried to recoup some of that ground. There is no doubt that he was annoyed yesterday when Mr. Speaker found a prima facie case of privilege. He was annoyed that he had not received a copy of the motion. Obviously he was manifestly annoyed. He said in that debate—and so that hon. members do not forget who was the first person to reflect on the Chair, I will quote from page 1863 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a motion that obviously was well prepared beforehand and which obviously was in the hands of the official opposition for some time, having prepared it in consultation with the Chair.

I am informed that is not true at all. That motion was not prepared in consultation with the Chair but was prepared in consultation with the Table and the officers of the House. There is a big distinction between the two. He went on to say:

> I regret that on a matter of this importance the motion itself was suddenly sprung upon us,—

What liability do members have—and I have raised several questions of privilege in this House in years past—to inform the government that we are going to be raising a question of privilege? None at all. They would like to have us operate as puppets, but that is not how we operate. He went on to say:

> —and that we were not given any opportunity to consider the terms of the motion prior to its being put before us,—

Here were the damaging words:

> —obviously on a prearranged basis.

He was accusing the Chair in no uncertain terms of collaboration, to use the word that was used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre last night. The Chair had nothing to do with the preparation of that motion. That was a very crass accusation to be made by the President of Privy Council. He really should apologize for it. However, it will not do any good because, in my view, the Speaker has a very fine judicial mind. After extreme care in exercising his discretion yesterday, he came to the conclusion that there was a prima facie case of privilege that has to be considered here.

What those opposite are saying is: "Your opinion is worth naught, Mr. Speaker. We do not agree with you that there is any case of privilege here. We are not going to allow it to be investigated. We are not going to allow it to be sent to committee. We are not going to hear anything from any witnesses. Our minds are made up. We are going to vote against the motion and you with your reputation as a very fine legal mind can go down the tube with it."

That is the position those opposite are taking. Then they draw the red herring across the trail of a parallel inquiry. I am glad to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council in his place.

Mr. Pinard: As usual.

Mr. Nielsen: He has the audacity to suggest that this question of privilege should not be discussed in a parliamentary committee but should be decided by Mr. Justice McDonald and his commission.

Mr. Pinard: You don't understand.

Mr. Nielsen: I not only heard the parliamentary secretary say that, but I read it again today. That is what the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi and the President of Privy Council have been saying. What a travesty of the parliamentary process! What could more clearly illustrate the complete lack of understanding of what this place is all about than that kind of a statement from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council? We do not want a parallel inquiry. What we want, as the motion describes it, is a reference to the standing committee which usually considers matters of this nature.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

● (2052)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, your arguments and those put forth by most hon. members who have already spoken are quite convincing. This is clearly a motion which deserves the support of most if not all hon. members. This opportunity hon. members have to demonstrate real and sincere eagerness to straighten up our political ways should have precedence over any other consideration. For we must agree that unfortunately most of our so-called democratic governments are democratic only in names. Sometimes our leaders, under the cover of democracy, administer and govern in a way that would shock our people, if only they were aware of what is going on.

Without presuming what results such an investigation could have, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there has been too much mystery about things whose consequences are too serious to allow us to dismiss them lightly without scrutinizing them so as to show once and for all, as I said earlier, that this government can offer the population something positive rather than the opposite.

Mr. Speaker, I recall that in 1969, the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts heard the evidence of municipal authorities from the city of Montreal who stated that they were aware of a great number of subversive activities not only in the metropolitan area of Montreal, but also elsewhere in Quebec, and that they did not understand why nothing was being done to stop these activities after they had told the police and government authorities about them.

One year later, there was the famous October, 1970, crisis where we witnessed serious disturbances, and because of the circumstances surrounding these events, we were able to ask ourselves certain questions such as this one: Why is it that since the authorities were aware that certain events could occur, why is it that the police, especially the RCMP, while it found quite normal in its regular operations to infiltrate certain underground movements in the field of criminal activities or where the security of the country was involved, had let the situation deteriorate to such a point that this crisis could occur and not only affect certain people, as I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, but also harm the reputation of a whole nation and a whole population? The hon. member for Champlain was taken lightly and even laughed at in 1970, 1971 and 1972 when he asked a series of questions to determine how come certain events had occurred when the police was aware of the situation. All I was told at that time was that I could not be told anything on this subject because national security was involved, and this is how, as others have said before me, the government hid behind the rules to avoid revealing certain facts about which we should have been told.

Mr. Speaker, circumstances made it possible a few months ago to see that those considerations made several years ago were just as founded as the confessions of the Solicitor General who said it was true that the RCMP had set criminal fires, stolen dynamite, and issued communiqués in the name of the FLQ in 1971.

Mr. Speaker, when we uncover everything under those revelations, we will realize that we are very close to a dictatorial government acting much like South American republics which always stand one hour or one day away from revolutions. Mr. Speaker, either one of two things—either the government takes its responsibilities and it has true and absolute control over everything that has to do with the security of this country, everything that has to do with its administration, directly or indirectly, or it leaves that democratic power in the hands of law enforcement agencies. In both cases, this goes against fundamental rules that should be guiding policies of this kind.

We have before us today a motion which puts those facts right to our faces, Mr. Speaker. How come the Solicitor General refuses to participate and the government confirms that refusal by informing us that it is going to vote against this motion whose only purpose is to bring about clarifications we need to set things straight? If there was an attempt to cover up, if it is still going on, I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is a way of doing things which sooner or later will generate disastrous reactions, and then do not be surprised when you see the comments that can be made on the general morality across this country, when the example comes from the top—the government itself.

Mr. Speaker, it is important that we in our capacity as representatives of the people be able to preserve the fundamental rights and privileges the people have to know how their money is being administered, how their interests are being protected and what is the general direction of policies. If a solicitor general does not have more responsibility before this House than any law enforcement agency dictating letters to him, Mr. Speaker, we have to know where we stand. To refuse to inform adequately the duly elected representatives of the people is, as everyone else said before me, to try to hide the truth. It is high time in the system we have, which more and more people see as a corrupt system, for those who run it to shed their fear of facing public opinion directly by having the courage to disclose all the side-lights of what was done. I repeat, whether it was authorized or not, it occurred. Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting to know under what authority and how it is the delegated authority the police was given went as far as stealing dynamite, setting criminal fires, and issuing communiqués in the name of the FLQ.

In view of the special circumstances under which emancipation and growth led to the election of a Quebec government advocating a restructuring of the country along the lines of sovereignty-association, there is a strong tendency to conclude that everything has been done for a number of years to tarnish the reputation of those who are honestly, sincerely and peacefully striving to find a way for the people in this nation to live in true harmony. That the temptation has been to tarnish their reputations by all sorts of arbitrary means, such as controlling in some way the enforcement agencies or letting the police lead activities that are unacceptable in a so-called civilized nation—

● (2102)

An hon. Member: Speak to the motion!

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, an hon. member opposite suggests I am not speaking to the motion, but this is more relevant than he thinks. I know of course such matters are of no interest to hon. members supporting this government. I know full well the large majority of Liberal members are not aware of all those actions, but they know as well as we do there have been actions that prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that the police are indulging in activities that might have been and in effect were from time to time in the nature of provocation. There were attempts to tarnish reputations, the audacity went as far as—and this has now been proved—to discredit a political party as a whole, namely the Parti Québécois, in a successful attempt at getting a list of their membership.

Mr. Speaker, we hear reports of coups in South America. The reference is to banana republics, the implication is this is quite normal there. Well, if we got deeper, if we could finally find out how things happened and why they did happen, we might find out we are faced with an administration whose sense of democracy is no more advanced than that of countries led by what amounts to dictatorships. Mr. Speaker, we are here to protect the citizens, we are here to pass legislation promoting their emancipation and growth. In other words we are not here to play hide-and-seek to protect anybody.

Whether it be police forces, high-ranking civil servants or government authorities that are involved and made mistakes, we and the people are entitled to know the truth. And we should agree that the matter be referred to committee, so we may shed light. Certainly there can be no other conclusion that those who do not support that have something to hide. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, everything surrounding the facts that came to light, everything surrounding the very existence of the McDonald inquiry, the circumstances surrounding what is for all practical purposes the demise of the Keable inquiry in Quebec, all these things are rather mysterious and directions have certainly been given at a certain time to create such a situation. If we are not given the opportunity to scrutinize those issues in committee, how shall we know? When shall we be able to undertake a really objective analysis of all those facts and circumstances?

Mr. Speaker, we have no choice because there is no other means in this country to call all the witnesses to throw light on that issue. We have witnessed the fight between the Solicitor General of the federal government and the attorney general of Quebec concerning the famous Keable inquiry. We have witnessed that mouse and cat game, those proposals and counter-proposals, the systematic refusal of any cooperations to shed light on the activities of police agencies and authorities in that matter, Mr. Speaker. How would we not conclude, as are doing all Canadians, that there is a plot of enormous proportions to try hiding the truth?

This is why, now that we have an opportunity to find out the truth, not for the sake of political or partisan revenge but merely to demonstrate to Canadians that we are responsible, we want to show our respect for democracy and even if the inquiry casts aspersion on certain people, we agree to go to the bottom of the matter to purify political morals and put an end to irregularities by the police to make sure that that kind of interference with the basic rights of citizens will not reoccur.

[English]

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to speak in this debate because I think it is a matter of great importance. At least, I would have thought it was a matter of great importance, because surely whether the parliamentary system works or does not work depends on whether we can trust one another; and if we are getting into situations where a member cannot trust a minister, an answer he gets from a minister, a letter he gets from a minister, or a verbal answer he gets from a minister outside this House, and if he cannot trust that he is getting accurate information from a minister, or from another member for that matter, then how can this parliamentary system work at all? That is what I think is really at stake here.

When this letter was written on December 4, 1973, by the solicitor general of the time, we do not know whether the solicitor general of the time knew he was giving false information to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). We do know that, in response to a letter of November 21 addressed to that minister by a member of this House, that minister gave incorrect information when he stated that he had been assured by the RCMP that it was not its practice to intercept the private mail of anyone, when it was its practice, when it was the usual thing, and when the RCMP had done it on dozens and hundreds of occasions.

Whether the minister just did not know or whether he took any steps to check the information he got, this House does not know. Therefore Mr. Speaker found a prima facie case. I want to point out what Mr. Speaker said as it is recorded at page 1857 of Hansard as follows:

> I, therefore, find a prima facie case of contempt against the House of Commons.

Further on Mr. Speaker said:

> —the hon. member does in fact have a prima facie case of privilege involving a deliberate attempt to impede the House in its work, and perhaps the minister and, in turn, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Having found a prima facie case, Mr. Speaker was not making a final decision. Surely the House has no other recourse but to ask the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to look into this matter. That is what one would have thought, but for the second time since 1965 hon. gentlemen opposite are going to vote against such a motion.

I remember that there was an Irish playwright who wrote a play called "The Playboys of the Western World". We see on the benches opposite the lemmings of the western world. They are all rushing headlong after their leader going over the precipice to electoral suicide. They are absolute lemmings, going blindly. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) demonstrated his lemming-like instincts here today. I have made up a little verse about him.

> The member for Miramichi
> When told by his whip says "oui, oui".
> Tonight on orders you'll note
> He'll give us a negative vote.

That is a typical hon. gentleman opposite. He does not want to make up his own mind about contempt of parliament, about contempt of the privileges of members, about whether members should get truthful answers from ministers, about whether members should get truthful answers from members or about whether members should have any rights at all. He just wants to vote blindly with his whip. When the whip says "vote yes," he votes "oui, oui."

> The member for Miramichi
> When told by his whip say "oui, oui".
> Tonight on orders you'll note
> He'll give us a negative vote.

I hope the hon. member proves me wrong before the night is out, or tomorrow is out, or Monday is out, or Tuesday is out, or Wednesday is out. Because if I had my way, we would debate this for the next month. We would give up Christmas.

Mr. Nystrom: Three cheers for Tom Mayo.

Mr. Crosbie: Tom Mayo is going to be in China with his cousin when I am through with him in the next election. That is the only mention his name is ever going to get in this House. He is never going to get here as a member as long I represent St. John's West.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: They are very upset next door to me here.

● (2112)

I want to give the House another quote. It has been proven false here today. A man named Barter Holyday said this:

A man may as well open an oyster without a knife as a lawyer's mouth without a fee.

It can be obviously seen that that is not true here today because lawyers are opening their mouths without fees, so far as we know. This is an important issue and it is a good thing we have them to speak.

Yesterday, the government House leader made his corkscrew defence of why the government was going to vote against this motion. Thank God I did not hear the hon. gentleman yesterday. He was like a boa constrictor. It was as if he had swallowed a donkey. He had a whole donkey down his throat, or a horse. He was like a boa constrictor twisting this way and that way, trying to digest what he had been ordered to do by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and have the House support it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Listen to them bray over there. Obviously he did not swallow all the donkeys because some of them are still braying over there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Now, Mr. Speaker, let us examine the House leader's speech made yesterday. What are the points he made as to why this matter should not go to committee?

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Is that the donkey braying again? Has the House leader returned? I am looking at page 1865 of Hansard to examine what defence the government House leader made yesterday.

Mr. Boulanger: You are brainwashed.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not think the hon. gentleman is brainwashed; he does not have that article to wash.

The House leader, as reported at page 1864 of Hansard, advanced his reasons why—

Mr. Boulanger: You are brainwashed.

Mr. Crosbie: The House leader said he probed beneath the surface. God knows what he found when he probed beneath the surface of that caucus.

Mr. Boulanger: Brainwashed.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to lose my train of thought here. At page 1865 of Hansard the government House leader is reported to have said of the government:

We set up the McDonald royal commission at the request of the official opposition.

How does that score with what the Prime Minister said a few short months ago? He said this at a press conference on October 28, 1977, when he appointed and gave additional terms of reference to the McDonald commission. He said, at the time when we had heard of some outrages by the RCMP, of breaking and entering and the like:

—I said, well, in that case, we will set up this commission of inquiry.

The Prime Minister decided to set up a commission of inquiry. Yet the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) suggested that they set up the commission because we had requested it. They had not set it up for that reason at all, Mr. Speaker.

What did the then solicitor general do? We have had so many solicitors general that it is hard to remember all their names. In this case it was the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux Montagnes (Mr. Fox). He came to the House on October 28 and said that in the spring of 1976 they had been made aware of certain break-ins and some thefts on the premises of the APLQ in Montreal, but they did not think that was important and they did not set up a royal commission. But later on, in the summer of 1977, other allegations were made, and having inquired into these allegations—now I am quoting from page 8—it says here:

—the commissioner of the RCMP advised that he believed that in the circumstances it would be in the best interests of the RCMP that a commission of inquiry be set up to look into the operations . . . The government agreed that public support of the RCMP——was necessary, and they therefore set up the commission, not because the opposition requested that this commission be set up.

First the Prime Minister claimed that he set it up because in his great wisdom he decided it should be set up. Then the solicitor general said it was set up because the commissioner of the RCMP wanted it set up. Well, it was not set up to decide whether or not our privileges as members of the House have been violated. It was set up for certain other reasons, and it has been pursuing them ever since. As Mr. Speaker himself said, to knock down another argument of the government House leader—there are a lot of them over there who should be knocked on the head but we will only knock their arguments on the head—as reported at page 1856 of Hansard:

—because the parallel inquiry that would be involved was not in any way a trial and there was no verdict which I felt could be prejudiced by a parallel inquiry. I therefore did not think the doctrine has an application in that sense.

So that puts that argument to rest.

Then the government House leader went on with his defence—it must have been painful to him because today he looked as if he had a bad case of the bends from having given these arguments yesterday—and said this:

Certainly it is not the exercise of either the ministerial responsibility or parliamentary responsibility to find a question of privilege on one sentence by one witness contradicted by other witnesses in testimony that is not yet complete, that has not been tested by other witnesses and that has not been the subject of cross-examination.

Who said that this was necessary? That is why we have the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, so that members of that committee can test the witnesses and can decide whether this sentence is contradicted somewhere else, or whatever the case may be. That is the whole reason we are asking that this should go to a committee.

Then the President of Privy Council, in the lowest blow, attempted to involve us in a conspiracy. He noted how the government is the victim of a lot of conspiracies now. The poor Prime Minister went to Toronto and spoke to the lukewarm Toronto Liberals and told them that there was a great conspiracy to get the Liberals out of the government, to defeat them. He said that the press was against them, the Conservatives were against them, the NDP were against them, the Social Credit were against them, that the people were against them, and it was all the result of a great conspiracy.

His deskmate, the government House leader, has the same conspiracy bug—not the kind of bugs the government has been putting in people's offices and houses through their agencies across Canada but another kind of bug. They have the conspiracy bug. The government House leader opened up his speech yesterday by saying that there was a conspiracy, that the official opposition had put forward the motion having prepared it on consultation with the Chair. It was put before us, he said, "obviously on a prearranged basis". In other words, there was a conspiracy, and even Mr. Speaker was involved in the conspiracy against the poor, pitiful hon. gentlemen opposite. Everybody is conspiring against them.

Imagine the President of Privy Council with his long record in the House saying that kind of claptrap, putting forward that kind of dangerous theory, that unless the Liberals stay in power in Canada, Canada will fall apart, and that it is a powerful and sinister conspiracy of people who are trying to pry them out of office to which they have attached themselves. They will cling to power by their fingernails, their toenails and their hangnails, and they will attempt anything to stay there. That is the effect of what the President of Privy Council said to us yesterday.

This is a sleazy, slingy, dingy government, and their actions yesterday proved it. They are sleazy, slingy and dingy. They are certainly not whiter than white; they are tattletale gray. They are not bright. Their whole performance in the last two years in the field of law and security is the sleaziest and dingiest of any elected democratic government in the world, and they still have not stopped.

All the defences that are alleged in connection with the McDonald commission give one cause to think and to worry. There was the Laycraft inquiry on the fact that the Department of National Revenue and the RCMP had ignored the law. All was given in testimony before the Laycraft inquiry. There is no confidentiality of information if the government wants to break the law and use it for its own purpose. The government is not concerned about that; they will just stay in their seats and vote baa, baa black sheep whenever they are told to vote baa, baa black sheep. They are not concerned with these dingy affairs. Then there was the Doyle case that I have spoken about here before.

I want to give the House a quotation which summarizes how this government administers the law. It is from Balzac, a Frenchman I believe, who lived from 1799 to 1850. He said: "Laws are spiderwebs through which the big flies pass and the little ones get caught". So long as this government is in office, the big flies will go right through the spiderwebs. They are not paying their taxes, they are not obeying the law, and the little flies are getting caught. I am sick and tired of looking at them over there, satisfied, prepared to put up with it and voting blindly every time—

Mr. Broadbent: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I have here another quotation which reads:

If police efficiency were an end in itself, the police would be free to put an accused on the rack. Police efficiency must yield to constitutional rights.

That was a statement by an American judge, Judge Wisdom. He was talking about who will guard the guardians. That is the question here: Who will guard these guardians opposite us who do not care about parliamentary traditions? Who will guard what happens in the House, if the majority will use their majority to prevent this matter from being referred to a committee for investigation? What a squalid spectacle, completely and utterly squalid.

• (2122)

The author of the squalidity is now over in Europe trying to take their minds off squalid affairs which are going on in the House of Commons. While he trips off to the United Kingdom and France, he is trying to take the public's mind off the squalid scene in the House tonight, all day today and yesterday. It is not going to work. It does not matter how the boa constrictor twists and turns, or what donkeys he swallows, or what horses he swallows. The Auditor General did not find any horses on the government payroll this year, but he found a large number of the rear part of horses on the public payroll. The horses are gone, but the horses' ends are not.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi better keep himself to saying, "oui, oui". There was a secret trial of Peter Treu. I remember in my youth listening to "The Shadow" on the radio. When that program was on, the saying used to be, "Only The Shadow knows". Well, only "The Shadow" knows in this House, because we do not know, and we are never going to know. It is only the government's little shadows that are going to know what happened and what are the true facts of the letter sent by the minister, who is right opposite me now, on December 4, 1973.

How can the minister sit in the House and have this matter discussed for two days, and not rise on his feet and say, "Gentlemen, this is what happened: I asked the RCMP", perhaps he might say, "to prepare an answer for me in all good faith, and this is the answer they prepared. I took them at their face word about it". That is what he should be telling this House or telling the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. "This is what happened: I am very sorry but I trusted the RCMP. You know, you would expect me to trust the RCMP. I was the minister in charge of them. When they told me X, Y, Z, I believed them".

Surely I could believe the minister if he said that. But how can I believe a minister who does not even get up to speak in this debate about a letter which he sent to a member, in answer to the member's letter to him asking for information? Honestly, how can one puzzle out what that means? I cannot understand it.

This is a scandal-ridden government if I ever saw one. If I ever saw a government scandal-ridden, this is it. The Auditor General's report, they have brushed that off. That has got scandal after scandal in it, but nobody seems to care. Is it that the press and the public think we are so corrupt that why should they bother caring about anything, about the hundreds of millions wasted, the way the Department of Transport put the blame on their ministers? Nobody even bothers to ask the minister to have an inquiry into why the public service is blaming the ministers for all these mistakes. Does nobody care that 65 per cent of all contracts in the country are handed out holus-bolus without tenders? Mr. Speaker, $1.8 billion to the Department of Supply and Services alone out of $2.7 billion, I think it was, in 1976-1977. Down in Newfoundland they had a royal commission investigation because a few hundred thousand dollars in contracts were given out without observing—

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. Crosbie: A few hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. Broadbent: What is the government of Newfoundland?

Mr. Crosbie: It is Progressive Conservative. They appointed a royal commission to investigate this minor transgression, compared to this outfit that is giving out and bashing out billions.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi better keep his thoughts to oui, oui, and not interrupt me. The lugubrious Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) got up to speak today, and he made another one of his unctuous, vacuous speeches here to defend the House leader. He said that it would not be the right method to send this to committee. No, it would not be the right method because there is something the hon. gentlemen are hiding. Therefore, it would not be the right method to do that at all.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi actually spoke today. He said that what the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) had said was arrant nonsense. Imagine, Mr. Speaker! What was it that the House leader said? It was Allan's nonsense. That is what he should have been speaking about, not arrant nonsense.

Where are we? Here we have the Speaker finding prima facie a disgraceful state of affairs. The press reported accurately. The press had as its headlines, "Liberal government letter misleads MP". That is just what the letter did. It misled everyone. The member was misled. We have all been misled. It was a prima facie case of privilege. There was a deliberate misleading by somebody. The letter emanated from the government, from the solicitor general. It was signed by him. So the headlines are perfectly correct, that Liberal government letter deliberately misled an MP. That is exactly what happened, but the Liberal government do not care that they have misled a member of parliament. They do not care. They think the public will forget this in the long run.

There are other members who want to speak here, so I cannot really let myself go as I would like to let myself go. It was a funny thing. The Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) in charge of funds for education and the like is going to go to Mandalay or Burma over Christmas to find out about freedom of information. He should start unlocking some information in this House before he goes. Is he going to stop in Chile on the way to find out how free the information is? He will find there is more information given out by the government in Chile than there is right here.

Mr. Broadbent: Right on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Where else is he going to stop? Why does he not shoot down to Iran on his way and find out how free the information is in Iran and the SAVAK? That is where we are headed for, if hon. gentlemen opposite are not turfed out on the first occasion the electorate gets in the next few months; we are headed right for the SAVAK. Imagine, freedom of information can be studied right here today and yesterday. Where is the Secretary of State? What has he said in this debate? When is this fine Torontonian going to rise to his feet to speak on freedom of information and the privileges of the members of this House, instead of going caw, caw, haw, haw when his party whip tells him to go caw, caw, haw, haw, oui, oui or non, non?

I noticed the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said that some officials were going to be hung out to dry in Loto Canada. I thought to myself, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) wants to hang out to dry the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, if he ever gets a chance. When it comes to pegging that old dollar, it is not going to be the dollar which is going to get pegged, it is going to be the chairman of the finance committee. He is going to go right up on a peg.

I have only given half of my address.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: More, more!

Mr. Crosbie: I have one other quote which will stun hon. gentlemen opposite into insensibility. This is called Coughlin's law: "Don't talk unless you can improve the silence". There is not one over there who can improve the silence. Not one of them can improve the silence. There is another law too, Gate's. I just happen to have this with me tonight. There is Gate's law: "If there isn't a law, there will be". That is Gate's law.

Because I know other members are anxious to speak on this, I will just say this. As a new member of this House, I am shocked. I do not even know whether I will offer myself for re-election, if this is the way the majority are going to treat the privileges of the members of this House, in such a supine manner. We will all be watching the member for Northumberland-Miramichi to see whether it is oui, oui or non, non when this vote comes up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to my friends on all sides if I deign to bring the House back from the road to Mandalay where the flying fishes play; but it seems to me that we have before us tonight a very serious issue. As a matter of fact, this started out to be a matter concerning a letter sent by a cabinet minister to a member of this House, containing a statement which turned out to be false. That in itself is a serious matter. In the absence of an immediate apology from the government side for this having happened, that issue would have been well worth the length of time we have been debating the motion put down yesterday by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

In my view, what has transpired in these two days has produced an issue much greater and much more serious than the original question which got us into this debate. That more serious issue is the way in which the government has decided to respond to a judgment from the Chair that there is before the House a prima facie case of privilege.

● (2132)

I concede that this takes the form of a motion, that if there is a motion it can be voted on and that if the majority of the members choose to vote against the motion it is defeated. I recognize, too, that the Speaker is perfectly entitled to assume the position that he has taken, namely, that his role is separate from the role of the House and that therefore he does not feel his position has been downgraded by the stand taken by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and, apparently, by all those on the government side of the House.

As a member on the floor of this House, I feel that we are experiencing a downgrading of the parliamentary process. We are in a situation where the government is saying that by the weight of its majority it will negate the judgment of the Speaker. We give to the Speaker of this House a great deal of responsibility and authority. Many years ago that authority was confined by having appeals against Speaker's rulings, but we decided in due course that that was not the way to run the House, that it would be better for the Speaker's rulings not to be appealable.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

I must say that in the days when we were discussing that change I had to be won over to it. I was here, of course, in 1956 when there were perhaps more votes on appeals of the Speaker's rulings than votes on anything else. Having experienced an occupant in the Chair who did not exactly grace it, I found it difficult to go along with the idea; but in the end I supported it. I am very glad that I did, as I think are all of us who participated in the making of that decision. We have had good speakers over the years, but the quality of the judgments by Speakers on points of order has definitely improved since the time we abolished appeals against Speaker's rulings.

This situation is in a slightly different category. It is not a ruling but a judgment which the Speaker has made. It is made by Mr. Speaker, who has been put in the position of having to give us his thoughts on the issue and the benefit of his judgment. He took a long time on this one, and it was discussed on at least two occasions on the floor of the House. In the end Mr. Speaker told us that, in his view, what had happened was very clear, that there has been a deliberate misleading of a member of this House and that that was an offence against the privileges of this House. He found that in his view there was a prima facie case of privilege.

It seems to me that in keeping with our experiences on Speaker's rulings on points of order, and with the more successful occupancy of the Chair, we have had since we went in for that way of doing things, there should have been no question about the judgment of the Speaker with respect to this matter, that there should have been immediate acceptance of the Speaker's opinion and that the motion made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and put before the House should have been passed without debate.

Of course, the whole debate could have been avoided completely if somebody on the government side had been prepared to stand up, offer an apology and ensure that steps would be taken guaranteeing that this sort of thing would not happen again. If the government was not prepared to do that, it should at least have been prepared to let the normal practices of this House proceed. The motion should have passed without debate, and the matter should have gone to committee where it would have been thoroughly examined.

However, the President of Privy Council has said that it will not be examined in committee, that it will be examined on the floor of the House. How can a problem like this be examined by having speeches made back and forth from one side to the other, whether it is the member for Mandalay who just spoke, the member for Winnipeg North Centre or the President of Privy Council? We are not conducting an investigation, calling witnesses or looking into the matter at all; we are simply making speeches which do not resolve the issue the way it could be resolved in committee. I feel that this matter should go to committee.

If the government does not like the judgment offered by Mr. Speaker yesterday, it is all the more important for the good name of the government to have this matter investigated. If the government simply votes down the motion, it seems to be saying, "We do not want this matter looked into; we are using the weight of our majority". On the other hand, if the government feels that it could win its point of view if the matter were investigated, that is all the more reason the government should be allowing it to go to committee.

I have not taken the time to look up all the related precedents on such a matter, but certainly in my time here the only case I can recall of the government voting down a Speaker's ruling that there was a prima facie case was earlier this year when the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) had a point of privilege. I was shocked that, after the Speaker giving us the benefit of his judgment, the government would simply say no.

The President of Privy Council yesterday cited an example of something back in the days when Mr. Speaker Michener was in the Chair. As I recall, that had something to do with a civil servant against whom there was a complaint on the floor of the House. The judgment he gave on that occasion related to the fact that that non-accused person was not here to defend himself.

This, however, is a totally different situation and Mr. Speaker Michener's dictum does not apply at all. In this case the person who has been offended is a member of this House right here on the floor. When you offend the rights and privileges of a member of this House, you offend the rights and privileges of this House as a whole. There have been no precedents advanced by those on the government side to support the government's position in this matter.

The practice is to send these matters to committee. I have known of a number of cases which have gone to committee, some of which after arriving there were found by the committee to have no privilege. That then is the end of it. Or the committee would report back to the House that there is a case of privilege, whereupon the House could turn it down. But to close the door by the weight of a government majority is flying in the face of reality, is flying in the face of what is the intelligent thing to do.

Even though Mr. Speaker may not feel offended by what has happened, I say that this action by the government is an offence to the Chair and is nibbling away at the authority of this institution, the parliament of Canada itself. I am disturbed by the fact that twice in the space of a few months the government has rebuked the Speaker in this way, and I think that it should not be tolerated at all.

I know that once a cabinet minister or two stands up and states a position, the backbenchers will go along. I hope that my friend over there does not mind my using that phrase. I know, too, that some government members, when they learned yesterday of the Speaker's ruling, assumed that it would be accepted because it was the Speaker's judgment. I have noticed some of them sitting in the chamber, and I wonder how they will vote. Surely there is something to this debate which has been going on these last two days, and surely there will be some Liberals who will not take the cue from the front bench, who will either absent themselves so that what is right can be supported, or will actually vote our way.

● (2142)

As I say, our practices are clear in this respect. That is what we are governed by around here; not just by our rules, but by practice. This practice that is being developed by the negative vote, even without debate, when we had the question of privilege in the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, and now by these speeches and a negative vote—these are precedents that are a black mark on this parliament.

I hope that even yet, Mr. Speaker, the House will, in the proper parliamentary way, support the motion before us at this time.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not often intervene in matters of a procedural nature, but what we are debating at this time is very much more than a matter of procedure; it involves the question of how broadly or narrowly ministerial responsibility is to be interpreted. It involves as well the right and privilege of each and every member of the House to be assured of the quality and the integrity of the information imparted to them, which they in turn impart to those Canadians they have been elected to serve.

In following this debate, I am deeply troubled by the reaction on the government side of the House. It is as if they have not understood or will not understand the responsibility that each one of us has to make sure that the service, information, that we provide to Canadians is beyond question. To want to do so may sound idealistic to some, but where parliament is concerned I indeed remain unashamedly idealistic.

The motion we are debating would grant us the right to determine, in a committee of the House, whether or not a minister of the Crown was misled or misinformed by officials on a matter of a very sensitive and important nature. It will allow us to determine whether or not the minister in turn accepted that information without questioning it, or if he had any knowledge to the contrary, but who in any case relayed that information to a member of parliament to be conveyed to a constituent who felt that his basic rights were being infringed upon.

In light of some of the information already before us, that motion seems to be the only logical step for this House to take. It is the only honest step to ensure that our parliamentary responsibilities are being properly discharged by each and every one of us in this House. Here we have a situation where a Canadian citizen was very concerned that one of his most basic rights was being violated—that his right to receive mail without it being tampered with by any individual or any organization, by any member of the RCMP, would not be violated. That is what he was concerned about. He thought it was, and he raised that concern because he knew that such action would be illegal.

Because of his concern, because of the worries and fears he had, this Canadian citizen contacted his member of parliament, trusting that if anyone could get to the bottom of this matter or allay his fears it would be his member of parliament. His member of parliament, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), set out to get the proper answer to his constituent's question, as was his duty. On the basis of the reply he received from the then solicitor general, the member of parliament replied to his constituent. He accepted at face value this statement in the minister's letter and passed the information on to his constituent, believing it to be true. Let us take for granted that the concern and the fears of the constituent were temporarily allayed by the answer he received, only to find later that the answer was contradicted in testimony before the McDonald commission.

In light of this sequence of events I must ask what recourse a Canadian citizen has when he feels his rights are being violated. This particular citizen took his fears to his member of parliament, his representative in the highest court in the land. That member, in turn, asked the minister who has the ultimate responsibility for the actions of the RCMP for an answer. The answer to his question turned out to be wrong, and wilfully wrong.

Where does the citizen go now? That is the question that many Canadians must be asking themselves tonight. More important, on their behalf, where do we as members of parliament go now?

In his ruling, Mr. Speaker found, and I quote, "a prima facie case of contempt against the House of Commons". This is a very serious judgment—a very serious judgment, not to be taken lightly by any member of parliament regardless of party affiliation. As a result of that judgment, we have a motion to refer both the letter sent by the solicitor general of the day to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham dated December 3, 1973, and the testimony of former RCMP Commissioner Higgitt given before the McDonald commission to a parliamentary committee for investigation and report back to this House.

This would seem to be the most appropriate course of action under the circumstances. But what have we found in this House in the last couple of days? We have the government House leader indicating his intention—that is, of course, the intention of the majority in this House as represented by the government party—to ignore the decision of the Speaker of the House and to vote against this motion, thus to vote against pursuing the truth of this matter any further. Members of the government tell us that the McDonald commission can look after the matter. The government House leader puts it in these words: "Why do we want a parallel inquiry? All of this is before the royal commission?"

I have news for the government House leader, Mr. Speaker. The activities of the RCMP may be before the royal commission. The actions of certain members of cabinet may be before the royal commission. But the rights and privileges of the members of this House are not before that royal commission.

Since the question affects the privileges of all members of parliament, the settling of it must take place in a forum where all members of parliament can participate openly and forthrightly. Members of parliament cannot just go and appear before the McDonald commission, and indeed the commission is not authorized to have them do so. The proper place for this matter to be examined and investigated is in a committee of this House, as the motion recommends. It is the responsibility of this chamber and not the McDonald commission to look out for the rights and privileges of members. It is the responsibility of the House to try to reach a decision so that incidents such as the one set out by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham do not occur again.

I want to recall for the benefit of members an incident which occurred not too long after I was elected, Mr. Speaker. On that occasion, members of a police force came into my parliamentary office and interrogated members of my staff without my knowledge and without the permission of your predecessor. That incident became a question of my privilege as a member of parliament, indeed, of the privilege of all members of this House.

• (2152)

It was agreed by members of the House subsequently to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It underwent a thorough investigation with witnesses being interrogated and heard, and the unanimous report of that committee—and this is what is important because it can be used as a precedent in this case—was to affirm your authority in respect of activities on Parliament Hill. It also moved to strengthen the confidentiality and the integrity of exchanges between members of parliament and those whom they represent.

That reference of a serious question of privilege to a committee, which is recommended in the motion we have before us, and the resulting investigation of that committee, had the effect of strengthening our parliamentary processes. It had the result as well of strengthening our responsibilities as members of parliament.

If the government is determined on this occasion to follow a contrary course, and if this motion is defeated and the decision which you so carefully arrived at is set aside, Mr. Speaker, then we will have set a precedent by this action for any similar questions of privilege involving information obtained from ministers of the Crown.

If this motion is defeated, sir, who will bear the ultimate responsibility for any misinformation that gets passed on from ministers to a member and, finally, to a trusting constituent? We cannot, as the highest court in this land, a body whose activities are all too often treated with cynicism, afford to toss this question aside too lightly. We must refer it to a committee, and we must determine, first of all, if there was a deception; second, who was deceived; third, who did the deceiving; and fourth, what was the role of the minister involved.

All of this must be cleared up so that members of parliament will not again be put in a position of unintentionally misleading their constituents. If it is not cleared up, members of parliament will cease to trust the information they receive from ministers, and constituents will cease to trust the information they receive from members of parliament. At that point, sir, the function of all members of parliament as representatives of the people will be placed in greater jeopardy.

The question of ministerial responsibility is basic to our parliamentary system, or at least it was. It is important that ministers of the Crown do everything in their power to ensure that they are cognizant of the major activities in their departments, and as certain as possible of the truth of the statements which are issued under their signatures.

If government members avoid this issue and defeat this motion, and if they use the excuse that an extraneous body can have a role and make a ruling concerning the privilege of members of the House of Commons, then, sir, the most basic principles of our parliamentary democracy are being challenged, and they are being challenged by a government afraid of the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the motion in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lawrence), which was negatived on the following division.

● (2202)

(Division No. 16)

YEAS

Messrs.

Alexander
Alkenbrack
Baker (Grenville-Carleton)
Baldwin
Bawden
Beatty
Blackburn
Brisco
Broadbent
Cadieu
Clark (Rocky Mountain)
Clarke (Vancouver Quadra)
Crombie
Crosbie (St. John's West)
Crosby (Halifax-East Hants)
Crouse
Ellis
Epp
Faour
Firth
Forrestall
Friesen
Gillies
Halliday
Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek)
Hare
Hargrave
Hees
Hnatyshyn
Holmes
Huntington
Jarvis
Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay)
Kempling
Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre)
Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand)
Lambert (Edmonton West)
La Salle
Lawrence
MacDonald (Miss) (Kingston and the Islands)
MacKay
Masniuk
Matte
Mazankowski
McCain
McCrossan
McGrath
McKenzie
McKinley
McKinnon
Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich)
Murta
Neil
Nielsen
Nystrom
Oberle
Orlikow
Paproski
Parker
Patterson
Peters
Pigott (Mrs.)
Rae
Ritchie
Roche
Rodriguez
Saltsman
Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth)
Siddon
Smith (Churchill)
Stevens Towers
Whiteway
Whittaker
Wise—75.

NAYS

Messrs.

Abbott
Allmand
Anderson
Andras (Port Arthur)
Andres (Lincoln)
Appolloni (Mrs.)
Baker (Gander-Twillingate)
Béchard
Bégin (Miss)
Blais
Blaker
Blouin
Boulanger
Buchanan
Caccia
Cafik
Campagnolo (Mrs.)
Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul)
Caron
Clermont
Collenette
Comtois
Corbin
Côté
Cullen
Cyr Daudlin
Dawson
De Bané
Demers
Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi)
Douglas (Bruce-Grey)
Duclos
Dupont
Duquet
Ethier
Faulkner
Fleming
Foster
Fox
Francis
Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier)
Gendron
Gillespie
Goodale
Guilbault
Harquail
Herbert
Holt (Mrs.)
Hopkins
Horner
Isabelle
Johnston (Westmount)
Joyal
Kaplan
Lachance
Lajoie
Lamontagne
Lang
Langlois
Lapointe
Leblanc (Laurier)
LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent)
Lefebvre
Lessard
Loiselle (Chambly)
Loiselle (Saint-Henri)
Lumley
MacDonald (Cardigan)
MacEachen
MacFarlane
MacGuigan
Maine
Marceau
McIsaac
McRae
Milne
Nicholson (Miss)
O'Connell
Olivier
Ouellet
Parent
Pearsall
Penner
Philbrook
Pinard
Portelance
Prud'homme
Railton
Raines
Reid
Roberts
Robinson
Rompkey
Rooney
Roy (Timmins)
Roy (Laval)
Sauvé (Mrs.)
Savard
Smith (Saint-Jean)
Stewart (Cochrane)
Tessier
Trudel
Watson
Wood
Yanakis
Young—107.

● (2237)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I declare the motion defeated.

It being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock in the morning.

At 10.41 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 8, 1978

The House met at 11 a.m.

● (1107)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

TRADE

SUGGESTED "FLY AND BUY" MISSIONS TO REDUCE TRADE DEFICIT WITH UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

It is necessary for buyers in the very important United States market to see Canadian manufactured products first-hand, if we are substantially to increase our sales in that market and start reducing our $12.5 billion a year trade deficit in fully manufactured products, the ones that produce the jobs. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House direct the minister of trade and commerce to immediately organize "Fly and Buy" missions from the important merchandise buying centres of the United States to see Canadian manufactured products displayed at giant trade shows in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and our heavy machinery in the plants where it is made across the country.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH FARM ORGANIZATIONS TO REDUCE POLLUTION FROM FERTILIZERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that recent studies show that one of the last remaining major Canadian polluters of the lower Great Lakes is, unfortunately, the farm community, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That the Minister of State for the Environment enter into discussions with all farm organizations to attempt to rectify this serious situation, in order to reduce pollution from phosphates, nitrates and potassium chloride without in any way adversely affecting farm incomes.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

HIGHWAYS

CONSTRUCTION OF OVERPASS IN WINNIPEG, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the obvious need for the city of Winnipeg to proceed with the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass, the urgency of which was pointed out to the Minister of Transport by Mrs. Anne Steen, of Winnipeg North, in a telegram received by the minister this week, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Transport disregard the advice of the lone Liberal, Lloyd Axworthy, and reinstate the federal commitment of $4 million for the immediate construction of the badly-needed Sherbrook-McGregor overpass in Winnipeg.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FINANCE

SALES TAX REBATE ON AUTOMOBILE INVENTORIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency concerning the $60 million windfall to the federal government at the expense of automobile dealers across Canada who have been denied reimbursement of the 3 per cent sales tax reduction on the 12 per cent sales tax paid on inventory and vehicles en route.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That the government reassess its position and negotiate with automobile manufacturers in an effort to have the loss split three ways between the government, the manufacturers and the dealers; the government and the manufacturers reimbursing their two-thirds to the dealers by crediting their accounts.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

AIRPORTS

SECOND MAJOR AIRPORT IN TORONTO AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, in accordance with Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the ever-increasing air traffic volumes at Toronto international airport have led more and more to the use of the two major east-west runways on a joint basis for incoming and outgoing flights, rather than on a rotational basis, and considering that this practice not only increases dramatically the total disruption and interference to the life-style and environment of thousands of my constituents but proves that the Government of Canada was correct in its plans for a second airport designed to avoid such disruption and suffering to people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne):

That this House reconfirm the need for a second major airport facility for the Toronto area, and urges the government of Ontario to admit their error in blocking a second airport and now to work in co-operation with the federal government to urgently seek a solution.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Lawrence: Cafik said no.

An hon. Member: That is why he is in the cabinet and you are not.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Alastair Gillespie said no.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

EXPERIMENTS WITH ARCTIC MAMMALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that experiments seem to be about to take place in feeding whales, polar bears and seals with diesel fuel oil and also dipping them in this substance, and in light of the fact that some of these creatures are on the endangered species list, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour):

That the Department of the Environment cause these experiments on polar bears, seals and whales to be re-examined.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of the same Standing Order.

In view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when minister of transport in September, 1969, removed a freeze from railway freight rates and as a result freight rates have since increased 136.62 per cent in Newfoundland, and since CN has developed a rate structure for Newfoundland to drive all freight offering off the railway, as is proven by the fact that if a Newfoundlander is transferred from St. John's to Vancouver and wishes to ship his automobile to Vancouver by rail, it will cost him $4,497 from St. John's, but only $571 from Halifax or $548 from Moncton, and that these are the rates despite the fact that Newfoundland is a part of and adjacent to Canada, and not an island in the South China Sea, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or the Minister of Transport, or both, explain on motions why.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (1112)

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

POLICY ON PROVIDING JOBS FOR PERSONS IN AREAS OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister. By happy coincidence, he is the senior member from the Atlantic provinces, one who represents an area of long-term, chronic, high unemployment.

Is it now the policy of the government, as seems to be emerging in the debate on the unemployment insurance bill, that unemployed people in areas of high unemployment, who will be disqualified from receiving UI benefits under this bill if it passes, should move to other parts of the country—a philosophy that has not been heard around here since Walter Gordon's famous final solution in 1957, when he suggested that the answer to the maritimes' unemployment problem was depopulation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to assure the hon. member that it is not the policy of the Government of Canada to encourage out-migration as a solution to the problems of regions of this country.

I believe my hon. friend will realize that the establishment of such programs as those carried out by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is the direct opposite of a strategy that would be employed if out-migration were the objective. Our purpose is to attempt to create economic opportunities in the region, so that an increasing number of employment opportunities will be available to the growing labour force.

Mr. McGrath: I am glad to get that assurance from the minister, Mr. Speaker. Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House whether his colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration, was enunciating government policy last night when, in response to concern expressed regarding the inability of young people to find jobs in areas of high unemployment and the fact that they would be disqualified under this bill, the minister said, "Isn't that just too bloody bad", and, "I hope the hell they move all over this country"? He said he was not going to put a nipple in the mouths of young people, and as far as he was concerned, if they wanted to stay home and suck their thumbs, that was just too bad.

I have much greater respect for the young people of this country than the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether his colleague was expressing government policy last night on the unemployment insurance bill when he said that the best thing for young people would be to move to hell all over the country, which is not too far out from the statement of the Prime Minister last March, when he—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not want an answer; he wants to bombast. The hon. member is not quoting me correctly; he is quoting me out of context. I indicated that one of the tremendous advantages in this country is that people have the opportunity to be mobile. I indicated the increase in in-migration to the Atlantic provinces. To misquote me in that fashion is a little irresponsible.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, my question was to the Deputy Prime Minister. I did not misquote the Minister of Employment and Immigration; I quoted directly from the transcript of last night's proceedings of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. I am prepared to put it on the record at a later time.

I now ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether it is the policy of this government to tell the young people of this country who have no jobs and now constitute 15 per cent of the unemployed, to get the hell out and move? Is that the policy of the government? I think the young people of this country would like to know.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I first want to point out that the hon. member is referring to a transcript of a committee proceeding which is not available to members of the House generally. The committee itself has not reported to the House: only at that time will its proceedings and the total report be available. In my view, it is quite irregular to base a series of questions on committee proceedings not available to hon. members and from a committee that has not reported to the House.

Apart from that, it is not the policy of the Government of Canada to speak to the young people of this country in the bombastic terms used by the hon. member for St. John's East. Inasmuch as the hon. member related his first question to the Atlantic provinces, I would advise him that for a good period of time until the worldwide recession occurred, there was considerable in-migration to the Atlantic provinces, particularly to my province of Nova Scotia which experienced a net increase in total population for the first time in a long time as a result of the policies of regional economic expansion.

• (1117)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Within that context, it is certainly my view that it is quite healthy and desirable for young people to travel to any part of Canada to seek employment opportunities. The idea that it is unthinkable for young people to travel to any province of Canada to seek employment is not one we advocate. The Canadian labour market is open to all the young people of Canada and it is quite healthy they should travel to obtain jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

EFFECT OF BILL C-14 ON LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister, who by coincidence happens to be the government House leader. It concerns the unemployment insurance amendment legislation.

I want to ask the hon. gentleman about order in council PC-1978, No. 3243, dated October 26, 1978, published in the Canada Gazette on November 8, 1978. In view of the fact that the order in council usurped directly the provisions of a clause in Bill C-14, which is now before the House, would the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether it is his intention either to withdraw Bill C-14 or to cancel the order in council to which I have referred?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the bill to which the hon. member refers is still before the committee; it has not yet been reported to the House. When the bill is reported, that will be the appropriate time at which to deal with questions relating to its provisions.

Mr. Clarke: The Deputy Prime Minister seems to forget that the order in council has been proclaimed. In case he is not aware of it, I wish to remind the hon. gentleman that both the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Deputy Minister had their attention drawn to their wrongdoing, and both of them apologized to the standing committee yesterday.

The Deputy Prime Minister may or may not be aware that the Department of Justice advised the Department of Employment and Immigration not to proceed with this matter. I would like to know whether knowledge of these factors would cause the Deputy Prime Minister to rethink his answer.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to transfer to the floor of this House matters which are presently before a standing committee. I have greater respect for the work of the standing committee than to have it duplicated in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

* * *

ENERGY

FUTURE OIL PRICES—NEGOTIATIONS WITH ALBERTA

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In the light of the announcement today by the minister of energy in Alberta, Donald Getty, that Alberta will increase the price of crude oil by $1 per barrel if a pricing agreement is not completed by January 1, could the minister advise the House whether he has been successful in negotiating a new pact on oil prices with the province of Alberta or whether we will be faced with a massive increase in oil prices on January 1?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to announce that we have reached an agreement with the Alberta government with respect to a deferral of the price of oil come January 1.

• (1122)

I have an exchange of letters which, with the consent of the House, I would be prepared to table now. If the House will consent, I would like to table copies of my letter to Mr. Getty and Mr. Getty's to me.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the minister shall have leave to table these documents at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could be a little more forthcoming. Can he confirm that this new agreement will have the effect of raising oil prices on July 1 of next year, and again on January 1, 1980, a doubling of the increase we were anticipating for January 1, 1979? Can the minister advise that the government has adopted a policy of "No increase today if you vote for us tomorrow"?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I made it clear in an answer in this House last week that there would be no automatic increases on July 1 of next year or January 1 of 1980. We have agreed to a set of conditions which would protect Canadians: we have agreed that increases would take place only if Canadian prices were kept below the United States price and below the international price.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the impact of these increases will clearly be to reduce by half the stimulus in this government's budget. Can the minister confirm that his officials have come to the same conclusion? Can he also confirm that the impact of these increases next year will be to drive the price of gasoline to the consumer up by at least three cents at the pump, and the consumer price index right across this country up nearly one point?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has his facts quite wrong. The reason for deferring the price increase, or the price freeze on January 1 is to assist the economy in holding down the rate of inflation. The effect of this deferral should amount to about one-half of a percentage point on the consumer price index, probably the single most significant item which can effect the CPI during the course of next year.

The second point which the hon. member should understand is that as a result of this deferral we will be making Canadian industry more competitive, rather than less competitive. Therefore, it will have a very favourable effect on growth and stimulation. It will also have a very favourable effect on employment.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister: it touches on the unsatisfactory answers we received yesterday from the intended President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. I asked that minister what plans he had in place, or was intending to put in place, to try to arrest the current account deficit in this nation.

In 1977 we had an $11 billion deficit on end products, a $3.5 billion interest service deficit, a $2.2 billion "other service" deficit, and a $1.6 billion foreign travel deficit—all of which were up in the first nine months of this year. In view of the minister's answer yesterday, that those are medium-term and long-term problems to solve, would the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what minister is going to start solving these problems today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is no difficulty in identifying the ministers who are responsible for the implementation of policies related to the deficit to which the hon. member refers. There is a surplus on the merchandise account, as the hon. member knows. There is a deficit on the service account.

As my hon. friend is fully aware, deficits arise from millions of private transactions undertaken by Canadian individuals and Canadian corporations. The hon. member seemed to imply yesterday that these imbalances arose from some contrived policy on the part of the Government of Canada. They arose from decisions made in the free market by individuals and corporations.

I believe that the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers was perfectly correct in saying that a number of these problems are medium and long-term in nature. One of these problems is, of course, the travel account deficit. If my hon. friend had followed the proceedings of the federal-provincial conference recently, he would have—and I am certain he has—understood that the federal and provincial governments regard the solution of the travel account as a medium-term problem to which both levels of government are currently addressing themselves.

• (1127)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed, again, to the Deputy Prime Minister who must still have the fact ringing in his ears that only this week it was announced that the third quarter deficit on the current account is the highest in our history.

Would he not tell the House frankly that the reason our dollar has tumbled from $1.03, in U.S. terms, to its present 85-cent value is mainly the current account deficit; and if he agrees with that, does he not feel it is time the government described what plans they have to arrest the current account deficit?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not agree with the hon. member's analysis of the present level of the Canadian dollar. I believe it is finding its place on the international market as a result of a large number of influences, including the state of the trade account. I believe it would be an oversimplification, not to be expected from an aspiring future finance minister, to accept that kind of reasoning.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed, again, to the Deputy Prime Minister who must realize that the government has expended billions of dollars in attempting to defend the dollar: $265 million has gone out this month alone in attempting to defend the dollar. Does he not realize that it is absolutely foolhardy to be expending such sums of money in foreign funds, if you do not arrest the deteriorating current account deficit in this country?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think it is accepted that one of the objectives of Canadian economic policy is to increase our sales abroad, which would have a direct effect on our current account position. It is also an objective to influence our service account. These are obvious conclusions which are contained in the hon. member's question.

* * *

[Translation]

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL ENSURE THAT GASOLINE PRICE INCREASE IS JUSTIFIED

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In spite of the government decision to defer an oil price increase for six months an oil company, Esso Imperial, has announced, at least that is what I heard on the radio, that it intended to raise the price of gas by two cents a gallon.

Is the minister aware of that decision and does he intend to ensure that such a price increase is justified and report his findings?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any decision or announcement by Imperial Oil with respect to a price increase. It is possible that there may be price increases by oil companies, depending on the competitiveness of certain markets.

The hon. member will realize that the pricing policies and retail level of the oil companies are beyond the scope of the federal authority. The point that I wish to emphasize is that there will be no increase as a result of a wellhead price increase. That is the price that we have frozen, in agreement with the Alberta government. There will be no increase on January 1. If that increase had taken place, it would have provided for an increase in the order of three cents, or a little more, per gallon at that time. That will not take place.

Competitive factors being what they are, there may be some markets where prices have been driven down below what has been allowable, and that could be the factor to which the hon. member is referring.

[Translation]

INQUIRY WHETHER GASOLINE PRICE INCREASE DUE TO MONOPOLY POSITION OF OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister. Every time oil prices go up, either as a result of a wellhead price increase or otherwise, we have seen all other oil companies, any one of the seven sister companies, proportionally raise the price of gas or fuel per gallon.

Should Esso Imperial increase its prices by two cents a gallon, as announced yesterday or the day before yesterday, could the minister make sure, if the other companies do likewise, whether it is not a monopolistic practice as in previous cases.

● (1132)

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned to the hon. member, I am not aware of the announcement on the part of the oil company to which he referred. I will be very pleased to look into it.

* * *

HARBOURS

PROPOSED EXPANSION OF ROBERTS BANK—ENVIRONMENTAL CONSIDERATIONS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. One of the serious issues in the 1978 Auditor General's report is the questionable use and structuring of information behind the decision-making process for large capital projects. The Minister of Transport gave us the impression that management procedures are now in place within his department to prevent or overcome this weakness as reported in the 1978 report of the Auditor General.

Can the minister assure the House that all factors have been considered properly and openly and have been included in the criteria behind the National Harbours Board announced expansion of Roberts Bank?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I can give the hon. member the general assurance he is seeking. I am not quite sure what, specifically, he is dealing with in relation to Roberts Bank. The current issue there is environmental considerations. Any final decision in relation to any facility at Roberts Bank will have to take environmental considerations into account. It could be anticipated that the cost and benefit analysis will change, given the spending which may be required in that regard.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the minister examine the letter he gave to my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, in February of this year. Also, I ask him to consider that the market data and projections support the doubling of the coal-handling capabilities of Roberts Bank at this time, but show that potash and sulphur can be handled well into the future by the existing facilities in place at the port of Vancouver.

Can the minister explain why environmental studies have been tampered with and why the National Harbours Board continues to call for expansion well beyond the foreseeable needs of the port?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, obviously there is room for different judgment as to when expansion is required. The hon. member could be critical of planned expansion, and he could be just as critical a couple of years from now if the facilities are not there to handle western products trying to go through the west coast ports. Our judgment has to be made as to when the expansion is right.

I deny that there has been any tampering with environmental studies. Any decision to go ahead with the facility will depend upon a full analysis of the environmental significance of the development plan. The National Harbours Board believes the need is so great that it keeps speaking about wanting to get it ahead, I understand, in terms of its business and task. The decision is not to be made and will not be made until the fullest environmental results are in and taken completely into account.

* * *

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SALARY PAID TO NEWSREADER KNOWLTON NASH

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Is the minister aware, in a time of budgetary restraint and cutbacks, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is paying a newsreader, to wit, Knowlton Nash of the National News, a salary rumoured to be $85,000 to $90,000 a year, not including any fringe benefits which may come his way? That is a higher salary than the Prime Minister of Canada receives.

What steps will the Secretary of State now take to ensure the CBC uses its money more judiciously? Will he now use moral persuasion and ensure that all funds granted the CBC, to wit, more than $500 million a year, will be used for furthering the broadcasting policy agreed to by all members of the House in 1967 and 1968?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The minister is on the road to Mandalay.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have, of course, seen newspaper reports speculating as to the salary mentioned by the hon. member. I do not know whether the stories are accurate.

An hon. Member: Find out.

Mr. Roberts: I am not sure I quite understood the last part of the question. If I can summarize it accurately, the question was whether I would take any steps to ensure the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation followed the principles or guidelines outlined by the Commons committee. I can tell the hon. member that I have drawn to the attention of the CBC the committee's comments on its operations. I have discussed different ways in which budgetary restraint would apply to the CBC and what its effects might possibly be.

* * *

LOTO CANADA

PURCHASING ARRANGEMENTS FOR LOTO SELECT PROGRAM

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport: again it relates to the question of the government's attempt to set up the Loto Select program.

On Tuesday of this week, the minister admitted that losses so far in the Loto Select program totalled between $2 million and $3 million. Can the minister indicate, for the benefit of the House, whether in fact Loto Select signed a $5 million contract in September with Addressograph-Multigraph corporation to build machines to be used in printing dealers' names on the tickets, and that the plan was killed one month later, with possible cancellation costs to the Canadian public of up to $1 million? Can the minister indicate whether that figure was included in her $2 million to $3 million figure of losses to date tabled on Tuesday?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, as I have said in this House many times on this question, although not on this specific one related to Addressograph-Multigraph of Canada, Ltd., these are now being represented by legal counsel. So far as I know, they are not in the courts at this time. To reveal the facts and the figures the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo wishes—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: —in fact may have the effect of causing a greater amount to be paid than would be paid otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: I am sure the hon. member would not want that to be on his head.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the minister would like to have on her head. Will she confirm to the House whether a contract was signed in September by Loto Canada with Addressograph-Multigraph, to the tune of $5 million?

Can the minister tell the House whether a cancellation clause was included in that contract? If so, what were the terms of that cancellation clause? If she will not tell the House, will she at least tell us whether she is hiding also in this instance behind a so-called secrecy clause which prevents her from coming clean with the Canadian public?

Mrs. Campagnolo: No, I am not, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member knows that under section 66 of the Financial Administration Act, a Crown corporation is accountable to the people of Canada through a minister in the House. I have undertaken to provide that accountability. I will do so at the appropriate moment. I cannot do so now, even though I would like very much to be able to supply the answers requested by the hon. member. But to do so would jeopardize the negotiations taking place at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

HIGHWAYS

CONSTRUCTION OF OVERPASS IN WINNIPEG, MAN.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The federal government indicated that it will grant $4 million to assist the city of Winnipeg in building the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass spanning the CPR marshalling yards. Also, the Canadian Transport Commission has approved the overpass.

Can the minister inform us when the grant will be provided, as there is some urgency because the two bridges in operation now over the tracks, the Arlington and the Salter, are in a state of deterioration and weight restrictions are in effect?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not stated the facts accurately. In addition to approval of the overpass by the Canadian Transport Commission, we have made it clear to Winnipeg and to Manitoba that the UTAP funds available to the province could be applied to the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. We indicated that at this time we cannot supply additional federal funds other than those available through the UTAP program. It is completely in the the hands of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba to move this project forward as quickly as possible.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, certainly that is not the information which has been relayed to the mayor. The council of the city of Winnipeg are in a state of confusion waiting for answers from the Department of Transport.

Has the Minister of Public Works vetoed the $4 million going to the city of Winnipeg? Does the minister plan to discuss this matter further in cabinet to see if the $4 million can be granted? Will the minister contact the mayor to let him know whether the money will be provided and to clear up the confusion on the other matters raised earlier by the minister?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is confused; I do not think the mayor is: he will have received a message from me along the lines of the answer I just gave. The matter was considered fully in cabinet and in appropriate committees several times because of the desire to review all factors which might lead to special consideration of additional funds for Winnipeg. In the end, it was concluded that only urban transportation assistance program funds would be available from federal sources. That has been relayed to the city.

● (1142)

With regard to local environmental matters and the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, obviously they may be very important considerations, but the view I took in dealing with the mayor was that these are essentially local issues to be decided by the province and the city, and there should be no federal involvement in those questions.

* * *

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION

OFFICIALS RECEIVING CP AIR PASSES FOR VACATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he confirm that officials of the Canadian Transport Commission have requested, and received, special vacation airline passes from CP Air for themselves and their families; and, if so, does he consider that there is, in fact, a serious conflict of interest on the part of CTC officials who regulate air transportation and air routes for which the airline carriers are competing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not have that information. Obviously, it would have to be obtained before I could comment on it and the second part of the question.

* * *

POST OFFICE

OFFICIALS RECEIVING AIRLINE PASSES FOR VACATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will look into the question and report to the House.

I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General, if I may. Is he aware, or will he inquire, whether officials of his department have received airline passes for vacation trips; and, if so, could he inform the House whether the Prime Minister's guidelines of December 20, 1976, have been broken and what action he would plan to take, since the Post Office awards mail delivery contracts to different airlines which are quite profitable to them?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that any passes have been given to any of the staff of the Post Office, and as for myself, I think the guidelines of the Prime Minister were made very clear in public the other day. This must be according to our own consciences and it is up to us to decide whether we accept them or not.

* * *

AIR CANADA

REQUEST THAT CORPORATION MOVE LONDON, ENGLAND, OPERATIONS FROM HEATHROW TO GATWICK AIRPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and arises from a decision by the government of the United Kingdom to request Air Canada to move its London operations from Heathrow to Gatwick airport.

Since this move would have a serious economic impact on the operations of the airline, would impose payload restrictions, have a serious effect on its competitive position with other airlines, notwithstanding the fact that Air Canada has been located at Heathrow for some 32 years, and would have a disruptive effect on investment and, indeed, on the people who work there, will the minister indicate what action has been taken on the part of the government and whether an official Canadian government protest has been filed with the government of the United Kingdom in connection with this matter?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have made our position very clear to the United Kingdom government on this question, and I did so personally at a meeting with Mr. Dell when he was here a few months ago. It was also conveyed to the government, through the airline, previously in direct discussions, as well as by our High Commissioner in London. We are pressing many of the points to which the hon. member referred, as well as some other significant ones in favour of the case Air Canada can make in support of staying at Heathrow.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister whether he has been able to determine why Air Canada was singled out as a candidate for the move from Heathrow to Gatwick? Does it have anything to do with the intentions of British Airways to apply for routes into western Canada, or is it, as has been reported, that Canada has become the easiest target for such a move? Has he been able to determine the reasons that lie behind this decision?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the essential problem facing the United Kingdom in this regard, with which I do have sympathy, relates to the overcrowding which is occurring and will occur at Heathrow, necessitating the removal of some of the facilities of airlines. That, obviously, is the background reason for some airlines having been moved.

Obviously, I am not going to try to state the United Kingdom's analysis which it would put forward as justifying the picking of Air Canada, because I do not agree with those arguments being put forward. I think we make a good case in relation to our long-term, long-standing position at Heathrow, having regard to the fact that three American airlines which are also there are not being asked to move. Therefore, we resist the United Kingdom's argument about convenience of traffic diversion. I would say that I do not see a direct connection between that issue and the issue of access by British Airways to western Canada.

* * *

[Translation]

AIRPORTS

INQUIRY WHETHER ANNOUNCEMENT WILL BE MADE ON IMPROVEMENTS TO AIRPORTS IN GASPÉ PENINSULA

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister advise the House whether he is or will be shortly in a position to indicate to the people of the Magdalen Islands and their elected representative, as we are approaching Christmas, that he has a fine present in store for them concerning air transport in this part of my constituency, and announce for instance the improvement of the landing strips, the installation of air navigation aids and the construction of adequate airport facilities? Could he also advise the House what his department's priorities are for airports of the southeastern Gaspé area, including that in Bonaventure.

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I will be able to make such an announcement in time for Christmas, which I know the hon. member would very much like. I will review the situation in an urgent way to see whether his desire in that regard can be met.

As he knows, I have been giving special consideration to some of the ferry services in that area. I hope that, at least, has been some good news.

* * *

NATIONAL REVENUE

SALES TAX REBATE ON INVENTORIES OF MANUFACTURED GOODS

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business): it concerns the recent reduction of 3 per cent in the federal sales tax on manufactured goods. This question was raised today by the hon. member for York-Simcoe and in the way of a Standing Order 43 motion by the hon. member for Red Deer.

Considering the certainty of great financial loss to certain businesses such as automobile and machinery dealers who have substantial inventories on which the old 12 per cent sales tax has been paid, will the minister indicate whether he is considering some form of adjustment in the sales tax formula that would minimize the financial loss of those businesses?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, in my previous answer I indicated that very real difficulties are present because of the enormous number of products that have been manufactured, sold and stored in inventory. It is very hard to draw the line. In the past there were some remissions granted in cases where the tax had been specifically reduced; for example, on automobiles and trucks.

What I did not say in my answer last time to the question, which probably I should have said, is that because this matter is a part of the budget and, therefore, within the formulation of taxation, the question should more properly have been addressed to the Minister of Finance. Nonetheless, I would reiterate the points I made, that very considerable difficulties are present in attempting to grant remissions in respect of so many millions of transactions which involve many thousands and millions of dollars in inventories that have been stored over such a long period of time.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REPORT ON FOOD PRICES—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council: it has to do with a report to the first ministers, from CSIP, on food prices.

Given the fact that if policy is to be adopted by this nation in respect of economic activity, it must be based on reasonably accurate information and a reasonably accurate analysis, and that even a cursory examination of that report, particularly in terms of the sample and in terms of methodology, would indicate no conclusion whatsoever can be drawn from it, is it the intention of the minister or the government to have that report withdrawn and reworked, or at least re-examined?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I have not seen or studied that report; therefore, I cannot make a proper response. However, I will undertake to provide the hon. member with an answer later.

* * *

● (1152)

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

IMPACT OF AMENDMENT TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you might do me the courtesy of directing a question to either the Deputy Prime Minister or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. They may reply to you, because they do not reply to us.

I wonder if you would ask the hon. gentlemen whether, prior to the introduction of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, either of them requested or initiated particular or specific studies with respect to the impact of those amendments on the economies of Quebec and the four Atlantic provinces; and, if so, may we have the results of those special studies?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member, I must assure him that all the provisions of the bill were carefully examined and their impact on various parts of Canada were understood.

I am not aware of any specialized studies, but I believe all the information that would be required in order to make a decision was available to the government.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I see that you are no more competent than we are in extracting information. May I direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister and be more specific about it?

The Deputy Prime Minister indicated to the House that he allowed to go forward, from his position of influence in the Government of Canada, the amendments that are presently before us—the tinkering with UIC on the backs of the poorer regions of this country—without having required or requested information that would lead him to a clear understanding of the very serious impact which, it is now obvious, these changes will have, particularly on eastern Canada. Is that the position?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, what I said was the very opposite of the conclusion the hon. member has drawn. I said that all the information necessary to reach conclusions and understand the impact on the various regions of Canada was available. What I said, also, was that I was not aware of any specialized studies on the subject, but that seems to be immaterial if the necessary information was available.

* * *

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

EFFECT OF BILL C-14 ON LEGISLATION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In view of the fact that Bill C-14 has not yet been passed and there is total confusion among the larger employers of Canada because of this, can the minister indicate why his officials are now instructing employers how to administer a regulation which, in effect, is still before the House?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the regulation is not before the House. It was passed under the present legislation: As is always the case, it was gazetted one month ago: I believe the date quoted today was November 8.

Invariably, at the end of the year, before all the facts and figures are in—as every employer who deals with computers knows—there will be a rush. The Department of Supply and Services knows that and the Department of National Revenue knows that: They need figures in order to prepare their tables. The regulation that was passed was legal; it was passed under the present legislation; it was gazetted in the normal way and became public information as recently as November 8. To some extent, the information was possibly available to others prior to that time.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, may I put my supplementary question to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council, in his role as government House leader?

This regulation was gazetted on November 8, it was discussed by cabinet on October 20 and the bill received first reading only on November 2—although we have now been sitting for a month. We are now in the invidious position that if the bill does not pass and parliament excludes that part of it, namely, clause 2, on January 1, despite what parliament says the regulation will still be in effect. Can we have the assurance from the Deputy Prime Minister that should parliament so decide, that regulation will be withdrawn?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be unwise to anticipate the judgment of parliament. I simply say that when the reality which the hon. member now hypothesizes comes about, we will consider it.

* * *

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES NOT BE ADVERSELY AFFECTED BECAUSE OF INCREASES IN OTHER BENEFITS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs?

A few weeks ago the minister indicated in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs that he was in favour of the necessary steps being taken so that war veterans allowance recipients who receive increases in their old age pension supplements in January or increases in their family allowance in 1979 will not have these increases cut off their war veterans allowance.

I ask the minister if he is now in a position to assure the House that these steps are being taken; and, if not, can he assure the House that he will do his best to get Treasury Board to allow him to make that statement before Christmas?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has indicated, I made remarks previously to this effect, and they are still in effect. I hope to have something to announce one way or another very shortly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not one way or another—one way!

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY WHETHER TERMS OF REFERENCE OF McDONALD COMMISSION WILL BE CHANGED

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council if he can tell the House whether the government is considering any change or amendment to the order in council or orders in council affecting the terms of reference of the McDonald royal commission?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any consideration being given to a change in the terms of reference. There may be some consideration being given by the Minister of Justice, but I am not aware that any such matter has been considered by the government.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Deputy Prime Minister inform himself, and undertake to report to the House of Commons on Monday whether consideration is being given to any change in these terms of reference; and, if so, what change is being contemplated and what discussion has ensued with members of the royal commission?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall advise the Leader of the Opposition whether any changes are under consideration by the government with respect to the terms of reference.

* * *

METRIC SYSTEM

INQUIRY WHETHER REVIEW OF CONVERSION BEING CONSIDERED

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in his capacity as minister in charge of metric conversion.

Knowing the warm feelings the minister had in the past toward metric conversion, I wonder whether since assuming his responsibilities as minister in charge of metric conversion he has reviewed the program, or does he intend to continue at the present rate? Has he any plans to modify this program?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with regard to metric conversion, nearly every country in the world has now gone metric.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: How is it in Damascus?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, when I was with those people over there, I did not get as much applause as I do now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I think that, considering Canada's effort to export more finished, manufactured goods, it is of the utmost importance that we keep in step with the manufacturing world. Certainly, we are watching very closely metric conversion in the United States and attempting to keep in step with that industrial nation.

Mr. Hees: How about the Horner conversion?

Mr. Neil: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister is probably aware of the problems with metrification in Great Britain and Australia.

In view of the report of the general accounting office in the United States which, in effect, says that the cost of converting to the metric system is prohibitive, and in view of the fact there is doubt in the minds of legislators in the United States whether they will proceed with metrification, I ask if the minister has read this report or met with his counterparts in the United States to consider the effect a decision against metrification might have on our trade relations with the United States.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware of the problems the United States has had in this respect. They passed a law some 200 years ago suggesting that the manufacturing industry could go metric if it wanted to do so. Only in the last ten or 15 years has that country made strides toward metrification. I am well aware of the problems and the confusion which rests in the minds of some legislators.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have, as a result of yesterday's proceedings, a number of notices on procedural matters. I can only repeat the order in which I received them. I had a notice from the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), from the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan), from the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), and from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale). I do not know if the points are still applicable in respect to which these notices were given but, if they are, I should proceed to hear them now.

● (1202)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think some of us know that when we get to statements there is to be a statement respecting an important anniversary having to do with the Declaration of Human Rights. I wonder if it could be agreed that that statement and the responses be made now rather than at some indefinite time down the way. My understanding is that there is a speaker from each party ready to respond to a statement that is to be made by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). It seems to me, in view of the importance of the question of recognizing the thirtieth anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights, that we might do that now in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raises a useful point of order. Without anticipating great difficulties we may be able to take routine proceedings through entirely, including, of course, statements by ministers, and conclude routine proceedings but before taking the order of the day for debate, we return to the procedural matters which were just raised. We could try that, but if it is too lengthy it would be unfair to other members.

I understand the statement and responses on the other matter will be brief. We might proceed to take routine proceedings through to their conclusion and, before going to orders of the day, return to these procedural questions. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the interparliamentary union at its sixty-fourth interparliamentary conference made a useful suggestion in one of its resolutions that each national parliament commemorate the thirtieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. As a result of recommendations made by the executive of the interparliamentary union in the House of Commons, it is my responsibility to make a statement on behalf of the Government of Canada.

On December 10, 1948, the United Nations General Assembly proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Sunday is the thirtieth anniversary of that event. It should be used in Canada and all parts of the world as an occasion to review the progress, or the lack of progress, that has been made in these three decades toward guaranteeing human rights. More significantly, it must be used as an opportunity to identify what more can be done, both internationally and in Canada, to ensure that the rights and freedoms enunciated in the Universal Declaration are effectively enjoyed by all people.

The agreement 30 years ago on the principles of the Universal Declaration was a remarkable achievement by the international community, given the wide variations in political and social systems throughout the world. One of the people directly involved in that success was Dr. John P. Humphrey, a Canadian. In his former role as the Director of the United Nations Human Rights Division he oversaw the drafting of the declaration. He is to speak on behalf of Canada at a special commemorative meeting of the United Nations General Assembly on December 11. The principles of the declaration have been elaborated and defined in more than 20 international agreements. However, we are all painfully aware that the existence of these agreements has not created a world in which human rights are respected. In many countries there are gross violations of even the most basic human rights.

The member states of the United Nations have not given it the power to oblige governments to respect human rights. But it is a forum where world opinion can and should be focused on those governments which persistently abuse the rights of their citizens. Canada and certainly the Canadian House of Commons, are firmly committed to efforts to improve the performance of the United Nations in the human rights field.

In Canada we have made considerable progress in the past 30 years. That progress has been influenced by the international obligations we have assumed. Every province has adopted human rights legislation and has established a provincial human rights commission to consider complaints from individuals. The federal government has adopted important human rights legislation and has established the Canadian Human Rights Commission. The distinguished former member for Fundy-Royal, Mr. Gordon Fairweather, has taken on the key position of Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

In 1976 Canada became a party to the most important human rights conventions, the International Covenants on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and on Civil and Political Rights and its Optional Protocol. The federal and provincial governments are aware that Canadian legislation and practice are not always totally consistent in every detail with the international obligations we undertook by adhering to the covenants. But they recognized that the covenants provide a standard against which Canadian performance can be measured to identify where improvements should be made.

The thirtieth anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights is being recognized across Canada by the provinces, by church groups and by non-governmental organizations. Among many other significant events, the Canadian Human Rights Foundation has conducted seminars and conferences across the country on the nature of Canadian obligations arising from our international commitments. On December 9 and 10 the Canadian Human Rights Commission, in co-operation with the Departments of the Secretary of State and of External Affairs, will hold a conference at which national organizations concerned with human rights will review progress in Canada since the Universal Declaration was adopted.

The federal and provincial governments are now preparing reports for the United Nations on the implementation in Canada of the two human rights covenants. When the reports are completed they will be made public. They will provide Canadians with important information on the state of human rights in Canada.

We are commemorating in the House of Commons the thirtieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, not only as a reflection of the past and present importance of that historic document but also as an opportunity for us, as Canadians, to move forward. In doing so, we renew our commitment to ensure that everyone, everywhere, will enjoy fully the fundamental rights and freedoms described in the Universal Declaration.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to be able to speak on behalf of my party on this occasion marking the thirtieth anniversary of the signing of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The adoption and proclamation of this Declaration by the UN General Assembly in 1948 marked a momentous step forward in the development of a sense of universal community and, I think, universal compassion. It sets forth those basic rights and fundamental freedoms to which men and women everywhere are entitled, without discrimination. It represents a standard, a goal, toward which we hope all member states of the UN will aspire.

Unfortunately the Declaration itself creates no binding legal obligations. However, it did give birth to two Covenants and a Protocol which are binding on signatories: the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Canada, I am glad to say, has acceded to all three.

• (1212)

Anyone who reads the declaration cannot but fail to notice the glaring contrast between what are declared human rights and the situation as it actually exists today in many countries around the world. It is an unfortunate fact that the world community has been unable, and in some cases unwilling, to give meaning to the words of the declaration. I am sure all members share my concern about this.

We on this side of the House believe that Canada must play a prominent and forceful role in keeping human rights issues to the fore at the United Nations. Wherever the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is given but lip service or openly scorned, and differences are repressed rather than resolved, violent struggle becomes likely. The United Nations charter is in harmony with the highest political insights when it affirms that the desire for peace is incompatible with the violation of basic human rights. We therefore hold inviolate the human dignity of each individual and seek to guarantee his or her physical and cultural well-being. Where religious and ethnic communities are surrounded by grave denials of civil and political rights, or the refusal of social, economic, or cultural justice, we declare our support for them as they demand freedom for their peoples.

Individual justice and freedom are questions of concern to persons throughout the world, and as such they may transcend the normal prerogatives of national sovereignty.

Looking at the world today, it seems that human rights violations are becoming, in some instances, more blatant and more vicious than at any time since the second world war, and, as I indicated earlier, it is a matter of grave concern that the UN seems unable to deal with these problems. For example, the representations made by Canada and other countries last year to the UN Commission on Human Rights about events in Uganda failed to produce even an investigation into the situation. To date, nothing meaningful has developed with respect to the situation in Cambodia, beyond intimations that the Secretary General may eventually receive an invitation to visit that country. At the moment, we know little about the circumstances which are driving thousands to flee Vietnam at appalling risks to themselves. We are all familiar with the problems of human rights in eastern Europe.

My party believes that a major step toward ensuring respect for the Declaration of Human Rights would be to create the post of a UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, with the power to investigate alleged violations whenever and wherever they occur. Canada has supported this in the past, and we urge the government to continue to press, in the strongest possible terms and at all appropriate opportunities, for the creation of such a post.

We would also urge, as another means of giving expression to the deep concern which all Canadians share about human rights, that Canada must minimize its material assistance to and symbolic approval of such governments that commit gross violations of human rights.

The UN has accomplished a great deal since its creation. Much remains to be done. The United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights is an inspiration to us all.

In conclusion, I join in the tribute to Dr. John P. Humphrey who played the important role of chairman of the drafting committee, representing this country in the drafting of this landmark declaration. It is our sentiment that it is the most significant declaration ever made by the international community. We in this party look forward to an even higher profile on the part of the Government of Canada to ensure that the statements made in this important declaration are brought to proper fruition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on my own behalf and on behalf of my party I am glad to be associated with the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) in asking this House to take note of and recognize the thirtieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. I am glad, too, that the interparliamentary union suggested and recommended this recognition. I congratulate them for it.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights speaks as a conscience of mankind. The first two recitals in that Declaration read as follows:

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people,

Those recitals which preceded the declaration are still applicable. Thirty years after the declaration was made, the situation has not substantially changed, although it would be wrong to deny that much useful progress has been made. In many parts of the world there is still contempt for human rights, resulting in barbarous acts. This is not the proper place to go into any detail on that matter. I only want to say that we must not be selective in our judgment wherever human rights are involved. Whatever regimes invade them should be treated alike, firmly and fearlessly by the expression of Canadian opinion, not only in international forums but also in bilateral relations.

An hon. Member: Fora.

Mr. Brewin: Somebody says fora. I do not like that word. I purposely left it out.

The declaration contains two types of rights, those that are political in nature, such as freedom of religion and speech, freedom from torture and cruel punishment, freedom from discrimination, and the right of access to the courts. It also contains a number of social, economic, and cultural rights which are enumerated in the declaration.

We in Canada have had much talk about a new Canadian constitution. It is not easy to predict when this new constitution will come into being. I hope it will be soon. We believe that when it does, the essential political rights should be enshrined in it as they embody the fundamentals of Canada's democratic society. A constitutional declaration of these political freedoms would not only have tremendous educational effect but would be a means of protection against invasion of these rights from any source, including governments.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights goes much further than merely dealing with political rights. It includes, of equal importance, a declaration of economic rights, for example the right to work, the right to form and join trade unions, the right to equal pay for work and the right for leisure and periodic holidays with pay, the right to security in unemployment, sickness or disability and to a standard of living adequate for health; the right to education, the right to cultural life in the community.

These are fundamental rights. However, they cannot be secured by a mere parliamentary or even constitutional declaration. They depend upon detailed legislation and administration, and the planning of a just society, which is our job.

• (1222)

Many Canadians are in urgent need of these rights—I think especially of the million or so unemployed, the large segment of the population which is below the poverty line. Special attention has to be paid to the rights of our native peoples, of immigrants and of aliens in our midst. We should, from whatever party we come, dedicate ourselves to realizing these rights for all our people.

What are the limits? There is no limit based on geography. The rights proclaimed are rights of all human beings by virtue of their humanity. There is no distinction to be drawn between people of different racial backgrounds. The poison of racism and racial discrimination must be totally eradicated. To many, the Declaration of Human Rights is a naive, idealistic, and theoretical exercise. We, on the other hand, hold a deep conviction that it is the way of sanity, the way of true realism, and the way of peace.

The Declaration of Human Rights must be applied to the world of nations; this is necessary in order that we may build a world society. It must also be applied within nations such as Canada. International proclamation is meaningless unless supported by the institutions and personal convictions of persons within different nations. It must permeate the thinking of individuals.

Our former colleague, Mr. Gordon Fairweather, who was the member for Fundy-Royal and is now chairman of the Human Rights Commission, said this:

For me to live a full human life, my neighbours must be just as free as I am. Their freedom is my freedom, their equality is my equality, their dignity is my dignity. Freedom is indivisible, human rights are universal.

I think that says it all. I have ended my quotation from the former hon. member for Fundy-Royal; I am not sure that all the members of his party are interested in hearing it. I commend that quotation to all members of the House, and to all Canadians. I, and those for whom I speak, accept the commitment to fight for human rights and to fight for the rights contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in the world, in our own countries, in our own communities and, if I may be personal for a moment, within ourselves.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to join the former speakers and all hon. members in the House in commemorating the thirtieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as proclaimed by the United Nations on December 2, 1948. At that time I expect most member countries of the United Nations supported the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, just as all the other countries which have since joined the family of the United Nations also support it. However, we unfortunately have to admit that in many countries around the world that declaration is far from being respected, though several countries have adopted their own bill of rights; we have to realize that regrettably there is still a long way to go and many situations have to change before its theory is in fact applied.

Even here in Canada we have our own Bill of Rights. Unfortunately it does not always hold true in practice. In the fields of politics, I would say we have full rights and freedoms. But economically, sad to say, we still have a long way to go. Again last night, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) pointed out in a television interview that almost 25 per cent of all Canadians live below the poverty line in Canada. In other words, Mr. Speaker, for all those people economic rights and freedoms are far from a fact of life. They do not have the right to choose like other Canadians.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, though we boast a Declaration of Human Rights, though we pride ourselves in a fully democratic system, I feel that for that sector of the population democracy does not exist, at least not fully. As we medidate on the objectives of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, whether in terms of the whole world or our own country, we must take this opportunity to see what remains to be done here in Canada and take the necessary steps to ensure that every Canadian, man or woman, feels completely free, politically and economically, in his or her own homeland.

* * *

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I realize we have to deal with some questions of privilege, but it would be a great convenience to the House if I could put the question on business which, in the confusion, I could not put yesterday. Perhaps I could direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). It is my understanding that there is no difficulty at all as far as the government is concerned about the proposition that the motion standing in the name of my hon. friend from Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), which would have been heard yesterday but for what took place in the House be called today, the last day allotted to the opposition under the rules. I would appreciate confirmation of this.

Later on today we shall be dealing with the appropriation bill. I just want to say to the House leader that it is not our intention to call a vote with respect to that bill. Will he confirm that the situation is as I have stated, and will he also tell us what is to be the business for next week?

Mr. MacEachen: In reply to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) I wish to confirm that there is no difficulty whatsoever from our point of view about proceeding with the motion which in other circumstances would have been dealt with yesterday. I should also like to confirm, for purposes of planning the latter part of the day, the understanding which has been voiced by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that it is not the intention to have any votes with respect to the supplementary estimates and the ensuing bill.

An hon. Member: Recorded votes.

Mr. MacEachen: There will obviously be no difficulty, I understand, in carrying these items on voice votes, but if it is the intention to have any votes on division it would be of interest for me to know, so that I could advise my hon. friends.

With respect to the business on Monday, for various reasons it is not possible to call the motion with respect to the Ministry of Economic Development or the other bills I had in mind, Bill C-12, for example, which has been the object of discussion between the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and myself. As a result of those discussions we have decided not to call Bill C-12 at this point. For Monday, therefore, I would like to indicate Bill S-4, legislation respecting non-profit corporations, Bill S-5, the Canada Business Corporations Act amendments, Bill C-13, the Electricity Inspection Act and the Gas Inspection Act amendments, and then the Canada-France trade agreement legislation about which we have had discussions. That is the champagne bill. It is known by that more interesting name rather than by the Canada-France trade agreement legislation.

● (1232)

I ask hon. members to keep in mind the referendum bill and the bill respecting conflicts of interest. It is not my intention to call the referendum bill on Monday, but if we make great progress on the other bills it might be contemplated for Tuesday.

I have received some information since the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question about the McDonald commission, and I would like to confirm that no consideration is being given to changing the terms of reference. I felt that it would be important to get that on the record before being asked outside the House. I might be held in contempt of the House if I answered outside and not here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the plaintive plea of the Deputy Minister (Mr. MacEachen) for peace of mind with respect to any votes this afternoon. I point out to him that the order paper does not contain any notice of opposed items in the estimates, so there cannot be any votes on individual items, and I give the undertaking that we will not be forcing votes on first, second, or third reading of the supply bill. In that connection, in view of the fact that there may be many members wanting to speak on the motion being proposed today, and since it is clear that there will not be votes called at 4.45, I suggest that the debate go until five o'clock and that we agree to pass the bill at that point.

I noticed in the list of items the minister gave he made particular reference to the fact that Bill C-12 will not be called next week. There is a good deal of interest in this bill, and I take it it can be assumed from the minister's announcement that Bill C-12 will not be put through in December. In other words, the arrangements respecting the Public Service Superannuation Act which now apply will continue to apply in 1979.

Mr. MacEachen: I think I can make it clear that it is not the intention to bring forward Bill C-12 this year. The reason is that it is apparent to me that it could not clear all stages and become law before the end of 1978.

Death of Golda Meir

On the second part of the question, I think it would be desirable to address a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) at an early date as to what his plans for that bill are in 1979. I think the question should be asked, and I think the minister will want to answer it, but I am not in a position to answer it today.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, can we have an agreement that the debate today should last until five o'clock and that there then be no recorded votes?

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

In keeping with the practice we have been following recently, may I presume, since this day has now become the day for dealing with the supply bill and as the House has now agreed to proceed in a certain manner, that it is in order to introduce the supply bill at this hour of the day under introduction of bills in order that it can be distributed? That is the way we have proceeded in recent times. I understand that the government has made copies available for the purpose. Can we proceed to do so now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* * *

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PROVISIONS TO FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-447, to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this private member's bill is to make it abundantly clear that the Canadian Human Rights Act is intended to apply to all federal employees, including the staffs of the Senate and the House of Commons who, under this particular legislation, at the present time are excluded. The bill further extends the protection of the Canadian Human Rights Act to employees of companies which carry on business in Canada and which are in receipt of federal government contracts or subsidies of any kind.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

DEATH OF GOLDA MEIR

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask that the House take note of the death this morning of Golda Meir, a former prime minister of the State of Israel, and that I be permitted to speak about that for a moment.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Golda Meir visited Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Despite the seriousness of the matter to which the hon. member refers, I really do not know that we have any practice whereby we can proceed with it any further.

Mr. Leggatt: Ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. Kaplan: I wonder if I might seek unanimous consent on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I think this puts the House in an invidious position. Once unanimous consent of the House is sought, the House is in a rather awkward spot, and I do not know that I ought to depart from our regular practices. Perhaps there might be some accord during the course of the next few minutes to see if some pause could be taken to make some recognition, but I think there ought to be some consultation first.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today, including those which were earmarked for yesterday: Nos. 181, 345, 537, 540, 186, 213, 423 and 467.

[Text]

SOLICITOR GENERAL—FRASER VALLEY EAST

Question No. 181—Mr. Patterson:

What amount was spent by the Department of the Solicitor General in the Constituency of Fraser Valley East in each year since 1970?

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General):

	Canadian Penitentiary Service and National Parole Service	Royal Canadian Mounted Police
	$	$
1970-71	4,576,706	904,200
1971-72	4,257,475	1,161,800
1972-73	6,597,268	1,490,800
1973-74	9,087,448	1,629,000
1974-75	13,716,390	2,625,200
1975-76	23,021,532	3,625,900
1976-77	23,553,391	4,031,900
1977-78	29,774,918	5,089,016
April 1, 1978 to September 30, 1978	13,826,229	2,428,143
Ministry Secretariat
National Parole Board
Nil

CANEX—CFB GAGETOWN, N.B.

Question No. 186—Mr. Howie:

1. Was a contract let in September 1978 for the construction of the CANEX Building in the Army training area at CFB Gagetown, New Brunswick and, if so, was the lowest or second lowest tender accepted and, if not, for what reason?

2. What are the names of the companies which tendered on the project and what was the amount in each case?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. The third lowest bidder, Modern Construction Ltd. was awarded the contract. The reason for accepting the third lowest bid was because of the earlier completion dated July 31, 79 offered with their bid, which was a full five months earlier than that offered with the lowest and second lowest bid. The decision was made based on a complete financial analysis of the effect of completion date on the base non-public fund picture forecast for these five months of operation, related to the difference in amount between the lowest and third lowest bid which was only $10,275. There are no public funds involved in this project.

2.

Atlas Construction Maritime Ltd.	$2,327,725	December 30, 79
Diamond Construction (1971) Ltd.	$2,333,000	December 31, 79
Modern Construction Ltd.	$2,338,000	July 31, 79
A.C. Mallet and Fils Ltd.	$2,417,727	September 30, 79
Simpson Construction Ltd.	$2,449,350	September 30, 79
Richards & Ryan (Atlantic) Ltd.	$2,486,781	November, 79

GRAIN HAULING—REPAIRS TO FREIGHT CARS

Question No. 213—Mr. Jones:

1. Will there be repairs made to large numbers of freight cars used in grain hauling? How many rail cars are being repaired?

2. Where will the repairs to these cars be made? List the yards and their location. What will be the cost of the repairs? Are there any plans to use the freight yards in Moncton, New Brunswick for any of these repairs?

3. How many new jobs will this work create? Will there be any new jobs created in Moncton, New Brunswick for this purpose and if so, how many and what are the job descriptions?

4. Will there be any CN employees or Transport Canada employees transferred from Moncton, New Brunswick to any other location and if so, how many? Will there be any CN employees or Transport Canada employees transferred to Moncton, New Brunswick for this project and if so, how many?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, 1,000 boxcars.

2. Winnipeg, 300 cars light repairs at Symington Yard, Winnipeg, 700 cars heavy repairs at Transcona Shops, Winnipeg. The cost will be approximately $6.5 million. There are no plans to use the CN facilities in Moncton, New Brunswick for this work.

3. This will create approximately 150 man-years of new jobs. Because of rearrangement of work this will create approximately 30 man-years of new jobs in Moncton, New Brunswick. The additional positions will all be for car-men.

4. No CN or Transport Canada employees will be transferred either to or from Moncton, New Brunswick for this project.

DSS—INTERIOR LANDSCAPING

Question No. 345—Mr. Howie:

For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, what amount was spent on interior landscaping by the Department of Supply and Services?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): $5,478.27.

COSMOS 954 SATELLITE

Question No. 423—Mr. Epp:

1. Has the search for debris from the U.S.S.R. satellite which crashed in Northern Canada been concluded and, if so, on what date?

2. How many days were spent in the search?

3. What was the total cost of the search?

4. Did the government request full reimbursement from the government of the U.S.S.R. of the full costs incurred in the search, and, if so, did the U.S.S.R. agree to pay such costs and, if not, what steps has the government taken to recover the costs?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the reply is as follows:

1. The search for debris from the Cosmos 954 satellite was concluded on October 15, 1978.

2. Two hundred sixty five days (January 24, 1978-October 15, 1978).

3. There is as yet no final figure for the total cost of the search since some costs remain to be determined.

4. Canada has informed the U.S.S.R. of its intention to present a claim. Under the 1972 convention on international liability for damage caused by space objects Canada has one year from the date of the satellite incident to present the claim.

GOLDEN REPORT

Question No. 467—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What was the total cost of the Golden report?

2. Was the President of Telesat Canada chosen to write the report and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. $5,463.59 (period March 28, 1977 to November 10, 1978).

2. Yes. Mr. Golden was asked to undertake the task because of his wide experience and proven capability in aerospace, in both the private and the public sectors. At his express request he was paid no fee for this assignment.

Order Paper Questions

DISEASE SCRAPIE IN SHEEP

Question No. 537—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. For each year from 1953 to 1977, were any sheep from (a) pure bred (b) commercial flocks ordered to be slaughtered owing to the disease scrapie and, if so, how many?

2. What was the total cost for each year?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture):

	1. Number of Sheep Slaughtered (a) - (b) *	2. Compensation Paid
1953-54	— **	—
1954-55	108	8,100.00
1955-56	654	100,050.00
1956-57	88	3,340.00
1957-58	79	4,566.00
1958-59	459	15,548.50
1959-60	5,539	214,235.00
1960-61	2,735	107,740.87
1961-62	1,593	32,617.00
1962-63	565	13,446.00
1963-64	1,639	115,873.50
1964-65	24	676.65
1965-66	164	5,868.90
1966-67	393	33,527.00
1967-68	78	6,495.00
1968-69	15	905.00
1969-70	29	2,880.08
1970-71		—
1971-72	180	11,875.00
1972-73	5	350.00
1973-74	82	3,175.00
1974-75		—
1975-76	33	3,621.00
1976-77	80	10,276.00
1977-78	1,026	200,085.00
	15,568	$895,251.50

* Records on scrapie do not differentiate between pure-bred and commercial flocks.

 Departmental records have only been maintained since 1954.

VETERANS—MEMORIAL PAVILION, B.C.

Question No. 540—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. (a) How many beds at the Memorial Pavilion were guaranteed to veterans under the Agreement with the Government of British Columbia covering the transfer of the Pavilion to the B.C. authorities (b) how many were guaranteed in the Jubilee Complex?

2. How many of the beds were occupied by veterans on (a) January 1, 1977 (b) July 1, 1977 (c) January 1, 1978 (d) July 1, 1978 (e) October 1, 1978 and, of these, how many were for (i) extended (ii) intermediate (iii) acute care?

3. Can a distinction be made in the foregoing Parts as to beds and beds occupied in the Memorial Pavilion on the one hand and in the Main Jubilee Complex on the other and, if so, could the replies already given be made again making this distinction?

4. (a) How many beds in reserve are retained, under the federal-provincial agreement to serve unexpected needs of veterans requiring acute care (b) have the required number of beds for acute care been available at all times or has the quota been breached?

5. How many veterans were on a waiting list for extended care space on the dates mentioned in Part 2?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. (a) and (b) In the 1974 transfer agreement with the Province of British Columbia, the Department of Veterans Affairs retained 170 priority use beds at Royal Jubilee Hospital, Victoria. Included in the total were 60 acute care beds located in the Main Jubilee Complex; and 50 extended care beds and 60 intermediate care beds located in the Memorial Pavilion.

The agreement provides that the priority bed allocation can be revised with changes in bed requirements. Such changes have occurred from time to time, and the present bed allocation is as follows:

Acute care (Main Jubilee Complex)	32 beds
Extended care (Memorial Pavilion)	46 beds
Intermediate care (Memorial Pavilion)	92 beds

2. The bed occupancy by veterans on the specified dates is as follows:

	Jubilee	Memorial Pavilion
	Acute	Extended	Intermediate	Total
January 1, 1977	11	42	73	126
July 1, 1977	11	46	84	141
January 1, 1978	16	49	84	149
July 1, 1978	21	44	94	159
October 1, 1978	8	44	90	142

3. See 1 and 2 above.

4. (a) No beds other than those described in (1) are retained to serve unexpected needs of veterans requiring acute care. However, the agreement does provide that where it is necessary to admit a veteran and priority use beds of the type required are fully occupied, the veteran will be admitted to the first available bed in a hospital having beds clinically suitable for the level of care required by the veteran.

(b) The agreement provides that priority use beds not required for veterans will be released for patients who are not veterans. No delays have been experienced in obtaining admission of acute care veteran patients and the acute care beds available for veterans are more than sufficient, as noted in (2). The department has reacted to trends in patient needs by reducing the number of priority use acute care beds, and by increasing the number of intermediate care beds.

5. No record has been kept of the number of patients awaiting admission on the dates specified. At November 15, 1978, there were five patients awaiting admission to extended care, and this number is considered higher than usual. When a situation arises requiring urgent attention an effort is made to locate a temporary bed in another institution.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 520 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 520 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Text]

CIDA—MENNONITE CENTRAL COMMITTEE

Question No. 520—Mr. Epp:

Did the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) give any aid to the Mennonite Central Committee (MCC) in (a) 1968 (b) 1969 (c) 1970 (d) 1971 (e) 1972 (f) 1973 (g) 1974 (h) 1975 (i) 1976 (j) 1977 (k) 1978 and, if so, by year (i) in what amount (ii) what projects were approved (iii) what was the purpose of each project and what amount was approved in each case?

Return tabled.

* * *

[Translation]

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 347 so I may reply to it.

[Text]

*REPORT—RESEARCH IN CREATIVE DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 347—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Did the Prime Minister or the Department of Transport receive a 1972 report authored by Robert B. Choma entitled "Research in Creative Development" which deals with Runway 23 at the Toronto International Airport and was receipt of the report acknowledged and, if so, by whom?

2. Was action taken in regard to the recommendations contained in the report and, if so, what was such action?

[English]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Prime Minister's office and Transport Canada as follows: No.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* * *

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—ACTIONS OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I intend, as briefly as I possibly can, to attempt to demonstrate to Your Honour and to the House that there is sufficient evidence to indicate that there may be a prima facie case of privilege with respect to the fact that by certain actions the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is in contempt of this House. My question of privilege will be to make that case, and I intend, at the conclusion of my remarks, to move a substantive motion.

● (1242)

My question of privilege arises out of the presentation to the House by the Minister of Employment and Immigration of Bill C-14, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. That bill received first reading early in November and it received second reading in the House on November 10. These dates are important because it has come to my attention that the Canada Gazette for November 8, 1978, volume 112, No. 21, part II, has a proclamation putting into effect order in council PC 1978-3243, October 26, 1978. That order in council and the proclamation in the Canada Gazette proclaimed clause 2 of Bill C-14 which is still before the House.

You may argue that this is a point of law. I argue that it is contempt of this place. Parliament has not passed Bill C-14 and the government has no right to anticipate the passage of the bill, the government has no right to second guess parliament, nor does the government have the right to legislate by order in council, which seems to be what it is doing here.

Surely the right to legislate is one that is jealously guarded by parliament itself. If the government has the right to legislate by order in council, then we might as well dispense with parliament; there is no need for us to be here. It is absolutely useless for parliament to conduct legislation in such circumstances. That is really the core of what my argument is all about, the fact that somebody else has taken it upon himself to legislate something which is still before parliament, contemptuously or, if you like, to second guess parliament or to anticipate what parliament will do.

I can say, although it is not entirely relevant, that this has caused a great deal of concern, confusion, and misunderstanding among the clients of the Unemployment Insurance Commission or of the Minister of Employment and Immigration who administers the act. Indeed, there is evidence in today's press that there is great confusion because, as a result of the order in council and the proclamation in the Canada Gazette of November 8 and the bulletins that went out from the commission flowing from the order in council, people are somewhat confused as to just exactly how they should go about the necessary changes to implement the provisions of a bill which has not yet been passed by the House. If that is not contempt, I do not know what is.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to be clear with respect to the hon. member's argument. Perhaps he could give me the language of the proclamation in the Canada Gazette, because I am not sure at this moment whether I can take his version of the proclamation as having the effect of proclaiming a section or whether it proclaims a section of an unpassed statute in exactly that language. I should like to be clear on that point.

Mr. McGrath: I can read the proclamation into the record, Mr. Speaker. The proclamation is PC 1978-3243, October 26, 1978. It reads:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, pursuant to sections 4 and 146 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, is pleased hereby to approve amendments made on October 20, 1978 by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission to the Unemployment Insurance Regulations approved by Order in Council PC 1955-1491 of 29th April, 1955, as amended, in accordance with the schedule hereto, effective January 1, 1979.

Schedule

1. Section 54 of the Unemployment Insurance Regulations is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

54(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3) the employment with an employer in any week of a person,

(a) whose earnings are calculated in whole or in part on a time-worked or fixed-salary basis and who is employed and remunerated for less than 20 hours by his employer, or

(b) whose earnings are calculated on a basis other than that described in paragraph (a) and whose cash earnings from that employer are less than 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings, is excepted from insurable employment.

For purposes of my argument, that is the only part of the order in council and proclamation that I need to record into the record. The rest of it is not entirely relevant to my argument.

Now I should like to read clause 2 of Bill C-14 now before the House. It reads as follows:

2. Subsection 4(3) of the said act is amended by deleting the word "and" at the end of paragraph (f) thereof, by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (g) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

Here is the key paragraph:

(h) any employment with an employer in which persons are employed for less than 20 hours in a week or in which the earnings of persons are less than 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings.

As you will see, it is almost the same, word for word, as the order in council and the proclamation.

The explanatory note to clause 2 of the bill is very important, and I will develop why it is important in a subsequent argument. The explanatory note for clause 2 reads as follows:

Clause 2: New. This amendment would provide authority to make regulations providing that a week of employment must contain at least 20 hours or must provide a salary equal to or greater than 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings to be considered insurable.

The government wishes to have the authority to make this regulation which it has made already by order in council which I read earlier, and in the proclamation in the Canada Gazette. If ministers did not need the authority, what are they asking parliament for? If they need it, then there is contempt of parliament in that order in council.

I should like to mention something in support of my argument, but I hate to do this because I do not want Your Honour to pick upon this as an excuse for ruling out my argument on a technicality. So if I may ask the jury to leave, while I mention this part of my case, may I continue by saying that yesterday, when this matter was raised in committee we received from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and from the deputy minister, an apology. They said, in so many words, "I am sorry, the committee and parliament should have been told about this, and we regret very much you were not told."

The minister and the deputy minister took the blame and they said that there should have been a further explanation in the explanatory note, that parliament should have been told when the bill was introduced that the order in council had been passed. "Mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa." I appreciate the minister saying he is sorry. That is what I would expect from the minister because he is that kind of person. He is a good parliamentarian, and that is in keeping with my perception of his good character. But an apology is not enough because we are still faced with the dilemma of having before us a bill, a part of which has already been enacted by order in council. That is my case.

I could argue that the committee was deceived, that the House was deceived, and, in support of my argument I could refer Your Honour to a citation in May's nineteenth edition entitled "Conspiracy to deceive either House or committees of either House." The citation reads:

It has already been seen that the giving of false evidence, prevarication or suppression of the truth by witnesses while under examination before either House or before committees of either House is punished as a contempt; and that persons who present false, forged or fabricated documents to either House or to committees of either House are guilty of a breach of privilege. Conspiracy to deceive either House or any committees of either House will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

● (1252)

The minister and the deputy minister admitted that they withheld this information from parliament, namely, the passage of the order in council and its proclamation, when Bill C-14 was presented for second reading debate and committee stage.

I submit there is a prima facie case. The minister is in contempt of the House, either by virtue of anticipating or second guessing the House, or by ignoring the House in making a proclamation for a section of the bill which has not been passed by this House, or in withholding information from the House and one of the committees of the House relevant to a bill or a measure before the House. The minister is in contempt either way.

Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration by an order in council dated October 26, 1978, and proclamation in the Canada Gazette of November 8, 1978, enacted section 2 of Bill C-14, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is still before the House, and thereby showing contempt for this House; and that the said order in council and the said proclamation of November 8, 1978 be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: There are six or seven members who want to contribute. I presume all members of the committee want to make a contribution. It seems to me the ground is fairly clear.

The first thing which must be solved is whether the order in council enacts what the section would enact. The second is whether, if that is the case, it constitutes a contempt of the House. If that is not the case, the matter stops there. It would seem to me the argument of the hon. member for St. John's

East (Mr. McGrath) is clear. I do not know whether new ground can be covered by other members who want to support it. Perhaps I would be more greatly aided to find out what the opposition is to the argument, than more support for it. In any case, I am in the hands of members of the House in terms of further discussion.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I will be very short in my remarks. What my friend has indicated is that if the parliamentary process is to work—and it should work—then we must have open, honest, and full disclosure. Your Honour's question goes to the very root of the matter, whether the promulgation or the proclamation under date of October 26, and as registered in the Canada Gazette on November 8, in fact is the gist of the bill.

It is quite obvious. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) indicated that the gist of the proclamation as promulgated, or the order in council, refers to those persons who are employed less than 20 hours. They would be excepted. The second portion of the schedule to which I have just referred deals with those persons whose earnings would be less than 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings. Those are the two figures which Mr. Speaker must keep in mind. The remainder of the sentences are explanatory and perhaps extraneous.

If one looks at clause 2 of the bill, one will see that those two key or phrases are within the bill. In other words, the principle brought forth by the order in council as promulgated is within the bill. I will not take long, because the hon. member for St. John's East explained clause 2. I direct Your Honour's attention to clause 2. That clause refers to less than 20 hours, and further on, it refers to less than 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings.

As my friend has indicated, the minister stated that he was sorry. More important, the deputy minister indicated that he was sorry, and as a matter of fact he went further.

Mr. Caccia: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) will have an opportunity to participate in this debate. I know Mr. Speaker will be kind enough to recognize him in due course.

The error has been admitted. The problem is in which direction they are indicating that they are sorry. The specific item within the bill which we are talking about sets forth no deadline. It calls for introduction by way of proclamation after the bill is passed. The order in council has gone beyond the scope of the bill, because it indicates the particular provision, to which we are directing our attention, will come into force on January 1, 1979. In the first instance, that is beyond the scope of the bill.

We are faced with a very peculiar situation. If the House is dealing with a particular piece of legislation, then I submit respectfully that there should not be any edict, regulation or proclamation promulgated prior to the passing of this bill. If that occurs, our role becomes a sham, meaningless, and useless.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And parliament is held in contempt.

Mr. Alexander: As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) just said, parliament is held in contempt. The hon. member for St. John's East said that the government is in contempt in terms of recognizing the roles of members of parliament when it comes to the parliamentary process of dealing with legislation. It cannot have it both ways.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, you will recall that at the lunch break I was trying to convince Your Honour of the necessity of dealing with this matter because of the principles involved. I was most encouraged by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who was asked by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) to withdraw the order in council, when he said, after some deliberation and a supplementary question, that it would be improper for him to anticipate the conclusion of the bill. I want Your Honour, with respect, to remember that phrase, "anticipate the conclusion of the bill."

What is equally important is the fact, and this has been emphasized by the hon. member for St. John's East, that there should be no intervention by the promulgation of an order in council dealing with the same subject parliament is dealing with by way of committee consideration. With all due respect, and if I am wrong I am sure the minister will correct me in due course, that is what has happened. I mentioned this to you, and I will not repeat it other than to say we were talking about the less than 20 hours in a week and the not less than 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings, which are the two main points. These matters have been dealt with by the order in council at a time when we were considering them, as we should in terms of the legislative process.

You will hear argument from the other side, particularly from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), that the government has the legal authority to do this. That raises a very serious question, because if the legal authority exists, the government has done by order in council—and once again I would direct your attention to the explanatory notes—what it is attempting to do under the authorities sought by these two provisions.

For the benefit of hon. members I will read this again. It is extremely important. The explanatory note in reference to clause 2, and these are the words I respectfully submit must be underlined, states:

This amendment would provide authority to make regulations providing that a week of employment must contain at least twenty hours—

If the minister had the authority to introduce the order in council, which I now question, why did he see to it that clause 2, which covers the very same matter, was included in the bill? If he did not have the authority, which the explanatory note would indicate to be the fact, then I respectfully submit the minister and his official are in serious error.

In conclusion, I would just say that if the parliamentary process as we know it is to function in a proper and meaningful way, without being a sham or a farce, and I will not emphasize those latter two descriptive words, we must abide by what is reasonable under the circumstances. We must be given an opportunity to rely on what this bill says.

The bill has been circulated across the country and states in dealing with clause 2 that it will not go into effect until the bill is proclaimed, rather than on January 1, 1979, as stated by the order in council. It says it becomes effective once the bill is proclaimed. We are entitled to rely not only on the explanatory note but on the application of clause 16. That is why I suggest, with all due respect, that the arguments put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, have great merit. I hope after due deliberation, and after hearing from other hon. members, Your Honour will find that this very serious matter should be referred to the appropriate standing committee for further deliberation and report back to the House.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we do admire the rhetorical talents and the heart with which the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) have spoken. It seems to me, and I submit this thought for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, that they have in their submissions to you forgotten to stress a couple of thoughts which, in my opinion, are very relevant to this matter, namely, that the proclamation gazetted on November 8 is not a proclamation that did not stem from any power or legislation passed by this parliament. That proclamation flows from a statute already passed by this parliament and therefore it has its roots in a piece of legislation that has undergone parliamentary scrutiny.

● (1412)

In essence, clause 2, which is under discussion, does two things: it narrows the powers outlined in the regulation that has been gazetted and it puts under parliamentary scrutiny, because of the transfer from a regulation into Bill C-14, a regulation which until now was in the regulations and now is being placed in the act for parliamentary scrutiny. It does, I submit, what we all know was recommended over the years by the Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments when it was felt that the regulations ought to flow from laws of parliament and that they ought to be limited, and where possible, the powers ought to be included in the statutes themselves.

[Mr. Alexander.]

The regulation to which hon. members opposite are referring is rooted in an existing statute; it is not in a vacuum. It is valid, and is based on the powers of a piece of legislation that has been approved in the past. What Bill C-14 does, and specifically clause 2, is to narrow the scope of that regulation and submit the substance of it to parliamentary scrutiny. It is not something that has been gazetted. What has been objected to is not something that has been done in anticipation or by second guessing parliament—I am trying to quote hon. members opposite—it has not been done to bypass parliament or in anticipation of what parliament will do. It is a measure or a step taken by the government within the scope of an existing statute and not outside that, as I understand it.

I submit there is no evidence of any prima facie contempt of this House; there is no anticipation on the part of the government or the department that the bill will be approved. If anything—and here I would agree with the hon. member opposite—the explanatory note in the bill is badly worded. But it is just an explanatory note attempting to explain the scope of clause 2; that is all it is.

In many respects, Mr. Speaker, this is a linear or fairly straightforward question. To suggest that there is an attempt to bypass parliament or anticipate what parliament might do is without basis, in my opinion, in view of the fact that the regulation that has been gazetted is rooted in an existing statute previously approved by this House, the Senate and the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) because I consider that the proceedings before this House and the committee represent a serious breach of the confidence of this House and amount to a contempt of this House and contempt of the committee.

We have to examine what was actually done here. I realize we are getting close to a legal inquiry, but I think it is essential to set the stage for the point being made. The order in council issued on November 8 was issued, so we are told, by the department under authority of sections 4(1) and 4(3)(f) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which read as follows:

4. (1) The commission may, with the approval of the governor in council, make regulations for including in insurable employment

4. (3)(f) any employment in which persons are employed to an inconsiderable extent or for an inconsiderable consideration.

That is the authority under which the governor in council issued the regulation, and under which the regulation purported to exempt from unemployment insurance benefits any individual whose earnings are less than 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings and any individual who works less than 20 hours a week.

The problem arises—and obviously the department has anticipated this—because the wording of Section 4 of the Unemployment Insurance Act is perhaps too vague, too uncertain, in giving the department authority to make those specific regulations. I would suggest that the department realized this when it presented clause 2 of Bill C-14 to this House which provided authority to make precisely the same proposal that was presented in the regulations promulgated on November 8. That proclamation came from the authority of a statute passed by parliament some time ago, but I would disagree with the hon. member opposite who just spoke and said that all the clause tends to do is narrow the powers given to the government. It does not narrow any powers; it grants specific authority to deal with part-time workers under the Unemployment Insurance Act. His statement that the proper course of action is to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments is not relevant here.

The question of whether there was authority in the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 to promulgate those regulations was never resolved. I think it is irrelevant. It is obvious that the department thought there was some doubt about their authority and they needed the specific proposal. Clause 2 provides specific authority to do what they have already done.

I would suggest that the conduct of the department in this matter amounts to second guessing parliament and bypassing parliament. It is obvious that if the original regulation had been followed and they did have authority for its promulgation, the rejection by parliament of the proposal in clause 2 of Bill C-14 would raise questions about the validity of the regulation.

I do not think we should ask Your Honour to decide the legal question involved, but rather just what the department was putting before parliament in this case. The department was asking parliament for authority to make a specific regulation. It is very specific in its terms. It is not a general regulation. It is not granting the department wide powers to deal with part-time workers; it is granting specific authority under specific circumstances. By promulgating the regulation prior to this time the department, I submit, is anticipating parliament and second guessing what this House would do.

● (1422)

As to whether members of this House were misled or whether it was an honest mistake, that I do not think is the issue. I do not think there is any allegation that there was a deliberate attempt to mislead. But the misinformation created certain problems for members. Members have been dealing with this act for some time. Members of the committee have been dealing extensively with the act for some 32 or 33 meetings over the last several weeks. In reporting to constituents, the press and so on, it presents a real problem, because members and constituents are under the impression that this particular enactment would provide the power for the department to deal with part-time workers under the Unemployment Insurance Act. In the department's opinion we now find that no matter what we do to this particular enactment here in this House or in committee, the regulation has been promulgated already, and in its opinion it is valid.

Reference was made in committee—and I am not sure if it is proper to refer to committee debates—and the deputy minister mentioned this in debate, to the effect that it was presented before, and he said he would check the record. We have checked the record and could not find where reference was made to the fact that this regulation has been issued prior to this time. What we were doing in the committee and this House was dealing with a provision that the government felt was not really necessary. The department had already promulgated it in the form of a regulation and therefore, in the opinion of the department, our time was being wasted and it really made a sham of the whole parliamentary process.

I submit to Your Honour that you should find a prima facie case of a breach of the privilege of this House.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a volunteer to speak on this particular issue.

Mr. Cullen: The lawyer does it for no fee.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, for no fee, just the approval of my colleagues at least on this side of the House.

I have some interest in the issue not only because as a member of this House I am concerned about the regularity with which things should be done, but also because I have the honour of being one of the co-chairmen of the statutory instruments committee. I have to point out to the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, that this particular regulation would, in the normal course of events, come before our committee for consideration in any event. Because of the numbers of regulations which the government is spewing out day by day and week by week, it might well be four months, five months or six months before it comes to us, by which time an interesting event might have taken place, or maybe even some reversals of positions from one side of the House to the other.

Just a short time ago this House gave approval to the terms of reference and to criteria which the statutory instruments committee uses when it examines orders in council and regulations. Certainly one of the most important of those criteria is the one which is now being discussed, that is, the study of the regulation which is warranted legally under the terms of the enabling clause in the legislation. However, we go far beyond that. We also look at the question as to whether it violates natural justice, whether it is in accordance with human rights and whether there is an unusual or unexpected impact of a power which this House has granted which is being used by the government in a rather extraordinary way.

During the course of our deliberations over four or five years we have had some limited capacity in taming some of the departments, including this particular department. I cannot say they are eating out of our hands as yet, but at least they are listening to us. We are having a reasonable measure of success in persuading some of the bureaucracy who, when confronted with a committee which is usually unanimous, consisting of members of this and the other place, change, take back, vary, and sometimes even repeal regulations which offend our criteria.

I am not going to take part in the debate in substance, but it seems to me to be rather unusual if a committee of this House, distinct from the standing committee, were to examine this particular issue and come to some conclusion about it, we would find ourselves seized with jurisdiction with respect to it maybe four or five months from now. We are not looking for work. I can assure Your Honour that with all governments and this bureaucracy we are guaranteed tremendous amounts of work so long as the committee is in existence, but it might well be that the committee on statutory instruments is the proper form to examine any issue should Your Honour come to a certain decision, and should the House decide that it is a matter which necessitates some examination. I just put those ideas forward for the benefit of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: As a result of the last intervention by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), I am wondering if there is any merit in considering the possibility of his committee getting to work at once on the examination of this particular regulation and statutory instrument, as it would do in the normal course in any event, and to suspend consideration of any matter of privilege until such time as the committee has had an opportunity to examine the regulation and report back to the House. That is in the normal course of the work of the statutory instruments committee. I am not considering that to be a special reference in any way. But as the hon. member has said, the statutory instruments committee in the normal course will have this before it, as it does all other regulations.

There seems to me to be two or three areas of argument here, and they are becoming intertwined. One of those has to do with whether or not the regulation has its roots in proper statutory authority. That is an argument that has not been waged by some members in support of this question of privilege, but it has been referred to by others. There also seems to be some argument as to whether or not this regulation and the section of the act referred to have an identical purpose. It would certainly help the Chair a great deal to be able to put those two questions aside. If the work of the statutory instruments committee, which will do that work any way, might accomplish that, it might be a worth-while consideration to think that this regulation be referred to them without prejudice to carrying this question of privilege forward after the statutory instruments committee has examined the regulation and reported to the House as it does in the normal course. From the point of the Chair this might be very helpful.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, that is a very useful suggestion. However, it leaves us with one dilemma. We have a bill before us which contains a section which has already been incorporated by a statutory instrument, that is, by order in council, and we will have to address ourselves to that bill at third reading. If the debate on the bill can be suspended until the statutory instruments committee has a chance to deal with this, then that obviously would be the answer. If Your Honour would so rule, I think that would solve the problem.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, even in the preamble of the hon. member's question he suggested a section of the act has been proclaimed. That is not the case. We are dealing with a specific issue here. Mr. Speaker has indicated that legal authority was provided. The timing aspect is significant. This view should be put and a ruling should be made. I do not think there is any question of contempt here or any breach of privilege. I would like to make my comments along that line.

• (1432)

It is fair to say that Bill C-14 with which we are dealing is a very complex piece of legislation. The issues have been hotly contested both before the bill was introduced and the announcement was made, and when the bill was tabled at first reading. Hon. members who have participated in the debate know that on occasion it has become somewhat rancorous.

I think the debate has been fruitful. It has been positive. There have been some suggestions on the bill here and there. We have had a thorough study of the bill. Witnesses appeared before the committee expressing their varying points of view. I believe we are now up to something like 32 meetings of the committee. It can hardly be said the bill has not received thorough study.

I am not in a position to suggest that we delay the implementation of this particular piece of legislation, important though it is, while we wait for the committee to study something I do not think in this instance has to be studied. The question of privilege can therefore be done away with.

One particular clause in Bill C-14 establishes a very specific and detailed regulation making authority. Members indicated they were not aware that there exists already a more general authority for similar regulations, and they were surprised to learn that a regulation had been made on October 26 under the existing authority.

I would like to deal with several aspects of this matter today, Mr. Speaker. The legal issue is whether there is authority under the present Unemployment Insurance Act to make the regulations which were recently published in the Canada Gazette or whether the authority set out in clause 2 of Bill C-14 is essential in order to make the desired regulations. In discussing this issue it should be understood that the regulations pertain to standards to be used by National Revenue in determining whether certain employment shall be excepted from coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

When I determined the need to submit the regulations in question to the governor general in council for its approval, I was advised by my legal officers that there was present authority found in section 4(3)(f) of the act to support the making of the regulations and that it was not specifically necessary to await passage of Bill C-14. In fact the regulations replace earlier ones made under the same statutory authority which were never challenged as being ultra vires.

As all members should know, proposed regulations must be reviewed by Department of Justice officials, including the legal officers to the Privy Council office who examine the regulations in accordance with the requirements of the Statutory Instruments Act. That examination also involves a determination as to whether there is proper statutory authority to make the proposed regulations. I am satisfied that the appropriate legal review was carried out correctly and that the regulations are proper. This is the difference.

The purpose of clause 2 in Bill C-14 is to provide cleaner and more limited authority respecting the power to make regulations of the type in question regarding excepted employment. I am seeking this authority after being advised by my legal counsel that, while present authority existed in the act, it was identified through broader wording than the government might desire in order clearly and specifically to identify exactly what the government wants as statutory authority for such regulations. As such, the introduction of clause 2 into law would re-identify the authority to make these regulations. In addition, once this new authority became effective, the government would propose to revoke the recently passed regulations and re-enact them under the authority identified in clause 2.

In short, with respect to the legal issue raised by the hon. member, I am satisfied with the legal advice given to me and have no doubt as to the legality of the actions of the government in this matter.

It has been asked whether the regulation passed is identical in substance and character to the wording of clause 2 of the bill. The regulations in clause 2 are not the same. They are of two separate characters. The regulation is the substantive provision for determining the exceptions for the type of employment.

Clause 2 is the statutory authority to make regulations and by itself does not provide the vehicle for legal authority to except employment from insurance coverage. The two provisions are for totally different purposes and are not an inconsistent or redundant duplication. I think that is the crux of the legal portion of the argument.

In the committee, hon. members did not probe the issue of comparability between the existing and proposed regulation-making authority. They might have been expected to know that regulations relating to minimum insurability in terms of earnings and hours of work exist now. There was in fact a minimum insurability regulation in existence prior to Bill C-14. Hon. members should have been aware of that.

Undoubtedly it would have been helpful if the explanatory note in the bill had gone on to specify that the clause would define and limit an existing regulation-making authority that is too broad and loose.

It is ironic, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members of the opposition are claiming that they were asked to pass a meaningless and redundant clause in Bill C-14 when in fact that clause does exactly what they have been demanding for years, namely, limit regulation making authority by specific and clear direction in the act itself. That was and is the purpose of clause 2.

On the question of privilege, I have apologized to the committee for the fact that we did not make it clear to them that the clause in question was a refinement of an existing provision. I am convinced that one of my officials did point this out at one stage in the committee hearings. In any event, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that there was absolutely no intent to mislead. The order in council under the existing UI act was passed on October 26 and published in the Canada Gazette on November 8, a month ago. I regret that it did not come to the attention of hon. members of the opposition before yesterday, but that is surely not the government's fault.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars are made available to opposition parties for research staff. Surely one thing it should examine is the Canada Gazette, which comes out on a regular basis, in order to determine what regulations have been proclaimed and what regulations have been gazetted. They have that obligation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I did not interrupt hon. members. I listened as courteously as I could to what they had to say in order to determine if I owed them another apology, or further apology. I wanted to know precisely what they felt was their question of privilege. I hope they will do me the courtesy of listening to my views.

This is singularly important to me because no less a person than the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to me as a House of Commons man. I consider that a great privilege. I do not want to do anything to usurp the role of members of parliament. I have that reputation. I built it up in this place over something in excess of ten years. I have a feeling for my colleagues in this chamber, and I would not do anything to usurp their role.

Again with regard to the timing, this bill was gazetted on November 8. It was referred to the committee, and clause by clause study began on December 5. For practically a month they had that information. It was public information. Therefore it was available to the opposition. There was no attempt to hide anything. If we had done something such as having it gazetted for December 15 or some time beyond the bill, that might be a different case. However, there was no intention to mislead here.

We went through the usual channels and caused this particular proclamation. It was published and therefore became public information. I can hardly be held to blame for the fact that the opposition did not find out about it until a month later.

I have apologized to the committee, as have my officials, for what has occurred, however unintentional. But I am satisfied that our actions were completely legal and proper and that the course of debate in the committee would not have been different if the opposition had been aware that the clause they were considering was a clarification and limitation of existing regulation-making power rather than a completely new provision.

● (1442)

I am endeavouring to indicate that what we did was correct and proper. There was no intent to mislead. The regulation was published as the law requires. I can see that the explanatory note might have gone on further—I suspect that every explanatory note could be longer and provide more information. But surely that is one of the purposes of a committee hearing—so that all the information with regard to a clause in a bill or a regulation made under it can be explained.

I concede that as a courtesy to the committee, having put this regulation through, I should have said to them, "By the way, the regulation which is needed in order to deal with all the hundreds of thousands of employers who have to get their computers and books in order, the Department of National Revenue which has to prepare its schedules, the Department of of Supply and Services which sends out hundreds, probably millions, of cheques in a year—the regulation to give them the necessary authority has been put through, and the regulation derived its statutory authority from the present act." Again I say there was no attempt to mislead or usurp authority. The regulation does not stand in the place of clause 2 of the bill. It performs a totally different function and on that basis I can hardly visualize your finding there is a question of privilege or that there has been contempt for members of this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At this point I see four other members who want to contribute to this discussion. I have no way of stopping them, but I wonder whether hon. members understand the limitation placed upon the Chair in this kind of argument. It is not a question whether the Chair accepts the proposition put forward by the minister or by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). This is a procedural problem, a question of privilege, and there are severe limitations on the authority of the Chair with respect to procedure. Whether the minister is correct or not in saying that the section and the regulation have two different purposes is not for me to judge on procedural grounds.

It is not my function to make a legal decision—to interpret the act and say, "This is the right interpretation, and that is wrong".

As long as the minister takes a position and says to the House, as he has done, that the section and the order in council have different purposes, it seems to me I am powerless to examine the matter further. There may be other grievances, other remedies which can be taken with respect to them, but we all have to recognize that rather severe procedural limitations are placed upon my ability to resolve this problem. I am prepared to listen to other contributions but I do not know they will get us anywhere.

We have a motion on the order paper with regard to social insurance numbers, we are rapidly running out of time, and I believe there are some important contributions to be made to that debate. I seek the indulgence of the House. If the House is satisfied I have heard all the argument I need to hear, and that other argument may be somewhat repetitious, I would think that either now, or very soon, I should be permitted to reserve my decision on this matter and consider over the weekend whether my initial impressions are wrong. I shall do that very studiously, but if my initial impressions are right I will make my ruling on Monday.

[Mr. Cullen.]

Unless there are some areas relative to what I have just said and from which I might get some helpful contributions, I would like to bring the discussion to a close because there are other questions of privilege of which I have received notice, one from the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) and another from the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan)—it is on the same subject as this one. I leave the matter in the hands of the House.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have just two things to say with respect to this matter and perhaps, in a way, they will be helpful to the Chair. The first is this. I do not think we can ever reasonably argue, as the minister tried to do, with respect to the reviewing of the Canada Gazette, that it is always the responsibility of everyone when dealing with matters of this nature to make the assumption that the government has done something wrong and that the research offices must therefore search everything out to confirm that the government has done something wrong. That is the essence of what the hon. gentleman said. Surely that is not a tenable point.

The second matter I should like to raise is whether or not this subject should be referred in some way, either to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, as set forward, or, perhaps, to the statutory instruments committee. This was one of the points you raised, Mr. Speaker. As the seconder of the motion in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) I am pleased to say that if that latter suggestion meets with Your Honour's approval as you consider the matter over the weekend, I would concur. I would go one step further and encourage you with respect to that course of action, because the committee was established precisely in order to deal with questions of this nature. It is well equipped, both in terms of counsel and of expertise—I need look to none other than the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) as the expert in this House to deal with an issue of this kind.

I rise with respect to the procedural aspect so that Your Honour may know that as a seconder I would concur if you felt, over the weekend, that that should be done.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I feel very strongly about this question of privilege because I believe it affects all members of parliament in a very real way. If the department felt it had the necessary authority to pass this regulation, it should not have shown the contempt of asking a committee to look at it.

The order in council was passed on October 26 and published on November 8. The committee has not met. Either that regulation was legal or it was illegal. If it was legal, parliament should not have been faced with the problem. If it was illegal and they wanted parliament to endorse something to make it legal, and the committee had decided not to do that and abolish clause 2 or vote against clause 2, then parliament would have made one decision and the department would still be saying that the regulations were legal and would be left in place. I know of no case where departmental officials have been allowed to overrule a decision of parliament. It is a little like discussing capital punishment. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) wants to hang someone and he has a friend in the Department of Public Works who is building all the platforms and getting them ready, whether parliament wants to hang people or not!

Another factor that enters into this is that we always have to depend on the law officers. In every department I find ministers hiding behind the law officers. Who the hell are they? I don't know. But they are like lawyers in general. Whoever hires them gets the advice they ask for.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: We had an interesting meeting with the minister who is so interested in parliamentary procedure and events in the past. There was some discussion about imports back in 1962 when John Diefenbaker was prime minister. Several days after that parliament ended, he passed an order in council dealing with imports, which eventually was challenged in the courts. The leader of the Liberal government had the same law officers. We were told in the 1963 parliament that those law officers had said it was legal, but when it went to the courts the law officers got cold feet and asked the government to pass a bill to regularize the situation. A bill was passed in 1963 establishing those import laws retroactively, because it was anticipated they would be thrown out by the courts. That is exactly the same situation this time.

• (1452)

The minister does not know whether this regulation is legal or illegal. He has to take somebody's advice. He is paying people to give him the advice he wants. That order in council is standing in line waiting behind a number of other things. A lot of time will go by. In the meantime he tries to pass the bill. If the bill passes, there will be an order in council. That order in council will be added to the line, and the illegal one will be withdrawn. That is what members of parliament are faced with.

I will read the first part of the explanatory note to clause 2 as follows:

This amendment would provide authority to make regulations providing that—

Then it refers to two specifics, the length of the week and maximum insurable earnings. This is a new clause. The minister says it is necessary to make this order in council and to make it specific. If this bill does not pass, in my opinion that order in council would not stand up in any court.

Mr. Caccia: Not so.

Mr. Peters: The apologist for the government says that is not so. That is not what the minister thought. That was not the advice he received. He was advised to get this clause through so that there would be authority. My privileges are being abused. When I go to a committee—

Mr. Maine: First time.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member says "first time", but I have been in the committee several times. I admit that I am not a member of that committee, but if Your Honour saw the game of musical chairs which went on in that committee, Your Honour would be surprised. Most members do not even know what the bill is about. What did the parliamentary secretary do last night? He wanted to continue when all the other members went home at the normal adjournment hour. He wanted to continue so that he could ram the bill through without any opposition. It seems to me that members of parliament should be able to depend on the integrity of the law officers of the Crown and of the minister. We have to have some faith in the whole structure, and ministers certainly have some responsibility regarding the legislation they put forward.

If that clause was not necessary, it should not have been there. If we had defeated it, it still would have applied by virtue of the regulation the law officers said was legal. Where would that put us? Parliament would have decided against it, yet it would have become a fact. Would the minister have got up and said that because of a certain ruling he would withdraw it? Nuts to that! The only reason he wants this authority is that he needs time to get this matter to the Department of National Revenue and to get forms made up for income tax purposes for employers who will be making deductions in accordance with this new category of work week.

The order in council was passed as a matter of expediency. The government knew it would never have to take this order in council to court because before its becoming effective, January 1 would have arrived, and the government anticipated the bill would have been passed by January 1. The dummy regulation would have been standing in place so that employers and the Department of National Revenue could have oriented their computers and their bookkeeping to that system. In the meantime a legal order in council would have been passed. That is the worst kind of abuse the government could inflict on members of parliament and on this country. It indicates, as nothing else does, the inability of this government to govern and to operate as a supervisor of civil servants, who are supposed to serve the government, and its tendency to act as a stoolie for civil servants.

Mr. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that three questions have been raised by yourself and by the minister. One question relates to the regulation which was proclaimed, that regulation being the same as clause 2. The second question is whether this represents a change from the previous legislation. The third question is whether the government had the power to do what it did. I want to deal with these questions, one at a time.

I would like to leave for Your Honour documents provided to us by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) outlining what he intended to do through clause 2 of the bill. These documents are entitled "Highlights of the Proposed Amendments". It seems to me quite clear that if one reads through these documents, one finds that the regulation which was gazetted was identical to what was being put before the House.

The second question is whether this regulation which was gazetted changed the current law. We have the word of the minister here in his summary, which reads as follows:

The proposal would change the basis of minimum insurability.

Further on it reads as follows:

Because the present formula allows some individuals to work very few hours a week to qualify for UI benefits, the proposal would reduce the disincentives to work.

Under the heading "Impact of the change" we find the following:

One effect will be to exclude from insurable employment those individuals who are able to earn a relatively large wage in only a few hours a week.

There are clear and repetitious references in the documents provided by the minister to the effect that the bill represents a change from the previous legislation. In addition, these documents were given to us when the bill was prepared. We see that the proposed effective date of the regulation is January 1, 1979, when in fact the regulation was already in place by order in council.

The third question with which I want to deal is the question of power. I want to deal with this just briefly because, as the minister has stated, the government relies entirely on section 4(3)(f) to make its case that the regulation which was gazetted is within its power. As was mentioned previously, that regulation said that the government could exclude any employment in which persons are employed to an inconsiderable extent or for an inconsiderable consideration. It seems to me that it is quite clear that if the regulation which was gazetted excludes one additional person who could not have been excluded under the prior act, that represents taking the law into one's own hands because the government did not have the authority to exclude that individual person.

The government has admitted that this change in clause 2 would exclude some 42,000 persons, but I would like to put forward for Your Honour's consideration the cases of two specific individuals who I do not believe could have been excluded under the previous legislation and who are clearly excluded now. I believe Your Honour can see that there is prima facie evidence that the rights of parliament and its sole right to make law have been breached.

One of the two individuals I would like to use as an example is a part-time school teacher. Typically, such a school teacher earns from $9,000 to $11,000 a year. That amount exceeds the average wage in the country. The dictionary definition of "inconsiderable" is "small, of little consequence or trivial". I do not think any person could agree that such a school teacher is employed for an inconsiderable consideration.

The second point is whether such a person is employed to an inconsiderable extent, because as part of his duties he would likely have to report for work at about eight in the morning. He would likely leave about one in the afternoon. He would have to mark tests and so forth in the course of carrying out his duties. He is under contract, and I do not believe any reasonable person could conceivably argue that he is working to an inconsiderable extent.

[Mr. McCrossan.]

• (1502)

Therefore, I think it is a clearcut example of a person who would be specifically excluded under clause 2 of Bill C-14, if it were passed, who is excluded under the regulation which was gazetted, and who could not conceivably have been excluded under section 4(3)(f) which the minister cites as his authority.

The second example which I would like to cite is that of the longshoremen in Toronto. We have a two employer system for the longshoremen's union in Toronto. The two employers are the Toronto Harbour Commission and the Maritime Employers' Association. It is quite possible for a longshoreman to work 38 hours a week, 19 hours for the harbour commission and 19 hours for the Maritime Employers' Association, to receive pay that is considerably higher than the average pay in the country, to work considerably longer than the average hours worked in the country, and yet be excluded under the regulation which was gazetted. I do not believe there is any conceivable way they could be excluded under the current act, and therefore it is quite clear that the regulation which was gazetted does, in fact, as indicated in the minister's explanatory notes to Bill C-14, represent a significant change from what was provided under the prior act.

The final point I want to make concerns my own question of privilege to which I should like to speak for about 30 seconds. I raised the point on November 28 of the impact of clause 2, and in the cross-examination, which is reported at pages 963 and 964 of the committee's proceedings, the deputy minister stated that when the act is amended, provisions will be introduced by regulation, which provisions could be changed from time to time. There was no hint at all that the regulations had already been introduced and that they were in force.

I refer back to the quotation cited by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) from May's nineteenth edition to the effect that if there was a suppression of truth by witnesses, that constituted a breach of privilege.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I just want to intervene briefly on this question of procedure because there is a point which I wish to make which has not been dealt with and which I feel concerns the very invidious position in which we are placed as members of parliament working on committees vis-à-vis the witnesses who appear before committees.

It is evident in this case that there is, and has been, contempt with regard to the witnesses who appeared. I want to make particular reference to two groups which appeared before the committee for a specific reason. One of the major reasons that they came before the committee was to deal with this particular clause of the bill, a matter which has been raised on a number of occasions by women in particular because it has special significance with regard to women in the work force. Some 22 per cent of women in the work force, almost one million Canadian women in the labour force, are employed on a part-time basis.

The Advisory Committee on the Status of Women and the National Action Committee on the Status of Women both appeared as witnesses before the parliamentary committee. The Advisory Committee on the Status of Women appeared on November 21, and the National Action Committee on the Status of Women appeared on November 27. Both directed many of their remarks to this clause in the bill. They were protesting the provision as it pertains to part-time workers. They had no idea at the time they were making their intervention that the order in council dealing with this specific provision had already been enacted.

What I find very interesting in the remarks of the minister is that he has made the rather fallacious argument that members of parliament should have been aware of what was gazetted. I have no doubt that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), when he gets up every morning, reads the Canada Gazette as his first order of business.

Mr. McGrath: It is a real best seller.

Miss MacDonald: But I am not sure that everyboby does that. However, it was quite evident, when representatives of these women's groups addressing this issue were before the committee, that they had not been informed that such an order in council had already put this provision into effect.

If the minister feels that members of parliament should have been aware of that provision—and he may have reason for feeling that members of parliament should have been informed—surely it was the duty of his officials sitting in committee on those two occasions to inform those witnesses of what had been promulgated by the order in council. Surely it was their duty, knowing that the representatives of these women's groups were raising this very point, to inform them at that time. That is what makes a mockery of the whole proceedings. Witnesses come before committees to deal with a specific piece of legislation and they are not even informed that their arguments are no longer relevant.

The reason I say that it is a form of contempt on behalf of the witnesses is that it can only lead to more cynicism on the part of people who appear before parliamentary committees to make justifiable arguments which they want to put forward strongly. If we are going to make a mockery of the system in that way, and if we are going to allow ourselves to be party to undermining the system in that way, then I think it is not only a contempt and a breach of the privileges of members of parliament but a contempt and breach of the privileges of every witness and of every Canadian citizen who appears before a parliamentary committee and is so treated.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes to give my thoughts on this question of privilege because I have been a member of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration from the time we started discussing Bill C-14. At no point was I aware or had an indication from the minister or from officials of the department that, when we came to examine clause 2, what we were discussing did not matter because it was already the law. Just suppose the committee had defeated clause 2, what then? The answer is, of course, that it would still be the law because the order in council would have stood as the law. We were there as members of parliament believing that we had some control over the legislation which was being examined in committee when, in effect, we had no control at all.

The minister and the officials put forward the argument that they have the legal right to do this, and they quoted the section of the act under which they claim they have the legal right. If they had the legal right to do it, then why did they need to repeat verbatim the same clause in Bill C-14? If they had the authority of the order in council, then why make fools of members of parliament and have us go through the charade of thinking that we could decide whether or not that clause was acceptable and would become law?

That seems to be an extremely important point because what the officials are saying to members of parliament and what the government is saying, in effect, is: be fruitful, go forth and multiply. All of us resent that type of treatment. At no point during committee stage, up until yesterday, were we informed that there was an order in council which made that particular clause in the bill effective.

● (1512)

Deliberations on Bill C-14 ought to be suspended, and a reference ought to be made to the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments for examination of this particular regulation. How often is this repeated in other legislation? If I introduced a private member's bill in the House of Commons for something which is already the law—for example, a private member's bill requesting an unemployment insurance program in Canada—the first thing I would be told is that it was out of order because an unemployment insurance program already exists in Canada. How can the government bring in a bill which contains a clause that is law already? The entire question is out of order.

The Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments ought to look at this particular situation occasioned by the order in council. The committee could expedite its deliberations on this particular point and bring back a decision to the House on which the House may decide before going forward with the consideration of Bill C-14.

It is an extremely important principle. The people of Nickel Belt and the constituents of all members are under the impression that somehow their members of parliament have some control over the legislative system in the country. Lo and behold, this particular incident indicates how foolhardy we have been concerning the democratic process. In effect, members of parliament do not have control. The bureaucrats and the government have complete control. It is a sham and a shambles to think hon. members have control. I resent that on behalf of the people of Nickel Belt and all other Canadians.

The government is in contempt of parliament. I have no hesitation in making that charge. The minister, the officials in his department, and the government are in contempt of parliament. They should have come clean and told us the truth. We did not receive the truth. We received an apology, which they hoped would move things forward in committee yesterday.

This is an extremely serious matter. They ought not to be let off without a proper examination of this principle. The bill should not go forward until the matter is cleared up to the satisfaction of all members and the people they represent.

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of briefly participating in the question of privilege before the House. I should like to deal with this matter and the manner in which it is hurtful to members of my constituency and perhaps others. Obviously I will not go over the ground already covered by other hon. members. I am referring to the longshoremen of the city of Toronto. They will be affected seriously by the legislation and/or the regulation, whichever comes first.

The longshoremen first read about this matter on November 3, 1978, at which time an article appeared in the Globe and Mail. In part it read:

> Thousands would no longer be insured by the program—for example, the longshoreman who works a few hours on the weekend for extremely high wages.

Shortly after that, the longshoremen were in touch with me. The reason for their particular concern relating to the ongoing process before the House and committee is that there are two ports in the country unlike other ports in terms of the manner in which longshoremen are employed. The ports of Hamilton and Toronto offer opportunities to longshoremen via a variety of employers. The legislation always contemplated one single employer. These ports function with two employer groups, the MEA and the Toronto Harbour Commission of the city of Toronto.

The situation is difficult for longshoremen in Toronto and Hamilton, given the circumstances of trade in those two ports during the last five to seven years, because they cannot receive up to 20 hours' work from one single employer. If this piece of legislation passes, or if the regulation goes through, they will not be insured.

After the longshoremen contacted me, I indicated that the bill had been introduced for second reading, that it was now before committee, and that the opportunity to make their views known would be before the committee. They believed in the process as much as I and felt that it was fair. At the same time as the matter came to committee, I found out that regulation 54 had been revoked. That regulation placed the longshoremen in exactly the same circumstance as the new legislation would have if passed. Not only did they have no opportunity to say anything, but they believed, as most people across the country do, that the idea of legislation before the House is to debate principles, refer it to committee, and allow people affected to say something about it.

As it stands now, the difficulty facing the longshoremen of Toronto is that essentially they are involved in a Catch 22 situation. They cannot speak to the legislation as it stands. They do not want the legislation to pass, particularly respecting clause 2, because it effectively "disinsures" them. To be told that it does not matter whether they come to the committee or whether the legislation passes, that in fact three weeks ago the government passed a regulation "disinsuring" them, abuses the process as it affects them.

It is not merely a question of the privileges of the members of the House. If the privileges mean anything at all, they mean something to the people affected by the legislation passed. The regulation means that the longshoremen in the city of Toronto are no longer able to achieve insurability respecting unemployment insurance. It is not because, as the minister suggested in one of his press releases, that the government is attempting to deal with those who make a lot of money over the weekend. The average wage on an hourly basis for longshoremen in Toronto is $11,500.

An hon. Member: On an hourly basis?

Mr. Crombie: Perhaps it is funny to be smart, but if a person has to live on $11,500—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member said "on an hourly basis".

Mr. Crombie: Obviously no one receives $11,500 an hour; I assumed hon. members opposite would understand that. Longshoremen receive $11,500 a year. According to contract, they must be available seven days a week. I am not talking about people who are slacking. I am not talking about people who can make a lot of quick money on the side. I am talking about people with average salaries of $11,500, people who must be available for seven days a week. Also they work in ports which are not designated as deep water ports. Therefore, their ability to carry out responsibilities as people looking after their families will be non-existent if the regulation or the legislation goes through. They would like to have an opportunity to make that point.

There is only one possible salvation for them. Perhaps an agreement will be reached between the MEA and the Toronto Harbour Commission for an employer of record. I mentioned that to the minister and he indicated that he thought something could be worked out. Given what I have heard today, I suggest it cannot be worked out by January 1, and that is the difficulty.

● (1522)

I conclude by suggesting that anyone who, for the first time, followed through on the problem of a constituent or a large number of people who were affected by a bill referred to a committee and found that it did not matter because in fact there was a regulation which covered it and, therefore, the people who were affected by it had no effective say, would consider that as not a very good introduction for someone handling the problem, such as is the case with the longshoremen, who were involved in this sort of thing before.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will be short. I did not intend to intervene, but when listening to the debate I noted the coming together of three sets of coincidences which made me feel that my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), has a very valid point in this question of privilege. If we were somewhere else we might describe this as a matter of contempt, because it does boil down to a contempt of this House. It is on this ground that I want to describe these three sets of coincidences.

There is in addition a fourth argument which I should like to touch upon briefly. It really strains my ability to accept the arguments advanced by the other side. I get the feeling when you take these three sets of circumstances together that there might be a fourth question, so to speak, which strains even further the credibility of the argument put forward. This may convince Your Honour that the case has been well founded.

The first set of coincidences relates to the dates. The order in council, PC 1978-3243, is dated October 26. The bill was introduced on November 2, about a week later. The order in council was gazetted a week later on November 8. Then the bill was adopted and referred to the committee. I believe the date of its reference was December 5. Those four dates, October 26, November 2, November 8 and December 5, with a debate in between, suggest there is a certain amount of haste on the part of the government.

The second circumstance or coincidence, and it would strain the imagination if it were not a coincidence, is that what we are doing here is adding a new paragraph after paragraph (g) namely, paragraph (h). That paragraph makes reference to the 20 hours a week and the less than 30 per cent of maximum weekly insurable earnings. They were not referred to in the previous section. There also appears a reference to the 20 hours and the 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings in the regulations. We must keep in mind that these regulations were published before the bill was introduced. They were approved in cabinet before the bill was presented to the House. It was presented to the House on November 2 and gazetted with these same terms on November 8. That is the second set of circumstances.

Having regard to the third set of circumstances, I noted with absolute amazement the number of times this committee met. It meets four times on Tuesdays and Thursdays. It met again this morning. There are very few committees that meet ten times in a week. I can account for nine of its meetings and there may have been another on Monday morning, which would make ten committee meetings in a week. What is the reason for all this urgency? We knew on December 8 through the order in council that the new regulations come into effect on the first day of next year. The bill, after being considered by the committee, will come back to the House for report stage and debate. Obviously the government wants to get this bill through the House by the end of this month in order to justify the date set out in the Canada Gazette regarding the regulations, and in order to justify or legitimize, so to speak, the order in council which was gazetted on November 8.

The fourth matter which is of a somewhat different nature, and perhaps not as grave as this pre-emption of the rights of parliament, relates to a press release. I came to Ottawa with the firm belief that this parliament had some meaningful role to play in legislation that would have a bearing on the lives of the Canadian people. When I found this sort of thing could be done through order in council rather than by legislation I became greatly disillusioned. I am very disillusioned by the performance of a government which acts in this way.

The date of this press release which I happened to come across the other day does not matter very much, but it is November 30. It was issued by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). It is to be noted that at the top left hand corner the department is noted as "Fisheries and Environment". The press release refers to fisheries and oceans, assistant deputy ministers appointed. The first sentence in the text is interesting. It states in part that "A major re-structuring of the emerging fisheries and oceans department" will come into effect on a certain date.

I rose to my feet during the question period, as did a lot of other people, to ask the minister if he was changing the name of his department. This government changes things by gazetting them before the existence of substantiating legislation. This government changes things by press release before there is any legislation, as in this case, changing the name of the department to the "Department of Fisheries and Oceans". To my way of thinking, this develops a brand new theory of legislative process. I can only describe it as legislation required to legitimize regulation. I am sure even Laski did not produce such a theory of government. The only place I know of where legislation follows the putting into place of regulation is one of the supreme councils of the people's democratic republic. I suggest this is the direction we are going.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated earlier, I will give this matter careful consideration over the weekend.

Before moving to orders of the day, there are two other questions of privilege of which I have received notice. The first is raised by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte).

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to rise on this question of privilege which concerns me personally and highly interests the 70,000 residents of the Champlain riding who feel rejected because their own member is helpless under the policy enforced by the Chair when it comes to my right to speak during general debates or during question period or on motions. Allow me to point out the essential issue which has given rise to a real question of privilege.

First, you will admit with me that this assembly is made up of 264 members enjoying equal rights and privileges. If some are ready to abdicate their own independence and freedom for the sake of a strict party line, allow me to do differently. During some ten years while I sat as a member of the Social Credit Party of Canada, I always kept my freedom of action. It is indeed the lack of democratic freedom and the irresponsibility of that party which have led me to resign from its ranks. I am not responsible to anyone except to the electors of the Champlain constituency of whom I am trying to be the worthy and proud representative.

Mr. Speaker, under what basic principles would you not recognize the spokesman for the riding of Champlain since he has been sitting as an independent? Under what rule is priority given to the eight members sitting immediately before me and to another one dragging a leg on my left? You will tell me that there has been tolerance. I will not accept that inadmissible tolerance when it goes against the interests of my constituents. I admit that it is difficult for Your Honour always to make a wise and fair choice of speakers in the debates on speeches from the throne and budgets. The same goes for motions under Standing Order 43 or the question period. However, I cannot tolerate without expressing my indignation being systematically eliminated from a reasonable participation in the heat of the action in this House.

● (1532)

As I already wrote you in previous correspondence, that is all the more revolting as the taxpayers of Champlain in particular, and the taxpayers of Quebec as a whole generally, were used to hearing me regularly defend their interests, denounce injustices and try to promote the profound aspirations of a large number of Quebeckers. Why silence that voice? Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not have the monopoly of expression from Quebec in this parliament but I think that all my colleagues will admit that I am the only one who openly wants a constitutional change through a restructuring of Canada that is closely related to the sovereignty-association option being advocated by the government of Quebec. Do you not think that is it good that at least from time to time all members of this House and consequently the whole people of this country should know that at least one member was not caught off guard by the election in Quebec on November 15, 1976? Is that not an excellent means of trying to harmonize different opinions and thus create a climate of sound objectivity with respect to the future of this country?

You may answer me from your chair with arguments like tradition or even regular attendance. I will answer beforehand that tradition should not supersede justice and that I am not interested in having the people of my riding see their member of parliament silent in the action. I will not warm up a seat in this place—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognized the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) to raise a question of privilege, and he understands very well that there is no question of privilege. The suggestion that he is systematically avoided in the selection of those who may rise in this House is completely false. The hon. member must realize, I am sure, that although he sits as an independent member, during proceedings for example he wanted to take part in the throne speech debate, a debate which is limited by our Standing Orders. Now the difficulty for the Speaker or Deputy Speaker, whatever the circumstances, is to recognize members according to the time allotted to different parties in this House, including independent members.

If I remember correctly, at least one of the independent members took part in the throne speech debate and another one took part recently in the budget debate. If it was not the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), this was certainly not the fault of the Chair. If the hon. member wants to suggest that the fact that the Chair recognized another independent member to take part in the budget debate violated his rights, I would like to point out that this is quite untrue. Second, it is against our rules and our traditions to suggest that the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker or one of the Acting Speakers have deliberately made their choice in violation of the rights of the hon. member or some other member. Of course, there can be certain limitations, even as concerns government members during question period, since each day I can recognize only one government member among seven, eight or ten who regularly seek to be recognized to ask a question. It is the same for opposition members. Since we must distribute the time of debate among members of the various political parties, the same problem exists for independent members. The Chair always tries to be fair when allocating the time available to the members of the House and it recognized one independent member during the budget debate and another one during the throne speech debate. If we went to the trouble of making an exact calculation, we would see that the Chair has been more than fair towards independent members. This is what has always been done in the past. On occasion, I try to recognize one or another of the independent members during question period. In view of the number of members from other parties in the House, I have the impression that the independent member is not only treated fairly, but most generously. I must now put an end to the contribution of the hon. member for Champlain because I am sure that he now realizes that this is not a question of privilege any more than a point of order. If he wants to discuss something privately with the Speaker, this can always be arranged. However, he does not have a question of privilege.

● (1542)

[English]

MR. GOODALE—INACCURATE REPORTING BY MEDIA OF MR. SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege at this particular hour with some hesitancy, as I think the House might understand given the events of the last two or three days. I rise both as a member of parliament who does not want to see the work of this House unduly delayed or interfered with on procedural matters, and also as a former journalist and news reporter who has a very high regard for those who are charged with what is a serious responsibility of reporting the news to the people of Canada.

The question of privilege which I put before you for consideration this afternoon arises from events in the House of the last two days relating to the issues raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). In particular I would refer to media reports today of those events which unfortunately serve to perpetuate two erroneous points. There has been an enormous amount of rhetoric on these issues in this House this week and some genuine disagreement with respect to the substance of the issues, but on the two particular points that I want to refer to this afternoon I do not believe there is any question of disagreement in the House as to the proper interpretation to be given to those points—no disagreement on this side, no disagreement with the Chair, and as far as I know no disagreement even from the opposition. Yet these two areas continue to be misreported or commented upon in the media in a fashion which clearly leaves a wrong public impression in a way I fear may affect privileges of members.

The two specific points are these: first, a misinterpretation of the meaning of your ruling on a prima facie case of privilege to be put to the House; second, the inference that an hon. member was deliberately misled by a minister or by the government.

To show the problem, Mr. Speaker, I would simply refer to one media report. There may well have been others, but I refer to one specifically which was carried by the CBC. It was a CBC news report on a program called "The World at Eight" carried across Canada this morning. I have a complete transcript of the newscast before me now. I will not take the time of the House to read it all, but the parts which I think are questionable I will refer to in due course. The second item on this program purported to report on the events in this House over the last two days. With reference to the first of the points I mentioned a moment ago, the CBC broadcast began with a headline at the beginning of that program claiming that for the last two days the House had been debating something called "ministerial privilege." I believe that is a concept which is totally unknown to constitutional lawyers or political scientists, and certainly not one that was before the House on Wednesday and Thursday of this week.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to restrict unduly the hon. member, but surely he does not expect me now to allow him to criticize the quality of broadcasts unless he has some specific point. Even yesterday when I was at pains to say that I was dismayed by the inaccuracy of reports, in my own decision I indicated even then that I did not think it had procedural significance. I simply put it on the record because I think we were all rather surprised by the misinterpretation. If the hon. member has a separate point from what I said yesterday and one that clearly relates to a question of privilege, it will have to be something more than a criticism of the quality of reporting.

Mr. Goodale: No, Mr. Speaker, I think I have a point that will meet the requirements that you have just made. If it does not, I would welcome your advice with respect to it. To get to the substance beyond the headline, the CBC said that it is—and I quote from the transcript:

—unusual for the House to overturn a decision of the Speaker.

Those were the words used on the program this morning. In its vote last night, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the House did no such thing, and that point is absolutely clear.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Now you are in breach of the Standing Orders.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I will give the hon. member an opportunity another time. Yesterday I said I would try to be careful not to draw conclusions respecting these things. We have to be very careful where we are dealing with areas of opinion. We have to be very careful in this House to make sure that we do not in any way even appear to interfere with journalists. As long as the matter is left in the area of opinion I do not think the matter should be touched by this House. In a situation in which there are factual inaccuracies, not differences of opinion, I think they should be addressed by the House. That is what I was attempting to do yesterday.

If the hon. member wants to raise this again, I will be glad to hear from him, but I think that matter has been dealt with rather thoroughly. But unless there is a clear factual transgression, which I am sure he would have mentioned by now, to get into differences of opinion as to whether or not the rarity of the House in deciding one way when the Chair has decided another is something I do not think we can launch upon on a question of privilege, particularly since we have just had two days of debate and a vote last night on the subject matter to which the hon. member addresses himself. Therefore with regret, I think I will have to go on to orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—GUIDELINES RESPECTING USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar) moved:

That this House, concerned by the threats to personal privacy posed by the Government's violation of its commitment to confine the use of the social insurance number to social security programs, accepts the recommendation of the Task Force on Privacy and Computers in 1972 that a single identifying number for individuals should not be adopted, directly or indirectly, without a full prior examination and public debate of its consequences, and calls upon the government to immediately introduce legislation establishing guidelines and limitations upon the use of the social insurance number or other identification numbers in order to protect Canadians against threats to personal privacy.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I was going to extemporize at some length today, but in view of the truncated nature of this debate I will follow my notes fairly closely so that I can put on the record some important and I think germane observations and recommendations with respect to this important issue.

In 1974, Senator Sam Ervin of North Carolina opened the United States Senate hearings on privacy legislation with these words:

Social Insurance Numbers

Privacy, like many of the other attributes of freedom, can be easiest appreciated when it no longer exists. A complacent citizenry only becomes outraged about its loss of integrity and individuality when the aggrandizement of power in the government becomes excessive. By then, it may be too late.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, as I rise today to speak on the need for public debate on a matter of great significance for personal privacy, namely, the use and extension of social insurance numbers, I cannot help but feel that the complacency does not lie so much with the citizenry but rather with the government and its unwillingness to engage the Canadian people in such a debate.

Traditionally, Mr. Speaker, the recourse for the citizen, if he felt abused or contraried, was parliament. As the scene of a continuing electoral battle, parliament was the privileged spot for debates on all major issues and trends. Furthermore, parliament guaranteed the citizen the opportunity to bring his grievances to the attention of the Crown. Indeed, one of the major precepts of parliamentary tradition states "grievance before supply".

In recent years, however, especially the administration in the Trudeau years, there has been a growing public awareness that the role of parliament has been downplayed. The attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the decorum of the House, both in his many linguistic profanities and in his opinions of members; the scandalous consideration of estimates; the increasing size of the Prime Minister's office; the lack of attention and abandonment of any attempt to revitalize the committee system; the refusal to introduce freedom of information laws, all these factors have tended to downplay the role of parliament.

It is no wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the ordinary citizen has little faith in seeing his grievances solved, or in hoping to stop trends which are disconcerting to him. In the case of social insurance numbers, this has been obvious.

● (1552)

The extension of SIN has occurred without parliamentary debate or a full examination of the merits and consequences. Despite government guarantees to limit the use of SIN, successive Liberal governments have forged ahead, surreptitiously but purposefully, to promote the extension of SIN within the government. This expansion within the federal government has been paralleled with increasing use of the SIN within provincial governments and in the private sector, partly due to its convenience and economy.

Yet parliament, the traditional scene for debate and examination, has never been seized with the issue. Liberal governments have refused to make the extension of SIN an issue to discuss. Part of the problem arises from the long reign of power by Liberal governments. The present government has become insensitive and complacent to the needs of the Canadian people. The government does not see the dangers or understand the issues involved with the extension of SIN.

The response of this government to our parliamentary inquiries on the use and extension of SIN has been typical of this government's insensitivity to real worries expressed by concerned citizens and by the opposition. I have some examples.

On October 27, 1978, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) what was the government's policy on the extension of social insurance numbers. She replied, and I quote:

Mr. Speaker, that question is very bizarre . . . It is quite in order that in the future social insurance numbers will be used more and more. More computers are being used in every department, whether provincial or federal.

Obviously, only a minister totally unaware of the ordinary citizen's concern could qualify such a question as bizarre. Furthermore, like many Canadians, I do not recall authorizing the government to expand the use of social insurance numbers.

On November 2, 1978, in response to a question from the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) replied:

—a program can be better administered as a result of using numbers, whether it is for income tax, bank accounts or whatever. I indicated in my answer that as far as the use of SIN numbers is concerned, we do not encourage their use outside the federal government.

While admitting the dangers of extended use, he did not feel it necessary to limit the use of social insurance numbers in the federal government.

On November 3, 1978, when it was pointed out to the Minister of Employment and Immigration by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) that SIN was used beyond the three fields to which parliament has given legislative authority and was used by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) in connection with firearms acquisition, the minister did not deny it.

On the same day, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) raised a question of privilege. He contended that, by forcing Canadians to present social insurance numbers in order to cash their savings bonds, a form of intimidation was being used to force Canadians to get a SIN number. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) answered that Canadians had ample warning by means of a press release dated June 2, 1977. This government, Mr. Speaker, acts so smugly that it presumes that its press releases supersede the importance of parliamentary debate.

Furthermore, on October 31, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) introduced a private member's bill to remove the necessity of presenting a social insurance number in order to cash Canada Savings Bonds. Once again, the government's attitude reflected its smug insensitivity. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance summed up the government's feeling on the subject as follows:

We are living in a computer age whether we like it or not . . . Everybody works by means of identification of accounts through a number system. This is simply done to ease administration, to facilitate the handling of thousands and thousands of accounts, and to simply make things easier in terms of administration of many thousands of documents.

For this government, accustomed to the bureaucratic routine and insulated from the concerns of individuals, the issue is seen solely in terms of administrative convenience. They do not understand Canadians' worries and misgivings about the extension of the social insurance number. It is not surprising that they have treated this issue so cavalierly. It is no wonder they refuse to have a debate on this issue.

In light of the government's obvious insensitivity to the issue, and aware that the extension of SIN troubles many Canadians, my colleagues and I have decided to use this allotted day to move a motion which will allow parliamentary debate on the use of social insurance numbers and to force the government to introduce guidelines to limit their use.

What are the uses of SIN? My first area of concern touches the extension in the use of the social insurance number. Without any fanfare, without great fuss, without even a word of debate, the social insurance number has evolved secretly and slowly into a de facto national identification card. Its use has progressed slowly but surely in both the public sector and the private sector. Let us look at some of the present day uses of social insurance numbers. Let us draw some attention finally to this innocuous number that has begun to pervade our lives and insinuate itself into all aspects of our existence.

In 1964, the social insurance number saw the light of day. Created for the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan, the number was to be limited to social security programs. Members of parliament who enacted the law thought they were merely providing a means to administer a new program. Any suspicions of other uses for the card, any suspicions that the card would become a national ID, were allayed by the repeated assurances of the then prime minister and his colleagues who claimed insistently that the numbers would not become national identity cards.

Fifteen years later, how do these guarantees stand up to reality? Is the social insurance number still limited to social security programs? Let us see.

In the federal government, the social insurance number has become a key registration and administrative number for numerous programs and various departments. It is used for unemployment insurance programs; for taxpayer identification; for identification of all federal employees; for registration of all purchasers of Canada Savings Bonds; for the military number of all Canadian Forces personnel; for gun registration with the Solicitor General; for permits to hunt in certain areas of Quebec. In addition, it is used as a prime identifier in computer banks in different agencies, varying from use in the computers of the external affairs department to its utilization in the computers of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation.

Not only is the social insurance number pervasive in the workings of the federal government, but provincial governments have adopted the social insurance number as one of their own. For example, the school systems of Saskatchewan and Ontario use social insurance numbers for record keeping for students in senior grades. Motor vehicle drivers' records in Quebec and hunting licences in Manitoba are recorded by social insurance numbers. Recently, Mr. Speaker, the federal government and the P.E.I. government reached an agreement to register all newborn babies in that province.

As hon. members can see, the social insurance number has become, without parliamentary authority or approval, an identification card within the government and, if I may say so, within the different levels of government. The assurances of successive Liberal ministers have been as hollow as much of their thinking on policy.

But the use of the social insurance number does not stop at the government. In recent years, a new phenomenon can be easily detected. The social insurance number has become more commonly used in the private sector. Youngsters playing peewee hockey are asked for social insurance numbers for the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association computer. A Winnipeg ballet school uses social insurance numbers. Banks are asking companies to provide social insurance numbers before they will process payrolls of the companies. Grocery stores, insurance companies, and other private institutions are demanding social insurance numbers as a proof of identification.

As shown by the above enumeration of activities and organizations using social insurance numbers, it is clearly evident that social insurance numbers have gained the status of a de facto identification card. The question Canadians are asking themselves is the following: "When did the Canadian people decide to adopt a national identification number?" The answer, Mr. Speaker, is never. There has never been a debate in the House about the desirability of or the necessity for such a system. In fact, Mr. Speaker, this system has been implemented contrary to the assurances given to the Canadian people by the government.

I want to turn now to government promises that have been broken. The extension of the use of the social insurance number and its attainment of the status of national identification has been done surreptitiously and without the consent of the Canadian people. What is interesting, Mr. Speaker, is to examine the replies of different cabinet ministers throughout the years and then match their statements with the facts. Let us start with the numberous assurances given by the government. In a written question on March 9, 1964, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orikow) asked the minister of national health and welfare:

Has the registration proposed for all Canadians been considered solely for social security purposes—

The minister answered:

It has been developed solely in connection with social security programs.

● (1602)

The right hon. member for Prince Albert was pressing the then minister of national health and welfare, presently the government House leader, on the future uses of the social insurance number. He wanted to know if the social insurance number data would be passed on from the Department of Labour to other departments and government agencies. The right hon. member suggested that social insurance numbers would be used in the future for "income tax and so on". The then prime minister interjected and said "certainly not".

This "certainly not" by the then prime minister is obviously a candidate in the "Hall of Fame of Famous Last Words, along with the assurances of the present Prime Minister that "Separatism is dead" or "We have wrestled inflation to the ground".

A third example of the hollowness of the government's promises arose from an exchange between the then hon. member for Middlesex West and the minister of labour, incidentally the present government House leader, in June 1965. The member asked whether the minister's description of these cards as general purpose cards will extend for numbering purposes to the military services. The minister replied "No, Mr. Speaker".

Canadians have seen instance after instance of the government breaking its word. Little by little, the social insurance number has become more prevalent in our society. This movement has not stopped. In 1977 the cabinet passed an order in council which permitted the then minister of national revenue "to cause a social insurance number to be issued to any individual who has not earlier been assigned such a number". A similar regulation in the same year gave the Minister of National Health and Welfare the same authority.

Perhaps the final indication of the government's intentions can be glimpsed at in the testimony of Bernard Dertinger, executive director of national systems for the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission before the McDonald commission in June of this year. He said the commission had discussed with the provinces the possibility of registration of all Canadians at birth by social insurance numbers and "there was substantial agreement at the official level".

The major objection of the Conservative party to the unbridled extension of the social insurance number and its not so subtle adoption as a national identification card remains the following. On an issue so paramount to the privacy of the individual and to the future development of our society, the Canadian people should have the opportunity to debate fully the advantages and disadvantages of a national citizen identification system.

Successive Liberal governments have condoned and encouraged the expansion of the social insurance number. The review of the federal activities described previously, which do not by any means constitute an exhaustive list, makes it clear that the federal government itself has been in the forefront of extending the use of the social insurance number. All these actions have actively promoted the tendency in society to depend more and more on the social insurance number as an identifier—of workers, taxpayers, automobile drivers, students, welfare beneficiaries, civil servants, servicemen, veterans, pensioners, and The Lion Club's band in my constituency. Few people have flatly proposed a national identification card. But successive Liberal governments have made decisions which, taken collectively, are leading us to the establishment of a national identification card.

Imperviously insensitive to the concerns of the individual citizen, blinded by their long sojourn in the corridors of power, the Liberal party has placed efficiency in administration above the protection of personal liberties. Despite general public disapproval, the party has forged ahead unilaterally to give Canadians a single identifying number, mainly in the name of administrative convenience. More seriously, Mr. Speaker, I honestly doubt if the Liberal party yet understands our concerns and citizen's concerns about the dangers inherent in the implementation of a single identifying number system. In their view, what's good for the functioning of the bureaucracy is good for Canada. Citizens move aside; personal rights abandoned; right of privacy banished.

Since the Liberal government visibly has no understanding of why concerned citizens are questioning the extension of a social insurance number, I will now explain our misgivings about such a system. First of all, Mr. Speaker, from a psychological point of view I have serious doubts about the applicability of a single identifying number system to Canada. In North America, Canadians and Americans have historically placed a great deal of value on privacy. To Canadians, the idea of a single number that would identify them "from cradle to grave" is distasteful in itself, regardless of how that number might be used and regardless of safeguards society might enact to protect the rights of privacy.

Many Canadians having fled their homelands in Europe retain bad memories about national identification cards and numbers. A Canadian travelling in continental Europe often sees his European host obliged to carry a national identification card which he must present on demand. Few Canadians envy this system. Once identifiable to the administrator in government or business by an exclusive number, such as a social insurance number, the citizen risks being identified exclusively in those terms. Few Canadians want such a system.

This is not my most serious misgiving about the extension of the social insurance number however. My real worry arises from the very real possibility that use of a single identifying number, such as SIN, in more and more computer files makes it easier and cheaper for organizations to exchange data among themselves and to merge records from files of different agencies, departments and organizations into central databanks. There arises the ultimate possibility that a person with access to the databanks will be able to compile a complete dossier on any individual covering everything from childhood illnesses, school records, psychiatric examinations, consumer habits, political activities, personal beliefs and employment record. The individual stripped of all privacy will be at the mercy of the data manipulator.

Many people argue that if one has done nothing wrong, what does he have to worry about? They do not view such a system as threatening. The only people who will have to worry, according to them, are the criminals with something to hide. Is this, in fact, true? Will the ordinary hardworking citizen have nothing to worry about? Will he not suffer any inconveniences or threats to his rights? I would argue that people who hold this view seriously underestimate the dangers of the system.

First of all, such a system poses serious problems in a political sense. Simply put, knowledge is power. An individual who has access to information on another person can use it to extort or extract some desired action. A government which has an all-dominating presence can manipulate its citizens.

Perhaps it should come as no surprise that a Russian can best suggest the words to describe a society in which all computers are interlinked and an all-knowing government dominates its citizens. In his book, Cancer Ward, Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, the Russian Nobel Prize winner writes:

> As every man goes through life he fills in a number of forms for the record, each containing a number of questions . . . There are thus hundreds of little threads radiating from every man, millions of threads in all.
>
> If these threads were suddenly to become visible, the whole sky would look like a spider's web, and, if they materialized as rubber, buses, trams and even people would all lose the ability to move, and the wind would be unable to carry torn-up newspaper or autumn leaves along the streets of the city. They are not visible, they are not material, but every man is constantly aware of their existence . . . Each man, permanently aware of his own invisible threads, materially develops a respect for people who manipulate the threads.

Mr. Solzhenitsyn describes accurately the dilemma of modern man in our societies. Each time we give up a bit of information about ourselves to the government, we give up some of our freedom. For the more the government or any institution knows about us, the more power it has over us. When the government knows all of our secrets, we stand naked before official power. Stripped of our privacy, we lose our rights and privileges.

● (1612)

I suggest that these are not merely abstract musings but a serious concern about the future of modern society. A single identifying number such as a social insurance number would give individuals untold opportunities to interconnect various computer terminals, each one possessing different bits of information about us.

In conclusion, I hope the government will take into account some of the solutions I recommend. In Canada, for the sake of individual privacy something must be done about the uncontrolled expansion of the use of social insurance numbers. Instead of encouraging surreptitiously the evolution of the social insurance number to the status of the exclusive identifier of individuals, the government should take heed of the advice of its own task force on computers and privacy. Its authors, including the present under-secretary of state for external affairs, Mr. Gotlieb, stated, and I quote:

> It is possible that a de facto personal identification number will develop in Canada, either through an ever-widening use of the social insurance number (despite its limitations) or indirectly through credit card and bank account numbers. However, it is important to ensure that a single identifying number should not be adopted in Canada directly or indirectly, without a full examination and public debate on its merits and consequences.

The government should introduce legislation regarding the social insurance number to prevent further extension and to place constraints on its use.

I put forward several suggestions to the minister, who is in the House today, which might govern the use of social insurance numbers in Canada. The use of social insurance numbers should be governed by the following principles. First, the uses of social insurance numbers should be limited to those necessary for carrying out requirements imposed by the federal government.

Second, federal agencies and departments should not require or promote the use of social insurance numbers except to the extent that they have a specific legislative mandate from parliament.

Third, parliament should be sparing in imposing mandatory use of a social insurance number and should impose it only after full and careful consideration preceded by well advertised hearings which elicit substantial public participation. Such consideration should weigh carefully the pros and cons of any proposed use and should pay particular attention to whether effective safeguards have been applied.

Fourth, when social insurance numbers are used in instances which do not conform to the three foregoing principles, no individual should be coerced into providing his social insurance number; nor should his social insurance number be used without consent.

Fifth, an individual should be fully and fairly informed of his rights and responsibilities relative to uses of social insurance numbers, including the right to disclose his social insurance number when he deems it to be in his interest to do so.

These are principles laid down by a comparative study of the social security number in the United States. We can take some direction from these principles, and I recommend them very strongly to the minister.

Having regard to these principles, I suggest that the minister make specific recommendations based upon them. Such recommendations would include the following. First, individuals should have the right to refuse to disclose their social insurance numbers to any organization which does not have specific authority provided by federal statute. Individuals should have recourse to the courts if this right is denied.

Second, any future legislation dealing with social insurance numbers should be preceded by full and careful consideration and well advertised hearings which elicit public participation.

Third, in order to prevent the social insurance number from becoming an employee identification number, a patient identification number, a student identification number, a customer identification number or the primary organizing element in any non-federal organization, any organization or person should be unable to use the social insurance number of an individual unless the individual gives his informed consent.

Fourth, legislation should prohibit the use of social insurance numbers for promotional or commercial purposes.

I think these principles and recommendations which I have set out should be adopted by the government and should form the basic guidelines for Canadian legislation. Like many Canadians, I feel that the expansion of the social insurance number and its evolution toward a single identifying number are not beneficial to the protection of privacy. Further examination and public debate are required. In the meantime, some concrete steps by the government are called for in order that Canadians will not be presented with a fait accompli.

Social Insurance Numbers

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us about your SIN!

Mr. Cullen: As a United Church minister the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) must be all shook up to be hearing about SIN on a Friday!

I welcome this debate, but I have one regret. Time does not permit us to explore this matter in depth. The concern raised by hon. members opposite is a concern we all feel. I am sorry that both yesterday and today there were questions of privilege and that we have not had more time. I believe the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) would have made some telling points. I may not have agreed with him, but I always enjoy listening to what he has to say.

At first blush any mention of invasion of privacy raises grave issues for most Canadians. The problem is that the very term "invasion of privacy" is somewhat like waving the proverbial red flag in front of a bull. All of a sudden the issue becomes a cause célèbre. Many are concerned about the issue, but many may not see it or completely understand it in the context in which it is occurring.

I do not intend to go on for very long today. I know that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) wishes to speak. I expect to be 15 to 20 minutes at the most.

I propose that we rationally examine the protection for Canadians already existing in legislation. There are definite limits to the information which can be passed on by the government about an individual. Unless the individual authorizes it, one's social insurance number and the contents of his social insurance file cannot be disclosed to a third party. The only exceptions, in most cases, are those who administer the Canada Pension Plan, the Quebec Pension Plan and the Income Tax Act. The government's policy is, in fact, very restrictive about the disclosure of information contained in the social insurance number registry.

It is important to realize what kind of information the central index, which is, after all, the social insurance registry, can actually collect. Sections 125 and 126 of the Unemployment Insurance Act legally restrict this. The central index can request only the type of information that is necessary to identify an individual accurately. Strictly personal information such as a person's race, religion, political affiliations, community activities, financial status, extended family affiliations and employment record cannot be solicited.

As I am sure the House is aware, section 52(2) of the Canadian Human Rights Act of 1977 provides, and I quote:

> Every individual is entitled to be consulted and must consent before personal information concerning that individual that was provided by that individual to a government institution for a particular purpose is used or made available for use for any non-derivative use for an administrative purpose unless that information for that non-derivative use is authorized or pursuant to law.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister decides what a non-derivative use is.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Mr. Cullen: We introduced that legislation. It was the first legislation introduced on the subject. I think it warrants some checking out. It warrants looking into the administrative value of all the information that could be made available. I think this is being done on an ongoing basis, and I think we have a good piece of legislation. In all probability improvements could be made, and I am sure that in the future they will be.

The government is bound by the prohibition in the act to which I referred. There can be no linkage without the consent of the individual. The sole exception to this arises when linkage is expressly permitted by law. For example, the exchange of data in the social insurance number registers is permitted between the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Department of National Revenue, Taxation. As has been stated, these linkages are necessary to the smooth functioning of the government's administration. This is dealt with in the legislation which was passed by parliament.

The issue of the use of the social insurance number to link bases outside the federal government has also been raised. As we all know, the individual has the right to decide whether or not to give his or her social insurance number to, for example, department stores and other places of business. It is true that a person's unwillingness to give this information may lead to a refusal on the part of the business concerned to do business with him or her.

An individual's right to disclose his or her own social insurance number is what permits the creation of data banks which use the social insurance number in the private sector. Modern computer technology allows for this linkage. It should be pointed out that this kind of linkage, given the heights to which modern computer technology has risen, would be possible using an individual's name, even if the social insurance number did not exist. I will concede that the SIN makes it easier. But if we did not have SIN, the computer could now make the linkage anyhow. We do not use the technology in the federal government which could link people by their names.

● (1622)

For the government to attempt to regulate the private sector on the use of SIN in their storage files would be a difficult operation. Every employer who has a computerized payroll system finds it a legal necessity to keep employees' SINs as part of this record. This is necessary for income tax purposes. It is easy to see how the use of SIN would grow for other record keeping purposes—for example, in logging in an inventory of tools or office supplies charged out to an employee. An attempt by the government to introduce controls in the private sector—controls which would certainly be viewed as intrusive—would have to be made only after very careful study as to their restrictiveness and, indeed, the probability of their effectiveness. Just imagine, if you will, Mr. Speaker, the spectre of an army of investigators probing into every computerized payroll system in the private sector to be sure employers are not using their computers for anything but government approved purposes.

We have the technology and it is growing every day. The question is how to use that technology intelligently and with due regard to people's right to privacy. This is a question under study by the government on an ongoing basis. But to jump in without proper study and thought would cause hardship to employers and workers in business concerns of every size, to say nothing of the millions of Canadians who found the SIN a convenient and commonly accepted way to identify themselves in business transactions of every type.

The concern voiced in both private and public sectors about the growth in volume and complexity of information and data processing systems has been heard by the government. People speak about the threat to individual control of our lives. Again, I must turn members' attention to the many acts of parliament limiting the use of personal information filed under the social insurance number. The SIN registry, as I stated, collects information solely to establish the identity of a person so that he or she can obtain a social insurance number. That has to be done; I do not think anyone will argue with that. Any personal information about a person is not available through the SIN registry. The SIN is as confidential as its holder chooses to make it. Many people do not seem to attach great importance to this confidentiality, since the SIN has been used as the basis for newspaper lotteries. So far as the government is concerned, the privacy and anonymity of the SIN are protected in the same way as bank accounts are protected. This is a time honoured tradition in Canada. The government is committed to upholding this tradition and to protecting this public interest.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that identifying systems seem to threaten basic human freedoms. Yet it must be recognized that, in many countries today, a number like SIN is used for a universal identifier. The record keeping systems of many European institutions are linked by the use of such individual identity numbers. These countries have successfully reduced the potential of this threat by parallel development of strict rules that give the individual control over the nature of the information recorded and the uses to which it can be put.

Canada is no different, Mr. Speaker. Although the SIN system is hardly a universal numbering system in the same sense, we do, nevertheless, have a Human Rights Act already in place to prevent abuses of information government now collects from people. The privacy laws give individuals the right to correct information on file and to appeal any abuses of their privacy to a privacy commissioner.

As we are all aware, the Canadian government, in June 1974, was party to a summary statement issued by a conference of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, OECD. The conference discussed policy issues on data protection and privacy. It underlined consulting public opinion as the basis of any major shift in information gathering and filing systems.

I believe that the government and the public will continue to be guided by the spirit of the following extract from the OECD's summary statement:

> The right of public or private institutions to acquire personal data is not absolute; at some point, the need to gather information must give way to the right of the individual to maintain privacy.

But let me add here, Mr. Speaker, that we must proceed with caution.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to commend the minister for the statement which he just made which seems to me to be a useful statement of principle. But it is unfortunate that, when one examines the record of the use of the number and its institution by the government, one finds that it does not square with that statement of principle. As to the statement of principle that the right to obtain information is limited, it seems to me that the use of SIN, which has grown, has clearly eroded the right to privacy which people who live in this country expect.

Sometimes when we engage in these kinds of debates we feel a little like King Canute trying to stop the tides from coming in, because the trend toward reducing the right to privacy is overwhelming, not merely in the case of government but in terms of the use of identification numbers by private industry. There is a parallel risk. I know the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) touched on that, but he touched on it very lightly. We tend in this place to emphasize always the bureaucracy and the great risk that big government runs in terms of obtaining access to what is normally private information and abusing it. In fact, the potential for abuse of private information by the private sector is just as serious as in terms of the public sector.

I think I should like to address a few remarks to that kind of risk. Consider the use of information such as, for example, that contained in an income tax return. Remember that the use of SIN is absolutely key to the operation of the income tax department in terms of programming purchasers, of finding a category in the public which is susceptible to buying insurance or buying motor vehicles or buying products for which they have no particular need. So here lies the danger.

I agree completely with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar that we need a guideline, an addition to the privacy laws of this country to set forth the right of the citizen to privacy. We cannot just look at it in terms of the potential for a draconian, totalitarian kind of society on the part of the bureaucracy. We also have to look at the increasing size of multinational corporations and the increasing sophistication of those organizations in the way they can use that private information also to erode freedom of choice and the right to privacy of citizens.

I am pleased to see that the NDP was, as usual, in the forefront in trying to protect the liberties of the subject when this system was initiated some time ago. On March 9, 1964, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) asked this question:

> Has the registration proposed for all Canadians been considered solely for social security purposes, or is it tied up in any way with the emergency measues organization and compulsory military service?

He asked also:

> Will this information be provided to other government departments and particularly the RCMP?

That question was answered as follows:

The proposed registration of all Canadians has no connection with the current planning activities of the emergency measures organization. It has been develped solely in connection with social security programs.

We know what happened subsequently with regard to the records of the income tax department and the access that the RCMP subsequently had to that information as a direct result of an agreement between two departments. That is a record the government should have touched on, and I expect that perhaps the minister might have mentioned what occurred with regard to that. I know he certainly was opposed to that and I think he made statements in the House and was somewhat active in trying to end that kind of arrangement. But what a violation it is of the undertakings that were given to the House when we commenced use of the SIN. The risk comes in the slow erosion of liberty in very small steps. Once liberty is taken away, it does not return because the public begins to accept the loss of that privacy as the norm, and therefore there is no great public pressure upon the legislature to restore traditional rights of privacy.

● (1632)

Not only was the number to be limited to social security. On April 8, 1964, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to the social insurance number and suggested that it would be used for many things. He said, "Oh; income tax, and so on?" That was the question he put to the honourable Lester Pearson at that time. The answer which Mr. Pearson gave was an emphatic "Certainly not". We know the number went on to be used regarding income tax.

As the use of that number increases and as our technology increases, we wind up with a capacity to compile all that information and put it in a data bank. Then it becomes very lucrative information. The trend exists already in terms of motor vehicle records. Provincial governments now sell their motor vehicle records. It is a nice revenue producer. The result is that private industry knows who owns motor vehicles, what kind of motor vehicles they are, and therefore they are able to use their subliminal advertising to reach their target groups through mailing. Suddenly the sales resistance one should have, if one has the information and is acting independently, is taken away. That is an erosion of freedom.

I would not doubt that the Conservative party's excellent campaign of fund raising, in which letters were sent across the country, has a computer somewhere in the background attempting to find voters who will be susceptible to sending the party some money in a moment of weakness. Also that is an erosion of freedom. It is an erosion of the right to make independent decisions.

It is interesting to look at the actual horror stories regarding SIN. I should like to refer to the excellent study on privacy and computers which was conducted in 1972. At page 88 it reads:

It is interesting to note that until 1967 all Eskimos in the Yukon and Northwest Territories were identified by numbers imprinted on tags worn around the neck. Not surprisingly the Eskimos objected to the system and, in preparation for its abandonment, during the four years from 1967 to 1971 the Eskimos selected their own surnames which are now used in lieu of numbers.

Can one imagine a law which requires native Eskimos to wear numbers around their necks? Of course that law has been changed; but it would not be changed if people did not stand up in the House like King Canute because of these trends and tendencies to register some objection to the continuing erosion of freedom and privacy in both the public and private sectors of Canada.

This motion is a very positive one in a special way. It suggests the introduction of legislation establishing guidelines and limitations upon the use of social insurance numbers. I should like to suggest how we can look at privacy legislation with a view to improving the right to privacy and limiting the use of that number. I see no reason why the police forces of Canada should not be required to appear before a judge in order to show cause as to why they need access to this particular information. This procedure should be on warrant.

I believe the same should also be required of other government agencies. They should not be allowed, as a right, to peer into a person's background for some bureaucratic reason, even if it is more efficient and a method of saving money. All other government agencies, except those directly dealing with social insurance numbers, should be forbidden access to SIN-related information on the ground that it is confidential.

The original law respecting SIN said nothing about private organizations demanding social insurance numbers from clients, customers or members. When someone wants to cash a cheque and the person behind the counter says, "We require your social insurance number", there should be some law protecting that person from providing the massive amount of information backed up by SIN. Perhaps we could forbid private organizations from demanding SIN.

It is worth considering denying the Department of National Revenue the right to use SIN. The use of SIN by the Department of National Revenue perhaps has been the most dangerous invasion of privacy which man has seen in this century. That department's use of SIN does not merely provide snippets of information. It provides almost everything there is to know about an individual. I am not afraid of making any level of bureaucracy work a little harder. Perhaps it will not be as efficient, but the advantages in terms of privacy would be very substantial. The advantages of denying SIN to the Department of National Revenue would put that department where it belongs, completely separate and not working in co-operation with any other department of the government. It would eliminate this nonsensical agreement between the Department of National Revenue and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police providing information and a method of cross-checking. I believe my suggestions would be of some benefit regarding the use of SIN.

Another area to which serious consideration should be given is the amazing clout an employer has over an employee if the employer has access to social insurance numbers and is able to tune in to the background information. In the circumstance where the employer has access to confidential information, such as something in the employee's background which would suggest that he was not a respectable citizen at one point, the capacity of the employee to maintain his job is limited. It could result in his demotion, firing or have various adverse effects. We require a law which substantially restricts access to social insurance numbers.

Since other hon. members wish to participate in this debate, in conclusion I should like to refer to the report on privacy and computers at page 86, where an amorphous fear of the loss of privacy as a result of various identification numbers is mentioned. It reads:

> Accompanying this fear is a suspicion that bureaucrats confronted by numbers will tend to forget that they represent real people. The suspicion is fed by haunting memories of the Nazi system of numbering Jews in the 1930's and 1940's. The survey of Canadians by the Department of Communications revealed that 62 per cent fear that computers "will reduce us to numbers".
>
> Fear of the cataclysm is simply the concern that, should an autocratic regime come into power, single identifying numbers would be used to assist in the compilation of investigatory dossiers which would be used as instruments of oppression. Proponents of SIN point out that the lack of comprehensive dossiers has in the past had no obvious inhibiting effect on autocrats.

Society continues to grow larger and become more complicated. The public and private organizations which dominate our lives continue to become more autocratic and less democratic. They continue to exert a power which we cannot restrict unless we are forever vigilant. I am referring to the power of the computer, the power of technology, and the power of having control over the lives of Canadians as a result of new scientific advances. Unless we express dismay over a society in which individuals have no control, then we do not do a service to our constituents.

● (1642)

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start my participation in this debate by congratulating my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), for proposing this motion today. Surely there can be no more important issue to come before parliament than the need for parliament to act when we find that mechanisms are being put in place, either by design or through complacency, which can strip away the individual privacy of our constituents and ourselves.

Like most members of parliament, I was not aware of the threat that was posed by these tiny white pieces of plastic that virtually every Canadian has today. Some 19 million or 20 million social insurance numbers have been issued. I was not aware of the implications of the problems caused by the social insurance number until I had a call about a year ago from a constituent of mine who was calling to ask what she could do because her nine-year old son had lost his social insurance card and he did not know what to do. I said: "This is outlandish. What would your nine-year old son want with a social insurance card? Why would they number him when surely he is not in the labour force and will not file an income tax return? It hardly seems reasonable to expect that he is required to have a social insurance number." Then my constituent told me that the minor hockey league in which her nine-year old son was enrolled required that every member of the team take out social insurance numbers. Here was a child eight years old who had been issued with a plastic card and told to carry it around. He had been told that was necessary if he was going to play hockey in his part of the league. He had to accept this government number. Then we were surprised a year later to learn that a nine-year old child had lost his social insurance number.

What an outrageous situation it is in Canada when we find that already in one of the provinces, Prince Edward Island, every citizen from birth is automatically issued a social insurance number. We have reached the point where this numbering with a single identification number is beginning to take place from the cradle to the grave.

Every member of parliament has in his constituency people who have bought Canada Savings Bonds for their children. We are finding now that if those people clip the coupons to take out the interest on their Canada Savings Bonds for their children, they are required to take out social insurance numbers for those children, who maybe are two or three years old, unless they want to have 25 per cent of the interest withheld until tax time. What sort of an outrage is this?

What sort of an outrage is it when senior citizens who have lived for 80 or 90 years without ever requiring a social insurance number now find, if they are going to be allowed to cash their coupons and their Canada Savings Bonds, that the government is requiring that they have social insurance numbers, unless they are prepared to leave behind 25 per cent of the value of that interest? I feel that the government is guilty of a breach of faith in its handling of the Canada Savings Bonds issue. Surely the government had a responsibility, if it had the intention of requiring that Canadians have social insurance numbers to cash coupons, unless they wanted to leave 25 per cent behind, to tell Canadians at the time they sold them the bonds that this requirement would be put upon them. Instead, after the contract was made the government changed the rules, just last year.

Let us take a look at the scope in which the social insurance number is used in the government and in the private sector. An article in the December 19 issue of the Globe and Mail dealt with this question of the proliferation in the use of the social insurance number. Here are a couple of paragraphs from it:

> SINs now are used as identification to cash cheques and make credit checks in department stores. Libraries, banks, insurance companies and hospitals use SINs. Canadians must provide SINs to cash government savings bonds. SINs are a must on income tax returns.
>
> Youngsters playing peewee hockey are asked for SINs for the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association computer. A Winnipeg ballet school uses SINs. By special agreement with the federal government, the Prince Edward Island registrar of vital statistics applies for and receives social insurance numbers for all newborn babies in that province.
>
> The federal government singles out and keeps track of foreign workers who require work permits by giving them special SINs beginning with the number 9. Employers can be fined up to $5,000, if they hire a 9-numbered person who doesn't have a work permit.
>
> In Ontario, 25 of the 44 public health units filed the immunization records of school children by SIN. The school systems of Saskatchewan and Ontario use SINs for record-keeping for students in senior grades. Motor vehicle drivers' records in Quebec and hunting licences in Manitoba are recorded by SIN.

What we have seen happen is that a program that was justified by this government on the basis that its use would be limited, and strictly limited to specific instances stated by the government, has been broadly expanded so it is used widely within the federal government, other levels of government and within the private sector. What we are finding is that without a conscious policy decision being made, without debate taking place within parliament to decide to issue social insurance numbers to all citizens, we are backing into the system through the back door and citizens are being forced of necessity to take these numbers out—not by statute but by circumstance.

What more scathing condemnation could there be of the irrelevance of parliament, or of the lack of direction being given by government, than to find that that sort of decision and that sort of circumstance takes place not by design but by accident, and by indifference on the part of the government?

When the minister spoke a few moments ago he stressed the fact that within the central index registry of social insurance numbers the sort of personal information that is included is very limited. Of course, that is correct within the central index; but what the minister did not mention was the scope of government data gathering activities in which dossiers are assembled on individual citizens which reach into every aspect of their private lives.

I think it would be useful to share with the House something of the scope of government data gathering. In 1974 I put two questions on the order paper asking what sort of computerized data banks were in existence at the time. This information is dated at this time, but I think it is useful to take a look at the answers I received.

First of all, all government employees have files kept on them, most of which are computerized. Some departments made provision for their employees to see the files; others at that time did not. The Department of National Revenue reported that a record is maintained for each individual required by law to file a T1 return. At the present time records are maintained for approximately 12.8 million employees. There are some 250,000 corporation tax returns and some 770,000 employers who are making payroll deductions from employees.

The Ministry of Transport has a computerized data bank for some 75,000 pilot licence holders.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has a computer data bank of families and children entitled to family allowances, including parents and children up to 19 years of age. There are some 3.5 million families and some 7 million children who have personal files in that data bank. There are some 1.8 million recipients of old age pensions and some 1.1 million recipients of guaranteed income supplement recorded in the computerized data bank. The department also holds files on some 10.3 million contributors to the Canada Pension Plan.

The Department of External Affairs also has a new data bank which was established in 1974, in which at that time it had only 600,000 names, but it was planned to include some 3.5 million people by its fifth year. Also, some 30,000 people whose passports are being processed at any one time and some 20,000 people who are not to be issued passports or whose passports have been reported lost or found, are recorded in the data bank.

The Canadian Wheat Board keeps computerized files for some 240,000 producers whose names appear on Wheat Board delivery permits.

The names of some 43,000 children of up to one year of age born with birth defects in New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia since 1967 are also recorded, as is the following information: hospital number, the serial number, the name, the date of birth, the sex, the birth weight, the gestation period, the place of admission or death, the residence code, the place of residence and the types of abnormalities.

Obviously this sort of information which is being kept by the government on individual citizens and their private lives is expanded day by day. The government has finally published a list of some 1,500 data banks in which personal information is held on individual citizens by the federal government. It is not required that in this catalogue the government reveal whether or not the information that is included in the personal file of an individual includes the social insurance number. It is not required either that they indicate to the public whether the number can be used as an access number to give a person access to a computerized file. We know that in many of the instances reported in the book, if an individual even wants to see his own file he is required by the government to first supply a social insurance number.

● (1652)

Last year I put a question on the order paper asking for a complete listing of government data banks, including personally identifiable information about individuals in which the social insurance number may be used to gain access to the computerized file. I asked about the nature of the information, the number of individuals who were on file, and about what other ways, beyond using the social insurance number, that the file could be accessed. The response I received was that the government did not have that information and that perhaps they would be able to provide it by the fall. That information was not included in this index of data banks.

At this point no one in Canada knows the extent to which the social insurance number is used within government as a computerized file. The minister stressed in his comments that we have privacy legislation in this country as well as a Human Rights Commissioner. It is worth noticing, however, that some of the most scathing condemnations of the government have come from the Human Rights Commissioner, Mr. Gordon Fairweather.

Mr. Maine: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because of the short length of time available for debate this afternoon and the number of members wishing to speak, I wonder if the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) would be kind and generous enough to keep his comments short so that as many members as possible may speak this afternoon.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I will stay within the time limit allowed me.

The Toronto Star of September 24, 1978, refers to the Human Rights Commissioner in an article headlined "I am Appalled." The Canadian Press story from Ottawa begins as follows:

Parliament will be asked to deal with alleged misuse of social insurance numbers, says Human Rights Commissioner Gordon Fairweather.

The government's own Human Rights Commissioner has indicated that he is totally dissatisfied with the way the government is acting to protect personal privacy and the abuse of the social insurance number.

In the time I have remaining, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make three or four points. This government has stressed time and time again that its justification for the increasing practice of numbering citizens and for the proliferation of the social insurance number is that it is to be used as a control mechanism to protect the public against fraud and against the misuse of public funds. In some ways this is justifiable, Mr. Speaker. We can understand that it is necessary to ensure that Canadians do not abuse public programs. I would argue, however, that the social insurance number itself may well present a mechanism that can be used by people intent on committing fraud.

I refer the House to statements made before the McDonald inquiry as reported in the Calgary Herald on October 26, 1978. The article on the subject reads in part as follows:

When RCMP Assistant Commissioner H. Jensen gave evidence to the McDonald commission into RCMP wrongdoing in June this year, he stated that 50 per cent of all cases of false pretenses made use of SIN cards. The problem, he implied, was the lack of security surrounding the SIN.

He illustrated this with the case of a Calgary man who had 109 SIN cards, 59 UIC claims, and a monthly income of $33,000.

He told of a Montreal duo who used 60 SIN cards over a period of two months to collect $32,867 from the UIC and who had projected earnings of half a million dollars from their gainful unemployment had they not slipped up.

He related the tale of the Winnipeg man who parlayed 25 SIN cards into $92,000 over 4½ years.

If we allow the social insurance number to be used increasingly as a citizen identification card, the credibility that goes with this card will also be useful as a mechanism for people intent on committing fraud to fulfil their objectives.

The use of the social insurance number within government, even without the direct linkage to government data banks, facilitates improper access into the personal files of individual Canadians. At this time last year parliament devoted a great deal of time to discussing the ability of people posing as chartered accountants or claiming to be unlicensed private investigators to get access to the personal and confidential income tax returns of individual Canadians. Someone posing as a chartered accountant could ring the taxation branch and say that his client has misplaced his income tax return, give the social insurance number and get information over the phone. In this way information was given to unauthorized individuals without the individual about whose return the inquiry was made being informed. This was done despite the sanctions in the law forbidding it. The use of the social insurance number as a computerized filing number throughout the government facilitates this sort of invasion of privacy.

Let me conclude, Mr. Speaker, with this one observation. We as legislators have the responsibility to act in a conscious and deliberate way. If we are to make changes which will profoundly affect all Canadians, we have a responsibility to ensure that those decisions are made after careful deliberation in parliament, after broad public discussion and after parliament has actually made the decision to go ahead with the particular program.

That was the recommendation of the 1972 computers and privacy report commissioned by this government. That is the nature of the motion before the House today, and it is the policy that should be adopted by the government. If the goverment looks seriously at the motion before the House today, it should agree that it is one which commends itself to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 58(10) and the agreement made earlier this day to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of all business of supply now before the House, including the bill based on Supplementary Estimates (A).

* * *

SUPPLY

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Supplementary Estimates (A), 1978-79, laid upon the Table, Wednesday, November 8, 1978, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Buchanan thereupon moved that Bill C-25, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1979, be read the first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Buchanan thereupon moved that Bill C-25, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1979, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

On clause 2—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, can the President of the Treasury Board assure the committee that there is nothing out of the way in the clauses of this bill and that it is in the usual form?

Mr. Buchanan: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I would have been distressed if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had not raised this matter. The form of this bill is the same as that passed in previous years and contains no additional borrowing authority.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

• (1702)

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? Now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Buchanan moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday I was pre-empted from so doing because Your Honour ruled that the question of privilege took precedence in the debate, and we found ourselves pretty much in the same position today with little time left to deal with the supply motion. I thought if I could raise the point of order at this time it would be the first practical chance I had to raise it.

It has to do with Hansard for December 6, which is last Wednesday. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouellet) in reply to my question, accused me of trying "to convey a message that all the builders in Canada are crooks". That statement appears at page 1845. This is a shameful innuendo which I reject out of hand. Any objective examination of my question will reveal that I tried to leave no such impression. I cannot ask the hon. member to withdraw his remark because there is nothing unparliamentary about it. It is just a cheap shot. But what can one expect from a minister who insults judges?

An hon. Member: That is a cheap shot.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being after five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday afternoon at two o'clock.

At 5.06 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 11, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

● (1407)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

SPORTS

CONGRATULATIONS TO CANADIAN DOWNHILL SKI TEAM FOR SUCCESS IN WORLD CUP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the current debate over the use of motions under Standing Order 43, and the limitations extending to these motions which occasionally prevent matters of urgent national importance being brought to the attention of this House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That this House direct the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to immediately review the provisions of Standing Order 43 which now apparently prevents a motion being brought to the attention of this House congratulating the Canadian downhill ski team on their outstanding performance in the opening race of the World Cup, and exhorting them to greater success for the glory of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

TRADE

MEASURES TO INCREASE EXPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

As it is essential that this country overcomes the $12.5 billion a year trade deficit which we have in fully manufactured goods, and as this can only be done if we greatly increase our sales effort abroad and let far more people in the world market know what this country has to offer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott):

That this government allow producers to write off 200 per cent of all expenses connected with making sales trips abroad, displaying their products at foreign trade fairs, and any other expenses incurred in sales promotion in the export market in excess of those made in the base year, the year before the plan goes into operation.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATISTICS CANADA FIGURES—INCLUSION OF "DISCOURAGED WORKERS" CATEGORY— MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, considering that Statistics Canada has confirmed that the real level of unemployment is much higher than the monthly labour force figures indicate, and considering that government job-creating funds are based on labour force figures, which means that certain regions, in particular Atlantic Canada and Quebec, get much less money than they deserve, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to have included in the monthly labour force survey, the "discouraged workers" category so that job-creating funds will in fact go to those regions which have greater need.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

FINANCE

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ABOLISH 5 PER CENT TAX ON STORM DOORS AND WINDOWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the building industry has slowed down in recent months because interest rates are too high, since storm doors and storm windows are important items of construction costs and that a 5 per cent tax has been announced in the budget speech on November 16, 1978, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That to stimulate the construction sector which is labour-intensive, the 5 per cent tax be again removed to give a new impetus to that economic sector.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[English]

TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF HOPPER CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF MALT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under, the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the importance of adding to the export value of Canada's resources and of the absolute necessity to protect export markets which have recently been developed to take Canadian manufactured products, in view of the fact that Canadian malt requires special handling through to the loading of containers at the port of export and that malt shipped in boxcars is damaged when handled through to container loading operation at such ports, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Minister of Transport order the railroads to provide hopper cars for the movement of all malt moving to export markets.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

REQUEST CANADIAN LIBRARIES RECEIVE CONTINUING SUPPLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of urgency and it is a plea that the government give priority to an issue of importance.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House views with deep concern the fact that the Publishing Centre of the Department of Supply and Services plans, as of April 1, 1979, to reduce severely the number of Canadian libraries which receive government publications free of charge, it being of particular concern that the plan is to reduce the number of full depository university libraries from 28 to three, and in view of the fact that the government itself contends that there should be public access to government documents, this House calls upon the Minister of Supply and Services to reverse this decision and to continue supplying government publications to Canadian libraries on the basis now in effect.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

● (1412)

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MONITORING OF AND COMPENSATION FOR WORKERS EXPOSED TO ASBESTOS HAZARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43—a matter connected with the news that a number of people who were employed in a Second World War Defence Research Board plant which processed asbestos-filled gas masks have begun having problems associated with exposure to asbestos. An unusually large proportion of these people have died of lung diseases associated with asbestos exposure, and the others are undoubtedly at risk.

In the light of this situation and the government's liability in these cases, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae):

That the government at once set up procedures to identify all the employees of wartime defence plants who may be similarly at risk from asbestos exposure, arrange to have them monitored for the appearance of related problems, and compensate them adequately for the suffering involved. This compensation should, of course, include the widows and families of those who have already died from such problems.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

INVESTIGATION INTO TAKEOVER OF NABOB FOODS LTD.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of the same Standing Order.

In view of the announcement that substantial lay-offs will occur at Nabob Foods Ltd. in British Columbia, a firm recently taken over by Jacobs Ltd. of Switzerland with the approval of the Foreign Investment Review Agency, I would move:

That an immediate investigation be undertaken by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and FIRA to determine whether commitments have been broken by that company with regard to that takeover and whether court proceedings should now be initiated by virtue of the legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the proposed motion. Is there unanimous consent that it should be presented?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LABOUR FORCE FIGURES PUBLISHED BY STATISTICS CANADA

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Statistics Canada has now confirmed what we have been trying to tell the hon. gentleman for some considerable time, namely, that the hidden jobless rate in this country is much greater than we have been led to believe and substantially more than the figures released every month by Statistics Canada.

Will the minister, as a matter of course, when he releases or responds to the monthly labour force surveys by Statistics Canada, indicate the extent of this hidden unemployment; or, at the very least, since this data is to be computed on a regular basis, will he make known to us the number of people registered at Manpower offices across the country, a figure which is always substantially more than that given in the official labour force survey, so that we may have a true picture of exactly how serious the situation is?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada did conduct, in March of this year, an experimental project to determine whether this method of survey could be used. The result was that they felt it was experimental, it was not very solidly based, and they have informed me that the most solid and objective measure of unemployment is the number of those who are without work and who are actively looking for work. Countries which use the household survey method accept that this is, in fact, the best and most honest basis of determining the measure of unemployment.

The provisos expressed by Statistics Canada with regard to the difficulty of obtaining unambiguous and meaningful estimates of the number of people who want work and who are not actively seeking employment are likely to be ignored. They pointed this out in their report, to be fair to StatsCan, and in no way suggested that this number should be made available in addition to the others. We have indicated, in our labour force survey figures, the kind of information the hon. member is looking for. I believe the figure in November was something like 63,000.

Mr. McGrath: I asked this question with respect to the March survey in a question I placed on the order paper last June. It is rather interesting that the question was replied to in the House on October 10. At that time I was told that the result of the survey would be released and that they would give consideration to having this additional data on a regular basis. The minister tends to discredit this new data, so I ask whether he feels the same way about his own Manpower offices across the country, because according to the data in March when StatsCan was reporting 1,045,000 Canadians out of work, his offices across the country indicated there were 1,389,000 Canadians registered as looking for jobs.

● (1417)

I ask the minister, so that we can get a reasonable assessment of the situation, whether he could release monthly the number of registered Canadians with the labour force survey at Manpower offices so that we can get the true picture. If not, is he going to discredit his own Manpower figures; or what is the situation?

Mr. Cullen: No, Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of discrediting Manpower figures. Many people who are registered at Manpower offices are already at work. Some of those who have registered at Manpower offices have already found work. So if we were trying to misinform the Canadian public, that would be one of the ways to go about it.

StatsCan has the officials, the experts and the professionals to do all of the labour force surveys. They are very good at their jobs. They have indicated that they are trying an experimental approach in March which, as they have said, is fraught with difficulties, fraught with errors, and it would be inappropriate to add those figures to the level of unemployed. We have indicated that to the best of our knowledge, given the information we get from StatsCan, the figure of—"discouraged workers", at the highest, is something like 63,000—and that information is made public.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps I can approach it this way. I checked with my own province where we have, I suppose, more discouraged job seekers than anywhere else in Canada because of the chronic, long-term nature of unemployment. I find that in Newfoundland, for the month of November, while StatsCan was reporting 31,000 officially unemployed, there were 62,000 registered at Manpower offices as looking for jobs. I submit to the minister that those 62,000 people were without jobs: certainly, they would not be registered and looking for jobs in a province where the official rate of unemployment is considerably higher than other provinces.

Let me frame my question by asking the minister the following: in view of the fact that Manpower training and job-creation programs are based on official labour force surveys from StatsCan, and in view of the fact that StatsCan, by their own admission, now admit to the inadequacy of labour force surveys based on the hidden jobless—the people who, out of sheer frustration, have given up looking for a job—will the minister now reassess the data that he uses to measure the extent of Manpower training programs and make-work programs?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, in his preamble, the hon. member has gone into four or five different areas. I have indicated to him that mere registration at a Manpower office does not indicate that an individual is unemployed. Many are looking for better employment, some are looking for jobs that would be easier for them physically, and others feel they are underemployed and would like to know, when jobs come up, that they will be called. So it would be misleading and inappropriate to use the numbers registered at Manpower offices.

I give full marks to StatsCan for trying constantly, through one method or another, to give us accurate statistics. They have indicated to us, and I quote them, that "the most solid and objective measure of the numbers of unemployed is indicated by those without work and who are actively looking for work." Given those particular statistics, they have a relative basis right across the country, so that no one is left out. As a matter of fact, the hon. member should know that his own province, in Canada works projects, ranks fourth in the gross amount of money that is received. If the hon. member is suggesting that is inappropriate, that cannot be helped by me.

* * *

MANPOWER

CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration: it relates to a report on the training of skilled, blue collar workers prepared for the Department of Employment and Immigration by Robertson, Nickerson Group Associates Limited.

Will the minister tell the House whether he agrees with the report's conclusions that the federal government has failed to supply leadership, that government training programs "need a massive overhaul", and that "the opportunity for high level young Canadians to get into a skilled trade is so non-existent that this situation can be described as disgraceful"? If the minister does agree with this assessment, can he tell the House what action he proposes to take, as minister, to rectify the situation?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I always feel that individuals who are writing reports and come to a particular conclusion use words that are bound to catch the eye and are bound to be printed. The fact is that we have tripled the amount of money we are making available under the apprenticeship program, just as one indicator.

[Mr. McGrath.]

• (1422)

We have just completed ten agreements, one with each of the provinces, under the Adult Occupational Training Act. The hon. member spoke about federal government programs. With respect, I should like to indicate that education is a field solely within the jurisdiction of the provinces. In fact we are buying places in the provinces for the kind of training they want. I have indicated in the House and in other places that, frankly, I am dissatisfied with the fact, having done a study in southwestern Ontario primarily, that 75 per cent of the high skilled jobs were filled by immigration rather than on the job training. I am trying to encourage industry, through the shifting of funding to industry, to play a larger role in on the job training and to make more funds available to provide that opportunity for the young people in the country. I think it is a better approach than relying on immigration to fill these jobs.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the report is eye-catching in its conclusions. It points out the reason such a high percentage of skilled blue collar workers have come to Canada is that it was promoted by the federal government and not by industry because of the lack of skilled labour available for blue collar industrial trades. The report points out that of the 9,300 skilled workers in the study group, only 27 per cent were born in Canada. Does the minister agree with the report's conclusion? It reads in part:

> —there is a shortage of upper skilled workers now and it will get more serious as the economy picks up. It does not understate the situation to say that industrial growth in Canada will be inhibited by a lack of skilled workers.

If he agrees with that, can the minister tell the House what specific action he is proposing to take, as the federal Minister of Employment and Immigration, to deal with this situation?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that substantial additional funding has been made available under apprenticeship programs. Also, I indicated the agreement we have entered into with each of the provinces to see if we can upgrade skills. I have made public the fact that 75 per cent of the highly skilled jobs being filled by immigrants in the manufacturing industry in southwestern Ontario is obviously inappropriate. Because of that, we are weighting our funding and our money into industrial on the job training programs. I think that is an appropriate approach.

However, companies have told us that they spend thousands of dollars in training individuals, only to find that when the training is completed they shop around. They would much prefer to do their recruiting from abroad. We have indicated that we will discourage this. If there are Canadians available—and there are jobs available now and there will be in the future—there will be first-class jobs in the particular skills which will be needed by Canada and I should like to see Canadians fill those posts rather than its being done by immigration. I have brought that point home very clearly to my provincial colleagues—all of whom share my concern, I might say.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATISTICS CANADA FIGURES—INCLUSION OF "DISCOURAGED WORKERS" CATEGORY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. Statistics Canada have indicated that the real level of unemployment is approximately 225,000 persons higher than the government acknowledges, principally because of the inclusion of the category of "discouraged workers". This has a regional impact of profound proportions, because workers in Atlantic Canada and Quebec are more likely to be discouraged with the higher level of seasonal employment there.

Will the minister explain why he said just a moment ago that the current method of measuring unemployment by the labour force survey which excludes these workers is a more accurate indication of the level of unemployment in Canada? Can he explain why he made that assertion?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as was indicated, the interpretation, or the misinterpretation of these figures is being done also by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party. Statistics Canada indicated that the tests were very imperfect and that there was a subjective test made by an individual. Often it is a matter of the question, "Do you want work?" If one goes into a pool room where there are eight guys standing around who are not working, and asks if they want work, they say yes, they want work. Do they want work, or do they want jobs? Statistics Canada indicated that there is a weakness in this basic method of interpreting.

We have indicated the number of discouraged workers according to the labour force survey statistics. These figures have been made available on a monthly basis. We have had the hon. member misinform and "broad-bent" the statistics long enough. I think he is once again doing a disservice in this respect.

• (1427)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, that is complete and utter rubbish. The minister knows that Statistics Canada has made a complete mockery of what he has been telling the people of Canada for the past year. Statistics Canada has just confirmed what I have been saying for a year and a half, that the real level of unemployment is much higher, and now the minister is trying to say Statistics Canada is backing down on its own report. That is absurd.

Considering that Statistics Canada, in the long report I have here—I hope the minister has read it—points out that the figures are, in fact, higher because of seasonal employment patterns in Atlantic Canada and in Quebec, will the minister not agree that Statistics Canada is right, acknowledge he has been wrong, and do something to remedy the situation?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, just because the hon. member says that something is rubbish, and then proceeds to lambaste or bombast his question, does not make it so. The fact of the matter, for the hon. member's attention, is that the provisos expressed by Statistics Canada on the difficulties of obtaining unambiguous and meaningful estimates of the number of people who want work, but are not actively seeking employment, are likely to be ignored. That is exactly what the hon. Leader of the NDP is doing; he is ignoring the provisos that StatsCan itself put in.

I am not knocking StatsCanada. I think they are being very honest in what they are putting across here, a little more honest in their approach than the Leader of the New Democratic Party in interpreting that an additional 250,000 people are unemployed. That is not, in fact, what StatsCanada is saying.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that StatsCanada, which is responsible, unlike the minister, has indeed pointed out that there are certain problems with the methodology but has underlined the fact that unemployment is much higher than the regular labour force survey indicates, and considering that countries such as Great Britain, Sweden and a number of others in western Europe include the "discouraged workers" category in their official statistics, and considering that government grants in Canada for job creation measures are largely based on real levels, or ought to be, rather than based on labour force surveys of unemployment, which means that the poorer regions are getting less than they should, will the minister change the methodology to include the "discouraged workers" category so that particularly those parts of Canada which need more assistance, to which they are legitimately entitled, will get more?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member always remembers things that are included in the statistics of Sweden and Great Britain, and tends to ignore some of the things which are not included in England in their statistics on unemployment, statistics which are remarkably different from those used in Canada. On that basis, he is comparing apples to oranges when he suggests that "this" should be included and "that" should not. The hon. member shakes his head, but once again he is misleading.

* * *

[Translation]

FINANCE

ITEMS COVERED BY 5 PER CENT TAX

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. He seems to be quite relaxed and I think he will give me an answer. At page 12 of his speech of November 16, we see that the 5 per cent tax on storm doors and windows has been abolished. Could he tell us what he means by storm doors and windows? I am asking that—and I am sure the minister will understand—because I have here a special bulletin which was sent by a manufacturer of doors and windows to his customers in which he tells them that he will have to charge 5 per cent more, effective November 17, to cover the federal tax because the exemption has now been abolished. Can the minister tell us how manufacturers must operate? Is this tax charged on the whole system of double doors or double windows or only on storm doors and storm windows?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we will consider these proposals in detail in a few weeks when the bill is introduced in the House. If the hon. member wants to submit a particular problem to me, I will be glad to consider it, to ask the officials of Revenue Canada who are responsible for the interpretation of the act to examine it and I will give him a direct and clear answer.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the minister having made this speech, I assumed that he was aware of the details. I have received a few notices from manufacturers and I suggest this is an important matter. What is more, I suggest that this is an urgent matter, for these people must be able to tell their customers on what parts of the storm doors, windows and storm windows the tax must apply, because this decision after all will have a very strong impact on the building sector, on various retailers and suppliers who wonder how they must proceed. That is the reason I am asking this question and I think the minister is now in a position to reply.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, a great many items are covered by these exemptions. For instance, while all building materials are covered by this special tax exemption to encourage insulation and energy conservation, other materials are not. A great many items are covered, and we must now clearly specify those which are covered and those which are not. However, question period and the House are not the proper time and place to do that. If the hon. member would kindly avail himself of the services of one of our many pages and send me the letter he has with him, I should be delighted to have it reviewed and reply to him as soon as possible.

* * *

● (1432)

[English]

ROYAL VISITS

INVITATIONS TO ROYAL FAMILY TO VISIT CANADA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council: it has to do with invitations extended to members to the Royal Family to visit Canada which require the acceptance and approval of the cabinet.

In the last few days, since the Prime Minister left for warmer climes, has the cabinet decided on the request of the government of Ontario to have the Queen Mother attend the Queen's Plate and Dominion Day celebrations?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate receiving the right hon. gentleman's question today because it gives me an opportunity to correct a report which was issued on the weekend, that in some way the government was preventing the Queen Mother from visiting Ontario.

As the right hon. gentleman knows, a number of invitations come in for members of the Royal Family to visit Canada and these have to be considered in respect of the over-all availability of the personage invited. In this particular case, the Queen Mother is being invited to attend the Queen's Plate and possibly some other events in Ontario.

I am sure the right hon. gentleman will recall that last year the same invitation was transmitted, on behalf of the Government of Canada, to the Queen Mother and that, unfortunately, she was unable to come to Canada at the time. At the same time, I would like to advise the House that Nova Scotia also has a request in for the Queen Mother to visit that province in association with the international gathering of the clans.

These invitations have been under consideration, and were probably discussed with the Queen Mother by the Prime Minister on the occasion of his visit to London last week. Upon the Prime Minister's return, it should be possible to have answers as to what the program will be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the answer which has been given by the Deputy Prime Minister surely indicates that the press has power. Would the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House why, in view of the fact a letter was written to His Excellency the Governor General last July, it was necessary for Premier Davis to write a further letter in October because the Ontario government had not received a reply to its original letter, and why he received a reply in the form of a standard Xerox letter stating that the matter would be placed before the Prime Minister?

How many months does it take this government to make a decision? Surely it cannot be because of a shortage of civil servants. Is this just an alibi, or is it not? How many months does it take to get an answer respecting a matter that a government should be entitled to immediately?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to go over the correspondence which may have been exchanged between—

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was not any.

Mr. MacEachen: —the government of Ontario and the Government of Canada. I do know that the Government of Canada would be very eager to have the Queen Mother attend the events in Ontario and Nova Scotia, and that that invitation has probably been conveyed by the Prime Minister to the Queen Mother. I hope that it will be possible for her to attend these events.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House whether that inexcusable, one-year delay is the result of indifference, or arrogance toward the monarchy, or not?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: These little fellows over there are nonentities unless they interrupt in this way.

Why, for one year, was there no answer to the inquiries by the Ontario government until Nova Scotia indicated an interest, which I approve of entirely?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not, personally, believe that the lapse of time in dealing with this matter was that great.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was. Every word is correct.

Mr. MacEachen: The request from Ontario, like other requests from groups in Canada, must be placed in the over-all context of the availability of the person invited to Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why was there no reply?

Mr. MacEachen: As the right hon. gentleman knows, at one time royal visits to Canada were rare and rather historic events. It ought to be placed on the record that since the present Prime Minister took office, the number of royal visits has increased very significantly, indicating the warm attitude which the Prime Minister and his government show toward the monarchy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

FINANCE

SMALL BUSINESS TAX DEDUCTION

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware of the widespread concern among bona fide, small employers in the service sector that they may no longer qualify for the small business tax deduction upon the enactment of the proposed revisions to the Income Tax Act?

Can the Minister of Finance clarify, for the peace of mind of these small employers, such as real estate agencies and insurance agencies, whether or not they will continue to be eligible for the small business tax deduction?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that these small businesses which have employees be able to qualify for the small business tax deductions and I hope to table legislation in the House of Commons in that regard very soon. What we are trying to do is make sure that people who derive their income from one employer do not incorporate themselves to qualify for this low tax rate. We have to clarify some sections in this regard, but of course, any bona fide small business with employees would certainly qualify.

* * *

[Translation]

URBAN AFFAIRS

CMHC INSPECTION AND PLANNING

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I gave him notice of it.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, my question follows exchanges in the House last week when the minister described cases of faulty inspections and bad planning by CMHC as isolated incidents. Is the minister aware of a corporation-funded condominium development in my riding, at 100 Quigley Road, which is literally sliding into the Red Hill ravine, costing the unit owners $30,000 to shore up immediately?

Can the minister confirm that CMHC refuses any liability and will not assist in financing repairs to this dangerous erosion because it might, as one of his officials told me, open up the floodgates in terms of a precedent for similar projects across the country?

● (1442)

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my answer is yes to both parts of the question of the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister, on behalf of these financially hard pressed home owners—who were, after all, not responsible for this Quigley Road mess in the first place—who is responsible to ensure quality of workmanship and materials: is it CMHC, or the local contractors, and why can neither be held responsible for obvious planning problems?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a legal opinion in the House but I believe recommendations have already been made by some local authorities to the persons concerned in Hamilton. Clearly, they should consult a lawyer to find out what their rights really are. It seems obvious to me that there is a prima facie case against the building contractor and also, after having consulted their lawyer, that they should perhaps determine whether they should not also sue the city.

[English]

SOCIAL INSURANCE

USE OF SIN

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue, but in his absence and in the absence of his parliamentary secretary I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

If a person has fears, when using his social insurance number to cash bonds, that such number might be used for other purposes, could the person invent a nine-digit social insurance number or ask the bank to supply one for him?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take that question as notice.

Mr. Hare: Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of a letter from the former revenue minister to a constituent of mine, indicating there should be no fear in the use of the SI number in the cashing of bond interest coupons. The hon. senator stated that the number could only be used for internal use and it would not in any way threaten the civil liberties and privacy of Canadian citizens. He further stated, and I quote—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question? If so, he should put the question.

Mr. Hare: Yes, Mr. Speaker. This letter states the number can be invented. Is the idea of inventing a social insurance number one of government policy, and is it now in operation? If so, the ramifications are horrendous.

An hon. Member: Come on, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: What is the question?

An hon. Member: Can the number be invented?

* * *

TRANSPORT

AUDITOR GENERAL'S STUDY OF DEPARTMENTAL PROCEDURES—CRITICISM BY DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It arises out of a report in the Ottawa Citizen of Friday that the Deputy Minister of Transport, a senior civil servant, had attacked the methods and procedures used by the Auditor General in fulfilling the mandate given him by this House.

Was the President of the Treasury Board aware of the remarks the Deputy Minister of Transport made, and does he support the view of this senior official of government that complying with the Auditor General's recommendations could cause more harm than good?

[Mr. Ouellet.]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the remarks made by the Deputy Minister of Transport.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the Auditor General is a servant of parliament and not of the government, and that the House has established a public accounts committee to receive the Auditor General's reports, to receive the government's reactions thereto and the government's criticisms, if any, is it the position of the President of the Treasury Board—and would he take this position by way of direction, if necessary—that all criticisms by senior officials or, indeed, by ministers, of the Auditor General should be directed through the Standing Committee on Public Accounts; and would he, further, confirm that the recommendations of the Auditor General sanctioned by the committee are to be obeyed even if the public service finds it inconvenient?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I think all of us, as parliamentarians, expect the Auditor General to discharge his obligations to this House and carry out the terms of the legislation governing his activities.

* * *

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CHILD TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare: it concerns Bill C-10, the bill which gives $200 per child for those Canadians earning less than $18,000 per annum.

I would like to know which provinces have made commitments with respect to their welfare legislation which would allow welfare recipients in those provinces to receive the $200 tax credit without suffering a reduction in welfare benefits as a result of receiving this additional income; and, in particular, what is the situation with respect to the province of Alberta?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, some provinces have made a commitment to pass on fully the additional benefits for individual Canadians regarding the GIS. Unfortunately, with respect to the child tax credit, no province has made that commitment yet, although six have recommended it to their cabinets: these are Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. I understand that Quebec has Bill 118 before its National Assembly right now, but I was not informed, nor did I get a copy of it. As for the province of Alberta, I received a letter last week saying that they do not know how they will deal with it yet. Personally, I think it is about time they did notwithstanding my numerous letters, telexes and federal-provincial meetings. I hope all members of parliament will join me by doing the same, making sure that individual benefits to Canadians go to them and are not to be considered additional transfer payments to provinces.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the minister that we on this side in our party share her concern that welfare recipients should have the benefit directly, and that they should not suffer as a result of provinces failing to pass on benefits. My question relates to provinces like Alberta which have not as yet said whether they will agree to this commitment. A letter from the province of Alberta, dated November 17, 1978, to the executive director of the National Anti-Poverty Organization indicated that even at that time they had not yet made up their mind whether they were going to change their legislation to have the desired effect. Can the minister tell the House whether she is prepared to give a regular report to this House indicating which provinces are giving effect to the legislation and which provinces are not?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, it is an excellent, but an uncomfortable, suggestion which I accept. I will make a regular report for the House.

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION

ESTABLISHMENT OF DISTRICT OFFICE

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs, on behalf of the Legion and the many veterans in my riding, whether he and his department intend to go forward with the district office establishment that he announced many months ago and, if so, what will be their relationship with the Legion?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I gather the hon. member is referring to the office in Brampton. Those plans are going forward and I hope to have a director in place by May. From then on, once the office is in operation, there will be considerable publicity in the local media and also by the veterans' organizations.

* * *

LOTO CANADA

EQUIPMENT USED IN LOTO SELECT PROGRAM

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). Could the minister tell the House whether any of the equipment which was to be used by Loto Select, the computerized lottery game, was purchased, or was the equipment simply leased from General Instrument? If leased, does Loto Canada have the right to sublease this equipment or to assign it?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the question of the contract was one of lease. I am afraid I cannot answer at this time the other question put by the hon. gentleman because I have been asked specifically by the solicitors not to do so.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The minister has made it clear that she cannot table at this time the agreement between Loto Canada and General Instrument. I understand that. She has tabled the agreement between the provinces and Loto Canada. However, there is a third agreement which I think we have been mixed up about in the past.

• (1452)

Would the minister be willing to table the telexes which, I believe, formed the agreement between the federal government, the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec as to the amount of money which Ontario and Quebec might be willing to contribute at this time to the federal government for Loto Canada?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, this was the subject of a question of privilege by the hon. member some weeks ago. There is not a third agreement, as he states. There is a legal accommodation between the corporation and the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. If I were to table these in the House at this time, I would prejudice the resolution of the contract. Therefore, I will not be able to do so at this time.

* * *

SOCIAL INSURANCE

USE OF SIN

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that posed by my colleague from St. Boniface. I think it goes most properly to the Minister of Finance, as it relates to the Bank of Canada.

Can the minister tell the House whether his then colleague, the then minister of national revenue, was speaking for the government when he said it was the policy of the Bank of Canada that Canadians who did not want to be identified by a social insurance number could invent their own number?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen that letter. I am very surprised at what the hon. member said and I would like to analyse the problem. Of course, when you have a social insurance number you cannot invent another number. That is my judgment. However, I would like to look into it.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to make available a copy of the letter from the then minister of national revenue, his then colleague, dated November 22, 1977, in which he stated that was the case. I would like an undertaking from the Minister of Finance that he will inquire of the Bank of Canada whether they are, in fact, pursuing his highly inventive policy, and report back to the House on that matter as quickly as possible.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think that is a question, Mr. Speaker: everyone knows I am a very diligent minister.

Oral Questions

FORESTRY

PRIVATIZATION OF FOREST PRODUCTS LABORATORIES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of State (Environment). In light of the uncertainty he has created with regard to the future of the forestry service as a result of recent policy changes, changes which are resulting in a mass exodus of scientists and diligent public servants to other industries and other parts of the world, has the minister received iron-clad assurances from the private sector that his privatization scheme is, in fact, working? If not, is he prepared to defer previous decisions to close down the forests products labs and some of the research stations for the reason of lack of money?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I will be making an appropriate announcement very soon. I want to assure the hon. member that our plans for privatization are going fairly well. I also want to tell him that he should be more careful in his choice of words, because not one of the research labs is being closed down. We have six research labs across the country. In terms of the privatization of those two forest products labs, the hon. member should not use the words "closing down". As a result of the planning now going on, and looking at privatization, we hope that once we have completed all the negotiations, those two labs will remain intact and, indeed, their position will be enhanced as a result of working with provincial governments, the private sector and the universities. Their service to the forest industry will, therefore, be enhanced.

Mr. Oberle: I am encouraged by the minister's remarks. I interpret him to mean that the research labs will not be closed down even if his privatization plan does not proceed. I interpret his remarks to mean that his decision to phase out—the federal government's decision—by April 1 is being deferred. Can the minister communicate that comfort to the people who are leaving the department as a result of his decision? Can he, also, make reference to the institutions that are being closed in Ottawa, the Forest Management Institute and the Forest Fire Institute?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, there is no change in moving the Forest Management Research Institute to Petawawa: That is going ahead. The Forest Fire Research Institute's move to Petawawa is going ahead.

I have said on previous occasions in this House that we feel, as a result of the amalgamation of the Forest Fire Research Institute and the Forest Management Research Institute in Petawawa, that that facility will become one of the foremost research institutions for forestry in the country. I should also tell the hon. member that we think very highly of the Canadian Forestry Service. It has done an excellent job. I ask the hon. member to just wait for a little while until he hears the announcements we will be making.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

[Translation]

DAIRYING

COMMITMENT RESPECTING INDEXATION FORMULA

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

As the Federation of Dairy Producers of Canada expressed considerable concern last November, I believe, about the fact that the minister has not implemented his promise with regard to indexing—the consequences of which he is fully aware and should not be ignored—can he tell us today when he will act upon that promise that is of interest to the dairy producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be aware of the fact that under this Minister of Agriculture and this government, the dairy farmers of Canada have been treated the fairest they have ever been in the history of dairy production in Canada. That fairness will continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I think that all hon. members particularly those from Quebec, are aware of the matter I raise. I know that several among them agree that the minister should fulfil a commitment. My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

In consideration of the increase at the production cost level, which was proved last June 30, the minister promised to apply an increase of some 52 per cent. Milk producers are wondering whether next January 1 the minister will fulfil his commitment. Then, again I ask the question of the Minister of Agriculture, in all respect, on behalf of those milk producers.

Does the minister intend to agree to fulfil a commitment he took himself and signed with milk producers already ten months ago?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I thought I intimated to my good friend, who has voiced the opinion of dairy farmers with regard to their feelings toward the Minister of Agriculture, that we have acted with fairness and will continue to act with fairness.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISSUE OF TRAVEL DOCUMENTS TO FORMER FLQ MEMBERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Canadian ambassador, Gerard Pelletier, says that the embassy in Paris has received instructions to issue travel documents to Jacques and Louise Cossette-Trudel if they wish to return to Canada. Will the minister advise this House and the country who gave those instructions and from what level of government they came?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think they reflected the words that I stated in the House the other day, when I said that if these people wish to return to Canada they would be facilitated in so doing in the manner that I outlined. I am not exactly certain who sent the specific instructions, but clearly it was done under my authority. I repeat, I think it was consistent with what I said in the House the other day.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for clearing up the confusion that was left not only in the House but throughout the country by the Prime Minister's answer to myself and to others who asked him that question. Do I take it that His Excellency solicited the instructions, or that those instructions were given to him by the Department of External Affairs under the authority of the minister in question?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I was not anticipating, nor was I given, any advance notice of this question. I am always reluctant to state specifically what kinds of procedures were followed; that is why I emphasized that the procedures were consistent with what I said in the House, namely, that there would be no prohibition put in the way of their return.

I am not sure of the actual technique of information or how the information was transmitted. I will make some inquiries. I am not in any sense trying to avoid the responsibility. I suspect that it is mine in law. If it is that way, then it was on my instructions.

* * *

● (1502)

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—ACTIONS OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—RULING OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On Friday last the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) entered into discussion of a matter of privilege of which he had given the Chair notice. It related to a regulation made pursuant to sections 4 and 146 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and its relationship to clause 2 of Bill C-14, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 which is presently before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, or was, at least, at the time the matter was raised.

I listened with great care to the arguments made by the hon. member for St. John's East as he evidently had a serious grievance of substantial significance. I listened as well to the counter arguments put forward by the minister and to supporting arguments put forward on both sides. On Friday, as the House knows, I listened at great length to all members who wanted to participate in the discussion, although I did indicate early on that I doubted there were many more significant areas which could be covered.

I was aware, though, that a great many members had different aspects of the question with which they wanted to deal. I refer particularly to the fact that this combination of circumstances, in which, as it was alleged, the bill which is on the order paper contains in one of its clauses what appears to be an intent identical in scope and authority with that of the regulation enacted pursuant to the existing legislation, recently publicized and, more recently, gazetted, has placed a number of people in a somewhat extraordinary situation, as the hon. member pointed out. First, it put a number of hon. members in an awkward situation before the committee and it placed the public in a similarly awkward position in several instances.

That is why I listened to all hon. members who wanted to participate, and with special care to those members who were serving actively on the standing committee. Each of them drew attention to some of the difficulties which had been caused. Since, as I say, I sensed that a substantial grievance may have occurred, I felt obliged to examine the record to determine whether there were procedural steps which could be taken with respect to the grievance, to the difficulty faced by the members and, in turn, by the public, by witnesses before the committee and, particularly, by delegations appearing before it.

Such delegations come to Ottawa with the intention of doing what all of us want us to encourage the public to do, that is, to participate as fully as possible in the democratic process by taking advantage of various stages of legislation or other occasions to come before standing committees of the House to make their views known. To such groups, to hon. members, to delegations, to other witnesses who came and to the general public, both the minister himself and his officials have, I understand, extended regrets and apologies because the combination of the paragraph in the bill and the regulation did place them in an awkward situation.

It is not for me to decide whether or not this apology, expressed both in the House and outside, is sufficient or whether these complications are more severe than that. I do note, however, that an apology was expressed and the minister was, I thought, generous and direct in admitting the difficulty in which he had placed these people. Some members expressed the view that in the circumstances the apology was not sufficient and that other remedies should be sought, one of them being the pursuit of a question of privilege.

Nevertheless, as I indicated earlier, it seems to me we are concerned here with matters of law. Did the regulation derive legal authority from the existing act? That is not a question for me to answer. All I know, examining the matter from the point of view of procedure, is that the clause in the bill and the regulation which was published are both in order in terms of the authority of the Chair with regard to procedure. I cannot go beyond this authority and I cannot make a judgment on the legality of the regulation.

Point of Order—Mr. Brisco

Having carefully considered all of the arguments over the weekend, I hope hon. members will understand that while I appreciate the complications they face and the difficulties with regard to which they expressed themselves so completely on Friday, it goes beyond my authority to try to deal with the matter on procedural grounds. I hope the contributions made by the minister both before the committee and in the House will serve as a complete answer to those people who were inconvenienced in that way, but procedurally I have no authority to go further in this matter.

* * *

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BRISCO—RECOGNITION BY CHAIR DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you know, the House went into session on October 11. Today is December 11. In other words, two months have gone by. It is true I have been absent from the House for a while, but during that period I have been recognized on one occasion, as Your Honour will find if you consult the index.

Sir, I have stood today. I stood four times last week, four times the week before and twice the week before that. Without objecting to my hon. friends being recognized, I notice that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae), a new member whom I am proud and pleased to see recognized, has been recognized several times; twice a Liberal back bencher from Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe has been recognized—

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Brisco: Well, the hon. member may think it damned funny but I am concerned. I am not referring to you, Mr. Speaker, but to the characters on the other side. Besides, the exercises I have been going through are now producing muscular tetany. I shall have to start taking a calcium supplement.

I can anticipate the kind of response I am going to get from you, Mr. Speaker; I have heard you give that same response to my hon. friend from Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) and it is a very reasoned answer. But I would point out to you, sir, that there are occasions when a backbencher has things to bring to the attention of ministers which may not put him on the so-called priority list. I am finding that my patience is exhausted and I wonder whether there is any point in my continuing to go through this exercise of trying to catch your eye.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will try to extend as much patience as I can in dealing with the hon. member's problem, but I can tell him that if he wants to change places with me he is certainly welcome to try. He might want to take into account that I try very carefully to keep track of those who are unsuccessful in being recognized. During the last minutes of the question period today, for example, as I am sure he will be interested to note, his hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. La Salle) and his hon. friend from Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) were both attempting to be recognized, as they were on Thursday and Friday, and therefore had a slight edge over him since he was not seeking to be recognized on Friday.

It is as simple as that and it is an indication of how thoroughly I try to keep track of the days upon which members have attempted to be recognized. There are only so many minutes in a question period and each of the hon. member's colleagues to whom I have referred had simply been trying more recently than he had, although I recognize that he tried several times last week. However, with only a few minutes left I had to make a choice and that is the choice I made. I can only console him by telling him that the choice was among two of his colleagues, the hon. member for Joliette and the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River, and himself, since all three of them on that side of the House had been attempting to gain my recognition most frequently last week.

With respect to the hon. member's comments concerning the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) and members from the government side of the House, I think he is straining the point a little. Surely the hon. member must recognize that they belong to different political parties, and if he has not observed by now that considerations with respect to each party have to be dealt with in a slightly different way, then a major difficulty which is faced in the question period has been lost upon him.

● (1512)

I am sorry, I have to correct myself. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) was attempting to be recognized on Friday. I regret that I overlooked that. That fact is in my notes, but in attempting to allot the last couple of minutes today I overlooked that. I owe the hon. member an apology. Had I not overlooked that, he might have taken precedence over two of his senior colleagues, the hon. member for Joliette and the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River. I therefore owe the hon. member for Kootenay West an apology.

* * *

THE OFFICIAL REPORT

APOLOGY FOR COMMENT DIRECTED TO MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On Friday as Your Honour was about to leave the Chair, with the Sergeant-at-Arms literally hovering over me with the mace in his hands and in the heat of the moment, I fired a rather cheap shot across the bow of my good friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouellet). It was offensive. I apologize for it, and I withdraw it unconditionally.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for the good words he has just said in front of the House. I recognize that parliamentary life is a difficult one, that in the heat of the debates discussions may become virulent; however, beyond the differences in political opinions, we achieve a mutual sense of respect through our working together in the House. Indeed, despite the differences that may exist on the political level, there is a sense of friendship and respect. That is why I appreciate so much the words of the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I simply add that I would not want this to go by without the notice of the Chair. I hope that on occasions in the future, although I do not have the authority under our precedents to require the withdrawal of remarks which come close to being unparliamentary in nature but which may not be technically, I can refer back to this enlightened exchange as an example for other members in the circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

PRESENTATION OF THIRD REPORT OF JOINT STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the third report of the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. I am giving notice that I hope to move concurrence in the report, which deals with a regulation purporting to give the minister the power to enter on to private land adjacent to airports and to destroy natural growth.

[Editor's Note: For text of the above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

[Translation]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-26, to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Order Paper Questions

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General for the Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-27, to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to amend the Post Office Act, to confirm certain orders and to make related amendments to other Acts.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

[English]

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO MODIFY NUMBER OF COUNCIL MEMBERS

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-28, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 81, 83 and 265.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

SALES OF PAPER TO ZAIRE

Question No. 81—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

During the past five years, did Canada sell paper to Zaire and, if so (a) what types (b) in what amount in each case (c) at what cost (d) were the sales made through CIDA?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: During the period 1973 to 1977 inclusive, the following Canadian sales of paper were made to Zaire:

1973 Nil

1974
- (i) 694.6 metric tonnes of newspaper valued at $143,000
- (ii) 2,640.4 metric tonnes of writing and reproduction paper valued at $1,861,000
- (iii) 40.6 metric tonnes of fine paper valued at $27,000

1975 Less than one metric tonne of converted paper valued at less than $1,000
1976 Nil
1977 2.9 metric tonnes of unbleached sulphite or sulphate wrap valued at $2,000

In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned: Since 1970 CIDA has provided to Zaire subsidies in the form of 4,348 metric tonnes of paper for the printing of school textbooks and notebooks. This consists of 3,995 tons of offset paper for the publication of texts and manuals; 144 tons for the manufacture of texbook covers; 190 tons for school notebooks and 17 tons for miscellaneous uses. Total value of the Canadian subsidy for the purchase and transportation of paper is $2,858,175.27.

The disbursements were made as follows:

Fiscal year	Disbursements
1978-79	$53,809.08
1977-78	229,737.01
1976-77	0.00
1975-76	46,434.38
1974-75	1,584,338.05
1970-71—73-74	943,856.75
	$2,858,175.27

NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 83—Mr. Brisco:

What are the pay arrangements for employees at Yoho and other national parks with reference to calculation of meals, overtime and salary and are they calculated separately at Calgary, Edmonton and Ottawa?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): All meal deductions are calculated at the Park and deducted from pay two weeks in arrears. Overtime for hourly paid employees is paid by time summary as received on a two week basis, along with regular pay. Overtime for salaried employees is submitted separately every two weeks and paid on a separate cheque.

All calculations for pay are performed on the computer in the Regional Services Office (D.S.S.), Edmonton. A post audit is carried out by the appropriate responsibility centre to ensure accuracy in payment. For retroactive pay, overtime hours are submitted separately from regular hours. This is to facilitate the pay process. All regions calculate pay arrangements for their employees with reference to meals, overtime and salary in the same manner as the above. No calculations are done in Ottawa.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—LAWYERS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 265—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Department of National Health and Welfare and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: None.

[Mr. Pinard.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING CHARITABLE CORPORATIONS

On the Order: Government Orders:

November 24, 1978—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill S-4, an Act respecting Canadian non-profit corporations—The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask that we proceed with Bill S-5 first, since it was developed first. Bill S-4 proceeded from it. I have spoken to my hon. colleagues in the opposition. They seem willing to agree to proceeding with Bill S-5 first.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a bill having been called, I do not know whether consent can be given; but if it can, we consent to changing the order.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) have the consent of the House to withdraw Bill S-4 from consideration?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* * *

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill S-5, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce for second reading Bill S-5, which is legislation to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act. As hon. members know, it is by means of this law that we establish business corporations with limited liability and generally regulate several of their activities. Given that the effective life of the existing act is only three years, this appears at first glance to be an extremely complicated bill. That is, however, misleading. The bill is bulky because it proposes a completely new French version which is being introduced in accordance with an undertaking the government gave to the Quebec Bar in 1975. Most of the other proposed amendments are mere technical changes designed to reconcile conflicts between sections or to fill logical gaps in the system.

On introducing the original bill for second reading in late 1974 the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs characterized the proposed law as comprehensive, clear, equitable, imaginative and, above all, practical. Moreover, during the passage of the bill through parliament departmental officials forecast that the proposed law would not result in any substantial number of new corporations at the federal level and that, in any event, because of the streamlined procedures set out in the bill, the new law could be administered without any substantial increase of resources. Three years of experience have clearly vindicated the minister's high expectations for the act.

● (1522)

The implementation of the new law has proceeded with few administrative complications, and the statute has been well received by the public, businessmen, and their professional advisers across Canada. Indeed, the law has been so well accepted that the forecasts of the officials did not prove to be quite accurate. The number of federal incorporations incorporated each year has increased from 1,800 in 1971 to 5,000 in 1976, the first year of operation of the CBCA, to nearly 8,000 in 1977, and to a projected 10,000 in 1978. In short, the annual federal incorporation activity has increased five-fold since the Canada Business Corporations Act became effective on December 15, 1975.

The officials' optimistic forecast of the administrative efficiencies that would be engendered by the new act proved, however, to be far more accurate. Partly because of the streamlined procedures made possible by the new act and regulations, and partly because of the computerized name search system developed in the department, the corporations branch has been able to handle approximately five times its previous workload with shorter delays and with no substantial increase in resources.

The wide acceptance of the act has not been limited to businessmen and their professional advisers. Provincial corporation law administrators also have been impressed both by its substantive provisions and its procedural mechanisms, and some have accordingly recommended corresponding changes to the provincial law to their respective ministers.

The provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan have already enacted new business corporation laws based on the Canada Business Corporations Act, and at least three other provinces are currently reviewing their acts with a view to adopting many, if not most, of the provisions of the federal law.

It appears, therefore, that the Canada Business Corporations Act is achieving the objectives set for it in section 3, that is, to modernize the federal corporation law and to furnish a model statute that will lead to greater uniformity of corporation law across Canada. To this end, officials of the department did discuss the proposed amendments with several of their provincial counterparts as well as with experts in the private sector to ensure that this increasing tendency towards uniformity is not undermined.

The specific purposes of the proposed amendments are to fulfil two undertakings given by the government during the passage of the act through parliament.

[Translation]

The Department of Justice as well as the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have undertaken before the Quebec Bar to draft a new French version of the legislation which is not merely a translation of the English text but as much as possible a statement on the legislation in French using the language and ideas with which the members of the Quebec Bar are familiar. The Legislation section of the Department of Justice began in 1975 to redraft the French text of the legislation with the assistance of various legal experts and accountants to prepare the bill now under consideration. On behalf of the government, I would like to thank more particularly the members of the special committee of the Quebec Bar and the lawyers of the Legislation section of the Department of Justice who worked diligently in a rather short period to prepare that new French version.

[English]

The second undertaking was given by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the House Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. That committee was concerned, because of the sweeping substantive changes being effected by the bill, that it might engender many problems for businessmen, lawyers and auditors. The committee, as a condition of approving the bill, therefore insisted that the department return to parliament within a reasonably short time to give the committee an opportunity to review any complaints that have arisen, to consider any proposed amendments to make the act work more equitably and more efficiently and, in particular, to review the broad regulation-making powers granted under section 187 in respect of stock exchange takeover bids.

Fortunately, only one major substantive problem has arisen since the act was implemented; that is, fundamental change, by way of arrangement.

The controversial policy issue, stock exchange takeover bids, has not yet been definitely resolved. Therefore, the government recommends that this issue continue to be dealt with by regulation to ensure maintenance of maximum uniformity among the provisions of the federal corporation law, the provincial securities laws and the stock exchange bylaws that relate to takeover bids through the facilities of a stock exchange or the over the counter market.

Knowing that each substantive provision of the bill will be scrutinized carefully in committee, I shall avoid discussing here the relatively minor changes, which may be characterized more as fine tuning than any fundamental change of policy.

The one major substantive change is the introduction in part XIV of the "arrangement" concept. The minister of the day and his officials had consciously omitted this particular technique of fundamental change for two reasons. First, they reasoned that the arrangement institution was superfluous in the act because a corporation could effect any fundamental change by exploiting any one or any combination of the specific fundamental change sections—amendment, amalgamation, continuance, dissolution—set out in the act. Second, they were concerned that the arrangement technique might be exploited to evade the shareholders' right to dissent and so subvert the policy fundation of part XIV.

I must report, however, that experience has proved that an arrangement provision, while perhaps not essential in theory, is a most useful technique to avoid extraordinary formal complications, particularly in respect of the unwinding of an unsuccessful amalgamation or effecting interjurisdictional transfers of corporations.

The government has therefore decided that an arrangement provision should be set out in the act, subject to safeguards that will preclude its use as a technique to squeeze out or freeze out minority shareholders.

The proposed section 185.1 seeks to achieve this goal. Characteristically, the provision gives very broad powers to a court to approve any proposed arrangement. But to ensure maximum protection of minority shareholders, it sets up a high entry threshhold, requiring a proponent of an arrangement to satisfy the court that it is not practicable to achieve the arrangement by use of the more conventional fundamental change institutions.

Moreover, this provision empowers the courts, in any event, to approve a proposed arrangement subject to the condition that any shareholders may dissent from the proposed arrangement and demand payment of the fair value of their shares, a limitation that will clearly discourage improper use of this changed technique in questionable cases.

In sum, although the arrangement provision entails some risks, consonant with the over-all development of the act, the government recommends that it be included in the statute to fulfil a demonstrated need, at least until actual experience proves that such a flexible institution does lead to abuse.

The predecessor bill was originally introduced in the Senate on November 8, 1977, and referred shortly thereafter to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The committee held several meetings between November, 1977, and February, 1978, to consider the bill, during which time the committee heard the testimony of witnesses from the Department of Justice and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The committee concurrently considered some informal briefs that were submitted to the committee chairman while the hearings were in progress. That version was introduced in the House on March 21, 1978, but died on the order paper at the end of the last session.

● (1532)

The present version, Bill S-5, was introduced in the Senate on October 17, 1978, considered by the Senate committee on November 8, and passed by the Senate on November 28. The bill contains 85 substantive clauses, each of which effects an amendment to a provision of the Canada Business Corporations Act. In light of the testimony presented before the Senate committee, approximately 220 further amendments were made to the bill. About 170 of these amendments were mere language changes to the new French version recommended by a special committee of the Quebec Bar. Most of the remaining 50 amendments were made in response to suggestions of the Senate committee. However, several reflect new suggestions made to the committee or the department during the course of the hearings and during the intervening summer. I should like to thank the Senate committee and its chairman for the diligent and thorough work it has done to improve this bill.

In conclusion, I should point out that the act has been a notable success, that the amendments are largely non-controversial, and that implementation of the proposed new French version at the earliest possible date is highly desirable.

Although I do not want to press hon. members of the House so that they do not have adequate time to consider the bill, I should like to underline that the amendments are very technical and that the corporations affected by the act, as well as their technical advisers, are most anxious to see the amendments made. In particular, the proposed amendments to section 26 are required to enable federal corporations to react to amendments to the Income Tax Act effective in late 1977 and imposing December 31, 1978 as a deadline on certain transactions affecting special surplus accounts. Therefore, I recommend that all members of the House support the bill and send it to committee where it can receive detailed consideration as soon as possible.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I will not speak too long on this bill. As the minister said, it is very technical and it is best dealt with at committee. As far as my party is concerned, there is no need to detain the bill very long in the House.

Aside from the amendments made after the bill received consideration in the Senate, the job done on the French version of it was an excellent one. The people in the Department of Justice, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Quebec Bar Association should be commended for the manner in which they have taken this bill and written it so that it can be used effectively in the province of Quebec. We should commend those involved in the handling of the bill.

Other than the French version, the provisions and amendments to the bill are very technical. I do not think I can say much more at this time. When the bill goes before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, I suspect there will be representations made by those concerned with some of the technical amendments. As far as my party is concerned, this bill should pass and be dealt with further at committee stage.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill, the minister pointed out that many of the amendments are of a technical nature. He could have mentioned something about the structure of the bill.

On the face of it, the bill amuses me. The government is very interested in the bilingual proposition, yet the entire bill seems to have been rewritten. The English version was written on 42 pages including the French section. Then it switches over and there are 160 pages of only French. Perhaps all the Senators are bilingual and understand what the French section applies to, but suddenly at page 42 the English section stops and all we receive is 160 pages of French with no translation. Perhaps the problem is more severe in the province of Quebec, but the minister opened up the entire bill. All the clauses of the bill have been opened, up and therefore there can be a general discussion. I should like to point out that we should have a general discussion.

This bill was put together from the old corporations act which had been amended by other pieces of legislation. This was brought together under the new Canada Business Corporations Act and put into its present form. There were very few changes and modernizations in the bill. Most of the changes were worth while. They affected the shareholders and their operations within the corporation, as well as relationships among the shareholders, the directors and the corporation. A number of the changes made were for the protection of shareholders. These changes have worked out very well for the shareholders. At the present time they have the right, if necessary, to put their stock on the market at a fair market value, and they can get out of the transaction if they do not agree with the board of directors. At committee stage I would be interested in hearing from the minister how many applications were made for the protection of the act in this sense.

One of the major categories affected by the Canada Business Corporations Act is the people of the country, the consumers and clientele. Very little if anything has been done for these people in Canada. On the other hand, citizens of the United States have been able to go after the large corporations. They have been able to bring before the courts some of the transactions which have taken place in boards of directors meetings, shareholders meetings and in the preparation of data and other paraphernalia which goes into the making of reports to directors and shareholders. They have been able to ascertain, on behalf of the customers of the country, whether a certain corporation was working in a reasonable manner. These facts were not foreign when the act was changed; they were fairly well known by some of the provinces. Therefore, a provision was introduced to appoint an inspector who would look at some of the transactions made by corporations in terms of the directors and shareholders to see whether corporations were working as good citizens or living up to their moral liabilities. Yet this has not happened.

This is no longer 1975 when the act was changed. It is now 1978 and we are approaching 1979. In the last four years a number of things have happened. As a private member, the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) was interested in some of the machinations of corporations. He became involved in a very meaningful manner. He was concerned about corporations which were manufacturing unsafe products for consumer use. One of the products he was particularly interested in was aluminum wiring. It is interesting to note that in the United States there is a protection in that there is a provision to investigate companies which are producing something that may involve a safety hazard or a customer hazard, or doing something that amounts to a plain dishonest practice, something that corporations sometimes do.

● (1542)

It was suggested by some of my colleagues when this bill was before us in 1975 that we should have an ombudsman who would be able to look at some of the things corporations are doing, things that go beyond shareholder or board of director responsibility. The ombudsman would be appointed by the government with his expenses paid by the corporation he was investigating. This would mean that in Canada we would not have to wait until the United States, as in the case of Firestone tires, said a thing was dangerous and likely to kill people, that it must be recalled and taken off the market. The ombudsman would be able to look at complaints about a company or corporation so that we would have some corporate protection. In this way there could be an investigation and a report to parliament that changes should be made or products should be withdrawn.

This procedure could be followed under an extension of this act or under other acts. The corporate law in the United States is considerably more flexible than ours. The demand in their legislatures is for less secrecy and more openness. Their legislation requires that it is up to the company or corporation to prove that the release of certain information would be against the interest of the state or the interest of the public. Even then, if the government says that because of security reasons it is not in the interest of the state to release certain information, individuals can go to the courts under two or three procedures and obtain the information.

Recently in the United States individuals were able to obtain information about the hazardous aspects of two automobiles. We could not obtain such information in this country, probably for two reasons. First of all, if the government does not know what to do about a certain product or information it stamps it top secret and puts the material in a file. If that does not happen it is probably because the government does not have the information in the first place.

Specifically I am referring to the problem in the United States and in Canada in terms of the Bobcat and Pinto automobiles. It was established in the United States that members of the board of those corporations in their board rooms considered how much it would cost to modify the gas tanks in Bobcats and Pintos. In their wisdom they decided that a lost life was only worth about $475,000, and that would probably be the average for which they were sued. They decided they would probably have to pay for the loss of about 20 lives at that rate, which would amount to about half what it would cost to make the change. This decision was made in the board room by the directors and management.

Under the terms of this act as expanded, the shareholders and customers could probably have found out about that decision. Under this act citizens probably would have the right to inquire about and obtain the background information for that decision.

In the United States citizens are able to obtain that kind of information through court and other procedures, and this has made high court settlements very possible. In one case I believe the amount of $120 million was awarded in respect of death as a result of an accident involving a Pinto. That award has been appealed. Had such a thing occurred in Canada it probably would have required this government to change the act, adding a protection for the general public. I know this government will not do that as it is not the least bit interested in making any kind of survey or inspection results available to the public.

It is of interest to note that people in this country are still driving around with the same kind of tires on their cars as those that were recalled in the United States. People in this country are still driving General Motors and Ford products without dozens of modifications being made, modifications that have been carried out in the United States. I am sure the same is true in respect of washing machines, lawn mowers and almost any product you can name.

There is one particular field that we worry about, and that is in respect of children's toys. We worry about the fact that a toy fashioned after the craft that Lorne Green flies around the galaxy shoots a rubber pellet that could cause injury to a child. We worry about that fact, and we worry about whether a child might put his head through the chicken wire on the side of a crib. We have done a very good job in this area, but how anyone is going to get his head through a two-inch wire mesh, I do not know.

It seems all right if adults are involved and are killed on our highways, it seems to be all right if an adult blows himself up as a result of a gas inspection not being carried out, and it seems all right if a house burns down because of faulty wiring, so long as adults are involved. One member of parliament mentioned today that the entire side of an apartment building is sliding into a ravine in Hamilton. He referred also to another case of a building that is only two or three years old and is sinking so fast they almost have to add an additional floor on top. This reminds me of the C. D. Howe method of building the DEW line. When a structure sinks into the permafrost you just add more on top and keep going.

Now that we have had the opportunity of seeing that this act works very well in respect of shareholders and directors, with very few having to pay the big penalties, and that it has brought some stability to the situation, it is time we as reasonable people looked at two other aspects. We should make some changes to provide a protection for the average citizen against a corporation which may be manufacturing shoddy goods. At the present time people have no protection through an inspection procedure, or through access to information about a particular product failure.

There are abuses taking place every day on the part of corporations in other fields. When a small company decides to do something that may be useful in a specific industrial field—and I am particularly interested in mining—which may put that company into a competitive position with a large corporation, the large corporation immediately takes over that company and the improvement is left dormant. Many of these small companies are swallowed up by the large companies and things that might benefit the consumers are forever lost.

[Mr. Peters.]

Consumers and consumer benefits are not taken into consideration by those who effect amalgamations. If any consideration is given at all in respect of consumers it is usually detrimental. Citizens should have some protection against such takeovers, amalgamations and the gobbling up of little companies by big ones. They should have protection against this kind of corporate manoeuvre, whatever corporate terminology is used today or even tomorrow. There should be some protection for the individual, the community and the country as a whole. I know this might interfere with the functions of FIRA, but that entity will be noted in history for the four takeovers it stopped and for paying no attention to the hundreds of others that were effected. It does not take very much to convince FIRA what is for the good of Canada.

● (1552)

I suggest that we eliminate FIRA and put its responsibilities under the control of an inspector according to this act. He would probably do a better job as an individual than the whole board of FIRA. It would not surprise me if the Petawawa army base was allowed to be taken over by the United States or China one day simply because FIRA could see some advantages to such a takeover.

I know that all these changes will not be made. This is a lame duck government and we do not expect very much from them anyway. I doubt that they really want to stir up the barrel again.

This bill should have been passed some time ago, but the government could not make up its mind who they would be hurting, who their friends were. I suppose the new changes in the elections act made them totally unsure, but it does not matter one way or the other. We now have an opportunity to look at the corporations bill again and there should be a number of changes made to it.

Something should be done to protect the consumer against the corporate rip-offs which many of these small and large corporations engage in. We should also put in an inspector to determine whether or not the changes being allowed a corporation are advantageous, whether it be a takeover, a roll over, a purchase and so on. Is it a good thing for Power Corporation to take over Argus, or would it be better for Argus to take over Power Corporation? I do not know, but it will make a great difference to many people in this country. Another takeover bid which should be looked into is Simpsons and Sears versus the Bay. Is it to our advantage? Will it increase or reduce the price of shirts?

Mr. MacFarlane: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: My friend from Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) must buy shirts, and maybe he is interested in having somebody inspect this section of the corporations act.

Mr. Nystrom: Wait until Ian Deans runs in that riding.

Mr. MacFarlane: He'll lose his shirt.

Mr. Peters: Somebody will lose their shirt and they are going to have to buy new ones. Takeovers among these major merchandisers must make some difference, good or bad, and we should not remain indifferent. Prices could go up or down, and most likely they will go up. Canadians should have a say in whether or not these takeovers should come about.

It is very important in this House to have a French translation and an English translation of any document. I would like the minister to inform this House some time as to why he had the French and English translations printed separately when normally they are printed on the same page, which makes it easier for comparison. My French is not good enough that I can make that comparison, but some people have that facility, and we are going to be in great trouble with translations if they are put in two different books.

After the election there will probably be a new government. I foresee a minority government, where some of these suggestions of mine will probably be given consideration. I think that the three or four proposals I have suggested are absolutely necessary in establishing a corporations act. The Canadian public is sophisticated enough to know that they are being taken advantage of by many corporations. While the company and its shareholders have considerable protection in this act, there is no act which protects consumers against actions of corporations.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend to take part in the debate on second reading of this bill, but one comment made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) at the end of his speech caught my attention. He seemed to suggest that publishing the French legal text in a separate volume would cause enormous difficulties. At least, this is how I interpreted his comments. I would simply want to say to the hon. member that for many decades, and we could even say for more than one century, French-speaking Canadians have received second class services in their own language.

In Quebec, of course, people are entitled to be served in their own language under our constitutional guarantees, but it is only since 1969, when the Official Languages Act was passed, that any Canadian can now demand instead of begging to be served in the official language of his choice. I do not know what the hon. member was referring to exactly, but for my part, as a Canadian, I can get along very well with a legal text printed separately in French and in English. For many decades we have tried to do all sorts of things to be good Canadians, and I am not at all embarrassed that for once—this occurs very rarely—a French legal text should be printed in a separate volume and not necessarily side by side with the English text as usual. There are of course legal implications for French Canadians in the legislation and it is important not only that the citizens and the corporations that use the French language are aware of these implications, but it is also doubly important for people in authority to be able to compare the English and the French text occasionally. However, Mr. Speaker, what is most important in my opinion is that there be justice for everyone.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I was very pleased, Mr. Speaker, to hear the intervention by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), and I would like to address my remarks to the same topic. The hon. member was absolutely correct in his comments with respect to the difficulties which have arisen in this country with regard to both languages and the understanding of the laws and rules which apply.

It is extremely appropriate that we in this parliament should do things the way in which we do them in terms of publications by ministers, by committees, etc. I am sure that the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria will agree with me that even though a member of the House may be more familiar with one language than another, it is appropriate for those who are familiar with both to make the comparisons which must be made between the texts of the two languages from time to time. It has been a convenience to the House to be able to look for discrepancies between the two official languages when the English version and French version are side by side. I think there is a great advantage in the publication of the two texts side by side for the purposes of understanding.

● (1602)

It is interesting that this matter should be raised on this particular bill. When I have young people come to visit from my constituency and ask questions about the translation facilities in the House of Commons, I can tell them that this is one of the relatively few places in the country where I can speak in the language in which I am most comfortable and my friend from Madawaska can speak in the language in which he is most comfortable and we can listen to each other and understand each other as we are speaking. It is quite an advantage when one thinks about it. This instantaneous translation facility is an extension of the written translation facility that we have. I understand that was the way in which the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) was speaking. It is interesting in a country like ours to be able to sit in a chamber like this one and no matter in which official language a person speaks he can be understood by every one even though from time to time we do not agree with what we hear. It is an interesting phenomenon nonetheless.

There is another aspect which the hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned that is correct. He stated that when this bill goes to committee it is inevitable that that committee will look at the appendix of the bill and deal with the French version of the law respecting business corporations, but also I think the committee is likely to take advantage of reviewing the whole of the law with respect to those corporations.

I hope that when the committee does so it will address one of the great problems facing Canadian business today. Whether we like it or not, there is no policy in this country with respect to business and says to Canadian businessmen when dealing with their own government that they will be given a greater opportunity than businessmen from other countries. If that kind of law is reasonable for other countries and is one which we support, greater consideration should be given to supporting it here. This kind of thing has been brought to my attention by businessmen in the electronics field. When dealing with the Department of Supply and Services they have found that the rules are drawn in such a way that struggling businessmen do not have that opportunity, that is, to deal with some advantage with the government of their own country.

I hope the committee will consider this bill in a way that might give that sense of advantage. I do not think it has to be advantage to the point where competition from other countries is excluded. Small businessmen are not asking for that. But they are asking, recognizing differences in our conditions, for equalizers from the point of view of dealing with government. We should look at any bill dealing with the operation of business from that point of view. When we are considering this bill in the committee I hope that we will bear in mind the problems that have affected us because this country has a branch plant economy.

Recently a conference was held in the Conference Centre in Ottawa. This centre used to serve as a railroad station. The conference had as its participants scientists and great thinkers. They talked about the conserver society, but they also talked about the difficulties of research and development. They talked about the difficulty of promoting research and development in a country whose economy has been dominated in other areas by other countries. It is not unusual that that has happened. We are all to blame because we have allowed it to happen. While this government gives lip service to research and to the necessity of developing Canadian business, what does it do to the forest research industry of this country? It cuts it across the throat. That is what it has done. It is in danger not only of harming research in that very important field; it is in danger of setting it back. It will set back experiments and cause Canada to lose its scientists to other countries. The government is discouraging scientific endeavour in Canada. Those are some areas I hope that will be borne in mind when we look at this bill in committee.

We had a budget that affected the business corporations to be governed by this statute to a great degree. Small business has been damaged by the position taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It has been stated that the government will not even consider, at least at this point, rebates with respect to the manufacturer's sales tax.

We have raised in this House of Commons the damage caused to every large sales outlet and business, some of them governed by this statute, as a result of this government refusing to consider the rebate section. I have automobile dealers in my constituency who say that this measure will cost them $25,000, and it has already affected their current sales. There are appliance sales people in my riding who are affected. Why should these people be made to carry the burden for the government's change of mind? I hope that this matter will be considered, not only with respect to the income tax legislation, but whenever the problems of Canadian businessmen are discussed in the House of Commons.

Then, for some reason or other, the government has decided to close a loophole with respect to a tax advantage given to small corporations. In their discussion they have zeroed in on lawyers, accountants and dentists. The government has not realized that this change will affect artists, artisans, insurance people, in fact a whole range of people who have been advised at great expense to themselves to incorporate. We will consider this in detail when the income tax bill comes forward, but I wonder why a certain segment of business that perhaps deals in unusual ways has been distinguished in some way and set aside. I wonder what kind of consultation this government had with those sectors of the economy it was going to affect. If it had no consultation at all, then they have some time for redemption and the provisions which are set forth in the budget which might affect a segment of Canadian small business might be reconsidered. I hope that will happen and I hope Canadian small businessmen affected by that change will get in touch with this government. I hope the government will be flooded with telephone calls, letters and telegrams.

When something like this happened before when dealing with life insurance problems a budget or two ago, the government finally relented. I entreat the government to consider relenting their position on the manufacturers' sales tax and with respect to corporations. It has had a great influence on the business community. I think there is not a person in this House who does not think it important to promote the interest of the working man and woman of this country so that there is a strong, big private business sector, and an equally strong small business sector. Therefore, we should look at what kind of administrative burden this statute puts on the business sector. It is important that we consider it in that way.

● (1612)

Finally, we must consider the question of openness, the above board, cards on the table approach, that the hon. member for Timiskaming spoke of in terms of the business of a corporation. If this does not happen, there is a tendency toward monopoly. Monopolies are not always unhealthy. However, there are some that are.

From time to time in this country we hear that government monopolies are unhealthy, that the intervention of government in business in a monopolistic way is unhealthy. The tendency of corporations that come to the government for licences to become corporations and, therefore, become private, especially when they become large, have a tendency to promote that aspect of monopoly which is not necessarily healthy. I hope we will also consider the bill from that point of view.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in response to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin). He made some comments in response to what my colleague from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) had said about the translation of the bill. I want to assure hon. members that the hon. member for Timiskaming was not in any way criticizing the French language or anything with reference to Quebec. He was merely pointing out the fact that in this House we normally deal with a translated version of everything that happens. There are two printings of Hansard, French and English. With a bill, one column is in French and one is in English. That is the only point the hon. member was making.

The first clause of this bill reads:

(1) The French version of the Canada Business Corporations Act is repealed and the version set out in the schedule to this act is substituted therefor.

The hon. member was concerned about the 160 pages found here that are in one language only. He would have like to see both languages in order to make more of a comparison.

The hon. member for Timiskaming has been a tremendous supporter throughout his history in parliament of the use of the French language in this country, of bilingualism and the Official Language Act. I do not want to see his position taken out of context and twisted by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria. It is important that that point be emphasized because that certainly was not the intention of the hon. member for Timiskaming. He wanted to see both versions, I suppose in order to promote a greater sense of bilingualism, certainly with regard to this bill. I felt those remarks had to be made.

While I am on my feet, there are a couple of other comments I would like to make. When we discussed this legislation before, we were concerned that the legislation did not offer adequate protection to consumers and to customers of corporations in this country. The hon. member for Timiskaming gave a few examples of that. When this bill goes to committee, we should try to build in more protection for consumers in Canada, those who are purchasing goods from corporations.

Large companies in this country have immense power which is becoming greater with the passage of time. A lot of concern is being voiced in Canada, especially by members of the Conservative party, about the growth of government and Crown corporations. Because of that voice from our political right, a lot of attention has been drawn to the role of government in our society. One thing being overlooked is the role of the private sector, which is absolutely immense. When we look at the corporations in Canada, we see that a few very large corporations, particularly in the resource sector, dominate this country. A lot of these are foreign-owned multinationals which are extremely powerful. I need only look at a few examples close to me, such as the grain business. It is dominated by five very large companies. The Wheat Board, the grain pools and these very large grain companies hold the power.

We can also look at the way some of the food companies dominate the food business in this country. We see the tremendous impact they have on the life of the ordinary consumer. I could give many examples of that. The minister, being a progressive left wing or pink Liberal—I do not know which is the best adjective—is frustrated by the lack of power he has in the law with regard to fighting the power of some of these large corporations. He has said on occasion that he would like more power with regard to protecting the consumers of this country against some of the tremendous powers of the very large corporation.

At the present time we have a commitment from the minister to call in the heads of food companies to explain why their profits are so great. I know he is concerned about a number of things such as the rise in bread and turkey prices. When we discuss a bill like this in committee, we have to look at the power of these corporations. We must do this collectively so far as very large companies are concerned.

Another point that should be made may have been made by the hon. member for Timiskaming, I am not quite sure. Since this bill passed the other place, we have learned that several large automobile companies have secret warranties covering such items as rust, the deterioration of engine parts and the like. This matter came to my attention just recently when I was concerned about the phasing out of premium or super unleaded gasoline. When we examine this bill we should be concerned about corporate secrecy.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) recently made quite a name for himself on a good issue, that of government secrecy. The other side of the coin is corporate secrecy. Much of what is conducted by large corporations is secret. When I try to pursue a matter having to do with food or agriculture, I am frustrated by the secrecy of large companies. I have looked at what is happening in the food business and what companies are doing in terms of altering food, refining it and so on. Consumers often ask me what goes into their food. They ask how it is changed, how it is preserved, what additives and what chemicals are included. Most of that is kept secret by I. T. and T. and others involved in big business. When you try to get that information, it is like hitting your head against a brick wall. It is nearly impossible to get any information. I suggest we look at that aspect of companies in terms of corporate secrecy.

Many people say we have no business doing that, that the government is spending taxpayers' money, that it is involved publicly and in that way it is a public cost. I can argue on the other side, that a corporation is also spending taxpayers' money. They are spending consumer dollars. What difference does it make? Even the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), who spoke on behalf of the Conservative party, has to eat. Therefore, he should be concerned about corporate secrecy as well.

Mr. Kempling: What about socialist secrecy?

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member asks about socialist secrecy. I say to him that at a recent socialist gathering in Vancouver, that was one question to which we addressed ourselves. The socialist parties agreed that governments in Germany, France and so on should exchange information about the multinational companies of this world and the power they hold. In other words, there is too much secrecy by the multinational corporations. If we had more access to information and it was made public, it would be a lot easier for countries to plan their economies and conduct their affairs.

Those are the three or four points I wanted to make. The first point was the misinterpretation by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria of the comments with regard to the French text of the bill made by hon. member for Timiskaming. I assure hon. members that the hon. member is in the forefront of promoting equality in this instance. He has always spoken out adamantly when it comes to the promotion of French language rights.

● (1622)

Secondly, we do not think the bill makes sufficient provision for the protection of consumers. Then there is the question of corporate secrecy. We have been dealing with government secrecy; I think we should take a look at corporate secrecy as well. If we enact strong laws to make sure that information which is of public interest is made available to the public, I think this would be a better country in which to live.

[Translation]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very short. I would like to refer to the comments of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and only to that. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) have already pointed out the importance of clause 1 of Bill S-5. I am going to read it because it is most important for us to wonder why it was decided that only the French version would be printed in the schedule to the act. The first paragraph of clause 1 of the bill reads as follows:

1. (1) The French version of the Canada Business Corporations Act is repealed and the version set out in the schedule to this act is substituted therefor.

[English]

We have every reason to wonder why this approach should have been taken to producing a French version of an act which figures in the consolidated statutes of 1974, 1975 and 1976, chapter 33. I am not sure whether the minister addressed himself to this aspect during the course of his remarks because, unfortunately, I was out of the chamber doing some research. Whether or not there were some serious errors in the French version, as I suspect, I may say one has noticed such before in translations from one language to another. Frequently we find variations between the text of English and French versions of statutes which would cause a great inconvenience to anyone in a court of law trying to decide which version ought to be followed in a particular case.

The most notable example which occurs to me relates to a bill on the fisheries. Just as a matter of interest, I counted up the number of definitions in the English version and compared it with the number in the French version. There were 12 definitions in the French text, and only 11 in the English, or it may have been the other way around. This looks to me very much like laxity, a lack of care in the translation process, which needs to be watched very carefully. Unnecessary problems can be created if definitions do not correspond. It is only recently that the definitions have been given following the English alphabet and, in the French version, following the French alphabet. That is fair enough. Definitions are easier to look up that way. Until very recently they followed either one pattern or the other and the translations were opposite one another.

I find it extraordinary that there should have been such serious errors that the French version had to be withdrawn and replaced with a new one as an annex. The indifference of the translators to this question ought to be underlined. All ministers should take particular care to ensure that when bills are put before the House the French and English versions correspond entirely and there is no chance of misinterpretation on this ground.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. If the hon. minister speaks, he will close the debate.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I think I should take a few minutes to answer some of the questions hon. members have raised and to correct certain misunderstandings.

The appearance of the complete French version in the schedule is due to a situation which arose after the enactment of the new Canada Business Corporations Act in 1975. That act was first drafted in the English language, as was the common practice up to that time, and then translated into French. When the bill was brought to parliament and examined by French-speaking lawyers, particularly by the Bar of Quebec, it became evident there was a good deal of criticism of the French expressions used in the law. Members of the House finally agreed to let the bill go through in the English and French versions on the understanding that the minister of the day would take the raw material of the act and have it drafted de novo in French. So what we have in the schedule is not simply an altered French version; it is, in terminology and expression, a version acceptable to the French speaking lawyers of this country. We worked closely with the Quebec Bar on this project and the draftsmen were French speaking.

Many statutes are now prepared along those lines; the raw material is drafted in English and French and experts in both languages make sure that the final version has the same meaning. What we have in this instance is a version prepared by draftsmen rather than by translators. I agree with the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that it is very helpful in committees of the House to be able to refer to the English version side by side with the French version. The English version can be found in the Revised Statutes—there has been no change, basically, there—but we shall try to arrange that both versions are available so that hon. members who wish to do so may follow them side by side.

Certain other matters related to corporations were mentioned; for example, securities and taxation questions, mergers, foreign takeovers and so on. I consider these to be very important matters but for the most part they are dealt with under other statutes. In Canada, securities legislation is provincial whereas in the United States it is federal.

The hon. member for Timiskaming referred to securities legislation and to the law in the United States. I would remind him that in Canada securities legislation is provincial. Then again, matters relating to the taxation of corporations are dealt with under the Income Tax Act and related measures; for instance, budgetary measures introduced by the Minister of Finance. Mergers are dealt with under the combines legislation. Foreign takeovers are dealt with by FIRA and CALURA deals with corporate reporting. So, while all these things are important, they are not the basic subject matters of the corporations act. The basic subject matters of the corporations act are the incorporation of companies and the rules which relate to shareholders, boards of directors, the publishing of prospectuses and so forth.

● (1632)

I wanted to clear up some of the misunderstanding with respect to the French version in the schedule and also to point out that, while we consider these other matters with respect to incorporations important, they are not usually found in the corporations act. One must remember that corporations, as legal entities, must obey all other laws.

Motion agreed, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

* * *

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING CHARITABLE CORPORATIONS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill S-4, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce for second reading Bill S-4, which would amend our law relating to non-profit corporations. Like Bill S-5, which is legislation to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act, this bill also appears to be a long and complex one, but its size belies its actual content. It is in fact largely a repetition of the Canada Business Corporations Act but modified to make the uniform provisions apply specifically to non-profit corporations and to add a number of new provisions which are essential and which apply uniquely to such corporations.

Of the total of about 15,000 non-profit organizations carrying on their activities in Canada about 3,000 are federal non-profit corporations. To give the House and the country some examples of these, I will mention the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the United Way or Centraide, the Canadian Heart Foundation, the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Cancer Society, Hockey Canada and the Vanier Institute. These are but a few examples of our many federal non-profit corporations.

Although small in number, because many of them carry on their activities across Canada and are perceived as Canadian as distinct from local institutions, their impact on Canadian social life is enormous. That is the principal reason why these institutions merit the special attention of parliament.

On being advised by the authors of the Canada Business Corporations Act proposals that they would recommend enactment of a new statute to apply only to business corporations, in 1970 the department retained Professor Peter Cumming of Osgoode Hall Law School and instructed him to prepare a report on a proposed statute to apply uniquely to non-profit corporations. Professor Cumming undertook immediately to analyze the activities of non-profit corporations in Canada as well as the content of several modern, non-profit corporation laws, and in particular those of the State of New York. Professor Cumming submitted his report to the department in 1973. The department published the report in 1974 under the title "Proposals for a new not-for-profit corporations law for Canada". Like the business corporation proposals which preceded it, the report was presented in the form of a model act accompanied by a second volume of section by section commentary.

Immediately after their publication the department distributed copies of the proposals to a large number of federal non-profit corporations, to the managers of non-profit organizations and to a number of lawyers and accountants who participate actively in the administration of the affairs of non-profit organizations, requesting their comments on the proposed model act.

The department received several major briefs and a large number of specific comments on the proposals and, working in close collaboration with the legislative section of the Department of Justice, began in 1975 to draft a statute in accordance generally with the proposals but modified in the light of the critical comments received. The department's plan was to table the bill at once after passage of the Canada Business Corporations Act in late 1975 to bring the non-profit corporation law into line with the new business corporation law. But because of the criticism of the French version of the Canada Business Corporations Act on which the non-profit corporation law is based, the minister had to defer completion of the bill on non-profit corporations until the new French version of the business corporation law was completed.

The proposals contained three main recommendations. The first was that parliament should enact a discrete act to apply to non-profit corporations which parallels in all respects the business corporation law except that provisions must be modified or added to deal with the specific requirements of non-profit corporations. The second recommendation was that the non-profit corporation law should be characterized with respect to the purposes of the two kinds of non-profit corporations, charitable corporations and membership corporations, and not with respect to the lack of power of such a corporation to issue shares. The third major recommendation was that the proposed law should apply to all federal non-profit corporations including, as well as those corporations subject to Part II of the Canada Corporations Act, all non-profit, special act corporations and all corporations subject to the Boards of Trade Act.

The bill, therefore, by design parallels very closely most of the substantive and formal provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act. As a result, it raises very few new policy issues. Generally what the proposed law seeks to accomplish is to modernize the federal non-profit corporation law and to set out substantive rules and procedures which are familiar to all corporate managers, their professional advisers and government administrators.

The proposed law above all seeks to establish a system that gives non-profit corporation managers broad, flexible powers to manage, subject to the rights of the members of such corporations to participate effectively in the management of non-profit corporations' affairs and to check any abuses by directors or officers.

Because of the extremely technical nature of the bill I do not propose to discuss any specific provisions of the bill at this time, with the understanding that these can be discussed in committee. I would like, however, to mention several of its principal characteristics.

First, consonant with our general concepts of freedom of association in Canada the bill permits incorporation as of right, subject only to the condition that its express or implied purposes must not contravene any law of Canada, particularly the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Second, the single distinguishing characteristic of a non-profit corporation is that, except in narrowly specified cases, it cannot pass through any of its money or property to its members. It can carry on business and may earn profits but, if it does so, any such profits must be applied to further its charitable or membership purposes.

Third, the proposed law distinguishes between the two basic types of non-profit corporations. The first is the charitable corporation which carries on activities which are primarily for the benefit of the public. With respect to financial disclosure it is cast under the bill as an analogue of a business corporation which distributes securities to the public. The second is the membership corporation which carries on activities primarily for the benefit of its members. Under the bill, for the purposes of financial disclosure it is cast as an analogue of a closely held business corporation. It must make full financial disclosure to its members but not to the public.

● (1642)

Fourth, the present Canada Corporations Act characterizes a non-profit corporation as a corporation without share capital. Although the proposed law abandons this characterization to focus on the function of a non-profit corporation, it continues to prohibit a non-profit corporation from issuing shares, since ownership of shares connotes a right to dividends and to share in any liquidation distribution of property of a corporation.

Fifth, the bill does expressly empower a non-profit corporation to issue debt obligations and, subject to qualification of any prospectus by a provincial securities commission, to distribute its debt obligations to the public.

Sixth, like the Canada Business Corporations Act, the bill requires extensive financial disclosure in accordance with proposed regulations.

Seventh, it clarifies the rights of an aggrieved member to a fair hearing in any case where the corporation proposes to discipline him or terminate his membership. It also simplifies the procedures that enable an aggrieved member to seek judicial review of any such action by a corporation.

Eighth, and finally, the bill deals with the distribution of any remaining property of a non-profit corporation on liquidation and dissolution. In the case of a charitable corporation a liquidation distribution must be made in accordance with the corporation's articles or, if the articles contain no such provisions, then to another charitable corporation that has similar purposes and that is approved by a court. In the case of a membership corporation, a liquidation distribution must be made in accordance with the articles or, if the articles contain no such provision, then rateably to the members existing at the time of liquidation and dissolution.

Because the two laws are so closely related, the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce considered together both Bill S-5, the CBCA amendment, and the present bill, Bill S-4. The Senate committee conducted several hearings on the bill, heard witnesses both from the private sector and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and recommended a number of amendments in the light of the testimony presented to it.

To maintain the bill parallel with the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Senate committee made some 30 general amendments as well as some 100 amendments to the French version. In addition, in response to the briefs presented to it, the Senate committee made four substantial amendments. The first was to legitimize indirect voting provisions such as those set out in the constitution of the Red Cross. The second was to simplify the holding of members' meetings outside Canada, which renders the policy of the bill consistent with the government's policy of encouraging foreign non-profit organizations to meet in Canada. The third requires a membership corporation that has solicited moneys from the public or obtained a grant from government to make public financial disclosure as does a charitable corporation. Finally, the Senate committee approved an amendment that excepts a board of trade or chamber or commerce from the right to dissent, treating those organizations differently from other membership corporations on the ground that their functions are unique.

The predecessor bill, Bill S-3, was passed by the Senate in March, 1978 and introduced in the House on April 3, 1978. It did not proceed to second reading and hence died on the order paper at the end of the third session.

Although the bill does not revolutionize the federal law relating to non-profit corporations, like the Canada Business Corporations Act it does attempt to clear away a great many conceptual myths, to eliminate unnecessary formalities, and to render compliance with and administration of the law efficient.

In sum, the proposed law attempts to create a system that assures members and public contributors will be treated fairly, that permits members to participate effectively in the administration of a corporation's affairs, and that, equally important, enables corporate managers to achieve the purposes of such corporations effectively. Thus, like the Canada Business Corporations Act, this statute, although quite long, is clear, comprehensive, and practical.

Therefore, I recommend the bill to the House and hope for its quick passage so it can go to committee for detailed examination as soon as possible.

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to seeing the minister's bill go to committee, as the minister indicated, because, although the bill does not raise any specific policy issues, it raises some general policy issues with which I would like to deal. It is also extensive in terms of its attempt to deal with a staggering variety of non-profit corporations and other organizations in what might be called the volunteer area in our society.

I note in particular that, when the matter went to the other place, considerable discussion took place with respect to the role that some of the organizations might play. I think as we go down the road over the next couple of years, we will find that the role of the non-profit corporation will increase, not only in the area of social policy, as the minister has indicated, but indeed in a variety of other ways, as has already been the case.

Part of the difficulty in discussing this subject is that we tend to look on non-profit corporations as being not entirely productive. They are organizations which we need because their activities are not part of the normal economic transactions in our society. That is something with which we will have to cope very soon.

In connection with that subject, a very good essay was written recently for the Vanier Institute of the Family which puts the matter in good capsule form. Most of us accept the fact that the really important things done in society are done in the resource sector, the manufacturing sector or the services sector, but very often we forget that all of that is held together by what some people refer to as the household and community sector. I dislike the word "sector," but it is one that is used here.

Let me quote from this essay what I think is a very useful and thoughtful comment. Let us suppose we looked at all the activities which have no value in the marketplace and which do not come under the category of the gross national product, and let us see what it would cost us if we exacted a price for them. I refer to the various things done in the household and in the community. The following is a quote from Hugh Stretton, an Australian political scientist, who said:

> How easily we could turn the tables on the economists if we all decided that from tomorrow morning, the work of the domestic economy should be paid for.

The reference here is to everything that is done in the household and in the community. The quotation continues:

> Instead of cooking dinner for her own lot, each housewife would feed her neighbours at regular restaurant rates; then they'd cook for her family and get their money back. We do each other's housework and gardening at award rates. Big money would change hands when we fixed each other's tap washers and electric plugs at the plumbers' and electricians' rates. Without a scrap of extra work the gross national product would go up by a third overnight. We would increase that to half if the children rented each other's backyards and paid each other as play supervisors, and we could double it if we all went to bed next door at regular massage parlour rates.

I might add that that is a quote. I continue:

> Our economists would immediately be eager to find out what line of investment was showing such fabulous growth in capital/output ratio. They'd find that housing was bettered only by double beds and they'd recommend a massive switch of investment—

To the household and community sector.

That is very important because for a long time we have not recognized that all the work which passes for real endeavour in the household and in the community does not fit our economic categories. Anybody who has been in this place for any longer than a week understands that the gross national product is the real trinity of this place. Of course, you can increase or deflate the g.n.p. and accomplish nothing in the process. That is why more and more people will find the use of the non-profit corporation to be of real value to the community. Whatever the changes are in relation to the non-profit corporation, they must be helpful to specific groups.

● (1652)

I went through Bill S-4 as quickly as I could because I only received it this morning, but I could not find anything in it specifically related to non-profit housing corporations. I do not know if they are included in the bill, but some portions of them are assumed to be included in the act. There are non-profit corporations in the housing field which relate to municipalities so that some municipalities have their own non-profit housing corporations. Those organizations are entirely different from a series of private non-profit housing corporations. For example, they have different capital, funding sources, modus operandi and mandates from church groups, labour unions and service clubs.

Even though these people want to contribute to society in areas other than their specific mandates, it should be remembered that private non-profit housing corporations are very, very different from public non-profit corporations. There is nothing in the bill dealing with that area. By indirection the government, without perhaps thinking about it, almost annihilated private non-profit housing corporations. The government did not realize this because it was not paying attention to the fact that it was a different kind of operation, with a different corporate structure.

The same is true respecting the field of culture. I am sure the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) will make comments in that regard. The bill primarily deals with changes as they affect very large non-profit and volunteer corporations.

The discussion in the other place dealt with the Red Cross, boards of trade and chambers of commerce, very large and traditional organizations. But the bill does not contemplate non-profit organizations which will emerge in the near future because of a variety of concerns and needs.

I should like to refer to the very good study "People in Action", a report of the National Advisory Council on Voluntary Action to the Canadian government of one year ago. Using 1975-76 figures, approximately $200 million was spent by the government, divided into 52 programs in 24 departments. Very often when groups are looking for grants, tax advantage or some non-monetary advice on getting into business to serve particular needs, they hardly know where to turn. Although the changes in the act are good for non-profit corporation lawyers, most people find the act difficult to comprehend.

I should like to turn to clause 109 in the bill which specifically deals with the indirect vote. When the other place dealt with this matter, it was quite properly concerned that an organization such as the Red Cross could not gather together all its members in order to have an election of officers and conduct its business. The Red Cross has approximately 80,000 members. It was estimated that it would cost $300,000 in order to bring all the members together in one place at one time. It was felt that the Red Cross could use that $300,000 more productively towards the needs of Canadians, rather than organizing its business meeting. In large sectors across the country, the Red Cross elects certain delegates. Those delegates elect other delegates, and by the time they get through the pyramid, approximately 75 members do the voting.

The clause which allowed for indirect voting was adopted. It is a very good provision for organizations such as the Red Cross. It makes sense, given the size of that organization and the fact that people know it, trust it and depend upon it. Its members do not have to worry about decisions taken which affect them. However, that clause applies to new non-profit housing corporations.

From my experience in this area, I can assure the House that the members should have more control than the clause provides. For a smaller organization of approximately 50 or 60 people which does not have a position of trust gained over time in a particular community, clause 109(3) allows for an oligarchic situation whereby a small number of people control the organization. If nothing else, the touchstone of a non-profit corporation, particularly one which deals in a voluntary manner, is that it must be accountable to its membership. It is absolutely essential that the membership not be shut out by what can be construed to be appropriate indirect election. When it comes to the crafting of corporate legislation for non-profit organizations, it is essential in the name of uniformity that we do not create more difficulties than we have had in the past, particularly if we get into the situation whereby there are more and more of those corporations.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Mr. Crombie.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming)—Communications—Televising of House Proceedings; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Air Transport—Jet service to western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan; the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn)—Labour Conditions—Occupational health and safety of workers exposed to asbestos hazards.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) stood by unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): We will now proceed to notice of motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier).

* * *

[Translation]

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ACT

ADVISABILITY OF AMENDING CURRENT BOUNDARIES

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act in order to change the current boundaries and include the Eastern Townships.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as we heard it, the motion I am putting forward today reads as follows:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act in order to change the current boundaries and include the Eastern Townships.

The so-called select territory now includes Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and that portion of the province of Quebec that is south of the St. Lawrence River and east of Quebec Highway 23, being the highway connecting from Lévis through St-Georges de Beauce with the Maine boundary.

Mr. Speaker, the motion gives us an opportunity to remind the government that areas such as the eastern townships can no longer wait that the great economic and industrial strategies bring about the results expected by the government itself. In other words, we can wait no longer and, as responsible government members, it is not good enough to attack current government strategies. We must advocate immediate and fast implementation of regional strategies, with special provisions for the economically and socially needy areas.

The motion put forward proposes one thing only: amending the current boundaries to include the eastern townships, more specifically the area within a 30-mile radius from Sherbrooke and the eastern part of that city, that is the area bordering all of Highway 1 up to the American border. I could hardly understand someone opposing this, because it would be running counter to the purpose of the current act, questioning its validity and efficiency. In other words, what I am asking for is that an area with competent and hard-working industrialists and a local manpower that can and wants to work be allowed to produce the goods it can make. Of course, producing is not enough because the goods must be sold, and they must be sold at competitive prices. But if to the real costs of production the real and significant transportation costs are to be added, given the distances, we must admit that we are ruining our regional economies, that we are literally emptying our regions and in fact it is totally unacceptable. The great economic and industrial strategies of the government are designed for well to do municipalities and we must demand henceforth that strategies be elaborated for vulnerable regions, that is for poor regions which are running the risk of becoming even poorer. I concede that the proposition I am making today is a very weak weapon to fight back the heavy pressures brought to bear upon us by the present state of the economy.

● (1702)

The motion before us today allows me to raise questions which would normally call for answers, yet these answers cannot be dilatory but must rather be responsible, comprehensive and practical. The first, and maybe I should say the only question is the following: is it necessary to raise the issue of an individual's right to work and whether this issue is restricted to a given area of Canada? Of course, one day we can talk about the right to prosperity and the distribution of this prosperity.

However, to raise the issue of everybody's basic entitlement to a job is perhaps like engaging a dialogue of the deaf and, if one happens to sit on the government benches, he is running the risk of being told that he is speaking like a member of the opposition. I think it is time the government considered the right to work is a top priority because it is the main cause of the present anxiety, and particularly in areas where job creation is more a matter of chance than of economic and industrial strategy.

It must be acknowledged, however, that if it is up to the government to take the lead as far as the recognition and the organization of the right to work are concerned this right will come out of a consensus, particularly at the level of economic agents. Present strategists, and in particular economists, place a large share of the responsibility on ordinary workers, and they do not hesitate to ask them to tighten their belts and to be reasonable, making them believe that it is the only solution. It is probably part of it but it is high time workers could count on spokesmen who will state to everyone that they are not solely responsible for the economic balance and that they will not be the only ones to accept restraints that one can easily agree with them to find unacceptable.

The workers are willing to understand but to them logic lies primarily in facts. For example, how can we explain the sense of social responsibility of a company such as Cadbury which did not hesitate to lay off 500 people for reasons that are difficult to explain and are most certainly embarrassing both for the company itself and for all those who need social conscience as a law for the operation of democracy. In Canada when we ask the workers to co-operate, we ask them first to tighten their belts, and finally to move or to expatriate themselves. Strategists call this mobility and recycling. I am in favour of mobility and recycling, provided there is a possibility of choice. If it becomes a utopia to long for happiness, we should at least have a say in our misfortunes.

Mr. Speaker, the motion I move today provides an opportunity to remind the government that there are needs throughout Quebec to which nobody brings adequate answers and for which government measures are inadequate, if not inexistent. My suggestion today is thus essentially constructive, and even if it is only a means, nobody can question its effectiveness, provided its application in the long term is guaranteed.

I have already mentioned the creation of a department of rural development, the setting up of a developmental infrastructure, the necessity of regional strategies for economic and industrial expansion. This, Mr. Speaker, is the motivation behind the motion which I have moved today, because I feel it can serve as a basis for the right to work. I must proclaim before this government that Canadians want to work and that we must do our utmost to make it possible for them to work, especially in the eastern townships region. To reach this aim, we need our own financial resources, including the budgets which will allow us to create permanent jobs at a minimal cost.

That is the challenge I am now asking the government to accept, and I suggest that the amendment I am proposing today is tangible evidence that the government is prepared to consider our particular needs, especially when it means the right to work for people who are able and willing to work.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am quite pleased to add a few comments on the motion put forward by the hon. member. Undoubtedly, one cannot but endorse this invitation regarding the objective he described a few moments ago, that is the right to work. We are still, as we have been for a long time, favourable to this job creation, and to this fundamental right to a decent job, but, to this end, the programs designed by the government have to result in direct and indirect job creation and in real job creation.

Undoubtedly, the motion before us should make us more aware of prompt us to give particular attention to this area. I trust all the colleagues of the hon. member will want to consider the motion jointly in order to allow all members of the House to make a worthy contribution in the committee. I believe it will be quite a special and interesting opportunity to sit on the committee and to discuss these changes to the boundaries for freight assistance. There is no doubt that the eastern townships would benefit from some changes. That would certainly give us the opportunity also to discuss other regions where changes could be made to give incentives to industry and thus create, not full employment perhaps, but additional jobs, which is urgent.

I therefore understand, what the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) is trying to tell his colleagues. And he does not have to ask if we agree on changes which are aimed at creating jobs. Of course we agree with job creation and for a long time we have been respectful of the right to work. We know full well that at this time the right to work must be respected more than ever, and any change which would help industry will naturally be supported by this side of the House. I will be brief in my comments because I would hope that before six o'clock we could count on the hon. member's colleagues for referring the motion to committee.

Under the circumstances, and especially since this concerns a region in my province, I could not help but stress the importance of this motion. I want to indicate to the hon. member for Compton that it is not this side of the House that he will have to convince of the validity of this suggestion. I can see the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), who certainly agrees with the motion, and countless others from Quebec, as well as the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Caron). As for the parliamentary secretary, we will have to convince him. That is rather surprising, Mr. Speaker. Or else it is just a joke on the House to say that we will have to convince the parliamentary secretary. Those people are in power. Of course the electors of the riding of Compton, like those of the hon. member for Lévis, are convinced that they have some power, that they are in power. Yet they would not manage to convince the parliamentary secretary, who comes from Quebec if I am not mistaken; he would refuse the study in committee of most interesting proposal that could do much to help stimulate and remedy the current economic situation in Quebec.

There is not one single hon. member among my colleagues who is not concerned about the problems we are now experiencing in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Campton speaks of a well defined sector. Other hon. members could speak of their own regions and ridings. My own riding has its problems too, Mr. Speaker; it has its problems but that does not keep me from understanding those in other parts of Quebec or other provinces. So, in light of those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I am making it my duty, which is also an honour, to invite the parliamentary secretary in particular, because he comes from the province of Quebec, he knows the eastern townships very well and he is well aware that right across the province there are people who are waiting for a job. We have people waiting to work. And the parliamentary secretary knows full well that the latest budget cuts have the effect of upsetting certain sectors in the province of Quebec. So perhaps that should be compensated by certain amendments. I see the hon. member for—I always forget the name of his riding; I do not know if it is because he does not speak often enough in the House, but I forget the name of his riding in any case. I am perfectly aware that when the government of Quebec denounced the budget cuts resulting in the loss of thousands of jobs, the Minister of Finance did not answer the questions I put to him to show that serious studies had been made. And I have every reason to believe that the government did not make serious studies on the consequences of those budget cuts. Of course we recommended cuts in government spendings. But they had to be done in the right place and at the right time.

We still have serious doubts about the way those cuts are being made and particularly the absence of analyses on the consequences they could have. In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I repeat, I do not want that motion to die and I am relying of course on the objectivity and honesty of the parliamentary secretary who understands the needs and the consequences of that motion. I see the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) who is also one of his colleagues from Quebec and who I imagime will not hesitate to urge the parliamentary secretary to favour the passage of this measure so it will be examined in committee, and in any case, no one doubts that many members from Quebec and others from both sides of the House will be interested in having an excellent discussion in committee and perhaps open a very valid discussion on other sectors in Quebec and other sectors in Canada. So, Mr. Speaker, I will limit my comment to this: I hope my colleagues opposite will understand the real situation and allow every motion to go at least to the committee stage.

• (1712)

[English]

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): It is a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, for me to rise on this motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act in order to change the current boundaries and include the eastern townships.

I can understand the problem of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier). However, I do think that the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act has been designed primarily and specifically for the Atlantic region, the Gaspé peninsula and the lower south shore of the St. Lawrence River. In these areas transportation is a problem, and that becomes very clear when one leaves Montreal and proceeds along the south shore into the eastern provinces.

I also feel that the hon. member's problem is not only related to transportation but also to the economic and social growth within the eastern townships. The geographical area of the eastern townships is much closer to the markets in Montreal and to the west of Montreal.

This motion affords me the opportunity to review the usefulness of this program. As a member of parliament from the Atlantic region, I have watched closely the effects this program has had on my own province of Nova Scotia and how it fits into the national transportation policy. The Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act is, in my opinion, a very good piece of legislation for the promotion of regional development in the Atlantic region, the Gaspé and the lower south shore of the St. Lawrence River. A fundamental principle of our national transportation policy is enshrined in this act, and that is the principle of equity between the various modes of transportation which support regional development and allow us to establish markets to compete with other areas in Canada.

The essential purpose of this legislation, introduced into the House in 1969 by the then minister of transport who is presently Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), was to extend to the trucking mode the intra and westbound subsidy programs provided for under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Until that time, only the commodities shipped by rail benefited from the subsidies. The provincial governments concerned, the trucking industry and members from all parties recognized the need for such legislation, and it has contributed to the further development of a viable and efficient trucking industry in the select territory, which includes Newfoundland, P.E.I., New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the portion of Quebec which is south of the St. Lawrence River and east of highway 23 for the trucking mode, and Diamond Junction and Lévis for the rail mode. In so doing, it allowed for a better utilization of transportation resources.

If one looks at the various subsidies paid out, one is struck by the very rapid increase in subsidy payments for the movement of commodities by truck.

● (1722)

For example, in 1971-72, $7 million was paid to the trucking mode for both intra and westbound commodity movements. In 1977-78 these payments reached $26.5 million. In addition, in 1974 a 20 per cent selective westbound subsidy was added and the payments have grown from $0.7 million in 1974-75 to $1.5 million in 1977-78.

During that same period of time, from 1971 to 1978, subsidies paid for the rail programs under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, both intraregional and westbound, grew at a less rapid pace, from approximately $13 million to $16 million. As in the case for the trucking mode, it should be noted that the selective westbound subsidy also applies to the rail mode and for that particular subsidy, payments have grown from $0.9 million to $1.9 million. The total subsidy payments under the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act amounted to $45.9 million in 1977-78 and it is estimated that the payments will be higher in 1978-79, principally, due to the increased movements of coal, pulp and paper products and other manufactured goods. The increasing amount of subsidy paid is a reflection of rate or tariff increases as well as growth in the volume of shipments originating in the select territory.

In 1970 we saw the establishment of the federal-provincial committee on Atlantic region transportation. Since then there has been a very high level of co-operation between the provinces concerned and the federal government on these matters and, as a matter of fact, on a wide range of transportation initiatives.

The general trend in so far as these subsidy programs are concerned has been to make them more selective and more responsive to economic and industrial development strategies as designed and implemented by the provinces with the support of the federal government. Members will agree that, in a great number of cases, it does not make economic sense to subsidize the shipment of raw material out of the select territory and then, months later, see them return to the region in the form of various finished products. This, of course, is only a general observation and may not apply to all cases, but given the various factors related to determining the location of firms, or trade patterns and that sort of thing it is a very important one.

This is in fact one of the reasons why the federal-provincial committee on Atlantic region transportation was established. Federal and provincial officials guided by their respective governments now look closely at each application for the selective westbound subsidy and make recommendations as to the advisability of including a given commodity under the program based on a number of criteria. Generally speaking, the aim is to select commodities which are highly sensitive to transportation costs, that have or display a potential for maximum value added in the region, and that are related to the development strategies of the provinces concerned.

As members know, until September 1, 1978, the intraregional subsidy program was a blanket program covering virtually all commodities shipped within the select territory, the select territory including Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and that portion of the province of Quebec which I have already outlined.

In 1972 a major study was undertaken by the committee which aimed generally at identifying in some detail the main commodities moving intraregionally by rail and truck. More precisely, the objective of the study was to identify the commodities for which the existing intrasubsidy was playing a significant role, or conversely, where the subsidy contribution was so small as to be insignificant. This information, together within other transportation and economic data, was subsequently used as the basis for the design of a revised intrasubsidy program.

Following ministerial meetings and extensive consultation with the provinces, shippers, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, the Atlantic Provinces Trucking Association and the railways, the federal minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) announced in December, 1977, the introduction of major improvements to the intraregional rail and trucking subsidy program to be effective September 1, 1978.

Let me summarize, Mr. Speaker, the essential elements of these changes. The most far-reaching one, I believe, is that the intraprogram no longer provides for a blanket subsidy. The program is now selective in the sense that it only applies to a list of eligible commodities or eligible commodity groups that are produced in the region. It should be noted that although selective, there are still a large number of commodities covered; in fact, most are covered by the program. As in the case of the 20 per cent additional selective westbound subsidy introduced in 1974, most farm products, forest products and fresh fish and other marine products are eligible. This reflects recognition of the importance of these sectors to the economic base of the region. In addition, several other primary products and most manufactured goods are also eligible. This new trend away from the blanket-type subsidy will ensure that subsidy funds are spent more effectively and that transportation assistance will be far more responsive to the needs of the region.

The new intraprogram provides a level of assistance equal to 15 per cent of the rates which would normally apply. Also to help ease the transition to the new program, a phase-out period was introduced for those commodities that are no longer eligible. For them, a provisional level of assistance equal to 7½ per cent is being paid beginning September 1, 1978, and will last until August 31, 1979, thereafter being reduced to zero.

Finally, and this is also an important aspect of the changes brought to this program, the intrasubsidy has been extended to the air and marine modes. In so doing, all carriers are treated more equitably and shippers will benefit from a wider choice of transportation modes.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is one criticism in this area from persons concerned and from the shipping industry in the Atlantic area and that is that an appeal procedure has not yet, been put into effect. It seems that transport officials have promised an appeal procedure, but the effort of getting it in place seems to be slow. This would benefit those people who have had their commodities excluded in the east. They could have them looked at and the shipper could have his case heard on a certain product. Provinces are saying that they cannot help a shipper in the area because the appeal procedure has to be set up at this level.

It is important to underline that the effect of the new subsidy program does not amount to a net loss in payments to the region. In effect, the savings incurred as a result of the new program are being reallocated to other essential priority transportation projects and programs in the region.

● (1732)

It is in that context that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Program was announced in 1977. Under this program the federal government proposed to spend up to $125 million within a period of three years, to help improve transportation services in the four Atlantic provinces.

[Miss Campbell.]

This program is designed to upgrade the primary highway network, $32 million to be put into Nova Scotia by the federal government as well as $32 million to be matched by the province. The province, of course, has determined the priorities of which highways. I know that many parts of highways 101 and 103 are being covered under this program.

The program is also to improve transportation and to rationalize freight and passenger subsidy payments within the region. The new intrasubsidy program is in fact part of this package. It may also be worth mentioning that studies are now beginning with regard to the westbound freight subsidy program in order to determine its effectiveness in promoting regional development.

There is some criticism from people in the area who are most concerned, those in industry, that they will not be given the opportunity, before a program is put in place, to be consulted by Transport Canada officials. As we know, this happened with proposed changes that were announced in December, 1977. After eight months of hard work with industry, they were changed to the satisfaction of industry. It is hoped this will not happen again and that the various groups in the Atlantic region and Gaspé Peninsula will be approached this time. As I said, the program includes a major highway strengthening program to which the federal government will contribute $100 million for the costs of approved projects. It also includes a passenger transportation program designed to improve the network of intercity bus service. Of the $25 million total, $4 million is to go to the bus service. However, I understand no proposal has yet been sent by the province of Nova Scotia for improvements to this intercity bus service.

There is also included in this program improvements to local and regional airports, as well as improvements to viable rail passenger services.

The federal government will contribute $25 million over the three years toward bus and airport improvements and, through the national rail passenger policy, a 100 per cent payment of operating deficits on those rail passenger services which are retained as essential.

In summary, since the adoption of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act in 1969, the federal government, with the full co-operation of the provinces concerned, has introduced several measures to ensure that transport subsidies become an efficient tool, in promoting regional development and also contribute to the rationalization and improvement of the transportation system in our part of Canada. I share the concern of the hon. member for Compton. However, one has to look at the objectives, as I have outlined them, in the proposed legislation to see how, over a period of years, they have become effective in a given area of transportation because of distance. The motion implies that transportation costs are an important factor for economic and industrial development in the Eastern Townships. Only a detailed survey of all the industries in the region will reveal to what extent their products are sensitive to transportation costs and, to what extent these costs are a determining factor in lowering their ability to compete in various markets.

The Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act has taken a long time to get where it is today and to be acceptable to shippers of the area. In the future there will be other areas and problems to be ironed out. Perhaps the hon. member should look for a study to see whether his area comes under the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier). I intend to resume my seat well before six o'clock. I hope the House will agree with the subject matter of this motion and send it to the appropriate committee. This is only a request of the government to consider. There is certainly nothing compulsory or mandatory with regard to implementing the intent of the motion.

I hope that as the result of this motion the hon. member for Compton and others on the government side will get a message to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) regarding the whole issue of user-pay and the freight rate structure which takes into account our geography and climate in relation to the markets, where goods are produced, and where people want to travel.

The minister issued a press release last February 17 on the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act in which he said that the interregional subsidy would be reduced to 7½ per cent only until September 1 next year, but there would be a 15 per cent subsidy paid on an agreed list of commodities. These are commodities westbound from the Atlantic provinces and from that part of Quebec south of the St. Lawrence and east of highway 23.

The hon. member sponsoring this resolution wants that boundary moved further west. I do not blame him. There are a lot of communities in the townships west highway 23 that have manufactured products and agricultural products, both raw and processed. They would like better access to the markets of central and western Canada. I support that concept. However, you cannot have it both ways.

The government has been saying we must have competition, free enterprise, and profitability in transportation in Canada. With our geography and our thinly scattered population, it does not work that way. My friends in the official opposition have been spouting the same line about profitability and transportation. If you insist on accomplishing that, you will get a reduction in service and a discrimination against producers of agricultural products and manufactured products. This is as a result of where they are located and their access to the major markets.

We support the resolution. We could have an inquiry, but I do not suppose more inquiries are needed. We would like to see a combination of subsidies and/or equalized freight rates applying to a host of commodities which Canadians are very good at producing. However, faced with competition from central Canada and from outside our borders, they are faced with a very difficult problem in the area of transportation costs.

It would be more appropriate to select modes of transportation most suitable according to distance and the kind of commodity eligible for subsidy. It is wasteful and inefficient to give subsidies to truck transportation hauling heavy bulk commodities for long distances. It is wasteful and inefficient to give subsidies to railroads for small lot shipments over short distances. If we ever reconcile that problem in transportation costs, not only in the Altantic provinces and eastern towships but all over Canada, we will have a much more equitable distribution of our industrial production in this country, both agricultural and non-agricultural.

● (1742)

In any case we support this resolution. We hope the hon. member's friends will agree with him, unless he is moving his motion solely for local consumption in his own riding and in a couple of ridings around it. I am sure his motives are much higher than that, though. He is serious about this and is anxious to obtain the support of members on his side. I trust the motion will be passed, at which point the hon. member will probably want to enter into serious discussion with his hon. friends, including the hon. member who preceded me in this debate, with the Minister of Transport, and with his parliamentary secretary.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think each member of the House should meditate on the statements made by my colleague for Compton (Mr. Tessier), in particular when he asks whether our problem is not that the strategies implemented by Canada in regional economic development and job creation, are those of rich towns. We should also meditate the question he put as to whether some people have the right to work when others do not just because they come from remote or less developed regions.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker—and statistics tend to prove it—the government creates every year more jobs than any other industrialized country of the world. As the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) announced it, we know that in 1979-80, the employment strategy of the federal government will amount to $715 million against $420 to $425 million this year.

We also know that between $200 million and $300 million will go to job creation for young people of 18 to 30. However, Mr. Speaker, it can be seen that these programs which in principle are valuable—for instance the employment tax credit which brings much benefit to businesses—cannot be easily implemented in ridings like those of the hon. member for Compton and the hon. member for Charlevoix constituencies where there is no industrial base. The millions of dollars which are being invested through that program will not really help the most disadvantaged areas but will rather have the effect of strengthening the urban industrial base.

Extending to the eastern townships the subsidy program which was originally set up for the Atlantic region could benefit the industrial infrastructure of that region. But, Mr. Speaker, a federal-provincial standing committee on transportation matters in Quebec was established four years ago by the Quebec and the Canadian governments. There is a similar committee for Atlantic Canada and another from Ontario and another for the prairies. And this committee's mandate is precisely to make a continuous and permanent review of the efficiency of those assistance programs and make relevant recommendations to concerned political authorities.

Of course, I feel that the issue of freight rates is a major item of any industrial development strategy. That review is already under way, Mr. Speaker, and we will have to make a global review of the whole structure of transport subsidies. And considering the areas whose economic potential is very high and which are very remote, for example the north shore of the St. Lawrence River, and considering the iron ore from the Sept-Îles area we realize that sooner or later the whole north shore of the St. Lawrence will have to be included in an assisted or subsidized area. And in Bill C-20 introduced in the House early in this session, review, Mr. Speaker, which every Canadian province has urged us to make as quickly as possible, I know my colleagues of the opposition are not in full agreement because they want to play politics with those important matters of transportation; they are not too eager to pass Bill C-20 quickly. But, Mr. Speaker, precisely in that bill we tabled in the house, a bill to revise the transport policy, we have enunciated a basic principle, and I quote one of the paragraphs of the preamble of that bill, as follows:

3. (1) It is hereby declared that the objective of the transportation policy for Canada is to achieve a transportation system that serves as an effective instrument of support for the achievement of national and regional social and economic development objectives, is efficient and provides accessibility and equity of treatment for users and it is further declared that the objective of the transportation policy for Canada includes the encouragement and promotion of the integration of services employing the most appropriate modes for each service and that it is the responsibility of governments to attend to the provision of the transportation system.

Further on, Mr. Speaker, still concerning the principles of the legislation, it is said that a decision of the government of Canada or of the Government in Canada and one or more provincial governments requires that the achievement of national or regional social and economic development objectives take precedence over the objective of commercial viability.

Mr. Speaker, we are now very far from the scarecrow raised by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) to the effect that the government is committed to the principle of profitability and the "user pay" principle.

Mr. Speaker, hopefully, Bill C-20 will be passed rapidly when the government introduces it in the House. To come back to the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, I believe we should go back over the history of this legislation to see why the legislators decided originally in the twenties and again in the sixties to introduce such legislation.

My colleague for South Western Nova (Miss Campbell) has already mentioned these principles, which are quite easy to understand. Following the establishment of the Canadian confederation under the British North America Act, which contained a commitment towards the Atlantic provinces to build a railroad to bring their products to the markets of central Canada, that is Upper and Lower Canada or the regions of Montreal and Toronto, which are the major consuming areas of our country, it was obvious that we had to assist those areas situated far from major Canadian markets through transport subsidies to bring their products to these major consuming centres. A line had to be drawn somewhere, and I believe that this was done around 1923 when the Duncan commission established by the Right Hon. Mackenzie King recommended that this line be drawn at Lévis and then east of the highway. There was no highway at that time, but centres east of highway 23 were included, I believe, in the review made in 1969.

Mr. Tessier: It was not moved far enough.

Mr. Lapointe: Perhaps, as my colleague from Compton says, it was not moved far enough. Of course, I wish too that Charlevoix were included so that our forest products, for instance paper from Clermont, may have access to major markets with more advantageous freight rates but, honestly, Mr. Speaker, I could not say that the distance between Montreal or Toronto and the eastern townships is as considerable as the distance to Charlottetown, Halifax, Gaspé, Rimouski, Rivière-du-Loup or Matane. I do not think it is exactly the same distance.

But the remarks of the hon. member are very interesting and I believe it is essential that, as members of parliament, we make regularly that kind of remarks to enlighten the administrations responsible for the implementation of those programs. For instance, I am assured that the federal-provincial committee responsible for revising all transportation policies concerning Quebec, as a result of the remarks from the hon. member for Compton, will study more carefully transportation subsidies in the eastern townships area.

Mr. Speaker, obviously the eastern townships have a diversified and relatively stable industrial structure. It is also true that this industrial structure is partly based on manufacturing industries that are facing problems, particularly as concerns textile and footwear industries. But before we decide if the intervention of the government in commodities transportation, as proposed by the hon. member for Compton, might have beneficial results, it is essential to study carefully the objectives of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. Hon. members opposite try to interrupt me by shouting: Question! I do not know exactly what they are saying, Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak until six o'clock, I have seven minutes left and I am going to use them.

Then, that Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act was passed in July 1969.

Mr. Speaker, we have to go back further in time to 1927 and consider first the intention of the legislator of the time, that is when the Maritime Freight Rates Act was adopted in 1927. This act that set up to define the selected territory, the members for Compton (Mr. Tessier) would like to see amended in order to include the eastern townships.

Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to give an unduly long historical background. However we have to go back somewhat in time to determine why the need for this legislation was once felt. As I said earlier, the Maritime Freight Rates Act was adopted following the report of the Duncan Royal Commission of Inquiry which sat in 1926. Among other things, the commission outlined the relationship between some obligations laid down in section 145 of the British North America Act and the situation in the maritimes in 1926. Basically this section provided that the federal government committed itself to building a new railway line linking Halifax to the St. Lawrence. This is how the Intercolonial Railway was built and completed in 1876. You will recall that later, in 1923, it became an integral part of the Canadian National Railways. The Intercolonial Railway was designed to achieve a particular purpose which was to guarantee maritime merchants and manufacturers access to the vast markets of the rest of Canada.

Furthermore, at the outset, approximately from 1876 until 1912 Intercolonial Railway freight rates were maintained to a lower level encouraging exchanges between the maritimes and more crowded regions of central Canada.

But between 1912 and 1927 a succession of hikes in transportation rates reduced the advantageous position of maritime manufacturers. This situation triggered off a wave of vehement protests and discontent in the Atlantic provinces and it was in this context that the then prime minister set up the Duncan commission whose mandate was the following, and I quote:

● (1752)

[English]

To undertake a task of national importance in inquiring into the maritime province grievances . . . The commission . . . should take every opportunity for the fullest and frankest discussion of the economic difficulties facing this part of the Dominion, the endeavours which have been made to overcome them, the causes of any shortcoming in these endeavours, and the most effective and practicable remedies.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker that is a short historical account of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, 1927. It is essential to see how at the time the present limits of the chosen territory were set. The Duncan commission recommended a 20 per cent reduction of the rate on rail traffic originating in the Atlantic division of the CNR. At that time, the Atlantic division ended at Rivière-du-Loup, but the Duncan commission recommended—

Mr. Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Question! Question!

Mr. Lapointe: The hon. member has a vocabulary worthy of the most enlightened parrot. If he can say something other that "Question" Mr. Speaker, perhaps he might rise to intervene in the debate. At that time, as I said, the Atlantic division ended at Rivière-du-Loup, but the Duncan commission recommended that it be extended to Diamond Junction and Lévis, since Diamond Junction, on one hand, was the point of intersection of the Transcontinental and the Intercolonial and on the other hand, the construction of the Intercolonial had been extended to Lévis in 1879. The 1927 legislation approved that geographic definition of the chosen territory which still prevails today.

Mr. Speaker, let us skip now to the present to deal with the legislation directly related with the motion of the hon. member for Compton.

Mr. Benjamin: Let us have the question!

Mr. Lapointe: We are discussing the freight assistance legislation. If the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) cared to listen, perhaps he would not need to make that remark because I am talking specifically about the proposed amendment or the motion put by the hon. member for Compton.

Mr. Speaker, until 1969 only freight moved by rail benefitted from reduced rates, as provided for in the act of 1929.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING CHARITABLE CORPORATIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), that Bill S-4, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, prior to the dinner break I was dealing with the bill, primarily in connection with two points. First, I indicated that over the next two years we will see an increase in the number of non-profit corporations, particularly as local communities become more and more involved in activities which heretofore governments looked after; and second, as a consequence of that, we will have to make sure that we are clear on the kind of corporate structures we are crafting to carry out those specific purposes.

Of course it would be wise for us to give uniform consideration to corporate structures, but I do not think we can assume that uniformity will serve our need. It will have to be the kind of structure—and perhaps they might vary from one place to another—to fulfil the needs of the different communities. I might say in passing that when I spoke earlier I had not had the opportunity to read the background paper on the bill, and I note that although the minister's speech came to us, we did not have an opportunity to study it. It seems to me to be always more beneficial and helpful in a debate if we all share the same information.

There are two matters which I should like to touch upon. Although this bill deals primarily and almost wholly with structure and form in relation to non-profit corporations, I do not think one has to be around government very long to recognize that structure and form very often determine content. The first thing I would like to mention is to remind those who are interested in the matter that, as we become more and more involved with non-profit corporations, particularly those dealing with charitable works, we must remember that there is a delicate balance between the operation in connection with government as non-profit corporations carry out those services which the government would normally have to deliver, and the right to participation.

I well remember a matter which was before the House and which was being widely discussed by the public last spring. There was a note from the minister on May 17 in which he indicated that the circular which was put out restricted political participation on the part of those who engaged either in obtaining government grants or were involved in the government in some fashion with respect to non-profit corporations. There was a clarifying statement, which was a good statement, which ended by saying that, according to the courts, political activities are not charitable activities. I appreciate that from the point of view of form and structure, but when form and structure determine content we always run into the difficulty that there is a tendency on the part of government to try to use that form and structure to organize content, and therefore, either inadvertently or with abandon, not worrying, when they should properly be worrying, about the right to political participation by non-profit organizations.

The second area I would like to touch upon is that, as more and more non-profit corporations are established to deal with local needs, we should find a way in which we can make sure that the purposes of those corporations are related to local government.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

I do not think members of this House need me to remind them that for a long time municipalities in this country had an enormous difficulty in obtaining funding from the federal government for non-profit corporations to meet local needs. Most of those corporations we are talking about deal with such things as non-profit housing, assistance to the arts, theatre, culture in general, sport, and social services. All of those concern municipalities. As a consequence of having at least three, and sometimes four levels of government which participate financially, I realize it is difficult to organize in such a fashion that it is responsive to local needs. That is the challenge. As we deal with the content of what non-profit corporations will be doing in the fields of housing, art, theatre, sport, social services and other cultural events, it is absolutely essential to realize it is dovetailed and connected with what municipalities do in the country. That is their particular, peculiar responsibility.

● (2012)

Certainly in the last ten years there has been a desire on the part of the federal government to have what has been called the federal presence. I assure the government that federal presence has been known primarily because the government seems to have intruded and to be organizing its affairs in relation to non-profit organizations. Rather than organizing its affairs in relation to the needs of local communities through their municipal councils, the government seems to be acting in defiance of them and confusing them. In relation to the federal government's contribution to local needs stems the provincial government's. Provincial governments have their own concerns. Over the next few years it will be absolutely necessary to work harder in order to ensure that as, the federal government participates, it does so through provincial agreements with municipalities.

If the federal government is looking for a presence by the expenditure of its money, then perhaps it ought to remind itself that it can do so by being known for its good work and not necessarily its advertising. The municipal councils of this country have known too often a federal government which has participated and created confusion. That is something which will be of greater difficulty in the years ahead, as community organizations and non-profit organizations within communities participate in order to serve the needs of communities.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks let me say that we on this side have had a great deal of difficulty compiling information respecting Bill S-4. When we looked around to see what was available, we found the bill. We looked at the committee hearings in the other place from which we gleaned some information. But we lacked an information kit from the department, providing some background information. After a couple of calls to the department, we received at approximately five o'clock a booklet entitled: "Detailed background on the paper for the Canada Non-profit Corporations Bill". I am not cynical enough to believe that this was withheld on purpose, but it says something.

If one wants a good debate in the House, be sure that there is adequate information. If one wants a shoddy debate which will contribute very little to the legislation, dry up the information. Perhaps that is what will happen as we consider this bill. I hope not, because it is an important piece of legislation. It is not something I can become really emotional about, but it is a piece of legislation which has been needed for some time.

There are approximately 15,000 non-profit corporations in Canada. Some of them come under federal jurisdiction, approximately 3,000. In the past they have been controlled either under the Canada Business Corporations Act or the Boards of Trade Act. The Canada Business Corporations Act was brought down, put together, debated, and finally passed. The section dealing with non-profit corporations was left out on purpose, because the government felt that non-profit corporations should be dealt with separately. I concur with the government's wisdom in that regard.

Non-profit corporations cover a wide range of activities from health matters to sporting and cultural matters which touch all our lives. The scope and range of volunteer organizations are something which has not been explored adequately. They have the power and ability to react rapidly to situations, far faster than governments. If the bill helps to bring their expertise into focus, then we will have accomplished something.

In the town of Dundas where I lived for approximately 45 years, a young gentleman was set upon by persons unknown and very severely beaten, so much so that he could not work for approximately eight months. No sooner was he out of the hospital and able to go back to work, than his house was burned to the ground by persons unknown. There was a hue and cry to help this man. There was no organization available at the time which could step in and do anything for him. The organizations in the town did not have the funds or structures in place to build him a new house. He had ongoing medical bills which had to be looked after, but no steady job.

The town fathers had a meeting and passed a resolution. They went through the town collecting money, virtually door to door, and received a substantial amount. One thing which hindered them was the fact that they could not say to people donating money that they would be provided with receipts in order to deduct their contributions from their income tax. The reason for that was that the letter sent to the Department of National Revenue was lost somewhere in the maze of mail in the department. In fact I made six or seven telephone calls to the department. To this date I have been told the letter has not been received, even though we know for certain it was mailed. The result of the efforts of the town fathers was very limited. Although some funds were collected to help this individual, certainly it was far short of what could have been done.

Generally speaking, the entire matter of charitable foundations is one which should be examined. I welcome some of the provisions in the bill before us, particularly those which dwell upon the reporting of these foundations. I do not mean to say for one moment that there are any instances of fraud. As far as we can ascertain, there has been very little fraud in this field. We can ask anyone in business for the number of organizations requesting donations in the course of a year, and we will see the potential for something going awry. I have experienced this, and like a lot of people in business I received so many requests for assistance that I developed a kind of defence mechanism. Some businesses will put a dollar amount on what they are prepared to give a charitable foundation or a non-profit corporation of one type or another. Others will say, "Write us a letter and we will put it before the committee within our company which will then judge how much we are prepared to give." Others say yes, but when they get off the phone they forget and do not follow through.

● (2022)

We found, as a result of an investigation I undertook with a group of businessmen at one time, that the city where I was doing business was divided into areas and people in fact almost had a franchise to collect funds in those area. No matter what charity was involved, it seemed that different individuals, through some right, and we could never determine just how, collected the funds, and very often the commission rates were as high as 45 per cent.

When I say I welcome the reporting structure contained here, it is because the public donating the funds has a right to know where the funds are going and how they are being dispersed. I might say that the bulk of the sort of thing to which I referred, that is, the general approach to people collecting money on a commission basis, has gone by the boards—at least I hope it has. Nevertheless, that practice was in existence and was very strong over the years.

There have been organized appeals by people who make an outright business of collecting money, and the unfortunate part of it is we do not see very much reporting about where the money actually goes. I think one of the most blatant cases of that in this country took place around World War II times in the form of the "Bundles for Britain" organization across the country. That organization collected millions of dollars, I suppose, and what actually reached the people who needed it amounted to only pennies. The majority of the funds collected was used up on advertising, overhead, travelling expenses to meetings, rallies, and so forth. The actual amount that ended up with the people in Britain who had suffered during World War II was minimal.

We welcome this approach. The ability of charitable foundations to mobilize public interest and gather funds to help research is something of which we are all aware. I have the greatest respect for those who devote their time to the diabetes research group, the heart foundation, the cancer fund, the cystic fibrosis group and other organizations. Those who collect money, including fire departments and various service clubs assist in keeping this research going, with the help of federal and provincial governments. This is a way in which we can express our concern. I know the people in the florist business are unhappy when they see an obituary that says something like, forget about the flowers and send a cheque to the heart or cancer foundation, but people like to express their feelings in different ways. Many people I know prefer to send a cheque to one of the worth-while charitable foundations that are contributing tremendously to health research, and we should encourage them.

With this inflow of funds there must be a structure in place to see they are handled properly and meted out to the various research organizations which fulfil the functions set forth in their individual charters. From that point of view this measure is good.

I noted in reading the minutes of the proceedings of the other place that the department has a kit it intends to send out to these charitable organizations which report on an annual basis to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister would be doing us a favour if he were to see that each member of parliament received one of those kits. In carrying out our duties as members of parliament we come into contact with many of these organizations. If you sent out a questionnaire to members of parliament I am sure you would find that most members are directors, honorary members or patrons of one type or another of charitable foundations. We could do a good deal of missionary work by spreading information about this bill and the requirements various organizations will have to adhere to in coming years.

We note there is a five-year compliance period in the legislation and a further period during which an organization which has slipped by for five years can get back in through an appeal to the governor in council. This is a wise provision and a good way to go about handling the measure. People who work with these charitable foundations, non-profit corporations and membership groups, are usually well-intentioned and well-informed and I would not want to see a club held over their heads. By taking this five-year compliance approach we are allowing them to review their charters, their bylaws and regulations, and a sufficient time to review the legislation in order to determine how it fits in with their organizations. This also gives them an opportunity to amend their constitutions, bylaws, charters, whatever the case may be, in order to comply with the provisions of Bill S-4.

Let me return to the matter regarding information given or not given to us. The preparation of this measure has been going on within the department for a number of years. The department has been trying to get a handle on non-profit corporations for five or six years. As the minister mentioned, the department employed Professor Peter Cumming of the Osgoode Law School to carry out a review. He produced a report, and it would have been very helpful if we had received a copy of that report along with the background detail. This would have given us a much more in-depth idea of what is to be required, and would probably have resulted in faster passage of this measure through the House and the committee.

We have no desire to hold this measure up unnecessarily, but we are at a bit of a disadvantage in that it is to be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The Christmas break is looming and we have the chairman of that committee telling us he would like to have this measure considered and reported back to the House before the Christmas holidays on the twenty-first, yet we really do not have adequate information. My colleagues will do their very best to see that this bill moves along at an appropriate pace. If the information is forthcoming it will be passed, but if the information is not made available it likely will not. That is the size of it.

● (2032)

There are many other aspects of this bill on which I could speak. I assume that when we get into non-profit corporations we touch many organizations somewhat international in scope and that many of our Canadian charitable or non-profit corporations are branches or affiliates of organizations in other countries, particularly in the United States.

One of the difficulties facing our department of tourism today is that these organizations are prohibited from coming to Canada to hold conventions, which means a loss of many tourist dollars. Although both countries say that it has nothing to do with the legislation passed that dealt with Time magazine and the closing of the border to American television advertising in Canada, this legislation has caused a good deal of resentment in the United States, and it is one of the reasons that these organizations do not come to Canada. Through an amendment made by the Senate, non-profit corporations and, I suppose, charitable foundations and membership corporations, if they so desire and if I read it correctly, will be allowed to hold their annual meetings outside Canada. I hope that reciprocal regulations will be extended to American non-profit corporations. At least it shows that the government recognizes that there is a fault in this regard.

Another aspect of this bill deals with the closing out of a particular corporation and allowing those three types of organizations to merge. Where there cannot be an equitable agreement on the distribution of any funds remaining, there are provisions for the appropriate organization to apply to the courts to have the distribution made.

We do not make enough use of non-profit organizations and particularly charitable foundations, in this country. Several members of service organizations have spoken to me about this. The president of the Rotary Club in Burlington said to me recently that his club at one time undertook many charitable functions in the course of a year and that it now seemed to him that the government had more or less taken over this sort of activity and did not seem to be too interested in organizations like the Rotary Club, Lions, etc. taking on charitable activities. In my constituency there are many senior citizen accommodations which were made available as a result of the work done by such organizations, and I for one would like to see them taking a more active role again.

These organizations can fill the gap and ease the drain on the public purse. They gather together people with tremendous backgrounds. We have to get more of the public and community spirit back into such acts. I may be old-fashioned to say so, but at one time I got a great deal of pleasure out of giving to charity and not getting a receipt for national revenue purposes. I enjoyed imagining someone in the organization saying, "I wonder who gave us $100." I enjoyed this more than the approach we have today when someone says, "Will you give us a donation for so and so? It is tax deductible." I realize that we are working on a larger scale today and things are no longer the way they were, but I think a lot of pleasure and real compassion have gone out of charity giving because of this approach. Perhaps getting some of these service organizations back into the field through legislation will help to change this trend.

If this legislation were to provide a framework and guidelines within which such organizations could work, I am sure the pattern of how they operate would be adopted by the provinces which would in turn probably introduce parallel legislation, if they have not already done so.

I hope the minister will listen to our pleadings about inadequate background information, and that the next time he has a piece of legislation to bring into the House he will remember our pleadings and see that we are adequately informed before we enter debate so that it can move along at a good pace and we can make some progress.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I am not going to speak long in this debate, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to make two or three points which I hope will be useful to the over-all context of the discussion, particularly as the bill goes to committee for more detailed examination. It has struck me that both the debate we are having now with respect to non-profit corporations and the debate we had earlier today on amendments to the Canada Business Corporations Act which, by nature, was primarily a linguistic amendment, more or less hit at the root of the way in which our society operates today.

I can remember hearing a very fascinating speech approximately two years ago, given by a former member of this House and of the present administration, the Hon. Eric Kierans, who talked about the evolution of corporations in the European-North American context, and in which he stated that the whole notion of the corporation and its importance in our society is a relatively recent phenomenon. I would like to talk more about that, because I think it is wise to keep this theory in mind in terms of the major amendment which is before us this evening.

It is important to note at the outset that this particular piece of legislation provides some kind of federal structure for two basic kinds of corporations as defined in the act. As I understand it, we are to have two kinds of membership corporations, one which basically carries on its activities for the benefit of the public, and is therefore defined as a charitable organization, and one which carries on its activities primarily for the benefit of its own members. In either instance these are not commercial enterprises in the true sense of the word. Such corporations—the minister himself has stated that there are some 15,000 of these bodies in existence—are really a recent phenomenon. I do not wish to sound like Methuselah, because when I say recent I am talking about the last century, and in the history of mankind that is not a very long time.

We have become so accustomed to having these institutions around that we have, by and large, taken them for granted. It is stated very clearly in the background notes for Canadian non-profit corporations that basically the bill is cast as a registration statute. The bill states unequivocally that a corporation has the capacity and also the rights, powers and privileges of a natural person. That, I would contend, is a very interesting phenomenon. In a sense we are providing a more up to date framework for a situation where we are creating an artificial person. That is really what a corporation is under the law. It is the creation of an artificial person for the purposes of certain rights, powers and privileges. It is an artificial person in an ultimate sense that there is no individual person who carries responsibility, liability, or who exercises certain privileges. Because of that fact and phenomenon, in a business sense we have seen evolve in our lifetime a whole new category of "persons" which exercise power in our lives, of a very great magnitude.

● (2042)

In our lifetime it is interesting to note that we have corporations which are much larger than even nations themselves. Some of the largest corporations that exist in the world today,—and I am thinking of corporations of the size, say, of General Motors, or I might even use the description of some of the very large religious bodies that exist that have millions of members,—exist for the purposes of this act as persons within our country, and yet they are not persons. I mean that it is possible for them to make decisions which ultimately affect all our lives without any individual being responsible. To me that is a very great responsibility. It is one that we will have to reflect on at greater length as the years go by.

When I realize the particular definition or responsibility that we are talking about this evening has to do with creating more order and hopefully less government regulation or less discrimination with respect to the operation of non-profit corporations, I am somewhat troubled that we have continued to provide a framework or to provide legitimacy, if you like, for corporate activity in our society without ensuring that it is fundamentally responsible to people.

It is quite one thing to provide a framework for either commercial or non-commercial corporations under national law as we do today, but it is quite another to think of the way in which corporations exist which are not covered under domestic law. Certainly that is increasingly the case with a growing number of transnational corporations. I will not take the time of the House this evening to go on at length about the problems that are being encountered in various United Nations forums in trying to deal with this phenomenon. We have only to deal with the problem that we have in our own situation of trying to ensure adequate disclosure.

I am delighted to see, in this particular legislation we have before us, that there will be much more effective disclosure than is presently the case for non-profit organizations. Although I have not studied it, I would assume that some similar forms of disclosure exist for the Canada Corporations

Act. Perhaps that is something we can explore in committee, or maybe the minister may want to set me straight if I have it wrong with respect to the bill that covers the larger area of commercial legislation, that is, the Canada Business Corporations Act.

I think we must be sure that as corporations, whether commercial or non-profit, receive greater privileges and rights in our society, that that comes with an exercise of greater responsibility. Responsibility must ultimately be in the area of disclosure. The right of the public is to know and to exercise some kind of response when corporations obviously trespass on the basic rights the minister refers to when he talks about this bill ensuring corporations that are registered under it will be operating in harmony with the Bill of Rights. I think that is what he said this afternoon.

That in itself struck me as being interesting. I would like to have heard him speak at greater length about that. However, I am pleased to see that he views this legislation, no matter whether there are 3,000 or 5,000 non-profit corporations registered, as insuring that they will in effect operate in conformity with human rights legislation. I would hope that we might ensure that all federal legislation, in terms of both legislation and regulation, would operate in such fashion, although we know that is not always the case. However, I commend the minister in this instance for ensuring that that framework will exist.

Also I believe it is important, as pointed out in this background document, that, as it says, "The bill requires mandatory financial disclosure by a membership corporation to its members and by a charitable corporation to the public." Here the distinction is made between the two types of non-profit corporations, those that basically serve the membership and those that service a wider constituency. This business of public disclosure, as my colleague, the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) mentioned, is very important. In this day and age when billions of dollars are being raised by charitable organizations, it is important that the general public, as well as the direct membership, be fully assured that these moneys are being raised for legitimate purposes and that the money is being efficiently and responsibly dispensed. So I look forward to the disclosure that is to take place.

May I say that I am particularly concerned about this section because I have attempted to gain, over the last year or two some accurate picture as to the situation in terms of the registration of charitable organizations, as Your Honour is well aware. I have found it most confusing. Perhaps this is because I am not a lawyer and I am unable to understand all of the legal arguments that have been put forward. But as far back as about two years ago, about two ministers, as my colleague from Esquimalt-Saanich says, two ministers of national revenue, I have been trying to find out even the names of those registered as charitable organizations in the country. Quite frankly I have been baffled and I do not think it has ever been properly explained on the floor of this House, and certainly not in any correspondence with me, why it has not been possible for the Department of National Revenue to make available a simple list of those organizations today that have received a charitable tax number and that are in the position of being able to offer charitable tax status or benefits to those who contribute to them.

In most instances individual organizations which solicit support will tell you whether or not they receive that status. This information is required when filing income tax returns, and yet in requests that I have made on the floor of this House and in correspondence to successive ministers, I have never been given an answer. Usually I am told that it would create some such thing as too much paper work or, in the disclosure of this particular information about the specific names, that somehow or other this would be giving information that would be either damaging, dangerous, or a disservice to these particular organizations. I cannot for the life of me understand the kind of rationalization or lack of response in this area. Therefore I register the mild hope that this particular bill will encourage the new Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) to be forthcoming on this matter.

I think this is a basic right of the people and taxpayers of this country, to know on an annual basis, if you like, those that are registered for purposes of charitable donations. If anything it will be one form of insurance where an individual may—because we have had cases of fraudulent situations reassure himself that the organization he is giving money to at a specific point in time has been registered, or has been registered for a period of years, if he wants to know that there is some continuity of likelihood of that organization being able to carry on and fulfil the objectives set forth in the pursuit of its particular program.

I look forward quite optimistically to having a more regular statement. I do not want to know in a detailed way each and every charitable organization's activities, or the disbursement of its funds. I presume that information will be available to those who want to inquire directly of a specific organization. As I understand it, that will be the law. I do think it is not beyond the range of responsibility and possibility of a government to provide an annual list.

Certainly I will press for that to take place on a regular basis.

● (2052)

There is something else about which I am concerned. This will come as no surprise to members of this House. I refer to the way in which the government treated charitable organizations when they began to raise issues embarrassing or disturbing to the government. This goes back over two or three years.

I recall the first instance when this became an issue. It was about two years ago. A particular religious group was demonstrating about the rights of certain people who were being discriminated against in the Soviet Union because of their religious views. In that instance, a particular group in Canada was advertising that it was going to demonstrate in front of the Soviet Embassy. When officials in Revenue Canada heard that this organization was going to carry on a demonstration against the Soviet Embassy because of what was happening to some of their confreres in the same religious group in the Soviet Union, Revenue Canada suggested in conversations with this group they would not get their charitable status renewed. Apparently they had suspended it for a period of time and it was not going to be renewed if that group participated in that kind of political activity. There was quite a row raised on the floor of this House about that kind of intimidation. The threat was then withdrawn.

Less than two years later a more recent minister of national revenue issued a set of guidelines, so called, that were circulated to all groups which had this charitable tax status, listing the kinds of proper and improper activity which they could engage in, a kind of setting forth of the guidelines for acceptable political activity.

Putting it the other way, any group that engaged in political activity would, according to the definition of Revenue Canada, soon lose its charitable number. Again this whole position was based on the flimsiest kinds of grounds.

First, it was based on a couple of court cases that were certainly not recent and which showed very little relevance to the present situation. The interpretation that was put on these cases went, from my point of view, away beyond what those particular cases in effect decided. I thought it entered very much into the situation of departmental officials, if not ministers, beginning to intimidate or to some degree limit the freedom of action of charitable organizations of this country. From the number of groups I heard from—church groups, service clubs, voluntary organizations of one kind or another—this did not go down well. It did have the effect of raising some very real fears among these groups as to whether the government might be able to cut off their charitable tax status. We still have not resolved that issue. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, the government finally suspended or withdrew the particular memo. However, he very much implied in the answers he gave in this House that the basis on which those regulations were set out still stood. There has been no substantial clarification or clearing of the air on this very contentious matter.

We are left in a real dilemma as to what are the criteria, the acceptable role if you like, of charitable organizations. We are also left with the question of who really decides what those criteria should be. Unfortunately, the danger still exists in terms of the kinds of intimidation that can occur, even in this legislation.

On the first page of the background papers, there is this intriguing and somewhat disturbing statement, and I quote:

—the bill, although it applies specifically to non-profit corporations seeks to achieve the same general goals as does the CBCA; that is, to set out a legal system that is clear, comprehensive, and practical:—

No one will disagree with that.

—to minimize the scope of the administrative discretion exercised by department officials;—

That is to be commended. Here is the important part:

—to relegate to the regulations the detailed rules, particularly the financial disclosure rules; and to simplify all statutory formalities with a view to increasing operational efficiency in the respective offices of the corporations,—

It is still implied very clearly that there will be a section for regulations or, as it states, detailed rules, not just the ones having to do with financial disclosure but perhaps other interpretations that some zealous official might put on what is a properly constituted activity of a non-profit organization in the charitable field.

It is becoming increasingly clear that we must have a good airing of this matter. We must have a thorough public examination of the role of charitable organizations in our society today. The more I have thought about this whole debate and the issue of contention that has existed here with successive ministers of national revenue and their officials, the more I have become concerned about some of the attitudes or philosophic assumptions on which some of this debate has been based.

There has been almost an automatic assumption that somehow or other the activity of charitable organizations and political issues are mutually and totally exclusive of one another. Quite frankly, that is extremely superficial. If one thinks about the very nature of charitable organizations, the reason for which a great many of them are brought into existence, one realizes in many instances they have been brought into existence to deal with issues with which the government or elected authorities have not come to terms.

Certainly most of the major social changes and improvements with regard to governmental responsibility over the lives of people very often began with voluntary associations or charitable groups. If we think of improvements in the situation with respect to people's housing, the provision of various social services, the whole issue of medical care and health services, many of these began with groups and associations that were purely in the charitable field.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, and anti-slavery.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): And anti-slavery, as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) reminds me. Many began in a voluntary way. It was only a few years down the road that governments decided to exercise their responsibility on behalf of all of society.

If a very strict interpretation had been put on this from the beginning, if at the outset officials had narrowly defined the issue of political activity as that famous circular did earlier this year, where would we be now in terms of responsive and responsible society? We would be in a very sorry state. That is why I am quite alarmed and very much concerned that a government minister or an official would think that somehow or other we could separate this into the kind of watertight compartments envisioned in that regulation.

If a charitable organization is being responsible, it will from time to time likely be involved in issues, sometimes of controversy, and sometimes of criticism of those in positions of authority. If we are going to have a narrow definition, if we are going to have regulations that prohibit the expression of opinion, even to lobbying from time to time on specific issues, we will not only do a disservice to charitable organizations and the basis on which they exist today, but we will do a major disservice to ourselves and our society.

Therefore, I simply argue at this point in the context of this bill that we not begin to envision regulations or begin to have narrowing definitions that really take the life, heart and some of the purpose out of what has been of primary importance in the activities of charitable organizations. As the minister knows, there are only 45,000 to 50,000 of these, and only a small number are registered for these purposes under this kind of legislation. Many would never seek nor in fact need this kind of national registration. What happens, of course, is that the major ones come under this kind of law. Therefore, any change they make will set the style, pace, and direction which many of the others will follow.

I hope in committee there will be more opportunity to explore this area. It is of very great concern, particularly having seen the many instances in the last year or so when officials who are either overly sensitive or overly narrow in their definition, or simply not realistic, impose the kinds of restrictions that do nothing but harm to voluntary and charitable activity in our country.

● (2102)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this may not be the occasion of a very exciting debate but I should like to register the opinion that some very important things have been said by all those who have taken part in this discussion. That goes for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) and for all my friends to the right who have spoken.

I should like to underline some of the things which have been said, and perhaps add two or three words. First, may I refer to the comments which have just been made by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) about the relationship between work done by voluntary, non-profit organizations and the services which are provided by the state through various agencies. I subscribe to the views he has expressed in that connection. I go on to say, as I have done many times in the House, that the thing of which I am most proud about the public life of this country in the last few decades is the fact that we have greatly improved the services which are available to our people. Those services include not only maintenance of income but a whole range of health programs which are available through the various health centres. I think of areas such as rehabilitation and assistance to handicapped people in many ways. There just is no comparison between what was available two or three decades ago and what is available now. However, I did not rise to make that speech—members have heard it made a few times before.

I simply want to say that as one who is most excited about the gains we have made in the public sector, I join with all those who have spoken in saying that a very important sector in our society is occupied by voluntary and non-profit organizations. The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) mentioned some of them, and other organizations have also been mentioned. I think of groups that work with crippled people, associations which are interested in paraplegics or multiple sclerosis patients.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

We all know our own constituencies best, and in my own constituency I think of organizations like the Ellen Douglass Association which works with the staff and teachers of the Ellen Douglass School caring for crippled and handicapped children. I think, too, of the work done by the Manitoba Association for Crippled Children and Adults. Such organizations do a tremendous amount of good work. They are pioneering in efforts the state may yet take over, and they are doing a tremendous service. They deserve recognition. They deserve this bill—I wonder whether many members have gone right through it to determine whether its substance matches its volume.

I think of various groups working with youth, with women, with boys and girls. There was an organization known, not long ago, as the Boys Clubs of Canada; in keeping with the times it has become the Boys and Girls Clubs of Canada. Then there are the veterans organizations. Today, a number of them work not only with veterans, disabled and otherwise, but are branching out to render services to civilians who suffer from disabilities of which they have experience. War Amputations of Canada is an outstanding example of this. And, of course, there is the Sir Arthur Pearson Association for the War Blinded.

We do well to take these few minutes today to pay tribute to the voluntary organizations, the non-profit groups that do this kind of work. I know that when I visit a place like the Ellen Douglass School in my own constituency I am impressed not only by the kind of service which is given but by the patience and the warm, human touch of those who teach and care for these disabled and handicapped persons. They deserve whatever praise it is to have their work mentioned in the House of Commons.

Having joined in that rhetoric—it is part of this debate and I regard it as important rhetoric—I want to support as strongly as I can one other theme which has been mentioned by previous speakers. The theme I wish to support has to do with the income tax regulations. I listened with interest to the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth saying it used to be more exciting to give for the sake of giving than to give because you get an income tax rebate. But today that is part of the way in which our society works, and many organizations of a voluntary character depend upon the contributions they are able to get because income tax deductibility is available to those who make those contributions.

I found it quite disturbing a year or so ago when the Department of National Revenue put out guidelines or a circular which seemed to warn some of these voluntary organizations that they had better not get mixed up with anything which might sound to the department as if it were political, or that they had better not be critical or caught saying anything which might be embarrassing to the government, if they wanted to keep their tax status. Surely, groups of people who are working for the good of their fellow human beings on a voluntary basis ought not to be looked upon with suspicion by the government as though they were trying to get income tax deductions they did not deserve. I am not satisfied that the matter has been fully straightened out even yet. The previous minister did not get it straightened out in this chamber, nor did he do so in the other chamber. And since then he has lost that job. Of course, members of the other place go on and on—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): For ever.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not really. They are only allowed to go on until they reach the age of 75. Fortunately, that is not the case in this chamber. At any rate, I am glad two or three hon. members have made this point tonight and I hope the government will take it seriously.

There is one other thing I want to say. I find it rather strange that the government should have brought in this bill at the very time we have learned that as part of the program of cutbacks the Department of Supply and Services has instructed its publications centre to cut down drastically the amount of government informational material it makes available to libraries generally, and to university libraries in particular.

• (2112)

Like many other hon. members around here I have been waiting for several days to participate in the question period in connection with this matter. When one waits several days and does not get into the question period, he falls back on Standing Order 43. That is why I moved the motion under Standing Order 43 I did today to make the point. I am sorry that the new Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) was not here to hear my motion, but I shall see that he knows about the proceedings both this afternoon and this evening. For a government which is talking about wanting people to have greater access to government documents and government publications to be cutting down on the extent to which it is prepared to make those publications available to the libraries of this country, and to be imposing particular restrictions on university libraries, I think is a very sad mistake.

It is perfectly true that we are getting letters about this matter. I am glad we are, and I hope the letters are coming not only to us who are private members in this House but also to the government. I know that every time we stand up in this House and say "This is a cutback which ought not to be made," the government says, "Well, we have to cut somewhere." Mind you, the government cannot say to us the things it says to my friends to my right as to which way they are going. We just happen to think that involving government in the life of this country is an important way to advance the cause of civilization. We do not advance the cause of civilization when we cut back on the material which is made available both to libraries which are open to the general public and to our university libraries.

I hope that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who is here for this debate and who, I hope, is following it, will take that message to his colleague, the new Minister of Supply and Services. I understand that some of the ministers who have taken over departments they did not have before are wrestling a bit with some of the decisions they are expected to implement. I hope the Minister of Supply and Services will see fit to reverse the decision about supplying government publications to libraries generally, and to university libraries in particular.

Those are the few thoughts I wanted to add to this discussion. This debate may not reach the crescendo of excitement we sometimes get around here, but I believe we are talking about something which is very important in Canadian life.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, remembering the remarks which have just been made by my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to the effect that we are talking about something important this evening, I am frequently puzzled by the priorities assigned by this government to the legislation it brings before this House. I just happened to look at Friday's Hansard, and I noticed on page 1941 that the order of business as set forth by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) was, first, Bill S-4, legislation respecting non-profit corporations, and then Bill S-5, Canada Business Corporations Act amendments. The order in which we have dealt with those two bills today has been reversed. Then came Bill C-13, amendments to the Electricity Inspection Act and the Gas Inspection Act. Then came legislation dealing with the Canada-France trade agreement, which is facetiously described as the champagne bill. In the present state of Canada's economy these are considered by this government to be the bits of legislation we should be studying.

True, we have dealt with a number of quite important bills since we came back here in October. We have dealt with the family allowances bill, the old age security bill, and the unemployment insurance bill. Some of these bills have gone through, and some are still in committee. We dealt with a borrowing authority bill. The government had to backtrack on that one. It had to move back from $17 billion to $7 billion. It had to lop off $10 billion because it could not tell us where it was going to spend it.

This afternoon and this evening we have been dealing with two bills, Bill S-4 and Bill S-5, which by their dimensions at least are important. The bill we are considering now is 150 pages in length and contains 242 provisions. I would like to come back to that in a moment. However, as I say, I am puzzled by the priorities this government set for its legislation. Where, for example, are measures which would deal with the key problems of unemployment, inflation, and business uncertainty, which are facing our country today? Where are the ways and means provisions which flow from the budget? Where are the changes to the Income Tax Act which are required? Where are the changes in the excise tax law and in the customs tariff law which are required? We are still waiting for them. The country is waiting for them. Business is waiting for them.

We have before us Bill S-4 and Bill S-5, which set up elaborate paraphernalia and structures to create and to put corporations in place, be they non-profit corporations or otherwise.

I did not have an opportunity to be present at the hearings regarding this bill which took place in the Senate. We learned on Friday last that this bill was to be before us today. I have not had a chance to see what representations were made to the Senate by non-profit organizations, about their concerns regarding the complexities of the structures which are set out.

I wonder if those who drafted this legislation ever considered such small charitable or non-profit organizations—à buts non-lucratifs, as it is aptly put in the French language—as the organization which is set up to ensure that the leg-hold trap will be abolished in Canada. That is a small group. It gathers dollars and fifty cent pieces from school children and adults all over Canada, but in order to quality as a non-profit organization this group has to subscribe to this bill comprising 150 pages and 242 clauses. This organization will have to have a lawyer. It will have to pay subscription for lawyer's fees in order to make sure that they are operating within the law. It seems to me that a non-profit organization is a non-profit organization is a non-profit organization. I cannot see why we have to use 150 pages to define one. There are some—they are specified separately here—which have a somewhat different nature. I refer to chambers of commerce and the like, but what about voting powers, proxies, and that sort of thing? I am sure those provisions are not needed for all non-profit organizations in Canada.

My friend, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), mentioned the number of non-profit or charitable organizations there are. I recall putting a question on the order paper about three or four years ago. I received an answer saying that there would be so much work involved in producing this kind of information that it would not be economically feasible. As my friend was speaking, it occurred to me that there is one way of doing this. There must be a list somewhere, there must be a list in Revenue Canada, otherwise there would not be a little X, Y, Z number. Maybe they have the SIN too, I am not sure. If they do not have one, they can invent one, as my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) said, because that is the new system. If you do not have one, you invent one and you proceed in that way.

● (2122)

There must be a list of the organizations which are given the right to issue receipts for income tax purposes. Where is it? I would say it is with Revenue Canada. Why is it not available? Why is there not just a copy of it available? Let us have just one copy in the Library of Parliament. That is one place where it could be. I see no reason why it should not be there. It must be a public document. Those of us who want it or need it would then know whether this or that organization was entitled to issue receipts for income tax purposes, and because of the inter-library loan system, that document would be available for consultation in any library in Canada. Thank goodness we do have that inter-library loan system. I think if there were specific titles of groups mentioned on the list, they could be looked up in the copy which would be in the library and, I suggest, in the Public Archives of Canada. It could be changed from time to time, but there is a loose-leaf system for making amendments to government regulations.

I wonder whether there is a swimming pool incorporated, for example, that is on a charitable organization's list so that those who build swimming pools for prominent people can obtain their income tax deductions that way.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Be more specific.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I do not think there is any need to be any more specific. What I have in mind is fairly evident.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Take the plunge.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I will take a dive at it.

I am also a little concerned about the matter which was raised by the hon. member for Egmont. He stole some of my thunder, but I think it is worth going over the matter again. I can remember when, in the month of May this year, those regulations came out and the furor that was raised about what they meant, about who was going to bite the bullet and who was going to continue engaging in the activities in which they had been involved. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that there was an information circular dated February 27, 1978, No. 3. I think it is worth putting it on the record in part. It reads:

> The purpose of this circular is to explain to registered charities and to charities seeking registration the consequences of having objects and carrying on activities that are political in nature.

I well remember that my friend, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, raised the question on May 1 and I raised the question on May 3, and during two or three weeks in May the government was balancing from one foot to the other, saying that the circular was not really an instruction but was merely an accumulation of the jurisprudence on this matter. There is no jurisprudence in this document. These are threats, plain threats.

Then, toward the end of the discussion in the House—because I do not think the discussion is fully ended since this was left very vague—the Prime Minister said in a pet, "All right, I will rescind it for you, if that is what you want." Do you rescind information circulars? Surely you can cancel them. I do not think rescinding was quite the word to use. You can withdraw them, which I think would have been the proper word to use. Rescinding has a somewhat different meaning. I have not looked it up recently in the dictionary, but it does not bear quite the same meaning of permanence that cancellation or withdrawal has, to my way of thinking.

I should like to go on and cite one other piece from this information circular. The second paragraph begins:

> It is well established at law that an organization whose purpose is the attainment of a political object is not organized for a charitable purpose.

When the hon. member for Egmont was listing some of the activities of organizations, I mentioned the anti-slavery organization in the eighteenth century. What about the organization to change the penal laws in the nineteenth century? That was political acitivity. They did not get deductions for income tax purposes in those days, I am sure of that. But today there is the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society. These societies are formed for the sole purpose of making sure that the penal system of this country is run in a humanitarian way, and when there are any regulations or any pieces of the law which, in their view, do not correspond to their definition of what is humanitarian, they are not mute and, God bless them, they should not be. They should stand on their hind legs and scream, and they should not be penalized for it either. The same applies, as I was saying, to those who are showing their opposition to the leghold trap. They became involved in political activities; they wrote to their members of parliament. It says here in the circular, "An object normally is said to be 'political' if its ultimate intention is to influence the policy making process." It speaks here about writing to members of parliament and so on.

I find that sort of circular issued to organizations which are fulfilling a very important role in our society an abomination. They are fulfilling a role that no government in any democratic country will ever be able to fulfil or should fulfil. These channels should be open to our citizens to express themselves, and to influence legislation and legislators. This particular information circular is an abomination. When we were asking these questions we could not say too much in our preambles, but "abomination" is the only word I can think of to describe that document. I would like to think that it will be definitely withdrawn, as in some other unfortunate incidents in which this government has been involved.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is a long list too.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, it might cover even more pages than this bill covers. I think that this particular information bulletin might go along with many others.

As I mentioned, I was rather staggered to see the size and complexity of this bill and the detail into which it has gone for the proper constitution of organizations that are designed to fulfil charitable purposes or of those who wish to come together on a voluntary basis to further a legitimate social cause. I do not know why they have to go any further than that—that is a simple definition, I should think. I suppose it could be refined a little more. But I do not see the necessity of going to this length to define that type of organization.

● (2132)

The booklet outlining the detailed background of this particular bill is a fair number of pages in length and is in fine print. At page 11 it reads as follows:

As a result, the bill, although it applies specifically to non-profit corporations, seeks to achieve the same general goals as does the Canada Business Corporations Act—

It continues:

—to relegate to the regulations the detailed rules, particularly the financial disclosure rules; and to simplify all statutory formalities—

Goodness gracious, there are 150 pages of detailed description, and there will be regulations in addition to that. How will associations out to ban the leghold trap fit into that system? How will those seeking amendments to the Criminal Code or other federal statutes, such as those affecting the gun laws, fit into that system? They have a legitimate right to stand up, complain, and make a corporate joint approach to government on pieces of legislation to which they object. They want to be within the law. They do not like the law as it is, and they want to see it changed. What about those concerned with the death penalty, prison reform, and abortion?

This bill is 150 pages long and contains 242 clauses, in addition to regulations. It defies the imagination of one who feels we ought to be thinking in simpler terms about our legislation and not in more detailed terms. I doubt that people with causes to further will be able to get from the beginning to the end of this bill without going to sleep. They will go to sleep and not understand more than the first two or three pages, if that. Yet, they will have to subscribe to it.

Therefore, among the comments the minister will make as he closes this debate, I hope he will address himself particularly to the status of this information bulletin. It is not a bulletin which emanated from his department. It belongs to the Department of National Revenue. If he does not make some comment about it, I am sure the matter will be brought up again in committee. That dreadful document should disappear because it is a shadow over all charitable organizations. They want to know exactly where they stand and where it stands with regard to them. If the minister is not able to say anything about that particular regulation, I hope he prevails upon the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) to come before the committee and make the appropriate statement.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words before the minister closes the debate. Bill S-4 is a very weighty tome respecting Canadian non-profit organizations. Supposedly it will have the effect of lessening the possibility that moneys donated to and expended by charitable organizations and membership corporations will not be used for the purposes for which they were intended, and that occurrences of abuse or fraudulent behaviour will be reduced.

The bill is a vehicle to expedite the work of the volunteer sector of our society. For that reason I applaud its objectives. But sometimes I think that we would do a lot more to encourage volunteers if a bill of this complexity could be written in plain English so that those to whom it applies would find it more comprehensible. As it stands, probably it necessitates the services of a corporate lawyer for days and even weeks to read, understand, and transmit its intricacies to the voluntary sector.

Because I have a very healthy respect for what volunteer organizations contribute to our society, and because I have a belief that they could do even more if they were not so hampered by bureaucratic red tape, I attempted to plough my way through this particular bill to see if it made reference to a matter which has been raised on a number of occasions this evening. It is a matter in which I am particularly interested and which I and others have raised in the House on a number of occasions. I am referring to the information circular which was noted by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

This circular was issued by Revenue Canada last spring. It dealt with charitable organizations and political activity. But search as I would through the 242 clauses of the bill, I could find no reference to that particular aspect of the role of volunteer organizations. One might say this is not surprising, since the matter should more rightly be dealt with by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). That is true after a fashion, but since the government has promised for many years to do something about updating the rules and regulations concerning the activities of volunteer organizations, particularly as they pertain to disclosure, I thought possibly this bill would be used for the purposes of clarification. I am referring to clarification as far as the guidelines of last spring were concerned. Those guidelines issued by Revenue Canada, far from recognizing the contemporary role of volunteer and charitable organizations, had the effect of restricting their activities considerably.

When I stopped to consider this promise by the government to attempt to make the rules and regulations covering charitable organizations more applicable to contemporary society, I found I had to go back eight years, to the time when the promise was first made in the budget speech of Edgar Benson. At that time, in 1970, he said that a review of the tax laws, as they relate to charitable organizations, would be undertaken. As far as I can find out, that is when the promise was first made. But in 1977 the government's advisory council on volunteerism recommended a series of measures to safeguard citizen groups from political pressures. Even that more recent advice to the government has not been heeded.

Did the government consider proceeding with reform of outdated rules and regulations? Did it consider getting on with the work of clarifying these vague laws? No, that was not the manner in which the government proceeded. It did not decide to clarify and set out what could be considered contemporary legislation regarding charitable organizations. Instead, last April it circulated to charitable organizations across Canada this circular 78-3.

● (2142)

As has been stated by my colleagues, this circular warned churches and charities that they risked losing their tax exempt status if they engaged in so-called political activity. Political activity was defined in the circular as any activity that has as its objective the changing of any legislation or even the maintenance of existing legislation. It included seeking support for their objectives from members of parliament or from the general public by means of the media. That may have been acceptable to the then minister of national revenue, and it may have been acceptable to his colleague, but to those of us on this side of the House, sir, not only did that approach seem to be very punitive, it also had the effect, as far as we were concerned, of stultifying rather than encouraging the work of the volunteer sector of our society.

At that time an editorial in the Toronto Star responded to the activities of the government and to the circular put forward with regard to charitable organizations. In that editorial of April 18 it referred to the way in which the Trudeau government was trying to muzzle volunteer organizations. It said:

> This is outrageous. It's based on National Revenue's interpretation of a body of law that goes back to Britain 300 years ago and which takes the narrow view that while charities can directly aid the needy, for example, they can't advocate changes in public policy that might benefit the needy.

It pointed out the incongruity of that approach.

As a result of that there was a series of questions asked in the House by a number of us on this side, members who were very concerned that this particular circular represented a very dangerous intrusion into the democratic right of free speech. At that time questions were raised in the House, in the committee, and during exchanges between this chamber and the other place where the minister was then sitting, and he replied to my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) by a letter, explaining that the charitable status of organizations "would not be prejudiced by limited attempts to promote the interests of those organizations at the political level". At this point the minister introduced a new note to the discussion for debate. This issue became compounded by that of limits or the lack of limits of ministerial discretion.

I asked the minister at that time in what way he was able to sit in judgment on the activities of churches or charities, as to whether their attempts or interests should be limited in any way and, if so, how he would define those limits and where he got his authority to do so.

As has been noted, under heavy attack in this House the government finally agreed to withdraw the circular. The victory was a very uncertain one, because government spokesmen insisted that they would continue to enforce the law according to their interpretation of it, circular or no circular. As a result of that, Canada's charitable organizations were left with the threat hanging over them, that if they did not conform and if they did not curtail their political activities, they might face punitive action by Revenue Canada. That, of course, is what happened, and has happened on a number of occasions since.

When I look back over my records I find it was on May 3, the then minister of national revenue wrote to inform me that he had decided to withdraw circular 78-3, for review by his officials. Having received that kind of communication from the minister, one might have gathered that the intimidation which was connotated in the circular would also have been withdrawn. Yet, sir, on June 11 of this year it came to light that a women's group, the Brampton Women's Centre, had been forced to sign a statement that it would take no part in political activities if it were to receive or qualify for its standing as a charitable organization and receive charitable status for purposes of tax deductions. The president of that particular group admitted she had signed only under pressure, because without the charitable status that was to be accorded her organization, the organization would not be able to continue or exist. I ask you, sir, is this an example of government action which is directed at promoting voluntary activity in our society?

At that time I referred to the incident regarding the Brampton Women's Centre as a danger to our entire political system, and a failure to keep a promise to redraft the circular. A little over a month after the minister had assured me that the bulletin was being withdrawn and reviewed, his department was proceeding to threaten organizations such as this one, the Brampton Women's Centre, because it was felt that they would engage in political activity of a nature relating to women's interests. It strikes me as rather ironic, sir, that if Agnes MacPhail and Nellie McClung, in their fight for women's rights in this country, had been forced to withdraw from their activities by governments of the day under that kind of intimidation, probably I would not be in a position to stand in the House of Commons this evening.

As a result of that incident regarding the Brampton Women's Centre questions were raised in the House of Commons as to the intent of the government in respect of volunteer organizations. Once again I heard from the then minister of national revenue. Having promised that the circular would be withdrawn for review and clarification, he apologetically explained to me that what was involved was a specific paragraph in the Income Tax Act, and that he had no authority to withdraw that. He went on to include this paragraph in his letter of May 24:

> It may well be that the legislation is too restrictive ... that it has not kept up with the time. For that reason I have asked my colleague, Hon. Jean Chrétien, Minister of Finance, to review the applicable provisions of the Income Tax Act. Meanwhile, however, my officials must administer the act in accordance with its present provisions. I assure you, nevertheless, that the department's practice is not to be unduly restrictive with charities.

What kind of language is that with regard to charitable organizations in this country?

Earlier I mentioned correspondence which I had from the minister that referred to limiting attempts of charitable organizations. Subsequently he wrote that he would not be unduly restrictive regarding charitable organizations. How can we assure that charitable organizations in this country will carry out work on a voluntary basis, work that we desire them to carry on, if they are to be threatened, or their activities curtailed by implication that the government will not be unduly restrictive? What does this really mean? What does it mean?

• (2152)

We have already seen in the case of the Brampton Women's Centre that they would not have received their funding had they not given a commitment that they would not take part in any political expression. How many other organizations across Canada since that time have received similar threats or have been similarly intimidated, and about which we do not know? How many charitable organizations which might have been functioning, refused to place themselves in a situation where they felt that their freedom of speech was being curtailed or their activities limited? How much of this has gone on of which we are unaware?

There are some things we do know for certain. We know that the Department of National Revenue has not yet got around to involving voluntary organizations in any redrafting of circular 78-3, or even to seeking their opinions on redefining what their role should be in the 1980s and the 1990s. It is a very different role from that of the 1930s or the 1950s and whatever prehistoric legislation upon which the government bases its circular 78-3. We know that the Minister of Finance has not got around to revising the restrictive clauses of the Income Tax Act which curtail the activities of voluntary organizations very significantly at the present time.

I note in this Bill S-4 that a non-profit charitable organization will still have to apply to the Department of National Revenue for a number in order to qualify for tax deductible status. In this bill we are presented with rules and regulations as to the number of directors, the meetings of these directors, the practices of quorum, the use of proxy, the role of the auditor. How much better this bill could have been had the minister urged his colleague, the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of National Revenue, or both of them, to do what Mr. Benson promised in this House eight years ago, to review and to update the tax laws as they relate to charitable organizations so that no one would feel pressured or intimidated, and no charitable activities would be restricted or organizations' work curtailed by the heavy handed government interfering with the true goals of voluntary activity in our society. I hope that the minister takes that message to his colleagues.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): A person should not have to speak on a bill like this, Mr. Speaker, but sometimes it becomes necessary because of the very poor drafting. We have here some 150 pages, plus another number of pages with schedules, which mean absolutely nothing to the ordinary person who actually makes up the majority of memberships of non-profit and charitable organizations in this country. Its purpose is to set up another bureaucratic empire for this government to take further taxes from this country.

Bill S-4 is for the formulation of the Canada Non-Profits Corporations Act. Nowhere in the definition section, however, is the word non-profit defined. It seems to me that if we are going to have an act with 150 pages defining what it is, at least the word non-profit should be clearly defined. The definition for charitable organizations is very general, and upon reading other parts of this bill I wonder what is the real principle. I believe that the real principle behind the bill is to set up another bureaucracy to take away the powers of voluntary or service club organizations. Nowhere in the definition section are the words "religion" or "philanthropic", words which are used in most non-profit corporation acts in our country. It is just another empire or bureaucracy, with more taxes and waste.

I wonder, too, if this bill, S-4, is really inter vires this House of Commons. It came from the Senate, but does its object really come within the powers of this parliament? It may for raising money, but that is not what it purports to be, an act to provide for the incorporation of charities or non-profit corporations.

What of those companies which have already been incorporated by provincial statute? Many of the non-profit, charitable and voluntary organizations across this country have in fact been incorporated under provincial statute, under a reasonably fair set-up, with little cost to them for set-up, and with very few forms to fill out. With this bill an organization will have to hire not just a plain lawyer to incorporate but a Philadelphia lawyer to decipher it.

As one reads through this bill, clause after clause, the general principles are, "as prescribed by legislation or as the ministry decides," but then that happens all the time in this House.

Shall I call it ten o'clock?

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, could the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council tell us what the bill of fare is for tomorrow?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will be dealing with Bill C-9, an act respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

COMMUNICATIONS—TELEVISING OF HOUSE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to place on the record some of my concerns as a result of a response made to a question I posed to the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) last December 1. I might say at the outset that my concern does not rest on the competence or the sincerity of the parliamentary secretary, but rather with the spirit of the response, which I do not think adequately replies to the concerns which I dealt with at that time.

[Mr. Jones.]

What has happened is that in metropolitan Toronto an organization called Rogers Cable Television has been presenting on their community cable channel the House of Commons question period live each day, and, as well, on one of their upper band channels reached by a converter they have been playing question period and, I believe, some other House of Commons programming. The regulations of the CRTC say that when a company has House of Commons programming on an available channel other than the so-called community channel, then you should not use the community channel for House of Commons programming. I termed this situation, in my original question, as regulation wise, common sense foolish.

In the course of a conversation on other matters a few weeks ago between an officer of Rogers Cable Television and an officer of the CRTC, the question was posed by Rogers as to whether there was any difficulty, because of existing regulations, with their playing question period live on that regular community channel which is readily available to anyone with cable television in the Rogers subscribing area. It was indicated in that conversation, as I understand it, that if a company had House of Commons material on another available channel, then it should not, according to that regulation, be broadcasting it on a community channel. Perhaps the principle behind the regulation is to prevent interference with community channel programming. It is a very wise-sounding and equitable regulation. The problem is that not all cable subscribers have converters, and thus in one fell swoop, a result of that interpretation and that telephone call, Rogers Cable felt it would be wise not to be in contravention and withdrew question period from their community channel.

● (2202)

I understand from a conversation with someone from Rogers Cable this afternoon that they have 200,000 units in homes in Toronto. They have sold about 30,000 converter units to some of those homes. Another 30,000 people have rented units, for a total of 60,000 out of 200,000, which would leave 140,000 homes, not people—there are many more people—who all of a sudden because of that regulation wise, common sense foolish decision no longer had available to them the proceedings of the House of Commons of Canada, the focal point of activities at the federal level. To me this seems to be an absurd development.

It may well be there are fewer than 140,000 people lost this service, because one could purchase a converter in any store. But, at best, at least half of those people, or 100,000 homes in Toronto, could receive question period live until a week or so ago. Today they cannot. Surely if we want people to understand better the operations of government and the concerns expressed by representatives from various parts of our country, that kind of silliness is unnecessary.

I understand there are very serious negotiations under way with regard to bringing the proceedings of the House of Commons to Canadians across the country, and I gather this problem will be resolved in the not too distant future. I do appreciate the principle that one channel on the main band using cable is intended for community programming. I also understand there were no serious disruptions and that the few changes that were made to accommodate question period on that community channel via Rogers Cable in Toronto were made with no difficulty and no complaints. Meanwhile, I argue further, what could be more important or considered of more, community interest than the proceedings of this House, especially daily focal point which makes evident what is troubling people across Canada, what the points of confrontation are, and the differences among the various parties?

I know that my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary, being a wise and reasonable man and a former broadcaster, who represents a great community, one of the most beautiful areas of Canada, one well known to me, will probably say in a moment or two that this silly business has been resolved.

If he does not, I will forgive him, but I count on him, because of my confidence in his ability, to go back and urge his minister to address this issue to the CRTC. Hopefully we can have a good common sense resolution and bring back the proceedings during the question period to at least those 100,000 homes in Toronto, a good many of which are in my constituency.

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to thank the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) for the kind things he said. I wish I could give him a more complete assurance than I am able to tonight concerning the problem he has put before the House. I must be quite honest, however, and tell him that according to the information I have received the problem has not been solved up to this point. But I am sure the CRTC, knowing the importance of broadcasting proceedings of the House of Commons to all citizens of Canada, not only to those in the city of Toronto and in the riding of York West, will be endeavouring as early as possible, as is the committee of the House of Commons itself concerned with the broadcasting of the proceedings, to provide the citizens of Canada with the best coverage of the House that is available.

● (2207)

One of the prime considerations we have to look at is the definition of a community channel. The purpose of a community channel is to represent and involve the community in a particular licensed area. The hon. member for York West made the eloquent plea that broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, in particular the question period, in that prime area would be of community interest. I agree that the happenings here in the House of Commons are of community interest to a large majority of the population, but is it community programming? We can probably get into quite a debate on that.

The view put forth by the CRTC is that it must involve participation of the people of the community that it serves to qualify as community programming.

Mr. Dinsdale: What about the MP?

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): The hon. member asks about the MP. We would be making quite an exception to the rule, not only in the city of Toronto but all across the country. We must realize there are areas outside the city of Toronto that are unable to receive the types of programming and broadcasting, particularly the cable service, which is available to viewers in that fine city on the shore of Lake Ontario.

I believe, because of the participatory role, the community itself should contribute to programming on the community channel. Therefore in this case, with a few members of the House of Commons, most of them from Ontario, the proceedings of the House do not fall within the parameters laid down by the CRTC as community programming. While the House proceedings do, without question, have a wide community interest, they clearly do not and cannot be construed as Toronto programming.

I do not say that broadcasting of the House proceedings should not have wide national distribution. I would put forth the idea that proceedings of parliament should be available to as many Canadians as possible. One way of achieving that would be to make the question period available as part of the national broadcasting service through the CBC. This would mean that approximately 98 per cent of all Canadians, not just those in Toronto, would receive the question period, which, as the hon. member said, involves members all across this country. The full proceedings of the House could then be carried over cable, but not on the community channel.

This is a very fine definition. I do not believe the community channel is the answer to providing wider access to the broadcasting of proceedings of this House. It should and must be done through our national broadcasting system.

AIR TRANSPORT—JET SERVICE TO WESTERN MANITOBA AND EASTERN SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I want to deal tonight with the perennial subject of air service to western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan. I do so because it has become critical. The Canada Winter Games open in Brandon on February 12. Air service is essential to the success of the games.

There have been repeated promises that air service would be available. However, the way things are proceeding at the moment, we will not have the required air service. Let me repeat the promises that have been made over a long period of time. On May 23, 1974, on a special trip to Winnipeg during the election campaign, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced as follows:

> The undertaking I am announcing on behalf of the government is as follows: we have asked Air Canada to work with each provincial government to determine what action is necessary to put in place in each province a third-level air carrier system that will provide high quality local air service, promote industry, reduce isolation and provide jobs. Air Canada will then co-operate with the existing carriers in each province to put in place this service. Air Canada will if necessary, either directly or through a subsidiary, provide that service.

Later in the statement the Prime Minister was more specific, and I quote:

● (2212)

In another area of air service, air policy, industrial development and job creation, I would like to announce the following: approval in principle has been given by the government for the provision of air services linking Winnipeg, Brandon, Dauphin, Yorkton and Saskatoon as a test of possible new third level air policies, the ones I talked about earlier. This will be air services linking these western cities.

That is a definite promise—an election promise, it is true, but election promises should be fulfilled.

After a series of questions in the House and after various delays, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), in a news release dated January 31, 1977, made the following announcement:

The government will make contributions to operating deficits not exceeding the amounts indicated below for either jet and/or non-jet type services over the following possible routes: for jet services Regina-Brandon-Toronto, $1.1 million . . . for non-jet services, Winnipeg-Yorkton-Saskatoon, $.5 million—

This is another specific promise made by the Minister of Transport. Transair, the regional carrier, applied to provide these services. They were taken over by Pacific Western Airlines. Great Lakes Airlines applied for the rights that would be abandoned by Transair and made an offer to buy out Nordair so that it would have sufficient equipment. Instead of agreeing to the proposal of Great Lakes Airlines, which is a reasonable regional carrier in this part of Canada, the ATC not only denied the sale but the government itself decided to buy Nordair. This was described by Mr. Geoffrey Stevens in the Globe and Mail of November 8 as "a weird decision". He wrote:

Its the weirdest decision to come out of the Government of Canada in many, many moons. Just as the airline industry was losing hope that the cabinet would ever make up its mind, Transport Minister Otto Lang announced late yesterday afternoon that the cabinet had reached a decision on Air Canada's proposed purchase of Montreal-based Nordair.

Well, we were back to square one, because Nordair refused to provide air service to the western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan area which represents a population of some 200,000. They are willing to provide jet service to Dryden, Ontario, but not this important area of western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan.

I was in touch with the Minister of Transport and he explained that, in these circumstances, there seemed to be no financially practical way of providing Brandon with air service to the east and west, desirable though that would be. This was in a letter dated October 11, 1978. Yet in the House the other day, in reply to a question by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), the minister came up with a new theory. He stated:

I continue to support the right and wisdom of ministers making judgments on the basis of social needs as well as economic needs and I am glad to stand here and say so on behalf of my predecessors and myself.

Later, he added:

It is also my impression that I fully answered the hon. member and told him why it is that sometimes, on a non-economic basis, a minister will make decisions and recommend situations to government on the basis of what is good for a province, region or development, not necessarily justified on economics alone. I said that and I said it very fully.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

That contradicts the response he made to me that western Manitoba could not be provided with jet service on the grounds that it was not economically feasible.

The minister has received petitions from large numbers of people. The government of Manitoba has made a special appeal to the federal cabinet. The deadline for making a decision on these matters is almost due with respect to the winter games, and I urge the Minister of Transport—I am sorry he is not with us tonight for this important discussion—to authorize Air Canada to provide this service. Air Canada flies over the area several times a day. The only difficulty is that it is hard to reach it at an altitude of 30,000 feet. Air Canada is the one carrier which is now able to provide this service. In 1974 the Prime Minister promised that Air Canada would be authorized, if necessary, to provide this service, and I trust that whoever speaks for the government in reply on this matter will indicate that there will be air service in time for the winter games, which commence on February 12 of next year.

● (2217)

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is still some misunderstanding surrounding the matter of the provision of jet service to western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan on time for the opening of the Canada Games in Brandon in February. I would like to take the opportunity to try to shed some light on that matter.

It is already established that the airlines decided themselves not to provide that service to Brandon or Yorkton after the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) invited them to do so. It should be specified immediately that no airline made a request to provide a jet service to Yorkton and that only Transair made such a request for Brandon but withdrew it afterwards.

It has also been suggested that if Great Lakes were now the owner of Nordair they would provide that service to Brandon. I feel there is nothing less sure. Great Lakes, as all other carriers asked to submit an application, have reviewed the financial implications of a service to Brandon and have found that they would incur very heavy financial losses. It should not be concluded that the possibility of a jet service to those locations has been definitely discarded. The air carriers have considered the service and have merely decided that at present it would not be profitable. In addition, if the carriers find that the demand for an air service is sufficient, they could then submit an application to the Canadian Transport Commission to obtain the necessary permit.

I am sure that my colleagues know that the Minister of Transport cannot ask Air Canada to provide that service to Brandon as long as a regional carrier cannot do so, as requested by the hon. member, even if Air Canada aircraft fly over that area several times a day. I should point out that in such a case it is proper to let airlines decide what services they will provide and file an application with the Canadian Transport Commission.

[English]

I think that the government lived up to its promise when it announced financial assistance for Prairie Air Services on January 31, 1977 and provided for a contribution of up to $1.1 million for jet service between Regina, Brandon and Toronto, and a contribution of up to $0.9 million for jet services between Winnipeg, Yorkton and Saskatoon. I have already stated that the result of this effort was that no carrier applied to service Yorkton, and only one offered to service Brandon, an offer which was later withdrawn.

The Minister of Transport has had continuing discussions with the airlines to encourage some interest on their part in coming forward with an application. The government has done all it could on the matter to this time. The carriers have indicated that this service to western cities would be a non-economic venture at this time unless a greater demand could be shown.

The Minister of Transport still stands ready to provide whatever help is required to make that kind of application work.

Mr. Dinsdale: Get rid of Nordair and let Great Lakes do the job.

● (2222)

LABOUR CONDITIONS—OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY OF WORKERS EXPOSED TO ASBESTOS HAZARDS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, on November 23 I addressed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), who is responsible for protecting and maintaining the health of Canadians. At that time I asked the minister to investigate claims arising from a U.S. court case that Canadian asbestos companies were aware of the potentially fatal health hazards to which their employees were exposed but that these companies took no action to inform their workers.

In fact, one of the documents introduced in the case against the asbestos giant, Johns-Manville, indicated that although the company took steps to warn Americans of the asbestos danger as early as in 1964, it did not do the same in Canada until 1968.

It is a sad fact that thousands of Canadian workers may have had their lives put in jeopardy because information regarding asbestos dangers was suppressed. I asked the minister to look into the matter and to discuss with the provinces what action might be necessary. The minister expressed some reluctance to do this. She stated that she did not want to create "unnecessary panic in the public", and those are her exact words. I also do not wish to create panic, but it is certainly time to express more concern than the government has demonstrated so far.

I am not so much interested this time in assessing individual corporate guilt or innocence in this matter, although that certainly bears further investigation. For the most part, the damage has been done, but I am interested in determining what is being done for the victims, or for those who will soon be recognized as victims, since asbestos-related diseases usually strike 20 to 30 years after exposure. In the United States, the health secretary has already warned that as many as half of the workers who worked with asbestos during and after the second world war might be afflicted with lung cancer or other asbestos related diseases, such as asbestosis. Some medical experts are worried that we may soon have an epidemic of asbestos-related diseases on our hands.

Only this morning it was reported that five workers who were employed during the Second World War in a Defence Research Board plant which processed asbestos filled gas masks have died as a result of a disease associated with exposure to asbestos. Others who worked in this plant are undoubtedly at risk.

Clearly it is now incumbent upon the government to set up procedures to identify all the employees of its wartime defence plants who suffered similar exposure to asbestos. It must be determined if they have developed asbestos-related diseases and, if so, they and their families must be compensated for the suffering involved. The government should set an example for the asbestos companies, if the companies themselves refuse to take any action. This would be one small step in the right direction.

There is now sufficient medical evidence, and a sufficient number of cases have been made public, to suggest that immediate action should be taken to determine how many Canadians have been affected, and what can be done to assist them. To this end, it is imperative that the Department of Labour's new Centre of Occupational Health and Safety enter into discussions with the provinces and develop a co-ordinated plan of action.

When I made this suggestion to the then acting minister of labour last month, he informed me that there have indeed been consultations on this subject. I would like to ask the new minister or his parliamentary secretary what was the result of those consultations. Were they aimed at determining what persons have been affected, what medical attention is appropriate, or what government involvement will be required.

This problem has been ignored by the government and by the asbestos companies for far too long. It has developed into a series of horror stories of hardship and suffering on the part of innocent people who worked in the asbestos industries, ten, 15, 20 and 30 years ago, not knowing that they were constantly exposing themselves to health hazards. I feel it is only fitting, as a result of what we have found subsequently—and indeed there have been some asbestos-related diseases that were discovered and documented as early as 1903 and during the 1920s, 1930s and 1940s—and that it is incumbent upon the federal government, in concert with the provincial governments, where asbestos companies are operating, to provide ways and means, financial if necessary, for the victims of asbestos-related diseases not to go the compensation route, which is not nearly enough, but to provide them with financial assistance, where necessary, in order to bring civil actions in a court of law, against the companies if the companies refuse to compensate them themselves.

● (2227)

It has been proven that companies have been derelict in their duty to inform workers or personnel concerning the dangers of working close to asbestos, and therefore exposing themselves to asbestos-related diseases. If the companies refused to inform the workers, then the workers should have the right to sue their employers if they have contacted asbestos-related diseases, which are practically always terminal in nature. If workers died as a result of exposure to asbestos, then their children and wives should have the right to sue the companies. Workmen's compensation is simply a cheap way for companies to get off the hook and put it back on taxpayers, government funds, and contributions made by the companies to workmen's compensation.

I ask the government to take action on this and to provide financial means where necessary, so that these persons who have contacted asbestos-related diseases from working in asbestos mines, even if they have been retired for several years, will be able to bring actions in a civil court of law against their employers or former employers.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on November 23 the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) asked the now Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouellet) if discussions were taking place between the provinces and the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety concerning the health effects of asbestos on persons working with or exposed to it.

The act authorizing the establishment of this new centre was proclaimed on October 1. Since then further action has been taken to bring it into operation at an early date. Members of the governing council of the centre, drawn from labour, management, and provincial and federal departments, are in the process of being appointed. The inaugural meeting of the council is being planned for mid-January.

I appreciate the concern of the hon. member regarding this serious occupational hazard. I know his concern is shared by many members in the House. Certainly I will bring this question to the attention of the council for its early consideration. However, I should mention that in 1975 the Department of National Health and Welfare completed a study of asbestos in the work place. It recommended that all jurisdictions adopt a more stringent standard, namely, two fibres per cubic metre. This reduction of exposure limits from five fibres to two fibres was promptly made applicable to all industries operating under federal jurisdiction and subject to the dangerous substances regulations pursuant to part IV of the Canada Labour Code. I understand a number of the provinces have taken the same action.

The seriousness and complexity of this hazard, both in its occupational and environmental aspects, are widely recognized, nationally and internationally. It is my hope that the centre, by fostering collaboration among all jurisdictions and facilitating joint action, can bring about real progress in providing more effective protection to those whose work exposes them to asbestos in its various forms and usages.

Also I am aware of the recent report of health problems of employees of the defence research plant which made mask languid asbestos. The Department of Labour will investigate this situation. We will attempt to identify any persons whose health has been adversely affected by virtue of this contact with asbestos. We are prepared to apply provisions of the Government Employees Compensation Act if appropriate. I will inform the hon. member later with more specifics.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 12, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

● (1407)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

SOCIAL INSURANCE

EXTENDED USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the expressed intention of Canadian General Electric to use the social insurance number as part of an identification badge system in its Peterborough plant, and considering the opposition of union officials and workers who regard this use of the social insurance number as unfounded and a threat to their personal privacy, I ask leave to move, seconded by 419-582-028, commonly known as the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this government and the present Minister of Employment and Immigration cease their apathetic and indifferent attitude toward the expansion of the social insurance number in the public and private sectors, and introduce immediately legislation giving individuals the right to refuse the use of their social insurance number to any organization which does not have specific authority provided by federal statute, and making it obligatory for any organization which wants to make the social insurance number an employee identification number to have the informed consent of the individual.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LEGISLATION TO CONTROL USE AND ABUSE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to deal with a similar matter: I think this indicates the urgency of the problem.

In view of the report today that Canadian General Electric requires its Peterborough employees to wear their social insurance numbers on outside ID badges, and in view of the grave potential for the invasion of privacy and employee intimidation arising from the improper use of SIN information, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government forthwith bring forward legislation controlling the use and abuse of the social insurance number.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Unanimous consent is necessary before it can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

EMPLOYMENT

CRITICISM OF REMARKS OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated in the labour committee on Thursday night last that the young people of Canada were prepared to be spoonfed and would, if given a chance, "sit at home, suck their thumbs and wait for the unemployment insurance just to pour in", since this has been proven not to be the case by studies done by the Department of Employment and Immigration which show that young people want to work, and by other studies which show that young people actually under-use the unemployment insurance program in relation to their actual percentage of unemployment, and since the National Union of Students has demanded an apology for this gratuitous insult to all of Canada's young people, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae):

That this House call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to apologize for his intemperate statements.

Mr. Speaker: Unanimous consent is required before the motion can be presented. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE REQUESTED BY SCOTTISH SOCIETIES ASSN. OF NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Scottish Societies Association of Nova Scotia is promoting the international gathering of the clans of Scotland for the summer of 1979 and requires limited financial assistance to assure its success. Since the gathering of the clans interests people of Scottish ancestry around the world and will attract thousands of visitors to Nova Scotia and millions of tourist dollars for Canada, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield):

That the government consider aiding the international gathering of the clans in Nova Scotia by taking action to arrange the limited financial assistance requested by the Scottish Societies Association of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, can be put forward for debate only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ACCEPTANCE OF FREE AIR TRAVEL PASSES BY CERTAIN MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

It was revealed this morning that at least three Progressive Conservative MPs, namely the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), have accepted free passes from Eastern Provincial Airways for members of their staff. Accordingly, I would move, seconded by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House refer the possible conflict of interest arising from the acceptance of these passes to the committee on privileges and elections for investigation and report.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion can be made only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

• (1412)

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ENTERTAINMENT OF MILITARY PERSONNEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that Canadian military personnel serving in the Middle East in isolation postings are being entertained with third-rate movies and poor quality canned television, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail):

That this House urges the Minister of National Defence to review his entertainment policy.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

SOCIAL INSURANCE

LEGISLATION TO CONTROL USE AND ABUSE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am always appreciative of applause, particularly when it comes from York East. I thank the hon. member for his applause, but there will not be any applause for him after the election.

The question I should like to raise is very difficult, having regard to the fact that on Friday the debate on this question came to an end by effluxion of time. My question has to do with social insurance numbers. This matter is causing a revolt in the thinking of people in general across this country.

My question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Everywhere there is widespread condemnation of what is taking place in this connection. Wholesale frauds are being committed through the use of the SIN. I cannot go into particulars in my question, but I could give full information.

Will the minister bring before the House immediately legislation in this regard? I hope he will be able to induce the government to agree that such legislation should be subject to diminution in so far as its comprehensiveness is concerned. The social insurance number should be used in connection only with social security and income tax matters. Why not bring in such an amendment to do away with what can only lead to the erosion of individual rights and the privacy of individuals in this country?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I was sorry that the right hon. gentleman did not have an opportunity to participate in the debate on Friday. I know he was here but that he had other responsibilities. As a matter of fact, I indicated that I would have been quite prepared to yield my time in order to hear what he had to say on this subject.

The right hon. gentleman and others from his party, as well as mine, are right in expressing concern about the use of the social insurance number. The fact is that many people who use the social insurance number or who agree to having their social insurance numbers used do so because they feel it is beneficial and in their best interests.

I noted the motions which were proposed today. I do not want to usurp the role of unions. I think they have taken appropriate action in the Peterborough case. I think they will meet their responsibilities and indicate that there is no requirement on them to give that particular number, nor to agree to it. I think they will resolve that in-house.

I am somewhat apprehensive, however, about bringing in legislation which might very well operate to the detriment of many hundreds of thousands of people across this country who in fact want their numbers to be used in order to make certain that benefits which should go to them will, in fact, reach them and not go to some third person.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is the nearest approach to an alibi I have heard in a long time. That is what you call "cullenization".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister said that there are advantages, but I wonder whether he has read about a number of cases across Canada in which up to the present time crimes have been committed because of the SIN. If he has not, I place before him the evidence of RCMP Assistant Commissioner Hank Jensen who, in giving evidence of June of this year, pointed out that this number is being used fraudulently. He gave examples. I will cite only two so that the minister will be in a position to answer.

• (1417)

Let me illustrate this with the case of a Calgary man—I do not like to mention Calgary in this way—who had 109 social insurance cards, 59 UIC claims, and a monthly income of $33,000.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Could the hon. gentleman identify himself? I would like to know what constituency he represents.

Then there was the Montreal case.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: That is a whole speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Two men had 60 social insurance cards over a period of two months.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, so you don't want the truth? They defrauded UIC of $33,000. Another group in Montreal defrauded UIC of $32,800. In other words, these cards are being used fraudulently, not protectively. Again I impress upon the minister that when he says there are hundreds of thousands who approve of it, they are not the ones who are being heard across this country. I think there are less than 1,000 people who are in favour of social insurance numbers, in spite of what the minister says.

Will he not reconsider this matter and give parliament a chance? He realizes this is wrong, in part, because he says he will give some guidelines. Let parliament make the guidelines and put an end to this practice in so far as it goes beyond social security.

Mr. Cullen: I thank the right hon. gentleman for perhaps putting me in the history books in a vicarious way when he referred to "cullenization". I am sure that years from now, when I read that, I will laugh. I am not laughing now.

An hon. Member: You will not for a while, either.

Mr. Cullen: I am certain that any system brought into play will be used in a fraudulent manner. What the right hon. gentleman is pointing out is the success of the department and of the RCMP in nailing those who have used these numbers in a particular way. Because of the widespread abuse, we introduced very recently additional requirements for individuals to secure their social insurance numbers and we were criticized by hon. members opposite because we decided it was appropriate to take this additional step and require people to identify themselves.

I think, also, the protection of the human rights legislation is singularly important in this instance. As I indicated in the debate, the information which we have would only be detrimental in effect, and in fact the right hon. gentleman has maintained from time to time that the use of social insurance numbers—which the hon. member for St. John's East gave freely and voluntarily in seconding his colleague's motion—causes very little damage, if there is no tie-in or connecting-up of data banks or of computer terminals.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I would ask the minister this: will he not remove the requirement for the use of social insurance numbers from the armed forces? Mail today is being returned because it does not bear the social insurance number. Why should the forces of our country be penalized in this way?

Mr. Cullen: I must say that I, too, was surprised when mail which did not have the number on it was returned. It may be that the address was imperfect. But, on the other hand, it may be that the Canadian men and women in the armed forces think that this is an appropriate use of the number to make sure they get their mail, because they are serving this country in many parts of the world and doing it very well.

USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS AT CGE PLANT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the answers on this topic given thus far, the minister and his colleagues are looking more and more like the Keystone cops.

Does the minister not understand that in the case of Peterborough, unless workers in the Canadian General Electric plant provide their social insurance numbers, they will be denied access to the grounds and to work? Does he not think that, under these circumstances, it is only fair and reasonable that the social insurance number devised by this government should be limited to the point where no sanctions can be imposed against the workers for simply refusing to give this private information? Does he not think the government could go at least that far?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): This would be piecemeal legislation to deal with "this" and "that" particular situation. As I indicated, I do not propose to usurp the role of union members. They indicated the company is wrong in this instance. In fact, they filed a grievance and I am satisfied it will probably be dealt with in the appropriate fashion by the people who have that responsibility.

● (1422)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the minister and the government are clearly insensitive to what is going on in the country today. Nesbitt Thomson, investment counsellors, now are advising their people in the field to obtain social insurance numbers on the basis that they will be required for all financial transactions. The British Columbia Automobile Association requires social insurance numbers for their charter flights. There are other instances. The Lions Club in my town, for Open House Canada, under the Secretary of State, the seatmate of the minister, required social insurance numbers for the purpose of participating in programs sponsored by the government for travel in Canada. Even the insurance industry now requires them.

Does the minister not have a semblance of feeling for Canadians who are being inconvenienced? Does he not think the least the government can do is to take the recommendations of its own task force and the many studies done on social insurance numbers and have parliament consider this matter before there is an extension of the use of social insurance numbers?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, there is something to be balanced here. Individuals are voluntarily giving their social insurance numbers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Cullen.]

Mr. Cullen: Whether it is in the interests of seconding a motion in the House of Commons or picking up—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They do not get the service.

Mr. Cullen: It was done voluntarily by the hon. member's colleague in the House today. He did not seem to think there was too much to concern him in that regard. In the interest of picking up a prize in a lottery, people are quite prepared to do it.

In the case recited by the hon. member, in the case where companies require social insurance numbers, I suggest that there is no requirement on individuals to give them and that the union will ensure that their rights in this regard are respected.

* * *

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—ACTION TO CURB PROFITEERING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday, a spokesman for the Department of Agriculture predicted that food prices in the coming year would increase another 10 per cent, such increase taking place after the products left the farm gate, that is to say, at the retailing and processing level.

Has the minister had an opportunity to investigate the report of the Economic Council of Canada which I brought to his attention over a week ago? It shows that profits in the food industry have increased some 63 per cent in the past year. What will the minister do to ensure that this level of profiteering will not continue into 1979?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into the report referred to by the hon. member, the report put out by CSIP. To begin with, I must say that parts of that report were misunderstood and were not read in conjunction with other parts. On the other hand, I think the report was misleading in certain parts and also is subject to criticism in some parts. I should point out that the CSIP report dealt with both food and liquor, including beer, wine and hard liquors, whereas the AIB report dealt with only food.

The CSIP report dealt with only 20 firms in its survey. It had no information about those firms, whether they were large or small, whether they had been on strike, or whatever. On the other hand, the AIB report dealt with 81 processing firms and 14 retailing firms making up two-thirds of the food business. The CSIP report compared the first quarter of 1977 with the third quarter of 1978. That is a very unusual procedure because of seasonal differences in the food business. The AIB report compared the first half of 1977 with the first half of 1978.

Finally, the unit of measurement used in the CSIP report was profits per unit of output, which is not used on a regular basis as a comparative measure. The AIB report used gross profits before taxes as a percentage of revenue. On the whole, I and many others feel the CSIP report did not give an accurate assessment of profits in the food industry. We are still concerned about increases in food prices next year. A report I have indicates that increases of approximately 14 per cent this year will decline to approximately 9 per cent next year.

● (1427)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would direct my supplementary question to the same minister, who did not deal with the second part of my first question. The same agricultural spokesman to whom I referred in my question also said yesterday—it is presumably the view of the Department of Agriculture—that current food profits, if they are not up 63 per cent, are at least substantial and quite adequate in terms of giving a reasonable return to the industry.

In light of that, could the minister outline for us what steps he is taking to ensure that the increases that have been forecast to take place, another 10 per cent next year on top of the 15 per cent in the past year, do not involve profiteering in the industry?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I think I should point out, as well, that the major food processing and retailing industries remain under the AIB until the end of this year and they have earned only 70 per cent of allowable profits under AIB guidelines.

In respect of the second question of the hon. member, my information is that price increases in food will moderate in the coming year. Of course, there are variations with different industries in the food business. I intend to continue to explore measures to keep food prices down. I cannot announce those measures now, but I will be making further proposals to my cabinet colleagues.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I wish members of the cabinet would get their act together. The Department of Agriculture is predicting a 10 per cent increase in food prices, and this minister is saying they are going to go down. I hope in the next few days one of these sources will clarify the situation and indicate what, if anything, is the coherent view of the government.

Since the Minister of Agriculture has said that the removal of the bread subsidy would result in only a 3.5-cent increase in the price of a loaf of bread, which is contradictory to what the Bakery Council has said, that the price should go up by some 12 cents, in response to which the Minister of Agriculture said that was ridiculous, will the minister assure the people of Canada that the price of bread will go up by only 3.5 cents? Will the minister also tell us how he is going to enforce that assurance?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, on the first point, I think the hon. member misunderstood what I said. I said that food prices had gone up this year about 14 per cent over last year, and that my information is that next year they will go up by about 9 per cent—not that they would go down, but the rate of increase would decline.

In respect of the second point, about bread, Mr. Speaker, I think both the Minister of Agriculture and myself have stated the increase would be about five cents to seven cents a loaf, but the Bakery Council has said it will be about 12 cents.

An hon. Member: They said another 6 cents.

Mr. Allmand: My information is that the increase in the price of a loaf of bread as a result of the removal of the subsidy would be about five cents. The Bakery Council said it would go up by about 12 cents. I have already spoken to some people in the industry asking for an explanation of this. They said that the price would go up anyway by about six cents and when you add on the result of the removal of the subsidy it amounts to about 12 cents. I am not quite satisfied with that answer and I intend to pursue it further.

* * *

[Translation]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER $1.2 MILLION WILL BE ALLOTTED TO CITY OF NORANDA

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Following the $34,876,000 subsidiary agreement on public equipment reached in May, 1978, between Quebec and Ottawa, each project was identified by its location when the agreement was signed, except an amount of $1.2 million which was earmarked for the Abitibi-Témiscamingue area. My question is as follows: Since that amount specifically represents the value of a project suggested by Noranda and since that town was the only municipality from northwest Quebec to submit a project when the agreement was concluded, could the minister say whether the 1.2 million will be granted to Noranda or as according to a recent report, whether it will be granted to the Val d'Or municipality?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, indeed when the agreement was signed last May, an amount had been earmarked for a project in northwest Quebec and the town of Rouyn-Noranda had indeed tabled a file. On the other hand, since the signature of that agreement, the Quebec government, more especially the municipal affairs department, has reviewed its position about the application of Rouyn-Noranda with the result that the funds had not till very recently been definitely committed to support the Rouyn-Noranda project because another project was submitted afterward by Val d'Or. According to my latest information, the discussion is going on between the municipal affairs department and the industry and commerce department in Quebec.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Could the minister tell us whether it is normal under these agreements when funds are being allocated to specific projects such as the one presented by the city of Noranda, whether it is the usual policy to allow other municipalities to come up afterwards with projects, and then to try to match the project to know which municipality is going to get it?

Mr. Lessard: To a certain extent, Mr. Speaker, some flexibility is indeed provided for in the agreements that we sign. The same kind of flexibility which under the provisions of another previous agreement—namely that of industrial infrastructures—is responsible for the development of the industrial park in Rouyn-Noranda and Val d'Or. The same principle applies in this specific case. And when the municipal affairs department—which under these circumstances is also the prime contractor—decides that the project under consideration can no longer be carried out, it is obvious then that they must resort to other projects and eventually the decision is left to them since municipal affairs are under their jurisdiction.

* * *

● (1432)

[English]

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY OF CHARGING VIETNAMESE REFUGEES FOR AIR PASSAGE TO CANADA

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It relates to a disturbing report made last night, which I am sure the minister would want to clarify, concerning possibly charging refugees coming from Vietnam the cost of their transportation by Canadian aircraft to this country.

Since this may mean a cost in excess of $1,000 for each refugee, most of whom have come here with little or none of the wherewithal to cover this basic cost, could the minister clarify this unusual situation and, hopefully, incorrect report?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the report is correct. It is normal policy to require payment to be made. In the past, most immigrants once established have willingly paid this amount. If they are not able to do so, the Crown invariably wipes out the loan. But many immigrants like to repay the loan. There is a revolving fund available to help people in this particular category, and those who have been helped often want to repay. That is the basis upon which the transportation cost is collected: it is normal policy.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate whether that has always been the case, particularly for those who have literally had to flee for their lives, with no resources, and whether or not this is a procedure which has been clarified with the United Nations High Commission on Refugees?

Also, would the minister indicate whether there have been any further requests, in view of the continuing serious situation in that country, for a further grouping of these people who might be in desperate straits in trying to find a country of refuge?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, yes, it has been applied in other cases. For example, many of the people from Czechoslovakia literally left their country with no assets other than what they had travelling as tourists. Many of them, obviously, could not become established and were not required to repay the money.

Concerning representations to take more people, as the hon. member knows, there is a meeting taking place at the present time in Geneva—I believe some 32 nations are participating—to determine how to deal with the problem on a long-term basis rather than the ad hoc method we have used to date. There has been no specific request to take more refugees other than general suggestions that Canada should take more.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in connection with another proposed refugee movement from Argentina, I think the minister is well aware of a recent communication from myself, the hon. member for Montmorency and the hon. member for Greenwood, concerning the situation of 100 political prisoners. The authorities in Argentina agreed to release these people if they could be guaranteed sanctuary in a country. After direct representations by the three of us to the officials in Argentina some time ago, it was indicated that Argentina would be quite happy to release these people.

Since there seems to be some difficulty in having any of these people released, even though some interviews have taken place, I wonder if the minister could indicate what steps are being taken with the Argentinian authorities in order that they may act in good faith with respect to the very serious plight, with prolonged detention and in some instances torture, of the people presently being held in Argentina.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, representations have been received and we have made representations to the Argentine authorities concerning 68 people who are being detained. In some instances the officials will not concede that these people are in prison, and in other cases they have indicated that where another country has expressed an interest in an individual, they will not give us access to that particular person in jail.

We have now interviewed two people. One person has already been admitted to Canada in a quiet way so as to protect his anonymity. Argentina has now indicated that we will be permitted to interview, I believe another 12 people, but has yet to concede that the total number of names we have submitted are in fact of individuals in prison there. However, we are pressing on with a very difficult situation.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INTER-OFFICE TRANSFERS—PURCHASE OF EMPLOYEES' HOMES

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, the president of CMHC indicated that it was their departmental policy to purchase the home of an employee on an inter-office transfer. The president did not explain whether or not there were losses to the government in the subsequent sale of these homes.

Could the minister advise the House whether such purchase of employees' homes by CMHC is government policy in terms of its departments or any of its Crown corporations?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that there is a policy relating to the covering of real estate costs, sales costs and things of that nature. It is not my understanding, as the hon. member suggests, that it actually covers a loss in the selling price. I would assume that is related to appraisals or something of that nature. However, I believe real estate costs, legal costs, and so on, are in fact covered when an employee is moved.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of every minister perhaps it could be best summarized in one sentence. The president of CMHC said:

> Then, having acquired title of the home, we will attempt to dispose of it directly.

My concern is that in the disposal there may be a loss at the expense of the taxpayer. Again I would ask, is this just a policy of CMHC or does it also apply to other government departments and Crown corporations? If the minister does not know the answer, would he inquire and report back to the House?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to inquire for the hon. member. As I say, I know that a portion of the loss attributed to real estate fees and legal costs is in fact covered, but whether or not any additional loss is covered I am not certain.

DISPOSITION OF PUBLIC SERVICE RETIREMENT BILL

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board with respect to the government's proposals dealing with Bill C-12, the public service retirement bill which is before the House with respect to which a specific invitation was addressed to members by the government House leader. This bill, according to the government House leader, will not be reached by the end of the year or by the time we recess. Would the President of the Treasury Board tell the House his plans in 1979 with respect to Bill C-12?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to indicate my plans to the House. As the President of Privy Council indicated at the end of last week, in view of the large number of groups which have indicated they would like to comment on this bill and make their representations before the committee we came to the conclusion that it would not be possible to have the bill in place before the end of the calendar year. Therefore, it is our intention to proceed with it early next year.

The provisions relating to indexation, in which I think the hon. member is particularly interested, would not come into effect on January 1, 1979. In fact, we would have a one-year hoist and the three-year tranche would run for the calendar years 1980, 1981 and 1982. We do not anticipate there being a retroactivity clause in the bill.

The provision dealing with prorating for new pensioners who retire during the calendar year 1979 would become operative at the time the bill was proclaimed. The provision relating to moving from age 55 to 60 for indexation would become operative at the time the bill was proclaimed. Also, I think a couple of technical provisions other than the ones relating to air traffic controllers would become operative.

● (1442)

I want to assure retired pensioners and the House that persons who are actually retired, or will be retiring during this year prior to the enactment of the legislation, will not be affected in any way retroactively by the bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that complete answer. Could he inform the House whether he will be tabling a document, or making a statement to the House before we rise with respect to the actual figures contemplated by the government for the triennial period? If he could do so today, that would be quite satisfactory; but if not, could he undertake to give the House, by way of a statement or tabling a document, an indication of the plans with respect to the actual figures, so that people who are appearing before the committee and are interested in the bill can have as much information as possible to assist them in their preparation?

Mr. Buchanan: I will be happy to consider that request, Mr. Speaker. The only comment I have is that, in a sense, when these figures become operative they would be substantially out of date: they would be a year hence, for some time in November next year when the decision would be made on the amount of indexation for the succeeding three years.

It may well be useful to the groups making representations, but I would be a little concerned that the figures might be misleading in the sense that they could have another year's accumulation before they would have to be analysed and a decision taken on the precise amount of the indexation.

Oral Questions

AIRPORTS

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL—EMERGENCY MEDICAL SERVICE

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the fact that cutting back emergency medical service at Toronto international airport could save some bucks but cost some lives, as pointed out in an article in the Toronto Sun dated December 5, 1978, and in view of the fact that present facilities at the airport provide emergency service for about 800 airport staff, travellers and visitors per month, will the minister consider reinstating the services of St. John Ambulance at Toronto international airport, terminals 1 and 2, that were discontinued some two years ago?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt, but something I had overlooked has been brought to my attention. I had mistakenly put the hon. member on the list when he is, in fact, a parliamentary secretary.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONITORING OF AND COMPENSATION FOR WORKERS EXPOSED TO ASBESTOS HAZARDS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the Minister of Labour who is responsible for the new centre for occupational health and safety.

Many persons who worked with asbestos during the Second World War in a Defence Research Board plant at Ottawa have been afflicted with serious asbestos-related diseases. I believe four people have died in recent years. In view of this situation, I would like to ask the minister if he is considering setting up procedures to identify all the employees of wartime defence plants who may be similarly at risk from asbestos exposure, to determine if they have developed asbestos-related diseases and to compensate them and their families for the suffering involved.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that question arose in the "late show" last night and we gave a preliminary answer to the hon. member. I have asked my department to try to determine what we can do, as the Department of Labour, to assist these people in this matter. The responsibilities may be shared among several departments, but we do have it under consideration. I hope to give a more complete answer at a later date.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. It has been documented in court cases now under way in the United States that Canadian asbestos companies were aware as early as 1949 of the potentially fatal health hazards to which their employees were exposed, but they still took no action to inform their workers.

[Mr. Buchanan.]

I would like to ask the minister if he would consider setting up a government fund for victims of asbestos-related diseases, in order to assist them to bring civil actions against companies and corporations which knowingly failed to alert workers to the danger of working with asbestos.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly consider that representation. And so that no one will be under any misunderstanding, I should point out that most of the health and safety in enterprises in Canada fall within provincial jurisdiction.

I do not want to give an answer this afternoon that will leave the impression that the federal government intends to intrude into provincial jurisdictions. However, where there is a federal establishment where persons may have worked with asbestos in the past, we will accept our responsibility. In fact, we have the equivalent of a workmen's compensation fund at the level of the federal government: it is known as the Government Employees Compensation fund. Moneys are set aside to compensate injured workers or those whose health has been damaged, so long as they fall within the limits of federal jurisdiction.

* * *

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF HOSPITALS TO JURISDICTION OF PROVINCES—EFFECT ON VETERANS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. My colleagues and I have received complaints with reference to veterans gaining entry to former veterans' hospitals which have been transferred to the provinces. There have also been several recent news articles dealing with this subject.

Two recent cases are causing concern, one at Sunnybrook and the other in Victoria at Memorial Pavilion, where veterans were refused access and by the time they gained entry to another hospital the opportunity for possible effective care had passed and they died shortly after. Is the minister aware of these cases, and what action is he taking to see that this does not occur again?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the case at Sunnybrook, but I am aware of the one in British Columbia. We have priority beds for veterans in those hospitals. The system is working very successfully.

There was some misunderstanding in the case in British Columbia. The request for a bed was not made properly, through some misunderstanding between the patient's people and his private doctor. I was in Toronto just recently, but I have no knowledge of the Sunnybrook case. This is an ongoing situation and I keep in close touch with it every day.

Further to the case in British Columbia, I want to make it clear that this particular bed was never asked for and I am prepared to refute the remarks which appeared in the press article.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The information respecting the Sunnybrook incident is on its way to the minister's office. Is the minister satisfied that his officials have properly explained to veterans' organizations and, through them, to veterans just what responsibilities his department has to veterans after these hospitals are transferred to the jurisdiction of the provinces?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, this has certainly been fully explained. As the hon. member knows, when people are admitted to hospital for the first time, they are in a new process. This process has been fully explained to veterans' organizations. I might say that in most cases it has been in operation for 12 years, but some cases are fairly recent. I have nothing but praise for the provinces and for the institutions to which our hospitals were transferred: things are working out extremely well.

* * *

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO IMPROVE DOCK FACILITIES

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? On January 4 this year, the minister announced assistance for the docks at Esquimalt, Vancouver, Les Méchins and Lauzon. At the same time, he said he would be working with Newfoundland to examine the opportunity to expand ship repair facilities in St. John's and to provide additional capacity for the federally-owned drydock there.

The minister has had an application from that dockyard since March, 1978, for an $8 million loan to put in a synchrolift so that they can handle 60 Russian ships per year and do additional work and create 200 more jobs in the dockyard. Where is that now, and when is the minister going to carry out his promise of last January?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I hope to do that very, very soon. We will be announcing a number of contracts with regard to drydocks very shortly. The problem arises from the severe cuts the government has made and the cuts necessary in the transfer payments to the provinces. If we succeed in getting some of that money out of the transfer payments through the provinces, then we can go ahead with some of the capital projects we would like to see developed.

● (1452)

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. The Prime Minister stated on November 28 that $445 million of new money had been reallocated by the government to provide new support for the shipbuilding industry. On November 24 he said that the minister's board would be concerned with improvement in the delivery of federal programs. The minister said he will help cut through red tape. He stated it will be an action board, not a talkfest.

My question is this: will the minister now act to cut through the red tape in connection with expanding employment in the dockyard in St. John's, Newfoundland, for which the Prime Minister said there is $400 million in additional moneys available, and there is supposed to be $75 million specifically available for Industry, Trade and Commerce for this purpose? Will the minister do this and create 200 new jobs in this area of terrible unemployment by taking some action and showing how this board will function?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): I note the representation with sympathy, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

RAILWAYS

POLICY RESPECTING RAILWAY CROSSINGS—LEVEL OF GOVERNMENT BEARING RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Thank you for recognizing me, Mr. Speaker: it is one more reason to be grateful for not being a parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: My question is to the Minister of Transport: it flows from recent accusations in the press aimed at the federal government whereby Ottawa is alleged to be responsible for lives lost at specific railway crossings in Ontario.

Will the minister inform the House which level of government is presently responsible for delays in the implementation of this policy?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to make it clear that the recent cost-cutting exercise has not removed any of the funds which have been committed to the Urban Transportation Assistance Program and, therefore, for grade separations. There has been some phasing of the way in which that money will be paid.

In looking at the particular case of Ontario, we as a federal government had approved some 26 grade separations and projects under the Urban Transportation Assistance Program. To our surprise, the province rearranged some of its priorities and slowed down the progress they will be making on grade separations, even though we were satisfied that the flow of funds we had made available to them would allow them to complete their original program. In addition to the two crossings mentioned in the article in question, we have approved, specifically, some five additional crossings, such as at Runnymede Road, Main Street and Osler, Erin Mills Parkway and at least one other.

Oral Questions

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REFINANCING AND MODERNIZATION OF SYDNEY, N.S., STEEL PLANT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague from Cape Breton, the Deputy Prime Minister. What progress is being made in assessing the proposal filed by the Sydney Steel Corporation in connection with refinancing and modernization of the Sydney steel plant?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the proposal was made some weeks ago by Premier Buchanan, and earlier by the former government of Nova Scotia. No response has yet been given to this proposal. Certainly, it will be considered very carefully. It is under consideration.

As I stated outside the House, it is unlikely it will be possible to give a final answer on this proposal before the end of the year, because of the very large stakes involved and the complexity of the problem. Certainly, this proposal will be considered sympathetically by the government.

Mr. Muir: I thank the minister for his answer. The second question is based largely on what he referred to. In view of the fact that the Tree Island Steel Company contract is apparently dependent on the upgrading of the billet mill, will the government be prepared to provide that portion of financial assistance, rather than the whole amount required, by December 31 in order to finalize the contract? I ask this question realizing that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion stated that he only recently learned of this stipulation in the contract as was reported in the last few weeks.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I rise to reply to this part of the hon. member's question because I feel it is specifically directed to me. We are indeed considering this element of the agreement, but we were advised of the terms of the contract between SYSCO and the Tree Island Steel Company only these past few weeks. We are also considering most attentively that part of the contract which requires a firm commitment from SYSCO to invest in the modernization of the mill, so that it can produce the required steel billets. But as the Deputy Prime Minister indicated, it would be very difficult to render a final decision before the end of the year, as we have had this issue under review only a few weeks. However, an interim decision could be made to meet this contract stipulation.

[English]

SPORTS

SAFETY REGULATIONS FOR HELICOPTER SKIING

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport: it arises out of a question I asked last February following a helicopter crash north of Revelstoke, B.C.

The minister indicated at that time there would be a review of safety regulations related to the sport of helicopter skiing, and that would come following investigation of the crash. Has that investigation been completed? Was any public report made? Has there been a review of the regulations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the investigation has not been completed. The safety bureau did release for the public three pages of material in relation to the analysis of the accident. While the report is being developed with regard to a specific accident, the Department of Transport has been reviewing helicopter regulations both with regard to regulation as such and with regard to safety. That work is now moving forward.

Mr. Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport).

In light of the fatalities that have occurred in the new but rapidly growing sport of glacier skiing, is the minister considering publishing guidelines on the training of glacier skiing guides in order to improve the safety record of that exciting sport?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for providing me with notice of his question. We have made appropriate representations to the sport governing body involved. In addition, we have made contributions to the protective and safety area of this sport governing body, to the Alpine Club of Canada and the Canada Ski Patrol Association in the amount of $28,768 and $66,157 respectively. Over-all, in skiing, the people of Canada are contributing this year $776,000, of which $422,000 was extremely well spent in developing our alpine ski team which members on the other side have seen fit to congratulate with us.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MONITORING OF ACTIVITIES OF RELIGIOUS CULTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice: it arises out of two specific circumstances affecting people in my constituency in relation to so-called, far-out religious cults.

My question is this: has there been any survey of the number of these so-called religious cults or communes operating in Canada? Is there any estimate of the number of individuals directly involved as being members in Canada? Is there any federal government monitoring of their activities, their fund-raising methods, what they do with their money, how they invest it and, finally, generally speaking is this a matter of provincial or federal jurisdiction?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the latter part of the hon. member's question he asked for a legal opinion. The hon. member knows very well that the Canadian Charter of Human Rights guarantees religious freedom in this country. Therefore, I know of no surveys or inquiries being done on a continuous basis with regard to religious organizations in Canada.

If the hon. member has in mind some particular groups which he has reason to believe are not obeying the laws of Canada and acting as genuine religious groups, I would be happy to have that information. I will try to get him the information about such groups, or get that done through the appropriate department.

Mr. Lawrence: This is just generally speaking, Mr. Speaker; I am not now referring to any specific group. Generally, is the minister aware of any monitoring whatsoever by the federal government in relation to the activities or even the question of membership in these groups?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Mr. Speaker. I am not aware of any such monitoring of religious groups by any organization at the present time.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether the House knows that last night the government announced through the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) that the order of business that we discussed last week had been changed. I understand today the government intends to call Bill C-9, dealing with referenda on constitutional matters.

● (1502)

In view of that change, and having regard to the time which is left to us, I wonder whether the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) could tell us today what he plans with respect to Bill C-9. When are we likely to be returning to the bill governing Canadian non-profit corporations and the order of business we discussed earlier? Certain arrangements have been made on the assumption the government would remain firm in its legislative program. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is returning from France on Wednesday. When does the Deputy Prime Minister propose to call the motion in the right hon. gentleman's name dealing with the new ministry of state? Perhaps he could clarify the intentions of the government with respect to the order of business because we would appreciate it very much if these matters could be settled.

Mr. MacEachen: I would disagree slightly with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). On Friday I did give a very strong signal that we would be dealing with the referendum bill on Tuesday, depending on the progress which had been made on the four items I listed ahead of that measure. I propose to call the referendum bill today and probably tomorrow, except that if the Prime Minister returns early in the day he might be prepared to proceed with the measure in his name creating the ministry of economic development. That must remain indefinite until his return, though I would hope to be able to advise the hon. member of our intentions tomorrow.

In addition to the items I have already mentioned I should like to advise the hon. member that I am awaiting with great interest the reporting of the unemployment insurance bill. When that bill comes out of the committee it would get priority over all the other items to which I have referred.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We would like to be firm about this. If the Prime Minister is back in time, I take it the Deputy Prime Minister intends to have the motion put in his name tomorrow. If not, do I understand he will be dealing with that matter on Thursday rather than on Wednesday, depending on the time of the right hon. gentleman's return; that we would be dealing with that matter, then, either on Wednesday or on Thursday? Is that the intention of the government? It is important there should be some certainty with regard to this. After all, the proposal has been hanging around for some time.

Mr. MacEachen: That is the intention as I look at the clock at 3.07 today, but that could change depending on the availability of the Prime Minister. But it is my intention to call the referendum bill tomorrow if the Prime Minister is not prepared to proceed with the legislation setting up the ministry of economic development, and to proceed with that item on Thursday also. In the meantime, if the unemployment insurance bill is reported I would give that bill priority over all other matters.

* * *

SOCIAL INSURANCE

USE OF SIN—TABLING OF REPLY TO QUESTION FROM LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked me about a letter signed by the Minister of National Revenue on November 22. I undertook to report very quickly to the House and I am now ready to report. I have here a rather lengthy explanation. There was a little bit of exaggeration in the letter—even Senator Joe Guay can make a little mistake—so I should like permission to table the reply.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have the leave of the House to table the document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order Paper Questions

[Translation]

POINT OF ORDER

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON 5 PER CENT TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday I put a question to the Minister of Finance on an extremely important matter, namely the 5 per cent tax on building materials, more particularly storm doors and windows, and at his invitation I sent him documents which he required to answer my question. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether he has read these documents and whether he is in a position to clear up this fundamental matter because if manufacturers of doors and windows do not inform their customers properly, it is the consumers who will pay the price. I would therefore like to know, through you, Mr. Speaker, whether the minister is in a position to inform us on this subject.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member had required, I met my deputy minister yesterday afternoon and I gave him the documents the hon. member had sent me. I also asked him to contact the hon. member directly to answer him. He was to do that this morning. I will therefore inquire on the matter. I want to inform the hon. member that the person who sent him these documents could have gotten all the information he or she wanted by simply checking with the local office of Revenue Canada.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-29, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 70, 154, 193, 255 and 481.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

RELOCATION OF DSS SUPERANNUATION BRANCH IN MONCTON

Question No. 70—Mr. Jones:

1. Is it the intention of the Superannuation Branch of the Department of Supply and Services to establish its operation in the facilities leased from Multileaseholders Ltd., Moncton, New Brunswick and, if so, on what date?

2. What is the exact location of the offices for such a facility?

3. What is the square footage and the rent for the premises?

4. Is such decentralization a temporary or permanent arrangement?

5. (a) How many employees are to be employed (b) what are the entrance requirements for such employment (i) linguistically (ii) meritwise (iii) in all other respects?

6. What (a) will be the total payroll in such a branch (b) is the classification and salary for each employee, already employed or to be employed?

7. How many (a) employees are re-locating to the Moncton Constituency with this arrangement from outside the Constituency (b) will be from the Constituency?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The superannuation division of the Department of Supply and Services commenced initial operations in the Moncton area, in facilities leased from Multi-Leaseholds Ltd. The commencement of operations was May 15, 1978.

2. Building No. 4 Parkview Plaza in Moncton's Industrial Park at 310 Baig Blvd.

3. Office space—44,163 square feet at $7.97 per square foot per year in four phases:

(1) 26,367 square feet in May, 1978,

(2) 6,635 square feet in October, 1978,

(3) 7,168 square feet in April, 1979,

(4) 3,993 square feet in October, 1979.

Storage space—800 square feet at $3 per square foot per year.

4. The superannuation division has relocated temporarily to the facilities rented from Multi-Leaseholds until appropriate permanent facilities are available.

5. (a) Eventually, approximately 400 over the next four years.

(b) (i) Either bilingual in the two official languages, or English or French identification will be accorded to the various positions.

(ii) Appointments to within the superannuation division shall be in relation to the relevant selection standards, and within the context of the Public Service Employment Act.

(iii) Nil.

6. (a) Approximately $5 million at full strength.

(b) Following is a breakdown by group and level showing anticipated establishment and salary range accorded to each of the positions.

Group/Level	Number	Salary Range
AS-8	1	$29,700—36,700
AS-7	2	$29,200—32,500
AS-6	4	$26,489—29,576
AS-5	3	$22,778—25,404
AS-4	20	$19,469—21,665
AS-3	1	$17,835—19,845
AS-2	27	$16,734—18,645
AS-1	1	$15,031—17,414
PE-3	1	$18,500—26,700
PE-2	1	$16,300—23,400
CR-6	21	$14,701—16,088
CR-5	84	$13,654—14,933
CR-4	25	$12,031—13,154
CR-3	109	$10,837—11,843
CR-2	46	$ 9,083— 9,856
CR-1	1	$ 8,721— 9,635
ST-SCY-3	1	$13,263—14,056
ST-SCY-2	3	$11,635—12,722
ST-SCY-1	5	$ 8,043—11,456
ST-OCE-2	10	$10,403—11,346
ST-TYP-2	7	$ 8,455— 9,168
FI-2	1	$16,674—18,697
FI-3	1	$18,268—20,490
DA-PRO-5	1	$15,648—17,129
DA-PRO-4	1	$14,067—15,394
DA-PRO-3	3	$12,633—13,821
DA-PRO-2	4	$11,294—12,347
DA-CON-5	1	$14,624—16,002
DA-CON-3	3	$11,109—12,140
DA-CON-2	12	$ 9,585—11,069

7. Present indications are that about

(a) 67;

(b) the balance will be selected and appointed according to the Public Service Employment Act.

PUBLIC WORKS—ABITIBI

Question No. 154—Mr. Laprise:

1. In 1977-78, did the Department of Public Works undertake any projects in the constituency of Abitibi and, if so, what were they?

2. Is the department planning to undertake any projects in the constituency of Abitibi in 1978-79 and, if so, what are they?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. Public Works Canada undertook the following project over $5,000 in the Constituency of Abitibi in 1977-78:

Val-d'Or GOCB—Interior fitting-up for Health and Welfare

2. The following projects in excess of $5,000 are planned for 1978-79

La Sarre—Install furnaces, 221 Main Street

Referenda

Great Whale River—New Post Office, warehouse only

Radisson (Baie James)—Fitting-up Post Office

CONSUMER ELECTRONIC PRODUCTS

Question No. 193—Mr. Howie:

Approximately what percentage of the Canadian market for consumer electronic products was served by imports in (a) 1972 (b) 1974 (c) 1976 (d) 1977?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that the percentage of the Canadian market for consumer electronic products, served by imports was as follows: 1972, 29.6 per cent; 1974, 38.6 per cent; 1976, 44.5 per cent; 1977, not available.

TREASURY BOARD—LAWYERS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 255—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the constituency of Provencher were given work by the Treasury Board and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: None.

CRTC—LAWYERS AND LAW FIRMS—VICTORIA

Question No. 481—Mr. McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the constituency of Victoria who performed services for the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission during 1977 and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows: None.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA REFERENDUM ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

Hon. Marc Lalonde (for the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations) moved that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to move second reading of Bill C-9, the referendums bill. This bill is being introduces by the government at a critical time in Canada's history. I am sure all hon. members recognize its potential importance. The bill provides the framework which would permit parliament to approve that referenda be held on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, where that includes all the conventions and enactments of the constitution as well as the political and judicial processes of Canada.

● (1512)

I want to deal with three themes in my remarks today: first, the need for the bill; second, its implications for parliamentary democracy and for federal-provincial relations; and third, the principles underlying it as the framework for a democratic procedure.

[Translation]

Canada has clearly entered the decisive stage of the constitutional debate which has been active since the early 1960s, but which goes back to the 1920s—if not beyond—and the first attempts to deal with the problem of an amending formula. The debate is exciting and it is necessary. Canada today is radically different from the four colonies which drafted the British North America Act 111 years ago. Where then there were four provinces and three million Canadians, during the past 111 last years, Canada has been transformed from a rural frontier society into a strong and sophisticated industrial state.

Where then—that is in 1867—we came almost exclusively from British, French and native ancestry, now we include an important fourth stream—that 30 per cent of Canadians who come from continental Europe, from Asia, and the other continents. While in 1867, it took months to travel from the Gulf of the St. Lawrence to Vancouver Island, now we can do it in hours, and our messages and images can do it instantly.

Where then the state played a relatively marginal role in most people's lives, today it has grown to absorb 40 per cent of our gross national income and to touch our lives in ways never then dreamed of.

Given these enormous changes, we must have the greatest respect for the Fathers of Confederation who drafted our constitution. It has served us well and provided the framework for extraordinary accomplishments. But it is necessary that Canadians look carefully at this constitutional legislation to ask whether, after over a century, the time has not come to renew our most basic law.

And this, of course, is exactly what is happening. The government has worked actively to promote this review: first, with the white paper "A Time for Action" last June; secondly, with Bill C-60 setting out possible changes; and, most recently, in late October, with its recent offer to discuss a number of questions relating to the division of powers.

The recent constitutional conference was a success, I do not hesitate to say so. It is now being followed by intensive discussions by the federal and provincial governments on a number of significant items. The justice ministers and the ministers of federal-provincial affairs or intergovernmental affairs have already held a three-day meeting.

Another one is scheduled for tomorrow night or rather for Thursday morning. It will be held in Toronto and will last for three days, ending after next Saturday's meeting. This conference will allow us to further examine the constitutional proposals which have been discussed during the recent first ministers' conference in late October and early November. But whatever the prospects for agreement on these constitutional issues may be, I for one am confident that real progress will be made during the conferences and discussions which will take place in the coming weeks.

So whatever the prospects for some agreement on some questions, it is clear that the Canadian public is not yet directly involved in the process of constitutional change. I believe there may be circumstances when such direct involvement could be of the utmost importance. For instance: It could serve to acquaint the large majority of our citizens with the importance and character of proposals for constitutional changes and permit the people to express themselves directly on these proposals. Even if the proposals were supported by the great majority of federal and provincial governments and by the important political parties, such public participation on the process of constitutional change could be very valuable.

This involvement of the public in the constitutional reform could directly demonstrate the legitimacy of the constitution and help transform this legal document—which is out of necessity somewhat dry—into a people's statement of their basic principles which would guide them over many decades. Direct public involvement could also serve to guide the federal and provincial governments, should the process of constitutional revision ever become blocked. Obviously, a referendum in these circumstances would not be entered into lightly. As well, any federal government would be aware of the great risks of defeat in a referendum if it asked parliament to approve a question with important provincial governments or parties ranged against it.

The referendum bill before us, Mr. Speaker, would do nothing to minimize those risks for the federal government. As a matter of fact, under this act, the federal party would not get more than 20 per cent of the television time allowed by the CRTC to the various political parties. And provincial parties generally would get as much television time as federal parties. These and other measures ensure that no federal government would ever be in a position to manipulate the result of a federal referendum over the opposition of the provincial governments or opposition parties. But the federal government would be able to ask parliament to approve a referendum question if it was confident that a public vote on the question would clarify the desires of the population in regard to constitutional reform.

These are two circumstances, and I could quote others, when a federal referendum may prove very useful in constitutional reform. There is another reason for this bill, Mr. Speaker, and it relates to the particular challenge to the country posed by the present government of Quebec. The Parti Québécois, as is known, is committed to holding a referendum on the constitutional future of that province. I do not know what the question will be and nobody at present seems to know, not even the government itself which is eventually supposed to ask the question. I honestly hope that both the question and the Parti Québécois' option will be clear so that the Quebec referendum will serve to clarify the desires of Quebeckers. But whatever the precise question and option, I think it is beyond question that the Quebec government is committed to an end to a federal Canada, that is an end to Canada based on two orders of government, each directly elected and having real powers to tax and to spend within its competence. Given these goals of the Quebec government and given that it has equipped itself to hold a referendum on the future of Quebec, the Government of Canada believes it is incumbent on itself and on parliament to ensure that we are equally equipped to consult with the people of Quebec, or of the other provinces, or all Canadian citizens at the some time, if need be.

● (1522)

[English]

Canada is a federation, and a federation requires a careful balance between the central and provincial governments. Canada and its provinces have parliamentary systems of government with well established principles and traditions for the political process. Some Canadians, and I respect their views, are worried that a law which would enable parliament to approve referendum questions on constitutional matters may have serious implications for either our federal system or our parliamentary democracy. Are they right to be worried?

Let us first consider the question of our federal system. It is basic to the present bill that referenda be consultative only. They would not be binding on parliament. This means that a federal referendum would not serve to replace the present procedures for constitutional amendment. This is clear in the bill, it is quite clearly spelled out, and it was clear in the bill which was introduced in the last parliament. This position is maintained in the present bill. It is therefore not a substitute for parliament, not a substitute for our present rules of constitutional amendment, but it is an addition to the present procedures, an addition which might provide extra relevance or legitimacy or which might help to move the federal and provincial governments closer to agreement.

What is more, as I indicated in the House in April, the government believes it is clear that if a question which had implications for one or more provinces was posed, then consultations would be held with those provinces relative to that question. Finally, the procedures set down in the bill for the referendum campaign are designed to put the federal and provincial governments and federal and provincial political parties on a completely equal footing in such a debate. Thus, the rules of a referendum campaign would preserve the balance in our federal system.

Let me go to the second question or the second area of concern which some Canadians feel, and that is the concern for our parliamentary democratic system. Here I think three points are critical. First of all, referenda would be consultative in nature. Second, they would only be held on the authority of parliament; and third, they would be restricted to subject matters having to do with constitutional questions.

First, the consultative nature of referenda would ensure that parliament was still responsible in every way, as it is at the present time, for the actual approval of any constitutional amendments. Because referenda would be consultative, it would also be possible to distinguish between the form of referendum questions and that of constitutional amendments. There may be occasions when it would be appropriate to ask the public to pronounce on broad constitutional principles or on the general characteristics of political structures without becoming involved in all the details which characterize the legal description of these. Thus parliament and the provincial legislatures would continue to be concerned with the detailed examination of legal texts, but they might do so after a public expression on the larger question; and it would always be possible for parliament or a legislature to reject the views expressed in the referendum were its members ready to answer for this in a general election when their turn comes. That is how the democratic system functions.

I hear some hon. members on the other side laughing. Let me remind them—although perhaps this is not a good example to quote to them—that Mr. Lévesque has said quite clearly that he would not consider himself bound by the answer he would receive in the next referendum and certainly would not intend to resign; but quite clearly in such a case he would be called upon to account for his decision before the electorate at the next provincial election, which would also be the case for any other government, provincial or federal, in a similar situation.

Therefore, I repeat that nothing would be changed in terms of our present system of proceeding with constitutional amendments. Referenda would provide parliament and the legislatures with the benefit of the views of the Canadian people expressed in a specific way on a specific subject at a specific time.

Second, only parliament itself can approve referendum questions. This is the most basic protection of the parliamentary system because members of the House would never permit our system to be eroded by the reckless use of referenda. It is worth noting that those countries which make extensive use of referenda, especially Switzerland and some American states, have procedures for citizens to initiate referenda by petition, and it is these petitions which are largely responsible for the frequent use of referenda. These referenda take place at the initiative of a certain number of citizens, as provided for either by the state constitution, in the case of the American states, or by the national constitution, in the case of Switzerland. However, in country after country where there is no right of initiative by petition arising out of a group of citizens, the use of referenda has been extremely limited.

● (1532)

Finally referenda would be restricted to constitutional questions. This type of restriction is found in many countries with parliamentary systems. There is no evidence that the possibility of constitutional referenda is the thin edge of the wedge which leads ineluctably to referenda on other questions. Even the Mother of Parliaments, the parliament of Great Britain in Westminster, has held two referenda in recent years; one in Northern Ireland and another one throughout the country concerning the entry of Great Britain into the European Common Market.

An hon. Member: Both divisive.

Mr. Lalonde: Those referenda were held on constitutional questions. Moreover, the Mother of Parliaments recently approved two more referenda on the constitutional future of Wales and Scotland.

Also, I might draw the attention of the House to the fact that Australia, Denmark, France, Ireland, New Zealand and Norway are all parliamentary democracies which hold occasional referenda but which restrict their subject matter solely or almost entirely to constitutional questions. I have not included in this list other democratic countries which use the technique of referenda on various subjects over and above constitutional questions. The most obvious ones which come to mind readily are the United States and Switzerland.

Of course, there is a logic to restricting referenda to constitutional questions. The constitution is the basic law of a country. It establishes the structure of the state and the sovereign relations between parliament, people and the different orders of government. In some countries, sovereignty is deemed to flow directy from the people. In those cases it is entirely natural, through constitutional referenda, that people should determine the institutional form which sovereignty should take.

In Canada we consider parliament is sovereign within its domain. But even here, most would recognize that people are the most important source of sovereignty. Consultative referenda permit the population to express itself on questions of sovereignty without violating the legal sovereignty of parliament or of the legislatures.

[Translation]

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to describe the principles on which the government has based the proposed procedures for referendum campaigns and voting. But in doing so, I want to avoid entering into details, for the nature of this bill is necessarily complex and, obviously, it would be better to get into them at the committee stage of debate. The government has based the bill on certain broad principles, which it hopes make the bill a model for referenda in a federal state. Besides, we have had consultations with opposition parties when the legislation was first presented during last session. However, the government recognizes that a bill of this type—like the electoral law—should as much as possible represent the views of all parties on proper procedures for a political contest. I want to underline, therefore, that we approach the debate on this bill with an open mind, Mr. Speaker, and we hope to work in as close co-operation as possible with all parties to ensure the procedures are widely acceptable as the best possible. In this regard, I think our debate at this stage is especially important because it gives us the opportunity to examine the principles underlying the bill before entering into details.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that members opposite will recognize that in some cases no procedure could be devised which fully satisfied all our principles. We had to make difficult choices between principles to which we all believe in this House. I am confident the opposition will recognize these difficulties and that in its criticisms it will show full regard for such difficulties. So these are the major principles underlying this bill. First, the procedures governing a referendum should be fully consistent with all those political rights normally respected in Canada, especially freedom of expression and freedom of association. Secondly, the procedure should impose financial controls which encourage a fair and open debate.

● (1542)

I want to discuss these two principles together, Mr. Speaker, because they are so closely related in the provisions of the bill. If we had been concerned only to ensure freedom of association and freedom of expression without any financial controls our task would have been greatly simplified. In fact, it is the combination of this freedom of association and of expression with the need to exercise some financial controls on the other hand which is so challenging. Our analysis led us to conclude that it would be impossible to satisfy both principles by trying to impose over-all financial controls on the "yes" and "no" campaigns within a referendum campaign.

The Quebec government, in its referendum legislation, has decided to impose such over-all financial controls on the two opposing sides in a referendum. An in-depth study of this bill has convinced us that the approach and the policy adopted by the Quebec government necessarily leads to infringements of the freedoms of expression and association.

Hon. members of this House will certainly want to voice their opinion on this matter—this is a very serious issue—and they will indicate how, by legislatively forcing people to join umbrella organizations representing each side of the question, the freedoms of expression and association of these same people are necessarily reduced and restricted. One can even suppose that, since only two unbrella groups are recognized, some people could be excluded from the referendum debate because they would be rejected, for political reasons by one or the other option or umbrella group. That has indeed happened in other countries. We have seen this in Norway, in particular, during the referendum debate concerning the country's entry into the common market. There have indeed been cases where two major organizations were created—they were not established by law—for and against the proposal, and for purely political reasons, certain groups could not join either one of these organizations, which believed that politically it would not serve their purpose to have some small group, considered marginal for example, join them lest it would discredit the opinion of the majority. We have therefore concluded that this requirement set out in the Quebec legislation to have all citizens join either one of the two umbrella organizations is a serious infringement on the freedom of association and even on the freedom of expression. That is why we have rejected that alternative, but only after due consideration, we have studied it with a great deal of interest and attention. We have examined foreign experiences in this respect and we must note that that philosophy, though it may be inspired by apparently defensible motivations prompting toward control over expenditures made by the two opposing groups, results in an undue and unecessary limitation of the freedom of association and the freedom of expression which must be the two basic freedoms in any self-respecting democratic system.

So what did we do? Barring, an over-all financial control over the two groups in question we found another solution. And the solution we found is that which is contained in the bill which we think is an acceptable way of dealing with the problem of financial control by limiting the expenditures and contributions of individuals and legal persons, as opposed to the "yes" and "no" campaigns; in other words, what we are going to control is the contribution from each individual or legal person. Thus, there will be a maximum contribution so that no one will be able in the referendum debate to exert undue pressure as a result of his wealth as his contribution will be subject to a maximum set out in the legislation, but we are not preventing anyone from contributing and particularly not from joining one of the tens of hundreds of groups that can form in a debate like that.

In short, this procedure avoids the situation where citizens are simply forced to join either one of the two camps and being practically prevented from participating freely in the referendum debate outside those two camps. Modern democratic views require that the public be informed of the provenance and object of political funds and that there be limits on the use of these funds. The Canada Elections Act limits the amount which individual parties and candidates can spend, but does not limit the size of contributions. And that is rather easy because there is a limited number of political parties. There are now four parties in the House and at election time there are always a few more, some that do not even manage to have one member elected to this House, but one must admit that the number of political parties is relatively limited. But if we are talking about a referendum debate for example on constitutional matters, obviously the question will have to be answered by a yes or no, but each political party, each group, each association, might want to decide pro or against such or such thesis, for entirely different reasons; some groups, I repeat, might prefer not to be associated with others in such a political debate or democratic debate.

Because we were not prepared to force the creation of "yes" and "no" groups which would be subject to total expenditure limits, we chose to put a limit of $5,000 on the amount that an individual or legal person can spend or contribute. No person, no corporation, no union could make a contribution exceeding $5,000 during the referendum campaign. That sum seems sufficient to permit anyone a natural extension of one's freedom of expression while it also ensures that no one or no group can have an unfair advantage because of private wealth or because of a special position which they might have, as corporations, unions, non-profit associations of any kind which would have access to special funds.

Mr. Speaker, the procedures in this bill recognize federal and provincial parties as basic actors in our political process, but they facilitate the creation of groups or even unbrella groups, should parties or individuals want this. But they do not make it compulsory, this must be emphasized. They also permit individuals to act alone, should they so wish, with absolutely no need to register or report on their activities. Thus, they preserve freedom of expression, subject only to the limit of $5,000 which applies to contributions or expenditures.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I have taken some time to elaborate on the first two principles that guide us in this bill, and that is that first and above all we should respect freedom of expression and freedom of association in the referendum debate; and, second, there should be some financial control on the powers that may be exercised by those who are contributing financially.

There are two other principles I should like to talk about which we find in this bill. The third principle is that the procedures should ensure the probity of the referendum process at the same high level as the probity of the electoral process. The fourth principle is that procedures should be as simple and as familiar as possible. Thus, the bill before us uses the procedures of the Canada Elections Act wherever possible. When adaptation has been necessary because it is impossible just to prescribe the Canada Elections Act, we have tried to make it as consistent as possible with electoral practice.

One example is the introduction of representatives of provincial parties or of referendum committees into the revision of electoral lists and scrutiny of the vote. Another example is in basing the allocation of television time to parties on the procedures established for elections.

This practice for the allocation of television time involves a difficult choice because there is a counter principle whereby time would be allocated equally to the yes and no groups. We decided against this partly because we could not devise a satisfactory procedure for the equal allocation of broadcasting time without forcing the creation of umbrella groups and violating the freedom of association and the freedom of expression about which I spoke earlier.

● (1552)

More fundamentally, we believe that broadcasting time should be allocated to recognized spokesmen for the population in relation to their established support in reference to provincial and federal political parties. If those parties wish to reallocate their time to outside groups, to divide it with other supporters, they would be free to do so, but the total allowable broadcasting time would be divided between federal and provincial political parties. Adopting the procedure from elections and from the elections act seems to do this perfectly.

The final and fifth underlying principle is that the procedures should respect the federal nature of Canada and not favour parties or groups active at the federal level over those active at the provincial level. I have already touched on this principle in discussing the implications of referenda for our federal system. Again, the government's bill is a marked contrast in this regard with the referenda act approved earlier this year by the Quebec National Assembly. While the federal bill gives full rights to provincial parties to participate in a federal referendum, the Quebec bill gives absolutely no rights whatever to federal parties to participate in a Quebec referendum. At best members of the federal parties, and I mean here members of this House, will only be able to participate as a privilege, if they are accepted by the referenda committees, the umbrella committees, set up by members of the National Assembly.

In any event, this bill would ensure that any referendum question was given a full and fair debate by all federal and provincial parties and any other interested groups. It ensures that there will be no bias in favour of the so-called "Ottawa point of view" against that found in provincial capitals.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to conclude let me say that this bill seems to me necessary and important, that it is a positive addition to our federal system and is fully consistent with our parliamentary system. It is based on democratic principles which are largely endorsed both in this House and beyond, particularly by provincial legislatures. Therefore, I invite opposition members to approach this bill in a positive spirit of critical examination, so that together we may try to improve its provisions and prepare Canada for the decisive phase of its constitutional development. I would like to thank hon. members from this side of the House as well as the other side who in recent months have expressed their views and thoughts on that very important issue. Once again, as I said early in my speech, not only has the federal parliament a right to get an instrument as proposed in this legislation, but in the present circumstances I think the government would be irresponsible if it failed to propose to parliament a legislation such as the one before the House today and which, I am sure, will be discussed positively by all parties.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Lalonde: Certainly.

Mr. Brewin: Would the minister tell the House whether in this bill—and I have read Bill C-9 through very carefully—there is any provision which provides, after the referendum has been completed, for any option to be taken? Or is it that the opinion secured by the referendum is purely advisory, and it would still be left to parliament and legislatures to exercise the same jurisdictions they now have?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the interpretation in the latter part of the hon. member's question is the proper one. The referenda under this bill will be purely consultative, and there is no action required by parliament or by any legislature following any particular result of any referendum.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Or by the government.

Mr. Lalonde: Or by the government; obviously by the government. If there is, for instance, an overwhelmingly positive answer to a positive question in a particular referendum and the government does not proceed to do anything about it, surely the people of Canada would ask themselves why they had to go through that exercise in the first place. That would be the responsibility of the government of the day, vis-à-vis the citizens of Canada after having expressed their views.

I reiterate that it is clearly a consultative process. There is nothing in the Constitution of Canada at the present time that could make the result of a referendum binding on the government, parliament or any particular legislature. I can assure the hon. member that the rights of parliament, the legislatures and particularly our responsibilities as parliamentarians vis-à-vis the amendment of the Canadian constitution continue to lie completely and wholly within the legislatures and the federal parliament.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to take part in debate on this bill on behalf of my party. Bill C-9 is:

An act respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada.

I note that the bill stands in the name of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid). I can only presume that he is not speaking in this debate. He is not even in the House, though he was earlier.

Mr. Lalonde: He will be.

Miss MacDonald: Perhaps he was not quite prepared due to the speed with which the government brought in this particular piece of legislation, and therefore is not leading off on a bill in his name. However, we shall be glad to welcome his participation at any time during the debate, and we will ask of course who is responsible for this piece of legislation. Is it the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations or is it the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde)?

Mr. Lalonde: Jointly and severally.

Miss MacDonald: Perhaps at some point we will have that matter clarified.

● (1602)

This is one of the most important, one of the most major, bills ever to come before the Canadian parliament, because by its very nature it has tremendous bearing on our established political process. This bill gives to the governor in council, the cabinet, the executive, power to initiate referenda on constitutional matters. Nothing could be more substantive or more serious. It is serious not just because of its constitutional aspects, with which I shall deal in a few minutes, but it is doubly serious because a referendum of any kind at the national level is a serious matter in itself.

We have not had much experience with national referenda in this country, one reason being that the whole concept is alien to the spirit of the Canadian parliamentary system; but the experience that we have had has shown that, far from being a mechanism of unity for Canada, the referendum has had the opposite effect. I say that sorrowfully, Mr. Speaker. The referendum of 1898 on prohibition and the referendum of 1942 on conscription were divisive and left their mark on this country.

In both cases the province of Quebec voted one way and the rest of the country voted the other. No one who knows even a fragment of Canadian history can be unaware of the incredibly divisive effects of the conscription referendum of 1942. The wound has not healed to this day and is, in fact, one of the major historical events which underlies much of the current disunity. Whatever reasons one can cite for favouring referenda, the healing of wounds is not one of them. Referenda serve to set neighbour against neighbour, family member against family member, and the cleavage remains long after the content of the referendum has been forgotten. We must bear this fact in mind if we are looking to national unity as a factor in this bill.

The last thing we want at this time is to further rend the fragile fabric of confederation at a time when it is being subjected to greater strain than ever before in our history. Being aware of its potential for divisiveness we must, if we are to consider referenda as an integral part of the political system, arrive at that decision only after careful thought, only after thorough examination of its effects on our parliamentary system; and, above all, we must arrive at it with the utmost honesty.

I do not find this legislation before us today to be in that spirit of honesty and forthrightness which this difficult subject demands. I see this legislation as being devious, dangerous and even deceptive. It purports to be an act respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada. It is, instead, a blatant attempt to subvert and undermine the responsibilities and duties of the Canadian system of responsible government.

Mr. Lalonde: You must be kidding!

Miss MacDonald: The minister laughs.

Mr. Lalonde: You have got to be kidding!

Miss MacDonald: If this bill were merely dangerous, our course would be clear. We would simply vote against this nonsense and have nothing more to do with it.

Mr. Lalonde: But devious?

Miss MacDonald: It is devious, as the minister has said, and deceptive as well. The government has undertaken to dress up this bill in attractive and worthy clothing of direct democracy, constitutional change and even national unity. We must not let this disguise deceive us for it conceals a fraud, the chief result of which would be to bring about not simply constitutional change—because we are all interested in that—but a constitutional revolution by stealth.

Of course, it would be done in the name of simply giving the Government of Canada powers equal to those which the Parti Québécois government has given itself. That is not fighting fire with fire, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would have it and as the Minister of Justice would have it. That is trying to fight fire with gasoline, with the result of burning down your own house and of spreading the fire much further—to fires of disunity.

I want to discuss the real significance of this bill because it demonstrates once again that this government either does not know what it is doing, where it is heading, or it does not want the rest of the country to find out. The bill has many defects and there are a number of ways in which we might deal with these.

Some time ago the separatist government of the province of Quebec began preparations for a referendum on the future of the status of that province in Canada's confederation. All of us watched with considerable concern as the arrangements were announced, piece by piece, by which the separatists would try to take our country apart, piece by piece. We watched that process with concern and alarm. We know that the people of Quebec will be called upon to express their wishes on this country's future. On this side of the House we are confident, even if the government is not, that the people of Quebec will reject any attempt to trick their country away from them by a misleading plebiscite or any other illegitimate means.

Our greatest concern is not that the people of Quebec will fail to see through the propaganda of the separatists, but that the government opposite will continue in its blind, wilful and divisive ways to the point where it discredits the federal system in the eyes of all Canadians.

Sir, the government says that it needs this legislation, that it must have as much power to consult the people of Quebec as have the Péquistes. On the surface that appears to be a very reasonable argument. If that were what this bill meant and all that it meant, we on this side could accept it fairly willingly. We would have no problem with that kind of legislation if that is what it were. All of us are concerned that the Quebec referendum be conducted in a fair way. But already it is quite clear that the Péquistes are loading the dice as well as stacking the decks.

The existence at the federal level of a clear set of rules to assure the utmost freedom of speech and the utmost in full debate prior to holding any referendum in the province of Quebec is very important. If nothing else, it will constitute a clear warning to the Péquiste government that it must play more fairly than it intends at that time.

Establishing these rules well in advance of the actual asking of such a question by either Quebec or the federal government is also important, for then parliament can concentrate its attention on the precise questions to be asked and the circumstances in which they will be asked without being distracted by debate over procedures. That is also good. We do not argue those points because, as I say, they are good.

● (1612)

However, what is not good, what is devious and deceptive, is the scope of this legislation. What is not acceptable is the attempt once more to sneak into the hands of this most untrustworthy government, and to seek to do it unilaterally, even more power to manipulate and abuse this parliament and the people of Canada than it already has.

Hon. members will recall that last Tuesday, on the initiative of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), this House engaged in a debate which demonstrated the extent to which the government has gone in undermining the Canadian parliamentary system of responsible government. That debate showed how this government had rejected and refused to put into play those rules and practices which would enable us in the House to have real parliamentary democracy. This government persistently rejects the basic constitutional principles of holding itself responsible to and properly accountable to members of the House of Commons.

If this bill should pass in its present form, it would give the present government even more opportunity and more incentives through abuse of the referendum process to evade proper accountability in this House. Today, under the pretence of meeting the Péquistes' power with equal power, the government opposite proposes a constitutional revolution. That is what this bill is all about.

We on this side are always willing to discuss and advocate, long before the government was prepared to do anything about it, discussion on constitutional evolution. However, revolution of this scope? Where on earth is this government leading us?

An hon. Member: Perdition.

Miss MacDonald: The terms of this bill are far too wide. Let me read that part of clause 2, the interpretation section, where the scope of this bill is effectively defined. It sets out what the government would see as falling within its power at the national level. In dealing with referendums on the constitution, it defines the constitution, that area where the government could conduct referenda. It states that the Constitution of Canada includes, and I quote:

—without limiting the meaning of that expression,

(a) the customs, conventions and enactments that comprise the Constitution of Canada, and

(b) the political and judicial institutions and processes of Canada;

If the bill had stopped after (a), despite my reservations on the "without limiting" phrase, that might have been acceptable. However, the inclusion of (b) opens up the question almost to the four winds. Canada has a great many political institutions, political processes, judicial institutions and judicial processes. A great many of those political institutions, political processes, judicial institutions and judicial processes are not now, ought not now or ought ever to be, under the authority and jurisdiction of the central government. They are under the jurisdiction of the provinces and rightly so.

That is what our constitution asked for. That is why we have a federal system. That is why we have a federal constitution, despite this government's constant attempts to subvert and centralize all power in Ottawa as far as it can. This is another indication of that tendency toward centralization which this government has exhibited year after year. We can see that tendency coming to the fore.

Clause 3, dealing with proclamation of a referendum, reads as follows:

Where it appears to the governor in council that any question relating to the Constitution of Canada or relating to or arising out of a proposed or possible change in the Constitution of Canada is of sufficient importance to warrant obtaining the opinion of electors on that question, the governor in council may, by proclamation, direct that the opinion of electors be obtained on that question by putting the question to the electors of Canada or of one or more provinces specified in the proclamation at a referendum called for that purpose.

That is a referendum called on any constitutional question by the Government of Canada. That wording in clause 3 encompasses any constitutional question that the Government of Canada might want to ask. That is how wide the scope of this bill is.

In his remarks the minister said that questions put on a referendum are restricted to matters of a constitutional nature. What kind of a restriction is that, given the scope of constitutional matters in our federal system?

A myriad of concerns come to the fore, concerns which all of us as parliamentarians, representatives of the people, feel deeply about. Who is going to determine whether or not an issue is constitutional? Can the federal government call a referendum on constitutional issues that might or would have a bearing on provincial or concurrent jurisdictions without the approval of the provinces? What about a referendum on controversial constitutional matters that have not yet been assigned to either provincial or federal jurisdictions, such as offshore resources?

If it wishes, a majority government could use its majority power to see that referendum results would be carried into law. The minister said this would only be a consultative mechanism. However, in the explanation that accompanied the Canada referendum bill, the section on page 5 dealing with the legal character states: "Referenda would be advisory or consultative in nature. Such referenda may, of course, be morally binding if the government indicates its intention to be so bound."

What would happen if a majority government decided to use its majority power to push a referendum through? In the case of offshore resources, for example, could the government effect a decision of this issue by means of a referendum, using the results as a directive to the government and thus do an end run around the courts? Is that the kind of thing the government has in mind with this legislation?

A general provision for referenda on constitutional matters is in itself a constitutional change of some magnitude. Some it is a constitutional innovation. Since it is something new that is coming before us, a matter of great magnitude with regard to constitutional change, should it not be included as part of an over-all package of constitutional reform? Is that not where this bill belongs? Is that not where this suggestion or innovation belongs?

If that kind of general power is what the government wants, then let it deal with it in the proper place and at the proper time. In the meantime, however, there is nothing to prevent the government holding a plebiscite on a particular subject as it did with conscription, or as the United Kingdom did in the case of the common market or on Northern Ireland. Contrary to the impression the minister tried to leave before the House, those matters were dealt with as specific bills coming before the parliament at Westminster in order to deal with a specific question at a specific time. That has been done before in this House, and it can be done at any time.

My greatest concern is that the present government is moving away from past experience where a referendum or plebiscite was held on a specific matter arising at a given point in time. They are moving away from that practice. They are now arrogating unto themselves a general power to hold referenda on constitutional matters. They are now using the Quebec situation to create a new and formidable weapon for the Government of Canada.

● (1622)

Now, sir, it could be argued that it would be appropriate for us to introduce the general concept of referenda into our political system. That is a legitimate argument. There might be arguments in favour of such a course but there are no arguments for doing it this way, trying to slip it in through an underhand method, nor can there be. The method being used by way of this bill is an extension of the government's penchant for attempting to change our federal system unilaterally, something which we have seen so much evidence of in recent months. It is before us once again.

I wish to draw attention to what has gone on in recent months. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that last spring the House and the country were given a white paper on constitutional change. It was called "A Time for Change". That white paper was designed to encourage public discussion and input into the whole process of constitutional change. But no sooner was the ink dry on that white paper than we were handed a finalized formula in the form of Bill C-60, the constitutional amendment bill. Before the people could even receive copies of the white paper we were presented with that bill.

Mr. Lalonde: Not at all.

Miss MacDonald: All the minister has to do is look at the dates on which those two documents were presented and he will find that this was the method which was used. Of course, the government was quick to tell us that the legislation itself was open to discussion, that none of it was immune to change. However, in its usual way of saying one thing and doing another, the government's subsequent actions put the lie to those dubious assurances. I say this because the Prime Minister in his most recent utterances has made it clear that his intent remains to meet his deadline for constitutional change regardless of opposition, regardless of the opposition of the provinces, regardless of the damage to the federal system.

A parliamentary committee, after much study, recommended the wholesale redrafting of Bill C-60, the government's proposals for constitutional change, but with the admonitions of that committee still ringing in his ears the Prime Minister met the provincial premiers to discuss the whole spectrum of constitutional questions at the first ministers' conference in the latter part of October.

The outcome of that conference, one which the Minister of Justice attended, was the establishment of a top level federal-provincial committee under the chairmanship, I believe, of the Minister of Justice to work in such areas as amending formulae, the division of powers, institutions, the whole field of constitutional change. That is why the committee was set up—to deal with matters such as the very one we are debating today. While that committee was working in this area thinking it would really have some influence on constitutional change, the government House leader introduced a major piece of legislation, one with great constitutional ramifications, which gives it and it alone the power to hold referenda on any question related to the constitution including, if the remarks of the Prime Minister are any indication, questions with which that federal-provincial committee is dealing at the present time.

I just want to quote, at this point, from the proceedings at a press conference given by the Prime Minister on October 21 of this year. He was asked what specific question or questions he would like to put to the Canadian people in a referendum. In response, the Prime Minister had this to say:

I indicated that the questions could have to do with as simple a thing as patriation of the constitution, or repatriation of the constitution; they could have to do with the will of the country to remain united, and they could have to do with anything in between.

"Anything in between"—anything of a constitutional nature. If there really is a reason for changing our system to accommodate referenda—and that may well be an arguable case—why is this concept not part of the federal-provincial discussions presently under way? How often is the government going to break faith in matters of federal-provincial relations? What is the minister going to say to his counterparts when he meets them on Thursday to explain why he is doing something unilaterally in the House of Commons which he will not discuss with them?

Mr. Lalonde: I would say you are talking nonsense.

Mr. Grafftey: Try to be more intelligent than that.

Miss MacDonald: How much longer does the government intend to continue its history of unilateral action on major constitutional matters without input from the provinces? What hon. gentlemen opposite must recognize is that the constitution does not belong to one particular government at one particular time. Nor do our institutions or the judicial processes. The government must give up the idea that it holds all the power and that it can impose its will upon Canadians for all time. I say this to the minister very seriously: it is not the prerogative of a dying government to extend its constitutional will long into the future.

We have heard a lot of talk recently from ministers and from the Prime Minister himself about direct democracy. Does the government really believe in direct democracy? I have the impression that it does not. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) have spoken about ways in which direct democracy might be practised and the idea has been put forward by any number of people in the Liberal Party. They have persisted in talking about consulting the people on every important or emotional issue that comes up. They talk about it, but when this legislation comes before us we find they have not dealt with the essence of what they were seeking to convey to the public.

● (1632)

This bill is not about direct democracy in the manner in which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport have spoken about it. This bill uses that broad concept, but it is applied only to constitutional matters. Either we should be speaking about specific legislation tied to a specific object, the Quebec referendum question, or we should be talking about the introduction of direct democracy on a grand scale.

Either one of those is a legitimate issue to be discussing, but we on this side would be willing to discuss the specific legislation to which I have just referred which would address itself to the Quebec referendum question. If that is what the government judges to be necessary, we want to make it perfectly clear that we would be willing to discuss that kind of legislation. What we object to is the potential to have any and all fundamental changes to our constitution brought about in this fashion, and that is what this bill would do.

As it stands, this bill would constitute very significant constitutional change. We on this side have always said that in the debate about constitutional change other participants from all levels must be brought into the discussion. I am talking about the other partners in confederation as well as the people of Canada. They must be brought into the discussion of any proposals for constitutional change, of which this bill is a very major one.

Evidently the government does not plan to do that. It does not plan to consult any of the other legitimate expressions of Canadian thought and feeling on this major constitutional change.

Mr. Lalonde: It has been out for six months.

Miss MacDonald: This legislation may or may not be wholly within the power of parliament to pass. I am not sure of that, especially when I consider the way in which provincial powers would likely be trampled on if this government were given the wide ranging power it is asking for through this bill. With this bill in the hands of an unscrupulous government, that government is given greater potential for seizing power than it is given by the Emergency Powers Act or any other piece of legislation presently on the statute books. That is what this bill does.

Of course, the government—and I know the way it approaches these things—will probably say this bill is within its legal power, and well it might be because that is the course the government took with its previous constitutional bill, Bill C-60. We know the objections to that approach which were raised by constitutional experts, by the provinces and by people all across the country. We know that that line of unilateral action which this government has always put forward has been rejected time and again.

The government should try to decide what it wants to do with this bill. If it wants fundamental constitutional change of the kind envisaged in this bill, it must bring the whole debate out into the open and into a much wider sphere of discussion. It must consult the premiers, the provinces, the public and other constitutional specialists outside government. If, however, the government is serious in its intent about wanting only to deal adequately with the Quebec referendum question, then this bill should be amended to do that job—

Mr. Lalonde: You have not been doing your homework.

Miss MacDonald: —and to do it without giving the government even more wide ranging and arbitrary powers than it already has. What the government should not be doing in any case is trying to do the first of these jobs under the guise of the second. That is what we have in this bill.

The government is trying to use the Quebec situation to delegate to itself much greater constitutional powers. What we need in this case is a special committee on constitutional matters. We need that committee to be set up in this House and to look at this bill. The committee should be given this bill so that it can get the terms and the mechanics of referendum legislation and referendum questions settled to everyone's satisfaction as quickly as possible. Then the committee could get down to the business of establishing once and for all the proper scope of questions which might be asked of the people of Canada.

That is the nub of this bill: What is the scope of questions which one level of government can put to the people of Canada? What is the power that the federal government is seeking to usurp? Before a committee of this kind we could look at this question and hear witnesses who are able to advise not just the government but all members of parliament on constitutional matters. Then we could see precisely what devious objectives the government has in mind and deal appropriately with them.

Either we live in a federal system and respect the basic tenets of that federal system, or we do not. Either we work out our constitutional renewal jointly with the provinces, or we repudiate our system of government. Either we encourage both levels of government to work together to build this great country of ours, or we engage in an ever greater proliferation of legislation directed against all provincial governments—not just one—which could prove divisive and destructive not just to our political system but to our whole country. The broad scope and powers embodied in this bill could do just that.

In a situation like this, and in the escalating confrontation with the provinces which this government seems determined to bring about, who speaks for Canada?

Some hon. Members: We do.

Miss MacDonald: Who speaks for our beloved country? The answer to that question is "Not this government."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, as both the minister and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) have already said, this bill is important, and it certainly is related to a fundamentally important part of the history of our country. There is no doubt in my mind—nor I am sure in the mind of any member of parliament—that we would not now be debating a measure to provide the Government of Canada with the right to have a referendum on constitutional matters if we were not already faced with the hypothetical possibility that one province, namely, Quebec, will take steps which could lead to the breaking up of our country and to the independence of that province.

In addressing ourselves to the question of a referendum we must consider not simply the general principles involved in parliamentary democracy and the general question of referenda, which are important in constitutional matters and in other matters, but it is very important that we consider, as always in politics, the historic context in which a particular proposal is being dealt with, whether at the federal level or any other level.

● (1642)

I say with all respect to the person who has just spoken that I have rarely heard a more contradictory speech in all my life—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: —in terms of facing the political reality in Canada. It is certainly my view in general that in a parliamentary democracy, or in any other kind of democracy, the referenda idea is not a good one, as a general principle, to deal with all kinds of matters. I hope hon. members opposite will listen to the debate because I will support the bill in just a minute and give reasons for doing so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: As a general proposition, men and women throughout history, whether you consider Greece at the time of Pericles, or England at the time of John Stuart Mill, or Canada and the rest of the modern world today, most responsible democrats, in my view, have argued that it is the role of elected people to make decisions, that it is our responsibility to face immensely complicated issues and to work out answers and compromises, because that is essential in a democracy, and normally referenda do not provide for compromise. Normally they divide a community on an issue, and frequently they are inappropriately used because they are used on matters which should be questions of personal morality. So in the view of my party, referenda on a whole range of questions are not something that a democracy should be concerned with. Democracy should be concerned with electing men and women to study issues seriously, to recognize the complexity of most problems and to work out a fair solution.

Now I want to come to the bill before us and to put it in its historical context. I wonder where the Conservative party is in its thinking, and I say that seriously. We will have a serious debate on this issue. The province of Quebec has elected a government honestly and democratically made up, from their perspective, of decent, honest and good citizens. I will not denigrate them because I happen to differ profoundly with them about the future of our country and indeed about the future of their province. But the historical reality is that, for the first time in the history of our country, we are confronted with a government which was elected in part, so they interpret it, on a mandate to divide the country. So it is not the present Government of Canada but they who were the first historically to present us with a bill that will provide in one province the right to decide.

I say frankly that if we recognize—be it in Canada, in Ireland, in Pakistan or in other parts of the world—two distinctly different cultural and linguistic entities like those we have in Canada, which have existed so far with some real tensions—and most of us hope we can work them out and continue with a united Canada—or if a society is divided on religious grounds, as it is in other parts of the world, we will have to resolve the issues at some point by having a vote.

No one can pretend that a referendum will be a permanent solution or the only solution; but if you do not believe in violence, if you do not believe in oppression, then surely the people have to be given the right to decide if the possibility of the survival of the country is at stake. That is why I for one agree in principle with the means of the Parti Québécois, which is a democratic means, of establishing a referendum, although I oppose the party with all the energy, intellectual, moral and physical, within the law, that I can muster on their objective.

I happen to agree with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands—although I was astounded to hear her say it in the context of her argument—when she said that, in general, the rules for the Quebec referendum have "stacked the deck and loaded the dice." She said it, I did not. I think that is the case. I do not think the rules as set out, when you think of freedom of association, freedom of opinion and so on, and a whole lot of details which I could go into, are reasonably drawn for the referendum framework in the province of Quebec.

If that is the reality, I ask the House: What is the Government of Canada to do?

Miss MacDonald: Bring in the bill.

Mr. Broadbent: We have a bill. I say to the hon. member that she attacked it for what seemed to me to be palpably absurd grounds, comparing it with the War Measures Act, if I heard her argument correctly.

The government is bringing in a bill which seems to me to enable the people of Canada to decide, within the democratic context. We will come to some of the provisions in this bill, and if the circumstances require it to the question of a vote to be taken, whether in Quebec or somewhere else. But we are not in a fantasy world. We will be living within the framework of this bill for five years only. My understanding—I would be surprised if anyone sees it any differently—is that if it happens that the question in the province of Quebec is put unfairly—we have to leave that open as a possibility surely, because the Parti Québécois is a partisan government, just as partisan as my party, as the Conservatives or as the Liberals, and I will not put it any more strongly than that—the question they will put to the electorate can be a loaded one. To use the hon. member's words, not only will they be loading the dice and stacking the deck in terms of the rules for the referendum, but they might even do it in terms of the way they phrase the question.

How are we to respond? Normally I am not in agreement with the basic principle of a bill coming from the government, but I and my caucus colleagues have thought through this question of a referendum on constitutional matters. This bill, for a limited period of time, will enable us as Canadians to do what the hon. member raises rhetorically, that is, to speak for Canada if the showdown comes, if we are confronted with an unfair question in the Quebec referendum and an unfair interpretation of the results.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands spoke about our turning the parliamentary system upside down. I would remind her that her colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), has brought in Bill C-220 dealing with a referendum on capital punishment. There were Tory candidates all over this country in the by-elections who were saying we should have a referendum on capital punishment. Some of us have had the determination to say that is our responsibility if we are elected. I am saying that you cannot have it both ways. I do not know who speaks for the Conservative party. Is it the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham or the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands? They are taking very different positions. We take a consistent position on this bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Then get to it.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member is a little embarrassed perhaps because of the contradictory positions his party has taken. I want to remind the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) that it was his leader who said that, on the basis of the result of a referendum in the province of Quebec, which will be conducted under rules which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands described as loading the dice and stacking the deck, if the results come out 60 per cent in favour of sovereignty association, he would be prepared to negotiate for such association.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Broadbent: We would not be prepared to negotiate sovereignty association conducted under rules which the hon. member has just described as being loaded against the rest of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I ask, is it responsible for the Government of Canada and for all of us in this parliament to stand back in horror and, considering the possibility that we might not like the way the referendum is written, the way the campaign is conducted or the interpretation of the decision, not provide the enabling legislation to conduct what might perhaps be a fairer referendum? That is an absurd position. It is a position which abdicates responsibility to Canadians.

● (1652)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I ask my Conservative colleagues on my right to speak that way not only in Quebec to federalists, but in the province of Saskatchewan and see what the people of Saskatchewan will say. I would like to see them speaking to the people of British Columbia, and above all to the people of the province of Quebec, and saying, "We in Ottawa believe exclusively in the government of the province of Quebec." I am sure Quebeckers will be taking part in this debate. I am sure they will not stand by and allow a government committed to the independence of the province of Quebec to write all the rules of the game. We will not stand by. That is what I want to tell members of the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I ask Conservative members to consider some of the—

Mr. Johnston: Deal with the bill.

Mr. Broadbent: I am dealing with five areas of concern. Conservative members are somewhat concerned, as they ought to be, with the duplicity of the level of debate they have engaged in so far. Why do we support the bill? It is restricted—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You support Liberals all the time.

Mr. Broadbent: I say to the hon. member that Conservatives have supported the Liberals more in this parliament than we have. I will count the votes. However, when a matter of fundamental importance is under consideration, we will not play around with petty, partisan politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: We support the bill because it is restricted to matters of fundamental constitutional importance which in various countries, including parliamentary democracies such as Great Britain, Norway, Australia and New Zealand, not to mention the United States and Switzerland which are not parliamentary democracies, have been dealt with by referenda. Those countries have had referenda on fundamental questions. It is hardly anti-democratic, unless one says that some of the most democratic countries of the world are not democratic. The bill is restricted to constitutional matters.

The province affected, will be consulted about the wording of the proposed referendum, and that is reasonable. I remind Conservative members to consider what the results of passing this bill would be as they affect a resolution being brought before the House. If one reads the bill, one will discover that a resolution must be debated for at least 40 hours in the House, which is approximately eight days of debate; and at least 40 hours in the other House, which is another eight days of debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is 20 days over there.

Mr. Broadbent: At least. If there is a particular referendum which we do not think is popular, the point is that we have the means in this House as an opposition to hold things up beyond the eight days. Indeed, if it happened that the government of the day, whether it be this government or any other, rammed through a referendum bill in the face of united opposition in the House of Commons, one does not have to guess what would happen. A referendum of that nature which did not have reasonable support and had to be rammed through would be defeated in advance. Any government would know that.

My crucial point is that there is opportunity within the legislation for a referendum resolution to be brought before us at any time. Personally I hope a resolution will not have to be brought forward. This is permissive legislation, not mandatory. There will be an opportunity to deal with the referendum.

Another point I like about the bill is that it puts federal and provincial parties on the same basis in taking part. There is no restrictive aspect to it.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has a horrified view of the government, and certainly on economic matters I share that concern. But if the government brought through a referendum which was so bad in terms of generating opposition on this side of the House, since most governments at the provincial level are Tories, it seems to me they should not worry because within the framework of this legislation they can participate. They have the same right as federal parties to participate. They can work on the resolution and generate opposition to it.

For that reason, I cannot understand why one would be opposed to this bill. Surely some details will be dealt with in committee, and as a result some changes will be effected; but on fundamental questions it is a responsible bill.

In conclusion, we support the principle of the bill. It restricts referenda to constitutional matters. It has a number of important safeguards built into it in terms of providing debating time in the House and enabling parties at provincial and federal levels to debate it. I cannot see how a democratic party in Canada, concerned with the survival of our country and faced with the hypothetical possibility of an unfair referendum, can do anything other than support this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands asked rhetorically who speaks for Canada. Certainly her party does not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr.

Corbin)—National Film Board—Reason for changes to French regionalization program; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Veterans Affairs—Transfer of hospitals to jurisdiction of provinces—Effect on veterans; the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon)—External Affairs—Canadian peacekeeping forces.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

DIVORCE ACT

REDUCTION IN WAITING PERIOD FOR MARRIAGE DISSOLUTION

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved that Bill C-207, to amend the Divorce Act (living separate and apart), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, once again I am pleased to have an opportunity of bringing the topic of divorce before the House. This time my bill is Bill C-207, an act to amend the Divorce Act (living separate and apart). The explanatory notes read as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to reduce to 18 months the three to five-year waiting period required for a marriage that has broken down to be dissolved. It also eliminates the question of fault under this ground for divorce.

It was 11 years ago this month that members of the House of Commons were debating Bill C-187, an act respecting divorce. At that time the government felt it was time to reform Canada's archaic divorce laws and to bring them into line with the social climate of the 1960s.

Prior to 1968, the only effective ground for divorce in every province—save Nova Scotia—was adultery. Most provinces entered confederation without divorce laws or procedures, and it was not until after 1930 that they were granted the authority to establish provincial divorce courts. However, residents of Quebec and Newfoundland were required to apply for a parliamentary divorce because these two provinces had no divorce courts until 1968. In 1966, the question of divorce reform was referred to a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. Its report on divorce was presented to parliament in June, 1967, and in 1968 the Divorce Act became law.

● (1702)

The act retained many of the traditional marital offences as grounds for divorce, but it also included a modified concept of marriage breakdown as a new ground for divorce. One of the grounds established was a separation period of three to five years—three years separation if the petitioner is the non-deserting spouse, five years separation if he or she is the deserting spouse. This separation ground conferred on each married person significant powers of individual control as to whether he or she desired to remain married. Today, about 40 per cent of all divorces are based on this ground.

It is important to remember, Mr. Speaker, that although the government was anxious to modernize our divorce laws, it was conscious of Canadians' interest in maintaining the sanctity of marriage and of the family unit. It is in this same light that I have put forward an amendment which will reduce to 18 months the three to five-year waiting period required for a marriage which has broken down to be dissolved. It also eliminated the question of fault under this ground for divorce.

Also, Mr. Speaker, some members may feel that my bill is tantamount to tinkering with the present divorce law because it is not consistent with the remaining marriage breakdown sections in section 4 of the Divorce Act. I would be prepared to put forward an amendment which reduces the waiting period in all circumstances to 18 months.

Let me take a moment to outline the divorce legislation of other countries with regard to the concept of marriage breakdown and the period of separation. Several countries differentiate between unopposed and opposed actions. For example, In England the waiting period is two years if the divorce is unopposed, and five years if it is opposed. Norway requires a one year separation if the action is unopposed, and two years if it is opposed. In Australia, the family law act of 1975 states that a ground for divorce is established if the parties separated and lived separately and apart for a continuous period of not less than 12 months immediately preceding the date of filing for the dissolution of marriage. The separation need not be agreed upon by both parties.

Sweden, in 1973, introduced divorce on demand, which includes both unilateral and consensual dissolution of marriage. Either spouse is at any time entitled to have the marriage terminated on formal request, without having to show separation for a period of time, marital offence or irretrievable marriage breakdown. The state's function is to approve the request. The only qualification provided for in Swedish law is a "reconsideration" period of six months if the divorce is opposed or if the family contains children under the age of 16.

In the United States, some states, namely, California, Michigan, Georgia and Nebraska, have adopted divorce by consent. Divorce by consent subjects marriage to the joint will of the parties involved and limits the involvement of the court or state. In fact, in Canada it is argued that because 90 per cent of our divorce cases are uncontested, divorce by consent already prevails. Hence, it is often recommended that the government may as well legalize its present existence.

Since the enactment of the 1968 Divorce Act there have been a myriad of studies, reports and recommendations, all concerned with the divorce issue. The concepts of divorce on demand, divorce by consent, marriage breakdown and others are constantly being debated and reworked by various legal groups, people involved with the status of women and by religious affiliations. One of the foremost bodies engaged in this examination of our divorce laws is the Law Reform Commission of Canada. The commission has published proposals in the form of studies, working papers and reports in an attempt to formulate a cohesive legal policy for the Canadian family.

The commission did examine the subject clause of my proposed bill and has advanced several arguments against the imposition of a designated period of separation as a prerequisite to divorce. It referred to the dilemma faced by an economically dependent spouse who may be forced to leave the matrimonial home, and also to the hardship faced by responsible spouses who encounter marriage breakdown yet must go through the loneliness of an enforced period of separation, being neither married or unmarried, in a coupled society.

Professor Herman R. Hahlo, who presented a research paper entitled "Reform of the Divorce Act, 1968 (Canada)" to the Law Reform Commission, also examined the three-year separation period and recommended that it be reduced to one year. He reasoned thus:

To take a large slice out a person's life by withholding a divorce long after the prospects of reconciliation have vanished can only be explained by a conscious or subconscious desire to punish a spouse for seeking a divorce. Many experienced marriage counsellors suggest that six months are normally sufficient to determine whether there is any hope of reconciliation—

Professor Hahlo also touched upon the five-year period imposed on the deserting spouse and recommend that in this case, too, the required period of separation be reduced to one year.

It was in May of 1976 that the Law Reform Commission promulgated its recommendations. Why has divorce legislation remained unchanged to date? That is my question.

First of all, it was deemed important that divorce reform not proceed until such time as all the provinces had enacted matrimonial property laws which would effect an equitable division of property on dissolution of marriage and in a manner which would protect the spouses who are not financially self-sufficient. However, at this point in time, eight of the ten provinces either already have passed such a law or are in the process of drafting legislation. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that this rationale is no longer credible and that we should proceed now to provide the desired reforms.

Secondly, it has been proposed that some measure of jurisdiction over divorce may go to the provinces as part of constitutional reform, thus making it unnecessary to have the federal government introduce divorce reform. I am of the opinion that constitutional reform should not delay the implementation of new divorce legislation, and in fact it may be a long time before some consensus is reached on this point. The number of studies, reports, etc., which have been brought forth in recent years attest to the fact that now is the time for divorce reform.

A letter forwarded to me from a concerned citizen points this out, very well. This letter was actually received by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) and it contained a request that a copy be forwarded to me. I should like to read one paragraph of the letter which refers to my previous bill on this same topic, formerly Bill C-214 which was debated on second reading in December, 1977. The paragraph of the letter to which I refer reads as follows:

The object of this letter is to add at least one voice to the demand for revision along the lines recommended by the commission. Perhaps you would pass along a copy of this letter to Mr. Robinson and hope that he or some other member would see fit to reintroduce legislation to benefit those persons in our society who are hopelessly trapped in the present restrictive law when society generally would be in favour of giving them freedom.

When people are considering amendments to our current divorce laws, one fundamental question is considered paramount: How will this affect the institution of marriage and the family unit? Divorce statistics since 1968 do lend credibility to those opposed to divorce reform who argue that making divorce easier will hasten that decline of the family unit. However, I am sure that all hon. members agree that family strength is a matter of moral values combined with a personal commitment. Legislation cannot create marital bliss or preserve family unity, nor can divorce legislation lead to the breakdown of the family. As it was pointed out by the commission, "it is not divorce that destroys families but bad marriages."

I think everyone should bear in mind, however, that official divorce statistics merely tell us about the number of divorces. They tell us nothing about marital conflict and disruption. Not every marriage breakdown ends in divorce; a couple may choose to continue to live together in disharmony rather than participate in a divorce process which is often painful.

Therefore, the correlation between divorce rates and the collapse of the institution of marriage is indeed difficult to prove. How is the reduction of the length of required separation going to affect the stability of marriage? The Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Divorce in its report made note that, in establishing the period of separation, the prime consideration should be whether the period provides a fair test that the marriage in question has in fact broken down. As I see it, the time required must be sufficiently long enough to give the couple a chance to reconcile their differences, but not so long as to force individuals to remain in unsatisfactory and unhealthy relationships.

It is extremely important, especially where children are involved—for an unhappy marriage is a detriment to children—that the parties be able to dissolve their marriage as painlessly as possible in order that they may build a new life and provide a more healthy, positive environment for themselves as well as their children. To quote Professor Wolfgang Friedman:

• 1712

People should be able to live out their lives as joyfully as possible under conditions which enable them to develop their personal capacities and potentialities. This means the right to correct errors, the right to cast off a burden that has become intolerable and may lead to the sapping of vital energies and the moral fibre of the affected parties.

Throughout my speech, Mr. Speaker, I have quoted statistics, briefs of the Law Reform Commission and professors to enhance my argument. However, I believe the most profound testimony comes from a private citizen, and I would like to read his letter into the record:

I am writing to express my support for Bill C-207, an act to amend the Divorce Act (living separate and apart).

It appears to me that there can be no basis either in policy or in philosophy for any member of parliament to vote against this bill, as it does not change or add to present grounds of divorce, and has no effect on property, maintenance or custody provisions. In allowing a so-called deserting spouse to sue for divorce after 18 months, it recognizes what is most often an irreconcilable marital breakdown, and erases what is presently a two-year "sentence", that is the forcing of a deserting spouse to wait five years rather than three years (which is presently Canadian law). The present waiting period has resulted in a statutory conviction of the deserting spouse for his guilt in having made his decision to create a new life for himself. As anyone who has been married will most readily verify, guilt is almost never one-sided.

The proposed amendment does not, in any way, obliviate the requirement of the court to ask about the possibility of reconciliation, nor does it affect any awards of maintenance or custody, or division of property. It seems in keeping with the present thrust of the federal government in the area of human rights. It is of no value to society or to the family unit to force an unwanted and often harmful relationship to continue legally. The present law allows couples three years to build up deeper resentments, to threaten each other with litigation and to use emotional blackmail, often in the form of one spouse's refusal to give the other his or her freedom for reasons usually based in spite, malice, anger and resentment. Children are the unfortunate, innocent bystanders, and for three to five years are torn between their parents' court dates, lawyers and threats. No party can stabilize his or her position until the final decree absolute, and many lives may be held in hurtful, expensive and unnecessary suspense for years. As everyone realizes, the result of such situations is, all too often, contrived grounds and manipulations to get into court. Surely the very fact of such manipulations is sufficient to point out that the law is not in keeping with the needs of the Canadian public.

I can in no way believe that the fabric of society or of the family will be damaged or diminished by this amendment. A family held together in name only is not a healthy unit . . . a clean and quick break is most often the solution for the immediate problem and the most beneficial act for a quick recovery.

I most sincerely urge the support of this bill and hope that members do not so lose themselves in self-righteousness that they overcome their ability to sympathize with people who need the law and the legislators on their side.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that my bill is the magic solution. However, it does attempt to bring our divorce laws in line with current thinking and perhaps helps to pave the way for additional divorce reform and strengthening of the institution of marriage. I hope all members will support may amendment and refer my bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for further consideration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Thank you, I like a large applause.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for presenting a private member's bill on a matter which, I know, is of great interest to the public of Canada generally. The ground in the act which my good friend would like to amend is chapter D-8, section 4(1)(e) of the federal statutes dealing with divorce which became law in 1967 and 1968 by chapter 24. The section reads:

[Mr. Robinson.]

(e) the spouses have been living separate and apart

(i) for any reason other than that described in subparagraph (ii), for a period of not less than three years, or

(ii) by reason of the petitioner's desertion of the respondent for a period of not less than five years, immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

The very simple but complete amendment calls for:

(e) the spouses have been living separate and apart for a period of not less than eighteen months immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

Basically the hon. member wishes to reduce the period in which spouses have been living separate and apart, either by agreement for three years or by desertion for five years, to 18 months. Within that time the petition providing that evidence would go before a court of a competent jurisdiction whereupon the judge would grant the petition for dissolution of a marriage, provided everything was in order.

It is true that the population of Canada is going up. It is interesting to note that in 1974 in Canada there were 45,019 divorces granted, in 1975 there were 50,611, in 1976 there were 54,207 and in 1977 there were 55,370 divorces granted. In other words, there has been an increase over the four years of approximately 10,000 divorces in Canada. One must look at the sociological changes in reference to why this has occurred.

I believe that one of the causes of tension in a marriage, which has come along with sociological change in Canada and, indeed, in all countries of the western world, is that today, in order to cope with the economic problems, both the man and wife must work. They are, in effect, fenced in as soon as they are married if they buy a home. The cheapest home which can be purchased in Calgary, a 900 square foot bungalow with two bedrooms, costs around $70,000 to $75,000. To meet the down payment couples, particularly young couples, usually have to purchase a first and a second mortgage, harnessing themselves to payments of $700 to $800 per month. This, combined with the high income tax rate in Canada, leaves little left over in their cheques to provide for food and other necessities, particularly if a family comes along. In light of these new economic and social changes which have come about in Canada, the hon. member believes that the law in this regard should be changed.

Parliament is a strange world. In the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs a brief was presented on the treatment of children in this nation and various groups from across the country will be appearing to speak to the proposed bill of rights for children.

• (1722)

I sympathize with the hon. member's position that once a marriage is broken down altogether, it is not much of a life for the people concerned if they have to wait three years or five years for a divorce, so this bill is probably a step in the right direction. If the evidence given before a judge in an undefended divorce case shows that the marriage has irretrievably broken down, then the imposition of any time limit would be a strain on the parties and particularly on children of nine or ten years of age who have to live in that atmosphere. I have had experience of many cases where people lived under such emotional tension, where there was physical or mental cruelty involved, and it is no place for children.

I was impressed with the lady who presented the brief at committee today which pointed out that breakdown in adults was usually the result of what took place in their younger years in their homes or institutions where they lived.

I would be prepared to agree to removing the time provision in the bill and leaving that aspect to the discretion of the judge, or perhaps a time limit of 18 months might be imposed. Once it was obvious the marriage was on the rocks, none of the sanctions of the law would keep people together.

I read some statistics in a newspaper article lately to the effect that one-third of all marriages in Canada end in divorce. That is a rather frightening statistic. When heckling the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore I think the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) said there must be a lot of bad marriages, and I guess that is the problem. Marriage has to be worked at. All of us who have been married know that if people worked as hard at marriage and home life as we do in our occupations, or in our idealistic drive to be in this House, people would stay together.

If the grounds for divorce were extended, that would raise one question for which I do not have an answer. It seems to me that people have forgotten their responsibilities toward the children, Mr. Speaker. There are many people in the western world today who did not have children of their own for one reason or another but who adopted children. Many children have found good homes that way and many successful people have come from such homes. I have always reminded adopted children that their parents chose them. They made application, their credentials were checked by people trained and skilled to some degree in child psychology, and they were classed as able to provide a fit home for a child. Unfortunately, many children come into homes where I would not go so far as to say they are not wanted, but they are treated as if they are not wanted.

I would oppose some extensions, Mr. Speaker, but I think this one is reasonable. If we have a divorce law, let it be one that works and is practical. People are not helped by having to stay together for a period of three or five years when not only for the spouses involved but for the family the conditions are, if I may put it in plain, ordinary English, hell on earth.

I had an old law partner once who said that lawyers made the worst husbands but they always managed marry very fine women. I feel that I fall into that category and that is a confession I have had to make even in front of my constituents.

Mr. Robinson: Me too!

Mr. Woolliams: My friend says "me too". It is sad to see a home break up but it is worse to see the results of emotional strain on the spouses and on the children.

I support this bill, Mr. Speaker, and if it goes to committee I will ask for a slight amendment to the effect that the period should be within the discretion of the judge. I would be prepared to delete the time clause providing the evidence is such that there is no chance of the couple getting together or living together. When things come to that state, if we are to have a divorce law it might as well be one that serves society and humanity.

That is my position and I congratulate the hon. member once again for bringing this matter to the floor of the House.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly.

Mr. Robinson: Do I understand that it is the hon. member's suggestion that the limitation be 18 months or less at the discretion of the judge?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that would be a step in the right direction. I would go further. It could be at the judge's discretion, but that would certainly be the time limit on it. When the Divorce Act was introduced, the three and five-year limit was included because legislators and parliamentarians sincerely hoped people would become reconciled within that time. This could only be to the good of families and society. In my view a nation is only as good as the homes it produces. It is from those homes that future generations flow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I cannot agree entirely with the two members of the legal fraternity who preceded me. As a matter of fact, I do not know that I could even say "me three" to the confession of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the mover of this motion.

I share some of the concerns of those hon. members but I have more difficulty getting over the concept that accessibility of divorce will have little or no effect on the longevity of marriage. I suppose if all of us had the opportunity of legislating good marriage, we would be disposed to legislate what people should do in order to get married rather than how to dispose of marriages once they have gone sour. That is probably what we should be working on.

Given that we have a Divorce Act and given that I was a practitioner of law, as I suppose my friends may have been, when this law came forward, when it was amended and when it took out of existence the "shady lady" divorce we have all heard about, we must bear in mind that at that time there was substantial deliberation on what kind of evidence should be required to demonstrate that a marriage had come to an end. I do not have the law statute as it exists in front of me. However, it seems that what we are saying is that this section of the law states that demonstrable marriage breakdown is evidenced by separation for three years or five years if it is the petitioner petitioning on the basis of his own desertion. If we go to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), if I understood him correctly, time of separation would not be any evidence upon which the court would rely. It would be looking for something else in terms of demonstrating marriage breakdown.

● (1732)

I think that the law which now exists has other categories which set up that kind of indicia of marriage breakdown. In effect, what we were trying to do was to accommodate these people in this section which this bill would amend. We would accommodate those who had nothing in law to put before a court except the fact that the two spouses in a marriage were living separate and apart. That is pretty slim indicia if that is all we are going to give to a judge to administer.

I ask hon. members to consider what happens in a divorce action. I have brought my share before the bar, as I am sure other lawyers here have done. There has been the parade of the parties before the judge, with the judge asking the compulsory questions: Is there a chance for reconciliation? No. How long have you been living apart? Three years. That is fine, and away we go. I have had judges tell me prior to my coming here that if I bring a divorce before that court that is going to take more than three minutes, I obviously have problems with that divorce and it should not be there.

Those would be the same judges upon whose discretion the hon. member for Calgary North would rely to determine, without the indicia of even the three or five years, that in fact there has been a marriage breakdown which would disrupt that very principle to which we are now paying lip service and upon which we say the whole country is founded. That would not satisfy me.

The then minister of justice stated in the House of Commons on October 25, 1976, as reported at page 420 of Hansard, referring to the government:

> We will go forward in the immediate future on three aspects relating to family law. The first is negotiations with the provinces toward the establishment in the provinces of unified family courts. The second is changes in the law relating to matrimonial property to better take account of the economic needs and rights of both parties. The third is formal consultation with those in the community across Canada regarding the other recommendations of the Law Reform Commission's report on family law.

These steps were viewed as integral parts of a comprehensive reform of divorce legislation, and in fact steps one and two have now been completed. The establishment in the provinces of unified family courts enables the widest possible number of family law issues attendant on marriage breakdown to be resolved, under our current constitutional framework, in a single court.

As you know, the Law Reform Commission in its 1976 report on family law recommended the establishment of unified family courts. However, the Department of Justice, in response to recommendations made by the Law Reform Commission of Canada in its 1974 working paper on "The Family Court", established a fund to assist interested provinces in developing unified family court pilot projects. Terms and conditions for the department's funding program were approved by Treasury Board in May, 1976. Pursuant to the terms and conditions, a unified family court pilot project is "a project that relates to the development of a unified family court having jurisdiction over a wide range of family matters and including some or all of the following support services: information and intake services, legal services, investigative services, diagnostic services and enforcement services."

To date the Department of Justice and the attorney general's department in British Columbia are cost sharing the evaluation of a unified family court pilot project that was conducted in the Richmond-Surrey-Delta area of British Columbia. The project was initiated by the provincial government in 1974, and the evaluation report for this project is due shortly.

There is also agreement with the province of Ontario covering the operation of a unified family court pilot project in the city of Hamilton. This project, which will run for three years, was commenced on July 1, 1977, pursuant to provincial legislation establishing this court at the county court level. Negotiations between the federal government and numerous other provinces concerning the establishment of a unified family court pilot project are well advanced, and it is expected that other projects will begin in the near future.

Obviously the federal government cannot establish the courts it wishes in each province as the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction and including procedure in civil matters in those courts, is within exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces.

However, this joint federal-provincial approach has resulted in a court which is quite a new concept. The major attribute of these courts is, of course, the unified jurisdiction. Perhaps in no other single area of the law is fragmentation of jurisdiction felt more keenly than in family law. It is for this reason that the unified family courts are presided over by a judge who has not only the jurisdiction traditionally exercised by the provincial family court judge but also the jurisdiction in respect of divorce.

As well as the unified jurisdiction, these courts offer a broad spectrum of dispute resolution techniques. There is a social component complementing the strictly judicial side which seeks to achieve settlement in a non-adversarial fashion to reduce the areas of contention requiring adjudication. Furthermore, these counselling and conciliation services, as they are called, are available not only to spouses in the process of marriage breakdown but also to those who seek to reconcile. Support services aim at preserving and strengthening the family where possible and, where not, attempting to establish a decent workable basis for interspousal transactions such as child custody, property and financial matters.

The Department of Justice continues to maintain the position that the grounds for divorce cannot be isolated from the economic consequences of divorce. Under the existing Divorce Act, economic and custodial bargaining leverage is provided by the requirement of proof of fault, and the availability of fault defences and bars which, if asserted, would preclude the deserting petitioner from obtaining a divorce for a minimum five years. This bargaining leverage helps in many cases to compensate for the laws which may be unfair to the non-wage earning spouse.

A transition from fault to no fault divorce grounds and, in particular, a transition that will allow divorce at the request of either spouse after a short waiting period, will render the non-wage earning spouse liable to divorce against his or her will with perhaps unfair financial consequences, at least unless all the traditional common law property systems are adjusted to recognize that the role of homemaker and child rearer is "partnership activity".

I note with some concern that although the proposer of this bill acknowledges this is a problem, he states that since there now appears to be an acceptance of that principle and the adoption of laws in eight of the provinces of Canada, that is adequate and we should be proceeding. If there is one province which has not adopted that kind of law, I say the time is not yet for us to move unilaterally by amendment of this kind to change the kind of leverage I just described. It is for this reason that the Law Reform Commission's recommendations are based on the premise that the concept of fault must be completely eliminated from the whole marriage dissolution process, for example, from grounds, economic consequences and child custody determinations except to the extent that conduct affects reasonable needs or the parent's capacity as a custodian.

Bill C-207 proposes to eliminate the concept of fault from only one ground of divorce by reducing the required three to five-year waiting period to 18 months regardless of the conduct of either spouse. This merely replaces one arbitrary period of time with another. Furthermore it appears to leave the remaining marriage breakdown provisions in section 4 of the Divorce Act intact. Accordingly, somewhat inconsistently, the intention seems to be that a couple could obtain a divorce under section 4(1)(e) by living separate and apart for only 18 months, whereas under section 4(1)(b), for example, a spouse living separate and apart due to his partner's alcohol or narcotic addiction would be required to wait the full three years. I should add, I suppose, that the hon. member has indicated that he would entertain an amendment that would reduce the requirement to 18 months in all cases. But again, I have serious doubt whether an 18-month period would be long enough. Take a look, for instance, at alcoholism.

● (1742)

Do we despair so much in this society that alcoholism, to use an example, is so irretrievable that a period of 18 months would demonstrate conclusively that it would not be stopped, that it would not be changed, that persons could not change themselves and thus remove themselves from the possibility of divorce purely on that ground? I think not, Mr. Speaker. Time has a way of curing and helping situations like that and should not be a abridged as a result of a bill like this.

It can be suggested that the amendment is not comprehensive and that any divorce reform should await a full reform package which deals with all the grounds. It is regrettable that when a member honestly believes, as I think the hon. member does honestly believe, that the law should be amended as he has indicated, that all hon. members cannot be carried along with that same conviction. I have indicated just few of the concerns I have to express with regard to this bill or in terms, even, of any comprehensive change of legislation concerning family breakdown and divorce.

I happen to be completely convinced that the family unit is the basis of the western world's civilization, that it is the basis and the model upon which all hon. members should be patterning and examining laws that we wish to pass in order to determine whether or not they are likely to lead to a better or more just society. I am satisfied that even if inadvertently we make changes that tear apart the fabric of the family unit, directly or indirectly, we will somehow have done a disservice to the nation while attempting to do a service to a few unfortunate individuals who haven't taken the time before entering marriage to consider how permanent and how important an institution they were getting into.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in speaking to this bill. It so happens that today is my duty day and I did not even realize that the measure before us was to be discussed. I happened to be in the same position last year when the bill came up and I counted it a privilege to speak on the bill at that time because I think, as the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin) has said, that marriage is the cornerstone of our society. It is the most fundamental institution we have, and one on which our country is built. Thus, I count it a fortuitous thing for me—perhaps all members will not agree with me but I count it fortuitous—that I was here when the bill came before us.

During the discussion of this bill, which would reduce the waiting period for divorce from three years to 18 months, we have heard from three lawyers in succession. It reminds me of something someone said to me a number of weeks ago. He said that if there was one lawyer living in town he would starve to death, but that if there were two they would both drive Cadillacs. That is the result of the adversary system, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Kent-Essex mentioned the experiment with the family court system which took place in British Columbia. It so happens that the first family court system in British Columbia was set up in my riding of Surrey-White Rock. Obviously, it is under provincial jurisdiction, and includes the municipality of Delta. I want to put on record here that it has been a very successful experiment. I was not speaking entirely in jest when I said that if there was confrontation with two lawyers they would both be driving Cadillacs, because so much of the problem in divorce proceedings is directly related to the adversary system where lawyers are fighting against each other and each is committed to looking after the interest of his client as he sees it. That is how the system is built.

To a large extent the family court system breaks down the adversary system in divorce proceedings. This does not mean all family conflicts will be resolved, but it does mean that one of the elements of conflict is taken out of the process.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) who introduced this measure has been interested in this subject for a long time by reason of his being a lawyer and because he had to deal with these things, and because he is a family man and is concerned about the family unit. He gave me a lot of support in the promotion of my private member's bill with respect to parental abduction of children, and I will always remember that. But I think it is wrong to try to solve these problems legally or by reducing the waiting period. He was anxious to reduce the waiting period from three years to 18 months and then, after discussion with my colleague from Calgary North, suggested it would not have to be even 18 months, that it could be less—12months—or maybe a shorter period still at the discretion of the judge. It makes one wonder how much this period can be reduced. How far are we willing to go to negotiate the waiting period?

I could not help but think of the days when I was in university taking a course in Russian history. Right after the Russian revolution the leaders in Russia did not believe in the bourgeoise institution of marriage, so they brought in measures for "postcard marriage" and divorce. It was not long, however, before they had to get rid of that system; it became too much for even the bureaucrats to handle. In my view there ought to be ample time for reflection and reminiscence. I remember listening to a marriage counsellor—I hasten to tell hon. members that he was speaking to an audience and not to me personally—Dr. Ticton of Portland, Oregon, a very fine marriage counsellor. He said that all relationships require maintenance. That is a profound statement and one which we tend to overlook.

Mr. Nystrom: And very original, too.

Mr. Friesen: The hon. members from Saskatchewan can speak flippantly if he likes, but this is a very important subject.

When these starry-eyed young couples come to the altar or to the courtroom and say, "For better or for worse", how long is the "worse" supposed to last? The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore negotiated with the hon. member for Calgary North and, as he did so, I wondered whether the period was being reduced from three years to 18 months, and then to 12 months, and then still further at the discretion of a judge.

How deep are our interpersonal commitments to each other to be? I believe reducing a waiting period which should serve as a time for analysis, reflection and so forth would be destructive.

The hon. member read into the record a statement from a letter—if I copied it inaccurately, the hon. member can correct me. But this person wrote "when society would be in favour of giving them freedom." What are we talking about—freedom in marriage? Whenever you bring two personalities together you give up some freedom.

• (1752)

It has been said that through divorce there is freedom. When people get married, they bring their personalities into their marriages, but when they go into divorce, they take their failures with them. There is no such thing as freedom through divorce. That failure haunts people for the rest of their lives.

I am not suggesting that there should not be divorce or that some marriages are not irretrievable. All I saying is that all relationships require maintenance. Perhaps one way to provide the maintenance to which I refer would be to make sure, legally, that a couple contemplating divorce proceedings has adequate time to reflect or to get counselling before taking this action.

I might add that the measure being brought forward seems to run counter to most sociological, criminal, and juvenile trends today. The feeling at the present time is that young people ought to face the consequences of their decisions. This measure implies that we should not have to face up to the consequences of our decisions.

In introducing this bill the hon. member who introduced it called it a matter of divorce reform. I do not think we should use the word "reform" with such ease. When something is referred to as a reform, the implication is that we should agree to it automatically and spontaneously. I am not so sure that a measure like this reform. If we were to adopt this measure, I wonder whether in a few years we would not think it was a retrograde step rather than a reform.

I understand thoroughly the hon. member's motivation for bringing this measure forward. I appreciate the fact that people who have faced the anguish of divorce have come to his office, and he wants to help them. However, I am not convinced that reducing the waiting period from three years to 18 months and ultimately, as the hon. member indicated, having the matter decided judicially, is the proper course so I cannot support this measure.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Bill C-207 as introduced by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), it seems to me one must not overlook the tremendous work performed by the Law Reform Commission with regard to family law, work on which I should like to dwell a few moments. As we know, the Law Reform Commission spent over four years studying family law, which enabled it to make recommendations on how to improve, modernize and reform it. Between 1974 and 1976, it published four working papers, the first of which was entitled Family Court, the second, Family Property, the third, Maintenance on Divorce and, finally, the fourth, with which we are concerned today, Divorce.

The reaction to those four working papers, which were published and widely distributed, was generally favourable. The commission subsequently incorporated their basic principles and recommendations in what became known as the Report on Family Law which was tabled in the House on Tuesday, May 4, 1976. The then minister of justice sent copies of that report to all the provincial attorneys general and to the coordinator of family law designated for each province.

The recommendations of the Law Reform Commission create in fact an overlapping on the federal legislative authority and their implementation requires a lot of co-ordination and co-operation between both levels of government. Since the tabling of the commission report, the justice ministers and the provincial attorneys discussed at great length the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission and the problems deriving from their implementation.

I shall venture to sum up here the main recommendations contained in the Report on Family Law and the causes of divorce and its economic consequences applying in fact to Bill C-207 which is before us. In the first place, the commission recommended to have a law based on the principle of equality of sexes instead of the present law on divorce. Then, it recommended to eliminate the concept of fault in the process of the dissolution of marriage, namely as far as causes, economic consequences and child custody are concerned, except if that measure would affect the reasonable needs or the capacity of the parents to act as guardians.

You will also remember that the commission recommended the concept of "marriage breakdown", defined as the failure of the personal relationship between husband and wife, which constitutes the only reason of divorce and which is proved conclusively by the evidence of only one of the spouses. The commission also recommended to establish a waiting period of at least six months between the beginning of the process of divorce and the application for a hearing. According to that recommendation, it would not be necessary for the parties to be separated in fact for a minimum period of time before the beginning of the process or the hearing of the petition. In fact, the federal parliament is presently the only legislative authority as far as marriage and divorce are concerned. Only provincial legislative bodies can legislate as far as property and civil rights are concerned. There is not yet unanimity on whether—

[English]

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe Your Honour will find that there is unanimous consent to revert to the presentation of reports from standing and special committees to enable me to present a bill adopted unanimously this afternoon by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Some haste is required because there are tax implications.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) have the unanimous consent he requests?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

First report of Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—Mr. MacGuigan.

[Editor's Note: For text of the above report see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.01 p.m. the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA REFERENDUM ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations) that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to speak on the bill first, but it is impossible to stand in my place and not make some response to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald).

First and foremost I want to compliment the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) for his step by step answers to the contradictory presentation of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I remain indebted to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby for his sincere concern for the problems which face Canada. He and his party are prepared to put aside partisanship, and they enjoin the entire House to bring all minds together to consider this important tool of parliamentary democracy. I look forward to the contributions of the hon. member and of others like him when the bill comes to committee.

I hope that the members of the official opposition will not take the same tack as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. While recognizing the real danger of the Parti Québécois referendum, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands practises distortion of the most dangerous kind while saying that the bill is dangerous. Her tactics will more likely divide us than unite us, while she calls the bill devious. She leads us down the labyrinth of confusion, which in itself strains her credibility, offering us a choice of divisive paths in future, while she calls the bill divisive. It is she and others with her who are dangerous, who are devious, and who are divisive.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I am not sure whether I heard the hon. member properly, but I would ask him to be very careful in the remarks he addresses to hon. members.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I did not use words of my own choice. I used words which were mentioned by the hon. member in her own speech, namely, "dangerous", "devious", and "divisive".

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, sir. I distinctly heard, even if the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) did not hear, that when the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) was using the words to which he has just referred, she was addressing her remarks to the intent and purpose of the bill. What makes the remarks of the hon. gentleman questionable is that he said he was addressing those words to members of the House. I think that as a gentleman he should withdraw them.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. As I said a while ago, I may not have heard the hon. member's words correctly, but the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is asking the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) to withdraw the remarks he had made. Perhaps it would be wise to await until tomorrow when we see Hansard before deciding on whether there is a case for asking for withdrawal.

● (2012)

Mr. MacFarlane: Certainly I would not want my remarks to reflect in any way on members of the House or even the individual member personally. I used the word "distortion". I said that indeed there was a distortion by the utilization of the words "dangerous", "devious", and "divisive". I thought there was a distortion there. I thought the distortion was that while the words applied to us, it was that kind of an act. If I have been unparliamentary in any way, certainly I will withdraw it now, or at a later date. If the member held the bill up to a mirror, she would have a much more optimistic point of view, rather than seeing all the thoughts she presented to us in the mirror, which would be a mirror of herself.

When the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands referred to the question of privilege in the House, she forgot that the question was disposed of to the satisfaction of the majority of the House. The hon. member jumped from this point eagerly to use the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) because she deceived herself into believing his was a just cause, and that the majority who did not support him must be evil. Therefore she drew upon his name as support in this cause. I find that rather odd because the hon. member conveniently forgot that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham introduced his own bill, Bill C-220, on a referendum. His was an exception because it dealt with capital punishment, which both the hon. member and I would find repugnant. Yet she drew upon this member's name as support for her opposition to even the introduction of this bill. The objective seems to be that one should be against anything which comes forward from this side of the House. I hope some members opposite will address themselves to the bill and not indulge in character assassination.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: Let us not talk of this bill in terms of distrust. Let us get on to the reason we want the tool presented for use in this parliament, for this parliament and for this country.

Every time I am about to move into the very calm, controlled, ordered and pleasant speech I was going to give, I think of something else said by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands which throws me off course. She mentioned conscription as being the most divisive, heinous, and horrible of things which occurred. I wonder if she analysed the number of yes and no votes. I wonder if she looked at them. Did it occur to her that some of those people who said "yes" were in positions which were exempt from conscription and therefore voted for those who were not to go? Did she look at those who said no? Did she not understand that some of those who said no were people who were conscientious objectors and for other reasons would not have wanted anyone to go? Did she live through that period herself and have the same family experience as I?

My father was totally disabled from Passchendale and Vimy Ridge. My brother joined the Royal Canadian Signal Corps. My sister joined the Royal Canadian Navy. I volunteered for the Royal Canadian Air Force. My mother voted no to conscription. Was this divisive within our family? Why did my father think as an old veteran, when we did not have the status of women in legislation—that it was quite proper for his wife, my mother, to express her opinion? Her opinion was, "My children may have gone of their own free will, but personally I would not want anyone's children taken from them to go." Was this divisive? Many things came out of that referendum which were very good for the country. It was a tool which took us around very difficult circumstances. It was a referendum which allowed us to recognize our differences without completely having to come to combat about them. Yet, every time it is mentioned, it is mentioned as if it was terribly divisive. In those days it was not a divisive force in my family.

We were proud that our mother stood up and had her say in the manner she wanted, as my father had a different say, as some of us had our own say while in the services. I did not see it as divisive. I saw it as a recognition of our differences. I saw it as a great tool for us at that time, and still believe it to have been so.

After hearing the rhetoric from the other side, I would call them fickle Tories. They rejoice when the opinion polls go up because the public has chosen them. They look toward a majority election, but they do not want to receive the majority opinion in a referendum. They do not want to hear it. They want the problem shoved under the rug, out of the way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: They recognize the complications which exists in our neighbouring province. Yet, when they look at the problem they say they will do all right. They can handle it. Leave it to them. "We English people can leave it to Mr. Ryan. He will handle the whole thing." We cannot leave something to someone else. This is Canada. We are responsible. If they have acquired, by means of their parliament, a tool which can be used for their moment, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby said, we must arm ourselves appropriately so that we will act properly. All of us in this parliament will have the right to say how we will act in a referendum, how we will write it, and what we will do.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) restricted himself in his speech to dealing with the need for the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) on a point of order.

Mr. Friesen: Will the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) permit a question?

Mr. MacFarlane: When I have concluded my remarks.

The Minister of Justice restricted himself in his speech to dealing with the need for the bill, its implications for parliamentary democracy and federal-provincial relations, and the principles underlying it as the framework for democratic procedure. In my short intervention I should like to draw from reality in showing that in referenda held in other countries we may learn from their experience.

As a parliament, we must lay heavy emphasis on the protection of freedom of individual expression and freedom of association. These two associations are at the centre of parliamentary democracy.

I could go on at great length to prove my point by making reference to the referendum bill of the Parti Québécois and its defects. Instead, I have chosen to draw from but one example, that of Norway. This quick flashback in history may serve us well in avoiding pitfalls which could befall us. It is my hope this background will prove valuable to all members of the House and the other place. It is true that all of us here are members of parliament, but we represent different political philosophies—Conservative, New Democratic, Social Credit, Liberal, and some of Independent persuasion. But each of us, as a member of parliament, is dedicated to a united Canada. For this reason we have the responsibility of ensuring that Bill C-9 serves as a useful tool of government, that it respects the rights of individual expression and the rights of freedom of association.

Norway had its referendum on entrance to the common market in 1972. The Norwegian referendum was extremely bitter. It divided friends and families. It became sort of an obsession with everyone for months, and it had major lasting political consequences beyond the issue of the referendum itself. In Norway we find that there were umbrella organizations. As in Britain, these umbrella organizations received limited financial support from the government. These yes and no organizations were important, but they did not embrace all political parties or groups.

● (2022)

The "no" campaign in Norway was a true grassroots movement. Independent of the political parties, it developed its own membership of 130,000 active workers in a country of 4 million. In many ways it was composed of the little people, the fishermen, the farmers and workers, who opposed the designs of the elite in Oslo, in the press, and in the political parties. It became bigger than any political party in the country and refused to be taken over by them. The political parties which worked with this movement recognized that the movement was stronger than they were.

Ask yourself, would this bill guarantee the rights of such a grassroots movement? The answer is yes, and that is most important. Would it guarantee its right to operate free from any interference from the political parties? The answer is yes again. These things must be looked at carefully in committee to make sure we do have these kinds of protections in the bill.

We can learn another lesson by looking at the Norwegian example, this time at the "yes" campaign. This was not a grassroots movement like the "no" campaign, but was an umbrella group embracing organized parties, unions, co-operatives and so on. But here we find that the umbrella group had a steering committee which drew mainly from the Labour party and excluded the Conservative party altogether, even though the Conservatives were very strongly in favour of entry. The people running the Norwegian "yes" campaign concluded that it would damage their cause if they were seen to be co-operating too closely with the Conservatives, because the "yes" campaign was mostly concerned with winning supporters of the Labour and Liberal parties who were basically hostile to the Conservatives.

Therefore, on both sides of the coin, it is obvious that without dividing the people into two groups, such as the bill in Quebec might suggest, by not giving the political parties which have different philosophies and different members, an opportunity of representation on their own, we are taking the chance of dealing a terrible blow to the rights of associations, parties, and also of individuals.

We can understand that political parties which agree on a referendum question may still wish to maintain totally separate relations in a referendum campaign. They may agree on the need to vote yes or no, but have very different reasons which they wish to advance. The parties may even by extremely hostile to one another on everything but the referendum question.

How does the federal referendum bill approach freedom of association? The answer is simple, and it is the answer you would expect from a Liberal government. Our bill guarantees absolute freedom of association. No party or group would be obliged to cooperate in any way with any other party or group. Every party and group would be able to register independently, to have full rights to collect its own funds, hold its own meetings, and produce its own literature and campaign material.

What is more, our bill recognizes the equal interest of federal and provincial parties in a referendum on constitutional questions and gives them exactly the same rights. We even guarantee that provincial parties will have equal broadcast time with federal parties. Every effort has been taken to ensure that our bill does not favour federal parties over other political groups.

It had been my intention to present a short background which might whet the appetite of hon. members of parliament to participate in committee so that this very useful tool, Bill C-9, an act respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, may be a landmark in our legislative history.

If, in my opening statement, I in any way made any remarks which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands would consider unparliamentary, she can rest assured that I will review the context and will be very willing to withdraw them. If I have been prompted to say what I have said, it is because, in concluding, I want to bring your attention to the principles of the bill. This is what second reading is all about.

The principles are the following: the procedures governing a referendum should be fully consistent with all those political rights normally respected in Canada, especially freedom of expression and freedom of association; the procedure should impose financial controls which encourage a fair and open debate; the procedure should ensure the probity of the referendum process at the same high level as the probity of the electoral process; the procedure should respect the federal nature of Canada and not favour parties or groups active at the federal level over those active at the provincial level; and, the procedure should be as simple and as familiar as possible.

I look forward to active debate, constructive criticism, and some conflict in committee. I encourage all members of this House to participate fully. We may once again prove that "it is in the heat of conflict that the spark of truth is blown."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) would now entertain a question? I noted with interest the enthusiasm and gusto with which the hon. member supported the legislation, saying that the 1942 conscription referendum was a good thing for the country and opened the door to free expression. I would point out that at page 1004 of Hansard for November 15, 1976 the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) said in respect of the referendum:

> And what happens over the years?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I understood the hon. member had sought the floor to pose a question. Perhaps he should get to the question.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I have to put the question in the context of this quotation:

> In the case of the province of Quebec, this creates dissensions, factions, and the province can no longer operate with factions. And if factions are created in Canada on the basis of the results of such a referendum, or of one option, or another—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member is addressing himself mainly to a statement.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I think I should answer that by saying that it may seem very odd to the hon. member—

Mr. Friesen: On a point of order, sir, I did not get to ask my question. How can he answer it?

An hon. Member: Don't you want an answer?

Mr. MacFarlane: Although perhaps not answering the question, I should just remind the hon. member that the great division occurred in 1918 when there was no referendum, not when there was a referendum.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lachance) on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that my colleague, whom I respect very much and with whom I have had the pleasure of working in the past, would quote me without giving any context and pick only one sentence out of a speech which lasted almost 20 minutes in the debate on a private member's bill and I reserve the right to read his words and see whether they constitute a breach of my privileges.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is precisely why he has not been recognized.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) knows, I listened very carefully to what he had to say. When I came into the House at eight o'clock I came anticipating that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) would make a speech the likes of which he made one evening in my company to my Kiwanis club, at my invitation. He will recall that well. I introduced him and listened with great anticipation on that occasion. My anticipation on that occasion was rewarded by not only the quality of the speech but by the way in which it was delivered and the sincerity of its message. I listened for that tonight expecting to hear it from the hon. member. I did not hear it.

Unfortunately, what we heard from the hon. member, who happens to be my friend, was a speech containing references to hon. members of this House which, if not contrary to the rules regarding proper parliamentary practice, certainly bordered on the wrong side. I am glad the hon. member is going to review those matters in relation to the charges he levelled at hon. members in this House of Commons.

One interesting thing about this House of Commons is that I have not come up against a member of the House, regardless of the side on which he or she may sit, who takes a devious or dangerous attitude to the country, or an attitude in respect of the country that is wrong. We may have some differences about leadership, but I am getting sick and tired, quite frankly, of sitting in this House hearing from members on the other side that the country's only salvation is a return of that derelict group which passes itself off as good government. I think that is a matter of truth, spoken in a proper parliamentary fashion. The truth is it has become apparent not just to members of this House, but to people across the country, including those in the riding of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

● (2032)

There are two tragedies in the speech of the hon. member. The first tragedy is that he made the speech at all, and the second tragedy is that he made it after a two-hour adjournment break for dinner when he had time to think about it. I do not know how we can advance the cause of this debate if that is to be the level at which it is to be conducted.

We are dealing with something which is extremely important to the country, as the Minister of Justice himself has said. We are dealing with something which is important and fundamental to the parliamentary process, as the Minister of Justice also mentioned in his speech. Although I may disagree in some respects with the Minister of Justice and I may suspect some of the motives of this government, at least the Minister of Justice addressed the question of the role of parliament and its relations to this bill on referenda seriously. I do not agree with everything he said, but certainly the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain made a speech which was not worthy to follow the speech of the Minister of Justice.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain in his speech made reference to a bill put on the order paper by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) dealing with capital punishment. As I recollect, that bill calls for a referendum on capital punishment. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is a private member in this House and has the right to put forth whatever bill he wishes. Members can decide to support it or talk it out, as they see fit. The important thing about that bill in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is that it, like every other referendum bill in Canadian history, is directed to a specific point and was not designed, as this bill is capable of being used, to deal with a much broader question.

As I read and listened with great care to the excellent speech made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), this was one of the problems she had with the bill, not that it dealt with referenda but that if dealt with the subject in a broad way and that in so dealing with it in that sense it could change, if used improperly, the course of parliamentary government as we understand it and as we know it. One of the members of the press gallery commented as I was leaving for dinner hour that it was a good speech. The hon. member said that that question, its effect upon the parliamentary system and where it will lead us in terms of the constitutional position of Canada, should be very carefully considered by this House of Commons and by the committee to which the bill will be eventually referred.

Another concern expressed by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands was that she did not believe that the process of constitutional reform in Canada was such a trivial matter that it ought to be dealt with piecemeal, that there ought to be a bill on referenda, a bill on the power of the Senate, the courts, etcetera, or a bill on how we distribute power. This whole process into which we have entered does not have the complete support of some elements of this country. I do not have to tell members of the government how Senator Eugene Forsey feels, how Senator Daniel Lang feels, or how Senator George McIlraith feels about this approach to constitutional reform.

Mr. Boulanger: Tell us about it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My namesake in the other official language on the other side of the House asks how they feel. They are terribly concerned that that approach is wrong. If the Minister of Justice says that that is not so, I would ask him to speak to those gentlemen and discuss it with them. I know that members on this side of the House join with members on the other side in hoping that this process of constitutional change will resolve to a constitutional position that will be acceptable in every province and every region of this country.

I listened with dismay today to the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), when he drew himself up to his full five and a half feet, and said that he would "stand at the gateway and protect our confederation". I thought those were marvellous words. Over the dinner hour I went up to my office and searched in my papers to find a document that would tell me how the NDP felt about constitutional reform. In those papers I consulted I found, printed at great party expense, Resolutions Book No. 2, New Democratic Party Seventh Federal Convention at Vancouver.

Mr. Boulanger: You are spying on that party.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No, I happen to be on the mailing list. As a matter of fact the New Democratic Party has made requests to me for funding from time to time.

I wanted to find out what was the position of this party which held itself up with such nobility at five o'clock as the guardians of the sanctity of the nation. In this book of resolutions I found under the heading of federal-provincial affairs—confederation, resolution No. 40, which reads:

Whereas the NDP is inspired by the most sacred democratic principles . . .

That is just wonderful. It goes on to say:

—and whereas the NDP is determined to preserve Canadian national unity—

So far that is not too bad. It goes on:

—be it resolved that the NDP refrain from openly encouraging the disintegration of Canada—

If I read this correctly, they do not want openly to encourage the dissolution of Canada. I do not know how else they will do it. It goes on to say:

—but that it recognize the right of Quebec to separate from the Canadian Confederation, should that be the expressed desire of a majority of the citizens in that province.

Mr. Roberts: Was that adopted?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am not privy to all the secrets of the NDP. However, that is what it says and I would like to read it again so everyone will understand where this "guardian of the gateway of confederation" stands:

—be it resolved that the NDP refrain from openly encouraging the disintegration of Canada, but that it recognize the right of Quebec to separate from the Canadian Confederation, should that be the expressed desire of a majority of the citizens in that province.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) would be honest with hon. members and inform the House that that resolution did not pass at that convention.

● (2042)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I must bring it to the attention of hon. members again that this is neither a question of privilege nor a point of order.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) on a point of order.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, on that particular point of order, I would draw to your attention that it is a matter of privilege that this House not be misled with misinformation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I am sure the House leader for the Conservative party would not want to mislead this House deliberately by suggesting that the New Democratic Party at open convention had passed that resolution. Would the hon. member be honest with the House and tell us if that did pass?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Again, I do not see any question of privilege. We are certainly debating something that was said earlier. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the question of whether they passed it is very important, and what is equally important is the majority by which it was passed.

I listened quietly to the Leader of the New Democratic Party defame the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) this afternoon, and I did not interrupt on questions of privilege. I think those overly sensitive people in that party could convince the House and the public a great deal more if they would produce a resolution tonight that says something to the contrary. They will have ample opportunity to do that. It is particularly important that they do it because that party has always prided itself on having the parliamentary wing and the leadership of the party follow the dictates of the annual meeting. However, I remember they did that in Ontario. Stephen Lewis raised the minimum wage after his party had done so and he suffered for it.

It is a well known fact that the Quebec wing of the New Democratic Party has for a long time wanted separate status for the province of Quebec. That is common knowledge. I say that the leader of that party ought not to draw himself up to his full five and one half feet and call himself one of the bastions of confederation. The Minister of Justice and others ought not to look upon this party as particularly good allies in the fight to save Canada, in view of that resolution. I think it is very important to say that, and I say it because this afternoon I heard the leader of that party, who should know better, stand up and misquote, and repeat a misquote of the Leader of the Opposition with respect to his position on national unity. He said that the Leader of the Opposition had indicated that he was prepared to negotiate with respect to the province of Quebec in the sense of the division of this country.

Mr. Pinard: That is what he said.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want this House to know, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the case. The quotation was in La Presse; a recording is available for any hon. member who wants it. This is what he said. The Leader of the Opposition said that the mandate of a Canadian prime minister is to preserve national unity. The Leader of the Opposition is not prepared to negotiate separation. I do not think that other party over there is prepared to negotiate it, nor are we. A referendum in Quebec might affect the mandate of a provincial premier but it could not affect the mandate of a federal prime minister.

There is no way, as the law exists today, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the next prime minister who will take office after the election, or any prime minister of this country has a mandate to negotiate the separation of this country. That is a bottom line of Canadian truism.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, it is the essence of federalism to negotiate with any premier when there is a mutually agreed upon agenda. In this case negotiation would simply emphasize two totally opposite points of view. That is what the Leader of the Opposition said in Quebec. I want to lay to rest once and for all the quote, misquote, and repetition of it which is a malignant statement and contrary to the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition. I think it is time this was said. I thought more of the Leader of the New Democratic Party than that he would stand up in this House and make that dreadful statement. I hope he will see fit to set the record straight.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, there are no second class Canadians if they honestly believe in this country. There is no parliamentarian in this House who ought not to be concerned about this referendum bill and with respect to the principle of the right of the people to be involved in the fundamental question affecting their country.

The committee will have to deal with this bill as it dealt with Bill C-60, and discuss the propriety of it in the context of the time in which they deal with it and with parliamentary practice. It is not our intention to attempt to deny the committee that power and that right. This bill is as important as Bill C-60 which dealt with a certain aspect of the confederation debate. The government saw fit in those circumstances to send that bill to a special joint committee of this House. I was not a member of the committee, but during the summer I watched the proceedings. It was a fairly constructive committee and it recognized the folly of Bill C-60 in the context of the time—that it was just a bit of a confrontation between the provinces and the other institutions. As a result of pressure from the committee the question of the Senate has been referred to the Supreme Court of Canada because the government felt it had to back off. I think it did so quite appropriately.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands suggested that we should deal cautiously with something that it so fundamental to our parliamentary government, and I support her in that. I think it is regrettable that in matters of this kind the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and certain other members on that side of the House should try to distort the attitude in the country with respect to referenda. His speech is very unfortunate, in view of the seriousness of the proposal, and I hope that as time goes on he will reconsider his remarks. Those remarks were probably prepared for him by the research office of the government. If that is the case, I forgive him, but this debate is so important it demands more consideration than has been given to it by that hon. member.

I listened carefully to what the Minister of Justice said, and I know his intentions as he expressed it.

● (2052)

This parliament has run its course. We are into the fourth session of an elongated parliament. The government has long since run out its moral mandate and has nearly run out its legal mandate. Therefore this is not the government, whatever its stripe, to trust with the tools for recreating confederation, with regard to this bill. That is my position. I make no apology for it. I hope that will be examined during the course of the debate.

One can imagine the position of this government and the turmoil it is in. The leader of the government faces invidious alternatives. Imagine the effect that has on the leadership. He is faced with being deposed from office by the Leader of the Opposition on the one hand, or by John Turner of Toronto on the other. That is an invidious position.

I do not think we can trust nor should we trust a major departure in a parliamentary sense to a government that is so led and so preoccupied with its own position rather than with those matters which should concern it. I am therefore very concerned about this bill in the hands of the government. When the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands spoke of her concern about this bill and the parliamentary practice, she spoke for a lot of people both inside and outside this House of Commons.

There is one other aspect I want to deal with from a parliamentary point of view. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain used to be the Liberal party whip. He is now a parliamentary secretary. When he occupied the position of whip, he and I worked together. He took some part in the operation of this House of Commons. I am surprised that he did not at least question the amount of time that will be allowed to debate this bill in the House of Commons.

I do not know whether 40 hours will be sufficient. I do not know how the government can say that 40 hours are sufficient in terms of debate on such an important matter as the question that may face us with regard to the constitution of this country. I do not think we should be fettered in terms of time in dealing with the questions of form and structure. We are not merely talking about an amendment to the family allowances, business corporations act, or even second reading on a bill with regard to referenda. What we are talking about is the opportunity for members of parliament, each of whom represents 125,000 to perhaps 200,000 people, to debate the kind of questions that will be put across this country, not just in one province or even a group of provinces. I hope the government will agree that we not be fettered with regard to time.

Mr. Lalonde: The people of Canada will talk.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister is quite right. I repeat, there should not be any fetter with regard to time limitations. There may be two members or a dozen members of this House who will not be able to deal with the bill. I am sure the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain will want to speak on a bill like that. I will want to, as I am sure other members will. When the bill goes to committee, I want the government to consider that very carefully.

There are certain remedies which the government has, although I do not believe they should be used on such a bill. I would not want to see the remedy of allocation of time. There was a free vote on the issue of capital punishment, and properly so, and every member was permitted to speak his mind on that moral issue. Whether we agreed with one another is not important. What was important was that every member was given time.

A matter that may affect the preservation of this country and the position the federal government should take on certain matters is worthy of the same kind of consideration as the capital punishment issue. I ask the Minister of Justice to consider that. We should not move hastily on this matter. We should move properly and with certainty, and with the knowledge that the people of Canada will understand precisely this whole issue.

Those are my concerns with regard to this bill. I have said in other places that I am not personally opposed and that I have no strong feelings against the principles of the referendum. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands indicated in her speech today that she was not opposed to the idea of referenda. However, she is concerned about the scope of this one because of its importance to the preservation of confederation as we understand it, or the confederation which it might evolve.

All members are concerned about this in terms of our country. I am sure there is not one member of parliament who is prepared to give one inch in connection with the maintenance of confederation in Canada. I wish that debate would end in this House of Commons. I worry when it continues. I worry about attacks and misquoting of political leaders. An attack was made today on the Leader of the Opposition. I have never attacked the Prime Minister on anything he has said about the preservation of this country. I have done that as a matter of principle. I hope that is the kind of atmosphere that will prevail when this bill goes to committee.

In conclusion, I am not at all opposed to new parliamentary forms. All I want is for those forms to be considered. I am not opposed to strong government in this country. The parliamentary system demands strong government. On the other hand, I want this parliament to be place where that strong government and its servants must account. After these important issues have been discussed, I would like the bill to go to committee where it can be discussed completely.

I would rather this matter were considered as part of a constitutional package. I do not have that luxury, except to say that is what I would like. However, the government has decided that is not going to happen. When something involves not only this parliament but the federal and provincial institutions, it should be considered as part of an over-all constitutional package.

I hope that in the last few moments I have indicated the spirit with which I and my party view this bill. It would be better to discuss the merits of this bill rather than the merits of each other, because this is an important piece of legislation.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would answer a question about an important part of his speech.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I will try.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Would the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) answer a question?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauther) made it quite clear in the House on two occasions and in the presence of the Leader of the Opposition that the latter had indicated that he would negotiate a form of sovereignty-association, if 60 per cent of Quebeckers voted yes in referendum to a question about sovereignty-association.

This statement was therefore made on two occasions in the presence of the Leader of the Opposition. I should like to know why it is not the Leader of the Opposition, but the House leader of the Progressive Conservative party who this evening denies this statement which is reported to have been made by his leader in Rivière-du-Loup, and why his leader, when this statement was made in his presence in the House, was not brave enough to deny it, either rising on a question of privilege or on a point of order to say: "The statements made by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier are serious and I never said in Rivière-du-Loup or elsewhere that I would negotiate sovereignty-association." Why did his leader not deny that in the House when those allegations were made twice in his presence, once in a motion under Standing Order 43 and another time in a question directed to the Prime Minister, in both cases the issue being raised by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier?

I would like the House leader of the opposition to answer honestly that question and tell us why this evening he is taking the responsibilities of his leader.

● (2102)

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the question matter was raised on two occasion in the House, on one occasion by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). Quite frankly at the time I heard him I thought he was being mischievous, and nobody really pays very much attention to what the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier says.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The second occasion concerned a question put to the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: That did it!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I say to you quite honestly that it exercised the Leader of the Opposition because it was obviously a planted question. I don't know whether the Prime Minister had his music with him or not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): But whatever the Prime Minister said was not correct. And on that very same day—and the Leader of the Opposition is not a cry-baby but he wants the record to be straight—the Leader of the Opposition went outside the House and made statements which were widely reported, with respect to it. I do not think the Leader of the Opposition should stoop to answer every accusation directed to him by the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We've got those cry-babies going now.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) permit a question? I might add, Mr. Speaker, that there is no one in the House with a fresher mandate than mine. The question I would like to ask relates to the hon. member's support of the principle of referenda. Unfortunately I was not here to listen to the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), but I gather that it is the position of the official opposition that the principle of the bill is acceptable, but that the scope of the questions which can be asked under the bill is too great. That is my interpretation of what I understood this evening and, if I may, I would like to have the hon. member's response to that. Having read clause 3(1) it struck me that the scope was really quite narrow.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are new around here!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to deprive other members of their right to speak, but the hon. member who put a question has a right to an answer. The position put by my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands, as I understood her, was put very precisely. She said that the existence at the federal level of a clear set of rules, which ensures the utmost freedom of speech and fullness of debate prior to the holding of any referendum on Quebec, is important. There are four or five areas within the speech she made which indicate that the principle of referenda is not repellent to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, nor does it repel me. I hope that answers the question of the hon. member. I am quite prepared to answer any questions, but I presume this bill will go to committee and will be dealt with quite fully.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) on a point of order.

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Two or three times in his speech, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) referred to the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent)—

[English]

—as the five foot six member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would like to hear the hon. member's question of privilege.

Mr. Pelletier: I think it improper to use these words. We do not refer to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) or the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) as the five foot two members—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Tiny perfect!

Mr. Pelletier: —and I do not think it should be used as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton used it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for York-Simcoe on a point of order.

Mr. Stevens: It is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. As everybody can see, it is clear that I am not five-foot two.

An hon. Member: Five-foot one!

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I don't think that the sheer size of a man is a true measure of his greatness but rather the kind of head he has on his shoulders. In the regard Mr. Speaker, I wonder what is the policy of the Progressive Conservative party on the subject matter of Bill C-9. Indeed, it is extremely difficult of anyone who listened to the speeches made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), to know what is the position of that party on the issue of the Referendum Act. What is extremely difficult to explain, Mr. Speaker, is the inability of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton to defend his leader after it was twice suggested here in the House of Commons that he would negotiate his country if 60 per cent of people voted yes in a Quebec referendum.

● (2112)

Some people bury their heads in the sand, and when they come to the province of Quebec—it is extremely important in this country—they know that people outside of Quebec do not listen to them as much because they use French, and therefore they feel they can say any silly things. They may try to make the people of Quebec believe something. The next day they fly to another part of the country where they say exactly the opposite. They are certain that nobody will contradict them. They believe there are in Canada people who do not understand both languages. There are others, Mr. Speaker, who, in their wishful thinking, believe they live in a unilingual country. They think because they speak in some way in Quebec they will not be understood elsewhere, and because they speak in some other way in the provinces they will not be understood in Quebec. They are understood just the same, Mr. Speaker; furthermore, they will always be understood. I think the important thing—Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, and it does not seem a long time for some members or perhaps too long for a few, but the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has made the worst speech I have ever heard in the House. I do not claim to be the official critic of a party but I can say at least, Mr. Speaker, that I can recognize when somebody has the future of his country at heart, because the bill before us is extremely important for the future of our country.

We have not introduced this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, solely to while away the time in the House, we introduced to guarantee the very foundations of our democratic society in Canada. What we want to do with Bill C-9, Mr. Speaker, is to guarantee to the Canadian people as a whole that no government will be able to usurp or to break this country unfairly. When we say unfairly, Mr. Speaker, we want to ensure that those who were elected in Quebec through the democratic process do not break this country in a way which would clearly be antidemocratic. I will explain this way. What I mean, Mr. Speaker, is that it would be extremely easy for a party which forms the government to try to deceive the population on the terms of the question. I believe it would be evidence of political immaturity for the federal government to evade its responsibilities by not introducing a legislation such as Bill C-9.

Mr. Speaker, we are not introducing a bill on referenda strictly for the fun of it. We introduce this bill to make sure that if ever the group of bourgeois who are in power in Quebec decide to fool around with the meaning of the referendum question we could redress the wrong that would have been done and we could know, clearly and accurately, whether Quebeckers want to remain within Canada or not. I believe there are hon. members in this House who have yet to understand that the future of Canada is at stake right now, in 1978, and not in six years or ten years from now. Too many members on the other side of this House are prepared to endanger their own country for the sake of power. I do not understand them, Mr. Speaker. It is maddening to see how these people refuse to understand the problem which now exists in Canada. It is shocking to note how these people prefer to destroy the will of the House of Commons that wants to try to keep Canada united through the present government which represents people from all parts of the country. Mr. Speaker, it is extremely difficult to understand how come these people, after what we heard tonight and after so many years in the opposition, have not learned anything yet. I think they are now a permanent opposition party. They have not learned yet to listen to the grass roots. That is what is important. These people, Mr. Speaker, have not realized what a Quebecker wants at all costs to stay within Canada. They do not take the trouble.

Mr. Speaker, they should take the trouble to look into the underlying principles of Bill C-9, particularly on the matter of referendum procedures. These were dealt with in a very superficial way. With all the experience of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, I would have expected from him a much better worked out speech on this bill.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind there is no serious awareness of the real urgency of having a referendum act in this country, an act that would enable us to ensure that democracy is safeguarded in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I hear voices on the other side. Unfortunately they know nothing about the way the party in power in Quebec communicates. If they think as some do, that Quebeckers can be bought off when they cannot speak the way Quebeckers want to be spoken to, well, they will miss the boat, Mr. Speaker. And in the House of Commons they will have, many will be missing, namely the representatives of Quebec. Then they will wonder whether the House of Commons can survive after that. There might even be a House of American representatives in our area.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is imperative that those people become aware, once and for all, that all the Quebec people want is simply that their problems not be made light of, that they be solved. Quebeckers want nothing more. They also want something that is basic. I feel that, humanly speaking, if French Canadians are truly respected, then, it should be understood that the French language should be respected throughout the country. When we can finally tell Quebeckers that you, on the other side, have a deep respect for them, then there will be no more problems in Canada. But Quebeckers are not convinced, Mr. Speaker, that people on the other side want them in Canada. On the contrary, a good number of them wonder if people like the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would not simply want them to opt out. Unfortunately, they already see themselves in power. Were it not for us in Quebec, they might be in power. Those guys are ready to negotiate their country for power. Mr. Speaker, I will not dwell on them any longer. I would rather speak of the bill, which is more important and more sensible.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to summarize the bill which to me is extremely important. The Quebec premier, Mr. Lévesque, incidentally is my MLA, I did not vote for him, but he won his election anyway. Mr. Speaker, the Quebec premier said that our referendum legislation was "full of holes", nothing but holes. I will show him, Mr. Speaker, what has more holes.

I would like to make 19 points, 19 comparisons between the Quebec legislation and the bill before us this evening. After that, let him try and find holes! Anyway we are going to find some.

● (2122)

Mr. Speaker, according to Bill C-9, referenda should only deal with constitutional matters. The Quebec legislation says that referenda may deal with any matter, but there could not be more than one referendum on the same subject during the same legislature. They are ready to do anything to gain power. They said that they had a taste for Quebec, but now they have a taste for power, Mr. Speaker.

Second point. We are making quite clear, Mr. Speaker, after the answer given this afternoon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), that the referendum would be held for consultation purposes only. In their legislation they say that a referendum might be held for consultation purposes or to submit to the people a bill passed by the National Assembly before its final approval. So they pass a legislation but they consult the people before giving it their final approval. They are putting the cart before the horse.

Third point, Mr. Speaker. Let us not forget that the Quebec Premier said that our bill was full of holes. We say that the questions asked in a referendum could only be worded by a government member, at least by the entire cabinet. If you look at the legislation, Mr. Speaker, it is characteristic of the bourgeois clique that runs the show in Quebec; only the premier could word the questions put in a referendum. When the leader says jump everybody agrees and the others have nothing to say.

Such is the basic democracy they talk about in Quebec.

The next point—I go on with the bill full of holes, according to the Quebec Premier. The questions should be worded so as to allow the voters to answer yes or no, which does not exclude the possibility to ask several questions, including alternative questions. He forgets this himself!

Mr. Speaker, I would not like to sound like a Social Crediter, as I have much more respect for them than for those people, but if I went further, they have been bothering us for a long time with their famous question. That is dangerous. Mr. Speaker, there is a way to ask the question which I think is very, very important. I have nothing against people who have spent years at the university, who have studied for a long time and who have been teachers. We find a lot of those people as in the Parti Québécois but all things considered, they should put more trust in Quebeckers. I get fed up that in Quebec, Mr. Speaker, only academics dominate people who are working hard, when the others spend their time deciding and governing. Therefore the question which will be put will be very important, and skilful as they are at manipulating crowds they believe that Quebeckers are stupid people. That will be their biggest mistake.

Recently there was a public opinion poll held in Laval, a prosperous city with a dynamic mayor. He had decided once and for all that he would not be ruled by fascists because if you do not think as the government party does you are a bad but you are okay if you share their views.

Mr. Speaker, to come back to what I have to say, housewives from Laval have clearly indicated according to the last poll they are sick and tired, and that is only a few Quebeckers who are tired of being manipulated by a sort of question which will result in a "yes" or a "no". They want to know clearly what the question will be.

And if you try to manipulate the people by presenting them with a leading question, they will come out with a loud and clear "no" as an answer to the question whether or not they want Quebec to separate.

I now would like, Mr. Speaker, to point out the shortcomings in our legislation by comparison to that of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, we are ready to grant forty hours for the consultation process to take place and when a referendum is held, they will grant thirty hours. We will not press the point for the sake of ten hours and I guess that democracy is all the more respected when more people can have more time to express their views.

Secondly, what we are saying is that after the wording of the question has been approved, the government will only have 45 days to issue writs for the referendum. Pursuant to its act, the government of Quebec will not be able to issue any writs until the twentieth day following the day when the phrasing of a question has been approved but it could also delay the issuing of that writ indefinitely. That is their way of understanding democracy, Mr. Speaker. The Quebec government will not be able to issue a brief during the yearly census period or the two following weeks. That is the Parti Québécois' idea of democracy, Mr. Speaker! We can also see it at work, Mr. Speaker, in its occupational safety program. They are taking away all the benefits workers have enjoyed up to now, as far as the safety is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few additional remarks but first I would like to make a very important point. I did not seek legal advice nor do I pretend to be a lawyer, far from it, but I am seriously wondering whether I or any of my hon. friends opposite, from the left to the right, will be allowed to write to our constituents during the referendum campaign to let them know our position and feelings on that matter or whether we will have to and I do mean "have to" become part of an umbrella organization before expressing our views.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is extremely important and if you have time one day you might study this bill in order to determine if it does not violate our privileges as members. If we examine the Quebec referendum legislation we notice that any organization wanting to contribute during the referendum campaign must either be in the "yes" or "no" umbrella group. If we stick to the text, this means that the member for Longueuil is not authorized to write to his electors and advise them to vote no. And also that during the whole referendum campaign members of this House will not have the right to go and speak to people in Quebec in order to convince them to stay in Canada if they are not in the umbrella group. That is what the legislation means in Quebec now.

Mr. Speaker, I find this extremely dangerous. What is sure in my mind is that I have been elected to represent people who believe in that kind of country and that the government party will not prevent me from holding public meetings in which I can express my point of view and explain why I want to keep my country as it is. If they think I am doing something illegal, Mr. Speaker, they can send me their thugs if they want to.

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely dangerous for a society which calls itself democratic to start invading rights and privileges of some members of parliament. And that is when you really see what the federal system is all about when whatever level of government unilaterally decides to attempt reducing the rights of some individuals, the other level can interfere to stand for them while if we had a separation such as the one provided for by the Parti Québécois group, we would refer to one single government in Quebec, under a presidency, how do I know, such as they have in France with their communes or whatever, and all the frills around it, when one looks at it it is beyond understanding.

Mr. Speaker, it is both extremely dangerous and important to point out the reasons for Bill C-9 now before us. If members in this House, and I would invite them to listen closely, if members are to be restricted in their right to speak or hold public meetings in support of Canada in the province of Quebec during the referendum campaign, without being a member of the yes group or the no group, it is extremely dangerous for our Canadian society and our Canadian democracy to let this go unchallenged. Things are happening in Canada where one part does not give a damn about the other. What is happening in Canada? Some people believe that because a dreamer or a saviour has come, the other side's problems are solved. Mr. Speaker, the problem is much deeper. If ten, twelve or fifteen members of all sides decided during the pre-referendum campaign or the referendum campaign in Quebec to hold public meetings for a united Canada, it would be interesting to find out whether we would have the right to do so.

Mr. Speaker, under the legislation that was passed in the province of Quebec, members would not have the right to do so. They would have that right if they were to join the yes umbrella, and we know what it means to join the yes umbrella. I am quite ready to associate myself with the provincial Liberal party, but let us not forget that the communist party also supports them. It is against separation. Therefore, I would have to associate with the communists.

Well, I would not suggest for a moment that the New Democratic Party are communists. In my view, they are socialists, albeit bourgeois socialists. They are intellectuals controlling workers and taking their funds for electioneering. This is what they are doing. A great leader once said they were Liberals in a hurry, but as far as I am concerned I feel they are backwards on a number of things. When we look at the principles and the main provisions in the legislation before us, the clear realization is that we have a responsible government. I should like to mention some provisions of Bill C-9 which I feel are the most important, although I have already mentioned a number of others. First of all, referenda should deal only with constitutional issues. They could be part of an advisory process. The answers to the questions would be an unequivocal yes or no. The referendum legislation would expire at the end of a five-year period, unless parliament decided otherwise. Our referenda could be held either in a designated area or at the same time in a few designated areas or everywhere in Canada. As I indicated earlier, the consultation process on a definite question would last 40 hours. As to the writs, 45 days would be required. The bill provides also for a judicial recount in cases where the results are very important and the number of "yes" and "no" votes are too close. Mr. Speaker, the reason I fully support the underlying principle of this bill—something hon. members opposite will or can not understand—is that its purpose is to safeguard the democratic process in Canada. And I have a lot of respect for those who do not think that way, Mr. Speaker, but I say one thing, they did not consider at length the problem that exists in Canada.

If the separatist party in power in Quebec said clearly our question is going to be so clear that people are going to be able to answer yes or no, that our question is going to be: Do you want to remain in Canada, yes or no, there would probably be no need to introduce this bill immediately. That is what is important. There are fundamental reasons why the Parti Québécois keeps postponing its proposed referendum. First of all, everyone knows that they are scared to death of the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). They know that on his own ground which is the province of Quebec, Mr. René Lévesque is going to go down to defeat. And they know also that when the people of Quebec are going to be called upon to make a choice between René Lévesque and Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the answer is going to be 70 per cent for Mr. Trudeau. They know that. Twenty per cent will be undecided and 10 per cent will be for Mr. Lévesque—and I am being generous.

Mr. Speaker, I will never draw enough the attention of this House to the problem of our democracy that is at issue in Quebec and in Canada because of the umbrella organizations because members of the House will probably not have the right to speak during the referendum process if they are not members of the umbrella organizations. That is extremely important. Although I seldom share the opinions of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, I think she has the right to say what she has to say in my riding, in my province, in my city or in her city—everywhere. I think it is normal, even if I do not think like her. But I say one thing, I believe she has not yet understood that she will not be able to do so during the referendum period in Quebec unless she is part of the umbrella organization. I find that extremely odd, Mr. Speaker.

There are some who seem to say that the Liberal party is in trouble. I challenge them to come and see what is happening in Quebec. Because we stand for the people of Quebec, because Liberal members elected to Ottawa stand for the interests of Quebec and always do so energetically, they imagine that we cannot understand the other problems that exist in this country. But the important thing in this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to help all hon. members from the province of Quebec and the members of all parties in the House and place them in a position where they can take part in an honest debate on the desire of a population to remain part of the country. There are too many people in the House, Mr. Speaker, who figure the future of the country is a matter of dollars and cents. This country will never make it as a united country if people, be they in the Liberal party, in the Progressive Conservative party, in the Social Credit party or in the New Democratic Party, believe that we will make friends with those who oppose the idea of a united Canada by pretending it is strictly a matter of economic problems. It is not so. We will never solve Canada's problems by talking about dollars and cents. Never! The problem will disappear when people start respecting those who come from Quebec, be they French-speaking or English-speaking. There is a French-speaking majority in Quebec. There is an important minority in Canada which demands to be respected like other Canadians living outside Quebec. And as long as people fail to understand this problem, Mr. Speaker, it will not be solved in Canada. On the contrary, they will still manage to split and divide this country. Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that with Bill C-9 we cannot be certain of winning the referendum, because we are sure that the party in power in Quebec, the Parti Québécois, will lose the referendum. I tell you one thing; be careful, you are dreaming in colour. A growing majority of Quebeckers think that the other provinces do not want them anymore. I tell you one thing, Mr. Speaker, to believe that the referendum will automatically be rejected in Quebec is to dream in colour. I tell you one thing, Mr. Speaker, if there were a referendum in the Longueuil riding tomorrow morning, if we asked the question yes or no, do you want to stay in Canada, I am not sure Canada would win. The population in Longueuil, Mr. Speaker, is 93 per cent French-speaking, 8 per cent English-speaking, and 4 per cent immigrants. Mr. Speaker, this is really significant. People on the other side think it is easy to be a member of parliament in Ottawa. If you believe it is easy to be a member of parliament in Ottawa when you are from Quebec you are mistaken. You should come in our ridings where we are always defending ourselves, where one keeps repeating that the Parti Québécois is not telling the truth, that it is not true that English-speaking people are out to get us, that it is not true that they want to destroy us, that it is not true they are this and that. When you come to do this work for us, I will begin to have some respect for you.

• (2132)

[English]

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier). Sometimes it is good to remind ourselves that no particular side of the House has all the answers with regard to some very difficult questions relating to matters of national unity. I think it sometimes is easy for us to inflate rhetoric and to take a parochial view, looking at these particular issues with our own immediate concerns in mind.

• (2142)

Let me be certain to leave no doubt in anyone's mind that, as far as I am concerned personally, in respect of the province of Quebec its continuation within confederation is essential. I feel as strongly about that as the hon. member for Longueuil, and as strongly as any member across the floor of this House, as any member in the NDP or the Social Credit party, or an independent in the House.

When I address myself to this particular legislation, and if I do not find it to be completely perfect, I do not want anyone in any part of this House to suggest I am not being patriotic, or not attempting to bring to this parliament the best possible legislation in relation to the problems we are now facing in the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Let's hear the rest.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are going to hear the rest. The fact of the matter is I am going to make some observations in respect of the legislation, and I will address myself to some provisions of the bill which I very seriously think are counterproductive to the task we in this House have regarding the issues concerning national unity with which we are faced today. I want to deal with the productive side of things, and with those things particularly and specifically.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), has pointed out, we are not looking at this particular situation and this bill in the context of a vehicle for constitutional change in the broad spectrum of that concept, but rather we look at the obligation of this government to bring forward legislation that will deal specifically with the problems we face today. That is the matter to which we should address ourselves. We should be considering how to attack problems by legislation brought before this House that will have the general support of members on all sides, rather than the type of legislation that in fact may only have limited support.

I hesitated a bit before getting up, sir, as you may have noticed. I am concerned about this debate. The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid) was in the House earlier today, and, although he is newly appointed, I had hoped he would address himself to this particular bill, giving us some idea of the direction of the action he proposes to take. He has not been here all day. I must say, quite candidly, that it disappoints me that he should not be in the House during this very important debate on a matter so relevant to his portfolio. I do not know the reason, and there may be a very legitimate one. No one has yet said why that minister has not participated in the debate and has not been in the House. I know the minister is busy, but if any bill involves a very substantial part of his responsibility, this one does. I think it demands his attendance in this House at all times and full participation in the debate. Otherwise we can only draw a conclusion about this bill that I do not want to draw.

I was a member of the joint committee on the constitution studying Bill C-60.

An hon. Member: You were not there too often.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I was in attendance, although I was away for a couple of weeks with the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) and others considering the constitutional situation in Germany. We wanted to come back with a proper perspective in respect of this matter.

When I went to that committee studying Bill C-60 I was advised that there was unanimity on the part of members of the government party, and that it was a matter of government policy that members on that side of the House should give it full support.

An hon. Member: That's not true; that's not true.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Now we hear that that is not true, and that tells the lie. The hon. member has indicated that Bill C-60 did not have the full support of the government majority. In view of the fact that he is prepared to be so candid now about that bill, I should like to know what kind of support we can expect in respect of this bill on the part of members of the government party.

An hon. Member: We didn't vote on Bill C-60.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We did not vote on it because as the hon. member points out, Liberals at that committee complained about the lack of consultation and the fact that the matter had never been discussed at any time in their caucus. They said it had never been presented to the caucus.

An hon. Member: I never said that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We hear them talking now, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Tell us about Germany.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Let me remind hon. members opposite, and some of them were members of that committee, including the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), the hon. member from Quebec city, and the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), that they were very quiet while Senator Lang addressed himself very eloquently to this matter, pointing out in no uncertain terms that there was absolutely no consultation.

We often hear that small coterie of people surrounding the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) advising him in respect of constitutional matters, but there was no discussion of this matter in the caucus of that party on the government side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I was listening to the radio tonight and heard something quite startling. I wondered why hon. members were in such a hurry in respect of this bill. I heard on the radio that it has been suggested the Prime Minister will resign this Friday. I wonder if hon. members opposite are able to stand and confirm or deny that, because I think it is important.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I think there should be consultation in respect of this bill with all of those who may be in the position of the Prime Minister between now and the next election. For example, has this particular legislation been discussed with Mr. John Turner? I do not know if there is anybody here who can answer that question. Possibly the person who will be the acting prime minister when the Prime Minister steps down on Friday is the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). Perhaps he will finish up his career in that position. Does anyone on that side want to tell me whether he has been consulted about this bill? Perhaps we should go down to the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), as I understand he is a contender for the position of prime minister.

I do not know really whether there is any support on that side of this bill. Perhaps the Minister of Justice has brought it in without even consulting the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. Why do we not get answers from the other side in respect of this matter of consultation? If there had been consultation in respect of this particular legislation with the parties involved, we might now have legislation to deal with the problem we face in Canada, in a more appropriate form. We know, as the Minister of Justice has pointed out, there are a number of devices that one has to resort to, and one of the devices is a hammer, and I hear one at the door.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

• (2152)

[Translation]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill C-25, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31 March, 1979.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa

December 13, 1978

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 12th day of December, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (2202)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-10, an act to amend the Income Tax to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973—Chapter No. 5.

Bill C-25, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1979—Chapter No. 6.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—REASONS FOR CHANGES TO FRENCH REGIONALIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the French regionalization program of the National Film Board was established in 1974. There are four regions under this program: Western Canada, Ontario, Quebec, which already has the head office of the NFB, and the region of Acadia. English regionalization has existed longer and is supported by stronger budgetary considerations and better equipment.

In the French sector, in four years, 78 films have been produced. At the head office, since the establishment of the NFB in 1939, only about 30 films we produced outside Quebec which concerned more or less directly French-Canadian realities. This makes .75 films a year for the central operation while regionalization produced 19.5 films a year. This proves the value of the French regional program and the enormous human and technical potential which has not yet been developed. Must I remind the House that, under its terms of reference, the NFB must undertake and promote the production and distribution of films in the national interest, and especially make Canadians more familiar with Canada in addition to promoting knowledge of Canada abroad?

I should also like to tell the minister that French regionalization has generated funds outside the budget of the NFB. I would like to note especially that provincial governments, social clubs, municipal governments and French-Canadian organizations throughout the country have shown an interest in these films. They succeeded in interesting and involving the citizens of the regions and their representatives in local productions. Nor is there any price put on the contribution of volunteer workers who may at times be in short supply in Montreal but certainly not in the regions. It is difficult to measure the impact of a so-called regional film on the rest of the country, but one cannot question its spontaneousness, its originality, its openness and its intrinsic value. A regional film is also less costly to produce in the field in my region than in Montreal or by Montreal based NFB producers.

● (2207)

The suppression of western and Ontario regionalization programs is not a saving but an unfortunate and incalculable loss. Yet regionalizations follow more closely the mandate which is to make Canada known to Canadians. Besides striking a foul blow to French: speaking minorities of the country, the NFB will contribute to further weaken them by taking away from them tools of expression and communication. It is a denial of the most significant part of the NFB mandate in the political context now prevailing in the country. And yet the June 26, 1976 issue of Quebec city's Le Soleil mentioned the comments of NFB commissioner André Lamy. Speaking on regionalization, he said, and I quote:

> We want to avoid forcing people to work with groups of strangers from Montreal, or uprooting them by forcing them to come to Montreal to produce their films.

And he added:

> I want to know what a Canadian from Vancouver thinks, and I want the federal government to give him the means to produce a cultural work that can be made known in Quebec.

And I add, in New Brunswick, Ontario and everywhere else in Canada. Those fine words, those noble feelings, that generous condescension are no longer valid today.

The country is moving openly towards the right and seems ready to sacrifice minorities and this in the midst of a national crisis. Principles and fine speeches are easily forgotten. For the sake of budget restrictions, a very nasty discrimination is practised, Mr. Speaker. If we do not take care, such discrimination will give rise to a more radical militancy than what we have seen up to now among minorities. I did say discrimination and I will give evidence based on figures and facts. The following are the cuts made by the NFB in the regionalization item of the 1979-80 budget. For English production, including the Pacific coast, the prairies, Ontario and the Atlantic region, no section has been abolished and the budget has been reduced by only $50,000. On the other hand, for the French production, the western and Ontario centres have been closed. They are merely abolished and the cut is $340,000.

There is a "proportional"—between quotation marks, not mine, they originate from the official source—reduction of $45,000 in the budget of French regionalization in Quebec. It is obvious that the French regionalizations have hit unduly hard.

This evening I urge the minister or his spokesman to give immediate instructions and put an end to that disgrace. Surely there are other cuts which could be made at the NFB. The hopes of French Canadians living outside Quebec should no longer be frustrated. There should be no more response to the cry-babies of the right. They should stop bleeding minorities drop after drop. The matter I raise goes much further than a mere dollar sign. On behalf of the government and in the face of his commitments towards language minorities, the Secretary of State cannot and should not let the National Film Board decide unilaterally who will live in French in Canada and where his or her culture will survive.

The regions are fed up with the professionals in Toronto, Ottawa or Montreal who dictate their conditions to the regions as far as their cultural life is concerned. The French regionalizations in western Canada, Ontario and Acadia are cinematographically and culturally viable provided they are not tripped when they begin to walk. The National Film Board has no right to deal so abruptly with the matter of the very existence of the minorities. Furthermore, the regions refuse to see film makers from Montreal come and try to interpret regional realities. Montreal and everything that swarms and scribbles there has never interpreted or has at least misinterpreted Canadian reality in the past. Let us leave that task to the people in the regions. They have begun to do so at CBC, in spite of some weaknesses; let us also do it at the National Film Board. This is an urgent matter, Mr. Speaker.

● (2212)

[English]

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having brought to the attention of the House, and particularly my minister, the problem he brings before us again this evening. He has indicated there have been budget cuts and that there is no department, and no agency under departments that has not been touched by these reductions.

What has been made clear, and I will repeat it again this evening, is that the same percentage of funds which has been available for French language productions will continue to be available. The reductions which have taken place are applied to administration costs throughout the country to be sure that the amount of money available for productions will not be reduced by the budget cuts, which had to be applied to this particular area within the department, along with the others.

The French language regionalization program will continue to exist, and its objective will continue to be to show through film the way of life of Francophone minorities outside Quebec. The closing of the Toronto and St. Boniface operations will result in a saving of the administrative and training costs involved, and the resources remaining will be concentrated in order that professional French-speaking film-makers in regions outside Quebec may continue to produce films under this program. While I am not downplaying the seriousness of these cuts and the concerns of those groups affected, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the National Film Board is attempting to ensure that with limited resources the French regionalization program will be maintained.

However, as a result of the comments and projections which have been made by hon. members when bringing this matter to the attention of the minister, he wishes me to convey his assurances that he will continue to consider the program. In addition, he will continue to review what is being done to ensure that the undertakings he has given with respect to the continuance of these programs will be carried out and will not be drastically affected. Only administrative cuts will result from the budget reductions.

[Mr. Corbin.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS—TRANSFER OF HOSPITALS TO JURISDICTION OF PROVINCES—EFFECT ON VETERANS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I questioned the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) with respect to complaints I had received concerning veterans gaining entry to former veterans hospitals which have been transferred to the jurisdiction of the provinces. There have been several news articles recently dealing with this subject.

Two recent cases are causing concern, Mr. Speaker. One concerns the Sunnybrook Hospital, and the other is the Memorial Pavilion, Victoria, British Columbia where veterans were refused access. By the time the respective patients gained entry into another hospital the opportunity for possible effective care had passed and they died shortly afterward. The minister explained there were extenuating circumstances with respect to the Memorial Hospital in Victoria and that the widow had not made proper application. But he said that he knew nothing of the Sunnybrook Hospital situation where veterans have been unable to gain entry. I find it very strange to hear him say that he knows nothing of the Sunnybrook incident.

As official opposition critic for veterans affairs, Mr. Speaker, I call upon the minister to launch an immediate investigation into the problems experienced by veterans in gaining admission to transferred hospitals and to report back to the House as soon as possible.

This afternoon the minister assured us that things were working very well. Well, there is certainly some doubt here, and there is obviously a breakdown in communication when it comes to explaining to veterans how they may gain admission to these hospitals.

● (2217)

I am sure the minister is just as concerned as we are. We want all veterans' needs to be properly met. There have been some very disturbing newspaper articles regarding veterans experiencing difficulties gaining entry into veterans hospitals. A recent article in the Toronto Sun carried the headline "Dying man shuttled by hospitals". The article appeared in the Sun on November 24, and it read in part as follows:

> A dying man was shuttled back and forth between three Metro hospitals with no free beds, for eight hours the day before he died, a coroner's jury was told yesterday.
>
> The jury was investigating the Aug. 25 death of Douglas Phillips, 61, of Unionville. He died of a stroke suffered Aug. 24.
>
> "You wouldn't treat a dog like this," his widow Patricia said, describing her horrified reaction Aug. 24 when Sunnybrook Hospital attendants ignored her pleas to help her sick husband—then returned him untreated to Scarborough Centenary Hospital.

In another article on this inquest, printed in the Toronto Star of December 6, we find the following:

The jury was investigating the case of Douglas Phillips, 61, who died of a stroke Aug. 25 after two Metro hospitals, Scarborough Centenary and Sunnybrook Medical Centre, refused to admit him. Hospital officials had said there were no beds available.

There definitely is a problem, and the minister's assurances this afternoon that there are no problems and that everything is working fine are completely false.

In the Toronto Star of November 25 we read the following:

There were 108 empty beds at Sunnybrook Medical Centre the night that fatally ill stroke victim Douglas Phillips was refused admittance, his inquest heard yesterday, but not one was in a part of the hospital that could have given him adequate care.

Testimony that concluded yesterday showed Phillips was turned away from Sunnybrook because Dr. John Edmeads, head of neurology, found that every bed in neurology, neurosurgery and internal medicine was booked.

The 61-year-old veteran had wanted to go to Sunnybrook, which Edmeads said has an international reputation and the only stroke unit in Canada—

But still he was shuttled from hospital to hospital. Another headline in the Toronto Star of November 27 states: " 'Shoot me', begged dying man hospitals rejected". What must veterans, who are entitled to entry into veterans hospitals, and their families be thinking when they read headlines like that?

The story reads in part as follows:

A stroke victim—bounced from hospital to hospital due to a bed shortage—pleaded with his wife, "Shoot me, I'm dying," an inquest was told yesterday.

Contrary to the statements made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs this afternoon, all is not well for veterans who try to obtain entry to veterans hospitals. We have a very serious problem on our hands. The inquest was further told that Mr. Phillips died of massive bleeding within the brain. It was termed the "worst kind of stroke." The inquest was told that an ambulance had taken him from his home to Scarborough Centenary where he was assessed as stable, and transferred, at his request, to Sunnybrook Hospital. But Sunnybrook, which had no available beds, refused to accept him. He was left on a stretcher in the emergency ward for more than three hours, and then sent back to Centenary Hospital. That certainly must not be very comforting news for our veterans and their families.

With regard to the hospital on Vancouver Island, problems were identified there over two years ago by the Veterans' Rights Association of British Columbia. Briefly, that association stated:

On behalf of our membership we would like to make you aware of the problems created for veterans on Vancouver Island through the operation and administration of the former Veterans Hospital in Victoria.

That was in a letter sent to all members of parliament. I read this into the record in the House over two years ago and in committee, and I was told that there was no problem at all. Apparently the problem still exists today.

● (2222)

In an article which appeared in the Daily Colonist dated December 8, it is stated:

The Trudeau government failed a Victoria veteran of the two world wars in his hour of greatest need, his sorrowing widow says—

Mrs. Hancox—

That is the wife of the victim,

—said she and her husband had believed beds would always be available for veterans at the hospital. "He believed until almost the end that veterans would be looked after by their country."

We all expected and thought that would happen, Mr. Speaker, so I am asking the parliamentary secretary to give us a firm commitment tonight that there will be immediate investigation and they will report back to the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) concerning hospital treatment for veterans. He has referred specifically to two recent cases, one occurring at Sunnybrook Medical Centre in Toronto and one at the Royal Jubilee Hospital in Victoria. The hon. member has asked that we give him assurances that these cases will be investigated.

The information regarding the case at Sunnybrook is incomplete at this time, but I will be pleased to inform the hon. member when I have more information. The minister has already spoken briefly about the case in Victoria and I want to reaffirm that, to our knowledge, no refusal of service occurred.

The hon. member made reference to the time a few years ago when there were some complaints at the Victoria Hospital. I can tell him that I personally, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, visited the Royal Jubilee Hospital at Victoria, was shown around the premises, and had extensive discussions with many of the doctors and nurses. It is obvious to me from the information I received when I was there that the problems, which were seemingly prevalent a few years ago when the letter which the hon. member read into Hansard was written, have now been resolved.

The government recognizes and accepts its moral responsibility to provide the best possible care for our veterans. Over the years, the number of veterans requiring acute and active care has steadily declined, for obvious reasons. Most of the patients in veterans hospitals required chronic or domiciliary care, and this led to difficulties in maintaining and attracting the type of highly qualified medical and support personnel to which we had become accustomed. To overcome this situation it was decided that services could be kept at a high level by integrating our facilities and patients into the total community medical hospital complex. This can best be accomplished when the facilities come under provincial jurisdiction.

Transferring a facility to a province does not represent the end of our responsibility for the care of the veteran patient. Guarantees are provided by the province in each case that a specified number of beds is to be made available for the sole use or priority use of veterans. The provinces have consistently honoured these commitments. I can assure the hon. member of this particular aspect.

Further, in each region of the country a departmental medical officer is employed to assist in assessing the veterans' needs and in ensuring that a veteran who requires admission actually obtains a bed.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to remind hon. members that the final decision as to the admission of a patient for active care is, in the last analysis, a medical decision.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question, and then a supplementary question, about the possible commitment of our troops to Namibia. My question was fairly simple, and the supplementary equally simple. Perhaps I could quote parts of both of them. My question ended as follows:

—will the government now undertake to bring a resolution before the House for debate before a final decision is made to send troops on a new and major UN commitment?

● (2227)

My supplementary question ended as follows:

Can the Prime Minister assure the House that we will have an opportunity to debate a resolution in this House on this important matter?

As the Prime Minister likes to do when faced with a question which he does not enjoy answering, he shifted the premise. In his first answer he indicated that he thought they had the support of the opposition in peacekeeping operations, where Canada is indeed in the forefront of all countries. He shifted over to talking about peacekeeping, instead of indicating whether we had a commitment. In answer to the supplementary question, he shifted over to whether there was a commitment made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson).

Was there a commitment or was there not? The Prime Minister denied it twice. He said:

All the Secretary of State for External Affairs said was that if the United Nations asked us for further troops, we would naturally consider the request.

Further on he said:

To my knowledge, there is no commitment. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made no commitment.

On November 28, 1978, as reported in the proceedings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said the following:

I have said before this committee on a previous occasion, and repeated, that if a force is established, if the circumstances are satisfactory in so far as we are concerned we would certainly be prepared to participate because, of course, we have been one of the architects of this effort and it would be quite inconsistent with that approach not to go on to the next logical step.

Whether there was a commitment is not the main reason I raised this question tonight. Will the government make a commitment to bring this matter before the House of Commons before it sends troops overseas, or before it takes final steps to agree to send our troops to Southwest Africa?

There are a number of precedents for this, but I should like to refer to only four. One was in 1956, at the time of the Suez crisis, when Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson agreed to the sending of troops and agreed to bringing it before the House of Commons. In 1960, at the time of the Congo matter, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was the prime minister. He brought it before the House of Commons in the form of a resolution before sending troops to the Congo. In 1964, at the time of the Cyprus matter, Mr. Pearson was the prime minister and Mr. Martin was the secretary of state for external affairs. They brought it before the House of Commons.

It is interesting that in the debate on February 19, 1964, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, the present hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), asked a question very similar to the one I directed to the Prime Minister the other day. In those days the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson was the prime minister, and he said the following:

Finally, if a request is made involving the use of substantial numbers of Canadians abroad, we would bring the matter before parliament before any final decision is taken.

It was quite simple. They knew the role of parliament. They were all willing to bring it before parliament, although at the time of the Suez crisis it was post factum by some six days. But the Liberal government of that day had to recall parliament to do it, which was the reason for the six-day delay. It recalled parliament to have it approve the dispatch of troops to the Suez.

Right up until the present Prime Minister it had always been considered the role of parliament to have a veto over such a decision, and that the government by itself could not commit our troops abroad in any major new undertaking. I do not know whether we should consider this matter as peacekeeping. I did not use the word "peacekeeping". The Prime Minister, looking for a fresh subject and not liking the one I brought up, mentioned peacekeeping. This is quite a different role than the ordinary role of peacekeeping.

An interesting article appeared in the London Times on November 30, 1978. It must have been one of the final editions of that newspaper. It dealt with an Independent Television News team which was back after spending 110 days in Angola. They went down there trying to locate Dr. Jonas Savimbi's Unita movement. As I understand from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, our troops will be positioned along the Namibia-South Angola border. What is happening just over that border surely will be of interest to the troops. Dr. Savimbi's Unita movement is in there fighting a guerrilla war against the Cuban and Russian-backed Angolan government forces.

● (2232)

This team was ambushed at the start of the offensive against Unita in which, the report says, the MPLA forces used French built Puma troop-carrying helicopters piloted by East Germans. The Angola ground troops were also being commanded by East Germans at platoon level, and between 30 and 50 Cuban tanks were also used in the operation. When you realize that SWAPO troops were also sequestered just over that border we can realize the situation that Canadian and other UN forces will be in when they occupy that position, for whatever reason.

I am certain this is not a peacekeeping operation as outlined by Mitchell Sharp when he gave his famous eight criteria for peacekeeping operations. If I had a minute I should like to read them so that we may find out how they differ from the situation we find in Namibia. They are as follows:

There must be a threat to international peace and security that requires the establishment of a peacekeeping force.

The peacekeeping endeavour should be linked to an agreement for a political settlement, or at least a reasonable expectation of a negotiated settlement.

They are not even close to a political settlement there, and I expect it will be years before there is a political settlement.

To continue with the criteria:

The peacekeeping force should be responsible to a political authority, preferably the United Nations.

The sponsoring authority should receive reports and have adequate powers to supervise the mandate of the force.

The parties to the conflict must accept the peacekeeping force.

Canadian participation in force must be acceptable to all concerned.

We may be acceptable to SWAPO, we may be acceptable to South Africa, but I doubt very much that we are acceptable to all forces involved there.

The criteria continue as follows:

The peacekeeping force must have a clear mandate, including provision for freedom of movement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's allotted time has expired. I am afraid he cannot record everything he has in his notes.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has disputed the peacekeeping nature of this particular force. Perhaps it might be of some benefit to report briefly some of the facts.

Canada has been an active member of the group of five western countries attempting to arrange a peaceful resolution of the Namibia problem. The basic feature of the proposal made by Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom and the U.S.A. for an internationally acceptable settlement in Namibia concerns the holding of fair and free elections in the territory, under the supervision and control of the United Nations.

After acceptance by South Africa and the Southwest Africa People's Organization of the western proposal, the Secretary General of the United Nations prepared a plan which sets out how the United Nations would fulfil its responsibilities for supervision and control of the elections. The Security Council has approved this plan, and to give effect to its provisions has authorized the establishment of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group, UNTAG.

UNTAG will have a military component up to an authorized limit of 7,500 personnel, as well as a civilian unit of approximately 1,900 persons. It is the responsibility of the UN Secretary General to consult with all parties concerned on the composition of the UN force, on the date for its deployment to Namibia, and on the mandate that will govern its operation.

As one of the authors of the western proposal on Namibia, as an active participant in the negotiations that led up to its acceptance by South Africa and SWAPO, and as a nation that has traditionally played an active role in promoting peaceful settlement of international disputes, Canada has a strong interest in a successful resolution to the Namibia problem under the aegis of the United Nations.

One of our continuing objectives has been to help strengthen the capacity and the authority of the United Nations in its role as a peacekeeping agency. Canada has consistently responded to UN requests to provide personnel for peacekeeping duties. As a result of this lengthy and intensive experience Canada has become recognized for its excellence in this field, both for its objectivity and the professional competence of its troops. Our experience has also provided us with a good degree of insight into the successes and failures of present and past peacekeeping operations.

With respect to Namibia, when the conditions and terms of reference are established, should a request come from the UN Secretary General for a contribution to UNTAG, the government would give serious consideration to it to determine whether the operation holds promise of success and whether Canada can play a useful role in it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.36 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 13, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

● (1407)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

URBAN AFFAIRS

CMHC COMPENSATION FOR FAULTY WORKMANSHIP UNDER AHOP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not yet made a decision, or has made no move, with respect to underwriting the cost of repairs to AHOP houses in St. John's which are necessary because of faulty inspection, faulty material and improper workmanship, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House directs Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to underwrite immediately the full cost of repairs to the affected units of the Assisted Home Ownership Program subdivision known as Virginia Park, in St. John's, Newfoundland, which repairs are necessary because of faulty inspections and the use of faulty material.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

TRADE

INCENTIVES TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In order to overcome our trade deficit of $12.5 billion a year in fully manufactured products, the ones which produce jobs, we must improve our productivity. To do so, we must offer incentives which will persuade producers that they will be able to pay for the new plant, machinery and production systems they will have to buy in a reasonably short space of time and in this way make it as easy as possible for them to make the usually high expenditures involved.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the government allow, first, that all capital expenditures involved in improving productivity be written off in one year; and, second, that a plant be rewarded in the form of a generous cash bonus at the end of the year in direct proportion to its increase in productivity during the year.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FORTHCOMING DISMISSALS BY VIA RAIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That this House protests the action of VIA Rail in notifying a number of Canadian National employees that they will be dismissed when the CN's passenger service is taken over on December 29, contrary to the provisions of the collective agreement covering such employees, and that this House calls on the Minister of Transport to take steps to make sure that these dismissals do not take place.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST BUDGETARY CUTS NOT AFFECT LINGUISTIC TRAINING PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

S.O. 43

Given the fact that the federal government has decided to make cuts in its language teaching program and that these cuts will cause the dismissal of 600 teachers, and also given the fact that the federal government intends to give out contracts to private institutions and that this will probably cost even more to the taxpayers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House instruct the federal government to revise its budgetary cuts policy in the linguistic training program, a service which is essential to the public who is entitled to be served in both official languages of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST MORE IMPORTANCE GIVEN TO FRENCH NEWS SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the French news service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation does not have as many reporters as its English counterpart, thereby creating an imbalance at the expense of Francophone Canadians, even though the quality of news reporting is outstanding on the French network thanks to such reporters as Derome, Rivard, Racine and others who could do better still were it not for a shortage in personnel, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston):

That the minister in charge of the CBC (Mr. Roberts) make representations to this Crown corporation with a view to increasing the number of reporters and the period allocated to news reporting on the French network, so that more time may be devoted to reporting news of national interest concerning French-speaking Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve).]

[English]

FINANCE

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF STUDY "THE TAX SYSTEMS OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Noting that the study of the Department of Finance of the Canadian and United States tax systems is based upon such strange premises as that, for example, Canadian transfer payments are subtracted from the Canadian gross tax burden before the tax burden in Canada is compared with that in the United States and, further, that the study itself refers to five difficulties with the comparability of data and two difficulties with the definition of the words "tax burden," I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That the study entitled "The Tax Systems of Canada and the United States" be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that that committee may assess the intellectual integrity of the study and determine whether the study forms an appropriate basis upon which to develop future federal economic policies.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

URBAN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF AHOP DIFFICULTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the fact that mortgage defaults under the Assisted Home Ownership Program are now approximately 10 per cent, and in light of the fact that 35 per cent, or 53,000 AHOP units, remain vacant across Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House directs the minister of housing and urban affairs to recall the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs so that it can begin an investigation into this serious AHOP crisis.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENITENTIARIES

CONSTRUCTION POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

It was announced yesterday by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) that $280 million will be expended over a five-year period for prison construction. In view of the fact that a unanimous report by the parliamentary subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada lies in almost total neglect and that these proposed construction plans fly in the face of the subcommittee's recommendations, in view of the fact that in August, 1977, the then solicitor general had accepted and was implementing 53 of the subcommittee's recommendations, and in February, 1978, the next solicitor general announced he was implementing 37 recommendations and in the latest report the present Solicitor General tells us that he has implemented only 22 of these recommendations, a number of those deemed implemented being questionable, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

● (1412)

That a moratorium be placed on all prison construction until all 65 recommendations of the subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada are fully implemented.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

JUSTIFICATION FOR HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance: it touches on the general deterrents which the minister appears to be putting into our economic fibre that are discouraging economic prosperity in the country. I refer to the fact that presumably under the minister's guidance the Bank of Canada is now taking steps to increase further interest rates in Canada.

Would the minister indicate and try to justify to the House why he feels higher interest rates are warranted, bearing in mind that for every half-point he bumps up the rates in the country it is costing the average home owner, over the life of his mortgage, $5,000 and in the aggregate it is costing businessmen, for every half-point increase, $375 million. How does the minister justify that?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Bank of Canada policies are announced regularly when there are changes in interest rates. The Bank of Canada has not changed its rates lately, they are the same as before and the prime rate at Canadian banks is exactly the same as last month. As for the short term market fluctuations, the Bank of Canada has to take action from time to time, but that has no effect on interest rates for people usually borrowing on the market.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, surely the minister realizes it is not just a question of the Bank of Canada tampering with the bank rate: it has intervened in the sense of selling treasury bills with the deliberate purpose of raising short-term rates in the country. The government has stated publicly that the reason it is doing so is to somehow or other put our interest rate structure in better balance with U.S. interest rates.

Can the minister tell us, if we have a floating dollar as he has assured us we do, why he is still worried about the interest rate level domestically in Canada as compared with that in the United States?

Mr. Chrétien: I have said many times that the interventions of the bank are to make sure that fluctuations of the Canadian dollar take place in an orderly way. It is very important for Canadians to maintain a competitive level of interest rates with the United States if we are not to see an outflow of capital from Canada to the United States.

Mr. Stevens: Once again, the Minister of Finance has carefully avoided dealing with the heart of the problem, that is, the current account deficit. It is absolutely foolhardy to be adjusting our interest rate structure and to be borrowing further capital funds such as the minister is hinting at if we permit the current account deficit to continue. Would he indicate to the House what plans he has to correct the current account deficit which is accelerating, not contracting, year by year?

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member would realize, if he read the information that is public, that in 1978 we will have in Canada a record surplus in trade. In fact, in the first three quarters of the year the current account deficit was $200 million less than last year.

* * *

SMALL BUSINESS

TAX ON SMALL BUSINESS OPERATIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Small Business), arising from some counterproductive moves to which the government has been resorting recently.

In the last budget, the government cast a net so carelessly in order to remove certain groups of individuals from the small business tax rate that it caught, in that blundering net, tens of thousands of legitimate, one-man small business operations, including independent insurance and real estate brokers. I should like to ask the minister the definition which applies to those receiving the small business tax deduction, When will small businessmen learn of this definition? When does the government expect to introduce legislation dealing with this subject matter?

● (1417)

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should appreciate, since he has been in this House for four years, that this matter emanates from the budget and is directly the concern of the Minister of Finance who will introduce the detailed provisions in due course.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I have been here over six years and I hope to be here a little longer. I wonder why the small business ministry is in existence, when the Minister of State for Small Business never answers questions related to small business.

I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he could tell small business people, confused as a result of the announcement in the budget, the definition of "small business" for tax purposes. When will this legislation come before the House? There is utter confusion within the small business sector today as a result of the confusion of the government.

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when we make changes in the cabinet we have to draft the legislation consequent upon that change. On budget night we gave as much explanation as possible at the time. Within the next few days I hope to be able to present the legislation resulting from the budget I tabled less than a month ago.

[English]

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I have one very short supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: They do not take small business seriously.

Mr. Jelinek: I thank hon. members opposite. Surely when the minister made the announcement in the budget he must have been aware of those within the small business sector who would be included in the tax deduction. Will he tell the House and small businessmen from coast to coast who those small businessmen are?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in reply to a question by one of my colleagues the other day in the House I said that those who are bona fide businessmen in Canada will not be affected. We do not want the low rate abused by people who are not businessmen but are really professionals or people who are not really in business. I am attempting to make sure that the low rate applies to small businessmen and not other people who want to use that rate.

I think every Canadian citizen should understand that if changes are not made once in a while there will be a lot of confusion and the benefit of the low rate for businesses will be lost. I want to protect businessmen; that is why I am moving. I want to clarify the act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

PENITENTIARIES

CONSTRUCTION POLICY—REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General: it concerns the report which emanated from his office yesterday indicating that he is embarking upon a $280 million prison construction project over five years. That program flies in the face of recommendation No. 50 of the unanimous report of the parliamentary subcommittee on prisons.

Why has the minister decided to build larger and, apparently, more prisons, in view of the report of that subcommittee? Also, can he advise why, if the government's projection shows sufficient bed space within the present system, he is embarking upon a construction project?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of launching into a new program; it is a revision of the ongoing program of which the hon. member is well aware. We have gone to larger institutions basically because the studies we have conducted indicate that the delivery of offender programs within the larger institutions is not negatively affected by the larger size. Because of the introduction of the living unit concept, with which the hon. member is very familiar, we are accommodating recommendation No. 50 of the subcommittee's report.

As well, I might indicate why we need new institutions. It is directly in order to accommodate one of the preferences of the hon. member, namely, that we should close down or change some of the large, fortress operations which we have had in the past. One of the consequences of the announced change will be the closing down of the British Columbia penitentiary.

● (1422)

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, one of the prisons the minister announced yesterday as a new medium-security prison in the Kamloops area also happens to be in the riding of the Minister of State for the Environment. I wonder whether the Solicitor General has decided that that particular area is appropriate in terms of its nearness to courts and nearness to population, or has he decided on that particular area because of its nearness to the constituency of the Minister of State for the Environment?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the Kamloops decision was made on the basis of the warm reception the community of Kamloops has given to the medium-security institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: That institution, as well, will meet a large number of the recommendations in the subcommittee's report, including common eating facilities and a more effective delivery of industrial programs. Again I would draw the attention of hon. members of this House to the fact that the hon. member for New Westminster was one of the first promoters of an enhanced industrial program within the Canadian penitentiary system. One of the reasons we are going to larger institutions is to provide more efficient industrial programs and to offer a wider variety of those programs to the inmates.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that very few of the recommendations of the subcommittee have been adopted. Not only is he not adopting them but he is abandoning the ones he said he would adopt in the first place. That has been the policy of this government.

My supplementary question is this. One of the great scandals in this country relates to the number of native people who are in our institutions. The justice and crime commission reported to the minister in October, 1977, at a cost of some $100,000, regarding what should be done about the problems associated with natives within these institutions. The minister has failed to respond to that report. In addition to that, he is phasing out—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, my question is, why is the minister phasing out one of the key positions, namely, the position of native co-ordinator, and why has he not responded to this report which contains some 85 recommendations?

Mr. Blais: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct this impression the hon. gentleman left both in his preamble, rather lengthy as it was, and in his motion under Standing Order 43, that in fact few of the recommendations of the subcommittee have been implemented. I would note that the hon. gentleman was unavoidably detained from meetings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs when we dealt with my statement about ten days ago. He was not there and therefore could not have reviewed the report I submitted at that time. Quite to the contrary, we have implemented 22 of those recommendations and 16 are very close to being implemented. In addition, most of the principles that are represented by the recommendations of the subcommittee have been recognized and are about to be implemented.

In terms of natives within the system, I fully sympathize with the hon. gentleman's position. I completely agree with him that this is one of the major difficulties within out system. This is perhaps one of the larger groups within our Canadian correctional institutions. Indeed, we are doing our utmost to correct that situation. With reference to the report the hon. gentleman has identified, I would be pleased to review the matter and discuss it with him in the near future.

* * *

[Translation]

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED DECREASE IN RECRUITING FRANCOPHONES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

Statistics dating from the end of 1977 show that the percentage of French-speaking university graduates recruited by the public service has reached its lowest level since 1970, that is 24.3 per cent, and that the percentage of CEGEP and college graduates is at its lowest level. Can the minister tell the House how he conciliates these figures with the statements by the chairman of the Public Service Commission that the level of participation of Francophones has been higher in the last few years?

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that there has, in fact, been a dramatic improvement. The figures cited by the hon. member were in the order of 24 per cent or 25 per cent. I think if he looks at the figures of a few years ago he will find they were in the teens, so in fact I think we have made very substantial progress in this regard.

[Translation]

BILINGUAL CHARACTER OF FEDERAL INSTITUTIONS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

According to statistics dating from the end of 1977, 52,000 positions in the public service are designated bilingual, in terms of real needs; 10,000 of these are filled by unilingual officials, the majority of whom benefit from an exemption to take language training course. In light of those figures, can the minister explain how it could have been said that the public service is now bilingual and if the whole bilingualism program of the public service was only a colossal joke at the time?

● (1427)

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is not a joke at all. Basically, the 10,000 positions to which the hon. member has referred, as I understand it, are held by people who have occupied them for some time, many of them prior to implementation of the policy and the bilingual designation of their posts. It is what one would term a grandfather clause situation where these people are protected in their position, but when the position becomes vacant the new person taking over will have to meet the criterion of having a capacity in both our official languages.

[Translation]

LAYING-OFF OF LINGUISTIC TRAINING PROGRAM STAFF—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, further to the answer the minister has just given me, I should like to put a supplementary.

As 600 staff members will be laid off in the language training school, its training capacity will be reduced to 1,600 students a year. Keeping in mind the 10,000 unilingual employees now holding bilingual jobs, that means the training school has work cut out for six years, in other words, until 1985, that is two years beyond the date set by the government. In light of this, how can the minister justify the laying-off of 600 members of the language training staff?

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my earlier reply, many of these people will not be developing a capacity in the second official language. They are there on a temporary basis and because of historical precedent are being allowed to continue to occupy the particular bilingual post. The intent is not that all of these people will become bilingual. As the hon. member has mentioned, several have been given an exemption and will occupy that post until they are transferred elsewhere or retire. However, their replacements will have to meet the criterion of having a capacity in both our official languages.

* * *

TRANSPORT

FOREST PRODUCTS TERMINAL AT SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Under a joint federal-provincial cost-sharing program, the Navy Island forest products terminal was built at the port of Saint John and some agency of the ministry decided that they should invite tenders for a terminal operator at that facility. Was the province of New Brunswick consulted, and did the move to hire a terminal operator have the approval of the provincial government before the National Harbours Board invited tenders for the position?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether there were consultations specifically before the invitation for tenders, but certainly there has been close contact with the province and with others in the process since then. I can say to the hon. member, also, that no decision has been taken so far with regard to the question, and I expect to see recommendations before any such decision is taken.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the facility was built for the forest products industry to ensure economic and convenient transportation of that product, and in view of the fact that the National Harbours Board is meeting in Saint John today, I take it that the minister has assured this House and the province of New Brunswick that no decision will be made until consultation has taken place with the province as to what is the proper decision and who should be the terminal operator according to their guidelines.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I believe that consultation has already taken place, which is what I said in my earlier answer, in relation to the whole question of operation. I am not sure that the province should be involved in the actual assessing of the final proposals because in the end that has to be our responsibility and I do not think the province would share in the responsibility of the ultimate decision.

• (1432)

I can assure the hon. member that the best interests of the port will be fully taken into account in the final decision.

* * *

SHIPPING

VESSELS IN SEAWAY—GRAIN STORAGE AT THUNDER BAY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport two questions. With regard to the closing of the Seaway on December 15, can the minister indicate to the House the number of foreign vessels still above Montreal and en route, and can he also indicate whether there is in position at Thunder Bay any additional on-board winter storage for grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the situation on the St. Lawrence at last reading looked favourable for the exiting of all vessels. There is a plan for loading on vessels for winter storage. The Wheat Board is attempting to continue the movement of grain into Thunder Bay to maximize winter storage aboard vessels so far as possible.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question. About a week ago, officials of the Wheat Board indicated there would be no additional grain in position at the Head of the Lakes for winter storage until today, December 13. Can the minister indicate whether grain is moving into Thunder Bay to be available for on-board winter storage now? To what extent has the delivery system been able to place grain at Thunder Bay for winter storage? How many tons are we talking about? Have they all the additional grain they should have or could have at the Lakehead?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to obtain the exact figures in tonnes. Obviously, the Wheat Board wanted to emphasize the movement of grain into vessels while still trying to make it through the Seaway before it closed, and then turn its attention to the total question of storage of grain in vessels. I will get the figures for the hon. member.

* * *

POST OFFICE

CONSULTATION WITH UNIONS PRIOR TO LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Because of the strong opposition of the major postal unions to the draft legislation to establish a Crown corporation to run the Post Office, particularly because of its failure to establish political independence and financial accountability, can the Postmaster General assure the House that there was further consultation with the union representatives before the revised bill was tabled the day before yesterday?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member is getting his information. At different reunions yesterday and the day before I met most of the union leaders who talked to me about the legislation. They seemed quite satisfied with it. We had many meetings with them. I can assure the hon. member that we already have meetings planned in order to explain to them and hear their opinions on the legislation. We have also planned meetings with postal users, mostly in Toronto and from the main cities across the country. We want to have the views of everyone before we discuss the bill, and that is what we are doing.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to know that the Postmaster General has agreed to meet with the unions and postal users to see that a special deal can be worked out. I presume he can confirm this and that specific steps are being taken so that when this legislation comes before the House he will have the views of the users, that is, the substantial postal users, the unions and, of course, his own officials.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: And Santa Claus.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that it was done in the past and, as usual, it will be done in the future.

* * *

FISHERIES

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON FISHING BOUNDARIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. The northeastern fishing grounds of Georges Bank, which I am sure the minister is aware is the fishing area for the Canadian scallop fleet and is part of the disputed area between United States and Canada in their boundary discussions, is at present showing some signs of overfishing. Tests have shown that scallop beds on the Bank are declining and the scallops are becoming smaller.

The United States scallop fleet operating out of New Bedford, Massachusetts, alone has added some 30 new ships to the fleet in the past few years, with 30 more on the drawing boards, while licences for the Canadian fleet have been frozen. What steps, if any, has the minister taken to consult with his counterpart in the United States with the hope of limiting further U.S. entry into this fishery at least until shellfish stocks are rebuilt and the boundary problem resolved?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not completely accept the arithmetic of the hon. member about the increased size of the United States fleet, although I know there has been some increase.

The fact is that in scallops, and at least two other stocks, we are not always in agreement with the United States authorities on conservation measures that are taken, and that is a complicating factor in any kind of joint management scheme which might come out of the negotiations. In fact, it is very clear that United States fishermen's groups have some difficulty in arriving at a consensus among themselves. In cases of lack of consensus on fishery management, it is usually the fish and the stocks that suffer. I think that is the case in this instance.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's reply I will send him a copy of the release issued by the National Marine Fisheries Services Northeast Centre in the United States so that he will be aware of the size of the fleet operating out of New Bedford.

My supplementary question to the minister is to inquire whether, in view of the importance of maintaining trading relations with our friends below the border, the Minister of Fisheries or possibly the Secretary of State for External Affairs could bring the House up to date on the status of the boundary discussions between Canada and the United States, not only on the east coast but on the west coast and in our northern areas, and inform us what progress, if any, has been made on these thorny problems.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is possible, in response to an oral question, to give the hon. member as thorough an answer as I should like. I would be glad to tell him about it privately or in any other forum. I can say, in a general way, that progress continues to be made. I think he is aware that Secretary of State Vance of the United States and I agreed that the negotiators would report to us by the end of the year indicating the progress made and any unresolved issues. That is particularly in relation to the east coast situation.

On the west coast, the situation is not as clear. I do not anticipate that we will have a fixed or definite solution by year end, but at that point we will address the west coast question to determine what steps ought to be taken from there.

* * *

[Translation]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RETURN TO CANADA OF FORMER FLQ MEMBERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Now that the suspects in the Cross kidnapping affair have come back to Canada, does the Prime Minister have any comments to make about the views expressed at a news conference by Quebec Premier Lévesque who was reported to have said that anyone with a fair sense of justice would take into account the eight years the Cossette-Trudels spent in exile if they are found guilty and condemned.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I can find the thread of the question again, I shall limit myself to saying it is a matter more of justice than politics. I believe we would all be well advised not to get involved in something that is now before the courts.

* * *

● (1442)

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VOTE ON INDEPENDENCE OF NAMIBIA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will preface it by saying that the minister has played a very important role in the effort to secure the independence of Namibia through a United Nations supervised vote.

In view of the doubtful legality and unrepresentative character of the vote conducted under the supervision of South Africa, will the minister tell the House whether this dubious vote is to be the basis of a constitutional assembly to fix a permanent regime in Namibia, or whether South Africa may be expected to recognize that the United Nations supervised vote must proceed if international approval and a genuine expression of the wishes of the people of Namibia is to be secured?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his usual courtesy in giving me notice of this question. I did look at the proclamation under which the internal elections were called by South Africa, and I believe the wording is worth quoting. It says:

The Administrator General—

That is, of Namibia, as appointed by South Africa.

—shall not be obliged to give effect to any request, recommendation, proposal or advice submitted or given by the assembly under subsection (2).

That is, I think, a most important clause. It means that South Africa is not required to take into account the outcome of the Namibian election in terms of proceeding on to the next step, which would be the establishment of a constituent assembly. Once the votes have been counted and the group elected within Namibia, it is our hope—and we have some reason to believe this, from conversations I have had with Mr. Pik Botha, the foreign minister of South Africa—that they will then be prepared to enter into very important discussions with the United Nations and will, in fact, be prepared to co-operate with the United Nations to ensure that legitimate elections take place. I choose the word "legitimate" advisedly because, in answer to the second part of the hon. member's question, in no way do we consider the elections of last week legitimate.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear what the minister has said on this matter. As soon as the final results of the vote come in, would the minister make a statement, on motions, to the House dealing with the question of Namibia, its importance to African stability and, indeed, to world stability and the steps he thinks could be taken to ensure that the independence of Namibia be granted with full approval of the community of nations and with the concurrence of the native peoples of Namibia?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be more than pleased to do that. If the House is not in session at that time because of the Christmas recess, I will certainly do it immediately thereafter. I can say, in the interim, that the outcome of the election will be assessed in terms of what I described a few moments ago, that is, the reaction of South Africa. And I can say to the House and the hon. member now that we will immediately urge the Secretary General to send Mr. Ahtisaari, a special representative, to South Africa as soon as possible—and I mean literally within days—to enter into discussions with the South African government as to the various procedures that will be required in order to set up elections and the UN supervision to which I have referred.

* * *

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

GUIDELINES FOR INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new Minister of State for Science and Technology. On June 1 of this year the minister announced the government's intention to produce guidelines for procurement policies aimed at strengthening research-intensive industries in Canada. When can we expect to see these guidelines?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, that work is under way. I will be pleased to check into the status of the work and give a report to the House.

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, also in the June announcement which was made in parliament the minister indicated the government's support for centres of excellence. This has received a large number of applications, including one in July from the province of New Brunswick involving our vital forest industry and the University of New Brunswick. When may we expect a decision on this matter?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right, there have been a number of submissions made—indeed, an exciting number of submissions with some very good prospects. Those are now being evaluated, as is another set of proposals with respect to innovation centres spotted across the country at university sites. I hope it will be possible early in the new year to make an announcement with respect to centres of excellence and innovation centres.

LOCATION OF CENTRES OF EXCELLENCE AND INNOVATION CENTRES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could tell the House where these centres of excellence and innovation centres will be located, and in addition to that, what mechanism has been established to determine the location of these proposed centres?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my previous answer, this work is going on right now within the Ministry of State for Science and Technology. Consultations are taking place under the jurisdiction of the Minister of State for Science and Technology with provinces and with universities. It would be premature for me to speculate at this moment as to where these centres will be located. I can tell the hon. member, as I told the previous speaker, that there are some very exciting prospects.

* * *

ENERGY

STATUS OF NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE PROJECT

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister in his capacity as minister responsible for the northern gas pipeline project.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He has disappeared.

Mr. Goodale: In his absence, I would direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the concern which has been expressed in the United States with respect to the possibility that current difficulties in Iran might jeopardize the American supply of petroleum from that country, and in view of the indication that was given recently by the Foothills company that it would be physically possible to complete one of the several legs of the northern gas pipeline by the fall of 1979 if that were necessary for North American security purposes, can the minister indicate whether concrete discussions have yet been held with American representatives to determine the necessity of an emergency reaction in this regard; and, if so, can the minister indicate the status of those discussions?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any detailed discussions about emergency procedures. There may have been some at the official level. In a more general sense, there were discussions between myself and the U.S. Secretary of Energy with respect to the whole question of the Iranian situation, its importance—it is, indeed, a matter of great concern to Canada—and the kind of steps we might take jointly to deal with it. One of the answers would be to progress with the whole refinery situation in eastern Canada. That matter is now under study in our two countries.

Similarly, there is an opportunity for emergency storage at certain eastern locations. It may be that natural gas can be used in a similar way. But I think much more work has to be done as far as Canada and the United States are concerned. It is clear that natural gas can be of great interest and benefit to Canada if we maximize the Canadian market and thus reduce our dependence on foreign oil.

* * *

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL REVERSE DECISION TO DEPORT SEWA SINGH CHINNA

Mr. Yuri Shymko (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and concerns the deportation by federal authorities of a certain Sewa Singh Chinna, an irreplaceable employee of the Kraven Knitting Limited, an important business in Stratford, Ontario. Since this will spell the closing of this business and since the minister heard representations on the matter about a month ago and promised to advise the House of a decision, I would like to know if a decision has been taken to authorize Mr. Chinna to stay in Canada and consequently save this business and avoid causing pain to families of more unemployed?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I have told Mr. Ken Kraven, the owner and operator of this particular knitting mill, that we will not permit this individual to come into Canada as a landed immigrant. He falls far short of the requirements for a landed immigrant.

The other problems were also in place, including the resignation of one of the operators at a particular plant. My officials in that area are working with Mr. Kraven and are providing, or are prepared to provide, the people to do the training and also to work in close co-operation with the company in the United States that supplies machinery, to see if we can find someone who can operate this particular machine. However, the individual named by the hon. member will not be permitted into Canada as a landed immigrant.

Mr. Shymko: Mr. Speaker, I think it points to the contradictions which exist in some of the policies of that particular ministry. Instead of deporting the famed war criminals from Poland, Stanislaw Radkiewicz—

● (1452)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question to ask?

Mr. Shymko: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Since the Kraven Knitting company has stated that it will close permanently on December 22, can the minister justify putting 50 employees of that company out of work, representing over $500,000 in salaries and more than $2 million in economic loss to that region? On the one hand, a program was recently launched under which potential immigrants—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East.

* * *

AGRICULTURE

PRICE AND SUPPLY OF TURKEYS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Although the minister sounds, and at times looks, like an old gobbler, I know his heart is in the right place. I know he wants to ensure that Canadians will be able to buy their turkeys this year at a reasonable price.

In light of the charge made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the turkey marketing board seriously underestimated the supply situation, and hence drove the price up, may I ask the hon. gentleman what steps he has taken to investigate that charge and what assurance he can give the House that there will be an adequate supply of turkeys on hand to ensure that Canadians can afford to buy them at a reasonable price this Christmas?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am sure the hon. member can read and write—pretty sure—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: In the local papers recently there have been tremendous advertisements for birds—turkeys, hen birds, toms, etc.—at different prices ranging from as low as 89 cents a pound, reasonably priced products. If he has read what the suppliers of these birds have been saying, he will know there will be an adequate supply for Christmas. Needless to say, we have carried out some inquiries in the department and our investigations have shown that the humble bird which is used for festive occasions such as Thanksgiving, Christmas, Easter, weddings and festivities like these is still a good buy, considering it is lower in price than a hot dog.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, speaking of humble birds, was the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. McGrath: —enunciating government policy when he stated that the turkey marketing board has seriously underestimated supply and when he claimed that this was due largely to the fact that the turkey marketing board had on it no consumer representation? If that is the case, can the minister assure the House that this situation will be remedied, or else will he clip the wings of his hon. friend, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is following his line of questioning more for devilment than for anything else. All he has to do is to look at that advertisement and see that these are prime, best-you-can-buy, turkeys. One of the directors of these stores is even a former chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, and the top grade is only $1.09 a pound. Other products which have no marketing boards connected with them have gone up much more in price than these highly nutritious birds which are almost 12½ per cent or 13 per cent protein, higher than nearly any other meat you can buy. They are a very good buy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

IMMIGRATION

CANADIAN COMMITMENT TO SOUTHEAST ASIAN REFUGEE FUND

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): My question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Mr. Speaker. The United Nations conference on refugee matters ended in Geneva yesterday. At that conference, during a discussion on Southeast Asian refugees, the western countries gave a commitment to provide an additional $10 million for those refugees as well as an undertaking that an additional number of refugees would be accepted.

I would like to ask the minister whether Canada made any commitment with respect to the $10 million and, further, whether Canada made a commitment to accept refugees in addition to the 600 from the Hai Hong, the 50 boat people per month or the 20 overland refugees per month.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Canada was a very active participant in the conference to which the hon. member referred. We did not go there with any intention to make any commitment, but we are endeavouring to determine how the matter might be resolved on a long term basis over a three or four-year period, rather than by some ad hoc method.

I have not yet received a report from our representative at the meeting other than a preliminary indication that the discussions were very productive. It seems there may be very adequate response to this problem. Officials of the government of Vietnam were also there and representations were made to them which might help facilitate family reunification not only in Canada but in other countries.

Mr. Epp: I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, since it is likely to come under his jurisdiction. One of the ongoing problems with respect to Southeast Asian refugees or, for that matter, any refugee movement is the fact that there are so few receiving countries, Canada being one of them. At the conference in Geneva a strong petition was put forward that more countries declare themselves willing to be refugee-receiving countries. Could the minister tell us what the response was? Were commitments made by countries now not receiving refugees, to do so? I ask this in relation specifically to Southeast Asian refugees.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer in specific terms for the conference itself. I have no doubt, although I have not seen a report to confirm this, that representations calling for more receiving countries were made. As for the reaction to the suggestion, there is as yet no formal report from the conference. Recently, during conversations at NATO with a number of countries, some of my colleagues and I urged that there be a widening of the number of receiving countries, and this suggestion was received quite well. In other words, I think there is a general awareness of the necessity for more countries to be forthcoming in this regard.

Without going into all the details, the difficulty lies in getting some kind of international agreement which would provide an ongoing basis upon which crises of this kind could be dealt with in an orderly fashion. As far as Canada is concerned, I think the most recent instance demonstrates the compassion we feel. We shall continue to do what we can and, as well, to urge other countries to do the same.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—REGISTRATION OF FIREARMS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice: it concerns the regulations which form part of the gun control law which will take effect on January 1. It seems that under those regulations people having guns repaired, as well as those buying new guns, will be forced to obtain a registration certificate. The regulations also provide that issuing officers will only be stationed in communities with populations of over 15,000. This would create a tremendous hardship in many parts of Canada. I would like the minister to check into these matters to make sure that this situation is rectified before the law comes into effect on January 1.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I take the representations the hon. member has made very seriously. I am aware of the difficulty that exists with respect to the repair of guns. It is not a question of having the guns registered; we are dealing with hunting guns which may be under repair and the requirement to obtain an arms acquisition certificate to re-acquire the gun once it has been repaired. This is a question which is currently receiving my close attention.

As for placing officers only in communities of 15,000 population or more, that is not the information that I have. However, I will certainly check into this matter and report back to the hon. gentleman.

* * *

SPORTS

STATUS QUO OF CANADA CUP HOCKEY COMPETITION

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Would the minister clarify to the House her position with respect to CAHA representation on the IIHF? Alan Eagleson and Hockey Canada both appear to feel that the Canada Cup is dead. What does the minister intend to do to ensure that this popular sporting event does take place?

• (1502)

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the entire matter hinges on a rather complicated pattern, and perhaps I should answer on the order paper but I will try to explain here. In June of this year the CAHA and Hockey Canada agreed that Hockey Canada would take over certain of the representations of international teams. There was one section of the agreement wherein if there was a junior team involved it was agreed that there would be an internal committee of Hockey Canada which would be controlled by the CAHA and which would represent Canada in junior team involvements. This was on June 26. On June 27, the next day, the agreement was signed by the CAHA and by Hockey Canada, and I was never given any indication by anyone in that operation that this was in any way a tentative agreement.

Four months later, on October 20 of this year, I was told by the CAHA that it disagreed with the agreement and with certain specific sections in it. Therefore, Mr. Eagleson has been waiting for us to honour the agreement which was made with the International Ice Hockey Federation regarding the 1979 and 1981 world championships, the 1979 and 1982

Canada Cup, the 1980 Olympic participation, and the 1981 world—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Regretfully, with the best of intentions, the answer although informative in nature is just a bit long for the question period. Perhaps the hon. member might have one short supplementary.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if, on behalf of Canada, she has considered allowing either Alan Eagleson, representing professional players in Canada, or that organization to exercise representation on the international hockey association so that we can participate in the Canada Cup and so that there will be some hope that it will continue in the future. It obviously will not if we play around with amateur hockey associations.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I have asked Hockey Canada to convene a meeting tomorrow or the next day at which Hockey Canada will undertake to find a means to resolve this problem. I expect the agreement signed last summer to be adopted, and if the CAHA finds it impossible to live with this, I expect it will find it impossible to live with Hockey Canada.

* * *

NATIONAL RESOURCES AND PUBLIC WORKS

REQUEST THAT HARE REPORT BE REFERRED TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise as a point of order the question of House business relating to the last session of parliament, if I can get the attention of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). The question arises out of the work done in the last session of parliament with respect to the referral of the Hare report on the disposal of nuclear waste to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. As the Deputy Prime Minister knows, there were a number of excellent hearings held with respect to that important question.

Since the termination of the last session and the work of that committee not being completed, some major proposals have come forward, one as late as today released by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited on the Canadian disposal program for the management of radioactive fuel wastes. In view of some of the conclusions in that report and some of the timetabling committing the government agency to the disposal of nuclear waste, I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister can give us some assurance that a reference of the Hare report plus other more recent documents can be made to the standing committee again in order that it can complete its work and make a full and final report to this House in this session of parliament.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in cases of this kind usually the initiative for the referral of a question like the one my hon. friend mentions is up to the minister responsible. I normally agree, unless there are strong reasons from the point of view of the operation of the committee system why a particular matter should not go ahead. So I believe that in a matter of this kind the question should be addressed to the appropriate minister.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have one further point with respect to this point of order. In view of the request in the last session by the committee to have that reference again so that it can complete its work, I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister would consult with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and any other appropriate officials so that that work may be completed. I am sure both ministers would want to have a full and final report from this parliamentary committee so that reports such as this may be examined fully. Otherwise, we may find government bodies making decisions for which there has been no parliamentary consideration or approval. Can we get some agreement that the minister might consult and make a reference very quickly in order that the committee can recommence its efforts?

Mr. Gillespie: We will consult.

* * *

[Translation]

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAVOIE—REQUEST FOR REVISION OF PROCEDURE DURING ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, this is the third time since I have been in the House of Commons that I rise on a question of privilege, and once again it has to do with the oral question period. Fairly often we see some colleagues on this side of the House get up regularly to ask questions of public interest, but we were recognized perhaps two or three times, Mr. Speaker, and I do not hold that against you. What happens in the meantime is that when they arrive in Quebec, for example, hon. members of the opposition say: You have 60 or 61 members and they never get up to speak in the House. We are willing to get up but if we are not recognized, we cannot say anything, Mr. Speaker. So I would suggest, with all due respect, that the leader of the government meet you, either alone or perhaps with a few hon. members, to try to come to an agreement on that matter because it seems that as hon. members, whether Liberal, Conservative, Social Credit or NDP members, we all have the same rights in the House. Then, it is normal to be able to ask questions. I am not saying that it is always the same hon. member who should ask questions. I have other colleagues, for example the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) who gets up nearly every day. There is also the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) and how many others who get up without being recognized, Mr. Speaker. I feel the problem should be settled once and for all in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, for example, so that we can also be recognized in the House. I think it is simple logic.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS AND STANDING ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

First report of Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders—Mr. Comtois

[Editor's Note: For text of the above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

[English]

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved that the third report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Monday, December 11, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that almost unanimous expression and wish on the part of hon. members opposite. I will not speak for too long on this motion. I am glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has rushed here from his arrival from Europe to listen to this debate.

Mr. Trudeau: I wouldn't miss you, Jed.

Mr. Baldwin: I know the Prime Minister is interested because I have a few documents to indicate that he and the government are alarmed at the extent to which there is abuse of regulatory power. At federal-provincial conferences the Prime Minister has shown that he is concerned about trying to restrict this abuse.

Mr. Trudeau: I just want to see your usual imagination at work, Jed.

Mr. Baldwin: My imagination certainly has led me to thank the Prime Minister for coming here. My imagination does not prevent me from saying that I hope he will support the motion, when it comes to a vote. In the meantime I will undertake to stay and listen to his speech, although I do so with some reluctance.

Mr. Trudeau: So do I.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, this motion indicates that there is unanimous support in the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments and the report deals particularly with the flagrant abuse of regulatory power by officials of the Department of Transport. On several occasions this committee has brought before the House reports in connection with our responsibility for examining the extent to which the power which this House and parliament gives to government, government officials and government agencies to act by order in council and regulation has been abused.

• (1512)

The extent of this can be shown by the fact that since our committee came into existence we have examined over 3,000 orders in council. Those are only orders in council which are not hidden, because a large number are not published. There are also directives and decrees which are not made public. It is fair to say that in the last three or four years there have been probably many thousand more than the 3,000 directives which I have mentioned affecting the people of this country, their lives, their property and their social problems, directives which have been prepared by bureaucrats, signed by ministers and have become the law of the land. Of those 3,000, we have said in respect of 1,200 cases that they should be challenged, objected to or queried. So when I say to the House that this is a considerable problem, Your Honour will be quite aware that I am not exaggerating.

The particular issue in question arose from an attempt by officials of the Department of Transport to deal with land adjacent to a number of airports in Canada. Those airports have been listed in the appropriate orders in council and cover St. Hubert, Calgary, Resolute Bay, Toronto international airport, Windsor, Sault Ste. Marie, Sarnia, Ottawa, North Bay, Hamilton, Kelowna, Sept- Îles and Charlo airports. It is an order in council by which the minister, through his regulations, is given the power to send his agents or contractors to an adjacent property to cut down articles of natural growth, trees or what have you, and have them hauled away or disposed of as he sees fit.

In the first instance, this is far outside the terms of the enabling section in the statute. The pertinent section of the statute is section 6(1)(j) of the Aeronautics Act, which provides that the governor in council may pass regulations dealing with such things as regulations restricting, regulating or prohibiting the doing of anything or the suffering of anything to be done on any such lands—that is, lands adjacent to an airport. That is a very reasonable power to be given, but it is far less than the tremendous power given here by some official in the form of an order in council put before the governor in council to sign. I doubt very much that the cabinet examines too closely some of the orders in council they do sign, having in mind what I have read about them. The officials are empowered to go on the land and remove these articles and commodities of natural growth.

This particular order in council is covered in clause 7 of the regulations gazetted in 1978. It reads:

> Where an owner or occupier referred to in section 6 permits an object of natural growth to exceed in elevation any of the surfaces set out . . . the minister may make a direction that any person may enter upon the land on which the object is growing and remove the excessive growth thereof.

If this parliament, which all too frequently is careless about the power it gives to the governor in council or to ministers to exercise authority by order in council, wishes that this be done, then let the government come to parliament and seek that power. Let us not leave it to some unknown, unnamed, faceless bureaucrat to make this particular regulation.

I suggest that in substance this authority may not be as much as some hon. members might feel it should be, but to me and to anyone who prizes parliamentary government in this country it seems we should stop and ask ourselves how far we are prepared to go to give authority to governments, to government departments and to government agencies to act by order in council without in any way examining the extent to which use is made of that power.

On several occasions our committee has made representations to the House, we have brought in reports to the House, but they have been ignored and neglected, and it is a matter of considerable importance that the Prime Minister, at the federal-provincial conference of February of this year, proposed that some steps should be taken to examine the growth of the regulatory power to see what should be done to curtail it.

In a letter of July of this year the Prime Minister wrote to the president of the Economic Council of Canada, Dr. Ostry, for whom I have considerable admiration, but in this case the letter was late, probably too little and too late. Dr. Ostry and her advisers only had between July and November of this year to make an interim report. The interim report went some distance along the road, but asking bureaucrats, who are probably members of the task force, or other bureaucrats in government to look at the problem of too much regulatory power is like asking rats to make the rat trap in which they will be forced to put themselves some time in the future. I am speaking figuratively, of course.

The Prime Minister is thoroughly familiar with rats, of course, and I do not feel that what I am saying is unknown to him in that respect. But I point out, Mr. Speaker, that if any body or any forum is going to exercise the care and scrutiny which there should be in respect of a matter of this kind, it is this House and this parliament. We have been careless and slovenly in the extent to which we have given away these powers and in our failure to ride herd on what happens to them after we have given them away. The Prime Minister recognized that, I think. He would make a great man in opposition. If he were in opposition, he would make a great rebel. When he is in power, of course, he believes in exercising all the authority on which he can lay his hands. When the devil is ill, the devil an angel would be; when the devil is well, the devil an angel is he. That is the way I think of the Prime Minister.

This is the situation we face. We have attempted to deal with it. Our committee, at the instance of my distinguished and learned colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), passed a motion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I am glad to hear that my opinion of my colleague is shared by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Railton: It has changed overnight.

Mr. Baldwin: I do not known what the hon. member did last night, but whatever he did, he was probably driven to it by the behaviour of hon. members opposite.

To come back to the subject, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton proposed a motion, which was unanimously accepted in committee by members on both sides of the House and from both houses. We are one of the committees which acted with unanimity and our reports are unanimous, so that is why we are getting some credibility for them. The hon. member's motion was to the effect that when bills are brought before the House which contain a clause of a regulatory nature, that enabling clause should be referred to the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments for study. Because our committee acts on a post mortem basis.

I think it is terribly important, when the House is being asked to give to the governor in council, to a minister or to an agency these important powers, that we should be entitled to ask why they want them, what they will do with those powers, what it will cost, who they will affect, and what will be their economic impact.

● (1522)

That is the text of the letter of the Prime Minister which was sent to the president of the Economic Council of Canada. Obviously he must feel the same way, and I hope he exercises what authority he still has among members of his own party in an attempt to pursuade them to adopt this particular motion.

I could continue for some length of time, but I do not want to delay the right hon. Prime Minister and other members of my party who wish to participate in the debate on this motion. I hope hon. members on both sides of the House will see the importance of this motion, in that it represents some attempt by the House to once more exercise control, to challenge and scrutinize the vast powers which we are persuaded to give government agencies.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to detain the House when we are eager for a very important matter of economic business. I am delighted the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) recognized the importance of the statutory instruments procedure once again in his remarks today. He did not translate that recognition into a tribute to the government for seeing to it that these procedures are in place in order to effect a thorough examination of our regulations.

Mr. Baldwin: John Turner brought that in.

Mr. Lang: This is a fact, and it is a tribute to the entire procedure. This regulation was made in a department which is within my area of responsibility. Perhaps I will ask the committee to consider hearing directly from the minister on another occasion, if the committee is moving to recommend, or comment against, a regulation. I say that kindly and in passing, without any great feeling of having missed an opportunity to appear before the committee.

The committee did not indicate that the regulation was ultra vires. It did not attempt to answer that legal question, and it did not indicate that it was necessarily a wrong thing to do. But the committee directed itself to the fact that it would be better, because of the extraordinary nature of the power, if it were done more directly by legislation rather than by regulation.

I have examined this particular question. In any case, it is not a power which is often needed or used. Perhaps a debate in parliament would have been desirable in relation to it. Therefore, I have no quarrel with the unanimous recommendation which the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments put before the House. I support the report and therefore I will vote for it if a vote is necessary in the circumstances.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly to the motion of concurrence in the report. I do so in order officially to apprise the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments of an order in council which was the subject of a question of privilege brought before the House last Friday. I am referring to order in council No. PC 1978-3243 of October 26, 1978 which was proclaimed in the Canada Gazette on November 8.

The reason it was the subject of a question of privilege before the House was that the order in council proclaimed on November 8 enacts or proclaims into law a clause of a bill which is still before the House, namely, clause 2 of Bill C-14. Mr. Speaker intervened during the course of the question of privilege and suggested that in the normal course of the work of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments this matter would come before it. Also Mr. Speaker suggested that the question of privilege could be disposed of by referring it to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments without prejudice to any question of privilege which may arise from it.

My reasons for participating in this motion are twofold. First, I should like to apprise the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments of the importance of dealing with this matter as soon as possible because Bill C-14 has not been disposed of. It has not had third reading; it is still before committee. Also, I do so because of the tremendous backlog of work facing the committee. According to the committee report, it has considered 3,047 regulations. It has objected to, queried and requested explanation, including matters raised by counsel prior to submission of an instrument to the committee with explanation attached, of 1,125 statutory instruments or regulations.

In the normal course of events, the committee would not deal with this particular regulation or statutory instrument, passed by cabinet in October and proclaimed in the Canada Gazette in November, for some time. It would be considerably after the House gave third reading to Bill C-14 and it passed the other place. That represents the quandary embodied in my intervention.

Before Bill C-14 is passed by parliament, the committee should rule as to whether government had the authority to enact that order in council which embodies the provisions of clause 2 of Bill C-14. If the government did not have that statutory authority, it is in contempt of the House and it would be the legitimate subject of a question of privilege. On the other hand, if the government had the statutory authority to enact the provisions of clause 2 of Bill C-14, then why did it bother to ask parliament to pass clause 2 or why did the government bother to include clause 2 in Bill C-14?

In conclusion, I congratulate the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and his co-chairman, Senator Forsey, on the excellent work which the committee has been doing as the watchdog of parliament's rights respecting legislation and the power or practice of the government to go beyond legislation all too often by enacting regulations flowing from legislation. I should like to apprise him, his co-chairman and the members of the committee of the urgency of giving consideration to order in council No. PC 1978-3243 passed on October 26. I say this because of its conflict with Bill C-14, and because it may very well put the government in contempt of parliament, which would be a legitimate subject of a question of privilege in the House.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I realize the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wants to begin. I do not want to hold him up because his journey has been a long and difficult one. I thank the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) for bringing this motion before the House. If the motion is adopted by the House, it would permit the House to depart from the usual practice of merely referring bills to standing committees, and provide a concurrent power to refer the regulatory aspect of the bill to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments to deal with the matter.

I was pleased with the acceptance of the motion by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). He suggested that it might be appropriate from time to time for ministers to appear before the committee respecting matters which fall under their jurisdiction when regulations made under statute are before the committee. I think that is quite appropriate and would be welcomed. We would welcome advice from time to time from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) in his capacity as Attorney General. I have often wondered whether, because the Minister of Justice has certain administrative responsibilities as far as the Government of Canada is concerned and to his colleagues in cabinet, he might stray into a conflict of interest situation or find himself at odds periodically because of his responsibilities as the Attorney General of Canada. Certainly if there was a separation of that department that would facilitate this kind of work, not only in respect of this committee but in respect of a host of other operations of committees of the House of Commons.

● (1532)

In closing, I want to commend to the Prime Minister the work of the joint chairmen of the committee, Senator Eugene Forsey and the hon. member for Peace River, who has already spoken. I want to speak particularly about the work of Senator Forsey and other senators of the committee who gave excellent service. I would hope that as time goes on the Prime Minister and the government House leader might want to temper their comments in respect of the Senate. The Senate is a very useful organization in terms of the calibre of work I have seen as a member of the committee. I know the Senate has followed the tradition which has existed in their finance committee in dealing with expenditures of the government. They have done an excellent job and have followed up that tradition in this particular committee. I hope the House will see fit to concur in this report.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I too want briefly to enter the debate on this particular motion and to join with those who have already spoken in support of the proposition we have before us; that is to say, putting into place a procedure which I think will very much improve the effectiveness of the operations of the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. That committee is doing yeoman service not only on behalf of members of this House but on behalf of the people of Canada, looking as it does at the incredible number of regulations that we see in government today and that affect very seriously the lives of people across the country.

I could not help but note that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in his interjection referred to the fact that this government has introduced a provision in law which allows for the establishment of this committee and allows the committee to look at regulations from time to time. As I recall, this was brought forward on a motion by Mr. John Turner, who is known to the Prime Minister, I think, when he was minister of justice.

I want also to point out the fact that while this move on the part of the government was extremely worth-while, and we in fact want to give credit where credit is due, we do go through a process of evolution in the considerations of this committee, learning from our experience in dealing with various regulations, statutory instruments and a variety of orders in council.

My hon. friend from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has pointed out an example of the kind of consideration we might now give in respect of legislation before the House. This is a matter of very considerable importance when there appears on the face of it to be conflict between a regulation which in fact has been passed or proclaimed by order in council and a section of a bill being considered by a standing committee of this House.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

I simply want to say that in my estimation we should try to broaden the operations of this committee in the interests of the people we represent, because from time to time there are occasions when it is drawn to our attention as members of parliament that there are regulations in place, or potentialities in terms of legislation, which would have serious consequences in the form of regulatory control on the lives of the people of this country. Sometimes I have felt we have been somewhat constrained within the committee in dealing with these particular matters until they came up in a post mortem sense, as referred to by the hon. member for Peace River.

I want to give my full support and endorsation to that which has been said by those who have spoken already. This is another step in the attempt to come to terms with the ever-growing government by regulation with which we are faced these days. I hope the report will receive unanimous concurrence at this time.

Motion agreed to.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 34, 168, 194, 222, 224, 227, 269, 360, 361, 362, and 369.

[Text]

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL—PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 34—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1976-77, what contracts for professional services were let for studies, surveys and analyses into (a) present or future policies, programmes or information analysis and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Atlantic Development Council?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Atlantic Development Council is as follows: 1. (a) Thirteen contracts were let in 1976-77 for the study and review of various subjects of concern in revising the council's economic development strategy for the Atlantic region. Please refer to following table.

(b) Nil.

2.

Name	Nature of contract	Amount committed
Dr. O. M. Solandt	General advice on approach, planning, elements and technical context for strategy revision project	$10 200
Atlantic Provinces Economic Council	Agriculture	6 500

Name	Nature of contract	Amount committed
Mr. E. S. Fellows	Forestry	$ 4 500
Geological Services Ltd.	Mining	4 500
Mr. C. Karasek	Construction	3 500
Development Planning Associates Ltd.	Manufacturing	10 000
Development Planning Associates Ltd.	Tourism	2 000
Mr. John Brander	Transportation	2 500
Atlantic Provinces Economic Council	Debt and equity financing	5 000
Dr. Angus Bruneau	Prospects in high technology	5 000
Dr. A. W. H. Needler	Fisheries	3 480
Mr. C. Karasek	Maine corridor road	5 000
Atlantic Provinces Economic Council	Service industries	2 500

CIDA—TIED AID

Question No. 168—Mr. Roche:

1. Do the proceedings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for May 31, 1977 at p. 20A-2 contain the following statement from CIDA with respect to tied aid "Recently, an interdepartmental agreement was reached for a one-year trial period of limited untying to developing countries? It will take some months to establish appropriate administrative procedures so that this can be implemented without seriously affecting particular Canadian industries or communities."

2. Have the appropriate administrative procedures for proceeding with a one-year trial period of limited untying been established and (a) if so, on what date will the trial period begin or on what date did it begin (b) if not (i) what is causing the delay (ii) on what date will they be established?

3. What is meant by (a) "appropriate administrative procedures" (b) "limited untying" to developing countries?

4. Which are the particular Canadian (a) industries (b) communities that would be seriously affected by limited untying of aid to developing countries?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 171(ff).

2. Administrative procedures were drawn up in 1977 but submission to the minister for approval was postponed, largely in view of constraints imposed by the comprehensive review of CIDA's organizational structure being undertaken at that time. With the re-organization now underway, the question of untying to developing countries is being re-examined with a view to submission of proposals for ministerial approval.

3. (a) "Appropriate administrative procedures" mean that clear guidelines must be established for the issuance of tender calls, their evaluation and approval, for payments, tax exemptions, settlement of disputes, etc.

These procedures are necessary to ensure:

—optimal benefit to the recipient country;

—meaningful bidding opportunities for third country suppliers;

—an acceptable level of CIDA administrative burden while maintaining adequate control over the utilization of aid funds;

—avoidance of serious injury to particular Canadian industries which might result from loss of aid contracts.

(b) The international debate on untying revolves around the concept of phasing in more liberal measures on a gradual basis, moving from "partial" untying to developing countries as recognized by DAC to full or "reciprocal" untying between donors. The expression "limited" untying refers to untying only to those countries eligible to receive Canadian bilateral assistance.

4. When this matter was reviewed in 1977, the industries and activities which might be significantly affected by untying to developing countries were considered to be railway rolling stock, potash and parallel financed EDC-CIDA lines of credit.

MARITIME ENERGY CORPORATION

Question No. 194—Mr. Howie:

Did the government agree to assist the Maritime Energy Corporation with its operating expenses and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: Negotiations are not yet completed between the federal government and the provinces. Federal participation discussed has been related to capital and organization costs rather than to operating expenses.

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED—SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 222—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

What products does Eldorado Nuclear Limited plan to produce in the proposed uranium refinery in the Province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Eldorado Nuclear Limited reports as follows: The proposed Saskatchewan uranium refinery would be capable of producing uranium hexafluoride (UF_6) as well as intermediate and final uranium products both for Canadian and export markets. The actual product mix for the proposed plant will be subject to further market analysis and feasibility studies.

EXPORT OF URANIUM

Question No. 224—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the government contemplating, or has it under discussion, any changes in its policy with regard to the export of uranium?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: The statement on Canada's uranium policy made by the Hon. Donald S. Macdonald on September 5, 1974 has been working well and continues to apply so far as the export of uranium is concerned.

Order Paper Questions

URANIUM ENRICHMENT PLANTS

Question No. 227—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the government comtemplating, or has it under discussion, any changes in its policy with regard to the construction of uranium enrichment plants in Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: No.

FINANCE—LAWYERS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 269—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Department of Finance and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: None.

COST OF URANIUM

Question No. 360—Mr. Lawrence:

1. What is the current cost of one pound of (a) natural uranium fuel (b) milled uranium?

2. How much value is added to one pound of uranium during (a) refining (b) fuel fabrication?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows:

1. (a) and (b) Uranium is currently bought and sold as a mill concentrate containing in excess of 70 per cent uranium (85 per cent U_3O_8). Costs of producing this product vary considerably from producer to producer depending on such things as the nature of the deposit, the method of exploitation, the geographic location and the tax and royalty structure of the host province. Current prices of uranium are in the order of $130/kg Uranium ($50/lb U_3O_8) in Canadian dollars.

2. (a) and (b) Since Canadian uranium export policy requires that exports be in the most refined form possible, uranium which is destined for export is normally refined to uranium hexafluoride (UF_6). This step adds about $5.50 to $6.00/kg U to the value of the exported product. Uranium destined for the domestic market is first refined to purified ceramic-grade uranium dioxide (UO_2), increasing the value by about $6.00/kg U; fabrication of the UO_2 into CANDU fuel adds a further increment of some $40/kg U.

PERSONS EMPLOYED IN PROCESSING OF URANIUM

Question No. 361—Mr. Lawrence:

How many persons are employed in Canada for the purpose of (a) mining uranium (b) milling uranium (c) refining uranium (d) fabricating uranium fuel?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology):

[Mr. Gillespie.]

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: (a) and (b) 5,000 (estimated); (c) 500 (estimated); (d) 600 (estimated).

ATOMIC ENERGY—TRANSFER OF URANIUM FUEL TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 362—Mr. Lawrence:

Will AECL, any of its contractors or any other Canadian agency, producer, private firm, corporation, partnership or consortium be involved in the transfer of technology to help (a) South Korea (b) Argentina (c) Romania or any agency, utility or operator in any of the countries, with the mining, milling, refining or fabrication of natural uranium fuel?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows: (a) No. (b) and (c) Argentina and Romania have expressed the wish to acquire fuel fabrication technology to manufacture their own CANDU fuel. Both will have to negotiate such transfer with the Canadian fabricators with whom such technology resides.

URANIUM FUEL

Question No. 369—Mr. Lawrence:

How many pounds of uranium fuel is or will be consumed per year in (a) Pickering NGS A (b) Bruce NGS A (c) Douglas Point (d) Point Lepreau?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

		1977 Actual Mg of U	Future estimated at 80 per cent capacity factor Mg of U per year
(a)	Pickering A	295	268
(b)	Bruce A	222	370
(c)	Douglas Point	12.8	27
(d)	Point Lepreau	0	98

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 322 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 322 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Text]

ARMED FORCES—ADVERTISING

Question No. 322—Mr. Jones:

1. Does the Candian Armed Forces place any advertising in local newspapers or special events programmes, and if so, what are they?

2. What amount of money is spent on each of these "ads"?

3. Are these ads, from development to lay-out, completed by Armed Forces personnel or do outside private agencies do that work? Are there not sufficient numbers of personnel within the Armed Forces to complete whatever work of this type is necessary?

4. What is the total amount of monies spent on advertising of this sort? What is the purpose of advertising of this sort?

Return tabled.

* * *

[English]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

The House of Commons, having considered the proposed text of the Order in Council laid upon the table of the House on December 4, 1978, in relation to the establishment of a Ministry of State for Economic Development, prays that the making of the said order in council be approved.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before beginning my remarks on this important subject I just want to say a few preliminary words to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) thanking him for his suggestion that the previous subject be dealt with somewhat expeditiously in order that we get on with this debate. I appreciate his consideration.

I must in turn say that I had not been told that there would be this other matter brought up by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and I had made plans to leave the House at 4.10. This will not permit me to listen to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) or the leader of the NDP, and I apologize to them.

Since the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton referred to the past 12 hours, I would tell him it is not those hours that have been long, Mr. Speaker, it is the next nine hours that I fear. I may have to step out of the House before hearing the opposition's point of view, but my colleague the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) will stay throughout the debate and keep me very well informed.

● (1542)

We are talking about Canada's economic problems, and I know they have led to many questions about our future economic prospects. Even though we have created jobs at a record pace, unemployment is still too high; and even though we have managed to bring our domestic costs and prices under control, the lower value of the dollar and the rapid rise in prices for some food products continue to exert inflationary pressures.

Canadians are frustrated by the perception that a country as rich in human and natural resources as ours still is not realizing its economic potential. There is a strong sense that we must work together to strengthen the structure of industry in Canada, to develop our manufacturing, resource and service sectors in a manner that increases our international competitiveness and that allows the economic potential of each region to be realized.

Canadians have looked to the government for leadership and direction, and we have responded through a number of specific measures. It is important to recognize the principles that have guided our actions. We do not believe that governments alone can create a strong and healthy economy. Economic development and growth must be based on a competitive and dynamic private sector. This can be achieved only by the government and private sector acting together in ways that are mutually supportive.

The private sector must lead this process, but government support is necessary in three broad areas: first, to create a climate for growth to ensure that the general policies and programs of government support initiative, risk taking and innovation; second, to assist economic development directly where necessary and desired, to help the entrepreneur to take advantage of new opportunities to promote healthy, viable and dynamic regional economies to ease the burdens of adjustment for those individuals and regions where adjustment is required; and third, to assist in the provision of basic infrastructures that will enable the private sector to develop new initiatives and open up new markets.

[Translation]

The steps we took follow the principles I just mentioned and reinforce them. First of all, we are doing everything we can to ensure the recovery and the prosperity of the world economy. Trade being a vital necessity for Canada, we are taking an active part in international meetings to foster that world recovery and prevent the escalation of protectionism which could jeopardize our economic well-being. I participated in four summit conferences, and particularly in Bonn, as leaders of major industrialised countries, we managed to take firm and decisive steps that will help bring back stability, growth and confidence.

We are actively pursuing the multilateral trade negotiations. We have specific interests to protect and promote as Canadians and we will continue firmly to assert them. At the same time, it is in our interest to fight protectionist policies which will hurt all countries, but particularly Canada.

Second, we have taken and will continue to take steps to create in Canada a healthy economic climate, a climate of confidence favourable to business growth and prosperity. Our anti-inflation program helped our industry regain its competitiveness in Canada and on world markets. We are also clearly determined to ensure that wage settlements in the public sector do not threaten to reduce that competitiveness by moving faster than in the private sector. We are also determined to reduce the part the government takes in economic activity and government interference in private sector decisions. We will continue to examine our social programs to ensure they provide sufficient assistance to those in need without reducing the incentive to work and the spirit of entrepreneurship. And if it is possible to improve on those programs, we will not hesitate to take the necessary steps, as we did recently in the case of family allowance payments and unemployment insurance benefits.

Finally, we took a certain number of specific steps to help Canadian industry:

—We have offered help and incentives to small businesses. We have reduced considerably their paperwork and decided to lower the excise tax and the capital gains tax.

—Changes to corporate income tax have helped industry to face the distortion in real benefits caused by inflation.

—We have increased help to Canadian exports through the Export Development Corporation. And, in co-operation with the private sector, we are setting up a last-risk insurance formula guaranteed by the government.

—We have started rationalizing our programs of direct help to manufacturing and processing industries by establishing the business assistance program. Regional committees were created in all provinces and are directed by representatives of the private sector. Through that program, we have improved adaptation and innovation spirit in Canadian industry. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) also announced recently that the funds available will be doubled next year and that the maximum guaranteed loans to the private sector will rise from $350 million up to $1 billion.

—We have sharply increased our help to research and development in Canada. We hope that expenses for research and development will amount to 1.5 per cent of our gross national product within five years, particularly in the private sector, and we have offered major tax incentives to facilitate the pursuit of that objective. Even though it may vary from one industry to another and from one region to another, enterprises located in the maritimes can now get the equivalent of $1 in new research and development for every 15¢ to 20¢ they spend.

Research and development are necessary if we want to set up highly technical industries which will be able to compete on the international level in the 80's. However, research and development alone are not always enough. This is why the government took some action recently to provide direct assistance on the hand to the aerospatial industry to help develop the Challenger which already has had an amazing success and, on the other hand, to the communications industry to promote in Canada the commercial development of communications satellite techniques. This is also why we implemented recently a $400 million program to promote the commercial development of new industries in the field of renewable energy resources. This is also why we shall continue to look for opportunities to break through and means to be successful in various major sectors.

In the context of the new economic development objectives set at the end of last summer, we have announced new expenditures of approximately $450 million for next year. These funds will be used to support the achievement of our industrial development objectives, which include job creation, further training for Canadian workers, naval construction and repairs, as well as the establishment of an infrastructure to promote our raw material industries and our tourist industry.

Finally, in the last budget we announced important measures which will truly help us contain domestic costs after wage and price controls are phased out. At the same time, they will provide a more direct stimulus to economic growth by promoting investment and increasing the purchasing power of Canadians.

All of this has started to bring about some results. The number of jobs has gone up significantly since 381,000 new jobs were created between November, 1977, and November, 1978, including 123,000 in the manufacturing sector. Our trade balance is good and still improving. The use of our manufacturing capacity has expanded during the first half of this year and has now reached the usual level. Confidence is increasing.

• (1552)

Last February, the premiers endorsed the general principles of industrial and economic development I already mentioned. But we went further together. We developed a sophisticated consultation and review mechanism involving businesses as well as unions and governments. Working groups have been established to evaluate the present situation and the future prospects for 21 different manufacturing sectors as well as tourism and construction. Those working groups have met with some 350 representatives from Canadian enterprises and more than 50 authorized union representatives, most of them presidents of affiliated unions. People from universities and the public service were also involved in that study. All those groups have produced reports and made a total of 850 recommendations on concrete measures.

All those reports have been submitted to the public and to a steering committee composed of five representatives from unions, five from businesses and one from the universities. The report of that steering committee was published last October 23. It includes a summary of sectorial reports and makes a number of specific recommendations.

The government committed itself to respond to that review of various industrial sectors and to give it a new thrust. A first series of response to the steering committee report has just been published. The premiers met two weeks ago to study the progress made and they have agreed that all governments should work very seriously in that respect. We also agreed on the success of consultations and the need to further them in a way acceptable to all parties concerned. However, I wish to express today my congratulations and thanks to all people who have been involved in those consultations. They have been of enormous service to the country, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

It is time, Mr. Speaker, to take the next step. We need to continue and strengthen the process that most recently resulted in the second tier exercise, and to ensure by policy decision that needed action is taken: action to influence the development of industries and regional economies to the benefit of all Canadians; action to integrate programs and activities providing direct support to industry in order to increase effectiveness and minimize red tape; and action to foster co-operative relationships with respect to industrial development with the provinces, with business and labour and with other public and private organizations.

To lead and concert these actions, I have proposed the creation of a new Board of Economic Development Ministers.

Under the leadership of its president, that board will be charged with: defining an integrated federal approach to the provision of direct support to industry and economic development in Canada, including government procurement policy, both by industrial sector and by region; it will be charged with reviewing and co-ordinating proposals by departments prior to their submission to cabinet or Treasury Board; and, finally, it will be charged with developing mechanisms to improve and to integrate program delivery at the local level.

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan), who will sit as ex officio members of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, will provide that board and its president with essential counsel and support.

The other members of the board at the outset will be the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell), the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie), and the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott). Other ministers will sit in at meetings of the board that deal with matters affecting their responsibilities; the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), for example, would be amongst these.

I should emphasize that individual ministers will continue to be responsible for the administration of their departmental programs, but their efforts in this area will be led and concerted by the new Minister of State for Economic Development. In addition to his role as President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, that minister will: advise Treasury Board on the allocation of financial and other resources to programs that provide direct support to industry and economic development, including programs in the field of enterprise development, employment creation, regional expansion, resource industries and research and development; and he will lead and co-ordinate the efforts of the government to establish co-operative relationships with the provinces, business, labour and other groups to promote a healthy, dynamic and regionally balanced industrial sector.

The purpose of this reorganization is to focus and streamline our efforts in this area, to do more with what we have and to do it in a more co-ordinated and consistent way. To underline this, the budget and staff authority for the ministry of state will fall within the already announced budgetary and staff ceilings of the government, so that no new dollars or person-years will be required.

The economic measures we adopted in August are being implemented according to the principles we enunciated in October of 1976 in the white paper called "The Way Ahead". In that document we said:

> Canada's economic prospects in the 1980's are matched by few other industrialized countries. Canada's opportunities for continued real growth lie in its relative wealth of resources, its abundant food producing potential, its technology, and, of course, its highly skilled and educated population. They lie, not least, in Canadians' capacity for enterprise. But to take advantage of these opportunities, to ensure that our substantial potential is indeed attained, Canadians and their governments will have to meet a number of major challenges.

I am confident that the Board of Economic Development Ministers, under the leadership of its president, will make a major contribution to meeting these challenges and, with the co-operation of all Canadians, will help to lay the foundation for a decade of prosperity in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning I want to say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that I understand other engagements will take him out of the House shortly. I appreciate his publicly drawing attention to that as his reason for having to be absent during a portion of my remarks, those of the leader of the New Democratic Party and others who may want to take part in this debate.

I should say to him also that we welcome him back from wherever he has been, and certainly on behalf of everyone in this House I want to assure him of our continued interest in whatever it is he will be doing.

First of all, I want to deal with the general problem of bringing some order to the management of government in an age that is growing more and more complex and it becomes more and more difficult for governments to bring some kind of coherence and direction to their affairs. There is no question that there is a very serious management problem that faces any kind of government. That problem is likely to continue being serious as the growth of government continues and as demands upon government become more complex.

In my judgment—and I think it is important that this be raised at the time of the creation of yet another layer of government activities by this administration—that natural problem that is associated with growth and complexity has been very seriously aggravated in Canada by the way in which this particular government has approached organizational problems. It has approached them by throwing aside for all practical purposes the traditional central instruments of policy decision in a country like Canada. There has been a virtual destruction of the cabinet of Canada as a source of policy. I am not going to comment on the other evidence of destruction in this particular cabinet. That is there for all to see.

What is important in institutional terms is that with previous governments under previous prime ministers it was clear that the place where policy decisions were taken was the cabinet room. It was clear that a C. D. Howe, a Jimmy Gardiner and other ministers of that era, and, indeed, ministers of the era in which the Prime Minister himself first came to Ottawa during the days of the Pearson government, were clearly people at whose desk the buck stopped. They were people who were called upon to make final decisions, who had power to summon information and who had direct access to the ear of the prime minister, and thus were in a position to act on that information.

That era is finished as far as this government is concerned. It is finished because of a deliberate attempt to move away from cabinet for motives which may well have been valid, although the experience over the last decade has shown that they were very badly considered. It was decided to move away from cabinet in the name of co-ordination and efficiency and to vest the power to decide in agencies other than the elected ministers of a government responsible here on the floor of this House of Commons. This, of course, has been accompanied by an excessive concentration of power in the hands of appointed bureaucrats in the Privy Council office and in the Prime Minister's office .

● (1602)

I should say in passing that this has been quite a new development in Canadian history. There is nothing new at all about public servants, senior public servants in particular, making decisions; that has always been the case. They have always had a heavy influence on decision-making. Some of us in the elected body of government think it is too heavy, but it is in the nature of things that those who come up through the public service should exercise an important influence on policy decisions in fields in which they have detailed, day to day knowledge. What is new is that this Prime Minister, in the interests of efficiency, put aside his cabinet as the central source of advice, and did not turn to the traditional public service, turning instead to a new group of public servants, by and large people chosen by himself and chosen with a purpose, one of the criteria being their ability to fit into his particular view of how government should be organized and what the country was.

We consequently saw the power over decisions move away from cabinet, its traditional source, move away from traditional public servants, and instead become concentrated in the Privy Council office and in the Prime Minister's office . That is an example of one thing that was done. I want to return later to some of the implications of that development as it pertains to the Canadian parliamentary system.

Another factor that is seriously aggravating the difficulty of governing in this country is the difficulty of getting decisions. One difficulty in the way of coherent policy has been excessive insistence on secrecy by the government opposite. My colleagues and I, along with members of parliament from other parties in this House, have made the point before that this is probably the most secretive of governments in the western world. It is not only Canadians at large who do not know what is going on in the government which their tax money pays for; it must be immensely difficult for ministers of the Crown, and indeed for the Prime Minister, to have any certain sense of what is going on in a government where a habit of secrecy has grown up, where a habit of keeping things away from people has grown up. People should know those facts because once you begin to shut out the wider world, the inevitable effect is to shut out the smaller world, no matter whether that is the cabinet, the Privy Council or the Prime Minister's office. They have to have information if they are going to make decisions that will be intelligent in the context of a complex and changing country.

A third action by this government which has seriously aggravated the very difficult problem of organizing to deal effectively with national policy has been the insistent and consistent restriction of the House of Commons, and the restriction of the ability of the House of Commons to hold government accountable. It remains a matter of grave concern to me, sir, and to others who have an interest in the system of parliamentary democracy, to know that one of the first acts by this government in relation to parliament—it was certainly the first thing that happened in their first year of office in 1969—was the imposition by closure of changes in the rules of this House of Commons which took away the power to control spending. By removing that power to control spending, it removed the power of this parliament to scrutinize what was going on in government. This consequently removed from the ministers, from the public servants and from the appointed little elite in the Privy Council office and in the Prime Minister's office the constraint of knowing that what they might be doing was subject to challenge and question by members of parliament here in this House of Commons. That pattern was established very early in their regime.

By the way, sir, that was the first time in the history of British parliamentary tradition that closure was used to force a change in the rules of the House of Commons. This insistence on keeping parliament distant from its job, interfering with parliament's ability to control, to know what was going on and to hold government responsible, has been a part of the pattern and the approach of this government to parliament.

All of us speak most truly when we lose our tempers. When the Prime Minister lost his temper in this House some years ago and referred to members opposite as being mere nobodies when they were 50 yards from the House of Commons, he was expressing the view of parliament as an institution which has ever since informed this government that that is a view which is inconsistent with, and runs against, the very basic history and purpose of parliament from its earliest days. The refusal to let parliament play its role of holding the government responsible has seriously aggravated the already difficult problem of bringing coherence and direction to the management of government.

Along with others in this House I have often spoken on the subject of secrecy. We intend to open up the system by the introduction of a freedom of information bill along the lines proposed by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Recently on an allotted day we spoke about some of the changes we would want to see in parliamentary practice so as to restore to parliament the power to hold government responsible, the power for which parliament was created and the power which was taken away by this government as one of its very first acts.

Let me speak at a little more length about the role of cabinet traditionally in the Canadian parliamentary system, because there has not been much opportunity to do so in this House. I suppose there are two authorities to whom we can turn for testimony as to the change in the central role of cabinet. One source would be authors who have described the works of parliament and governments over the years in Canada, in Britain and in other systems which have the parliamentary tradition. From this particular source it will be found that the verdict is consistent, that it has always been the cabinet in which the power to decide was located and situated. But perhaps an even more eloquent expression of the change that has occurred in Canada under this government, a change that has involved making the cabinet of Canada insignificant, is offered by the practice of very many strong men who came to this House of Commons as members of parliament in the expectation that the tradition of cabinet as the place of power would continue, but who were forced to leave or who found themselves wanting to leave parliament when they found that the cabinet offices that they held had less influence than the particular portfolio had held a decade ago, or indeed that they as elected ministers of the Crown had less influence on public policy events than members of small, appointed elites of friends in the Privy Council office and the Prime Minister's office .

The real testimony concerning the gutting of the Canadian cabinet as a place of decision comes from people like the Hon. John Turner, the Hon. Donald Macdonald and the Hon. Gerard Pelletier. The people who came to serve in a system where cabinet had power and the ministers had power found instead that they were serving in a system in which it was possible for the Prime Minister and his advisers, for example, to call in seven economic experts and locate them in the Privy Council or in the Prime Minister's office so they could second-guess the minister of finance on national budgetary policy.

• (1612)

That is a precise symbol of what happened under this government in regard to cabinet over the years and the result has been the gutting of the cabinet, the removal from cabinet of the power to establish national policy which, in common sense, has to be the only system within which the democratic, responsibly elected government can function. To put this in perspective, it might be interesting, sir, to—

An hon. Member: I hope so!

Mr. Clark: One of the urban guerrillas is awake, I see.

Mr. Gillies: Socialist International!

Mr. Broadbent: Just two of them.

Mr. Clark: Their leader tells me that not many of the urban guerillas are awake. I cannot contest that. It would be interesting to set on the record some of the figures of growth in the Privy Council office during the period in which it has become the centre of power in Canada, when the cabinet was gutted of the influence it has traditionally held through our system. In 1968 the number of persons permanently employed in the Privy Council office was 63; in 1977 it was 469. The total budget for the Privy Council office is up from $6.4 million in 1968 to $22.2 million in 1977.

One result has been a policy-making process so centralized and so cumbersome that many of the best ministers in the government, people who knew the tradition under which ministers had the power to decide, have quit in frustration. They have done so rather than try to work through the maze of this intermediary agency which has been put in to replace the traditional system of cabinet government.

It is interesting to note that during the same period the budget of the Prime Minister's office increased from $767,000 in 1968 to $2.7 million in the current year. One of the results of this growth has been a continuing isolation of the Prime Minister not only from his cabinet colleagues but also, sadly, from the people whose problems he and his government are here to respond to and resolve.

There is no question, as I said at the beginning, that some of the problems of organization of a government in difficult times are complex in their nature. And there is no question that the structure presently in place for governing Canada at the federal government level is not working. Clearly there need to be changes made. It seems to me and to this party that there are some principles on which we should stand. One of those should be that ministers of the Crown, elected individuals sitting in and responsible to the House of Commons, should set policy; that responsibility for setting policy, for making the final decisions, should not be cast off to some little elite sitting in isolation in the Privy Council office or the Prime Minister's office, but that it should be the ministers who carry the can. Indeed, one of the shocking things about the last two or three years in the House of Commons has been the frequency with which ministers have been prepared to chuck off to public servants the responsibility which should have properly been residing with ministers. They do that because they have become accustomed to being people through whose offices the buck passes rather than being people in whose offices the buck stops.

Another thing which is obviously important here is the capacity in the capital of Canada not only to set policy but to co-ordinate policy, to make sure, if I might draw some hypothetical examples, that one level of government is not proposing a policy of decentralization at the same time as another level of government is entering into extensive lease-purchase arrangements to buy new space in communities which public servants are being asked to leave. There needs to be some kind of co-ordination to ensure that the left hand of government—the large, left hand—knows what the right hand of government is doing. Clearly, this needs to be another of the principles which should be followed when considering the restructuring of government in this country as a means of trying to ensure that responsible politicians carry the burden of decision and assure co-ordinated direction to national policy.

Normally I would not talk about the internal preoccupations of opposition parties, but since this is a matter of some concern to us today, and since the problems of opposition will be a matter of continuing concern to the hon. members across the floor as soon as an election is called, I think it might be appropriate for me to make reference in passing to the fact that we in opposition, trying to do our job of keeping on top of what government is doing, have had to face some of those problems of organization ourselves and we have certainly taken a long, hard look at what is going wrong with the system which is in place now.

It became clear to us earlier this year that one of the things that is lacking in the Government of Canada—and, frankly, it was also lacking in our structure—was a capacity to co-ordinate the initiatives and the interest of members of parliament, whether ministers of the Crown or critics of ministers of the Crown, who have specific responsibilities. There has to be some means of bringing these different ministers and spokesmen together. For that reason we in the official opposition established the practice of appointing policy co-ordinators, the practice of establishing six broad fields—economic policy, social policy, cultural policy, policy relating to transport and communications, food and resources, and policy relating to government operations.

I have designated a senior colleague in my caucus to serve as the co-ordinator, generally free of line responsibilities, so that he can draw together the activities of other spokesmen and put together a view of what was going on in relevant ministries and departments on the other side. This has worked reasonably well and, indeed, when I first heard the press release indicating the change which is the subject of our discussion today I thought that perhaps the government had borrowed yet another idea from us and was attempting to bring into its own structure that same process of co-ordination which we have pioneered here and which, by and large, has been a success in terms of the organization of our ability to meet our responsibilities. Without offence, I wish to say that this pertains only to parties in opposition which have enough members to organize, but I am sure the leader of the New Democratic Party will take at least an academic interest in what I have been saying.

An hon. Member: If he gets some of the Independents in with him then he'll be okay.

Mr. Clark: I understand he has established a co-ordinator responsible for policy on referenda but that, too, is his problem.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, when the government announced this new proposal, I thought they were borrowing the mechanism we had set in place. But as we look at what they are doing, we realize that they have not done so. They are adding here an extra layer with a co-ordinating responsibility which is not clear in the press release, not clear in the order in council and not clear, I regret to say, in the Prime Minister's remarks, in terms of its limits. It is not clear to us—and perhaps the new minister will enlighten us with some detail—exactly who is co-ordinated and when, exactly where his responsibilities start and stop, exactly what is the continuing power of, say, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chretien) in relation to a budget or, say, of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) who, I think, is the only one of the seriously victimized ministers present in the House today. Where do those regional economic expansion responsibilities start and where do they end? The minister has pointed to three ministers, and I want to come to that point because they are not exactly equals. As I read the terms of reference, some of them appear to have some powers of their own. Others, such as the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), seem to have been reduced to mere shadows of their former selves, such as their former selves were.

• (1622)

Mr. Lessard: That's not true; you will find that out.

Mr. Clark: The minister says that is not true and that we will find that out. The point is that we do not know. We have introduced before us now a piece of legislation setting up a new mechanism. It is not at all clear where the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion fits into this.

Mr. Lessard: I know. y

Mr. Clark: The Minister says he knows. If he knows, he is doing considerably better than his colleague, the Minister of Finance, who the other day under questioning in the House of Commons indicated that he did not know exactly where he sat in this new arrangement. However, what we have here is not a level of co-ordination; what we have here is another level of confusion, and my great fear is that in its interest in putting forward to the Canadian people a face of concern about economic questions, to this government, which is so preoccupied by cosmetic solutions and which has so often ignored real solutions, is putting forward something that looks like action but which in fact will mean confusion. That would be particularly unfortunate for a country facing the problems we are now facing in Canada.

Interestingly, of the departments which are rattling around loosely in this corral over which the minister opposite presides, no department has been replaced but several departments have been very significantly changed. In my judgment, and as I read the terms of reference, four of them have been very seriously downgraded, if the new minister has any powers at all. If he does not and if this is simply a cosmetic appointment, then there has been no change. However, if he does have any powers at all, then four existing ministries have been seriously downgraded, and a fifth, the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, has been virtually eliminated. It has virtually been gutted of all its powers.

One of the principal ministries which has been downgraded is industry, trade and commerce. As I read the responsibilities of the new minister, it seems to me that the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the temporary member for Crowfoot, is left with responsibility for little other than the metrication program. There are members on this side of the House who will savour with particular pleasure the idea that the man who before his conversion was the leading critic of the metrication program has now been reduced to having control over only that aspect of government.

Mr. Baldwin: He has been converted to metric.

Mr. Clark: My colleague, the hon. member for Peace River, suggests that the minister has been converted to metric. Let me deal for a moment with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, because it is quite clear that if the new minister's responsibilities mean anything at all, they absolutely gut the mandate of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. They take away the basic role of that department. That is quite explicit. Because in describing the central role of the new minister, the Prime Minister says that it will be a role of formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies as well as of leading and co-ordinating the efforts of the Government of Canada to establish co-operative relationships with the provinces, business and labour.

That description of duties strikes right at the heart of the whole operation of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce last February to co-ordinate the 23 sectoral task forces and to bring them together in a comprehensive package. That was the purpose of that program, which was the major program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce at the time, and that purpose has been taken away holus-bolus, completely. That program is not to be co-ordinated; it is to be run, as nearly as we can make out from these terms of reference, by the new minister. So we have the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce standing with one foot in a swimming pool and the other foot in the metric system, with nothing else to hold on to or to administer.

Another department which has been very significantly changed—and I am sorry that the minister responsible had to leave the House temporarily—is the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I say in passing that one of the failures we in this party most regret has been the failure of this government in relation to regional economic expansion. We remember, and will naturally ensure that the citizens of Atlantic Canada remember whenever an election is called, the undertaking by the Prime Minister to establish a kind of Marshall Plan for Atlantic Canada.

We remember his undertaking to solve the traditional problems of disparity. We know what has happened. We know that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been an insignificant department. It has been up against the giants in this government. Every initiative it has taken has been undercut by other policies whether those policies were in the field of tariffs, which have continued discrimination against the Atlantic region, in the field of tax policy, which has failed to recognize the particular needs of that region, or in the field of concepts like "user-pay", which has deeply undercut any sensible prospect of development in Atlantic Canada. Nonetheless, the shell of the department remains.

There is a very real question as to what responsibilities the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will have when the explicit mandate of the new super minister is to establish, and I quote:

> —the most appropriate means by which the Government of Canada may . . . have a beneficial influence on the development of industries and regional economies in Canada—

What in the world is the mandate of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, if that is the mandate of the new super minister? I see that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has now returned to the House, after my having described how his department has disappeared and has been taken over by his colleague, the new super minister.

The third department which is quite significantly downgraded, it seems to us, is the Department of Finance. The Minister of Finance, for reasons on which I am sure the new minister will elaborate, is only an ex officio member of this new board. It is not exactly clear what that means or how that distinguishes him from other ministers. Perhaps it means that he has the right to say a quiet "no", whereas the others are expected to snap to attention whenever the super minister gives an order. As has been suggested, perhaps some sort of liaison is to be kept open between the Minister of Finance and the super minister, who is really responsible for establishing economic policy in the country. However, there is no question at all that there has been a significant downgrading of the role, the power and the influence upon policy of the minister, the ministry and the Department of Finance in the country.

I note that one of the powers of the new minister is that he is free to ask advice of the Minister of Finance as long as—

Mr. Gillies: As long as he doesn't take it.

Mr. Clark: As I understand the provision here, the Minister of Finance is free to take actions in his field as minister, as long as they have no impact on economic development. It may well be that that is simply a description of what has been happening in Canada for the last two or three years, because there has been a minister of finance who has had singularly little positive impact upon economic development. This raises some very real questions as to what the continuing role of the Department of Finance and the Minister of Finance will be and whether any of their initiatives which would have an impact upon economic development in the country have to be cleared with some other minister. Just exactly what is the relationship here? Whatever it is, it is clear that the Minister of Finance and his department have been downgraded by the establishment of this new super ministry. The super minister's responsibility will be to do what all of us assumed the Department of Finance has been doing or has been responsible for doing.

● (1632)

I do not think it is clear exactly what the responsibilities of the new minister are in relation to the budget, but certainly on the off chance that this government's budget might have some positive impact on the economy, he would appear to have the obligation to vet that proposal in advance and he might very well have the power to veto proposals for a budget put forward by a minister of finance.

Once again the fourth ministry which, in our judgment, has been significantly downgraded is the Treasury Board. I say that with some regret because one of the causes of great difficulty with this government has been the degree to which the role of the Treasury Board has been diminished in recent years. There is now a provision in these terms of reference which empowers the new minister to advise the Treasury Board—it is not a question of "he may advise"; it is a question of "he shall advise", the Treasury Board—on the allocation of financial, personnel and other resources to federal programs that provide direct support to the development of economic enterprise in Canada.

It would seem to me that that term of reference takes a great deal of the raison d'être of the traditional purpose of the Treasury Board away from the President of the Treasury Board and vests it in the new minister. What is he to be left with if he has to take advice which "shall be given" by the new minister? Of course, he would be left with approving LIP grants and one or two other matters, as well as his pay, but most of the important responsibilities that have an impact on the economic development of the country have been taken away from the President of the Treasury Board and his department has been seriously downgraded.

The Department of Science and Technology, to which the Prime Minister made some reference in his remarks, has been virtually eliminated. Its shadow lingers on. It is attached to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but its power is passed quite clearly to the new super minister who has the authority to initiate and co-ordinate research and development studies, to initiate proposals for new R and D policies, programs and activities, and to evaluate existing and proposed policies, programs and activities to ensure consistency with federal development policies, and to recommend changes therein.

The question to me is: If you are going to take away the powers of the Minister of State for Science and Technology, why not wipe out the department and have those powers exist in only one place in the government, namely, the new super ministry, rather than continuing the fiction that we have a super minister with those powers as well as a Minister of State for Science and Technology with those powers? It reminds me of the situation of the environment where we have two ministers doing one job. It makes very little sense in that case as it makes very little sense in this case.

I must say in passing, since the Prime Minister spoke glowingly about the importance of research and development to the Canadian economic future and about the priorities that his party and his government attach to research and development, that I would like to restate our view that one of the most serious mistakes that has been made by this government—which means it was serious indeed, because they have made a number that were dangerous to this country—was their deliberate decision to buy technology abroad. We are paying for that daily in the leakage out of this country of innovators and researchers, of people whose initiative could help make Canada competitive in the world. They are leaving the country because it was the deliberate policy of the government in the name of research and development to drive them away.

There are a few other matters of curiosity in relation to the ambit of this new ministry of state. For example, while I see the Prime Minister has corrected himself, or left the door open to correction, in his remarks today, the Department of Agriculture is not one of the resource-related departments which will be co-ordinated by the super ministry, nor is the Department of Fisheries. In other words, to the Trudeau government agriculture is no longer a resource for Canada, nor is fisheries a resource for Canada. In a country like Canada you simply cannot have a national industrial policy designed to encourage the development of our farm resources without taking account of the tremendous potential for growth in the country in the fields of agriculture, fisheries and forestry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister indicated that these departments would be left outside at the outset. That suggests that at some later time they might be incorporated within the ambit of the new minister. My colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), asks what is going to be left. Perhaps we have stumbled on something here. Perhaps we should not vacate the field to the Allan Fotheringhams and the Marjorie Nichols. Perhaps, in fact, there has been a de facto resignation by the Prime Minister of Canada and what we are being asked to approve here today is the establishment of a new board which will concentrate all the powers of all the other departments under one minister, and then the Prime Minister can step aside and no one will notice he has gone. Perhaps that is what this is all about.

Mr. Andras: Better leave it to Fotheringham; he is much better.

Mr. Clark: We are faced with the question as to exactly what is left in the place of these formerly important ministers which have now had their status downgraded. What exactly are the powers of this new super minister? What can he initiate? What can his officials initiate? What can they stop? What is their power independent of other ministers in the cabinet? What exactly are they there for?

These are questions which I am sure the minister himself will try to answer, but I must say that on the record of this government, our view as to what they are trying to do with this new super ministry is quite simply this: They are trying to fool the Canadian people. They are trying to pretend there is now a new seriousness about economic policy and economic problems in the country, and they are putting together a structure which will look good and do very little.

We in this party, committed as we are to the view that there must be significant structural reforms if responsible members of the government and of parliament are to be able to influence national policy in this country, think we are not receiving that kind of proposal today. We think that what we are receiving today is simply a smokescreen, simply another gimmick by a government that has excelled in gimmicks; and we think there is no major new power that will be assigned to this minister. We think he will have no power to start important things, no power to stop important things, and that his job is simply to be the freshest in a round of soothing faces that the Government of Canada put forth to a community concerned about the failure of economic policy.

What has happened here is that late in its life—indeed, in the first year of its afterlife, its fifth year in office—this government has recognized that it will not be able to survive another election without an economic policy. That was the reason the election was delayed. That was the reason we had the sermon from on high on August 1. The government knew that it could no longer get away with ignoring fundamental economic problems in the country. But true to form, instead of responding to these problems, instead of going to their root, instead of bringing in budgets that might have stimulated growth in the country, instead of starting on a serious exercise of getting the provinces together and getting the other partners in the community together to work toward common economic goals, this government resorted to a series of gimmicks. They brought in a street fighter as Minister of Finance and that was going to solve everything. It has not.

● (1642)

Since the government was not able to change the Minister of Finance again, it came up with another gimmick which it hopes will persuade Canadians that the government is serious about economic development. The government can indicate that of course it is serious, that it has a new minister. But, there are serious questions as to which responsibilities of other ministers this minister will take, and what he will do with them. That is not his most basic problem. It is that he is supposed to co-ordinate economic policy, and the government has no economic policy to co-ordinate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have a change of face, a change of clothes, but not at all a change of direction. As questioning day after day by all parties has indicated, there has been no change in the willingness of the government to face the need to stimulate growth in the economy and to bring some order to economic affairs in the country. Instead of policy, we have a new structure and a new gimmick. In the judgment of my party, that is not good enough. The country needs a change in direction in national economic policy, and not simply a change in the face of the apologist. Unfortunately a change in the face of the apologist is all we are offered by the proposal before the House today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the new minister across the chamber is politely indicating that he will be right back. I appreciate his consideration, because my comments will deal with the subject we are supposed to be dealing with today, namely, economic planning. If ever we needed a demonstration of the problems with our economy, we received one today from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He came in from a flight from Paris and rambled on for approximately 20 minutes. His speech was an abbreviated version of the one which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) made some weeks ago. I wish he had taken a longer flight and skipped the entire debate.

Then we heard from the official opposition. I listened with great care for an indication whether they were for or against planning, but I did not hear one. It appears the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is in favour of "significant structural reform." If this debate was taking place in any other industrial country of the world, such as Norway, France or Japan, whether social democratic governments or not, it would have been laughed at. The hon. Leader of the Opposition is going to Japan. I hope when he returns that he will feel free to talk about economic planning. Japan is one society which talks about it and does it.

First I should like to deal with the problems in general and specific terms, and then I should like to deal with some workable solutions to those problems. We have had ten years of the Prime Minister. If we have ever had an admission of failure in terms of national economic policy, it was today when the Prime Minister indicated the need for the proposed planning mechanism. After ten years, the number of unemployed in Canada has tripled; inflation has risen by 100 per cent; income distribution between regions in Canada and individuals within regions has worsened; the rich have become relatively richer and the poor relatively poorer; and there is a problem which is central to our economy, that is, an increase in the degree of foreign ownership in the manufacturing sector, the core sector for an advanced economy. This has increased, not lessened, in the past ten years. These are the significant ten-year old developmental problems associated with the government.

At one point in his speech, the Prime Minister said that it is time to take the next step. He should have taken that step ten years ago. He should have made a commitment ten years ago to deal with economic planning in a manner which would have ameliorated the problems of income distribution, unemployment, inflation and foreign ownership in the manufacturing sector of our economy. In all of those categories, the situation has worsened in the past decade, not improved.

Not only is the need to create this new department an admission of failure of the long run during the past decade, but it is a significant failure also in the short run. This was recognized by the Minister of Finance who brought in three budgets. There is a lower growth rate in our economy than was promised as recently as last August, when the Prime Minister had a new vision after the summit meeting in Bonn. The three budgets have not improved the degree of economic performance in the economy. Monthly the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) witnesses the continuing imbalance in trade in manufacturing products between our country and others. This should be a central concern of economic policy.

There is a need for planning in an industrially advanced economy such as ours, and I will attempt to make some suggestions in this regard. Before doing so, I should like to refer to the tacit admission of the failure of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which in recent years has seen the problems of regional development worsening rather than improving. The economically advanced areas of the country have made more progress, while areas in Atlantic Canada and the province of Quebec have fallen behind.

There have been both short-run and long-run failures which have been acknowledged by the need, at long last, to create a new instrument for planning. The particular mechanism being proposed, is it good or bad? Surely that question should enter this debate at some point. It is relevant to consider whether what is being proposed will work in our economy. To put it euphemistically, the Minister of Finance, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) and the Prime Minister have conflicting views as to what this new entity is all about.

The government chose to name the former president of the treasury board the new President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. That significant phrase came right out of the corporate experience of the government. Initially the Prime Minister said that this new entity would deal with macro and micro economic policy. He made this distinction. The Minister of Finance was to deal with one, and the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers was to deal with the other. Perhaps it was the first time in Canadian history that a minister of finance indicated that he was not sure of the difference between micro and macro, that everyone believed that he was telling the truth. The Prime Minister gave one description. A number of ministers have interpreted the purpose of the board entirely differently from the Prime Minister. What will happen to the old cabinet committee on economic policy? Will it remain in existence? Will it remain unused, as has been the case in the past decade? Surely if we are talking about a planning board or instrument, some discussion is relevant concerning the priorities. Certainly this would be true in any industrially advanced country.

What will the board do? The new President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers indicated that he believed it would be a one-stop shopping service for business looking for government support.

Mr. Andras: The hon. member is taking that comment out of context.

Mr. Broadbent: The Department of Finance has been a one-stop shopping service for years for corporate handouts which have been unrelated to specific economic performance. He left every implication that he really did not see planning as being relevant at all. The implication he left with me, at least, was that all the government could do was get out of the private sector's way. In some areas that is entirely appropriate, but anyone should know, and I am sure the new president of the board does, that in a modern market economy that is scarcely enough, and there are a number of positive things that a government must do. Some leadership in directing the economy is required. He has downplayed the whole planning role and suggested it is essentially going to be a negative instrument to get out of the private sector's way.

● (1652)

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech went out of his way to say that in a market society planning was probably inappropriate. That statement was specifically in his speech and surely could not have been accidental. Again this is a point that would not be made in any other industrial country. No other industrial country would have the government party and the official opposition somehow saying that in the 1980s, nearly into the twenty-first century, it was inappropriate in a market economy to have planning. That boggles the mind, Mr. Speaker.

The government neglected in the terms of reference for this board to make any reference to the problems of Canadian women. Regional problems are referred to, quite appropriately. Problems in respect of income equality between individuals is referred to and that is entirely appropriate. But where is reference to that other great dimension of inequality that is still with us in this country in this century, and that is equality of the sexes? Is there any reference there at all? I suggest there is not. This is not merely an academic point.

The government of the United States, to its credit, has established affirmative action programs embodied in legislation which have become the central concern of that government in the United States in respect of economic areas for women. There is nothing, I repeat, nothing, in the mandate given to this new board which deals with that other central inequality in our country which surely should be a leading concern of politicians at every level.

Perhaps the most important structural point I want to make about this board, and I say this candidly, is that a similar mechanism was tried by the Labour party in Great Britain and it failed. Harold Wilson, when he was prime minister early in the 1960s, set up within the cabinet structure in England a planning mechanism which sounds almost identical to the one that has now been established by the Government of Canada. About four years later Mr. Wilson abolished it because it did not work.

Let me say something about why it did not work because it is central to my understanding of whether the government is really serious about what it is doing. In Great Britain it was abolished by Harold Wilson, according to George Brown, the former minister of the Crown who had responsibilities similar to those now taken on by the new president of the board here—

Mr. Gillies: You have read the Crossman diaries.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, I have read the Crossman diaries and some other information that goes with them. It was abolished because, according to what comes out in the Crossman diaries and what comes out of the published statements by George Brown, who was a minister, that minister was not given overriding authority in respect of economic policy. There was continual confrontation and conflict between the minister of finance, or the chancellor of the exchequer in the British system, and the man who was supposed to be responsible for planning.

If you look at these terms of reference, and if you look at the order in council that was passed to set up this new department, you will get no indication at all that there is a recognition of the problem that is to be faced by the Government of Canada. Quite obviously conflict remains. The responsibilities of the Minister of Finance have not been changed. The president of the board now has some over-all general policy for some kind of economic development, but when there is a conflict how is it to be resolved? Surely if the government were serious about economic planning it would have to give the new ministry precedence over the ministry of finance, and that should have been spelled out in the order in council setting up the department.

Economic planning should have an overriding priority, and if there is a conflict between the Ministry of Finance and the ministry of planning, planning should have the priority, particularly if that is to be the leading concern in the country. However, that is not the case here. I repeat, we are establishing a planning mechanism which even on paper has been demonstrated in the experience of the government of Great Britain to be a failure in practice.

This leads me to my conclusion, and that is that the Government of Canada is not any more serious about planning now than it has been in the past. The Minister of Finance has to be taken as indicating the true direction of the government when he said in his budget address that the Government of Canada really did not believe in planning in a market economy; and the new president of the board has to be taken seriously when he said that really what this new agency is going to do is provide a one-stop service to the private sector in relation to some kind of handouts or the removal of red tape. I would repeat that the removal of red tape is desirable in many aspects of the government's relationship with the private sector. I would also repeat that that cannot be the central purpose of the new planning board.

My colleagues and I see the creation of this new instrument as simply one more public relations gesture by a government that has recognized at long last that its unpopularity is due in the main to its failure to come to grips with the Canadian economy, to deal with regional inequalities, to deal with income inequalities between individuals and to deal with inequalities between the sexes. That is why this government is unpopular. Instead of coming to grips with these problems in a serious way by setting up a serious planning instrument, this government has taken over a program that failed in Great Britain, that was recognized as a failure and abandoned by that government. It is now attempting through public relations to convince the people of Canada before the next election that it takes economic problems seriously. We just do not believe that.

Let me briefly say something about why we think it is important to plan in an economy, particularly in the context of the problems we are facing in our land at this time. I want to indicate first of all that the planning we have in mind is not simply intervention in the economy. We have always had intervention. Let me say to my colleagues in the Tory party that I wish they would read some Canadian history. If they did they would recognize, for example, that unlike the United States we have always had more government intervention in our economy than they have, by a long shot. In fact, if this country had relied simply on market principles it would not have come into existence.

The first government of Sir John A. Macdonald recognized that something called "national policy" was necessary at one point. He recognized that when you have regions as disparate as Atlantic Canada, the west coast, the prairies and Ontario, with the tremendous market forces at bay to the south of us in the United States, government intervention would always be required in our economy at a much higher level than in the United States.

It is not merely intervention that is needed, because all too often that simply means something negative—buying up railways and creating the CPR at the expense of one generation, or bailing out the aircraft industry again at the expense of another generation. Planning as it has been demonstrated to exist in other countries of the world, and as we see it performing here, has one essential purpose, and that is to take steps now to create something better down the road. Economic planning is central to dealing with the great inequalities that exist between individuals, regions and sexes. It makes sense, particularly in a land like ours, to have a very sophisticated instrument of planning, and perhaps the most sophisticated in the world will be necessary to do the job that is required in our land.

● (1702)

We want further planning, not for its own sake, not to give some bureaucrat or academic the vicarious pleasure of seing an idea worked out, but because it is essentially a human device for human purposes. In this context Sweden, Belgium, Norway, France, Japan and West Germany have four or five-year economic plans with regular submissions to their parliaments. When a government is formed in one of those countries, one of the central tasks it has is to come before the legislature with the economic development plan for the next four or five years, which becomes the central matter for debate on both sides of the House. I wish the other national parties in this country would accept that idea and come before parliament with a plan on which we could have meaningful debate, instead of trivial, nitpicking matters such as whether some bureaucrat is taking another bureaucrat's function or whether a ministry is being removed which ought to be continued in operation. Such debate is most trivial.

What are some of the concrete problems facing us in 1978 and how do we propose to deal with them? The first issue is regional inequality. We believe that it is not right for central Canada, Alberta and British Columbia to see our fellow Canadians in Atlantic Canada and the eastern townships in Quebec dependent on some form of hand-out. It is an illusion to believe that the private sector will remove the difficulties which exist in these areas.

An hon. Member: That is what caused them.

Mr. Broadbent: Indeed, that is what caused them. Market forces if left on their own will always mean that areas such as Toronto, Montreal and Alberta will get richer. If we are going to come to grips with the problems in Atlantic Canada, then we have to do what other countries have done and move in with public capital and long range plans. Why is it inappropriate for the Government of Canada to borrow money for development when it is entirely appropriate for Bell Canada or other huge conglomerates to borrow capital and pay interest on it for the same purpose? Government development through public sector investment can be just as effective financially in the long run, and more so when we are dealing with regional inequality, as in the private sector.

There is in Cape Breton the potential for serious long-range development. Instead of having 30 per cent unemployment, or unemployment ad infinitum, and being dependent on hand-outs which they do not want, they could be financially independent. There are many people on that island who are trained in the steel industry and mining industry. Capital should be invested to build the most modern steel facility in the world for that area. I know that the market situation for steel in the world is tight at the moment, and it may mean for the next year or so that the operation would run at a loss. But I repeat a point I have made in this House before. General Motors does not plan for six months down the road; it plans for six years and, indeed, six decades down the road. It is time we started doing the same thing at the national level. The only way this can be done with federal funds, because Nova Scotia certainly does not have the funds. Such an investment would put that part of Cape Breton on a creative, economic basis on which it could start contributing to the rest of Canada. I am sure that Cape Bretoners would like that much more than the rest of us.

There is another province which has only been part of Canada since 1949 on the east coast and which has one of the last great fisheries in the world. While in Japan recently I was asked why it was that most of the fish caught off Newfoundland was caught by vessels owned by Norway, Poland, Russia and other countries. I had to say that for a variety of reasons the fisheries—

Mr. Breau: You don't know.

Mr. Broadbent: There is a member who has said that I don't know. I can tell him that I have spent some time studying the problem with the government of Newfoundland; and if the hon. member does not watch out his party will lose all their seats, because they have totally neglected this region. I would say to the hon. member who comes from that part of Canada—

Mr. Breau: New Brunswick.

Mr. Broadbent: I said "that part of Canada", if the hon. member would just listen. I did not say Newfoundland. I know very well that the hon. member is from New Brunswick.

Instead of providing hand-outs and unemployment insurance to Newfoundlanders, who do not want that, we could do for them what we did a few decades ago for our farmers on the prairies; we could set up a national marketing board like the Wheat Board, which goes around the world seeking markets for Canadian farmers on a collective basis because a single farmer cannot afford to pick up and travel around the world. Because we have had the Wheat Board and because we have a modern agricultural industry on the prairies, Canadian farmers, for all their problems—they like the rest of us are going through some economic difficulty—are among the richest in the world. Why can we not do that in Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Breau: We are.

Mr. Broadbent: Why can we not do this in Newfoundland—provide capital for inshore and offshore fisheries and fish processing plants, and then get out and hustle for the markets?

The hon. member has made some critical observations. I was in that part of the country recently and was told by the fishermen that instead of using the opportunities provided by an 85-cent dollar to expand our markets in Europe and the United States, they are simply taking in higher profits. That short-run perspective of the business sector is just the opposite to what the Japanese have done. The private sector in Japan has at least had the sense to take lower profits in the short run so that they would expand in the markets and grow in the future. We should be doing this kind of thing in Atlantic Canada with government initiative and imagination.

In recent months new investment has come to the west coast from Japan. They have begun to provide financial assistance to people in our fishing industry on the west coast because those people could not get that financial assistance from the Government of Canada, their own provincial government or the banks of Canada. Japanese investors have come in with better terms, and in exchange are tying that aid to long-range market commitments in Japan.

While it may be beneficial in the short run for fishermen to get a good price right now, they are being locked into long-range commitments to sell fish at a price down the road which may not be advantageous to Canadian fishermen. Another factor is that the Japanese are receiving the fish in bulk and having the processing done in Japan for re-export. Instead of having a developmental policy on our west coast which would not force our fishermen into such long-range commitments, and instead of having a developmental policy which would have the fish processing plants in Canada rather than Japan, we have allowed and we are allowing continuing inroads by a foreign country into a major sector involving Canadian resources.

• (1712)

This kind of imaginative use of federal capital which would take substantial amounts invested in the short run for long-range benefits is what is required. We did it once with the railways of this country. There were a lot of mistakes and give-aways and that ought not to be repeated. But there was a time when we had a long-range perspective in mind in building this country. It is time we had that perspective in terms of industrial development.

The second area of concern is the manufacturing industry. In that context the economic tragedy is of such proportions that one does not quite know where to begin. There are countries in Europe with much smaller populations than ours that have a durable and creative manufacturing base, independently owned. There are countries like Sweden with economic, geographical problems, thousands of miles in length, very diverse, wintery conditions and small markets that have managed to do about 1,000 per cent better than we have in developing their own manufacturing industry. The reality is that we have relied too long on the excuse of a small market in Canada and difficult geographical circumstances. These are just excuses for inaction.

The fundamental decision that was made in this regard in my lifetime, and the decision that has to be reversed, is one associated with the name C. D. Howe and with the Liberals of that time. Some two decades ago they decided that because of our small population this country ought to survive by selling off our resources and we would buy back finished products. It was thought we would have the net benefit because there would always be a shortage of resources and it was argued that other countries, particularly the United States, could produce goods at a lower cost because of their larger populations.

The chickens came home to roost, Mr. Speaker. We are discovering that third world countries such as Venezuela, Mexico, Indo-China and others have resources that we thought were unique to Canada. Instead of cornering the world market on nickel, copper and other minerals, we are facing competition from the third world for resources. As a result we have big lay-offs by companies like Inco in Thompson, in British Columbia and in dozens of other communities. We can no longer rely on selling off our resources as the key to prosperity even if it made sense, and for many reasons it does not.

Since the time of C. D. Howe the industry of western Europe has modernized and has become sophisticated. Japanese industry has also modernized and as the people of Quebec know very well, third world countries are producing shoes and textiles of a sophisticated type. We have lost out on both grounds.

The domestic manufacturing industry, which was set up simply to service Canadian markets and not to go after exports, has to compete with a modern Europe and modernized third world countries in manufacturing. The resources that we have wanted to export as a source of prosperity are having to meet competition from third world countries.

We have to deal with this problem on a long-range basis, Mr. Speaker, and I was hoping to see some commitment to that effect by the government. We have to deal with the problem of foreign ownership. It is not a matter of blaming the United States or Germany or The Netherlands for investment; it is a matter of recognizing who is to set our priorities. Is it to be people in other countries or are we to do it ourselves?

At this moment in Canada there are some 100 large companies which control more than 50 per cent of our manufacturing, mining and forestry industries. Of these, two-thirds are owned and controlled outside Canada. The result is that in 50 per cent of the business area there are companies that do not conduct their own research and development, companies that do not pursue exports because their parent firms in the United States or abroad do that. There are companies that do not innovate because, in the main, the parent firms do the innovation.

As long as we leave that structure intact, as long as we leave foreign control of our major manufacturing sector as the characteristic form of manufacturing in Canada, just so long will we remain in immense difficulty in regard to manufacturing.

The fundamental question for Canadians is: Who is running our country? Who is setting our priorities? Is it to be Gulf Oil, is it to be Phillips, is it to be Ford, is it to be IBM, or is it, for once, to be Canadians? Are we at long last to come to grips with this problem as other industrial countries have? I say on behalf of my colleagues that this kind of action is long overdue.

I should like to put on record some aspects of the economic development policy that we are advocating. First of all, we say that we in Canada should do as the Japanese did and as most industrial countries in western Europe have done, and as the United States did for most of the nineteenth century; we should ensure that most Canadian needs are met by Canadian production. We must restructure the Canadian economy to ensure that most Canadian consumer dollars are spent on goods and services produced in Canada.

Two or three ideas are central to the implementation of this proposal, not because they are dreamed up in some abstract way but because they have worked in other countries. We should realize where people are spending their money. It is known that 80 per cent to 85 per cent of Canadian disposable income is spent on housing, transportation and food. We should concentrate on these sectors. We should make sure we have the best housing industry in the world that could lead to exports in that field, and we should make sure that everything that goes into a house in this country is produced in this country.

In the transportation sector we should make sure that what goes into it is produced in Canada.

We should ensure that most of our food is produced in Canada. Agriculture associations meeting in this city in recent weeks and months have stated self-sufficiency in food as a Canadian goal. The New Democratic Party believes in that for the sake of security for Canadian farmers and as a Canadian economic objective. The more food we produce in Canada, the less we buy abroad and the fewer dollars we send out of the country. That makes good economic sense.

We should specialize in certain key sectors of industry. We should do what other industrialized countries have done and not spread all our economic investment over different sectors, but instead concentrate on the agricultural implements business, for example, and on food processing and equipment. Good economic arguments can be made for saying that they are key sectors in which Canadians already have some leadership in world terms which, if developed further, would lead to access to export markets, and this is very important.

● (1722)

Central to all of this has to be a major shift in resource policy. We as a people should be exporting steel products, not iron ore. We as a people should be exporting furniture and paper, not raw pulp and unprocessed paper. We should be exporting plastics and petro-chemical products, not unrefined gas and oil.

This is the central concern of my party for the development of Canada in the future. We must at long last recognize that Canadian resources ought to be developed by Canadians primarily for the benefit of Canadians. That has to be a central economic concern. We must stop exporting our fish to Japan and buying back the finished product. We must stop exporting so much lumber to the United States and buying back the finished product. We must at long last begin exporting finished goods and not raw resources.

There are a variety of instruments to implement these objectives. In my remaining time I want to indicate how these goals could be achieved. The central reason that we have not done this before has nothing to do with our proximity to the United States or to geographic difficulties, or indeed with the cultural tensions we have experienced from time to time. It has everything to do with the lack of political will. That has been the central problem in this country.

There are a number of instruments we can use that have been developed by other countries which have worked well. One is tariffs. We must be very concerned now that we are moving from a high tariff country with no planning to a low tariff country with no planning. That seems to be the general drift of the GATT negotiations. In certain sectors we may have to create—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please, I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: I appreciate the consideration of other members and I will try to be brief. We must use our tariff policy, but not in a mindless way. In changing tariffs we must, as other countries have done, build in in certain sectors non-tariff barriers so that we can preserve certain sectors now, and indeed lay the foundation for broader and more long-range growth in those sectors in the future. We must not simply phase them out, which seems to be the current inclination of the government.

With respect to purchasing policy, Mr. Speaker, in the United States for years they have had a policy in which something like 30 per cent of the purchases of the federal government had to be from small businesses. That happens to make good economic sense. Unlike large firms, most small businessmen do indeed compete and innovate and create more jobs.

We could have a purchasing policy like that in Canada where there is a commitment on the part of the national government to buy, say, 30 per cent of all their requirements from small businesses. Small businesses are almost uniformly owned by Canadians. They are not owned and controlled outside our borders.

Another instrument is the use of planning agreements. Planning agreements have worked very well in Holland, Great Britain, France, Belgium, Sweden and Norway. In these countries a specific set of tax policies is negotiated with major firms over a five-year period. In this way the firms know where they stand and know that tax policy will not change from one year to the next. The private sector must be aware of that information. In return for specfic tax concessions, specific benefits would accrue in terms of creation of jobs, research and development and export commitments. Planning agreements are something that have worked well in other countries and ought to be duplicated here.

Another instrument we have advocated is the establishment of a Canadian investment fund. I could speak at great length about this, but I simply want to make the point that it has worked well in Sweden where a special tax is levied on large companies. If companies put money into this fund, they do not pay tax on that part of the revenue. The government then plans where that fund could be used best to stimulate new development, and then the private company from which the revenue was originally derived would ultimately receive a benefit. The important thing is that this could be an instrument of the government to make sure that development occurs in certain areas and in sectors that need it.

Second, in terms of the cyclical nature of the economy, in Sweden this method is used most effectively in stimulating the economy. The level of investment can be controlled in terms of timing as well.

Finally, as I said earlier, we say that certain key sectors which have a particular potential for export should be concentrated on for development. I repeat that planning is not something new. It is not something that did not work in other countries, and it is not a panacea. A commitment to planning now will not remove all our difficulties overnight.

In conclusion, planning in a modern economy has been undertaken in other countries and it has worked very well. On behalf of my colleagues in this House I say that it is time we planned. It is time that we made our decisions. It is time we shaped our future. It is time that Canadians controlled Canada.

● (1732)

[Translation]

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all say a few words on this motion we of the Social Credit Party of Canada consider very important. On December 4 last, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), tabled in the House of Commons a motion dealing with the establishment of a Ministry of State for Economic Development. That motion followed the creation of a super ministry of state to revive the Canadian economy. I think it is right to say, Mr. Speaker, that with this government our economy is being not constantly revived but re-re-revived. First of all, at the provincial level, then at the level of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and finally by the board for economic expansion.

You would think, Mr. Speaker, that they are now using a repeating rifle, particularly in the last few years, to try to revive the economy. And at what price, Mr. Speaker? That is precisely what is important for the average taxpayer because after all those revivals, those multiplications, those duplications of departments, John Q. Public always ends up paying the bill. What is odd, Mr. Speaker, is that at the same time the government decides to reduce its spending, it is trying hard to increase them by creating new departments, always to centralize more and throw the weight of its taxation and spending power on the provinces which cannot take it anymore. The government seems surprised to hear the cry of the provinces against the central government.

The motion introduced today, Mr. Speaker, is a perfect example of the dictatorial behaviour of this government. We would be in favour of it if the purpose of the creation of the super-ministry was first to eliminate economically-oriented federal departments which are just a duplication of provincial departments in the same formerly-provincial areas which should be returned to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. In this way, future departments would have to co-ordinate the efforts of provincial departments for a better performance at the national level.

But when we examine the formation of the Ministry of State for Economic Development we realize that that super-ministry will be a perfect instrument of centralization to further control natural resources and agriculture in every province which have been asking for the patriation of their jurisdictions in those areas.

We can thus see a duplication of departments in all sectors to the economy—forestry, mining, fisheries, regional economic expansion, energy in its various forms, science and technology, agriculture and food industry, and so on. A new department was created a few years ago, the Department of Amateur Sport. How is it that the government has so much money that it can—afford duplicating departments which already exists in the provinces? A little while ago I contacted the Minister of Amateur Sport in order to get a grant for our region, which this year will host a national curling match, so as to make this a success like in all other provinces. And every time I contacted this minister I received the same reply: no funds available for grants to regions or provinces.

The money was allocated to the Canadian Amateur Sport Federation. The government went to see the Amateur Sport Federation and distributed the money to the provinces. What it did, Mr. Speaker, was to appoint a minister to collect the money and send it to the federation just like it was done for many years. I believe we have reach a point where we may well wonder whether the Canadian government has too much money to do what it did in the past.

There is also the Department of Transport. For one year, I have been trying to come to an agreement with the minister on a matter which has been in suspense for seven years, that is the question of the Chibougamau airport. Neither me nor the elected representatives of the people concerned on the city council have succeeded. First of all, only one meeting was held with the minister under the pretext that the Quebec transport department did not want to co-operate. In Quebec city we were told that it was Ottawa who did not want to cooperate. No one wants to see us. However, when there was an election campaign, the predecessor of the minister came to my constituency and especially to that part of the area where the people are separated by hundreds of miles from northwestern Quebec and the Lac Saint-Jean area.

Mr. Speaker, why must the government always duplicate everything that this department does, even though it does a very good job in my opinion? Of course, the department could be given more responsibilities. The government prefers to establish other departments instead of taking that money and distributing it. Mr. Speaker, that is only one example of the efforts made by the government to control all sectors of provincial jurisdiction. In the name of national unity, the government is doing everything to divide our country even more.

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister is well aware that not a single province is willing to give up one of its fields of jurisdiction to the central government. Every day we can read in the newspapers in the western provinces and in Quebec that these provincial governments oppose the centralizing tendency of the federal government. We may seriously wonder whether the federal government does not consciously want to prevent economic development in Quebec. The Prime Minister seems to have both feet in Ontario and his head in Quebec. What will be the results? Obviously to try to consolidate his base in Ontario but by doing so he also risks losing his head in Quebec or vice versa. Mr. Speaker, we had too many bad experiences with the super-department of federal-provincial relations which was headed by the current Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), a department which was nothing more than a propaganda agency for the Liberal party of Canada against the Quebec government. Mr. Speaker, I will come back to that in a few moments.

We are afraid, Mr. Speaker, that this super-ministry will have the same effects as the Department of Federal-Provincial Relations, that is, first to increase the present crisis, the fight of some federal politicians against the Quebec government particularly and generally against the autonomy of the provinces, in order to lead to that federative dictature which the present government is hiding under the guise of renewed federalism. The Liberals are creating crisis ministries.

● (1742)

And I refer to the Liberals because I realize that the idea of the super-ministry was not the result of consultations with the various economic partners of our country but a result of the Quebec Liberal caucus held last August. And, in that respect, we can read in Le Devoir of November 25, and I quote:

Need we recall that, on the advice of its youngest members at its Mont-Gabriel meeting last August, the Quebec Liberal caucus had proposed the establishment of a super-ministry of economic affairs.

[Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve).]

To conclude, those are not the first emergency measures tabled in this House by the present government since 1968.

Let us remember, Mr. Speaker, the War Measures Act of 1970 which has yet to be justified. And what about the famous 1975 anti-inflation measures about which Mr. Paul Weiler, Chairman of the British Columbia Labour Relations Board said in the periodic Policy Analysis of last fall, and I quote:

One of the lessons we have learned from the experience of the Anti-Inflation Board is its incapacity to control prices and consequently the injustices caused to some workers.

So, according to the comments of that labour relations expert, those measures were not only inefficient but absolutely unfair. In January 1975, the Prime Minister established the Federal-Provincial Relations office. Far from demonstrating to the citizens of all provinces the advantages to stay together, that office directed by the present Minister of Justice, through its famous publications, tried only to demonstrate to Quebeckers the non-viability and the bad aspects of sovereignty in Quebec. Considering its promotional efforts, that office should have been called the office of the constitutional crisis.

After the budgetary cutbacks of last August, it is now the generalized state of crisis, a crisis which we fully owe to the Trudeau government that has been officialized under the name of the Board of Economic Development Ministers which is actually a department of economic crisis. Mr. Speaker, just like all other Canadians, Quebeckers are fed up with these war games. Canada needs competent and responsible individuals to implement serious programs aimed at economic recovery. Let the government discard such projects and stop increasing the cost of the federal government with its super ministries of crisis. The members of the Social Credit Party of Canada will then be pleased to give their support to this government once it understands for good as I said earlier that these are not crises which will solve the most serious problem presently afflicting Canada, namely the economic issue.

To conclude my remarks Mr. Speaker, in the name of all my colleagues, I think that rather then creating again a new ministry, the Prime Minister should seriously study the proposals put forth for so many years by the Social Credit Party of Canada which are first and foremost a guaranteed annual income which would remove all the serious problems we are now experiencing with unemployment insurance. The unemployment insurance recipients are no longer the only ones with problems because now the government itself is compelled to make as many cutbacks as possible to incite people and the recipients to stop cheating the system.

I hope the Prime Minister will do as he did in the past, because a number of positive suggestions have been made by the Social Credit Party of Canada, especially by our late leader, Mr. Réal Caouette, who led the government to realize how important it was to delve on the economic problem, as faced by middle income people, and the likes of which the newly established super-ministry of economic development is destined to solve.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to contribute to the debate stemming from the resolution tabled by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on December 4 on the establishment of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. I would firstly indicate that I support the motion as strongly as I can. Time has come in Canada to set up a process ensuring better co-ordination and cohesion in our economic development programs and policies.

I would like at this point to draw a distinction which apparently escaped the attention of a number of people who commented on the Prime Minister's announcement at the end of November last and his resolution tabled on December 4. I noted this afternoon the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby also made the same error. Apparently they do not see the difference between fiscal and monetary policies on the one hand, and policies concerning the development of the internal economy, the domestic economy of Canada. There is a difference. When the Leader of the Opposition criticizes the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will lose influence, he nearly implies the whole development issue can be left to fiscal, monetary and tax policy-making in general. This is wrong in my view. I give my wholehearted support to the establishment of this new board, especially since it is chaired by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Andras). He has been in cabinet for so long we do not always remember his constituency, but I think the former president of treasury board is the hon. member for Port Arthur. The minister has proved in the past can give practical meaning to government policy, and therefore ensure that all government programs better meet with the situation—at hand.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, today the Leader of the Opposition could really just have repeated one of the speeches he used to make in 1973 when he was his party's critic on matters having to do with government organization. He does not seem to have evolved very much since those days with regard to government organization. The Tories, and particularly their leader, criticize the fact that the Prime Minister and this government have given a greater role to the Privy Council office, to the Prime Minister's office and to the institution of cabinet.

The Leader of the Opposition says that ministers should have more personal power and that that would be better for Canada. However, giving more power to the Prime Minister's office and to the Privy Council office is not to reduce the influence of politicians. It is not to reduce the influence of parliamentarians and parliament. The Prime Minister is, after all, a member of parliament. We seem to forget that. He is accountable not only to parliament but also to his caucus and to a political party. He must make sure that in the management and the chairmanship of a large committee, which is cabinet, he has proper advice on a political basis in order to make sure that whatever the civil service is doing and whatever parliament is doing are proper and responsive to the political situation.

Both before and after becoming leader, the Leader of the Opposition has said that this process reduces the effect of parliamentarians. He does not understand how to lead a government or to fill the position of prime minister. I think that a prime minister must make sure that the elected part of government is competent and well advised as to what goes on in government. It has never offended me that the Prime Minister's office has been strengthened in the last ten years, because the Prime Minister is an elected person. He is accountable not only to parliament but also to his caucus and to his political party.

The Leader of the Opposition suggests that ministers should have more power. I jotted a few notes down as he was speaking. He did not say this, but it struck me that what he was really saying—

Mr. Paproski: You don't know; you were asleep.

Mr. Breau: —was that ministers are just an association of politicians.

Mr. Paproski: Don't misquote him.

Mr. Breau: I am not misquoting him. I am not even quoting him. I am interpreting the position he was taking. I felt that in his mind he was taking the position that ministers should be an association of politicians. To me his position was that ministers should meet over lunch once in a while—sometimes in Jasper after skiing—to let each other know what is going on in government.

That is the kind of government the Leader of the Opposition would lead. That is a backward view. That is a view of governments in the 1940s and 1950s when governments did not have much to do in society. The role of government then was merely to make sure that there was a Department of National Defence, a Department of Finance, a Department of National Revenue to collect taxes, a Treasury Board and a few other things. In those days parliament sat only a few months of the year. Governments did not have much to do. However, in our modern society things have changed, and I wish the Leader of the Opposition would come out with some better ideas than the ones he learned in school 20 or 25 years ago.

The Privy Council office, the cabinet and the Prime Minister's office should co-ordinate what goes on in government and make sure that things are put together. To me that is the proper way to run a government.

• (1752)

Again the Leader of the Opposition complained about the terrible thing that happened in 1969 when we took the control of spending away from parliament. I was here in 1969. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain was not here but he may have been an assistant somewhere. Spending control has not been taken away from parliament; parliament still votes on the estimates and on appropriations. If it wants to refuse appropriation, it just has to vote against it.

Apparently the Conservatives are not sufficiently competent or efficient to bring forward exactly what the weaknesses are, in their terms. They complain that it is the institution of parliament that is not good enough. What happened in 1969 was that we provided for a better system of examination of estimates. The opposition is complaining about having the control of spending taken away from the House, but what has been taken away from them in reality is their capacity to frustrate the work of the government by filibustering debate on the estimates, and that is what they are worried about. Now there is a more effective way of examining the estimates in committees than was possible in the House of Commons.

What is happening is that opposition members do not always come to committees because the members of the press gallery are not always there. Opposition members do not do their homework in committees, so they complain and say they would like to be able to come to the House and make speeches here and frustrate the work of the House.

An hon. Member: You are misleading the House.

Mr. Breau: There is better control of the spending of government now than there ever was before. What opposition members have lost is the capacity to frustrate the work of the government.

An hon. Member: Absolutely false.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not think the hon. member is trying deliberately to mislead the House, but I wish he would keep to the bill instead of trying to tell us how to run the committees and whether or not members appear in the committees. That has nothing to do with the bill before us at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that that is not a point of order.

Mr. Breau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I agree the hon. member did not have a point of order and he was wrong when he spoke about a bill. We are debating a resolution. I wish the hon. member had also told his leader that he should have spoken about the resolution instead of the phony things he spoke about which have nothing to do with the resolution before us.

The Leader of the Opposition said that DREE has been ineffective and has been undercut because other departments have done what DREE has been doing. What the government is doing by the establishment of the Economic Development Board, after eight or nine years of experience with DREE, at a time of very rapid economic growth in Canada, and now that we have serious adjustments to make, is to refine the means and the tools for the economic development of the country. This board will bring about better co-ordination and cohesion and will ensure that economic development programs of the federal government are more effective when we are not in a period of rapid growth, when we have to make serious economic adjustments, when we have to decide, because of the new economic context, what exactly will be the role of the government and what kind of society we want to organize. It becomes more important now to assure ourselves that the tools of the government are more efficient. This board does not reduce the influence of the other departments.

The role of the Minister of Finance is to deal with monetary matters, taxation matters and economic policy. The Leader of the Opposition does not know the difference between economic policy and economic development programs. There is a large difference between them. He said this afternoon that the country's economic policy will be impaired because we will have better means of making sure that economic development programs work better. Does he mean he would not have economic development programs and he would leave everything to macroeconomics? Does he wish us to believe that in the enunciation of a budget, which is one statement of economic policy, one can deal with all possible problems in terms of economic development programs? That is a complete fallacy; there is no way you can do that.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned the role of the Treasury Board. I hope that the new board will not be a board exactly like the Treasury Board which, by its very nature, must be a regressive institution because it must ensure that all programs and initiatives stay within a certain fiscal context. The job of the Treasury Board is to put on the brakes. The role of this economic board is one of a positive agent. It is to make sure that things are done, not like the Treasury Board which makes sure that things remain within the fiscal context which has been set by the economic policy. That is the basic difference between the two boards, and I am glad to see that the government makes that difference.

In Canada we have in one part of the country, in the west, great opportunities in terms of economic development, and in the east the economy lags. However, I would just like to point out that the challenge in both cases is exactly the same. When things go well, as they do in western Canada and in the north, when we have an opportunity to do things, the challenge is to ensure that the organization of society will be such that what you want will happen. In areas which need assistance, the challenge is there also. The challenge is the same whether there is too much development or not enough development. I am glad to see that at this time in our economic history we will have this kind of co-ordination in our economic programs at the federal level.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 14, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

• (1407)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INQUIRY INTO QUEBEC AIR CONTROLLER TRAINEES IN CORNWALL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Quebec air controller trainees have decided to boycott their training in Cornwall to protest against the discrimination of which they are the victims and that the minister responsible has deemed advisable to launch an inquiry into charges of discrimination against Francophone students, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the House unanimously appeal to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to table as soon as possible in the House the report on that inquiry to avoid a repetition of the sad story of the Gens de l'air du Québec.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[English]

AWARDS AND DECORATIONS

SUGGESTED AWARD FOR SIR WILLIAM STEPHENSON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in light of the failing health of that distinguished but retiring Canadian, Sir William Stephenson, otherwise known as "Intrepid", head of a special allied intelligence unit during the war, and his outstanding contribution to the success of the allied forces during the Second World War, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That this House support the move beginning to gather momentum to have Sir William Stephenson designated as a Companion of the Order of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will recognize that, in another form that is a motion which I have not consistently put to the House under this Standing Order.

* * *

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NDP FUND-RAISING ADVERTISING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that I, as well as many thousands of other innocent Canadians, have received, unsolicited, through the mails an appeal for a contribution to the NDP from one Terry Grier who states correctly that "Ed Broadbent needs help", and in view of the fact that the contribution is requested not for the purpose of winding up that party but to enable it to continue to spread noxious doctrines among the electorate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Leader of the NDP and Mr. Grier be awarded jointly the trash mailer of the year award for 1978 and that both also be awarded—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INDIAN BAND'S PARTICIPATION IN POLICY ON SCHOOLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the urgent and pressing necessity of this matter, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43.

In view of the continuous representation since October 27 by the band council of the Montreal Lake reserve, supported by resolutions, reaffirmed by a selection board comprised of the Department of Public Works, the Indian Affairs regional office, my representation as their member, a telex from the president of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians and a telex from the director of operations, Department of Indian Affairs, in spite of which a decision has not been rendered on the selection of an architect for an approved school, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes):

S.O. 43

The adjournment of the House for a debate on government policy whether or not Indians have been excluded from the consultation and decision-making policy involving Indian schools.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

AIR TRANSPORT

ADDITIONAL WESTERN ROUTES FOR CERTAIN AIRLINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the current lay-offs of qualified pilots by Transair Limited of Winnipeg, in light of the fact that Air Canada does not exercise its prerogative on the Winnipeg-Chicago run, for which it holds the rights, and considering the fact that Pacific Western Airlines and Transair have applied for several new western Canadian air routes which, if implemented, would alleviate the work slowdown and allow PWA and Transair to hire back all the pilots on lay-off, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the House direct the Minister of Transport to instruct the Canadian Transport Commission to allow Pacific Western Airlines and Transair additional western routes and the Chicago-Winnipeg run immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

TRADE

INTRODUCTION OF IMPORT QUOTAS ON LOW-WAGE COUNTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As imports from low-wage countries are taking away a steadily increasing share of the Canadian market from Canadian products, thus causing Canadian workers to be laid off in ever-increasing numbers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

[Mr. Korchinski.]

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to introduce import quotas, to be applied against imports from low-wage countries in order to retain the same high proportion of the Canadian market for Canadian producers as the United States and European Common Market do to protect their domestic producers.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced at this time for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

● (1412)

PENITENTIARIES

CANCELLING OF CONSTRUCTION OF PENITENTIARY AT SELKIRK, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the decision of the Government of Canada to cancel the building of a new maximum security prison in the town of Selkirk, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the Solicitor General table all studies and supporting documents which now validate the reversing of the definite decision made by his department in May of 1977 to "proceed immediately with the construction of a maximum security prison for Manitoba".

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

HEALTH CARE PROGRAMS FOR INDIAN COMMUNITIES

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the minister knows, or should know, the Indian and Inuit people of this country have health problems of a magnitude far greater than the general population of Canada.

How can the minister justify unilateral action which will affect adversely the health of Indians and Inuit in Canada and the delivery of health services to these people without consulting the Indian community? By way of example, I mention the 30 maritime Indian chiefs who are in Ottawa at the present time and with whom the minister has refused to meet despite repeated representations by myself and, in particular, by my Conservative colleagues from the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the last insinuation of the hon. member. I never received the two representations to which he referred. However, for the first time on Monday I received telexes from four Indian groups representing different interests in the country. They asked to meet with me today. Unfortunately, my agenda has been fully booked for a long time and I could not accommodate that request. It was unknown to me prior to Monday.

Two or three weeks ago I met at length with representatives of the National Indian Brotherhood, but I do not remember the exact date. The hon. member is wrong when he says there are changes in the health delivery system. There are no such changes. We continue to provide all the health care for which we are responsible. We are talking here only of uninsured health expenditures such as eyeglasses, dental expenditures and transportation.

Mr. Clark: And drugs.

Miss Bégin: I have answered the question often. I issued guidelines in the month of September because of expenditures which could not be justified by anyone.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the minister, let me re-emphasize this. As I interpret it, and other people who have read the guidelines, many people will be affected, such as those who are diabetics and those with heart problems. When one looks at factors such as infant mortality and life expectancy in the Indian and Inuit communities of Canada, one will realize that they are absolutely abnormal and beyond comprehension when compared to an average community. I would say to the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Holmes: Will the minister reconsider her position and meet with the maritime Indian chiefs who are present in Ottawa today? This is a problem which is reflected in Indian and Inuit communities across Canada. Will the minister do that?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, no changes in circumstances permit me to change the guidelines. I ensured that the appeal system was the simplest and fairest possible. I think that is very important. The guidelines assure to all Indians in need of assistance 50 per cent more than provincial assistance gives people on welfare in Canada.

• (1417)

Those are my guidelines. I cannot accept the concept of there being no guidelines because as a result costs will skyrocket. I take my responsibility seriously to define the rules of the game and ensure that they are fair for everybody.

Mr. Clark: Except for diabetics, those with heart trouble and those who happen to be Indian.

NUTRITION PROGRAM FOR NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As the minister knows, the nutrition survey study indicated that the Indian and Inuit people had severe nutritional problems not experienced by the vast majority of Canadians.

In view of that fact, how does the minister justify the unilateral discontinuance of noon-hour lunches to Indian children, which are essential as part of a nutritional program in many Indian communities in Canada, and yet approve a movement of the department to Hull which cost over $500,000, with an annual rent of $6 million? This move, which was opposed by the Indian community—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the comparison is a fair and equitable one. If the hon. member is seriously interested in the nutritional question, and I believe he is, the answer is not simply noon-hour lunches; the nutritional problem in the north largely relates to the over-all diet.

We have probably done more in the last two years in an attempt to get country food circulated through the communities than has ever been done before. That is, in large measure, the direction we would have to go in dealing with the nutritional problem.

INDIAN BANDS' PARTICIPATION IN POLICY ON SCHOOLS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact there was a meeting involving the Department of Indian Affairs, the Department of Public Works and Indians, at which an architect was to be selected and to which a unanimous recommendation has already gone forward, and the Minister of Public Works this morning told a delegation that he alone is the one who must make the decision, has there been any change in the policy which was announced in 1973 in which the then minister of Indian affairs stated that full participation would be accorded Indian bands in determining questions affecting Indian education?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, in my area of responsibility the policy of full consultation continues.

Mr. Korchinski: Will you, then, consult with the Minister of Public Works?

Oral Questions

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FUND TO COMBAT OCCUPATIONAL HAZARDS IN ASBESTOS INDUSTRY

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the minister knows, the federal government has already given doctors McDonald, Corbett and Gibbs $100,000 to look into the problem of occupational hazards in the asbestos industry.

Is the minister also aware of the fact that the privately financed Institute of Occupational and Environmental Health, of the Quebec Asbestos Mining Association, has given six times that amount of money to the same doctors to look into the same problem?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that but I will look into it.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the same minister whether or not there is a conflict of interest, in view of the fact that these doctors, particularly the doctors McDonald—a husband and wife team—have refused to divulge their findings to the public even though they were publicly financed in the amount of $100,000. Is there a conflict of interest, or not?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some time to look into the matter. I shall investigate fully and report to the House.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I find the minister's responses totally unacceptable. Obviously, she—

Miss Bégin: I was not aware.

Mr. Blackburn: The minister should have been aware. My supplementary is this: will the minister table in the House all the information, not only from the public inquiry but also any private information which this team of researchers—academics who find it beneath their dignity to divulge their information to the public—may have? Will she make all this information public, and not just that held by this private group of asbestos mining companies?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would have appreciated receiving notice of the hon. member's question, because it is a detailed question on one particular case. I do not understand why he prejudges the terms of the contract for which these people have received research money. I said I will look into it, and I will and report to the hon. member.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

• (1422)

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITMENT TO INCREASE DEFENCE BUDGET

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. During his recent visit to Brussels, was the minister able to reassure our NATO allies that Canada would fulfil the commitment made by the Prime Minister and the minister himself to increase the over-all defence budget of Canada by 3 per cent, in real terms, each year for five years?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Our NATO allies were pleased with the progress we are making: not as pleased as with some other countries, but in the main very pleased with the progress that has taken place in Canada's contribution to the alliance.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it that the minister believes we are going to fulfil our commitment of 3 per cent, in real terms, for the year. Last May, the minister's officials estimated that we would not quite be able to reach the 3 per cent figure. Since that time the Prime Minister has announced his reductions and the Department of National Defence has accepted a $150 million reduction although, granted, it is not all for this year. By what percentage, in real terms, is the budget going to increase according to NATO standards this year?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, it will be about 2.2 per cent for this year, and it will be somewhat less than that in the 1979-80 period when that reduction does take place.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SAFEGUARDS APPLIED ON SALE OF CANADIAN NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In answer to an opposition inquiry on November 16, the minister told the House that he would look into the safeguards treaty in respect of Argentina to find out if it was within the power of Canada to prohibit any more nuclear or uranium assistance or supplies to that country in the event it was going into the reprocessing cycle. The member of the opposition was quoting from a dispatch in the Latin American Review which indicated that Argentina was actually doing that.

Has the minister looked at the safeguards treaty, and could he tell the House whether we can now prohibit that type of assistance to Argentina in the event that they are doing this?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that I answered that question for the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. My first response was that there had been a denial that the quote attributed to the Argentinian spokesman was correct, as least that he was not a spokesman for the Argentinian government.

As for our rights under the safeguards treaty, I am speaking from memory and I would ask the hon. member to give me the opportunity to check it again: I think the answer is that our safeguards treaty does, in fact, give us authorization to cease shipments or cease co-operation in the event of the kind of development to which that particular story referred; but, once again, I am speaking from memory. I will look into it again and try to respond in more detail.

Mr. Lawrence: A supplementary question. Is the minister also aware of a story in the Washington Post under the byline of a gentleman by the name of Benjamin who has indicated that he has taped the actual conversation with Rear Admiral Madero who is spokesman for the Argentinian government on nuclear and uranium matters. He has very definitely indicated that Argentina is doing just exactly that. Mr. Benjamin is willing to make this tape available to Canadian embassy officials in Washington.

Is the minister aware of these developments, that the Argentinian authorities are doing this so they can stay ahead of Brazil in the arms race and, if so, what is the action of this government?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am aware, as I said in my first answer, that we have been assured that this is not a spokesman for the government. That is point No. 1.

The second point is that there was initially a claim that the admiral in question was being misquoted. Subsequent to that I heard reports along the lines the hon. member has just quoted. I have asked for further details on these to have them confirmed. When I get that information I will be in a better position to answer more definitively.

Speaking from memory, once again, I think what they are talking about is some kind of experimental arrangement. That may be where the distinction is in terms of the denials in Argentina and the understandings we have in this country. It is a very complicated matter and I will be glad to try to get a written response for the hon. member.

* * *

● (1427)

FINANCE

SALES TAX REBATE ON AUTOMOBILE INVENTORIES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The minister has received hundreds of letters and telegrams from automobile dealers across Canada. Would the minister advise if he has come to a decision on the request for a rebate of excise tax on the difference between 12 per cent and 9 per cent on automobile inventories that were in place at the time of the budget on November 16?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I appeared before the committee last week I said that it was impossible to refund those taxes for inventories. If we did that for the automobile dealers, we would have to do it for everybody. This would be very expensive in terms of the number of bureaucrats who would have to work on the procedure. At the same time, we would be losing $300 million of revenue and adding $300 million to the deficit—and the opposition are always complaining that we have too large a deficit.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Not everyone sees the situation the way he does. Will the minister agree to meet with the Federation of Automobile Dealers in the immediate future? The federation has had a request in to his office for several weeks. Will he agree to meet with them?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be pleased to meet them if we can arrange a meeting. I do not know what the usefulness will be, but if they insist, I can meet them.

* * *

PUBLIC SERVICE

TABLING OF STUDY ON OVERCLASSIFICATION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. My question deals with the overclassification study undertaken by the government with regard to the public service. The minister's predecessor, on at least three occasions, made a commitment to my hon. friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West, that this study would be tabled in the House and action arising from it would be indicated to the House. Can the minister tell us now if he is prepared to table this report?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the hon. member for Hamilton West that I would be tabling it late last week or early this week. Unfortunately, there have been a couple of complications. I hope to have it ready for tomorrow; if not, Monday.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, will the minister, at the time he tables the report, indicate to the House what action will flow from it? Will he indicate whether he is going to engage in red-circling dismissals or just what procedures will result from this study? Also, what opportunity will the House have to discuss it—in response to a statement on motions, by referral to the appropriate committee of the House, or through some other method if one can be found?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I am considering whether it will simply be a tabling of the report or, as the hon. member suggests, a statement on motions. I will make a decision later today or tomorrow.

Oral Questions

COST OF BOOKLET CIRCULATED TO EMPLOYEES

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Could he advise this House of the cost of the booklet being distributed by Treasury Board, entitled "Proposed Changes in the Public Service Staff Relations Act" and whether it is the intention of the government to permit the bargaining agents access to the same delivery system for reply to this booklet?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the cost of this publication was in the vicinity of 9 cents per copy, which we felt was a reasonable cost to be incurred for distributing it to members of the public service.

In so far as the latter part of the question is concerned, it is interesting that I was with my friend, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, when Bill C-28 was before the House and I was accused, as a member of the government, of having failed miserably in communicating our side of the issue to all public servants in Canada: they have heard a great deal about the union side and were very distressed that they had not heard a single word from their employer, the government. We felt it was very important that we put before them the position of the government, their employer, on this issue. We feel the cost of less than a dime per employee is not unreasonable.

* * *

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TRAIN SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as acting minister of transport.

A week ago Tuesday there was a meeting in Newfoundland about the Newfoundland railway. The House of Assembly has since passed a resolution, supported by all parties, that the railway should continue and be supported by the Government of Canada.

Could the minister tell us whether it is now the policy of the Government of Canada—as he said in a telex of last Tuesday, a week ago—that the government will provide direct payments to CN to cover clearly identifiable losses sustained by CN in carrying out their special responsibilities in Newfoundland in order to maintain effective rail service in Newfoundland and to avoid serious dislocation and lay-offs. Is that now government policy, and when will these arrangements come into effect?

● (1432)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not the acting minister of transport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wanted to be clear in what capacity the Secretary of State for External Affairs is answering the question. It would have to be in some capacity related to his responsibility as Secretary of State for External Affairs, or Acting Prime Minister.

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, my question is to whoever is acting minister of transport or whoever is prepared to accept responsibility for the Secretary of State for External Affairs' telex of November 30. My question will be to whoever that is.

Is it now the policy that the government will make direct payments to CN for the operation of the Newfoundland railway?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first the hon. member should say whether it is a telegram from the Secretary of State or from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As for particulars on the matter, I will take good note of it and provide details to the member.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Simcoe North.

Mr. Crosbie: Here is your telex from the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

HEALTH AND WELFARE

GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION TO HEALTH CARE PROGRAM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the galloping increase in geriatric care costs across Canada due to an aging population, necessitating more teaching research and chairs of medicine in the universities, what contribution is the government making to the health care and disease prevention plan of the former minister of national health and welfare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the need for Manpower training courses to cover the field of geriatrics properly in Canada has not yet been satisfactorily defined. As soon as I receive from the deans of medical schools and other interested bodies a better definition of the needs, I will raise it immediately with my provincial colleagues at a federal-provincial meeting.

Mr. Rynard: Will the minister consider broadening the field of health and welfare to include the geriatric field?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the new bureau on aging which has started operating in my department will include geriatrics. I thank the hon. member for his suggestion.

SPORTS

WHITE PAPER ON AMATEUR SPORT

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). I think it is one her legal counsel will allow her to answer.

About a year ago the minister refused to extend the deadline for submissions in response to her green paper on sport, the reason being that she had a deadline to meet in preparing the report. Will the minister now tell us why she is delaying the issuing of her white paper on amateur sport, and whether that is due to the postponement of the election or the disruption within her department because of resignations?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the response to the question is quite simple. Due to new economic priorities within the government, I have had to take a little more time with my white paper. I am sure the critic of my department will be very pleased to know that in spite of the deadline for the white paper, we have continued to receive representations from sports people all over the country which we have been taking into account in its preparation.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the sports people will be disappointed to learn that their priorities are not as high as the minister seems to imply they are. Will the minister confirm that negotiations are under way and that a bill is being drafted to change Sports Canada into a Crown corporation? If so, is that one of the reasons for the delay in both the white paper on sport and the green paper on recreation?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the matter of the green paper on recreation, I expect that to be before this House very shortly.

With regard to the other question the hon. member raises, that is a possibility but one might want to consider other options. Of course, what we are looking for in sports is to have a better system with more flexibility so that sports people can have more to say about their affairs. This will be included in the white paper. I trust the hon. member will wait until it is released to hear about that.

* * *

[Translation]

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ONE-YEAR MORATORIUM ON PHASING-OUT OF CNR SUBURBAN MONTREAL LINES

Hon. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Transport, but as he is absent, I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the representations made to the Minister of Transport by the suburban mayors of Two Mountains, Mount Royal, West Island and South Shore at the meeting which the hon. member for Chambly and I had called together, could the parliamentary secretary advise the House whether the Minister of Transport is now prepared to ask the Canadian National Railways to impose a one-year moratorium on its program to phase out its commuter service around greater Montreal, in view of the fact that a recently published report to the Montreal Urban Community recommends both the integration of commuter service and the acceptance of the responsibility for the payment of the operation deficits on a large section of these lines?

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the minister has read with much interest the findings of the Gascon report to the effect that commuter trains should be integrated into the Montreal urban transport system. Following this report and also the representations made by the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes and his colleague the hon. member for Chambly, the minister has accepted to officially request the president of the CNR to reconsider his phasing-out plan and to greatly reduce the rate increase, if there is one, to become effective on January 1.

[English]

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether the same fellow who wrote the question wrote the answer?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

POST OFFICE

OFFICIALS RECEIVING AIRLINE PASSES FOR VACATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Postmaster General is a follow-up of the question I asked him last Friday.

Have officials in the Post Office Department received for themselves and/or their families passes from airline companies? If so, has the minister given consideration to whether or not the receiving of such passes raises the possibility of a conflict of interest on the part of his officials, as the Post Office Department is involved in awarding very substantial mail contracts to airline companies?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that question was asked by the hon. member last Monday, I believe. I verbally asked the Deputy Postmaster General if any of these passes were being used for anything other than business matters. I was verbally told they were not. However, I have also asked the Deputy Postmaster General to make a full report on this. As soon as I receive a reply, I will inform the hon. member.

Mr. Orlikow: Will the minister also ask the deputy minister to find out whether passes were obtained not just for officials in his department but for members of their families, which would certainly not be considered part of their work?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am as anxious as the hon. member to get the reply from the Deputy Postmaster General. As soon as I receive it, I will let him know.

* * *

● (1442)

COMMUNICATIONS

INVITATIONS TO LAUNCHING OF ANIK B

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Communications, who has been in the House one day this week. Today she is in Florida, so I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister, whoever he may be. I am glad to see it is the Minister of Finance who has spoken about restraint to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I will get to the question, if hon. members opposite will keep quiet. In this time of restraint which the Acting Prime Minister and others have been professing, could he please explain to the House the reason it is necessary, at the launching of Anik B tomorrow, to have present one minister, two Liberal members, two deputy ministers, two assistant deputy ministers and two executive assistants, separate and apart from 35 staff and directors of Telesat and 100 other invited guests? This is the third or fourth launching of a satellite, and it is not a novel event in Canadian history.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the details of this. I will look into the matter. I can appreciate the frustration of the hon. member over the fact that the minister forgot to invite him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I appreciate that answer, and the minister is quite correct. In 1968, at the launching of the first satellite we ever put up, there was all-party representation and at subsequent launchings—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: —there was not this great extravaganza. I appreciate the Acting Prime Minister's handicap. Can he assure the House that he will try to obtain the financial details and the involvement of the Canadian government? Admittedly, many of these people will pay part of their expenses but the expenses of many others will be paid for by the Canadian taxpayer.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is very simple. If the hon. member puts his question on the order paper, he will receive a quick answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

OPPORTUNITY TO CREATE NATIONAL POULTRY MARKETING BOARD

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, because of the noise, I was not sure you had recognized me. I thank you very much.

My question is for the Minister of Agriculture whom I know as an honest man, one who can take his responsibilities. I would like to ask him, Mr. Speaker, what progress has been made in cabinet regarding the decision on the establishment of a national poultry marketing board. I asked the minister about it on several occasions. He answered me every time and he gave some information to the House, but the fact is that we are almost at the end of December and producers are still waiting for a decision of the cabinet on this issue. Could the minister tell us now, in his usual sincere and straightforward fashion, when producers can expect a final decision to be made about the establishment of this marketing board?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the honest words spoken by the hon. member at the beginning of his question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: With regard to the national broiler marketing agency, the answer is "very soon".

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell the House if, when the establishment of this marketing board is finally decided, production quotas will be set according to December figures or if provincial production quotas will be set according to the request for the establishment of the board, in order to be as fair as possible to all producers?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we want to be as fair as possible and we will use the historic production records over a five-year period. That may go back to the first time or the second time the hearings were held, but the historic production of producers will be protected. Negotiations have been going on for several months with our main trading partner in this commodity, the United States.

* * *

[Translation]

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INQUIRY INTO QUEBEC AIR CONTROLLER TRAINEES IN CORNWALL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

Since the minister has decided to launch an inquiry into the discriminations against French-speaking trainees who are studying to become controllers, can the parliamentary secretary tell the House today if this inquiry has been completed, since students have returned to work, and if so, can he give us his word that he will table the report in the House and make it public?

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Leader of the Opposition will not say that I wrote my answer with the hon. member for Joliette. Be that as it may, I am very happy the latter brought up this matter. Indeed, 16 Quebec students went back to Cornwall last Monday, and we promised them two Francophone instructors as early as on that day, as well as a co-ordinator of training in the French language. With regard to the possibility of discrimination at the school, we have asked the administration to make an inquiry. It has not yet been completed. I cannot therefore promise, Mr. Speaker, to table a report whose contents I have not seen. In addition, I should like to say to the hon. member that the Official Languages Commissioner is also to give us a report within the next few days.

REPORT ON INQUIRY INTO QUEBEC AIR CONTROLLER TRAINEES IN CORNWALL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

The parliamentary secretary will understand why the Leader of the Opposition made that remark: I put the same question to the hon. member, the parliamentary secretary, two months ago. As the latter pointed out that progress has been made in the inquiry and because those complaints were made publicly, I honestly believe that the report on the inquiry should be made public to let us know whether a compromise was made, which I think was imperative, and also whether justice was done in fact as was requested. Therefore, can the parliamentary secretary tell us at least that the report will be made public?

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question the hon. member put to me two months ago, may I remind him that the Gascon report had not yet been published at the time.

Mr. La Salle: I know that report, that is for sure!

Mr. Lapointe: As for the supplementary he just put to me, Mr. Speaker, I cannot promise to table the report.

* * *

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, I will direct my question to the parliamentary secretary, if I might have his attention.

The Canadian Wheat Board has found it necessary to put out tenders for 500 to 2,000 hopper cars because the Canadian government has not supplied the necessary number. Would the parliamentary secretary indicate whether any further tenders are to be put out by the Canadian Wheat Board for hopper cars?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my responsibilities as parliamentary secretary of transport do not cover the Canadian Wheat Board. However, I will take the hon. member's question as notice and as soon as he is back the minister will be able to give an answer.

[English]

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, trusting that someone on the other side is responsible at this moment for the Canadian Wheat Board, I will direct my question to whoever that may be. Would that person undertake to let the House know if there is any limit in the statute to the number of cars which can be ordered by the Canadian Wheat Board? The money comes from farmers' pockets and it has been stated that some 20,000 new cars are needed. Is there any limit to the number the Canadian Wheat Board can order?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —hon. members opposite sound like turkeys flapping their wings. I will take the hon. member's question into consideration and report back. He is asking for an interpretation of the law and I would have to talk to legal officials.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

DEFICIT IN AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS TRADE WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and it is with respect to automotive products trade with the United States.

It was announced recently that the deficit for the first nine months of this year was down by over 40 per cent compared with the first nine months of last year. Can the minister identify the main reasons for that great improvement, and can those same factors be applied successfully to other areas such as trade in auto parts and trade in automotive products with other countries?

● (1452)

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In the first nine months of this year we had a greatly improved trade balance in auto parts and in automobiles with the United States. Basically, truck sales were up some 40 per cent and car sales were also up, but we still show a significant deficit in auto parts.

With the Reisman report now before the cabinet, we will be studying in particular what we can do to enhance the automotive parts industry in Canada and to improve our balance in part sales to the United States.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON FISHING BOUNDARIES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as minister responsible to the House and to the Canadian people for the Canadian side in the Canada-U.S. negotiations on maritime boundaries.

In light of the rather unsatisfactory answer provided yesterday to my colleague, the hon. member for South Shore, as reported at page 2079 of Hansard, to the effect that there was lack of clarity in the situation on the west coast in this matter, would the minister give an undertaking to make a statement on motions or find some other equally satisfactory method of informing the House and the Canadian people as to the situation on the west coast in terms of the fishing boundary negotiations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my thanks to the hon. member for giving me notice and having a short consultation on this matter so that, indeed, I can try to eliminate some of the lack of clarity which surrounds this issue.

As of today, there is a representative of the Canadian negotiating team on the west coast discussing the various issues with representatives of the fishermen, the provincial government and all the other parties concerned. As the hon. member knows, much will depend upon what kind of agreement is achieved among them as to the position which Canada should put forward. So far as I can see, that is as far as I can reasonably be expected to go at this time.

I will be more than pleased, either on motions or in some other way—I will do it in consultation with hon. members, if they so desire—to indicate progress, or the lack of it, or whatever develops as soon as I think there would be some useful purpose served by that decision.

* * *

FINANCE

RIGHT TO DRAW ANNUITIES ON RRSPs

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is he aware that a provision in the budget bill of April, 1978, prohibits persons under 60 years of age who are disabled or otherwise physically unable to support their families from drawing an annuity from the registered retirement savings programs to which they might have contributed for several years?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking me for an opinion on a piece of legislation which has been voted upon by the House of Commons. However, we will have occasion to debate that aspect of the budget because there will be some changes to the RRSPs when the budget bill is before the House.

* * *

EMPLOYMENT

CLARIFICATION OF PROVISIONS OF OUTREACH PROGRAM

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. At a committee meeting some weeks ago, the minister justified his refusal to make public project assessments under the Outreach program by saying there may be situations where, in the evaluation of a project, it might be found that someone in charge of it is a hopeless alcoholic, is a drug addict or has some kind of problem at home. That has left some 80 or 90 people responsible for administering those projects under something of a cloud.

I should like to ask the minister if indeed he found that in any specific cases and, if he did not, would he make it clear? If he did find it, could he narrow it down a little so that all these people are not left with the broad suggestion that some of them might be alcoholics or drug addicts?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is really reaching today, and I am surprised. I indicated this as an instance. There might be personal information on individuals which they would not like to be made public in the evaluation process. I was commenting on the fact that, in the interest of protecting their civil liberties and their personal rights, it might not be appropriate to make public a particular report.

* * *

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

TAKEOVER OF PANCO POULTRY COMPANY IN B.C.—REVIEW BY FIRA

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce: it concerns the announcement that the publicly-owned Panco Poultry Limited in British Columbia has recently been purchased by Cargill Grain Company, one of the largest multinational grain firms in the world.

Can the minister tell us, first of all, whether this transaction has been reviewed or is under review by the Foreign Investment Review Agency, and whether it will receive the government stamp of approval?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can look into the matter to see whether or not it is before the Foreign Investment Review Agency, but certainly I cannot say whether or not it will receive the government stamp of approval because it has to go through the process of being reviewed by the agency on whose recommendation the government acts.

Mr. Leggatt: I wonder if the minister can advise us whether good corporate citizenship is one of the criteria of the Foreign Investment Review Agency and, if such is the case, whether the agency will take into account the fact that the Cargill Grain Company has committed at least 105 violations of the Wheat Board's regulations and is not a particularly good corporate citizen in this country. Will that matter be considered by the agency?

Mr. Horner: Hundreds of thousands of farmers have violated one regulation or another of the Canadian Wheat Board, at one time or another, but in my opinion they are still good Canadian citizens.

In assuring the hon. member, let me point out to him that what the Foreign Investment Review Agency looks for is significant benefit to Canada and I am sure that in this case, as in many others, the agency will try to ascertain how much benefit Canada can derive from this proposal and whether or not significant benefits will be gained from this takeover, if the takeover takes place.

* * *

LOTO CANADA

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. About an hour ago I said to a colleague of mine that I hoped he was having a Loto fund, and the minister turned around and said to me—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. The minister said to me that if I was good, I would be getting it in Churchill. I should like the minister to clarify that statement, because if you do not get it very often, you want to know what you are going to get.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSESSION OF FIREARMS AMNESTY PROGRAM

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It has to do with the firearms amnesty program. I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister could tell the House whether that program has been extended.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is not in the House, but his parliamentary secretary is here.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, may I say, on behalf of the minister, that I am happy to have this opportunity to clarify the nature of what has been referred to as an extension of the amnesty period.

There have been some misleading generalizations in press reports which have created the impression that the amnesty was to remain in effect indefinitely. In fact, what the minister said, and what his November 30 press release said, was that the full penalties of the law were once again in force, but that he was encouraging police officials across the country to co-operate with any person who wished to come forward voluntarily to legalize their possession of firearms.

Mr. Whiteway: My question is for the parliamentary secretary. Would he ask the Solicitor General to make that clear to the attorneys general of Canada, because the telegram received by a Mr. Roy Cooper, chief provincial firearms officer of the attorney general's office of Manitoba, from the Solicitor General of Canada was very ambiguous and the attorney general of Manitoba is today waiting for clarification. Therefore, would the parliamentary secretary assure the House that a clarification will be sent out today, at least to the attorney general of Manitoba?

Mr. Young: I will be very happy to draw that to the minister's attention. I think the effect of the discussions which took place was that we were hoping that police officials and provincial officials across the country would co-operate in the same manner as they did while the amnesty program was in total effect, for those people who still voluntarily wish to come forward and surrender or legalize any firearms they have.

* * *

[Translation]

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAVOIE—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY ON ORAL QUESTIONS PROCEDURE

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to take the time of the House for a second day in a row on a matter of privilege of which I gave you notice. My privilege is in two parts, first it concerns a parliamentary committee which is sitting right now and, second, a very short remark on the question I put yesterday to the Chair as regards question period.

I thought, following the suggestion I had made to the Chair, that I would at least obtain an answer on whether or not it is possible to hold a meeting to try and correct this situation. Also, Mr. Speaker, yesterday I attended a parliamentary committee and I believe that as member of this parliament, I have the right to speak at a parliamentary commission.

I understand that there are rules to follow. But when we have a right to 11 members on a parliamentary committee and that I am the eleventh, if the twelfth is not there it is not my fault. I think I have the right to sit and speak. When we are considering legislation like Bill C-14 which concerns all Canadians and particularly people in my constituency, I think I have the right to speak, and I would wish that once for all this House can correct that situation because otherwise, Mr. Speaker, this parliamentary institution will be threatened. That is what will happen if an elected representative of the people does not have the right to speak, because they cannot be here themselves to do so. They have elected us and I think we have the right to speak in this House and in committees.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member raises a question about the identification or the granting of an opportunity during question period for persons to participate in the question period. Of course, that is never a question of privilege; it is a matter which lies within the sole discretion of the Chair. That is the way it must remain. It is not a question of privilege and cannot be under any circumstances.

[Mr. Whiteway.]

The second matter raised by the hon. member has to do solely with procedure within the standing committee, which is not within my jurisdiction to deal with in any manner as long as the matter is before the committee. If any hon. member at any time has any grievance to raise about his rights being affected adversely in any way by any decisions or procedures of the committee, they must be resolved in that committee. The committees have the power to set their own rules in any way they wish. If there is a grievance, it may come before this House at the time the committee reports to the House; or if the matter is raised in the standing committee and in itself as a grievance becomes part of a report when it is reported to the House, then the House can take it into account. But as long as the proceedings remain in the committee, the decisions to govern its own procedures remain the business of the committee and not the business of the Chair.

● (1502)

MR. CROSBIE—REQUEST THAT ACTING MINISTER OF TRANSPORT BE PERMITTED TO ANSWER QUESTION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege. During the question period, I addressed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) in his capacity as Acting Minister of Transport, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) not being here today. It is a matter of great importance in Newfoundland. It has to do with the Newfoundland railway and a statement of policy which was contained in a telex sent by the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself last Tuesday to the railway labour unions in Newfoundland.

Within the last three or four weeks, a question was addressed by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as Acting Minister of Transport, the minister not being there. Your Honour permitted the Secretary of State for External Affairs to answer that question having to do with the railway in Newfoundland. Then the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) answered it.

The thing is: I was trying to question the minister on a statement he himself made in a telex, where he said that the Minister of Transport has indicated he is prepared to recommend to government the system of direct payment to Canadian National Railways to cover clearly identifiable losses sustained by CN in carrying out the special responsibilities assigned to it by government in order to maintain effective rail service in Newfoundland and offset the serious dislocations that will occur, to see if that is now official government policy.

Today six employees in the accounting department in St. John's were laid off effective December 31, one of them with 36 years' service. This is a fine Christmas present for the CN to give six of their long service employees, particularly in view of the statement of the Minister of Transport and the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

My grievance is: the minister is the acting minister but he was not permitted to answer. As this is an urgent matter, perhaps if he could answer now, that would solve my question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure it would solve the question of privilege of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), but it would raise a great many more difficult problems for me. First of all, the hon. member wants a minister who was not evidently serving in an acting capacity today to be permitted to answer that question; and second, now he would like him to answer the question after the question period is over. I would dearly love to grant that to the hon. member for St. John's West on this very important subject. The only trouble is that I do not know how I would stop the call of other members every day after three o'clock. There is simply no procedural way in which we can pursue the matter at this time.

* * *

LOTO CANADA

PROSPECTS FOR DISADVANTAGED REGIONS

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, in response to the remark made by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith), I simply think that the record should be clear on this issue. I have heard numerous rather humorous remarks concerning Loto Canada. As a fellow northerner of the hon. member for Churchill, I am very well aware of the seeming incapacity of the provinces to be able to equalize the advantages and opportunities for Canadians within their boundaries. It is my hope following our present obligations that in 1980, when we have a new Loto Canada program, we will be able to advantage those sections of the country which are not now advantaged by their own governments.

In regard to the sexism of his remarks, and to bring it to a more germane issue—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: —I wish to place a motion. Simply the motion is that the hon. member for Churchill should consult with his wife on whether or not he will have an answer to that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) was permitted one salvo which did not resemble a question in the question period. The minister begged a reply, which is not a question of privilege. I think they are even.

[Translation]

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL POULTRY MARKETING BOARD

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, that is where we see the importance of having someone to preside over our debate and to ensure order. I would like to rise on a question of privilege concerning a very important issue which I raised during question period, namely the establishment of a national marketing board. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter and as a representative of a large percentage of poultry producers, I would like to voice very sincerely the great desire among poultry producers in Quebec and indeed throughout Canada for the creation, in the very near future, of this marketing board.

I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) for his attention as we are dealing here with a crucial matter. The issue has been brought to the cabinet's attention and an order in council should be issued in the forseeable future. But in view of the importance of this matter, I would like to ask the minister, on behalf of all producers, to exert pressure on his cabinet colleagues so that an order can be issued as soon as possible to prevent a deterioration of the market which would benefit those who are monopolizing the marketing of this important foodstuff. Since the minister is responsible for food in our country and must ensure that consumers can avail themselves of the best priced and best quality foods, I would like to ask him, and cabinet also, to examine this matter very seriously and make a decision as soon as possible. I am certain that the Minister of Agriculture understands my concern and that is why I considered that this was a very important question of privilege, which calls for a decision.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) realizes, I am sure, that the situation here is the same as in the case of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). We absolutely cannot continue the oral question period beyond three o'clock.

* * *

• (1512)

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the deputy government House leader whether he can tell us the intention of the government for the balance of today, tomorrow and into next week in respect of government business?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to continue today with the Prime Minister's motion dealing with the board of economic development, to be continued into tomorrow. Following that it would be our intention to call Bill S-5, dealing with the business corporations act, followed by the non-profit corporations act, which is Bill S-4, followed by Bill C-28, which deals with the Northwest Territories Act; and following that we would call Bill C-9.

Reference to Committee

An hon. Member: It's going to be a long day.

Mr. Cafik: It would be the intention, as previously indicated, that the UIC bill, which is now being reported back from the committee, Bill C-14, be called on Monday.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

LABOUR, MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

First report of Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration—Mr. Savard.

[Editor's note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO OUTLAW USE OF LIE DETECTORS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-448, to amend the Criminal Code (commercial use of lie detectors).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill briefly is to outlaw the use of lie detectors in commercial enterprises. The reason this bill needs to be introduced is that a number of commercial operations in Canada continue to require their employees to take lie detector tests. This is a severe invasion of their civil liberties and it is time the law was changed in order that these devices be severely restricted.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF MINUTES AND EVIDENCE

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I move:

[Mr. Cafik.]

That the minutes of proceedings and the evidence adduced therein of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs respecting the supplementary estimates (A), 1977-1978, relating to the Solicitor General be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and

That the committee be authorized to make any such evidence adduced in camera available to the commission of inquiry concerning certain activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under such terms and conditions as may be established by the committee.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion by the hon. member for Ontario. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in answer to your question as to whether it is the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion, the answer from this side is yes. There have been some discussions in respect of the matter and we are prepared to have the motion go now.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 45, 394, 482 and 493.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

FISHERIES—PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 45—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1976-77, what contracts for professional services were let for studies, surveys and analyses into (a) present or future policies, programmes or information analysis and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Department of Fisheries?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): In so far as fisheries and oceans is concerned:

1. (a)	J.C. Barclay: Study of post benefit—Cost analysis of selected salmonid enhancement projects.	$20,000
	Underwood McLellan and Associates: Study under the salmon enhancement program to assess the competitiveness and efficiency of the B.C. salmon processing industry.	$79,950

Underwood McLellan and Associates Limited: Study of supply and demand characteristics for B.C. salmon as part of the economic assessment of the salmonid enhancement program.	$11,500
Edwin, Reid and Associates Limited: Study of the socioeconomic impact of the salmonid enhancement program on native people in remote communities along the B.C. coasts.	$33,319
Laval University, Quebec: Biological and ecological study of eel, St. Lawrence River basin.	$60,303
Grand Council of the Crees, Val d'Or: Selective sampling of fish in northwestern Quebec to analyse mercury levels.	$54,870
Various Provincial Departments, Quebec: Cost sharing industrial development to encourage fishing expansion in Quebec.	$56,500
McGill University, Montreal: Study of algae in Magdalen Islands lagoons.	$20,000
Fisheries and Marine Associates Limited: Consultation services on the Atlantic coast herring industry program and on the Bay of Fundy herring industry.	$30,000
Systemhouse: Analysis of Halifax system 2000 landings project.	$ 2,000
(b) P.A. Lapp Limited: Alternative proposals study for the development of an Aquatic Sciences and Fisheries Information Centre.	$ 9,350
C.F. Wilson and Associates: Word processing and related office systems study.	$33,500
Manex Inc., Quebec: To define structure and positions to reorganize the Quebec region, fisheries branch.	$ 8,215

2. See 1(a) and (b) above.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT—QUEBEC

Question No. 394—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, what amount was paid to the Government of Quebec under the Canada Student Loans Act?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State):

Canada Students Loans Program
Alternative Payments to Quebec

	$ (Thousands)
1973-1974	9,036
1974-1975	10,698

Economic Development

	$ (Thousands)
1975-1976	12,708
1976-1977	13,190
1977-1978	13,559

CBC—LAWYERS AND LAW FIRMS IN VICTORIA

Question No. 482—Mr. McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria who performed services for the Canadian Broadcasting Commission during 1977 and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: None.

CANADA COUNCIL—LAWYERS AND LAW FIRMS IN VICTORIA

Question No. 493—McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria who performed services for the Canada Council during 1977 and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: None.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

The House resumed from Wednesday, December 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

The House of Commons, having considered the proposed text of the order in council laid upon the table of the House on December 4, 1978, in relation to the establishment of a Ministry of State for Economic Development, prays that the making of the said order in council be approved.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the problem we are dealing with today in setting up a new ministry of state to provide authority for one minister to speak on behalf of the co-ordinated policies of the government is not a new problem to any government in the world. I should think it is safe to say that since the war in every country of the world that has some form of representative government, and that includes communist states, there has been a battle for power between those who have elected positions of power, such as the communist power in Russia or in China, and the elected members of parliament and the cabinet as in countries of the west.

I had the privilege of discussing this matter with the senior members of the People's Republic of China in 1964. It is not a new problem there. They were worried in their new government how to control the tremendous bureaucracy which had to be developed to do all the things the government has had to do involving the business of the country.

Likewise I have had discussions with senior members of the Russian hierarchy. As I remember those conversations, this resulted in the cultural revolution in China in 1966-67 where high school students and university students were freed from school to go out and attack their teachers and civil servants, with the hope that by yelling at them they might get across the message that they were supposed to be carrying out the policies of the people and not policies to perpetuate themselves.

This problem relating to the control of bureaucracy has been in existence here in Canada as well. Those of us who were here from 1962 to 1968 will remember the technique used by the Pearson administration. That administration saw this problem as one of political science. When there was a problem that could not be met, that administration created a new department. This resulted, I think it is fair to state, in a weakening of some of the in line or regular departments, such as the Department of Agriculture, with various functions belonging to the regular departments being put into these separate portfolios.

Nothing new came from this practice except a continual flow of ministers. I suppose if you looked at the length of time served by ministers of various portfolios under both the Pearson and the present administration, you would find that never before in the history of Canada were ministers able to serve for such a short period of time.

I point that out for a reason. It was very evident in the days of the Pearson administration that there had to be some control by elected representatives over those who were fully paid representatives, civil servants if you like, in this country. The reason for this can be found in previous history. It actually goes back to the 1930s following which there was a reform of the civil service. The Bennett administration brought in a top notch man with instructions to build the best civil service possible in Canada. Mr. Clark was recruited to build that civil service. There is a statue here in Ottawa, quite properly, as a result of that service. He brought together in the 1930s and into the war period some of the best minds from universities and businesses across the land, which enabled Canada to go through the war without even going into high gear. We went through the war in a cruising posture because of the efficiency of the direction of the civil servants here in Ottawa. It was a high level mark in the running of a government by paid employees of the Crown.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

• (1522)

As time went on and ministers became accustomed to accepting directions and ideas from the civil service, we have this management concept of government taking hold. The ministers in the latter period of the Mackenzie King government became accustomed to taking orders which came up from their departments, presenting them to cabinet and having Mr. Howe look at them and nod his acceptance. In the St. Laurent period the same thing occurred even more smoothly. He was quite content to hand the details of any policy over to the civil servants who would propose their ideas to their ministers, and if Mr. Howe nodded his head then it went through.

This was the situation when a new government was elected in 1957. Clearly this new government had different policy points of view which were tied around the word "development". Historically, this was the traditional position of the Conservative party, and we had this program of development and all its concomitant policies ready to go. However, these policies had not originated in the traditional civil service milieu of officials who had been accustomed to administering the country purely as a managerial function.

This clash between the elected representatives and the appointed representatives of the people came to a head in what is now known as the Coyne episode. When the budget was read in 1959, cabinet ministers were surprised to find that the policies enunciated in it were the opposite to what the cabinet wanted to do. There was a discussion with the people who devised this policy which went on through the winter of 1959 into the summer of 1960. As a result of those discussions, Mr. Coyne refused to accept the government's expansionary policies, the government would not accept his restrictive policies, and we had to announce our intention in parliament to have him dismissed. This was probably the first clash in the history of the western world between the elected representatives and the senior mandarins of the civil service regarding their respective ideals.

This decision on the part of the Diefenbaker administration probably cost them the reins of government because a feeling went through the establishment of the civil service, business, university and all the opinion leaders across this country which was expressed in this way: "How can this country be run by a group of prairie cowboys?" Actually we were right. Our policy at that time set this country moving in an upward direction economically that lasted from 1961 to 1968, the longest period of sustained wealth foundation growth in the history of our country.

Because of that clash and because of the fact that the cause of the civil service was defeated, it was only good sense on the part of the Pearson administration to take a look at this situation to see how they could get control and have some say over the civil service, which had welcomed Mr. Pearson back into the fold as one of the same flock of sheep that had been there for a long time. That was the beginning of this war which has gone on continuously.

As I have said, this war is not only going on in Canada. Prime Minister Wilson of Great Britain, during his administration, decided to put four or five top men in charge of groups of portfolios. Hon. members can read all about that disaster in his book, which he wrote after he lost the prime ministership and went into retirement.

Approximately six or seven years ago, in 1971 the Ontario government set up four co-ordinating ministers—as a matter of fact, one of them sits in this House today—who were to co-ordinate the work of several ministries. One needs only to speak to them to learn the results of that attempt to control departments and thereby control civil servants.

In the year 1974—the United States government, faced with the energy crisis, appointed an economic and energy czar in the name of William Simon. He is no longer in that position but he has written a book called "It is Time to Tell the Truth". Every parliamentarian in the world should read that book, which outlines how a brilliant man set up as a czar was beaten by the forces that were in place. All the techniques of delay were used. There were pressure groups, and there was complete subjugation of the leading publishers and the media of the country. They had to fit in with the establishment or they were not in.

This is something I have already mentioned, and it brings me to the present administration. The best way to understand the situation is to let your mind go back ten years when the new emperor took power. The first thing that he did was to realize that the civil service had to be controlled, and as a result the Prime Minister's office was set up. It was a deliberately planned effort to give himself and the people around him enough knowledge and power that they could direct, instead of taking direction from the bottom, from the same tired, old group of people who had made their last serious effort in 1946 to be constructive and innovative. That was the way the government worked from 1968 to 1972 when it had a majority. The Prime Minister's office put up a gallant fight to match the controls of the Privy Council, which has now grown very big and powerful and put up a fight against the tremendous knowledge and strength of the various departments in the civil service.

In 1972 there was a minority government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) must have blamed his failure to get a majority on the fact that the people believed that the Privy Council Office or his Prime Minister's office was not doing a good job of running the country. In effect, he scuttled for a period of time his Prime Minister's office and began to draw more heavily on the civil service mandarins, particularly those in the Privy Council office.

If one looks at the events over those years and then looks at the events of the last four years when the majority was restored to the government, one gets a good picture why this order in council is before parliament today. This government has been guided for ten years by a two-fold philosophy. Part of it is that by political science techniques, by putting boxes on a diagram and arrows in those boxes, this will solve the problem. The Prime Minister is on public record as having declared that as his policy.

The Prime Minister thinks that all we need to do to run this government is to appoint knowledgeable people to run it and then he can sit back and take his holidays skin diving or whatever. This is the managerial concept gone mad, the concept of all control going to the Prime Minister through his Privy Council office, to the Prime Minister's office and the civil service, and making an occasional report to cabinet.

I have rushed through this history of the last 16 years. I will simply say that the last episode of August 1 when the Prime Minister came back from Bonn and Morocco and announced a $2 billion restraint program, which ministers will get the civil service to bring in, indicates that the Prime Minister's battle, will simply be continued in a continuing war with the civil service.

• (1532)

If we visualize this as a war for power, we begin to see the picture a little more clearly. Ministers were called back from their holidays and told that the government wanted a $2 billion restraint program rammed through. The ministers did not know what to do. They cannot do anything because they know nothing to start with. When they were asked to do this, they called on their deputy ministers and told them that the Prime Minister wanted them to save a certain number of dollars. The civil service showed who was boss. They picked where the cuts would take place. They decided that the forestry service in Petawawa should go. That does not affect any of their friends in Ottawa. They decided that fisheries research should go and that ARDA should go. All these things were put in place by parliament to help the country make more money and fight inflation. They were wiped out partly as a policy of the civil service to show that it could take these instructions and do whatever it liked and, to use street language, screw the government in the process.

The government is taking an awful beating in terms of public opinion over the so-called restraint program. On some occasions it has even tried to back away from it. The civil service has won the war, although at times they seem to be losing it. I will return to this point and give some details at the end of my remarks.

A word or two should be said about the position of the Progressive Conservative party. I have related the Coyne episode on many occasions because it is crucial to an understanding of what we were trying to do. In our innocence we were trying to demonstrate that we, as elected representatives of the people, having decided on a fundamental policy of expansion, wanted the country to expand and did not intend to let any senior official of the civil service or any department or agency stand in our way. What we did was right and proper but we paid a heavy price for it in the next election in the cities where propaganda works most effectively.

It has to be made clear, as the key point of my remarks, that the only time an elected government ever stood up against the civil service was in that episode in 1959. That is why I stand here today in support of our leader, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark), whom I expect very shortly to take over the job of prime minister of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I look back over the experiences of the last 30-odd years from the high point of the civil service in 1946 to where it is now, running like a bunch of sheep from one corral to another—we all know the sheep are going to end up in the same place before they are clipped. Then I look at this young man who leads the official opposition today. I speak from the experience of having known and seen in action Mackenzie King, St. Laurent, Pearson and the present Prime Minister. I have watched and worked with men like John Bracken, George Drew, John Diefenbaber, Robert Stanfield and our present leader, and I do not think I misstate the case at all when I say unequivocally that, in my judgment, our present leader is the best qualified and best prepared person out of these nine to settle this war between the elected representatives and the civil service. I knew his interests when he worked for various ministers in government as well as in the opposition. I know something of his thinking as to making it possible for the will of the people to be restored in Canada through their elected representatives.

This is not the type of thing that is talked about on every street corner; it is a battle, a war that is going on across the world. In our part of the war, in Canada, I think we have a leader in the Conservative party who has a better chance of understanding how to utilize the tremendous merit and strength of our civil service and move it into the innovative and creative thinking of the Conservative party, thus producing a winning team.

We must be aware of power groups, however, Over the last 30 or 40 years in Canada, business has had tremendous power and since the war labour has developed tremendous power. We have a new rival for power—the media in radio and television, and even the newspaper have a little left. Since 1956, these people no longer report the news. They are an editorial power group who feel their views on what should be done are closer to the truth than the views of the elected representatives in the government or the opposition. They must be accepted as a rival for power. They have long since lost the innocence of reporting the news in a factual manner and, in effect, have moved into the job of the opposition. Their excuse is that we are not strong enough to get our opposition across so they will decide what has to be done.

I sat in this House during this last session and witnessed one or two very good debates. Just two weeks ago there was a debate on the motion of the Social Credit party and every person who spoke in that debate actually spoke on the subject of the motion. That is very unusual. But what was usual about that debate was the fact there was no news of it. A debate on a subject of very great importance apparently is not news.

In the present circumstances the only news that is reported is on the techniques of the government. That is all they study—public relations. Members on that side use every trick of the trade to get their names in the newspapers, on television and on radio. They crawl around here like hyperactive ants trying to get their faces on television or their voices on radio. A minister is not selected on the basis of what he or she knows or can do, but on the basis of ability to communicate. We end up with a group of communicators running the country. Their skill is what I have just described, namely, getting it out. It does not make any difference whether it says anything sensible—just get it out. Naturally, ambitious young members of parliament think this is the way things are done, but to win the battle I am talking about it is necessary to have someone or a group in any party know something about something.

I suggest that the leader of this party knows that he must have people around him who know something about something and are prepared to put their experience into practice. He knows that he must have around him someone who knows something about resources, because this is a resource country. He also knows that this person must appreciate that we live in an interdependent world. We must know the extent of world resources, the demand for those resources and the supplies available. Above that there must be an industrial strategy based on those resources. Such an industrial strategy must have its priorities and its related policies in finance, trade, manpower and development, and there must be co-ordination of all these factors.

This is the type of thing that I think the young leader of the Conservative party is aware of. He knows that he must have people around him in all fields, not just resources, who know something about their subject. That is the only way to cope with the tremendous efficiency and know-how of the civil service. Everything we want to do must draw on those assets—the know-how, ability and knowledge of the civil service. We must put them to work formulating policy on those subjects in line with the philosophy of the government of the day.

● (1542)

The leader of our party knows the history of the civil service in Ottawa. He has been around here for 20 years and he knows that the civil service has failed to grow in ideas since 1946. That is where the weakness is. He knows that to climb in the civil service one has to belong to a pyramid and keep one's nose at the right angle to make progress. This conformity principle that is so strongly entrenched in the civil service bars from that upward movement many of the ideas and know-how that are there in the civil service. Who knows about this situation better than the present leader of the Conservative party? I know of no other person.

I would like to mention next the public relations propensity of the present government. Ever since the days of Mr. Pearson the governing party has put the emphasis on public relations. There was a problem in 1963 so they brought in a whole team of fellows as evidence that they had strong men around Mr. Pearson who could run this country. They had a picture of a bus which shows all these bright young fellows getting off the bus with briefcases and suitcases with all their plans ready. When the government changed in 1963 they walked back and forth from the East Block to this block, carrying some document or reading a book—not the red book of Mao, but the same thing, and a lot bigger. They were going to give us 60 days of decison. Actually it was an image for the public.

The first decision came in the budget on the fifty-seventh day, and one of the better qualified ministers of that government came a cropper because he forgot one little detail. And that detail? If you bring in an outsider who knows something about what you want to do and have him do it for you, you get rid of him a few days before the budget is announced or you will be under the suggestion of a leak. What we are witnessing here today is the present version of the same technique of the bus with all these young fellows getting off it and pretending they are busy and that they will be able to solve everything in 60 days. All they have is an idea in this order in council. It is that if we could only get the ministers who deal with economic matters to sit down together under one minister who could co-ordinate their efforts and put their views before the cabinet, then we would solve our economic problems.

Let us take a look at this image they are now trying to create. Remember that nothing succeeds so poorly as the blind trying to lead the blind. But this is what we are witnessing. They have even left out the portfolios of agriculture, forestry and fisheries. It never crossed the minds of the political scientists who drafted the order in council that a great part of the wealth of this nation over the next few decades will be coming from the production of food, fibre and energy. Nearly half of the energy for the future needs of Canada will be drawn by farmers. Yet the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is left out. I am not suggesting the Minister of Agriculture could make any contribution, but there may be some people in his department who know what is possible, and biomass is more than just a swear word, it is a very valuable product. I would like to have seen some realization of this by those who drafted the order in council. In image-making one always slips up.

As I look at this matter, I also look at things which have happened before, and I am not alone in my observations. I refer, for example, to the federal-provincial ministry that was set up in 1977. Most members can remember back that far. I have a story from a local paper, the Journal, dated September 27, 1977. The article is written by a man who served as one of the inner group in government; he is now a pundit. The headline reads "Bureaucrats Wins Latest Round Against Top Federal Ministers." What else have I been talking about for the last 20 minutes? Let me read some selections from this article. The first one states:

> I am informed . . . that the federal-provincial relations office will continue to report directly to the Prime Minister, but will work closely, . . . very closely, with the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations.

That is gobbledy-gook. It means they have made a new man the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid) but that he and the department are to always report to the Prime Minister. Here is a situation where a federal cabinet minister is appointed who has no civil servants at all. Mr. Gwyn, the author of the article, goes on to describe the political in-fighting. He says:

> The interest in the battle of the Dotted Line is that it has matched Ottawa's best political in-fighter against the town's best bureaucratic in-fighter. The significance in the affair is that the bureaucrat won. If you still cling to to that quaint theory that cabinet ministers run the mandarins, now is the time to chuck it.

Let us take another example, that of the committee system. I have an article from the Citizen dated January 26, 1978. I have clippings here over the last 15 years, but I am not going to go into all of them. This article is about a top mandarin. At the particular time he was president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. He gave a speech to the Institute of Public Administration of Canada. His speech was very similar to the remarks made by the deputy minister of finance. This was the statement, and I quote:

> —innovation and creativity are being frustrated by committee style policy-making.

This was the belief of Simon Reisman and Al Johnson, two top mandarins, one in the field of finance and the other in the field of broadcasting, who were complaining about the committee system. Taking the speech in detail, I will quote one paragraph:

> —the representative committee approach almost inevitably creates a bargaining situation . . . Sometimes this means the acceptance of constraints before the advantages of new policy directions can be measured against possible changes in constraints; sometimes it means a succession of compromises which lead to the lowest common policy denominator. Or both.

Here is an example of civil servants complaining about this system and about being so frustrated. One more layer is put in here and another one put in there to make sure there is enough bargaining for all groups, but nothing will be done. That is a translation of that quote, which is a quotation from a speech delivered to the Institute of Public Administration of Canada around January 26, 1978.

I could go on and on. I have talked a little bit about Pearson's new departments every month. I could talk about the Trudeau technique of shifting portfolios. Politically it is simply a device called the "moving target principle of responsibility". If you have ten ministers running across the stage over a ten-year period, it is hard to get a lead on them and catch them. One is out of the damned picture before you can get a lead on the next.

These poor ministers do not get a chance to learn their portfolios. You cannot blame the civil servants for saying they come and they go but we stay on forever. That is how you lose control over the people you are supposed to be directing. That is what the Leader of the Opposition meant yesterday when he called it the downgrading of cabinet. This cabinet has changed so fast that all you can think of is a bunch of assorted Grits in a pot.

An hon. Member: Like shaking a box of Rice Krispies.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I think I have made my point about this legislation. We are being asked to conclude that by putting in a czar we will end all this confusion, that by doing that their struggle for power will be won. I am simply saying, "Oh, no, you are not." It is simply a part of the struggle and everyone knows it. When it is all over, the headlines will come out "Civil servants still in control".

● (1552)

With regard to the suggestion of a super minister, there is only one thing in the whole statement that intrigues me. I quote from page 2 of the order in council, at the bottom of the page:

> His Excellency in Council is further pleased to direct—
>
> (b) He shall advise the Treasury Board on the allocation of financial, personnel and other resources to federal programs that provide direct support to the development of economic enterprise in Canada;

The word "shall" sounds impressive. It means you must ask advice. However, the question has to be asked, do you have to take that advice? Does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) really think he is going to sit at the head of his department and let this group walk all over the top of the department? The Department of Finance will show who is boss. They have been running the show here for 20 years. They do not give up easily. They also run the minister.

This proposal is ridiculous. It was described by somebody as fraudulent. Let us call it what it is, a roaring farce. In this battle to control the power brokers in the civil service, they have more cards in this poker game than you can shake a stick at. Ministers come, ministers go, but they stay on forever. They decide who gives up. They decide who from the outside comes in.

They pretend to this House that by setting up a super ministry to guide economic problems and giving the power to advise, an amendment will be made to that order in council. I know the amendment that will be made, and so does the Minister of Finance. The order in council can be amended in such a way that it will cause a real battle.

This is not even a threat to the Department of Finance and Treasury Board; it reads "shall advise". I remember writing legislation, when I was innocent, giving the power to the National Energy Board to advise the minister. The minister never got any advice from the National Energy Board. I asked why. What I got from the officials in the minister's office, in that case energy, mines and resources, was that those guys did not know enough about it. There was not a single man in the department of energy who knew anything about energy. However, the administrators, the top mandarins, knew what would happen. They did not want advice from the National Energy Board.

We are not the only ones being taken. I got taken in a very elementary manner. I thought when you said "shall advise the government" it meant put in the advice and it will be accepted. However, that does not hit the root of the problem. The power has to have some core or centre, either an individual or a small group.

What we have in Ottawa is a small group of six or seven which controls the decisions of the federal government of Canada. They do not see any rivals in this present cabinet. In fact, I suspect they do not think there will be any rivals when we form the government. They intend to run the show even after the government changes. It will be quite a battle.

In 1959 we had enough guts for a central theme on financial direction to take on the civil service. After 15 long years in opposition, we have ourselves steeled up sufficiently that we will take them on this time as well. The only difference is that this time we will know how to tackle them, matching their cards with higher cards and matching their people with stronger-willed people. The war will be won by the type of person put into the cabinet. We will see whether we can move the power from where it is now in the civil service back to the elected representatives.

We may make mistakes, but at least they will be our mistakes and we will be responsible for them. There is more than one reason why I hang around this place. I fought the battles for a few years. I lost more than I won. I want to live long enough to sit on those treasury benches just to take another crack at them. I want to see whether the elected representatives have enough backbone to win this battle.

I know these people have to learn something, and know something about something, because you are dealing with some of the most able men you could deal with. This problem exists in every country in the world. However, I want to see this job tackled in my country. I do not think it will be done with this legislation. In fact I know it won't. It will not be done with this government. It lost the will to fight before it was born in 1963. I hope that after a sufficient period in opposition, about 15 or 30 years, they will have the opportunity to recruit the type of people who will sit down, study and learn something, and then be able to do something about it when they are elected. By that time we may have the country back in shape.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to speak on the very important motion before the House this afternoon. The creation of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, under the chairmanship of my colleague the new minister of state, is a logical step in the redirection of our economic priorities. The focus of this new body will be on the co-ordination of federal policies and programs directed at economic development. This is an important initiative; it will help considerably in achieving what I have been calling for in the last year, and I support it.

As a former minister of industry, trade and commerce, and as a member representing one of the lagging economic regions of Canada, I am the first to appreciate the significance of this new approach.

As Minister of Finance, I have been very conscious of the limitations of the traditional policies for demand management. I have explained many times that demand management policies and income policies alone will not by themselves ensure the economic performance which Canadians want. We also need structural policies which will create the right climate for the improved effectiveness and efficiency of the market. This in turn will lead to greater economic growth and to more jobs. This has been one of the key messages of my budget statements, and I think it bears some repeating in today's debate.

I would like to give some examples of what I have in mind when I talk about structural policies and programs. I mean those which are directed at labour markets, at the industries that might be affected by the trade negotiations, at regional development, at the problem of government regulation, at the large tourist deficit, at our difficult energy problems.

I have also noted the importance of structural change in two discussion papers on Canada's medium-term prospects. Hon. members will recall that last February I issued a paper entitled "Canada's Economy—Medium-term Projections and Targets". That paper was basically a medium-term analysis of the aggregate components of economic growth. It recognized that broad economic conditions are a vital factor in determining our prospects. But it emphasized that a favourable medium-term economic performance would be a great deal more certain if other supporting policies were implemented which encouraged investment, improved efficiency, or helped the current account of the balance of payments.

In February, it was difficult to tell how rapid the progress would be in integrating policy approaches in these areas, or in developing innovative policies for specific sectoral problems. I believe that the creation of the Board of Economic Development Ministers is a major step in answering that question.

As Minister of Finance, I will continue to be concerned primarily with the performance of the economy at the aggregate level, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) explained when he announced the creation of the board. But I have repeatedly called for structural policies that support the economic recovery, so I am very pleased that the new President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) will devote himself entirely to putting these policies into place.

● (1602)

It should be clear from the examples of structural issues I have just given that their successful resolution requires the co-ordinated input of several departments of the Government of Canada. I look forward to working with the new minister of state on these matters.

I have also noted several times the need for consultation and co-operation with the provinces and with labour and business. As hon. members know, this is a task in which I have been engaged quite extensively, particularly before my recent budget. I will continue to consult widely on what the government's fiscal and monetary stance should be. I think it will be most helpful to have the new minister of state looking after arrangements for ongoing consultation in matters of economic development.

In his statement two weeks ago at the conference of first ministers on the economy, the new minister of state emphasized that few people want rigid five or ten-year economic plans or detailed scenarios for the future. He did not promise a single industrial strategy. I made the same point in my recent budget speech when I expressed my scepticism about the search for a single grand industrial strategy in a competitive market system.

I said that we can and must have a set of sensible industrial policies designed to provide a healthy framework for all industries and specific incentives tailored to particular needs. I applaud the setting up of a mechanism which will allow federal ministers to concern themselves with such issues in a co-ordinated and systematic way.

My budget statements have all been centered on, first, general fiscal measures such as the reduction from 12 per cent to 9 per cent in the federal sales tax and the increase from $250 to $500 in the employment expense deduction announced in my November budget. Second, I have included measures designed to improve the climate for business and investment, such as the investment tax credit. Finally, I have taken into account the special needs of our regions and of our industrial sectors. Such measures are illustrated in my recent budget by the different regional rates for the investment tax credit and by tax measures helpful to the mining industry.

The new minister of state himself explained last week that his board would review the economic development proposals submitted by program departments—and I quote:

—through one perspective that has three parts: how proposals support economic growth in Canada's regions, in industry sectors, and in the general economy.

I believe that the new Board of Economic Development Ministers will provide the knitting together of the government's broad, aggregate economic policies with its specific structural policies. This is a very important undertaking, as I have been saying since becoming Minister of Finance. This approach to economic development has been evolving, in fact, since the beginning of the anti-inflation program three years ago.

As decontrol is becoming widespread through the economy, it is quite timely to pay particular attention to structural problems and policies. I believe the goals of the motion before the House are the right ones in this government's program of providing more jobs, less inflation and a greater balance in our country's regional economies.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to endorse the resolution before us today for a number of reasons. First, because the establishment of the Board of Economic Development will permit me to achieve what I have wanted to achieve since becoming Minister of Finance. I have explained on a number of occasions that the traditional fiscal and monetary levers will not be sufficient by themselves to set the economy back on a recovery path as all Canadians want.

The problems in key areas such as economics, energy, regional development, government regulation, the labour market, multilateral trade negotiations and their industrial impact, have become too complex to expect that general policies of demand management will solve these problems adequately. My budget speeches have emphasized this theme. In my April budget speech, for example, I spoke of a structural reform challenge and I emphasized the progress we have made in regulating tourism, fishing and agriculture.

I also had two important studies published dealing with our medium-term prospects which show clearly that success stems not only from a wise policy of demand management, but also from sustained attention to the specific problems of certain regions and certain sectors of our economy. That is why, my last budget includes, for instance, measures to help the pulp and paper industry and increase, from 10 to 20 per cent, the investment tax credit in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé Peninsula.

As Minister of Finance, I must above all be concerned with the over-all fiscal and monetary policies. I can only agree when I see that my colleague, the new President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras), will be able to devote all his time to ensuring that the proposals of the various departments in economic development matters are consistent with the fiscal and monetary policies of the government. I am convinced that the new Board of Economic Development Ministers will be of considerable help to the government in increasing the number of jobs for Canadians, reducing inflation, and better distributing our economic activity among the various regions of the country.

[English]

In some speeches hon. members have questioned what the relationship between the board and the Department of Finance will be. I do not see any problem. I think it is very important that the different departments be able to work in order to implement the structural changes they want to put forward. Very often one department has to concentrate on the problems it has to face. Such problems relate to energy, industry, trade and commerce, regional development and so forth. Sometimes there has not been enough co-ordination in developing policy and in making sure it is co-ordinated.

I worked with my colleague when he was president of the treasury board. I am used to working with colleagues. It used to be that the minister of finance was the president of the treasury board. Those portfolios were split up. I worked with two different ministers of finance when I was president of the treasury board. As Minister of Finance I worked with my colleague when he was president of the Treasury Board. Some might have said that at times the two organizations held different views. Of course, that is normal, but we always managed to sit down and talk problems over. We always managed to be in agreement when we were together in the cabinet.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) says that bureaucrats do not listen to ministers and that we are always changing ministries. I have been a minister for almost 12 years.

Mr. Paproski: Good for you.

Mr. Chrétien: I know how bureaucrats operate. They give us good advice, and when we do not agree with them, they change their advice. That often happens. I held one portfolio for a long time. I was minister of Indian affairs and northern development for six years, one month, three days and two hours. I felt no more or less comfortable in that portfolio than I feel now in the Department of Finance after 15 or 16 months. When one has been in cabinet for 12 years, one knows how the government operates.

The hon. member said we should go back. There is a kind of spirit of vindictiveness in that. I do not like that approach. Public servants give us advice, and we can accept it or reject it. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was a minister who was able to reject advice. Some cannot, but that is not the fault of the system. Perhaps some ministers are not sure of themselves, do not comprehend or whatever. Some come, some go, but a minister who wants to run his department has no problem. However, running a department does not mean a minister must reject all the advice he receives. He must be able to select from the advice he receives.

● (1612)

What we are doing now is making sure that in the line departments there will be a political co-ordination, under the chairmanship of the new president of the board. There will be no problem between him and me. The fiscal, monetary and economic policies will be set by me. If he comes to me to give me good advice, I will welcome it. I need good advice.

An hon. Member: You sure do.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, and I accept it. I am not at all embarrassed by it. If I have another political minister who can look into any other department and say to the Minister of Finance, "We are having a problem in the development of an industrial strategy; perhaps we could use the tax system", then so much the better. I am not preoccupied by that. I do think the Minister of Finance has retained the same power as he had before. I see no problem. I know the opposition would like to create division within the ranks of the cabinet. If I were them, I would try to do the same thing. But I can assure hon. members that I do not see any problem arising with my colleague. I have worked with him for more than two years since I left the Treasury Board to become Minister of Finance and I have had no problem with him, nor do I expect to have any problem with him in his new job.

I do think that the new ministry will have a better political input in the co-ordination of the policies of the government. He will be consulting me. The responsibility for the budget remains with the Department of Finance, but if he gives me good ideas, I will accept them with pleasure. I am willing to do that.

So I do not know why hon. members on the other side are trying to see in this move a downgrading of some departments. What we are doing is to try to make the government apparatus work more efficiently. We want better co-ordination and more political input. That will be good. This will not start fights between ministers. Anyway, we have cabinet meetings all the time where we can disagree. When policies are developed, there will be some more political input, and I welcome it. I am not at all embarrassed by the move. We are just trying to do the right thing because we have said that we want to develop the right policies to make sure that the development of the economy of Canada proceeds properly.

When I was minister of industry, trade and commerce I started this idea of having the 23 different sectors studied. And that is carried on by the present minister. That was a very positive aspect where both the management and the unions work together with the provinces and the federal government in trying to analyse and develop the proper policies for the different sectors. We said that because a policy was successful we must carry on that type of consultation. We decided we want a minister to do that on an almost full-time basis. What is wrong with that? Of course, if you are minister of industry, trade and commerce you have many other responsibilities. You have to travel abroad to stimulate business for Canada. So instead of these consultations being conducted only by bureaucrats, they will be conducted by my good colleague, the new minister. I see no problem and I think it will be very good. It will be a step in the right direction.

I do not think any power has been taken away from the Minister of Finance, and if it has been, I do not mind if it is the right thing. I think that the economy and the fiscal and monetary policies of the government will continue to be the responsibility of the Minister of Finance, whoever he is.

The development of new industrial policies and the co-ordination of those policies for the benefit of Canadians can be better handled by the new board because there will be more political input. That should have been the point made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. Instead of criticizing this new move, if I followed the logic of his argument, I believe he should have been applauding it.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to join in this debate, particularly after hearing what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has had to say about this proposal which the government is bringing forward. I do not think anyone denies that all governments must try to find better ways to organize their approach to the processes which they have to administer, and it is particularly interesting to look at this proposal because it brings to the forefront two important questions which we have to solve. First, how do we get a proper economic policy in this country—which, I presume, is what this board will try to do—and, second, what is the appropriate administrative way to approach the issues of economic policy-making in our country.

Everyone agrees that the complexities of government these days are great. With a $50 billion budget, no one would think a country can be administered in the same way it was administered in the past. Our modern problems are far removed from those of Sir Alexander Mackenzie 100 years ago when he was prime minister and could operate without even a prime minister's office and personally administer the most extensive ministry of the time, that of supply and services.

It is a far cry from the days of the Hon. Edward Blake who, when he was elected to parliament, was the premier of Ontario and represented two federal seats, or even of the days of Mr. Bennett who could serve as his own minister of finance, or even the days of Mackenzie King when minutes of the cabinet meetings were not even kept. Those indeed are times that are far behind us.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) pointed out in a masterful speech, which I hope hon. members will take time to read with care when it appears in Hansard tomorrow and which I hope the press will read with care, some of the problems of administration as witnessed by a man who has had extensive, significant and important experience in governing. The leader of the NDP has also pointed out the problems that Mr. Wilson had as prime minister of Great Britain when he tried to find ways of administering better.

The inner story of that battle was told, as I suppose it has never been told about any other cabinet, with the publication of the Crossman diaries, which some authorities in Great Britain tried to have suppressed. However, they were published and so now all of us know more about the operation of cabinets than has ever been known by any group outside of cabinet before. What becomes so clear are the difficulties of finding new ways and structures of administering in these complicated times.

We all know the experience of the province of Ontario in the development of its policy ministeries, as well as all the experiments that have taken place in the United States in trying to find better and more efficient ways to administer. I remember when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to office that one of the members of the cabinet at that time told me that it was a refreshing experience to see a new type of administrative operation for the prime minister brought into play, a new system which he thought was going to work more effectively. I am sure that members on the government side in particular will recall the development of an extensive series of cabinet committees: the co-ordinating committees that were evolved at that time and through the last few years, the committee on priority and planning, the committee on legislation and House business, the committee on federal-provincial relations and the Treasury Board—all designed to make the government operate more efficiently. Also there are five subject matter committees: external policy and defence, economic policy, social policy, science and cultural policy, government operations, and then an ad hoc committee.

● (1622)

Approximately a decade later, we know the system has not worked. If the co-ordinating committees of cabinet were working, this order in council would not be before us. If the economic policy committee of the cabinet is operating, why do we need a new tier of bureaucracy in the system? It is well known that the more levels of decision-making a matter has to go through, the more difficult it is to operate efficiently and effectively. The administrative procedures put in place by the government have not worked, and consequently the government is looking for something new.

This debate cannot be as highly politically partisan as some debates. All of us must be concerned about finding a structure of government which will deliver service efficiently and effectively to Canadian taxpayers. I do not think anyone would suggest that our potential in terms of the resources and people in the country has been fulfilled. I am sure all of us deplore this, even the Minister of Finance and the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras). Obviously we must find a way to make economic policy work effectively.

One must ask oneself if this new board is the correct way to do it. One must look at the establishment of this board with great care, concern and considerable scepticism. The tradition of this country, dating back to the Rowell-Sirois commission when there was a centralization of authority and economic policy-making, has been that the Department of Finance establishes the economic policy of the nation. We have had the benefit of some very strong ministers of finance and deputy ministers of finance in our history. The practice has developed that the Minister of Finance and his deputy minister are the senior officials in the development of policy as far as economic affairs in the country are concerned. For the present Minister of Finance to suggest that the creation of this board will not result in a lessening of power within the Department of Finance is ludicrous. If one compares the traditional operation of the Department of Finance, one will discover that the very things the new board will attempt to do are matters which have been looked after by the Minister of Finance and his department for the last 25 years, with mixed degrees of success.

With respect, the decline in the existence of strong ministers in the cabinet of Canada came about with the co-ordinating operations in cabinet. A strong minister does not want to develop a policy which must be sold repeatedly to a variety of other ministers. The exodus of strong ministers from the government has been a product of the existing system. Also the change in management philosophy with respect to deputy ministers has been a factor in many strong deputy ministers leaving the government. The administrative philosophy relating to deputy ministers now is that one must know how to manage in order to be a good deputy minister. I agree with that. But another element of that administrative philosophy is that one does not have to know much about the substantive nature of the material one is administering. That is a mistake. Will we receive the required results if a deputy minister is deputy minister of department X on Monday, department Y on Tuesday, and department W on Thursday? Is it a good idea to move a deputy around because he knows how to manage but has no knowledge of what he is supposed to manage? We require the fixing of responsibility and authority, with strong people within strong departments, if we are to receive the type of policy the country requires.

I should like to refer to page 2093 of Hansard dated December 13, 1978, where the Prime Minister gives the reasons for the establishment of the board. He said that the board will take——action to influence the development of industries and regional economies—

[Mr. Gillies.]

I thought that was the responsibility of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard). Surely it must be. The Prime Minister continued:

—action to integrate programs and activities providing direct support to industry—

Surely that is the responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He continued:

—to increase effectiveness and minimize red tape—

A minister has been appointed to minimize red tape. He continued:

—action to foster co-operative relationships with respect to industrial development—

Surely that is the responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He continued:

—direct support to industry and economic development in Canada, including government procurement policy—

Is that not the responsibility of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané)? On and on it goes. My point is a very important one. In order to arrive at good policy, we do not require another board. We require a redefinition of the line responsibilities of various departments of government.

The establishment of the board indicates that there has been a confusion in the operations of different departments. The confusion is such that they are constantly overlapping each other, with each department doing the same things over and over again. No one knows what he is supposed to do. There is no fixing of responsibility or authority.

If the government is serious about restraint and streamlining its operations, another board should not have been created. The government should have asked itself why it required another board. If the government found out that it was because of the overlapping, then it should get rid of that overlapping.

Another function of the bureau is to bring together economic policies of the government. What economic policies? Surely the departments have line functions to perform. The government knows what the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are supposed to do within the framework established by the Department of Finance. If there is so much overlapping that the departments do not know what they are supposed to do and they have to be co-ordinated, the responsibilities of departments should be redefined in order to eliminate the overlapping so that they can operate more effectively.

The comments of the Minister of Finance were very interesting, yet at the same time they were quite shocking. He said that the board will work well because he has been around for a number of years and he gets along with the minister who will be his super minister. Surely the Government of Canada is not proposing the creation of a new bureaucracy and saying that it will work because the ministers are old friends. I cannot think of a less reasonable explanation for the development of the board. One must put forth management proposals or administrative changes on the basis that they will work effectively and last. Neither of those ministers may be there very long. The probability is that they will not. To defend the establishment of the board on the ground that we should not worry because the ministers get along is just preposterous.

● (1632)

Indeed, the whole speech of the Minister of Finance on the serious issue of how we should make economic policy in the nation is a travesty, one not worthy of being recorded in the Journals of the House of Commons. I thought this was a serious proposal of government, but I have to confess after hearing the Minister of Finance, and it is his department that is the most seriously affected by this proposal, that there cannot have been serious consideration given to the plan.

I can tell you one thing; I would be willing to wager a considerable sum of money that if the Hon. John Turner was still the minister of finance for Canada this proposal would never have been made, because he would not permit a downgrading of his department. If it was suggested, it would not be defended on the ground that "everybody can get along with me so it is okay." Fortunately, the Hon. John Turner is not here, and I say "fortunately" meaning fortunate for the country as a whole because of what happened under his administration.

Mr. Andras: You very nearly slipped there.

Mr. Gillies: The sort of defence put up by the Minister of Finance for the abdication of the responsibilities of his department is, indeed, something less than one would have expected. He argues that this is the way in which his sector policies are to be co-ordinated. If that is so, one has to worry a great deal about the future of the nation.

He also makes the point that the change does not matter. If I were the incoming minister of this new board I would be very worried about a Minister of Finance who says it really does not matter that we have this new board because "we meet in cabinet all the time anyway." If ever there was a statement suggesting that we do not need this board and that the taxpayers of Canada should not be asked to pay for it, that is it. If they meet in cabinet all the time anyway in a co-ordinating committee, why do they need a new bureau? Why do we have to put another layer of bureaucracy of this sort on top of the existing bureaucracy? The Minister of Finance says they all get along together in the government and it doesn't make any difference. He just laughs it off, saying "we are old friends, charge the taxpayers, it is okay with me. We meet anyway." That shows the absolute ludicrousness of the proposal being put before us.

What we really need, and need badly, is a total redefining of the line responsibilities of the departments so there is no such overlapping of functions and responsibilities. If the departments knew what they were supposed to do and knew the limits of their responsibilities, we would not need this new bureaucracy the government is creating. Indeed, what an opportunity this government has lost. It has talked of the need for restraint. If the government thought there was too much overlapping, surely there was a golden opportunity for restraint by redefining the responsibilities of departments and getting rid of the confusion, rather than bringing in a board designed to co-ordinate the confusion.

Having said that, there is no question that we do need a better way of formulating economic policy in this nation. The answer clearly is not found in this sort of board, because there is just going to be more of the same input in the same way.

If we are to get the economic policy the country ought to have we have to start back in parliament. We have to start back in the standing committee on finance. We have argued as strenuously as we can that that standing committee, as is the case in almost every legislative assembly in the world, ought to get appropriate pre-budget papers prepared by the government. That committee should be able to call the most able and best witnesses from across the country. No one thinks that economic policy-making in this country is easy, and we should get all the best minds together providing input before the budget, that principal document of economic policy-making, is brought down. This committee should have some staff to assist it in its work.

It is interesting to note that the executive vice-president of the Bank of Nova Scotia made a speech two days ago, I think, suggesting that the Economic Council of Canada has outlived its function and that the staff of that council should be attached to the standing committee on finance. In that way we would have a properly staffed forum in this country in which could be brought forward the best ideas of the best economists, the best industrialists, the best manufacturers, mining people and so on. This would help not just the government, but the people of Canada as well, to get better economic policy-making than we have had in the past.

To propose that the government meets the situation by establishing a new sort of board is absolutely ludicrous. We need more openness in the making of economic policy in the country. We have the most closed economic policy-making process of any democracy in the world. We have no forecasts about what is to happen. If you were a citizen of the United States today you would know, because the government has said, that its goal is to reduce the federal deficit in that country to $30 billion by 1981 or 1982. No one has any idea what the goal of this government is in respect to reducing the federal deficit. To have a similar proportionate deficit in this country we would need to have a deficit of $3 billion by 1981 or by 1982.

We have a strange situation here. Everyone who is considering economic policy-making and the situation that now exists is calling for reduced deficits, yet ours is going up. We have a billion dollar a month deficit. It is a deficit that is running, depending on which measure you use, almost four times higher proportionately as the deficit of the United States. This is a critical situation.

We do not need a bureau or a board made up of existing cabinet ministers, advised by the same people, to co-ordinate policy. If we are to get to the root of our problems what we really need is some place in the Government of Canada where there is someone who says what the objectives of economic policy-making are. For example, we should have someone declare that it is an objective of policy to reduce the size of the federal deficit. We need a place where economic policy is set in a definite way. Until that is done I am not sure we will be able to do what we ought to do in this country.

No one can object to the government trying to find a way to make better economic policy. We have had slow rates of economic growth, high levels of unemployment, increasing regional disparity of income and a devastating situation in respect of our balance of payments, to which there does not seem to be any solutions put forward by the government either for the medium or the long term.

We have a squandering of our resources, and financial controls that do not seem to have worked. We have a financial system that seems almost out of control, according to the Auditor General. We have enormous problems. One would think the government would try to find some new way of dealing with these things rather than through the creation of a new bureaucratic board. Anyone who thinks that such a board will do anything to improve the creation of economic policy in this country is deluding himself.

With all the problems before us, with the need for the development of economic policy-making, with the need for restraint and with the need for redefining the functions of various departments, how sad it is that this government has once again missed an opportunity, and once again has brought in something which has been well described as cosmetic and which will achieve nothing. We in this party believe it is not going to work. We hope that the government will not go ahead with a proposal which will do no good. It will probably cause harm by slowing down the government process and costing money. It would be better if they turned their attention to the real problem, namely: "How do we design better economic policy for this country?"

● (1642)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am quite pleased to rise and take part in this debate on a resolution introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) establishing a Ministry of State for Economic Development. It is an appropriate opportunity, when we take into account the discussions held inside and outside the House over the past two years, more especially since the government paused to analyse the economic conditions two years ago. During a day spent together, the members of the cabinet discussed a new direction to be given to government action as a result of the failure experienced by the implementation of so-called traditional policies to solve unemployment, inflation or lack of investment in some sectors of our Canadian industry, more especially as far as some resources are concerned. As a result of the review of some failures following honest attempts and discussions, recommendations and suggestions made to us, after having implemented and experimented with all these policies, we were still facing, as Canadians and as a government, a rate of unemployment and a rate of inflation which were clearly too high.

We therefore had to consider our tools for action, that is the existing laws, in order to face and deal with a situation which appeared to be of increasing complexity. That is why we had during the last two years a whole series of federal-provincial meetings in Ottawa as well as in the provincial capitals during which the federal government, together with the various provincial governments, analysed each sector of the country's economy in order to identify their weak spots, but also to come to an agreement concerning the ways to solve the problems. Mr. Speaker, after two years of concerted effort and consultation with and analyses, recommendations and suggestions from all parties concerned, we found it was necessary that the Canadian government established a mechanism for the purpose of dealing with all these recommendations from the private sector, from the labour sector and from the provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker, after some three years carrying out my duties as Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I had come to realize that it was necessary to better co-ordinate the efforts both at the federal and provincial levels, if we really meant to reach our objective of better regional equality.

The reason I am saying this, Mr. Speaker, is to better situate myself within this debate. We heard yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) make a somewhat negative speech. We were not at all surprised, for we have come to expect from him speeches like this, and for some 30 or 40 minutes yesterday, I listened to him as he criticized us and I read again his remarks this morning. I have been unable to discover one single positive remark. I shall return in a little while to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition, for I should like to deal now with the speech made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). On a number of occasions, I was very tempted to applaud his remarks, and I could not help in fact applauding when he resumed his seat. The hon. member told us what he really thought had to be done by the government and I tend to believe that the ideas put yesterday afternoon by the Leader of the New Democratic Party are largely similar to those we are developing and implementing. However, it is not an easy task. That will not be achieved right away. I would even go further, Mr. Speaker. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced some weeks ago the creation of an economic development board, I was most happy. Indeed, I had written to him some months ago to inform him of my views, my orientations, how I felt it was possible to better co-ordinate our economic decision-making policy. At that time I meant to inform him of my approach and appreciation of the situation. I wanted him to know that—although I was in charge of an economic portfolio having a specific task to achieve—I was aware of the fact that I could not take up such a challenge alone—although I could count on my department, its publics servants and a budget of half a billion dollars—unless the government and other departments would make a similar joint arrangement.

We could not meet this objective, Mr. Speaker, while ignoring the other economic problems of our country and the need to develop other sectors in other areas of Canada. I cannot believe that we will lessen economic disparities by curbing development in other regions. Some people do believe that we should slow down development in some areas to allow others to catch up. I am not quite prepared to agree with this theory, Mr. Speaker.

I think we must help all regions develop as much as possible and achieve their potential. It is only this way and by allowing potentially rich regions to develop as fast as possible that we will get the human and financial resources we need to help other regions which occasionally fall behind. It is within this context that I look at the role DREE will play as a very positive component of this new committee, this board of ministers, of that I can assure the House.

In the last three years, to give you an idea of the importance of the task and of the difficulties, when I came in DREE, we began to operate under a formula called the general development agreement. We negotiated and signed those agreements with the nine provinces in Canada, as there was a completely separate agreement with Prince Edward Island. It was the result of a three-year experience in MEER which made us realize that we needed a much more flexible piece of legislation, a much more flexible working tool.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) opposite understands very well what I mean. I think that that mechanism is not perfect, Mr. Speaker, but it is one of the best mechanisms the federal government has ever developed with the provinces to be able to work together, to fulfil both the objectives of the provinces and of the federal government. I hear criticism from time to time both on the opposition side and outside the House, namely that the federal government, through DREE agreements, forces its own will on to the provinces, but there is nothing less true.

If I take Newfoundland as an example, where DREE contributes 90 per cent of a project on which we have agreed, we do not impose our views upon the province. We have a discussion with the province representatives and they set forth their priorities and all their needs. We examine this along with them and we indicate where we think we could join and help them. We do not impose anything upon the province. The province has the last word on where our effort will be most useful when we accept to help. So we do not impose anything. We have signed with the province of Newfoundland a long list of agreements covering all sectors of economic activity in this province. We did the same with New Brunswick. We have practically completed the whole gamut of intervention sectors in Nova Scotia and, of course, we are involved in all sectors in Prince Edward Island. We are now involved in three-quarters of the areas of economic activity in Quebec, through agreements already in place. This is concerted action by both levels of government which want to attack the evil at the root, which want to activate and accelerate the development of their economy and particularly the resource sector.

Why is the federal government taking part in this effort? It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, since the provinces, under the Canadian constitution and the jurisdiction which is given to them, are responsible for and owners of these resources, that the federal government does not control the development of the Canadian economy 100 per cent. That is obvious to anybody who examines the situation. Since the resources belong to the provinces, are managed by them, and are subject to provincial legislation, their development will necessarily take place as and how the provinces see fit, according to their potential and the general economic outlook, both in Canada and around the world, and that is why we now have a general development agreement and we have signed subsidiary agreements in the past four years, over 100 in fact, Mr. Speaker. I have personally negotiated 80 of those agreements, and 60 major amendments to those agreements. It is no wonder that since I have been appointed head of the department, that is for three years, I have spent a large portion of my time in ministerial meetings, together with our officials, with the various provincial governments in a constant, commendable and sincere effort to help one another in achieving the common objectives of the two levels of government, namely the rational, reasonable development of the potential of each one of our provinces according to its possibilities and resources.

• (1652)

We signed those agreements and since its inception, Mr. Speaker, with the provinces and industry DREE has spent $3,600 billion. At this point in time, another $2 billion has been committed, money still to be paid out as a result of my own commitments or those of my predecessors—though they are largely mine for the last three years—as I was saying, over $2 billion will be paid to the provinces and industries under the Regional Development Incentives Act. To a very large extent, in fact my data confirm it, 82 per cent of my budget represents amounts committed under agreements signed with the various provincial governments in every field of economic activity.

As a result of that effort we are making together and will continue to make together we will do more together and in a more efficient way during the coming months thanks to the creation of that instrument of co-ordination. Mr. Speaker, I would not want to disclose any secrets but I am standing here with a little pride today, and more particularly today, and you understand what I mean, Mr. Speaker. Today, that board sat for the second time and today it made its first decision. So much for the criticisms made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition who said that DREE would disappear that DREE would be weakened, that its role would be less important. He said so yesterday. I am proud to be here today and announce that the first decision by the board this morning, a major decision, was made on a file submitted by myself, by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and in support of the most destitute province in this country, Newfoundland, that today the government of Canada made a clearly positive decision in support of the economy of the province of Newfoundland. That is the first step.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and through you hon. members of this House, that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is not about to disappear. Rather the opposite is happening thanks to the experience acquired in the past ten years, the work of our officials all across this country, the rather special situation in which we find ourselves with officials in every provincial capital working on a daily basis with the people at a provincial level, the people in each of those provinces, with industry people and groups representing the workers. The officials of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are those who are—and it is with great pleasure that I say this—are those who are best informed about local situations and who are in the best position to help this government reflect not only the situation but also the needs and projects it must support to increase economic activity in those areas. That department is doing its work and will continue to do so as effectively as possible through that co-ordination instrument.

To give you a better idea of the work they have done, Mr. Speaker, I said a while ago that we have signed more than 100 agreements. Over the last three years, and I said so in committee, in this House and publicly to the media, I tried to get the support of my colleagues. Did I succeed? Here is a little clue: out of 88 agreements signed during that period, 57 of them, from departments other than DREE, seconded my efforts.

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources joined DREE to sign agreements with the provinces on nine occasions. The Department of Transport—and transport is very important—joined DREE to sign agreements with provinces on 13 occasions.

I have signed agreements with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce on ten different occasions. I could give the whole list. On 57 occasions, federal departments jointed with DREE to support my action and my objectives in co-operation with the provinces not only by providing the technical assistance of federal public servants, but also by providing us with millions of dollars, even though not as much as I would have liked, I hasten to add. I did not get as much money as I would have wished from my colleagues when they jointed in my efforts. They gave me their moral support. They gave me the support of their policies. They gave me the support of their officials, and occasionally, the support of their funds, but not as much as I would have wished.

The Department of Transport has committed $60 million in co-operation with DREE, Employment and Immigration $46 million, Energy, Mines and Resources $10.5 million and Environment and Fisheries $9 million. You can see all the money that my colleagues have committed to my programs in addition to the contribution of DREE. All together, they have contributed $131,836,670. This is the effort of co-operation and co-ordination that I have tried to obtain and that I have been rather successfull in obtaining in the last three years. I am convinced that I have had enough discussions with my colleague, the president of the new Board of Economic Development Ministers, whom I know very well, to know what are our objectives. I can see that it is now five o'clock, so I shall continue at eight o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni)—Health and Welfare—Funding of Planned Parenthood Association; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Sports—Canada's participation in Moscow Olympics; the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack)—National Revenue—Sales tax rebate on inventories of manufactured goods.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITH FIRMS AND INDIVIDUALS OTHER THAN CROWN CORPORATIONS AND AGENCIES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all government contracts, excluding Crown corporations and agencies, with Canadian firms and individuals in the years 1976 and 1977.

● (1702)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I placed this motion on the order paper some time ago. The government has informed me that it is too costly and too time consuming to produce any of these documents, which number in the thousands, and we have no idea at all what it has done with these studies or whether any of the recommendations will be implemented. I would like to see many of them brought before the appropriate standing committee so that members of the opposition can review these contracts and studies to see what they are all about. I think Canadian taxpayers are entitled to know what is in all of these thousands and thousands of contracts and studies which are costing hundreds of millions of dollars.

I have been gathering statistical information over the past couple of years through questions on the order paper, and I have only a partial count. However, I have information on some 940 contracts with a total assessed value in excess of $225 million. In the second stage of my study I found out that the total amount paid to contract employees during the fiscal year 1975 was $25,720,000. In 1976 the total was in excess of $21 million. The figure must be astronomical if one included the amounts for those years prior to 1975 along with the figures for 1977 and 1978.

Nevertheless I have received some answers from the ministry with regard to public servants under contract. I would like to put on the record the costs for some departments to give the House an idea of the amounts spent. Agriculture, $3,275,000; Consumer and Corporate Affairs, $1,047,000; Fisheries and Environment, $3,870,000; Indian Affairs and Northern Development almost $16 million; Employment and Immigration, $2,859,000; and Supply and Services, $959,000.

It was interesting to listen to the statement made by the new Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) the other day. He said he believes in open government and will be co-operating with everyone. We hope, therefore, that some of these studies and contracts will be made available by his department.

I will now give some descriptions of these studies. Treasury Board spent $133,000 for a study on the psycho-social factors affecting the attitudes, motivations and behaviour of public servants. I do not know whether that study is just gathering dust on a shelf or whether any recommendations have been implemented. I think all opposition members are entitled to look at some of these documents and perhaps, some of them should be discussed in committees.

The next one I refer to is an $18,000 contract for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to provide consultation for accurately showing canoe routes on maps. Under the Department of National Health and Welfare there is a $4,000 study to write and edit a handbook on family planning for use by pharmacists when providing information to their clientele on family planning matters. I do not know whether any pharmacists have received this or whether they use it.

There was also a study concerning the extent and level of divorce and marriage counselling services in selected communities in Ontario, for an amount of $2,000.

Under the Department of Public Works $20,000 was spent to provide fine art work for major postal plants at Saint John, New Brunswick. This was a contract given to a John Owen Cooper. I do not know who John Owen Cooper is. We should know a little bit about him and whether anything has been done with this particular study.

The next one I would like to point out is a $9,500 preliminary study for a golf course at Mirabel, Quebec. As if we have not squandered and wasted enough money on that white elephant without having some kind of a study for a golf course at Mirabel. What an extravagant waste of taxpayers' money that is! I would certainly like to look at that document.

The next one is a $118,000 contract to study publicity in connection with people living on expropriated land near Mirabel in the province of Quebec. We have certainly seen enough publicity about Mirabel without giving somebody $118,000 to do yet another study on publicity for Mirabel.

This list goes on and on. I see the Secretary of States' Department with an $11,000 study to prepare design proposals for large and miniature certificates of Canadian citizenship. It also is to provide finished art work for those certificates and prototypes of large certificates if requested. I wonder where that study is today. On occasion we in the opposition get copies of these studies and contracts. They are leaked to us; that is the only way we obtain them.

The next one I come to was done by E. P. Fitzgerald and Associates in Ottawa. It is a study on the economy, inflation, housing, use of tax bonds, reducing waste in government, etc. Accompanying this study there is a letter written by Mr. Fitzgerald, the principal, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I quote from the second paragraph in the letter:

> Also, at Ivan Head's suggestion I submitted the document to James Coutts for review which, owing to his crowded schedule, somewhat delayed proceedings.

I have information that absolutely nothing has been done with this document and I do not know what it cost. It is entitled "The Way Ahead," by E. P. Fitzgerald, who is an engineer. In the heading it mentions that Mr. Fitzgerald is a member of the Ottawa West Liberal Association. Are these contracts and studies being handed out to Liberal executives? Is it a pay-off? Is this part of what the Prime Minister talks about when he says in his campaigns that "there will be goodies for you"? Does he mean thousands and thousands of useless contracts just passed out to Liberal friends? Who knows? Let us table some of these studies and documents and look at them to see if any of them are worthwhile.

In this particular document by E. P. Fitzgerald and Associates it says:

> The purpose of this submission is not merely to comment on the contents of the working paper, but to suggest to the Prime Minister possible ways and means of developing a more rational approach towards controlling current and future inflationary trends in Canada than is at present available.

I questioned the Prime Minister in the House about this particular document some time ago and he did not know anything about it. Here it is, we have a copy of it. Probably none of the recommendations have been implemented, but somebody has likely received $25,000 or $35,000 for it.

Here are further examples of studies, and they are very questionable. The first one is an independent study to be made in relation to the government's response to the Finkelman report; the amount is $1,800. This is going to a Macey Schwartz. I do not know who Macey Schwartz is or how Macey Schwartz was picked out to do this study, unless she is on a Liberal executive in some riding in Canada.

Here is another one "to advise on ways and means of overcoming structural problems in the government's management process and to undertake a review of the government's approach to management." The amount for this study is $6,000 and this money went to a T. Taylor.

The contract description for the next one is "to provide advice and assistance to the decentralization review group, interview departmental officials, prepare reports and make recommendations." N. B. Moyer received $22,635 in connection with that. There are pages and pages of these contracts.

The next one I pick out is in the amount of $12,484 which goes to a J. E. Crowe. This contract was "to advise on pensions and insurance in connection with the personnel policy manual." Maybe there are some excellent recommendations in some of these studies, but who knows? Are any of the recommendations being implemented? Does anyone know that? Is there anyone that knows just what is going on? I think the government has a responsibility to make these documents available to everyone in the House. Probably the government backbenchers do not even know about these documents either, Mr. Speaker.

I see another one in the amount of $9,600 to a C. Nicholson which was for a contract to plan, develop and undertake research projects on specific aspects of the federal statistical system, specified by the interdepartmental committee on federal statistical activities. It would be very interesting to speak to the civil servant who drafted the wording of that contract description. How he ever dreamed that one up or why we even need such a study is a puzzle to me. That one cost $9,600, which went to C. Nicholson. On and on it goes.

● (1712)

My colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has been the champion in fighting this government with regard to freedom of information. He is a perfect example of why we need freedom of information. He is certainly on target when we see examples like those I just read into the record. The hon. member for Peace River put out a position paper on freedom of information. I quote from it:

> Hereafter follows the essentials of a program to restore some measure of parliamentary control.
>
> (1) Freedom of information and open government;

We do not have freedom of information or open government with regard to these thousands and thousands of contracts that are costing hundreds of millions of dollars and noboby knows what is happening to them.

> (2) Government accounting for spending of taxpayers' dollars;

There is no accounting here. We do not know anything about these documents or what is happening to them.

> (3) Need to answer for the use of special and extraordinary power taken by the Government;
>
> (4) More independence for private members of parliament.

As a private member, I hope to make some headway in convincing the government that some of these documents should be made available to members of the opposition. The hon. member for Peace River goes on to say, and I quote:

[Mr. McKenzie.]

> Information in the hands of the people, freely available, with the exception of a few clearly defined exemptions, is essential to any democracy.

This has been going on for the past 15 or 16 years. None of these documents, studies or contracts have been made available to any members of the opposition. How are we to function properly? We have a right on behalf of Canadian taxpayers to see whether something is being done with these studies and contracts and to determine whether they were needed in the first place. I again quote:

> Deception, lies and concealment, cover up of everything from stupid, unnecessary spending right through the erros, and corruption is the order of the day. And, because of this today, the anger, the disgust, the outrage, the cynicism, the total distrust of so many of our political institutions and leaders is frightening, but understandable.

We certainly have a classic example of that here. I have another document which was leaked to me a couple of years ago. It is an excellent study by Samson, Belair, Riddel and Stead on how the post office should be operated. I have asked that this document be made available to other members of parliament, but the government has refused.

I asked in committee why the Post Office does not implement the excellent recommendations contained in this report. I got no place at all because the Liberals and the NDP united to defeat my motion asking that we study the recommendations and implement some of them.

One of the most significant chapters in this document states that mail delivery should be left in the hands of private trucking companies. It gives dollar examples showing how the mail could be delivered cheaper by private truckers. The government completely ignored that recommendation and took away the contracting work from the independant contractors across Canada, the trucking firms, and got into the trucking business itself. That required an additional 129 trucks, 292 employees, and 105 part-time drivers. Hon. members can see the additional costs of operating the post office as a result of ignoring that excellent study. That document should have been referred to the standing committee so that every aspect of it could be studied. Hon members could have made a contribution with regard to implementing the excellent recommendations of that study.

I have further examples of these contracts. Mr. J. R. Clark received $4,000 to research and develop material for speeches given by the commissioners of the Canadian grain commission. Why on earth do we need a study like that? The government handed out $120,000 to Michael Arnold for a financial information system of higher education for federal and provincial governments. I do not know what that is all about.

It cost the Canadian taxpayers $4,950 for a study on services in a general support capacity to devise a feedback reporting system for user advisory services. Most of us would not understand that one, never mind what else is in the document. It cost $34,200 for a study on requirement contractual assistance in the area of accommodation planning.

On and on it goes. I have only a partial list of these contracts. I suggest this is something that could be looked at by the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras). The government talks about restraint and proper management. This could be a challenge to the new super minister. I hope whoever speaks for the government today will give us some information as to making some of these studies available. Maybe we cannot get them all, but possibly we can get a number of the choice ones, especially those I mentioned today. These should be made available to members of the opposition so that we can study them over the Christmas recess.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I normally start off my remarks by saying I am delighted and pleased to have an opportunity to reply to an hon. member's motion or private member's bill. However, I cannot begin my remarks like that today because I am not impressed with the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

This is not the first time we have witnessed this member take a negative position, not only in this House but with regard to questions raised in committee. The official opposition holds out to the Canadian people that it is reasonable. It tries to create the impression that it is sincere in doing its job as the official opposition. Members opposite talk about conservatism and restraint. However, this is the second time the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has come forward with an unreasonable request. I will be getting into some very specific details of that aspect.

Before getting into my general remarks, I want to take this opportunity on behalf of the new Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) to inform the House that he will be delighted to extend an invitation to the critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty). The minister is very sincere about this offer, and I am pleased that the hon. member is in the House so that I can seize this occasion to extend to him this official invitation.

● (1722)

The opposition critic and his colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, can come to the department. When they do, the appropriate officials will be duly notified that they should receive the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo and his colleague so that they can be informed about any aspect of the Department of Supply and Services.

The minister has indicated to me that he is presently preparing a comprehensive reply to the letter written by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo of December 7, 1978. The minister is quite prepared to reply to the ten points raised by the hon. member in his letter. I am delighted to inform the House that the minister will be complying with the request in the letter of December 7 from the official critic. In accordance with the policy of openness and willingness to share all available information which is not commercially confidential or which would not ordinarily be viewed by the public at large, such departmental information will be made available to Canadians.

It has been made very clear by the minister that he wants hon. members from all corners of this House to have an equal opportunity to come and be received graciously by the officials of the department. When it is deemed convenient such hon. members will be made more than welcome. Departmental officials have received and accepted this instruction from the minister, and it will be followed to the letter. As far as we are concerned, members of parliament are the most important people not only with respect to this House but also with respect to the various departments with which the Department of Supply and Services is involved.

I want to put some facts with respect to the motion before us this afternoon on the record. The department has studied this request and the size of the task outlined in this motion. I want to tell hon. members just what this motion would entail. I emphasize that the government wants to provide information which would be useful. We have tabled contracts in the past and will continue to do so within certain broad limits.

I referred earlier to commercial confidentiality. However, in our view, the current restraints on man-years and dollars would make it very difficult to comply with the hon. member's motion in the terms in which it is framed, particularly as there is still some doubt as to the purpose of the hon. members question. It is a very general question. It is not specific in any way.

All government departments issue contracts, although the Department of Supply and Services and the Department of Public Works, because of the nature of their work, are the major contracting departments.

I would like first to deal with contracts issued by these two departments, then I will speak about contracts issued by other departments.

The motion calls for copies of all government contracts with Canadian firms and individuals in the years 1976 and 1977. As hon. members know, the government's fiscal year runs from April 1 to the following March 31, and government statistics are compiled and maintained on a fiscal year basis.

In the fiscal year 1976-77 the Department of Supply and Services issued a total of 232,349 contracts and 30,662 amendments to Canadian firms or individuals, for a total of 263,011 documents. It has been determined that on the average each DSS contract contains 4.75 pages, while amendments consist of an average of two pages. In terms of sheets of paper, this becomes 1,103,658 pages for contracts and 61,324 pages for amendments, totalling 1,164,982 pages. In the next fiscal year, 1977-78, the department issued 265,305 contracts and 38,302 amendments. On the basis I have described, this represents a total of 1,336,803 pages, so that the number of contracts combined for those two years comes to 2,501,785 pages.

Mr. Beatty: Could we have that in English, please?

Mr. Harquail: At this point I would like to inform the House that the Department of Supply and Services, in accordance with government policy, does its business and issues contracts in accordance with the language choice of the public to be served. That would answer the hon. member's question about language. The policy of this government is to serve the public in both official languages.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for interrupting the parliamentary secretary, but my question related to the figure he gave. I think he said, "2,501,785". I wonder what that would be in English. I wonder if he would give that figure again.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the hon. member's attitude. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo and the other hon. member make a good pair. They have displayed their attitude in this House and their respect for other members while they are speaking. I think that remark will just be left with the hon. member, and if he will be polite enough, I will continue with this information. If he is able to grasp the figures, I will be happy to continue.

Mr. Beatty: If you are able to say them.

Mr. Harquail: I would like to inform the House that in accordance with government policy the Department of Supply and Services does its business and issues contracts in both official languages. In providing these documents to the House there is a requirement that they be prepared in 12 copies.

A simple calculation shows that 2.5 million pages in both official languages reproduced 12 times for each language gives something in the order of 60 million sheets of paper. We have estimated that the paper used for the reproduction of these documents would weigh 375 tons. This is still only for those contracts issued by the Department of Supply and Services.

When my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), asked the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to withdraw his motion, it was not to deny him the information but to avoid a costly and time-consuming chore. I repeat the invitation to that hon. member to join with his colleague, the official critic, and to come to the department at an appropriate time which is convenient to all, and we will be very happy to let them ask officials their questions.

Let us consider the cost of this work. What would it cost the Canadian taxpayer? We have assumed that a translator could produce 20 pages of work per day. Using this as a base, the requirement can then be expressed as something in the order of 482 man-years of work. At an average salary of $20,000 per annum, we arrive at a figure of $9,640,000 for translation alone.

The cost of paper alone has been estimated at $420,000, and to this we add reproduction costs at three cents per copy, or $2,220,000. The gathering and copying time was estimated at two man-months in each of the 29 locations for 4.8 man-years at an average salary of $12,000, which gives a total cost of $57,600. Is the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo able to follow this? I could slow down if that is his wish, but there is much more factual information I want to get on the record for the benefit of Canadians so that they will understand how ridiculous the motion before us is.

To achieve some continuity in this effort it is essential that someone be assigned to co-ordinate the receipt, translation and transmittal of these documents to the House for the duration of the translation process. It is felt that three man-years at $15,000 each might be a realistic figure. Then the mailing of the documents from the 29 points of origin across the country, at bulk mail rates, would run to some $20,000.

• (1732)

You can appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that the preliminary figures with which we came up indicate that it would cost the Department of Supply and Services some $12 million, and it would take a total of over 490 man-years to complete this task solely for DSS contracts.

Let us now turn to the other major contracting department, namely, the Department of Public Works. That department issues approximately 10,000 contracts each year, averaging four pages each. Using the same process as we did for DSS, these 10,000 contracts, at four pages each, represent 960,000 sheets of paper annually. The costs of copying these contracts has been calculated at some $57,600, and at $13,440 for the cost of paper. The time taken for their translation has been estimated at 15.4 man-years, representing an estimated cost of $308,000, so that the total cost involved in carrying out the request contained in the motion, in so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned, is approximately $379,040. To these costs must be added the cost of gathering, co-ordinating, transmittal and mailing, to bring the figure for the Department of Public Works well above $400,000.

It is our estimate that about 550,000 contracts are issued annually by other departments of the government. In general, these contracts are simpler and of a lower value than those issued by the Department of Public Works or by the Department of Supply and Services. Accordingly, they probably consist of a page each per document. Here again, the arithmetic is interesting. We find that the return demanded by the motion for these 550,000 contracts annually would involve 26,400,000 sheets of paper. The cost of paper would be $184,800, the cost of copying at three cents a page would be $792,000, and the translation would require 212 man-years, at an over-all approximate cost of $4,240,000.

Because this return involves such a multiplicity of departments, the job of co-ordinating becomes more complex and is estimated to be in the area of 20 man-years at $15,000 each, for a total of $300,000.

The total bill—and this will be interesting to all the taxpayers in Canada—to comply with this ridiculous request would run to an estimated $18 million.

The government is anxious to respond to this hon. member's and to all hon. members' legitimate desire and requests to look into contracts. However, it has been the normal pattern for members of the House to inquire about specific contracts or specific areas of contracting. It seems to me that the taxpayers of Canada would have a serious objection to the expenditure of $18 million, unless there were a very defined and important objective behind the request which could not be met in a more effective and less costly way.

It would be helpful to know the true purpose of the motion. It might be that the motion flows from either a concern that the government's contracting systems are not open or accessible, or possibly from recent comments by the Auditor General on contracting in government. First, I would like to deal with possible concerns about openness in the contracting activities of the government, and in particular within the Department of Supply and Services.

Openness in the contracting system of the Department of Supply and Services is achieved through a wide dissemination of relevant contracting information to the Canadian public. This policy of openness is a further good reason why the requested contract documents need not be tabled. In order to understand fully how openness with respect to contracting information is achieved, it is first necessary to understand the role of DSS in contracting, which I will describe. In addition, it will be necessary to cover the responsibilities and procedures for contracting in so far as DSS is involved. Then I will describe the mechanisms used to provide all relevant DSS contracting information to the Canadian public. I will conclude with examples of the significant benefits achieved by the current availability and provision of contracting information to the public, which will underscore the lack of necessity for tabling all contracts for the year 1976-77.

The Department of Supply and Services provides a wide range of services to other federal government departments and agencies. The department is divided into two sections: supply administration and services administration. The services administration is responsible for the distribution of the cheques issued by the federal government, including payroll, pension and family allowance cheques. In addition, it is responsible for accounting, audit and management advisory services within the federal government. The supply administration is responsible for the procurement of everything from typewriters to tanks and ships for the federal government, buying about $3 billion worth of goods and services in 1976-77 alone.

Besides procurement, the supply administration is responsible for the provision of such other common services as printing and publishing, traffic management, warehousing and distribution, and expositions. Reporting to the Minister of Supply and Services and working closely with the supply administration is the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation which is responsible for the sale of surplus goods to the public.

The supply administration's prime objective is to provide or obtain the goods and services essential to government programs at a fair and reasonable price and, at the same time, to ensure prudence and probity in the expenditure of public funds and an equal opportunity for Canadian business and industry to do business with the federal government.

As I have mentioned, one of the major impediments to tabling copies of all contracts is the sheer volume of documentation. I will give a description of the contracting responsibilities and procedures in order to indicate the complexities involved which, in turn, are reflected in contract documentation.

In a general way, the supply administration operates in a similar fashion to a supply organization within a major firm in that it is part of a larger corporation, that is, the federal government, and the basic services provided are similar. However, with close to $3 billion of annual buying power, the sheer magnitude and diversity of government operations places the supply administration in a unique position with respect to private sector supply operations. In this respect the supply administration's prime objectives are, first, to obtain the goods and services essential to government programs at a fair and reasonable price, while at the same time, second, to ensure prudence and probity in the expenditure of public funds, and third, to provide an equal opportunity to all Canadians to do business with the federal government on a fair and reasonable basis.

In the contracting process, these objectives are achieved through a judicious sharing of responsibilities between the supply administration and its customer program departments. For example, a policy has been developed which delegates low dollar value contracting responsibilities to customers, and there are provisions which allow customers the necessary flexibility to conduct emergency purchasing, where appropriate. Aside from this, some aspects of services contracting are a customer department's responsibility, although the supply administration does conduct a wide range of services contracting.

Within the contracting mandate of the supply administration, the actual process of purchasing can, and frequently does, involve much more than issuing tenders and evaluating bids. It begins with the identification of an operational need by a customer department, the funding for which must be provided for in the department's annual main estimates submission.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise to join in this debate. First I want to indicate that I was pleased to receive the invitation extended to me by the new Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) through his parliamentary secretary. I indicated to the minister, when he was first appointed, that I welcome his appointment because, from my experience with him while he was on the backbenches on the government side I found he had proven himself to be an individual concerned about the rights of parliament and recognizing the fact that Canadians are entitled to information concerning the way in which the government is spending money.

I should like to indicate to the minister that I will indeed be taking him up on his offer and I will be making a point of visiting the various officials within his department, that I will be looking for information to fulfil my responsibilities, and will be bringing with me my colleagues who are also interested in learning about the activities of the Department of Supply and Services.

There will be two particular areas in which we will be looking as we visit the officials in the Department of Supply and Services. First, and most important, we will want to ensure in all instances that, in a department which spends several billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money every year, the taxpayers' money is well spent. That is one of the main criteria which we will be applying. Second, we will want to know what policies are being followed by the government in determining how contracts will be let. For example, what are their tendering procedures and what actions are being taken to ensure that the taxpayer gets the greatest value for his money.

● (1742)

We will also want to know to what extent is the purchasing policy of the Department of Supply and Services being used as a means for promoting growth in the economy, for example, growth in slow growth areas, the small business sector of our economy, and in Canadian industry at the expense of contracts being given to foreign companies.

The purpose of the motion for production of papers put down on the order paper by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) appears to have escaped the parliamentary secretary. More than once he said that he did not understand why the motion would have been put forward. If the government followed a procedure of openness and seriously believed in it, it would not have to question the motivation of my colleague. The principle should be there, that these things should be open and that access to information should be granted to every citizen. The government should not have the right to demand to know why citizens or members of parliament want to know how the government is spending its money. It should be a matter of right that citizens should have access to this information, and not a matter of discretion on the part of the government.

I apologize if I upset the parliamentary secretary during his speech by asking him if he would give the figures again which he was quoting. I was attempting to make notes of the figures he was quoting regarding the number of pages he would be required to table if the motion were put forward. Unfortunately when his officials wrote his speech, apparently they did not rehearse his delivery. He has difficulty with numbers which cannot be counted on his fingers and toes. Unfortunately in this particular instance he stumbled, and it was very difficult to understand what he was saying.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Harquail) is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I think every member in the House knows about the problem with the hon. member who is speaking now, concerning the silver spoon in the mouth, spoiled, and so on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I should like to hear the parliamentary secretary's point of order.

Mr. Harquail: I am getting to my point of order. I just wanted to remind the member, if he is not already aware of this fact, that he will have an opportunity to rehearse himself, and to read the facts which I put forward, in Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Beatty: I am sure, as the parliamentary secretary is, that the Hansard reporters will be much more faithful to the text which he was reading than was his delivery. I will look forward to reading Hansard.

Mr. Harquail: I hope the hon. member has the ability to understand Hansard.

Mr. Beatty: It is worth while for us to take a look at some of the contracts let by the government, and at some of its tendering procedures. I should like to refer the House to the Auditor General's report released in parliament a couple of weeks ago. One of the very interesting findings of the Auditor General related to the entire tendering process. I raised a question in the House on the day the Auditor General's report was released, November 24. I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about this. My specific question read as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question about the Auditor General's report. As the Prime Minister will be aware the Auditor General states in his report that throughout the government, contracts of great value are given out without calling for competitive tenders.

More contracts without tenders are given out than with competitive tenders being called.

It continued:

> For example, the Auditor General points out that the Department of Supply and Services alone signed about 90,000 contracts, totalling over $1,800 million, without calling for competitive tenders.

I asked the Prime Minister how he could justify this particular activity, particularly in view of the fact that it would appear to fly in the face of the government's own regulations regarding tenders. Surely the motion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is designed to give parliament access to this sort of information, so that we know the way in which the government's tendering process has been going, and whether money being spent by the government, which is held in trust on behalf of taxpayers, is being well spent. Surely Canadians are entitled to that information. It is an anomaly, and it is something about which I will be requesting information from the minister.

In the period looked at by the Auditor General, of the contracts identified as the source, one half of them in total numbers were given out without competitive tenders being called. Approximately two thirds of the value of the contracts given out were without competitive tendering. What confidence do Canadian taxpayers have that their money is being well spent if the bulk of this department's contracting in this area, or two thirds of the contracts, were given out without competitive tenders being called?

In the House of Commons in the course of the last couple of weeks we have debated the issue of Loto Select. This is another instance where the government rushed into signing contracts on behalf of Canadians which ultimately will cost taxpayers several millions of dollars, because the government botched its attempt to set up a computerized lottery. Members of parliament on this side of the House—during the last couple of weeks—have requested information as to the nature of those contracts signed by Loto Canada. When one recognizes the fact that the General Instruments contract had a reported face value of approximately $23 million, than surely Canadians are entitled to know the substance of that contract. When I raised the question in the House of Commons, I was questioning on behalf of my constituents and Canadian taxpayers. I was told that parliament would be denied that information because the government specifically wrote into the contract a confidentiality clause which forbade the giving out of information concerning the spending of this public money.

What possible justification is there for government to operate in secrecy when it committed $23 million of taxpayers' money? What possible justification could there be? We are left to speculate as to what the cause was. One of the apparent reasons was that the government was so anxious to get into the Loto Select program, pre-empt the $1 computerized lottery deal, and to get in there before the provinces did, that it operated in haste and secrecy. The government made every effort possible to prevent the provinces from knowing what was happening lest the provinces should get into the field before the government did. The cost for the success the government had in getting in there first, and the cost the government had for operating in secrecy, will be several millions of dollars of Canadian taxpayers' money being poured down the drain.

We do not know yet what the figure will be. We will not know until the government has been successful in negotiating its way out of these contracts. But the government has made it clear all the way along the line that it preferred to operate in secrecy, rather than share with Canadians information concerning the manner in which this money was being spent.

Other questions arise out of this particular contract. The contract with General Instrument for $23 million was given out to an American computer company headquartered in Baltimore, Maryland, without tenders being called by the federal government. This is a highly competitive field. There were Canadian businesses in the field which were equipped and anxious to bid on this multi-million dollar contract, but they were strictly forbidden. The government did not allow competitive tendering. In the past when we asked the government why it did not allow competitive tendering, its answer was that it wanted to favour Canadian companies, that it did not want a lower bid to be brought in by a foreign competitor, and that it wanted to ensure the benefit stayed in Canada. This was a case where the government signed a contract for $23 million, in secrecy. It did not allow Canadian companies to compete. Now the government finds it has so badly mishandled the matter that the cost to the Canadian public will be several million dollars.

In connection with this same computerized lottery program, another contract appears to have been given out. It was a contract to Addressograph-Multigraph, Ltd. It was designed for that firm to create machinery—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Milne: I apologize to the hon. member opposite for interrupting his speech. Would he put on the record the names of the Canadian companies which had the capabilities for answering the contract?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) to the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) who communicated with the minister at the time. He gave the minister a number of names of companies which would have been interested. I am sure he is prepared to make those names available at any time to any hon. member opposite who wants them. I am sure he would be delighted to do that because one of the companies was headquartered in his constituency. He heard from these companies afterwards that they were very disturbed by the fact they were not allowed to participate in this contract.

Mr. Milne: Are the names of these companies on the public record?

Mr. Beatty: Certainly my colleague would be prepared to put the names on the public record. The difficulty was that the companies were not allowed to compete because tenders were never called. They could not even offer themselves to do the job. After the fact, they found out the contract had been given out to an American company.

Before the hon. member asked his question, I was raising the matter of Addressograph-Multigraph, Ltd. According to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a contract was signed by Loto Select for $5 million. At the present time the federal government is attempting to negotiate out of this contract too at the collapse of Loto Select. According to the report on the CBC the cost of negotiating out of this contract could be up to 20 per cent of the face value of the contract itself. It could be up to $1 million.

• (1752)

I asked the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) just last week about this particular contract, and whether or not, when she gave the figure of $2 million or $3 million of Canadians' money being poured down the drain already on the Loto Select program, she included the Addressograph-Multigraph contract. She was unwilling even to give the House that information. Again we see an example of how the government prefers to operate in secrecy and how it feels that Canadians are not entitled to full information on how their money is being spent.

My friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, put on the record a number of contracts which he felt were questionable and which he felt parliament had a responsibility, as trustee of the public's money, to investigate and hold the government to account for. Another one I raised in the House myself a couple of years ago was one in which it was discovered that the federal government was contracting out for a study to be done of public washroom facilities.

If you were in the National Arts Centre washroom a couple of years ago, Mr. Speaker, you might very well have noticed while you were in there that there were people in there with a tape recorder in one hand and a stopwatch in the other, timing the amount of time it took you to use the various facilities. This information was gathered up from various public washrooms, fed through a computer at a cost to the taxpayer of some $200,000, so they could get some indication of how long it took people to use facilities in public washrooms. This again is an example, which I think boggles the mind, that governments are capable of getting into this sort of contract. When governments operate in secrecy without public scrutiny, this sort of contract is all the more possible. Anywhere but in Ottawa a person would be arrested for hanging around washrooms watching people. In Ottawa they get paid $200,000. There is something terribly wrong here.

I also want to deal with a couple of other matters which I think are of concern as well. I raised a question on Monday in the House about a contract which had been given to the Robertson, Nickerson Groups Associates Limited. This particular group did a study on behalf of the federal government of the training of skilled blue collar workers. Again this was done at a cost to the taxpayer. We do not know what the cost was. The government does not appear to be very forthcoming in terms of information as to its costs. We do not even know when it was received by the government. But a copy of it has become available and it is clear that in the report the group condemns the government for its handling of its manpower training policies, and points out that at a time in Canada when we have runaway unemployment, with over one million people who cannot find jobs, there is actually a shortage of skilled blue collar industrial workers and we are forced to import people from abroad to fill those jobs which are available today.

Was this report freely given out by the government? Was it tabled in parliament? Was it made available to the private sector as soon as it was received by government? No, it was received through the back door. Even on Monday my office called the minister's office to ask whether it would be possible to get a copy of this report. What were we told? Initially we were informed that they did not know what report it was we were talking about; then the minister's assistant was out all morning. He was just out of the office, or out to lunch. Then finally we learned that the minister's office could not find their copy. It had apparently disappeared somewhere. Fortunately I have a copy of this report, and I was able to make it available to members of the House who were concerned about it.

Surely this is symptomatic of the problems we have been dealing with here. It is symptomatic of the problem my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, wants to cure. When public funds are being spent the public should surely have the right to see the way in which that money is being spent. The public should surely have the right to examine these contracts, and should surely have the right to study the reports which are received back by the government after the tax money has been spent.

We should take a look at the broad range of government contracting procedures and do everything possible to make sure they are open and that Canadians are not just tolerated, or that scrutiny by Canadians is not just tolerated but should be invited by the government. When the federal government is spending some $50 billion every year of taxpayers' funds, we have the responsibility as public trustees to ensure that the money is well spent. We should recognize that it is not our money and not the government's money but is the public's money.

When it comes to freedom of information the principle is very simple. It should be that the information is the property of the people and not the property of government, and the onus should be on the government to justify withholding information, not on the people to justify getting the information.

I would refer hon. members of the House to the order paper. You can look, on any day, and see the number of questions which remain on the order paper, questions asking for information on contracts, about government policies, and about actions taken by various cabinet ministers. Often this information is extremely straightforward, yet these questions sit on the order paper day after day after day, week after week, and month after month. In come cases the questions have stayed on the order paper for years unanswered.

I myself have a number of questions on the order paper at the present time asking about the government's purchasing policies and how much money it spends on various items. I made the offer to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) that if he felt it was too costly to provide this information, which had its genesis in the Auditor General's report, and if he felt it was too cumbersome and time consuming, I would appreciate hearing that from him and would be willing, in instances where he could justify that, to withdraw the questions. The parliamentary secretary did not take me up on that offer. He did not say that these questions were too expensive or time consuming; he just simply left them unanswered. Surely this is a classic example of the way in which the government deals with this whole question of the public's right to know the way in which the government is operating.

With most contracts and most reports, extra copies are printed. It is not terribly costly for the government to give those copies, or make them freely available to members of parliament and the public. I think the time has come when the House of Commons should be on record as supporting the right of the public and the right of parliamentarians to do that job of holding the government to account, scrutinizing the spending activities of government and making sure that every single penny taken from the taxpayers of Canada is properly and wisely spent. If we do not take that action today, and if we do not stand up on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada, we will be letting them down at a very important time in our history.

* * *

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-10, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

The House of Commons, having considered the proposed text of the order in council laid upon the Table of the House on 4 December 1978, in relation to the establishment of a Ministry of State for Economic Development, prays that the making of the said order in council be approved.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When the House adjourned at five o'clock I was giving a brief historical account of the co-operation and co-ordination we managed to get in the last three years in the pursuit of the objectives of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I was talking about the importance and the need of obtaining that co-operation from other federal departments in the pursuit of those objectives because it is quite obvious that a department could not take up that challenge alone.

I did get that co-operation, as I mentioned for that matter with supporting evidence, and I repeat it tonight, that co-operation is absolutely necessary and is becoming increasingly so if we truly want to reach those objectives. That is why, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister announced the formation of the Board of Economic Development Ministers I was very pleased because I think it is a step toward the achievement of my objectives which are precisely to bring a greater number of departments and officials of those departments at the federal level, to inform them and urge them to join in the efforts we are making to develop remote and isolated areas, those that in the last decades did not have the same degree of development as the rest of the country. And I was saying that in that effort, on the other hand, we should not lose sight of the need to co-ordinate our efforts in terms of our economic and industrial policies to make sure that the more aggressive parts of our country will continue to develop at their normal pace.

I also referred to the understanding of the former president of the Treasury Board and the new minister who was assigned the task of presiding over the board, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Andras)—I think we both have a good understanding of the objectives the Prime Minister wants to see us achieve as a result of the establishment of that board. This afternoon and yesterday we were able in listening to the speeches and the arguments of members of this House but previously to realize the importance of having a better co-ordination. Opposition members can attack that government proposal all they want, see it as a division, try to see a downgrading of certain departments, of their autonomy, well, to them I say this: I think Canadians as a whole want better development, a faster and orderly development of Canada's economy, more wealth and more jobs.

If certain departments have to co-ordinate their activities and forgo a certain part of their autonomy, and if this is the price we have to pay, I suggest that the price is not too high. I believe we would be making very few concessions, and then mostly as concerns our pride, by accepting to sit with five, six or seven other ministers or departments to co-ordinate our activities aimed at supporting Canadian economic development.

I would now like to talk about the criticisms that have been made, for instance, by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who said yesterday that this new body would swallow up departments such as DREE in particular and make them fade away so that they will no longer have any influence or any hope of attaining their goals.

Were I a cynic, Mr. Speaker, I would be tempted to tell the Leader of the Opposition that he should be happy at the result he expects because, if we go back two years, when the Leader of the Opposition took over his present responsibilities, in his first speech in New Brunswick he suggested that DREE was useless and should be abolished. In fact, I have here a copy of this speech, which was made at the University of New Brunswick. A few months later, Mr. Speaker, on his return from the maritime provinces, he made another speech in which he amended his previous position. He said that DREE was probably a good department, but that it was badly managed, especially because it imposed its will on the provinces. He went on from there. However, a year later, he went back to New Brunswick and made another speech. This time he said: DREE is a good department. It is useful and did good things in the Atlantic provinces but, you know, it might be reorganized a little. It might have a larger budget and with better co-operation from other departments it might probably do more. He had made some progress. He did so because he was told in the Atlantic provinces, particularly by Newfoundland and New Brunswick Conservative premiers, about the work done by DREE in the Atlantic provinces, something which the Leader of the Opposition was not fully aware of.

This is why he took the risk, if I may say so, to criticize in the Atlantic provinces the work of the department which is presently one of the best perceived and supported in the four Atlantic provinces. That can be seen in the results of federal-provincial conferences here in Ottawa where nine of the ten premiers supported without any reservation the action, the work and the co-operation they have received from DREE in the last ten years. The Leader of the Opposition realized he had made a mistake, so he withdrew and corrected this statements. It demonstrates that you can sometimes learn from experience. Of course, he says that it is a delegation of authority and denounces the secrecy in government operations. I do not see what DREE has to do in those allegations because there is not much secrecy in our operations with the provinces. He said that the department was going to disappear and I might comfort him by telling him that not only it will not disappear but it will become one of the most important tools in the achievement of economic development and industrial strategy of this government and this political party.

And the action of DREE will increase in coming months and years because it is a tool, a mechanism absolutely necessary because of its flexibility which allows us to adjust, from time to time, to changing situations in various provinces. You can be sure, Mr. Speaker, that the department will not only continue to assume its responsibilities but also that those responsibilities will be increased in the coming years.

● (2012)

The Leader of the Opposition once again criticized this group because it will have too much power, because there will be too much power concentrated in the hands of a small number of ministers and that in fact this power will be exercised to the detriment of other departments. Yet at the same time and almost in the same vein he became critical of the fact that certain departments have been left out of this board of ministers, among others the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Fisheries and Environment which in his mind should have been part of this board. It is therefore very difficult to reconcile the arguments put forth by the Leader of the Opposition who, on the one side, says that this body wields too much power and on the other side, that he would like to see other departments included in this board.

Of course we could argue extensively over the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition but I think I will content myself with these few comments simply to conclude that perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will be in a better position to judge during the coming weeks and the coming months the actions and the decisions taken by the Board of Economic Development Ministers. We have to take very specific actions which will even match certain suggestions made this afternoon by some hon. members opposite. We are conscious that if we want to implement these recommendations which number more then 800, probably half of them have already more or less been applied within the system. The 800 recommendations have come out of the 23 sectorial studies by a very broad selection of financial, industrial and labour leaders and representatives of the various levels of government during these past 12 months. These tasks force have dealt with 23 sectors of our economic activity. These people have made a great number of recommendations.

How can we expect the government to be able to implement all these recommendations if there is no mechanism for consultation and co-ordination, in order to study them and try to estalish some form of programming because it is quite impossible to implement them altogether at the same time. One must therefore provide for a gradual implementation of these recommendations made to us. Priorities will also have to be established in this gradual process for the implementation of these programs and these new formulas. That will have to be done by working closely and consulting with the provinces. All of that calls for a group of ministers to fulfil this task, this responsibility of conveying regularly in order to review these recommendations, to check and experiment as deemed necessary. We need that mechanism, and that is precisely what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is giving us. He indicated he was going to do so by setting up the Board of Economic Development Ministers.

The hon. member of the Social Credit Party of Canada who spoke yesterday said that, in short, that board was a panic board. I shall not dwell on that at any length. In no way is it a panic board. It was set up after considerable thought, to solve a problem to meet a need. Rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that we shall not act under the stress of panic. We know what our objectives are. There are policies on which we will have to pass judgment. There are interventions the Canadian government will have to make in several sectors of the economy in coming months and years. Those interventions will be well thought out. There is no question of panic here. We will have to make decisions, and recommendations to the right hon. Prime Minister and the cabinet on what we believe the decisions should be. The departments will be responsible for delivering, implementing, applying and developing the decisions of the cabinet. That is how it will operate. It will not be a department with 2,000 or 3,000 employees as has been suggested in some quarters.

The department will include a maximum of 150 employees selected in other departments and, as a result of some consultations, there will probably be some DREE officials who will join that team to make sure that the purposes and objectives of DREE are well reflected in the decisions which that board will be led to take. Indeed, there is nothing improvised in the announcement made by the Prime Minister three weeks ago. There is absolutely no improvisation and it is merely the normal result of a development, of discussions which have been going on for two years in the country and in this House, and especially during cabinet meetings.

I see that the time allowed to me, Mr. Speaker, will soon come to an end and I would like to conclude with some more specific comments and more especially ask the members of this House and Canadians generally for their co-operation, because I think that Canadians are interested in the debate, realizing that there is an opportunity to take up the challenges they are facing.

Personally, I shall willingly work within the board with a wide open approach. I am not limited in my outlook, I am not prejudiced, I would quite simply examine these proposals. I would like to examine the segments of our Canadian economy. I would like in particular to see how the development of each segment can be integrated with the stepped-up development of the so-called underdeveloped, or not adequately developed areas. Such is my department's role, and through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the House as well as every province and municipality, but provinces especially, and also the various groups and industries throughout Canada, whether in Newfoundland or Labrador, northern Quebec, northern Ontario or northern Alberta, that in pursuit of our goal we will consider the particular needs and above all the potential of each of those areas, because there is a vast potential in the vast northern parts of each of our Canadian provinces. As a Canadian government, I believe it is part of our responsibility to ensure that the road we have been and will be covering, especially during the next few months, is consistent with the need for balanced development in the economies of each of our regions.

In conclusion, I would ask my colleagues in this House to support the motion put forward by the Prime Minister. It is totally non-partisan, it reflects the commendable will, and this of course will be perfectly understood, of this government to achieve in co-operation with provincial governments a more rational development of this country's potential for the benefit of all Canadians.

● (2022)

[English]

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I was not able to follow the minister's eloquent address in his native tongue because I am sure it would have been more interesting than hearing it through a translation. I have seldom heard him so worked up or so eloquent—and in such an ignoble cause. The hon. gentleman was doing his best in a cause which he knows is lost.

When I look at this order in council, at this economic management board, I think of the old program "Superman" we used to hear on radio and read about in the comic papers—today it is a movie. "Is it a bird? Is it a plane? No, it's super-Andras." Or shall we shorten that in the future and say it is super-ass? What a confession of utter failure and economic bankruptcy on the part of the government that it should now, in the fifth year of its term, set up an economic development board under a president! It is an admission that all through its term since 1974 the government has failed in the area of economic development. Even the admission to the economic development ministers of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), from our ranks, did nothing to redeem the failure they have been experiencing for the last five years.

I know this is not an exact quote, Mr. Speaker, but the saying is that in that in the valley of the blind the one-eyed man is king. Well, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras), the hon. member from the twin cities, the one-eyed man, is the new president of the board and in the valley of the blind he is king. The others are blind, they cannot see, they have failed utterly to accomplish anything. So they will be further ahead with a one-eyed squinter than with the seven ministers who have held those portfolios over the last few years.

Before I get launched on this address of mine, let me give you a quotation from Khrushchev. I am going right to the source, Mr. Speaker—the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) would tremble with delight were he to hear this quotation from Khrushchev who is very dear to his heart. Khrushchev once said, "Economics is a subject which does not greatly respect one's wishes." That is what has been happening in the last four or five years. The government has wished that it was competent in the economic field but economics does not respect one's wishes. Mr. Khrushchev found that out in Russia, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is finding it out in Canada. Indeed he has found it out, and now in the last, desperate extremities of his reign he appoints this superminister of economics.

I want to give several quotations at the start, Mr. Speaker, so that you may get the flavour of my address. W. C. Fields once said "The cost of living has gone up another dollar a quart." I wish the leader of the New Democratic Party were here tonight to hear something that would appeal to him, but he won't stay to hear anybody speak but himself. He gave us a lecture yesterday on the planned economy. Under a planned economy, said Mr. Carey McWilliams everything is included in the plan except economy. That is the kind of planned economy hon. gentlemen to my left would give us if the people of Canada were so desperate or so down in the dumps, or so abysmally dismal in their outlook as to give that gang in the corner their vote.

Finally, my last quotation—from now on it is going to be pure me, Mr. Speaker. It is from George Bernard Shaw. Mr. Shaw said that "if all economists were laid end to end"—my God, what a lay that would be—"they would not reach a conclusion." That is what we have got here tonight. The government has been laid end to end. The ministers of the government have been laid end to end. The people of Canada have been laid end to end, and the government has not yet reached a conclusion.

● (2032)

I do not want to be critical. Have you ever noticed how every time this government gets into a little bit of difficulty, it adopts a change in nomenclature? The minister of employment, the gentleman who the other day was referred to as being "cullenized", was once the minister in charge of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. They changed his title to minister of employment. It did not mean the employment of one more Canadian. The status of unemployed Canadians never changed one iota because the minister has his title changed from minister of unemployment to the minister of employment. Every now and then this government wants a little name change.

Mr. Nystrom: It helps the sign painters.

Mr. Crosbie: It helps the sign painters as my friend, "nosy nostrum", says, or "nasty nosetrum", or whatever his name is. He is from Saskatchewan, I believe. You know that little cartoon, that is "nasty nostrum". He hangs on a balloon floating along in the sky. That is the NDP party. They are floating along in the sky.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You sound like Allan Fotheringham.

Mr. Crosbie: This government believes in sleight of hand. Whenever things get difficult, they change the name, set up another board or set up another group. What they have done this time is set up another minister. It is the old shell game. How many peas are under the shell? Under which shell is the pea? We are getting "pea'd" off with this government. We know what shell the pea is under. They do not have to carry on this shell game any longer for us. We know what the end result of that game is.

This is the emperor's new clothes policy. Do you remember the old fairy tale of the emperor who wanted to change his clothes? He was persuaded that he had clothes on, that he was looking beautiful. When he walked down the street, he had nothing on. He was naked as a newt. This is the emperor's new clothes policy. Whenever the government is in difficulty, its members change their clothes. They try to persuade us they have clothes on when they are naked. They have no ideas, no policy, no action, no follow through, nothing. They are naked. This economic development board is the emperor's new clothes.

Mr. Nystrom: Hear that, Monique? Naked government!

Mr. Crosbie: I did not know the hon. minister was here. I would not have mentioned that word naked.

Let us look at industry, trade and commerce. This is one of the departments that has been decapitated. It has had its head removed by the new economic development board. You might ask why that department should have its head removed. The answer is because the head has been so ineffective it might as well be removed. No wonder the Prime Minister set up this economic development board.

On November 9, 1977, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) stated, "We are on threshold of tremendous growth." I do not know where he was sitting. He must have been sitting on top of the deficit. The deficit had tremendous growth, but Canada did not. As a forecaster, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is supposed to be one of the super powers in the economic ministry of the government, does not get full marks.

On October 5 of this year he stated in Sarnia that the Canadian economy is entering a period of stable growth. The Canadian economy went from tremendous growth to stable growth. At least that was something. Now we are in a period of stable growth. This is the same gentleman who said he favoured leaving the dollar at 90 cents U.S. He said par is 90 cents. When you have a Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who says par is 90 cents, no wonder you have to set up an economic development board. I always thought that par was 100 cents. The fall of the Canadian dollar has been useful, he said on November 9, 1977, and he hoped it would stay around for awhile. He was an accurate forecaster there, Mr. Speaker. It certainly stayed around. It is down to 84 something today. It should be 90 cents.

On May 12, 1978, the minister was quoted in the Winnipeg Tribune—he did not realize anyone read that paper—as saying he thought it would be obvious that the economy had picked up a great deal. Has anybody noticed this great pick-up in the economy this fall? I do not think so. We have noticed that the Prime Minister in his extremity set up this economic development board, but the economy has not picked up a great deal. All that has picked up a great deal is the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. He has picked up a great deal, but we do not know how long his great deal is going to be picked up. I do not want to spend too much time on industry, trade and commerce, although I am the critic of that department.

Mr. Horner: You mean you are going to quit reading my speeches?

Mr. Crosbie: I cannot quit reading the minister's speeches, because I love being entertained and amused. One thing about this minister is he will not listen to anyone. We noticed that when he was in our caucus. He has kept that trait. I am now looking at a CP clip which appeared in the November 13, 1978, edition of the Montreal Gazette. It contains a quote by officials of the Science Council of Canada, Mr. John Orr and Mr. John Shepherd. They stated:

Industry Minister Jack Horner is deceiving Canadians into thinking Canada has a healthy trade picture by deliberately misreading our trade figures—

A study that the minister had prepared by his department was completely a snow job because he was trying to pretend that Canada does not have a problem in manufactured end products. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce often refers to this $11 billion deficit and says we do not have a problem.

They further stated:

—the real weakness in Canadian industry is in the area of fully manufactured goods.

Do you know what the minister said in response to this reasoned criticism from the Science Council of Canada, with members who are appointed and paid by the Government of Canada? The minister said they are talking balderdash. He said. "What do they know about running a business in the real business world?"

While he has been here for the last 15 years agitating in Ottawa, and now springing to fruition in his department—

Mr. Horner: Twenty years.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. John Orr is a successful consultant and Mr. John Shepherd a successful entrepreneur, a manufacturer, a leader in the field of electronics. For the last few years he has been trying to serve Canada on the Science Council of Canada. However, they are not listened to by the government. The minister says they talk balderdash. What do they know about running a real business?

The government is not totally hopeless. On November 20 I asked the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), who is in charge of GATT negotiations, pipelines and so on, a question. I pointed out that between 1970 and 1976 Canada's share of the world market for manufactured goods fell from 6 per cent to 4.7 per cent. At that time the world demand for world exports was increasing rapidly. I asked whether he agreed with the analysis of Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Orr that a real weakness was in the area of fully manufactured goods, or did he think that was balderdash. The Deputy Prime Minister replied:

No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that these statements are balderdash, even though when repeated by the hon. member they have not improved in transmission. They are serious views which will be taken into account by the government in its ongoing effort to develop and implement an industrial policy in Canada.

The Deputy Prime Minister had to repudiate the silly statement of his own Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. No wonder the government had to set up an economic development board.

The Prime Minister is never ready to admit a mistake. One of his greatest mistakes was admitting the hon. member to the portfolio of industry, trade and commerce, where he has listened to no one who knows more than he does. He insults them all when they offer him an opinion. I cannot use up too much time dealing with the minister. I quote from a Canadian Press story of November 8, 1978, referring to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce:

He told reporters his grand design for industrial development during the next few years is to prepare Canadian companies to be ready for the major developments ahead. He offered the Alaska natural gas pipeline and the hydroelectric power project on the lower Churchill River as examples.

● (2042)

When asked how he knew his new approach would work, he replied, "Because I am in charge". Now he is no longer in charge. The President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, thank God, has been put in charge.

Mr. Nystrom: Jack of all trades.

Mr. Crosbie: Jack of all trades and in charge of none. That is what the minister is now.

Mr. Nystrom: He is horning in.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister said he assured the House he would be there for a long, long time. That pipe dream is going to come to an end very quickly.

Then one of our main economic ministers, the same industry minister, said as reported in the Globe and Mail of November 8:

—the economy is posed to move ahead strongly "if our biggest purchaser, the United States, can only get its economics right."

Imagine the gall and the audacity of that statement coming from this government, which has led this country into its present economic state, its huge unemployment, its tremendous inflation, its big deficit on the current account, its deficit on the capital account—

Mr. Horner: Tell us about the U.S. trade deficit.

Mr. Crosbie: —and its deficit in thinking. We will be all right. "We are posed to move ahead strongly if the United States can get their economics right." Imagine! No wonder the Prime Minister was driven to setting up an economic development board. The minister said that to the ten provincial ministers who were gathered to discuss, with him, the future of manufacturing. Manufacturing has no future if this government stays in office.

Then let's look at their record in tourism, which I mentioned in the question period the other day. We just had the biggest deficit in nine months that we ever had in our whole national history in tourism, $1.387 billion. The total deficit last year was $1.641 billion, more that Canadians spent outside Canada than people from outside Canada spent in Canada. What did the minister say? What did the minister say when he spoke on February 27, 1978, to the Liberal convention here in Ottawa? We know that Liberals will swallow anything. They certainly swallowed this one. He said:

Canada should come awfully close to balancing its tourism budget this year after two years' deficit—

No wonder the economic development board has been set up. Let's hope the president of the economic development board levels with the Canadian people, not with this kind of nonsense, not with this kind of foolish optimism, not with this kind of negligent, silly statement that was made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. "We are going to come awfully close to balancing our tourism budget," and we have had the worst nine month deficit ever in our history, $1.387 billion. It is going to exceed next year. The total nine month deficit was $53 million lower the year before. What does the government do to try to overcome it? The government introduces an additional tax on people who travel by air. The minister should have resigned when that tax was introduced.

The minister had been speaking to tourism groups all over Canada about how he was going to reduce costs and introduce promotion measures and all the rest of it, when our travel costs have risen higher here in Canada than anywhere else since 1971, and our tourist visits from the U.S. are down 1 per cent this year, and so on. Then the minister permitted the government to increase the air transportation tax from $8 to $15 in Canada and $8 to $12 or $13 from outside Canada. That is what he is doing. That is what he is permitting the government to do to encourage tourism in this country. He had the gall last February to tell the people of Canada that we are going to come awfully close to balancing our tourism budget. My God, no wonder there is going to be an economic development board set up to stop this kind of nonsense, this kind of ridiculous forecasting.

The government will not even consider an industrial strategy. They are too big, they are too important, they are too all-wise, they are too all-seeing even to consider an industrial strategy. They have been in power now since 1963, and still without an industrial strategy. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said in his budget speech, page 7:

> I am frankly sceptical about the search for a single grand industrial strategy in a competitive market system.

I hope that the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers is going to ignore these micro murmurings from the Minister of Finance that he does not want a grand industrial strategy. Surely a look at the figures will show that we need some kind of strategy here in Canada to help develop our manufacturing sector.

I can speak for at least ten to 12 hours just on the material given to me by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with the silly statements he has made since he was appointed in the fall of 1977, but I will just give that as a few examples and move on to this economic development board, so-called. Either this board is a nothing, either it is a camouflage, it is a piece of sleight of hand, it is a shell game, it is the emperor's new clothes, or it is something, and if it is something, if it means anything, it is a devastating indictment of the incompetence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), and all the rest of those ministers for the last four years.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

If it means anything, it is an admission by the government of a total lack of success in developing our economy in Canada in the last four years. If it is not that, if it is not an indictment of the government, then it is a nothing. It is meaningless. It is what the Prime Minister called it in his speech yesterday after coming back from France, that specious speech of nothingness, the gobbledygook, bureaucratic nonsense, Privy Council colitis, or whatever it was that he made here yesterday. Bureaucratic twaddle!

An hon. Member: What are you issuing?

Mr. Crosbie: What did the Prime Minister say on November 24, when he announced that this board was going to be set up? He said that the board is going to consolidate and co-ordinate present and future policies of economic program departments and improve delivery of these programs and services to industry. In other words, there is something wrong with the present delivery of these programs and services to industry, and I can testify to that because the minister has been sitting on my synchrolift now for 12 months.

Mr. Horner: Your synchrolift?

Mr. Crosbie: I am coming to that. My synchrolift. My district.

Mr. Horner: Your synchrolift?

Mr. Crosbie: My synchrolift that the minister has been sitting on.

Mr. Horner: Your synchrolift? I will sit on it another 12 months.

Mr. Crosbie: We down there are not afraid to wait 12 months because in 12 months you will be gone, I will be here, and they will get their synchrolift.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If the minister wants to discuss the synchrolift, I am going to pass this over. I am tabling this, Mr. Speaker, "What's happened to our synchrolift, Mr. Horner?" Seven hundred Newfoundlanders want me to present this to the minister, and I am going to present it to him later on. Don't let the minister open his mouth about the synchrolift.

The Prime Minister said that the board's review and approval will be required for all economic development proposals going to cabinet and the Treasury Board. That is what the Prime Minister said, so therefore we can take from that that the board must mean something. I am laying all my hopes now on the president of this economic development board. I am not cuddling up to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce any more. I am going strictly with the president of the board because I think he has the power, and he is going to give my synchrolift to my district.

Mr. Horner: Please don't suggest to anybody that we ever cuddled up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, what can the country expect when it has a cackling, cracked hulk for a Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? I suggest that he listen to me, and he would learn a few things here tonight.

Mr. Horner: I haven't heard anything yet.

Mr. Crosbie: On November 28 the Prime Minister spoke to the conference of premiers, and he said this:

The Board will have the responsibility to review and approve all programs and policies that directly affect economic development. Its scope will be broad, covering not only secondary industry but also our resource industries—both renewable and non renewable—and service industries such as tourism.

The minister's department is gone, gone, gone with the wind. The minister looks to me something like Vivien Leigh with glasses tonight, because he has gone with the wind.

It will also advise on and co-ordinate broad policy areas that affect economic development, such as regional policies—

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion's department went like the wind.

—regional policies, R and D and manpower policies. It will be charged with not only co-ordinating the development of policies at the federal level but also improving the delivery of federal programs.

There is nothing left. They are gutted head on. All we are looking at over there is a bunch of heads. They are gutted head on, regional development, IT and C, all the economic departments.

Small business hasn't even got its gonads any more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: There is nothing left except the Metric Commission. They can share up the Metric Commission between them. Mr. Speaker, have you ever heard of the St. Valentine's Day massacre? This is a St. Valentine's Day massacre of the economic development ministries of this government.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. When the hon. member sits down, I would like to express a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Relax, John, and sit down.

Mr. Abbott: This diarrhetic stream of consciousness that is going on here has included among it some offensive, unparliamentary comments. While I would not bother to ask the hon. member to try to recall what he has stated—it is beyond recall—I would ask him to be more careful in his comments from now on.

• (2052)

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, if I mentioned anything that bothered the minister—it was small anyway—I certainly withdraw it.

When this ministry was set up—I will quote again from the Globe and Mail because it is the Upper Canadian bible and I never go to sleep without referring myself to the Globe and Mail and having a little bible study in the evening because I know how much it means to Upper Canadians—the Globe and Mail of November 25 reported an interview with the president of the economic development board. He is reported to have said this:

All proposals for economic development will have the approval of my board before they go forward to cabinet—

It is going to have 120 civil servants. It will help industry cut through the red tape in dealing with the federal government.

When the minister speaks—I presume he is going to speak—I hope he will explain how this board is going to cut through the red tape because there were already all these departments, there was already the cabinet committee on economic policy, there was already the Treasury Board, the Privy Council office, and the cabinet secretariat. If you could get through all that, you were chloroformed by the time you got through. Now there is economic development. How is that cutting through red tape? Whether or not the minister can cut through the red tape will depend on whether he can announce the delivery of the synchrolift loan to the St. John's dockyard before Christmas. That will prove to me that he can cut through red tape, and not only red tape, but also political tape. I will come to that in a minute, if I have enough time. He should explain to the House how he is going to cut through the red tape.

Now I will pick up another article from the bible, the Globe and Mail, of November 25, headed "Economic Board to get pick of bureaucrats". That makes one suspicious. Who would want the pick of the bureaucrats? I must say that the president of the board has a good reputation and I have high hopes for him. I am speaking here tonight in a hopeful and optimistic mood that he will do these things. I discover that the reason this board is set up is that Mr. Osbaldeston of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, according to the new minister, became convinced of the need for a body like the new board. So now we have the explanation, that Mr. Osbaldeston had experience for a year with this minister and he became convinced of a need for a body like the new board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The whole board was set up because the minister had been imposed upon Mr. Osbaldeston who was determined to get rid of the minister, so he had to set up a new board to get rid of the new minister, and he became convinced of the need for it. The article states:

Mr. Andras stressed yesterday that it is an "action board, not a talkfest."

I hope it will not be a talkfest, and whether or not it will be a talkfest will depend on whether the $8 million for the St. John's drydock synchrolift is approved before this House adjourns next Thursday. If the president approves it, it will not be a talkfest but an action board.

The article goes on to read:

"There is just one of a hell of a lot to be done," he said.

I like a man who will admit that the government has been here for four years and has left economic affairs in such a state that there is one hell of a lot to be done.

Then the president of the board went on to explain that the Minister of Finance has his hands full. He sure does. He said that the Minister of Finance has his hands full with the dollar in day to day financial problems.

The article goes on to say:

Mr. Trudeau explained that Mr. Chrétien will retain macro-economic responsibilities while Mr. Andras takes on the micro-economics sphere.

But this division was less than crystal clear to Mr. Chrétien, who became somewhat irritable when reporters asked whether any of his power had been taken away.

You should have seen the poor old Minister of Finance today get up here, with a speech written for him by some bald-headed pate of a civil servant. He said he was delighted to have this new set-up. But he was gritting his teeth. I wish I could have got the full flavour, if I could only understand his language properly, the full flavour of what he was saying. He said:

"The economic policy of the government will still be set by the Minister of Finance," he stated repeatedly. "Micro? Macro? I don't know. I didn't study that too long at school," he quipped sarcastically.

Well, he better start studying it now because the old president of the economic development board knows what it means, yes, sir, and he will find that his role has become somewhat attenuated in stature, because the president of the economic development board, if this means anything, is going to be el supremo, el dictatoro. I may not speak much French, but I can speak the Spanish, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to give my own opinion tonight, I want to quote a couple of experts from the newspapers. The Ottawa Journal—a marvellous paper—of December 9, contains the following words: "Andras first among equals". That was always the description of the prime minister until the present Prime Minister came to office. Now we know he is a giant among midgets. But the former president of the treasury board will be first among equals, the old definition of the Prime Minister. So, in effect, he will be the old concept of the Prime Minister, while the Prime Minister will be the new concept of the Prime Minister, which means that nothing has changed.

In an interview the president said, according to the article:

—he is being given extensive power as head of the board . . . and he intends to use it if necessary.

I say it will be necessary, Mr. Speaker, because when you look around at the other members of that board who have been doing nothing for the last four years, with the exception of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) who has done something—I had a fine relationship with him and I exclude him from any of my remarks—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You better watch out.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Crosbie: He has a marvellous record.

The president of the board said:

—ministers would have the right to appeal to cabinet if they disagree with his decisions or those of the board. But if rulings are set aside too frequently, the board would have to choose a new head.

Do you get the veiled threat there, Mr. Speaker? I like to see a president of the board who will use a veiled threat. In other words, "If any of you, jerks, perk up, it is you or me." So the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of DREE, and the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott), as well as the minister of this and the minister of that who are on that board ex officio, or full officio, or half officio, or hopelessly officio, better keep their mouths shut. The President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers will decide what will happen on the board, and I say: congratulations, Andras, super-ass.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I quote from an article by Mr. Don McGillivray—

Some hon. Members: Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member watch his language.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have your advice.

I have here an article by Don McGillivray from the Montreal Gazette of December 4, headed "Trudeau Shuts Barn Door After The Horse Had Bolted". It is too bad more horses did not bolt. The conclusion is this: the president of the board said no one can be against co-ordination.

The article goes on to say:

But the co-ordination of a whole passel of policies—

The word "passel" was put in here for the hon. rancher from Alberta.

—that are not working is not going to produce an industrial strategy that is.

This is a very succinct and understandable comment. He went on to say that they are going to co-ordinate 23 task forces and second tier reports, and so on. I pity the poor old president—there will be tears in his eyes as he examines the 23 tiers.

McGillivray went on to say:

This is a job handled until now by trade minister Jack Horner, who has clearly been downgraded by the Andras appointment. The new economic development minister was also unconvincing yesterday in his denials that his appointment undercuts part of the authority of finance minister Jean Chrétien.

This is an unbiased report of a newspaper columnist of some renown, Mr. McGillivray.

Let us look now at an article by Mr. Wayne Cheveldayoff of the bible, the Globe and Mail, of December 5, 1978, in which he said this:

Disappointing Performance

Mr. Trudeau is taking away the responsibility for consultations with labour and business from industry, trade and commerce minister Jack Horner, who is regarded by his cabinet colleagues as having put in a disorganized and disappointing performance.

I would not be that strict, I would not want to hurt the minister's feelings, but I have to do a job here impartially and objectively. Therefore I have to report what has been said.

Mr. Cheveldayoff goes on to say:

Presumably the new board of economic development ministers will be able to present the finance minister with a coherent package of selective tax measures needed for industrial development.

The Minister of Finance does not think this will interfere with his sphere of operations. They are all going to be praying for an election before the next three months are over. There will be more fighting, gouging, elbowing, knee bending and kicking, and I will not mention what will be kicked and gouged, among these gentlemen in the next three months. It will be pitiful. We will have to call for an election on the grounds of humanitarianism. The SPCA will have to be called into the cabinet room to stop what is going on there.

● (2102)

I do not speak as a partisan here. I am speaking as an objective member of this House. Just to show I am non-political, I am going to quote from a political authority who is a Liberal, to show the opinions I have expressed here tonight are agreed with by most of the Liberal party. That gentleman is Mr. John Turner.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: He issued, on July 14, a report on what was happening. He was very prescient. Is that the word? I hope the Hansard reporter will get that one right, prescient. He said:

On the federal front, the government has run its mandate—

Right on. He said:

—the principal economic minister, Jean Chrétien, has been hurt by the sales tax brawl and has much less leverage than he had—

He was forecasting the president's appointment. He said:

—there has been a progressive weakening in personnel of the principal economic ministries—

All of that has been borne out.

At page 9 he went on to say the following:

—one cannot rule out a full crisis of confidence in the Canadian dollar.

That has happened. This is the only time Turner has ever been accurate. When he was the minister of finance he certainly was not, but now that he is an objective observer, he is.

He went on to say:

Unfortunately, there is also weakness in some key economic ministries of the federal government. In finance . . . the minister has been seriously hurt.

Then he goes on with some other comments, but I do not want to hurt anybody's feelings. At page 10 he said:

—Jack Horner is effectively spending 95 per cent of his time away from the job on his re-election problems. This leaves him a totally inadequate amount of time to learn and cope with his job, which is evident from a succession of reports on his performance.

He spends 95 per cent of his time away. We are lucky. Thank God! That is the only thing that saved the government in industry, trade and commerce in the last few months.

I am sorry, he goes on trying to butter up the president there. I think he is the man of power.

At page 11 he said this:

In the Treasury Board, where fiscal restraint leadership must come from, the dedication is present but the horses are not.

In other words, the old president had the dedication but he did not have the horsepower.

He said:

Andras has fought and lost too many battles—

Say it is not so.

Mr. Andras: It is not so.

Mr. Crosbie: The president confirms it is not so. We hope it is not so.

He continued:

—because the underlying commitment of the government to its own restraint was lacking, and spending ministers continued to win too much too often.

I will not dwell any more on that. It was just to show that a prominent member of the administration, who left two or three years ago because he wanted to make his fortune in the world—he went to Toronto, the only part of the country which could afford him—has given us these comments. I am glad to see what I am saying tonight is supported by somebody who might be the leader of the Liberal party in the next election. God knows. I mean, the Prime Minister said tonight that he is never going to resign. I believe him, but who knows?

Now, to get on to something that touches my heart deeply, and I have only got a few minutes left—

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I want to give the president two examples of where action is needed immediately. One is: there is a linerboard mill in Stephenville, Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: There was $300 million lost, thanks to Mr. Crosbie.

Mr. Crosbie: That has been bought now by the Abitibi-Price company.

Mr. Abbott: Crosbie's folly.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister can get right on this. It is $13.6 million which is required in the form of a DREE grant. The president should brace himself and see that that gets through immediately. I want to give the president a tip. If he wants a precedent for giving $13.6 million—oh, there is the man; he is coming over to tell us it is already approved. I have never had such successful results in one little speech. If the president wants a precedent, there is a mill in the riding of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, St. Lucien, which got $30 million from DREE in the last couple of years.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Crosbie: This is only $13.6 million. Now, I know the minister has got it in his own heart to give out $13.6 million to the linerboard mill in Stephenville. It is going to create something like a 1,000 jobs.

Mr. Andras: Tell us how it all started.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister should ask his friend in Panama. He should go down to Panama on a government jet and ask his friend, Mr. Doyle, who has not paid his taxes yet. He will tell him how it all started.

Mr. Horner: Tell us how you lost $300 million.

An hon. Member: Tell us why your riding is going NDP.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not want you gentlemen to tempt me to speak longer than I intend. I want to give the president of the eco-dev board—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour).

Mr. Crosbie: Oh, I thought I had consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I definitely heard a no.

Mr. Crosbie: I wanted to table this, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe has the floor. The time of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has expired.

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be able to follow the type of performance we have just seen. I think it was marvellous that we could be entertained so. Like the hon. member expressed regarding the speaker previous to him, I wish I could follow him in his own language as well. I think the member is trying to create a new language for himself. He has come up with interesting words like "twaddle" and "bureaucratic colitis". There is certainly a new language coming forth. He is doing a magnificent job in entertaining the members of this House. Perhaps the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation might find him useful in one of its comedy programs.

This was the first time I sat through one of the hon. member's speeches. I must say I was entertained. But I am very concerned. I do not believe the hon. member addressed the problem before us. He did not address the problem of planning, and he did not state his position on the concept of planning which the government put before us today. We see problems with what the government has put before us today. As most hon. members would know, we are committed to a concept of planning. We feel planning is essential to the well-being of the economy of the country. It is essential to set priorities on a national scale so that public resources, and perhaps some private sector resources, can be allocated to areas which need them the most and areas which can be most productive.

The lack of planning on any national scale has given us the present situation. Our dollar is in terrible shape. Inflation is running at close to the double-digit level. The regional disparity situation has not improved over the last ten years, and in fact may have worsened. Unemployment levels are becoming higher and higher. In my part of the country the real unemployment figure is approaching 30 per cent. This 30 per cent figure takes into account the real unemployed. This was supported this week in the figures released by Statistics Canada indicating that there was a huge number of hidden unemployed in the country to whom the government has not addressed itself. These people are being left to the welfare rolls and their own resources because the government refuses to pay attention to them. This entire situation is caused by a lack of planning and a lack of economic priorities on a national scale.

We welcome any approach by the government to plan and set priorities. We wish the proposal before us today was such an approach, that there was some real planning involved, and that it was a commitment on the part of the government to real economic planning. What is the evidence? We see the mechanism the government has put before us as a super ministry. The hon. member who spoke previously emphasized that quite well. But the problem is that there is no overriding priority given to the planning process. There can be conflict between the planning department and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). When the Minister of Finance presents a budget, he does not have to abide by the plans set by the Board of Economic Development Ministers.

Can we expect this situation to be different from the experience of Great Britain? Approximately 15 years ago that country set up a similar type mechanism for economic planning. After three or four years it found out that the mechanism just did not work because the department of economic planning, or the similar body in Britain, did not have the overriding authority to set an economic plan for the country or to make sure government policy adhered to it.

We believe a commitment to planning is important. Many structural changes are needed in the economy of this country. A good example of how planning can cause structural change in a beneficial manner is the fishing industry in Newfoundland. For years fishermen were telling their sons not to get into the fishing industry because it was no good, there was no money in it, and that they should go to Upper Canada somewhere, or to Alberta. Now the situation is changing.

• (2112)

For the first time probably in hundreds of years the fishing industry holds out hope of being the key to prosperity in the province of Newfoundland. The one thing that has caused the change is organization. The fishermen have organized in the last ten years and the fishermen have themselves imposed a planning mechanism and a set of priorities in that industry. That is what is causing success in the fishing industry today. We can see that economic planning does work.

Setting priorities can bring great benefits to individual sectors of the economy. We see no reason why it should not bring the same sort of benefits to the economy as a whole. It is important to set priorities. If we do not set priorities we get a crazy sort of situation like we had in Stephenville, in my riding on the west coast of Newfoundland, where the linerboard mill has been shut down for more than a year.

At the same time as this linerboard mill has been suffering difficulties, the Export Development Corporation has invested over $900 million in pulp and paper mills abroad. Hon. members have said before that this is only investment and the money is returned, but if this country can find $900 million to invest in undeveloped or under-developed countries like Czechoslovakia, Poland and the United States of America, why in God's name can we not find a few million dollars for a mill that is down here in our own country? There are over 1,000 people unemployed because of that mill being closed down, and the whole situation is caused by a mix-up in the priorities of this government.

This sort of structural change in the fishery and pulp and paper industries, without the sorts of contradictions built in that the Export Development Corporation has precipitated, could only take place if we have economic planning on a national scale. I really question the government's commitment to economic planning when this super ministry is set up with serious defects in it. If the Minister of Finance can usurp the priorities set by that ministry, then we have seen in part the direction the policy will take.

The Minister of Finance in his budget of just a few weeks ago specifically rejected any concept or idea of planning as a way to solve the problems of the economy. With that sort of support for the economic planning ministry, how is it going to work? This just does not make sense.

That budget, as well, would have superseded any of the priorities set by the planning ministry if that ministry had been in effect prior to the budget being laid down. That budget was probably one of the most regressive we have seen in years. It did nothing, not a thing, to alter the basic structure of the economy of the country. It did not address itself to fundamental problems in the economy, the biggest one being unemployment with over one million Canadians unemployed. I guess there are one and a quarter million Canadians unemployed right now when you include the hidden unemployment statistics that Statistics Canada came up with last week. The minister in his budget speech said we are going to create 100,000 fewer jobs this year than last year. What does this do for unemployment?

Regional dislocation and regional disparity have not changed at all. The budget did nothing in this regard. It probably countered many of the good efforts the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) has made over the last few years because it offered nothing to the poorer regions of the country.

There was the investment tax credit, but there is absolutely no evidence to show that the investment tax credit, over the last five or six years it has been in effect in Atlantic Canada, has had any effect whatsoever in encouraging businesses to set up in that region. That has really been a hollow sort of measure for the Atlantic region.

There are two other main problems in our economy that can be related to foreign control. Canadians do not have control of their own destiny at this time. The budget did nothing in that regard. The big problem which is really at the root of most of our economic ills is that in Canada we are digging resources out of the ground and shipping them raw to foreign countries. The budget did not help this problem at all.

The point I am trying to make is that with this sort of regressive budget set up against an economic planning ministry and taking precedence over it, how can this economic planning ministry have any effect whatsoever? Any planning would attempt to address these problems. I believe that, and I believe the super minister would attempt to address these problems in the new ministry. But, as I mentioned in this case, the budget would have overruled all his great plans.

I would like to look at the record of the government over the last few years, to examine its commitment in the past to planning even in the small areas in which it has engaged in economic planning. The planning has not been effective in solving the problems which it was supposed to solve, not even by those departments set up for that purpose. With my apologies to the hon. minister opposite, I am going to look at DREE as it is set up in Newfoundland.

There have been many dollars come into Newfoundland because of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. DREE was set up to reduce in a planned way the disparities in underdeveloped regions of the country. Speaking from the experience of Newfoundland, DREE has done much good. We have obtained schools, highways, and so on. Basically DREE has approached the problem, in its early days, especially—it has changed a little bit now and maybe the present minister is having some influence—not from a planning point of view, but from an aid-giving point of view and on an aid-giving basis. This has amounted to welfare on a grand scale for provinces like Newfoundland. Receiving aid just does not do anything to solve the basic problems.

I should like to quote from Paul Streeton, a journalist, who said:

Receiving aid is like making love to an elephant. It doesn't feel very good, you run the risk of getting crushed, and you don't see the results for a very long time, if ever.

That is what DREE has been. It has just been aid programs over the last nine or ten years it has been in effect. DREE was the culmination of a series of alphabet soup type programs the government set up in the 1960s. We had ADIA, ARDA, FRED, LIP, OFY and a host of others. These were the alphabet soup programs. DREE was basically the culmination of them in an attempt to co-ordinate these policies in one direction.

The concept of planning was introduced, and its stated objective was to redistribute wealth from the have provinces to the have-not provinces, structurally and on an enduring basis. That was the object of DREE when it was set up in 1969. Even though planning was necessary, DREE never moved from the aid type of approach to economic development. If you are going to change the structure of an economy of a have-not province on an enduring basis there has to be some sort of economic planning. This was never done. There were some jobs created, but not enduring employment. There is a real difference, and it is a fundamental difference to which I hope the new ministry will address itself. This certainly is not an example of how the government should address itself to the problem of unemployment and underemployment in places like Newfoundland.

There was an expenditure of mass amounts of dollars, but without planning this large number of dollars spent had a very minuscule effect upon basic problems in the economy of Newfoundland. Let me just quote some figures. Between 1966 and 1970, and 1974 to 1975, there was $185 million spent in the province of Newfoundland, which created 3,400 jobs. In its 1977 report the Economic Council of Canada said that 8,300 jobs, almost triple that number, were needed in the province between 1970 and 1975 to reduce unemployment by even one half of 1 per cent. What DREE has done, if we use the Economic Council's figures as a guide, is reduce unemployment in Newfoundland in that time period by one quarter of 1 per cent. We still have 30 per cent unemployment. Right now there are 45,000 people looking for 900 jobs in Newfoundland. It just has not worked. The DREE money has been used basically for infrastructure, which we need along with schools and highways, but it has not been co-ordinated well.

● (2122)

The transportation system in Newfoundland is sadly lacking. For instance, if the same amount of money had been put into the railway, Newfoundland would have a modern, upgraded railway, instead of the system it has now. Businessmen are not fools. People from the manufacturing industry would be crazy to invest in Newfoundland because it does not have a railway upon which they could depend. If the contributions by DREE to the province had been channeled in a planned way to providing infrastructure like transportation services, the province would be a lot better off. There is much that could be done, although I know that the minister is working on many things, including harbour development.

[Mr. Faour.]

In spite of the fact that DREE, by necessity and by definition, has had to have a planning approach to its operation, it still does not work. In fact the planning by that department has even been counterproductive in some ways. To illustrate this I would like to quote briefly from the Report of the People's Commission on Unemployment at page 70:

Between 1969 and 1975 DREE spent more than 75 per cent of all its moneys in the province on what the Economic Council of Canada calls "non-rural infrastructure". What this means is that DREE's money has gone to build roads and schools, just as the west coast businessman quoted above suggested.

That refers to a previous quotation. It goes on:

The commission finds nothing wrong with the construction of roads and the building of schools. But we must seriously raise the question as to whether DREE has, through its support for urban development, made our rural areas less competitive in terms of economic development and job creation.

This illustrates that DREE, even though it has not provided substantial benefits to the urban communities in Newfoundland, has contributed in a very detrimental way to the rural areas of that province. It is fortunate for the rural areas that the fishermen's union, through its policies, is making these areas much more viable, because fishermen and fish workers can now stay in the small communities and live a good life there. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has also provided aid to businesses in the region, but again in the absence of priorities and sound planning we must question its value. In this regard I would like to quote again from the Report of the People's Commission on Unemployment:

However, one still must be aware of the apparent illogic involved in an approach to alleviating regional underdevelopment and worker poverty which begins by giving large sums of money to those who are already well-off and who, if successful, will succeed in increasing their fortunes even more.

I would contend that Canadian development policy, to the extent that it is based on incentive grants to corporations, is trying to combat regional underdevelopment by giving money to those economic interests which are essentially the cause of underdevelopment.

Again, because there has been no sound approach to economic planning, DREE's contributions have had a negative effect in some respects in the province, and in many ways have contributed to factors helping to keep the province underdeveloped.

Through DREE the government has tried to alleviate disparity by planning. It has failed because there has not been a substantial change in relative economic welfare in the various regions of the country, with the exception of Alberta with its oil revenues. Other regions such as the Atlantic region, the Gaspé Peninsula, and so on, seem to have gotten poorer. It is the old story, the rich get rich and the poor get poorer. In light of the high unemployment in these regions, if this approach continues who knows what will happen? The unemployment rate nationally is 8 per cent. If it were 8 per cent in Newfoundland, everybody would jump for joy. Even the official rate of unemployment in Newfoundland is double that figure.

By developing the urban areas, DREE has undermined the ability of the rural areas in the province to support those who live there. We cannot solve the economic problems of Canada by planning which includes only the upper echelons of the economic society. DREE has made massive payments in Newfoundland which in many ways are responsible for the underdevelopment of the province. For example in the fisheries industry, it was only when the fishermen organized themselves and began developing the industry at the grassroots level that they began to see benefits from that industry in the small communities. We must re-evaluate the planning strategy and direction of DREE if we are to have any lasting benefits upon the economy in underdeveloped regions like Newfoundland.

The government's economic planning is just as bad in other areas. It has set up the department of employment, or more aptly it should be called the "department of unemployment." Its purpose was to have a planned approach to the human resources of the country, with the idea of moving people to where the jobs are. It sounded good on the surface, that people could travel from one part of the country to another. Emphasis must be placed on the word "could" as opposed to forced to move. As a result of this type of planning there has been a massive migration of young people from the Atlantic region. I can recall reading statistics some time ago which showed that in the early part of the century, up to the 1930s, approximately one half a million people had left the Atlantic provinces.

The department of employment has set up all sorts of manpower mobility programs, suggesting that people move to Ontario or Alberta, the lands of milk and honey. It just does not work that way. This plan has caused the relocation of thousands of people in this country, the breakup of many families and other major social problems. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) made some comments last week in this regard which I felt were unforgivable, but I will not go into them.

There is, however, an interesting slant to this. I am not one for reading poetry, but I would like to refer to a poem by Al Pitman, the last line of which I have adapted myself. He is a well-known literary figure in Newfoundland. The poem is about the idea of mobility, forcing people to move, saying that the opportunities are greater elsewhere. The poem reads as follows:

● (2132)

Now here is the gist of this marvellous plan
To save all the livyers of this Newfoundland;
Just take one half of the horrible lot
And send them to pickle in Canada's pot

Take a daughter, an uncle, some sisters and brothers
And put them on barges along with the others
And bid them good-by and say now there you go
You're going to glory in Ontario

And when you go to see Davis up there
Just tell him you're looking to go on welfare
Just tell him you're victims of governments' plans
Invented in hell and then spread on the land

With apologies to Al Pitman, Mr. Speaker, that expresses my sentiments exactly on what this mobility is all about. If one wants to say to half of the population of Newfoundland that they should move to Ontario, that is fine, but is not the way to go about economic development. It does not change the problem but just moves it somewhere else.

All the planning that is done in this area ends in exporting people. It has often been said in Newfoundland that, after fish, our main export is our young people. In all parts of the country there are Newfoundlanders working, not necessarily because they want to be in those parts of the country but because of economic necessity. A lot of them leave their families in Newfoundland because they cannot afford to take them to Alberta or wherever they go, and we all know the consequences of that.

The other creature of the department of unemployment is the Canada Works Program, which I have talked about on other occasions. On page 84 of the People's Commission Report there is an interesting comment on the Canada Works program and others like it. The federal and provincial governments were unable to conceive of a strategy of development in the province that was based on the social and economic traditions of the people. Instead, they performed the role of subsidizing industry, either through granting generous concessions to developers who invested in the province or through using manpower training and mobility schemes to move workers to central Canada.

All we see are programs that beg the question of real economic development in the country. They are stop-gap measures, and they become important in parts of Newfoundland because they are all there is at certain times of the year. They do not solve the problem, however; they provide jobs but not real employment. This is typical of the economic planning that has taken place in the past. Atlantic Canada has been a labour reserve for Ontario and Alberta. Education ministers from the Atlantic region have complained that "we train them, you claim them", when referring to our young people. The Atlantic region has had to subsidize education, to train workers and young people with skills not used there, but that are useful in the western provinces or Ontario.

What has been looked upon as a planned approach to the economy has actually been a direct subsidy to two main groups: first, to industry by give-aways under DREE and other programs and by subsidizing and forcing the mobility of the labour force and, second, to transfer payments, which is probably the most insidious. Forced welfare programs are designed to give purchasing power to people in poorer regions, not out of genuine concern for their situation but so that they have the purchasing power to buy goods made in Upper Canada or in foreign factories. This approach solves nothing. We have to look at the basic structure of the economy. The basic defects of this new super ministry make it impossible for us to have effective economic planning. After ten years of defective planning the government expects us to swallow this super ministry with all its own defects.

On the surface there is no commitment to economic planning. Time and time again we have said we are committed to positive, effective economic planning. We would support the government if we felt the proposal was a commitment to economic planning, but there is no evidence of that. This is just window dressing. The new super ministry will have no power to impose an economic plan on our economy.

We support real economic planning, but we believe that implementation is probably more important. Of course there has to be a plan, but implementation is the key to success. We have developed an economic plan based on our view of the Canadian economy. It is not a complete view but is one that we feel represents an approach that would be beneficial to Canada. Of course we would like to see it implemented, and perhaps we will present it to the new super ministry in the hope that this will happen.

I will not take any more of the time of the House, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to say that this super ministry has some definite defects. Its planning potential will be muzzled by the veto of other ministries, the Minister of Finance in particular, if future budgets are as "progressive" as the budget he presented a few weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I want to say, to begin with, that I support this proclamation and all it entails, as one of the ministers who fully expects to profit from it.

To be blunt about it, my position, and that of other individual economic ministers, are strengthened by this move. I do not believe in working in cabinet by playing a lone hand. I prefer having allies. When my proposals to assist exports or to further support domestic industries go before cabinet, and they are endorsed by the nine other members of the board, that will strengthen those proposals a good deal. It gives them a strong leg up. Ten ministers of one cast of mind, economic growth-oriented, certainly have a tremendous influence within the cabinet structure.

It only makes sense, sir, to integrate policies that affect economic development and to view those policies as to how they impact on one another. It only makes sense, to me, to consider policies and programs from one basic perspective—how will they help the growth of industry sectors and industries within a specific sector to which they apply. How will they help the growth of the regions, the growth of the general economy? It only makes sense to bring co-ordination and over-all economic development under one roof. And finally, it only makes sense to focus in one place the consultations with provinces, industry and labour, that have taken place in the past under a variety of ministers.

I look upon this as being similar to the things I have seen in Germany and Japan. Those countries have paid a great deal of attention to their industrial thrust since the Second World War. They fully believe that industry is the engine that makes the standard of living that they enjoy possible. When one travels to Germany and sees—

[Editor's note: Whereupon a stout gentleman, dressed in red, with white fur trim, entered the chamber, exclaiming, "Ho, ho, ho!"]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Faour.]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, as a minister participating in this economic board, I certainly want the House to know that I am no Santa Claus.

● (2142)

In Germany they pay a great deal of attention to industry because they believe it is the engine that provides the quality of life they want. In order to do business you have to join the chamber of commerce in Germany; if you are on that side you have to join their industrial board. In Japan, there is a board of industry composed of senior industrialists, called the Keidanren, and the government pays a great deal of attention to the needs of industry there. I look on this new thrust as being somewhat similar in purpose. The government is demonstrating to industry that industry is important to the economic well-being of this country. Industry will make possible the social services we all want, as Canadians, to enjoy, and which can be provided as long as the proper amount of assistance is available.

My department will continue its normal activities. We shall continue to propose policies designed to benefit industry. For example, I am launching two major consultative exercises with business and labour. One is to assess and make recommendations upon the efficacy and scope of the services and policies provided by government to assist exporters. A blue ribbon committee of business and labour leaders will be headed by Mr. Roger Hatch, president of Canpotex. Its membership is representative of our exporting industries and of our regions. I am looking to this committee for strong recommendations as to how we in the federal government, together with provincial governments, can improve our performance in supporting exports.

Some hon. members have asked why this should be done now. I think it is important that the House should recognize the reason for the action we are taking at this time. We are entering upon what will perhaps prove to be the most competitive era in Canada's recent history. The years ahead will be tremendously competitive for any industrialized nation and we must address ourselves to this task. The new ministry will, I hope, be successful in furthering the liberalization of trade.

Canada depends a great deal on its ability to sell abroad. As I have pointed out on past occasions, approximately 25 per cent of our gross national product is derived from exports. If hon. members want to relate that figure to the Japanese experience I can tell them that 13 per cent of Japan's gross national product is related to exports. In the United States, the figure is 7 per cent or 8 per cent. We have to meet the competitive forces which will be upon us in the eighties, which means we shall have to attach greater importance to the role of industry in our economy. I look upon this new departure as signifying to industry that we are there to help them and that we have the power within the cabinet to make certain that the engine moves well and provides Canada with the resources to accommodate people with the standard of living we believe they should be able to afford.

I mentioned I was going to set up two task forces. The other group, consisting of senior private sector leaders, is taking on a very important task. Its members represent a cross section of firms, both large and small, in the Canadian resource and manufacturing industry. This task force is meant to assist Canadian companies to win contracts arising from the major industrial and energy projects which are about to come on stream in Canada; it will work with and make recommendations to both federal and provincial governments.

This country is launching upon a series of very large projects worth billions of dollars. The Canadian section of the Alaska pipeline is one—it has already been mentioned in this debate. Mr. Speaker, that is worth $4.3 billion in contracts for design engineering, steel, and a host of supplies ranging from manufactured products to food, transport and other services.

Other large projects planned in the fields of electrical generation, mining, forestry, petroleum and petrochemicals over the next decade are expected to exceed in value $50 billion in construction work. These Canadian projects can provide a large majority of Canadian contracts and jobs, located, as they are, in northern Canada, on the west coast, the prairies, central Canada and Atlantic Canada. They are a vast and varied market for Canadian industry. Canadian designers, engineers, consultants and services, manufacturers and steel plants must win the majority of contracts in competitive bidding.

Without ordering the placing of contracts by government decree, without intervening in a way which would contravene international trade practices and perhaps get us into a great deal of trouble with our trading partners, the bottom line is that the large majority of industrial benefits must go to Canadians. This is important for the immediate contracts and jobs involved. It is equally important in terms of new technology, new skills, and ability to merge into effective consortia to tackle large and complex projects, all of which are necessary if Canadians are to succeed in that competitive bidding role.

The task force of the 25 business leaders and senior labour representatives working with the provincial and federal governments is charged with identifying means to ensure that we get those contracts and those jobs. It will identify and communicate in advance the opportunities which are expected so that Canadian companies may know what they should be competing for. It will make recommendations concerning procurement by governments. It will make recommendations with regard to government policies which can be supportive of the objective. It will take a look at ways in which companies pool their talents and abilities to take on new and larger tasks.

From time to time we hear members complain about imports of manufactured goods into this country. They ask what the government is doing about it. This task force will be looking at that situation to encourage the Canadian manufacturing sector to meet better the challenges of supply—to increase the supply of steel, electrical generators and other equipment necessary to the huge projects which will be started between now and the year 2000. The other task force has, of course, been set up to assist in meeting challenges in world trade. This is our way of supporting Canadian industry both at home and abroad.

I am pleased that the Canadian Commercial Corporation will now be in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which is where it should be. I certainly believe it can play an aggressive role in assisting the private sector to seek contracts with foreign governments. It fits logically within my department; so rather than losing power through the recent shuffle my department has, in fact, gained power. It is not sufficiently realized, especially by hon. members opposite, that we provide about $3.7 billion worth of support for Canadian industry every year, three quarters of which goes to encourage Canadian exports.

Some hon. members wonder what I have been doing this year. Well, the Enterprise Development Program has recently been doubled and the EDP loan guarantee ceiling has been raised from $350 million to $1 billion. We have set up advisory boards in every province to make certain that both small and large industries are aware of the assistance the EDP can give them. Some hon. members may have noticed in the papers today an announcement that the board is to lend money to establish two-way trade between Nova Scotia and British Columbia.

Mr. Forrestall: What about the reciprocal part of it?

Mr. Horner: I think it is a very good project. If the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) does not like it, he should speak up.

● (2152)

Mr. Forrestall: I will speak up.

Mr. Horner: I am certainly pleased that my department can play a role in assisting the steel industry. The Export Development Corporation has had its funding capacity expanded from $9 billion to $26 billion. No one on that side thought it was a good idea. They complained bitterly, holding it up for a month in this House. They said it would ruin Canada. They did not trust the people to whom the money was being loaned.

Mr. Forrestall: Balderdash.

Mr. Horner: Read the speeches. The Federal Business Development Bank did a tremendous amount of business this past year. Last month they increased their lending to Canadian industry to about $61 million. They loan about 25 per cent to Canadian manufacturing industries, about 25 per cent to the tourist industry, and about 25 per cent to the wholesale and retail and other industries. They do a great deal of business. They have been stepped up a great deal in their lending ability. The Federal Business Development Bank is the largest single source of venture capital in Canada.

Mr. Forrestall: The left hand does not know what the right hand is doing.

Mr. Horner: I am telling you now what is being done to help Canadian industry within Canada. The hon. member for St.

John's West (Mr. Crosbie) warbled on with quotations from my speeches. It pleased me a great deal to find that somebody over there is reading what I say. That is more than they did when I was a member of that party.

I find the hon. member's speeches quite humorous. I had the honour of speaking at the nomination of the hon. member for St. John's West. I was quite interested in that cabinet minister who was quitting the Newfoundland government and wanting to come to Ottawa. He had been a cabinet minister in the Liberal government, and a cabinet minister in the Conservative government. I was interested to see what kind of an animal he was, and whether or not he could make a contribution in Ottawa. His speech tonight convinced me that he can make a contribution in Ottawa, as an entertainer in some night club. However, he is hardly a serious-minded person representing that province.

The hon. member talked about economic development. He was a member of the famous government which got into more economic difficulties than any government in recent times. He was minister of finance of the government which financed the linerboard factory that ran up a debt of some $300 million. No wonder the present Premier of Newfoundland was glad to get rid of him, as I found out that night when speaking at his nomination meeting in Newfoundland.

The hon. member for St. John's West complains because I have suggested that when the United States economy picks up, it will definitely help us. Is the hon. member not aware that the President of the United States has suggested that United States industry bring in voluntary wage and price controls? The president of that country seems to think they have economic troubles. Is the hon. member not aware that the United States will chalk up the biggest merchandising deficit in the history of that country? On the other hand, we will chalk up the largest merchandising trade surplus in the history of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The hon. member talked about a synchrolift drydock in St. John's. I am a very strong supporter of that. As I explained to the hon. member the other day, we need to have the money before we can spend it. In the budgetary cuts announced in August, there were some cuts in the transfer payments. When we no longer have those cuts, I am certain Treasury Board will approve the synchrolift for the people of Newfoundland and of Canada, not for the hon. member for St. John's West. It will not be his synchrolift. He has done nothing but hinder our ability to get it through.

From time to time I become amused with the party opposite. In Committee the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) stated that we should do away with the Dash-7. He suggested that we scrap it, that we cancel the program and get out of de Havilland altogether. At the time he said that, we were employing approximately 3,700 people in de Havilland. That will go to 4,500 and then to 5,000.

I recently announced the sale of 13 planes, mainly to the United States. If one can sell in that market, one can sell pretty near anywhere in the world. There are options on 20-some Dash-7 planes. These are being manufactured at the rate of one a month. In order to meet the demand, this will have to be increased to four a month.

Because of the demand, it has been necessary to put out subcontracts. Estimating the subcontracts for the manufacture of 200 planes, approximately $600 million in subcontracts will be let. That is because de Havilland cannot handle all the work the Dash-7 will bring to Canada, nearly 85 per cent of it for export.

Hon. members opposite say they are tired of hearing Horner talking about optimism and thinking positively about the air industry in Canada, which is high technology. They certainly would not admit that. They had a big laugh in this House about Canada Air and its plane. That is a fabulous airplane. It has flown extensively. Over 130 of these airplanes have been sold. Employment has increased in that factory. Approximately 99 per cent of the planes built will be exported. Within the next five years, that one plane will provide 50,000 jobs for Canadian workers. Therefore we are making tremendous strides in what might be called highly technical industries which will certainly bring great rewards to Canadian workers.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—FUNDING OF PLANNED PARENTHOOD ASSOCIATION

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight in this House unashamedly as a Roman Catholic. However, it is my fervent hope that I will always use my position to defend with equal vigor and sincerity the integrity of any religious denomination which I feel has been impugned.

• (2202)

As to the point in question, on November 3, 1978, as reported at page 771 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) if her department had funded the publication of the fall, 1978 edition of the Planned Parenthood Federation newsletter. She replied that funds from her department were used strictly for the operation of that federation's national office.

By sad coincidence, the editorial address given on the newsletter is, in fact, the national office of the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada; in other words, as the minister herself stated, the office from which the offensive missive has been transmitted operates, thanks only to funds from the federal Department of National Health and Welfare.

I would like the House to consider for a second what is offensive in this missive. The subject of the newsletter is abortion, and it is a subject open to debate which would go on much longer than the seven minutes allotted to me. However, in my view and in the view of millions of Canadians, abortion is killing. It is the taking away of life. I will not go into that point of debate.

The point I am making is about this particular newsletter of the fall of 1978. Articles in various newspapers, mainly Canadian, by the way—the Globe and Mail, very often the Toronto Star, the Ottawa Journal and the Ottawa Citizen—are interpreted as being in favour of abortion. Among all the quotations in newspaper articles there appears one entitled "Pro life isn't". There is some recognition given to the author of this editorial. It is quoted as being the National Catholic Report of July of 1978.

A tiny bit of checking on my part—it did not take very much—proved to me that this so-called National Catholic Report comes from the United States in the first place. Despite the fact that it is national in a large country like the United States, it has a circulation of less than 46,000. By national standards that is an extremely small circulation. Therefore someone in Canada would have to undertake a certain amount of research to find that particular article. He would probably have to make a few international telephone calls.

The article in question was written by a Catholic. A little more research on my part revealed that the publication to which I referred is a Catholic newspaper, but it is written by a certain dissident group from the Catholic church and in no way—and this is the point to be made—does it respect or reflect the traditional view of the real Catholic church.

If the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada wanted to find out what Catholics think of abortion, it could have gone to L'osservatore Romano, if it understood Italian. The federation could have asked me for a translation. If the federation did not ask me, it could have gone to the Catholic Register or to many other Catholic newspapers in Canada, none of which would ever, ever have given the impression that pro-abortion people are Catholic or that Catholics do not give a damm about people who are born.

The only concern of Catholics, according to this article, would be to save the four-month fetus, and to hell with four-year old child living in squalor. That is a travesty. It impugns the integrity of every Catholic. I do not know whether the author is Canadian or American. I do not know his or her nationality, but what is the motivation? That is what we have to ask ourselves. What is the motivation for going to a very small, little read, dissident Catholic newspaper, and then printing this rubbish, this garbage, as if it were something from the Vatican?

This newsletter obviously is of no moral value at all. They do not know the meaning of the word religion. Why did they print it in the first place? Who is funding this publication? The minister said that federal funds were used only for the organization of the national office. We have already found that the national head office is the place from which this spurious paper emits. What does the funding do for the organization? It pays for rent, electricity, and for staff. For the minister, with all due respect, to tell me, "No, we do not fund this subliminal anti-Catholic message" is, I suggest, an insult to my intelligence.

● (2207)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. lady but the time allotted to her has expired.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking tonight on behalf of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson) who is unavoidably absent.

At the start of my remarks I should like to say, in response to the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni), how much respect I have for her. I also want to put on the record, for her information and that of other members of the House, that, being a Catholic myself, I have great respect for the points she brought forward tonight. However, further to the minister's response of November 3, 1978, to the question of the hon. member for York South concerning the fall 1978 edition of the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada newsletter which, as she commented, contained "despicable and insidious innuendo which vilifies the entire Catholic church," I would like to make the following remarks.

I have had the opportunity to review this particular publication and I saw no remarks directed at the Catholic church. In the provincial-territorial news section of the newsletter—the section in which there are references to the Roman Catholic church—it is reported that Planned Parenthood Yukon has co-sponsored with the Roman Catholic parish, workshops for parents. There is also a reproduction of newspaper clippings, one from the Globe and Mail of April 25, 1978, and the other from the National Catholic Reporter of July 14, 1978, both of which mention the Catholic church.

One article reproduced from the Globe and Mail of April 25, 1978, outlines the position put forth by the Chancellor of the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Toronto which calls for mandatory instruction and testing on how to be good parents for all couples planning marriage. The other reproduced news clipping which refers to the Roman Catholic church appeared on the editorial page and was drawn from the National Catholic Reporter of July 14, 1978. The editorial states in part:

> There is something wrong in the pro-life movement that causes many Catholics concerned about peace and justice—life—to look askance, or grieve about the misdirected energy. The national "right-to-life" movement isn't "pro-life" at all—it's anti-abortion. The self styled "pro-life" movement, therefore, whatever the attitudes of individual members, comes through in a single-focus frenzy, apparently lacking Christian understanding regarding life in general. There are individual pro-lifers whose cares are larger, but they are scattered, and so is their impact.

The editorial continues in this manner.

In addition, there are 30 or more other reproductions of press clippings of Canadian and American newspapers.

As can be seen, the references to the Roman Catholic Church are contained in reproductions from highly regarded newspapers or based on material from other publications, such as the National Catholic Reporter.

For the record, I would like to make it quite clear that the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada has, over the years, constantly provided a high quality of family planning services. Associations of the type set forth by the hon. member for York South can only foster misunderstanding and hard feelings in the groups genuinely interested in promoting responsible parenthood.

● (2212)

In principle, the Department of National Health and Welfare does not control the content of the publication of the voluntary agencies it funds. In particular, the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada newsletter has been dignified in tone, content, and reflects responsible work done by dedicated volunteers promoting responsible parenthood.

SPORTS—CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN MOSCOW OLYMPICS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on November 9 I rose in my place to ask the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) the following question:

Our own House last week passed a unanimous resolution expressing our concern for the abridgement of freedom of thought and expression in the Soviet Union as demonstrated by those trials.

In view of the upcoming 1980 Olympics to be held in Moscow, could you tell me whether there are any plans in your department to re-examine our country's position vis-à-vis participation in the Moscow Olympics?

The answer of the minister was so twisted that it looked like a pretzel. She said the following:

—I am quite prepared to accept that there be sport boycotts when related to sport, but when the matter is outside the realm of sport I do not feel the sport should be used as an instrument through which retaliation is executed.

The minister directed a letter to me dated November 10, 1978, which reads in part as follows:

—in principle, we consider that sport should not be used as a political instrument except in cases where the matter in question directly affects sport, as apartheid does.

The minister is living in an Alice in Wonderland world.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the November 12 edition of the New York Times. It was written by Yevgeny Rubin, a former sports writer for the Soviet Union. In part it reads as follows:

Soviet sport is a facade, or the brightest, loudest and most glaring part of the facade. Athletes—strong, agile, tanned and invincible—are supposed to personnify the Soviet way of life to the world, including their own people. With each record, each victory, each goal, the athlete is supposed to demonstrate that the Soviet people are the strongest, the fastest and the most graceful.

[Mr. Harquail.]

If that is not politics in sport, I should like to know what it is. The minister implied that she had nothing to do with the decision, that it is the Canadian Olympic Committee which makes the decision. But she has a lot to do with the funding which goes to that committee, its grants, or the withholding of grants. All one has to do is ask Mrs. Koop whether that is the case. The incredible answer of the minister reflects her naivete. If anything, the minister has raised the concept of apartheid and not I. Since the minister raised apartheid, I will refer to it. The minister ought to know that all legal restrictions in the country of South Africa have been withdrawn from apartheid. I am not saying that it has been withdrawn in the countryside, but certainly the legal barriers have been withdrawn from the legislation.

I have seen the pain which apartheid brings. I have seen some of that anguish. I realize the pain of the hundreds of workers from Mozambique who work in the deep mines of South Africa, live in fetid dormitories, and are kept from their families for 11 months of the year. The same thing is true in Russia where people are kept in forced labour camps in Siberia, in the freezing cold of Siberia, for 12 months out of the year, and are never allowed to see their families. All one has to do is read the book entitled "A Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich" to know something about that cruelty.

I have seen some of the incredibly cruel and unjust treatment of the millions of blacks in South Africa who are not allowed to hold citizenship or own property. That is true also in Russia where the property of dissenters is seized. They are drafted into the army so that they cannot leave the country. Is one better than the other? One is just as cruel as the other. I remind the minister that pain does not recognize the colour of skin. All races in South Africa be they coloured, white, Indian or black, are made in the image of God. They deserve to be treated in dignity and with the dignity all God's creations deserve. If that is true of South Africa it is certainly true of those people in Russia who have convictions and feelings they ought to be able to express, and they ought to be able to find expression for their convictions every day of their lives.

● (2217)

Ask all those people we have talked about in this House how they feel about this. If the policy of détente of this government and of other western governments is designed to break down the barriers between us and the Eastern bloc countries in respect of all of those things that are repugnant in that present system, why should that policy not work in other countries where there is another kind of discrimination?

Would it be too much to ask this government just once to carry on a consistent policy in this matter? Even better yet, would it be too much to take politics out of sports altogether and allow athletes from all around the world to compete without any government controls or restrictions?

I am not fighting against Canadian participation in the Olympics in Moscow or in any other city in the world. All I am asking this government to do is recognize that pain is universal, and it does not matter whether it is in a Russian concentration camp, a Russian insane asylum, or in a South African mine. All I ask this government is to start being consistent in its policy.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is obviously aware that the immediate responsibility for Canada's participation in the Moscow Olympics rests with the Canadian Olympic Association and not with the federal government. The Canadian Olympic Association solicits private sector funding through the Olympic trust. In addition, funds are provided to the association by the fitness and amateur sports branch as part of its program of assistance to sports associations to ensure participation by high performance Canadian athletes at international competitions.

The need to avoid government intervention in the affairs of autonomous sport associations such as the Canadian Olympic Association is recognized and respected by many groups in Canada.

In the circumstances which we currently face regarding the abridgement of freedom of thought and expression in the Soviet Union, we do not consider the Olympics to be an appropriate forum in which to express our views on human rights in the U.S.S.R.

I am rather amazed that the hon. member should state we should keep politics out of sport, while at the same time asking whether the Government of Canada would prevent participation in the Olympics by Canadian athletes. I cannot reconcile those two statements by the hon. member.

I believe you will find, Mr. Speaker, our policy consistent with the government sport boycott of South Africa. The United Nations in 1971, 1975, 1976 and 1977 adopted a series of resolutions calling on all member states to refuse any sponsorship, assistance, or encouragement of sporting contacts with South Africa. Canada supported all those resolutions.

At this time no such international reservations exist with regard to a sport boycott of the U.S.S.R. and, therefore, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), the fitness and amateur sport branch does not believe it appropriate at this time to alter its position vis-à-vis participation in the 1980 Moscow Olympics.

NATIONAL REVENUE—SALES TAX REBATE ON INVENTORIES OF MANUFACTURED GOODS

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, the subject of my grievance tonight arises from the budget announcement on November 16 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) regarding the reduction of the 12 per cent federal sales tax to 9 per cent.

● (2222)

I posed a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). This was on December 8, and I would like now to read that question:

Adjournment Debate

Considering the certainty of great financial loss to certain businesses such as automobile and machinery dealers who have substantial inventories on which the old 12 per cent sales tax has been paid, will the minister indicate whether he is considering some form of adjustment in the sales tax formula that would minimize the financial loss of those businesses?

The Minister of Finance said in his speech on November 16, "I want this passed on to the consumers". I speak tonight on behalf of automobile and machinery dealers and businesses with other inventories subject to the reduction in this tax. I say to the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance that this is a very cavalier and deceptive approach to this question on the part of the government.

Just because the government is almost bankrupt, that is no reason why it should also bankrupt the retail dealers of this country. When the minister says he wants to pass this 3 per cent reduction on to the consumers, his approach should be honest and fair to everyone. He should recognize that the automobile and machinery dealers of this country should be compensated for the reduction they will have to make in their inventory prices.

I have with me two good examples, borne out in letters from dealers in my riding who will suffer losses as a result of this action by the government. The first letter is from Pringle's Service Ltd. in Napanee. It reads:

Dear Doug:

I am writing you to express my deep concern over the effect the recent federal sales tax reduction has had on me as a small businessman, as well as thousands of small businessmen, like myself, all across Canada.

Although I heartily applaud the government's initiative to lower federal sales tax, albeit long overdue, the immediate effect of this change is myself being caught with over 60 new cars and trucks that are, on the average, $175 overpriced. If I don't reprice my stock, customers will not buy from stock, but rather order the same vehicle from the factory at the new lower price. But to reprice my entire stock means writing off $10,000.

As it now stands, the Canadian car dealers are left holding a multimillion dollar price tag. As a small businessman, I resent this indirect budgetary subsidization. Since the November 16 budget speech, my firm has been unable to sell a new 1979 vehicle out of stock.

I urge you to push for a 3 per cent federal sales tax rebate of instock vehicles for small businessmen like myself right across our nation.

It is signed Larry A. Pringle.

I would like to quote from another letter I received from Revell Motor Sales Limited in Verona, Frontenac County. The letter is addressed to myself and includes the copy of a telegram sent to the Minister of Finance on November 27. It reads:

Dear Mr. Alkenbrack:

Re: Budget—Federal Sales Tax Reduction.

Please find listed below a copy of a telegram we have sent to the Minister of Finance.

We feel heavily penalized by this tax reduction as this will cost us in excess of $22,000.

I, a businessman, do not feel I should have to subsidize your tax cut.

Our customers are waiting for the lower priced vehicles and I am left with over one hundred (100) vehicles in inventory and at 12.50 per cent interest rate, I feel this is a severe and unnecessary penalty to car dealers over other retailers.

Rebates of this nature were granted in 1961, 1968 and 1974 and should certainly be granted again at this time.

As our net profit is less than 2 per cent, we feel we cannot afford this. We need your immediate attention to this matter.

Yours truly,

H. M. Revell
Revell Motor Sales Limited

If the minister wants these reductions passed on to the consumer, he should give each dealer credit for the savings that he has had to pass on to his customers. It is not difficult to do.

Both the Minister of Finance and Minister of National Revenue have complained about the tremendous amounts of money and very numerous accounts that would have to be serviced. But every automobile manufacturer has a computerized record of every dealer's inventory on November 16, which was the date of the minister's announcement, and through this they have the ability to make an accurate total of tax reductions and/or rebates that should be credited to the dealer as he sells an automobile to his customer.

● (2227)

I appreciate that some adjustment has been made in the time of transit of automobiles from factories to dealers as of November 16, but that is not enough.

Both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue have pointed out that it would cost many millions of dollars to rectify this problem. This government ought not to have made the automobile and machinery dealers of Canada pay for this aberration on the part of the government.

I reiterate, there is a precedent for a rebate in the 1974, 1968 and 1961 budgets. Let the minister now be fair and follow those precedents.

I note, Mr. Speaker, in the proceedings of today the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) has obtained an agreement from the Minister of Finance to meet with a delegation of representatives of the Automobile Dealers of Canada, and I say let the government and that delegation work together to right this inequitable situation, and this gross example of unfair financial discrimination against a very important segment of our economy, the Canadian automotive retailers.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has received a number of representations from auto dealers and others concerning recovery of tax which had been paid on goods in their inventories on budget night. The matter has received careful consideration.

It is customary for changes in sales and excise taxes on commodities to come into effect on the day following the budget announcement. The government was aware that there would be goods in the hands of wholesalers and retailers on budget night on which the tax had been paid at the 12 per cent rate. However, the government did not propose a refund of the difference between the tax previously paid at the old rate and the new rate. This would be difficult to do in a fair way because of the wide range of products and the large number of retailers and distributors involved.

Questions have been raised by hon. members and by some auto dealers concerning refunds which were paid to auto dealers in 1958 and 1961, and to retailers of heavy trucks in 1974, when taxes were reduced on these vehicles. The measures introduced in those years were specifically oriented toward the automotive and transportation equipment industries. The decisions to pay refunds in respect of tax paid inventories were taken in the context of the exceptional circumstances which had focused the tax cuts on the motor vehicle industry.

The situation today is not the same. The recent reduction in federal sales taxes affects a broad range of taxable goods. It was not specifically directed toward any one industry.

Hon. members will appreciate that it would be difficult to provide relief for tax-paid inventory for the auto industry without providing similar relief for all goods held in inventories in Canada. A general provision to provide refunds to wholesalers and retailers holding tax-paid inventories at the time of the budget would result in a substantial revenue loss. Furthermore, it would be difficult to do so in an equitable manner because of the large number of products and traders involved.

The budget bills will be before the House shortly. The hon. member will then be able to bring forward an amendment which would take into account the difficulties I have outlined tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 15, 1978

The House met at 11 a.m.

● (1107)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

AGRICULTURE

PRICE AND SUPPLY OF TURKEYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, since Christmas is approximately one week away.

In an in-house publication put out by Agriculture Canada on November 28, entitled "Food Outlook", under the heading "Poultry" is found the following:

Turkey supplies will be short for Christmas, causing much higher retail prices than a year ago.

In view of that, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move:

That this House directs the Minister of Agriculture to apologize to his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, whom he embarrassed in the House and seriously undermined and, furthermore, that he apologize to Canadian consumers who are forced to pay higher prices for turkeys because of the minister's refusal to accept the advice of his own department.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FINANCE

LOW-INTEREST LOANS FOR FARMERS AND SMALL BUSINESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

As capital at reasonable rates of interest is a vital necessity for starting up and expanding farming and industrial operations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott):

That this House directs the Minister of Finance to make available low-interest, government-backed loans to enable young men and women to get started in business and farming, and small businesses and farming operations which need additional capital for expansion to be able to obtain it at rates of interest they can afford.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

ALLEGED REMARK OF PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House, noting that the Prime Minister stated yesterday that he is the best person not only in his own party but in all of Canada, cites—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: I never stated that. I might believe it, but I did not state it.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has confirmed the point. My motion continues:

—this as both proof that he has succumbed to the Greek vice of hubris, and even after 11 years in the light of the blinding sun has not been able to distinguish the forms from the substance, thus instructs him to retreat to the cave forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

AIR CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF HON. BRYCE MACKASEY AS CHAIRMAN OF BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which flows out of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) press conference yesterday.

In view of the incredible appointment of Bryce Mackasey as chairman of the board of Air Canada, the airline owned by the people of Canada which is its flagship abroad and just recently operated at a profit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That in view of the new chairman's history of spending binges at the Post Office and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, this House requests the Prime Minister to assure concerned Canadians that the new chairman is to play the political figurehead role which he plays so well, but is to have nothing to do with the operations of the airline.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PICKETING AT WEST DOOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that a woman has been picketing the west door of the House of Commons for many weeks now, that she is nearing the point where her inclusion in the Guiness Book of Records for the longest one-person protest in Canadian history is a distinct possibility, and that her placard is totally incomprehensible to anyone seeking to learn the point of her protest, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the Prime Minister, in the finest tradition of Christmas and showing true Christmas spirit, find out what this woman's problem is and see if he can offer any assistance to her.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

AIR CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the discriminatory appointment of the new chairman of the board of Air Canada, which clearly overlooked 12 equally distinguished losers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare):

That this House instructs the government to create a new Canadian honour, to be known as the DFC, equal in rank to the Order of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

[Mr. Nowlan.]

NATIONAL UNITY

REMARKS CONCERNING SECRETARY OF STATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my motion arises out of a secret memo from a senior official in the Canadian Unity Information Office who states their activities will become more politicized and calls their minister, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), accident prone. It states:

● (1112)

Mr. Roberts does not know what we are doing or why we are doing it and probably doesn't care a hell of a lot as long as it doesn't get him into trouble.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House refers the estimates for the Canadian Unity Information Office to the appropriate committee for investigation and report, and requests that the minister resign.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROPOSED OFFICE IN WINNIPEG, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Recently, because the government finds itself bereft of representation in the province of Manitoba—even St. Boniface, its safest seat in the west, having been lost—it has decided to open an office in Winnipeg headed by the Minister for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid).

Because sufficient funds have already been spent for citizen representation in Manitoba, and because the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is not an elected advocate of Manitoba's interests, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That the plans for this new office be scrapped.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR CANADA WORKS AND YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the alarming unemployment rate is liable to impede the national economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle):

That the House urge the Department of Employment and Immigration to disclose immediately the estimates earmarked for the Canada Work and Young Canada Works programs to reassure the many victims of unemployment in eastern Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AIR CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF HON. BRYCE MACKASEY AS CHAIRMAN OF BOARD

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it relates to his announcement last evening concerning the appointment of Bryce Mackasey as chairman of the board of Air Canada.

In view of this surprising announcement by the Prime Minister, taking into account the outstanding history of Air Canada as one of the few Crown corporations that has had very high public esteem, one that has been relatively free of political influence on the part of a series of successive governments, and one that has—as my colleague, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, pointed out—just recently made a profit, and considering that in one stroke the Prime Minister has now downgraded both the independence and objectivity, and possibly the efficiency of Air Canada in view of Mr. Mackasey's record with the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Post Office, will the Prime Minister indicate why he made this appointment, particularly in view of the Estey report of 1975 which said, in reference to the appointment of senior personnel as directors—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the question is clear.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member had a long introduction and was going to ask something of the Prime Minister. I did note that he used the word "downgraded" in association with the appointment of a former cabinet minister to the chairmanship of the board of Air Canada.

I do not remember that hon. member opposite saying to the Hon. Bryce Mackasey, when he was a minister or present in the House, that he was not an honourable man or was not an intelligent or capable man. Therefore, I can only conclude that in the mind of the hon. member, a man who has served his country well in the House of Commons is not competent to serve his country well in other pursuits. This is not the view of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that two of the first comments by Mr. Mackasey, in talking today about his new role, were that he would continue to make political speeches but at a lower profile, and that he planned to paint the airline green, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could indicate if chairman Mackasey will be performing a suitable role in the important task of chairman of the board of Air Canada, whether he is simply in a holding pattern waiting for some future development in his political career, or does he think these kinds of statements are appropriate for the head of a large Crown corporation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. member's quotation of Mr. Mackasey. I would not believe he said such a thing. I believe the hon. member is not quoting him accurately.

• (1117)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Prime Minister himself will check into these comments, and that he would also check the Estey report in terms of the appropriateness of this kind of appointment to Air Canada.

In view of the fact that there seems to have been no consultation with Air Canada or with anyone who knows something about planes, such as the Minister of Transport, and that the only reaction in cabinet was one of applause, could the Prime Minister indicate what kind of guidelines, with specific reference to the very rapid technological changes and sophistication of air travel—and given all the major question that will need to be resolved in the coming months with respect to Canada's national airline—had application to the appointment of Mr. Mackasey to this very important and sensitive position.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that I check what Mr. Mackasey said. I asked my colleague, who assured me that he said he would continue to speak about national unity. It is typical of that hon. member and the party opposite that they think when a person talks of national unity he is making a political speech. We think that it is also the duty of all Canadians to concern themselves with this issue.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Eglinton on a supplementary.

* * *

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

MEMO OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE RESPECTING POLITICAL OBJECTIVES

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Would he tell the House whether a memorandum written by the Minister of National Revenue, dated November 27, 1978, expressed official government policy when it noted that the entire direction for the next four months must be measured against political objectives?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a supplementary question.

* * *

EMPLOYMENT

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAMS FOR WOMEN

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question may not have been supplementary, but it was relevant. I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question which concerns the women of Canada.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration said in this House as recently as November 30 that affirmative action programs for women in Canada had already been put in place. Considering that this is simply not the case, because the regional offices which are essential to the implementation of affirmative action programs have not even been filled, and it has been ten months since the promise was made, will the Prime Minister tell the House when the government plans to live up to this ten-month old promise?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, staffing and training for the affirmative action offices should be in place by February, 1979, and the program is expected to be operational by April, 1979.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the question to the Prime Minister, as head of the government. The Minister of Employment and Immigration told the House on November 30 that the program had already been put in place, the minister had said the same thing prior to that date.

Since it will be almost one year from the time the promise was made until the program is implemented, I would like to ask the Prime Minister another question about women's programs. Considering that the government, in its cutbacks, plans to eliminate a number of specific programs concerned with problems which women face—I am thinking specifically of the Outreach program which in Ontario alone has provided benefits for 12,000 women by keeping them off welfare and unemployment insurance—will the government reconsider this matter and restore these essential women's programs.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is typical of the NDP that they only notice how good the government's programs are when we curtail the rate of growth of those programs. I thank the hon. member for the backhanded compliment. We still have many excellent programs in order to promote the advancement of women both inside and outside the public service, in the employment of Canada. Great sums are still being spent on such programs.

If the rate of growth has been curtailed in that area, then it has also been curtailed in other areas, as the hon. member knows. He should also know that the whole purpose of the government is to make sure that its expenditures do not grow any faster than the economy as a whole. I think that is a reasonable proposition.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, as usual, the Prime Minister deliberately misheard the question. I referred the Prime Minister to a statement made in the House by a minister, which was false: the minister told the House on November 30 that the affirmative action programs had been put in place. They have not been put in place.

Again, since a number of specific programs are being curtailed or eliminated by the government—I am thinking particularly of the Outreach program which has kept thousands of Canadian women off unemployment insurance and welfare—would the Prime Minister not agree that it is preferable for people to be working rather than collecting welfare and, if so, because women particularly are hit by unemployment, will he reconsider the government's priorities and re-establish these programs?

• (1122)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, our priorities have not changed. Just a moment ago the hon. parliamentary secretary indicated the date on which this particular program would be implemented; therefore, the priorities have not changed.

What I am trying to make the leader of the New Democratic Party understand, and what he has some difficulty understanding, is that the rate of growth of total government expenditures—federal, provincial and municipal—had been judged too high at all levels. All of us must reduce somewhat the rate of growth. That does not mean we cut back or destroy programs; it means we do not continue growing as fast as had been planned. The hon. member should know that, when he looks at the size of his party: it does not grow as fast as he planned.

[Translation]

TRADE

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO REDUCE COMMERCIAL DEFICIT—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Considering that Canada's commercial deficit for manufactured goods has gone up from $2.2 billion in 1970 to $11.5 billion in 1977, does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce intend to announce shortly some measures meant to correct that situation?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this question has been asked a number of times and I should like to put the record straight on it.

Since 1961, Canada's exports of fully manufactured goods have increased 20 times, while in the same period Canada's imports of fully manufactured goods have increased about five times. It can readily be seen from those figures that growth in exports of fully manufactured goods is increasing faster than imports of fully manufactured goods.

Fully manufactured goods coming into Canada are priced on the international market; so, naturally, with an 85-cent dollar their price is high. The volume of imports is not necessarily up over last year, but the price of those imports is up over last year because of the relationship of the dollar, and that is what shows up in the figures.

[Translation]

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL INTERVENE AT GATT NEGOTIATIONS ON BEHALF OF CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the views of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce are certainly not shared by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The minister claims that he is making efforts; on the basis of the results obtained, his efforts must certainly be quite inadequate, because the trade deficit I have indicated represents a great many jobs lost every year in the manufacturing industry. Could the minister advise the House whether, during the current GATT negotiations, he intends to make representations to obtain for our manufacturers advantages similar to those enjoyed by foreign manufacturers?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the House that my department is playing a very major role in the multilateral trade negotiations. I also want to assure the hon. member that we will have better access to foreign markets after the multilateral trade negotiations are concluded. Therefore, our manufacturers will be greatly assisted by the results of those negotiations.

FISHERIES

OPENING OF CLAM BEDS IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

In view of the problems that have been experienced in the clam beds of eastern Canada as a result of regulations which mean that decisions are made in Ottawa, rather than at the site of operations, can the minister tell me if there has been any change, or will the beds be given immediate attention when they are ready for digging, instead of their opening being delayed?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised this matter before and I asked the region to provide me with information, which I shall, of course, pass on to him.

I might say that the only reason the regulations have to be dealt with in Ottawa is that they are part of the order in council process. For that reason they cannot be delegated, but they originate in the regions. It is my policy to decentralize as much decision-making to the regional managers as is legally allowable.

Mr. McCain: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that regional decisions are to be made in class 1 and class 2 beds, but in the class 3 beds decision can only be made in Ottawa. Would the minister assure the industry that he will take the necessary steps to put the decision-making process at the scene of the operation, so that it may be in place at the earliest opportunity for the greatest possible economic advantage to the clam diggers?

● (1127)

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty at all with the hon. member's proposal. These regulations are put in because of the danger that clams and certain other species have of being hazardous to health. Where the ban can be lifted, we do so as quickly as possible; but we have to make very cautious approaches because if there is one way of wiping out an industry, it is to have the sort of accident that can occur through carelessness.

* * *

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PRICE AND SUPPLY OF TURKEYS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. A publication put out by Agriculture Canada pretty well confirms what the minister told the House regarding a short supply of turkeys which would force up prices. I might say it seriously undermined the credibility of the Minister of Agriculture in this House.

I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs if he could tell the House whether he has investigated this matter and whether there has been a substantial price differential as a result of short supply. Also, what recommendations can he make to the House to ensure that there will be adequate supplies of turkeys at reasonable prices?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Agriculture pointed out a day or so ago, prices have declined in recent days. We are very gratified by that. Although they are higher than last year, it is our feeling that the high price has been due to lack of supply in response to the increasing demand due to higher beef prices.

I might say that the National Farm Products Marketing Council did authorize an increase in quota for next year and that is a good thing, but it might not help for this Christmas.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, could the minister explain to the House how it was possible for the government to underestimate the market situation, knowing that there was this change in beef prices? Could the minister also tell the House what advice he has with respect to the failure of the council to adequately forecast the situation? If the honourable turkey, the Minister of Agriculture, cannot restrain himself—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. McGrath: —I will let the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs carve him up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: He is doing a nice job of carving up the minister, who sounds like a turkey stuffed with his own rhetoric.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has had an adequate oportunity to put his supplementary question.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I lost the question, with all the rhetoric of the hon. member.

* * *

NATIONAL UNITY

REMARKS CONCERNING SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Another turkey.

Mr. Beatty: I wonder if he could confirm the authenticity of the report which appears on the front page of today's Ottawa Journal and purports to report on a memorandum written by the executive director of the Canadian Unity Information Office which accuses its former minister, the Secretary of State, of being "somewhat accident prone" and states:

Mr. Roberts does not know what we are doing, why we are doing it and probably doesn't care a hell of a lot as long as it doesn't get him into trouble.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am told that such a document does exist and that it was the opinion an official expressed to his superior. Obviously, this government believes in free opinions. The note was an internal one. I can assure the House that I do not share the view of the official. I do know, from discussions and listening to the minister many times, that he is, on the contrary, a very intelligent and ardent proponent of national unity and all aspects of it.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister will be aware, the memorandum is extremely critical of the effectiveness of the Secretary of State. It was purportedly written because of the author's concern over the issue of ministerial responsibility in the House of Commons for the Canadian Unity Information Office.

May I ask the Prime Minister, in view of the statement contained in the memo that, in summary, "we cannot afford the risk of having our effectiveness reduced because the minister does not know," to indicate to the House whether the responsibility for reporting to parliament was taken away from the Secretary of State and given to the Minister of Justice because the Prime Minister shared the concern that the Secretary of State was not properly and effectively operating on behalf of the Canadian Unity Informatin Office?

● (1132)

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker; even prior to the appointment of the Minister of Justice he was the minister to whom this group reported. That was at the time he was minister of state for federal-provincial relations. The estimates were in the Secretary of State's department because the Minister of Justice, then minister of state for federal-provincial relations, did not have estimates of his own. They had been part of the Privy Council estimates. Therefore, it was an administrative arrangement. However, the reporting was done to the present Minister of Justice. It remains with him. I, of course, have great confidence in him as I do in all my ministers.

* * *

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

MEMO OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE RESPECTING POLITICAL OBJECTIVES

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister: it relates to a memorandum written by the Minister of National Revenue on November 27, headed "Stricly confidential". Was the minister expressing government policy when he wrote:

—the entire direction of my efforts must be measured against political objectives.

He further said he must clearly avoid, at all costs, speaking to delegations, signing mail dealing with legislation, and so on. Is that the policy of this government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand the memorandum is one written by the minister to his political staff. As the House knows, each minister—and, indeed, the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party—has persons called political people in their offices. It was his indication to them, I understand, that he wanted to achieve a high profile—and I believe he has done that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Parker: Can the Prime Minister confirm that he is now heading a coalition government as in the same memorandum the minister expressed his intention to become a member of the CCF, a "cutting controversial figure"?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTION MPs TRAVEL ON CANADIAN ROUTES BY CANADIAN AIRCRAFT

Hon. Ron Basford (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: In recognition of Canada being a Pacific Rim country, and Vancouver being Canada's gateway to the Orient, will the Prime Minister endeavour to persuade the Leader of the Opposition and the journalists travelling with him to visit Tokyo to travel via Vancouver and a Canadian route, rather than via Los Angeles and Hawaii?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that if he uses the pass issued to him by the Canadian airlines, there will be no criticism from this side of the House, particularly if he travels on a Canadian route.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister please advise this House who will be the next chief justice in this country, particularly the one in British Columbia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not seem to know that the chief justice is well and is performing very well.

Mr. Paproski: Not in British Columbia.

* * *

AIR CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF HON. BRYCE MACKASEY AS CHAIRMAN OF BOARD

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, who is extending his mettle from the press conference of yesterday. It relates to the serious question asked by the hon. member for Egmont about the appointment of Mr. Mackasey to the chairmanship of Air Canada.

In order to try to assess the value judgment of the Prime Minister, and without getting into dialectical debating points about the hon. members who have served their country well and are suggesting national unity red-herrings—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Does the Prime Minister honestly believe, in view of the record of Mr. Mackasey when he was the minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the minister responsible for the Post Office, that his appointment to Air Canada measures up to the stature referred to in Judge Estey's report in 1975 when, in talking about directors of the board, the dominant governing force in the corporation's management structure, he said that appointees should have that stature to give the independence of thought that the position desires? Does the Prime Minister honestly think, in view of that person's record here legislatively, that he should be chairman of the board of the people's airline?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is one record that Mr. Mackasey has: it is not with people who are the hon. member's friends, but with the ordinary people in Canada, the little man, the workers, the people in all categories of the population. I think his record in that area is sufficiently well proven that he will improve in every way possible the services of Air Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, having served in this House with Mr. Mackasey, and appreciating very much his Irish nature and his compassion for people, I agree in part with the Prime Minister's answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: However, are the standards for the chairman of Air Canada determined by a person's compassion for little people and not his outlook in many other areas? With regard to this appointment, is this the type of precedent the Prime Minister will follow in other areas? I might believe that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is a very interesting individual, who personally I might have had some very interesting times with—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: Is he going to be the new president of, for example, the CBC?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know of many of the qualifications of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for that particular post. However, if the hon. member would tell me some more about the interesting times he has had with the minister, I would perhaps discover some of his further qualifications.

* * *

INDUSTRY

TAKEOVER OF SIMPSONS BY SIMPSONS-SEARS—STUDY BY COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the fact the proposed merger between Simpsons-Sears and Simpsons, which in effect is a takeover by Simpsons-Sears of Simpsons, increases the control of corporate power in the hands of a few, increases the amount of foreign ownership of Canadian industry and has many other disadvantages for this country, will the minister consider having this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for review before the merger is approved?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Foreign Investment Review Agency comes before the committee when it is considering my estimates. At that time its work can be fully examined. Any particular case can be examined during the study of those estimates. This particular case increases the ownership of a company doing business in Canada, namely, Sears. With this recent acceptance, as much as 75 per cent of it will be owned in Canada. However, the final decision as to whether the merger takes place or not is in the hands of the shareholders.

With regard to Simpsons, they are nearly 100 per cent Canadian. They can make a choice whether they want to accept the Hudson's Bay offer, a very good company which had had tremendous expansion in Canada over the last ten or 15 years and is a great merchandiser, or having greater participation and ownership in Sears, also a great merchandiser in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the minister that the kind of review he talks about is after the event, not before, which was the point of my question. My supplementary question is based on the fact that in 1977 there were 193 foreign takeovers in Canada, the largest number in history.

● (1142)

In view of the fact that it looks as though that number will be exceeded in 1978, is the minister not concerned about this increasing degree of foreign ownership in Canada, and does he not think it time for the government to pay attention to the will of parliament when it passed the Foreign Investment Review Act—that we should move in the direction of greater Canadian ownership, not greater foreign ownership, as is happening under the policies of the present minister?

Mr. Horner: Let me explain this very carefully to the hon. member and to the House. About one-third of the supposed foreign takeovers which occur in Canada involve a foreign company selling its operation in a foreign land and a subsidiary in Canada being part and parcel of that agreement. In other words, in one-third of the applications an American company is really taking over another American company in Canada. Or, quite often, a German company is taking over another German company in Canada. Recently there were a number of Swedish cases.

In all cases we seek to determine a significant advantage to Canada. If the hon. member would add up the number of jobs we have created by allowing foreign investment in Canada and would calculate the increased degree of Canadian ownership, he would really get an idea of what FIRA is doing.

In the Simpsons' case, for example, Canadian ownership went up to 75 per cent from 60 per cent. Much more research and development is being done in Canada now because of Foreign Investment Review Agency demands. How many more jobs has this research and development created in Canada? These are questions the hon. member should consider before he concludes that the Foreign Investment Review Agency is not serving Canada very well. I think it is serving us very well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

POST OFFICE

ANNUAL LIONS CLUB CONVENTION—COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Public Works, but I see he is not here today. I do, though, have a question I was intending to put to the Postmaster General next week and I will ask that one today.

Lions Clubs from all over the world are holding their annual convention in Montreal next year. A few weeks ago, in answer to a question, the minister said consideration was being given by his department to recognizing the work of Lions Clubs all over the world, perhaps by issuing a commemorative stamp. I wonder whether the committee which is studying that matter has yet made a decision and whether it is in the affirmative.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge the committee has not yet finished its exploration of what is possible in connection with the Lions Club celebrations during their convention in Montreal next year. However, I can assure the hon. member that because of pressure from this side of the House, as well as from the other side, without taking note of pressures from countless other Canadians, we will do our utmost to find a way by which Lions Club members would be satisfied in commemorating this event in Montreal.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion concerning subsidiary development agreements with the province of Ontario. I want to congratulate him on the forestry management agreement involving some $71 million which was signed a week ago today and which will do a great deal for that industry.

In view of the termination next spring of the ARDA agreement which has done a great deal for rural development in northern Ontario, can the minister tell us whether a new agreement will be signed with Ontario to ensure the development of the northern part of the province and its resources in terms of minerals, agriculture, tourism and industry?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I just want to correct the figure the hon. member quoted. The agreement which was signed in connection with forestry last week involved a commitment of $82 million, $41 million of this coming from DREE. As to his question, I hope the negotiations with the government of Ontario presently taking place will allow us to sign an agreement which will probably start early in the new fiscal year of 1979-80.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FORECAST OF INFLATION RATE—IMPACT OF UNITED STATES RATE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. As inflation in the United States is now pushing to 10 per cent and as, in years past, the government has been saying that Canadian inflation is largely dependent on inflation abroad and not due to internal conditions, does the hon. gentleman believe that this steadily rising U.S. inflation rate will allow the economy to achieve the 6 per cent inflation rate forecast for the year end, or the 4 per cent figure forecast when the AIB was first established?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I recognize, of course, that the level of inflation is going up in the United States and that ours is going down, but I do not think inflation in the United States will lead us to miss our target in Canada. We have a good chance of realizing our goals. It will, nevertheless, affect our situation here. There are, I am pleased to say, many observers who think that at this moment the pressure of inflation is lessening in the United States because of a change in the monetary policy of that country.

Mr. Ritchie: Does the minister contemplate taking any further significant steps to contain the effects of U.S. inflation for example, by giving more support to the dollar?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid there is not much I can do about it at this time. It is evident that if Canadians demonstrate a lot more discrimination when they choose consumer products in Canada, and select Canadian goods over imported goods, they can certainly do a lot too to help. As to the balance of payments, if Canadians stay away from the United States because of the price increases there, they will certainly help improve our position as far as the tourist industry is concerned.

* * *

[English]

PENITENTIARIES

REDUCTION IN CHAPLAINCY SERVICE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It concerns a number of representations I have received in recent days against what is purported to be a cutback in the chaplaincy service in penitentiaries across Canada.

In committee, the commissioner stated there had been no formal notices of lay-offs sent to anyone in the chaplaincy service. In view of reports I have received to the contrary, can the Solicitor General tell us exactly what is going on? Can he assure us that there has been, and will be, no reduction in the chaplaincy service from the small number of people who perform a most important and necessary service?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): I have nothing to add to the information which was given to the committee at the time the hon. lady was present at that committee meeting. I cannot assure her that there will not be a reduction in the number of chaplains within the service, for the reasons I gave to one of her hon. friends when this matter was raised. However, I will undertake to advise the hon. lady when decisions are to be made. As to specific notices to which she has referred, I will look into that matter further.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the reports I have heard do not concern only one region; they come from regions all across the country. There is some indication that notices of a verbal nature, not of a formal, written nature, have been given which would result in cutbacks right across the country. If this is the case, would the minister reconsider the whole policy of proceeding in that way?

Mr. Blais: I will undertake to look into the matter further. However, it has always been my practice to receive representations, from whatever quarter, to analyse them carefully and then to make a decision. I will advise the hon. lady of that decision when it is made.

* * *

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HEALTH CARE OF NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. After meeting with the maritime chiefs for a few minutes yesterday—although there was no discussion of substance—can the hon. lady provide an assurance that she will meet with the maritime chiefs in January? Perhaps she could send them a letter to that effect.

● (1152)

Can she also undertake to rescind the present contract signed by her regional officials on Blue Cross and the Blue Shield payment plan, which is an unacceptable contract to the maritime chiefs and was implemented on December 1 without their consent and without adequate consultation with them?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am not aware of the latter part of the question and I will inquire in my department as to what it is all about. As to the first part of the question, it was difficult to have a discussion of substance in the minute when I was at the door and 30 persons were trying to get into the room while I was trying to get out with the other members of the committee. If the hon. member had not sent them to that room, I would have met them in my office.

I can confirm to the House—something which I have already done a few times—that I did send a telegram on Monday or Tuesday morning on receiving telegrams from the 40 different delegations of Indian chiefs in Canada, telling them that I would meet with them and that I was recommending that our technical people first meet immediately and then we would meet together in the second part of January, and that for a very good reason. I think it would be better and less expensive for everyone concerned if I went to their regions of the country instead of having huge delegations come to Ottawa, as they did yesterday, at public expense.

[Mr. Blais.]

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister seems to be attributing powers to me that I do not have in so far as the behaviour of the maritime chiefs is concerned. I would like to ask her another question concerning the new guidelines which in effect mean a reduction of the health services, such as dental and optometric services, in various areas. Would she agree to suspend the guidelines, as apparently has been done in Manitoba, at least until she has had a chance to talk to the maritime chiefs and obtain their views on these matters?

Miss Bégin: I welcome the opportunity to clarify to the hon. member once more the fundamental reason for these guidelines. These are guidelines for my officers to keep any abuse in check. I want that to be quite clear.

It is very easy to be irresponsible and to sign any request without even looking into it. I need the co-operation of the chiefs so that those in need receive what is meant for them. I said they would all receive whatever care they need in terms of dental services, eyeglasses, and so on. We are not speaking of the health delivery service but, rather, of four items which involve drugs, eyeglasses, transportation and dental costs. The hon. member is fully aware of that. All the Indians in need will receive these services, which amount to 50 per cent more than provincial welfare.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATUS OF PRIME MINISTER'S MEETING WITH PRIME MINISTER OF JAMAICA—AGENDA

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Although my shy and retiring nature will not allow me to ask him whether he will use his pass to go to Jamaica later this month, I would like to know whether that visit will be an official one when he meets with Prime Minister Manley. If it is, could he tell the House what will be on the agenda and whether he will be discussing such things as the north-south dialogue and the economic rearrangement as a result of third world exigencies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought the announcement of the summit had been made. Certainly I spoke about it at some length at my press conference yesterday. It will be a summit attended by something like seven, eight or nine heads of government and heads of state.

Concerning the hon. member's shyness, let me tell him that I will use my pass on Air Canada, if it is convenient, and if not I will attempt to fly to that summit on a Department of Transport JetStar.

There is no agenda: it is a summit convened by Mr. Manley and Chancellor Schmidt of Germany to develop the idea that it would be excellent, in order to break the log-jam in the dialogue between the north and south, if we could get some heads of government from the group of northern countries and some from the south to discuss, without an agenda, all the attendant problems with regard to disparities between the third world and the industrialized nations and attempt to find solutions as the Commonwealth did when we set up the McIntyre committee after the Commonwealth meeting in Kingston in 1973. We would attempt, once again, to improve the quality of the understanding of the dialogue between the so-called third world countries and the developed world.

It will be a rather unstructured meeting. I do not expect there will be resolutions or communiqués and I have not encouraged the press to attend it as an event that would draw a great deal of public attention.

* * *

SOCIAL INSURANCE

COMMITTEE STUDY OF USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. It deals with the continuing concern over the use of the social insurance number beyond the original intention of the federal government.

I am convinced, as are many other Canadians, that the major demand for the use of the SIN is made by agencies and departments of provinces which require this number for the issuing of permits and licences. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could confirm that the committee which will be formed in February will bring into public view the opinions of the provinces, and will he say who will participate in this committee and whether we will have some agreement on the use of the SIN in future years?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): I am sure the minister will want a full discussion on the use of the SIN, and I am sure the recommendation of the hon. member will be viewed favourably in so far as dialoguing with the provinces on this matter is concerned.

I should like to add that the use of the SIN in many cases is voluntary and well received. I refer to Operation Identification whereby local police officers, in co-operation with householders, use the SIN to identify valuable items in the home. Many persons who have had returned stolen goods so identified are very happy with the voluntary use of the SIN.

* * *

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PRICE OF TURKEYS IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is on the continuation of the turkey war and I should like to direct it to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

We have noticed that the price of turkeys in Ontario, for Christmas, is down but generally is remaining very high in the rest of the country. In view of the fact that the farmer receives less for turkeys in western Canada and Ontario when he sells them, but the consumer in Winnipeg continues to pay about 20 cents more and the producer is getting only four or five cents less for them, what is the reason for this discrepancy? Is it that there is more corporate concentration at the retail end on the prairies? Can the minister check into it and see if he can do something about it?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I read a news report that turkey prices were lower in Ontario than in the rest of the country, but I checked ads in Quebec, for example, and found that prices there were pretty much the same as in Ontario. I am not sure about the west and I am not sure about the reason for the differential, but I am willing to look into it.

* * *

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

MEMO OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE RESPECTING POLITICAL OBJECTIVES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to take a look at the momorandum in relation to the Canadian Unity Information Office written by a former executive assistant to the economic super minister.

As the Prime Minister will have noted, there is a reference in that memorandum to the activities of the information office becoming "more politicized" over the next few weeks and months, and then there is a specific reference to the hiring of advertising agencies.

Can the Prime Minister tell the House which agencies it is contemplated will be hired which will generate political controversy, and what are the kinds of actions contemplated, to his knowledge, by the Canadian Unity Information Office that will escalate the reputation of that office as a politicized group?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will defer to the Minister of Justice who can give more details on this particular group, but the House is aware of the fact that there is a referendum bill before the House and that we intend to take a very active part in promoting the Canadian point of view throughout the period preceding any possible federal referendum.

Certainly, we intend to participate actively, as we have been doing, in the political debate on the issue of the separation of Quebec in the period preceding the Quebec referendum. No doubt this is the type of political activity that is contemplated in the memorandum to which the Leader of the Opposition referred.

Mr. Clark: I fail to understand questions relating to the appointment of advertising agencies which are seen by a former political appointee to a political minister, now a member of the Canadian Unity Information Office, being one of the sources of political controversy that the office will have to contemplate. I fail to see how that relates directly to problems which would naturally arise in the putting forward of a federal case.

● (1202)

My supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister is an administrative and structural one. Can the Prime Minister tell the House why the Minister of Justice will be answering in this House in relation to that office, and not the new Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the same memorandum as the hon. Leader of the Opposition. I see more visible and more politicized as an objective. In the hiring of agencies, of course, we would want to ensure that they were agencies which were not tinged by adverse political influences such as separatism. We would want to ensure that we are hiring agencies which believe in federalism and which will not—

Mr. Broadbent: Tory agencies in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Trudeau: There may be some suggestions coming from the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party concerning Tory agencies, but I am sure I can get advice from both sides of the House on this.

As to the reporting of that group to the Minister of Justice, it is simply because the Minister of Justice was the minister to whom this group reported previously. It will continue in that capacity, the Minister of Justice being the lead minister in terms of the referenda bill before the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What does the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations do?

Miss MacDonald: What is left?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott) on a question of privilege.

* * *

PRIVILEGE

MR. ABBOTT—MEMO RESPECTING POLITICAL OBJECTIVES

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It arises out of a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker). As a preliminary point, hon. members are aware that I made a good deal of effort to reduce the burden of paperwork in government. I want to announce happily that I shall not be writing any more memoranda to myself.

I realize the hon. member was attempting to be cutting and controversial. I do not ask him to reserve that field for myself. Also, I realize some of the comments I made in the memorandum may have been injudicious. But the hon. member joined two points in his question to the Prime Minister. He said that I would measure everything against political objectives, and that I would refuse to sign mail and meet people. In relation to signing mail, I said only that I did not wish to be submerged by my department in these chores which would prevent me from doing some of the other important things.

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of privilege raised by the hon. Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott), perhaps there is some disagreement concerning the exact interpretation of the document in question. Perhaps the minister would be willing to table it. If he is not, I would be willing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is as good a finish as any to a non-procedural point.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

Second report of Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.—Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).

[Editor's note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR ACT

AMENDMENT REMOVING REQUIREMENT TO PUBLISH "LABOUR GAZETTE"

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-30, to amend the Department of Labour Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING INFORMATION CENTRE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-31, to establish the Collective Bargaining Information Centre.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FOREIGN ECONOMIC BOYCOTT REQUESTS REPORTING ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR REPORTING OF INFORMATION

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-32, to provide for the reporting of information relating to foreign economic boycott requests.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1978

MEASURE FACILITATING CONVERSION TO METRIC SYSTEM

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill S-10 (from the Senate), to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

* * *

TRADE

TABLING OF THIRD SEMI-ANNUAL REPORT ON INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC BOYCOTTS

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I have the honour to table in both official languages the third semi-annual report on international economic boycotts.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 82, 152, 387, 516, 547, 549 and 586.

[Text]

PUBLIC WORKS—CONSTRUCTION OF POST OFFICES IN QUEBEC

Question No. 82—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

During the fiscal year 1976-77 and 1977-78, did the Department of Public Works construct any buildings which were used as post offices in the Province of Quebec and, if so (a) how many (b) in which municipalities (c) at what cost (d) were tenders called?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): (a) Public Works Canada completed eight single purpose buildings to be used as post offices in the province of Quebec, during 1976-77 and 1977-78.

(b) Municipality	(c) Cost
Anjou	$735,000
Chelsea	215,000
Clarke City	114,000
Deschambault	181,000
Repentigny	393,000
St. Bruno de Montarville	378,000
St. Justine de Newton	96,000
St. Lazare	85,000

(d) Yes.

NOTE: In addition to the single purpose buildings, four General purpose buildings were completed in the Province of Quebec during the period 1976-04-01 to 1978-03-31, which contained postal facilities and tenders were called:

MUNICIPALITY	% OF BUILDING USED BY POST OFFICE
Campbell's Bay	31
Contrecœur	50
Mount Laurier	60
St.-Hyacinthe	45

NON-CANADIAN REGISTERED VESSELS IN CANADIAN WATERS

Question No. 152—Mr. Forrestall:

For each year since 1970, what was the (a) name (b) country of registry (c) cargo or purpose of voyage (d) number of voyages made of every non-Canadian registered vessel which operated in Canadian waters north of the 60th parallel, excepting those vessels transporting grain from the Port of Churchill?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport):

	(a) Vessel's name	(b) Country of Registry	(c) Cargo	(d) Trips
1970	Thuntank VI	Great Britain	Petroleum	1
	Thoradan	Denmark	General	1
	Esso Panang	Panama	Petroleum	1
	Trojaland	Sweden	General	1
1971	Thuleland	Sweden	Petroleum	1
	Tavastland	Sweden	Petroleum	1
	Esso Panang	Panama	Petroleum	1
	Federal Hudson	Great Britain	General	1
1972	Palva	Finland	Petroleum	1
	Helgadan	Denmark	General	1
	Thebeland	Sweden	General	1
	Thoradan	Denmark	General	1
	Englishman	Great Britain	General	1
	Duhallow	Great Britain	Asbestos	2
	Northern Shell	Great Britain	Petroleum	1
	Poolzee	Netherland	Asbestos	1
	Messiniaki	Greece	Petroleum	1
	Tavasland	Sweden	Petroleum	1
	Federal Hudson	Great Britain	General	1
1973	Salerno	Great Britain	General	1
	Wilke	Finland	Petroleum	1
	Thebeland	Sweden	General	1
	Palva	Finland	Petroleum	1
	Esso Halifax	Liberia	Petroleum	1
	Helgadan	Denmark	General	1
	Cotswold	Great Britain	Asbestos	1
	Buccleuch	Great Britain	Asbestos	2
	Northern Shell	Great Britain	Petroleum	1
	Thuleland	Sweden	Petroleum	1

	(a) Vessel's name	(b) Country of Registry	(c) Cargo	(d) Trips
	Tundraland	Sweden	General	1
	Thora Dan	Denmark	General	1
	Wilke	Finland	Petroleum	1
1974	Finnmaster	Finland	General	1
	Salerno	Great Britain	General	1
	Atherstone	Great Britain	Asbestos	3
	Wilke	Finland	Petroleum	2
	Nordic Ranger	Liberia	Asbestos	1
	Inland	Great Britain	General	1
	Nordic Regent	Norway	Asbestos	2
	Palva	Finland	Petroleum	1
	Tundraland	Great Britain	General	1
	Thuleland	Great Britain	Petroleum	2
	Pinnebog	U.S.A.	Petroleum	1
1975	City of Corinth	Great Britain	General	2
	Palva	Finland	Petroleum	1
	Esso Bombay	Panama	Petroleum	2
	Wilke	Finland	Petroleum	3
	Nordic Rover	Liberia	Asbestos	2
	Artherstone	Great Britain	Asbestos	3
	Northern Steel	Panama	Petroleum	2
	Kivisto	Panama	Petroleum	1
	Tundraland	Great Britain	General	1
1976	Duivendrecht	Netherland	Asbestos	2
	Esso Bahamas	Liberia	Petroleum	2
	Scherpendrecht	Netherland	Asbestos	2
	H-1070	Bermuda	Petroleum	1
	Palva	Finland	Petroleum	1
1977	Dordrecht	Netherland	Asbestos	1
	Gothic Wasa	Sweden	Zinc and Lead Concentrates	2
	Esso Bahamas	Liberia	Petroleum	3
	Lunni	Finland	General	1
	Pinnebog	U.S.A.	Petroleum	1
	Baltic Wasa	Sweden	Zinc and Lead Concentrates	3
	Wulven Drecht	Netherland	Asbestos	1
	Scherpendrecht	Netherland	Asbestos	1
	Duivendrecht	Netherland	Asbestos	1
	H-1070	Bermuda	Petroleum	1
1978	Celtic Wasa	Sweden	Zinc and Lead Concentrates	2
	Gothic Wasa	Sweden	Zinc and Lead Concentrates	1
	Deltadrecht	Netherland	Asbestos	2
	Dordrecht	Netherland	Asbestos	3
	Lunni	Finland	Petroleum	1
	Pinnebog	U.S.A.	Petroleum	1
	Esso Bahamas	Liberia	Petroleum	1
	Tozui Maru	Japan	N/A	1

CROWSNEST PASS

Question No. 387—Mr. Herbert:

During each of the past ten years, what was the estimated loss of revenue in the maintenance of the Crowsnest Pass rates?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The commission on the costs of transporting grain by rail (Snavely Commission) found that for 1974 the total cost of moving grain at Crowsnest pass rates was $231 million. Of this total, revenues accounted for $89.7 million, the federal government paid $52 million in branch line subsidies while the remainder ($89.3 million) was borne by the railways. Mr. Snavely recently updated his work for the year 1977. In this case the total cost was $354 million of which revenues were $114.8 million, subsidies $63.7 million and the railways covered $175.5 million. No data is available to produce comparable figures for years other than 1974 and 1977.

[Mr. Lang.]

PRODUCER RAILWAY CARS—WESTERN CANADA

Question No. 516—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many producer loaded railway cars were involved in the movement of grain in Western Canada for each of the past five crop years?

2. What is the government's policy on producer loaded cars?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Transport Canada advises as follows:

1. 1973-74 181
   1974-75 96
   1975-76 394
   1976-77 255
   1977-78 2174

Source: Canadian Wheat Board.

2. There has been no change to the Canada Grains Act which governs the use of producer loaded railway cars.

MARITIME POLLUTION CLAIMS FUND

Question No. 547—Mr. McKinnon:

1. What is the total amount accumulated in the Maritime Pollution Claims fund?

2. How many payments have been made from the Fund and, in each case (a) in what amount (b) to whom (c) on what date?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport):

1. $48,997,810.93 as of October 31, 1978.

2. Two.

   (a) $345.90. (b) Mr. William Guimond, fisherman, Pointe au Père, Quebec. (c) October 23, 1975.

   (a) $300. (b) Mr. Eudore Boudreau, fisherman, Carleton, Quebec. (c) January 5, 1977.

PRAIRIE RAIL ACTION COMMITTEE

Question No. 549—Mr. Murta:

To date, what was the total cost of operating the Prairie Rail Action Committee?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): As of November 15, 1978, the total expenditures for the Prairie Rail Action Committee were $221,135.97.

AIRPORT AT URANIUM CITY—SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 586—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is Eldorado Nuclear Limited, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources or any agency thereof, purchasing the airport at Uranium City, Saskatchewan and, if so, for what price and for what purpose?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, Eldorado Nuclear Limited, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Atomic Energy Control Board, National Energy Board and Uranium Canada Limited report as follows: No.

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

The House resumed from Thursday, December 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

The House of Commons, having considered the proposed text of the order in council laid upon the table of the House on December 4, 1978, in relation to the establishment of a Ministry of State for Economic Development, prays that the making of the said order in council be approved.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has the floor. Before giving him the floor, I should like to indicate to the House that if this debate were to run its full seven-hour course, as has been prescribed by the statute under which we are debating this motion, according to the calculation of the Chair there remains one hour and eleven minutes.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, last evening when this proposed proclamation was being discussed, I listened extensively to the contributions of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I was struck by the differences in the two contributions. The hon. member for St. John's East wanted me to pay greater attention to the economic advisers in the country, but the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain begged the House to give him one more chance to be a minister. Then he would tell those economic advisers, who advised him when he was a minister in the early 1960s where to get off. He wanted one more chance to straighten out the economic advisers. The hon. member for St. John's East wanted me to listen to some of the economic advisers, and he claimed that I was not listening. Some of them are perhaps right, but some are perhaps too negative for me.

● (1212)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but he is referring to my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). East is east and west is west, and never the twain shall meet.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for making that mistake. One is a serious minded Canadian and the other is a jokester, and I should have had them straightened out as to which is east and which is west.

I should say that in looking at the economic reports one should study, the vice-chairman of the Conference Board in Canada, with which the Conservative party seems to have some ties, was quoted in the Financial Post of about two weeks ago as suggesting that the province of Alberta would have slower economic growth in the year 1979 than the rest of Canada. I do not know where that economist has been or where he learned his economic trade, but he should not expect me to accept that line of reasoning. I do not know whether I would call it balderdash, but it is certainly chock full of nonsense to my mind. The underlying strength of the economic growth in the province of Alberta will, I think, once again in 1979, if not lead the rest of the country, be very close to it.

Certainly the government is taking action when the Canadian economy is showing definite improvement. Members opposite do not like to hear this and complain from time to time when I make some remarks in this regard. They prefer gloomy news. I remember a year ago being accused of not utilizing capacity in the Canadian manufacturing industry. It was then at about 83 per cent and now it is up pretty close to 88 per cent, representing a substantial improvement in the Canadian manufacturing industry.

To me the Canadian economy is verging on the edge of a gigantic step forward. If anyone wants to consider the reasons, certainly the 85-cent dollar helps substantially; there is no question about that. We have greatly improved productivity in relation to our major trading nation, the United States. We still have problems with unemployment and inflation, but I think we have joined with the provinces in the first ministers' meetings to launch an attack on both these problems.

In looking at the question of unemployment, when I think of the number of jobs my department alone has created in the past year in every province of Canada one can readily see that we have made some tremendous steps forward.

Last evening I mentioned the aircraft industry and I should now mention the textile industry. Many people opposite, Sunday economists, believe we should get out of the textile industry completely. Actually the clothing apparel and fibres industry alone employs over 200,000 Canadians. In the city of Winnipeg the textile and clothing industry is the largest single employer. My department has done a great deal to enhance the stability of that industry. Manitoba does not particularly appreciate that industry, but it is still playing a major part in the economies of the city of Winnipeg and Manitoba.

An hon. Member: The same with Drummondville.

Mr. Horner: Yes, the same with Drummondville and many other parts of Canada.

A few weeks ago I discussed an able and factual study put out by my department in regard to Canada's manufacturing industries. I was accused by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who read off a number of newspaper quotations, of having in fact misled the House and the country by quoting actual facts with regard to our exports and imports. As I said today during the question period, this study shows that in 1977 we exported twenty times more fully manufactured goods than we did in 1960.

Let us look at our position in respect of imports of fully manufactured goods. The amount of fully manufactured goods imported in 1977 compared to 1966 has gone up only five times. One can readily see that the gap is narrowing. Perhaps it is not narrowing as fast as one would like, but we are a trading nation and, as I mentioned last evening, we depend on that trade. In order to trade one has to accept goods from other countries.

Naturally we have to meet the competition that exists. I mentioned a couple of particular steps last evening that we are taking to encourage and make Canadian industry better able to meet that competition. If the Ottawa Citizen, the Toronto Star and the Science Council of Canada think I have misrepresented the facts, let them take a look at that document and prove to me where I have done so.

There is no question in my mind that Canada has grown a great deal. Today in nearly every 33-day period we export as much as we did in a full year back in 1960 and 1961. That is an indication of how big we have become as an industrial nation. In every 33 days we export as much as we did in 1960 and 1961. We have become a huge industrial nation. In fact, a trade commissioner from Russia told me we are the sixth largest industrial nation in the world.

In an effort to meet competition we can expect that in the 1980s the president of the new economic board, with its new powers, will do a lot to assist Canada, and will pay greater attention to industry so that we can serve it better.

Members opposite should look at our trade figures. As I have mentioned in this House on many occasions, in 1961 some 22 per cent of our total exports were in grain. That has diminished to about the point where grain products account for 8 per cent or 9 per cent. One would automatically think grain sales have fallen off and we are selling less grain than ever before, but that is not true. In the late 1950s and the early 1960s we averaged about 340 million bushels in grain exports per year. In the late 1960s we averaged about 440 million bushels. In the early 1970s we averaged about 660 million bushels, and in the last couple of years we have moved 700 million bushels of grain each year for export.

Our exports of fully manufactured goods have gone up substantially. Looking at the same period, in 1960 and 1961 fully manufactured goods accounted for 8.8 per cent of our trade. Automobiles accounted for 4 per cent, nearly half of that total of 8 per cent. Today fully manufactured goods account for something like 34.7 per cent. Automobiles are up as high as 23 per cent. I mentioned earlier in the House that our deficit in respect of automobiles, trucks and parts will be substantially down this year.

In fact, if one wants to look at the basic volume of exports, ignoring the dollar figures completely, our volume this year will be up about 8 per cent. Our volume of imports without looking at the dollar figures will be practically zero. That will give an indication of what is really happening in this country of ours. We are meeting world competition and we are certainly importing less in comparison to what we are exporting.

To me, Canada has great potential to meet the competitive challenges of the 1980s. I am certain that this new thrust of the government to co-ordinate the economic efforts of various departments so that they can work together in making sure our industry is assisted in every possible way to meet that challenge is a move in the right direction. My Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will work very well with the president of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, and I am certain this will be a beneficial step for this great industrial nation.

• (1222)

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): That was an astounding speech, Mr. Speaker, made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Horner: Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. Andre: The use of the word "astounding" was no compliment. For 15 minutes the minister poured forth a lot of nonsense which, if it were true, would mean that Canada has no unemployment, an inflation rate of 2 per cent and the greatest economy in the world.

I have listened or read the speeches on this debate very attentively in an attempt to get some information on what this new super ministry is all about. Most of the public comment on this new board has been by way of inquiry. The Ottawa Citizen put it as well as anybody in an editorial in the November 25 issue:

> The question is, why was it necessary to take this administrative step—haven't these ministers been speaking to each other in the past? Has one hand in cabinet not known what the other has been doing?

I wanted to hear what the new board would be doing that had not been done by the existing structures of this government. Why have these existing structures failed, and if they have, why are they being kept in place? If these existing structures have not failed, then why do we have the new super ministry? I read very carefully the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in looking for an indication as to what this board would be doing. What I read was a bland, partial budget type of address followed by some bland generalities. If it contained anything at all, the speech indicated that this new board would be removing from the authority of the existing ministries that for which they heretofore had been responsible. The Prime Minister said, as recorded at page 2093 of Hansard:

—that board will be charged with: defining an integrated federal approach to the provision of direct support to industry and economic development in Canada.

That remark covers almost totally the responsibilities of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Prime Minister goes on to say that this board will be responsible for "co-ordinating government policy". What are the 23,000 people in the Department of Supply and Services doing? I thought that was their responsibility. This board will also be charged with "reviewing and co-ordinating proposals by departments prior to their submission to cabinet". We have a plethora of cabinet committees charged with that responsibility. The Prime Minister says that "it will be charged with developing mechanisms to improve and to integrate program delivery at the local level". It is difficult to say what that statement means.

I have also familiarized myself with the remarks of the various ministers who have spoken. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) made the incredible comment that "it won't do any harm". He and the new super minister are great friends and have known each other for a long time. He assured us that they could get along. Of all the incredible explanations for the extra expense of this board being imposed on the Canadian taxpayers, that one takes the cake.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) spoke for 40 minutes. I read his speech twice and I still could not ascertain whether he thought that this board would be helpful or harmful. He spent most of his time talking about his department. All I could gain from his remarks was that he thought that the board probably would not make a lot of difference in the end result and that he would be able to carry on as he had before its establishment.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce offered the incredible explanation that, as a result of the board's establishment, he will now have ten allies to back him up with his proposals when he attends cabinet meetings. That statement implies that before he had no allies in cabinet. Also, as I understand the remarks of the Prime MInister, he has little confidence in the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce because his policies will now have to be approved by the super minister.

In his preliminary remarks, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce praised the establishment of two new study groups within his department. One of the groups would be called the blue ribbon committee of business and labour, and its purpose would be to look at ways of improving exports. The other committee was called the committee of small business, which would look at ways of improving access by small businesses to programs of large capital expenditure around the country. If I understand the remarks of the Prime Minister correctly, these two committees will be reporting to the new super minister, not to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In all, four ministers have spoken and the House is no wiser as to what this new ministry is to do and just how Canadians will benefit from the additional expense to establish it. It was probably best summed up by John Gray in the Ottawa Journal yesterday when he quoted an unnamed official in his column. It reads:

"Obviously, if the cabinet committee system were working 100 per cent, there wouldn't be any need for this thing."

This official recognizes that the establishment of this super ministry is an admission on the part of the government of its complete and utter failure in trying to manage the business of the country during the ten years this Prime Minister has held office.

Hon. members will recall the great accolades the Prime Minister received for his approach to the question of management of government when he first took office. He was a man of the modern era, a systems man who appreciated technocrats. He was putting in place new, modern systems for the management of information flow through cabinet so that decisions could be made on a systematic and proper basis with everyone having access to all the relevant information.

Some months ago I had the privilege of participating in a seminar on the operation of government central agencies. One of our speakers was a senior civil servant who had been in the Privy Council office during this time of organization. This fellow explained to the seminar just how the cabinet functioned and how the Privy Council operates in conjunction with the cabinet. It was an incredible description. It was beautifully done, and he was obviously very proud of what he and the other technocrats had created there. With flow charts and transparencies on top of transparencies, he explained to the seminar how information flowed through cabinet, how decisions were made, which committee sees which piece of legislation, and the feedback system which was in place. With a lot of high sounding figures, he indicated the structures this Prime Minister had put in place to make the most efficient government in the world. It was absolutely incredible, beyond belief. How anyone could witness that and not see that the government was totally out of control astounds me.

● (1232)

There is no mystery about why the Privy Council staff has increased from 63 people to 469 people within ten years. They need that many people to keep track of all these systems and procedures that have been put in place by the Prime Minister with great pride in the past ten years. After ten years of the people of Canada having to pay the price for that incredibly stupid approach to management, there is now some recognition that it was an utter and complete failure and that something else needs to be done.

The new ministry that is proposed, with the vague guidelines that the Prime Minister has presented to this House, is not the answer. The incredibly complex Privy Council cabinet structure has not been undone; instead, another layer of bureaucracy has been put on it. That is not going to help one iota. It is a reminder to the people of Canada of the Prime Minister's blind spot, of his unwillingness to recognize that people's problems cannot be solved by moving chairs, by establishing new committees or by restructuring things. Examples of failure of that method are legion. There have been over 400 cabinet changes in the lifetime of this government, Mr. Speaker. How can anyone know where the washroom is, let alone know what their department is doing or how to exercise any control?

That kind of approach to government organization results only in total control falling into the hands of senior bureaucrats. A small handful of senior civil servants, the Privy Council office and a few of the key departments are, in effect, running the government. They answer only to the Prime Minister. The rest of the cabinet is absolutely irrelevant; their role is to show up at myriad meetings and say "Aye, sir." They make no other contribution to government and I suppose we should be grateful for that. As every objective journalist who has followed this government has indicated lately, this is clearly the weakest cabinet in Canadian government history.

There is one charitable explanation of why the Prime Minister has imposed this system. It could arise—I am not saying that it did—as a result of the recognition by the Prime Minister that his government is not obeying the policies decided by cabinet. Let us look at a few examples. The budget stated in four different places that it was the intention of the government to reduce involvement in the private sector. That statement was made in the throne speech in four different places. It was also made on national television on August 1 in the speech of the Prime Minister.

Less than two weeks after the throne speech the government nationalized Nordair and then it nationalized the oil company, Pacific Petroleums Ltd. These actions were directly contrary to the government's stated policy. I am willing to suggest that possibly the Prime Minister did not like doing that and that perhaps he has created this super minister to keep a watch on other irresponsible ministers who take decisions contrary to government policies.

There are a lot of other examples, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) announced last spring the establishment of an office to reduce the burden of paperwork. It was to cut the red tape and reduce the paperwork imposed by government on industry. Less than two weeks after that announcement the Minister of Energy, Mines and resources (Mr. Gillespie) introduced a bill entitled "Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Act". The total intent of this bill was to impose an additional paperwork burden on this industry. It was directly contrary to the policy announced by the Minister of State (Small Business) which presumably had the approval of cabinet.

There were also the commitments in the throne speeches of 1973 and 1974 that the then minister of state for science and technology was to be given new muscle and would truly be in charge of the goverment's efforts in the areas of science and technology. No such thing happened, Mr. Speaker; in fact, government actions were directly contrary.

I am prepared to concede that the Prime Minister has recognized that kind of conflict between commitment and performance and is trying to prevent it happening in the future. In 1972, the then minister of state for science and technology made a policy announcement to the effect that henceforth the amount of in-house spending would be reduced as a percentage of total government expenditure. In fact, the amount of in-house spending actually increased over the next four years. Again the actions of the goverment were directly contrary to their stated policy.

In 1972 Treasury Board announced that henceforth it would not build up large computer services in-house but would contract out to the private sector. Over the next five years, exactly the opposite happened. They built up large in-house computer services and the amount of contracting out decreased.

These are just a few examples of where government policy has been contradicted by government action and it is not a complete list, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to concede that just possibly and finally after all these years the Prime Minister is starting to realize that the public will not allow the government to get away with saying one thing and doing another. The government is going to have to make sure its actions are consistent with what they have announced as policy. This super ministry has been told to try and keep the reins on those ministers who have not bothered to make sure their actions are consistent with their commitments.

If that is the purpose of this board, it is a sad commentary on the capabilities of cabinet, Mr. Speaker. It is a sad commentary on the honesty of the people involved that a super ministry has to be created to see that they do not deceive the Canadian public and that their actions are consistent with their statements. If that is what is necessary to control them, however, then that is what has to be done. I wish the minister well if that is the objective.

I have strong suspicions, however, that this charitable view is probably not quite accurate. It is more likely that the real reason for establishing this ministry is a final recognition or death bed repentance by the Prime Minister that, in terms of managing government and cabinet operations, the sophisticated approach to cabinet which he brought in with great fanfare ten years ago has been a dismal failure. That ten years of failure has imposed a burden on this country which it should not be asked to continue to bear.

There is only one real solution to the problem of that kind of incompetence, that lack of managerial ability by the Prime Minister, and that is to make a change. That is the only real answer. That is what this country needs. We need a new prime minister who understands management. We need a prime minister who has considered the problem and who recognizes that it is the people who count, not the structures. You cannot create a fancy system and put in whoever you want and get desirable results. You cannot take a broken down, defeated politician and make him chairman of a major international airline and expect to get performance. We need a prime minister who recognizes that this cannot be done. We will have that kind of a prime minister after the election. We sincerely hope and pray that before the election we will not be inflicted with any more of those kinds of stupid decisions, changes and appointments.

● (1242)

It just boggles the mind to think what arrogance it must take to dismiss democracy totally and to say to yourself that being defeated, being turned down by Canadian citizens in a democratic, secret ballot election, is a qualification for a person to serve in high office again in this country. It boggles the mind to think of the arrogance it takes to make that kind of an appointment. The sooner a person with that kind of arrogance is sent back to counting and identifying tree leaves, plants or whatever else he desires, the better off this country will be.

My leader, in answering the Prime Minister's banal generalizations, listed a number of specific changes that should be introduced in terms of improving the operations of government. These are changes that we will introduce to try and bring some semblance of rationality to the government of this country. I urge the House and the new President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers to take a look at that. On behalf of all Canadians I beg him, at least in the few months of life left in this government, not to take any action that will further destroy what little there is left of the policies and the personnel left in our senior civil service who are trying, in spite of this incompetent government, to give the people the kind of service they deserve and are paying for.

My expectations of this ministry are very low. I cannot see how by shuffling around incompetent people this new shuffle will drag out some secret, hidden competence which heretofore has been invisible to us. I plead with the minister, at least until there is an election and his leader screws up the courage to ask the people of Canada whether they want to give him a mandate to proceed, not to do anything so precipitous that the next government, when it takes office after the election, will be faced with an impossible task or a task which will take two or three years to clean up the mess before it can get on with the job of giving this country the kind of leadership and government it deserves.

I will conclude my remarks at this point so that others who want to participate in this debate will have that opportunity.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, we are approaching the end of about seven hours of discussion of a proposal which is before the House. Members have heard the comments of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the description of the ministry of the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. The proclamation, that was tabled in the House the other day, sets out the responsibilities of that board and the portfolio of the ministry itself. I am inclined to think my best contribution to the discussion would be to elaborate a little on the attitudes that I want to bring to this assignment.

Economic Development

The basic context and the working background, of the Board of Economic Development Ministers and the ministry is the logical progression of response to a long and deep series of consultations this government has had with provincial governments and with industry. When I talk about industry I am talking not only about those who manage and invest in the work place, but also those who work in it, the employees. Therefore, I am talking about business and labour.

The first ministers of this country, that is, the Prime Minister of Canada and the ten provincial premiers, concluded a conference the other day which was in fact the latest of many consultations which have, at their very core, the same basic concept that is behind this new ministry and board of economic development. This concept is a fundamental position that economic growth is, has to be, and will be the first priority of this government. We want to pursue that emphasis on support for the private sector and the marketplace as an essence for that determination.

Economic growth fairly distributed by region and among workers, investors and managers is the key priority and, indeed, the delivery system for that—if you can accept this kind of jargon—is business. Investment decisions in our society and mixed economy to start a business, expand a business, to bring a business up to date in its technology and to make the business more competitive, starts with a decision on somebody's part to put up some capital. That investment capital decision is based on an assumption and a confidence that there will be a return on that investment. That is where the beginning of economic growth really takes place in a mixed economy such as ours.

Of course, there are public sector requirements. There are absolutely legitimate areas where the public sector must play a part and must invest taxpayers' money as a catalyst to assist in a period of some difficulty or doubt, and indeed in ventures where the private sector simply will not, because of the lack of profit opportunity, make a decision to enter into it.

There are areas in this country where that kind of public sector activity will continue to be necessary. Canadians should accept that the prime movers in terms of creating the kinds of jobs that are lasting and, in the main, the kind of jobs which are satisfactory, are those in the private sector. The government's role, and my job as I see it, is to do everything I can on behalf of this government, with the co-operation not only of the members on the Board of Economic Development Ministers, but with the co-operation of members of the government party and hopefully on occasion through contributions from members opposite, to improve the climate for business and get on with providing the jobs and exports which this country needs. Indeed, it may not be a dramatic statement, but I am convinced that improving the climate can be accomplished by the combined actions of those in the public sector—and I mean by that the federal and provincial governments, and occasionally municipal governments as well.

● (1252)

It also has to do with something I said publicly which aroused the concern of people in the New Democratic Party. It has to do with government getting out of the way, reducing where it is wise and possible the amount and burden of government intervention in the economy. I am talking about reducing the weight over weight of government regulations where they overlap, duplicate or unnecessarily inhibit in relation to their objectives of the success, progress, advancement and expansion of industry, and therefore their capacity and ability to provide more jobs for our people.

I am interested in enhancing the effort to reduce the very weight of paper burden that governments in their rather inexorable way tend to create for people who have their own difficulties, without having to answer to all sorts of curious inquiry that we in the bureaucracy might think from time to time is productive but too often which we collect and pay no attention to in the end.

I am talking about a continuation of the program of responsible expenditure management over restraint within the bureaucracy, the government itself. I bring that bias to my new portfolio from the responsibilities I had in Treasury Board for a little over two years. As hon. members know, I was heavily involved in that in my previous portfolio.

There have been these and other responses by the federal government to the very wide series of economic consultations held with provincial governments. I refer not only to the federal-provincial conferences that are televised, but to the many meetings held at departmental levels, official levels and in ministerial discussions.

Consultations have been taking place over the past four or five years with business and with labour. In particular, I think of the consultations that took place over the last several months. The Prime Minister reminded the House in his comments of our response in the way of taxation policies, new labour and employment policies, major assistance to regions and to industries. In the consultations, particularly those with industry and labour which were organized and very well led by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) over the past several months, and the sectoral task forces and the tier two overview committee of business and labour, we helped produce considerable new confidence by the private sector.

Discussion on the creation of this new ministry and board began seriously about 12 months ago. It intensified over the past six months. When it became a possibility that I might be involved, and I will be candid with the House, I weighed this assignment very carefully. It seemed it was an idea whose time had come.

There are those opposite who criticize any change in structure, change in process, or attempt to improve the way we serve our fellow Canadians. They say it is an indication that everything we have done in the past was no good. That is ridiculous. The world constantly evolves. Anyone who is so smug and so satisfied with the status quo of structure or process should leave and go away, because this is an ever-changing world.

When we announce something that we consider to be an improvement, we hear the negative side; that if it is a good idea, it should have been done a long time ago. I can subscribe to that. I have confidence in this new idea and approach to government process and structure. I am now convinced we should have done it some time ago. However, the world does evolve. To be negative about such a suggestion and simply say there is an indication that everything done in the past is no good is absolutely childish, to say the least.

There were many streams and many thrusts as to why this was a move that should be made. There was a key element that tipped our position toward making this change. I will be very blunt in saying that influenced my decision to accept what is going to be an interesting and admittedly difficult responsibility. It was the result and the feeling of the consultative process that took place over the summer between labour and business, in industry by industry, the so-called sectoral task force. I do not want to oversell or overstress this, but in my 13 years in public life I have never been so encouraged by the possibility that I see coming out of this process as it has developed over the past ten or 11 months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: I was party to consultation on behalf of the cabinet along with the Prime Minister and other ministers for the past four or five years. We met from time to time bilaterally with selected businessmen across Canada and bilaterally with representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress. I found those consultations extremely useful. I hope they go on. However, they did have their limitations.

With the greatest respect to the NDP criticism of this resolution before us, I think this is where the danger lies. The CLC is very worthy and effective, but still an umbrella organization to labour. The businessmen, on the other hand, were not even knit together in a federation or structure. While the conversations and discussions were extremely constructive, they were ultimately about ideology.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, when we broke for lunch I was talking about the consultative process which has been taking place primarily between business, industry and labour over the past ten or 11 months supported—and I want to emphasize the word "supported"—by government. In the time I have available to me in this debate I cannot cover all the ground we hope to achieve with this new ministry, but perhaps I can try to capture the essence of what we have in mind.

In the 23 task forces, industry by industry—the pulp and paper industry, the footwear, textile industries and so on—I think for the first time since I have been around the scene chief executive officers of companies met with the most senior line unions to discuss their mutual problems, with the view in mind that the industry would be healthier, profits would improve, that as a result wages would be better and, above all, that more jobs would be created. There was an umbrella committee called tier two which was made up of five selected people from labour and five selected people from business, with a neutral chairman supported by an academic.

In the earlier process, called tier one, there were some 305 business firms across the country, some 28 or 30 unions represented and a dozen universities. In my view they reached an amazing degree of consensus about a lot of practical things, in each case affecting their industries. The tier two committee examined all of these and was tied in its mandate to dealing with those recommendations and, finally, to producing an over-all report.

There are two things I wish to illustrate from these events. First, the encouragement we should all take from the fact that senior members of the trade union movement and senior executives from business are meeting and have reached a high degree of consensus about a number of important matters. They have had their disagreements and will continue to have them. But I have talked to people from both groups and I find there is a degree of trust and respect for each other that before I did not think existed. Out of this process, which was started by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, came 800 or 900 recommendations about what governments, both federal and provincial, should do.

That was the reason for establishing a co-ordinating ministry. The recommendations covered almost every program in every department and agency of the federal government as well as the very important and significant part played by the provincial governments. And a line ministry, even through interdepartmental committees of deputies and officials, was not geared to respond to this kind of constructive but all-inclusive and all-embracing series of recommendations.

Another significant factor was that some of these recommendations—more than a few—were recommendations that the federal government initiate programs or change policies which already exist. The people who were involved in the process worked diligently and are clever and responsible people. But we have to face the fact that they did not know that several of the programs they were recommending already existed. Therefore our delivery system, our information system as to what is available, obviously needs to be pulled together in a more cohesive and more readily available fashion. This is necessary in order to do the job of assisting the reconstruction and making the structural changes needed to give industry the help it needs by sector or by region.

● (1412)

I have used that example as an indication of my cautious enthusiasm for what we can do, as an illustration of why it is necessary to put in a co-ordinating mechanism, and also as an illustration of one of the most urgent tasks that my new board should undertake, which is the response to those sectoral task forces and tiers. After all, that covered mainly the manufacturing sectors, and today, by virtue of the apparent or potential success of that process, provided we respond substantively and responsibly, there are other groups in this country wishing to get in on the same process. To me that is a very healthy sign that there is something going on between labour, industry and business in this country supported by government which is worth nurturing.

I want to make a very definite point about this, not to overuse this issue except by way of illustration. I would not call it a partnership between labour and management because that would be overstating the case. There is a tenuous, potentially growing respect of one for the other which we must nurture, and both sides have indicated personally to me and to others that they want to see this process continue. There are great benefits to Canada, to labour and to business from the continuation of that kind of consultation, but it has to proceed in a balanced way. Labour cannot be party to this as an afterthought or in any sense of tokenism. They have to be respected for the constructive suggestions they will contribute to the process.

The businessmen I have been talking to who have been working with them on this fully understand. I cannot speak for them but my impression is that they will support it. For some others it may be a bogey, but we want it fully understood that this will be a balanced consultation and there will be no tokenism. In fact, the more that is recognized by labour, the more suggestions and constructive participation will be forthcoming from labour.

I am very conscious of the fact that there is another speaker who wishes to take part in this debate. One could talk for hours about what our intentions are.

Hon. members have before them the legalistic version of the mandate of the board in the order in council. I want to touch on two or three of these items to clarify some points that have already been made. The definition of an integrated federal approach is one of them. It seems to me that even just taking the consultative process I have described as a way of a significant illustration, the need for that is extremely apparent. I think the same thing applies to the question of developing better mechanisms by a political body which, if necessary, bangs heads together but, from a political point of view, reaches consensus on policies to be adjusted between departments.

Another responsibility I have is to meet with provincial governments to see whether duplication, overlaps and gaps can be tidied up between us.

The other item is the question of the Treasury Board. I do not think anybody in the House respects the importance and the required integrity of the Treasury Board more than a past president of that board. It is an education in itself in that job because you see the broad requirements and the broad distribution of programs of a very large institution called the federal government. There is no question that I will respect the Treasury Board's over-all responsibility for the allocation of expenditures and resources. In that process we will look within the existing programs of economic development and support, through the various departments, not all of which are on the board, for the reallocation and reordering of resources to do new things before we go to the Treasury Board to seek new funds. But I will go to the Treasury Board to seek new funds, which might mean the reordering of other programs outside the area of economic development support if we as a board are convinced that this is an economic requirement for that time. I will be advising the Treasury Board within the very broad area of economic development and support.

There is an obvious attempt on the part of the opposition to drive wedges between me and my colleagues by attempting to say that the establishment of the new board will downgrade this or that department. That is patent political nonsense. It might be understandable as a measure of approach to this change which in most people's minds, if they were objective, could be seen at least as an opportunity for improved economic development management and economic growth in the country. I would have thought that rather than the absolute concentration on the negative aspects in this debate, apart from a little barb here and a little brickbat there, we could have heard some opposition members say: "We wish you luck, Mr. Minister, for whatever contribution you might make. We suggest to you that there is an area of improvement here or there." But we did not hear much of this.

An hon. Member: You are going to get it.

Mr. Andras: I will close my remarks, Mr. Speaker, because, if what the hon. member says is true, it will be such a pleasant prospect to hear it from the opposition. I do not know how much time I have left, but I will try to conclude my remarks as soon as possible.

The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) said in the first instance that they have looked at the structure of the government and the structure of the opposition parties and have decided to have six co-ordinating committees. Then he turned around and said that for us, the government, to have a co-ordinating committee is nonsense. If, God forbid, they ever sat on this side of the House, they would have six co-ordinating ministries.

Mr. Paproski: He said that? That is what you will have to do when you are in the opposition.

Mr. Andras: That is interesting. Maybe some of the mystery is still left to be unfolded. I had the distinct impression they planned to have a co-ordinating system. Obviously I commend it, but they cannot have it both ways. They cannot recommend this sort of thing and then criticize it the way they have. His comments were full of contradictions. I just wish I had an hour or more in which I could enjoy going over them.

One relatively minor, or perhaps not so minor, point has been the suggestion that the creation of this new mechanism will add expense to the taxpayer. We have clearly said that the secretariat will be small and that the expenditures of that secretariat will be contained within the fiscal ceilings we have already announced.

I also want to indicate that at the time we announced the proposed creation of the new ministry and secretariat, we announced the disbanding of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. The proof will be in the pudding.

I wish again I had more time. I want to leave some time for my friend the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), but I should like to leave this thought behind. I would be very interested to hear—I hope it comes in the last moments of the debate—at least a note of optimism from the opposition, some hope, some encouragement, a note of good luck, the phrase "we hope it works", rather than the negative criticism we have heard in almost seven hours of debate.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in the last few minutes of this debate I would like to thank the minister very much indeed for his generosity in cutting his remarks short so that I could have a few minutes at the end to express some views on this important matter. The other thing I would like to say is that from what he said about the policy put forward by my leader it is obvious he has misunderstood it. I will be glad to get together with him afterwards and explain to him what my leader was saying in this regard; I will take pleasure in doing that.

The only justification which exists for creating an economic super minister, as this bill does, is that the government is a government of misfits. The government's economic ministers are incapable of dealing effectively with the responsibilities entrusted to them because they have not had the training or experience necessary to cope with the complex economic problems with which their departments must deal.

● (1422)

What I have said applies to all of the ministers handling economic portfolios at this time. Because the time allotted to me in this debate does not permit me to deal with all of them, or even several of them, I intend to deal in some detail with one portfolio which is a clear example of what I am talking about. What I say applies to all of the economic portfolios in this government. The department I intend to deal with is the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The Department of Agriculture must be headed by a minister who has had farming experience, because farmers alone are familiar with the problems facing the farming industry. The Departments of Justice and the solicitor General must be headed by lawyers, because they are the only ones familiar with the complexities of the law. Thus, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce must be headed by a minister who has had practical experience in the manufacturing, processing, and distribution fields. He alone understands the problem facing the business world he has been appointed to serve.

The present minister is a former rancher and a good one. He understands farm problems and, in my opinion, would make a pretty good minister of agriculture. He also gathered a good deal of practical knowledge about transportation both before he came to Ottawa and while he was transport critic in the opposition. In my opinion, he would make a far better minister of transport than "Airborne Otto", a former dean of law who knows absolutely nothing about the problems faced by transportation companies and by those who rely heavily on transportation to obtain their raw materials and to ship their finished products to market.

Mr. Blais: Get a new writer.

Mr. Hees: My writer is myself, as opposed to the ghost writers of members on the other side of the House. I write every word I utter, and I am proud of it.

But in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce the present minister is a complete misfit, because he knows next to nothing about the problems faced by those who produce manufactured products and who must compete in the export and domestic markets in price, quality, and design against the producers of the world.

It is for this reason that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has decided that he must be supervised by a super minister, and that the super minister must see to it that he introduces the following policies which should have been introduced long ago. The minister very kindly asked me to suggest the type of things he should do as the new super minister. I take great pleasure in doing just that right now.

The first of these policies is the introduction of productivity incentives which will persuade producers that they will be able to pay for the new plant, machinery, and production systems which they will have to buy to increase their productivity in a reasonably short space of time. This will make it as easy as possible for them to make the usually high expenditures which they must make to increase their productivity. Such incentives would include all capital expenditures involved in improving productivity to be written off in one year, and a plant to be rewarded in the form of a generous cash bonus at the end of the year to be paid in direct proportion to its increase in productivity during the year.

In order to encourage Canadian businessmen to make more sales trips abroad to better acquaint foreign buyers with what this country has to offer, incentives should be introduced to allow producers to write off 200 per cent of all expenses connected with making sales trips abroad, displaying their products at foreign trade fairs, and any other expenses incurred in sales promotion in the export market.

The government must introduce legislation which will require those who export our raw materials to process a far higher proportion of them in this country, and make available generous tax incentives to induce the building of the additional factories which will be needed. Such action will start to make it possible to create the 800,000 additional jobs which the Canadian Manufacturers Association indicates will be made available if we can overcome our annual trade deficit of $12 billion a year in fully manufactured products.

He must introduce a policy to better acquaint the world market with what Canada has to offer. The principal buyers from the important markets of the world must be flown to Canada to see our manufactured products in giant trade shows in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and our heavy machinery in the plants where it is made across the country.

He must introduce a policy to protect Canadian industries and Canadian workers from imports from low-wage countries which are taking away a steadily increasing share of the Canadian market. Import quotas must be introduced to retain for Canadian producers the same 80 per cent of the domestic market which is retained for their domestic producers by the United States and the European Common Market. I hope the super minister will see to it that the incompetent Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce now gets to work and introduces these policies. I am glad to see the super minister is already talking to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce because of my suggestions. I see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is listening. I hope we will get some action at long last.

In conclusion, the Prime Minister should, instead of adding to the bureaucracy and red tape which already exists in profusion, promote people in his party who have had the practical experience necessary to handle the economic portfolios, instead of retaining in his government favourites who obviously cannot handle their departments. If he had done so, there would have been no need to create an economic czar to try to bring order out of the chaos which has been created by retaining obvious misfits in our economic departments.

Since unfortunately it has been found necessary, for the reasons I have so clearly outlined, to create this super minister, I can think of no better member of the present government to handle the job. One does not have to go far because there is not much to pick from. This minister is a good guy, and he has my very best wishes in the tough job which lies ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 2.30 o'clock p.m., and the seven hours allotted for the debate having expired, it is my duty to put every question necessary to dispose of the motion before the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Trudeau), which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 17)

YEAS

Messrs.

Abbott
Allmand
Anderson
Andras
(Port Arthur)
Appolloni (Mrs.)
Baker
(Gander-Twillingate)
Béchard
Bégin (Miss)
Blais
Blaker
Blouin
Boulanger
Buchanan
Caccia
Cafik
Campagnolo (Mrs.)
Campbell (Miss)
(South Western Nova)
Campbell
(LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul)
Caron
Chrétien
Clermont
Comtois
Condon
Corbin
Corriveau
Cullen
Dawson
De Bané
Demers
Dionne
(Northumberland-Miramichi)
Dupras
Duquet
Ethier
Fleming
Foster
Fox
Francis
Gauthier
(Ottawa-Vanier)
Gendron
Gray
Guilbault
Harquail
Holt (Mrs.)
Hopkins
Horner
Isabelle
Johnston
(Westmount)
Joyal
Kaplan
Lachance
Lamontagne
Landers
Langlois
Laniel
Lapointe
Lavoie
Leblanc
(Laurier)
LeBlanc
(Westmorland-Kent)
Lee
Lefebvre
Lessard
Loiselle
(Chambly)
Lumley
MacGuigan
Marchand
McIsaac
McRae
Milne
Nicholson (Miss)
O'Connell
Ostiguy
Ouellet
Pearsall
Penner
Philbrook
Pinard
Portelance
Prud'homme
Railton
Raines
Robinson
Rooney
Stollery
Trudel
Turner
Watson
Whelan
Yanakis
Young—89.

NAYS

Messrs.

Andre
(Calgary Centre)
Baker
(Grenville-Carleton)
Baldwin
Balfour
Beatty
Brisco
Broadbent
Clark
(Rocky Mountain)
Clarke
(Vancouver Quadra)
Corbett
de Cotret
Dick
Elzinga
Epp
Faour
Firth
Fraser
Friesen
Gillies
Hamilton
(Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain)
Hare
Hees
Huntington
Janelle
Jarvis
Johnston
(Okanagan-Kootenay)
Knowles
(Winnipeg North Centre)
Korchinski
Lambert
(Edmonton West)
Laprise
MacDonald
(Egmont)
MacDonald (Miss)
(Kingston and the Islands)
Malone
McCain
McCrossan
McGrath
McKinley
McKinnon
Mitges
Muir
Munro
(Esquimalt-Saanich)
Nowlan
Nystrom
Paproski
Parker
Peters
Pigott (Mrs.)
Ritchie
Roche
Schellenberger
Schumacher
Shymko
Smith
(Churchill)
Whiteway
Yewchuk—55.

● (1452)

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill S-5, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Allmand moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, Bill S-5 from the Senate was considered very briefly one afternoon last December 11 and then referred for study to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and not, as would be expected, to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. This is why I have not had the opportunity to speak on this bill amending an act on which I worked meticulously when we put forward and passed here in parliament the present Canada Business Corporations Act, in 1974.

We are presently considering the act to amend the Bank Act in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which takes all our time, and it is rather by chance that in committee we received representations from the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, relating precisely to an area of that legislation. After all, they did say at the time that perhaps we could improve the Bank Act by requiring them to release their public accounts—in short their public balance sheet—along the same pattern followed by Canadian corporations and businesses, which is in line with the principles and practices of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. I certainly think that is an acceptable suggestion, and I note, from the amendments that I have in front of me, that although this is a voluminous bill, amendments are actually not that numerous. Amendments to the text of the act are especially aimed at improving, correcting or explaining it. But I am in a rather difficult position because I do not practice law in the province of Quebec and all my experience with the Canada Business Corporations Act has been in English. According to representations made by the Quebec section of the Canadian Bar and by the Department of Justice, a new version should be prepared, in French, which would not merely be a translation from English to French, and that is what is being suggested this afternoon.

As the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) indicated in his speech, there has been, since 1975, a rather dramatic increase in the number of federally registered corporations. I recall that when we were considering the legislation as it existed, in 1974, and proposing some amendments, we were saying that the federal legislation or practice was almost obsolete and that most Canadian corporations would be incorporated under the various provincial statutes and then apply for transfer in order to come under national jurisdiction.

However that was not the case. A more up to date legislation is now used as a model, and I must add that I was rather surprised to note that the legislation has been used as a model by some provinces which have amended their own statutes on commercial operations in accordance with the federal model.

We hope that there will be more certainty in such matters, because if notaries and lawyers in provinces regulated by common law must advise their clients on a point of law, they have to proceed on the same basis. If in Quebec, on the basis of a similar French procedure, we now get the same results as an English solicitor in Ontario or western Canada basing himself on an English version, it will be quite effective.

[English]

I should like to ask certain questions. On the one side, the attraction of the English language in practice is that there is a certain subtlety to it; it bends, it is malleable and subject to judicial interpretation. On the other hand, on the francophone side, there is always deemed to be a philosophical demand for absolute precision. In other words, the letter of the text must always govern, and if something is not found therein, it cannot exist. In the English version, that is not the case. A certain amount of growth and flexibility exists in it.

What philosophy prevailed in the drafting of the French version that has now been incorporated as the schedule to this act? I do not know. I have not had a chance to look at it. Perhaps the minister or his parliamentary secretary would tell us whether there is a dichotomy in the philosophies of the language used. I have never heard it said before that the French versions of our laws have been wrong and that they do not conform to a certain philosophy of language.

● (1502)

Is this to be an example now for many of our major acts as they apply in Canada? For instance, would we have to review the whole of the Criminal Code to see whether it should be rewritten in the French language rather than being a good and very effective translation of the English? I discern this to be a rather different philosophy of language. If that is so, I must say the Department of Justice and the Department of the Secretary of State and anybody involved in the translation of laws and their compilation will be extremely busy for many years to come. This is an observation I put forward at this time.

I have never seen this done before—outside of a relative few compared to the size of the act—that technical and explanatory amendments, amendments for greater precision have been put forward in the English text and yet the whole French text has been rewritten and brought in as an appendix. This is the reason for the bill being so thick.

There are at this time, however, a few other comments I would like to make about incorporations. One which is allowed under this particular act deals with personal corporations. Since the total French version is brought in I can speak about it, even though somebody might question the English version if there was no particular amendment to this section. We have seen where many services, insurance companies, architects, athletes, entertainment artists and a number of other persons who have incorporated themselves, under the laws of Canada or of the laws of a province, into personal corporations so that they could take advantage of certain tax provisions under the Income Tax Act and thereby be relieved of the heavy taxation levied for general corporations.

In my province the professions were able to convince the government of Alberta that personal incorporation was a good thing. Alberta has a forward looking government which is given to developing private initiative. It has allowed those in the professions to incorporate themselves and associate their business practices with these personal corporations. This gave them a better tax deal. About that there is no doubt. I have always advocated the use of the income tax system on an incentive basis. If this form of organizing one's affairs through a personal corporation gives a better return to the individual, who thus was encouraged to get out and scramble more and to increase his or her economic activities, then so much the better, and Canada gains.

There is always a philosophy which has been abroad in certain political parties, and certainly it is so in the present administration: anyone who makes a dollar must be socked, in other words, hit the hardest. In fact the state claims as an inalienable right its proclaimed share of an individual's economic activity as soon as that activity is concluded, and whether or not the money has been collected does not matter. It belongs to the almighty state. That is a philosophy to which I cannot ascribe, and I repudiate it. It seems to me, in order to regain a sense of the work ethic, of taking our rightful place in the economic world and putting Canada back among the leaders where it was 20 years ago, out of the depths of the rather inferior position into which we have slipped, that we have to give individuals, either in their private capacity or incorporated, the best incentives possible so that they can carry out their economic activities and proposals.

I am not going to go into all of the details. There is no particular point in going into the detail of the changes. I certainly support a bill of this kind. While it was not open to me to get the detail of the study done by the committee in the Senate, I am sure they did very good work, as did the legal affairs committee of this House, but certainly the pattern would be set by the first committee hearings in the other place. I commend this sort of examination by the other House and I say the same about Bill S-4 which precedes it. This bill is one that is equally voluminous but of the same nature.

I trust that we will readily come to a decision on this bill on third reading. I have not seen a speech at second reading from either side of the House which was in opposition to it. Therefore I would approve of the work done by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to read the committee report and I did not have the opportunity of attending the committee meetings.

I had anticipated there would be some explanation or discussion by some members on third reading regarding the point which was raised just now by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), in relation to the translation. I mentioned at the time that it would have been easier if the translation had also carried the original text beside it so it could be easily checked by those members of the House who have that exceptional fluency in both languages. Members would have been able to check the detail that the one language demands, and relate it to the purpose and intention that obviously the other language gives to the legislation.

There have not been any amendments made by the government or by the opposition at the report stage. This may be an oversight on my part, but when the bill was before the committee, consideration should have been given to doing something on behalf of the poor, abused, frequently agitated public. The willingness of members of parliament to do something about the type of protection that could be given under this bill to protect the public from the corporations and the machinations in which they engage, should have been indicated.

● (1512)

It was pointed out by a number of members, including myself, that we were far behind the United States. We were playing with legislation that obviously had been handed to the government by civil servants. I indicated that the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) had, in his more enlightened days, been interested in this subject. He had indicated that corporations often did things that were diametrically opposed to the wishes of the average citizen. Much of what they did was detrimental to the health and property of individuals in this country.

This bill is now back for third reading. None of this has been done. All we have done is correct some of the abuses that were taking place in the bureaucracy. All that members of parliament are doing is fixing up the legislation so that it can be handled more easily by the civil servants.

A large number of members in this House practise law. Occasionally there is lobbying by their colleagues in practice. They find the law a little difficult to handle in one aspect or another.

Maybe we cannot protect the shareholders, directors and others against the limited penalties in this legislation. However, surely somebody on that committee should have been interested in putting some restrictions on the corporations. The corporations are given the right to establish under Canadian law. We are setting forth the protection the shareholders will receive. We are setting the regulatory powers of directors and how they will relate to the shareholders. However, we are not doing anything to protect the public against the corporations which often work against them.

The example was given of aluminum wire. Because we do not have the guts or the intelligence to put into this bill restrictions on corporations, they do things that are both immoral and unsafe. There are still companies that manufacture aluminum wire for domestic purposes. If the price is right, that wire will be installed in houses and may ultimately result in the death of some people.

The same is true of Ford Motor Company. It was allowed to incorporate. We protect the shareholders and do many other things. However, there is no protection for the consumer who buys from his dealer who, in good faith, is selling automobiles which the company and the board of directors know are dangerous and may result in fatalities.

Ford Motor Company has calculated how many fatalities there will be per thousand or per million cars. In addition, they have calculated what the lawsuits will cost, what the company will have to pay for each accident. They have determined that is easier than redesigning the automobile. That would not be allowed under any other act, but it is allowed in the Corporations Act. That is not because the committee did not know about it. It was because the committee just did not care. They listened to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) who says there is protection under another act. However, it should be under that act which gives the corporations the power to set up. That is where protection for the consumer should be. It is the only way the power could then be taken away from the corporations.

The companies are allowed to incorporate. They are established under this legislation. If they do not live up to the requirements in the legislation, their power should be taken away. It is all right to talk about the consumers protection act and other devices we have tried to establish, but they have not worked. The wire companies can still manufacture aluminum wire which could conceivably kill people.

We have not told Ford Motor Company that it must have the type of engineering that will ensure the automobiles they manufacture are safe. If a limiting clause had been put in this legislation, Ford would not be able to sell the Bobcat or Pinto in Canada at the present time. The board of directors, the shareholders and anyone who reads the newspapers know about this because it has been publicized in the United States. With that limited clause, Ford could not sell those cars or could lose its certification under the Corporations Act of Canada.

This is a very limited requirement, but we are not including it. Why all the fuss? Why are we going through this exercise, making the French version coincide with the English version, at least by implication? We have not put the two together. What we have done is write two different acts. The one before us will operate in French. The English act has already been passed.

This act is not being opened up that much by this bill. In effect, only the French version is before us, except for the initial clauses which are in both languages. We are not going to make any change. A lot of people are having trouble with Firestone tires. Others have the problem of gas tanks rupturing when they are in accidents.

Many people have bought a Chrysler, as I did, which has a starter that will not turn over the motor. It has been admitted in the United States that those starters were built for a much lighter car. I understand they may have to be changed three or four times during the lifetime of the car. That applies not only to my car but to every Chrysler. I have been told by a Tilden fleet owner that he keeps two standard and two heavy duty starters on his counter all the time, and that he is continually changing them. That is an engineering fault.

● (1522)

There are faults in the ignition system of some of the automobiles on the road; there are faults in the cooling systems; there are faults in some of the transmissions, and these have been obvious for more than one year's production run yet they are still being allowed.

The public asks for the kind of protection which is possible under this bill, but the members are not asking for it, and the department does not want responsibility for supervising the relationship between the warranties and the knowledge which shareholders and directors may have about weaknesses in the products they are selling. They do not wish to become involved because this is, to them, a totally different field. Yet someone has to occupy that field.

It is surprising to me that when this bill went to committee the members there examined it, listened to seven or eight members discussing its deficiencies, and then refused to write in any provisions for the benefit of John Q. Public. When a change of government comes about after the next election I predict there will be a minority government and, if there is, all members had better be prepared—

An hon. Member: Dreamer!

Mr. Peters: The hon. member says "dreamer", but the Gallup poll indicates that whether it is the high level or the low level, the voting will almost inevitably result in a minority government.

The public knows that minority government is good government. The people know that the only time they got changes beneficial to them—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad if you would ask the hon. member to explain how his prediction of the outcome of the next election fits in with the topic under discussion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What are we discussing?

Mr. Peters: We are discussing Bill S-5. The hon. member can look it up on the order paper if he likes—it is under Senate bills. If he looks at it he will not be better off than he is now.

The reason I am interested in minority government is this: we have made no changes in this bill which has to do with corporations. It is an act under which corporations are established, but all the government has been interested in doing is seeing that the French version coincides to some extent with the English version which we passed a couple of years ago. I am saying there are more important things to be considered and one of them is the right of individual citizens to demand that, since Canada provides facilities for these large corporations, the public should in turn be assured that where the shareholders or directors realize there is a problem with the product they are selling they would be guilty of an offence if they do not acquaint the public with it and make every effort to eliminate the hazard. Anything less is unacceptable.

The reason I mentioned minority government is this: the bill went to committee and a number of suggestions were made from all quarters. However, when it came back to this chamber no amendments were reported. Indeed, no amendments were moved in the committee, meaning that it was rubber-stamped there; no consideration was given to it at all. I am convinced this is the case, having heard the previous speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West, who is a stickler for detail. I have heard him give a number of lectures to the House on details of this nature, and if these matters had been discussed in the committee he would have been among those taking part and some amendments would have been made in it, because I am sure it is not perfect. Consideration might even have been given to making some changes affecting the responsibility of companies which have been incorporated so as to ensure that the public would be protected as well as doing what this act does, namely, protecting the shareholders and the board of directors.

I will not say anything further along these lines. I am sure that if a minority government were in power changes would probably have been made to the benefit of the public. We might have saved someone being killed in a little Ford car, a Bobcat or a Pinto; we might have prevented someone being stranded if he were driving a Chrysler whose starter did not work; we might have prevented someone being killed because of the blow-out of a Firestone tire through a defect the company knew about for a year before it became general knowledge. We might have prevented someone being burned to death in a house which had been wired with aluminum wiring.

I am suggesting this is lousy legislation. It is a lousy way to send it to a committee where the committee does not have the courage or the guts to make any decisions other than those the civil servants have made. I think this is lousy government and the sooner we get into a minority situation the better government will be.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to reply briefly to the questions raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). The question of the public interest about which the hon. member for Timiskaming has spoken so eloquently was, in fact, raised and discussed extensively in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. It was unfortunate that their other duties prevented those hon. members from being present because I think that had they been there most of the questions they have raised would have been answered. The point is that this bill which registers corporations is not intended to do everything. A corporation, like an individual, is subject to the law of the land, and the assumption is that a corporation will abide by laws of general application, for instance, in such matters as safety standards.

This bill enlarges the power of the dissenting shareholder who is thereby strengthened when expressing a concern about the public interest. The safeguards for fiduciary responsibility are also increased.

I should like to comment also on the questions which have been raised with regard to the French language translation. We must remember that although this bill has been on the order paper for only a couple of weeks now, it was also on the order paper in the spring, and it is the second time the Senate has examined it, held extensive hearings, and heard witnesses. So it is a bill which has had rather careful examination and broad exposure to the public because the draft bill was in the public domain—it was circulated to lawyers and accountants over a fair period.

● (1532)

The question of the French translation arose when the bill was before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs about three years ago. At that time some of the French-speaking members of the committee found fault with the quality of the French in that the translation seemed to them to be clumsy or less clear than it might be, particularly if it were going to be used by members of the Quebec Bar. So the commitment was given to the committee at the time that a new French version would be introduced. Again there was extensive consultation with members of the Quebec Bar, and our colleague, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), who was the parliamentary secretary to the minister of justice three years ago when the bill in its first shape was before the House, worked with the legal draftsmen in the Department of Justice, with officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and with members of the Quebec Bar in order to get a version which was clear, accurate, and more acceptable to the practitioners in Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

[Miss Nicholson.]

[Translation]

THE LATE MRS. GOLDA MEIR

PARLIAMENTARY TRIBUTE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I understand there is unanimous consent to allow one representative of each party to rise and express briefly his condolences on the death of Mrs. Golda Meir, former Prime Minister of Israel.

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Agreed.

Mr. Nystrom: Agreed.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Golda Meir whose death occurred in Israel before the Sabbath last week. I had the honour to be part of the eight-member delegation of parliamentarians who represented our country in Israel at the funeral. The delegation was headed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) and by Senator Jean Marchand.

Golda Meir was, in her lifetime, the most remarkable woman in the world. She settled early in the land which was to be reborn as Israel. Because of her great strength as a human being, her personal values and standards will be a part of that state forever. Her commitment was to a free society, to democracy, to social justice, and to the search for peace.

In her great life she was a victim of discrimination, a refugee, a pioneer settler, a wife and mother, a woman who will always be a particular example to women, a union organizer, a politician, an ambassador to the Soviet Union, a minister and a prime minister who, suffering from the disease that was to ultimately take her life, led her country in war. Regrettably she did not live to see her country know the blessings of peace, but there will be a peace in Israel, a just peace, and when that peace arrives it will be a tribute to her memory.

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, along with my colleague, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) and, as he indicated, a number of other members in the House and one representative of the other place, I was honoured to attend the funeral of Mrs. Meir in Israel earlier this week. It seemed to me that in attending her funeral, in paying tribute to her, in taking notice of her death today in the House, we mark much more than the passing of a former head of government of the nation of Israel.

Born in the Ukraine, raised in the United States, she was a pioneer in the Zionist movement and in the Israeli organization of the kibbutzim, the collective farm villages that were and are central to the development of the modern state of Israel. She was a pioneer as a woman who combined a career of more than 50 dedicated years in public life with a deep and abiding love for her family. She was a person of caring and compassion, of heart and love for her fellow man, whose turn as leader of her nation was bloodied by a terrible war.

For those of us who did not personally know this remarkable woman, we have still with us an introduction to her in the form of her autobiography entitled "My Life". In it she stated that despite all her accomplishments as a citizen, high government official, minister of the state and first minister, all that she did during her life in Israel and outside it, her proudest achievement was the three years she spent as a young woman at Merhavia, a kibbutz.

When a Jew dies, the friends and family sit Shiva, a seven-day period of mourning. For the death of Golda Meir, a nation will mourn, and for much longer than seven days.

On behalf of my colleagues and my constituents, I would like to say to the nation of Israel and its people around the world, in the words of the Hebrew prayer, "Hashem yinohem et hem", or, may the Lord console you.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues of the New Democratic Party I am pleased to associate myself with the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker) in these few words of tribute to a great woman, the late Golda Meir. We are pleased that our party was also represented at the funeral service in Jerusalem by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and we extend our appreciation to the government for arranging the trip to Israel for a delegation representing both Houses of Parliament.

I am happy to join the two preceding speakers in the words of tribute they have spoken to the life and contribution of Golda Meir.

I should like to add—I suppose it is because I am a grandparent myself that I noticed it—that I believe the last time that Golda Meir was seen on television around the world was during the visit of President Sadat to Israel when she, as a grandmother, gave him a present for a grandchild which had just been born to the President of Egypt. I mention that because it tells us that Golda Meir was not only the strong public international figure we knew her to be, but that she was a warm human being, and we join in this tribute to her memory today.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, it is with eagerness that I join my colleagues today in paying tribute to that great lady, Mrs. Golda Meir. As a member of the delegation Canada sent to Jerusalem to attend her funeral, I had the opportunity of seeing that the Hebrew people have lost one of their greatest historical figures whom they had surnamed "Mother Courage". She lived through exile and persecution which doubtless shaped her character and determination. She also helped to build her country as ambassador, member of the Knesset, minister and prime minister. Her public life and her political life did not prevent her, however, from fulfilling her role as a wife, mother and woman. Ben Gurion said of her "She is the only man in my government" which shows how great a role she played in the life of her country: she was a model of courage for the State of Israel and the whole wide world. Her memory will doubtless remain engraved in the minds of men for a long time to come.

* * *

● (1542)

[English]

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING CHARITABLE CORPORATIONS

The House resumed from Monday, December 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill S-4, respecting Canadian non-profit coporations, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I take a great sense of pride in being able to talk about Bill S-4 because it deals with the regulations affecting volunteer organizations in Canada. At the outset, I should like to place before the House the importance of volunteer organizations, and then follow through with some of the concerns regarding this specific piece of legislation.

No great nation has reached a state of greatness without the framework of volunteer endeavours. Volunteerism is the true concept of pioneering. I come from the prairies which witnessed, approximately two generations ago, settlers who came to start what turned into the agricultural communities of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. They became the lumbering people of British Columbia and the miners of the north. They were part of the gold rush in the northern areas of the western provinces and the territories. Those people believed in the volunteer concept. Those men and women headed west with nothing but Red River carts and the will to achieve. They were without staples, the normal supply of food. They lacked the shelter by which they would normally be comforted. We recognize that it was the intuitive will of the human being to grasp for something greater which provided the strength of the nation.

Innate within human beings is the natural instinct for curiosity and ambition. As a farm boy I observed that natural instinct in all young, higher mammals. One can see it in young children, puppies and kittens. Anything which limits natural curiosity comes about by an imposed set of regulations and rules. In all societies, obviously rules are necessary. When I take a look at Bill S-4 I am concerned that it contains more than 200 clauses relating to the manner in which volunteers will work effectively within Canadian society.

If Bill S-4 became law in its present form, we would be faced with a situation where those who wanted of their own initiative and ambition to contribute to the fabric of Canadian welfare would require secretarial, legal and accounting staffs, as well as all paraphernalia surrounding economic and political structures. This is a very, very serious retrograde step, a step which could plunge Canada into attitudes which are prevalent in some of the eastern European countries. The over-regulation and over-power of government is such that the people of those nations feel, unless their governments make them perform some specific duty by law, that they have no incentive of their own volition.

Personally I feel I can speak with some authority on the concept of volunteerism. I spent ten years of my life working with the 4-H Club movement in the province of Alberta. In some of the larger towns in that province the majority of students attending high school were from urban centres, yet the presidents of student unions were usually farm boys. This was not by accident. It was because they came out of the 4-H movement which existed on the backbone of parenting and volunteers. People in the ranching districts of the southern section of the province drove an average of more than 60 miles per member in order for their children to attend the club. They believed that their children were taught something about conducting meetings, public speaking, debating, accounting, looking after animals, and most particularly, responsibility.

I should like to share a recent experience with the House. I am sure three government members share my concern. On a recent trip to the Middle East we visited with the Canadian contingent on the Golan Heights and in Cyprus. Our soldiers there do not know or desire the eight-hour day. Their work is the limit of the task. Whenever their soldiering duties are done for the day, interestingly enough, the vast majority of them are involved in self-help projects.

We noted with great interest that the other battalions serving in the Middle East were of the very strong opinion that Canadian soldiers were favoured with Canadian money over and above other contingents. Also, there was a belief that the United Nations favoured them with a greater degree of money. The truth of the matter was that Canadian soldiers were favoured no more in an economic sense than others. They were favoured because they were blessed with the ingenuity and initiative to go ahead with self-help projects such as developing their own recreation areas, planting grass and trees, and building around themselves something which was very beautiful and a home away from home. In striking contrast, some of the countries just across the rolls of wire fence provided army tents which were sheltered from the wind only by bombed out buildings requiring repair for approximately five or six years.

Everything comes down to the concept of Maslow's hierarchy of human needs: once a human being has met the basic needs of food, clothing and shelter, feels the sense of having been loved and the capacity to be loving, he strives for a sense of self-esteem, willingness, and a desire to achieve.

I find the objectives of Bill S-4 commendable, but when I look at the particular wording of the bill, I become very, very concerned. This bill contains approximately 242 clauses. It is a weighty manuscript to place before any association which operates within the concept of volunteerism. These associations operate because they want to help the people around them, yet now they will be burdened by the heavy weight of government. They will require the assistance of legal people to sift through and comprehend this piece of legislation. The nation will not achieve greatness by the government regulating associations with the ambition to attain achievements which otherwise would not be forthcoming.

I should like to refer to some of the disincentives which exist in eastern European countries. The fact of the matter is that initiative has been destroyed in those areas. Their populations have lost the zest for life which is a natural human instinct. Effectively the bill kills the volunteer sector of our society. Free society needs and must have a free notion of volunteers. Volunteer organizations should not be required to have red-tape computers to thresh through all the material placed before them by government. Not only are the 242 clauses dangerous because they are numerous, they are dangerous because some clauses raise considerable concern for all Canadians, particularly people who believe in free democracy.

● (1552)

In the 700 years the parliamentary system has been in existence, and since the concept of that Mother of Parliaments at the time of King John, we have removed the notion that we are subjects, and now appreciate the fact that we are citizens. Freedom of speech ought not to be taken away in any light form.

I should like to put forward some examples of the things in this bill which create rather grave concerns. I am sure there are many organizations across the country which have great concerns about some of the aspects we find in Bill S-4. The bill contains an indication that churches will lose their voluntary status if what they do is interpreted in any way as being political. Without making reference to any particular faith, one simply has to ask what a church is if it is not an institution to attend to moral questions in a society? Without giving any of my own feelings in this regard at this time, I would simply ask why a church should not be able to express an opinion on capital punishement, on any issue involving law and order, on abortion, on mercy killing, on women's rights or on child abuse, without an assumption being made that in so doing the church is becoming political in its intent and should lose its voluntary status?

Any bill before the House which can be interpreted as having that intent would lend itself to the destruction of the very backbone and fabric of democracy. What we must attempt always to preserve is not just the concept that we regulate the society in which we live but, more important, the incentive of people, wherever they may be within a country, to create a society that reaches greatness because of the ideas, energies, and imagination of the people.

Churches are not institutions to be slighted by legislation that would take away some of their basic rights to speak out on any subject in respect of which, in a self-proclaimed manner, they feel it is their duty to speak. It is an affront to the concept of freedom of speech to have such a clause within a legislative measure.

What of many of the other volunteer organizations in the country and their feelings in this regard? Let me refer to fish and game associations as an example. Are they not to have the right to become involved somehow in politics when there is a bill before the House such as Bill C-83, the initial gun control bill, or Bill C-51, the subsequent gun control bill passed by this House? A fish and game association is basically a voluntary organization. It is very dangerous to suggest that if ever such an organization were to speak out on something that is political it would somehow lose its voluntary status.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member opposite has spoken with great feeling of the importance of the voluntary sector, and of that sector being free to do its advocacy job. I think perhaps what the hon. member is responding to is the national revenue definition of a political institution in the tax statutes, which has nothing to do with this bill. The hon. member mentioned a clause in the bill which would limit this kind of activity by a church, but I do not see that in the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. What the hon. member suggests is more in the way of a correction than a point of order.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish at this time to enter into a debate with the hon. member opposite. I could document that particular statement, and I could go even further by saying there are civil servants who have made the statement that, even if the clause were removed, the intent of the government is to enact the measure with that interpretation. That becomes almost more frightening in that it means without a law there is this intention to place a particular slant or emphasis on this activity.

Why should any group be denied the right to speak? What has this government become? Does it no longer intend that we have citizens in this country? Are we to be reduced again to subjects? Somehow organizations which are really fundamental parts of the nation are being denied the right to speak out on any issue. I must ask myself what organization there is in Canada that speaks out on any issue which does not in some way touch politics? Politics is an all-encompassing concept. It is everything within a society. Therefore any organization that speaks out on any issue could in fact be, or have the potential of being, interpreted as being involved in politics.

This bill needs a great deal of additional scrutiny. The fact that it has 242 clauses supports the suggestion that what we see before us is a government with a great capacity for taking the simple and making it complicated. I would suggest that volunteers, no matter what period in our history they live, have always been and always will be the pioneers of our society.

I have more comments I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, but, noting the time, may I call it four o'clock?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

Item No. 2, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent.

Item No. 6, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand, by unanimous consent.

Item No. 7, the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins). Shall the item stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 9, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott). Shall the item stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 10, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard). Shall the item stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 11, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). Shall the item stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

* * *

COMMONWEALTH CARIBBEAN

CLOSER TIES WITH CANADA SUGGESTED

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons should be established to consider the advisability of taking an initiative in promoting closer commercial and cultural relations between the Dominion of Canada and the communities of the Commonwealth Caribbean and that inter alia such committee should consider (a) subsidization of sea-borne transport between this country and the Commonwealth area (b) Canadian governmental assistance in the upgrading of the seaports of Atlantic Canada (c) such tariff changes as might facilitate the exchange of commodities between the two areas (d) encouragement of the exchange of students of the two areas (e) recommending assistance towards meetings of political business and educatioal leaders of the two regions with a view to stimulating a north-south exchange of goods, people, services and technology in a mutually advantageous way.

He said: Mr. Speaker, to me this is not a new subject. As some of the veterans like the venerable hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will know, it is not a new interest of mine.

Whatever else is uncertain in this political career, and I have found it more uncertain than ever in the last few months, this will certainly be my last notice of motion speech on anything.

● (1602)

I have found that while it is quite a treat and, indeed, sometimes an extremely difficult thing to get into the House of Commons, I am among a small group of people who are finding it quite difficult to get out at the date of our choosing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Some whom we would like to get out will not go.

Mr. Macquarrie: I noticed the former minister of justice across the way this morning, and I had a fellow feeling with him on the situation in which we find ourselves.

I am happy that my last motion under private members' hour should deal with a subject very close to my heart and on which I made a speech in my youth when I sat over there and spoke on a motion by the hon. gentleman who now sits in the other place, Senator McIlraith.

In recent months I have had to live with a personal embarrassment in that I have said goodbye to so many people and have been bade goodbye by so many people and find now that I am apologizing for being around.

Mr. Paproski: It is nice to have you back.

Mr. Macquarrie: Thank you, sir.

I do give the promise that I will eventually go, and that is a firm commitment, with all the uncertainties of the present political situation. I can say that this parliament will eventually end, and that we will not need a Cromwell to say, "In the name of God, go". I think we will eventually be dissolved.

When I first spoke on this subject matter, Mr. Speaker, I sat on your right. I was a government supporter. I am about to leave the House of Commons when it seems that in a few months my party may again be given the opportunity of sitting on the Speaker's right. I have never felt like a biblical figure before, and I suppose I never deserved to feel like a biblical figure, but it reminds me of Moses, who could see but not enter the promised land. But I do see it, I see it clearly, and I am delighted with what I see.

My interest in this subject matter has not diminished over the years, as I have become more familiar with the people of the Commonwealth Caribbean and with the area itself. As I have been, I remain a committed believer in Canadian involvement in the outside world, even though at this time we have enormous and painful internal economic problems.

I have heard, as one is bound to hear, the mutterings, rumblings and grumbles of those who say charity begins at home. I have heard the sour notes of those who point to our own problems, and sometimes they indicate that one has pointed them out from time to time from public platforms. I have never been terribly upset by these people, because I have always believed that those who say that charity begins at home are not usually too charitable at home themselves, so they are not my advisers. I am convinced that despite our stresses and strains, our national problems and our crises, we gain perspective if we recall that we are a part of the greater world. That, I think, is the credo of a good international citizen and a leading member at its best of the international community, as Canada is.

It is never very profitable to spend much time in navel gazing, hand wringing, or problem gathering. This is not a useful exercise. As Mr. Pearson said more than once, in the face of our internal difficulties we gain strength rather than diminish ourselves by giving of ourselves to the outside world. Of course there are questions we should ask about our programs for the outside world. We should ask about the nature of these programs, the types of programs and, in general, our capacity to aid efficiently the developing world. I am happy that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, through an important and valuable subcommittee, has looked into this matter in a most searching way and intends to do so again.

To abandon the world because of our internal anxieties and weaknesses would, I believe, be a supreme lack of faith. There are questions which we should ask. One which I have often asked in the last 15 years is whether or not we have our priorities right. I will not use the terrible conglomeration of letters called "priorization". That word is even worse than the word disincentives or the word patriation. What we should ask is what we should do, how we should do it, and where. Even at its best, even at times of great economic strength, the Dominion of Canada could not mount, support, and sustain a meaningful program of assistance for 70 or 80 countries all across the world, so we must develop priorities.

I have never had any hesitation in where I would place my priorities. Commensurate with our capacity, based upon our contacts, our knowledge, and our friendship, I would say that there is no place abroad where we could do more effective work, develop more meaningful contacts and be more significantly helpful than with the nations of the Commonwealth Caribbean. It seems to me that their needs are commensurate with our capacity, or perhaps it would be more graceful to express it the other way, our capacity is more commensurate with their needs. With this area we can see clear prospects of aiding them, even the weakest among them toward a state of economic viability and prosperity.

I think that it is only right and proper that in all such programs of aid we ask, "will our contribution make a difference, will it show up in developing those goals for the people to whom we are extending our aid?" This is a manageable thing to do. Indeed, it is possible that it might make the difference between a strong and viable policy or a healthy economy and a depressed one.

We know that in our external contacts we have often made grave errors because we really did not understand the people with whom we were dealing. We did not know their customs. So much valuable time was lost and so much strength was wasted. However, we do know the people of the Commonwealth Caribbean, and they know us. We have had a long history of friendly ties with them. Even before we had the capacity to deal with foreign affairs, which I would place at around 1917 under the great Sir Robert Borden's leadership, we were developing contacts with the external world, and these were with the Commonwealth Caribbean. Interesting and valuable trade negotiations were carried out in Ottawa on more than one occasion.

To the historic ties we add the geographic propinquity. They are in fact in this global world, as it is still called, our neighbour. Perhaps more impressive than anything else—and here I show my bias as a parliamentarian—these communities have parliamentary institutions which are strong and which are in some cases carried out under very great difficulty, the highest goals for which parliamentary institutions are established.

● (1612)

I do not get too carried away by the views of those who say we should apply some litmus test to every country in the world and, if we do not approve of them morally, 100 per cent, we should have nothing to do with them. Because we draw our inheritance in a parliamentary way from the United Kingdom as do they, I believe this establishes a bond of extreme importance and immense value. They are sister members of the Commonwealth; they are neighbours, and it is heartening to see that in some of the islands in the Commonwealth Caribbean where the institutions are very small, they are able to carry on well and to develop a party system and all the institutions known to the British pattern.

They know us and they still like us. That is important, Mr. Speaker. Canadians from the private sector and the public sector have been going there for many years. I should like to see this bond strengthened along the lines I have suggested.

Over the years I have moved away from advising aid and toward developing a mutuality of interest and stimulating trade between our countries. That is why I asked for better ports in the east, better facilities for shipping and exchange programs for students, professionals, social workers, politicians and so on. I believe this is the positive way for us to help them and, in the long run, for us to help each other. I think there are great possibilities in this, and I should like to see the matter studied very carefully.

I suggest this proposal should be examined by a joint committee. I propose a joint committee because the Senate of Canada has established an excellent reputation for the quality of investigation of its committees. In my judgment its methods are better than ours, its procedures much more effective, and its accomplishments generally far more substantial. In 1970 a Senate committee made an exhaustive and interesting study of the Commonwealth Caribbean which added much to our deliberations.

I could say much more, Mr. Speaker, but I have spoken on this subject before. Knowing how hon. members hang on my every word in every session, I shall not repeat what I have said. Exactly one year ago on the Friday before the Christmas recess—I seem to be fortunate enough to get the opportunity to speak on a Friday—I remember speaking to hon. members in a parliamentary way. I again invite members who enjoy the fruit of the cane and the Caribbean high commissioners in the gallery to join me, after the debate is over and approval has been given by the House, in a little Christmas cheer à la Caribbean rum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) that I wish him all the best when he retires from this House after his career as a parliamentarian.

I was somewhat suprised that when he resumed his seat he was applauded by members of his party. While I respect the hon. member, I am completely and diametrically opposed to his ideas. During the four and one-half years I have been a member of this House, I have wanted other people from British Columbia to travel to his beautiful part of the world, to Ontario, and to Quebec. I want massive student exchanges. I must tell the hon. member what we have in British Columbia and why I cannot in any way support his plea for exchanges with the Caribbean.

The economy class air fare from Vancouver to Ottawa and return costs $430. It costs more to Montreal, and far more to go to the hon. member's province. For four and one-half years I have been urging this government, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) and everyone else, to provide lower air fares to lure British Columbians to other parts of Canada. So far we have seen just a small drop in fares and the introduction of some charter fares. Many British Columbians still have not seen Prince Edward Island, they have not seen Ontario or Quebec. For half the fare they can travel to Hawaii, San Francisco and Seattle, and people in eastern Canada can take their holidays in the Bahamas and the Caribbean. They can have student and teacher exchanges between Canada and France or, as the hon. member wishes, between Canada and the Caribbean, which are supported by the federal government, while we do not have enough funds to support this country. At this time in our history I want people from the west to see the east, and vice versa.

I propose that every Canadian from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island should have the right to travel to other parts of the country once a year for a fare of $100 or $150, to put an arbitrary figure on it. People from British Columbia could visit Quebec city, Montreal, Prince Edward Island, and people from those areas could visit British Columbia. In this way all would have a better understanding of the country. As a member of parliament I have had the opportunity of going to Quebec.

The hon. member spoke of a list of priorities. I should like to refer to some that have not done too well. In the Ottawa Journal of May 27, 1978, under the headline "Student Exchange Program Goes Broke", there appeared the following report:

> The federal government's showcase student exchange program, Open House Canada, has run out of money with 6,000 on the waiting list.
>
> Co-ordinator Brian Gilhuly said the program's budget of $6 ½ million is enough to take care of 23,500 students. Another 6,000 students have completed the necessary steps and are waiting to be accepted.
>
> Open House Canada offered free airfare to anyone between the ages of 14 and 22 who was willing to be matched up with a host somewhere else in Canada.

Apparently we do not have enough money for these student exchanges. I see the hon. member for Hillsborough is having a chat with a member from British Columbia who is a colleague of mine. I am sure my colleague on that side of the House will add his persuasions to mine.

I do not want to oppose the program for the Caribbean, Mr. Speaker, but it is low on my list of priorities. It is a good idea and I, too, want exchanges with the Caribbean, but also with France, England, and other places. The hon. member, of course, has his list of priorities, but during the 20 minutes that he spoke he never once mentioned any other part of Canada. Has he forgotten British Columbia, Alberta, and other parts of the country? They are all rather beautiful, but it costs the average Canadian too much to visit them.

I should like to hear the hon. member's views on lower airfares. I am sure there are people in his riding who would like to see Quebec and Ontario.

I should like to tell the House of the value of the student exchanges, Mr. Speaker. In British Columbia there is some prejudice against Toronto and Ontario, perhaps even more than in the maritimes. Certainly there is some prejudice against Quebec and against another language. From time to time to it has been my pleasure—as I know it has been for other members—to welcome students from all parts of the country who are participating in programs such as Open House Canada. They have all thought how wonderful it was to have the opportunity to participate.

Three years ago I attended Laval University in Quebec—at my own expense—in order to learn French. I met with students from the United States, British Columbia, and even from Prince Edward Island. All saw Quebec city and the province firsthand as they were learning the language, and they had no prejudices or misconceptions. If both students and adults had the opportunity to travel across the country and still had a dislike of one part of the country, at least it would be well founded on things they had experienced, and not based on misconceptions. Some of those misconceptions are due to the failure of the media, and of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in particular to live up to its mandate of explaining one part of the country to other parts.

[Mr. Raines.]

• (1622)

I have called for cuts in the CBC. I have called for these cuts in committee, and I have done so in opposition to this government at times. I have called for cuts in administration, but I have told the CBC president, Al Johnson, in committee that I would even vote for an increase because I think communication is that important. If the CBC would live up to its mandate, nothing could be more important.

Of equal importance to communications is the right of Canadians at this time in our history to travel and see the country and to meet their friends and fellow Canadians from Quebec, Ontario, and Prince Edward Island. And now, in December, 1978, to have a colleague of mine say—and I call him a colleague whether he is on this side of the House or the other side of the House, our ideas could be the same—let us have exchanges with the Caribbean, valuable although that may be, I find it almost to the point of being discourteous that in a 20-minute speech he did not mention once that we have a need in British Columbia and Alberta that is not being fulfilled.

The airfare from Ottawa to Vancouver and return costs $430, and that is not an easy amount to find. So I suppose people from here go to Florida and the Caribbean. I do not blame them. People who live in British Columbia, because of the excessive cost of air fare and the lack of communication—we do not see that on the national network—people in British Columbia are more familiar with Seattle, Hawaii and California than they are with the maritime provinces. This national disgrace must come to an end sooner or later. That is why for four and a half years I have asked that the constituents who live in the Hillsborough riding, as well as all the people who come from Ontario, Quebec, or any part of eastern Canada, be given an opportunity to come to British Columbia, Alberta or any part of the west. By the same token I want the people of the west to have the opportunity to come east.

While I am not telling anyone what language they can or cannot speak, there are growing numbers of people in British Columbia who want the opportunity to learn another language. I submit that we should all join together to give them the opportunity to learn a second language. I do not care what the media or what orators in this House say, and at times I do not care what this government says, because I have been to Quebec, I have spoken to the people there and I have found a desire to learn English. I find their hearts are good.

No matter what premiers or officials of any province may say, I have talked to the people, as have all hon. members—the hon. member from Prince Edward Island has talked to people more than I in his long and distinguished career—and I think the people of Canada are good, and that growing segment who want an opportunity to become Canadians must be given that opportunity. For that reason perhaps the hon. member for Hillsborough will join me in my plea that we have a chance to see all sections of this country and then, after that, perhaps I will be prepared to listen somewhat more carefully to an exchange between the maritimes and the Caribbean.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that you allowed the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines) to discuss his motion when he was supposed to be discussing the motion put by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie).

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Peters: It is possible for those of us who like hockey to discuss baseball also and these topics do not have to be discussed at the same time. In fact there is some advantage in not mixing them up. I think that when members are discussing hockey they can discuss it, and likewise when they are discussing football, they can discuss it. But they do not necessarily mix, and the rules are not the same.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member is insinuating that the Chair should have intervened when the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines) was speaking. I thought he was addressing himself to the motion before the House. I understood he was stating his views, that contrary to having an exchange of services and techonology, he referred to an exchange of students within Canada, and I thought he was quite in order.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, thank you for your explanation. I did not understand that from the comments.

We have had the opportunity of associating with the hon. member for Hillsborough in a number of debates—

Mr. Raines: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to know if the hon. member understands either one of the official languages. I thought I had made myself quite clear, and if at any time in this House one cannot speak on the need—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, the member just proved my point.

As I was saying, since 1957 we have had an opportunity of associating on many occasions with the hon. member for Hillsborough and we will be very sorry to see him go. I am sure we will be no more sorry than the people in this country who have felt that we have an obligation in Canada to help some of the other Commonwealth countries. I agree with him that there are no better Commonwealth countries to help than those that will help us. It has never been suggested by the hon. member for Hillsborough that we were going to do this out of the goodness of our hearts. There was a great deal to gain from a relationship where we might need sugar, oranges, or the rum that comes from that part of the world, which is something dear to some people's hearts, as well as cigars. In turn they are interested in our potatoes, wheat, flour, and a number of other commodities that we have in excess in Canada.

It seems to me that is good neighbourliness for Canadians to participate with other Commonwealth countries in that kind of an exchange. Over the years the hon. member for Hillsborough and those who have participated in the Caribbean Canadian committee, loose though that term maybe, have always stressed the fact that this was not entirely one-sided, there were advantages on both sides.

It is interesting to walk down the streets of Toronto because one will find people there from the Commonwealth Caribbean area rubbing shoulders with other Canadians in a harmonious relationship. It is not odd either to walk down the streets in many Caribbean countries because one will find a branch of the Bank of Nova Scotia rubbing shoulders with a branch of the Bank of Montreal or a branch of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. One can also see ships carrying Canadian goods delivering to Caribbean ports, and in return, bringing back to Canada some of the produce found in that part of the world.

The hon. member has stressed the advantages of developing ports. It is very difficult to deliver or receive goods unless sufficient facilities in the ports are made available. It means that if we are to import tropical fruits and other commodities of a perishable nature from those countries, they will have to be protected with refrigeration and container ships and the other necessities of modern merchandising. Those ports have to be established at both ends of the line. It is only in Canada that we have a ship docking off the shore of Frobisher Bay and then we find we cannot make the delivery via small boats because the water is frozen. Most countries are not that stupid, and it is only in Canada that we believe we do not have to have facilities. We have the ships but we cannot dock them wherever we please. I think the hon. member for Hillsborough is perfectly correct in saying that proper facilities at both ends of a trade route are necessary. We may help in the construction and with technology in the Caribbean, and they may help us in other ways.

There is one thing Canadians miss that our friend in British Columbia cannot give us; during our six months of winter we need warm sunlight. This is something the Caribbean has. The Caribbean has beautiful beaches, warm sunlight, and warm water in abundance. We have commodities the Caribbean countries need. In a limited way we are an industrial nation. A trade can be made very readily which is advantageous to both parties.

It might be wise and more to our advantage than it is to theirs if one were to pick up an Air Canada brochure and find that the prices are quoted in Canadian funds instead of American funds. The other Caribbean Commonwealth countries do not use American money either. It is only a form of exchange for the tourist industry that is operated for both Canadians and Americans. There would be very little difficulty translating Canadian money into money used in Barbados, Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago and other places in the Caribbean. However, that is not the way it is done. It is converted into American money. This kind of arrangement could be made very easy so that our money is directly related to the Commonwealth Caribbean countries which we visit.

● (1632)

I do not want to spend very much time on this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: That is not to satisfy my colleagues on the other side of the House. It is simply because they may not be able to stay on this subject long enough to kill the motion. That is the reason I will not take too long.

We have been very impressed with the efforts that have been made to relate in a fair and reasonable way the relationship between the Caribbean and Canadian people. There is a warm friendship on both sides. It has been ably demonstrated that, given a reasonable response, very unusual results may flow from that which will be to both our advantage and theirs.

We are all familiar with the lack of support on the government benches with regard to the request from the Turks and Caicos Islands. They petitioned Canadian members of parliament to make some kind of arrangement whereby we would provide them with the industrial development necessary to develop those islands into a resort area. In return, the islands could be used for the benefit of Canadian citizens.

The government pooh-poohed that, saying that we would be accused throughout the world of starting up a colonial empire. When my colleague from Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) suggested those islands attach themselves to Nova Scotia, there was a great hullaballoo. It was suggested by the Turks and Caicos that they become a protectorate of Canada or a territory. The then secretary of state for external affairs, Mr. Sharp, almost had a fit. He asked what our neighbours would say when we went to the United Nations if we had a protectorate or territory in the Caribbean. He said we would become a colonial power.

That was not the way the people on the islands viewed it. They have a relatively small population, 5,000 or 6,000. Even if you include all the relatives on the islands, there still would not be more than twice that number. These people could easily be covered under our old age pension and other social security programs that we have. In return, they would have allowed Canadians to build hotels and establish seaports. The Canadian dollar would have been used as the exchange. Canada could have sent many processed foods and goods to these islands. They, in turn, could have sent us what they grow on their tropical islands, as well as letting us take advantage of their sun and sand. This was pooh-poohed because the officials in the Department of External Affairs felt it would indicate that we were not as pure in terms of being colonially oriented as we pretend to be.

There would be an advantage on both sides. All arrangements would have to be done in harmony. There could be an equal exchange and we could quite easily arrive at a trade balance that would be nil. By reciprocal buying and selling, there would be equal advantage to both sides.

This is not true at the present time in the Caribbean. In Jamaica, for example, we own the banks as well as the bauxite industry. They look at Canadians in a different light than if we were equal partners in a Commonwealth arrangement.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) has sown a seed that I hope will grow to maturity. I see great advantage for both the Commonwealth Caribbean and for Canada. I can visualize ships travelling between those two areas in the same way that airplanes do, carrying people and produce, with a mutual advantage to both parties. There should not be any roadblocks whether people want to travel to Hawaii or California. That is not the question. This is an opportunity to expand our trade in a mutually acceptable way and to do it with equality. We would be equal trading partners working to our mutual advantage under a harmonious arrangement between Canada and the Caribbean Commonwealth.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, there was joy in the House of Commons today when we were privileged to hear again the distinguished voice of our colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). There was sadness in the House also when we were reminded of the pending departure of that gentleman who has done so much through his years in the House of Commons to raise the sights of Canadians to our international opportunities and responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: I say to the hon. member for Hillsborough that this House will be the poorer for his departure. If he leaves behind the many aspects of a legacy through the years, the final chapter being his motion this afternoon, this House has been well served indeed.

Unfortunately, I have to tell the hon. member for Hillsborough that he has not been totally successful in raising the viewpoint of Canadians with regard to international opportunities and obligations. There was a perfect demonstration a moment after that gentleman sat down of a Canadian who has not yet had his vision widened commensurate with the responsibilities he holds as a member of parliament.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines), in responding to this motion, made a very interesting speech indeed. I say to him with great respect, and indeed friendship, that his speech this afternoon in which he lamented the high cost of domestic travel and deplored the drying up of funds for the domestic student exchange program, was not a speech against the motion of my friend from Hillsborough. It was an indictment of his own government for failing to do the things necessary in our own domestic economy, giving him a sense of frustration and exacerbation respecting travel in our own country. Just because a point he made indicated the government is not to say that the validity of the point made by my hon. friend from Hillsborough is any less.

● (1642)

I have to remind the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour that only three or four hours ago in this very chamber the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), answering a question from one of my hon. friends, gave a run-down of his forthcoming trip to Jamaica where he would be meeting with several first ministers from around the world on the general subject of the north-south alignment. The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour forgets that his own party has been a leader and, indeed, has supported the two reports of the subcommittee on international development to which my hon. friend from Hillsborough referred. The members of the Liberal party joined members from both sides in making unanimous the two reports which were prepared in 1976 and 1977 as a reflection of the concern of the many members in all parties with regard to the north-south problem.

Those reports from the subcommittee on international development were a reflection of the work which the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence is capable of doing were it given sufficient opportunity. These reports stand out as exceptions to the general lassitude which characterizes the work of the committees generally, and specifically of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. If there is any improvement to be made in helping Canadians understand a wider sense of opportunity and obligation—the hon. member for Hillsborough pinpoints a specific area, the Caribbean—it is through the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. I say to the House with great confidence it will not be long before events are set in motion whereby a sense of leadership will be given to the Canadian people to explain and support the measures which have been recommended by members of parliament from both sides who took part in those hearings.

I will just refer briefly to a couple of sections in that report from the subcommittee on international development. My hon. friend from Hillsborough, referring to the north-south problem in the Caribbean, has by implication talked about the debt problem of the developing countries today. The report which the subcommittee offered to the House and to the government started by quoting the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth, Mr. Ramphal, himself a distinguished son of the Caribbean. He said:

> The inequities in the international system are of tremendous significance. They have given rise to essentially two worlds and the disparities between them are growing. One is the world of the rich, the other the world of the poor, united by its heritage of common suffering. A poverty curtain divides the world materially and philosophically. One world is literate, the other largely illiterate; one industrial and urban, the other predominantly agrarian and rural; one consumption oriented the other striving for survival—

The second report from the subcommittee had to do with intermediate funding. One of the recommendations, indeed, the principal finding and recommendation, reads as follows:

> The flow of "aid", or real financial resources, to developing countries remains as important and urgent as ever and is still the most concrete yardstick of the commitment of wealthier countries to assist the developing world. It is important to stress the continuing role of aid since the debate on the "new international economic order" has often focused primarily on "non-aid" aspects of co-operation.

When the hon. member for Hillsborough comes into the House on a Friday afternoon and reminds us of our opportunities to fulfil the commitments our country has made over the years, for his pains he gets a speech saying we have to improve the situation in domestic air fares and domestic student exchange rates. In other words, we have to make great improvements in the internal economy of our country before we address ourselves to the larger matters of the world. Mr. Speaker, every day of the week members of House are engaged in that very exercise of analysing and trying to improve domestic economy.

Is the hon. member trying to tell us that we cannot give any priority to the subjects my hon. friend mentioned? He forgets that a large percentage of the land of the world and 99.5 per cent of the people of the world are not in Canada. What shocks me is how little time is spent in the House of Commons devoted to occasions on which members can discuss more realistic policies of Canadian involvement in a changing world. If there is any characteristic which marks my hon. friend's motion this afternoon it is the characteristic of being sensible. It is eminently sensible.

I will read the operative section of the motion. He recommends "assistance towards meetings of political, business and educational leaders of the two regions with a view to stimulating a north-south exchange of goods, people, services and technology in a mutually advantageous way." He understands the reality of the human condition today that is threatened by this widening chasm between the 30 per cent of the world who live in the advantaged countries and the 70 per cent who live in the developing countries devoid of any means by which to make themselves more self-reliant. That is what the issue is today. Canada benefits from a more vigorous participation in improving north-south relations.

I shall certainly not be the one to talk out this motion. I want it to go to a committee. I want the subject matter to be cummunicated to the people of Canada and, indeed, to the government side here this afternoon, because it represents the voice of wisdom and outlines the practical steps to be taken in order to move the north-south debate ahead.

There was an implication in the Prime Minister's answer this afternoon in reply to a question, and I invite the hon. member to go back and look at Hansard for the Prime Minister said, and he was right, a log-jam had interrupted the north-south dialogue between the developed and the developing nations. Everybody who follows the international scene today is all too conscious of that log-jam.

Many things must be done of a sensible nature, as my hon. friend suggests, which can begin to move us forward in practical steps to close that gap in such a way that the people of the developed countries, as well as the developing countries, are the beneficiaries. I invite the hon. member to give that aspect some thought, even from the vantage point of beautiful British Columbia. British Columbia as well as Prince Edward Island will be among the chief beneficiaries of this move. You see, it is in the interests of both the rich and the poor to boost productivity all over the world.

• (1652)

The heart of the dilemma today is low productivity in both the developed and developing worlds. That is at the heart of economic instability. Once we see that, it becomes easier to take a systematic approach, the kind of approach for which my friend is arguing. It is in the interests of both the rich and the poor, the developed and the developing, to increase the flow of capital into the developing world, and to improve the transfer of technology. That is what he is talking about in his motion today.

Mr. Raines: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but would he permit a question now?

Mr. Roche: I will close my remarks in just a moment and my friend can raise his question then.

In supporting this motion I should like to point out that moving toward a more dynamic global economy is in the mutual interest of both the north and the south, and by raising the purchasing power among the greatly expanding populations of the south, releasing new resources and developing new markets for both the poor and the rich, higher levels of trade can be created within and between all countries. That is the essence of the motion. In effect, the developing countries of the south can become one of the engines of resumed progress in the industrial world. We need those expanding markets.

The subject which we are debating this afternoon is far beyond the subject of just aid. Aid is an inconsequential aspect of the totality of the north-south relations. It is, as my friend points out, an important aspect still, but those who follow the north-south dialogue recognize that if we are going to make a realistic response to the challenges in the world today, then we have to move beyond aid and create a new development strategy.

As the third development decade opens in 1980, one of the things that Canada can do, since we do not really have a strategy but only a lot of ad hoc programs, is to develop a new strategy on industrial development co-operation with the nations in the north-south complex.

Mr. Maurice J. Williams, who is chairman of the development assistance committee of OECD, one of the world's foremost authorities on this general subject, notes the following:

> Broad international support is more likely to be mobilized for evolutionary changes which remove unjust constraints in the international economic order, facilitate an ongoing process of structural change and encourage a concerted effort to help weak and vulnerable people.

That is what my friend is asking for this afternoon in his motion.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Roche: Canada is well suited to lead and not be a grudging participant in the search for new order in the world. I think that the members of the House should have the opportunity to debate these questions. The Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence should be much more active. If we did that, we would have a more realistic foreign policy that is understood and supported by the people of Canada, especially including the people from British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Raines: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the hon. member who comes from Alberta, and I included Alberta in my remarks. What he said was most interesting in dealing with the need for trade with the Caribbean, but I would like to ask him if he would support me in acceding that the priorities of cultural and student exchanges should be the first priority of British Columbia and Alberta in the west? Would he support me in a motion with regard to that priority?

Mr. Roche: The hon. member is perfectly free to submit his own motion and to try to generate support for ideas that are closest to his heart. This afternoon we are privileged to have a motion from the hon. member for Hillsborough, and that is the motion I am supporting this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, opposition members made it extremely easy for me today, but probably because they wanted to prevent me from paying tribute to a colleague and friend of mine, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). I want to tell him my hope that this pre-election period goes on for many more months so I can continue to have the pleasure of working with him and benefit from everything I learn in his interventions which are always full of wisdom and humour. I appreciate his constant concern for the better-being not only of Canadians but, as he has shown in this motion today, of all inhabitants of the globe, and I believe we have in our colleague from Hillsborough one of those new beings or one of those people we call citizens of the world.

Ever since he first sat in the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has always endeavoured to bring an international dimension to the debates of this House. Unfortunately, I think we do not have enough opportunities to discuss those subjects. I was struck by one of the things he said in his intervention today. He referred to that false proverb which says that "Charity begins at home." I believe as he does that it is imperative, even in a period of economic difficulty, that we use our minds, our hearts and our financial or technical means to help our brothers in other countries of the world going through worse economic difficulties than we are.

Mr. Paproski: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 18, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

• (1407)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE OF NO. 1 AND NO. 2 WHEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Having regard to the fact that although during the past weeks wheat has been selling out of Vancouver and Thunder Bay at between $4.50 and $4.70 a bushel, and that the initial price for wheat for the farmer at the farm gate is only $2.75, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House requests the initial price of No. 1 and No. 2 wheat be increased immediately by at least 50 cents a bushel.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Turned down by Liberal members again.

* * *

SOCIAL INSURANCE

ADVISORY COUNCIL STUDY OF INCREASING USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Noting the decision of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to form an advisory council to study the increasing use of social insurance numbers only after persistent pressure by the official opposition, and noting with dismay and incredulity further evidence of government expansion of the use of SIN in that the Canadian Transport Commission now requires all domestic charter passengers to provide their SIN if they wish to profit from the savings of advance booking, that Statistics Canada demands farmers' SIN in their agricultural enumerative survey, and that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation uses the SIN as an employee identification number, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the minister immediately convene the advisory council and instruct it to report as soon as possible so that legislation limiting the continued expansion of SIN can be introduced after the Christmas recess and, in any event, before 1984.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

AGRICULTURAL AND RESOURCE PROGRAMMING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in recent days I and other members, such as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), have received several complaints from farm people regarding a recent program about beef farming on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation entitled "High Steaks". Farmers claim that, like the program last year on grain entitled "What Breadbasket", the program was biased, one-sided and it did not represent a true overview of various opinions on the beef industry.

Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That this House recommends to CBC president Al Johnson that he review the position of Mr. Don Baron as director of agricultural and resource programming and ensure that the CBC maintains a high standard of objective broadcasting in their agricultural and resource programming.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

[Translation]

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REASON FOR CHANGES IN FRENCH REGIONALIZATION PROGRAM IN ONTARIO AND WESTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the decision of the National Film Board to abolish the Francophone regional production centres in Ontario and western Canada; considering that such a decision will deprive Francophone minorities outside Quebec of an important communication and cultural tool and will also prevent them from obtaining the provincial government and non-government funds they need to operate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert):

That the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) call on the administrative board of the NFB to justify that reprehensible action which did not contribute to the cultural survival of Francophone minorities outside Quebec when it abolished French regionalization in Ontario and western Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[English]

FINANCE

INCENTIVE PROGRAMS TO ENCOURAGE EMPLOYMENT OF YOUTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, as the rate of unemployment for men and women under 25 years of age is twice that for those 25 years and over, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Finance be instructed by this House to introduce a program of incentives, without delay, which will induce businessmen and primary producers to employ our young people and enable them to take their rightful place in the work force.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion for debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

INDUSTRY

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR STEEL INDUSTRY IN SYDNEY, N.S.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of extreme urgency affecting the economic future of thousands of Nova Scotians.

Recognizing that the ten-year, multimillion dollar contract between the Sydney Steel Corporation and the Tree Island Steel Company of British Columbia may represent the only real hope of revitalizing the Cape Breton steel industry, and recognizing the importance of this industry not only to Cape Breton but to all of Nova Scotia, and in view of the fact that Tree Island intends to cancel the contract unless financing can be arranged by December 31 for improvements to the Sysco billet mill—and I note that today is December 18, Mr. Speaker—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates):

That this government give its assurance that it will approve that portion of funding required for the modernization of the billet plant so the province of Nova Scotia may take advantage of the very substantial contract with Tree Island Steel Corporation of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented at this time for debate only with the unanimous agreement of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

● (1412)

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CO-ORDINATOR TO ENSURE MAXIMUM USE OF RAIL CARS TO MOVE GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the fact that there are at least 45 unassigned grain cars in a small area around Red Deer city, which means there could be hundreds of boxcars sitting on sidings in western Canada at a time when elevators are plugged and barley is not moving.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board appoint immediately a capable co-ordinator with authority to ensure maximum use of railway cars so vessels will not be held up at the west coast, and thus avoid breaking last year's record $25 million in demurrage charges.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS IN CASHING CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that two constituents of mine, aged ten and 12, last week cashed in coupons from their Canada Savings Bonds to buy Christmas gifts for their parents, and in view of the fact that they were penalized by an unfair 25 per cent deduction because they did not have social insurance numbers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

The Minister of Employment and Immigration immediately rescind the regulations that brought about this parsimonious action, and allow children, or at least pensioners, to cash their Canada Savings Bond coupons without penalty or, conversely, that the minister be called Scrooge instead of Santa Claus.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO ROMANIA

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given the sorry history of financial negotiations by this government with regard to the sale of Candu nuclear reactors abroad, a history which includes losses of hundreds of millions of dollars, disappearing agents and mismanagement by AECL—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Miss MacDonald: —can the minister say that the $1 billion loan made by the Export Development Corporation to Romania for the construction of four Candu reactors is all the financing that will be made available, in view of the fact that similar financing with Korea by EDC for one nuclear reactor has now escalated to a cost of $560 million—$1 billion for four; $560 million for one? Is this another $1 billion financial fiasco?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology):

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Canadians will take pride in this transaction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Especially when they develop an atom bomb, like India!

Mr. Gillespie: Canada has developed the world's best nuclear technology. There is no question that the Pickering reactor, for example, is the best performing reactor anywhere in the world. I do not think most Canadians would want to keep that technology to themselves, on the basis that they are not prepared to export it, or would want to hold back on the manufacturing opportunities which that technology represents.

Mr. Fraser: Answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: That particular arrangement which has been negotiated with respect to a licensing fee, an engineering fee, and Export Development Corporation standby credit in the amount of $1 billion will provide $1 billion in opportunities for the Canadian manufacturing industry.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I notice that the minister was very careful not to answer the question as to whether or not this $1 billion would be the limit to which this government would involve itself in this particular transaction.

It appears that the licensing agreement between AECL and Romanergo could encompass the construction of more than four reactors. Can the minister tell the House whether the licensing agreement will allow Romanergo to sell reactors to other countries, or expressly states that reactors will be built solely in Romania? In other words, could it allow for further nuclear proliferation even to Soviet satellite countries?

● (1417)

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, Romania has signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and has accepted international safeguards and inspection by the International Atomic Energy Agency. Romania has in every respect observed Canadian safeguards, the toughest in the world. We negotiated the agreement with Romania a year ago.

As to the question of additional Canadian benefits which may flow from this transaction, it is quite possible that after the four reactors have been put in place, Romania will want to purchase additional components and engineering services from Canada. That would be to the advantage of Canada. But before they can export any part of that technology to foreign countries there will have to be a further agreement negotiated with Romania with respect to those export opportunities.

Miss MacDonald: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if perhaps the next customer on the government's list of clientele will be the People's Republic of China.

Since Canada has only recently begun to develop the technology for nuclear waste disposal, and since Romania has not moved in this field at all, could the minister assure the House that any agreements signed between Canada and Romania anticipate where the nuclear waste will be stored which comes from the Romanian nuclear program? Have there been any discussions between Canada and Romania with respect to the possibility that the nuclear waste would be returned to Canada, or can the minister say that such a proposal has been explicitly ruled out?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I can say categorically that there is no question of any waste which results from the spent fuel in Romania being returned to Canada as part of this arrangement. The answer is absolutely and categorically no. The Romanians will have to deal with their own waste fuel.

I can say, however, that as a result of the manufacturing opportunities inherent in this field, there will be thousands and thousands of jobs created for Canadians.

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO ARGENTINA—STAGE OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I presume that this initiative in eastern Europe was for the purpose of opening up new markets for our nuclear technology.

Could I inquire what the situation is with respect to the initiative we took in South America some time ago and, specifically, how matters are proceeding in Argentina? Is the initial reactor close to completion? Is there any progress in settling the misunderstandings that so far have prevented this country and Argentina from proceeding further and, indeed, proceeding further in South America, from the point of view of AECL's first steps in that part of the world?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, answered questions on this particular point last week and gave a progress report in respect of the discussions between Canada and Argentina.

I think it is fair to say that that particular reactor is on schedule, or within a month or two of being on schedule.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest to the minister that the report given by his colleague was not very specific and that the impression given by the minister is not the one generally held by people following the situation.

I should like to follow up the question asked by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and ask the minister directly whether, in view of his latest initiative, when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce visits the People's Republic of China, as reported earlier in the year, he is going to have a mandate to talk about nuclear technology with that country.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that if he has a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that question should be put to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

* * *

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

SALES OF GRAIN TO CHINA

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport—who is also supposed to be in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board—in view of yesterday's announcement about the United States establishing full diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China.

Reports indicate that this will mean greatly increased commercial opportunities for the United States in general, and particularly with respect to grain sales, including an additional three million to six million tonnes that could otherwise be bought from Canada.

What action does the minister and the government intend to take to increase our capacity to transport grain from the prairies to west coast ports, so that the Canadian Wheat Board will not be left in the present position of not tendering for further contracts with China because of lack of sufficient rail capacity to handle additional sales?

• (1422)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of the capacity to handle grain was considered at a meeting of the senior transportation committee last week and certain steps are being taken in that regard. The existing elevator terminals at Vancouver are adding a total of about ten millions bushels of storage space.

The hon. member knows that we are determined to see that a significant increase in capacity occurs at Prince Rupert so that by the early mid-1980s we can handle a lot more grain there.

His reference to the relationship between United States and China should not be left untouched in view of the fact that Canada long ago recognized the Chinese government. I am sure that will stand our relationship, in terms of the grain trade with them, in very good stead; and perhaps even more than that, the Canadian Wheat Board is alert to maintaining the good relationship which it established by having negotiations and transactions with China even before recognition was given by Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: I am glad the minister said what he did about our trading relationship with China in view of the fact that on November 7, and again on December 7, the minister advised the House, in response to my questions, that CPR had maintained it had enought equipment to handle the projected grain movement and it is now obvious that CPR misled the minister and has caused him to mislead the House, because on December 5 CPR wrote to the Canadian Wheat Board saying that it would not have enough railway cars to move grain in 1979 and 1980.

In view of the fact the CPR now says it will not have enough cars, will the minister require CPR, under the provisions of section 262 of the Railway Act, to supply sufficient accommodation for this grain movement?

Mr. Lang: The hon. member is misleading the House in suggesting that I thought at any time that CPR had enough equipment. If he would check those answers, I hope he will be good enough to advise the House that I made it clear at the time that I did not necessarily share the view of the CPR which had been put to me about their having enough equipment.

When I saw the letter, not only to the Canadian Wheat Board but an identical letter by the president to me which referred to the shortage of equipment which CPR foresaw for 1979, I began to take immediate action in relation to the question of further cars, and I hope to be able to report further on that soon.

Mr. Benjamin: I hope I did not imply, and I certainly did not mean to imply, that the minister misled the House. He passed on information whereby CPR misled him.

In view of the urgent requirement to enlarge our capacity to move grain and to increase grain sales to China, which is being undermined by CPR—in fact, I think they have lied to all of us—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: —will the minister now give an undertaking that the farmers will not have to pay for up to 2,000 hopper cars tendered for by the Wheat Board, and will he give an undertaking to implement the Hall commission's recommendations regarding the Crowsnest statutory grain rates, so that henceforth the railway will be responsible for providing sufficient equipment to move our grain?

Mr. Lang: Those are several major questions which are not really related to the earlier sense of the hon. member's question. I did indicate to him that I was taking very seriously the issue of CPR ensuring there is enough equipment later in 1979 and I will be able to say more about that at a later date.

* * *

● (1427)

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

POSSIBILITY OF ABOLISHING REGULATION 57—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I want to come back once again to regulation 57 under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do so for the fith time; the minister may find me somewhat tenacious, but if I am, it is that I still believe in his honesty and therefore that he will solve this case. I also put this question because of the serious unfairness and discrimination this regulation visits upon many farm workers who have never been consulted and who will have to live off welfare if the situation does not change. In fact, only the minister can solve the problem because it stems from regulation 57 on page 124, and is not part of the Unemployment Insurance Act. According to that regulation, a worker has to work 125 full days. As the minister is aware of this, I merely want to ask him when he is going to give us a final answer on this matter. He promised he would look into the situation. That was about a month ago. When will he give us his answer?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we did study regulation 57 and I believe a letter was sent to the hon. member in that regard. Moreover, I am sure consultations were held with farm workers; but I shall look into the matter once again, further to the representations of the hon. member.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just said that consultations were held with the employers. However, none were held with the employees. I looked into the matter myself: today, 90 per cent of all farmers are opposed to that regulation in provincial organizations, and all workers are opposed to it because it is unfair as compared with other industries. That is why I should like to ask the minister whether he can give us a final answer before December 31.

* * *

[English]

HEALTH

SALMONELLA CONTAMINATION OF TURKEYS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has been reported that as many as 83 per cent of the turkeys being sold in Toronto are contaminated with salmonella. Can the minister tell the House why this contamination is so high, and why no action has been taken by her department to reduce it?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have just received a briefing notice on this. I have only just returned from my constituency and have not had time to study it. I prefer to study this matter and, if I am satisfied that the briefing answers the question fully, I will send a copy to the hon. member.

Mr. Yewchuk: Since the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not informed on this matter, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture, who is also involved.

About 5,000 cases of salmonella poisoning per year are reported in this country, the largest percentage being in chicken and turkey. Will the minister indicate why the percentage of contaminated birds is so high? Also, it has been reported that the percentage is increasing annually. Why is no action being taken to check this increase in contamination of birds as some other countries have done—namely, Denmark and Sweden—and come to grips with the problem?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, supervision of the salmonella problem, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated, is mostly under her jurisdiction. The Department of Agriculture is also concerned about it.

As I am sure the hon. member knows, there are 1,800 different varieties of salmonella. About six or eight kinds can do damage to human beings. We are trying to control this. I am sure the hon. member also knows that the problem starts right at the beginning with the chicken, turkey, or whatever it may be. This is not confined to poultry products; it is in all meat and fish products.

I am sure the hon. member knows, as well, that it is good kitchen practice to properly clean the board which will be used for cutting up the chicken. The poultry must also be properly cooked. In that way this problem can be eliminated and one will be perfectly safe. You can be perfectly content with the product if you follow proper hygiene. It is a known fact that two out of three persons have this contamination on their hands and can spread it by touching food, and so on.

It is not right to say that any one country has eliminated this problem completely. You could not possibly eliminate it, but you can use every precaution I have mentioned, and that is what we are doing.

* * *

● (1432)

RAILWAYS

EASTERN TRANSCONTINENTAL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a non-turkey question for the Minister of Transport. I would not call him a turkey; he is not too bad.

We now have in front of us the preferred plan for eastern transcontinental rail passenger service. While at first blush it seems to provide us with an adequate improvement over existing services, it does give rise to one or two questions. First, the timetable for implementation calls for roughly April, 1979. I wonder whether the minister would indicate to the House what preplanning has taken place up to this point by CN, CP and VIA to put in place the necessary timetables and to order the new type of rolling-stock and other facilities which are strongly recommended in the report?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the date of April 1 is being suggested by the Canadian Transport Commission, but I do not know whether the railways or VIA have yet had a chance to react to it. It may be possible, as the CTC suggests in its report, that because the changes are not as major as might have been thought, they will be easier to implement. I shall be discussing this aspect in particular with VIA and CTC, of course, will now come forward with a final plan after which we will hear from VIA as to whether there are any alternatives requested.

As far as rolling-stock is concerned, VIA has been proceeding in obtaining from CN and CP dedicated passenger rolling-stock and has been going ahead with the refurbishing of passenger cars. As well, the ten trains, the lightweight, rapid, comfortable type are, of course, on order so there is no problem contemplated with relation to implementation in this regard.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I gather from what the minister has said that once again the people in Atlantic Canada are expected to go ahead with a new system with old or worked-over equipment.

Can the minister tell us whether or not VIA Rail will be in a position, some time prior to the implementation of the final report, to bring into service the new light, rapid and comfortable type of diesel rail car service to which the minister has alluded?

Mr. Lang: The Atlantic provinces will have the same opportunities as Canadians throughout the VIA system to use cars which are improved and rebuilt. I would join the hon. member in seeming to suggest that this is not an important change. However, he will have to agree that Canadians in the Atlantic region can be no further ahead than the rest of Canada with respect to riding in the light, rapid and comfortable trains which are on order.

These trains have been on order for about a year now. They will cost a great deal and will be excellent trains, but we really do need them to be built before even the people in the Atlantic provinces can ride in them. So as soon as they are ready, which will be some time in the mid-1980s, they will be available to the maritimes as well as to other parts of the country.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and follows up an earlier question by the sometimes vocal member for Regina-Lake Centre.

Can the minister say if the historic move to establish diplomatic relations between the United States and the People's Republic of China has any immediate implications for our own relationship with China, and especially our very favourable trade relations at the moment?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I can only repeat what has already been said, that Canada certainly regarded this as a welcome development. It is positive and follows, by some years, the enlightened policy that was introduced by this government in 1970.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HARASSMENT OF ORTHODOX DOUKHOBORS—REQUEST FOR COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—RCMP PROTECTION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice. In view of the increasing harassment being experienced by the Orthodox Doukhobor community at the hands of the Freedomite Doukhobors in the form of arson and threats of arson, is the minister prepared to consider recommending the establishment of a commission of inquiry to examine this problem which has gone unresolved for five generations, costing Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars and untold damages, police work and prison services?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall gladly consider the hon. member's suggestion and the request he is making. First, however, I shall try to ascertain whether this is not a provincial responsibility and whether I should not instead refer this matter to the attorney general of the province concerned. Just the same, I shall consider most seriously the issue raised by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Brisco: I thank the minister for his answer. I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Solicitor General.

In view of the fact that at this time some 16 homes of members of the Orthodox community of Doukhobors are reported to be on a Freedomite Doukhobor hit-list, and that these home owners are weary from guarding their homes and in fear of their lives, would the minister support the proposal of additional RCMP personnel to be assigned to protect these home owners and others, and to provide increased manpower to the RCMP "D" squad in the Kootenays?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the question the hon. member directed to the Minister of Justice and I do not know what relation it bears to the question he has asked of me. However, with reference to his representation, the allocation of members of the RCMP within the province of British Columbia is a matter for the province. It relates to the administration of the RCMP within that province for which the attorney general of the province of British Columbia is responsible.

AGRICULTURE

UTILIZATION OF GRAIN TERMINALS SEVEN DAYS A WEEK

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and relates to the two questions I asked three weeks ago.

Has the minister received any report as yet from the Board of Grain Commissioners about the utilization of grain terminals seven days a week and about bypassing terminals by putting barley through on final export permits from the country elevators?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Just this morning, Mr. Speaker, we had a meeting with the chairman of the Canadian Grain Commission. He informed me that several of the suggestions made by the hon. member are quite good, but with respect to some of them he is getting a legal interpretation of the act since he does not feel he has the authority to direct the elevators to run seven days a week. Consideration has to be given to such thing as union contracts, hiring extra people, and so on. Apparently there are quite a number of aspects involved in following these suggestions.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, still maintaining the constructive mood which exists between the minister and myself, would the hon. gentleman advise the Board of Grain Commissioners that there was a meeting between labour and management on this subject on July 7, 1975, in Vancouver. The railway unions at that time requested the seven days a week operation. If the Board of Grain Commissioners are informed of this, they will perhaps be in a position to ask more pertinent questions of the grain companies.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners is aware of these facts. He has a slight labour difficulty at the present time, as I am sure the hon. member is aware. If I interpreted the chairman correctly, he does not wish to aggravate the situation. Of course, I take the same stand as the hon. member, that when the need is there and urgency exists, the facilities, whether they be on the farm or off the farm, should be run around the clock.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NELSON, B.C.—TRIAL OF DOUKHOBORS ACCUSED OF ARSON

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplemental to one asked of the Minister of Justice by my hon. friend from Kootenay West.

Considering the telegram received from the participants in a mass meeting of Doukhobor communities at Brilliant, B.C., over the weekend protesting that the court proceedings during last week's arson trial at Nelson, B.C., were a complete mockery of our justice system—as was graphically illustrated by CBC coverage on Saturday night during the national news—is the minister investigating that trial with a view to developing procedures to prevent a recurrence of events during which the Sons of Freedom group gained complete control of the court proceedings?

● (1442)

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly refrain from answering in a way which would suggest that I agree with the hon. member's interpretation of these legal proceedings. As the hon. member is certainly aware, the administration comes under the jurisdiction of the province, and if there are specific complaints about the way a trial was carried out in a province, they should be directed to the attorney general of that province who is responsible, as I have said, for the administration of justice within that province.

* * *

[English]

ENERGY

INCREASES IN PRICE OF OIL—EFFECT ON INFLATION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it relates to the inflationary effects of world oil price increases.

In light of OPEC's announcement to increase the price of oil by some 14.5 per cent—I believe that is in terms of American dollars, so the increase will be higher in Canada—and also the government's stated policy to increase the price of domestic oil in July of next year and January of the following year, a 16 per cent increase, can the minister inform the House whether his government has undertaken studies—and, if not, will it undertake studies—to determine the inflationary effects of these oil price increases, particularly on the consumer but also on the competitiveness of Canadian industry, as well as the general drain on federal revenues?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, work which has been done has indicated that if we had gone forward with the $1 a barrel price increase on January 1 which had been the basis of an agreement with Alberta, that particular price movement would have resulted in an increase in the cost of living index over the course of the year of one-half of one per cent. We regarded that as too significant an increase, and that was the reason we renegotiated the agreement with Alberta and postponed the increase which would have taken place.

As a result of the OPEC increase, it is fair to say that other countries will now be hit with the kind of increase we were able to postpone. Indeed, over the period of a year other countries—European countries and Japan in particular—will experience increases of that order or perhaps a little higher.

[Mr. Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay).]

Our policy has been to protect Canadian consumers and Canadian industry. As a result of the measures we have taken, I think the hon. member can appreciate that Canadian industry will be more competitive with European industry and Japanese industry and that we will be able to maintain our competitiveness with the United States, because as a result of the OPEC increase Canadian prices will still be below the level which will exist in the United States.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, the minister has confirmed only that there will be a postponement. Instead of facing one price increase in January, we will face two in the next year, and as a result of the additional OPEC increase I suggest that prices will rise even higher.

In view of the continuing trend of higher world oil prices and also the commitment the government has given Syncrude that it will receive world prices, has the minister undertaken any special plans to offset our dependence on high-priced, foreign oil? In particular, are there any plans to push for an extension of the natural gas pipeline to eastern Canada, and perhaps an oil pipeline as well, so that we can lessen our dependence on foreign oil and hence the inflationary effects on our economy?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is paraphrasing the policy announcements we have made and acted on over the course of the last six months. The hon. member will recognize that in August of this year we announced that we were going to renegotiate our agreement with Alberta with respect to the proposed oil price increase in January. We have done that successfully.

We also indicated that we were going to try to work out with Alberta a flexible pricing system so that we could increase the market in eastern Canada for Canadian natural gas, and thus displace foreign imported crude which carries a higher price and which is more vulnerable in the sense that the Middle East is a less secure source of energy for the future. Those are measures which we have already taken.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we should not have postponed price increases, let him say so. It has not been at all clear to me how his party feels about this. It has been even less clear how the official opposition feels about the postponement. The last time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We know how we feel about you, Alastair.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi.

PROPOSED ACTION TO MITIGATE EFFECT OF OIL PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

If, as he says, the effects of the oil price increase are inevitable, has the government made any assessment in order to be able to tell us when those effects will be felt? If so, how does the government intend to mitigate these effects, and will the one-price system for oil be maintained in this country?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the one-price system for oil is fundamental to the government's policy, just as the whole process of moving up to international prices in a graduated and manageable way is also fundamental to our policy.

The last time we moved to slow down price increases we were attacked by the opposition as if our action was some kind of an election ploy. It is about time the opposition stood up and told us and the Canadian people where it stands on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

[Translation]

NARCOTICS

MEASURES TO CURB USE OF NARCOTICS IN VANCOUVER, B.C.—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

In light of the findings of the British Columbia drug commission according to whose report there has recently been an increase in the use of drugs by high school students in Vancouver, can the minister tell the House whether he has discussed or intends to discuss the issue with the British Columbia attorney general in order to find a solution to the problem?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not met with the attorney general of British Columbia since my appointment to the justice portfolio. However, I had the opportunity to meet him a few weeks ago on which occasion we had a few words on the issue of drugs in British Columbia, but not specifically on the problem referred to by the hon. member.

* * *

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCOPHONE SUMMIT MEETING—DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it relates to the Prime Minister's visit to France last week.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister confirm whether the Prime Minister was able to make any headway regarding the idea of a Francophone summit meeting, or whether the government of France does not really recognize the Government of Canada as a Francophone government and is insisting that the province of Quebec be represented as the delegate, or member, from North America at any proposed summit meeting before the government of France would agree to participate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell the hon. member whether this particular subject matter was raised between the President of France and the Prime Minister, although I do know that their meeting was very constructive.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: All two minutes of it.

Mr. MacEachen: I add, by way of clarification, that the suggestion contained in the latter part of the hon. member's question would be entirely unacceptable to Canada and to my knowledge certainly has not been advanced by France.

* * *

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CO-ORDINATOR TO ENSURE MAXIMUM USE OF RAIL CARS TO MOVE GRAIN

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Has the minister discussed with the relevant parties in the grain trade the possibility of the government's appointing a grain co-ordinator or somebody who would have jurisdiction to sort out the mess in which grain transportation has found itself in western Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that subject did come up at the senior transportation meeting which I chaired in Ottawa last week. I think there was a strong feeling among the participants at that meeting that much could be accomplished by some hard-hitting, direct contact in meetings like that, and that that might be preferable to putting another agency in position, even an agency under the name of controller. However, we did agree to meet again early in the new year, and I will certainly keep an open mind regarding the right solution, depending on what progress is made.

● (1452)

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated that he is favourably disposed to thinking about the whole question or the idea of a grain transportation co-ordinator with the power necessary at least to sort out some of the problems in the grain transportation industry at the present time.

In relation to a grain transportation co-ordinator, when will the minister be prepared to make a statement? What time in January? Will it be in the early part of January, or at the Palliser Wheat Growers' meeting at which I understand the minister will be speaking? Is he prepared to make a statement and inform western Canada whether this is a real solution to the problem as he sees it at the present time?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have not made up my mind about when to comment on that issue because, obviously, I have not reached a firm conclusion on it. I just told the hon. member that I will be looking at the matter again in an early January meeting when I will meet once again with the senior people involved in grain handling and transportation. It would not likely occur to me to say very much definitively before then.

* * *

CUSTOMS

RELOCATION OF TRAINING SCHOOL IN OTTAWA

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is multibarrelled in that it may affect a number of ministers, but it is directed primarily to the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of State for Small Business, as well as to the Minister of Public Works.

Is it the intention to move the customs training school to the quarters being vacated by the coastguard training school on Walkley Road? The Department of National Revenue has received an eviction notice from the Department of Public Works for the premises in the Daly building, effective the end of December this year. In approximately nine or ten months is it still the intention to move to Rigaud, Quebec, the whole being part of a decentralization program costing some $10 million, the minister having clear evidence that the involved personnel do not want to move from Ottawa and the Walkley facilities being perfectly suitable and ample for their purposes?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain of the details of the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: But I certainly know—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Be mean.

Mr. Abbott: —that the school will be moved.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is that it will be moved to Rigaud. I will leave it at that, rather than try to deal properly with any of the insolent remarks from over there.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister will address himself to one of those clear, concise memos, and not only his files, for the benefit of those of us in the House who are interested in the government's program of retrenchment. This would mean a saving of $10 million in the coming year.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I hope I am able to get the information from my office before it is stolen by someone opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: That is a mean thing to say.

* * *

[Translation]

FISHERIES

JUSTIFICATION FOR TITLE "DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS"

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who is always designated in Hansard and in other places as the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

On November 30, a press release originating from his department used a terminology little known to date, namely that of Minister of Fisheries and the Oceans.

Is the minister prepared to tell the House what could justify this change and would he give an explanation as to the legal basis of such a terminology?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the exact legal implications the hon. member is alluding to in his question. I will have to look into that matter. I was told there was no objection to use unofficially one title instead of the other.

I must say that if the hon. member refers to first reading of the legislation splitting the Department of Environment, he will note that its intent was precisely to give that title to the new department, namely "Fisheries and Oceans". Besides, it is to pinpoint the real autonomy, if not in the still official statute, of the minister responsible for environment in relation to myself and to indicate that separation between the two, that those two titles are used.

I must say that the new bill setting up the new department went last week to the legislation committee of the Privy Council, and I hope my colleague will present it within the next few days.

* * *

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHETHER DECISION MADE CONCERNING SUBSIDIES FOR EASTERN PROVINCIAL AIRWAYS AT ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE, QUEBEC

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct my question to the Minister of Transport.

In order to avoid another sizeable, and perhaps even the total disappearance of air transport services in the Magdalen Islands by the carrier Eastern Provincial Airways, could the minister tell us whether a decision has been taken or will soon be taken as to the request for subsidies for that service by Eastern Provincial Airways for the next financial year?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be in a position to communicate that information very soon to the airlines providing service in that area. I share the hon. member's concern to ensure that, indeed, service is continued.

* * *

RAILWAYS

PRAC RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. My understanding is that the minister has had in his office since November 30 a report from the Prairie Rail Action Committee—known as PRAC—which sources indicate contains a recommendation for the abandonment of 60 per cent of the 2,400 miles of line which it studied.

Can the minister inform the House when he intends to make that report public so that farmers will know whether the lines they utilize will be axed or safeguarded within the basic network?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, indeed I have the final report from the Prairie Rail Action Committee. In the earlier cases, a good number of its decisions came in single report form and we were able to take our own decisions regarding them and announce them fairly quickly. In this particular case the report is very comprehensive, including all of the remaining lines under consideration by the Prairie Rail Action Committee. Also, it includes very extensive documentation on the manner in which the committee proceeded and the theoretical basis upon which it approached each line.

We are analysing it for our own purposes in order to decide what we have to do; in addition, we are in the process of printing the report. It will be made public and the decisions will be announced as soon as the printed report is available.

* * *

AGRICULTURE

AGREEMENT WITH MANITOBA FOR AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Last Friday, the Government of Canada and the government of the province of Manitoba signed an agreement for agricultural development. We have had similar agreements under PFRA, especially in the interlake region. Many of us have attempted to obtain an agreement for southeastern Manitoba to have agricultural development go forward in that area. I understand southeastern Manitoba was included in the agreement. When is the agreement to take effect? What specific proposals are being made in the agreement regarding agricultural development?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the agreement takes effect April 1. That is why the signing took place the other day in Ottawa between myself, the minister in charge of DREE and the minister of agriculture for the province of Manitoba.

The province and the federal government will be spending approximately $9 million for drainage programs, diking, etc. That will include the part of the province of Manitoba to which the hon. member referred. The agreement is over a dozen pages long. It outlines each area for crop research, forage research, livestock testing programs, etc. It is quite a detailed agreement. I would think it is a public document and that it can be made available to the hon. member for study.

* * *

PRIVILEGE

MR. YEWCHUK—COMMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE TO INDIAN DELEGATION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning a matter of great importance and urgency which reflects unfavourably on all members of this House.

On Friday last, representatives of the National Indian Brotherhood and of the maritime Indian chiefs had a meeting with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson), since the minister did not have the time to meet with them. The meeting was cut short by the division bells at 3.30 p.m. and an arrangement was made to reconvene on Tuesday to continue the discussions. As the Indian representatives were leaving the parliamentary secretary's office, words were uttered which the delegation found offensive. The words were as follows:

> Maybe when we meet next Tuesday, you can wear your feathers.

● (1502)

The Indian representatives felt this was a racial slur against them and an insult to all Indian people in this country, and that these words were unbecoming of a member of this House. They have asked me to raise this matter in the House on a question of privilege in order to give the member or perhaps the minister a chance to retract that statement and to apologize to the Indian people as well as to members in this House.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, obviously I cannot prejudge what my parliamentary secretary has said or has not said. Hence I will let him clarify himself this part of the question. However, I can assure the House that the first part of the statement of the hon. member for Athabasca is untrue. I have never refused to meet the Indian chiefs. In fact, I talked to them Thursday afternoon and the hon. member was there. I had twenty minutes with them at the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs where a kind of filibuster was organized.

The Indian chiefs of the Atlantic provinces arrived in Ottawa on Thursday, after sending me a telegram late Monday. It was the first time I ever heard of their visit and I answered right away, indicating that unfortunately on Thursday my schedule was extremely full and that I preferred that our representatives meet first to make a good analysis of the question and, of course, I assured them that I would meet with them personally afterward. I proposed to go to the maritimes myself instead of having them come to Ottawa, at a cost of some $9,000 since it is the most elementary courtesy from a minister to her Canadian constituents. I wanted to make that clear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised by way of a question of privilege a complaint that has come to his attention from a body which, of course, is not a party in the House. I would have very grave doubts about the procedural basis for this matter. I should think it would require some sort of conduct on the part of a member which would in some way bring the whole House of Commons into disrepute. If it is simply a matter of some sensibility on the part of any group, whether or not that sensibility is well founded—and I am not commenting on the sensibility of that group as that is not the point—I have to deal with the matter only on a procedural ground.

Upon reflection it may be, since the hon. member has raised the point, that the member or parliamentary secretary involved may want to examine what has taken place and consider whether any statement, either here in the House or privately to the group involved, may be in order or appropriate. But on procedural grounds it would appear to me that it would be a great extension of a question of privilege as we understand it to bring this matter within the bounds of a question of privilege. I will not make that final determination until there has been an opportunity for a response by the parliamentary secretary.

MR. PARKER—REPLY OF MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to a remark by the Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) during the question period. I do not have the exact quote but I believe he referred to the theft of documents from his office by members opposite, unspecified. I am very new in this chamber, but it seems to me that kind of accusation unfairly impugns the reputation and practices of members on this side of the House. I would ask that the minister either clarify his remark, make a specific charge if he has one in mind, or withdraw the remark entirely.

[Miss Bégin.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Like the hon. member, I will have to examine the record. I did not have the impression that what the minister said at the time was unparliamentary in nature, but again I will look at the record to determine whether it was or not.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

TABLING OF CLASSIFICATION AUDIT REPORT

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table, in both official languages, a report on the classification audit in the national capital area and the non-national capital area.

* * *

[Translation]

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE TO GRANT IMMEDIATE ANNUITY TO JUSTICE MORAND

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-33, to authorize the granting of an immediate annuity to the Honourable Mr. Justice Donald Raymond Morand.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

[English]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 178, 258 and 552.

[Text]

CLASSIFICATION STAMP OR SEAL

Question No. 178—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,853 of the Third Session of the 30th Parliament which states in part: "Clerks, typists, stenographers, secretaries may use any classification stamp or seal provided they have been properly cleared and are acting under the direction of a person authorized to classify information", what are the names of all persons in each department who have authorization to give such directions to staff members regarding classification of documents as "top secret", "secret", "confidential", "most secret", etc.?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 171(a), (b), (c) and (d).

AUDITOR GENERAL—LAWYERS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 258—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Auditor General's Office and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: None.

TAX ON INSULATED STEEL ONE-DOOR SYSTEMS

Question No. 552—Mr. Hare:

1. What is the income from the tax on insulated steel, one-door systems?

2. What would the income be if all storm doors were not exempted from the federal sales tax?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Revenue is not recorded in a manner which permits identification of the sales tax paid on this product.

2. This information is not available.

[English]

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House is aware that there are 31 motions on the order paper at report stage of Bill C-14. I have closely studied all of these motions and should indicate now to the House that I have procedural reservations concerning five of them, specifically motions Nos. 11, 12, 27, 30 and 31. As has been my practice in the past, I will give an indication now, in a preliminary way, of the reasons for my reservations. Then, depending on progress in respect of the bill, I hope I will have an opportunity to give the proponents of those motions the opportunity of trying to persuade me otherwise, following which I will make an adjudication in respect of these motions in a procedural way so the House will be aware as early as possible of the manner of dealing with these, and will be in a position to plan its business for the remainder of its consideration at this stage.

As I have done in the past, I have asked that a copy of my own notes in respect of this decision at this time be distributed to House leaders. My own notes are prepared for me and my use in the chair in English, but where relevant I have asked that a rough copy in French be prepared for those members who may be involved and who may be more at ease in French than in English.

Perhaps I could indicate the motions, and there are several, that ought to be debated and voted on separately. They are motions 1, 2, 14, 16, 21, 22, 23 and 29. Those eight motions in my view ought to be debated and voted on separately. Motions Nos. 3 and 4 will be grouped for debate and voted on separately. An affirmative vote on motion No. 3 would obviate the taking of any vote on No. 4. Motions Nos. 6 and 7 would be grouped for debate and a vote on No. 6 would obviate the necessity of a vote on motion No. 7. Motions Nos. 5, 8, 9 and 10 should be grouped for debate. Motion No. 5, I believe, is in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour). Motions 8, 9 and 10 are in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Motion No. 5 will be voted on separately. With respect to the other three motions, we will vote on motion No. 10 first, as the result of the vote may eliminate the necessity of voting on motions Nos. 8 and 9.

● (1512)

Motions Nos. 13 and 15 will be combined for debate. An affirmative vote on motion No. 13 would obviate the necessity of a vote on motion No. 15. Similarly, motions Nos. 17 and 18 should be debated together, with an affirmative vote on No. 17 obviating the necessity of a vote on No. 18. The same holds true with motions Nos. 19 and 20, motions Nos. 24 and 25 and motions Nos. 26 and 28. Those pairings of motions will be grouped for discussion with a vote on the motion to delete in each case ruling out the necessity of a subsequent vote on the motion to amend.

With respect to motions Nos. 11, 12, 27, 30 and 31 I have reservations on procedural grounds. Motions Nos. 11, 27 and 30 clearly seek to amend the parent act in a way that was not envisaged by the amending bill. In each of these cases the very language of the motions directs us beyond the amending statute into the parent bill and is contrary to the citation in May's nineteenth edition at page 521, paragraph (1)(d).

Motion No. 12 is defective in that it proposes to amend more than one clause. It poses for the House the procedural impossibility of amending two clauses in a bill by one motion. I would direct the House to Standing Order 75(5) which states, in part:

—written notice is given of any motion to amend, delete, insert or restore any clause in a bill—

Hon. members will note that the word "clause" is singular. I would also like to refer hon. members to a statement made by my very distinguished predecessor, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, on June 20, 1969 at page 1218 of the Journals which reads:

It appears each motion at the report stage should actually be directed to a specific clause of a bill rather than a number of clauses. Such motions, I submit, should not relate to two or more clauses.

Motion No. 12 is therefore defective in that it seeks to amend two clauses and clearly flies in the face of that precedent.

Finally, motion No. 31 is out of order on the ground that it does not make a date certain, either by royal assent, proclamation or date fixed, for the act to come into force. The hon. member, it seems to me, has made a very sporting attempt in motion No. 31, by a very imaginative approach, to put a condition precedent in front of the coming into force of the act. I am not saying that that is impossible, but that if it is attempted the effect of it has to be that the act still comes into force on a date which can be fixed. I would think that the hon. member, being a strong proponent of the argument that unemployment rates are not agreed upon in this House, will agree that the formula for finding an agreed upon rate of employment would be quite an achievement in itself. Even if that were to be agreed upon, it still does not lead us to a certain hour on a certain date when the conditions would be fulfilled and upon which the act would come into force. Whatever the effect of a proclamation clause, it must lead to a date which can be fixed with certainty so that all the world knows exactly the moment the law comes into force.

For those reasons, I would say these motions are procedurally unacceptable to the Chair. Each proponent, if he so wishes, may try to persuade me otherwise. I do not expect that they would be prepared to do so at this moment, but since we do not come to one of these troubled motions until we have debated the first ten motions, perhaps they could be debated at that time. I presume we will take the greater part of today on those ten motions. If we do not, however, it would not be inconvenient to the House, upon the calling of this measure tomorrow, if it is the government's intention to so call it, to give the proponents time to put their procedural arguments, whereupon I could rule at that time as to whether or not the matter ought to stand and be considered as part of the discussion on the report stage of this bill, or whether it will be set aside.

If there is no serious objection to my proposal, I suggest that the House move now to the consideration of motion No. 1. The next day that this bill is called, at the beginning of the debate, I would call the hon. members who put these motions to put their arguments. I would try to make a ruling as soon as they have completed their discussion, and let the rest of the debate proceed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on one point relating to your suggestion, I would advise the House that it will be the intention of the government to call this bill tomorrow and on whatever remaining days are required to pass it. I notice the very large number of amendments, and I would indicate to the House that it would be agreeable to the government, in order to give hon. members additional time to debate this important item of legislation, to have additional hours of sitting during this week.

Finally, may I seek clarification as to whether it would be the practice, when the debate, for example, on motion No. 1 is completed, to call the vote at that point, or would we call the votes when a number of motions have been finished?

Mr. Speaker: It is my understanding that we would follow the practice which we have in the past, that is, to enter into the discussion of some of these motions and at a time when we have covered enough of them that a vote might be arranged, or when it is convenient for the House, or, failing that, when I thought that a number of votes might be called, we would deal with them.

I understand that one of the motions which I have ruled aside on procedural grounds stands in the name of the government, motion No. 11. In respect to that motion, there may be a desire to deal with it in some way, even if ultimately after argument it is found to be a new amendment to the bill. I understand there may be a disposition to deal with it and let it continue on some consent. Since we now have the assurance that the bill will be called tomorrow, I think we ought to deal with it in a final way at that time.

● (1522)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to support the suggestion you have made that we might defer the first four, five or six votes until we reach a convenient time. In other words, there is no point in taking a vote immediately after motion No. 1. I also would indicate our approval of the proposal that the procedural debates might take place tomorrow. Only one of the five concerns us in this party, but it would seem logical to have all the arguments at the same time.

As to extended hours, perhaps we should wait to see what happens.

[Translation]

Mr. Lavoie: Mr. Speaker, I would like some information, as I am not used to the procedure regarding the introduction of amendments to legislation I would like to propose an amendment to Bill C-14 and I would appreciate if the Chair could tell me when I can do so.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie) proposed motion No. 27. I indicated that there was some problem regarding this motion and I said that, if possible and if it is agreed, I would prefer to hear tomorrow the arguments of each member who has proposed a motion. There are five such members, including the member for Hochelaga, who has proposed motion No. 27. I have the impression that the hon. member for Hochelaga is now asking for a ruling regarding the motion that he intends to propose during debate. Is he referring only to motion No. 27?

Mr. Lavoie: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the number you mention corresponds to the order in which the motions are to be discussed. The motion that I proposed and that I gave to the clerk concerns clause 14 of Bill C-14. Obviously, it relates strictly to that. If it is not possible to discuss these amendments today, and if it is possible tomorrow or the day after, I will simply discuss them at that time, Mr. Speaker. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. Speaker: It must be clarified that there are two points to be considered in motion No. 27 from the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie). I indicated that we would discuss the procedural matter tomorrow at three o'clock. Then, after that, we will start the discussion on the substance after other discussions.

[English]

I would therefore propose at this stage to proceed with the discussion on motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) (for Mr. Leggatt) moved:

That Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be amended by deleting clause 1.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have proposed this amendment to delete clause 1. From the moment the minister announced on September 1, 1978, that he intended to tighten up the Unemployment Insurance Act and sketchily outlined the areas in which he was going to move, this party went on record as saying the minister was distracting attention away from the real issue that is evident in this country, and that unemployment insurance was not unemployment insurance but employment insurance. That is the issue.

I recall turning on the television set on September 1 to watch the national news. There was the minister in full living colour telling how he was going to tighten up the Unemployment Insurance Act. Then came the Conservative party spokesperson, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), on the television set telling us that this bill moves in the right direction but does not go far enough. He talked about moving to the right with the Unemployment Insurance Act and put the Conservatives on record in what they want to do, that is, move beyond what the minister announced on September 1.

When we examined the bill that the minister brought down, and particularly that section of the act it proposed to amend, we concluded that this was a vicious and discriminatory bill. We pointed out the clauses which we feel are discriminatory and those which are vicious. We consistently tried to pin the minister down on the rationale behind the bill. He told us it was the government's perspective that the public thinks people are ripping off unemployment insurance. The minister was looking for a scapegoat in order to regain popular public support for the government and hit on the people who are collecting unemployment insurance as the people who are ripping off the system.

To set the stage, the minister placed $150,000 worth of advertisements across the country which say, in effect, that such and such a person who is collecting unemployment insurance has his hand in the taxpayers' pockets. He created an atmosphere in which those people who are working feel that those who are collecting unemployment insurance are indeed sticking their hands in the workers' pockets.

The minister then conducted a survey to find out if the advertisements were effective, and as you might expect the results showed the public perception to be that those who were collecting unemployment insurance were doing so illegally and were rip-off artists.

This party has never avoided saying that the unemployment insurance program suffers from a percentage of rip-off. It is no greater than the percentage of doctors who rip off the medical insurance program, however, and no greater than the percentage of lawyers who rip off legal aid schemes. It is simply comparable to any other social program in our society.

The minister brought in Bill C-14 on the basis of perceptions gleaned from a survey probably taken in areas where the advertisements had been placed in some density. Apart from the Conservatives, who supports the minister in these conclusions? Mr. Speaker, you will shortly see one of the greatest performances ever seen without a stage. You will see the Conservative party in the House swallow itself.

• (1532)

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is smiling at me. I hope he will continue to smile as they rise to his eyeballs.

Who supports the minister in this attack on the unemployed other than the Conservative party? No one else but the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. They came before the committee which was studying this bill. By the way, only nine witnesses were heard on this bill. The manufacturers appeared before the committee to support the moves the minister was making in the bill. They urged the minister to go even further on some amendments. Who appeared for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association to give witness that night but the vice-president of the International Nickel Company, Frank Burnett. How Inco fits into the CMA is completely beyond me. Moreover, I do not know what Inco has done lately to create employment in this country. It seems to me they have helped to put people on the very unemployment insurance program which they came before the Commons committee to tell members of parliament to tighten up.

What was their argument for supporting the bill? I want to quote from the brief they presented in which they said:

Because of the extent of unemployment among young people and women, we suspect that over 50 per cent of claimants come from households and families where there is more than one wage earner.

They are saying that overwhelmingly people on unemployment insurance do not need it because they can pool the family income. Where are the figures to support that argument? They were tall on statements but very short on programs.

Who else supported the minister on this bill? The Canadian Construction Association came before the committee. What did they have to say? Their contribution was some of the most unadulterated garbage that has ever been presented to a Commons committee. When we take a look at the friends in the minister's corner, we should all tremble with fear in this country. They said:

What is probably the most serious problem of all—

They are talking about the unemployment insurance program.

—is the impact on moral and social values. This is particularly evident among young people. The ease with which they are able to achieve a satisfactory way of living supported by long-term unemployment insurance is becoming increasingly popular and widespread amongst large numbers of young people. It is difficult to measure the price that our country will pay for this deterioration of values. Our society cannot stand further deterioration of moral standards.

There is not one shred of evidence to support this garbage. This is the kind of support the minister has in his corner. Perhaps that is why he was led the other night, in an unguarded moment in the committee last week, to accuse the young people, in Cape Breton specifically, of sitting with their thumbs in their mouths, of being thumbsuckers. He said:

I just cannot understand the thinking of the New Democratic Party . . . that we are forcing young people to move around this country.

Now, is that not just too bloody bad! That is the best thing that could ever happen to this country! I hope to hell they move all over the country!

We heard that suggestion before, that young people not only move around this country but that they move beyond the borders of Canada to look for work. The fact is that there are no jobs for young people to move to. It was thought that they could move to Alberta, that Alberta is now the Valhalla of employment opportunities. But that situation has changed. It is not so now. Even the minister's own department of manpower is refusing, for example, in Thompson, Manitoba, to relocate people from the Sudbury basin, even though Inco had hired people to go there from Sudbury. But lo and behold, the manpower office in Thompson will not relocate them. As a matter of fact, I have just drafted a letter to the minister with respect to that matter.

Who else is in the minister's corner, apart from the Conservative party in this House, the CMA, and the CCA, who said the following in their brief:

As the result of the Public Attitude Survey—September 1975—

Now we are legislating by public attitude.

—sixty per cent of Canadians felt that the eight weeks minimum entrance requirement is too short and that an entrance requirement of about six months would be more appropriate.

That is from the "Highlights of the Comprehensive Review" of the minister's own department, what was called the public attitude survey. So why not six years, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) suggests, or why not eternity? Or why not until the unemployment rate drops to 4 per cent? That would be even further into the future than eternity, if it is conceivable at all.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Who else is in the minister's corner? None other than the Canadian Federation of Small Business who sent me a telegram saying that they carried out a survey among their members and found that 95 per cent of them supported Bill C-14.

We see lined up on the side of the minister the Conservative party, who is supposed to be the official opposition in the House, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Construction Association and the Canadian Federation of Small Business. Who else do we see there? We see the Canadian Chamber of Commerce right smack in the minister's corner.

Who is on the opposite side? Who is saying to the minister that unemployment insurance is not the problem? None other than the Economic Council of Canada. In their 1976 report under the section headed, "People and Jobs", they said the following, and I want to quote it because it seems to me that it puts the whole matter into context. They have garnered the facts and analysed them and come to what I think would be some legitimate conclusions. They said:

We have looked closely at the provisions of the unemployment insurance system, as revised in 1971. We believe the system is comprehensive and generous by any standards and, as a second line of defence against financial hardship and income security, it has gone a long way towards eliminating poverty in this country . . . It—

The unemployment insurance program.

—has the effect, it may be argued, of transferring to persons most prone to involuntary unemployment, many of whom have less than average education, some of the income security that others now enjoy as a result of past public transfers of wealth implicit in the education and training systems.

It concludes as follows:

—It would, of course, be possible to try to eliminate abuses by cutting certain categories of claimants or the duration of benefits, or by extending the period of work before claimants become eligible for benefits. But such recommendations could prove harmful to persons most exposed to periodic and genuinely involuntary unemployment . . . For this reason we believe that much of the problem of abuse of unemployment insurance could be solved by two methods—by tightening administrative methods to get persons back to work, and by creating jobs to absorb them.

That has been the cry of those who have lined up against the minister and this vicious and discriminatory Bill C-14.

Who else is lined up against the minister on this bill? The following telegram was received by members of the committee:

● (1542)

The poverty task force of the United Church of Canada is opposed to any reduction in unemployment insurance benefits. The reductions of 1976 have already gone too far. We are also opposed to increases in entrance requirements. Fourteen weeks of work in the current qualifying period is more than enough. We don't believe that the rationale for discontinuing coverage to people who work under 20 hours per week as described in information paper 1 released by Employment and Immigration Canada makes a case. It's hard to comprehend these proposed amendments at a time when the unemployed number over a million.

Rev. Robert Lindsey, Associate Secretary, Division of Mission in Canada, United Church of Canada.

When that was brought to the minister's attention in committee, he made the facetious remark that he would speak to his pastor or to the United Church because that is where he goes. He said he would have a chat with them. That is the way this government handles opposition; it has a chat.

Something that irks me about Bill C-14 is not so much what is in the bill but the way in which the government has handled it. Have you ever seen this government bring in legislation with regard to the corporations in this country? I was on the finance committee when Bill C-16, the Borrowers and Depositors Protection Act, was brought before it. I have seen amendments and changes to the Bank Act. This government would not bring in any changes which affect the way corporations do business in this country without first consulting them for their opinions and ideas.

When Bill C-14 was before the committee, there were witnesses who had some knowledge of unemployment insurance. In fact, they deal with the Unemployment Insurance Act almost every day of their lives. When asked, they told us that they had not been consulted about these changes.

The CLC was never consulted and neither was the CSN of Quebec. The National Union of Students and its counterpart in Quebec were not consulted on the contents of this bill. The government's own Advisory Council on the Status of Women was not consulted. The government should have advised that group what they were contemplating and asked for their opinion. However, they were not consulted at all.

The height of pomposity was the minister saying it was not up to them to consult but that the government should be consulted. It is not up to these organizations to consult the government. The government would never act in that way with regard to the corporate sector of this country.

We asked whether the government had consulted with the trade union movement because the bill specifically affected the subplans and the wage loss plans the unions had negotiated with employers. The deputy minister said they did not consult them. When we asked if the government was going to consult them, he said they would if they were asked. I have never seen such autocracy. I have never seen such—what is the word I am looking for?

An hon. Member: Liberals.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. They have acted like Liberals with regard to this bill. They do not consult with anybody; the people must consult with them. Not even the dictators of Latin America act that way. I know the minister will get up and plead innocent to a lot of what I have said.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand we are dealing with motion No. 1 which reads:

That Bill C-14, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be amended by deleting clause 1.

The hon. member's diatribe, most of it not based on fact, may be appropriate for second reading or third reading. However, when dealing with a specific motion that the clause be deleted, the hon. member's comments do not have any relevance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. minister's point of order is well taken. I ask the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) to stick to the motion under consideration.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I thought I was speaking to the bill. Clause 1 of the bill reads:

(1) Paragraph 2(1)(r) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(r) "Minister" means the Minister of Employment and Immigration except in parts IV and VIII;"

As this is the minister of employment, I am right on the clause I am talking about. We have looked at this bill. It is important to get the thrust of what the government is trying to do on clause 1. We want to have it deleted. If it is deleted, the rest of the bill will become meaningless.

As I was saying, there was no consultation on clause 1 or any other clause. The minister cannot get up in this House later and say there was consultation because he admitted in committee there was none. There was no consultation with the provinces. In fact, the provinces have worked out what their costs will be under their welfare programs if Bill C-14 is carried.

A great debate began between the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) and the provincial welfare ministers with regard to whose figures were right. What they did was typical. They set up a federal-provincial committee to study whose figures were right. Emanating from the provincial welfare ministers, and touted by the Tories, the lackeys in the House of Commons, was a two-tier system.

There was no consultation with the provincial ministers and no consultation with the trade union movement on clause 1 or any other clause. In fact, the Steelworkers of America pointed out they had several hundred contracts which were tied to the maximum unemployment insurance benefit. Lo and behold, in one fell swoop this minister says that collective agreements do not count. The government can cut right through to the heart of it, cutting right through collective agreements.

We found out that could mean up to $17 a week in 1979-1980 under a collective agreement agreed to by workers and their employers. When they have a strike, the government will turn around and say that is what happens when you take off wage controls. The government is inciting workers into a situation where they will be developing bad relations between the employers and employees. What did the minister and deputy minister say in committee about that issue? They said that when the contract comes up for renegotiation, they can renegotiate a new figure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member get back to the terms of the debate and speak to motion No. 1.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There was no consultation whatsoever on clause 1. Having given the background to the bill and what transpired in committee, I would like to make clear the lines that have been drawn in this debate. It is the government and the official opposition that are pushing this bill. This party, the party of right, justice, goodness and light, is opposing Bill C-14. I should get a little applause for that!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Clause 1 has a connection to clause 14, which talks about taxing back unemployment insurance benefits. In effect, it dandies up the language which allows clause 14 to take effect. What is the government arguing with respect to taxing back? They are saying, in effect: People who are wealthy should be prepared to pay back benefits via the income tax provisions; they should be prepared to pay back the benefits or part of the benefits they have received under unemployment insurance. So they have introduced this formula of 1.5 times the average annual insured earnings. That is what is proposed and it works out to around $18,700 for next year. That is what they are calling an excessive amount of earnings; if you are getting that much or go above it, you will have to pay back a percentage of benefits.

● (1552)

It just so happens, Mr. Speaker, that the metro Toronto social planning council came out the other day with the latest figures showing that there is a $1,150 jump in costs affecting a family of five. Such a family would have to earn a taxable income of $14,450, or $12,170 after tax. The poverty level in metropolitan Toronto therefore, for a family of five, is now $12,170 after tax. But the government wants to tax it back as soon as income reaches $18,000 or over.

We in this party have said this is a phony approach. When the provinces proposed a two-tier system and the provincial Tory premiers got their lackeys in the House of Commons to push it forward, we heard the minister say that it took away the insurance principles from the program. What does he think clause 1 does, Mr. Speaker, if it does not take away the insurance principle? Those people at the top of the earning scale, paying the same premiums for the coverage, are going to find their benefits have been taxed back. That is not an insurance scheme, Mr. Speaker; that is breaking with the insurance principle which the minister has touted time and again during debate in committee on this bill.

That was the argument he used against the Conservative party when they proposed a two-tier system. We say this is really a prop; if you want to go about with this sort of game, taxing people who are making a lot of money in this country, why not revise the Income Tax Act? I have been around here participating in debate, sometimes at great length, on the income tax program. But what has been done? It seems to me the principle the government is following is to take from those who earn a lot from this country. They ought to get into the whole question of revising the progressive income tax system so that as people earn more they are expected to pay more income tax. That is why we argued so vigorously against the loopholes, the RHOSP, the RRSP and the various other ways the government allows those who are wealthy in this country to escape paying their fair share of taxes. It seems to me a worth-while project for the government to embark upon would be to set up a just tax program so that those who earn most from the economy are taxed accordingly.

It seems to me this clause is the thin edge of the wedge. The next step will be consideration of family income. If a family's income is over, say, $22,000, the government will want to tax back. This is the new game which is being played by the government. That was the thin edge of the two-tier proposal made by the Conservatives—to take family income into consideration.

We have heard some very persuasive argument by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) against the whole concept of using family income to determine what persons will get under any kind of social program introduced. That is what the minister is proposing to do though. That is where they are headed with this proposal, it seems. I can just imagine the bureaucratic red tape which would be involved. Already the unemployment insurance program is a very tough one with respect to administrative detail. Large numbers of those receiving unemployment insurance do not have the educational background to understand what is involved. That is why members of parliament often become advocates for constituents on unemployment insurance. We have tried to bring this point home in the past when we dealt with Bill C-69 and Bill C-27, which was an erosion of the 1971 Mackasey agreement. God bless his soul; he is now up there with the chairmen—

An hon. Member: He won his war with poverty!

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes. After bringing in the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 he has gone on to his just reward—to be chairman of the board.

Mr. Benjamin: He is flying up there in the clouds, now.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, we brought the point home to the minister and his officials that the act is very complicated and bureaucratic. What the amendment before us will do is to superimpose on an already very complicated act an involvement by the income tax department. People who dispute what has been deducted will have to appeal under the Income Tax Act. So there will be two appeal authorities to be dealt with, the Income Tax Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act, and, as I said before, this will affect people who have very basic concepts about the way in which the unemployment insurance program works. In that shuffle I am sure many people will be hurt.

How much is the minister proposing to get out of this tax back clause? In all of Canada, $9 million. What about the hundreds of thousands of people who have paid premiums to get coverage? If they go on benefit their premiums are not reduced. If the minister wanted to extend this principle of insurability he ought to have established a ratio between the amounts paid by people who are taxed back and the premiums they should pay, but he has eschewed such a principle. It is unfair. I will tell you what it is, Mr. Speaker: it is grand larceny. Because people have no choice but to contribute to the program. It has, in effect, become a tax. That is what it is, and I wish the minister would cut out all this flim-flammery. If he is going to tax the people and take back so much from them through income tax, why does he not come right out and say it? Why is he playing all these "here we go around the mulberry bush" games? In the harshest language I can think of, the minister is perpetrating grand larceny.

• (1602)

This government should be taken on the carpet for this. It is saying to people that they must come in, they must belong and they cannot escape. Unemployment insurance premiums are compulsory. They are deducted at source. That is not a matter of choice. People pay premiums thinking they will receive maximum benefits related to the amount of money they pay per $100 of insured earnings. Lo and behold, when the time comes to collect, there is the minister with his hat trying to collect $9 million. He is stealing $9 million from Canadians, and I wish he would come clean and tell the Canadian people that that is exactly what he is doing.

We have said in a very serious way that the overrun in the unemployment insurance program does not exist on the employer and employee account. What employers and employees pay carries the program for what it was designed to do. The overrun on the program is carried on the government account. Last year that overrun was $1.8 billion. That was the accumulated deficit on the government account, and that is where the minister is having difficulty. That money comes from the coffers of the country directly. It is costing the government. The minister wants to indulge in some fiscal legerdemain and slip this over to the employer and employee side of the ledger sheet so that he will look good in the eyes of the public. Here is a tough minister. Look how tough he is. He has really cracked down on the unemployment insurance program.

An hon. Member: He is not tough; he is nasty.

Mr. Rodriguez: The minister does not talk tough, he talks nasty, and in light of some of the quotes I read into the record, his mouth should be washed with soap. Back in the old country where I come from my mother would wash my mouth with soap if I used the language this minister of the Crown used. It was a totally shameful display. He used such words as "bloody" and "hell". I think that is disgraceful. He may think that is flamboyant language, but the people of Nickel Belt do not think that at all.

Mr. Symes: Those genteel miners.

Mr. Rodriguez: We think the minister is blustering. If he is trying to speak to the people of Nickel Belt, he should speak more clearly. His language is certainly not becoming.

In conclusion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I see that Liberal backbenchers now have the claps.

I think we have put forward an admirable proposal. We have said that clause 1 should be deleted. Hopefully that would result in the deletion of clause 4. As a matter of fact, we are hoping that we can extrapolate the plausibility of our proposal to the whole bloody bill.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Dawson: Soap!

Mr. Rodriguez: Oh, pardon me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member watch his language in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I listened to your reprimand and I know that, being an old railroader, you will certainly understand that my language was most intemperate.

We are suggesting that clause 1 should be deleted. In all the hearings of the committee the minister accepted none of the propositions put forward by the opposition—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, today is just like last week in the committee. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has again used all his time. There were about 34 committee meetings over the last few weeks, during which time I was afraid that I might end up being brainwashed by the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: No problem with that.

Mr. Clarke: It took a great deal of adherence to my principles to avoid having some of his garbage rub off. The hon. member for Nickel Belt spoke about garbage coming from members from other corners of the House in the committee, but there was a full share of unmitigated garbage coming from the dreamers on my left, who seem to think that this country does not need any taxpayers. They seem to think that all we need is unemployment insurance beneficiaries.

If there were any provisions in this bill which might have the effect of cutting anyone's benefits, we would be sure to hear from the hon. member for Nickel Belt or one of his rotating army of colleagues who came into the committee to keep us amused. It was interesting that when the time came for the committee's procedures finally to wind down, the hon. member for Nickel Belt sat there by himself and exercised his vote. His rotating army had taken off for greener fields or dreamier pastures. I do not know where they went.

An hon. Member: We are entitled to only one vote.

Mr. Clarke: They may be entitled to only one vote, but in that committee we saw how NDP tactics for delaying things work. Some of us who were there had somewhat higher motives than those of the NDP.

An hon. Member: Get a halo.

Mr. Clarke: If there is any question about the motives of the NDP, I think we need only refer back to November 10 when this bill was referred to the committee. We heard no objections from the NDP. As a matter of fact, I do not think any member of the NDP was here that day.

An hon. Member: What about the Tories?

Mr. Clarke: The Tories were here that day. They were anxious to get this bill into committee so that it could be given the detailed examination which only a committee could give to it. I think 34 committee meetings should be adequate to allow that kind of study. I think it is obvious that the NDP wants to continue its delaying tactics. One tactic is to move to delete clause 1, which sounds innocent enough, but it would subvert the whole bill.

I want to state why it is the intention of my party not to support motion No. 1. It is the stated intention of my party, and has been for some time, to support restraint on the part of the government. Speaking for my party in the second reading debate, I said that this bill was a step in the right direction, but we do not like the minister's proposals, and I think that probably became obvious when we opposed the bill in committee. However, we have hopes, and the amendments proposed by members of my party should indicate that we hope that the government will see the light before this debate ends. It is our intention to re-submit our amendments at this stage.

I want to say a word about why we oppose this motion and about what complaints we have regarding the government's methods. We will be debating our proposals fully as we proceed with this debate, but it is obvious to us that the minister made proposals which would not strike at the problem which we and the public perceive to be present in the unemployment insurance system. The minister's proposals are more inequitable than we would like them to be.

As a national party my party was able to accept proposals made by three provincial ministers on behalf of all the provinces and territories. It is worth noting that included therein were the agreements of the New Democratic Party province and of the Liberal party province. I do not think there is anything unusual in the national Progressive Conservative party seeking to agree with six provincial Progressive Conservative governments. It demonstrates that we as a party can work on a national basis to put forth ideas for which there was agreement. The proposals put forward by the provinces were a fairer method of solving the problem of unemployment insurance inequities.

● (1612)

The scope of the bill does not allow for many of the inequities. As I have said many times, it is unfair that many Canadians who are not entitled to benefits under the unemployment insurance system must nevertheless contribute to what I call the deficit and to what the minister calls a commitment. One can call it what one wants, but it costs taxpayers approximately $2 billion every year. Hard working, self-employed Canadians and those retired on pension are not entitled to benefits under the scheme, yet they are required to pay into the deficit. We do not think that is fair.

Members of the New Democratic Party talk about their labour friends and how angry they are about the cutbacks. There are working people in my riding, as well as a lot of people concerned with labour. The view of labour organizations does not surprise me—that some of their members will lose benefits. The majority of working Canadians realize that they pay not only through payroll deduction but also toward the $2 billion deficit. They do not like that fact, and they do not think it is fair. The abuses are well known to workers. In fact, they are probably better known to the workers of the country than to many of us in the House. The proposals of the government will not be effective in getting at the people who need to be curbed in order to make this scheme an insurance one.

The government's proposals will load an unfair burden on to many of the less affluent provinces. This was pointed out by the provinces. It was not done deliberately by the government, but through ineptness. It put proposals forward without studying how the costs would filter back into the provinces. The government was not receptive when this was pointed out. We consider this to be bad, and it led to our amendments. Perhaps we borrowed our proposals from the provinces, but they will save more money than the proposals of the government aimed toward restraint. Our proposals are less complex and adhere more closely to insurance principles. When the House considers our motion, we will deal with the proposals.

I sympathize with members of the Liberal party. Perhaps they have been required to put their scheme into effect more quickly than they would like. For approximately two or three years, my leader called for a major overhaul of the unemployment insurance system. The government commissioned a report entitled "A Comprehensive Review" in 1976. In February, 1977 the government released a report on that comprehensive review. One would think that the government had enough time to get matters into shape; but the government cannot even put the pregnancy amendment into effect because it does not fit into the rules concerning the presentation of motions.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came back from Bonn this summer, he saw the light. He announced to Canadians that restraint was necessary and that further announcements would be made. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) had the finger pointed at him. He was told to get his amendments going and on the table. Dutifully, the minister made an announcement on September 1. He announced his program to the world at large. Approximately two months later, the minister introduced his bill into the House, and for reasons he will not tell us the proposals were not quite the same as he had indicated on September 1.

I feel sorry for members opposite. They have had adequate time to establish a perfect set of rules for the game. But when they are finally forced into action, they cannot stick to their guns for more than a month or two at a time. Now the combined opposition will be blamed for delaying this matter. It is similar to the Grinch who stole Christmas. We will be blamed for sitting here instead of being on Christmas holiday.

I should like to remind the House that the bill was introduced on November 2. Debate on second reading commenced on November 9 at eight o'clock in the evening. At that time there were less than two hours of debate on this important bill in the House. I do not think 34 committee meetings was an unusual amount of study. Many more witnesses could have appeared before the committee in order to tell their problems, but I think we received adequate input from them.

We cannot expect to scrap all of the work which has been done to this point. Restraint and reform are sorely needed. We will see what happens to the amendments we put forth. Then we will make up our minds on the bill itself. For us to support motion No. 1 and thereby scrap all the work which has occurred to this point would be contrary to our policies. Therefore, we will not support the motion before the House.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, one has to calm down somewhat after hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). He has a way with words. I was pleased Your Honour chastised him and indicated that he should clean up his language. The hon. member misinterpreted almost everything I have said. He made reference to rip-offs. I have not used those particular words at any time in any of my speeches. Also he suggested that people thought there was a lot of illegality. That is not what the report called for, and the hon. member should know that.

Turning to the motion itself, clause 1 simply is consequential to clause 14. It provides that the Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) will be responsible to administer the benefit repayment provisions of the bill. We do not require a long-winded or bombastic debate by the hon. member for Nickel Belt on that particular subject.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) talked about the pregnancy benefits and suggested that we cannot get the particular motion through. As I said to the hon. member at committee, I knew it was not a proper amendment. I indicated that it could not be passed at committee stage, but that I was prepared to bring it forward at report stage on the understanding that clearly the motion was out of order unless it received unanimous consent of the House. As Mr. Speaker said earlier today, for those very reasons we will get into debate tomorrow. But I concede the motion is out of order in so far as the rules are concerned.

● (1622)

I did give an undertaking to members opposite and to the women who will benefit from this particular clause that I would bring the motion forward. If we get unanimous consent of the House it will in fact be carried. If we do not get unanimous consent it will not be carried and certain benefits will be lost by these women. I think it is a little unfair to suggest that we could not even bring forward an amendment that was in order. The hon. member knows I gave that commitment at the committee stage.

I am a little disappointed in the position taken by the NDP. I think there can be legitimate differences of opinion. We have those with members of the official opposition and we certainly have them with members of the NDP. We could have had a good debate, and we could have had solid input rather than the bombast and histrionics we have witnessed from the hon. member for Nickel Belt. There are obviously some areas of this bill that could be improved upon. I would hope that we continue looking at the bill to see how we can make it better and more effective.

However, hon. members of the New Democratic Party have totally destroyed that opportunity by bringing in something like 25 amendments that are all over the park. They really are not interested in a serious debate on this particular bill. Because of that, it is somewhat difficult to respond to the hon. member, particularly when, in respect of an innocuous amendment to a clause in the bill simply indicating that the Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business) is responsible for administering this particular part, we get a 40-minute diatribe by the hon. member for Nickel Belt. That, in my opinion, is really not honest debate. I suggest we get on with the vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the fact that clause 1 is the subject of the amendment that has been proposed encourages me to take issue with what the minister has just said. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) made a similar remark, in respect of the suggestion that, because we were so active in committee and had more than one person in attendance at the 34 or 35 meetings of that committee, this indicated somehow unparliamentary behaviour on our part. It was suggested that the fact that we debated the measure all the way through in terms of its content also put us in this position. I suggest to the minister that, if he looks at the transcript of the remarks made in that committee by various members of our party, he will find very serious criticism of the philosophy that is behind and underlies this bill. Certainly I put forward that criticism, as did the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). We were all there speaking on behalf not only of our constituents, but also on behalf of the many other groups who have come to us asking for help.

Many groups were not able to attend the hearings. The committee did not hear from the largest industrial union in the country in respect of this bill. It did not hear representation in respect of the programs that are going to have an effect on supplementary unemployment benefit packages which are part of collective agreements right across the country. I think the hon. member for Nickel Belt put it very well when he suggested that, if this were a financial bill, there would not have been an employer, an employers' group or an industry that would not have preoccupied members opposite. Simply because it is trade unions and the working people involved the government thinks it can lump them all into one group and say: "We have heard from the auto workers so we know what labour is going to say anyway, and we do not have to hear from anybody else". That is the kind of sympathy and understanding that organized labour gets from this government, and that is the kind of sympathy and understanding this government gives to the ordinary working men and women.

An hon. Member: And the Tories.

Mr. Rae: There is no point in even dealing with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, because the Tories really missed the boat in terms of what we have been saying about this bill. I think that hon. member said there were inequitable aspects of the bill that went too far even for the Conservative party, or words to that effect. The only thought that occurred to me, as it did to my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), was: What are the inequities that those people find acceptable? I would like to know what they are so we can put them forward.

I think it is a good time to look back at the debate of 1971, and this speaks directly to the motion and to clause 1, because the minister's authority and responsibility for administration of the act is really what is in question here. I would like to read into the record some words spoken by the then minister of labour, Mr. Mackasey; may he fly in peace, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Mackasey has gone on to his own reward. I think it was Lord Palmerston who once referred to the British civil service as the indoor relief department of the aristocracy. I think the Canadian civil service has become the indoor and outdoor relief department of the Liberal party. They have their own unemployment benefit scheme for superannuated politicians on that side. I do not suppose they could really be heard to blame other Canadians if they expect equal benefits from their government.

I want to just read into the record exactly what Mr. Mackasey said when the benefit increase went up. In 1971 there was a maximum of $53. The government of the day brought in amendments that put it up to 66⅔ per cent and 75 per cent for people with dependants. Let me read into the record something Mr. Mackasey said as it appears at page 5039 of Hansard of April 19, 1971:

> —the increase in benefits will postpone the day when people chronically unemployed must turn to welfare if they have no other sources of income. It can be said that the benefit structure has been developed by people who care about people. The argument that this will breed laziness, that it is catering to lazy people, is an argument that should not be raised in this chamber. But, Mr. Speaker, it is an argument that we hear too frequently. It is said that people are inherently lazy. That has not been my experience.

Later in the same paragraph he said:

> —I do believe that the overwhelming majority of Canadians in the work force would prefer a job rather than unemployment insurance or welfare, if they have that choice.

Mr. Mackasey then goes on to say—and for the benefit of those who want to look at this I would repeat that it is in Hansard for April 19, 1971, and I would suggest to hon. members opposite that they listen to this because they might learn something:

> There have been the usual criticisms, Mr. Speaker, that unemployment insurance is welfare in disguise. It never has been that and it was never meant to be. We have attempted to close up the unintentional loopholes that previously permitted welfare connotations to creep into the plan. One of the weaknesses of the present structure is this: it has been difficult for people legitimately in the work force for the first time to become identified as legitimate members of the work force. After you leave university or high school or teacher's college and enter the work force for the first time, you must be part of the work force for two years and accumulate by a tortuous formula 30 contributions—hon. members know all the rest of it—as well as so many contributions in the last year before you are eligible for any type of assistance. We propose to reduce that period. We shall consider someone as attached to the work force if that person has as few as eight weeks of contributions. I say that because we are interested in the future of that worker and not in his past history. I think this will be of tremendous advantage to the Canadian worker. This is his fund.

Those are the words of the minister of labour who at that time was responsible for the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act. He is the one who brought in the amendments in 1971. I think it is worth pausing a moment to reflect on those words, that this is the worker's fund, or the fund of the working person; it is his and her protection against unemployment.

We can see that the government's approach in this matter has been crystal clear from remarks made by the deputy minister in answer to questions, and from remarks by the minister in answer to questions. It is perfectly clear that this is no longer the workers' fund, but that this is the employers' fund. This fund is now regarded as the fund of the organized employer in Canada.

Keeping the record in mind, tell me at what point the Canadian Manufacturers' Association gave a damn about income maintenance. I am sorry for using that word, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is necessary in these circumstances. When did the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen worry itself sick about the fact that working men and women are not able to pay their mortgage payments or deal with the difficulties of economic life because of unemployment?

There was a revolution of ideas, Mr. Speaker, in the 1930s. That revolution and idea brought home to people that unemployment is not a voluntary thing. To use the words of the great social scientists of the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, "unemployment is a social disease, a disease of industry and the economy". It has many different causes and many different facets to it as an economic phenomenon, but it is not a voluntary act. We must never forget—as the government has, and of which the Tory party has had no knowledge at any time—that unemployment is something which happens to working men and women. When people are suddenly put on unemployment, it has a devastating effect on the individual, their well-being, their ability to deal with life, not to mention the family.

● (1632)

Let me quote from a speech made on April 20, 1971, when the new act was passed. It was made by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), who is still the hon. member for London East. It reads:

I must emphasize that the lower qualifying requirements have been proposed only after a considerable amount of research and study centred around the motivation of the individual, the needs of a worker when faced with a loss of earnings, and the ever-changing composition of our society, which brings with it a reshaping of the labour force and its attendant dislocation of individuals. The results of these studies have shown us that no rigid guidelines are available from which we could formulate a hard and fast rule for qualifying, but there are indications that current conditions require a re-orientation of our thinking in terms of providing protection and assistance to members of the labour force. Therefore, we must look to our objectives in deciding on a level of minimum attachment.

That speech went on to refer to what it was like to be unemployed and what the Canadian worker was up against when he faced unemployment. Today that spirit seems to be dead on that side of the House. Their Christmas present this year for the unemployed worker is a reduction in his or her benefits of 10 per cent, at a time when welfare payments, old age pensions and workmen's compensation benefits are increasing to keep pace with the rise in the cost of living. In this case the government has taken one critical weapon in the fight against poverty and the maintenance of income for the families of these working men and women and has singled it out for special attention.

It is unbelievable that welfare payments are going up while unemployment insurance benefits are going down. Families can now get more from welfare programs than from the unemployment insurance program. It is a guaranteed incentive for those people to stay at home and not join the work force. Perhaps that is what the government wants, to see women and youth, who are often part-time employees and unable to achieve the sufficient number of hours to qualify for unemployment, leave the unemployment insurance system and go to the welfare system. That is their philosophy.

Mr. Boulanger: It is the demagogy of the NDP.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member has said it is demagogy. I do not think that is fair. The hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) has said that I am a demagogue. That is a very unfair charge because, like an archaeologist, we go with the evidence which is before us and the footprints are there. They are the footprints of dinosaurs. The government is not walking in Bryce Mackasey's footprints; it is walking in the footprints of dinosaurs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest to hon. members that we get back to the motion under discussion.

Mr. Rae: If I have wandered from the path, Mr. Speaker, it is because of some hon. members opposite. If one looks at the philosophy which underlies this clause and the other clauses, it is completely incoherent but at the same time it is a reactionary attack on unemployed people at a time when the world recognizes that unemployment is not the problem of the individual worker but of society.

The government has not decided whether the program is an insurance scheme; therefore they have raised the question of overpayment of benefits. Part of the underlying philosophy of this bill seems to be that the government would like to go back to an insurance scheme to help tighten things up. However, they also say that they will collect back benefits paid to people earning more than $18,000, which turns it into a welfare scheme, a needs-related scheme. If it is a needs-related scheme, it does not relate to the needs of Canadians. Their needs cost much more than the maximum of $240 which the government proposes.

The metropolitan social planning council of Toronto in its report two weeks ago said that a family of four in that city requires $14,000 to live above the poverty line. This bill does not provide for that fact. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has brought in a scheme which provides tax credits to families making less than $18,000. This is a small step in the right direction, but the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is taking that away with the stroke of a pen.

This government cannot make up its mind where it stands with regard to income security and income maintenance. It says that we are filibustering this bill and taking our time, and that is quite correct. We are doing everything we can to explain to the people of Canada that this measure combines an incoherence of thought and purpose with a reactionary philosophy that needs to be exposed. We all have our different styles in exposing it. If the hon. member for Nickel Belt can use colourful language, then more power to him.

What our purpose in committee was, and what our purpose is this week, is not to talk for the sake of talking, but to attempt to get across to Canadians, who may be confused and uncertain as to exactly what the abuses of the unemployment system are, what the program is, and explain that the amendments which have been proposed by the government—many of which are supported by the Conservative party—will quite simply have the effect of reducing the income of working Canadians and Canadians who are not working but would like to be.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra has attacked the New Democratic Party, saying that we do not care about spending, about who pays for these programs, and that we would like all of Canada to be unemployed and drawing unemployment insurance benefits. That is reactionary twaddle which has no substance. This party would like to see all Canadians working. There are now nearly one million unemployed in Canada, or over one million by any definition other than that of the government. I should like those people to be able to lead a decent life. I should like the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra to indicate what level he thinks is appropriate and what a 10 per cent cut in benefits will mean to people who rely on those benefits. I should like him to tell the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) how to explain this to people in the Atlantic provinces where the unemployment rate is over 15 per cent and where unemployment insurance benefits are critical to income maintenance and planning for those families.

● (1642)

I can speak first hand on how this situation affects my riding. When I go there and meet with people on Friday night, Saturday and sometimes on Sunday I find that there are some who cannot get mortgage money at less than 13 per cent. There are others whose cars are being seized because they are unemployed or have been unemployed for so long that they are now on welfare. Some people, for example, cannot draw workmen's compensation for one reason or another. There are women who cannot get back on the labour market because when they become unemployed, the benefit payments are low compared to welfare. They cannot get on manpower training programs either because of problems I have mentioned to the minister.

I am concerned about the level of benefits being paid to Canadians, about the fact that the government appears to be enamoured of the concept that unemployment is apparently a voluntary phenomenon and that hundreds of thousands of people are choosing it rather than employment. This philosophy is based on anecdotal evidence and is not substantiated at all.

Mr. Boulanger: You should read all the court cases.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Mercier cries out that I should read something.

Mr. Boulanger: I said you should read the court cases.

Mr. Rae: I have read the court cases.

Mr. Boulanger: How many in the last year?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this clause because it seems to me there is surely a contradiction here. Indeed, reference is made to overpayments, as referred to also under part VIII or clause 14, if your prefer, about which an amendment has been introduced and on which I will have an opportunity to speak. In any case, Mr. Speaker, what is important is the problem as it relates to unemployment insurance, and it is obvious that this problem preoccupies all members.

When people come to see us—of course, we are there to look after them and we try to do a good job—sometimes that is extremely difficult. I am not blaming the minister. I know he is doing what he can. I know also opposition members are there, more often to criticize rather than suggest practical amendments to the legislation, but it seems to me the following could have been taken into account but the minister will probably be able in spite of the bill to take into account the fact that at a certain point when people come and see us and say: Young people do not want to work, they prefer to live off social welfare, that is not true, Mr. Speaker. There are some but not many. Often, Mr. Speaker, young people who come to see us want to work. That is not complicated but it seems to me that we should be providing more training whether of an academic nature or in other areas where young and older people also have access. There is often talk, Mr. Speaker, of managing to provide full employment. That is not complicated. It is possible in this country.

I have spoken about this before, and I will come back to it. I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, if what I say is out of order, to tell me. I think that young people, when someone receives—and I have talked about this before the parliamentary committee—and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) knows that, just like all the others. I simply mentioned that we want to save money. It is obvious that the government must cut expenses one way or another but, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to penalize people who are unemployed against their will and who have no other choice. And the way it is, those people will in fact be penalized. Therefore, it seems to me that we should have a closer look into that situation in order to prevent those people from being penalized later. So, it is true that we must save money.

Obviously, I will talk about clause 5 which says that we are going to take the 66⅔ per cent and make it 60 per cent of the income to save 6⅔ per cent. But if, for instance, we tell someone who earns $100 a week at a rate of $5 an hour that he is going to work 20 hours a week under Canada Works or other projects, according to what the minister decides, it seems to me that will allow us to encourage people to go to work, and that we will in fact discourage them from depending on unemployment insurance.

It seems to me that only then can this becomes truly concrete. If we want to pass legislation, we must be reasonable. We should not penalize people who have no business being penalized. I have nothing against clause 1 as such, but I wonder whether this clause could not be broken up in two since it mentions part VIII which comes under clause 14. There seems to be a contradiction somewhere. I am not a lawyer, I am a simple citizen like everyone else, but I am trying to understand. Mr. Speaker, there is something which does not seem clear in all this. If someone in the House can clarify this for me, I would like him to do so because I want to understand and to participate with all my colleagues on both sides of the House in passing bills which will benefit all Canadians. After all, they are the ones who contribute, they are the ones who pay our salaries, they are the ones who pay for unemployment insurance. As a matter of fact, we should not even call it unemployment insurance, but rather employment insurance. In my opinion, it is time that we stop talking about unemployment all the time. We should talk about employment instead.

Mr. Speaker, this is how we can encourage people to work. Let us stop talking about unemployment and telling them: You are like this or like that. We talk about that too much, even in this House. We create psychological problems for the people when we should be trying to do the opposite. We should encourage people and show them that there are not only bad things in this country, but also some good. We must try to strike a balance.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I hope that this clause will be amended, unless the minister can provide further clarification. I believe there is some confusion between clause 1 and part VIII. If the minister can explain this and make me understand this clause, I may be able to support him.

● (1652)

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as has been mentioned, this bill received considerable attention in the committee and some references have been made to the relationship of various committee members to the bill as well as to the fact that the representation on the committee was not necessarily fair or equitable. I presume the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie), who has just spoken, had that in mind when he made his comments because he also comes from an area where unemployment is a considerable problem and where the problems of the individual become more apparent than the $1 billion, in nice round figures, which the government has decided it wants to save.

It is all very simple, Mr. Speaker, and it has not much to do with employment. Nor has it much to do with unemployment, I suppose. It involves every Canadian, and there are one million of them who are unemployed. Individually they believe that if they go through the various stages which they are asked to go through to locate a job, then they have fulfilled their obligation, but that the government has not fulfilled its obligation in making work available for them. Because they have done what they are supposed to do—when they were working they paid money into the insurance fund—now that they are unemployed, they should be able to receive their benefits.

That is the problem as seen from the point of view of the individual. When we look at the problem from the point of view of the country as a whole, we are ashamed to admit that we have one million unemployed and that we have to raise $2 billion to add to the insurance fund which was established a number of years ago when we thought that a 4 per cent rate of unemployment was too high. When the individual looks at this plan, he hears the government saying to him: "No, Joe, we will change the rules now; although you have been paying in for years, your benefits will change now."

There is another group of people who are watching the individual, Joe Doe, and wondering what these changes will mean to Joe Doe in relation to them. I am referring to the municipalities of this country. The government and the Conservative party are saying that there are many people who abuse the unemployment insurance program. They say that every day, and I am sure most Canadians are saying that. It is quite true that many people in organized labour, as well as housewives and people on the street, do say that. Everybody knows somebody who knows somebody who has a friend who has taken advantage of the unemployment insurance program.

That may be true, and if it is, it is a pretty sad state of affairs; but we members of parliament can plug those loopholes if they are as broad as people seem to think they are. But that is not what the government is doing. The government has said: "We must get rid of the expenditures; we must cut out $1 billion." If, because we have an excess of unemployment we are paying out more than the amount for which the plan was originally designed, and if, out of that $2 billion, there is a waste of 25 per cent, or half a billion dollars, then the other half will have to be built up by the municipalities because we are saying that the need is still there and will have to be met in some way.

It is very interesting that the various provincial governments have indicated that there would be a large drain on their treasuries and they were not sure how large it would be. The figures varied anywhere from $10 million to $50 million in some of the provinces. That seems to be quite a large sum to be playing with.

I think the plan has been unfair in another way. The minister indicated that we should have had some serious, intelligent discussion of the bill. Surely one or two good ideas have been put forward by the ten witnesses who appeared before the committee, and surely the minister would agree that some cogent arguments were put forward by one or two of the witnesses on some aspects of the bill. Surely the minister will admit also that the hon. member for Hochelaga had a good point to make, that his parliamentary secretary who gives him advice had some good points to make somewhere along the line, or even that some good amendments were put forward at some time in the back rooms.

The minister himself did not amend the bill in any way and he did not make any major concessions on any important aspects of the bill. To be fair to the minister, let me point out that he toyed with one part of the bill that is probably more complicated than any other, and that is the totally new concept of the two-tier system. I think the minister would agree that the new concept, to be realistic, would have to be considered in a pretty broad philosophical way rather than by way of an amendment to the existing act. If the implementation of the two-tier payment system were to be considered seriously, it would have to be considered initially from a philosophical point of view and new legislation would have to be brought forward. In my opinion, the minister did not consider any of the proposals put forward by the witnesses who came before the committee, and he did not want to hear any more witnesses because he did not listen to the ten who had been before the committee. There is no point listening to 100 witnesses if you decide not to listen to one.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave)—Agriculture—Request that beef import quotas will not be increased; the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker)—Employment—Clarification of provisions of Outreach program.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

ADVISABILITY OF LIMITING COMPENSATION PAYABLE TO CERTAIN CATEGORIES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to limit the total compensation payable to (a) a public servant (b) an officer or employee of a Crown corporation (c) an officer or employee of an agency coming under the jurisdiction of the government, to an amount no greater than the maximum salary and allowance paid to the elected representative who receives the highest salary and allowance under the terms of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I hope this motion will be supported by a number of members of the House for a number of reasons.

First, I have said many times in the House that because we operate under the British parliamentary system we have not built into our legislative processes any system of checks and balances. Moreover, because of the changes that have taken place in the rules of the House over the course of the last decade, members of parliament have been unable to hold up supply to the government, one of the fundamental privileges of any opposition. Consequently one of the fundamental ways in which a government should be held accountable for what it does is non-existent in our parliament.

● (1702)

I have also often made the point in the House, as have many of my colleagues, that in the examination of estimates before the committees of this House we are not able, for a variety of reasons, to do an adequate job of finding out where the taxpayers' money is spent. Consequently, it is important that we begin to build into our system some checks and balances to take the place of those checks and balances we no longer have.

This proposal today introduces one check, albeit a rather modest one in terms of the total number of dollars involved. However, it is symbolically an important check on the way the taxpayers' money should be spent.

If we legislate that no employee of the Government of Canada, or of a Crown corporation or agency of the government, can receive compensation greater than the highest compensation paid to an elected official of this country, namely that of the Prime Minister, we have set a standard for salary determinations which I think is important. Can one argue affirmatively that any member of the public service or of an agency of the goverment should be paid more than the Prime Minister of Canada?

My second reason for introducing this motion is that we have had great difficulty over the years establishing appropriate compensation for senior executive members of the public service. As hon. members know, a variety of committees have been set up to examine compensation for public servants and to set up adequate guidelines. However, this has always been extremely difficult to do. These committees tried to have some kind of comparability with similar salaries in the private sector, but the problem is that the jobs are not the same.

I have had friends point out to me that a person who fulfils the responsibility of deputy minister has only half the job of a senior vice-president or senior executive officer in the private sector. In the private sector, the man with that responsibility has to raise the money he spends as well as oversee the way in which it is spent. The deputy minister, on the other hand, does not have the problem of raising the money; he only has the problem of spending it.

I am not suggesting a deputy minister might not have other duties that a man in the private sector does not have. The reality is that it is difficult to make comparable decisions as to how these positions should be compared.

The third reason for bringing forth this suggestion is that we are in a period of restraint. Anyone who has been in this House of Commons for a number of years knows that politicians do not raise their compensation without considerable debate. They do not do so without assessing whether the people of Canada really believe members should be paid more for the services they provide to their constituents and the people in general. There is always heated discussion when the question of payment of members of parliament comes forward. That is not the case with the establishment of compensation for executives on the administrative side of government. There is no public debate on the question of compensation for a very large number of government, agency and Crown corporation employees.

In the last ten years, as the figures show, the increase in the number of appointments of people filling executive level jobs has been larger than in any single area of employment in the federal government in relative terms, and the public knows little about the salaries of these employees.

The fourth reason for supporting this motion is that it would bring public accountability to the establishment of salaries in the public sector and Crown corporations. On occasion we try to find out what the compensation in certain activities paid for by the public happens to be. It is difficult to get that information. Too often the responses are very much like that made by Senator Marchand when he was minister of transport. When asked on the order paper to provide to members of parliament the levels of compensation for senior officers in Air Canada, the reply was that it was not in the interest of the corporation to make that information available, that it would be competitively difficult because the private sector did not make such information available, and it would be bad for morale. The shareholders of that corporation are the people of Canada and yet they are not given this information.

When Air Canada's major competitor, CP Air, decided to do some financing in the United States, it was forced by the SEC to make that information available and it did so. Why should the people of Canada not know what the compensation is in this corporation and in fact all agencies in which they are the major shareholders? If my proposal were adopted, the people of Canada would know what the compensation is for a large number of people who work for them.

Fifth, such a measure would help to redress some of the imbalance which has developed between the legislative arm of the government and the administrative arm. Politicians constantly hear that the government is really run by the public service. We are asked why politicians do not have more control over the public service.

If a situation develops where the deputy minister is paid more than the minister, what can one expect? Who in the eyes of the people of this country is worth more in the service to this country, the deputy minister who is paid more, or the minister? Presumably it is the deputy minister. While this is not a significant factor, the imbalance needs to be redressed. We need some way to ensure that the legislative element is in control. One of the ways this can be looked at is through the compensation system.

I am sure most members know that in the United States a system limiting compensation has been in effect for many years. In fact, it has been in effect throughout the history of that nation. There have been many studies, and suggestions that it is very difficult in that country to get the type of public servants that are needed, but the system prevails.

Under the administration of President Ford and the administration of President Carter, changes have been made in the compensation to senior executives in the public service, but in no case have they been made in such a way that public servants are paid more than the elected representatives. There is no one in the United States public service who earns more than the senior elected officials in the United States. There are very few people in the public service of the United States who earn more than cabinet ministers.

To give some idea of the way in which the situation has got out of balance, at the present time a deputy minister in Canada can earn over 18 per cent more than a senior undersecretary in the government of the United States. There may be very good and just reasons why senior public servants in this country should be compensated substantially higher than public servants in the United States.

I want to be very clear that I am not arguing or suggesting that our public servants are necessarily over-compensated. What I am arguing and suggesting is that we do not have in place in this country a built-in way of keeping sound control over the payment of senior public servants and that our system needs it. I would argue that the appointment of ad hoc committees to try and bring in studies of comparability with regard to compensation is not as satisfactory as built-in control.

If we are concerned about restraint and a proper balance between the legislative and administration function in the nation and a proper utilization of the resources of this country, what better way to start than by putting in a built-in check on the use of the taxpayers' money and that no legislating employee of the government or any of its agencies may be paid more than the Prime Minister of Canada? What a sensible solution! What a sensible way!

● (1712)

I am not arguing in favour of an increase in pay for legislators; I am arguing that under the present system there should be some sort of built-in control, some built-in guideline, so that we might know where we are going. How foolish it is to have a system under which deputy ministers are paid more than ministers. What kind of a system is that? We in this country badly need controls built in in the way in which compensation is paid to employees of the public service. We need controls built in to the whole system of expenditure in this country. I am arguing that the government give serious consideration to passing legislation limiting the amount which any public servant, any employee of any agency of the government, can receive. They will not be permitted to earn more than the Prime Minister of Canada gets. I can think of nothing which would do more, symbolically, to improve the legislative posture in this nation and I urge every member here to support this motion.

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I found this motion interesting and in some respects unusual, coming, as it does, from the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). I do not discard it out of hand because I think there is much merit to some of the points he has made, but I believe the mischief he is trying to correct would not be affected by the adoption of the motion he proposes.

We are considering a motion which essentially excludes the marketplace; it curtails the right of the individual who offers his services to a Crown corporation in an executive capacity to negotiate a level of remuneration which he might expect to receive in the private sector. Under its terms, no man or woman could be hired by the government or by one of its agencies at a higher salary than that paid to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I suggest this would place a government in an untenable position and make it impossible to obtain people with the competence we require in, for example, Crown corporations which play an increasingly important role in this country. It would concern me very much if Air Canada, for instance, could not compete in the marketplace for the skills and talent required to give the people the best service available.

Mr. Gillies: That is why you hired Bryce Mackasey.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): I am glad to see hon. members have a sense of humour. I detected an ambiguity in the remarks of the hon. member. Are we being asked to increase the level of remuneration of legislators in this country, specifically of the Prime Minister, since that is to be the touchstone used to determine maximum compensation to be paid elsewhere? Or are we being asked to roll back the remuneration paid to senior civil servants, presidents of Crown corporations and so on? I gather from the comments made by the hon. member that it is the latter.

I personally favour the hon. gentleman's view because the people who are involved in the political process are not essentially seeking remuneration. As the hon. gentleman knows very well, "Man does not live by bread alone", and nothing could be truer of the representatives of the people involved in the legislative process. I would suggest, however, when we turn to the people who are serving as employees of government agencies and Crown corporations, that this is not the case. The hon. member is seeking a form of wage parity which does not accord with what I understand to be a classical philosophy of the Conservative party, one to which I happen to subscribe myself, namely that we are not to be envious of what is paid to others, of what is paid to members of the public service.

I share the view of the Auditor General, expressed some weeks ago, that we should be prepared to remunerate the public servants of this country by paying the highest wages required to obtain the best possible people, while at the same time we should retain the right to terminate those services in the manner adopted by the private sector. I have no doubt that, notwithstanding the argument put forward by the hon. member, deputy ministers and senior officials in Crown corporations and government agencies discharge responsibilities which in many instances are as great as those undertaken in the private sector, sometimes greater.

The hon. gentleman made the point that officials in the public service wear only one hat—the spending hat—whereas in the private sector they have responsibility both for spending and for raising money. I do not think the analogy holds. I believe there are many officials of major corporations whose roles are almost identical to those of the deputy ministers of many of our departments. I believe that at the top level of responsibility our public servants are probably underpaid, not overpaid as the hon. member suggests. It may be that adjustments ought to be made elsewhere in the public service, but they should not affect senior public servants nor should they affect presidents and senior executive officers of Crown corporations.

I return to my view that if this motion were adopted we would not be able to attract necessary skills into the public service.

Mr. Gillies: Let's try it.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): The hon. member says, "Let's try it", but I am personally not prepared to take the chance of losing some of the most able people in the country on this issue of remuneration. I think the Canadian people are prepared to pay according to responsibility assumed.

• (1722)

The hon. member has drawn upon the American experience, but the American experience, fortunately or unfortunately—and there are arguments both ways—is quite unlike our own in that policymakers in the United States change, by and large, with change in the administration. As we know, federal administrations in the United States change every four years. The difference is that people who assume the roles of undersecretaries, assistant undersecretaries and others in terms of the policymaking apparatus in the United States are essentially servants of the people during limited periods of time. It is a responsibility and an honour to take such positions, but these people are basically private sector people who return to the private sector at the end of a given four-year period. Some of them take leaves of absences from universities, businesses and so forth. In fact, in many respects I suggest that that aspect of the U.S. system is healthy because there is a constant interchange between private sector and public sector personnel due to this process.

There are very few major law firms, investment houses or corporations in the United States which do not have among their ranks some people who have served government in senior capacities in one or more administrations. Unfortunately—and I say "unfortunately" because our system as it now operates is not compatible with that kind of change—we have basically a permanent civil service in this country. There are great advantages and disadvantages to our system, but I suggest that in the absence of undertaking very fundamental reforms in the entire government apparatus in Canada it would be virtually impossible to adopt this motion at this time. It would have a severe impact and the civil service would experience severe dislocation, not to speak of Crown corporations and Crown agencies.

Hence I am drawn to the conclusion that as much as I agree with the motives which obviously underlie this motion, I cannot accept it as being a reasonable means of accomplishing the objectives the hon. member for Don Valley wishes to accomplish.

I say in conclusion that we must never forget the role of the elected representative of the people, the role which each of us in this chamber sees as being very distinct from that of the public servant. There is no reason to suggest that if any limitation is to be placed upon the remuneration paid to public servants, it should take the form of wage parity with the people who represent the people of Canada. I really do not think the people of Canada believe that a deputy minister is more important than a minister just because the deputy is paid more. I believe that the people of Canada and the people in this House are willing to pay for performance.

I also believe—and the Auditor General endorses this—that if performance is not forthcoming, that man should go. That is one part of our system we should look at in terms of establishing checks. I would much prefer to see our public servants and the officers of Crown corporations and Crown agencies paid salaries, remuneration and benefits which are comparable with those paid to men of equal ability in the private sector, with the knowledge that, if performance is not forthcoming, the people of Canada have a right to terminate services in the same way they are terminated in the private sector.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious that this matter be dealt with during the course of this private members' hour so I will confine my remarks to a minimal length of time.

I was glad to hear the comments of the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston), which in essence indicated to me that while the hon. member has certain reservations as to what would necessarily flow from this resolution, by and large he is very much interested in and sympathetic with the objectives set forth by my colleague the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), who, incidentally, is to be congratulated for bringing this matter to the attention of the House.

Generally speaking, I think all of us in this House feel that this resolution has great merit, that it should receive some very serious consideration in terms of the operation of the public service vis-à-vis the operation of the legislative arm of our parliamentary system. I suggest, however, that there is a problem with respect to defining precisely what effect this resolution might have on the whole question of secrecy in government and in government agencies. As the hon. member for Don Valley pointed out in his introductory remarks, very often we in parliament inquire about the salaries of chief executive officers of Crown corporations or government agencies and are told by ministers responsible over and over again that that information is confidential and not available to the people of Canada.

Perhaps the hon. member argued this matter on the basis of principle, but we really do not know in pragmatic terms exactly how many senior public servants and chief executive officers of Crown corporations might be affected. The most immediate example of which I can think is the recent appointment of the chairman of the board of Air Canada. I think there is information, not through the House but through press reports, to the effect that this new chairman qualifies to be part of a very elite group of chief executive officers of Crown corporations and that he will receive a salary and other incidental benefits which will bring his level of total remuneration above that of the person who was responsible for his appointment, namely the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

The main reason I join in this debate is that I think most hon. members feel that this subject matter should receive detailed consideration in a committee of this House. That would provide an opportunity for us to examine the context within which this motion might be beneficial to our system in an institutional manner. That is to say, are there ways by which we in parliament can come forward with suggestions or amendments in accordance with the motives which brought the hon. member for Don Valley to put this motion before the House? Are there specific suggestions, guidelines or legislative provisions which could be brought forward for consideration and which might bring about the perspective I know we all want to have with respect to this division between legislative and executive or, indeed, public servant pay scales and the relationship which exists between these two segments of our system of government?

Under those circumstances, I would like to propose an amendment to the motion before us. I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this motion be not now further debated but be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for consideration and report back to this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) want to rise on a point of order or does he want to participate in the debate?

I shall now consider the motion that is being proposed.

● (1732)

[English]

I want to consider the amendment attentively because it is a new perspective and at first glance seems to be a new proposition. At this time I will now recognize members who are interested in contributing to this. However, if the House has no objection, while I am contemplating the amendment, I will recognize the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont).

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). According to that motion, and I quote:

—the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to limit the total compensation payable to—

Mr. Speaker, suggestion is made here, not that the motion be referred to a committee, but that it be discussed by the House. First of all, I should like to say that the motion of the hon. member is intended primarily to restrict, generally, the expenditures of the government by offering civil servants reasonable, good and equitable salaries. That is an objective to which no hon. member in this House could possibly object, and towards which this government has constantly strived, and continues to do so. I believe one can say, in all fairness, that the various succeeding governments of this country have always endeavoured to achieve that objective, regardless of their respective accomplishments.

The motion raises a problem since it endeavours to compare and conciliate two quite different facts, that is the compensation of parliamentarians and employees of a vast multidisciplinarian organization which assumes responsibilities of direction and management in specialized disciplines, those responsibilities being sometimes similar to those of employees in the private sector. With your leave, sir, I would say that the comparison made by the hon. member is not valid. The needs of both groups, the reasons underlying the definition of their compensation and the points of comparison are quite different. I wonder if the hon. member, when he refers to the elected representative who receives the highest salary and allowances under the Senate and House of Commons Act, means the Prime Minister. I know that such reference was made by the hon. member for Don Valley, but in doing so he made that comparison more difficult.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to remind the hon. member of the unique character of the basic problems which their compensation system was suppose to solve. I will refer hon. members to the report of the Advisory Committee on Parliamentary Salaries and Expenses prepared in the early seventies under the chairmanship of Mr. T. N. Beaupré. Generally speaking, the advisory committee refers to the discussions that took place in this House a few years ago and more particularly to the comments made in 1963 by the then prime minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. The report contains the list of specific problems enumerated by the prime minister to justify the adoption of special provisions pertaining to members of the House. That list mentioned, and I quote:

The maintenance of two residences, one in the riding and one in Ottawa;

With a few exceptions, Mr. Speaker.

Financial sacrifices especially for new members;

Disruption of family life;

Difficulties in educating children;

Difficulty in attracting young candidates because of the loss of income in accepting a political life;

If the financial barrier were allowed to continue as a deterrent to attracting candidates to public life, parliament would lose its representative character as only the financially independent could afford to be members.

In general, Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that these conditions, although they must necessarily be taken into account in order to establish the salaries of members, do not concern the compensation payable to public servants. The nature and conditions of work differ greatly in both cases and it would not be reasonable to ask for exact comparability between the two systems of remuneration.

I would like to quote again from the Beaupré report and draw the attention of the House to some interesting paragraphs. First:

The establishment of appropriate levels for parliamentary salaries must be based largely on subjective judgment. The position of the federal parliamentarian is unique and therefore, it cannot be easily compared to apparently similar positions in other political jurisdictions, either in Canada or elsewhere, nor to other occupations in Canada. Virtually none of the guidelines normally used to determine rates of remuneration in other sectors of the economy is applicable.

Furthermore, the committee does not "accept the proposal that parliamentary salaries should be related to the salaries that the government establishes for the executive category in the public service", even though it briefly dealt with the relative salary of a deputy minister accountable to the ministers.

I am prepared to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the opposite is equally true. Public servants' salaries should not be compared arbitrarily and systematically to the salaries of members of parliament. However, you can rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that to raise peremptory, arbitrary and systematic barriers, as proposed in the motion, will result without doubt in a direct and relevant comparison between the duties and responsibilities of the various groups concerned.

Since government activities represent a practical exercise rather than a mere exchange of intellectual ideas, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gilles) has considered all the real problems that the passage of his motion would entail. As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, there are obviously and quite legitimately some differences in the nature of the activities, working conditions and underlying factors behind the salary rates paid to legislators and public servants. Allow me to look a little more fully into some aspects of civil servants' salaries. To this end, I believe it would be appropriate to take into account two agencies which have allowed successive governments to direct their efforts in order to determine the level of compensation of federal employees. They are the Royal Commission on Government Organization, the so-called Glassco commission, and the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service, most often identified with the name of its current chairman, Mr. Lambert.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote a few extracts from the Glassco report which represent in many respects the basis of the administration and compensation policy within the public service for the past 15 years. In Volume I, dealing with the policy of compensation, the commission states in part: "Levels of compensation comparable with those of other employers keep an enterprise financially competitive in the market for skills and talent. They also tend to minimize the risk of losing present employees to more attractive employment elsewhere. At the same time, the philosophies underlying the internal administration of wages and salaries may have a profound influence, for good or bad, upon the employees morale and productivity, and upon his incentive for growth and development. They may emphasize the relation between employee effort and the objectives of the organization, as well as the performance and reward, or they may conceal a link which should, precisely exist."

Mr. Speaker, the Glassco report also states the following: "Although comparability with wage levels outside the public service has been a stated or implied bench-mark for wage determination in the federal public service ever since 1919, it is not possible to make a single, simple generalization about these relations." As far as I know, the commission does not refer to the comparability of wage levels between parliamentarians and civil servants, maybe, Mr. Speaker, because it would have found that the proposal we are considering today is a method that is too general to determine the compensation at more senior levels in the public service.

In the late sixties, the creation of the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service was a concrete attempt by the government to collect judicious advice on the remuneration of senior officials. Hon. members certainly know that the present advice originates from people who are themselves representative of senior levels in the Canadian business sector.

I am sure you are all aware that the present chairman of the group is Mr. Allen T. Lambert, and I should like to take the opportunity to draw the attention of the House to some very pertinent parts of its most recent report. In the second report of the group, we can read the following, and I quote:

—we were struck by the fact that it is necessary to ensure that executive personnel compensation in the public service should remain at a reasonable level of equality with those in the private sector; this level should however be considered reasonable comparatively to wage levels of other categories of public servants. We think more than ever that the efficiency and effectiveness of the public service, and the importance of this efficiency to the government and to the taxpayers could not be stressed enough, continue to depend to a significant extent on the maintenance of reasonably competitive wage levels for senior public servants.

In the fifth report, the group continues in the same direction, and I quote:

It was impossible for the advisory group to arrive at precise conclusions with respect to the equivalence principles and limitations that should exist between the public and private sectors. We do not believe that specific mathematical formulas could be set. However, the studies undertaken were useful in our considerations on the appropriate rates, and we will continue to take them into account when time comes to formulate recommendations that are made from time to time.

The reports the government got based on the advice of experts in these matters clearly show that the salaries paid to senior officials must compare with those paid to their counterparts in the private sector and must in so far as it is possible remain competitive with the latter. I find it difficult to understand how the hon. member can bring himself to believe that senior officials are going to protect effectively the interests of the public if they receive salaries that differ a lot from those paid in the private sector. So that will not happen, a comparison has to be made between the levels of pay in the public service and the private sector.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate that I cannot support this proposal not only because it goes against the policies set by successive governments but also particularly because the remuneration policies of those governments which are intended to achieve over-all comparability with the other sectors of the Canadian economy are still adjusted to needs, and I find it impossible to reject them for the proposal of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Mr. Speaker, we must continue, and I am sure we will, to recruit and keep competent senior officials not only because their work is a challenge and important but also because the pay they get squares with the work they do and compares by and large with what is being offered elsewhere.

● (1742)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the next hon. member might I be permitted to give my ruling in respect of the proposition moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

The difficulty I am faced with at this time in respect of the proposed amendment is that the hon. member is proposing two things. If he will refer to citation 200(4) of Beauchesne's fourth edition at page 168 he will see it is clearly stated there that:

A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the House may be taken on each separately.

There may not have been too much difficulty in that regard but for the fact that the hon. member is proposing to refer the subject matter to the committee and trying also at the same time to stop the debate by the first part of his amendment. In addition, we might have members in the House who agree with the second part of his amendment but do not agree with the first part.

If the hon. member would take the trouble to read citation 202(6) of Beauchesne he would find that it states as follows:

It is not an amendment to a motion to move that the question go to a committee.

His second proposition is faulty in that it is completely contrary to citation 202(6). On this ground, and because of the fact that I cannot put before the House an amendment, part of which would go against the rules, I must reject the complete amendment moved by the hon. member.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, of course I recall the citations to which Your Honour has referred, and they were in my mind when I proposed this particular motion. I would simply like to get some clarification of the point you have raised. The first aspect is, of course, in respect of the nature of the two parts of the amendment. It would seem at first glance that the first part would terminate the debate, but there is no question that it would not have had that effect because the motion itself is debatable. For this reason it seemed to me we might have the opportunity of discussing the merits or otherwise of what I think is a very sensible and worth-while proposition, namely, that this matter should receive more intensive attention than we are able to give it in the course of the one hour allotted for private members' business.

The fact that there seemed to be general acceptance of the proposition put forward by the mover of the motion was the rationale within which I brought this forward.

● (1752)

Secondly, while the motion contained the recommendation that the matter be referred to a standing committee for detailed examination, the most important part of it was that the committee report back to the House, perhaps for further debate. I was wondering whether under those circumstances that would now take the matter outside the prima facie objection that you have raised by your ruling, that this matter is not a motion merely to relegate the matter to a committee where it may then die but, indeed, was a motion which directed the committee to report back to the House. I would like you, sir, to clarify under those circumstances what might be the distinction which would allow you to put the motion so that we may have the feeling of the House on giving this matter more consideration in committee and, at the same time, that we not be precluded from debating the matter at the time the committee reports to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is making a suggestion on which I do not have to agree or disagree, the merits of considering the motion either in committee or in the House. My difficulty is with the procedural aspect of the matter. I agree with regard to the topic of the debate, and if I were accepting the motion it would not preclude a debate. Procedurally, however, the debate should be on the amendment proposed by the hon. member, not on the main motion, although these debates sometimes allow members to spend most of their time debating the fundamentals of the main motion.

At the same time a suggestion to have the Chair allow a question of this kind to be put to the House so that the subject matter may be referred to a standing committee which would report back to the House, is not a practice that follows precedent. Perhaps the hon. member was not listening, but I read a citation from Beauchesne's, paragraph 6 of citation 202, which says very clearly that it is not an amendment to a motion to move that the question go to committee.

I realize what the hon. member is attempting to achieve. I believe he is trying to do what we sometimes do with private members' bills, when a motion is made that a bill not be read a second time, that the bill be struck from the order paper and that its subject matter be referred to a committee. Even in situations like that, we are not entitled to order the committee to report back to the House. We send the subject matter for consideration to the committee and that is the end of it, so even in that respect the hon. member is overstepping the rules.

With regard to the suggestion to allow his proposition to refer the subject matter to committee, the motion, which is for general discussion, is before the House at this time. It is here for discussion, decision, and recommendation, and I think that the hon. member's objective should be first to let the House go as far as it will with the debate and to hope for a vote. If things do not go as the hon. member would like, perhaps in another way he could make a proposal that might meet his objective. As it now stands, I do not think that we can deal with his amendment.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for taking so long in coming to your decision. I followed your procedural perambulations with a great deal of interest, and I did not think the decision would take anybody with your experience quite as long. I was not really sure whether it was the legality of the procedure or the indecipherability of the longhand written amendment in the first place that was bothering you.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

I thought that the motion by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) was interesting, and still is for a couple of minutes. In the wording, the hon. member is limiting the compensation payable to so and so, and so and so:

—to an amount no greater than the maximum salary and allowance paid to the elected representative who receives the highest salary and allowance under the terms of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

In other words, this motion narrows it down to the question of what we pay executives in the civil service and Crown corporations.

The hon. member might have said in his motion that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—knowing that he is underpaid because of all the flack that goes with the job—should get at least twice as much money.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, no!

Mr. Railton: The hon. member did not even say that the other members of the civil service at the lower grades should not be paid higher than members of parliament. However, members are so notoriously underpaid, they haven't had a raise, I think for about six or seven years, and they get nothing but flack. Right now members here do not get as much as members in the provincial legislatures. I do not know why the hon. member for Don Valley mentioned congressional salaries in the United States because they are so far ahead of our salaries that there should be no doubt about the foolishness of comparing or setting the same salaries based on the salaries of elected representatives to the House of Commons.

The other point I would like to make, if you will give me a little time, Mr. Speaker, is with regard to the suggestion that we set ceilings in the private sector. How can we do that unless we adopt the same authority as they have in Moscow? This is a democracy, and we do not set the salaries in the private sector. I could go on and on and really get down to my prepared notes, unless you wish—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order and just so there is no further confusion, there is nothing whatever in my motion about setting salaries in the private sector.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps it is time to say that the hour provided for private members' business has expired. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Before we were interrupted by private members' hour, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the government has decided to save a billion dollars. This saving is to be achieved principally through adding to the burden on the backs of the working people, particularly those in areas of high unemployment.

It is very interesting to note that although the unemployment insurance fund was presumably actuarially sound when it was established, it now shows a drain of $2 billion. This has certainly been a political football. The Liberal party has won a couple of elections by promising to include people who were not intended to be included when the Unemployment Insurance Act was first enacted. Now it appears that contributions of employers and employees are to be reduced simply because there is a surplus of about $400 million in the fund. This indicates that up to the point where workers and employers were to carry the unemployment insurance plan, the plan was sound.

Where the difficulty arises, Mr. Speaker, is that ten years ago 4 per cent unemployment was considered too high. I remember that the New Democratic Party felt a reasonable figure would be 1 per cent and that this would take care of the turnover of people who looked for jobs in other fields, those being transferred, or such things as retraining and reclassification programs. We certainly thought that 4 per cent unemployment was too high. In the last ten years the government has increased the intervention point from 4 per cent to 5.5 per cent, to 6.5 per cent and now, according to this bill, the trigger figure is 11.5 per cent. I suppose the government considers that things are not bad if it is less than 11.5 per cent. If it goes over that figure I do not know who is going to handle it. Certainly the government apparently does not intend to participate in the unemployment insurance fund in order to carry that kind of unemployment.

Whether 4 per cent, 10 per cent or 50 per cent is the acceptable level, it is the unemployed person who is affected, not the worker. It is the unemployed person who worries how to cope with his situation, whether he loses his car or his house. Even whether he loses his wife and family sometimes depends on how long he is unemployed.

The cost is immense in a social sense, Mr. Speaker. It may well be that we should not be covering social costs through unemployment insurance and should not be making arrangements for the well-being of citizens in lieu of employment. The way to help the unemployed is to give them jobs.

When I first started paying unemployment insurance it was a simple proposition. I do not know how we allowed this government to get into this mess. There was cyclical unemployment then too, but not to the degree we have it now.

The Liberal party bragged about how many more people are working today. That is all right for the person who is employed, but the one who is unemployed and cannot buy his children Christmas presents or pay the light bill is not helped by knowing that the Liberal government is able to provide jobs for more Canadians than ever before. There are more people in Canada today than ever before, Mr. Speaker, so the only figure that has relevance is the percentage of the population that is working. Unemployment has an immense effect on the individual concerned.

The government is really saying to employers and employees that they have done very well. The government is saying, "You have $400 million excess in the kitty, you have a surplus. It is so high that, under the act, we have to reduce it, so we are reducing the premiums to you people."

• (2012)

They have not covered the problems about which, I am sure, everybody in the street speaks. They have not covered the problem of your neighbour who came from a big construction job where he made $20,000 and is now on unemployment insurance. No one knows where he got the $20,000 construction job or where he spent his summer, but he is supposed to have made a large amount of money and he is supposed to live the rest of the year on unemployment insurance. We are not doing anything about him, nor are we doing anything about the people about whom the minister is speaking, such as the women who are the abusers of this system. We are not doing anything about the young people in that sense.

What we are doing is to say that it will be much harder for women to get into the labour force and that they will be treated less advantageously than other segments of the population. We are saying to the young people that they are repeaters because they do not have permanent jobs. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that they are lucky to get any kind of job.

Your son and mine who go to college find that it is almost mandatory for them to find a summer job of some kind to qualify for the benefits they will need to put them through college. They will take any kind of job. Sure, these are temporary jobs and they are not the kind of job they expect to put them into the labour force, but they are the best jobs they can find.

All of our young people are plagued with the problems of having no particular training for a career job and very few of them have any experience after living on a farm, working in a store, or doing some such work because of their parents' occupation. Most young people do not have experience in any form which would enable them to get a better job. These are the people we are cutting off, these are the people we are hurting, and it will create an immense problem.

I would have no problem at all walking into an unemployment insurance office and collecting unemployment insurance.

It would mean that I had worked at a job and paid my contributions so I was entitled to unemployment insurance. That was my right because I had paid the premiums. No one goes out and bangs up his car because he has car insurance. Perhaps I should not say that nobody does it because there is always a nut somewhere who will park his car on a dangerous corner and wait three or four hours knowing that eventually somebody will run into the car and he will get whatever had been wrong with the car previously fixed up. There are exceptions to everything. Doctors cheat, lawyers cheat, and workers cheat, but that does not mean that all workers, all doctors, or all lawyers cheat. There are just some who do, and we have to look after those exceptions, but we should not abuse the whole system for them.

As I was saying, before the Liberal government bought the computer system and the high-priced help—they decided they must have a means to check the help they had hired the day before—one would go into the employment office and, if they had a job, one would take it, but if there was no job available for you, then they would mark it on their slip and you could go over to the unemployment insurance side where you presented the card which had the record of your contributions on it, then they gave you the cash and you went away looking for a job. When you found a job, you started again making contributions which were then marked on the card. If you thought you did not get enough money, they would show you your card and you could add up your contributions yourself or you could have your lawyer or accountant look after it. Now it is so complicated that we do not really know whether or not people are honest in collecting unemployment insurance.

It is very easy for the minister to say, as he said in a discussion in which I was involved, that he anticipated people would move. I do not expect a Liberal government to be always in office. The last time it stayed 20 years. Now it has been in office long enough and it should go. I expect some change after the next election, and when it comes about I anticipate—perhaps I am a born optimist—that things will be better and that more jobs will be available, especially in northern Ontario, in my riding, where the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) has spent $2.5 million looking for minerals. If they find any minerals, I expect some mines will be opened, and if they are, I want those young people, not those living in Toronto but those living in Timiskaming to get those jobs—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. Is there agreement to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I take exception to the statement made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): The statement was made that doctors cheat and lawyers cheat. I do not think that is a parliamentary comment. He went on to say that not all doctors cheat and not all lawyers cheat. I would like to correct the record—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. That is not a point of order, it is a point of debate, and if the hon. member wishes to get into the debate, I will recognize him later on.

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, before I start my comments on the bill I should like to tell hon. members about the education which this whole process has been for me in the last few weeks. The process to which I refer is the legislative process which this bill has gone through from second reading in the House through the committee stage.

In my naivete as a new member I approached consideration of the bill in committee with a fair degree of optimism, thinking that we would find in the committee a considerable amount of co-operation on the part of the government to get to the nub of the problem of unemployment insurance and of unemployment, and a willingness on the part of the government to accept suggestions and amendments to its proposals in the legislation.

We heard from the minister himself that this piece of legislation is not the end-all and the be-all, that the bill is not perfect and that it is expected it will be revised in the future because it does not provide the whole answer at this time. Since that is the case, I was quite taken aback, I must say, when I found out that the government seemed completely unwilling at the committee stage not only to accept suggestions for changes in the legislation but even unwilling to listen to the witnesses and to accept the proposal that more witnesses appear before the committee.

The distinct impression I had of the attitude of the government was the attitude which I had observed in some circles before, that is, "My mind is made up, so don't confuse me with the facts". That was the attitude that came across to me as a freshman member of the House, and that is before being tainted with all the prejudices which members normally acquire with time in the House.

● (2022)

At first I was astounded to find that the government did not wish to listen to many groups and individuals who are concerned about the impact this bill will have upon them. At least 35 groups and individuals wished to appear before the committee to state their case. They wanted to state their view on the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act and to offer suggestions as to how the problems presented by the government could be better met and solved than by the legislation before us.

The minister stated a willingness to listen to suggestions. He stated that the legislation certainly was not perfect and would suffer revisions over the next few years. In spite of that statement, there was a severe restriction on the number of witnesses who could be heard. There was certainly a restriction on the time which each witness was allowed, which was about one hour before the committee.

Because of the efforts of the minister and the parliamentary secretary to force this legislation through the committee stage as quickly as possible, the witnesses were not allowed enough time to prepare their briefs, do the necessary research, and present telling evidence to the government which might have convinced it to accept some revisions to the legislation. There were accusations by some witnesses that they were severely handicapped by the shortness of time allowed to them to prepare their brief and present it to the committee.

I repeat, it was quite an education. When I came to the House, I felt that government and opposition members alike would co-operate and look at legislation before them, not as the end-all and be-all in itself, but as a proposal for the committee to work on, make amendments to, and make adjustments so that it would be a little more perfect when it came back to this chamber for final deliberation. I did not see that. As I say, I saw a government which had a piece of paper in its hand called Bill C-14. I saw that it was completely unwilling to accept amendments or to listen to witnesses.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hesitate to do so knowing that the hon. member is a newcomer. As with all NDP members, he learns fast. However, I think he is going a bit too far. I suggest that he stick to motion No. 1 rather than give a résumé of what happened in committee. I believe he should be instructed to stick to the motion before us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour) stick closely to motion No. 1.

Mr. Faour: Mr. Speaker, I believe my comments are relevant to the over-all consideration of the bill. The experience over the past three weeks has given me, as a freshman, certain opinions on the bill which I would like to present. It is important that hon. members understand how I came to feel this way and have these opinions with regard to what has gone on.

I repeat, it was my opinion as a freshman member that, in the main, the government was unwilling to accept alterations or amendments to this bill. As I said before, the attitude was, "My mind is made up, don't confuse me with the facts." That is my opinion of the government's attitude.

I come from one of the poorest regions of the country. My constituency is among the highest unemployment areas in this country. The official unemployment figure announced by Statistics Canada is in the vicinity of 15 per cent to 17 per cent. However, Statistics Canada has finally adopted a concept of hidden unemployment figures. Including the hidden unemployed in my constituency, the figure would be somewhere between 25 per cent and 30 per cent. Because of that, my constituents are very much interested in what goes on with this bill and what it will mean to them.

There are communities in my constituency—the same probably applies all over the country but my experience is related only to Newfoundland—where at certain times of the year unemployment insurance is almost the only source of income for a great majority of the people. For many people it is the only source of income for at least a certain part of the year. It is a very necessary part of their family budgeting for the year. Without it, they would be destitute.

To give an indication of what this might mean, I will quote the reaction of a member of the minister's department, an employee of the commission in St. John's. When confronted with the type of proposals the minister announced in August, his reaction was that in Newfoundland next winter it will mean cold homes and hungry children. That man had seen how necessary unemployment insurance is in one particular part of this country. He knew precisely what the effect would be of restricting or withdrawing benefits from certain people.

Cold homes and hungry children in Canada in 1979 are completely unacceptable. That is not the way this country should be governed. However, that is what the minister is offering to people on the northwest and northeast coasts of Newfoundland, people who have no alternative to unemployment insurance.

It is difficult to tell someone to get a job when there are no jobs available, when the unemployment rate in that area is between 25 per cent and 30 per cent, and the person knows that if he moves to a large city he will not have the necessary skills to get a job. In addition, it would mean leaving his family and his home.

I know the minister has encouraged young people in particular to travel around this country. That may be very commendable, but it is another story when you are forced to leave your home and your family. When a member of the family has to travel to western Canada in order to support his family back home, it often results in a broken family. I hope that is not what the minister is offering the people in parts of the country like Newfoundland. I know that deep down he is a good man. If he knew the facts, he would not be offering that kind of solution to those who have no alternative.

The proposals before us in Bill C-14 will do two major things. They will restrict the number of people who can collect unemployment insurance benefits and reduce the amount of benefits they receive. Let us look at these individually to see how they relate to my part of the country where unemployment is extremely high.

Because of the seasonal nature of their occupations, such as working in a fish plant, fishing, logging or whatever, some people in my constituency only get so many weeks work during the summer. In the past, this has meant they have been able to obtain unemployment insurance which has enabled them to survive the winter without having their children cold and hungry. They survive the winter with some degree of dignity in the hope that the next summer they will be able to obtain the same kind of work which will carry them over the next winter. For more than 8,000 in Newfoundland this will not be possible—they will be forced on to the welfare rolls, they will be obliged to cut down the amount of food and fuel they can buy for their families.

● (2032)

If this proposal goes through it will mean serious deprivation for many people next year. Many people have depended on unemployment insurance for a substantial portion of their annual income, and now much of this support will be taken from them. There are, of course, the welfare rolls. In Newfoundland the welfare office is fairly active as things are—I cannot say it has more clients in proportion to the total population than any other province in the country but I suspect that is the case. The welfare rolls will get longer. Newfoundland is a province which already has a tremendously high debt. I shall not go into the financial status of the Newfoundland government, but the added costs of welfare payments will prove to be a serious additional burden. It is somewhat unbelievable to me that some 8,000 people—

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member might mention that we pay 50 per cent of welfare costs. He might put that on record.

Mr. Faour: That may be so, but this will still have serious consequences for many communities.

Reduction of benefits is another aspect to be considered. The government has proposed that benefits be reduced by 10 per cent across the board from 66⅔ per cent of insurable earnings to 60 per cent. That is a reduction of about 10 per cent. At a time when inflation is wiping out the benefit of any increase in income people may get, at a time when incomes in provinces like Newfoundland are among the lowest in the country, at a time when the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Council suggests that a family needs $14,000 if it is to live above the poverty line, the government is cutting down on the amount the average individual in Newfoundland receives from unemployment insurance.

Since the amount is based on income earned we need to look again to ascertain who is being hurt worst. They are people at the lower end of the income scale receiving the minimum wage, or slightly better, for a few months of the year, enough to qualify them for unemployment insurance benefits. They would qualify for two-thirds of the meagre income they earned in the summer and this will have to carry them over the winter. This is certainly not a very great amount at present, but under the government's proposal the proportion would be cut to 60 per cent.

In Newfoundland the average wage is about $100 a week. The government is proposing that an individual should live and feed his family on $60 a week. In other words, a person who earned the minimum wage in the summer would have to live on a weekly income of $60. I think, for instance, of fish plant workers who are not unionized and whose wages are not very high. They earn the minimum wage or slightly above it and, of all people, it is they who will have to accept a cut in income because of the government's austerity measures. This is unforgivable. What they should be getting, as was suggested by one or two witnesses, is added income during the winter months so that they could cope with inflation. Remember, payments are based on income earned some time earlier, and inflation is eating up every month the amount they are receiving. So while the government is putting forward the figure of 60 per cent, in real buying terms that figure may be closer to 55 per cent six months after the claimant begins collecting benefits.

These are aspects which I believe the government has failed to consider or, if it has considered them, it has dismissed them as being too unimportant to stand in the way of slashing reductions in expenditure. What the government is doing is making people at the low end of the economic scale, people who can least afford any reduction in income, shoulder the burden of cutbacks and restraints. The government is telling them it is they who must bear the brunt of government waste and excesses. To my mind this is not fair play. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) many years ago talked about a just society. This is not a just society. If the Prime Minister would cut out give-aways to corporations the government could probably make up the same amount of money as it hopes to gain from this bill without attacking the poor and the unemployed who can least afford a cut in income at the present time.

As I said before, I am sure the minister has some good in his heart. If he really knew what the effects of these cutbacks would be, especially in parts of the country like Newfoundland, he would never introduce them in the form in which we see them. But he has not had a chance to see what the situation is really like. The committee, led by the government members, heard only nine witnesses, and most of those were from central Canada, either academics or professionals who had jobs. We never saw a single unemployed person appear before that committee; we never heard one bit of testimony from a person who was unemployed, the person who would be most affected by these cutbacks. I am sure that if the minister could have heard testimony from those directly affected by his proposals he would have relented. I cannot believe that if he understood the impact of these proposals on Newfoundland, for instance, where unemployment is very high, or on Cape Breton, he would seek to push these proposals through. For some reason, however, the government appears to have made up its mind. It does not wish to be confused by the facts. It wants—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired. He may, of course, continue by unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: No.

● (2042)

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped until recently that I would not have to take the floor on this bill as the original purposes of the legislator, when he presented Bill C-14 to the House, are commendable and I think that if this bill could be fairly applied for all Canadians I would not have any objection to support it.

However, Mr. Speaker, we realize that because of some geographic divisions some people and some underprivileged areas of the country are completely deprived of the income they require to live, of rights to which they are entitled. Owing to the magic of some geographical line, the residents of a given village might be exempted from some provisions of this bill when a few miles further other people just as underprivileged would be subject to regulations imposing severe financial and moral hardships, because those people will not be able to find employment.

Mr. Speaker, I have before me a document dated June 1978 and published by the Department of Manpower and Immigration which says that the official unemployment rate in the Charlevoix riding is 23.4 per cent. This rate has been determined by manpower and immigration officials to calculate the budget for the Charlevoix riding under the Canada Works program and the Young Canada Works program.

Mr. Speaker, 23.4 per cent is the official rate established by Manpower Canada when we know full well that the rate does not take into account welfare recipients who are not included in statistics of unemployment or manpower offices.

Mr. Speaker, I checked today with the offices of Manpower Canada in my riding and I was informed that in December unemployment in Charlevoix, including welfare recipients, reaches 42 per cent. But because of an imaginary line somewhere along the St. Lawrence River, three-fifths of Charlevoix riding are included in metropolitan Quebec where you find cities with an unemployment rate around 5 per cent or 6 per cent. This is why, Mr. Speaker, my riding has an effective unemployment rate of 9.5 per cent when the actual and official rate as established by the department is 23.4 per cent.

Well, Mr. Speaker, a majority of my colleagues are from urban constituencies where the unemployment rates can be high and the people also are faced with property problems, but very few members here, outside my colleagues from the Atlantic region and eastern Quebec, really know what it is to live in an area where the unemployment rate may be as high as 20 per cent.

When we suggest it is not possible for an individual to find work for more than ten weeks, this is something other members from more affluent areas cannot get themselves to understand. Apparently they do not realize that in areas where the tourist trade is the only industry, the season extends from June 15 to September 15. Apparently they cannot understand fishing clubs are only open from June 24 to September 3, which can only give some nine work weeks. My colleagues do not seem to realize that even if people make five job inquiries a week by visiting in some particular village the two garages, the two groceries and the clothier or any other office where they might find employment, even if they repeat this 40 times or during 40 weeks, they will not find enough work to last for more than 12 weeks in a year.

And now we are dealing with Bill C-14. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest all the changes are acceptable in principle, because all the unemployed support the allocation of more funds to job creation, which is the specific aim of this legislation. However, Mr. Speaker, in the extremely underprivileged areas, particular measures are absolutely essential for the people to live decently. And to meet that concern to some extent, a special clause was introduced for areas with unemployment rates above the 11.5 per cent mark. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the following change has been made in clause 7(t) of this bill:

(t) establishing regions appropriate for the purpose of applying subsections 17(5) and (6) and section 35 and delineating boundaries thereof, based on the boundaries of the regions used by Statistics Canada in relation to its labour force survey;

It is because of this, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot support the bill in its present form. The government seems to be delineating areas without checking on the spot the effects that this will have. Those responsible will probably never have the opportunity to visit these areas or alleviate the human tragedies that their decision will cause.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall the anguish of Sir Cyril Radcliffe when Lord Mountbatten asked him to divide the Indian empire between what is now India and Pakistan. Sir Cyril Radcliffe was very concerned about the situation and very unhappy about having to do what was asked of him, but I have the impression that we are now faced with a blind administration which is saying: The Saguenay river goes through here and it will be a good place to put a boundary. No one thinks about the chain reaction that this can provoke in a specific area where people are too poor to fight and to look for more work.

Mr. Speaker, the major employer in my constituency is the Canada Works program, and every year, 600 to 700 jobs can be created in the area. This is an excellent program, and I must say that the people have learned to depend on it to improve their economic situation. However, there are certain rules for programs such as Canada Works. For instance, if someone worked last year on a given project, he is not entitled to work on another project this year. Now, people will be left without a job for 52 weeks. They will never again be able to qualify as former applicants or newcomers and be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make my colleagues aware of this type of day to day reality, of the serious problems that confront the underprivileged. Those are the concerns that I wanted to communicate to my fellow members. Perhaps we could ask Statistics Canada for example to refine its economic regions, to increase them so that the statistical data can correspond more closely to reality.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill requires of lot of improvement before it can be passed, and I trust that if we all decide to make it more acceptable to the underprivileged we can do so. It is with this wish that I would like to conclude my remarks.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are debating a bill to tighten up the Unemployment Insurance Act. This bill is made necessary, if it is necessary at all, by the disastrous economic and social policies of this government.

In introducing this bill on November 9 the minister said it was necessary because the government wanted to reduce some of the disincentives to work which are present in the program. The minister said this bill was necessary because the program cost over $4 billion in the latest fiscal year. If the program cost that amount, it is because in the last half dozen years of Liberal government there has been a steadily increasing number of unemployed and a steadily increasing unemployment rate. To a large extent this was brought about by the fact that the government has been more concerned about the threat of inflation than it has been about unemployment.

● (2052)

At the present time there are over one million people unemployed in the country. At least the last available figure for October, 1978, indicated that there were more than 900,000 people unemployed. That is an increase of approximately 2.5 times what it was ten years ago when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office. It is an indication of the failure of the goverment to deal with this problem. Although the bulk of unemployment, substantially more than half, occurs in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, there is relative silence on the part of members of parliament from Quebec. I find that rather interesting. They seem disinterested in the plight of their constituents, particularly the members from eastern Quebec where the rate of unemployment is 15 per cent or more.

In March of this year there were more than 300,000 people unemployed in the province of Quebec; in Ontario, more than 300,000 people; in British Columbia, more than 100,000; in New Brunswick 40,000; in Newfoundland, 35,000; and in Nova Scotia, 42,000. The situation is getting worse rather than better.

The announcement yesterday and today concerning the sharp increase in the cost of oil charged by OPEC countries will result in a further increase in the unemployment rate. The United States is expecting a substantial increase in its rate of unemployment, which will be reflected immediately in an increased rate of unemployment in Canada.

The official unemployment figure in Canada for the month of October was over 900,000 people. Many studies have been conducted in which estimates were made as to the real number of unemployed. The official figure represents only people who are unemployed and actively seeking work. Many researchers have established that the number of people unemployed is perhaps 30 per cent to 35 per cent higher than the official figure. The unemployed people who are not included in the official statistics, because they have given up looking for work, are married women and young people living in the slow growth areas such as Newfoundland, New Brunswick, eastern Quebec, northern Ontario, and the interlake area of Manitoba. In those areas there are no opportunities for employment, so people have stopped looking. The general problem of unemployment is serious, yet the problem facing young people is much, much worse. The official youth unemployment figure for many parts of Canada is 2.5 times the number of unemployed, rather than the 8.2 per cent figure for the entire labour force. In March of this year the official figure for youth unemployment was 16.5 per cent. In fact there are substantially more unemployed youths than that.

The government is attempting to hide the extent and the seriousness of unemployment in Canada. It has attempted to limit access to employment information at the regional level because the government realizes the situation is much worse than it has been willing to indicate or the public understands. It has been suggested that many people could be working but they do not want to work. The fact is that there are over 900,000 people unemployed, and there are less than 50,000 job vacancies in the country. This means for every job vacancy there are between 15 and 20 people unemployed. It does not take into account that many of the vacant jobs require skilled workers who cannot be found in the ranks of people seeking employment. That is a problem hon. members should discuss at length with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). The minister and his department have spent billions of dollars in manpower training programs which have failed miserably to meet the needs of employers. But that is not a subject for debate this evening.

We require more information than we are receiving if we are to deal with the problem of unemployment. If information became available as to the number of unemployed in various regions, the types of unemployed people, and the types of jobs which should be available and are not available, the government might be embarrassed. The fact that this information might embarrass the government ought not to dissuade us from insisting that Canadians and parliament are entitled to more information rather than less. The fact that this information might cause difficulty and embarrassment on the part of the government should not obscure the fact that the secrecy which the government and the Department of Employment and Immigration are attempting to achieve is not consistent with an open and democratic method of public policy development.

In September the government announced the cancellation of the joint federal-provincial community employment strategy program, even though the employment programs implemented by the government in recent years have always been too little and too late. The reason for the government's failure to meet the needs of people who want jobs can be found in the fact that the government has refused to commit itself to a program of full employment.

In the United States a full employment bill is seen as a necessary legislative framework to achieve full employment. Such a commitment has never been adopted in Canada. The equal opportunity and full employment act before the United States Congress and Senate defines full employment as a "situation under which there are useful and rewarding employment opportunities for all adult Americans willing and able to work." The Americans talk about full employment for all Americans willing and able to work, yet we receive a constant revision of the idea of full employment from the government.

At one time the government and its economic advisers considered acceptable unemployment to be 3 per cent of the labour force, then later it was increased to 4 per cent, and now the government talks about a much larger figure. A few years ago a system was adopted through the Unemployment Insurance Act whereby the more government failed, the greater number of people unemployed, the higher the percentage of the labour force unemployed, the more we paid our share of the unemployment insurance deficit. There is a built-in incentive for the government to fail, because the greater the amount of unemployment the less the government is required to pay. This is the situation which we are facing.

● (2102)

The minister, in various speeches inside and outside the House, has indicated there is a great desire on the part of Canadian people for a tightening up of unemployment insurance programs. He has indicated that the government wants to make unemployment insurance programs less generous, and wants to encourage the unemployed to take work. He has suggested there is a belief on the part of the public that many jobs are unfilled because the unemployed are unwilling to work.

On what does the minister base that belief? He bases it on a so-called marketing research study on unemployment insurance which was commissioned by his department and published in September, 1978. There is an indication on the first page that it contains "public reaction to proposed 'information on hiring' procedure". It states that it is "a survey of public opinion for: Employment and Immigration Canada", and was prepared by Contemporary Research Centre Limited.

Let me refer the minister to page 25 of that so-called survey which contains some of the questions which were asked. The first question or statement to which an answer is required is:

> Stricter controls are needed to ensure that unemployment insurance benefits do not go to people who will not take a job.

That statement received an 87 per cent favourable response. Anybody who has given any thought to the subject will know that the answers one gets depend to a large extent on the questions one asks. If one asks: when did you stop beating your wife, or have you stopped beating your wife, you will get a different answer than if you were to ask a sensible question.

Supposing instead of asking that kind of question about unemployment insurance the minister had asked a similar question about income tax, what do you suppose the favourable response might have been? Let me suggest a question to the minister. Suppose the survey had asked the following question: do you believe that the people at the upper income levels in this country do not pay their fair share of income taxes? I am sure he would have received more than the 87 per cent favourable response. He would likely have received a 97 per cent favourable response. Instead of asking the question that was asked in this survey, if it had asked, or suggested: many people in the upper income brackets take advantage of loopholes in the Income Tax Act in order to avoid paying their fair share of taxes, what percentage of favourable response would that have received? I would suggest it would receive a 95 per cent favourable response.

The survey then requested a response to the following statement:

> The new stiffer requirement to get unemployment insurance is a step in the right direction.

That received a 72 per cent favourable response. Supposing the survey had asked, or made the statement to which a response was required: the new stiffer requirements to make sure that people do not use loopholes in the Income Tax Act in order to avoid paying their fair share of income tax, what response do you expect that would have received? I suggest it would have received a 95 per cent favourable response, particularly if it had been asked of people working for wages and salaries, about the self-employed, doctors, lawyers and architects.

I suggest to the minister that this was not a fair survey and does not really represent what the people think. The minister received answers to questions predetermined or designed to elicit the kind of answers the government wanted, because the government was determined to cut down on the amount of money it has to pay out in unemployment insurance benefits to those who are unemployed.

The solution to the unemployment problem will not be found by forcing people to accept work they do not want. The solution to the problem is not to suggest to teachers, social workers, and others that they should take jobs mopping floors. The solution to the problem will be found when the government finds the jobs it promised the young people would be available when it encouraged them to go to colleges and universities.

We have the best educated and trained group of young people Canada has ever had, but what are we saying to them? We are telling them there are no jobs in this country in the fields in which they have been trained, and no jobs in the fields in which we encouraged them to study and labour for two, three, four or five years. We are saying that there are no jobs that will be financially rewarding, and no jobs that will be satisfactory in terms of the jobs for which they have been trained and which this country requires. That is what we are saying to them when we turn the screws on unemployment insurance regulations. We are telling them to take any job, regardless of past experience or education. We are telling them they have to take jobs because, if they do not take them, they will not receive unemployment insurance benefits. We are saying this as though it was their fault there are no jobs.

As I have indicated, the number of available jobs is limited to probably not more than one job for every 15 to 20 people unemployed. By forcing people who are receiving benefits out of the system we are not going to force them into other jobs. If every job vacancy was filled we would still have in the neighbourhood of 850,000 unemployed. That is a fact the minister stubbornly refuses to face.

We must consider who will be adversely affected by this measure. If we look at the facts we will discover it is not the ordinary citizen who has been brainwashed by the media of this country, and fooled by the kind of trick questions asked by those trained seals the minister hired to do this so-called survey, who will be affected. We will find it is precisely the poorest people in the country who live in slow-growth areas who will be adversely affected.

Let me refer the minister to a letter from a member of the legislature of Manitoba, the hon. member representing the provincial constituency of Churchill. That is an area in which a very large percentage—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting debate because we have people sitting across there like the minister who has been desperately trying to extricate himself from one of the biggest examples of foot and mouth disease this House has seen for a long time as a result of his intemperate and untimely remarks in committee.

An hon. Member: You're full of bugs.

Mr. MacKay: I can tell you about bugs, if you like. There are more bugs in this bill, and in the head of a minister who would make a statement like he did in committee, than one could find anywhere else outside a Dutch elm farm, I would suggest. The simple fact is that those people opposite have got themselves in a bit of a box. These are the hon. gentlemen who, over the years, have prided themselves on being the guardians of the social conscience of the nation. I remember when the present chairman of Air Canada, recently appointed, extolled the virtues of income redistribution, and assured all and sundry that this was a great thing, and that the situation was going to be all right just as long as these people had the opportunity to talk about unemployment insurance and bring in their big ideas of what was going on in admiration of it.

● (2112)

Members in my party and in the New Democratic Party pointed out at that time what would happen. In fact the whole history of unemployment insurance difficulty in this country can be traced back to when the government started to manipulate the situation that was to be found when we had a national employment service. Anyone who would care to go back over the history of the parliamentary debates and to examine what occurred, would see that some years ago when Tom Kent, the exalted gentleman who is looking after Sydney Steel and who was previously appointed to look after Devco, in the name of a national manpower strategy and other such misguided attempts to change the social fabric of the country, brought in, the forerunner to the present Unemployment Insurance Act.

There was a time in this country when employment and unemployment matters were in the control of the local office, and the local officials knew who needed work and who needed benefits. All of that was changed in the name of a national manpower strategy. In the aftermath of having this program computerized and dehumanized, there has been such gross administrative incompetence over the years that probably hundreds of millions of dollars have been wasted, dollars which could have been applied to permanent job creation programs.

We have reached the stage now, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has said, where $4 billion is paid out in this country in such a way that it is a tremendous drain on the economy, simply because the government has manifestly failed to do anything constructive in the way of giving Canadians who want jobs an opportunity of full employment and to do something to help their country in the process.

When the minister is made to face his failure, he talks about people in the most disadvantaged areas of the country in terms of saying that he does not want to spoon-feed them or, as he says, "put a nipple in the mouths of those young-people of the country the way the New Democratic Party would do". Another comment he has made is, "sit at home and wait for the unemployment insurance just to pour in." I do not always agree with some of the theories of my friends to the left, but certainly there was no suggestion by anyone in that party or by any other members in this House that people in any part of Canada were exhibiting an attitude like that. I think that it shows the attitude of this government and the attitude of the minister, that he would blow his cool, make a statement like that and, in so doing, harden and exacerbate the attitudes in this House and, indeed, in the country, and create this kind of environment where people have to sit back and take those kinds of gratuitous insults.

What is the outlook for people in the slow growth areas of this country, particularly in view of the energy crisis and the increasing costs which people will face in provinces like my own, Prince Edward Island, and in many other areas of the country? There are absolutely no real prospects for industrial growth and, therefore, regional development, as long as this kind of economic condition exists. Yet this is the time when the government chooses to bring in legislation to make it basically impossible for people who do not have jobs to survive without either going on welfare or some sort of relief, which is provided not by the federal government but by the municipalities or the provincial governments.

It is very easy to see, if the government cared to listen to some of the statements put forward by spokesmen for the provinces, that there is no way that the economies of some of the Atlantic provinces can withstand this additional burden. The submission by the Hon. Leslie I. Hull, the minister of social services for New Brunswick, sets this out very graphically. He says:

As you are well aware, there is a large seasonal component to unemployment. In the Atlantic provinces, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate not only masks the true unemployment picture, but is subject to unilateral manipulation by that agency of the federal government—Statistics Canada, with whom New Brunswick in particular has had a disastrous experience with respect to the equalization formula.

There are many interesting comments which could be made about that hon. minister's statement. I do not know whether Statistics Canada can be blamed entirely, but it seems to me—I am glad to see that the minister is back in his seat, and I know that he will correct me if I am wrong—that there has been a real effort made by the minister and his officials to keep from the public and members of this House some of the more distasteful pictures which have emerged about job vacancies. For example, I think that there have been memoranda which have found their way out into the public realm and into the House which show that the minister and his department are very reluctant to have the people of Canada know the extent of unemployment in this country.

I have listened to my friend, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), for many months while he has tried to bring to the attention of the House the situation of the hidden jobless. I have heard members in the New Democratic Party do the same thing. But this government steadfastly refuses to concede—or did until additional information came out—that anything other than the official figures as put out by Statistics Canada or the department could indicate the true state of unemployment. This kind of dishonesty is wrong, and it also indicates the attitude of this government in showing its distaste for job vacancy figures, another point which has been emphasized from this side of the House on different occasions.

How can people be expected to find employment in this country when there are only approximately 50,000 jobs available officially and there are perhaps, as my friend from Winnipeg North has indicated, over one million people unemployed? It does not make sense. Many provinces have made submissions to this government indicating ways in which they felt this bill could be improved and better administered, but again they met with absolutely no co-operation.

It is obvious, as far as answers to this country's unemployment question are concerned, that this government does not have any, when $4 billion is paid out as a drain on this country's economy and as a graphic testament to the failure of this government to take advantage of this nation's potential. If one thinks of the multiplier effect or the spin-off in the form of other unfortunate consequences as a result of the poor administration of this $4 billion, it is disastrous. This $4 billion is half of what the entire federal budget was not too many years ago.

When one thinks of the contribution that could be made to this country if those persons receiving the $4 billion in benefits were able to work, pay income tax and put their creativity to good use one begins to wonder. Some of them undoubtedly would be able to give up unemployment benefits and start their own businesses or create things which would enrich this country, instead of having to sit at home as do the people in my part of the country.

The people in my part of the country are not sitting at home and sucking their thumbs. They are looking for work, but they also feel that they have a right to live where they would like to in this country, where their forefathers have lived, and where they feel they have a right to make a decent living in the process.

A former minister of finance some years ago made the remark that it would be more appropriate for people to move out of depressed areas in this country.

An hon. Member: One-way tickets.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, one-way tickets, as my friend has said. By taking that approach, the minister merely helped to exacerbate the attitudes of many people in this country.

● (2122)

The minister introduced this bill at a time when we are supposed to be considering national unity in this country. We are supposed to be considering equality of opportunity and a chance to develop that part of the country where confederation began. Instead of that, we get gratuitous insults about the kind of life we have a right to live in eastern Canada and are told that we are probably sucking our thumbs instead of trying to work. I do not really believe that the minister meant that literally.

An hon. Member: Or said it.

Mr. MacKay: If he did not say it, Mr. Speaker, then the minutes of that committee ought to be checked. If he did not say it, he came so close to saying it, as the minutes reflect, that a lot of people across the country, including the news media, television commentators, and members of parliament have been misinterpreting what he did say. The Canadian Press among many others.

If the minister did not say it, then it is interesting that the old fox, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), had to go to such great lengths to explain what he did say. I do not think he got very far in convincing Cape Bretoners and Nova Scotians that he did not say it. Perhaps the minister will have better luck in trying it again, but I doubt that very much.

The process of unemployment insurance benefits has really been deranged and dehumanized over the years by administrative incompetence. First of all, the government had to go through the exercise of divorcing unemployment insurance, and the Canada Manpower strategy, setting up separate offices all across the country, confusing the public in the process, trying desperately to improve on a system that was working satisfactorily and then going through what to anyone else would be colossal humiliation. This government, however, has delusions of divine omnipotence and expects the people of Canada to take this in stride. It proposes to undo all that which had been done at taxpayers' expense at a cost of several hundreds of millions of dollars of administrative costs.

They are now putting unemployment insurance offices and manpower offices back together again. That they should come to parliament with such an administrative record and tell the Canadian people that they have to save money by cracking down on those who can least afford to pay, simply boggles the mind. With their history of maladministration, overpayments, complete disinterest in pursuing the abuses, how can they now come to this House in the Christmas season and through you, Mr. Speaker, tell unemployed people in the areas such as Newfoundland where unemployment is highest, that the only way the government can save money is to crack on the benefits available to seasonal workers and the like? Even Scrooge, with all his miserliness and the other objectionable qualities, would be taxed to the utmost to try to put together an approach such as this.

As this bill unfolds and as other members have an opportunity to speak, it will become more and more obvious that what this government proposes is not socially just or financially sound, but is unacceptable in every way. If they seek to impose it by use of closure, for example, or whatever other parliamentary device they have by virtue of their majority—which will not last much longer—they will have to answer for it very soon when the election is called.

I cannot think of a better issue on which to fight the next election than this government's record, in the creation of unemployment and the methods they choose to try to fool the people by bringing in such a measure as this. I am sure that many members who have sat in this House much longer than I, have not seen the equal of it. This could best be described as the personification of poetic justice—that this government has to come before parliament at this time of year, in the lame duck period of its administrative life, at a time when it is trying to push national unity, at a time of decay for this country that it brought on, at a time after ten years of its administration under this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that has seen unemployment go up by several hundred per cent, at a time when the country's deficit and economic performance and social climate have never been more inhospitable to the type of measures the government is trying to bring forward.

Whether it is unemployment insurance or regional development to try to help the have-not areas, whether it is transportation, in order to bring some semblance of equality across the country, or energy rates, does not matter. It does not matter what sort of social or economic measures this government has tried to bring in, the record shows that matters have reached a state of decay. It is not possible to find any area of social or economic life in this country that has improved in the last ten years.

This particular measure hits people where they can least afford it. Their economic livelihood is affected, and this is something that cannot be excused.

To use a trite expression, Mr. Speaker, this is the last straw. This is the last administrative gasp of a government that has taken what used to be a reasonably good system that had some actuarial soundness and twisted it to where it is costing the country $4 billion. All they can think of is to try to change it hastily. The hon. member for York Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan), one of the newest and one of the most able members of this House, pointed out in committee that instead of looking at it in an administrative way that makes sense from an actuarial point of view, the government is taking a hamfisted approach, an unfair approach, an approach that is socially unjust and administratively unsound.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, none of us on this side of the House can understand this particular approach, and why I could never support a measure such as this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to outline my concern regarding Bill C-14 which relates to the use by the Unemployment Insurance Commission of economic regions established by Statistics Canada to implement the repeater provision of the bill.

I notice that hon. members opposite are very vocal tonight, Mr. Speaker.

In reviewing the proposals in this bill, Mr. Speaker, I am sure it can be said that most people look forward to the amendments. There certainly has been a need to reform some of the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I would think that most people would support the provision that the minimum insurable earnings—if the bill is passed—will go up from $48, or one-fifth of maximum insurable earnings, to 20 hours per week at minimum wage, or 30 per cent of the maximum insurable earnings if a person is on commission or piece work. At the present time this would be 30 per cent of the maximum insurable earnings, $240, for minimum earnings on commission or piece work of $72. It is my understanding that the saving in Nova Scotia is $1.5 million.

● (2132)

The new entrance and re-entrance amendments will require people who are entering the work force to work for six months, and re-entrants, if they have not been part of the work force, to work for the last two years. Again this will mean a saving in Nova Scotia of $15.5 million.

Another amendment reduces the rate of UI benefits from 66⅔ per cent to 60 per cent, which will become effective on January 1, if the bill is passed. This will mean a saving in Nova Scotia of $23 million.

Had the provisions for the 33 per cent recovery of payments, the benefit repayment for higher income recipients, been in effect in 1978, the threshold would have been $18,720, or coming from 1.5 times the yearly maximum insurable earnings, $12,480, so there will be a 30 per cent recovery payment. The saving in Nova Scotia will be approximately $0.6 million.

Let me return now to my area of concern in this bill, that is, the repeater provision. I would like to outline exactly what it would mean in Nova Scotia. This provision is for repeaters to the work force.

According to the variable entrance requirements, they will need up to six weeks of work over and above the present entrance requirement. This proposal would mean a higher entrance requirement for people during their qualifying period—the qualifying period refers here to the last 52 weeks since the last claim started, whichever period is started—who received more weeks of UI benefits, and again the weeks of benefits would include weeks where benefits are being paid or are payable. For example, weeks of disqualification for voluntary quitting are deemed to be weeks of benefit paid. In other words, this proposal would mean higher entrance requirements for people who receive more weeks of UI benefits than the number of weeks they need to qualify under the variable entrance requirement, that requirement at present in Nova Scotia being ten weeks.

Individuals who on their previous claims receive less than ten to 14 weeks of benefits, depending on where they live, would not be affected by the change. They would only be required to find the needed ten to 14 weeks of variable entrance requirements to establish a new claim. However, the penalty comes in areas where a person has been on an extended benefit period or has taken more weeks than their ten insurable weeks or variable entrance requirement.

In an area of high unemployment, where the entrance requirement is ten weeks, the maximum entrance requirement to requalify for benefits would be 16 weeks. In other words, there is a provision in this bill which will affect the repeaters in the same qualifying period, although the department officials have stated in committee, and in studies they have done, that approximately 30 per cent of the repeaters will be able to find additional weeks to qualify for benefits in the same qualifying period. The saving in Nova Scotia, excluding the exempted areas—and I notice that the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) represents an area which will probably be exempted, the proposed exempted areas being Cape Breton and northern Nova Scotia—will amount to a total of $5.5 million. Under the proposed amendments, the total saving in Nova Scotia will be approximately $46.2 million.

An hon. Member: What a terrible government.

Miss Campbell: That is the proposal for the coming year.

My concern, as I said, is that the adoption of Statistics Canada economic regions does not reflect the true unemployment rate in South Western Nova. As presently defined, these regions will create a real hardship to thousands and thousands of Canadians, in my opinion. Nova Scotia has five economic regions according to Statistics Canada. As I mentioned, two areas are exempted from the repeater provisions, namely, Cape Breton and northern Nova Scotia which includes, for instance, Truro which, I am sure most Nova Scotians would agree, is one of the higher income areas in the province. However, areas such as these will be exempted from the repeater provisions.

My constituency illustrates the problems which would be created by the amendment. In economic region "E", which includes South Western Nova, the unemployment rate in 1977 was 10.3 per cent. Therefore we would not be exempted under the repeater provision contained in the bill. However, statistics obtained from the UIC district office in Yarmouth, which represents Digby, Yarmouth and Shelburne, are as follows: the average number of beneficiaries per month in Nova Scotia in 1977 was 39,382. For the same period, the average number per month at the Yarmouth district office was 4,339, approximately 11.1 per cent of the total number of beneficiaries for the province of Nova Scotia. However, the labour force for the Yarmouth district office, according to the 1976 mini-census, was 26,575 people. The percentage of unemployment at the Yarmouth district office, based on the average number of beneficiaries in 1977 out of the labour force in that area, was 16.3 per cent.

The total unemployment insurance paid out in 1977 for Nova Scotia was $192,881,000. For the Yarmouth district office it was $20,878,000, or approximately 10.8 per cent of the total paid out for Nova Scotia. However, the total population, using the district office figures, is only 8.8 per cent of the total population of Nova Scotia.

The above figures indicate that the UIC office in Yarmouth has an average unemployment of 16.3 per cent on a total labour force of 26,575. However, these statistics are overshadowed in economic region "E" by other areas, such as Lunenburg, which bring down the unemployment percentage of the region to the point of painting a badly distorted picture. The result is that this bill will disqualify, in my opinion, thousands of Canadians who would not be disqualified if they just lived on the other side of what is evidently an artificial boundary line.

● (2142)

As hon. members are aware, many areas in the Atlantic provinces have been exempted from the harshness of this clause. In Nova Scotia there are two Statistics Canada economic regions out of five which are exempt because their levels of unemployment do not average below 11.5 per cent. As I already mentioned, these areas are Cape Breton and northern mainland Nova Scotia, which includes approximately 38.9 per cent of the population of Nova Scotia 15 years of age and over.

The constituency of South Western Nova falls in another economic region which is not exempted. This region has about 14.5 per cent of the population of Nova Scotia. However, in this economic region the unemployment insurance district office for most of my constituency, Digby, Yarmouth and Shelburne, is situated in Yarmouth. It represents about 7.6 per cent of the total population of Nova Scotia.

The economic base of the constituency of South Western Nova is solely dependent on the amount of fish caught, a bit of farming and forestry and, of course, the tourist season in the months of June, July, August, and part of September. Therefore it is seasonal employment on which the people have to depend. This area also has some of the lowest incomes in the province.

As I said, this provision, particularly the use of economic regions without any discretion, is harmful in its effect on the constituency. Because the economic regions used by Statistics Canada are inadequate in calculating the unemployment rate in a given area, the minister or the commission should have the power to make special regulations so that all regions in Canada will accurately reflect real unemployment levels and not just area wide averages.

I realize that the pledge of this government is to produce work programs. I also realize that at the provincial level, in conjunction with federal programs, there is job creation. I believe that areas such as South Western Nova should have some say in how and where those jobs will be created. I also realize that our fishing industry will have to produce, as well as produce more finished products.

Come next September, October or November when one is looking for the required number of weeks, I hope there will have been jobs in that area in order that the people there can qualify with this ten to 16 weeks repeated provision.

I know the people in my area and all across Canada are looking for reforms within unemployment insurance. However, there must be some discretion as to the hardship this provision will cause if it is included in this bill. I cannot see why one area in Nova Scotia should be discriminated against because of the use of statistic regions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the next speaker, I should advise hon. members that I am becoming concerned about the way this report stage debate is developing into a second reading stage debate. This may be because of intimations of the Chair in the last session. However, there will have to be a rethinking of the process of report stage with some direction given to the Chair because it is impossible for the Chair, with all the authority given to it, to intervene every time and try to bring a member back to an amendment to a clause. I say this without wanting to prevent any member from participating in the debate. I just draw that to the attention of hon. members. When we get an opportunity tomorrow to look at the debates of today, we may be in a position to evaluate whether we are going in the right direction.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether my distinguished colleague from South Western Nova would reply to a very brief question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member accepts the question, there is no problem.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I attended the committee meetings. I did not see the hon. member there. However, if he would like to ask a question, that is fine.

Mr. Forrestall: Having supported this motion in committee, would the hon. member care to indicate to the House how she intends to vote at report stage?

Miss Campbell: The hon. member has been here longer than I. I am sure he realizes the final bill is not here. I will let the hon. member know at that time.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have noted the comments you made a moment ago concerning procedure at the report stage of the bill. I am the first one to be dismayed by procedure. I have to put up with it like all other members as long as it exists in its present form, because it has to be enforced. It is not the first time that we witness such confusion in our proceedings specifically as the result of that procedure. We think we are progressing but instead we are moving backwards. I have always maintained that it would be advisable to proceed in committee of the whole. I have always found that we then moved more quickly. Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to deal with procedure but merely say a few words about the comment you made a moment ago.

Mr. Speaker, I would like very seriously to give my view on the bill amending the unemployment insurance legislation. I remember that when the bill was passed by parliament some years ago, it then met an essential need. It was after or during the war. It was at a time when there were a great many jobs. With a few exceptions during the seasonal periods, most Canadians could work. It was not so mechanized and modern as it is today, and parliament adopted this legislation to make it possible for workers who became unemployed once in a while to get some money without incurring debts. That is why it was termed an insurance, for workers were called upon to pay a premium to protect themselves.

Later on, the legislation was amended. If the government is complaining today that too many workers are abusing the unemployment insurance legislation instead of actively seeking employment, it is because it introduced amendments which encouraged workers not to work—unfortunately, for a number of them, I do not want to generalize—and then to quit the labour market, because it was more interesting to receive unemployment insurance benefits. The benefits had been increased considerably and made more readily available.

Mr. Speaker, it is when there is much activity in the economy of a country, more particularly in Canada, that the eligibility conditions for unemployment insurance benefits must be the most difficult to meet. In such periods, it is generally possible for workers to find jobs and keep them. Therefore, in such times it is absolutely essential that the law be more strict if we want workers to keep serving the country, if we want them to be patriots and to work in order to transform our resources into useful goods that will be sold at the retail level in order to meet public demand. But when there is a recession, when the economy is in difficulty, when jobs are scarce, when progress has left less and less place for the worker and for the human participation in the production of essential goods or in the transformation of resources, I think the advantages or benefits of a law such as the Unemployment Insurance Act should be easier to obtain. Indeed, we must not penalize people because scientists, intelligent people, have succeeded in inventing and modernizing services. In all fields of activity, everyone aims at producing as much with fewer employees or at producing more without having to use a larger work force and they always succeed.

Naturally, the union movement as we know it today is another cause of the problem we are now witnessing in Canada. I am all for unions, but I am absolutely astounded to see some leaders use their unions as a tool not to build, not only to fight for the rights of the workers, but to change all sorts of things in our society which do not always better the fate of the workers, their families and the people as a whole. That is one of the reasons why many businesses in Canada do not want to expand at this time despite the incentives offered by the various governments. There are so many problems on every side, so many complications. Someone says: Let us set up a program to create jobs, to help public organizations give services to municipalities, to the people. On the other hand, we see a proliferation of rules, laws and requirements which prevent the implementation of thoses programs. And the bickering starts. On the one hand, there are inspectors who check on the people who work; and on the other, people are penalized when they work.

I could see that again in my constituency during the weekend. It is discouraging to see how public affairs are administered to annoy people, to make them quarrel. The Unemployment Insurance Act in its present form has bad aspects. The previous time it was amended, through Bill C-27, it was worsened instead of being improved. I recall that at the time I took part in the debate, and I said in the House that the amendments we were introducing were not likely to improve the conditions of the workers or to create jobs. The act in its present form, does not please everyone, of course. Earlier I heard the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe) who wanted to express his views on this bill—

An hon. Member: Where is he now?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I think he was right when he said that this piece of legislation would be acceptable if it were applied only in centres where manpower is being trained, where the unemployment level is very low. But in rural and underdeveloped areas, where industries do not settle but where there is plenty of manpower, this legislation will create more problems than it will solve.

The hon. member said that the 23 per cent figure as we know it is not correct. He is the one who quoted this figure earlier when he mentioned that in his riding 42 per cent of the labour force is unemployed. If he quoted that figure, I suppose he analyzed it first and I am convinced that he did not exaggerate. In my area, it is the director of the manpower centre who conducted an analysis and a review of the situation, and who stated at a certain point that 25 per cent of the labour force in that area was unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, I have other things to add, but I would like to point out that it is ten o'clock.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

● (2152)

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—REQUEST THAT BEEF IMPORT QUOTAS WILL NOT BE INCREASED

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight have to do with two questions I addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) and to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on November 27. They were related to a beef industry seminar which was held in Regina on November 22 and 23, and at which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was the after lunch speaker.

This two-day seminar was sponsored by the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and the Meat Packers Council of Canada. It was an excellent conference, the first of its kind in some five years. Discussion was focused on four main subjects—consumption, production, marketing, and government. It was significant that the opening session dealt with consumers, and their representatives were very much involved throughout the entire two-day meetings, especially Mrs. Yvonne Miles, president of the Canadian Association of Consumers.

I suggest that the minister's remarks to the seminar were abrupt and abrasive. I suggest to him that the public at large is well aware of the extreme difficulties from which the Canadian cattle industry has just emerged after three or four years of operation at or below cost of production. This applies to all sections of the industry, but particularly to the cow-calf, grass yearling and feedlot sectors. Just a courteous reference by the minister in his speech to this background would have been both appropriate and appreciated.

His two personal assistants attended the meeting and could have properly briefed the minister. Certainly, he was invited to speak as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but he might at least have been more aware of his audience and of the people they represented. They represent a $2 billion industry, the largest agricultural commodity group in Canada. Instead, the minister called for a conference of all sectors of the beef chain to establish a dialogue for decision. That is precisely what that meeting was. It was the first time in five years we got around to doing that on our own.

● (2202)

He told us to rationalize our operation and improve efficiency. Where was he in the terrible western drought year of 1977, the worst since the 1930s, and during last winter's blizzards which killed thousands of cattle?

Then he proposed floor and ceiling prices for live cattle and opening up our beef import quotas, this to protect consumers.

He quickly forgot the $10 market drop over the entire North American continent which came after President Carter opened the United States beef import quotas by only one pound per person last spring. This, of course, was done for political purposes.

Finally, at a beef seminar he told Canadians to eat more fish and poultry. I repeat: he was abrupt and abrasive.

We are now on the down side of our cattle number cycle, in Canada and the United States, and that is why the price cycle is now higher. Continued heavy kill of cows and heifers in North America has definitely lowered our potential per capita supplies for 1980 through to the end of 1982. We are now in a critical position.

Our Canadian Cattlemen's Association has advised Canadian cattle producers to retain 15 per cent to 20 per cent more heifer calves than last year for breeding next year. In my opinion this has not happened and, in addition, too many cows which could have produced two more calves each went to slaughter this fall. Both of these developments arose for the same reason, that is, to take advantage of the very strong cattle prices to pay off creditors, in other words, banks, after four losing years.

In my supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture I asked for a reassurance that it was not government policy to increase beef import quotas and to install floor and ceiling live cattle price limitations. I thank the minister for this reassurance. He said this: "At this time we have no intention of changing it." He went on to add, and I quote:

—if the policy which was announced jointly by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and myself did not work, we would bring in an immediate import law.

That was a reference to a joint policy announcement by the Department of Agriculture and by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce last March 30. The announcement came under the heading "Beef and Veal Import Controls". I want to quote briefly from that announcement:

The quotas will be set under the Export and Import Permits Act in relation to the average level of beef and veal imports between 1971 and 1975, adjusted for changes in domestic beef consumption since this base period.

The announcement went on as follows:

We will use this procedure for the next three years and evaluate its effectiveness . . . we will introduce legislation to control imports.

Such legislation would be introduced if it were necessary. That three-year period will not be up until March of 1980. Let us not have a repeat of 1976 when 186 million pounds of offshore beef were imported. That was an increase of some 60 per cent over the previous year, with the help of that infamous "6 cent under" rule.

Finally, I want to add that Canadian beef cattle producers and feeders desperately need some incentive to remain in the beef cattle industry. Their confidence in government policy, both short and long term, has been severely tried over the last four years. Increasing import quotas and bringing in floor and ceiling live prices is not the way to bring confidence and increased production and stability to our cattle industry. I urge the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to announce the 1979 beef import quotas as soon as possible and before the year's end so that our industry can plan accordingly.

[Mr. Hargrave.]

● (2207)

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in a joint statement dated March 30, 1978, issued by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), it was announced that the federal government set up an ongoing procedure to control imports of beef and veal. At the time it was stated that the quotas will be set under the Export and Import Permits Act in relation to the average level of beef and veal imports between 1971 and 1975, adjusted for changes in domestic beef consumption since this base period. The government is currently in the stage of calculating what the import levels should be for 1979. We are not able to say specifically that there will be no adjustment in 1979, but I can say that the minister does not expect any substantial change.

It is recognized that cattle producers have had a difficult time during the last four years, but fortunately cattle prices have improved substantially. However, we believe producers must be given an opportunity to recoup some of their losses and regain confidence in the cattle industry. Only if Canadian cattle producers have confidence that in the longer term they will receive reasonable and stable prices, will they again increase their cattle inventory levels. Of course, this is in the long term interest of consumers as well.

With reference to the current marketing situation, undoubtedly the hon. member is aware that the level of cow marketings has decreased. This points to an increase in cattle inventories some time down the road. However, a turnaround in the beef situation will not take place until around 1982 because of the time required for the build up of cattle herds.

While it is recognized there has been some increase in cow exports, this was brought about partly as a result of the change in exchange rates, that is, the reduced value of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar, and partly by the failure of our processors to outbid their United States counterparts for Canadian supplies. We have no intention of introducing a floor and ceiling for live cattle prices. Concerning the floor price, hon. members are probably familiar with the stabilization program which is in effect.

Slaughter cattle are one of the named commodities under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. This act, along with the cow-calf stabilization program, has been of real benefit in helping producers through the difficult period. The stabilization program assisted producers to cover their cash costs of production and to carry on despite the low prices as a result of the sharp increase in beef supplies on the world market.

The emphasis on stability is consistent with our policy to control imports. A ceiling on live cattle prices, on the other hand, would only further disrupt the cattle industry and undermine the confidence we are trying to restore to the industry for the long-term benefit of Canadian producers and consumers.

EMPLOYMENT—CLARIFICATION OF PROVISIONS OF OUTREACH PROGRAM

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my concern tonight is a question which I asked of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) on last Thursday. It arose in a committee hearing at which the question of the outreach projects and their evaluation was being discussed, particularly the question as to why the evaluation of those projects could not be made public.

In answer to a question asked by an hon. member of the New Democratic Party, the minister said that there may be some situation where they do an evaluation of the project and find that somebody in charge of it is a hopeless alcoholic or a drug addict or they have a problem at home, or God knows what else. Also he indicated that they did not want to make that kind of information public. The sentiment on the part of the minister seemed quite clear in his answer. At the time it took some 90 people who worked for Outreach programs across the country—and there are 22 such programs—and put them all in the same bag. It made them all subject to the possibility that their projects were not being evaluated in a public way because they were drug addicts or alcoholics.

I asked a question of the minister. He said that there may be some situations. I was not asking him to make all evaluations public. I was asking him to clarify whether he was referring to all of the employees, all of the project managers, or only some of them. I received representations in my office, as I am sure a number of other members did, from the employees or people who were working on those Outreach programs. They wondered why they were singled out to be slurred with this type of allegation by the minister. His answer was simply to explain what was quite clear from his original statement, that they did not want to make personal information public. We understand that on this side of the House.

Perhaps there are occasions when personal information in a memorandum may be embarrassing to someone if released. We would never make anything public, or want it made public, when it is embarrassing to a private individual. If it is embarrassing to someone in the House, that is a slightly different case. We understand the concern the minister had. What we do not understand is why he refuses to make those evaluations public in the face of what is a perfectly reasonable request. Hopefully tonight will give the minister or his representative a chance to put that wrong right and to admit there is a valid principle of privacy, but you do not have to extend it to all 90 people.

● (2212)

We wonder whether the reluctance to release that kind of information is perhaps because in the process of the budget cuts that were announced during August the government has been cutting programs without regard for their efficiency or effectiveness. We wonder whether the evaluations that are so secret for these allegedly personal reasons are being kept secret because they reveal that these programs operated by volunteers have in fact been more effective than programs operated under the direct control of the minister.

There is suspicion on this side of the House, as well as outside the House, that many of these cutbacks being talked about in such broad terms are a sham and that where the cutbacks are real they are being implemented in a very sudden, unplanned and ad hoc way, and that projects which are more efficient than those of agencies directly under the control of a variety of ministers in the government are being cut back without public reasons being given because it would be embarrassing to the ministers involved to have that fact revealed, that volunteers working on their own for low pay, with poor resources, can achieve a higher level of accomplishment than the vast bureaucracy run by this government.

Let me quote from a presentation prepared by some of the Outreach people backing up that point. They said:

> In response to a question posed in the House of Commons, Bud Cullen justified the elimination of women as an Outreach target group on the basis of "16 or 17" other programs which his ministry has set up to help women.

That has reference to the ministry of unemployment and immigration. I suppose I should say "employment and immigration", to be formally correct.

The quotation continues as follows:

> In fact, there are no other services which fill the needs that Outreach programs address. Mr. Cullen did not specify the programs he had in mind, and employees in his department were unable to name 16 or 17 other services that are directed toward women. Programs which do exist to serve women, while useful, do not deal with the client volume served by Outreach projects. In Ottawa, for example, two major C.E.C. women's courses . . . respectively served 16 and 18 clients last year, compared to 600 served by the three counsellors at the Ottawa women's Outreach program. Similar ratios apply to Toronto and London.

This whole evaluation process is being kept very secret. The people who run the programs are not being consulted. They do not know how they are being assessed. They do not know what the results of those assessments are. All they know is that the minister justifies his refusal to make those assessments public by saying that some of the people who manage the programs might be drunks or dope addicts. I think that is an inexcusable refusal to provide information on how well the programs have gone.

We sympathize with the government's desire to cut back. We feel it is necessary to cut back on the amount the government is and has been spending, but if the government is doing it in this way without any public assessment of programs, and without any ability of people to compare the assessments that are being made, and to say then that this is a justified cutback, and that is a justified cutback, and this is an unjustified cutback, is not acceptable. There may be cases where very valuable programs have to be cut. We are certainly never going to know, if this is the kind of process the government follows. We are certainly never going to know, if ministers of the Crown give this kind of answer to serious questions when the reputations of very dedicated volunteers have been impugned in this House or in committees of this House.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reiterate the minister's opposition to the tabling of the individual Outreach project assessments in their entirety. However, at committee the minister was asked to provide the following: (a) the program evaluation, less its recommendations and conclusions: (b) the program criteria; and, (c) the assessment of certain women's projects. The minister has agreed to table soon, at the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, the evaluation and the criteria. He will not table the assessments as they may contain material which could be misconstrued and cause a negative effect on the projects themselves.

● (2217)

Let me explain to those who may not be aware what the Outreach program is. The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission's Outreach program aims at improving the job prospects of people who, for various reasons, cannot benefit fully from services offered by local Canada Employment centres, manpower services.

Some of the commission's clients have many barriers to overcome in their search for jobs, and Outreach focuses on helping the following groups who are particularly affected: native people, physically and mentally handicapped people, long-term welfare recipients, inmates and ex-inmates, residents of isolated or remote communities, and people experiencing great difficulty entering or re-entering the labour force.

Through Outreach, community groups and agencies can sponsor a project which delivers a full range of personalized employment-related services and provides access to commission programs for their clients. In many cases these agencies already offer employment-related services, and with the help of and on behalf of the commission, can broaden the scope and extent of these services. The agencies fulfil a valuable role by providing an interim service for their clients until they no longer need it or until they can benefit from regular Manpower services.

When a community group or agency has identified a need for employment-related services for a special group, it submits a project proposal. Once a proposal is accepted, an agreement is signed between the commission and the community group or agency. The agreement reflects the project activities, procedures and objectives, and defines the commission's rights and obligations and the agency's obligations to the commission and to the clientele.

Having said all this, and to explain the program better, the minister will also be tabling, with the standing committee, profiles of all women's projects in Canada, with selected statistics relating to each of these projects.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.19 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

END OF VOLUME II