VETERANS AFFAIRS

CALL FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are some cabinet ministers whose departure from Ottawa would not exactly depress us, but there are one or two exceptions. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs, before he considers leaving this place, to add to the good job he has done on behalf of veterans by introducing legislation to provide prorata pensions for widows of disabled veterans, in any case where the veteran's pension was below 48 per cent, and also by introducing legislation to amend and update the War Veterans Allowance Act, it being clear that this House would co-operate with the minister in enacting such legislation without delay, and certainly before he leaves.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MEDIA

NEWS CONFERENCES HELD BY PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity involving the principle of news manipulation and control.

In view of the concern of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about whether he sits down or stands up at his semi-occasional news conferences, keeping in mind the parliamentary press gallery's official request today that the Prime Minister return to his practice of weekly news conferences, hosted by a member of the press gallery executive and in the National Press gallery theatre, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House requests the Prime Minister to show his professed respect for the media and for freedom of information by moving his news conferences back to the renovated Lester Pearson press theatre, where he will not be open to the charge of news manipulation.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INDUSTRY TO DEVOTE PROPORTION OF PROFITS TO RESEARCH AND MODERNIZATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of pressing necessity, that is the general economic climate in the country.

Considering that the closing of the Cadbury plant in Montreal will entail the loss of 500 jobs in Quebec.

Considering that the main cause of that closing is the fact that the company in Montreal has used its capital to open another manufacture in Ontario rather than to modernize the one which has been operating for 60 years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the government seriously consider forcing large manufactures to reinvest each year at least 15 per cent of their profits for research and modernization of their facilities to avoid repetition of such disasters.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB OPPORTUNITIES FOR STUDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has received many telegrams and representations from student associations about the disastrous effects that Bill C-14 will have on graduates seeking permanent employment and students seeking summer jobs during this period of unprecedented youth unemployment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

That this House calls upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to introduce amendments to remove from Bill C-14 the harmful changes in the eligibility requirement and benefit rate, along the lines of students' concerns.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion could be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT PRINCIPLE OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME BE INCLUDED IN BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent matter of national importance.

Considering the extremely serious unemployment situation in Canada, the high number of job seekers and the deterioration of the purchasing power of Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House urge the Minister of Finance who will introduce a new budget on November 16 to include in his budget the principle of annual guaranteed income payable on a universal basis to all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

URBAN AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF CMHC ANNUAL REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In light of the fact that recent police investigations in several centres across Canada suggest inadequate accounting procedures and very questionable management decisions, and in light of the fact that the present Ministry of State for Urban Affairs lacks the necessary leadership, policies and co-ordinating programs to ensure the proper disposition of $1.3 billion, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House directs the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to refer the last annual report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs in order to examine and make recommendations to the minister in an effort to restore taxpayer confidence in CMHC and the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC WORKS

PRESS CONFERENCE ROOM FOR PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is somewhat similar to an earlier one, but I think there are some differences.

Since the Department of Public Works has spent taxpayers' dollars to remodel the press conference room at the National Press building which the Prime Minister does not want to use because he must sit to answer questions there, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to use the press conference room refurbished at public expense and that he not worry about his public image since most Canadians are already convinced that he is sitting down on the job anyway.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF DEPARTMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. While I realize that he has three jobs and that his deputy minister has just returned from a six months' vacation, in light of the ongoing RCMP investigations can the minister assure the House of his confidence in his deputy minister and those who are managing the affairs of his ministry?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like the hon. member to be more specific about the investigations she is talking about. I am not aware of many investigations. I am aware of one in Hamilton. I indicated in the House previously that I thought it was very unfair on the part of the hon. member to try to generalize and create doubt in the public mind on the basis of one specific investigation which is taking place with the full support of the CMHC administration. I think the hon. member ought to be more specific when suggesting a series of inquiries. If there are others, she should let me know what she is talking about.

Mrs. Pigott: Again, the minister does not answer the questions put to him.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That's right.

Mrs. Pigott: If the minister wants a recital, I can give him a recital.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Pigott: If that is what the minister wants, why does he not ask for the cabinet file compiled by Mr. Basford where he lists all the 11 luxury hotels under section 6(1)? Why does he not talk about 150 Sandford Place in Hamilton? We could talk about Vancouver—

• (1417)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, would she put it forthwith.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, the minister did ask for a recital.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Pigott: The document which I held up the other day was signed by the minister. He thought it was public. It says in this document that housing and community service programs also offer a major avenue for federal flexibility in the constitutional debate. Can the minister assure this House that shelter for Canadians is not being used as a bargaining tool at constitutional talks?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is citing only part of a document in a very partisan way. The total document would clearly indicate the excellent policies of this government. I ask the hon. member to table the document.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I realize that I have been here only a few months, but I thought it was the minister who should table documents, not me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: I would gladly offer the document, which is signed by the minister, for tabling.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY URBAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. There has been a record number of AHOP defaults and walkaways this year: the rate is four times that for conventional CMHC mortgages.

My question is in relation to the pending disaster regarding AHOP housing. Can the minister tell the House why his deputy minister ignored a cabinet order signed on July 17, 1973, which would have established a senior interdepartmental committee on urban affairs? That committee produced only one report, and the minister is aware of it. Can the minister tell the House why his department head ignored that cabinet order which would have established this committee on an ongoing basis?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think such a committee has been meeting. I do not know what the hon. member is talking about. I think he is totally out of court when he alleges in this House that the deputy minister ignores cabinet directives.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I am not making suggestions regarding the deputy minister. I suggest that the minister has ignored his responsibilities. Can the minister produce any committee report other than the one which was produced in 1975? If this committee has been meeting as it should have been doing, and if it has produced annual reports, can the minister produce the reports since 1975?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, a number of studies are taking place within Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in order to improve our housing programs. A number of officials from various departments are working together in order to improve the rate of production of housing for low income people who want to have better accommodation in Canada.

The hon. member is talking about some activities which are taking place. There has, indeed, been a series of meetings in order to improve our programs and to facilitate better production of housing. These meetings involve federal and provincial governments and their purpose is to provide more housing at low cost for low income people and senior citizens.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, the minister is obviously confused. I am not talking about any study but the one authorized in the legislation of 1970. I have here a confidential cabinet report dated July 17, 1973, and I am showing it to the minister. I am talking only about the senior interdepartmental committee on urban affairs. Has that committee met? If so, would the minister table its reports since 1975?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to live for the future and not for the past.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member is referring to a document which goes back to 1973. I would like to remind all members of this House, particularly those in the New Democratic Party who are so noisy today, that the production of housing reached record levels in the years 1975, 1976 and 1977. We have one of the best records of production in housing for Canadians, a record that cannot be matched by many countries in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: With a past like this government's, I can understand why the minister is talking about the future.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

RADIATION HAZARDS FOLLOWING CRASH OF SOVIET SATELLITE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Tomorrow, as the minister might know, an important book by Leo Heaps, entitled "Operation Morning Light" will be published. This book deals with the crash of the Soviet satellite, Cosmos 954, in the north of Canada last year.

Considering that Mr. Heaps, in this book, contends that there are certain facts pertaining to potential dangerous health and ecological effects of the radiation produced by this crash which have not been revealed to the public, can the minister tell the House if the study done by the research laboratory of AECL at Pinawa, Manitoba, has been completed; and, if so, why has it not yet been made public?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to look into this question to find out the status of that study. In the meantime, may I reassure the hon. member and the House that the information and advice I have received from AECB which assisted in the clean-up and identification of radioactivity in the north, was that there was no threat to Canadians or to the environment.

Mr. Broadbent: My second question pertains very directly to what the minister has just touched upon in his answer. I hope he will consider his words with great care in answering the question, because it is most serious. Considering that only a small fraction—less than 4 per cent, I am informed—of enriched uranium 235 has so far been accounted for, can the minister assure the House that threats, both to human health and to the ecological system of the north, have been negligible?

Mr. Gillespie: If the hon. member has new information which has not yet been made public, I will want to reserve my position. But I have told him of the advice which I have received, to the effect that there was no threat to the health and safety of Canadians.

Mr. Broadbent: I can tell the minister that the same officials did everything they could to stop the author from getting information which ought to have been made available to the public, and that is well documented in the book.

My final question to the minister is this: considering that the Great Slave Lake was covered with contaminated particles, and considering that the bones and marrow of caribou eaten by the native people are possibly dangerously contaminated, is the government now monitoring, and does it plan to continue to monitor in the future, the possible effects of fissionable by-products on the northern food chain as a whole?

Mr. Gillespie: There have been a number of studies involved in this unfortunate and unhappy event. There was a very substantial clean-up throughout the winter snow period and a further clean-up during the non-snow period, particularly around the communities. So far as I know, that clean-up has been completed.

With respect to ongoing studies and monitoring of the effects, that work might well be undertaken by a number of different agencies and universities. I will want to inform myself on just what research is being done in that area at present.

EMPLOYMENT

INQUIRY WHETHER BUDGETARY CUTS WILL HELP WORKERS LAID OFF BY CADBURY COMPANY

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Could the minister specify whether the money saved through the regular budgetary cuts in the unemployment insurance program will be of some help through retraining or job creation programs, especially to the 500 newly unemployed people from Cadbury?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, officials of both the federal and provincial government met with company and union representatives as early as August in an attempt to sign a manpower assessment incentive agreement for that plant. In fact, the office staff signed an agreement, but the workers did not because both levels of government were endeavouring to convince Cadbury's in fact to stay where it was and did not wish to usurp the role of the unions which felt that it would just make it a little easier, shall we say, for Cadbury's to leave if it signed this particular agreement. The staff and personnel are available. The funds are available, be they for retraining, mobility grants or in whatever way they can be used to help in this unfortunate situation.

URBAN AFFAIRS

HOUSING—PRACTICALITY OF MORTGAGE DEDUCTIBILITY PROVISION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Since the minister, quite understandably, does not want us to live in the past—because obviously the past is catching up with the minister and the government—I should like to refer to a document which is more in the present. It was given to cabinet just a few months ago.

Reference is made in the document to the fact that there are 438,000 households in Canada where over 30 per cent of income is paid for shelter, a situation which might be helped considerably by our mortgage deductibility proposal.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Is the minister prepared, today, to release to the House and the country a study, which was commissioned by himself within the Department of Urban Affairs into the feasibility and practicability of the mortgage deductibility provision which we put forward? I understand that study shows the proposal in a most favourable light. Will the minister release that study to the House today?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position I presented on behalf of the Canadian government at the last two federal-provincial ministers of housing conferences clearly indicates that we do not favour the proposal put forward by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. The reasons are very simple. It would be of great advantage to the rich people who have expensive homes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: That is baloney.

Mr. Ouellet: It would be a measure which discriminates against renters.

Mr. Alexander: That is baloney as well.

Mr. Ouellet: It would be a measure which discriminates against the elderly who have no mortgages. Also, it would be a measure which would have very serious impact on financial markets. Therefore, in the past at two specific conferences of ministers of housing I indicated the position of the Canadian government, that we reject that proposal.

I see that right behind the hon. member, the former mayor of Toronto is smiling. Not too long ago he indicated that he did not favour the position of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Obviously, the minister is protesting too much. In the view of the minister, the program was designed for the rich. It will help to alleviate some of the terrible burden a great many people in the country have to undergo because of high mortgage and high shelter costs, as was identified by the fact that 438,000 householders are paying more than 30 per cent of their income for housing. Will the minister now lay before the House the study by the Department of Urban Affairs which shows that the mortgage interest deductibility proposal in fact favours the majority of people in the country and in fact is feasible?

Mr. Alexander: As the Minister of Finance knows.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member that, indeed, a very substantial number of those who are paying more than 30 per cent of their income for rent are renters who will receive nothing from the scheme proposed by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, that is a misrepresentation of the facts, and the minister knows it.

Some hon. Members: Oh oh!

Mr. McGrath: The minister continues to misrepresent the situation. What action does the minister propose to take respecting the statement made by the vice-president for policy, Mr. Adamson, in Windsor last weekend, in which he literally dumped all over this proposal which the minister is now dumping all over, in view of the fact that this man is a public servant and unquestionably will be called upon to implement this proposal in a few months' time?

● (1432)

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised by the attitude of the hon. member. I hope he is not giving the official position of his party by indicating that those who might not have the same opinion as they have will be shut up and will have no right to speak out. We on this side of the House believe that, indeed, people have every right in this country to speak out and express a genuine point of view. I am surprised, and I am afraid that if the Conservative party takes over there will be less freedom of information and less freedom of speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PUBLIC WORKS

EXPROPRIATION OF "LE DIPLOMATE"

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he can explain to the House why he signed a notice of intention to expropriate, without a public hearing, in respect of a property called Le Diplomate adjacent to Les Terrasses de la Chaudière? The House will remember this was the same property that was the subject of correspondence between the developer and Mr. Juneau in which the developer suggested court action would be appropriate, although he did not wish to be involved in it.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, there is, in fact, a court action under way. My understanding is that there is a very genuine question as to whether a leasehold interest exists. The building that was under lease was, in fact, to a very large degree destroyed by fire a year and a half ago. There have been ongoing negotiations with the former lessor and apparently there were some complications. It was indicated to me that the most prudent way to deal with the case, if an interest did exist, was in fact to handle it through this expropriation procedure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the minister would not think that a court of law would be the appropriate way to determine whether or not there was an interest. If there is no interest there to expropriate, perhaps the reason for holding out the expropriation procedure, particularly without public hearing, could just possibly be interpreted in the minister's mind—and perhaps he can put this to rest—as a device to help stop the probability of certain of his colleagues and himself appearing in a court of law to testify about the background of this whole affair.

I would ask him, as well, why there appears to be concern in respect of Le Diplomate when two other properties cheek by jowl do not appear to be the subject of the same concern.

Mr. Buchanan: The answer to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely not; and the answer to the second part is, this is the only one, in my understanding, that was involved in this fire situation.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

CASH REQUIREMENTS FOR 1978 AND 1979

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, and it arises from certain comments he made at his press conference yesterday. The transcript of that press conference indicates that he said:

> The cash requirements will be of 9 billion this year, 11 billion next year, probably a bit more the year after—

As the Prime Minister probably realizes, the Minister of Finance last informed us that the cash requirements for Canada this year will be $11.8 billion, and $9.7 billion next year. Would the Prime Minister clarify whether he has new information in respect of cash requirements of the nation, or did he make a mistake yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I said in relation to comments by other ministers, Mr. Speaker, the finance minister is right.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, let me ask a further question arising out of the Prime Minister's remarks yesterday. The Prime Minister stated, in respect of the deficit:

> —it is not the size that is frightening. It is the rate of growth in the past two or three years and that is what we are trying to control, not the absolute size of the deficit but the fact that provincial, municipal and federal deficits in the past two years were growing at a very fast rate . . . about 15 per cent—

Would the Prime Minister indicate whether he is aware that in the years he has referred to it was the federal deficit that almost tripled, from approximately $4 billion to something like $11 billion at the present time, while the aggregate municipal-provincial deficits actually declined? If he is aware of that, why is he trying to finger the provinces and the municipalities when his government is responsible for such a rising deficit in the country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member refers to the question as well as to the answer, he will see the context in which that explanation was put forward; to wit, that the size of the deficit in Canada—the over-all deficit at all levels of government—is not out of hand and not out of comparison with other countries which have higher debt proportionately.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I hear some "tsk, tsks" over there. If they read the press conference, they will see that, Mr. Speaker. It was the questioner himself who put these correct facts forward. The thrust of my answer—and that is why I said the minister's figure was correct—was that it is not the size of the deficit which is big, which is not untowardly big, but it is the rate of growth which was too fast.

As a result of the figures which the minister and the President of the Treasury Board put forward, the hon. member will see that the rate of growth has been reduced from something in the area of $11 billion this year to something in the area of $9.7 billion next year. It is the rate of growth we are acting upon, and not on the absolute size of the deficit which, I repeat, in terms of the questioner himself, is not astonishingly high.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FIREARMS CONTROL PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

With regard to the restricted firearms recall campaign undertaken by the Canadian government and more particularly by his department, could the minister tell the House and the Canadian public whether it is true that this campaign has had disappointing results in the province of Quebec? At the same time, could he indicate whether this campaign is having encouraging results in other parts of Canada?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing to the attention of the House this program which, I suggest, should be promoted, and I urge all members to boost the publicity for this program with a view to ensuring the progress of this program which has been in effect since November 1.

I hasten to indicate to the hon. member and to the House that indeed we are very much encouraged by the public response to this program. We have received over 5,330 firearms from Canadian individuals, either for registration or for ultimate disposal. This is a very encouraging figure and the answers are coming in at an increasingly faster rate due to a very effective advertising campaign.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FEASIBILITY STUDY ON COAL MINE IN DONKIN, N.S.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I should like to address my question to the parliamentary secretary.

Most recently, the Cape Breton Development Corporation presented to DREE the first phase of the feasibility study on a new coal mine outside Glace Bay called the Donkin area. Would the parliamentary secretary confirm this, and will he table it in the House? If he cannot do that, will he table it with members of the regional development committee and indicate when the more important and crucial second phase of the study is expected to be completed?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question, and I will take notice of it.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I expected that the minister would be here for these questions. Will the parliamentary secretary also take notice of the fact that there are very strong rumours in the Cape Breton area that, because of difficulty regarding the coal preparation plant producing coking coal, this year we may not be able to provide enough coal to fulfil the orders of the Steel Company of Canada and Dofasco, thereby putting the corporation in a bad position? Will he ask the minister to comment in that regard, because this is very crucial to the future of the coal industry?

Mr. Wood: I certainly will, Mr. Speaker.

PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE OF PACIFIC PETROLEUMS SHARES—FINANCIAL LIABILITY OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for the purpose of seeking clarification. Is it his position that the financial liabilities incurred by Petro-Can, or any of its subsidiaries, which the Prime Minister referred to as a Crown agency, are in no way financial liabilities of the Government of Canada, and the Government of Canada will not ultimately be responsible in connection with those liabilities? Is that his position?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that there is a contingent liability as far as the Crown is concerned. There has never been any question that Petro-Canada is an agent of the Crown and that, acting as an agent of the Crown, there is that contingent liability. It was made perfectly clear in my answer that there is no taxpayers' money involved in this transaction in any way, nor were there any express government guarantees.

I went to some lengths yesterday to indicate that the section of the Petro-Canada act which provided for government guarantees was a section of the act that was not used. There were no government guarantees nor taxpayers' money used in that transaction.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if at some time the minister would explain why it has taken me three days to get that information from him.

I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister and ask him why, in light of the answer the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has just given, the Deputy Prime Minister, answering on behalf of the Prime Minister on November 14, said with respect to these arrangements of Petro-Canada, "It does not represent in any way a demand on government resources." Was that a misleading answer by the Deputy Prime Minister, in these circumstances?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear a moment ago that this was a commercial transaction, that it was financed by the private banking system and that no taxpayers' money was involved. Therefore, there was no demand in any way upon the financial resources of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to re-read the question I asked him three days ago, and whether he can say in his heart that he honestly and openly answered it as he has today.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to re-read that question too, and also, when he uses the words "express guarantees", whether he means express guarantees. Clearly, that was the phrase he used and I answered him in exactly the same way. I dealt with that in my answer yesterday. The hon. member cannot have it both ways.

PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE OF PACIFIC PETROLEUMS SHARES—CONTINGENT LIABILITY OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Could the minister explain to the House how he rationalizes his admission now, after three days, that there is a contingent liability on the Crown in regard to transactions of Petro-Canada, but that it in no way represents a demand upon the resources of the Government of Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think that anyone with any experience at all would understand that answer.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the minister go back to school.

My supplementary question is to the President of the Treasury Board. The 1978 capital budget for Petro-Canada was approved by cabinet on June 16, 1978, and the Privy Council document was tabled on October 10. This capital budget calls for common share issues of 205 million and preferred share issues of about 270 million. Since the Petro-Canada act clearly establishes that only the Crown can purchase common or preferred shares which must be purchased from consolidated revenue—meaning, therefore, that the costs involved must appear in government estimates of spending programs—can the President of the Treasury Board tell the House why this commitment on the part of cabinet has not appeared in either the main estimates or the supplementary estimates since approval was given back in June?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to examine that question. Is the hon. member referring to approval of this current acquisition?

Mr. Andre: The issue of shares in this capital budget.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will examine the question and I will be very careful in my examination before I give the hon. member an answer. I will give him an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Stevens: You approved it.

TRANSPORT

FARE INCREASES FOR CNR SUBURBAN PASSENGERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the decision of the Canadian National to increase its 1979 rates for users of suburban trains by about 50 per cent, I believe, can the minister tell us whether discussions are being pursued with the Quebec government in this regard?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not had personal discussions with the minister with regard to this matter. We are in touch with the province of Quebec, of course, at the official level concerning the use of urban transportation assistance program funds. Assistance to commuter travel, as well as other forms of urban assistance, would come under that program. The province of Quebec knows that we are prepared to consider their designation of federal funds for such purposes.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. As the minister confirms that discussions are going on with officials, and as such a high increase is almost inconceivable for commuters, can the minister agree before this House to urge the Canadian National to put off application of its decision until such time as the matter has been settled between the two levels of government?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, some time ago studies were begun in the province of Quebec concerning the level of fares and level of service on commuter lines. It was our position then, as it has long been, that commuter service is the principal responsibility of either the municipal or provincial governments. At the time the studies were undertaken, in order to allow time for their completion I did ask Canadian National to delay a certain fare increase. However, at that time I indicated that it was associated specifically with the need to complete the studies.

Subsequently, the province of Quebec undertook of its own responsibility to make some payments to Canadian National in order to avoid fare increases. I believe the fundamental responsibility must be seen to rest clearly on the municipal government and the provincial government with regard to this matter, as it is a commuter matter and not a matter of connections between cities or provinces in this country.

PROVINCES IN FAVOUR OF LINGUISTIC RIGHTS IN COURT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. On June 23 last, the House passed Bill C-42 which guarantees certain linguistic rights before the courts. That bill contained a provision prescribing a consultation between the Minister of Justice and the provincial attorneys general with a view to ensuring efficient implementation of the provisions which become effective on proclamation of the act. Can the minister tell the House which provinces have accepted to proclaim that act to date, and what the date of proclamation was? In addition, can he report on negotiations with the other provinces and tell the House which among them favour that bill?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have had exchanges with the various provinces concerning the implementation of Bill C-42, as it then was, and after discussions did suggest the date of April 1, 1979, in the case of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Alberta. The province of New Brunswick has accepted that date. The province of Ontario and the province of Quebec have indicated that they see no problem in accepting it, but Quebec has indicated that it would like to see replies from the other provinces before making its final commitment. In the case of the province of Alberta, they indicated that they would want more time before implementing it. We are pursuing the matter further with the remaining provinces.

FISHERIES

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONSULTATION ON MANAGEMENT OF INDUSTRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. According to all reports, the provincial representatives from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, when meeting with the federal Minister of Fisheries in Moncton on November 10, indicated their displeasure over the decisions that have been made by the federal government on fisheries management and asked for the right to provide greater input into the decision-making process.

In view of the fact that spokesmen from the five provinces mentioned were unanimous in their views, I would ask the Prime Minister what steps he intends to take to see that the five provinces will become a full partner, with the federal government, in resource exploration, fisheries management, the allocation and establishment of fishery quotas, and the allocation of fishing licences.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the short answer, of course, is that at the federal-provincial conference on the constitution just a couple of weeks ago we suggested that the item of fisheries be included amongst those which would be discussed with a view to changing the distribution of powers. For some strange reason which I still cannot understand, the provinces refused to have that incorporated in the communiqué. In spite of their refusal, our offer still stands and the officials and ministers who will be meeting are prepared, as far as we are concerned, to study all the areas that I put forth for examination in terms of redistribution of powers.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, possibly this reaction is based on past experience and that is why there is a reluctance to participate. My question to the Prime Minister is: in view of the fact that Newfoundland indicated leadership this week by announcing a $500 million development program for the fisheries in that province, to take place over the next five years, when can we expect an announcement indicating that some initiative will be taken by the federal government to assist in the fisheries' development in all of the Atlantic provinces, including Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have just received a telegram from the fishermen's union in Newfoundland supporting the minister of fisheries for the federal government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —and not saying a word about the $500 million promise of the Newfoundland government. Probably they are used to this kind of experience and they want to see a bit of delivery by the government before congratulating it.

LOTO CANADA

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH GENERAL INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs has fled the chamber after the initial barrage. However, I do have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Since the minister has been so kind as to table an agreement which I requested on Friday, in which clause 3 of that document provides for an agreement between the federal government and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec to decide how they would dispose of the assets for the Loto game which the federal government had bought from General Instruments—and I understand that that agreement between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the federal government has been concluded—could that agreement now be tabled?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has the agreement. Clause 3, as he suggests, is precisely the agreement between Ontario, Quebec and the federal government.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, as clause 3 of this agreement states that the federal government will abandon the proposed Loto game and, as was foreseen during the last provincial conference, a reasonable agreement will be reached between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the federal government regarding the proposed disposal of assets for the Loto game, can the minister tell me what the disposal arrangements are for that equipment which was contracted from General Instruments, and considering this document has the word "will" in it proposing that something will be done in the future after the timing of the agreement?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, as I have said several times in this chamber to the hon. member, when such an agreement is concluded, I will be pleased to give him the information. Such an agreement is not now concluded.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE BE RECONSTITUTED

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It concerns his response some ten days ago that he would consider reconstituting a special joint committee on the constitution so that it could, through parliament, address itself to the ongoing debate on confederation.

I ask the Prime Minister if he has yet reached a decision to re-establish this very important committee. If so, could it have referred to, among other things, the economic studies that are being done on the future of confederation by government departments and related agencies, including the Economic Council of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I said the other day that I would consider that worth-while suggestion. I was hoping, quite frankly, that if the matter is so important to the opposition they would find it useful to take one of the opposition days to discuss the constitution. We would welcome such a discussion, and I hope the opposition will follow up on that suggestion.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I realize the Prime Minister's long-standing regard for members of parliament and what they can accomplish, but I do not think that even he feels that all of the problems of the constitution can be resolved by a single day's debate.

However, I would like to ask him a related question dealing with the recommendation that came out of the former committee on the constitution with regard to a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada as to the authority of the federal government to reform the Senate. Since the Prime Minister stated recently that he would not proceed with any changes to the Senate without the unanimous agreement of the provinces, I ask if that statement of his was based on the recognition that the federal government does not have the authority, under the British North America Act, unilaterally to make changes to the Senate without the consent of the provinces. If it does not, what is the present standing of the reference to the Supreme Court—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. lady that having a day's debate would not preclude setting up a committee after that. But I would have thought that one day's debate would be enough to put all of the ideas of the opposition on record.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: So far as the reference to the Supreme Court is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the answer is, of course not. If we believe, like the hon. lady, that the federal government has not, under section 91(1), the authority to change the Senate, we would not refer the matter to the Supreme Court. It would have been a no contest. We would have agreed with that, but because there was a division of opinion within, particularly, the joint committee, we agreed to refer to the Senate to see which of the two parties is right—

Miss MacDonald: To the Senate, or the Supreme Court?

Mr. Trudeau: —either the opposition or those who, like the government, believe that section 91 does permit the federal government and the Parliament of Canada to amend the Senate.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURE—STEPS TO CREATE JOBS IN CANADA

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns the fact that in Canada all auto parts manufacturing and otherwise takes place in central Canada and there is no manufacturing of any significance outside central Canada, particularly, of course, with regard to the Pacific Rim.

My question is this: at the present time there are proposals for duty remissions respecting places such as Japan: The Japanese can purchase Canadian parts and, therefore, take advantage of a duty remission to that country. In other words, can we bring them within the auto pact? Has the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce made submissions to the Japanese for duty remissions in order that we can make some progress in developing an auto manufacturing industry outside of central Canada, particularly in British Columbia?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I do not know whether that particular representation has been made. But I do know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a concern with the auto pact agreement. He has done a fantastic job so far, and we are looking for improvement in the future.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, that is not a very clear answer. My supplementary question is this: it has been reported that the U.S. embassy has made direct representations to the Government of Canada not to make proposals for duty remissions to foreign companies, so the impact is that the U.S. will receive new foreign assembly plants, rather than Canada. Has the United States embassy, or any other U.S. agency, made representations to Canada not to provide duty remissions to Datsun, Volkswagen or any other foreign company?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I will bring the hon. member's representation to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

BENEFIT ENTITLEMENT OF EMPLOYEES LAID OFF BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Since the Department of National Revenue taxation branch has commenced its annual mass hiring of 3,000 keying operators and clerical workers, and since most of these workers come from the ranks of those who are not in the work force, not employed and not on benefits, could the minister say if it is his intention or expectation that these workers, when they are discharged by the Department of National Revenue, will be eligible for benefits from his department?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I would expect that if they were under personal contract, no, Mr. Speaker. But if they were hired by the department, of course they would pay their premiums and would be entitled to the benefits if they were unemployed following their period of employment.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, how does the minister see the proposed changes in Bill C-14 as affecting these temporary workers?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical question. Until we get the bill through this House and the other place, it is not really appropriate for me to comment, because I do not know what the bill will be in its final form.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROMBIE—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR URBAN AFFAIRS

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to statements made by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) in connection with my position on the policy of mortgage interest and property tax deductibility. I wish to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to thank you for being permitted to clarify it. I have supported, and do support, that policy. I support it for four reasons which I commend to the minister. First, it is a policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have given the hon. member the floor. I understand the nature of his question of privilege. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) described the position of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) to the House. If he has been inaccurate in describing that position, the hon. member for Rosedale has the opportunity to say so, which he has just done. However, I do not think even he would expect to have the opportunity to give us all of the reasons why he has taken the position that he has taken.

Mr. Crombie: My intention was, simply because the minister had deliberately misrepresented my position, to have the opportunity—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Crombie: I know the minister understood well he was misrepresenting my position on the matter. My concern, therefore, is to instruct the minister on my true feelings so that he might better represent them when he goes elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are getting into a little danger here about which I think I ought to warn the parties. The House recognizes at once that the minister having earlier indicated the position of a member of the House with regard to a particular policy, the member has the opportunity at the earliest possible moment to rise by way of a question of privilege to correct the minister on that. It is not fortuitous to indicate that that misrepresentation, if it was such, was a deliberate misrepresentation by the minister. However, I think that the hon. member may be understood in this effort to say that the minister knows and, if he did not know, the hon. member wants this opportunity to correct him. I think in that spirit that remark can be accepted. However, both sides will recognize there is a limit to how far we can go. I want the hon. member for Rosedale to have ample opportunity now to indicate that he disagrees with the interpretation by the minister. Presumably the minister will respond. Then perhaps we can close it off.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I apologize if I used the word "deliberately" when I should not have done so. There are four very good reasons why all hon. members of this House would support the policy. I will not get into that policy. I simply want to say that I have one concern. I know the minister and every member of this House has this concern. It is not in the policy. There should be a policy that also supports shelter for low and moderate income tenants. If the government of the day spent time on that, it would be appropriate. I therefore ask that the minister withdraw his remark with regard to my views on the policy. He knows I support it.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the hon. member has just withdrawn the words that I deliberately misrepresented his point of view. I am more at ease now to indicate to him and the House through you, Mr. Speaker, that my remarks were based on a Canadian Press report of September 29, which stated:

David Crombie, former Toronto mayor and a Progressive Conservative candidate in a federal by-election, says a Conservative proposal to allow income tax deductions for mortgage payments and property tax requires further thought.

I guess that the representative of Canadian Press felt at that time that the candidate wanted to review the matter further because he probably had a number of misconceptions about the scheme.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: If the hon. member has now decided to change his mind, if in the first place he was having doubt about that scheme and now he has no doubt, that is up to him. However, it is too bad that he changes his mind now that he is a member of the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Rosedale was given the floor and an opportunity to indicate that the minister should be corrected if the minister was describing his position as being opposed to a particular policy. The hon. member took the opportunity to indicate that he is not opposed to the policy, and has set the record straight. The minister indicated the source of his remarks. While the clarification of that is not entire, I do not see that procedurally there is anything I can do about it in the circumstances.

MR. STANFIELD—MINISTER'S REPLY ON PURCHASE OF SHARES IN PACIFIC PETROLEUMS LTD. BY PETRO-CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is that on November 13 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) gave me one answer to a question. Today he gave me the opposite answer to the same question. I will try to develop this as quickly as I can. On November 13 I asked the minister:

Is the minister saying, in connection with the Petro-Can purchase and the financial transactions involved, that there is absolutely no financial responsibility on the part of the federal government? Is he saying, not only that the federal government did not engage in any express guarantee, but that by virtue of Petro-Can being an agent of the government, and the implications of that under the Financial Administration Act, there is no financial responsibility on the Government of Canada in connection with this transaction by way of guarantee or otherwise?

The answer I got clearly indicated there was no financial responsibility.

Mr. Gillespie: That was not my answer. Read my answer.

Mr. Stanfield: I will deal with the minister, Mr. Speaker. I say he answered my question clearly in the negative. He said there were no government guarantees. That is true. That is not the question he was asked. He answered in such a way as clearly to try to give the impression that there was no financial responsibility.

He continued through the discussion we had yesterday. He referred specifically to my question. He said:

There is no question that Petro-Canada as an agent of Her Majesty is covered, as are other Crown corporations, by the Financial Administration Act.

He did not say what the effect of that was, in his view. He continued:

That is common knowledge and is not in question. But I was asked by the hon. member for Halifax whether or not there were any expressed guarantees by the federal government. I would refer the House to Hansard, page 1050, I believe, in which yesterday's debate is reported. That is a fair question, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday he was pretending I was asking him the day before whether there were any guarantees. It was not just feeling around in the air. He referred specifically to my question and the text of it. There can be no possible doubt that he was asked on Monday whether there was any financial responsibility by way of guarantees or otherwise. I repeat, there can be no doubt as to the impression he intended to leave.

Yesterday Your Honour indicated you had some difficulties with a question of privilege like this. You stated:

If I were to try to make a decision, I have to make a substantive decision on the basis of facts as to what set of facts is correct. Essentially, that is a disagreement on facts, but often, to resolve it, the test the Chair has to apply is whether it is a disagreement as to facts or a question of privilege by virtue of an attempt to mislead.

I suggest there is no problem about the facts. The facts are there. They are on record in Hansard. The question I asked on Monday and the answer I received is there; the question I asked today and the answer I got will be in Hansard in due course. They will be on the "blues".

You went on to state yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that there was a further difficulty:

If the Chair finds itself in the position of having to make a decision between the two sides on an interpretation of facts, that is enough for the Chair to surrender the question of privilege and say that on procedural grounds, and in the circumstances, I have no jurisdiction. The difficulty is even more severe here because we are not even arguing about a question of facts but rather about an interpretation of the statutes. Therefore, the matter seems to place upon the Chair the obligation of not only deciding on the correctness of facts but also of making a judgment as to which argument is correct under the law.

I accepted that, Mr. Speaker. That caused me a great deal of concern yesterday and I felt I could not properly ask you to take a position with respect to the law. But in the light of the minister's answers to me today, there is no legal question involved. The minister has stated his view of what the law is, and we are quite in agreement on that. He has eliminated any question of law and, therefore, in dealing with this matter there is no question of law for you to decide. It is now settled on both sides of the House that this deal made by Petro-Canada, or by a subsidiary of Petro-Canada, does involve a financial liability on the Government of Canada described more precisely as a contingent liability.

I do not know why the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources were at such pains a couple of days ago to leave the impression there was no financial liability with regard to this on the part of the Government of Canada. The Deputy Prime Minister may have honestly believed the Government of Canada was not involved in any financial liability. But I submit it is very clear that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources never believed that, or he was awfully careless if he did.

In short, I submit I have a question of privilege in that I was misled by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on Monday. He continued, if I may say so, to try to cover this up yesterday in the way he referred to my question, trying to pretend I asked him a question different from the one I put to him. It was very clear today, though, that he could no longer maintain any kind of cover, and consequently he had to answer my question correctly. The answer given today is directly opposite to the answer he gave me two days ago, and, if Your Honour agrees there is no question of law for you to decide and that there is indeed a prima facie case of privilege, based on the answer I was given on Monday being directly opposed to the answer I received today, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That the answer given to me by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on November 13 constituted a misrepresentation in the light of his answer to me today and that these answers of the Minister be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to determine whether the answer given by the minister on November 13 constituted a breach of my privileges.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that not only is there no question of law involved, but there is really no question of fact to be disputed.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear from the tactics the opposition members have used in the first three days of this week that they are trying to work themselves out of a serious dilemma, a dilemma in which their own leader has placed them. Their leader has placed their party against Petro-Canada, against the corporation which was created by this parliament to provide for the future energy security of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Their dilemma is how to deal with the politically embarrassing position in which they have been placed, so they have used the ruse of legal obfuscation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Stick to privilege!

Mr. Gillespie: They are using the tactic of legal obfuscation to try to deal—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know the minister would not want to lead us into a debate on the merits of Petro-Can or the acquisition by that Crown corporation of Pacific Petroleums. The narrow question I have to decide is whether the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and the hon. member for York-Simcoe have a question of privilege—I am not sure about the regularity of having both cases before me at the same time.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the notice which was given to you with respect to a question of privilege by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. In giving reasons why he wanted to give notice for his question of privilege he cited the question which was put by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). When he actually spoke on his question of privilege though, he seemed to slide off that point and concentrate more on the act itself, on section 23, in particular, of the Petro-Canada Act. I was therefore placed in the position that both hon. members were concerned with the question of guarantees.

I should like to re-read the question which was put by the hon. member for Halifax, as reported at page 1050 of the House of Commons Debates on November 13. He said:

Is the minister saying, in connection with the Petro-Can purchase, and the financial transactions involved, that there is absolutely no financial responsibility on the part of the federal government?

These are the important words:

Is he saying, not only that the federal government did not engage in any express guarantee—

The words "any express guarantee" I judged to be the important statement. If those words were not intended to be important, I do not understand why the hon. member used them.

Mr. Woolliams: Read the whole thing.

Mr. Gillespie: It was a long and convoluted question, as the record shows. The hon. member has read out the rest of that question. It was a long and convoluted question of the kind for which, on occasion, the hon. member for Halifax has become famous.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Gillespie: I believe it is perfectly in order for a minister, when answering a long and convoluted question, to extract what he considers to be the relevant portion of that question. The hon. member specifically referred to express guarantees under the Petro-Canada Act. I dealt with that in my remarks. There is an express guarantee section in the Petro-Canada Act, and it is section 21(1) and (2). I think it is important in the context of this debate to reintroduce that particular set of words because those words are relevant to our discussion. Under the sub-title "guarantees", section 21(1) of the Petro-Canada Act reads as follows:

● (1522)

Subject to section 23, the governor in council may, on the recommendation of the minister and the Minister of Finance, authorize the Minister of Finance to guarantee on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada, the principal and interest of any debentures or other securities issued by the corporation for the purpose of raising capital otherwise than from Her Majesty in right of Canada.

As I recall, the hon. member for York-Simcoe referred to that specific section in his remarks.

Section 21(2) says:

The Minister of Finance may approve or decide the form, manner and conditions of guarantees under this section.

It is quite clear to me that the question of guarantees was uppermost in the minds of the two hon. members opposite, with respect to this question of privilege. It is for that reason, and for the other reasons I have given, that I believe my answer was accurate.

I also believe that the remainder of the answer which I gave yesterday, recognizing the fact that Petro-Canada is an agent of Her Majesty and that the Financial Administration Act does apply, also covered that point. That is clearly common knowledge, but that was not the issue. The issue was whether an express guarantee was given by the Government of Canada in this situation, and my answer stands. There was not an express guarantee given by the Government of Canada in this situation. The funds were provided in a normal commercial banking transaction through the banks. There was no express guarantee, and I stand by that answer.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this debate, but I want to make a couple of points. To some extent the confusion is understandable when one realizes that under section 5 of the act the government can buy shares to supply capital up to $500 million, that under section 13, on the authorization of the governor in council the corporation can borrow money, and that under sections 21 and 22 debentures may be issued by the government on behalf of the company.

What has been overlooked is that in section 7(1)(e) it says, among other things, that the corporation may, and I quote:

—acquire and hold shares, debentures or other securities of any other corporation having objects altogether or in part similar to those of the corporation, or carrying on any business capable of being conducted so as, directly or indirectly, to benefit the corporation, and sell or otherwise deal with the same;

Section 2 deals with promoting such a corporation. It seems to me that this is not a matter of the corporation's borrowing money. It is not a matter of the corporation's borrowing money through the Crown or the Crown issuing debentures. It is a matter of whether a commercial transaction could be carried out under section 7(1)(e) by which shares might be acquired by putting up collateral for those shares. That did not amount to any intervention by the government, except that by so doing the government incurred a contingent liability. It therefore seems to me—and I thought so at the time that the minister answered the question—that the minister was leaving himself open. I admit that the question was very convoluted and that the minister may have missed the point.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Perhaps we are wasting time unnecessarily, but the question which was asked was very simple. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) asked for an assurance that there is absolutely no financial responsibility on the part of the federal government. That was the first question. The second question was as follows:

Is he—

That is, the minister—

—saying, not only that the federal government did not engage in any express guarantee, but that by virtue of Petro-Can being an agent of the government, and the implications of that under the Financial Administration Act, there is no financial responsibility—

There were two questions. One was whether there was a financial responsibility, and the other was whether the government has put out any money. It seems to me that the minister answered only half the question. That is quite understandable, in view of the exchange which was taking place. The minister said, and I quote:

—I made it very clear that this was a commercial transaction. It was negotiated and financed by normal commercial instruments.

Then he went on to say:

There are no government guarantees.

What needed to be added was, "But there is a contingent liability by virtue of section 11(e)". An agency of the Crown has purchased shares and given shares as collateral. In my opinion that therefore involved a contingent liability upon the government. I think the minister is now saying that he recognizes this as a contingent liability, and that clears the matter up.

I do not think the minister was trying to deceive the hon. member for Halifax, but his answer was certainly incomplete. If the minister now says there is a contingent liability, in addition to the fact that there was a commercial transaction and that there were no guarantees, surely that clears the matter up.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) argued extensively yesterday. I think we should retrace the dimensions of this question of privilege. It was first raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. He made his presentation yesterday. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) then made a contribution to that question of privilege. He later rose to say that he might have a question of privilege of his own. We do not have two separate questions of privilege on the floor at the same time. If we do, I will have to deal with them separately, but I would not want to invite hon. members who have contributed to the question raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe to make separate contributions now to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Halifax.

I think the situation is very clear. The answers of the minister have been the same on both days since Monday, when he made his initial answer. I am going to rule on this very shortly, and I do not want anybody to feel he has been deprived of the right to discuss the matter. The hon. member for York-Simcoe first raised this question. I thought he had completed his argument.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the reason I rise once again is to speak in reference to the proposed question of privilege of my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). I do so particularly in view of the fact that in responding to my hon. colleague's proposed question of privilege the minister referred to me several times.

In view of what has been said today, and in view of the fact that the minister has now indicated that there was a contingent liability, I would like, with your Honour's approval, to add at least some views with respect to why I believe the hon. member for Halifax has a valid question of privilege, which I hope Your Honour will find, as well as with respect to the question of privilege I raised yesterday. To that end I stress once again that the question which was put to the minister on Monday by the hon. member for Halifax was very clear.

In part the hon. member said:

Is he saying, not only that the federal government did not engage in any express guarantee, but that by virtue of Petro-Can being an agent of the government, and the implications of that under the Financial Administration Act, there is no financial responsibility on the Government of Canada in connection with this transaction by way of guarantee or otherwise?

I think the minister twisted that when he said that the real thrust of the question was whether there was a guarantee. Now he is saying that all he attempted to say was that there was no guarantee.

With all due respect, and in support of my argument, I draw Your Honour's attention to what the minister said earlier on Monday, as reported at page 1044 of Hansard, in response to a question put by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). At that time he said:

● (1532)

This deal is a commercial transaction which has been financed without any government assistance, without any government funds and without any government guarantee.

There were interruptions, and then he said:

—and it will have the effect of reducing the demand or the requirement for government assistance in the future,

For the minister to tell us now that he has found there is a contingent liability flies right in the face of not only his response to the hon. member for Halifax but also of what he said in response to the hon. member for Calgary North. There is absolutely no doubt that he misled the House.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), in attempting to support the minister's position, has missed the point, I think, and the minister, when he was making comments earlier about my argument yesterday, also missed the point. I referred only to section 23 in an attempt to show that if that is the section on which they are relying to justify the statements made, not only by the minister, but by the House leader and by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), in the opinion of counsel whom I consulted it is not adequate. Section 23 deals with an entirely different matter, and it is Section 14 which is the overriding section as far as Petro-Can's active incorporation is concerned. That section is very clear. It states:

The corporation is, for all purposes of this act, an agent of Her Majesty, and its powers under this act may be exercised only as an agent of Her Majesty.

It goes on to say that the property owned by this Crown corporation:

—is the property of Her Majesty and title thereto may be vested in the name of Her Majesty or in the name of the corporation.

Clearly there was always a liability on the part of the Government of Canada for the actions of Petro-Canada. The thrust of my comments today is that the responses we had on Monday, not only from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) but also from the House leader and from the Minister of Finance, misled the House, in an attempt to create the impression that somehow this was another commercial transaction. It was as if Petro-Canada had just filled somebody's gas tank and there was no government liability involved. In truth, it has now been agreed by the minister that there was a contingent liability. In my opinion, and according to the advice of my counsel, it is, in fact, more than a contingent liability; it is the direct liability with which an agent can bind his principal, and that liability comes from section 14 of the Petro-Canada Act.

I should like to mention, in conclusion, that where I think the misrepresentation has occurred is not only in the two statements by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but also in what the House leader has stated on Monday, namely:

—this does not represent—

That is the deal involving Petro-Canada—

—in any way a demand on government resources. It is totally a commercial transaction, financed outside government expenditures—

May I ask, with all due respect, how a minister of the Crown can make such a blatant statement followed by another minister of the Crown two days later stating that there was a contingent liability?

Secondly, I should like to mention that the Minister of Finance said on Monday:

—Petro-Canada pledged the assets they have gained in making the transaction. This was analysed by those who were loaning the money. They found that the assets being given against the borrowing were very good indeed, so they went along with the transaction. I believe it is a very good transaction for Canada.

Again I suggest that this was a misleading statement on the part of the Minister of Finance, because we know now that there was a contingent liability, that those who lent the money knew that Canada was ultimately liable with respect to the debt they were extending. As I have already indicated, subsection 3 of section 14 of the Petro-Canada Act makes it very clear that the Petro-Can assets are, in fact, not their assets to pledge; they are the assets of Her Majesty in the right of Canada.

May I conclude by simply saying that I support the proposed question of privilege that might be put by my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax, and in connection with my own proposed question of privilege I would like to reinforce what I said yesterday by stating that I think all three ministers should correct the record, because they have misled the House.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very much time in order to deal with the points which have been made. I have been looking at the full question put on Monday, November 13, by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), and also at the answer given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), and I think that, in line with the reasoning advanced by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the only justified comment that might be made about the answer given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is that it might be regarded as incomplete.

I attempted to inform myself of this transaction before I came to the House on Monday because I anticipated there would be questions, and I remember quite clearly the question put at the time by the hon. member for Halifax and its significance, and, without doing violence to the substance of the question, I should like to abbreviate it thus:

Is he saying,—

Then there are some descriptive phrases—

—there is no financial responsibility on the Government of Canada in connection with this transaction by way of guarantee or otherwise?

It seems to me that the point is that in his reply the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did not deal with "or otherwise". I thought the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources prudently sidestepped in his answer, as I would have done, dealing directly with that point, because the hon. member for Halifax cut quite a swath in his question by asking:

Is he saying . . . there is no financial responsibility on the Government of Canada in connection with this transaction by way of guarantee or otherwise?

In other words, by guarantee or in any other way.

The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear that this was a commercial transaction. It was negotiated and financed by normal commercial instruments. There are no government guarantees.

In so far as that statement is concerned and in so far as any answer I gave is concerned, I regard them as totally accurate. I believe the text will bear that out. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is correct in saying that that "or otherwise" was not followed up. I am sure the hon. member for Halifax might have asked a supplementary question which gave the answer, namely, that there might be a contingent liability.

I am not posing as an expert on all these financial matters, but I do believe that the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is attempting to telescope two events, one which has taken place and one which might or might not take place in the future. There is a transaction that has taken place, and that transaction, in itself, as I understand it, has not created any contingent liability. Certain events—this is not basically my point, I just add that—would have to take place in the future before the actual contingent liability would be triggered. That is something upon which hon. members might reflect.

To suggest that an answer in the House of Commons, which does not deal with every single point, raises a question of privilege, cannot be sustained. To say every single piece of information available in the stratosphere was not put forward in answer to a question is a question of privilege, cannot be sustained.

Perhaps the hon. member would have had a question of privilege if he argued that the minister had deliberately attempted to mislead the House. He did not do so. In so far as the minister's answers were concerned, he was totally accurate. When the hon. member for Halifax pinpointed his question in precise terms today, he received a precise answer. I suggest that if he put his question in precise terms on Monday or Tuesday, he would have received the precise answer.

At worst, which is not a very grave accusation against anyone, the answer to the question put by the hon. member for Halifax was incomplete. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands put the matter in proper and true perspective in his analysis of the situation.

I do not think for a moment that the hon. member for Halifax or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources are out to mislead the House or each other.

It was useful to have this clarification of what has been a rather abstruse point.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing abstruse about the point. The answer of the minister yesterday was very clear and definite. He said that there were no government guarantees. Today he said in an answer that there is a liability on the government.

Mr. MacEachen: Contingent.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): All right, I will deal with that. He said that there is a contingent liability on the government. That is the situation. My friend talked about the triggering of some future liability. There is no question of a triggering of a future liability whatsoever.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, there is.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The liability exists now.

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The triggering depends upon some event which may occur in the future because the borrowing is taking place now.

Mr. MacEachen: The triggering would occur if Petro-Canada could not meet its obligations.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is the situation in which we find ourselves. If one looks at the answer given to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) on November 13, 1978, one will see that it is pretty clear what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) was trying to do. He was attempting to say that this was a great commercial transaction which did not involve the government in any way. The answer he gave today cleared that up, but the question put by the hon. member for Halifax still stands and is before the House: whether the minister's answer to the question on November 13, 1978, misled the House, inadvertently perhaps, or whether it was incorrect in the terms set forth by the motion.

The matter is still open and not closed so neatly and nicely as the hon. government House leader attempted to do. There is always a liability upon the Government of Canada. Perhaps the event which activates the process to fulfil and complete it is something else, but the liability is there. The intent of the statute is there. This statute is no different from any other statute respecting Crown corporations. The denial or indication that the liability was not there was a misleading of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think I should reserve on this question any further. My difficulty remains a fundamental one. In the circumstances I am able to accept every argument put forward by the opposition members who have risen on this particular occasion, except the last one by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), indicating that the misleading occurred as a result of the minister's answer, and whether the misleading was inadvertent or not, whether a question of privilege is to be sustained. Of course, the difficulty I have is that that is not the case. In order to sustain a question of privilege, I have to find not only that members of the House have been misled by the answer, but that the attempt to mislead had been deliberate on the part of the minister.

As I have said before, and I will repeat again, when a minister rises after this kind of intervention on a question of privilege challenging the correctness of his answer, and indicates that upon reflection his answer was not correct, then he must indicate to the House that he unintentionally misled the House in the circumstances. However, when a minister, as both ministers have done in this case, returns to the point after an intervention on a question of privilege and says that he has checked his answer and now stands by it, procedurally the situation is a very difficult one, if not an impossible one for the Chair because I must not only find that the House has been misled but deliberately misled.

I accept the interventions of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). The hon. member for Halifax prefaced his remarks by saying that in all of his years here perhaps this was the first occasion on which he was raising a question of privilege. If not, it is a rare occasion. He said he would only do it after very serious deliberation. Of course, I accept the hon. member's intervention, as I do that of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. When they tell the House that they were misled in the circumstances, I accept that. In order to find a question of privilege, however, I must go further than that. Not only must I find that they were misled, or the House was misled by the minister's answer, but that it was done intentionally.

Equally I accept what both ministers have told me, that in the circumstances and in good faith they addressed themselves to the question put on the record, and that in good faith they made answers at the time, which are now being criticized as incomplete, inaccurate, misleading, or something of that nature. Nevertheless, while I accept the word on one side of the House, I also accept the word on the other side. In the circumstances I am compelled to accept the word of members that they addressed themselves to the question, answered it, and upon reflection the answer was accurate and not intended to mislead. If the answer did mislead and obviously was not intentional, any misleading was accidental and not calculated to mislead hon. members or the House in general.

The procedural case is quite simple. Unless I am able to find a deliberate attempt to mislead, I cannot find a question of privilege. Since both ministers have indicated that they did not intentionally mislead the House in the circumstances, it is impossible for me to find that they had any intention to do so. While I am sure the disagreement will continue, on procedural grounds I cannot find a question of privilege.

MR. DICK—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF STATE (FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT)

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a separate question of privilege arising out of an answer given by the hon. Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo). The minister indicated that she had responded to my question on an earlier occasion. I should like to put this matter on the record now, which is my first opportunity since the conclusion of the oral question period, so that the minister will be able to respond fully tomorrow, if that is her desire.

As reported at page 1010 of Hansard of November 10, 1978, I asked the minister if she would table two agreements. The first agreement was the one which Loto Canada made with General Instruments. The second agreement was the one Loto Canada made on behalf of the Government of Canada with the provinces, which got the provinces out of $10-and-above games and the federal government out of $9-and-below games. To be fair, Mr. Speaker, and I am not sure whether this was through inadvertence or otherwise, the minister was quite co-operative and indicated in her reply she would be pleased to table the document concerning the agreement with the provinces dealing with who will have the $10-and-above games, and who is to have the $9-and-below games. The minister subsequently did table that document, for which I am very appreciative.

In the second part of her reply the minister stated:

—I think that it would be more appropriate to consider tabling it when the final resolution of that contract is reached.

She has disposed of the two agreements about which I asked, by tabling one and suggesting that the tabling of the second be postponed to a different occasion.

As a result of the tabling of the agreement I find that clause 3 states that the federal government will abandon the proposed loto game and, as was foreseen during the last provincial conference, a reasonable agreement will be reached, meaning in the future, between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the federal government regarding the disposal of assets for the loto game. There is now a third agreement. The minister indicated today in her reply that she had already told me on several occasions she did not think it appropriate to table that agreement at this time because negotiations were going on. That was in reference to the Loto-Canada and General Instruments agreement. This agreement deals with the method of dividing the assets or commodities purchased between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the federal government. That is definitely a third agreement which has not been mentioned heretofore in this House.

I did not know of that third agreement until this document was tabled, and I wanted to point out that there was an inconsistency in those replies. I am sure the minister did not do this intentionally, but perhaps on the spur of the moment she was confused. There are three agreements, and I thought I should bring that to the attention of the House at the first opportunity.

I am sure the minister will read this in Hansard and, in answer to a future question, or perhaps tomorrow after the question period, she will clarify the matter. I am interested in having that agreement between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario and the federal government, dealing with the proposed disposition of the assets which were the subject of the agreement between Loto-Canada and General Instruments, tabled as well. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

URBAN AFFAIRS

TABLING OF DISCUSSION PAPER ON HOUSING POLICY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the question period, in fact in the lead question, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) referred the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to an agreement or a document, a copy of which I have in my hand, dated March 9, 1978, entitled "A Discussion Paper on the Implementation of Housing Policy to Achieve Federal Priorities for 1978-79". In fact the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton quoted from that document in the course of her remarks.

During the interchange that took place in the House it was obvious that, for some reason or other, this reference agitated the government, and certainly over-agitated the minister. I really cannot understand why that should be so because this is a government document. In any event, during the agitation which occurred on the other side of the House, the minister and, indeed, his seatmate, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) shouted, "Table it! Table it!" The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton reminded them that, of course, it is the government's job to table documents.

If the government had intended to make a disclosure I am sure it would have tabled the document, but the minister is not here to do that. Since the tabling of the document in the House obviously has the approval of persons in such high position as both the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, I wonder, sir, if I might obtain unanimous consent of the House to the tabling of that document as I have described it. In order that members may understand the document, it might be appropriate if I read from it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize the difficulty we are in now. In order for him to complete that line of thought to its ultimate conclusion, he might read the whole document, and thereby put on the record what he is endeavouring to have tabled. I think the hon. member has made the point that he is seeking unanimous consent for the tabling of the document. Quite frankly, I am glad he relieved me of the procedural difficulty of having to decide whether a private member can table a document, even if agreed to by a minister of the Crown, for in fact a decision in that regard would be in the negative. Nevertheless, the hon. member in attempting to table the document is seeking the consent of the House, and unanimous consent would be required if he were to table the document at the present time. Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House for the tabling of this document at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I just wonder if it might be appended to Hansard rather than simply—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since my friends have been so agreeable in respect of this matter, I wonder if this document, signed by the minister, which is fundamental to housing in Canada, could be appended to Hansard? I certainly think this would be an excellent idea.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if we could be absolutely clear in this regard. Procedurally the tabling of a document is quite different from having it printed in the records of the House. Was the hon. member originally seeking to have it printed in the records, or simply seeking to have it tabled?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its generosity for agreeing, as I understand it, that the document be tabled. You asked whether there was consent. There was consent, and I understand the document has now been tabled. What I was asking was whether it might be appropriate to ask the House if it was agreeable to the document being made an appendix to Hansard as well as being tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we agreed to the first request because it was so nicely made by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott), but we do not see the necessity for the second since all we want is copies of the document which has been tabled.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-443, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (labour dispute).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to clear up and correct a serious misinterpretation of an act which has arisen as a result of decisions by the Unemployment Insurance Commission in recent years. This has resulted in workers who have not concluded negotiations with their employers being locked out. I am thinking of the recent dispute between Canada Packers and Swifts and their employees who were on strike recently. There was also the recent strikes in the brewery industry. All these employees were refused unemployment insurance benefits when they made their claims.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 209, 268 and 225.

[Text]

CUSTOMS—SASKATOON AIRPORT

Question No. 209—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the government giving consideration to improving customs services at the Saskatoon airport and, if so, to what extent and on what date?

Point of Order—Mr. Beatty

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): There is presently no permanent staff assigned to Saskatoon airport. All customs service is provided on a call-out basis from the Saskatoon office. Regional officials indicate that, to date, there would not be sufficient work to justify assignment of permanent staff to the airport. Given the current low volume of traffic and the necessity for financial restraint, it would be neither desirable nor feasible to further expand customs service at Saskatoon beyond the current level, that is from 0700 to 2400 hours, seven days per week.

DREE—LAWYERS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 268—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: None.

EYRETECHNICS LIMITED

Question No. 325—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Was Eyretechnics Limited, 92 Grenville Crescent, Ottawa, Ontario, allotted a contract for $175,000 in connection with preliminary work for destroyer life extension?

2. Was the tendering process conducted before this contract was let?

3. Is it the current plan of the Department of National Defence to go ahead with the destroyer life extension plan?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. The Department of National Defence has approved in principle a program to extend the life of the current steam destroyers until the new ships come into service. The precise scope and extent of the project is yet to be determined.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the other questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BEATTY—ANSWER TO QUESTION NO. 67

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would apologize to you and the House for having to raise a further point of order, because discussions have gone on and taken up the time of the House since the end of the question period. My point of order is with regard to the answers given to questions on the order paper.

I feel that it is a fundamental question and that my rights as a member of parliament are affected by the procedures we are following here, as well as the ability of all members of parliament to discharge their responsibilities. I acknowledge that you, sir, have stated on many occasions that it is not your responsibility to ensure that answers given to questions on the order paper, or answers to questions asked during the oral question period, are adequate and full, that your responsibility is merely to ensure that the rules are kept. I certainly accept your statement in that regard.

However, I think it may be useful to you, sir, and to the House, if I explain the difficulty that these procedures have put us in at the present time and which leads to a situation where the rules make a mockery of the ability of an individual member of parliament to get information from the government if the government is determined to frustrate his attempts to do so. I would like to bring to your attention the answer I received on November 7 to question No. 67, which I placed on the order paper on October 11.

You will recall, sir, that over the course of the past several months I have risen at this point in the proceedings several times to bring to the parliamentary secretary's attention the question which I had on the order paper relating to the use of government aircraft by the then minister of labour to fly to western Canada to consult with various owners of CFL teams to prevent the takeover by Mr. Harold Ballard of the Hamilton Tiger Cats. The first part of my question was to elicit from the parliamentary secretary whether in fact the trip had taken place at government expense and, if so, what were the costs to the taxpayers, who the other individuals were who accompanied the minister, and how these activities related to the official responsibilities of the minister of labour because, surely, if he is to commandeer government aircraft, it must be in line with his official responsibilities.

The second part of my question was to ask whether the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) intended to follow up on a suggestion made by the then minister of labour to the extent that the Minister of Agriculture would find money to cover the cost of increasing the seating capacity at Ivor Wynne Stadium.

These questions were first placed on the order paper on February 22, 1978. At that time they were listed as question No. 1,332. I allowed several months to elapse before first bringing the question to the attention of the parliamentary secretary because I felt, even though this was a matter which would be answered in short order, that the government was entitled to a reasonable period of time. The first time I rose in the House to bring it to the attention of the parliamentary secretary was in June, 1978, at which time I asked him, after mentioning the substance of the question, why it had sat on the order paper for several months without receiving an answer. The response I received from the parliamentary secretary, as reported at page 6832 of Hansard reads:

[Mr. Beatty.]

> Mr. Speaker, the number of the question is all I need. I am quite capable of reading the order paper. I can assure the hon. member that we will give his question all the attention it requires within the next few weeks.

At the time I thought the parliamentary secretary was acting in good faith, and allowed the matter to drop. I assumed that he would discharge his responsibilities and provide me with an answer to this very straightforward question.

The House then adjourned for the summer, and the question was left standing on the order paper for three months while the House was in recess. During that period, of course, no further questions could be added to the order paper and therefore the government had three months to come to grips with the various questions left on the order paper and to prepare answers for when parliament resumed for the last day of the old session. When parliament resumed there was no answer given to that question and it died on the order paper.

Although I raised the matter in the form of a point of order at that time, the parliamentary secretary then assured me that he had made every effort to get an answer but had not been able to do so. I subsequently raised the question a couple more times, and in all it has been five times in eight and one half months that I brought to the parliamentary secretary's attention the fact that this question was outstanding. On June 29, October 17, and October 24 I referred specifically to this question, and on November 1 and October 10 I referred in general terms to a number of questions still outstanding which I had on the order paper.

On November 1, in response to a question which I raised in the form of a point of order as to delays in answering questions, the parliamentary secretary made this comment:

> Mr. Speaker, I find these remarks unfair. On numerous occasions, following interventions made by the hon. member or by others, I have shown the government's good will and efficiency in dealing with questions on the order paper.

This was reported at page 698 of Hansard.

Quite apart from the irony in these statements when he talked about efficiency and good will in answering these questions, I think that the answer by the parliamentary secretary would lead a reasonable person to believe that a decent answer would be forthcoming shortly. But this was not to be the case.

Last Tuesday, the parliamentary secretary tabled an answer to my question. The answer to part one reads:

> See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 171(11).

Over the course of the past few days I have had an opportunity to review Beauchesne to find out exactly why the parliamentary secretary was refusing to answer the question. Citation 171(11) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, 1958, reads:

> A question oral or written must not:
> (11) seek from an ex-minister information with regard to transactions during his term of office.

You can see the ludicrous situation I now find myself in, sir. The minister took the trip on the weekend of February 4, 5 and 6 of this year. On February 22 I placed my question on the order paper. It dragged on through the intervening months, and half a year later the minister resigned from the cabinet. We end up with this situatin where the parliamentary secretary tables an answer in which he says that he is not going to give me the information because the minister has resigned. He does not feel that he has any obligation to give the House information about the way in which the funds of the taxpayers have been used.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, you cannot compel the parliamentary secretary to give adequate answers to questions on the order paper, but surely members of this House, under its procedures, in trying to discharge their responsibilities as parliamentarians and to ensure that the taxpayers' money is properly used, have rights too.

An hon. Member: You are only politicking; you don't mean it.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite laughs when I mention the rights of members of this House.

I feel that I have been poorly treated by the parliamentary secretary. It is a sign that he has acted in either bad faith or simply has not been responsible in discharging his duties. I hope that the House will look at this matter and come up with a means to ensure that when members ask questions in good faith they will get full and complete answers and will be treated in good faith by members on the other side.

● (1612)

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on a point of order with respect to answers that have been forthcoming. This is a special occasion for me. I have received my first answer in this session, and so I wanted to mark this by bringing to your attention, a grievance which I feel I have respecting the whole process of answering questions.

As you know, the purpose of putting question on the order paper are twofold. First they are not necessarily matters of urgent and pressing necessity which would be allowed within the context of question period. Secondly, detailed information is sometimes required that is not appropriate for question period. We have a device now of having written questions on the order paper, in order to obtain information from the government on matters that are of some considerable importance to each member, who puts these questions on the order paper. This applies not only to members on the opposition side, but indeed to members on the government side as well.

What we have is the example that is being set by this parliamentary secretary. I am sure he is merely the conduit for each department to give answers as they deem appropriate. I have observed the list that we have been getting during the course of this session. Most times it contains something like three replies, occasionally more, but three answers each time there is an opportunity for the parliamentary secretary to rise and table answers given to these written questions.

On the basis that, as individual members of parliament, we are using this device in a responsible manner to allow departments to answer questions not in an indefinite period of time but within a reasonable time, under this point of order I would like to raise with the parliamentary secretary the question as to whether there are any guidelines handed down to departments concerning the time limit within which it is expected these questions will be answered. I can give examples of my own questions where it would be almost possible to have a yes or a no answer. Yet I have been in a position of waiting. In some cases I could give examples of questions which were put on the order paper in previous sessions that went unanswered, and I have replaced them on the order paper because I am still interested in finding out what the policy is with regard to areas important to myself and my constituents.

If there is to be any semblance of order and we are to have any credibility in this government—whether it wants to answer these questions or just play games with us—I would like to know if there are any guidelines the parliamentary secretary gives to departments to suggest that within a certain period of time it would be reasonable to expect answers to these questions, unless there are extenuating circumstances.

Some of my colleagues have asked on previous occasions, I think in all seriousness, whether the parliamentary secretary would tell us what questions the government does not intend to answer, and if in fact that is its intention, then let us know about it. However, will the parliamentary secretary inform us if there are any guidelines at all given to departments concerning time limits in which it is expected they will, in the normal course of activities, answer?

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in support of the excellent point of order put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty), and to support him with my own particular grievance. This concerns question No. 232 on the order paper. It has been on the current order paper now since October 17. That question, sir, is really a very simple one. It has to do with a detailed account of the spending of money under the Federal Labour Intensive Program and, more particularly, how many jobs were created under that program, and by department.

That question was placed on the order paper in the last session. It was one of the 20 per cent of those questions which the parliamentary secretary was unable to answer because he was unable to obtain answers from the various government departments to whom the questions were directed. However, this question deals with an expenditure of $100 million voted by this parliament. This expenditure was undertaken by this government under a program late last winter, a program known as the Federal Labour Intensive Program, the purpose of which was to be a part of the government's over-all attack on the very troublesome and serious unemployment problem facing the country.

As we get into this winter, and as the present serious unemployment situation becomes even more aggravated by winter conditions and the traditional seasonal factors that are at work, we will be called upon, I have no doubt, to provide more funding for the Federal Labour Intensive Program.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is not unreasonable to expect, and indeed we have every right to expect the government to inform us as to just exactly how productive, how effective that last vote of $100 million was under the Federal Labour Intensive Program and, more particularly, how many jobs were created by it.

The parliamentary secretary can put my mind at rest very quickly by explaining to me and to the House why he cannot get an answer to this question. That phase of the government's make-work program is now over. We are going into the next phase which will mean, as I have indicated, another vote under the Federal Labour Intensive Program. We have a right to know, Mr. Speaker. We are voting public money. We have a right to know whether or not that public money is productive in terms of its intent, in terms of the purpose for which it is being voted. Surely, sir, that lies at the very root of supply in this House.

We are on the eve of a new budget and we are going to have to go through the whole process again. By addressing myself to the legitimate grievance of the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo, I would hope that you, sir, and the House, can find some way to satisfy the House and its members who have grievances in this regard. As I say, we no longer have the right under our new rules in this House to withhold supply. If we did, here is a classic case where I, as an aggrieved member, would withhold the passage of estimates to provide more money under the Federal Labour Intensive Program until the government was able to satisfy me that the previous vote, the $100 million spent last winter, was effective in producing jobs.

The parliamentary secretary can put this matter to rest by telling me and the House that he is unable to obtain this information from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) and from the various government departments. I suspect that is the dilemma in which he finds himself. If that is the case, then I have a question of privilege, and I will pursue that question of privilege with a substantive motion.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the remarks made by the first speaker, I believe he raised two points: the question of good faith and the question of the taxpayers. On the question of good faith, his remarks were directed either at me in my capacity as parliamentary secretary or the government generally. He knows quite well, or should know, that good faith is always presumed, and it is up to the person allegating that there was bad faith to substantiate it. The hon. member will understand that. He is smiling like his leader who, if he had passed his law exams, would be able to understand the principle I just mentioned but he is in a very bad position to be smiling on that principle when this government in the past two sessions answered over 90 per cent of the questions that were put on the order paper. I realize the hon. member is in an unfortunate situation in not being able to give more substantiation or weight to his argument, when you consider that there are hundreds of questions put on the order paper every session, that my predecessor answered more than 90 per cent of them and that I answered 88 per cent or 89 per cent of those questions. That takes care of the argument of good faith raised by the first speaker.

With respect to his concern for the taxpayer, I draw his attention to his own questions. Very often his questions require research in several departments, and they are costing the taxpayers a fortune in time and research so we can give him a full answer or an answer that makes sense. And even if sometimes we are unable because of the end of a session to answer a question he asked, that does not mean that we did not do any research to try to answer it. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were more concerned with the good of the taxpayers, he would be more careful with the kind of questions he asks and he would try to ask questions perhaps as intelligent as the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has the habit of asking.

Mr. Speaker, there is also the intervention made by a second hon. member who spoke before the hon. member for St. John's East. He wanted to know whether there were any guidelines to be followed by those who do the research to provide answers to the questions on the order paper. The instructions given to the employees of all departments and agencies when they consider these questions are as follows: they must try to find as much information as possible to provide the best and the most complete answers possible as soon as possible. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, we continuously take steps to encourage these employees to provide us with full answers as soon as possible. In support of their excellent work, I must say that they have behaved very well and that they have always made valid efforts to provide this type of answer to the opposition as soon as possible. The results of the last few sessions stand as evidence of this fact.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as concerns question No. 232 asked by the hon. member for St. John's East, I shall take note of his representations, but I would still like to draw to his attention a mistake that he made in his comments. Since I have great respect for the hon. member, I am certain that it must have been an involuntary mistake when he said that we failed to reply to 20 per cent of the questions asked during the last session. He probably wanted to say that we did not reply to approximately 10 per cent of the questions asked during the last session, and I am convinced that he made this mistake involuntarily. As far as we are concerned, we shall try not to make any mistake when we reply to his question.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of matters I want to talk on with regard to this point of order in connection with answering questions, because of the diminishing right of private members to obtain information. This is one of the faults of our system. It is something to which we must address ourselves.

Every time this matter is raised the parliamentary secretary states that they answer 90 per cent of the questions. That is their record. I do not know how it stands statistically. I would not doubt the word of the parliamentary secretary that in statistical terms that is true.

The problem raised by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) was with regard to the kind of answer he received and the circumstances under which he received it. To rely on that citation in Beauchesne is to evade an answer or give a non-answer. Statistically I would not argue with the parliamentary secretary, but that is what is happening with regard to answering questions.

The question raised by the It reads: member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is very simple. It reads:

1. By department and by community, how many positions have been made or will be made available under the Federal Labour Intensive Program?

That kind of information must be in the hands of a competent department in order to do the planning. It has to be there and available. To say that it is not available or it is hard to find, is to say that the ministry involved is incompetent, is not doing studies and so on.

It is wrong, innocently wrong, or I suppose innocently improper is the best way to describe it, for the parliamentary secretary time and again to say that all questions cost a considerable amount of money. I realize there is work caused in the public service as a result of questions by members of parliament because I represent a number of public servants who do the work in respect of answering questions. They tell me that is the case. Of course, that is their job. Not one has ever complained about doing his job.

I become concerned when I hear colleagues in the House worrying about questions that are not answered when the public service has done its job, when the answers are prepared and available, but the minister or someone else does not let those answers see the light of day. That is a matter which concerns me. Perhaps at some stage during the course of this parliament we could examine the process to ensure that does not happen. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) says it is nonsense. If that were so, I would be relieved.

I know a large number of public servants who prepare answers to questions. They do not complain about that. I worry that sometimes their work does not get to the floor of the House of Commons because somebody's ox has been gored. That is the suspicion I have. Perhaps some day the parliamentary secretary can indicate the process to the House of Commons so that we can be relieved of that doubt.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise because, in his earlier intervention, the parliamentary secretary made some statements with which I take sharp issue. I have had a large number of questions on the order paper session after session. I admit that some of them have been complicated. When it has taken a long time to get an answer, I have not complained.

A year and a half or two years ago I put on the order paper of that session a series of questions having to do with Crown corporations. Each one was a very simple question. I will quote one which I have again placed on the order paper. I quote question No. 85:

1. Who (a) is the president (b) are the vice-presidents of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority?

2. What is the annual salary in each case?

I have a series of questions, each along the same line, asking about a particular Crown corporation.

Had the government said it has not been the practice to divulge that kind of information with regard to Crown corporations, I probably would have accepted that answer, gone to the committee where the Crown corporation reports, in this case the transport committee, and discussed it with the minister. These questions would have then been off the order paper.

I do not do what the minister accuses some members of doing, create a great deal of work for public servants, then the end of the session comes, they do not have a chance to report, and the questions are forgotten. I waited until the first day of this session and I again placed the questions on the order paper. I repeat, they have been on the order paper for a year and a half or two years.

These are not complicated questions. They would not be difficult to answer. If the government wanted, I am sure it could obtain the information in a day or two, answer the questions, and have them removed from the order paper. If the government is embarrassed because it is paying too much or too little and therefore does not want to answer the questions, I suggest to the parliamentary secretary a lot of time could be saved by simply saying it does not want to answer the questions. I would not then have to get up every two or three months to ask what is happening.

I sympathize with hon. members who complain that their questions are not being answered or that it is taking a very long time to get answers, because I frequently receive that kind of treatment in this House.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURCHASE OF FIGHTER PLANES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the proposal of a cabinet committee to seek the approval and commitment of the cabinet to the purchase of fighter planes at the total of $2.3 billion in 1977 dollars, on the grounds that this order, which is the largest arms order ever made by Canada, has not been debated in the House or in the standing committee on defence and involves the assumption of a very large commitment at a time when restraint and retrenchment in government expenditure are called for, and when there is no need for the proposed fighter planes to be used against the unreal threat of manned bombers, there being no such commitment in either the NORAD or the NATO treaties.

This motion, as I say, comes at a time when restraint and retention are urged.

An hon. Member: What about Petro-Canada?

Mr. Brewin: I am not dealing with Petro-Canada at the moment. If the hon. member would recognize the importance of the subject I am dealing with, it would be helpful.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps the hon. member would recognize the importance of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member gave the Chair notice of his intention to make this application pursuant to Standing Order 26. First I would like to call to his attention the language I used in dealing with a recent application, if I recall correctly, by one of his colleagues in respect to the proposed acquisition of Pacific Petroleums by Petro-Can which has been the subject of such lengthy discussions this afternoon. In that circumstance I indicated that in order for me to respect paragraph 16(a) of Standing Order 26 and find a genuine emergency, I would have to find some irregularity or something extraordinary about the practice that was being followed, and on the surface I see no allegation that the practice which is followed in this instance is any different from that followed in the past.

However, I am also struck by subparagraph 5 of the rule in this particular case, not because I am inviting the hon. member to make this the subject of one of the allotted days. I do not like to use that approach in dealing with applications under Standing Order 26, but I can scarcely ignore the fact that if the hon. member is seeking an opportunity for himself and his colleagues to inform the government of the position they would propose to take in respect to this kind of an arms' transaction, they would have, all of them, I trust, an ample opportunity to do so in the course of the discussions which are to begin tomorrow evening when the budget is presented. In the days that follow, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), along with other hon. members, will have the opportunity to address themselves to defence policy in general and, in particular, to the spending of money, the subject most germane to that debate. Therefore, in deference to those two paragraphs of the rule, I have to decline the hon. member's application at this time.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. STEVENS—COMMODITY TAX REVIEW

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) on a point of order.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My point of order arises from a matter that has been raised, I think, on three occasions earlier—the fact that the government has declined to date to make a commodity tax review reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

I see the parliamentary secretary to the House leader is in the House, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to draw his attention to the fact that the commodity tax matter was referred initially in the last session of parliament to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on June 8, that is, 1978, not long before we adjourned. On July 12 the committee advertised for submissions from all concerned with respect to that commodity tax review. To date, 93 briefs have been submitted, and we understand there are another 21 to come. The deadline for submitting briefs was initially September 21.

Our problem in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs now is that we cannot deal with this matter. There is no reference. Yet, there are 93 briefs sitting there and I think it is a grave injustice to the various people who have spent the money and taken the time to send in their material. We still cannot process it without a new reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. My House leader has reminded me that every time this question has been raised we have assured the government that if they move a reference it will pass without any debate on our part.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I share membership on the steering committee of the same committee with the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), and I am well aware of the suggestions which have been put forward by him. My understanding at the moment, however, is that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs decided just last night in full session to call six meetings a week to deal with the Bank Act reference which has been made by this House and that the committee has been extremely busy recently in connection with Bill C-7. I did make an undertaking in the committee—and this is really a committee matter—to report back to the next meeting of the steering committee with regard to a reference of the commodity tax matter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 14, consideration of Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance Trade and Economic Affairs, and the motion of Mr. Stevens.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, last night at the end of the day's proceedings I had the floor, but in view of today's dilatory tactics by the opposition, I will give others the chance to speak.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert).

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I had indicated to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) that he might follow the parliamentary secretary, but when the hon. member resumed his seat nobody got up except the hon. member for Vaudreuil. I have recognized him, but if there is unanimous consent I could go back to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I was on my feet, Mr. Speaker, when the parliamentary secretary sat down. I had no way of knowing he was going to play the shrinking violet and disappear from the debate.

When the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) put his amendment on the order paper, I decided I would not take any part in this debate even though I thought the amendment was somewhat puerile and mischievous to the extent that all it would do would be to confuse the whole situation with respect to Canada Savings Bonds.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe used his speech on this amendment yesterday to launch a vitriolic attack upon socialism, on the NDP in particular, and on the things which the New Democratic Party members in the House from 1972 to 1974 supported and to some extent succeeded in having put on the statute books of this country. The hon. member spent a good deal of his time attacking the establishment of Petro-Canada, and particularly the acquisition by that corporation of Pacific Petroleums a few days ago. His speech was reminiscent of the Coolidge and Hoover era. It could have been delivered by Ronald Reagan or a member of the John Birch Society.

I recognize that the official opposition has a compound name. It calls itself the Progressive Conservative party. I have always thought that to be a contradiction in terms, but a party which looks in two directions at the same time is bound to have a left wing and a right wing. Yesterday the hon. member for York-Simcoe demonstrated the genius, which the right wing of the Conservative party has always displayed, of snatching defeat from the jaws of victory. Whenever they get within sight of taking office, they immediately drop the masquerade of being progressive, and all their reactionary tenets come to the fore. That is what we witnessed yesterday.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe talked about the dangers to this country and to the western world if democratic socialist principles were put into effect. He spoke about how this country would be pushed back to the stage of human history reminiscent of conditions in Calcutta. The trouble with the right wing of the Tory party—and the hon. member for York-Simcoe is the exponent of it—is that it never really understands the people of Canada. Members of the right wing of the Tory party spend so much of their time talking to the bankers and financiers of this country that they think those individuals represent the man on the street, but they do not. The man on the street is not fooled by the "bogey man" of socialism. He is not fooled about the great blessings of free enterprise. He knows perfectly well that in the Scandinavian countries, some of which have had socialist democratic governments for over 40 years, progress has been made.

Mr. Stevens: They also have the highest suicide rate.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Only the hon. member for York-Simcoe would believe that fable. If he will take the trouble to look up the figures published by the United Nations, he will find that that is not true, as is the case with many other propaganda figures tossed out by the right wing. He should take the trouble to look at West Germany, which has a social democratic chancellor, a social democratic prime minister, and social democratic government. The economic performance of West Germany far outstrips Canada or the United States.

Mr. Oberle: How many Crown corporations are there in West Germany?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If he wants to, my friend can speak when I am finished. People are not fooled any more. People look around this country and recognize that the province of Saskatchewan has a better debt position and a better budgetary situation than has the province of Ontario. Saskatchewan does not have the big deficit Ontario has, nor the debt load per capita Ontario has. The official opposition tries to frighten people about public enterprise and about governments using the power which the people have given them to insert some control in the market place so that the average individual will at least have a voice in determining his own economic destiny. Most people recognize the value of such a procedure.

Yesterday the hon. member for York-Simcoe said that in the years 1972 to 1974 the New Democratic Party, along with the government of that time, and I quote:

—seeded the expansion in our monetary system and fiscal system that gave us the inflation we are now living with—

As a matter of fact, it was the New Democratic Party which moved an amendment to the budget which defeated the government and brought on the election of 1974. Our opposition was to the fact that the government was giving $2.5 billion to corporations which, by the way, the Conservatives supported.

The right wing of the Tory party and the Tory party as a whole are going to have to come clean with the Canadian people. What are they talking about with respect to the inflationary fiscal policies of 1972 to 1974? Are they talking about the fact that we put pressure on the minority Liberal administration to index old age pensions and family allowances, and to improve the medical and hospital services of this country? Is it to that they are objecting? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked the hon. member for York-Simcoe whether that was what he was objecting to and whether he would commit the Conservative party not to curtail those services if it took office. What was the answer? The answer was, "Give us a chance; just try us; put us in office and see what we do." That will hardly satisfy the people of Canada.

I tell my friends in the Conservative party that the people of Canada will not be satisfied with a party which says, "Put us in and we will then tell you what we will do." The Conservative party seems to be saying, "Put us in and then we will start to think about what we will do." The people of Canada will not be fooled by that technique.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe criticized members of the New Democratic Party for supporting and, in fact, urging the government to bring in legislation to set up Petro-Canada. The official opposition criticized us at the time. The hon. member for York-Simcoe was a member, as I was, of the committee which worked on that legislation. I think there were 19 sessions. At least 12 of them were the result of the objections and filibustering of the hon. member for York-Simcoe, who fought tenaciously against the legislation. That was his right, and I did not blame him for exercising it. He did not support the legislation, and he had a perfect right not to do so. However, that obsession has stayed with him, and he used yesterday's debate to criticize the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums by Petro-Canada.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

It is time that we brought this issue out into the open. It is time for the Progressive Conservative party to tell us where it stands. For the past 20 or 25 years 99 per cent of the ownership and control of the production and refining of petroleum products in this country has been in the hands of foreign corporations. I have not heard any protests about that from the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Are we to assume that, in the eyes of the Progressive Conservative party, government intervention in the oil industry is bad and that 99 per cent ownership of the oil industry by foreign corporations is good? Is that where the official opposition stands?

Mr. Broadbent: That is their position.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is time the official opposition told the Canadian people where it stands. It is significant that when the Liberal government reluctantly and belatedly got around to setting up a Crown corporation—and I have been as critical as any of the slow pace at which it has moved—the opposition came solely from the Conservative party.

What is the situation now? In Canada today we have probably sufficient quantities of light crude oil to last us at best until 1990, and after that we will be dependent for oil upon the tar sands which cannot possibly meet our requirements because of the large capital investments necessary and because of the disposal of the tailings.

The only other way we will be able to have anything like adequate petroleum supplies will be to develop the heavy oil deposits which straddle the borders of Alberta and Saskatchewan. It is estimated that there are billions of barrels of heavy oil there, but it is heavy oil which is very difficult to extract, which requires new technology, and which requires very large investments of anywhere from $700 million to $1 billion. The difficulty is that that territory is in the hands of private oil companies which have the leases. They have not been developing the oil, they have been sitting, waiting until the price gets to the place where it is economically viable to develop that heavy oil. Petro-Canada and the government have been pushing these companies to get on with the production, but nothing has been happening.

A few months ago Petro-Canada decided to try to purchase Husky Oil Company, which has very large holdings. All the members know what happened. Alberta Gas Trunk Company, closely associated with the government of Alberta, moved in, bid the price up and took the Husky Oil Company away from Petro-Can. I did not hear any of the Progressive Conservatives objecting to that. As a matter of fact it was the very opposite; they were chuckling with glee at the fact that Petro-Canada had been denied the opportunity to develop those heavy oil resources. Petro-Canada was not going to be able, on behalf of the Canadian people, to develop the Canadian people's own resources for the benefit of the people of Canada! The Conservatives were delighted that Husky Oil was going to go into the hands of a private company.

An hon. Member: And the government of Alberta.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Now Petro-Canada has made its second move. It has managed to purchase from Pacific Petroleums in the United States 48 per cent of the shares which they hold, and it will endeavour to buy the shares which are held in Canada, but even 48 per cent will give them a controlling interest in Pacific Petroleums.

We have listened all week, in question period after question period, to all kinds of criticisms made about the impropriety and the foolishness of the government and of Petro-Canada in seeking to buy up the shares of Pacific Petroleums. Pacific Petroleums gives to the Canadian people the opportunity of having oil ten or fifteen years from now, therefore enabling us to avoid the terrible imbalance in our overseas payments if we have to import that oil from the Middle East.

Every person who has looked at the situation knows that any industry which controls the energy resources of a nation has its fingers on the windpipe of that nation's economy, and unless people in this country, through their federal and provincial governments, obtain some control of the petroleum industry, we will have to go through, in the next 25 years, what we have gone through in the last 25 years when we have watched the petroleum industry, which is foreign owned and controlled, ignoring the interests of the Canadian people and blackmailing Canadian governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yesterday the hon. member for York-Simcoe said that taking over Pacific Petroleums will not produce one barrel of oil or provide one job. What it will do is to enable the Canadian people to get oil when they need it, at a fair price to the Canadian consumer.

What has been our experience with the 99 per cent American controlled oil industry? Any member who was here in 1974 can give you the answer. In 1974, when the price was $4 a barrel and the government was reluctant to raise it, the oil industry sent its drilling rigs down to the United States—it went on strike. If the oil workers had gone on strike there would have been legislation on the floor of this chamber within 48 hours. But the oil industry went on strike and said, "We are not going to drill until you raise the price." They put the gun to the government's head, and the government had little choice, so they knuckled under, and since then we have been raising the price by $1 every six months until it reaches the world price.

Are we going to go through that again when we come to the heavy oil? At present we are already net importers of oil; we now import more oil than we export. It is going to cost us $2 billion or $3 billion in the next 12 months or so to pay for imported oil, even after we subtract from the cost of importing oil what we export. Will we once more, when we come to deal with the billions of barrels of heavy oil that straddle the provincial border between Saskatchewan and Alberta, allow the same companies to hold us up to ransom as they did in 1974?

When the Canadian people realize where the Progressive Conservative party has been standing, or at least where the hon. member for York-Simcoe has been standing, and when they realize that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) has committed his party to wiping out Petro-Canada if he takes office, then I say the Canadian people will realize that the choice in this country is whether or not we are going to develop the petroleum resources of Canada for the benefit of the Canadian people, or whether we are going to continue to be an economic colony in which our vital energy resources are owned and controlled by foreign multinational corporations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) for his remarks concerning the purchase of Pacific Petroleums, and particularly for his reference to the need of the people of this country to have a greater handle on the development of their natural resources. I think the effect will be considerable in the sense that presumably the realization that we can purchase and control our own resources will be forcibly brought to the attention of the Canadian people by this purchase, and also by the fashion in which it is done. I am pleased it is not done by expropriation but rather by agreement.

I find it quite interesting that there has been some discussion about the price that was paid. I would not suggest that I have any special knowledge by which I can judge whether the price was high or low, but let me say that I am under the impression that the shares of companies such as Pacific Petroleums are considerably undervalued so far as the stock market is concerned, and therefore their fair value will be substantially higher than the present market value. Therefore it is not unreasonable to pay some $20 more than the present market price of the shares.

What I want to point out in my few remarks this afternoon is the fact that this bill is necessary essentially because we are running into a deficit, one this year and probably one next year. The fact that we have these deficits necessitates additional borrowing. When I look at the situation as it exists today, I see our national debt, the public debt, as of March 31 of this year, listed at some $80 billion. The figure is made up of $51 billion in unmatured debt, and another $28 billion in other liabilities. I am not talking about net debt because that would include a deduction of the assets. I am not deducting the assets for the simple reason that the only assets listed total approximately $40 billion. Obviously this amount does not include huge assets throughout the country which have never been recorded in the balance sheets of our nation. Most of the debt on which we are obliged to pay interest charges totals $80 billion.

Federal expenditures this year are expected to be somewhere between $48 billion and $49 billion, and our deficit will be somewhere between $11 billion and $12 billion. Looking at a total indebtedness of $80 billion for a nation such as Canada, it seems to me that we should not become particularly excited. I do not. I look at it from the point of view that the debt is something in the order of half the total income of the nation for one year. If a person has an income of $20,000 per annum, the chances are that his personal debts are considerably in excess of $10,000. In fact I doubt whether anyone would criticize an individual with a $20,000 per annum income if his total indebtedness was in the order of $25,000 or $30,000. The person judges whether he can handle his debts on his ability to pay interest charges and principal.

Canada is running into increasing public debt every year because of deficits and deficit budgets. We should examine the reason why. I should like to deal with that. Of the total expenditure this year of something less than $49 billion, $13.7 billion is in the form of transfer payments to the provinces, transfer payments made in areas acknowledged to be entirely provincial areas of responsibility, such as hospital care, education, social services, and welfare.

A few days ago I made a rather simplistic motion indicating that we could very easily get rid of our deficit of almost $12 billion by eliminating transfer payments to the provinces. That would leave us with a net surplus of approximately $2 billion which could be used for other purposes. Obviously the purpose of my motion was to illustrate why we are running into deficit financing and budgets at the present time.

The province of Quebec receives $4.3 billion from the federal treasury. Before someone says that the province of Quebec does not agree, I should like to indicate that the figures of that province amount to $3.2 billion. For the moment I will not argue about the difference between Quebec's figure of $3.2 billion and the federal government's figure of $4.3 billion. At the present time the Quebec budget varies between $12.3 billion and $12.7 billion, depending upon whether provincial or federal figures are used. That means between one-quarter and one-third of the Quebec provincial budget is moneys which come from the federal treasury. I am not objecting. I am saying that in provinces which run balanced budgets, this is being done because they receive money from Ottawa, even the rich provinces of British Columbia and Alberta. These provinces are considered to be rich because they have greater wealth than other provinces in the country. Those two provinces receive $2 billion from the federal treasury.

We must recognize that there was good reason for transfer payments being introduced. They are just as valid today as they were when the programs were put into force. I support fully the fiscal intervention or participation by the federal government in programs recognized as being of a purely provincial nature in order to ensure standards of service, portability, and a national scope. When the federal government puts out moneys to the provinces to ensure minimum standards of service, then those payments should not be discontinued. As an individual, that is why I opposed the latest agreement on social services, where the government no longer exercises its right to ensure even social services in the provinces. As a federal government we must strengthen our position, not weaken it. We should say bluntly to the provinces that presently we are running a huge federal deficit, substantially because of moneys being transferred to the provinces in areas recognized as entirely the responsibility of the provinces. Conditions should be attached, and we should insist upon conditions which ensure that the programs are national in scope, such as hospital treatment being available to all Canadians no matter where they are situated in the country, welfare payments, and so on.

I should like to deal with the two areas of transfers in old age security payments and family allowances which amount to a total of $8 billion. Approximately 11.6 per cent of the federal budget is devoted to old age security payments, and 4.8 per cent to family allowances. These are national programs, but if one wants to argue about constitutional powers they can be construed as provincial by nature. One cannot have it both ways. The only way to maintain a strong federation is by ensuring that social programs are national in their scope.

At the present time the direction in which the Conservative party is going, when talking about more power for the provinces, is hypocritical in the extreme. When I attempted to draw them out on the subject of transfer payments, I heard loud cries from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) who called transfer payments the very linchpin of Confederation. Even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) suggested that to withdraw these transfer payments would be a matter of devastating consequence to Confederation. At least we have that position established. When members of the Tory party discuss the weakening of the federal system they presumably are not talking about cutting payments for hospital service, welfare programs, social services, old age security, and so on.

I think the criterion on which we must judge whether we should be in the position of deficit financing is precisely what we do with the moneys that are involved. In the present case one of the problems we face obviously is that most of these programs have been indexed, or because we have been involved in sharing on a percentage basis with the provinces there have been substantial percentage increases beyond the control of the federal treasury.

I have no idea what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is going to introduce in his budget tomorrow night. One thing I do hope our federal finance minister will do at the finance ministers' conference which is coming up next week is put bluntly to the provinces, "You have been talking about provincial powers, you have been talking about the fact that the federal government is exercising its authority in areas where it should not be exercising such authority; how about now being specific? We have on going programs in areas which are entirely a provincial responsibility; do you believe we should re-negotiate these programs now, which would be of tremendous advantage to the federal government, or do you believe it is of national importance that we maintain the programs in their present form?"

Even though the programs are ongoing, it is my firm belief we must have the position established with provincial finance ministers and provincial governments before we go much further in this debate regarding what we want in a new confederation. I am absolutely convinced that the people of this country have been somewhat mesmerized by the continuing statements of provincial premiers that the federal government is too strong and that more powers should be distributed to provincial governments. Personally it is my belief that the opposite should be the case. In the many discussions I have had, I have found that people, when you discuss directly with them what they believe should be the power of the federal government, agree that rather than decreasing federal powers there should be a transfer of some of the powers from provincial governments to the federal level so that we can act in many areas as a nation.

I feel, for example, and I am glad that the subject of the petroleum company has come up this afternoon, that resources in this country should be considered as belonging to the nation. Before we start an argument on this, that does not mean I want immediately to transfer control of all resources to the federal government. I only suggest that most people, I like to believe, feel that the lumber of British Columbia, the oil of Alberta, the wheat of the western provinces, the industrial might of Ontario, the hydroelectric power potential of Quebec, and even the potatoes of the maritimes and the fish of our coastal waters, belong to our country, and in that respect we should look upon them as being national resources, and we should under no circumstances accept from either private companies, as in the case of the oil industry, or for that matter even from provincial governments, any attempt to hold back on the development of resources that can be of national benefit.

The federal government has contributed so much in the resource area which at the present time is often ignored. For example, I wonder just how far the oil industry in Alberta would have been developed had it not been for federal intervention to assure a market for Alberta oil when it was much cheaper to buy it from foreign sources. I wonder where the consumers of fuel oil, heating oils, for example, in the province of Quebec and in the maritime provinces, would be if the federal government had not intervened to stabilize prices in this country, ensuring that the full impact of oil price increases was not borne by the consumers of these provinces. I wonder even, in spite of all the arguments I have heard in this House about the Wheat Board, where the western provinces would be if there was not a national policy for grain. I wonder today where the coastal provinces would be were it not for the position taken by the federal government to keep to ourselves our fishing waters.

All these things clearly indicate there has been in the past, and is continuing today, massive federal intervention in respect of resources of the country—resources which I suppose, according to the letter of our constitution, are provincial, but which the people of our country from coast to coast look upon as being national.

I feel we are now moving toward a realization that we as a nation must be able to control our own riches. I am very pleased to see we have acquired a major interest in the oil industry, and I certainly like the way it has been done. I feel that the continuing intervention by Crown corporations for the benefit of Canadians as a whole will achieve something we are not able to achieve through the private sector. It has been extremely difficult to encourage Canadians to participate fully in Canadian enterprises, or to the extent we would like.

Hopefully our Minister of Finance will come in one of these days with something regarding the capital gains tax that will make it a little more encouraging for Canadians to invest in Canadian corporations.

We are asking for the power to borrow more money. We need that additional borrowing power because we are in a deficit financing position. We are in a deficit financing position for two basic reasons: first, huge transfer payments to the provinces and, second, increasing cost caused by indexing, increased population in areas of social service programs, all of which are surely a stimulus to the economy. This point should not be missed by the Conservative opposition. Moneys which are paid—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herbert: I will just conclude my sentence, Mr. Speaker. These moneys paid in the area of social services are, in the main, moneys that are spent by the recipients. Old age pensioners, the majority of whom obtain the supplement, will obviously be spending these dollars. Women receiving family allowance cheques will be spending these dollars. These programs must surely be a direct stimulus to the economy. If the Tory party would look upon it from that point of view perhaps they would be a little less critical about the present deficit and less difficult in passing a bill which is so essential if we are to continue to manage our country in an efficient fashion.

● (1722)

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): At the calling of the orders of the day just a few minutes ago, sir, you witnessed a fine piece of footwork when the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) deferred his remaining time to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), one of the Liberal party's crutches, the former leader of the NDP and who, the government thinks, apparently is better at expounding its devious policies than any of its own members.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I was present in the House last evening when the parliamentary secretary made his remarks. As I understand it this afternoon, he merely stood up to indicate that he had completed his comments, and it was as simple as that.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Anyone who was here last night, Mr. Speaker, knows that the parliamentary secretary had plenty of time to finish. If the government's policies were any good, why did he not remain to expound on them himself, instead of deferring to his ally in the NDP party, who spent all his time attacking the Progressive Conservative party and their policies? Both the Liberal party and the NDP party are in a federal eclipse, and the House has just witnessed one of their last frantic embracing gestures. I say to the Canadian people, "Don't vote Liberal or NDP, both of these parties are in bed together, with nothing but deceit and political trickery to offer as a solution to Canada's problem."

As I join in this debate on Bill C-7 I am reminded that on April 20 I made what I thought at that time would be my last major speech in this House. When I left for England on April 30 as a delegate to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference in London, I fully expected to return to the excitement of a federal general election campaign in this country. Instead I found that our country was still gripped in the turmoil caused by this confused and leaderless government. It is common knowledge right across this country that the government is in deep financial trouble, and has been for a long time. There is a five hour time limitation on the debate of this bill, the equivalent of closure, because the government cannot issue any bonds until it is passed.

This bill gives the Prime Minister and what is left of the Liberal party in this House the authority to borrow another $7 billion. The name of the session has changed since I returned from the old country from the third to the fourth session, but apart from that nothing else has changed. We are still mired in the same old political, social, and economic morass. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not seem to have heard the same message that we in this House have heard from people across the country. The message is that the Prime Minister has had his day and reached the end of his rope. It would be charitable and merciful if he should step aside and let the country recover its equilibrium with a new administration in charge.

On the occasion of my last speech I announced my voluntary retirement from active politics, and I did not expect to be here six months later debating still another government bill that turns out to be no more than another effort to borrow money. Just six months and 15 by-elections later I find that the government is setting still another record for spending and borrowing.

What we are getting is economic doubletalk. We hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that we can still go deeper into the bottomless pit of national indebtedness without increasing per capita indebtedness. What a fallacy that is. There might have been a time two or three years ago when it would have been true, but even then it would have required some juggling on the part of those who were selling that theory. Today, with a greatly devalued dollar, reduced productivity, and even greater deficit spending, there is no way that the Minister of Finance can sell such a theory; he will just have to think up a new one.

In the same vein, Bill C-7 seeks borrowing authority for the government to go into the market place anywhere in the world to borrow $7 billion, and at the same time amends the Financial Administration Act. While they were at it they should have asked for authority to amend the dictionary, and in particular to change the definition of "debt" and all its derivations. It now takes more than 15 cents of every dollar levied to carry our national debt. A year ago it was between 13 cents and 14 cents, but I am making that safe estimate of 15 cents now because there is at least 15 per cent discount on our money in the New York stock markets, which is the source of our emergency credit.

Unhappily, the government is faced with the same fact that the rest of us must face, that that debt means the same today as it meant yesterday, the same today as it meant 50 years ago, and the same today as it meant even to the Fathers of Confederation, and will mean the same in the years to come when our children and grandchildren are faced with a veritable mountain of IOUs, promissory notes, bond issues, and heaven knows what. The plain fact is that we are up to our eyeballs in debt, and yet this government wants more and more.

We are being asked to approve a further $7 billion of indebtedness, but we do not know for what it is to be used. If my leader had not jumped on the government and forced it to split its bill in committee, it would not have been $7 billion, it would have been $17 billion, but the government backed down on the other $10 billion.

What is the explanation we are given for the use of this money? Paragraph 2 of this five-paragraph bill reads:

> —the sum of $7 billion, as may be required for public works and general purposes.

Given the record and the attitude of this government, we probably should be thankful for small mercies and for the fact that the writers even volunteered to mention what it would be used for, albeit in general terms. Government bills seeking spending authority keep getting shorter and shorter.

Previous speakers in my party and in other parties in the House have termed this bill a disaster. It would be difficult to improve on that, because a disaster is a disaster. The Trudeau government is the all-time record holder in Canada for profligate spending and for floating bond issues. Over the past two years this government has been floating bond issues to pay interest on interest on the national debt.

I would like to quote from today's Citizen, no handmaiden to Liberal policies of profligate neglect of our nation's business and her economy:

> Canadians are desperate to see solutions to the country's economic problems and they're willing to make major sacrifices to achieve that objective—
> The more the government spends, the more it prints money. The more money it prints, the less worth that money has. Once it's into the cycle, there's almost no way, short of draconian measures, to get out of it.
> Part of the problem is government borrowing to finance over-spending.

● (1732)

Yes, that is true. I have stressed government borrowing to finance the payment of interest on interest on maturing obligations in the form of bonds.

The article in the Citizen continues:

In the process it imposes totally contradictory policies on Canadians and tries to explain those policies with unmitigated gibberish, pompous bluster and downright falsehoods.

A majority of Canadians may favor wage and price controls, but that preference should be seen as a willingness to bite the bullet, to make the sacrifices required to preserve this country's economic future.

The last few paragraphs in the Citizen editorial read as follows:

What it failed to do in the first ten years of its existence, the Trudeau administration now hopes to bring together in six months.

Is that the date of the election, six months from now?

Borrowing and deficit financing further debase and undermine our currency, and therefore our dollar falls in relation to the currencies of more responsible governments, the cost of imports goes up, and inflation soars.

In the last three years the government has been remarkably inactive in planning to reduce Canada's demand for imports. It has been equally delinquent in planning for increasing Canada's exports.

To return to the subject of the national debt, a subject which this government shies away from, but nevertheless it will have to face up to, we find that this is the third time in fiscal 1978-79 that the government has come to parliament to request an increase in its borrowing limit. Over the past two years these increases in borrowing authority have amounted to $28 billion, a 66 per cent interest in the national debt accumulation. I should add that "coming to parliament" is a hollow phrase. Those Liberal members vote as a pack, probably without even reading the bills, and so it is a foregone conclusion that Bill C-7 will pass.

Bill C-7 also authorizes the government to borrow in currency other than Canadian currency, and to repay loans in the currency in which it was borrowed. The plain fact is that the loans must be paid back in Canadian currency converted to the foreign currency borrowed, and the discount on the Canadian dollar must be paid. In the case of U.S. funds the exchange rate of 15 per cent to 17 per cent must be added to the average of 10 per cent interest, and to that must be added the two or three points that foreign buyers are discounting for our bond issues. This all adds up to an astronomical cost to our children and grandchildren.

Considering the growth in government spending and borrowing, and considering that we are being plunged headlong intc massive public debt, there should be more, rather than less scrutiny of bills such as Bill C-7. There should be dollar by dollar accountability by parliament on the part of any government. It is obvious from this five-paragraph bill before us that accountability has been lost. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that this government has lost control over our economy.

Accountability for public funds has always, at least until the past ten years, been an honour and a sacred trust. Under the reign of the present government it has now become somthing else. It is now a vital necessity to restore accountability to governments and ministers. The PC administration that will succeed this one will certainly stick to that code. Bill C-7 is a prime example of what I am talking about. Seven billion dollars is a lot of money to approve of spending for general purposes. I have to tell myself what I spend my money for, and so does each member of this House. We do not try to delude ourselves that we can spend vast sums of money and put it under the heading "general purposes", and yet the explanation in Bill C-7 as to what the money will be used for reads "For public works and general purposes" That is exactly six words, not even one word per billion. That is not an explanation, it is a put-off.

When I came to parliament 17 years ago I came from the municipal level of government where I learned my lessons on accountability of elected officials. As any hon. member who also came here from municipal politics can tell us, we did not strike mill rates for general purposes. Those rates are struck to cover the cost of specified expenses and services required by the corporate body, the municipality. I shudder to think of where I would be today if I had attempted to cover an item of, say, $20,000, by telling my colleagues to just charge it to general purposes. I know for certain that I would not be sitting here in this House.

Briefly, by way of qualification of this point, municipal government expenditures are controlled in three ways. Municipal governments are far more accountable than we are. First, council committees draw up their budgets. These are combined and brought before the whole council for debate and approval. Second, budgets are scrutinized and approved, in whole or in part, by the official arm of the province. In my case, it was the Ontario Municipal Board. In Ontario, and I suppose in other provinces, municipalities are creatures of the province and each has their municipal board. Third, mandates are often given by the people in the form of local referendums concerning certain types of laws and public improvements. There is naturally a certain amount of deficit financing allowed by the province since the province is responsible to the people. But it is not run-away deficit financing without accountability as we have seen over the past few years with this profligate government.

Day after day this government is stretching its credibility to the breaking point. Day after day the obedient ciphers on the Liberal benches across the way vote yea plunging the Canadian people further into debt. I have objected as strongly as possible to this government's practice of floating bond issues to pay interest on interest, but this has been to no avail. This practice is destroying parliament's confidence and the Canadian people's confidence in this government. They should do the honourable thing, get out and call an election.

This bill should be thrown out for at least two very good reasons—I know it won't be—but in the first place we do not have the faintest notion as to what the government wants the money for. I suspect that it is to pay interest on interest because it has to pay that, among other equally devious purposes. But the fact is that we do not know, and we know that we are not going to be told before this bill passes. Second, what we are being asked to do is approve a third mortgage for a client who is not able to pay even the interest on the first and second mortgages. That is certainly not good financial practice, Mr. Speaker. We should not be put into the position of approving this bill by aiding and abetting it here. I resent being put into that position. It is a perversion of the high trust of public office and it is a misuse of the high privilege of being allowed to cast a vote in this chamber. How much of this money will go to buy another oil company? How much of this money will go help shore up the shaky Trudeau buck in New York, London, and other world monetary markets?

In short, there is a misty aura of deception and doubt already created by the dismal record of this government which should make any member voting on this bill conclude that the borrowing authority which they have asked for, of another $7 billion, should be refused. But better still than that, an amendment should be moved to the Financial Administration Act prohibiting and forbidding any government of Canada or any government in Canada at any level to borrow money anywhere from anyone to pay interest on interest, making it illegal to place a third mortgage on Canada, our country, which is now financially embarrassed and in a state of near bankruptcy as a result of being too long governed by the false and phony policies of Trudeau liberalism.

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to speak on a matter as important as borrowing money to ensure the efficient operation of the federal government.

I noted the speech of the previous speaker as well as those of other members of the Progressive Conservative party. It seems to me they are all mixed up about that bill requesting authority to borrow money. Most hon. members refer to borrowings and expenditures. The bill is merely aimed at borrowing money and does not authorize the government to spend it in various areas such as agriculture, fisheries and so on. It is merely a bill to borrow money.

If we want to borrow money, it is surely to do something, to spend it. As I said, however, that amount will not necessarily be earmarked for specific areas. It could be used, for example, to maintain what is commonly called the cash flow. It could also be used to repay matured bonds. In short, it could be used for many purposes.

The official opposition suggest that the Liberal government is spending money in an irresponsible way. However, since last August the Liberal government is cutting expenses in almost all departments, wherever it is possible to reduce expenses. In spite of those cuts, the official opposition still suggest that we spend far too much money. Yet in the course of the last election campaign the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said that if he were elected he would allow Canadians to deduct from their income tax return up to $5,000 in interests or taxes paid on private houses.

A few simple calculations show us that such an exemption would cost the federal treasury about $1.5 billion and again as much to the various provinces. In other words, by a very innocent electoral promise he commits himself and others to outlays of about $3 billion. Since we know that the federal budget varies between $43 and $44 billion, such an expense would represent 6 per cent of the total budget and would result from a very arbitrary and hasty promise. If that promise were enacted, it would cost $1.5 billion.

And the Conservatives have the nerve to say that we Liberals are irresponsible in our spending. I would really like to hear what they have to say about that $1.5 billion promise. My contention is that not only it would cost the government a fantastic sum of money but it would be unfair to all Canadians. Tenants who rent their homes would not benefit from that exemption. Yet when they pay rent these tenants also pay interests, taxes and unavoidably a portion of their landlords' profits. But when the landlord determines the rent, he takes into account these taxes and interests. I think it would only be fair, if these credits are allowed, to grant them not only to landlords but to tenants as well. Incidentally, the province of Ontario has a system through which such things as interests and taxes are deductible. True, this system is restricted to a very small amount but on the other hand, it applies to all Ontario taxpayers, whether they are homeowners or tenants.

Another thing is very important. People whose houses are mortgage free could not benefit from this exemption even if the Progressive Conservative party could pass it because they do not pay mortgage interest. However, if such a measure were accepted, these people could mortgage their home for a sum depending on its value, let's say, for $50,000. The same owner who took a mortgage loan of $50,000 on his house could go to Florida, buy a condominium and live there during the winter months. Then he would be eligible for the deduction for the interests paid on his mortgage, which means that Canadian taxpayers as a whole would finance a portion of the condominium in Florida.

I said earlier that the present government has been reducing expenditures as much as possible since last August. I would like to bring hon. members to a place where I agree with the limitation of expenditures, namely my constituency where it affects me particularly. As we know, Mr. Speaker, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a definite purpose, which is to lend money to builders so that they resell their buildings to Canadian people with as little cash as possible. I understand that there are some other things related to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but its main purpose is what I have just mentioned. However, along the way some contractors went bankrupt. The Central Morgage and Housing Corporation, as any mortgagee, was therefore forced to take over its property and in many cases even had to complete construction, improve it and rent out to individual Quebeckers. And in Quebec a great many housing units belonged to CMHC. However, in view of management restraint, it decided to sell its properties, which were often rented 40 per cent to 50 per cent below market value, which means that indirectly CMHC was helping underprivileged people to have adequate housing at minimal cost. To recover its money, it is now selling its properties in Quebec. Before selling, it asked the Quebec Housing Corporation Authority, which is under provincial jurisdiction, to make offers on all its units. The Quebec Housing Corporation did in fact buy some of them, but at a minimal price.

However, I would like to explain also the difference between the role of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Quebec Housing Corporation. The main function of the Quebec Housing Corporation is not to lend money to promote construction and help Quebeckers become homeowners but to have buildings built or bought to rent them to underprivileged people so the poorer people in our society can have adequate housing.

I think the Quebec Housing Corporation should have bought a lot more of those units in Quebec. Furthermore, I realize that the Quebec Housing Corporation should have incurred deficits because its duty is to rent its housing units according to the capacity of the tenants to pay and not the market value. However, those deficits incurred by the Quebec Housing Corporation are financed 50 per cent by the federal government and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I realize that CMHC rented its buildings to individuals at reduced rates for a long time, because then the federal government was financing 100 per cent of those tax credits, but according to the law, those credits should be paid half by the federal government and half by the provincial government.

That is an example where the federal government is tightening its belt, recovering money and saving. I can also mention others, Mr. Speaker. In my riding there is the St-Vincent-de-Paul penitentiary. And now civil servants are being laid off, particularly staff working in the kitchens, and also office staff and even guards. And again the opposition which wants to spend $1.5 billion on a tax credit for housing is accusing the government of overspending. This is one specific area where we are saving the taxpayers money. In fact, I could mention all the departments, but one department where most members can see a saving in their ridings is the Post Office, which is spending a lot less than before. In the Montreal metropolitan area, for example, the Post Office has reduced the number of available boxes where people can deposit their mail. In the rural areas of my riding, we have boxes located on street corners, and the people living there must go and get their mail at those boxes. There again we have reduced the number of boxes and, of course, in doing so, we had to relocate them in perhaps somewhat more strategic and more central places so they could accommodate all the people in that same area.

Bill C-28 aims among other things at limiting the indexing of pension for public servants. I am not saying that it aims at eliminating indexing, but rather at limiting it. In my opinion, it would be a good thing if our public servants were limited to a reasonable amount because there is absolutely no restriction for most Canadian workers. There is also the unemployment insurance policy where there have been carefully thought-out cutbacks which will also save money for the federal treasury. For instance, in the past benefits represented a maximum of 66⅔ per cent of the insured salary. This has been reduced to 60 per cent. We have also increased the number of weeks of work required for employees to become eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. I cannot give the list of everything that has been done in all areas because I would then have to list all the departments as there have been significant cutbacks in each one of them.

I noted one thing earlier when I read the speech made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). He said that if, instead of issuing federal government bonds on November 15 we were to postpone the issue until November 22, because this bill will not have been passed yet, this would cost $30 million more to the federal treasury in interest charges. He then said: If this bill is not passed, instead of November 22, it could be November 29. This would mean one week more and cost another $13 million. If the members of the Progressive Conservative party are serious, they should give us their support as soon as possible so that this bill can be passed and we can avoid needlessly paying current interests on Canadian bonds. I therefore urge them to act like responsible managers and responsible Canadians and allow this bill to pass as soon as possible so that the interests charged to Canada will be as low as possible.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to have the opportunity to make some comments with respect to the bill currently before the House. I always enjoy the opportunity to speak on measures that are constructive, measures which offer some means by which the problems facing us as a nation can be resolved. Unfortunately, the bill before us is one which somehow brings with it a feeling of unhappiness and unease because we are being asked in this measure, the first of economic consequence to be introduced this session, to authorize the borrowing of a further $7 billion for the financing of government operations. This, in itself is an indication that we are facing serious difficulties. It is an indication that the government has failed to come to grips with the problems which are besetting the nation. It also indicates that the administration has failed to find solutions for the problems which are of current concern, not only to members of this House but to Canadians generally. So, as we face the task of commenting on this legislation we find it necessary to go back and remind ourselves of some of the circumstances which have led up to the present serious financial situation.

For the past ten years the government has been engaging in a mad spending spree, with adverse results which are of tremendous consequence, and which call for immediate action.

May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—REQUESTED AMENDMENT OF QUOTA POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on an urgent matter of national importance.

In view of statements made by the hon. William Newman, Ontario minister of agriculture and food, to the Ontario Dairy Council's annual convention to the effect that a shortage of industrial milk produced in Ontario is causing severe losses in terms of jobs, farm income and secondary economic growth, as well as a loss of export sales, particularly of Cheddar cheese, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the Minister of Agriculture accept his responsibilities and convene a meeting immediately with the provincial ministers, the National Milk Supply Management Committee and officials of the CDC for the express purpose of amending the present rigid quota policy so as to take into account changing production and market demand within the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED INCREASES IN COST OF AIR TRAVEL—EFFECT ON TOURIST INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, that being the proposed increases in the cost of air travel in Canada.

Domestic air fares may go up by an average of 5 per cent, airport taxes may be increased from $8 to $13, and landing fees may also be increased. Because of the negative effect this would have on the tourist industry in Canada, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the government use its powers to stop these discriminatory and damaging increases which would deal a further blow to our tourist industry.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, under Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), I ask leave to move:

That this House calls on the Postmaster General to drop the idea of a further increase in the first-class postage rate, it being the view of the House that enough is enough.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that an international congress of the Lion's Club will be held in Montreal during the week of June 17, 1979, considering that the congress will be attended by more than 40,000 delegates from 150 countries and principalities throughout the world, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle):

That the House ask the Postmaster General to issue a commemorative stamp for that important event.

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—CONSULTATION WITH FOREST PRODUCTS INDUSTRY ON ESTABLISHING TERMINAL OPERATOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the fact that the National Harbours Board is considering establishing a terminal operator in the Navy Island forest products terminal at the port of Saint John, and in view of the fact that it is considering awarding that title of operator to a Montreal consortium of stevedoring firms, while rejecting a consortium of New Brunswick forest products producers, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the Minister of Transport personally investigate this matter to ensure that no change in terminal operations is considered until full consultation has taken place with the New Brunswick forest products industry so that the industry will be a part of the decision-making process.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, under Standing Order 43, can be made only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

CONSERVATION

RE-CYCLING OF WASTE PAPER ON PARLIAMENT HILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43 with respect to which there seems to be a consensus in this House.

In view of the importance we attach today to conserving our forest and energy resources, given the cords and cords of wood consumed by hon. members in the form of paper subsequently discarded, and in view of the opportunities for recycling waste paper in the Ottawa-Hull region, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House set an example to the country and instruct the Sergeant-at-Arms to take prompt action and make the necessary arrangements to have the paper discarded on Parliament Hill recycled by the industry.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of this motion, under Standing Order 43, can be made only with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion put forward in the name of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

COMMUNITY EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY PROGRAMS IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae):

That this House direct the government to discontinue its plans for the termination of the community employment strategy program in the western part of Newfoundland and, in particular, the Labrador Straits community employment strategy association and the Port au Port community employment strategy association, it being the view of this House that to discontinue these programs at this point, when local associations have strategies in place, without adequate provisions for implementation will tend only to undermine local community efforts to foster local development.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

APPEARANCE OF OFFICIALS BEFORE COMMITTEE TO EXPLAIN LOSS OF EXPORT SALES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the announcement by the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture that China plans to increase its purchase of American grain, in view of the fact that so far this year China has purchased 4.35 million tonnes of American wheat and corn, of which 3.3 tonnes was wheat, and in view of the fact that traditionally the Chinese market has been a Canadian one, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board take immediate steps to arrange for the appearance of Wheat Board officials before the Standing Committee on Agriculture to explain the reason for the loss of the Chinese market and other problems in the movement and sale of grain.

LABOUR RELATIONS

LABOUR-MANAGEMENT DISPUTE AT INCO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to seek the unanimous consent of this House.

In view of the fact that local 6500 of the United Steel Workers of America has been on strike against the International Nickel Company of Canada for over eight weeks, that Inco has always forced its workers into strikes, even when nickel markets were good, and that this government stood by and was powerless to act when Inco laid off about 2,600 workers last fall, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instruct Inco to get itself back to the bargaining table and to offer its employees a better package than it has offered to date.

Mr. Speaker: As a result of recent discussions, I think hon. members will recognize that a minimum precaution which I ought to exercise, even with regard to Standing Order 43, is that motions have to be within the administrative capacity of the government, which this one does not seem to be.

TRADE

IMBALANCE OF TRADE—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON STATISTICS CANADA FIGURES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. An analysis of imports and exports of high technology end products indicates that our position deteriorated in the first two quarters of this year. We showed a deficit of $4.7 billion for six months.

Can the minister de-bag these facts as produced by Statistics Canada, and is this the rosy trade picture about which the minister talks?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the analysis to which the hon. member refers. I will look into it. But I am quite confident that we have made gigantic strides forward in the export of end products from our country this year.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, this statistic was produced by Statistics Canada and it is available to the minister. Can the minister explain why, after the government accommodated the formation of CAMCO an attempt to rationalize the white goods and appliance industry, we are importing more than $863 million worth of domestic and commercial heating, refrigeration and air-conditioning appliances? That is a very significant market. What efforts is the minister taking, or is he going to take, to see that some of these products are produced in Canada?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we are making great efforts to encourage Canadian production. We recognize that we must rationalize manufacturing for many of our requirements in order to meet competition. I believe that over the last six years we have lent about $600,000 to the company to which the hon. member referred. However, I would like to check the facts. We have certainly attempted to keep manufacturers in business so that they can sell to the Canadian market.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The Canadian machinery industry experienced a net deficit of more than $7 billion in the first six months of this year. Would the minister advise us whether he considers a $7 billion domestic market to be a significant market, and can he explain why reports out of Geneva suggest that the Canadian machinery industry will not survive the GATT negotiations?

Put another way, does the minister support the sell-out of the very significant market in Canada for the machinery industry?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, $7 billion, in relation to $11 billion, is less. I think the hon. member is reaching conclusions which are not at all well-founded. I believe very strongly that there is a growing market for the Canadian machinery industry in Canada, and we will do everything we can to make certain that that industry reaches its goals.

DEFICIT UNDER CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—REQUEST FOR REGULAR CANADIAN REPORT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Why does Canada have to continue to rely on reports from the United States Secretary of Commerce to indicate how large our deficit is growing under the auto pact? When will the minister produce a Canadian auto industry report on a regular basis?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I intend to release, I think on November 23, the Reisman report with regard to the auto industry. As I said about a week ago in the House, this year our deficit in trade in automobiles and auto parts between Canada and the United States is half of what it was a year ago, a reduction of something like $600 million, which is quite a substantial reduction as I am sure even the hon. member would agree.

Mr. Lawrence: It is still a $10.3 billion deficit accumulation, Mr. Speaker. For some time conditions looked very favourable for a new, multimillion dollar aluminum engine block foundry and plant to be located in the province of Quebec: it looked favourable until the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce got into the act. It is now apparent that General Motors will not proceed with it. Can the minister indicate what he did that turned them off?

Mr. Jamieson: Whatever turns you on.

Mr. Horner: I and my officials have had discussions with General Motors. They have not informed me that they are turned off at all, Mr. Speaker. In fact, this is only one of a number of plants which General Motors intends to build in Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Some time before the end of the century.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RIGHT OF EMPLOYEES TO RUN FOR PUBLIC OFFICE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs spoke very eloquently yesterday about the government's commitment to civil liberties.

Considering that section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act permits public employees to obtain leave of absence to run for public office, and considering that the Liberal candidate in Winnipeg North is a civil servant who has been given leave, could the minister tell the House why Mr. Garth Brewer, a federal employee in New Brunswick, was not only denied leave of absence to become a candidate for the NDP in a recent provincial election, but has subsequently been fired for doing so?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this matter was brought to my attention only ten minutes ago. It is the responsibility of the Public Service Commission, and I will inform them of the concern expressed by the leader of the NDP and reply to him as soon as possible.

[Mr. Lawrence.]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the minister has just learned of it; I informed the office of the President of the Treasury Board of it over an hour ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Even a Liberal cabinet minister should be able to find out something in an hour. I should like to ask the minister, in all seriousness, who is dealing with the matter.

As a supplementary question, may I point out that subsection 3 of the act asserts that the only reason for denying a public employee the right to run as a candidate is his or her usefulness to the public possibly being impaired. Can the minister tell us, after he looks into this case, how that could conceivably apply to Mr. Brewer's situation, who was employed as a customs and excise official?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member complains about the length of time in bringing it to my attention. I would have thought that he has been a member of the House long enough to know that the Public Service Commission reports to parliament through the Secretary of State. As I have already said to the hon. member, I will pass along his inquiries to the appropriate body, the Public Service Commission, and transmit its reply to him.

• (1422)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, quite apart from passing on information, and since a Liberal candidate has been given leave to run in the forthcoming federal election in Winnipeg—which makes a lot of sense, and we support it 100 per cent—will the government take steps to ensure that this man who sought, and ran for, public office recently in the province of New Brunswick will have his job restored to him?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is asking me to intervene for a specific purpose in relation to the Public Service Commission, it seems to me that is not entirely an appropriate suggestion. As I repeat for the third time, I will communicate his concerns and come back to him.

REQUEST COMMEMORATIVE STAMP BE ISSUED IN HONOUR OF MONTREAL LION'S CLUB

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General.

In view of the fact that the international congress of the Lion's Club will be held in Montreal this year and that it takes some time to issue a new stamp, I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he has received representations with a view to issuing a commemorative stamp on this occasion, and if in fact he intends to do so?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I must say that many representations have been made to me to that effect. I had some from both government and opposition members as well as from the general public. The matter has been referred to our philately experts and an answer will be forthcoming shortly on the opportunity to issue a stamp for the Lion's Club thereby setting a precedent in relation to that category of association.

TOURISM

PROPOSED INCREASES IN COST OF AIR TRAVEL—EFFECT ON TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In terms of our lagging tourist industry, how can the minister justify a proposed increase of 5 per cent on domestic air fares, an increase in landing fees and an increase in airport taxes which, combined, will make Canada a very, very expensive place in which to travel? How can this be justified at a time when our tourist deficit for the first two quarters of 1978 is in the neighbourhood of $1.35 billion, and if projected to the end of 1978, the deficit will be over $2 billion?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not as pessimistic as the hon. member. I have looked at the third quarter figures and there is substantial improvement in our deficit in tourism.

Leaving that aside, I also think it is true that we have taken great strides to make more charter flights available to Canadians travelling within Canada, which automatically lowers the cost to Canadian tourists travelling within Canada. Also, I should add that I well recognize the fact that most tourists coming into Canada come from the United States and most of these American tourists come by way of an automobile, not an aeroplane.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, in conversations with travel industry executives, they state that the implementation of the proposed new airport tax alone will hurt seriously our tourism industry in Canada. Is the minister in favour of the proposed increases that the Minister of Transport seems bound and determined to implement?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I am not necessarily in favour of all costs. I do not like to pay any more than the next person for a service which I require or want the government to provide for me. I am not going out and asking the government to provide a bunch of costs for me to pay as a tourist. But I recognize that I, as a tourist, can afford to pay the costs which I incur as a traveller.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: I reiterate that most of the tourists coming into Canada come from the United States, and by far and large most of them come by automobile, not by aeroplane.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIR TRANSPORT

AIRPORT TAX—EFFECT ON TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): My supplementary question is to the Minister of Transport. Canada's airport tax of $8 per person is already one of the highest in the world. The sector task force report on tourism stated:

> The airport user-pay policy makes air transportation in Canada non-competitive with that of the United States, and is detrimental to Canadian tourism development.

Would the Minister of Transport indicate to the House, if he is in a position to do so, whether the airport head tax will be increased to $13 as part of the generation of the additional $72 million included in the government's restraint program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at this point I cannot add anything to the comments which have been made previously in the House on the subject. As far as the question of costs is concerned, particularly those being borne by travellers rather than by taxpayers not travelling, I think that the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce put the matter very well.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to increase airport landing fees by some 30 per cent to 40 per cent over an eight-year period. This would result in these fees being increased by six times their present level, which would raise the cost of landing a 747 up to $1,800, compared to roughly $400 for an airport such as the one in Chicago in the United States.

Would the minister explain to the House the differential between these two costs, and is he not concerned about the negative impact this will have upon domestic air travel and, indeed, the tourist industry? Or is this simply the price the air traveller must pay for the ministers grandiose schemes in terms of the Taj Mahals that have been erected in this country in place of airports?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the United States is also reviewing its policy of subsidizing air travellers by not charging fully the costs of the system. We are awaiting their judgments in that regard.

I can assure the hon. member that, although there may be increases in charges over the year, at no time will the charges be higher than the actual costs of providing the facilities and conveniences to the traveller. Not only that, I can assure the hon. member that this very system of making realistic the fact that facilities being provided have to be part of the cost of flying has led to a full discussion with the carriers of all the issues—

Mr. Mazankowski: That is not true.

Mr. Lang: —about what kind of facilities should be put in place. Whereas, until we were charging some of these costs through, the carriers always found it very attractive to ask for as much as possible in the way of facilities. Now that they know there is a charge to be borne, they are being very realistic indeed about what they ask for in the way of facilities, and that is a very good result for the taxpayer and the traveller.

NATIONAL SECURITY

IGOR GOUZENKO CASE—PUBLICATION OF SECRET DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister: it has to do with national security.

As the Prime Minister knows, under the law, secret documents are kept in custody for 30 years. Recently, it has become known that in so far as the revelations of Igor Gouzenko are concerned, they are not going to be made available at this time. Would the Prime Minister tell the House why such an alteration has been made in the general policy, and when does he expect that these revelations, which were so beneficial to our country and would no longer be detrimental by revelation, will be revealed to Canadians as a whole?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the former prime minister will recall that I took the initiative a few years ago, myself, to reduce the 50-year rule to a 30-year rule, at which time I consulted with the right hon. gentleman and obtained his agreement.

It is a matter of policy to shorten the time interval as this government has done. If there is some exception, I am not aware of it; but I will take note of the question and find out why there has been an exception.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I realize what the Prime Minister has done: I thought it was worth-while and I approved of it. However, there has been an exception made in Gouzenko's case and some people in this country are very frightened at the revelations which might be made, for they were not proceeded against as others were who were no more guilty than these people. Therefore, it is necessary that at the earliest date this information be made available.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. gentleman has repeated his previous question and I can only give the same answer, that I will inquire if an exception has been made and, if so, why. Presumably, if it has been made, it would have been in the interests of national security.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no national security in that.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. gentleman knows that there is no national security involved. I wonder how he knows that. The files were not accessible to him at that time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INCREASE IN CAPITAL BUDGET OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On Tuesday, he told his press conference that the government was adhering to its commitment to increase the capital budget of the Department of National Defence by 12 per cent per year, in real terms, and its operating budget to keep pace with inflation.

Can the Prime Minister clarify those remarks, as senior DND officials, particularly the associate deputy minister of finance in the department, acknowledged at the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on March 21 that the real increase in the capital budget for this fiscal year is only 2.8 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to refer to that testimony and see in what context it was made. Probably it was talking about a particular point in time, but the commitment on the forward budgeting over the period, I believe, until 1981 has been for a 12 per cent increase per year in capital budgets and in real terms.

It is possible that in expending the money the department will want to spend more than 12 per cent in one year and a little less in the next. Certainly, the commitment still stands and I would be very surprised if the hon. member could find any evidence to the contrary.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn to the Minister of National Defence for my supplementary question.

On Tuesday, he too referred to a theoretical capital envelope. Is this not really a subterfuge that means the government has taken some of the department's money out of this year's budget and is replacing it with an IOU possibly payable in some not yet specified year? Does the minister agree that the so-called financial envelope is a euphemism meaning, "Sorry, DND: we are breaking our financial promises this year, but we will give you a similar promise for some other year"?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, maybe it is unparliamentary, but that is absolute nonsense. The hon. member asks this sort of question in committee and in the House all the time. He knows the answer to it. The Prime Minister just gave the answer to it.

The capital envelope is not a fictitious thing; it is a very tough constraint in my department, as it is in all departments, but it is very real. Nevertheless, those expenditures are committed by the government, or will be if some are not already, and that equipment will be purchased. I think the hon.

member must realize it is there for a real purpose and not just to spend. If we do not spend it on the equipment we intend to one year, we do it the following year. We are not going to disrupt those major capital equipment projects for the Canadian armed forces.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC INDEPENDENCE PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the comments made by the Prime Minister at his press conference the day before yesterday to the effect that Quebec Premier Lévesque has managed to lull Canadians to sleep concerning his real intentions, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government of Quebec is still pursuing its project for independence in the context of its relations with the federal government? Furthermore, what is the position of the federal government in view of the threat made by the Quebec government to hold a referendum to get a mandate to negotiate the province's withdrawal from confederation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question could lead to a lengthy answer. I think it would be summarized by saying that no one is being misled on the intention of the PQ government which is to lead Quebec to independence. No one on this side of the House, anyway. It is true that the statements of the PQ premier in Regina last summer seem to have slightly lulled the other provincial premiers to sleep but I do not think that any Quebecker entertains any doubts whatsoever as to the real intention of the PQ which is to try to make an independent country out of Quebec.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITY FOR HEALTH CARE OF INDIANS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the minister knows, the federal government is now planning the transfer of Indian health care to the provinces. She knows that the Indian people are very concerned about this and have been to Ottawa to see us, as well as sending telegrams to the minister.

I should like to ask the minister whether she will consider suspending that action and restating a commitment to Indian health because of the great concern Indians have about Indian health being guaranteed under their treaty rights with the government?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there has never been such a plan: I want to make that extremely clear. I do not know what the hon. member has in mind. There is no need to say it is very easy for me to reaffirm, as he has asked, a firm commitment to better health for all Indians of Canada.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, that is rather strange. Representatives of the Saskatchewan Indian Brotherhood, the National Indian Brotherhood, the Manitoba and Yukon Indians have been down here to see members of various parties. They sent a very lengthy telegram to the minister. She replied to the effect that the government is still very committed to transferring Indian health from the federal government to the provinces. That telegram is dated October 18.

Today, the minister reversed her position and I want to be clear about this: is she saying now to the Indian people that Indian health care is going to rest with the federal Department of National Health and Welfare, and not transferred, as her telegram indicates, to the provinces and to the territorial governments?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, the telegram was probably too long for the hon. member to read. If he had taken the time to read it and study it, he would have seen that the National Indian Brotherhood delegates, who came for a very good meeting in Ottawa this week, asked me questions and made very good representations to me concerning what we call, in the jargon of the health delivery system, the uninsured items or expenditures. That has nothing to do with health care per se. Health care remains exactly as it is, and we are following completely the historical relationship by which we are in it. That means eyeglasses—and I told them there would not be several pairs per year, per person—it means dental equipment or expenditures, it means transportation costs and drugs.

This question is very serious, and if the hon. member is honest, he will listen. There is no point giving to any segment of the population open expenditures that will create abuses to which everyone else will object. We were going bankrupt with the expenditures because there were no guidelines. We have set guidelines, which I issued in September, giving Indians on welfare 50 per cent more than the provinces give them.

POST OFFICE

INCREASED POSTAL RATES TO COVER INCREASED DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. On November 21, 1977, the then postmaster general announced significant increases in postal rates affecting all classes of mail, to be effective April 1, 1978. A year later, because of the continuing turmoil in the Post Office, that means the deficit for the fiscal year 1978-79 will be much higher than the $525 million predicted by the present Postmaster General last June.

Does the hon. gentleman intend to pass on these unplanned, increased deficits to the taxpayer by increasing postal rates again in 1979? If so, what will be the proposed rates, and what classes of mail will be affected?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member for Brandon-Souris picking up the question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in a motion at the beginning of the sitting.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, "Enough is enough". But enough is enough of deficit, not necessarily the postal rates. That is exactly what we are trying to do, to reduce the deficit of the Post Office. That is why we moved so wisely by putting Bill C-8 through the House, so that we would have labour stability during at least another year.

Also, at the postal users conference, most of our users asked us to administer the Post Office as closely as possible on business principles. This means that we have to be very fair about the share which is paid by the users themselves, which must be their fair share, and the share paid by the general public. That is what we are going to do when we decide to raise rates. It is under consideration at the moment, and the hon. member should hear about it soon.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There are some post offices around the world making profits today. This deficit is created by the continuing turmoil in the postal service.

The Postmaster General referred to postal users. I wonder if he has discussed the proposed increases with the publishers of periodicals and the other major users of the postal service who must have at least a six-month lead time before the implementation of new rates in order to plan their affairs and meet other rising costs. The Postmaster General neglected to consult with substantial post office users before the last round of increases. Has he met with these major customers this time around? If not, when does he intend to do so, in order that they might make their necessary plans?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the turmoil in the Post Office is very often caused by the remarks of some opposition members. There is no turmoil in the Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: I wonder where the hon. member for Brandon-Souris was at the time of the two-day postal users conference in Toronto: he was not there, of course. I was there. I consulted with at least 1,800 people from across Canada who use the postal service, including publishers, editors and others. I met with directors of most of the magazines and publishers in Canada. They have a very good opinion: they told us to administer the Post Office in a way that makes it as close as possible to operating a business. As far as postal rates are concerned, they realize that at the moment we have the lowest rates in the industrialized world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE OF PACIFIC PETROLEUMS SHARES—EFFECT ON COMMON CARRIER PRINCIPLE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council: it is with regard to his responsibility for the Alaska pipeline.

My concern is the Petro-Can takeover of Pacific Petroleums which, of course, has a subsidiary known as Westcoast Transmission which, in turn, is a partner in the pipeline consortium. Is the minister concerned over the fact that such ownership by the government would not only offend the common carrier principle but would put the government in a precarious position with regard to establishing and administering guidelines to which they themselves would later have to adhere? Is it the intention of the government to ask Petro-Can to divest itself of the interests in Westcoast Transmission after the acquisition?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not see any difficulties arising from this transaction, with regard to the northern gas pipeline, in any particular raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Oberle: Can the minister indicate whether there has been a reaction from the industry, other partners in the pipeline consortium and the government of the United States? After all, this is a strange and serious departure from the principles which earned this consortium the right to build the pipeline in the first place.

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, there have been no representations from any sources with regard to this situation.

AIRPORTS

CALGARY INTERNATIONAL—ZONING BYLAWS RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF NEARBY BUILDINGS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport: it deals with the safety of air traffic particularly as it applies to the Aeronautics Act.

My question is twofold. By an order in council passed in 1977, No. 2449, hundreds of houses in the city of Calgary adjacent to the airport and quite some distance from it were affected. A zoning bylaw was passed governing, probably, two things, height and noise with regard to hundreds of houses. I wrote the deputy minister on October 31.

First, was this order in council passed in reference to only the height of the buildings? Second, it is similar to a caveat and none of the owners received notice respecting the filing of the order in council against hundreds of houses already built and bought by citizens of that city. No notice was given. The act requires that an action with reference to any damage resulting from the filing of this zoning bylaw must be commenced within two years. None of these people received notice. Will the minister look into this fact and advise me of the reason for filing this order in council and, second, why notice was not given in accordance with the Land Titles Act similar to caveat law?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into the matter and see the nature of the order in council and any zoning that flows from it. My impression is that it will be in relation to height only, because we have not taken general power in relation to zoning for other reasons. A bill to broaden our power in relation to zoning was before this House and held up, I must say, by Conservative filibustering in the last session.

In addition to giving us the right to do some zoning around airports when necessary, and that was only intended to be used when the municipalities were unable or unwilling to do what was required to make sensible use of airports, the bill had some additional provisions to give protection to people around airports as to the way in which notice would be served. I would be delighted if the hon. member would have discussions with his colleagues about quick passage of that bill so that we might bring it back and move it forward.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister will be pleased to know that I did discuss this with some of my colleagues. As I examine the new bill, I find it would make the situation even worse. The minister did not answer the main part of the question. There were hundreds, probably thousands, of these properties affected. Good money was paid for them by average people with average incomes. When they come to sell, they will find, after two years, this has been on the title without notice. I have searched the titles. How can they commence an action for any loss or damage? Will the minister explain that?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, if I did not, as the hon. member says, answer the main part of his question, I surely made it clear to him that I was not aware of the exact content of that particular order; that it likely did relate to height and, therefore, likely has no adverse effect upon any existing structure in the area. All of that is logical conclusion on my part, from our ordinary practices. I further told the hon. member I would check into the matter and report to him when I had more detail available.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REUNIFICATION OF FAMILIES PROGRAM—SITUATION WITH VIET NAM

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that negotiations with the Republic of Vietnam have been disappointingly slow in respect of reunification of families in Canada, and in view of the fact that I have received reports from people who have left Vietnam that officials in Vietnam demand $3,000 for each person who wishes to leave, will the minister undertake to express concern to the government of the Republic of Vietnam at the time it is taking to conclude this agreement on reunification of families in Canada and respecting the fact that its officials are demanding cash payment for those who wish to leave the country?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been aware of some of these charges. I thank the hon. member for having given me notice.

An hon. Member: In caucus.

Mr. Jamieson: I did not hear the hon. member's interjection. We have been making frequent representations to Vietnam with regard to family reunification. We will continue to do so. I have asked, for example, that representatives at our embassy in Peking, which is responsible for our embassy operations in Vietnam, be welcomed there to negotiate individual cases. We will resume and strengthen those representations.

EMPLOYMENT

CRITICISM OF DISCONTINUANCE OF JOB VACANCY SURVEY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It was revealed this morning, in committee, that the deputy minister, Mr. Manion, regretted very much discontinuance of the job vacancy survey. He has made a recommendation that it be reintroduced. Given the fact that the government was embarrassed with regard to the job vacancy survey, can the minister tell me what has happened with the deputy minister's recommendation?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the preamble of the question is in error: the government was not embarrassed by it. As a matter of fact, it was a useful instrument which was used very often by my department. It was taken at the initiative of another department which prepared that statistic and which apparently felt it was not receiving extensive use. In view of the fact it had to make cuts, it decided to make cuts in those programs that were not being used.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question. His deputy minister, Mr. Manion, indicated that he very much regretted that the job vacancy survey had been discontinued. This is of significant importance to him, and he recommended that it be reintroduced. What has the minister done with that recommendation? Has he accepted it? Has he discussed it with his colleagues in order to see that this very important survey is reintroduced?

● (1452)

Mr. Cullen: I commend my deputy minister for commenting in such a forthright way about the valuable use my department made of that particular statistic. However, as I have indicated, there are many projects which I would have liked, and which the deputy minister and others would have liked, which have had to be dropped. In the interest of saving, another department of government has decided that this is a project which should not, in fact, be kept alive.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE HOLIDAY SERVICES WILL NOT BE DISRUPTED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice. I trust he is fully aware of today's public relations release by Air Canada with respect to the corporation's pilot problem.

May I ask him, first of all, whether he is seized of the release, if he is satisfied with it and, more important, whether or not he is prepared either today or later this week to give some assurance to the flying public that notwithstanding pilots having in large numbers "flown out" the contractual hours allowed, there will be no interruption or disruption of essential holiday services next month?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): I am literally seized with it, Mr. Speaker: it came into my hands a few minutes ago as a consequence, perhaps, of notice from the hon. member's office that he intended to raise the matter. I have not had a chance to read it thoroughly, and I want to do that before replying to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Forrestall: One very brief supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I hope I am right in assuming that the minister was not aware of the difficulty facing Air Canada with respect to flying hours available to the pilots. I hope he will take careful notice, within his department, of their knowledge of the rate at which this situation was building up; the failure by Air Canada to exercise its internal management responsibilities to ensure that such a situation did not exist; to ensure that he or his senior officials had not been advised of this, and that he did not take earlier, corrective action to offset or negate the very serious situation which exists and which puts Air Canada in the position of having this problem in manning aircraft because their pilots do not have left over flying hours.

[Mr. Alexander.]

I ask that question because of the obvious implications to safety and the convenience of the flying public. Does he know whether he had ever been advised?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's definition of a brief supplementary is quite different from mine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have not had this matter brought to my attention. I can assure the hon. member that my departmental safety officials will see to it that all the ordinary safety rules are adhered to and that there will be no problem in that respect.

I think the question which has been raised relates, essentially, to a management problem, and in this release, as far as I can see, Air Canada is, in fact, explaining how it came to be in its present difficulty. We will both look at it together at a later time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SAFEGUARDS APPLIED ON SALE OF CANADIAN NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Latin America Economic Report carries a statement from Buenos Aires which quotes Admiral Madero, president of the National Atomic Energy Commission of Argentina, as saying work will soon begin on the building of an experimental plutonium reprocessing plant. The report goes on to say that the plant could supply enough reprocessed material to develop a nuclear weapon and keep Argentina firmly ahead of Brazil in the arms race.

I want to ask the minister whether this development has been brought to his attention, and whether the safeguards entered into between Canada and the nations which are recipients of Canadian reactors give the minister power to take action with regard to such a development and, if so, does he intend to take action?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not know of the quotation to which the hon. member refers. I deeply regret it, if it was made in that context, because our whole effort in Latin America, as elsewhere, has been to achieve total recognition of the non-proliferation treaty and, most particularly, a limitation on the reprocessing aspect which, as the hon. member recognizes, is extremely hazardous and dangerous.

Rather than give an off-the-cuff answer with regard to the safeguards, I would ask the hon. member's indulgence to allow me to look up the treaty. I can say, in passing, that I suspect the safeguards are such that we can prohibit the kind of reprocessing to which he has referred. But I will take the question as notice, look into it and give the hon. gentleman a specific answer.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the minister, along with the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues, has repeatedly told us that these safeguards are the strongest in the world, and in view of assurances the House has been given from time to time that in the event of any recipient of a Candu reactor building a reprocessing plant, steps could be taken to discontinue the operation and the supply of equipment and repairs, can we have an assurance from the minister that he intends to take this matter seriously and apply all the powers he has under the safeguard arrangements?

Mr. Jamieson: If that question had been posed originally, my answer would clearly have been yes. In other words, whatever action it is possible for Canada to take vis-à-vis that particular country, or any other country, to keep down and to prevent expansion in reprocessing, we would certainly take. I was perhaps being unnecessarily cautious by saying I would like to look at the agreement so that I could be sure. I did not want to be charged in the House tomorrow, when somebody sees the document, with having misled the House. That was the only reason.

MILK—REQUESTED AMENDMENT OF QUOTA POLICY

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture: it relates to difficulties arising from his national dairy policy. In view of those difficulties, related to the lack of adequate industrial milk supplies within British Columbia, Alberta and, particularly, Ontario, would the minister take the necessary action to revise the present quota system to take into account changing production patterns as well as changing market opportunities within the provinces?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I think I know what the hon. member has in mind: it is what the Ontario minister of agriculture said when addressing a dairy group in Ontario yesterday. I say to the hon. member that he should also refer to what the Ontario Milk Marketing Board stated as reported in the same article. It is under the jurisdiction of the provincial minister of agriculture, and not under my jurisdiction. They are the ones who decide on the national quota, how it is distributed, and so on.

No one has reported to me that there is any cheese shortage in Canada at the present time. If Mr. Newman has anything he wants to put on the record, he can do it on Monday, because we are going to be meeting with the provincial ministers and that is one of the subjects we shall discuss. We do not, as federal and provincial ministers, set that quota. That is set by a group which is representative of the dairy producers and the provincial governments; they sit down with the National Dairy Commission and they are the ones who decide what the quotas shall be. So no matter what Mr. Newman says, or what I say, we abide by what that group tells us.

Mr. Wise: I appreciate what the minister is trying to say, but he has the responsibility and the authority to ensure that the national dairy policy is fair and equitable to all producers in all provinces. He also has the responsibility to ensure that financial returns to the producers are maximized and that both domestic and export needs are met. Under the present policy, neither of these requirements is achieved. Would the minister consider increasing the size of the national quota to the extent which would provide sufficient products to meet domestic and export needs?

I also want to ask the minister if he would consider lowering the present $7.50 per hundred penalty charge to encourage producers to fulfil their own individual production requirements.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if the dairy industry is healthy and if many want to get into the production of industrial dairy products, I will take full blame. If, because of the quotas we have placed on imported cheese, people are enticed into getting into the production of cheese, I will take full blame for that. Cheese production has been good. Our reserves are not much different from what they were a year ago. There is no shortage of specialty cheese; there is a tremendous increase in specialty cheese production. In Ontario alone I believe there has been about a 44 per cent increase in two years.

If the hon. member has any more facts to present, I would be glad to hear them, but nothing he has presented here today shows that anybody is suffering. Cheese producers are making more money than they ever have. Farmers in the dairy industry are making more money than they ever have.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, by way of a point of order I wonder if I might ask the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) about his proposals regarding the budget. I understand that it is his intention to continue the budget debate tomorrow and to carry it into next week for the appropriate number of days. In order to allow us to plan, would he give us the order of his priorities following the budget debate?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, first I want to say that today we will continue with the bill which would authorize additional borrowing authority, to be followed by the old age security legislation, and then the child credit benefits legislation. The budget will be presented tonight, and the debate will continue on Friday and on Monday, when the first vote will take place. I indicated informally to the hon. member earlier that it was my intention to continue the budget debate without interruption, but if the child benefits legislation is not passed, it might be necessary on Tuesday to interrupt the debate in order to deal with that in committee of the whole. However, that is not certain yet.

I have not cast my attention beyond the budget debate, but I highlight as one of the main items I would like to bring forward early, in line with requests made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the legislation affecting pensions in the public service. There is also the health resources fund legislation to be considered. By that time I hope to have on the order paper the bill relating to the Post Office. That would certainly be high on my list, but I would prefer to give a more precise indication next week.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his remarks. Some comments have been made with respect to the budget debate this evening. During the course of the day I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister might give some consideration to making the text of the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) available to members of parliament as the Minister of Finance begins his speech, so that we can follow that speech carefully.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I see that there is some support on the other side of the House for that proposition. This would enable the media to deal with the matter appropriately from the point of view of their operations outside, because I understand there has been an embargo placed on anything regarding the minister's speech until 8.30 p.m. I can understand that the privileges of parliament should not be infringed, but in these circumstances it seems to me that it would be appropriate for the Deputy Prime Minister to consider, if the media can begin dealing with the budget, whether members of parliament should have copies of the speech on their desks so that it can be followed by them. I would be very grateful if my hon. friend would consider that, in order to assist us and the public in understanding what is in the budget, if indeed there is anything in the budget.

Mr. MacEachen: With respect to the arrangements for the media I understand that there is an embargo on media reports of the budget statement until 8.30. That seems reasonable, because it is logical to provide the minister an opportunity to make his budget statement before interpretations and reports of the budget statement. I think it is reasonable to have an embargo until 8.30.

I will draw to the attention of the minister the matter of whether he could make copies of his speech available earlier. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) have always had copies of budget speeches as ministers of finance have read them. I have always felt discriminated against because, as a minister, I have never had copies provided to me the way they have been provided to the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my heart bleeds for my hon. friend, but I thank him for his cooperation. I hope he will consider having the speech available at least for members of parliament.

I wonder if this morning the cabinet considered the possibility of fixing a date by which time we might begin the Christmas adjournment, if we are to have one this year, and how long it might be. If that was dealt with and if we knew where we were heading, I think it might help expedite business. That, coupled with an announcement regarding business after the budget, would help parliament expedite its work, which we always want to do.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity, as I had hoped, to discuss with my colleagues this morning the time for the Christmas adjournment. I can assure the hon. member that it is my intention to provide for a Christmas adjournment, and I would appreciate any comments hon. members might have as to the length of that adjournment.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, what I have to say does not affect the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), but I know the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is a family man, and those of us who are do like to make plans, believe it or not. Would the Deputy Prime Minister consult the gentleman on his left and decide early on a fixed date so that we will all know where we stand?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Stanley said no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I were taking part in the discussion which has just taken place, I would do so on behalf of all the grandparents in this place. We too have rights.

I would like to have a word with the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) about the business for today. He announced that we would deal first with Bill C-7, on which there is a time limit, and that then we would move to Bill C-5. Bill C-7 is the bill respecting borrowing authority, and Bill C-5 is the old age security bill. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will permit me to make the point that under Bill C-5 there is a provision for the extension of the spouse's allowance in certain cases, but it will come into effect only when that bill has received royal assent.

This means that every day that we delay the passing of that bill, seven more spouses between the ages of 60 and 65 who have become widows will not get the benefit under the act. Therefore I am suggesting that the Deputy Prime Minister call that bill first so that we could pass it quickly, sent it over to the Senate, and get it passed on the earliest possible date. As I say, every day means seven more widows who will not get the benefit of that legislation.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the representation made by the hon. member is a good one because I have been concerned, as has the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), about the speedy passage of the bill, for the reasons cited by the hon. member. I would be prepared to call Bill C-5 as the first item today if I had some understanding that it would be passed without debate, so we could go on to the bill on the borrowing authority. If that is the wish of the House, I will call it, but I cannot call it without an assurance of some kind. Otherwise, it may take all afternoon and I would not be able to have the borrowing authority bill passed, which is under a time limit, and which would normally be passed within an hour.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I heard the minister mention the Crown corporation bill affecting the Post Office. A few days ago I heard the Minister of State for the Environment (Mr. Marchand) mention the Crown corporation bill. My concern, which has been registered by others, is that the government is thinking about introducing the omnibus Crown corporation bill to determine the conduct, control and accountability of Crown corporations. Given the fact that a Post Office Crown corporation might not be the answer, is the government considering the ramifications of dealing with a Post Office Crown corporation bill followed by an omnibus bill on Crown corporations which could perhaps wipe out the effectiveness of the previous bill? Are we not a little premature in giving the Crown corporation bill such high priority.

I am just bringing this to the minister's attention because of the great concern which not only the government but we on this side and the people of Canada have with regard to the conduct of Crown corporations. Is there any possibility of the omnibus bill on Crown corporations guiding the conduct, control and accountability of Crown corporations, being brought forward in the very near future?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would say that there is little likelihood of the general bill being brought forward before the bill relating to the Post Office as a new Crown corporation. I believe the House will have to deal with the provisions of that bill on their own merit, and later we can deal with the general principles relating to all Crown corporations.

Introduction of Bills

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader whether or not it is the intention of the government to reintroduce Bill C-14 which died on the order paper in the last session, dealing with the regulation, control and development of nuclear energy.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe that that bill is on my list, but I will have to check further. I am sure there is a bill dealing with nuclear administration which will be put before the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise with respect to a point I wish to make following the discussion we had a few minutes ago on Bill C-5. If it is the intention of the government House leader to call it immediately with the understanding that the matter would go through without debate, we are quite willing to deal with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Frankly, I had anticipated that there would be a period before private members' hour when we could do that, but I have no objection to dealing with the bill sooner. I think, in fact, it is an excellent suggestion.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 15, consideration of Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the motion of Mr. Stevens.

[English]

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of Bill C-7 I feel constrained to express not only my own views but the feelings of a great many of my constituents, and of Canadians in general, with respect to the present government's mishandling of the business of our nation as it relates to the economy. On a number of occasions prior to the resumption of this session or the beginning of a new session, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) declared that it was imperative that parliament meet and deal with legislation vital to the economy of the country. Also, ministers of the Crown, many times after long periods of delay and inaction, have suddenly produced bills and urged their quick passage because of the urgent needs confronting us. However, time and time again parliament has resumed its sittings faced with a blank order paper, except for some inconsequential items which had little if anything to do with the economy.

• (1522)

In a period when there is almost universal agreement that the Canadian economy is in dire need of attention, and that some effective measures are required to reverse the trends and start moving forward, all the government has to offer are some limited measures to cushion the effects of inflation on some of the more needy in our society—redistribution of income—but not one measure to increase the productivity of the economy, thereby increasing the size of the economic pie.

I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Financial Times of October 30, 1978. It reads as follows:

> There are a number of examples of the way some fine master plan devised by Mr. Trudeau and the great thinkers in the Prime Minister's office has fouled things up: the controls program which held back investment, stifled job creation and kept Canada in a state of semi-permanent recession while doing little to curb inflation; the hassle over resource taxes; energy pricing; overtaxation of capital; the lack of any coherent economic policy; the commitment to redistributing wealth instead of creating it. These and other "initiatives" have produced four bad years for the economy when Canada could have been enjoying four good ones.

Bill C-7 does nothing to improve the health of the economy and its ability to support the demands being made upon it.

What are some of the factors which compound our problems at the present time? As mentioned in the editorial, there is a lack of any coherent economic policy. There have been ad hoc programs, policies born of desperation and fear, lacking forethought, and devoid of any regard to the consequences thereof. They have been the order of the day, and when challenged by failure and rejection the defence has been that the people do not understand what the government is trying to do, and they fail to take advantage of the largesse of the government in its attempt to bolster and expand the economy.

I should like to refer to another article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on October 24, 1978. The article was written by Dian Cohen, and reads in part as follows:

> The best we can say about the economic policies of the Trudeau Liberals is that they are consistently bad. The federal government has been playing the same tapes for a long time and still has not the wit to realize they are not conducive to the economic well-being of this country.

There has been no recognition on the part of the government that perhaps it might carry some of the blame for the state of the economy and not just blame the people in the private sector. The lack or loss of confidence in the government's ability effectively to guide the affairs of this nation is demonstrated by the flight of investment capital, which has been referred to on many occasions in the House. I am not only referring to the flight of capital which would otherwise be invested in Canada by the international community, but the flight of investment capital on the part of Canadians as well. This is a clear indication that there is a complete lack of confidence in the economy. These investors choose to invest their money elsewhere.

There is another problem which we face in Canada today. It is the government's waffling as to the basic economic philosophy needed to meet the requirements and aspirations of Canadian society. Yesterday we were treated to a rather impassioned speech by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) as he extolled or implied the glories of a socialist state. I should like to remind him that we in British Columbia were rather recently the recipients of the so-called advantages resulting from such experiments. I remain unconvinced that that is the road we want to travel in Canada.

Some months ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) intoned the obituary of the market system and predicted the further intrusion of government into the lives of Canadians. I think it was he who stated that the government had no business in the bedrooms of the nation. Even if he has followed this particular philosophy, he still claims the keys to all other rooms in the house, because more and more the heavy hand of government is strangling initiative, industry, and the efficiency of the economy of this country. The Prime Minister later proclaimed his conversion to a belief in the doctrine of the pre-eminence of the private sector. But I am afraid that this remains uncorroborated by any fruits "meet for repentance" to which the scriptures allude.

The private sector in Canada has been the strength of the nation in the past and will so remain in the future, if given an opportunity to make an effective contribution. We must think of the place of the business community in the economy of Canada in providing opportunities for the great numbers of our people who seek ways of providing for their own needs and the needs of their families. They are prepared to take the necessary time, expend energy, lay the plans and face the obstacles of entering into business opportunities in Canada, because they have the desire to make a contribution and to look after their own needs. Not only must we think of the needs of the people in the business community, but also the provision of job opportunities for hundreds of thousands of fellow Canadians.

Many times when the government enters into restrictive measures as far as business is concerned, it fails to realize the role Canadian business is playing in the economy of the nation. Approximately 60 per cent, or perhaps more, of job opportunities is provided by small and medium-sized businesses. This calls into question any suggestion that we ought to have more government control, direction, and the heavy hand of government being exercised in the business community to a greater extent than at the present time. As well as providing job opportunities for hundreds of thousands of fellow Canadians, those engaged in the small and medium-sized business sector supply a great proportion of the revenue required by the government to assist those in society who cannot provide for themselves for a variety of reasons. They do not object to this. However, they object to the confiscation of their time, energy, and resources by a government which has neither the will nor the capacity to spend its money in an efficient and productive manner.

Also we are faced with the tragedy of unrealized possibilities in this country of ours. The editorial in the Financial Times to which I referred pointed out that these government programs and policies and other initiatives have produced four bad years for the economy when Canada could have been enjoying four good ones. This is the tragedy. This country has natural resources, skills, technology, will, and all other prerequisites for progress and success. But because of the absence of effective policies and leadership, its aspirations remain unfulfilled, its potential thwarted, its capacities underutilized and its shaky economy is maintained on borrowed money. It will be a burden on the backs of our children, their children and even succeeding generations, which they will not be able to bear. These are things that we have to remember. We have to recognize that these are the things which are facing us. Unless we can reach the point in our history when government, either this one or one that will be succeeding it, faces some of these issues, we are going to suffer from a lagging economy, an overburdened public, and the inability of our nation to achieve the objectives that the people of Canada have a right to expect.

I intended to deal with the policies which have been presented by my leader and my colleagues in the Progressive Conservative party, but due to the limited time available it will not be possible. I would commend to hon. members the statements that have been made outlining the policies which we have been proposing in order to meet this challenge of a lagging economy. I would ask that they take the time to peruse these statements and speeches so that they might realize that all our participation in debate is not negative and that we are presenting ideas which we believe are essential if the problems of Canada are to be met, and if we are to have an economy that will respond and be able to meet the challenges of the days ahead.

Another weakness of the government is its addiction to borrowing, and it is underlined once again by the presentation of this bill. I would refer to statements made by the Prime Minister nine or ten years ago in which he talked about Canada being on the road to financial disaster if nothing was done to bring spending under control. We now find down through the years since then that not only has the problem remained unsolved, but it has been aggravated. The very things which the Prime Minister predicted would happen unless something was done then, are actually happening in our economy and society today.

This bill takes the form of a third demand for additional borrowing authority. We all know that there are two main sources of revenue for government, taxes and borrowing. As far as taxation is concerned, it has just about reached the limit, and I do not believe that the general public will stand idly by for additional increases. The problems they are facing now in meeting their own needs, because of the confiscation of their savings and income by the government, even now are not acceptable, and I believe that there will be a revolt in this country if the government proceeds along this line.

We are left therefore with one alternative, and that is borrowing. After two previous authorizations for borrowing, the government is back asking for authorization to borrow $17 billion, $7 billion for this fiscal year and another $10 billion for the coming year. It is unprecedented in our history for a government to ask for borrowing authority two years in advance in order to carry on its operations. We all have heard the statement of the Auditor General that spending is out of control. As a result, there was a comptroller general appointed, but he was not given the power to exercise any control, and the problems remain unsolved, the evil still remains in our midst, and we are faced with a continuation of policies that can only spell disaster for Canada.

I would like to refer hon. members to one or two statements in a book by William E. Simon called "A Time for Truth". Mr. Simon is the former secretary of the treasury of the United States. At page 10 of his book he says:

Unfortunately, all the rhetoric about deficits and balanced budgets obscures the real danger that confronts us: the gradual disintegration of our free society. . . . This country is in desperate danger.

In reference to the consequences of deficits, he says at the bottom of page 11:

—we all know what they are. We all know that neither man nor business nor government can spend more than is taken in for very long. If it continues, the result must be bankruptcy. In the case of the federal government, we can print money to pay for our folly for a time. But we will just continue to debase our currency, and then we'll have financial collapse.

That applies to Canada as appropriately as it does to the United States. Unfortunately, this government has not learned the lesson. Its ministers have not faced the issue or brought into effect the policies they indicated were necessary to bring government spending under control. I believe that we are in for serious trouble unless something is done immediately. Fortunately, because of the opposition which was raised to the borrowing authority for $17 billion, the government finally yielded and asked for borrowing authority for only one year.

As our debt increases we find that a greater percentage of our income is siphoned off to pay for the interest. Just ten years ago it was $893 million, and today it is in the neighbourhood of $4 billion—the cost of interest on our national debt. It is all right for this government to go ahead and spend money, borrow money, spend money and borrow money; but I shudder to think of the burden it will put upon my children, my children's children, and the generations beyond that who will have no way in which to extricate themselves from the morass in which they have been placed by the spending of this government today.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): I find this debate, Mr. Speaker, on the borrowing bill sown with a good deal of confusion. Perhaps it is deliberate confusion, but if it is not it is certainly confusion based on a great deal of naivete. When one talks about debt it is meaningless to say, for example, that I owe $10,000 and somebody owes $20,000, and then to say that one person is twice as much in debt as the other. Anyone knows that they must consider the individual's assets, his earning power, and the percentage of the cost of that loan of his income. These are the questions we have to ask when talking about debt. We speak about the borrowing power of government, and about the debt going up and up, but we need some reference point to understand the magnitude of that debt.

In 1960, which was the last year that the Progressive Conservative party held power in this country, the national debt, which had been rising, was 33 per cent of the gross national product. By 1972 the debt was down to 19 per cent of the gross national product. That is a considerable reduction, Mr. Speaker, so we were better off in 1972 in view of the fact that our assets had not quite doubled in that period. The debt today, and this figure is perhaps several months old, is only 18.7 per cent of the gross national product. In 16 years, therefore, the debt has been reduced from 33 per cent of the earnings of all the products and services in our country, to below 19 per cent. In the next year or so we can expect this to grow at a moderate pace. It will probably go up to about 21 or 22 per cent.

I think it is extremely important that we consider debt as a function of earnings, Mr. Speaker. We should also consider it in terms of the cost of maintaining that debt as a function of earnings. In 1967 interest on the national debt used up 1.9 per cent of the gross national product; in 1977, in spite of the fact that interest rates had nearly doubled, the interest costs used up 2.4 per cent of the gross national product. I want to put the thing in perspective. This government is very concerned, and as the opposition points out, it has a right to be, about the growing debt and the fact that we may be spending beyond our means. It is unfair, it is confusing, naive or both, to assume that debt is an absolute thing and not to relate it to the gross national product or our assets.

Another thing that concerns me about this borrowing bill is that it is made necessary by fluctuations in the Canadian dollar. Most of the need for authority to borrow $7 billion—we are not actually spending it; through the bill we only have authority to borrow—comes about because of efforts by the government to sustain the dollar at a reasonable level, or at least sustain fluctuations in the dollar. This should be better understood.

We would not need to borrow this $7 billion if we did not need money for this purpose, and if we do borrow it we are not going to spend—we have borrowed something in the order of $5.4 billion—but we are not going to spend that money on current expenses. What it actually means is that when we borrow—as we have borrowed the $5.4 billion—we pay interest for that, then put the money into an investment of some sort or another and receive an interest on that. The cost of this borrowing is the net difference between the cost of borrowing the money and the return we get from the investment of the funds.

I believe the Canadian dollar will rise to a higher level. The assets we have bought in terms of German deutschmarks, United States dollars, etc., will appreciate, and this will give us some advantage; it will reduce the actual net cost of servicing the whole loan.

We are not talking about going to Hades in a sidecar, or that the debt is going to destroy future generations and so forth; we are talking about stabilizing the dollar, investing money and the difference in interest between what we have to pay and what we accrue from our investments.

I want to deal with the Canadian dollar because I happen to believe that the depreciated dollar, at least no higher than 90 cents, has some great advantages for our economy, particularly at this time. I can see what it has accomplished in the community of Thunder Bay which is heavily involved in the pulp and paper industry, in the movement of grain, in building rail cars and other equipment for foreign markets, through the EDC. For the last year or year and a half, we have had the lowest unemployment rate of any city in Canada, and this can be attributed to the level of the Canadian dollar as much as anything. I think some other advantages have also accrued.

Earlier this year the manufacturing sector of the economy was operating at about 81 per cent capacity. I think 90 per cent would be full capacity, so 81 per cent is low. That gap has been more than halved in the last four or five months and we are now operating around 87 per cent capacity, close to the maximum level of 90 per cent. That is a very significant gain, Mr. Speaker, and is partly due to the sale of exports which were able to compete on the world market because of the depreciated dollar. Canadian domestic producers are also able to compete much more easily with imports. It is almost like saying to Canadian manufacturers selling on the domestic market that we have given them a 15 per cent tariff and telling them to do something about it. I think something has been done. Closing the capacity gap from 81 per cent to 87 per cent is very important.

When we consider the trade position we see that in the second quarter we had a surplus in commodity trade of $176 million, to be exact. In the third quarter this had risen to $600 million, a very significant increase. The third quarter, the mid-summer and early fall, is normally considered a slow period. It is significant that this happened at that time.

There are those who spend a great deal of their time deploring the state of our economy, the low value of our dollar and how badly this reflects on Canadians. They should realize that we are getting into a very enviable position. When the Japanese trade deficit starts to plummet, we begin to see the advantage to Canada of having a low value dollar. We begin to see the effect this will eventually have on our dollar, probably pushing it up to 87, 88, or 89 cents.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Trudeau buck.

Mr. McRae: During this debate the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) referred to Crown corporations and Petro-Canada. I wish to make a few comments in this regard. We should very seriously look at where we are going in this area. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the members of the Progressive Conservative party have said without question that if they are elected and become the government of this land, they will disband Petro-Canada.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Not if, when.

Mr. McRae: They should another look at that position. I do not think Canadians want Petro-Canada disbanded. I fought for it from the beginning. I sat in on the 19 meetings of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public works while it was considering Article II. I did so because I believe what we were doing was right.

There are three basic reasons for doing that. First, it is one of our most important resources aspects. Ninety per cent or more of those assets is owned and controlled by foreign corporations, most of them large corporations. We have less than 10 per cent ownership in those assets. I could not see how the private sector could turn that fact around. There is not one Canadian company that could move into the big four or five. The only way to do that was to create a national company. That was absolutely essential.

The second point is that, regardless of what is being said this year, we are being faced with a downturn in our oil supplies. We will likely be out of conventional crude oil if not by the middle of the next decade, by the end of it. It is essential that we secure a supply of crude oil, conventional or synthetic, for the future.

There are those who are concerned about debt and the legacy for future generations. They should be concerned about the fact that by the end of this century there will be virtually no oil. Early in the new century we may be out of gas. That is a fine legacy for future generations.

It is important that Canada get control of the situation and that we do the best we can to secure our supplies. This may mean drilling in areas where it will not be profitable. It will mean becoming very much involved in Syncrude.

The third season I supported strongly, and will continue to support strongly, Petro-Canada, is simply this. In the mind of the public, the oil industry of this country has virtually no credibility. I do not say the industry is lying, but the public just does not believe it is telling the truth.

At one point they say we have resources that will last 123 years. They feed this information to the National Energy Board. The next time they say we will be out of oil by 1985. All of a sudden we are going to exporting again. There is no credibility in the mind of the Canadian public. In fact there is no credibility globally. That may not be justified, but that is the case.

For the sake of the industry, and the Canadian people, it is extremely important that the Canadian government own a company that is part of the oil industry in order that it can monitor the industry. One of the beneficiaries of that kind of monitoring will be the majors in the industry. If the majors are not lying, and I do not say they are, having a group with some credibility to explain the situation and put it in perspective will do good. If the majors are lying and the figures we are given are not correct, we will then know that.

This becomes very important in view of the fact that oil and gas prices have been allowed to increase very rapidly in the last three or four years. One reason for that was so that the industry could spend more money exploring for future supplies. This is another reason why we should be in a position to monitor. It is important that we have a company owned by the Canadian people in a position to monitor the industry.

Before suggesting that we eliminate Petro-Canada let us look at a parallel situation. There may be three or four, but I can name one or two companies, British Petroleum and Acquitains, both functioning in this country and principally owned by the governments where their head offices are located, Britain and France. I am sure there are other such companies, but possibly not as large.

I have not heard the opposition say that British Petroleum and Acquitains should get out of Canada because they are socialist operations. We accept those companies. They do business here. They function well. If this is all right for Britain and France, why is it a cardinal sin if Canadians own such a company? We must maintain a position in the oil industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not have very much time. In the few moments remaining I want to put a little perspective on what we are talking about in this debate.

Whenever the government is in a difficult position, ministers rely on their good friends and colleagues to my left who are prepared to support them on any policy, including their profligate spending habits, regardless of the consequences.

We in the Conservative party are concerned about the social conscience of the people of this country, about the extent of the debt that has been developed through mismanagement of affairs by this government. That has to be taken into consideration. We should look at the programs in this country that we cannot afford because of the activities and practices of this government.

This government got into difficulty at the time of the minority government from 1972 to 1974. We had 19 occasions when my friends on the left supported the government and kept it in office. It reminds me of a story about Noah's ark that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) likes to talk about. It reminds me of the time when Noah was standing at the ark and they wanted to make sure that there were no births on the ark, so he put the giraffes in charge to make sure there was no fooling around. Of course what happened was, when the waters came and went, Noah was standing at the ark and the animals came off in pairs, and finally he noticed that although two cats went on, there were 19 kittens following behind, when debarking. Noah went up to the giraffes and said, "What in heaven's name is going on? What happened?" One giraffe said "I don't know. I thought they were fighting." That is the situation we have now with the NDP.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Chrétien moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—SENATE DELAY IN DEALING WITH BILL C-5

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier today this House unanimously agreed to the passing of the third reading of Bill C-5 without debate. I know that this involved restraint on the part of some of us on this side of the House, but we felt that the circumstances were such that the bill should be passed as quickly as possible. The fact is that more than 200 times a month the situation arises where a spouse in the 60 to 65 year range loses the older spouse and loses the allowance. The extension of that allowance is—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) get to his point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will be glad to do so. The reasons for my concern are apparent from what I have said. This bill was passed and sent to the other place this afternoon. However, my understanding is that although in the other place the bill was given first reading, Their Honours refused to proceed with it on second reading today. The result is that every day's delay means that seven more widows do not get—

• (1652)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on my point of order I am asking if the government House leader will have consultation with Their Honours in the Senate to see if they cannot meet again today and deal with this matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I also heard this Senate report about which I inquired. I would like to thank hon. members, particularly my colleagues on the opposition side, who would have liked to take part in the debate this afternoon but who, having already expressed their views, agreed to withhold their additional remarks so that we could pass this bill unanimously. This is a bill which will give senior citizens $300 million in 1979 but which means starting from today a possible loss of money each day for those who receive the spouse's allowance, and I would like to say that in this case the Senate does not help speed up the business of the House.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot see in fairness why two other hon. members may not have occasion to praise the bill which is evidently having difficulty which is beyond the scope of our procedures by any stretch of a point of order.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is the concern about the relevancy of it that worried me. I just want to say, through you, to the minister that if she is concerned, beyond making a speech, with respect to her bill and about a day's delay in the Senate, I want to assure the government House leader that we will be happy to deal with an amendment very quickly to make it retroactive, so that we can deal with that matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I should say that when the House gave third reading to this bill, the Old Age Security Act amendment, we transmitted that information through the normal channels to the other place with the suggestion that, because of the needs that have been pointed out, particularly the benefits that would accrue to widows, action should be taken as quickly as possible and that we would attempt to arrange royal assent in order to provide that the bill be fully in effect before the end of the day.

Like other hon. members I regret that the Senate did not take action on that bill and that it adjourned without dealing with it. There is no way I can have consultations with members of the other place. I would just ask my colleagues in the House of Commons if they do not think now that the proposals made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with respect to the Senate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motion (papers), private bills, public bills. There being no items under the heading notices of motions for papers, or under the heading of private bills on the order paper, the House will proceed to public bills. I understand there is some disposition to call the measure standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, earlier today there was some discussion about this and it was understood that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) was tied up in committee this afternoon and so would not be able to proceed with that bill. Perhaps there is another one.

If there is no other bill to take, this would be a good day for the House to take my bill to abolish the Senate.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand then that the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt will not proceed at this time and will stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could help the government out of a dilemma. There is a bill on the order paper in my name dealing with lobbyists. I think there may be some way of having us proceed with private members' bills. If we cannot do that, or if it is inconvenient to do that, I would think, since this is budget night and many members are preparing themselves for budget night, that it would not be inappropriate if we called it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 4.59 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to place before the House an assessment of the state of the Canadian economy and my proposals for improving our economic performance.

In recent weeks I have travelled to many parts of Canada. I have talked to many Canadians—my provincial colleagues, businessmen, labour leaders, economists and laymen. Everywhere I have been told that my budget must be responsible, that it should create an atmosphere of stability and certainty in the country and that it should aim at lowering costs, including the costs of government.

[English]

The General Economic Situation and Outlook

Let me begin by reviewing our current economic situation. The economy in 1978 made much progress, although the results have fallen short of my earlier expectations.

It is true that employment has risen strongly. In October, 362,000 more Canadians had jobs than a year earlier. A larger proportion of Canadians is working now than ever before, but unemployment is still too high.

The increase in the gross national product in current dollars is likely to be close to the 11 per cent I forecast in the April budget. But prices have risen by more and output has gone up by less than was forecast at that time.

The prices of the things we produce are likely to be up about 6½ per cent. The growth in output should be close to 4 per cent. We had a slow first quarter when the United States economy was depressed by the coal strike. We have not been able to catch up fully since.

The consumer price index rose more sharply than had been expected. In September, it was 8.6 per cent higher than a year earlier. This renewed outburst of inflation was not the result of any acceleration in our own incomes or our own domestic costs. It was the result of higher food prices and the decline in the dollar.

This faster rise in the CPI reduced the growth rate of real income and real purchasing power of Canadians. The result was that consumer spending rose by less than had been expected, and this was the main reason for the shortfall in growth. Consumer spending has risen this year, in real terms, by 3½ per cent to 4 per cent. Employment is higher and personal income taxes have been cut. A special stimulus has been provided by the temporary reductions in provincial sales taxes, largely financed by my April budget. But higher prices of food and other imported consumer goods have weakened the impact of these expansionary forces.

Since the Bonn summit, several countries have taken measures to stimulate their economies. Growth is expected to be rather more rapid in 1979 than in 1978 outside of North America. But it will slow down in the United States. The outlook is for expansion in Canada at a greater rate than in the United States next year. But because our most important trading partner will be growing more slowly, it will be hard for us to reduce the slack in our economy. Moreover, our trade balance will not improve as rapidly as it should, given our improved competitive position, although it will be higher this year. In these circumstances, we must get better access to the markets of other countries, especially those which continue to run very large trade surpluses. The success of the Tokyo Round of trade negotiations remains critical to us. In our bilateral relations with other countries, we will press hard for greater opportunities to trade.

We have been through a period of great disturbance in international financial markets. The American dollar has come under severe downward pressure. The United States government has taken steps to rectify the situation, including sharp increases in interest rates. Our own situation has necessarily been made more difficult by the higher interest rates that have accompanied our efforts to control the rate of monetary expansion and maintain an appropriate relationship with interest rates in other countries.

Laying the Basis for Future Growth

While recognizing the setbacks and difficulties we have encountered, I want to emphasize that Canada has made great progress since the introduction of the Anti-Inflation Program in 1975. We have been getting the fundamentals right and laying the basis for sustained growth in the 1980s.

In the last three years the Bank of Canada has gradually reduced the rate of growth of the money supply. It has set target ranges for monetary expansion, successively reduced them and consistently succeeded in staying within them.

Expenditures by all levels of government have been brought under tight control. The growth of total federal outlays has been held to less than the growth of the gross national product since 1976-77 owing in large part to the tough leadership of my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board.

The ceiling on total outlays for next year has been established at $52.6 billion, an increase of 8.9 per cent over this year's ceiling. This increase is well below the expected growth of the GNP. Many programs will have to make do with a lower level of real resources; some activities have been eliminated. We are having to cut back on the rapid growth in our transfers to the provinces. Even so, our expenditure budget is coming under great pressure from the rising cost of our statutory programs, especially interest on the public debt. There can be no weakening in our determination to keep expenditures under tight control.

Average increases in wages and salaries have been brought down from a high of 15 per cent to 6 per cent in the last year of controls. I do not attribute all of this to our prices and incomes policy, because no doubt there would have been some slowdown in any event. But I am sure that controls made a contribution to the process. That appears to be the view of economists who have closely examined the record.

While domestic costs were being brought under better control, the decline in the exchange rate reversed the loss of competitiveness which we suffered earlier in the decade. Canadian firms are now in a good position to increase their sales in foreign markets and win back the share of our domestic markets which they had lost to foreign competitors. This is already happening. The good September trade figures suggest that we will have a record trade surplus this year of close to $4 billion.

Industrial Policy

Mr. Speaker, our manufacturing industries are benefiting most from this improvement in our competitive position. They suffered most when we priced ourselves out of world markets. The decline in manufacturing output and employment was a major concern, but the latest data show a turnabout in the past year.

Manufacturing production in August was 7 per cent higher than a year ago. New orders have risen sharply. Capacity utilization is back up to 86.4 per cent, which is above the long-term average. Manufacturing employment in October was up 110,000 or 5.7 per cent over a year ago.

The government has recognized the strategic importance of the manufacturing industry and provided assistance to it in many ways—through the tax system, through the Export Development Corporation, the Federal Business Development Bank and the Enterprise Development Program. In the reallocation of government expenditures announced September 8, we set aside an additional sum of $300 million to assist industry to exploit new markets, to develop new technology and to reorganize to meet the challenges which lie ahead. This will reinforce the measures contained in the last two budgets which have provided generous tax incentives for research and development.

I am frankly sceptical about the search for a single grand industrial strategy in a competitive market system. But we must have a set of sensible industrial policies, designed to provide a healthy framework for all industries and specific incentives tailored to particular needs. This government has gone a long way to putting these in place, and I will go further tonight.

The effective process of consultation between business, labour and government launched by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is contributing to the further development of our industrial policies.

Energy

There is good news from another critical sector of the economy—energy. The massive increase in world energy prices in the early 1970s created severe difficulties for all consuming nations. Because we are relatively rich in energy, we have been able to cushion the shock by phasing in higher prices gradually. At the same time, we have provided generous incentives to spur the development of new energy sources and we have put in place a number of conservation measures to restrain demand.

Our policies are working. In contrast to the perspective only two years ago, the outlook for energy self-reliance and the sector's contribution to our economic performance are most encouraging.

This is true of all the main energy sources, but particularly of oil and gas.

According to the National Energy Board, domestic oil shipments to Montreal can continue until at least 1995 and exports of light oil could be maintained at 55,000 barrels per day for three years. Compared with the Board's 1977 forecast, the new figures indicate the basis for an improvement in our trade balance of more than $2 billion in total over the next three years.

Hon. members will be aware that the National Energy Board is holding hearings on the supply and demand for natural gas and is expected to report in February. There is mounting evidence that our reserves of natural gas are significantly more than estimated just a few years ago. The indications are that there may be more than enough to meet our foreseeable domestic needs. But the whole magnitude of our reserves remains to be determined. Primary emphasis must be laid on expanding the use of gas in Canada, and this in itself will displace imported oil. The favourable trade effects of the new gas outlook will be substantial. For example, an additional 500 millions cubic feet per day, whether used to displace imported oil or for exports, would improve our trade surplus by $500 million a year.

Growing Confidence in the Economy

All of these developments are building the greater confidence in our medium-term prospects which I found in my pre-budget consultations. There is a growing faith that Canada can launch itself on the sort of sustained expansion which I portrayed for the February meeting of first ministers.

We should not underestimate the strength of the expansionary forces that are at work. A powerful stimulus to sound economic growth is now coming from a more competitive dollar. This will not only improve our trade performance: it will also lead to more investment as Canadian firms increase their productive capacity and modernize their equipment in order to take advantage of the new opportunities.

A recent survey showed that 300 large corporations are planning to increase their spending on plant and equipment next year by 16 per cent. Allowing for rising costs, this represents a substantial increase of about 8 per cent in the volume of investment. I welcome this evidence that firms are pressing ahead in 1979 with the investments we will need in the 1980s. We should do all we can to encourage this development. We must respond to the particular problems confronting individual sectors of the economy. We must strengthen our efforts to encourage investment and growth in the less favoured regions.

The Outlook for Costs and Prices

Our most immediate challenge, however, is to hold onto the gains we have been making in our competitive position, as we come to the end of mandatory controls over prices and incomes. Decontrol is not an easy business at the best of times; our phased approach was designed to reduce the chances of a post-control bulge. It is all the more difficult when we have been through a surge in the cost of living, caused not by any acceleration in our domestic costs, but by the rise in food prices and the fall in the dollar.

These unfavourable influences are coming to an end. We have already seen some decline in food prices in August and September which brought about a welcome pause in the rising cost of living. A great deal more stability is expected from now on if crops are normal around the world.

There is good reason to believe that the major adjustment in the exchange rate that was required to restore our competitive position has been completed.

This can only have a lasting effect if the feedback on the domestic economy from the higher price of imports and export-related goods does not result in a fresh outbreak of large, leap-frogging wage and price increases in Canada.

Steadier food prices and a steadier exchange rate will mean that we have every chance of a much lower rate of inflation emerging even though we will probably see a jump in the cost of living for October. This will be mainly because of the ending of provincial sales tax cuts. But that should be no more than a temporary interruption of the trend unless we Canadians become unreasonable in our income demands.

In the last year, wage increases in Canada have been lower than those in the United States. So far, post-control wage settlements are showing only a very modest acceleration. I commend labour and management for the responsibility they have generally shown; increased competitiveness means more jobs. The federal and provincial governments agreed in February that compensation in the public sector should follow rather than lead the private sector.

While I urge Canadians to exercise self-discipline in their income demands, I would stress the fact that Canadian workers have done well in the last three years. Real disposable income per employee in Canada has increased by over 7 per cent. In the United States real disposable income per employee has declined by nearly 2 per cent in the same period.

Even so, there is some risk that we will launch ourselves again on a price-wage spiral which will undo all the progress we have made. We must reduce the rate of inflation to 6 per cent as soon as possible, but it will not be good enough to stabilize the rate of inflation at that level. Inflation must keep on declining if we are to expect really good economic performance.

Fiscal Policy Choices

I have now spelled out in some detail the economic background to this budget as I see it. In considering what action I should take on taxes, the obvious question is how much room do I have.

A wide range of views on this question has been put to me in my recent talks. I have been urged to cut taxes massively in order to stimulate the economy. Given the expansionary forces which are already at work, I do not think this would be wise, particularly when our cash requirements are so high.

On the other hand, I have been told that I should do nothing to add to the $9.7 billion of cash requirements already forecast for 1979-80. But action is needed now to encourage investment, to respond to the needs of sectors and regions, and to keep our costs competitive, while reducing our cash requirements from the present high level.

I believe I have some room because of the efforts we have made to reduce our expenditures. I think we should share these savings with the public.

I would like now to turn to the tax measures that I am proposing tonight. Let me begin with personal income taxes.

Personal Income Tax

Mr. Speaker, an outstanding feature of our personal tax system is the inflation indexing of personal income tax exemptions and brackets. Canada is one of the very few industrialized countries that provide such indexing. Since its introduction in 1974, indexing has reduced the taxes paid by Canadians by billions of dollars.

I would like to announce that the indexing factor for 1979 will be 9 per cent. As a result, for example, the total personal exemptions for a family of four will increase by $490 to $5,970. This indexing adjustment will also increase the $200 child tax credit to $218 per child payable in the spring of 1980.

Indexing will reduce federal taxes paid by Canadians by about $1.2 billion for the 1979 taxation year. It will also reduce provincial income taxes in those provinces with tax collection agreements by some $400 million. As a result of these built-in reductions, Canadians will pay a lower share of their total income in taxes next year.

I have a further announcement to make with relation to personal income tax. Taxpayers are currently permitted an employment expense deduction of 3 per cent of wage and salary income with a maximum deduction of $250. I am proposing to double the maximum for this deduction from $250 to $500 for 1979 and subsequent taxation years.

This change will benefit most working Canadians. It is estimated that it will reduce their taxes by $270 million in 1979-80.

Hon. members expressed concern at the time of the last budget over the taxation of registered retirement saving plan proceeds. This concern was directed toward the situation where both parents die, leaving behind minor or disabled children. I undertook to review the situation. I now propose that the provisions be amended for the benefit of these children.

Unemployment Insurance Premiums

Employees and employers will also benefit from a cut in unemployment insurance premiums. On behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am pleased to announce that the weekly employee rate for 1979 will be reduced from $1.50 per $100 of insurable earnings to $1.35. The employer rate will be reduced from $2.10 to $1.89. The effect of this will be to increase take-home pay and reduce costs to employers by about $300 million in 1979.

The built-in reductions in personal income tax, the increase in the employment expense deduction, and the cut in unemployment insurance premiums will improve the take-home pay of Canadians by about $2 billion in 1979. The great majority of Canadians now recognize the inflationary impact of too rapid a rise in money incomes. I am confident that they will take into consideration these improvements in disposable income in setting their income demands over the year ahead.

[English]

Tax Structure Changes

Mr. Speaker, I come now to important structural tax changes. A stable tax system is essential for economic growth and development. It must be equitable. It must reward initiative and enterprise. Defects in the system and unchecked abuses lead to unfairness. Special tax incentives that miss their target do more harm than good. For these reasons, tax system stability cannot mean leaving the system unchanged.

We have to keep the tax system under constant review. I am releasing tonight two major studies made by my officials. One is a study that lay behind the decision of the government to introduce the refundable child tax credit. The second makes a comprehensive comparison of the Canadian and United States tax sytems. Mr. Speaker, this second study destroys a myth. It shows conclusively the Canadian personal tax system compares most favourably with that of the United States. I have also found that our business taxes are fully competitive. Our system is basically sound. There is, however, need for certain changes—some of a relieving nature and some not.

Commodity Taxes

First, certain changes are needed in federal sales and excise taxes. Some tax measures designed to conserve energy are not working as they should.

In my view the special 10 per cent excise tax on marine engines and private aircraft and the 5 per cent tax on motorcycles are having adverse economic effects. The contribution of these taxes to energy conservation has been minimal. I therefore propose to eliminate them, effective tonight. At the same time, I want to put all non-commercial users of gasoline on the same basis. I am therefore extending the special 7 cents a gallon excise tax on gasoline to aviation fuel for non-commercial uses.

To encourage energy conservation, storm doors, windows and automatic timer-control devices were exempted from federal sales tax. These exemptions have proven extremely difficult to control and to administer. For example, most glass used in new construction is now exempt from tax, even though it is less energy-efficient than solid-wall construction which is taxable. The exemptions will therefore be withdrawn effective tonight. Also, the sales tax exemption for insulation materials will apply only to items with genuine insulating properties. Solar-powered water heaters will be exempted from tax. These measures will increase the effectiveness of the government's energy conservation program.

Air Transportation Tax

An air transportation tax is currently used to help finance a widening range of airport services. Unfortunately, the costs of these services have been increasing rapidly. I have been asked by my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), to take steps to improve cost recovery. For flights within Canada and to the United States, I am therefore proposing an increase in this tax to 15 per cent of the air fare, with a maximum of $15. For international flights, the tax will be increased to $12 with provision for a subsequent increase to $15. This is another step in an ongoing process to shift the costs of airport services from the general taxpayer to those who use the airports. These increases will come into effect after March 31, 1979.

Tariffs

I am not proposing to make any tariff changes in this budget, partly because the multilateral trade negotiations are now at a critical stage. I do expect to be introducing in the near future a new schedule of tariff rates for fruits and vegetables.

I announced in my last budget that we were entering into negotiations on these products with our trading partners, following an exhaustive study of the industry by the Tariff Board. These negotiations are well advanced and should be concluded shortly.

Corporation Income Tax

Let me turn now to several important structural changes in the area of corporation taxes.

As a result of tax benefits introduced by this government over the past few years, small businesses in Canada enjoy very favourable tax treatment. Small Canadian-controlled private corporations pay federal income tax at less than half the normal corporation rate. The dividends they pay qualify for the generous dividend tax credit. As a result, the total tax on income from small incorporated businesses is below the level of personal tax on the same amount of wage and salary income.

Mr. Speaker, the very generosity of the measures makes it essential to ensure that they are effectively targeted. Some individuals have rearranged their affairs simply to make their personal, professional and investment income eligible for taxation at the low small business rate. It would be wrong to allow such practices to continue.

I am introducing changes to the Income Tax Act to ensure that the application of the low corporate tax rate is reserved for those small businesses for whom it is really intended. These will include those engaged in manufacturing, processing, mining, construction, farming, fishing, logging, transportation, wholesale and retail trade and other businesses as may be prescribed. In this way the generous tax incentives will be maintained for small businesses that need capital to expand and create jobs. The new measure will apply to taxation years starting next year.

I have also concluded that it is essential to amend the Income Tax Act to change the treatment of income debentures and term preferred shares. These securities are currently treated as equities for tax purposes, even though they are essentially debt obligations. As a result, income earned on such securities by banks and other financial institutions is tax-exempt. For the most part they are used for the financing of a relatively small number of multinational and large Canadian corporations. Their use has resulted in a very substantial loss of revenues to the federal and provincial governments. This has been of concern not just to me but also to my provincial colleagues, as we held discussions last week at the finance ministers' meeting in Ottawa.

The proposed amendments will generally apply to any such securities issued after tonight. They will not apply to issues outstanding or committed. Nor will they affect the tax treatment of common and ordinary preferred shares.

I am proposing other structural changes of a technical nature in the Notice of Ways and Means Motion which I am tabling tonight. One of the more important of these is a broadening of the deductibility of security underwriting expenses.

Sectoral and Regional Policy

Mr. Speaker, a strong industrial structure is vital to Canada's future. I have benefited greatly from the sectoral consultations I have already referred to.

The recommendations of the 23 industry task forces and the report of the Second Tier Committee have been carefully reviewed in my department. The supplementary material contains a summary and analysis of the tax proposals in these reports. In response to some of these recommendations of business and labour, I wish now to propose measures to improve efficiency, to lower costs and to promote a better distribution of economic activity across regions.

Investment Tax Credit

My first proposal concerns the investment tax credit. Since 1975 this credit has supported expansion and modernization of business. It is scheduled to expire on June 30, 1980.

I am now proposing to extend the credit indefinitely. This will provide benefits to manufacturing, the resource sector, farming and fishing.

But I want to go further. I therefore propose that the basic rate of the investment tax credit be raised from 5 to 7 per cent, effective immediately.

I also want to give increased support to regional development. For investments in areas designated under the Regional Development Incentives Act, other than in the Atlantic Provinces and the Gaspé, the credit will be raised from 7.5 per cent to 10 per cent. These areas include most of Quebec, all of Northern Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, parts of Northern Alberta and British Columbia and all of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. For Atlantic Canada and the Gaspé, the investment tax credit will be doubled from 10 per cent to 20 per cent.

● (2042)

The importance of transportation was strongly emphasized by the first ministers last February. A modern and efficient transportation system is fundamental to prosperity throughout this vast country. I am therefore proposing that investment in equipment for rail, air, water and long-haul road transportation now qualify for the basic 7 per cent investment tax credit.

All these changes in the investment tax credit will confer benefits of $500 million in the first full year of application. This is $150 million more than under the present system.

Research and Development

A common theme of the industry task forces to which I have already referred was the importance of adequate incentives for research and development.

The government has already moved a long way in this direction. A 100 per cent write-off of these expenditures has been in place for many years. The March, 1977, budget introduced tax measures to extend the investment tax credit to both current and capital expenditures on R and D.

In April of this year I provided a new 50 per cent deduction for firms which increase their research and development. The government has also announced a package of direct grants and subsidies for industrial R and D.

I am proposing to do more. The basic investment tax credit for research and development will be doubled, from 5 to 10 per cent. In the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé this credit will be 20 per cent. However, I want to provide a special measure of assistance for small business corporations. These corporations in all parts of Canada will qualify for a research and development tax credit of 25 per cent.

[Translation]

Resource Taxation

Let me turn now to the resource industries, and mining in particular.

Federal and provincial finance and resource ministers have just concluded an in-depth review of the tax situation in mining. The federal tax system has been found to be basically sound. However, some changes could be introduced to spur the development of new ventures. I want to take the lead here. Following our recent meetings. I feel confident that provinces will do their part.

I propose that the current write-off for development expenditures in mining incurred after tonight be raised from 30 per cent to 100 per cent.

Furthermore, I am proposing that for new mines, the costs of associated townsites and social assets earn depletion. I am also extending indefinitely the fast write-off for pollution control equipment, which will be of particular benefit to mining.

Also, Mr. Speaker, the regional increases in the investment tax credit are also of special value to this sector.

I want to assure the industry of the federal government's intention to pursue the spirit of federal-provincial co-operation established during the review. It is not my intention to initiate tax system changes that would create uncertainty. Nor will I offset the benefits from tax reductions that provinces may introduce. In the area of oil and gas, there has been a significant response to the incentive for drilling funds. This incentive expires on June 30, 1979. I have concluded that we must continue to encourage a high level of exploration activity. I therefore propose that the incentives be extended to December 31, 1981.

Pulp and Paper

I am anxious that the pulp and paper industry take advantage of the very favourable situation created by the lower value of the Canadian dollar. It should use this opportunity to modernize and so guarantee its future competitiveness. The federal government and a number of provincial governments are working together to reduce the high cost of wood supply. They are also studying ways to strengthen and modernize the industry.

Two of the measures in this budget will contribute to these efforts. The increase in the investment tax credit, and its enrichment in slower-growth regions, will be of considerable benefit to the pulp and paper industry. In addition, the indefinite extension of the two-year write-off for water pollution abatement equipment is particularly helpful.

Housing

I want to announce two measures to reinforce the government's support for housing. First, the tax incentive for multiple-unit residential buildings will be extended for one year. Second, developers will be allowed to deduct the carrying charges incurred after tonight on their land inventory.

[English]

Manufacturers' Sales Tax

I now come to one of the most important tax measures in my budget. I am proposing to reduce the 12 per cent manufacturers' sales tax to 9 per cent, effective tonight. This will affect all goods now subject to the 12 per cent rate with the exception of alcoholic beverages and tobacco.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I do not smoke and I do not drink very much. Gasoline is not subject to the 12 per cent ad valorem rate and will not be affected. Construction materials will continue to be taxed at the low 5 per cent rate.

This sales tax measure will reduce taxes payable at the manufacturers' level by $280 million this fiscal year and by $1 billion in 1979-80.

In accordance with standard practice, my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue has asked me to give notice that no claims will be entertained for refunds of tax in respect of goods on which the 12 per cent tax has been paid.

Unlike provincial sales taxes which apply at the retail level, the federal tax is levied on sales by manufacturers and importers. I want this cut to be passed on to consumers. That is why I have made a cut of significant size with no terminal date. Experience suggests that such tax cuts are passed on. I am appealing to manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers—I am surprised to see the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) smiling. If he believes in the marketplace, he will conclude that the tax cut will be passed on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I am appealing to manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers to make sure that the consumer gets the benefit. As well, I am asking my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), his department, the Anti-Inflation Board and the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity to monitor the situation closely. Consumers themselves, by seeking out competitive price reductions, can help to make this measure effective.

Impact on the Economy

I estimate that the cut in the sales tax will reduce the increase in the consumer price index by one-half of one per cent. This comes on top of the proposed postponement of the oil price increase and the reduction in the gasoline excise tax announced in August. These two will have a similar impact.

● (2052)

These measures will have a direct effect on wage costs through cost-of-living clauses in wage contracts. More important, a somewhat lower rate of price increase will be helpful in moderating new settlements. The cut in income taxes as a result of indexing, the improved employment expense deduction and the reduction in unemployment insurance premiums will also help to relieve the pressures for large increases in money incomes.

I therefore believe that this budget will make a significant contribution to the containment of our domestic costs in the post-control era. This will enable us to take full advantage of the improvement in our competitive position that we have achieved.

My budget measures will, of course, provide a more direct stimulus to growth. Investment will be stimulated by the enriched investment tax credit. Consumption will benefit from the increase in the real spending power of Canadians as a result of the income and sales tax cuts.

I am projecting an increase in real output next year of between 4 per cent and 4½ per cent. I would expect the number of jobs to increase by at least 250,000. I expect that the consumer price index will average 6½ per cent above the 1978 level, but the increase from the fourth quarter of this year to the fourth quarter of next year should be under 6 per cent.

My revenue forecasts are based on an increase of 11 per cent in the current dollar value of the gross national product.

The Fiscal Position

Mr. Speaker, I would like now to table projections of the government's revenues and expenditures, the Notice of Ways and Means Motion, supplementary information giving details of the measures proposed tonight, and the two studies I mentioned earlier. I would also like to ask for the consent of the House to include in Hansard the usual tables on the government's accounts together with the explanatory notes.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Chrétien: This fiscal year I expect financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, to total $12.1 billion. The increase from the $11.8 billion forecast in September is due to the sales tax cut and other measures announced tonight.

I am forecasting financial requirements for 1979-80 of $10,750 million. This is an increase of $1,050 million from my previous forecast of $9.7 billion. The loss of revenues from the measures I have announced tonight which had not been reflected in the previous forecast amounts to $1,380 million. But there is some offset arising from the favourable impact of these measures on the economy and from other minor adjustments since the last forecast.

The financial requirements in 1979-80 will thus decline by $1,350 million or 11 per cent from this year's level. If account is taken of the special factors relating to Canada Savings Bond interest, financial requirements would increase by about $350 million. The deficit on a national accounts basis is forecast to increase by $200 million.

These financial requirements are large, but their size must be kept in perspective. They are lower than this year and they are being incurred at a time when unemployment and interest rates are high. Morever, the provincial governments are providing rather less stimulus than in the past, mainly because of the substantial surpluses of the resource-rich western provinces. With faster growth in the private sector in prospect over the medium-term, coupled with continuing expenditure restraint, significant reductions in the deficit can be expected.

I am confident that our financial requirements this year and next can be met without causing undue pressures on financial markets.

Concluding Remarks

Mr. Speaker, in the last three years Canadians have worked hard and responsibly to regain our competitive position in world markets. We are starting to reap the benefits. Our costs are now competitive and we have seen recently a great improvement in our balance of trade and a firming of investment plans.

At the February first ministers' meeting and in discussions among government, labour and business an important consensus has developed. All sectors have come to recognize that to build a strong economy we must be competitive in international markets.

So tonight I have brought down a budget to build further confidence and to ensure continued competitiveness.

Everyone agrees that the future is very good for Canadians. Our resources, our people, our institutions, and our freedom make us the envy of the world. Of course, there are problems. There always will be. But the potential for even greater prosperity is there, and I am confident that Canadians are prepared to act responsibly so we can continue to enjoy one of the highest standards of living anywhere, and to make sure that we pass on to future generations a free, united and prosperous Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in making a few introductory remarks tonight in response to the budget we have just heard delivered to the House, I should first like to congratulate the minister on the various aspects of it which I believe will be good for Canadians.

The first thing I should like to refer to is the manufacturers' sales tax reduction from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. This is a move in the right direction. We may in due course have comments to make as to the form the minister has chosen in which to make this reduction. The minister will recall that over the period of the last three budgets we in the official opposition have pressed hard to have the manufacturing sales tax reduced in this country. The minister will also recall that in statements made earlier we indicated that we felt it would be more effective to have the manufacturing sales tax reduction in certain specific areas as opposed to reducing it across the board, as he has proposed tonight.

In particular, we felt that the construction industry was an industry that needs this type of stimulus, and I am disappointed the minister did not reduce the 5 per cent manufacturing sales tax that is still outstanding in respect of the construction industry.

I would like to commend the government also for deciding to go further in helping research and development in this country. This perhaps has been one of the greatest shortfalls of this government for the past ten years. The mining industry, if you add together the provincial tax portion and the federal tax portion, has had a very heavy load to bear which has undoubtedly discouraged development in this country. Once again, while it may be a bit late, I am pleased that the minister has chosen tonight to accommodate at least that resource field further.

One of the aspects that I think is perhaps dearest to the heart of everybody in the official opposition is the employee accommodation benefit which the minister has proposed for January 1, which allows employees in this country to increase the amount that they can properly charge for their ongoing expenses from $250 to $500. The minister will recall that only a few months ago in this House we on this side supported an increase in that expense allowance, but unfortunately we were voted down by the government forces at that time.

I am disappointed, as I am sure are many Canadians who are watching tonight, that the minister has refused to accommodate our mortgage deductibility proposal and our municipal tax deductibility proposal. Those two proposals, as we link them to meaningful expenditure reductions, are not only needed by Canadian homeowners, but they would add a stimulant to an otherwise rather stagnant economy. Perhaps the most unfortunate thing is that the government has not accepted our suggestion, for example, that we stop hiring 20,000 extra public employees per year over a period of three years. That alone would have saved the federal treasury about $1.7 billion, and over that period of time the savings on that one item alone would have been sufficient to allow the government to phase in our mortgage deductibility plan and our municipal taxation plan as described by my leader in September of this year.

I could hardly believe my ears yesterday when I heard the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) in this House categorically challenge the concept of mortgage deductibility and municipal tax deductibility. In fact, he said that it was something for the rich, on the one hand, and would not help the tenant, on the other hand. I would like that minister to come with me to downtown Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal or Halifax and tell people with $30,000, $40,000 and $50,000 mortgages that they are the rich people, the people which the government says should not get a break in this country, the capitalists which they do not want to help.

The minister of urban affairs yesterday referred to the tenants, the group which this government pretends to defend. I would ask that minister if he were in his seat tonight, why does he think the average tenant stays in an apartment building? Does he believe that that is his first choice? The hard fact is that the majority of tenants would dearly love to move out of their apartments if they could afford to buy a home in which to live. That is the kind of program that a Clark government, after the next election, will put in place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Another area which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) either glossed over or said very little about was the small businessman. In earlier questioning to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) we pointed out that ten years ago there was one bankruptcy for every ten businesses in Canada, mainly among small business people, today it is now seven bankruptcies in every ten as compared to the United States. This is the situation which the small businessman finds himself in, and yet in this budget there is no meaningful assistance for these people. We will certainly be pressing the minister to tell us why he avoided helping these people in a meaningful way and making suggestions as to where he could have helped the small businessman.

Capital gains have been taxed in this country for several years. Even the minister agrees that the capital gains tax has not been a big contributor to revenues, but the government categorically refuses to index it for inflation. I would have expected the minister at least to index this tax to avoid future confiscation of private property as a result of the way taxation is now being inflicted upon people who make such investments.

I would now like to touch in a more general way on certain aspects of this budget, but before I do that I would draw to hon. members' attention the budget brief. The most amazing thing about this brief is that it is so brief that it has no figures. The budgetary figures for perhaps the first time in history have been left out of the budget brief. On reflection, it may be that the figures are so ugly—that $25 billion deficit which the government anticipates this year, including next year—that they want to say as little as possible about it. If you put that $25 billion deficit which will be incurred in the fiscal years 1979 and 1980 together, it means that this government is putting Canadians into debt to the extent of $1,000 for every man, woman and child within two years. Over these two years, they are contemplating an expenditure of approximately $100 billion, roughly $50 billion per year. Perhaps the saddest thing is not just that the expenditure is huge, but also when we look at where the government are spending the money we get the true facts of what is going wrong in Ottawa today.

Only this week the Department of Supply and Services issued its weekly bulletin showing what contracts have been let. I know hon. members have probably leafed through these contracts and their descriptions, but just in case the Prime Minister has forgotten some of the things his government is buying currently I will go over some of them. This is only one week's ordering and only one page, but it totals $11 million. There were 39,000 plastic credit cards for a total price of $20,000. What does a government that is already spending to the hilt need with 39,000 plastic credit cards? Exactly who do they intend to give these 39,000 credit cards to? It is the Canadian taxpayer who will have to pay for them. The next item is paper clips. They are spending $44,000 on a weekly order alone to buy 460,000 boxes each containing 100 paper clips.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. They spent $203,000 for the purchase of 7,400 plastic floor mats. Do you know what they are for?

Mr. Trudeau: For floors.

Mr. Stevens: The Prime Minister says they are for floors. He is partly right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Stevens: Maybe the Prime Minister has forgotten, but they are for floors that have only a shag rug. That is what they were bought for—for those people who presumably have enough prestige to have a shag rug. Those are only some of the items, Mr. Speaker.

We have heard talk of some of the other studies that this government has engaged in. For example, I know the minister will recall the $170,000 that was spent to study air breathing fish on the Amazon River.

An hon. Member: Hurrah for Romeo!

Mr. Stevens: Sir, I know I have more time tomorrow and perhaps I will give more examples of where this government is spending the Canadian people's tax paid money and tax payable money.

I see the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) has come awake and says he would like me to speak about the budget. Presumably he would not hear the budget.

I do not want to be too critical of this government nor of this minister, Mr. Speaker. That is why, if I may have hon. members' attention, I should like to quote a Liberal that I know at least some hon. members on the other side have some respect for. The person I am referring to said this government has run its mandate and the principal economic minister has much less leverage than he had. He also said there has been a progressive weakening in personnel of the principal economic ministries.

That Liberal—and I know from the Prime Minister's expression that he knows to whom I am referring—was none other than a former minister of finance, John Turner. As we know, that former minister of finance now sits comfortably with his industrial friends in Toronto. In his interregnum papers that he keeps bringing out—I know the Prime Minister must read them intently—he has gone much further. Sometimes he appears to be in sharp conflict with some of the statements made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: You have just dropped a paper clip.

Mr. Stevens: For example, he has stated that he believes the size of the federal deficit threatens tight money and rising interest rates should the economy recover on the investment front, with all the negatives for private investment which that prospect implies.

That statement is obviously in sharp conflict with what the Prime Minister has told the press and this House in the last couple of days. He told us that we did not have to worry about the size of the deficit, that it is the rate of increase that we should worry about.

Commenting on Petro-Can's apparent insatiable appetite for takeovers, be it Husky Oil which they lost, be it Pacific Petroleums Ltd. which they might win, heaven forbid, Mr. Turner said that these are not the actions of a government whose overriding concern is public sector restraint.

I probably would not have quoted Mr. Turner if the Minister of State had not intervened, Mr. Speaker. Now that I have done so, I must say it is odd to hear what one Liberal says about another Liberal, particularly when we remember that when this particular Liberal was minister of finance, he was the biggest spender of all.

Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, given the opportunity, I hope to go into greater detail about what this party, led by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), would do if given the opportunity to form a government after the next election. At that time I intend to describe how we feel it is urgent that there be five-year plannings in this country, instead of having this ongoing ad hockery where there is a budget almost every five months. We feel that the government of the day should bring in a budget showing not only the immediate plan, but where they intend to take the economy for the next five years. I will be showing in a meaningful way where, during those five years, there can be significant reduction in federal government spending and where there can be meaningful tax cuts to stimulate the economy, all to the end of narrowing the $12 billion deficit we are living with in this country per annum. That is what we need.

The United States has five-year budgets. The United Kingdom has five-year budgetary plans, and the OECD is asking all member countries to follow that approach. I cannot understand why this government so adamantly refuses to do what is only sensible. In fact, I can only guess, knowing how bad the two-year figures look, that they are frightened to show the Canadian public how their five-year figures might appear.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like now to move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Stevens the debate was adjourned.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move:

That this House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

On motion of Mr. MacEachen the House adjourned at 9.24 p.m.

The source of funds provided by Foreign Exchange Transactions in the first seven months of 1978-79 is largely accounted for by net sales of foreign exchange by the Exchange Fund Account. The EFA's holdings of foreign exchange result from purchases in the exchange market and from borrowing in foreign currencies by the government. This foreign currency borrowing amounted to $3,586 million in Canadian dollars from April 1, 1978 to October 31, 1978.

Notes to Fiscal Tables

Comparison of Current 1978-79 Forecast with April 10, 1978 Budget Forecast

The current forecast of 1978-79 Budgetary Revenue of $35,200 million is $800 million below the level forecast in the April 10, 1978 budget. Some $435 million of this change represents the estimated impact of measures introduced since the April budget. The 3 per cent cut in the manufacturers' sales tax rate is estimated to reduce 1978-79 revenues by $280 million, while other changes in the budget cause a $30 million reduction. The reduction in the gasoline excise tax which took effect on August 25, 1978, the impact on the oil export charge revenues of the planned deferral of the January 1, 1979 oil price increase and the May 1978 small business tax measures are estimated to have reduced 1978-79 revenues by $125 million. (The child benefits tax changes announced August 24, 1978 are estimated to have little or no net impact on revenues in 1978-79).

The balance of the change in forecast revenues, some $365 million, reflects changes in economic assumptions, and revisions as a result of analysis of revenue collections data for the 1977-78 fiscal year which became available after April together with analysis of the revisions to national accounts economic series released in June by Statistics Canada. The largest changes resulting from these factors were a downward revision of personal income tax revenues reflecting, most importantly, analysis of final 1977-78 data, and an upward revision of customs import duties reflecting an upward revision of the forecast value of imports. Non-tax revenues were revised upward reflecting somewhat higher interest rates on government cash balances and higher cash balances than had been assumed at the time of the original forecast.

The government's expenditure ceiling is set in terms of Total Outlays, which is the sum of Budgetary Expenditures and Loans, Investments and Advances. As announced by the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board on September 8, 1978, the level of Total Outlays for 1978-79 has been reduced to $48,300 from the April ceiling of $48,450 million. However, within this total, Budgetary Expenditures have been revised up $400 million from April, while Loans, Investments and Advances have been revised down $550 million. The figure for Total Outlays includes reserves for revisions of the estimated costs of statutory programs and for supplementary estimates. At the beginning of the fiscal year, the appropriate division of these reserves between Budgetary Expenditures and non-budgetary Loans, Investments and Advances, is somewhat uncertain. In addition, it is now apparent that loan requirements, notably net loans to CMHC, will be lower than originally expected. A number of factors, including higher public debt charges resulting from foreign borrowing to supplement exchange reserves and from recent interest rate increases, have caused forecast Budgetary Expenditures to increase although the increase has been offset in some measure by the cuts in certain specific 1978-79 program costs announced in August and September.

The decrease in Budgetary Revenues of $800 million together with the increase of $400 million in Budgetary Expenditures results in a forecast Budgetary Deficit which is $1,200 million higher than the deficit forecast in April. The $550 million reduction in loan requirements, together with a $275 million reduced source from the annuity, insurance and pension accounts (reflecting higher unemployment insurance benefits) and a $325 million reduced requirement for other transactions has partially offset the increased Budgetary Deficit, resulting in a forecast of Financial Requirements (excluding foreign exchange) which is $600 million higher than that forecast in April.

Financial Requirements (excluding foreign exchange transactions) in 1979-80 are forecast to be $10,750 million, $1,350 million below the 1978-79 level. Underlying this Financial Requirements forecast are forecasts of 8.4 per cent growth in Budgetary Revenues to a level of $38,150 million, 8.0 per cent growth in Budgetary Expenditures to $51,100 million and an increased net source of $2.2 billion from non-budgetary transactions. The Budgetary Revenue forecast assumes growth in nominal GNP of approximately 11 per cent.

The levels of, and annual percentage changes in, the major components of Budgetary Revenues are shown below.

	1977-78 Actual	1978-79 Forecast		1979-80 Forecast
	$ millions	$ millions	% change	$ millions	% change

Total budgetary revenues	32,846	35,200	7.2	38,150	8.4

The 13.0 per cent rate of growth of personal income tax revenues is influenced by the fact that 1978-79 revenues are reduced by $760 million through transfers to provinces and to Quebec taxpayers associated with the temporary provincial retail sales tax cuts. The 1979-80 yield of the tax is reduced $270 million by the higher level of the employment expense deduction, and there is a net reduction of $655 million due to the changes in child benefit provisions announced in August. On the other hand, 1979-80 revenues are raised by the fact that the tax payable on the large amount of CSB interest cashed in November 1978 will affect tax collections mainly in the first months of the 1979-80 fiscal year.

Following a projected increase of 6.7 per cent in 1978-79, corporation income first year, or first full year, impact of tax measures introduced in March 1977, October 1977 and April 1978 has lowered expected revenue growth in 1978-79, as has the large increase in the use of income debentures. The measures in this budget are estimated to cause a net reduction in 1979-80 corporation tax revenues of $75 million.

The actual decline in sales tax revenues, of course, reflects the 3 percentage point rate reduction which is estimated to lower revenue by $1,015 million in 1979-80 compared with $280 million in the last part of 1978-79.

Other duties and taxes are forecast to decrease by 3.5 per cent in 1979-80, following a decline of 7.8 per cent in 1978-79. Falling oil export charge revenues and the impact of the 3 percentage point reduction in the special excise tax on gasoline are the principal factors causing these declines.

Non-tax revenues are projected to increase 10.1 per cent in 1979-80 compared to the projected 15.0 per cent increase in 1978-79. The dominant revenue source in this category is return on investments which is projected to increase at a 6.2 per cent rate in 1979-80, compared to a projected 22.2 per cent rate in 1978-79. The large 1978-79 increase reflects higher interest rates and increased government cash balances.

Budgetary Expenditures and non-budgetary Loans, Investments and Advances sum to the $52,600 million ceiling announced on September 8 in the joint statement by the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board. The increase in this Total Outlays ceiling is 8.9 per cent. Budgetary Expenditures are forecast to increase by 8 per cent and Loans, Investments and Advances by 50 per cent. The large increase in loan requirements basically reflects the return to a more normal level of net requirements by CMHC following the abnormally large repayments by that corporation in 1978-79 resulting from the sale of mortgages by CMHC from its existing holdings.

The source of funds provided by the annuity, insurance and pension accounts is expected to increase by $845 million over the 1978-79 level. By far the largest factor in this increase is a projected swing to surplus in the unemployment insurance account, reflecting the savings in unemployment insurance benefits from the tightening of entrance requirements and reduction in benefit levels which will result from Bill C-14. These savings are partially offset by the 10 per cent reduction in employer/employee premium rates.

Other transactions are expected to provide a net source of $880 million in 1979-80, a swing of $1,855 million from the previous year. The most important single factor here is the decline in the level of Canada Savings Bond interest encashments.

Canada Savings Bond Interest Encashment

In 1978-79, a total of $2,300 million in regular interest coupons, compound and bonus interest on the maturing SR and S24 series of Canada Savings Bonds is expected to be cashed. Approximately $2,050 million of this interest had been charged to budgetary expenditures in previous years, as public debt charges are calculated on an accrual basis. In 1979-80, bonus interest totalling an estimated $630 million will become payable on Canada Savings Bonds issued prior to November 1974 and still outstanding. Approximately $550 million of this amount will have been charged to Budgetary Expenditures prior to 1979-80.

When interest encashments exceed (fall short of) interest accruals in a given year, the government is faced with a cash requirement (source) which is recorded in the interest and debt accounts component of 'other non-budgetary transactions'. Thus, encashment of previously accrued regular, compound and bonus interest on the SR and S24 series is expected to give rise to a non-budgetary requirement of $2,050 million in 1978-79, and encashment of previously accrued bonus interest in 1979-80 is expected to give rise to a non-budgetary requirement of some $550 million in 1979-80. Previously accrued regular and compound interest on CSB series maturing in November 1979, and interim compound interest coupons on certain series, will also become payable in 1979-80. At the same time, in both 1978-79 and 1979-80 it is expected that interest accruals will exceed interest encashment by significant amounts on other CSB series, thus providing a source of funds to the government.

In total, the difference between interest accruing and interest cashed on Canada Savings Bonds provided a non-budgetary source of funds of $827 million in 1977-78, is estimated to give rise to a non-budgetary requirement of $1,395 million in 1978-79 and is projected to provide a source of some $300 million in 1979-80. (The latter projection depends on the fraction of the current CSB issue assumed to be sold in 'compound interest bonds' form. It is thus subject to considerable uncertainty.) The lack of an exact matching of interest accrual and encashment on the non-CSB portion of government debt (marketable bonds and treasury bills) can also give rise to a non-budgetary source or requirement of funds, although the effect is much smaller than for CSBs due to the lack of compound and bonus provisions on these other securities.

The year-to-year change in CSB interest accrual/encashment thus accounts for a $2.2 billion increase in Financial Requirements between 1977-78 and 1978-79, and for a $1.7 billion reduction between 1978-79 and 1979-80. Thus, apart from these CSB interest accrual/encashment effects, Financial Requirements will increase from 1977-78 to 1978-79 by $1.6 billion, and will increase from 1978-79 to 1979-80 by $350 million.

Direct Borrowing by Government Agencies

Direct market borrowings by agent Crown corporations which have been authorized to borrow under their respective statutes are not included in Government of Canada Financial Requirements. In 1977-78, the Export Development Corporation (EDC) borrowed $341 million directly, Eldorado Nuclear borrowed $40 million and Petro-Canada repaid $30 million. Over the projection of requirements for 1978-79 and 1979-80, it is envisaged that such direct borrowing will continue. In addition, the 1978-79 requirements for loans to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are reduced due to the sale of mortgages by CMHC in that year.

Government Expenditures

Since 1976-77, the federal government has set its spending ceiling in terms of Total Outlays, the sum of Budgetary Expenditures and non-budgetary Loans, Investments and Advances. The following table shows the level of Total Outlays, the growth rate of Total Outlays and Total Outlays expressed as a percentage of current dollar GNP for the corresponding fiscal year.

* GNP for corresponding fiscal year.

 Savings of approximately $700 million in 1977-78 Budgetary Expenditures resulted from the partial replacement of cash transfers to provinces by the transfer of additional tax points under the Established Programs Financing arrangement. Adjustment for this change would increase the 1977-78 growth in Total Outlays to 8.8 per cent, and the Total Outlays/GNP ratio to 20.8 per cent.

Another common measure of federal government spending is the sum of current expenditures (in the form of expenditures on goods and services, transfers to other levels of government, interest on the public debt, transfers to provincial and local governments, etc.) and gross capital formation as shown in the National Income and Expenditure Accounts. Fiscal year data on this basis are shown below.

Federal Government Expenditures

* GNP for corresponding fiscal year.

It will be noted that the rates of increase of expenditures as measured in the national accounts are similar to the rates of increase of Total Outlays for all years except 1977-78 and to a lesser extent, 1979-80. The higher increase in national accounts expenditures in 1977-78 largely relates to two differences in the coverage of these alternative expenditure measures. National accounts expenditures include unemployment insurance benefits on a current basis. With the rise in the unemployment rate, these payments increased by 21 per cent from $3,457 million in 1976-77 to $4,168 million in 1977-78. Total Outlays include (in Budgetary Expenditures) the government contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Account (UI). This contribution is based on the experience of the account in the calendar year ending three months before the start of the fiscal year in question, and is affected by changes in the employer/employee contribution rates as well as by unemployment rates. The government contribution to the UI account fell 20 per cent from $1,728 million in 1976-77 to $1,379 million in 1977-78. The second difference in coverage which proved important over this period is the fact that national accounts expenditures do not include government outlays in the form of loans. A reduction in loans between 1976-77 and 1977-78 contributed to the lower growth rate of Total Outlays in 1977-78.

In 1979-80, these two differences in coverage work in the reverse direction leading to a slower growth rate for national accounts expenditures than Total Outlays. The reductions in UI benefits which will take effect in 1979 affect national accounts expenditures immediately but will not reduce the government contribution to the UI account, and thus Total Outlays, until 1980-81. In addition, the large increase in the loans component of Total Outlays does not affect national accounts expenditures.

AIR CANADA

REASON NEWFOUNDLAND NOT MENTIONED IN PUBLICATION "EN ROUTE"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Air Canada, in its magazine "En Route", distributed in aircraft ostensibly to inform the travelling public, carries a guide to what is happening across the country, entitled "Canada Calendar 1978", outlining events across Canada which travellers may wish to attend. Since the province of Newfoundland is not included in this calendar, leaving unrepresented the most interesting and culturally stimulating part of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the president of Air Canada, Claude Taylor, be summoned before the bar of the House to explain this strange, if not sinister, omission, including an explanation as to why Newfoundland has been separated from Canada without even a referendum, and that Mr. Taylor be sentenced to one week's landings by aircraft at Torbay airport, after midnight and in fog, without the guidance of air traffic control as proposed by the Minister of Transport in his drive for economy, particularly in essential services.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway).

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SALE OF REMEMBRANCE DAY POPPIES IN FEDERAL BUILDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that Mrs. Betty Dall, a member of the Women's Auxiliary of the Royal Canadian Legion, Prince Edward Branch 81, was not allowed to sell poppies in a federal Canada Manpower building at 220 Henderson Highway, in Winnipeg, and was ordered to leave by the supervisor, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare):

That the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is aware of this incident, investigate with a view to establishing a policy which would permit the selling of Remembrance Day poppies in federal buildings across Canada, and that an appropriate apology be extended to Mrs. Dall and Prince Edward Branch 81 of the Royal Canadian Legion.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Twelve o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the minister one sentence to indicate the nature of the point of order, and then I will take it at twelve o'clock.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the nature of the point of order is the use of Standing Order 43 regarding matters of allegedly urgent and pressing business. Some of these items are of deep concern to all of us in the country, but they can hardly be considered urgent in this sense. Representations could be made to ministers and departments, and I do not think the use of the time of the House in this way should be permitted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In order to present this motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43 unanimous consent must be given. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE BUDGET

CRITICISM THEREOF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that last night's budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was his third in 13 months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour):

That this House unanimously concludes that the minister has brought down a Toronto Argonaut budget: he has had his third down, fumbled the ball, and time has run out.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEBT SERVICING CHARGES FOR 1980 AND 1981—LEVEL OF INTEREST RATES AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Based on the figures given by the minister last night in his budget, it now appears that federal debt servicing costs next year will be $8 billion, compared with $2 billion in 1970, which means that next year every worker in Canada will have to carry a debt servicing load of $800 as far as the federal government is concerned.

Would the Minister of Finance indicate what he anticipates the ongoing debt servicing charges for 1981 and 1982 to be? Can he let us see down the road a little further than he did last night?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, because I had been preoccupied with that situation, I decided in my budget to reduce cash requirements for the next fiscal year from $12.1 billion to $10.7 billion. I am always surprised that hon. members opposite complain about the size of the deficit. Last night they complained that I had not cut taxes enough.

● (1112)

Mr. Stevens: The minister knows well enough—at least, if he has been talking to his own deputy minister—that if you take out the Canada Savings Bonds rather extraordinary circumstances, the cash requirements will actually go up next year, not down.

Let me put this question to the minister: would he indicate what he would anticipate to be the deficit in Canada in 1980 if there were full employment in the country, as analysts are currently anticipating—as has been stated this morning—that the deficit, with full employment, would still be $6 billion to $8 billion? Would the minister indicate if that is, in truth, so?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the first point is that there will be a debate on the budget this afternoon, as we have agreed, so I am not about to discuss what the budget would have been if there was no unemployment, what is the level of full capacity in Canada, and so on. Those questions are difficult to answer and assumptions are difficult to make.

I can just say that I stimulated the economy last night as much as I could. At the same time, I took steps to reduce our cash requirements, and I think this was the soundest economic policy I could provide under the circumstances.

Mr. Stevens: My question is again directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister, in his answer to me, shows that it is the "ad hockery" in which he engages that is causing the problems in this country.

My final question to the minister deals with the impact on the private market sector of the extensive borrowings that he now anticipates, which will mean that in the coming years 28 per cent of the total available private funds will go into the federal coffers, as compared to an average of 10 per cent in the decade ending in 1976. Would the minister indicate whether this will not have a tendency to raise interest rates still higher, and consequently raise unemployment above the objectionably high level at which it is today?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad that the hon. member referred to the marketplace. In fact, this morning, because the budget was a responsible budget, the value of the Canadian dollar increased in the marketplace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: May I say, in reply to the question put by the hon. member, that there are many savings available on the Canadian market at this time. The savings in the Canadian economy are at a high level and there is absolutely no problem—I forecast this—for the government to raise this money and for the private sector to use it to expand planning and increase investment by 16 per cent next year.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is interesting to note that the dollar edged out of the 84-cent level by one-fifth of 1 per cent in response to the budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Last night, the minister said in the budget speech that there is good reason to believe that the major adjustment in the exchange rate which was required to restore our competitive position has been completed. Does that statement mean that the Government of Canada has taken the position that it will support the Canadian dollar at around the 84-cent or 85-cent level?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): We have always said we do not intend to fix the rate of the Canadian dollar; the rate will be fixed by the market. We do think that the level of the dollar at this time is a good level for maintaining our competitive position. We hope that the fluctuation will not be downward, but if the pressures of the market bring the dollar down, we will have to live with it because we are not the ones who fix the dollar; it is the market which determines the value of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Gillies: Again, I would like to have this point clearly clarified, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister of Finance now saying in the House that, regardless of what pressures may be exerted, through speculation or any other forces, on the Canadian dollar, the Canadian government will not intervene, even though it is the position of the government that a downward change in the exchange rate would be damaging to the Canadian economy?

Mr. Chrétien: The position of the Canadian government on the dollar is that the Bank of Canada intervenes to make sure that the market operates in an orderly fashion.

PROJECTED INCREASE IN GROWTH RATE—EFFECT ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I also have some questions for the Minister of Finance. In his April budget, the minister stated that he expected a "5 per cent growth in real output . . . (which) should bring about some modest decline in unemployment." In fact, the minister admitted in last night's budget that the 1978 growth rate will be less than 4 per cent; and, of course, unemployment has increased in Canada since last April.

• (1117)

An hon. Member: Come on.

Mr. Rae: In view of the 4 per cent to 4.5 per cent growth rate, can the minister indicate to the House whether the unemployment rate is expected to come down in 1979 and, if so, to what extent?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I stated in my budget that the growth in output should be close to 4 per cent for 1978 and that with such a growth rate the level of unemployment went down by one percentage point in October 1978, compared to 1977. I think that with a decrease in inflation in Canada, an increase in investment in the private sector and the job-creation programs put forward by the federal government, if all that works, there should be a decline in unemployment in the course of next year if, of course, the manpower participation rate does not edge up too quickly.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, it is of interest to note that the unemployment figure did not even appear in last night's budget speech. The minister bases real growth in Canada on the assumption that there will be a 3 per cent growth rate in the United States. In view of the fact that with this optimistic forecast, the minister seems to be alone among all forecasters in saying the rate in the United States will be this high, can he now indicate to the House why he is choosing, deliberately, a policy of high unemployment which makes Canada a leader in world unemployment figures?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I brought down a budget with as many incentives as I could. We reduced personal income tax by increasing the indexing factor to 9 per cent, we reduced them through a raise in the employment expense deduction, we reduced unemployment insurance premiums for Canadian workers thereby boosting their purchasing power; furthermore, we reduced the sales tax which should lower the inflation rate by 0.5 per cent, which will help further to contribute to increase the purchasing power of the people of Canada. I am very surprised that with such incentives, a stimulating policy which was also proposed by the New Democratic Party—and I refer to the sales tax cut—the hon. member says today that those policies are bad. The members of the New Democratic Party advocated such policies themselves.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, we do not want to take credit for this budget: I can assure the minister of that fact.

I have a final supplementary question. In view of the fact that housing and construction markets remain particularly depressed, and that high interest rates, land prices and the profits of large developers make it impossible for many working Canadians to buy their own homes, can the minister explain why the only housing proposal in his budget was a tax haven for land speculators and housing developers?

An hon. Member: Tories!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have had, in the past—and they are still in place—very good housing policies. Over the last few years, we have managed to create more than 250,000 units per year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: It was exactly the level set by the Economic Council of Canada for the housing policies of Canada. The money we use in that field is targeted to help people at the low end of the income scale in Canadian society. At this moment, we think that Canadians, as has been said by many people, are probably the best housed people in the world.

INQUIRY WHETHER BUDGET FOR CANADA WORKS PROGRAM WILL BE INCREASED TO CURB UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In view of the budget presented last night by the Minister of Finance, which would seem to generate much more unemployment than jobs, is it expected, within his department that budgets will be increased for Canada Works projects, which are indeed job-creating?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is giving that interpretation to the budget, clearly he is wrong. I am happy my colleague did not yield to the temptation to put in the kind of stimulus suggested by the opposition, which would have been fiscally irresponsible and really would have caused Canada to lose jobs.

• (1122)

INQUIRY WHETHER BUDGET CUTS WILL ELIMINATE SELECTION COMMITTEES ON CANADA WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister, who has not answered my question concerning budget increases for Canada Works projects. I suppose he meant that there would be no increases. Is it therefore true that next year selection committees, which are composed of local residents, who are really responsible in the ridings, will be abolished; is it true that to save money these selection committees will be discontinued?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not in tune with the facts. The fact of the matter is that there is a significant increase in money made available over this winter for the Canada Works program.

BUDGET PROVISIONS RESPECTING ISSUANCE OF TERM PREFERRED SHARES—PETRO-CANADA, PACIFIC PETROLEUMS DEAL

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As a result of the budget last night, the government is closing a very real tax loophole relating to the issuance of term preferred shares. As the minister knows, of course, the issuance of term preferred shares is a very crucial and critical part of the Petro-Can, Pacific Pete deal.

Then a curious and rather contradictory limitation pops up in the budget papers, at page 38, and I quote this, sir, very briefly. In reference to closing the loophole, it states, "This will not apply to a security issued pursuant to a written agreement made prior to November 17, 1978". That has obviously been written in there so this will not queer the Pacific Pete deal.

My question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is this: was there any communication by, or on behalf of, Petro-Can with the finance minister or any of his officials in respect of this special, discriminatory, favoured treatment of Petro-Can?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that many of these instruments have been negotiated in the last little while by all sorts of corporations across Canada. We decided to change the law, to clarify the definition of income debentures, and retractable preferred shares and make the decision effective yesterday because many business decisions by different corporations, banks and financial institutions in Canada had been negotiated. It is a principle in law that, when you make a change, you make it non-retroactive; and this applied to all transactions that were negotiated between financial institutions and other corporations in Canada up to last night.

Mr. Lawrence: Of course, that is a non-answer, because the budget actually does plug the loophole for shares issued prior to today, but the limitation in there is that there is an exception which covers the Petro-Can deal, for an agreement made prior to today. That is a phony-boloney limitation.

My question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is: it now seems—this is with regard to the Petro-Can, Pacific Pete dubious deal—that there is going to be a battle for control of Pacific Pete, involving a Canadian group which is interested in trying to gain control, because both the minister of energy and the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lawrence: All right. My question relates to the representations made by both those ministers, that the purpose of it is to repatriate control of this oil company. If there is a Canadian group that now wants to purchase it, my question to the minister is: will he give directions to Petro-Canada, a Crown corporation, a baby of this government—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lawrence: Will he give directions to Petro-Can to withdraw from the deal if there is a Canadian group interested in taking over?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is an extraordinary suggestion. The deal has been entered into in good faith between Petro-Canada and the shareholders of a controlling block of Pacific Petroleums, and I refer to Phillips Petroleum, a very large United States corporation. This is a transaction which will repatriate control of Pacific Petroleums, a significant Canadian entity, to Canada. That deal has been made, it was made in good faith and there is no intention whatsoever to go back on it.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN DEPARTMENT AND PETRO-CANADA PRIOR TO PACIFIC PETROLEUMS DEAL

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Finance, who I think neglected to answer a very key question asked by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham regarding the existence, or not, of any communication between anyone related with Petro-Canada and anyone related with the Department of Finance so that there might have been some advance knowledge on the part of anyone related to Petro-Canada that might have led them to become involved in the Pacific Petroleums deal before the budget was brought down.

Is the minister able to give the House of Commons categorical assurance that there was no communication of any kind between anyone associated with the Department of Finance and anyone associated with Petro-Can that might have given Petro-Can a special advantage in anticipation of this budgetary proposal?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Shoyama, is by law a member of the board of Petro-Canada. At the meetings he did not know, did not speak or give any indication at all to anybody about what was to be done in the budget. The final decisions about a change in the law for income debentures and retractable preferred shares were made Saturday morning when I closed all the elements of the budget.

Mr. Shoyama has assured me that he has given no indication whatever, to anybody, of my intentions. He even said at the press conference that it was my decision and he could not give an indication because he had to respect his role as the Deputy Minister of Finance. I have complete faith and confidence in this public servant—who has served many governments, not only this federal government—having acted properly throughout. If somebody is accusing him of wrongdoing, I would like them to give me the information and I will make inquiries. I have been assured by Mr. Shoyama that at no time did he give any indication, to anybody, of my intentions.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, just so that I understand this correctly, we do have a statement now, a confirmation by the minister that the Deputy Minister of Finance was present at the meeting of the board of directors of Petro-Canada which took this decision. That is an established fact which the minister has now admitted to the House of Commons.

Will the minister advise the House whether the Deputy Minister of Finance, seized of the knowledge of the intention of Petro-Canada as he was, gave any indication of that intention of Petro-Canada to the Minister of Finance, before the minister took this decision—which he modestly claims as his own—on Saturday morning?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, before Saturday morning, I was aware of the decision of Petro-Canada to buy Pacific Petroleums; but as I had not made any decision, I did not mention to Petro-Can or to anybody that the changes were to be made. Until Saturday morning, I was not sure whether I was to move or not move: there were arguments for and against the proposition. I kept the secret vis-à-vis Petro-Canada all along, and I never mentioned the intention of the government.

Of course, I wanted to move on it because I had received letters from the treasurer of Ontario, two letters from the minister of finance of Quebec and representations from other ministers of finance that this interpretation of the law on income debentures and retractable preferred shares was causing the federal and the provincial governments losses in revenue. I decided to put it in the budget on Saturday, and I made it public yesterday.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, certainly we will want to examine in some detail, at a later stage, what happened to the deputy minister who was placed in a very invidious position by the determination of this government to become directly involved in most of the economic activities of this country.

• (1132)

I ask the minister to clarify what I think he told the House. Is he saying that he gave a special exemption, referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham; that he put that into the budget, knowing it would confer a special and specific advantage upon Petro-Canada in relation to the Pacific Pete acquisition?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the new policy became effective as of last night and it applies to all transactions of all companies which have negotiated loans with financial institutions in order to finance their development. It applies to all companies, including Petro-Canada, and I did not want to discriminate either for or against Petro-Can.

SOCIAL SERVICES

FINANCING THEREOF—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT REJECTED AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As the Minister of National Health and Welfare signed an agreement with the provinces last spring concerning the block funding of social services and as a bill was put before the House on the matter two weeks ago, I should like to know why the Minister of Finance, a few days ago, unilaterally rejected and cancelled that agreement with the provinces, and how the federal government is going to explain that flip-flop to the ministers of the provincial government.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member surely knows that last year the transfers of federal government to the provinces grew by 13 per cent to 14 per cent. Last February we agreed with the provinces to lower that growth rate.

The government, with regard to its own expenditures, considerably reduced the growth rate to about 9 per cent. It was therefore quite proper for the transfers to the provinces to be reduced as well. We discussed plausible reductions with the provinces, we told them we would not act unilaterally. The provinces refused to let us decrease expenditures stipulated by law or agreement. Consequently, we simply said, in the case of expenditures which were planned but not yet confirmed by law; very well, we shall withdraw that bill for the time being. But we can go back to it later on when the economic situation allows it.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, it is not only a matter of budget. The minister will conclude an agreement with the provinces and that is a totally different approach to financing the problem of social services. Therefore, I would like the right hon. Prime Minister to tell us what is the situation now as regards social services? How are those changes made within the provinces? And does the federal government intend to call an early conference with the provinces to explain this turnabout? That is not a matter of budget but of changing completely the financing pattern of social services.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately for the hon. member, his indignation is based on a mistake in the facts. He is talking about the signature of an agreement with the provinces, but there has not been any agreement signed with the provinces. There were plans for an agreement, but it was never confirmed by legislation or in an official agreement. We wanted to proceed in a certain way and we are still interested to do so. Next week, I think, the minister will meet with his provincial counterparts to discuss other possibilities.

However, the hon. member knows that on August 1 we announced that we had to reduce the rate of growth in our spending. That is indeed one sector where expenses will be cut down. We would have preferred to do it in other sectors as well, for instance through the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, but the provinces turned that solution down. They said that it was a signed agreement. So we said very well. You do not want us to touch this one, we will change the ones which have not been signed yet.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT RECONSIDER CUT IN FAMILY PLANNING GRANTS PROGRAM

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister please reconsider the drastic reduction of almost 50 per cent in her department's family planning grants program, from $2.1 million in the current fiscal year to almost half, $1.1 million, effective April, 1979, as the savings are considered illusory and as prevention is certainly preferable to increased teenage pregnancies and therapeutic abortions?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question a few days ago. I said that, with great regret, all programs have to share a part of the budget reductions, and family planning programs have seen a reduction of $1 million for next year. Under actual provincial-federal agreements, provinces do receive funds to pay for half the cost of all family planning services to Canadians in need.

I have already answered that question, but I want to repeat that this is the situation. There is also some money left for commencing special projects here and there, but sooner or later large national agencies in this field will have to obtain from communities and other levels of government more financial help to decentralize their own work.

REASON BUDGET DID NOT CONTAIN SPECIAL ECONOMIC PROGRAM FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Finance? On October 30, I asked the minister to consider in his budget a special economic program for the province of Newfoundland. He replied that he always takes into account the different regions of Canada in drafting a budget, and that "special efforts"—to use his words—are always made to help provinces experiencing difficulties.

In view of the fact that last night's budget contained nothing in the way of special consideration for Newfoundland, I would like to ask the minister why he did not present a special economic package to help alleviate the serious economic conditions in that province.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in my budget yesterday, in all the different programs that I proposed I made special provision for the maritimes and the Gaspé because I felt those areas are of slow growth and should have more tax incentives in order to promote development of industries and economic activity. On top of this feature, we have increased substantially the Canada Works programs. Under those programs the Minister of Employment and Immigration has spent most of the money in the maritimes. Of the maritime provinces, on a per capita basis, it is always Newfoundland that gets the biggest share.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that the riding of the hon. member has been in opposition with the Tories and with the NDP, they have always qualified first for grants coming from the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Faour: Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel with the minister that Canada Works programs have been set up in the Atlantic region; but as the minister knows, these programs do not alleviate the fundamental problems in the region and the reasons why unemployment is so high.

I would ask the minister if he would seriously consider sitting down with the provincial government to develop a New Deal or Marshall Plan type of economic program to radically change the position of Newfoundland within the Canadian economy, so that lasting benefits might result.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I met with the minister of finance of Newfoundland when he came to Ottawa and he explained the problems of the province to me. That led me to make sure that the tax incentives for development and construction would be doubled for that part of Canada, which is facing difficult problems.

In all the measures I put forward yesterday in terms of tax incentives, I doubled them in order to help economic development in the maritimes and with the prospect in sight for the development of the fisheries industry. The fact that we have doubled the incentives for development will certainly help in the creation of many more activities in that part of Canada.

FUTURE OF PRINCE COAL MINE IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the fact that the work force at the Prince mine, operated by the Cape Breton Development Corporation, is continually being reduced, and fears are being expressed by the workers that the corporation is not proceeding with the development work as quickly as was promised, can the minister give a clear and concise report as to the future of this coal mine and its work force?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think I might reassure the hon. member as well as the workers of Prince mine in Cape Breton regarding the future of that operation. As he knows and as many hon. members in this House also know, we had some problems with roof fallings in the mine. We are now looking for a new process to go deeper and reach a new coal deposit which seems much more promising to us and will provide clearly more secure working conditions. We had some problems recently when workers did not report to work, last Tuesday I think, and the mine management decided to suspend them for one day according to its policy. But I am told that yesterday all was back to normal, all workers were back to work and drilling for new approaches and new development possibilities were going on normally. However, we hope to be able as early as next spring to accelerate current works in order to reach the new development area which will allow us to develop on a larger scale the deposit we have found there.

● (1142)

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I do not have to remind the minister that the situation is very volatile and the work force is discouraged because they do not know what is going to happen tomorrow.

In view of the fact that the statement was made by an official of Devco before a committee of this House, that when development was completed at the Prince mine, the work force would number in the vicinity of 500, can the minister reassure the workers that this commitment will be fulfilled? In addition to that, can he say how long these coal miners will be displaced from their normal place of employment? As the minister knows, these miners are forced to undergo undue hardship in having to travel to and from another mine so many miles each day, which takes up so much time that they do not have much time to sleep during the night.

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I understand the difficulties the workers are experiencing due to a reduction in the level of operation of the Prince mine as a result of a roof falling, which was causing security risks for the workers. The workers were informed that they would not be laid off, that they would be reassigned to other operations partly within the Prince mine but, as well, would work in other mining operations within Devco. I understand they travel from their normal place of work to the other place. However, that was the best solution in the circumstances.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. gentleman that we expect, if the development plan for Prince mine follows the projections we have set, the mine to return to normal operation within a reasonable time. I hope at that point the level of employment at Prince mine will reach the figure we projected, which was roughly 500 workers.

FINANCE

EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES—EFFECT OF BUDGET

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. The other day he confirmed his intention to reduce the unconditional transfer payments to the provinces by some $220 million, but he declined to be specific as to how much the programs would be cut.

In the absence of any elaboration in last night's budget on these cutbacks, I would like to know, now, if the Minister of Finance will tell the House how much of that $220 million reduction will be equalization payments. Will it be $25 million, $50 million or $100 million? Will he give us that figure?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question earlier. Unfortunately I do not have figures with me. I gave explanations to all the ministers of Finance when I met them. We are not dealing with a reduction of equalization payments. On the contrary, the amounts paid by equalization are going to increase. If necessary, I will provide the hon. member with the list. In each province, they will rise from 9 per cent up to 15 per cent. We intend to change the formula to ensure that equalization payments do not increase too quickly because the Canadian government could not cope with that. That would have happened if we had not introduced these changes. Indeed, the province of Ontario would have qualified for equalization payments and everybody understands that. The treasurer of the province of Ontario did understand that it was absolutely normal under the circumstances to see that equalization payments rise normally and that we do not come to a point where the province with the highest per capita income in Canada is eligible for equalization payments.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that lengthy tirade by the Minister of Finance, but I was really looking for a simple answer to a simple question. I fail to understand how he can be so definite about the $220 million total reduction, if he cannot give us the figures that make it up.

Could the minister tell the House, in addition to the amount that will be made up in the reduction to equalization payments, just how much of that $220 million will be absorbed by the elimination of the social services financing act, the block funding provisions of which were, indeed, agreed to at a federal-provincial conference earlier this year, contrary to what the Prime Minister may say?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, when I had discussions with the provinces I told them that it was impossible, in a reduction program of government expenditures, to proceed with the social services act and to proceed with the program next year for the Department of Urban Affairs. I informed them of that. We discussed it. I have explained to the ministers what I had to do on the question of equalization payments. Mr. Speaker, I do not have the figures with me; I will have them at the next session.

AIR CANADA

REDUCTION OF SERVICE DUE TO NECESSITY FOR PILOT TRAINING

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, I will direct my question to the acting minister. Air Canada has announced they will be cutting back on 15 routes due to the necessity for pilot training. This is going to cause serious inconvenience for the travelling public, as well as causing no end of problems for travel agents across Canada. Recently, on flights out of Winnipeg and Calgary, passengers have had to sit in aircraft from three to four hours waiting for Air Canada to find flight crews.

Could the acting minister explain why Air Canada has been so negligent in its pilot training program and why there is such a pilot shortage within Air Canada?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, Transair has given notice to a number of its pilots that they will be laid off due to the PWA-Transair merger. Would the parliamentary secretary inquire of Mr. Claude Taylor whether any of these Transair pilots could be hired, due to the pilot shortage within Air Canada?

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I will transmit the question to the minister as soon as he comes back.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CEREMONIES TO MARK ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. As next year marks the thirty-fifth anniversary of D-Day, can the minister tell the House if Canada will be participating in any special events to mark this occasion?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I previously announced the fact that plans are now being made for June, 1979. My hopes are to lead a delegation at this very important function. The ceremonies will be held at Beny-sur-Mer and other important cemeteries.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

VETERAN PREFERENCE FOR SUCCESSOR TO GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Over a week ago, my colleague, the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand, inquired whether it was the intention of the Prime Minister to continue the veterans preference with respect to the appointment of Black Rod in the other place. Has the Prime Minister had an opportunity to consider this matter in detail, and could he report to the House at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do recall the question and I said I would consider the suggestion. The point is, there is no appointment which is imminent; therefore, I do not feel I have to decide who is going to be Black Rod until the vacancy eventually occurs.

PUBLIC WORKS

CHARGING OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS FOR ACCOMMODATION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Since the minister indicated last year, in his testimony to a committee of the other place, that he favoured putting his department on a revenue dependency basis as a common service agency, charging government departments for accommodation, and since the committee of the other place recommended such a change in its recent report on the Department of Public Works' accommodation program, has the minister done anything toward implementing this provision?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the support of the hon. member on this suggestion. A committee of Treasury Board is currently examining this proposal in an endeavour to see how it can be most feasibly and sensibly put in place.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, will the minister be bringing in legislation during this session to revise the Public Works Act which, as the financial committee of the other place noted, is grossly out of date and out of line with the Department of Public Works' actual contemporary responsibility?

● (1152)

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, at this time we do not intend to make any changes in the act. However, in view of the report of the Senate committee and other matters, we may well reconsider that question later in the session.

FINANCE

DIVIDEND REFUNDS TO PRIVATE CORPORATIONS—EFFECT OF BUDGET

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those put by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the cut-off date of November 16 on dividend refunds to private corporations. I do not think the Minister of Finance realizes the unfairness which exists throughout Canada with this ruling.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, there are members in the business community—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member understands, I am sure, that we are about to embark on six days of debate on the budget. If there are questions to be put on the budget, I think they should be questions, and questions only.

Mr. Huntington: The question I want to ask the minister is this: does he think it fair that the cut-off date should apply to people who have been waiting for rulings from his department for over eight months on this very ambiguous point which arises within the present legislation? Companies have paid $150, asking for a ruling, and now they are wiped out by the stroke of a pen on November 16, leaving a class of businesses in a preferred position—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is precisely what I wanted to avoid. I said that all corporations which had entered into agreements with banks and which are now waiting for a ruling from Revenue Canada do not need to worry. If they are found eligible, the ruling will be respected. All parties who have already made commitments with financial institutions will know in the next few weeks the ruling of Revenue Canada, but as of today the department will not accept any commitment.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, there are companies which had this class of share ready to put into effect for many months prior to November 16 and which were awaiting a ruling from the minister's department. Will the minister give serious consideration to allowing firms which have been waiting for a ruling to implement this qualification?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not make myself clear. I said that anyone who has a legal obligation or has a signed, binding contract with a financial institution, even if a ruling has not been received so far, will be able to receive a ruling and qualify.

Mr. Huntington: You did not hear the question.

Mr. Chrétien: I think I heard the question, and I have given a good answer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DANYLO SHUMUK, POLITICAL PRISONER IN U.S.S.R.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs: it concerns the case of Danylo Shumuk who, as the minister knows, is a political prisoner in the Soviet Union, suffering from the effects of deprivation and malnutrition.

We recently learned that Mr. Shumuk has probably contracted terminal cancer of the stomach, and we recall that Mr. Shumuk has been imprisoned in Poland and the U.S.S.R. for at least 34 of his 64 years for alleged political crimes, acts which would not likely be regarded as offensive in a free, democratic—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, this matter has been raised many times in this House in recent months, and recognizing that a plea was finally entered—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, this is my preamble to the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL REVENUE

INCOME TAX—CASES RESPECTING JOHN C. DOYLE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker, in her capacity as Acting Minister of National Revenue. I am trying to help the government gain revenue and reduce its debt.

Can the minister tell us the results of the settlement of the seven income tax cases against one John C. Doyle and a company known as Javelin Foundries? There are minutes of settlement filed in the Federal Court on November 6 for $6 million in cash and interest being claimed in those cases going back to 1966, and in the two cases in 1950 and 1954 where $5 million is owed. Has the government now collected these moneys? What are the terms of the settlement which has been filed?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the question of the collection of Mr. Doyle's account has been dealt with extensively in the past days and weeks——and I am pleased to tell the hon. member that an agreement has been concluded with Mr. Doyle for repayment of funds he owed to the Department of National Revenue and there remains only the matter of funds owed by the company itself.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Since the government has been working on this matter for 25 years, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary this question. I have a taxpayer who is being pursued for $250, and he says, "I have no money, own no oil; why not treat me like John C. Doyle?"

Would the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether the government is going to collect all of the $11 million owing, or whether the government has agreed to collect less than the $11 million owing since 1950-1956?

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, this government has always believed that whatever the wealth of taxpayers, be it one company or another, they should refund the money owed to the government. Thus the government has instituted proceedings for the refund of the money owing in that case and it intends to see it through.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

BUDGET STATEMENT ON NATIONAL GAS RESERVES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, arising out of the statement he made in the budget speech in which he said indications are that natural gas reserves are more than enough to meet our foreseeable domestic needs.

In view of the fact that his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has said that there should be no export of gas to the United States until we have supplied gas to Quebec and the maritime provinces, and used gas to replace oil in central Canada, are we to take the hon. gentleman's statement as meaning that he is rejecting the position taken by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and supporting the position taken by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the oil industry, that our surplus gas be shipped to the United States?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): If the hon. member would look carefully at my statement, he would find I said indications are there, but we are waiting for the National Energy Board to estimate the quantity of the reserves.

Indications are that the reserves are greater than was estimated, but we are waiting for the proof to be established. I said that the energy could be used in two ways, either to replace oil in the eastern market or for export. But this decision will not be made until we have received a report from the National Energy Board and decided the extent and nature of the need in the east. I think we should serve Canadians first, but having that gas in the economy will help displace imported oil which is causing a lot of problems for our balance of payments position.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Will the minister make a distinction between our immediate needs and our foreseeable needs? I ask the minister whether, in the category of "foreseeable needs", he places the need for gas in Quebec and the maritimes, and gas to replace oil consumption in central Canada as being primary, as coming first, before any gas will be exported to the United States?

Mr. Chrétien: It is too early to reach any decision about this matter. We are waiting to hear from the National Energy Board. As a member from Quebec, I wish we could use more gas in Quebec, but it is not an easy proposition because there is the cost of building a pipeline and the economic viability of such an operation. Of course, we shall use our resources for Canadians first, but if there is a surplus we shall try to sell it.

ENERGY

BUDGET PROVISIONS RESPECTING PRICE

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In view of the special provisions in the budget last night for Atlantic Canada, can the minister confirm reports in yesterday's press that all provincial representatives, especially those from Atlantic Canada, at the federal-provincial energy conference this week were opposed to his efforts to moderate the rise in prices of petroleum products scheduled for the beginning of next year and, if so, does the minister intend to follow this incredible and irresponsible advice?

● (1202)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we are actively pursuing an understanding to try to make a very important agreement work. That agreement provided for increases in oil prices at intervals, measured steps, but with one very important condition: that was that the price would not be raised in Canada if it were to exceed the United States price. That is in the agreement: it was put there to protect Canadians.

I have been seeking the support of consuming provinces and others in this venture, and I regret that they seem to be less interested in protecting Canadian workers than is the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting reports from standing or special committees.

POINTS OF ORDER

PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE OF PACIFIC PETROLEUMS SHARES—CONTINGENT LIABILITY OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The day before yesterday the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) addressed a question to me which I wanted to examine. I said I would respond the next day, which was yesterday. I did not give that answer yesterday because the hon. member was not in the House. He is not in the House today, but I am prepared to give the answer. I would like to get it on the record, if hon. members would permit me.

Mr. Speaker: That, of course, could only be done with the consent of the House. It may be that it would be of benefit to have the answer put on the record so that the hon. member could have an opportunity to look it over before perhaps putting supplementary questions. I have no way of knowing. In any case, it could not be done without unanimous consent. Does the minister have unanimous consent to put his answer on the record now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it was the question of supplementaries which was concerning me, and Your Honour dealt with that. I think the minister should be allowed to answer.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the question was with regard to the capital budget of Petro-Canada. First I would like to note that the capital budget to which the hon. member referred was the first supplementary capital budget of Petro-Canada for the year 1978, and it was indeed intended to allow Petro-Canada to make an offer for Husky Oil Limited, which was a transaction under consideration at that time. In fact, it did call for common share issues of $205 million and preferred shares of $64.5 million for a total of $269.5 million. The hon. member inadvertently and incorrectly remarked that it called for preferred shares alone of $270 million. He said that was the figure apart and aside from the common shares amounting to $205 million.

Second, while the hon. member was correct in noting that subscription by the Crown for common or preferred shares is a statutory charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund and, as such, should appear in government estimates of spending programs, he should also note that it had indeed been properly recorded through main estimates for 1977-78 and 1978-79. Two hundred million dollars toward subscription of common and preferred shares is shown in each of the main estimates for 1977-78 and 1978-79.

The requirements for share subscription amounting to $269.5 million in the first supplementary capital budget approved in June, 1978, are in fact within the spending plans duly recorded in the main estimates. It is done by combining draw-downs during the last quarter of the 1977-78 fiscal year with draw-downs during the first three quarters of the 1978-79 fiscal year.

The last thing about which I think the hon. member should be aware is that the recent major acquisition approved for Petro-Canada will not entail any increase in the government's planned subscription of shares as displayed in the main estimates.

MR. T. C. DOUGLAS—AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA ON PRICE OF OIL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) made reference to an agreement with the province of Alberta regarding the price of oil. Since so much depends on the wording of that agreement and the interpretation placed upon that wording, I wonder if the minister would be prepared, if he has not already done so, to table that agreement so that we may be in possession of the facts and so that the matter may be cleared up. The point of difference is whether a provision in that agreement, to the effect that if the one dollar every six months increase in price goes beyond the American price, means that the government is not obliged to agree to an increase in price. Everything depends on the wording. We cannot decide until we see the agreement itself. I wonder if the minister, with the consent of the House, would be prepared to table that agreement?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the agreement has been tabled in the House previously. It certainly is a public document, and I would be very pleased to table it later this afternoon, if it has not already been tabled.

PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE OF PACIFIC PETROLEUMS SHARES—CONTINGENT LIABILITY OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to put to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) arising out of the statement he made. He referred to what I think he called the first supplementary capital budget for Petro-Canada for 1978. We know that there was the original December capital budget. We know there was the one which was approved by order in council in June of this year. Would the minister tell us whether there has been a second one since the June one? I refer to the June one as the one which authorized, in total, $819 million either in borrowings or in equity issues for Petro-Canada.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, that transaction for which that order in council was authorized in June did not take place. If it has not already been done—and I am not quite sure—there will be a revocation of that order in council and an adjustment of the capital budget, but there will be a further adjustment to reflect the more recent decision with regard to the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums, and I think those details will be available before too long.

Mr. Stevens: Would the President of the Treasury Board tell us what the new order in council will show? Will there be an amount greater than the $800 million which will be revoked, or will the amount be a lesser one? Can he tell us that at this time? Obviously it will be a matter of public record shortly. What specifically has been okayed by the cabinet with respect to Petro-Canada's total takeover of Pacific Petroleums?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am not able to give the hon. member the figures off the top of my head. As I indicated, he can examine Hansard tomorrow. The answer I gave to the hon. member for Calgary Centre was relatively complex. It was about the budgetary process related to the June shares, but I did say at the end that there is no increase in the acquisition of capital shares of Petro-Canada related to the recent transaction, so the order in council is related to the borrowing process in which Petro-Canada will indulge.

Mr. Stevens: How much?

Mr. Andras: I will get the actual figures for the hon. member. I think they will be revealed in the order in council in any event, before too long.

MR. DANSON—S.O. 43 MOTION RESPECTING SALE OF REMEMBRANCE DAY POPPIES IN FEDERAL BUILDING

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue the point of order I raised during routine proceedings. My point relates to the use of Standing Order 43. I am not a barrack-room lawyer, I am not even a lawyer. I do not usually nit-pick about these things, but I think this is becoming more important, particularly since we have television in the House and proceedings under this standing order have made this House a stage rather than a debating arena.

With impeccable parliamentary logic, Standing Order 43 follows Standing Orders 41 and 42. Standing Order 42(1) deals with 48 hours' notice. Standing Order 42(2) deals with other matters. Standing Order 42(3) deals with proceedings when Mr. Speaker is unable to act. I have never seen Your Honour unable to act. However, Standing Order 43 is provided to deal with matters of urgent and pressing necessity, and reads as follows:

> A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

The standing order specifically says "urgent and pressing". It does not say "important" or "frivolous", as many motions are. Even to the uninitiated I think this would appear to be a misuse of the rules and the spirit of the House. As a veteran, and as a member of the Royal Canadian Legion, I could not be more concerned about poppy sales and about whether they are handled appropriately. But the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) raises this as a matter of pressing national urgency and wants to deal with it in the House, when there are many others ways of making such a representation.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to interrupt the minister; I know he has a point to make in respect of this particular application. He had an opportunity to raise it, and he did indicate its nature, and now he has been able to add to that. However, I would like to ask his indulgence in this matter because, as he knows, only a few days ago we had an extensive and exhaustive argument on the provisions of Standing Order 43 which has now left me with the duty to review all the obligations of this standing order, including the question to which he has now addressed himself, namely, the question of urgency and how that may or may not be determined by the Chair.

There is also the matter of points of order to be raised in respect of Standing Order 43—whether or not they can be raised, and, if so, how they should be dealt with by the Chair, whether they can be taken into account during the period before questions or whether they can be deferred until this time, just after the question period.

Therefore, all these questions to which the minister has addressed himself are very much on my mind as a result of that discussion. I only ask for his indulgence to leave it with me now because I would be reluctant at this stage to reopen the whole discussion, which was very extensive. I am called upon now to review all the provisions of this rule, which we are doing at present. I expect to be able to make a statement to the House about it on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week. The minister's point is well noted and it will be part of the considerations. I wonder if I could have his indulgence to leave it at that.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House because I was with the defence minister of Norway when this matter was first raised. Perhaps I could add to it by saying that there were examples of it each day of this week, but obviously those are foremost in your mind, sir.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is necessary for me to say a word about that point of order because the minister implied that my motion was frivolous. I simply want to suggest to him that it had some urgency on two points. First, the lady involved, Mrs. Dall, who went—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Whiteway: —to the Canada Manpower Centre in her uniform was embarrassed and hurt. The Prince Edward branch of the Legion felt slighted and are rightfully angered, and the community as a whole is upset. Second, I spent some 30 minutes with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) discussing this very problem, and it was with his agreement that I decided the way it should be raised by me was under Standing Order 43 in the House. So I would invite the minister, instead of raising spurious points of order, to get behind the efforts and concerns of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to help right the wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 16, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, following the budget speech, I made a few introductory remarks concerning the budget that is now before us, but perhaps in my remarks today I should start out by saying how concerned we are, not only for the general economy in Canada but for those who will literally be walking the streets of Canada looking for jobs in the coming winter months, because if you assess this budget you would have to say that it is certainly not a stimulative budget. If anything, on balance it is slightly negative so far as the economy is concerned.

It is disturbing to think of the unemployed whom we are going to see in the coming winter months. We must also point our finger at the reason why the unemployment situation will get worse. Essentially, this government, through its bungling and mishandling of our economy, has put us in a deficit position that is the worst deficit position of any industrialized nation with which we have to compete in international trade.

I know that currently the government likes to rationalize our deficit position. It likes to say that if you relate it to the GNP, it is not that bad. I suggest to you that ministers are carrying that type of rationalization to the point that it is clear they do not yet understand the serious situation of the economy and, in particular, the serious consequences of their federal fiscal policy. I say this because it is not a matter of having deficits and of having the resulting high interest rates structure. Unfortunately, it means that with those deficits we will have ever rising and constant inflation in this country—there is no avoiding it.

What is most disturbing, I think, is to hear that tone which is now being set by the emperor himself, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that somehow or other it is not the size of the deficit we must worry about but rather the rate of increase. Let us meet him on his own ground in this argument. I hope he has taken a look at how the rate of increase of our deficit compares with the rate in such countries as the United States, Great Britain and West Germany. Clearly, it is now demonstrated that the borrowing requirement of Ottawa today is between 4 per cent and 5 per cent of our GNP, which means that, in turn, we have a greater borrowing requirement than that in the U.K., certainly greater than that in the U.S. and in the Republic of West Germany. Those are the facts. We in Canada have put ourselves in a position, under the misguidance of this government, where the total impact of our borrowing in relation to our GNP is now higher than in those three countries to which I have referred, and I could give a long list of other countries of which we are well ahead.

What is the resulting impact? What is the impact, for example, of Canada now having a financial requirement which, relative to the United States, is triple the impact there? Let me put that in another way. The United States have been able to get their current deficit at the federal level down to approximately $38 billion. We in Canada, as we have found out last night, have been introduced to a deficit of merely $13 billion! If you take into account the relative GNP in our two countries, you will find that the Americans now have a deficit that is only a third of the deficit we have to live with in this country. What is the impact of that? The impact hits the poor of this country hardest because, with high interest rates and high inflation, it is the poor person who finds it most difficult to adjust.

Sometimes when I look at the record of this government I can only say that this government must in truth love the poor, or why would it have created so many in Canada?

Mr. Stevens: For example, if one refers to the Statistics Canada figures, which only came out a short time ago, it is very startling to find on a family income basis that families in Canada in 1977 actually lost income in real terms compared to 1976. In fact based on those figures, the number of Canadians who slipped below the poverty line was 300,000. They are now treated and considered to be poor. That is the increase—300,000 Canadians in one year.

For those who are curious as to what Statistics Canada is saying, I should like to put the figures on the record. In 1976 it shows that families in Canada, including unattached individuals considered as a family unit, had salaries of $16,095. In 1977 their income was $16,602. That was barely a $500 increase on a $16,000 base. If one works that out, in constant terms it is an increase of a little under 3 per cent. Once inflation is taken out, in truth the average Canadian family actually has fallen behind in 1977 compared to 1976. The figures we are now looking at, and the deficit we are living with, destines hundreds of thousands of Canadians to join the poor in this country. This is something which no government or no member of the House should continue to tolerate.

One of the most disturbing aspects of the government's attitude on deficit is that it will not really show us what the future holds. Not only in our budgetary response last night, but in several others we asked and virtually pleaded with the government to give us some idea how it views revenues, expenditures and deficits down the road. What will be the figures for 1982, 1983, and 1984? Other countries are making five-year projections. The current budget in the United States sets out a five-year program, as does the budget in the United Kingdom. The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development asked its member countries for projections, but our government constantly refuses to do so.

Mr. Railton: That does not necessarily indicate that they are doing any better.

Mr. Stevens: I hear what my hon. friend is saying. Presumably he is referring to the United Kingdom and the United States. I would ask him to take a look at their record, and if he is an honest man he will move quickly off the benches supporting the Trudeau Liberal government. The fact is that the United States, the United Kingdom and West Germany currently are doing very, very much better.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) questioning my honesty?

An hon. Member: That is what he is doing.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is still my friend. I must assure him that he is just a little too touchy. I was only setting out one guideline.

Mr. Railton: Thank you very much. Very good.

Mr. Stevens: I should like to show hon. members the impact of Canada continuing to live with the deficits it has. Presuming government expenditures continue at the roughly 9 per cent per year increase, and presuming that revenues follow roughly the line anticipated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), which was 4 per cent to possibly 4.5 per cent, here are the deficits we will walk into: As we know, last night it was disclosed that the deficit on a budgetary basis for fiscal 1979 was not the $10.9 billion deficit which we were told only last April 10, but it was $12.1 billion. According to the figure revealed last night, it was up $1.2 billion compared to the April 10 figure.

Also last night we were informed of the budget deficit which possibly is low, again because the figures of the minister are not credible. Time and again we find that his figures are proven wrong negatively all the way down the line. But last night he admitted, as he looks into fiscal 1980, that he sees a budgetary deficit of $12.95 billion, or almost $13 billion. Let us look a little further. If we project that figure, we find that by 1983 the deficit the government will be living with is a minimum of $16 billion, and that the aggregate deficit between 1979 and 1983 inclusive will be nearly $70 billion.

Mr. Martin: This is ridiculous.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, those are the facts. I agree with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) when he said that it is ridiculous. I agree it is ridiculous the government would allow our economy to drift to that point. If one reads what was revealed by the Minister of Finance last night, and adds the fact that the Prime Minister said in the House and in a press conference that he anticipates the deficit may be even higher, the truth of the matter is if that is spread over a five-year prospectus, that we will be dealing with $70 billion worth of deficits.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, there was a clear misinterpretation made of my interjection. I said that it was ridiculous for the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) to claim that the figure which he is pulling out of the air as forecast proposals are factual.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the Chair were to allow interventions from hon. members who say things from their seats, we would be on points of order all day. The hon. member can make a correction when he speaks in due time.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, As usual, you are more than fair. I suggest, in answer to the parliamentary secretary if he has figures which show otherwise, let him produce them.

Mr. Clark: That is right.

Mr. Stevens: That is what we are asking the government to do. It should stop showing little ad hoc solutions which it comes up with concerning the state of the nation. Let us see its long term prospectus as to where it sees our deficits, expenditures, and revenues down the road.

I have some other matters which must be dealt with. Not only are we living with the deficit I have referred to, but the government has now embarked on that happy little illusion of somehow rewording or cooking the books. That is what is going on. The government has hit upon a few cute accounting tricks. On the one hand it is able to show expenditures coming down which it claims makes the record look better on expenditure increases. But it does not make clear as the expenditures fall that revenue is diverted at the other end. The net result is that there is a widening deficit, yet the government claims there has been an expenditure reduction, or at least a curtailment in increases.

This is perhaps one of the most serious things the government has started to do. In short, it is doctoring the books in order to make the facts look a little more palatable, without realizing that it will doctor us into a worse economic position than we are in at the present time.

Let me give you an example of this. If you review the figures we have before us you will find that the provincial sales tax revenues loss was not shown as an expenditure in the current year. It was actually shown as a diversion of revenue. What the government should do is take that item, which is up in the hundreds of millions of dollars, and add it to its expenditures. This government very cleverly came up with the notion of saying this is not really an expenditure but is simply a diversion of revenue.

Let us take a look at the family allowance approach. As you know, we on this side are not objecting to the idea of giving a $200 extra grant per child to Canadian families, but we must be aware of the consequence of the family allowance realignment on the books, as we saw last night. In a nutshell, what the government has done is say it will take roughly $8 off the amount of family allowance going to Canadians, which reduces the $28 amount that would be payable next year to $20—that is, de-indexing it. That makes a savings as far as government expenditures are concerned of $690 million. That comes off the expense side. When we look down to the revenue side we find the government has taken $810 million in revenue and diverted it off to give the $200 income tax credit to Canadian families on a per child basis. The net effect of this is to make expenditures look lower, when in fact the deficit is certainly as great as ever, if not a little greater as a result of this government's approach. All I am saying is, let us really look through the figures.

The other thing I would like to comment on, as far as this doctoring of the books is concerned, is what the government is doing with our Crown corporations, and this is something we on this side of the House find disturbing. It is one thing to have a Crown corporation and have the government of the day showing in a proper way whatever the loss is if the Crown corporation is losing money. It is quite another thing for the government to disguise that loss or, in the case of the borrowing activities of a Crown corporation, not to reflect that in the books at all. That is what is happening here.

If we take a hard look at the financial requirements revealed last night by the minister, we will find it is not just $12.1 billion which he says we will need in the current year, or $10,750 million in the next year. What will be required are those amounts plus the total amounts to feed the almost insatiable appetites of Crown corporations such as the Export Development Corporation and Petro-Can.

Perhaps here is the great distinction between where a Clark government would be taking this country today compared to where the Trudeau government is taking it, that is, in respect of this matter of Crown corporations.

Let us take Petro-Can, for example. The government has an investment in Petro-Can. It is hard to get the exact figures, as we know from listening to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) today. We do know it has at least a $550 million investment in equity in that Crown corporation. Our position is that there are better purposes for the use of that money than leaving it in Petro-Can. We would like to free up that capital and, if nothing else, reduce the amount we have to borrow. What we are suggesting is that if you liquidate by privatizing Petro-Can, that will give the treasury about $550 million, providing we could at least get the money back, and that is a serious question. The way this government has so mishandled its investment in Petro-Can perhaps it would be difficult to get $550 million back. We must bear in mind that the corporation last year only earned $9 million on that $550 million in government investment.

We in this party say the government should free up that money. In fact we are saying that if the corporation is only earning $9 million on a $550 million investment it is absolutely foolhardy to be borrowing $550 million at a minimum of 9.5 per cent, which is the offset of the earnings on that investment. In short, the government no longer can afford the luxury of owning things such as Petro-Can. It is too far in hock to afford that type of thing. Even its cousin in the United Kingdom, the labour government, got out of British Petroleum to the extent of 21 per cent. The International Monetary Fund said to that government in its dark days of 1976, "Start liquidating. If you are in trouble debtwise, start to liquidate some of these luxuries you have, such as the investment in British Petroleums." By coincidence, when it liquidated that 21 per cent it picked up $4.1 billion.

I referred to that as coincidence because this is the bottom line with Petro-Can. Not only does the government insist on preserving Petro-Can and borrowing money to do it, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) only today confirmed that the government has absolutely no intention of backing down, it now intends to take us $1.4 billion further into debt so the empire builders in Petro-Can can in turn acquire Pacific Petroleums.

Let it be clearly understood that the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums will not contribute to the production of one extra barrel of oil in this country, and it will not mean the employment of one more person.

Let me point out what this will actually mean. The servicing of the debt the government has to incur in foreign funds to pay for the takeover of Pacific Petroleums will cost the exchange fund $50 million a year over and above the dividends which, up until now, have flowed from Pacific Petroleums to Phillips and other American shareholders in that company. The specific figures are in the records. If the minister has not already noted them, they are as simple as this. Pacific Petroleums has been paying roughly $20 million a year in total dividends. Once this deal goes through, the total drain to the American side will be about $70 million, which means the extra flow of Canadian funds to service that debt will be $50 million.

The interesting thing as revealed in the question period today is that, in order to structure this deal, Petro-Can needed to take advantage of what has often been called a loophole in the existing income tax position in Canada. Let me describe that loophole. Under the provisions of the Income Tax Act, prior to today it was possible for one company to give what was called income debentures or preferred types of securities to another company with relatively low interest, because for income tax purposes this was treated as an after-tax payment. In short, one could borrow money at 7 per cent because the recipient did not have to pay any tax on that 7 per cent. If you had to pay tax you would probably have to pay 11 per cent or 12 per cent.

In taking over Pacific Petroleums the government is taking over a company which had after-tax earnings of about $85 million and, as I say, the vast bulk of that money stayed in the country. It was re-invested and the company's pay-out in dividends was about $20 million. Because Petro-Can had to finance the deal, they structured an income debenture in foreign funds which will be serviced by Pacific Petroleums by paying the dividends to the subsidiary of Petro-Can, which in turn is the amount of money which is needed to service the income debenture. This way nobody pays any taxes. It is a beautiful thing for the people in the United States who put up the money to allow our Crown corporation to buy Pacific Petroleums.

The net cost on a yearly basis will be about $50 million a year. The interesting thing is that the deputy minister of finance sits on the board of Petro-Can and that the blocking of the income debenture is effective today, November 17. Clearly that date was chosen to ensure that any written agreements prior to that date could not be challenged.

The most tragic thing is when we listen to our friends to the left champion their brain child, Petro-Can, saying in effect, "Why don't you take over virtually everything in the resource industry?" I cannot understand how a party which likes to pretend that they have the average Canadian at heart can miss the point so badly. Just think, Mr. Speaker, what that $1.4 billion would do for Canadians if it were channelled in another way, instead of giving a most fortuitous price to American shareholders and other foreign shareholders in Pacific Petroleums.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Just by coincidence the budget filed and approved for CMHC was $1,356 million, almost the same amount which will go into Pacific Petroleums' takeover. CMHC, however, has different intentions for their budget. Under section 43 of the public housing legislation incorporating them, they intend to build 5,750 dwelling units, under section 40 they intend to build 1,910 public housing units. They intend to assist with rental supplementals in the amount of 11,200 units, and under another section they are empowered to assist in the building of 1,300 other rental units. Under what is sometimes referred to as non-profit enterprise, CMHC will be able to accommodate 3,700 dwelling units. In total out of their allocation, which is very close to the allocation for Pacific Petroleums, they will be able to build 23,860 dwelling units. They are not only able to provide that kind of assistance, but they will be able to help municipalities with their water and sewage programs, and in regional planning in urban areas.

The point I want to make is that if the $1.4 billion, which presumably has been approved by the cabinet, had been routed to CMHC or some other agency to help Canadian home owners, it would have allowed for the building of 23,860 additional dwelling units, with nearly $100 million left over to help with sewage and water treatment assistance and planning assistance to our municipalities. That is the perspective in which we must put this. There are all kinds of things that the government of the day might want to do, but there is the question of priorities. Our word to this government and to their allies on our left is simply that if they want to borrow $1.4 billion in the name of Canada, it should be routed to other things than the takeover of an oil company which has been profitable, which is certainly bringing oil into production in this country and is giving employment to Canadians. This takeover will not add one job or one extra barrel of oil or one cubic foot of gas to oil production in Canada.

There are other examples I could give. Earlier I referred to the Export Development Corporation, another concern which is borrowing money extensively. These borrowings, however, are not reflected in the accounts that are now before us. The capital budget for the Export Development Corporation in the current year is $2.4 billion. This corporation has been using its money to finance pulp and paper mills in Poland which will eventually compete with Canada, financing like types of development in Cuba, and even financing steel mills in the United States. I am sure hon. members can imagine what that amount of money would do to help fishermen refurbish their fleets on the Pacific and Atlantic seacoasts, to assist in the infrastructures which could be put in place to help improve grain handling facilities in the west or to help in urban areas—for example the rapid transit system which is needed in Vancouver, and the commuter situation in Toronto.

I could go on describing the mismanagement and mishandling of this government, but I think I should put on the record once again the things that we as a party would like to see done. The focal point of a Clark government will be to restore confidence in the Canadian economy for all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: To do that we must first accept the fact that after ten years of mismanagement it will take at least five years to get the economy turned around to where it is at a more buoyant level. That is why we believe that it is necessary, not only to show a little further into the dark valley, but to show what is on the other side. Hopefully, it will be a side that is a little brighter with more sunlight. In short, we, through a budgetary response on the night of our first budget, will describe how we plan to have control on the expenditure side and how we will suitably stimulate the economy to upbring revenue. First we will narrow this deficit, and secondly we will give meaningful tax cuts to Canadians who need them.

• (1252)

When I say that, one of the things a colleague will be touching on in his remarks will be the hard fact, in spite of what the Minister of Finance tried to say last night, that the average Canadian is today over-taxed by 20 per cent compared to his counterpart in the United States. That cannot be allowed to continue. The Carter commission made it clear it was a growing problem when it reported that long ago. That is one of the reasons why we say this government has been negligent in not bringing in a mortgage interest deductibility scheme and a municipal tax deductibility scheme for Canadian homeowners. Certainly that is an approach this party will follow.

With the savings we are able to indicate of a meaningful nature as far as government spending is concerned, by saving or at least not hiring an additional 20,000 civil servants per year as is proposed by the President of the Treasury Board, we can pick up a saving of about $1.7 billion per year. By cutting out some of those contracts the government loves to throw around, particularly to political friends, we could save a quarter of a billion dollars—

Mr. Andras: Absolutely not.

Mr. Stevens: The President of the Treasury Board says absolutely not. If he is sitting in opposition when we form the government, I hope he will stand up and say, "You did it, and I did not think you could do it."

An hon. Member: He will not be here.

Mr. Andras: —including manpower agreements and everything else? You are still playing that game.

Mr. Stevens: Obviously the President of the Treasury Board does not like to hear the truth too directly.

Mr. Andras: I rarely do from that side.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I could go on outlining where we can see obvious savings that this government could make. There is at least $50 million that could be chopped off the advertising budgets it has been signing on a regular basis. We feel not only is there room to give mortgage deductibility and the municipal tax deductibility approach that I have indicated, but there is room for further tax cuts.

We can come up with a budget, given the opportunity, that would have the net effect of lessening the deficit in this country over a period of years, bringing it down to a much more manageable level and putting Canadians in a more attractive tax situation.

Before I end up my comments, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the Minister of Finance very quickly. If there is another budget before the election, it is most likely that he will not be minister of finance at that time.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): How do you know?

Miss MacDonald: He wants the assurance.

Mr. Stevens: I know the hon. member is as far back in the Liberal ranks as you can find—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Better back here than up front over there.

Mr. Stevens: From the curtains I heard a Liberal ask how I know. Obviously he is hoping I am right.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Even you could afford to be wrong once.

Mr. Stevens: Before this minister goes from our midst, let us look at his record. He has many firsts to his discredit. Up until last night he was the first minister of finance to crack the $10 billion deficit level in Canada. As of last night he excelled that record. He is the first minister of finance to crack the $1 billion per month deficit level in this country.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, dear!

Mr. Stevens: He is the minister who has let the dollar go down to 84 cents, the lowest level since the dirty thirties. In his budget speech last night he had the nerve to take credit for that. It is the classic example of the more this government gets into trouble, the more it turns around and tell us it smells like perfume.

Let us look at something else in which this minister has excelled. Under his guidance the banks' prime interest rates stand at an historical high in Canada. As far as federal borrowings are concerned, they are costing the treasury almost 20 cents of every revenue dollar they take in. Put another way, the next time you pay your income tax, take off 20 per cent—that is exactly what you have had to pay to carry the debt that this government has incurred on your behalf. As we know, the average worker in Canada now has to work two days simply to pay government taxes.

There are other things this minister has to his discredit. He has given us more budgets and economic statements in a shorter period than any other minister back to confederation.

Mr. Railton: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I see my friend has come alive again. Obviously the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) loves ad hockery ad nauseam.

This minister also has to his credit the fact that he has evolved a new economic approach of shifting expenditures to revenue losses, which allows him to leave the illusion of falling federal spending levels while our deficit soars.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, never before has any minister switched Canada Savings Bond interest rates once, let alone twice, during their period of initial sale as this minister has done. Now he finds he may not be able to close the issue unless he can get a special act of parliament passed to give him authority to do so.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, a colleague to my left is wanting to speak shortly, there are other colleagues on this side of the House who would like to speak, and perhaps even the odd government member will dare stand up and support this budget—I do not know.

An hon. member: They are not that odd.

Mr. Stevens: —But in that connection, if government members are thinking of their political future, I think the wisest thing for them to do is to duck, just sit in their seats and not say too much. If the public gets a chance to deal with them in the voting booths, I do not think there is very much doubt about what will happen to many of these fellows who have been babbling so actively while I have been speaking, considering what happened in our recent by-elections.

If I may summarize, the greatest disappointment in the budget last night was the fact that the figures are so terrible. The fact is they are worse than the minister has been representing. We are now into a $12 billion, almost $13 billion deficit range as far as next year is concerned. Not only are the figures terrible, but there is no concrete indication on the part of the government as to how they see these deficits narrowing. It is all just hope. It is just "trust us. Somehow or other we will lead the country out of the chaos that we have led you into."

Mr. Martin: Doom and gloom.

Mr. Stevens: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance says "doom and gloom." He should know, because they have certainly led us into the doom and gloom that he likes to speak of.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Is that the hon. member for Scarborough West?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Paproski: Goodbye, Scarborough West.

Mr. Stevens: The Canadian public now know that this government has got them into trouble. You do not have to tell the average voter and citizen in this country that he is not doing as well as he should be. What he is now looking for is some hope. He is looking for some type of alternative that will hopefully ensure that there are better years to come.

An hon. Member: Not Tory years.

Mr. Stevens: A Clark government will give him that new hope.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is doom and gloom.

Mr. Abbott: You cannot be that discouraged.

Mr. Stevens: When I look over at some of these fellows—and I better not mention their names—I find it interesting to note the difference between what they tell you privately and what, with a stiff upper lip, they show publicly. They know they are on borrowed time over there. They know they have a few months left and that when those months have run out they will be sitting in the opposition if they are lucky enough to be re-elected, and that we will be the government. When we form the government under my leader—

Mr. Railton: Let us get back to the budget.

Mr. Stevens: My hon. friend from Welland says he wants to get back to the budget.

Mr. Railton: I have heard enough.

Mr. Stevens: I say to my hon. friend, I would like to get back to the type of budget we will be introducing when we form the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The focal point of the budget will be the restoration of confidence in the Canada that can be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Details of where we will cap the expenditure extravagances that this government has led us into will be brought in. Those cappings are going to ensure that there will be more money to share with the Canadian taxpayer as well as to lower the deficit to which I have referred.

An hon. Member: Let us hear your budget.

Mr. Stevens: The new budget which the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) is referring to is one that he, being a doctor, will enjoy much more than the budget that was introduced last night. I do not know whether he is one of those doctors who have incorporated their own personal corporation on the side and who were cut off at the pass last night, but certainly his colleagues in the professional field I believe will not be too happy with the government that he is wont to support after last night's budget. As I say, the focal point of our budget will be to lessen the deficit, to give tax breaks such as I have described to the Canadian public, but above all, and I think the comments made by the President of the Treasury Board indicate the need for this, we feel there has got to be expenditure control brought back to parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I say the comments made by the President of the Treasury Board indicate this. When I was talking about cutting a quarter of a billion dollars in the contracts that they have been putting out, cutting say $50 million from some of the lavish advertising contracts, I was a little startled to hear the President of the Treasury Board say, "No way." What better evidence do we need that there should be a change of government? Essentially when the President of the Treasury Board says that there is no further way to cut expenditures, you know it is time to replace the president of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: This government has become defensive of its previous mistakes, it is a problem it is living with. Literally ministers are surrounded with advisors who perhaps advised them to get into the problems that have now developed. Naturally those advisors are telling them not to change from the original advice given, because they might look bad if they had to admit they made a mistake. That in truth is part of the problem. There would be breaths of fresh air come into the bureaucracy if a Clark government was able to take over. There would be new attitudes. There would be new basic concepts of saying, "Don't tell me why we can't do something, tell me how to do it."

● (1412)

I think it is important, as I said when we were debating Bill C-7, that we consider the possibility of establishing an expenditures committee responsible directly to parliament which would function much as the public accounts committee does, the difference being that the expenditures committee would look first-hand at every expenditure which was proposed, just as the public accounts committee deals with them after the event when the money has been spent. In short, in great contrast to the budget last night—perhaps William Shakespeare put the best name on it when he called his play "Much Ado About Nothing,"—we would bring in a budget, given the opportunity, which would restore for Canadians the vision they see for Canada, restore their hopes in our future, which can be a truly great future and, above all, again ensure that the enterprise system can get on with creating wealth in this country, instead of a government which concentrates on trying to redistribute wealth at the expense of creating wealth itself.

In short, it is the difference between a worn out group of people who call themselves a government, and a fresh, alternative group who are only too willing to do a few positive things to get our country and our confidence restored. With that, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker):

That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

this House rejects a budget which increases the deficit without providing a genuine economic stimulus such as mortgage interest and municipal tax deductibility and which continues a policy of stagnation instead of beginning the structural reforms needed for the 1980s.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The reason I want to look at this proposed motion is because—

Mr. Abbott: It is so outrageous!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —because to my mind there might be a relation between the object of this amendment and a decision previously made this session on this question of mortgage interest. I do not have before me the other confidence motion put forward by the opposition toward the conclusion of the debate on the Speech from the Throne so I am not in a position to judge. I hope the House will give me a few minutes before putting the amendment. In the meantime I ask the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) to begin his remarks.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think you should know, Mr. Speaker, that before it was submitted the motion was cleared with the Table.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, but it is always for the Chair to decide.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will find the motion in order, but I must say that if the remarks of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) are any indication, nothing he has been saying recently is in order. I have some unkind things to say of those who are applauding across the way, But I shall leave that for the moment.

I do want to say one thing about some of the comments made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe on the subject of the dividend question. I found it difficult to believe what I thought I was hearing from the hon. member when he was talking about the rip-offs that came from the loophole being closed in the budget regarding the use of reserve funds and dividends. It was perfectly all right for private industry to do that, but Petro-Canada should not avail itself of that opportunity! An hon. member to my right says he was not saying that at all. I have been listening for years to the hon. member for York-Simcoe but not once have I heard him rise and bring to the attention of the House the fact that this loophole existed for the private sector and that it should be closed. But now that it seems that when Petro-Can is eligible to use this loophole, it becomes a crime!

Mergers go on in this country every day, mergers which really do not provide any new jobs but merely allow for a change of ownership, a change of shares. Again, I have not heard the hon. member raise a protest and say this should not take place, nor have I heard members of his party rise and say mergers are a terrible thing because all you are doing is changing shares, changing ownership, without providing new employment opportunities.

What really seems to be bothering members to my right is that Petro-Can will turn out to be profitable and that the Canadian people will make something on their investment. It is intolerable that anything in the public sector should be profitable! If it is profitable it should be turned back to the private sector, but the public sector should be starved of all these things. We pick up the losers. We are not supposed to go into business and do something profitable on behalf of the Canadian people.

One way of clearing the House of Tories is to tell them what they don't want to hear. They just want to hear themselves talking. They do not realize the incredible double standard they are putting forth as an argument in this House, that whatever the private enterprise system does, regardless of whether it rips off the tax system, regardless of whether it does not create any jobs or not, that is fine, but don't let the government get into the field at all. It is really an argument not based on logic but on a prejudice against public involvement.

I listened to the minister's speech last night and the only thing that came through was a message that we had a minister and a government which were not prepared to provide leadership in this country, had no vision and concern for the future, and did not really want to try to control what was going on in the economy.

It reminded me of a nephew of mine when he was very young. He called me in to watch him in the bathroom as he was performing. He was very proud, and he said, "Uncle, I can do it with one hand". I said that that was pretty good. He said, "Look, no hands," and he took both hands off. Hon. members will know what the consequences were. That is the kind of budget the minister brought in last night. It just splattered all over the place, without hitting the bowl once.

Mr. Abbott: You have such an elegant way of characterizing it.

Mr. Saltsman: If we were not on television I would apply a name to it, but the CBC might object.

None of the measures in the budget are really very specific. There is no plan. There is no strategy. As a matter of fact the minister went out of his way in the budget speech to eschew any kind of strategy. He said, "I am frankly sceptical about a search for a single grand industrial strategy in the competitive market system". What competitive market system? There is some competition in our market, but increasingly the evidence is that it is no longer a free competitive market system.

The minister is thinking about a century which has passed, and trying to solve problems in a modern society with outmoded ideas and an unwillingness to act and behave as a government and a minister should. The message of the budget is that this government does not think it can do anything. It is waiting for the American economy to recover. It is the old story of government after government in Canada. They wait for the Americans to bail us out of our situation. The difficulty is that the Americans are in trouble, as deeply as we are, and perhaps even deeper, and were it not for the fact that many of the things my friends to my right and my friends opposite call socialist measures—things such as unemployment insurance, old age pensions and family allowances—we would be in a worse recession than the one we are in now.

Our economy is suffering greatly. Unemployment is high, and that accounts for a measure of suffering, but at least there is some cushion. There is still some purchasing power left in order that society can move along. The government is waiting for the Americans rather than setting out an independent policy of its own, which is something it could do.

I know it is a common view in both the Liberal and Conservative parties that we really cannot do much on our own and that we must wait and see what other countries are going to do. To some extent that is true, but, having said that, there is a great deal we can do on our own. We should analyse our strengths—and we have many in this country—and act independently of other societies.

Instead of concentrating on exporting to the extent we do—as if we have to export in order to live, and again there is always some truth to the assertion that a certain amount of exporting is necessary—we should be concentrating on import replacement. The province of Ontario has made a tentative move in that direction. Manufacturers in Ontario are being exhorted to look around and see what kinds of things are coming into this country. Most of the things which are coming in are things we could be making ourselves. The purpose of an industrial strategy is to work with the market and with the manufacturers of Canada. We should be saying to them that there are things they can be making in this country rather than importing, and that manufacturing would provide employment, which in turn would provide opportunities to the people of Canada.

We are in a period of high unemployment and, unless government policies change, that will continue for a number of years. However, if we look a little beyond that, five to ten years, there will not be unemployment but a labour shortage. Therefore it seems to me that the government's fear of stimulating the economy is groundless and that in fact we should be stimulating the economy now. We should be building the capital works which are required now.

In statements put forward by my leader on many occasions he has pointed out the things which should be done at this time and the number of jobs those projects would create. For instance, we need a $400 million federal-provincial-municipal capital works program. That has been urgently demanded unanimously by all ten premiers and by most municipalities. That would create 60,000 new jobs. Instead of that we get reports like the one published in this morning's Globe and Mail which says:

Federal move felt endangering renewal plans of municipalities

> "Ottawa is trying to curtail their spending at the expense of the municipalities . . . It is trying to make us pay for these programs by raising our property taxes—"

The government is cutting back on its spending, and the consequence of that will simply be that more people will be thrown out of work. The cost of unemployment insurance, welfare, and other social support programs will increase. We should be viewing the present period of high unemployment as a moment of opportunity. Not only should we try to put people back to work, with all that means in terms of the benefits of working and the moral benefits of working rather than being unemployed, but we should put people back to work on projects which will be needed for the future. The need for municipal projects is obvious. The need for urban renewal is obvious.

Another suggestion we have made is that $500 million be spent on railroad upgrading and rebuilding. That has been recommended by the Hall commission. While creating 70,000 new jobs, that would maintain railroad branch lines, and grain elevators would be repaired and modernized. Surely that would be worth while, particularly when we know that the future calls for more and better rail transit services. When is the government going to contemplate this—when we have labour shortages later on, or now when there are so many who are unemployed? All we need is a little direction from the government and a little courageous fiscal management to put people back to work.

Another project we have advocated is a $300 million urban transit program which would provide needed transportation services in urban communities in Canada and create an estimated 40,000 new jobs. A $500 million special housing program is needed to reverse CMHC overspending of its 1977 capital budget by almost that amount. That would provide needed funds for non-profit, co-operative and public housing, and for neighbourhood improvement and residential rehabilitation programs. We think that would create 70,000 new jobs in the high unemployment construction industry. The cost of these capital works projects comes to about $1.7 billion. They would get the private sector involved in important areas of the economy and decrease the level of unemployment. The government should be concerned about moving into these areas, particularly now when the private sector seems so weak and so unwilling to invest.

My friends to the right say that the problem is lack of confidence. The government brings in a regressive budget and says that it is meant to instil confidence in the business community. The official opposition turns that around and says confidence consists of having the hon. member for York-Simcoe in a blue serge suit as minister of finance rather than opposition critic. I think the word "confidence" is grossly misused by both parties. Confidence comes from looking at a government, or an official opposition, which has the courage to advocate programs rather than standing pat all the time, playing it safe and doing nothing beyond the immediate and short-term. There is a reason for this malaise, and again a clear message comes from the budget.

The government is totally preoccupied with the problem of inflation. However, that problem has, for the most part, passed. The government itself acknowledges that the worst of the inflationary spiral is over, that from thereon in—while there will still be inflation and while we still have to be concerned about it—there will not be the rise in inflation we have had for the last number of years.

I am very proud to say that if you look at organized labour in Canada you will find that it has been behaving in a very responsible and concerned way. Its members have, in fact, been taking wage settlements below the increases in the cost of living to demonstrate that. The trade union movement is doing its part in terms of controlling inflation, and I think it deserves a word of commendation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: I see there are many members who agree with that statement. So there is no longer, if there ever was, any pressure from wage demands on inflation.

I was rather surprised to see the following statement in the minister's opening sentences in the budget speech, to give some verisimilitude to a somewhat misleading document:

> In recent weeks I have travelled to many parts of Canada. I have talked to many Canadians—my provincial colleagues, businessmen, labour leaders, economists and laymen. Everywhere I have been told that my budget must be responsible.

While the minister does not say so in so many words, he certainly implies that he has the support of labour for this kind of budget, or that labour would consider this budget responsible. I think he must know that on both grounds he is wrong. Labour would not support this kind of budget; labour would not support a budget that does nothing to cure the high unemployment rates in this country, does nothing to increase growth in Canada, and does not concern itself about the future. Labour would certainly not endorse this budget, nor in fact would labour consider that the minister's budget was in any degree responsible. So the minister should not try to make it appear as if he had the support of labour, because he certainly does not have it. Obviously labour is not pushing in any way that would contribute to inflation.

If we look at the other factors that were blamed for inflation, we find that energy prices have settled down. We do not have the quantum leap, the quadrupling of energy prices which you had a few years ago.

Agricultural prices, after being set back sharply for many years, have recovered some of their position, and there does not seem to be a great push on food prices projected into the future—the minister acknowledges that in his budget speech. The worst of inflation, which has been created by the increased cost of imports arising from the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, is over. I do not think the Canadian dollar will be going down much further than it is now, and, if it does, it is just a fluke, and it will not stay there.

A much greater problem that faces the government—if it is problem at all—is not that the Canadian dollar will go lower but that it will start to rise pretty soon because it is undervalued now, and when it starts to rise it will ease the inflationary pressures in Canada.

What I am putting forward in enunciating these four items is that these are the four main components which go into any assessment of whether things will be more or less inflationary in the future. I think the evidence is stark, it is quite clear, that the past basis for the surge in inflation is over. The government really does not have to pin its whole policy on fighting a situation which is settling down. The war is not over in any absolute sense, there are always problems with inflation, but it is settling itself down.

To say that you cannot stimulate the economy, or you cannot move to provide employment, because you are afraid of inflationary pressure, is not only the wrong analysis of the situation but a dishonest statement about what is happening in our society, and a way of avoiding the necessity of taking responsibility for getting people back to work and getting this country growing again. It is shocking to see this sort of juvenile economics used in arguments put forward by the government.

Again the message is quite clear in the budget, that while the government has tried to show that labour, provincial premiers and businessmen have all asked the minister to present the kind of budget he presented last night, what is quite clear is that the only ones who wanted him to present such a budget are some of the business people who have been advising the government, and to whom the minister has been talking. It was quite clear, from the comments and the reaction after the budget speech last night, that the minister has struck a responsive note and is now competing with the Conservative party for the affection of business in Canada. They have been wrong before. These are the people who have been advising governments over and over again and getting this country into nothing but trouble.

Certainly there are many prominent businessmen whose advice is very useful, but to listen to only one side of the argument—because it was only to business that the government was listening—not to labour because labour's priorities are different, not to the provincial premiers, because their priorities are different and they differ among themselves, and to say this is a consensus budget is wrong. I think that the advice the minister is getting is bad advice and will not get the country going.

Let me talk about some of the incentives that are in this budget. The government proposes that the investment tax credit be extended for an indefinite period of time and that it be raised beyond its present 5 per cent level. There are two points about that. First, is it really necessary at this time? The government itself says in its budget address that the indications are that plant utilization is increasing.

A recent report is that a low of 80 per cent to 82 per cent plant utilization has now increased to about 87 per cent. What that means is that when plant capacity starts to approach 87 per cent of utilization, they will expand anyway without incentives. They will not expand at 82 per cent, and all the incentives the government offered in the last two budgets to get them to expand at that level have fallen. All this has accomplished is to fill the coffers of the various corporations which took advantage of those tax plans to depreciate allowances. It has not got the economy going.

Now they may say, because we improved these tax arrangements for business, the economy is starting to move again." I think it will start to move again, but the truth is it will move again because plant utilization has increased, not because of what the government has done with tax incentives, and the consequence is that money will be given away for virtually nothing.

I want to go back to what I said about the rather questionable simile which I used at the commencement of my remarks about my little nephew in the bathroom. If you are going to give incentives all over the place—and we in this party believe there are times when you should be giving far more in the way of incentives to certain kinds of business—you have to do that within the context of an industrial strategy. If you are going to give incentives, you have to do it within the context of knowing that certain industries, if they receive benefits out of public funds, will use those benefits to create jobs, to innovate, to do research, to do something specific for the benefit of the country, rather than to simply make a welfare payment to them through the tax system. That is what an industrial strategy is about, to pinpoint those areas of greatest usefulness for the future development of Canada. Without that, just to give these incentives across the board is like going all over the bathroom. You do not know what it is going to hit and what good it will do.

We have gone through this before with incentives and all the evidence we have, as a result of giving across the board incentives and increases, has been that it has not accomplished the purpose for which the incentives were intended. Quite the contrary, there is now some evidence to suggest that as a result of government generosity, as a result of industry being given benefits and the absence of investment opportunities, much of those benefits have resulted in cash surpluses for industry which start to move back and forth across the Canada-U.S. border in search of higher interest rates. Many of the problems we are facing, because of the outflow of capital from Canada, arise from the excess generosity of the government giving them more money than they can use. Therefore we find ourselves in this unbelievable position, as a consequence of government action and misplaced generosity which was designed to help industry and create jobs in Canada. We must take action against this misplaced generosity. We must raise interest rates to keep capital in Canada. In the course of raising interest rates, the opportunities for industry to expand and jobs to be created are cut down. The government has created a circular piece of mischief.

I had hoped that somewhere in the budget the minister would have given form to words he has expressed on many, many occasions. He is a very straightforward minister. We have heard him indicate in the House and on public platforms that the level of savings in Canada is too high. He has not said the following but I will extrapolate for him: the tax system has been so generous to people with higher incomes, or industries which could not use their cash flow, that problems of surplus savings have been created. These surplus savings are used to seek nothing but higher and higher interest rates in Canada or the United States. Then a yo-yo-ing back and forth and a jockeying for interest rate preferences occur between one country and the other. If ever there was a government policy which was a clear failure, it is this one. Yet it is included in the present budget.

Does the Minister of Finance and his advisers want this kind of situation? I do not think so. Their industrial strategy and planning are no good. They say the government should stay out of the economy; we should curtail our spending and let the private sector move in. It is a commitment to ideology which causes the problem. That is at the heart of the failure of the budget. The government cannot see this problem. Public policy will fail without planning, intervention, strategy, a setting of priorities or evaluation. The government feels that it must be scattergunned all over the place, without knowing the consequences, benefits, costs or losses.

Strangely enough, while I think the performance of the economy will leave a lot to be desired in the next five or six months, or until the next budget, a kind of statistical optical illusion may take place as a result of some of the measures in the budget. From what we have seen in this budget, I am not too hopeful that any other budget will make any difference or result in much of an improvement. The cut in manufacturers' sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent will do some good. This is something we advocated. We are sorry the government did not pick up more of our package. It only picked up part. To the extent that the government has picked up part of it, one must acknowledge that it will be of some value. As pointed out by the minister in his budget speech, its chief political value probably will be a drop of one half of 1 per cent in the consumer price index.

In reviewing some of the factors which have led to inflationary pressures in the past, one comes to the conclusion that the consumer price index will start to decline, particularly if the Canadian dollar starts to move up. I do not think the government wants it to move up rapidly, but it will start to move up and there will be a very convenient decline in the consumer price index somewhere just prior to election time.

Another measure which will provide a statistical illusion of well-being is the changes in unemployment insurance. Those changes will knock a lot of people out of the visible labour market and into the invisible one for which no statistics are kept. Even with the government uncommitted to the creation of jobs and admitting that it will create 100,000 fewer jobs this year than in the past year, unemployment figures may drop. Again it is a statistical illusion conveniently appearing some time before the next election. By the government's own admission, the employment effect will be less than last year. Unemployment figures will drop, not because of increased employment, but because a lot of people have been thrown out of the labour force as a result of the changes made in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Despite the government's effort, the exchange rate will start to rise. Again this will give the illusion of things improving. Today the government argues very vociferously that every time the exchange rate drops it is very good for the economy. But I am sure the government will find a congruous argument as soon as the exchange rate starts to rise, an argument demonstrating how that is even better for the economy. In my estimation, many of the measures in the budget are not very effective and are grossly inadequate to solve the problems we face. Yet these measures will show up as statistically charming in time for an election.

The general public, the taxpayers, the voters and the citizens of Canada are concerned about government spending. They feel that care should be exercised in government spending. These concerns are legitimate ones. Much of what the government has done to persuade those concerned people has been nothing more than an exercise in public relations. Even though my friends on my right have expressed concern about public expenses, they are engaging in a public relations exercise as well. As a matter of fact one of my friends in the Conservative party expressed concern about what the government was doing in relation to Petro-Canada. His concern was that by enlarging the role of Petro-Canada the government is making it impossible for his party, when it forms the government, to sell Petro-Canada, because the stock market will be disrupted too much. Thus, I would say to my friends who have been berating Petro-Canada up and down that they should be careful and heedful of that. Perhaps they will end up being the custodians. Who knows, perhaps the hon. member for York-Simcoe will be made commissar in chief of Petro-Canada? Then he will have to eat some of his words, as the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had to eat some of his words about the Liberal party on another occasion, and as all of us have to do from time to time.

Mr. Fleming: What about some of your comments this afternoon?

Mr. Saltsman: I added my last comment because I was very much afraid that someone might bring up something I said 12 years ago. I was afraid someone would have it tucked up his sleeve, ready to trot out before the House.

Recently the government announced that it was going to cut back on public services. The Prime Minister came out with a great big axe in his hand. I presume he did not tell anyone about it. He came out looking like Henry VIII, chopping off ladies' heads, and saying, "Off with their heads, off with their heads". In the meantime, the heads are not rolling rapidly, nor should they roll rapidly. By the time you get through that exercise you really have not changed very much.

There is room and there is need for scrutiny in the public sector. All of us have some private and pet horror stories about what goes on in the public sector, or all of us should have, and some of us have stories about what goes on in the private sector. These things can only be handled on a day to day and consistent basis with a determination to make the public sector work. This is part of the problem.

If you wonder why bureaucracy is the way it is, and why there is less concern about the public sector than there should be, it is because governments, federal governments at any rate, up until the present time have had a kind of death wish. Sometimes one feels it really does not want the public sector to work. Like my friend, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, instead of putting their very considerable talents to work trying to figure out how to make Petro-Can of more service to the Canadian people, hon. members are busily trying to destroy Petro-Can. Like that hon. member, hon. members in that part of the House do not want Petro-Can to work because that would put a lie to the belief which is currently popular among members of the Conservative party. I say "currently" because things were not always that way. Many good endeavours have come from the Conservative party in its better days.

One of the great challenges of the future is not so much related to whether there should be more or less public involvement. I do not think it is possible any more in the kind of world we live in, and with the kind of future we foresee, for the government to get out of involvement in the economy. No government can divorce itself from that involvement. Quite to the contrary, there is an increasing need for the government to be involved in managing the economy. What is critical is not the extent to which the government is involved in the economy, but the extent to which people in public life ensure that the public sector always performs efficiently and humanely.

Because of our concern about the need for public investment and government leadership in the public sector, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. While the hon. member still has three minutes available to him, perhaps this would be an opportune time for me to intervene, just before he proposes a sub-amendment to the House, to render my decision concerning the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

When the hon. member proposed his amendment, pursuant to Standing Order 51 I indicated it was my impression that the amendment contained a matter in respect of which the House had already made a pronouncement. For that reason I hesitated to put the question to the House, and I base that impression on citation 200 in Beauchesne. It clearly states as follows:

An old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the House might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

That citation clearly indicates that a like motion cannot be put to the House, or the House should not be asked to make a pronouncement on the same type of motion within the same session. As a result I hesitated to accept the amendment, and I signified that hesitation to the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

I see the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is ready to stand and take part in the discussion. Let me first say that, to my mind, the best and simplest way of correcting the motion proposed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe would be to exclude the words "such as mortgage interest and municipal tax deductibility", which is that part of the motion I feel is faulty under the rules and practices of this House. This would leave the motion reading as follows:

—this House rejects a budget which increases the deficit without providing a genuine economic stimulus and which continues a policy of stagnation instead of beginning the structural reforms needed for the 1980s.

Having said that, and before making a final decision, I would invite the representations or comments of hon. members of the official opposition or others.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned to you earlier, this matter was referred to an officer at the Table to determine whether it was procedurally correct in so far as the rules of the House are concerned. It was indicated to me that it was procedurally correct.

I would have to say that I would not argue with that text of citation 200 in Beauchesne, but I would argue that it ought not to apply in this case. I do so for two reasons.

I want to go back, if I may, and read the motion which causes you the problem. It is a motion moved by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) during the throne speech debate on October 18, 1978. That motion stated:

—but this House regrets to inform Your Excellency that the policies of your ministers have severely damaged the Canadian economy, and that your ministers have not proposed those measures of taxation relief, including home mortgage interest and property tax deductibility, which would promote economic growth and recovery and ensure a more equitable tax system for all Canadians.

The issue in that particular matter was the damage to the Canadian economy, taxation relief, including among other things, implicit in those words, home mortgage interest and property tax deductibility, for the purpose of promoting economic growth and recovery and to ensure an equitable tax system. Within that issue and implicit in the words "including home mortgage interest", "taxation relief" and other things, is set forth a number of things of which this is only one.

The guts of this motion, if I may put it to you that way, does not deal with the Canadian economy as such, but with the question of the deficit policy of the government and its failure to provide a genuine economic stimulus. It goes on to state that, as a result of that policy, stagnation is continuing in the Canadian economy. That is the guts of this motion which calls upon the government to provide the structural requirements we need as we go forward to the 1980s. It is quite a different motion. I grant you that the words "including home mortgage interest and municipal tax deductibility" are similar and appear therein, but they appear as merely one of the items, among others, that are included, and are not germane to the motion. Therefore it is open for us to argue that they could be removed from the motion without destroying it, as you Mr. Speaker, have pointed out, and that is the strongest support for my argument that this is ancillary to the motion rather than being the central or focal point.

I have given you the arguments as best I can, sir, with respect to the substance of this motion as compared to the substance of the motion put on October 18, 1978. The thing which offends the Chair, and which is the most eloquent argument one can possibly have for the point I am trying to make, could be included within the general scope of the motion, but it is not necessarily exclusive nor germane to it. Therefore, I think that on those grounds it should be allowed to stand, because that is what probably moved the officer at the table to take the position he did.

There is ample precedent for my position because in an amendment with respect to the budget there is a considerable amount of scope, as there is on motions with respect to the allotted days given to the opposition. Therefore, I do not believe that citation 200, which has as its substance a provision against a question being put more than once, applies to this particular amendment. You, sir, supplied the most eloquent argument for granting this amendment, as it is appropriate to the terms of the rules of the House of Commons.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). He referred to the fact that there is a good deal more latitude in consideration given by the Chair to the wording of any amendments in, for example, the throne speech debate or the budget debate, than when a bill is at second reading, committee stage or even third reading.

While there may be a similarity in this motion of five or six words to the motion made on October 18, I would suggest that the thrust of the amendment on October 18 was that the government policies had damaged the Canadian economy. There is no such reference in the motion made today by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). In the motion on October 18 the hon. member for St John's West (Mr. Crosbie) had not proposed certain tax measures which would promote economic growth or the assurance of a more equitable tax system, both of which are proposed in this motion.

There is mention in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe about damage to the Canadian economy, but he is proposing certain measures to stimulate the economy. The two measures cited in the hon. member's amendment are used in a different context, and it is mere coincidence that there are five words similar to the amendment of October 18. As my colleague the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has said today, the two amendments are entirely different and for that reason the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe should be accepted.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks that I would like to add to what has already been said here, partly because it is Friday afternoon. It is nice to see the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) smiling at this late time in the week. My argument refers to the citation which you read, sir, and which my friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) suggested that you follow, that if you cut a piece of the whole and still have the whole, then nothing has been decided upon in a previous question. All hon. members I think understand citation 200. This House would become even more confused if the Chair were to repeat and debate questions that have already been put and decided upon.

The amendments to the Speech from the Throne on October 18, as it appears at page 238 of Hansard, and the question which was decided by the House then, of a much more broader nature, not the precise, specific provision of home mortgage interest deductibility and/or taxation as outlined in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. The citation says that you cannot put a question more than once, and if we had that precise question in either amendment, then perhaps the matter would never have come before you, sir. Because I do not think that either the House leader or the table officers would have proposed the specific deductibility feature which is only a piece of a more substantive motion that is much more general.

Of course, as my hon. friend from Edmonton West just mentioned, there is a broader interpretation given to amendments to the Speech from the Throne or to the budget than to a specific issue which has been decided upon in the House. For those two reasons, and without getting into all the forms and precedents of Beauchesne or Standing Orders, I use your own words, sir, to put my point across, namely that if you cut a piece out of the amendment and you still have a substantive amendment, then you have not had this House decide the issue, which was used only as an example in both substantive motions and not per se the substantive motion.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I know that it is customary wherever possible on Fridays to launch into sparkling and scintillating debate on procedure, and that you, sir, are waiting to hear other members. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) was laughing a moment ago. I think it is a great tribute to the enduring characteristics of hon. members on the other side that they can still laugh after last night.

That is my only contribution to the budget debate, and I will now deal with the procedural issue. The Chair is probably seeking advice from hon. members because the general principle is that the Chair must always seek diligently for ways to find motions in order. That rule is particularly applicable when looking at the many traditional amendments moved in debates on the Speech from the Throne or debates on the budget.

After some soul searching I decided to vote for the amendment moved in the Speech from the Throne debate and which has been referred to by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. At that time I looked at the wording and saw that it dealt with home mortgage interest and property tax deductibility. Those are specific words that have an interpretation which falls squarely within your knowledge, sir, and mine.

I am not going to traverse the ground already covered by my colleagues on this. They have dealt adequately with it and I imagine Your Honour is prepared to find a way which would give effect to their arguments.

I would simply put this additional argument. In the motion in question appear the words "a genuine economic stimulus such as mortgage interest" which go far beyond the question of home mortgage interest. This could include mortgage interest on an industrial property or on a number of things. I submit there is a very considerable difference between "home mortgage interest" and "mortgage interest".

I do not know what I am going to do on this amendment. I still have to make up my mind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I hear some raucous amusement from hon. members opposite. I am simply delighted that my friends opposite can laugh today.

Mr. Roberts: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member usually has an open mind. This is the first time I have heard he has an empty mind on a subject.

Mr. Baldwin: Well, Mr. Speaker, unlike my hon. friend I do have a mind. To go back to where I was before I was so rudely interrupted, there is a substantial distinction between home mortgage interest and mortgage interest. We all know what a home is and mortgage interest on a home is very distinct. Home mortgage interest, as I see it, could include mortgage interest on any type of property. It may well be, as the debate develops, that colleagues on this side of the House may refine that distinction, but I see the motion at this time coming down to a very common sense use of those words. I think I am in a lot different position in coming to a decision on this than I would have been at the time of the first motion.

I should like to go on to the second aspect. On October 18, on page 238 of Hansard, there appear the words dealing with the deductibility— "property tax deductibility". Here we have municipal tax deductibility. That is a very plain distinction. Property tax deductibility may have connotations far beyond that of municipal tax deductibility. I suggest to Your Honour, without trying to force the Chair to reach for meanings, that given the general principle that you must seek diligently, and within the limits of discretion, of course, to find ways and means to make the motion one which can be put to the House so that there can be a debate, surely Your Honour can take into account the plain distinctions that can be made in respect of the words used on October 18 and the words used today.

Those are the general arguments advanced by my colleagues. I submit there is an irresistible case made for allowing this amendment to be put.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, on this particular point, the objective of our parliamentary procedure is to prevent the House of Commons from making conflicting decisions during the same session. If we compare the amendment suggested by the Progressive Conservative party to the main motion during the throne speech debate, and their amendment motion to the budget moved today, we realize that in both cases a major part of the motion is similar. Of course, I do not want to join in the acrobatics attempted by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). A mortgage always applies to a building, but he is attempting to distinguish between a mortage on private property and a mortgage on something else. This is irrelevant because mortgages are always on buildings in any case.

I believe it was the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who said: "Mr. Speaker, it is not because four or five words in the two motions are somewhat similar that you can conclude that these are motions of the same nature as described in citation 200 of Beauchesne on page 171". I believe that there lies the whole problem. You must answer the following question: Is it indeed a motion of the same nature as that which was moved during the throne speech debate? I recognize that it is not an easy question to answer.

In my opinion, what we must do is determine whether the motions are similar in part or whether the similar part in the two motions are in both cases major elements of the motions, which would mean that in principle, if the House were to agree to this motion today, its decision would be in conflict with that which it made during the throne speech debate. This is the question that you must answer, Mr. Speaker. The issue is not to determine whether both motions are identical from all aspects, but to see whether the similar parts are of such importance that, as a result, the House of Commons would risk in principle making two contradictory decisions within one month or five weeks of each other, or at least during the same session.

This is what Beauchesne wants to avoid by enunciating the principle that a question once made and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House. That is a sacred rule and I think there is a very simple solution. If you have any doubt, it is because you fear that the House might indeed make a contradictory decision. Then it would be so simple if this part of the motion is not important to the Progressive Conservative party to put forward another motion through another speaker which would not include this question of mortgage interests and property tax deductibility, which was disposed of by the House very clearly during the throne speech debate.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as must be obvious, I have been reluctant to take part in this procedural debate for the reason that we voted against the amendment the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) moved on October 18 and which was voted on on October 30. It might seem, therefore, that we have a conflict of interest here. Since we did not like the amendment that was moved on that occasion, it would follow we are not exactly happy with the motion before us now; but I want to make it clear that we will not shy away from expressing our views on it or from voting on it if Your Honour puts it to the House.

Your Honour interrupted my hon. friend, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), as he was about to move our subamendment. Without upstaging him, I can say that our subamendment was drafted as though the amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) was in order and it touches on that in that sense. In the intervening time, however, I have done some redrafting so that, if the original amendment has to be changed, our subamendment will be changed.

I want also to say that in view of these considerations I am not going to press Your Honour with all the vigour one can command in procedural debate; I do not think the world hangs on this issue. But in view of the positions that have been taken by members of the Progressive Conservative party, I feel someone in the opposition should support the position that the Chair has taken.

My friends to my right seem to be making a good deal out of the fact that the part in today's amendment that Your Honour does not like, is like the part in the amendment of October 18, and that since they are just incidental or ancillary bits in both cases, you should not be worried about them. It seems to me to work the other way. When this House on October 30 defeated the amendment moved on October 18, it did not defeat just part of it but all of it. Indeed, if there were three or four parts to that amendment and if it is possible today for the official opposition to revive one of those parts and get another vote on it, then as we move on through the session it can revive the other parts. Indeed, if we can revive this one today, we can revive it again. Therefore, a coach and four has been driven through the rule Your Honour has cited about it not being proper to seek again in the same session a decision on a motion or question on which a decision has already been taken.

My hon. friend the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader seems to approach this matter with concern lest the House reverse its position. I would say in terms of its rules the House is breaking the rules even if it takes the same decision over and over again. In my view, we should not be doing that. It seems to me the question that you raised, Mr. Speaker, is a legitimate one. I do not doubt the desire of my friends in the Progressive Conservative party to raise this issue of mortgage interest and municipal tax deductibility just as often as they can during the course of this session, but surely the rules should be observed. Although, as I say, I do not make it the case of the century, and we are not concerned, we are ready to move our subamendment either way. I hope you will stand by the view Your Honour expressed when you first raised this issue.

While I am on my feet, I must say that I have always enjoyed the contributions of my friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). We have had a good time together through the years we have been here. But I did get a smile or two out of his attempt today—talk about Your Honour reaching for some way to find this matter in order, but my friend from Peace River was reaching—to try to find a difference between home mortgage interest and mortgage interest. If he is arguing today that deductibility from mortgage interest is broader than home mortgage interest, does he mean that his motion calls for all the big companies in the country that have big buildings or properties or what have you to get deductibility for those mortgages?

Mr. Stevens: They already have.

An hon. Member: You did that.

An hon. Member: You have already given them that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And my friend is asking for more than that. I thought my friends were concerned about the homeowners, these "poor" people who own homes. But now my friend from Peace River is not quite sure. In fact, he may not be able to vote for this. He said he had not made up his mind yet, because it refers to mortgage interest; not just home mortgage interest, but mortgage interest in the widest possible sense.

An hon. Member: You voted on this.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We voted against the amendment that was made on October 18, and my friend knows it.

Then my friend from Peace River really stretches the point when he tries to see a difference between the phrase "property tax deductibility" and "municipal tax deductibility". Well, it is a different word. I do not know what happens to it in French; we do not have the French translation of this day's motion yet. But really that stretches it.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when the House voted on October 30 on the motion moved on October 18, it voted against a request for home mortgage interest and property tax deductibility. But when the Progressive Conservatives are asking us to vote today on a request for mortgage interest and municipal tax deductibility, they are asking us to vote on something on which the House has already made a decision. As I have said, we are ready to submit our amendment, to fit whatever motion comes from the Chair. But I suggest to Your Honour that your original statement was correct.

Mr. Baldwin: That is a rigid socialist mentality.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. However, I do want to point out in deference to my knowledgeable colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that there is in fact a great deal of difference between municipal tax deductibility and property tax deductibility. I do not know precisely how all the other provinces are organized, but I know that in New Brunswick the province itself levies property tax against homeowners and there are thousands of homeowners in New Brunswick who do not live within municipalities. I would like to know what the Tories are aiming at, whether it is municipal tax deductibility or property tax deductibility. Or are they, as they usually do, trying to fudge the issue so that they can take two different positions, or four if necessary?

The same, of course, applies to home mortgage interest and mortgage interest deductibility; the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has tried to make a difference there. He is right in the first instance but I am not so sure that he is right in the second, unless he is going to make all kinds of mortgage payments and so on deductible. It seems to me that in bragging about the brain he has he has been too clever by half. I believe he has hoisted his party upon the horns of a huge dilemma that they are now going to have trouble crawling down from unless, Mr. Speaker, you rule the motion out of order and take them down from the horns of their own dilemma.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to thank hon. members for their advice and contribution to this debate. Some hon. members use such different arguments that I find it hard to come back to my own decision. The last remark made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), along with remarks made by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), in trying to help convince me as to an analogy or a difference between two propositions is not clear to my mind. They do not take away the doubt I have.

I have forgotten which hon. member it was who said if five or six words could be taken out of the motion that would be enough to prove that they do not represent the main proposition and are secondary to the motion. This I can go along with. And I agree that the question proposed in the motion and in the debate was broader than the one we have in front of us at this time. I agree it was twofold. As mentioned by one hon. member, on the one hand it suggested that the economy had been severely damaged; on the other, it blamed the government for not proposing some measures for tax relief. In the end, that motion, although it was twofold, singled out only one solution—among others I agree—to achieve its objective.

I do not disagree with the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that it was the old motion voted upon. I wonder what the situation would be if the motion had been adopted. What if another motion or a motion to abolish property tax deductibility or a return of interest on mortgages was made? To my mind it is the duty of the Chair to protect the House and to make sure that the workings and the decisions of the House are orderly. I would like to suggest to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that the mere fact of speaking to the incumbent of the Chair or to a clerk at the table is not enough to obtain an absolute guarantee that a motion or a position can be acceptable. The Table is there to advise members. When I am not in the chair I do not have full power of decision. I do not have all the elements. It is when I occupy the position of Mr. Speaker that I exercise that authority.

To my mind, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council brought out the specific point that is contrary to citation 200 of Beauchesne which states that a question having been made and carried once, it cannot be questioned again in the course of the same session.

The fact remains that I harbour a very clear and specific doubt in my mind in allowing the House to vote again. In putting before the House the proposed amendment of the official opposition, I thereby put to it part of a question which was debated and voted upon at the opening of this session.

[English]

It still seems to me that by putting forward for debate the proposition of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), I would be putting one of the questions that was voted upon in the debate on the Speech from the Throne and upon which the House has already pronounced itself. There could be other means available to hon. members, but I will not fall into the trap of accepting the invitation of the hon. member to discuss the specifics of the motion before the House in that proposed amendment or try to indicate the exact words that could be embodied in the new proposition in relation to mortgage interest and municipal tax deductibility and try to argue the case with the hon. member as to whether or not there is a difference between those words and those contained in the motion of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

I am looking through the notes I took while hon. members were so eloquently trying to convince me one way or the other and I am not sure I have covered everything, but the same doubt that struck me at the beginning is still on my mind. I did make a suggestion earlier. Is the hon. member for York-Simcoe rising on that alternative solution to the dilemma?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I can well understand your doubt, as you express it. But I feel we must not delay a budgetary debate. In consultation with the seconder of the original motion, I suggest a revised wording of the motion. The wording I should like to suggest is:

That this House rejects a budget which increases the deficit without providing a genuine economic stimulus such as would follow from meaningful personal income tax reductions, and condemns the continued acquisition of private corporations by the government and the government's general policies as evidenced in the budget which continue stagnation instead of beginning the structural reforms needed for the 1980s.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is one thing I want to say. The rules do not allow an hon. member to amend his own motion. That rule can be found in citation 204 of Beauchesne. No member may amend his own motion, but with the leave of the House he may withdraw it and substitute another. The motion proposed by the hon. member was not put to the House. I have tried to look into the precedents taking account of the fact that I did not put the motion. If it had been put, I could not modify it without the consent of the mover, the seconder and the House. The Chair did decline to put the motion on the basis that the amendment might have been out of order.

To make it easier, taking into account the fact that some advice was sought as to its acceptability and that the main substance of the motion is definitely acceptable, I wonder whether there might not be consent, so as to simplify the problem and find a quick solution, to allow the hon. members, without further discussion, to move his amendment.

Is there consent that the hon. member be allowed to substitute an amended proposition?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then I will put the modified motion to the House.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) will now resume his speech.

Mr. Saltsman: After such a long period of time, Mr. Speaker, it is going to be a little difficult for me to remember what I was about to move. If I might be permitted, I would say to Your Honour that this is one time when procedure and logic go together. We had the same reservations about the amendment which the hon. member for York-Simcoe offered as you did, and my hon. friend with great prescience framed a motion originally to strike out all those words as though he knew they were offensive both to procedure and equality in tax administration.

Therefore, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the words "such as", and by substituting therefor the following words:

"the implementation of a program of public investment in housing, upgrading of railways, urban transit and provincial-municipal capital works, and this House condemns the government for carrying out a policy of deliberately high unemployment and for failing to reduce personal income taxes on middle and lower-income earners."

I find that despite the changes in the new motion moved by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, it is just as unacceptable as the old.

● (1542)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am very hesitant about this and I would be prepared to hear arguments from hon. members. My first impression is that the subamendment proposed tends to modify the first proposition completely. Unless it is worded in such a way as to add words to the proposition, I wonder how far we can go toward accepting subamendments which go beyond the scope of the proposition which is before us.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, if this motion is in order, it is somewhat accidentally in order. I therefore ask the indulgence of the Chair, in view of recent events surrounding this motion. It seems to me that what we are doing in our subamendment is clarifying and being very much more specific, but nevertheless along the same lines as the amendment itself. The amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe talks about meaningful changes. We are being very specific in terms of the use of the vague word "meaningful"; we are specifying reduced personal income taxes for middle and low income earners.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rather quick decision you have indicated. I think in drafting the proposed amendment to my motion the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was a little too sweeping. The fact that this is the case was demonstrated when the mover of the subamendment commented that almost regardless of the final wording of our amendment his amendment would fit all right. In effect, what he was saying was that provided the New Democartic Party could tack on anything it liked after "such as", the New Democratic Party apparently felt it had a free rein to amend our motion as it saw fit.

As I understand the rules, Your Honour is perfectly correct that basically we cannot amend away the whole thrust of the motion. That is what the New Democratic Party is proposing, and I think members of the NDP must at least restrict their amendment in such a way as to agree with some of the points in our motion before they propose to amend it virtually out of existence, as is the case now. In short, if they do not like our motion, they will have an opportunity to vote against it in due course; but in the meantime they may not amend it to such an extent that they automatically defeat our motion with their amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is both obvious and true that we have been doing quite a bit of drafting this afternoon. First we had to draft a subamendment to the amendment which was first moved by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). Then, we had to redraft that to fit the suggested change proposed by the Chair. Then, with about 30 seconds' notice, another amendment was submitted by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, and we had to try to fit into that.

I do not ask for any concession because of that, but that is part of the picture. However, I point out in answer to what the hon. member for York-Simcoe just said that his is a motion which is critical of the budget. In fact, it rejects the budget because it increases the deficit without providing a genuine economic stimulus. We accept that, but we qualify the reasons for our rejecting the budget and make other suggestions as to how to do something about it.

It is perfectly true that a subamendment has to be relevant to the amendment. The amendment deals with the budget and its faults and proposes something in its place. I suggest that in our subamendment we are accepting the rejection of the budget. We are qualifying or altering the reasons for that rejection, but it seems to me that it is in the same ball park. It is in the regulations that a subamendment must be relevant to the amendment, and I hope we do not have to have another hour's debate on procedure.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the subamendment may be in the same league, but I have to agree with the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) that it is certainly not in the same ball park nor part of the same ball game. I have always emulated and admired the example set by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in supporting the Chair on every possible occasion. I think he saw fit to support the Chair when my amendment was under consideration. The amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, is under consideration now, and I must say that I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will find it equally admirable of me if I support the Chair in the reservations Your Honour expressed regarding this subamendment.

I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe is quite correct in saying that one cannot amend away the whole thrust of an amendment. For whatever reason, I think that is what is being attempted here, and I am sure that given a few moments and given the drafting skill of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which is revered in every parliament in the Commonwealth, he will be able to come up with an amendment which will satisfy the Chair, the government—which will have the right to vote—and also satisfy us as to its procedural acceptability. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre needs a little time, we are, of course, prepared to give it to him.

Mr. Baldwin: It would be easier if the government would review its budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, surely no one has any objection to your taking all the time required to give a ruling on whether or not the subamendment is receivable. What strikes one, however, is how difficult it is for the opposition parties to criticize legitimately the budget brought down by the government. Which leads one to wonder what they would do if they were on this side of the House. Mr. Speaker, I suggest we resume the debate. We have, on this side of the House, several hon. members who are willing and ready, to say the least, to praise last night's fine budget. We shall await your ruling at your leisure on the subamendment of the New Democratic Party.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to accept the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary because it might bring about the same problem and at the same time work against one of the parties in the House who has a priority at this time, under the practices of this House, to present a subamendment.

If I were to come to the Chair on Monday and make a negative ruling on this subamendment, at whatever time, that might preclude a representative of the New Democratic Party from exercising his right to move another subamendment. I wonder if the House would be prepared at this time to accept my suggestion that I reserve the right of a representative of the New Democratic Party to move another submendment. I base my suggestion on the fact that I am quite concerned about the wording of this subamendment. Perhaps its objective might not go against the rules of the House if it were worded in another way or attached to the amendment in another way. So without ruling out the content of the motion, I find fault with the way it is attached to the amendment. At the same time, I am ready to protect the right of the hon. member's party to have one of his colleagues move another amendment on Monday.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to agree to allow the NDP to put an amendment in an appropriate way, as you suggested, or in some other way that we could work out. However that is done, we are certainly prepared to agree to that.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are willing to help the opposition in its efforts to adjust to the rules of the House.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to accept that. I was trying to draft something fast, but it would make more sense for us to present a new motion on Monday. But I take it that if the House agrees now to what is proposed, the Chair will not accept a subamendment from anyone else until another New Democratic Party member gets the floor.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: For the information of hon. members, the House agrees to reserve the right of another member of the New Democratic Party to introduce an amendment to the amendment moved by the official opposition and the Chair will then decide whether that amendment is in order. At this time I consider that even if the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) might not be contrary to our standing orders and our practices, the manner in which it is proposed and related to the proposal of the official opposition seems to me entirely out of order and thus goes beyond the substance of the main motion and at the same time, I think, gives rise to a new proposal which replaces part of the one already made by the official opposition.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there has been some consultation among the parties with respect to the debate. It had to do with the divisions that will be taken. In fact, announcements were made by the government House leader on the time of the vote when he answered questions on the business of the House yesterday. I would just like it to be understood that in terms of the consent we are giving to accommodate reasonably the dilemma in which we find ourselves, we can take it that today is the first day of the budget debate. I want to make sure there is no doubt in my friend's mind about that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is quite clear.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And it is understood that the second day will be Monday, and that there will be a vote on that amendment on Monday evening, assuming an appropriate amendment is put by my friend or his colleague; and that the debate will carry on, not as I had agreed, but as the government House leader has indicated and in accordance with the plans of the government for the balance of the week.

Mr. Pinard: I rely on the statement made by the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday. I think it is obvious that we have to act accordingly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But there might be an interruption. Should that not be made clear? The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is speaking as though the debate would go on every day next week. I think there was a reservation regarding the possibility of one day's interruption.

Mr. Pinard: When I said I would rely on the statement made by the government House leader, it included that possibility, of course.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: To make sure that this is clear, let me ask whether that possibility could not arise on Monday.

Mr. Pinard: No, Mr. Speaker, that was not specified. I still have to rely on the statement made by the Deputy Prime Minister. If anything is to change before Monday, of course the House leaders of the other parties will be informed in advance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the second day of the budget debate, the Chair will ensure that a member of the NDP seeking the floor will be recognized for the purpose of presenting a subamendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, we found ourselves in some confusion probably because there was confusion as well in the speech on the budget itself last night. Such problems of "adjusting" to move amendments or subamendments as we were just faced with a while ago makes us smile because generally we never had much problems to devise appropriate amendments and I could hardly comment on that amendment or subamendment because so many have been tabled. Still I can at least speak on the intent of the amendment and subamendment since the latter was preceeded by a speech.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the representative of the Progessive Conservative party, the official opposition, calls for a lower deficit and economic incentives. Well, Mr. Speaker, we can only approve strongly such an amendment. However, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) did not tell us what the Conservative party would do if it were in power to lower the considerable deficit we have known for years. And knowing the monetary policy of the Conservative party, which is more or less the same as that of the Liberal party, I think they will have much difficulty devising ways of cutting down those deficits while at the same time improving the Canadian economy since they follow the same monetary policy.

Mr. Speaker, earlier I heard the hon. member for York-Simcoe criticize this administration. He was right on nearly everything, but as I was listening to him I wondered what would have happened if since 1968 for example, he had been on the other side of the House? Undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, we would have had roughly the same difficulties. The Progressive Conservative party is undoubtedly full of good intentions but the administration it gave us when it was in office in the late fifties and early sixties shows that in terms of administration they are not much more capable than the Liberal administration has been since 1963. During the Progessive Conservative administration we had a period of terrible unemployment, the dollar went down, we had a period of intense inflation, and that is in part practically what caused the Progressive Conservative party to be defeated in 1962-63. So today, Mr. Speaker, they want to replace the Liberal party but with the same means to administer this country. Mr. Speaker, the same causes have the same effects. So as far as I am concerned I do not have any more confidence in the policies of the Progessive Conservative party than I have in the Liberal party currently in office.

I listened also to the arguments of the hon. member of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), and he was practically at the opposite of what the representative of the Conservative party proposed. For the representative of the New Democratic Party, public projects should be increased substantially to fight unemployment. Fighting unemployment, Mr. Speaker, would be a good idea but increasing public projects in the sense that was suggested means increasing the current government deficit.

Mr. Speaker, that deficit is considerable and has become a frightening plague for the taxpayers of this country. Since 1975—and that is only three years ago—the public debt in Canada has doubled. If you take the budget deficit of 1977-78 and 1978-79 and the forecast for 1979-80 you get a total deficit of $31.12 billion. Mr. Speaker, administering like that when you have a Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) coming out with estimates like that, you do not have to be a genius to administer with debts like that. Anyone, Mr. Speaker, could do it, but administering a country soundly and running a country like the people want it to be run is another thing. I believe that what we have now on the government side is an incapacity to do so. The Minister of Finance might be well intentioned but last night he was unable to introduce a budget to revive the Canadian economy which is in great difficulty, he was unable to introduce a budget to reduce the rate of unemployment in Canada, he was unable to introduce a budget to reduce substantially the cost of living we now have in Canada. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the margin of the Minister of Finance is very narrow, I would say almost nonexisting, because of huge expenses which are far higher than revenues. And the government can hardly get more from income tax than it already does, because Canadian taxpayers are overtaxed as it is. They cannot afford to pay more. And today our workers, those who have a job, are overburdened. They must pay for about 50 per cent of the Canadian people and they account for an ever decreasing percentage of the labour market. They must pay for just about all those who do not work for one reason or another. They have to support all those people and the entire government machinery.

Some workers are beginning to wonder whether it is more advantageous to be outside the labour market rather than being at work. More and more people are worrying about that. The gap between the poor and the rich grows wider and wider, and it is increasingly difficult for the middle class to live under such an administration. So, Mr. Speaker, a lot of criticism can be levelled at the government that has been in power for the past ten years, at least with regard to the present administration and it has been done in all sorts of ways and I do not intend this afternoon to come back on this kind of criticism. I would rather spend a few minutes trying to make the House of Commons and the Canadian people understand that we must get off the beaten path, that we must forgo this system which is leading Canada to bankruptcy.

We have come to the point, Mr. Speaker, where the interest on the national debt this year is as large as the Canadian government's budget in 1962, a date which is not so remote after all. One is entitled to wonder in what kind of a situation we find ourselves and when we are talking about billions of dollars we are not dealing with peanuts. These are billions of dollars which we are giving away every year. We have now gone over the $6.5 billion mark in interests on the national debt and these $6.5 billion are not recycled within the government. When we tax workers to pay for old age security pensions, family allowances and the cost of public works, development projects of all kinds, all that money eventually finds its way back to the government somehow. But when we tax the same workers to pay the interest on the monumental debt of our country to those who have a claim to that debt, all that money is not redistributed, it has to be borrowed again at current annual interest rates which have now reached 10 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians have the right and are beginning to wonder where all this will lead us. What will the situation be next year? What will it be in two years? This cannot last forever, there will be a breakdown somewhere, sometime. We have had the 1939 crash and we undoubtedly find ourselves on the eve of another one because there are limits to the level of indebtedness of a country and its people. In the thirties, when the crisis took place, which was called then an economic crisis, nobody had any money. There was a surplus a goods everywhere which people did not know what to do with, the stores were stacked up with all kinds of commodities. There were unemployed people everywhere eager to work but there was no employment for them and those worked were not getting paid.

Then, Mr. Speaker, people were suffering in the midst of abundance. When war was declared, suddenly we could find the money that was lacking a few months before. However, tractors, had to be built to make war, machines had to be built, ammunitions were needed and there was work for everybody. The necessary money was found. And as men were workig in factories producing war equipment and ammunitions, salaries were paid and wage earners were buying consumer goods which in term gave work to other people so that during the war everybody was working, any disabled man could find a job; in fact, everybody was working. Such was wartime economy. But no sooner had the hostilities come to an end, that we found ourselves in the same predicament. We were having economic and financial problems and the government, in an attempt to save the economy and preserve jobs, sank ever deeper into debt.

Mr. Speaker, surely it is easy to find an alternative to such an administration, and other means must be looked for, other than those we know and other than those proposed by current economists.

We are laughed at on occasion. When I heard the minister making his speech, I remember the sixties when the same minister was making jokes at the Caouette dollar, the Social Credit dollar. He found that funny. But today we have Chrétien's 85 cents, and this is not much funnier. Social Credit monetary proposals were then called "funny money." Today we have sad money and it hurts even though the minister repeatedly suggested last summer, that the Canadian dollar devaluation was something that could enhance the economy, would promote exports. Mr. Speaker, rather than trying to export our production, developing an international market, let us try rather to develop a domestic market, a home market by giving back our Canadian dollar its purchasing power, the real value it has lost because of this administration.

That is what he should try: The Minister of Finance stated that the 90, 89, 88 cents and even 85 cents, and it went down to 84 cents, that dollar made for cheaper exports. We could export more. But last night the minister of Finance told us the opposite in his budget. This is what I find on page 5, and I quote:

> The consumer price index rose more sharply than has been expected.

He erred across the board, this is nothing new.

> In September, it was 8.6 per cent higher then a year earlier. This renewed outburst of inflation—

Please note this:

> This renewed outburst of inflation was not the result of any acceleration in our own incomes or our own domestic costs. It was the result of higher food prices and the decline in the dollar.

Last night the minister agreed that the renewed outburst of inflation was due to the decline in the dollar. This flies in the face of the statements he made during all of last summer, when we questioned him, in the course of the last session and the beginning of the current one, on the Canadian dollar devaluation. If the Canadian dollar devaluation could help our exports and improve the Canadian economic climate, why not lower it to 83 cents, 75 cents and even 50 cents if this is effective?

The proof is that the minister did not believe it at all since, along with the governor of the Bank of Canada, they made every effort to borrow on the American market and elsewhere in an attempt to save the dollar. Each time it was exactly the opposite that should have been done. All they did in fact was to devise a means of exporting interests and dividends, of exporting and increasing the flow of our money out of the country, when it should have been kept here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the government has only three means of obtaining the funds needed to meet its obligations, and for the government, the main obligation is to provide an efficient administration to the entire population, not only to parts of it but to the entire population. That is why it must offer advantages not only to big owners of what I would call chicken coops, but also to owners of single family dwellings, not only to big owners but to small owners as well. That was omitted in the budget speech we heard last night. There is nothing there for the small homeowner or the tenant who wants to buy a home, they were completely disregarded. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the government's obligations.

Small and medium-sized businesses were also largely overlooked. Nothing new was done in addition to what we already have, and the government is only starting to show concern for small and medium-sized businesses. Yet we know how much this type of business generates jobs. Therefore, much more should be done in that direction, but there was nothing in the budget speech which was far more noteworthy by its omissions than by its content. Also, Mr. Speaker, the government has the obligation to ensure a decent standard of living to the people of Canada. At present, 20 per cent to 25 per cent of the population is living below the poverty line, especially the senior citizens of Canada. There are disabled, sick and socially handicapped people who are without jobs and there are others who do have a job but who work for the minimum wages allowed by the provincial governments. Mr. Speaker, almost 25 per cent of our population live below the poverty line. As a matter of fact, somebody mentioned today that the poverty line for a family of four was $11,000 a year. Mr. Speaker, many families live on a much smaller income. It is the government's responsibility to take care of them.

Mr. Speaker, in order to obtain the necessary funds to meet its obligations, the government can levy taxes—and we know it does not hesitate to do so. It has the authority to tax citizens and corporations alike, to take the money out of their pockets. Last night, while I was listening to the minister's budget speech in the House, I noted the tax cut offered to the Canadian people. I noted the 9 per cent tax credit or indexation of the personal income tax and true, I felt relieved for the Canadian workers, but the government has nothing to lose by granting this indexation.

In the tables which were tabled before us last night in the budget speech and which have been included in Hansard we can see in Table 2—Forecast for 1979-80—under personal income tax that despite a supplementary indexation of 9 per cent the government is going to collect an additional $1.85 billion. The minister can always brag about his allowing for a fiscal reduction; in fact because of the wage increase that almost all workers get during the year, the government will get an ever increasing tax amount but it will not be seen as such by the people.

Mr. Speaker, when the minister proposes to reduce the sales tax from 12 per cent down to 9 per cent, he plays the same trick once again, since prices and costs increase, the government is able to get more money through the taxes on manufactured items. The government does not lose anything in this 3 per cent reduction, even though we hope the consumer will draw some kind of advantage out of it in the end. Mr. Speaker, the government can get money through taxes and we know how it uses it.

Here is another way: the government could borrow from the people, from institutions and corporations and pay back the money it has borrowed. But the government almost never pays these sums back, it pays only the interest. When Canada Savings Bonds fall due, the government makes every effort to convince the buyers to keep them for another term. The government offers higher interest rates in the hope that bond owners will renew them. But if the owners want their money, the government must borrow to pay them. Then it is like digging a hole to fill another one, but at the end we are still left with a hole.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the second system the government is using to get funds for its administration.

The third system the government may use to get funds and which they do not want to resort to is simply to create money and spend the funds thus created for public projects. That is the very third power of the government which could change completely the administration of the country and restore a sound administration which Canadians call for and are entitled to expect.

Mr. Speaker, the government refuses to exercise that third option because its masters, those who control it behind the curtains, that occult power which nobody knows, nobody sees, forbid the government to exercise that third option.

In 1977, my colleague from Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) asked the Minister of Finance a question which I shall repeat here for your information, Mr. Speaker, and that of hon. members. I quote:

> —this misunderstanding between the federal government and the province of Quebec depends mostly on the fact that we have economic problems; since money is manmade, why does the Minister of Finance not urge the Bank of Canada to open a new credit for the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, to promote or finance new public projects in municipalities and school boards in order to deal with unemployment and create new jobs?

Well, Mr. Speaker, here is the answer of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Finance of the present Liberal government, and I quote:

> The Canadian monetary policy is well known and it has been formulated by the governor of the Bank of Canada and I do not intend to ask him to change his policy.

Then, Mr. Speaker, who is governing the country? Is it the Minister of Finance elected by Canadians or the governor of the Bank of Canada who is only known by 1 per cent of Canadians because nobody votes for him? And yet he is the man who administers our financial policy in Canada. He is in the driver's seat but answerable to nobody. Mr. Speaker, such conditions cannot go on. The present minister or the next one, this government or the next one will have to assume their responsibilities. They have to assume the responsibilities entrusted by the people and instruct the Bank of Canada to do what they have to do. At the present time, it is the tail that makes the dog wag and not the other way around; everything is mixed up. We have to put back some order and put things as they should be. The Minister of Finance did not say that in his budget speech yesterday and the spokesmen for the Progressive Conservative party and the New Democratic Party avoided making such proposals. They have good intentions, but they did not suggest any measure to do something. We should remove those who are not qualified to manage our economy and give that responsibility to the people's representatives elected by the people. They are the ones who should assume that responsibility.

● (1622)

[English]

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): As the first supporter of the government speaking on the budget, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for what he has produced in what are agreed to be very difficult circumstances. The minister has come up with a prudent, responsible and equitable budget which goes a long way to both stimulating the economy and also showing the national and international community that the government is wholly responsible in its position today and in the circumstances that limit it. I think that the responsible comment in the press tends to confirm this fact.

The official critic for the opposition, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), spoke, I think somewhat irresponsibly, on a number of issues and failed to a large extent to come to grips with some of the real benefits and concerns in the budget. He gave a very lengthy, gloomy résumé of what he saw to be the problems in the economy. He referred to matters like paper clips, floor mats, and his concerns about Petro-Canada, all inaccurate and ominous statements about the national state of the economy; but he is filled with hope that there will be a Tory government in 1979.

I believe it was Samuel Johnson who said that if a person marries for a second time, it is the triumph of hope over experience. Every now and then I think that the public mind tends to forget the years under Tory governments. Mercifully we have not had too many of them, but those we have had are a very sharp reminder to any who have experienced the mismanagement, irresponsibility and reactionary character which they have imposed. Whether it was R. B. Bennett or the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), they were dismal and hapless performances.

When the hon. member for York-Simcoe speaks of his high hopes for the Clark government, as he refers to it, I suggest that these hopes are perhaps excessive or optimistic. As hon. members may be aware, 1979 has been designated by the United Nations to be the International Year of the Child, but I do not think that members opposite should hope that it will be the year of a Clark government. I do not think that the International Year of the Child should be taken as an automatic assumption that we will have a Clark government.

Listening to the hon. member for York-Simcoe last night and today would suggest to any new arrival to this parliament or to the country who was listening to his speech that Canada has had a deplorable ten years economically and is on the verge of financial collapse. All the facts, however, are contrary to that statement, and these facts have been stated both by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance, who last night, for instance, stated that in this past year 362,000 more Canadians were employed and that our exports reached an all-time high.

A recent report of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) on the annual survey of the capital intentions of the large industries in Canada shows that there is going to be a very distinct strengthening in capital intentions. In other words, all the measures and indices that are currently revealing themselves show that, far from the economy being in the depressed and deplorable state that the hon. member would try to convince the Canadian people it is in, in reality it is showing real signs of improvement. The record of the past ten years has been considerably brighter than he would suggest.

One need only refer to the statistics supplied by the OECD to confirm this. They show, for instance, that the rate of growth in the labour force in Canada between 1968 and 1977 was the highest of all member countries. The cost of living index for 1978 showed the United States had the smallest increase, Canada was second, then came West Germany, Sweden, Switzerland, Belgium, Denmark—countries that the hon. member tried to suggest last night and today had done much better than Canada. Food prices are shown as being the least costly in Canada in 1978, with the United States coming second. The rate of growth in real domestic product between 1968 and 1977 showed Canada first. There is much talk about the need for greater stimulus through their regrettable tax proposal in the area of housing starts, yet Canada is listed second amongst the countries from 1972 to 1977. Belgium came first and the United States third.

It is one thing for hon. members opposite to engage in the cut and thrust of parliamentary debate, one thing for them to try to fool themselves. But I suggest that at a time when a lot of Canadians are looking for leadership from parliament, and are expecting some degree of responsibility, for the official financial critic of the official opposition to try to cast such a spurious pall of pessimism across the Canadian scene, suggesting that our economy is in a shambles, does no credit to him, to his party or to his country.

I should like to touch on some aspects of the budget itself for a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, and on some things other budgets in the recent past have provided in the area of small business. The hon. member who last spoke suggested that nothing was done for small business in this budget. I would point out that the provisions relating to development and the increase in the employment allowance are two notable features which mean a great deal to small business people. These come on the heels of recent changes which have given support to small business.

In the provision for the reduction of the manufacturing tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent, it should be remembered that 8,000 of the 9,000 members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association are involved in small business. The vast number of manufacturers in Canada fall into this category. The reduction of this tax will not only stimulate big industry but will have a marked impact on the prosperity of industry as a whole in Canada in which small business is dominant.

The pattern in tax policies that now exists in Canada for small business has cut a wide swath. I reminded hon. members before of the very real accomplishments of the government. We have a tax system for small business which is more favourable than that of any other country in the world.

I do not say this, as the hon. member for York Simcoe would, simply because I want to say it or hear it said, and hope somebody is going to believe it. I say it because other commentators, such as Mr. John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, say it. The report that was issued by the Minister of Finance last night gives a careful study of the comparative tax systems of the United States. The hon. member for York-Simcoe tried to assert theirs was so much more beneficial than Canada's but he had not read the report.

The report states it is evident that the Canadian system is considerably more generous than the United States system. Canada extends the low rate of a significantly larger amount of small business income and does not impose any special penalties on the sheltering of business income in the corporate entity, it points out. The report also says that the combined corporation and personal tax burden on corporation income is much lower in Canada than in the United States due to the presence of the dividend tax credit. It says that the credit causes the combined corporation and personal taxes on small business income to be even lower than the personal tax on, say, wages and salaries.

When you consider the special tax rate for small business which results in some 20 per cent or 21 per cent less tax being paid than is paid by larger companies, and add to that the recent tax change whereby family businesses have been provided with roll-over provisions so that intergenerational transfers can take place without the application of the capital gains tax, when you consider the elimination of the sales tax payable by small businesses representing 20 per cent of all the manufacturers in Canada, with almost 50 per cent of them being eligible for a much reduced filing of returns system, when you remind yourself that as of last spring we have had a far more liberal provision for write-offs of losses against other income, then I think I can say with confidence, without going into a number of other measures which have been passed by the government to help small business in the way of tax reform, that it amply substantiates my point that this government has set its sights on small business and has helped them to an extent that no other country in the world can demonstrate in the area of taxation.

I think as the member of parliament for Mississauga, an area in the industrial heartland of Ontario, I should point out that the greatest job-creation vehicle, the greatest engine for economic growth, is the manufacturing sector. I was very pleased that the Minister of Finance addressed this area and provided relief in the form of a reduction in the manufacturers' sales tax so that this important sector will receive the stimulus it needs to generate the sort of jobs we need in Canada.

I should like to say something about the accusations concerning the Petro-Canada transaction. I think it is unfortunate that the hon. member for York-Simcoe attempted to cast doubts on the merits of this proposal. Of course, he was an active member of the energy committee. Many of us who sat on that committee remember his dogged opposition and his attempt to filibuster passage of the bill. From the inception of the idea of Petro-Can it was said that, apart from the United States, no other western industrial country lacked a government oil company. British Petroleum belonged to the British government, the French government owned a company, the German government had a company. All these government-owned companies act as a balance—a player at the table in their country's national strategies to counteract the overwhelming influence of the great international oil companies that are dominant elsewhere. Canada is particularly vulnerable as a major oil producer where all the major oil companies doing business have been foreign dominated, foreign owned and foreign managed. When I say the United States is an exception, it must be remembered that three or four of the largest oil concerns in the world are based in the United States, which has a very real interest or control over their policies. Canada lacked this.

Today, by virtue of this transaction, Petro-Can if fulfilling the mandate it was given, which is to equip itself to be a player at the table and thus provide a kind of balance against the policies of the major oil companies. The suggestions made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe that a vast new debt is being placed on the shoulders of the Canadian taxpayer, when the reverse is true, is a misleading comment. Whether it was deliberate or not, I am not prepared to say. It is well known that Petro-Canada is financing the acquisition through banking sources of its own negotiations. The payment of these loans will be paid out of cash flow from the combined assets of the two companies, amounting to some $232 million annually. The banks that have assisted in financing this acquisition have done so with hard-headed realism because these loans are not being guaranteed by the federal government, which is the advice I have.

Therefore, I suggest his representations that somehow the Canadian taxpayer is having money extracted from him that should otherwise be put into homes or into other forms of activity in Canada is entirely misleading. I suggest it should be revealed as such and the hon. member should rise in his place and point out to the Canadian people, through parliament, the inaccuracy of his statement.

The hon. member's anxiety to show up the malevolence of Crown corporations as he sees it was revealed in his condemnation of the Export Development Corporation. Here is a corporation that has never had a loss. It consistently earns a profit, it has created thousands of jobs in Canada for foreign projects and has insured projects by Canadians. It has seen hundreds of millions of dollars invested at no cost to the Canadian taxpayer, and it has given great opportunities to Canadian manufacturers. Yet the hon. member and others over there say the policy of the Export Development Corporation is to export Canadian jobs, somehow trying to suggest that there are projects abroad that, if Canada does not agree to do them, will not get done.

By using these red herrings, and by making them a large part of his condemnation of the very responsible budget that was delivered last night, the hon. member has shown the bankruptcy of his own ideas and that he is incapable of meaningful criticism. The hon. member is filled with hopes for a Clark government. Some of us, however, were struck by the inability of himself and his colleagues to draft even their motion in opposition, with the result that we had to take valuable time to straighten up what should surely have been a simple task, and not recite again what parliament had seen fit to dispose of previously.

I would like to turn to the question of mortgage interest deductions. This is a subject that we are going to hear a great deal more about. I think there is a real misunderstanding among a lot of people as to what should constitute an equitable tax system. I was reading a comment the other day in an American paper on tax policy. The question of tax in the American system was discussed. It spoke of the "three martini lunch". I know that the hon. member for York-Simcoe is a man of abstemious habits and I certainly would not accuse him of having a three-martini lunch, although the content of his speech would seem to indicate some blurring of ideas.

The three-martini lunch, the expense account lunch, was one element in the ability of people with large incomes to treat themselves to rich meals on a daily basis and write them off against income tax in a way that citizens of poorer status cannot do. This is greatly resented by many people who hear about expense accounts. I do not suggest there are many business people in Canada who take advantage of this type of tax deduction.

The American system also provides for donations to museums or art galleries by people in very high income tax brackets. They are able to take the entire donation and write it off against their taxes. While indeed the art gallery may be the beneficiary, frequently people in the 75 per cent tax bracket are able to create for themselves a very substantial tax relief in a way that is not available to ordinary citizens. The esteem of such individuals is raised in the eyes of the community and the art gallery benefits. Nonetheless, it is a deduction from income tax revenue which must be raised in other ways from somebody else. Therefore, the burden falls on those who do not have the means to contribute to such charities.

Then there is the deduction the Americans have for municipal tax free bonds. Again, the municipalities are the beneficiaries. They get money which is invested by wealthy people in high income brackets who then get tax-free income from these tax-free municipal bonds. Nonetheless, the fact that those taxes are not received by the federal government from these wealthy citizens means that the over-all tax has to be higher. I suggest once again there is something basically inequitable about that deduction.

The United States allows for what hon. members opposite have been advocating for the last few weeks, that is, the deduction of mortgage interest and municipal taxes. Who is entitled to enjoy this benefit? People obviously who have initial capital to invest in real property in homes, and people who are paying municipal taxes. What of the ederly people who have already paid their mortgages off and have spent their lives doing so? Out of their modest income they must pay the full tax without such a reduction for mortgage interest. What of the poorer people who, by necessity, remain tenants? There must be a growing number of them due to the high cost of buying a home. They must watch while those who enjoy home ownership and a larger income deduct the interest on their mortgage payments from their income. So again, what are the consequences? Some people get a benefit and others do not, and the over-all rates of taxation must be higher so that the system as a whole may raise the tax revenues needed.

The Tory idea sounds good and it sounds as though it will create a lot of new housing. The fact is, if you trace these kinds of deductions you see they are essentially inequitable. If we have this kind of inequity in a tax system where poorer people on modest incomes see people across the street enjoying rich expense account living, making handsome donations to art galleries and writing them off against their taxes, buying tax free bonds or deducting all their mortgage interest or municipal taxes, somehow there will be a massive number of people in this country who will say: "Our basic tax system is unfair, I have no respect for it, and consequently I have no respect for the government that imposes it."

I suggest it is not enough for an opposition, loyal or otherwise, to come forward with measures which would create growing inequity in our taxation system. The Minister of Finance last night produced a budget which maintained a consistent attitude toward this whole question of equity. Some commentators in their wisdom criticized it as a business budget without noting the number of measures which took away certain of the advantages business has been getting, such as the loophole provision for debentures and preferred stock being classified as equity instruments whereas they are really debt instruments. This is one area where business will have to pay more for its borrowing.

The budget as a whole leaned toward the creation of tax relief. Consumers will benefit from the reduction in the tax on manufactured goods. Also, we have built into the system the indexation of taxes so that where there is an increase in the cost of living citizens will enjoy some protection. There is also the raising of the exemption so that families pay less tax when costs are higher.

I simply wish to reiterate that while the economy is not as strong as we would wish it to be, and while there are great ills afoot in this country and in the world, I consider that the Minister of Finance has approached his very difficult task—and let no one doubt that he has on his shoulders as heavy a burden of responsibility as any minister of finance in the history of this country—with optimism, with intelligence, with courage, with prudence and with wisdom.

We in this country often feel that it is open season on all politicians and that they can be criticized at will. That is fair game. But I do think it is irresponsible for an opposition, which for some reason or other is now dreaming ever more positively that it will form a government, to cast such doubt upon the economy as to lower the self-esteem of the Canadian people and their standing in the eyes of the world. I believe that in the months ahead the revitalizing of the economy, the renewed growth of our industry taking advantage of the lower rate of the Canadian dollar, the increasing productivity of the workers, the increased trade opportunities and the stimulation afforded by this budget, will enable us to show that the government and the Minister of Finance have rendered Canada very effective service in the budget which has been brought down.

I do not know whether it is possible to call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, but if it is I would so recommend.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed we call it five o'clock?

Mr. Ellis: I think the minister has used his time. With all due respect, perhaps I might call it five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the suggestion that we call it five o'clock. Is that agreed?

Mr. Abbott: I was prepared to call it five o'clock but I do have one or two more comments to make and if it is not five o'clock I had better carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The minister still has two minutes in which to conclude his remarks. Does he have consent to conclude his remarks?

Mr. Abbott: I presume that if I do have two minutes left I do not need the indulgence of the House to use them. I am sorry the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has only just arrived. I had hoped he would have listened, a chastened figure, to what I had to say, but he is a busy man and will have to read my remarks. I would have liked him to be here, though. I heard him on television explaining his position on mortgage deductions and it did not seem to me he was quite clear about it. I do not know how much time he has spent reviewing the experience in the United States, but no doubt at a later stage he will want to consider whether his proposal is as responsible as he thinks it is at the present time.

Last night, when we talked about the inequity of certain people not being homeowners and thus not being in a position to take advantage of a mortgage allowance, the hon. member for York-Simcoe gave us the impression that somehow, just because some people are tenants and want to become homeowners, the problem is corrected.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I have to interrupt the hon. gentleman. His allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ellis: As I indicated a while ago, Mr. Speaker, I will now call it five o'clock. I know the Leader of the Opposition has a very strong stomach but I doubt he could stand reading the drivel we have been hearing for the last while.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is five o'clock anyway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order.

At 4.59 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

USE OF SIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, to move as follows:

That this House calls on the government to set aside, as bureaucratic "snoopery" which interferes with the civil rights and privacy of Canadians, the regulations under law under which social insurance numbers must be produced, failing which 25 per cent of the interest on bonds is held back and the sale and purchases of stock without such a number is denied.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the movement of grain out of Manitoba has almost stopped and, according to sources in the grain industry, the province of Manitoba will not see any significant movement of grain until January, 1979, at the earliest, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That Canadian grain cars be recalled immediately from the United States and pressed into service, moving barley and lower grades of wheat out of the province of Manitoba so that Manitoba farmers will have some available cash with which to pay their bills.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONDITIONS ON BLACKFOOT RESERVE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development personally acquaint himself with the deplorable housing conditions on the Blackfoot reserve, where there are 239 families living in 104 houses; 126 houses without plumbing, running water and sewage disposal; 21 to 22 people crowded into three bedrooms, instances where there are five families jammed into a single substandard home and, further, that the minister meet with the chief and council to discuss the band council resolution seeking to complete a housing study which is an integral part of a workable housing construction plan.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for discussion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous agreement. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour):

That in commemoration of the Prime Minister's discourse to Ontario Liberals on Friday, November 17, this House names November 17 as a National Day of Reason to be celebrated by a shutdown—

AIRPORTS

RENT-A-CAR POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, affecting car rental agencies at major Canadian airports and, specifically, the failure by MOT, to the detriment of other car rental firms, to resolve a dispute with Host Rent-a-Car Ltd., which allegedly owes MOT in excess of $1 million; this at a time when the government, in its current budget, is attempting to maximize revenues from airport facilities, even to the point of drastically increasing an air travel tax to the detriment of many regions.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Minister of Transport cause to be exercised those rights conferred upon the department under the existing contract with Host Rent-a-Car Ltd., allowing for eviction after 15 days for arrears in payments and a lien on the company's automobiles to expedite the settlement of some of the matters at issue.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be aired for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

RATE OF INFLATION—LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance, who is just coming into the House. As the Prime Minister, in Toronto over the weekend, told Ontario Liberals that we in the opposition and the media were his enemy in that we are too critical, would the Minister of Finance tell the House how we can put a better slant on our current 8.2 per cent inflation, bearing in mind that inflation was about 4 per cent when the Prime Minister first took power, which is well up from the 2 per cent average prior to his gaining power in this country?

● (1412)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to tell the hon. member that indeed I was in the House. Since he saw me circulating, I do not know why he took the occasion to tell them on television that I was not in my seat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. MacKay.]

Mr. Chrétien: I was here at two o'clock. I think the hon. member is not seeking information; he is just trying to make some political points.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, who must slip around so quietly that certainly I did not perceive he was in the House earlier.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: My follow-up question to the Minister of Finance deals with unemployment. Could he tell us how we should interpret the present unemployment level in Canada of 8.2 per cent, bearing in mind that when the Prime Minister took power it was a mere 4 per cent? I ask this question in the context of the Prime Minister's suggestion that we are a little too critical, judging from his remarks in Toronto.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, he said that opposition members were a little bit too critical because the financial critics of the opposition never mentioned that we have created 2.3 million new jobs in Canada in the last seven years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. In due course, I hope he will try to explain his answer to the 900,000 people who are still out of work in this country.

Mr. Alexander: Plus the hidden jobless.

Mr. Stevens: Since Canada, for four years in a row, has been the only industrial nation to run a current account world deficit, would the minister tell the House in what way this has been good for Canada, bearing in mind that while we likely will lose $4 billion to $5 billion internationally this year, Italy, France, Britain, West Germany and Japan all will run substantial surpluses in their current positions with the rest of the world?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking me to compare the economy of Germany or France with that of Canada, a country which must develop its monumental resources year after year in order to boost its economy from coast to coast and from Windsor to the North Pole, which is very difficult to do. Obviously, over the years, Canadians have been obliged to borrow capital to develop their vast country and that is why we now have current account deficits. But I want to mention that among all western hemisphere countries, Canada is the one which has the largest per capita trade surplus.

[English]

MARITIMES—EFFECT ON ECONOMY OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, can the minister explain, or perhaps tell the House what steps, other than those announced in the budget, he intends to take to offset the 10.75 per cent increase in the prime rate in the slow growth regions of the country, especially in the five eastern provinces which already account for over half the total unemployment in the country, and on which provinces this high interest rate will slow growth considerably more?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have put many more resources at the disposal of the Minister of Employment and Immigration for his program this winter to cope with the problems of unemployment. In turn, particularly to help the maritime provinces in developing and having more investment, we have doubled from 10 to 20 the investment tax credit. We have done the same for research and development. This is the first time, since I became the Minister of Finance, that we have found enough flexibility in our policies to have fiscal policies which are conducive to more growth in the maritimes and the rest of Canada, and to have a special fiscal policy for the maritimes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the minister is attempting to salvage what is left of his reputation as Minister of Finance, and the Prime Minister is attempting to explain away ten years of mismanagement by the government. According to the 1977 figures of Statistics Canada, especially in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, family incomes have fallen behind by 4.5 per cent in real terms, thereby adding another 300,000 Canadians to the list of those already below the poverty line. Since this is something the minister cannot be proud of, perhaps he can explain why it is so. Let him explain that away.

● (1417)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the night of the budget I explained that in the last three years Canadians have increased their net income by 7 per cent while our southern neighbours have seen their net income go down by 2 per cent. I think that is a performance we should be proud of.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, keeping in mind the slow growth rate of the country and the government's pitiful record in regional development, perhaps the minister and his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, will look at what has been happening in the New England states adjacent to the Atlantic provinces, particularly at their growth rates and their rates of unemployment—which are the envy of the country—to determine what they are doing right and what this government is doing wrong. Has the minister examined that?

Oral Questions

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PRICE OF TURKEYS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. This morning, Ken Crawford, president of the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency, said that wholesalers in the turkey business in Canada are withholding some 50 million pounds of turkeys from the market on an artificial basis in order to drive up prices before Christmas. He also predicted that if the government does not force them to release these 50 million pounds of turkeys, the price paid by Canadians will be the highest we have experienced in the last 45 years.

I would ask the minister whether he is aware of that situation and, if so, what is he doing to prevent the wholesalers from driving up prices artificially?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that. As a matter of fact, during the summer and on several occasions since, I have made public statements urging marketing boards to increase the production of turkeys as an alternative to beef with such high prices. I have taken an opposite approach, and I am certainly surprised by this particular set of events.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the marketing board says we have 50 million pounds of turkeys artificially being held back by the wholesalers, not the marketing board, with another 50 million pounds of turkeys now in the process of being killed and put on stream, which is about half the turkey production in this country. So the turkeys are there.

Since the farm price for turkeys went up by four cents a pound, and according to a government study in August the consumer price has gone up by some 15 cents a pound, I would ask the minister whether he has considered referring this matter to the combines investigations branch to determine whether this comes under consumer gouging or price fixing by the turkey wholesalers of this country.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am alarmed by the allegations of the hon. member, and I certainly will pursue the matter.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister will soon receive in his office the press statement by the turkey marketing agency of Canada, and from the president who held a press conference this morning, saying the things I am now saying in the House, namely, that as a result of this artificial stockpiling by the wholesalers, the retailers have now gone to the Canadian turkey marketing agency asking it to press for a further importation of turkeys from the United States to the tune of some three million pounds.

I would like to ask the minister whether he can assure us he will recommend to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the supplementary import permit be denied and that, instead, he will force the turkey wholesalers to put on stream these turkeys they are holding back in order that we can have more jobs in Canadian agriculture and processing.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to pursue the recommendations made by the hon. member, but I want to check the facts first.

THE BUDGET—ECONOMIC GROWTH

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Now that he has admitted real growth in the country will be around, or less than, 4 per cent this year, yet only 13 months ago he was saying we must have growth of at least 5 per cent or 6 per cent if we are to bring unemployment right down, I would ask the minister whether the government is giving up the proposition that one of the functions of budget-making, and one of the functions of economic policy-making, is to create reasonably full employment in the country.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is always the objective of the government to create as much employment as possible and to review the level of unemployment. At the same time, we have to set our policies against the flexibility we have in present circumstances. Of course, we have had 4 per cent growth, or close to it, rather than 5 per cent as expected. There is less growth in all OECD nations than predicted. Even with a growth of 4 per cent, as I said, we managed in the last year to create 368,000 new jobs, while with 5 per cent growth last year we predicted we were going to have less than 300,000 jobs. So under the circumstances I think we have done quite well in terms of employment over the last 12 months.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am always astonished when the Minister of Finance quotes figures for growth of jobs. That is totally irrelevant; the question is how many people are out of work and what is the unemployment rate. That is what is important. It is also clear from the budget that the minister was not really making any really concerted attack on inflation. Given the fact that for the last 40 years the goal of budget-making has been to have relatively full employment and reasonable price stability, I am trying to discover, through my questions to the minister today, what were the goals of this particular budget, which is doing nothing about unemployment and nothing about inflation. What was the Minister of Finance trying to achieve in this budget?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, through the different measures that we have put forward, we have reduced income taxes paid by workers in Canada by almost $2 billion. We have also helped, thereby, to put more money in the hands of the people to buy more goods next year. We have also reduced the sales tax in order to reduce the cost of those goods which Canadians will be buying. At the same time as doing all that, we have managed to reduce the cash requirements of the government, because in the month of August we were able to produce some cuts in expenditures.

The policy of the government is to make more money available in the hands of the workers, and to lower prices. In doing so, we will be more competitive and, in being more competitive, we will have more people working in Canada's labour force.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I come back to the Minister of Finance because I think this is an important point. One has to be pragmatic and take into consideration what the minister has provided in his budget. Under the budget, neither unemployment nor inflation will be substantially reduced in this nation. Am I correct in understanding that the minister has said today that the principal goal of this budget was to reduce the cash requirements of the government? Is that the major aim of budget-making in Canada at the present time?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have just clearly indicated that the purpose of this budget was to control the level of inflation which has varied this year between 8½ per cent and 9 per cent. We hope that this level will be reduced next year to 6½ per cent. We hope also to create next year some 250,000 additional new jobs, which indicates that we are very concerned about the level of employment in Canada, and we have succeeded in introducing such a budget while reducing the cash flow requirements from $12 billion to $10.7 billion.

DECLINE IN MANUFACTURED EXPORTS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Between 1970 and 1976, Canada's share of the world market for manufactured exports fell from 6 per cent to 4.7 per cent. At the same time, the world demand for manufactured exports was increasing at an amazing rate.

I would ask the Acting Prime Minister, does he agree with the analysis of the Science Council of Canada's, Mr. John Shepherd and Mr. John Orr—this being a government appointed agency, by the way—that the real weakness in Canadian industry is in the area of fully manufactured goods? If the Acting Prime Minister agrees with that, what steps is he going to take to overcome this weakness, or does he think that these statements are balderdash?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that these statements are balderdash, even though when repeated by the hon. member they have not improved in transmission. They are serious views which will be taken into account by the government in its ongoing effort to develop and implement an industrial policy in Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am glad the Acting Prime Minister does not believe that these statements are balderdash. Could he explain to the House why the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has said that the Science Council experts are talking balderdash, as reported on November 13 in the Montreal Gazette and in every other newspaper that carries Canadian Press reports? The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has said that they are talking balderdash, and I quote him: he said, "What do they know about running a business or the real business world?" Who speaks for the government in this matter, the minister, who spouts balderdash, or the Acting Prime Minister who has just answered my question?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would not conclude that the use of the word "balderdash" is a matter of government policy. I hope it does not become a matter of great concern in the Conservative caucus.

PUBLIC UTILITIES TAX REFUNDING

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Some ten days ago I asked him about a pending government decision with regard to the public utilities tax refunding act. He indicated it would be decided at that week's cabinet meeting. Is the minister now in a position to tell the House whether there has been a decision? Has it been indicated to the ministers of finance of the provinces, and is he prepared to tell the House what the government is prepared to do about this question?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position today to report anything new to the House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the hon. minister tell me whether he has the concurrence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in regard to this policy as enunciated by the President of the Treasury Board, since this proposal mostly affects the province of Alberta in a very negative way?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I just said that when the time comes, I will report to the House of Commons. Discussions within cabinet are not for public exposure. I am going along very well with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Crosbie: Balderdash!

RCMP INVESTIGATION OF BOEING CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It is now more than 18 months since the first published reports that Boeing was making so-called dual contract payments to its agents in Canada.

Will the minister tell the House approximately when the RCMP investigation was begun, whether there has been an interim or progress report since then to a minister or ministers and, for the record, when does he expect the final report?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter was raised by me on a number of occasions with the RCMP. In reply to the hon. gentleman's question, I can only indicate to him that, as has been the practice in the past, the investigation is ongoing. I cannot advise the hon. gentleman at this time when it will be concluded, but I can indicate to him that I will be pleased to report to the House any progress in the matter.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister neglected to mention that I was told by the government a month ago that if I would be patient I would soon be satisfied one way or another with an answer. As Boeing stated that they executed dual consulting agreements in connection with sales in Canada, it would seem logical for the inquiry into this matter to start with the individual or company most likely to know the practice of Boeing during dual consulting agreements, that is, the regular consultant for Boeing in Canada. Has this been done? Can the minister tell me that and, if not, will he undertake to find out and report back to the House?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the question the hon. gentleman poses requests information that would reveal the nature of the investigation and the progress of that investigation, which is something which I am not at liberty to do. In terms of the undertaking that he wishes me to give, I cannot give it.

DISPOSABLE INCOME FOR CANADIAN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question arising from an earlier question to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister inform the House how he can talk in his budget and, again, in answers given today, about the need for a greater competitive position between Canada and the United States and at the same time stress the fact that real disposable income for employees in Canada has risen in real terms by 7 per cent, while it has declined in the United States by 2 per cent? It seems to me those two statements are in direct conflict and I should like the minister to explain.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suggest there is nothing wrong in saying that the situation of Canadian workers has improved over the past three years. We must see to it that the competitive position between Canada and the United States does not deteriorate in the future because of excessive increases in wages and prices. One does not contradict oneself when one says to Canadian employees that they have improved their situation over the past three years and that they must limit their demands in the future to help Canada maintain its current competitive position with the United States.

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Finance tell us, at this time, whether or not the disposable income of a Canadian worker should increase at a faster rate than, or at least decrease at the same rate as that of his American counterpart in the years to come, so that we can maintain our competitive position?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to make a statement that will cover the next ten years. I can only say that, at this moment, the Canadian economy has recovered its competitive position with the economy of the U.S. and that we will have to take all the necessary precautions so that we do not lose it.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON CANADIAN U.F.C. FINAL NOT TELECAST

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Secretary of State, but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister. Last Saturday, two Canadian universities, the University of British Columbia, the western champion, and Queen's University, the eastern champion, were playing for the championship of Canadian university football. I would like to know why the CBC's French network did not televise this event which does much more for Canadian unity than the two old American films which were shown on that network?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will draw the hon. member's question to the attention of the Secretary of State who, I am sure, will be in touch with the CBC with respect to this matter.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISIONS RESPECTING CHILD ABUSE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In his absence, perhaps his parliamentary secretary or the Solicitor General would answer the question.

My question deals with the social problem of child abuse. Section 43 of the Criminal Code says:

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Every schoolteacher, parent or person standing in the place of a parent is justified in using force by way of correction . . . if the force does not exceed what is reasonable—

The Tree Foundation of Canada, which represents children who are abused and are being beaten, also asks whether this matter is under consideration by the Justice Department, so that when Bill C-51 returns to this House there will be sections in the Code regarding sanctions and with reference to child abuse; also other sections to protect children of this nation.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the matter of child abuse is of great concern to the minister. In that respect, one of the major concerns is related to the fact that given the very nature of the offences, most often they are not reported to police authorities. In that respect I would recall to the hon. member that on November 9, 1978, the subject matter of Bill C-204 in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East, respecting a Canadian bill of rights for children, was referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I think this would provide hon. members of this House with a very good opportunity to express their concerns and make suggestions to the minister with a view to amending the Criminal Code accordingly.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could get a statement at a later date, either from the parliamentary secretary or the Minister of Justice, on this subject—in light of the fact that 1979 will be the International Year of the Child. Would they take a hard look at the sections to the Code and the new amendments thereto, so children will be protected against abuse and beating, a problem which is becoming very prevalent and which is on the increase in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, that question as well as all those regarding the rights of children—and I refer particularly to the matter related to the custody of the children and the difficulties encountered by custodians to keep their children when one of the spouses leaves the province concerned—all questions respecting the rights of children are currently under study, and again I repeat that the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will provide a very good opportunity to examine those questions in detail and to make recommendations to the House.

[English]

RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMITTEE ON HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice. If the minister is concerned about this matter, as the parliamentary secretary seems to indicate, will he tell us why the minister has not taken any action whatsoever to implement any of the recommendations put forward by the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs which did a fairly exhaustive study on this problem about two years ago?

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, many recommendations made by this committee were contained in the provisions of Bill C-51 amending the Criminal Code, which should come back to the House during this session.

URBAN AFFAIRS

CMHC LAND-BANKING PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance.

In light of the cutbacks which were announced by the government in relation to Central Mortgage and Housing in August and September of this year, in light of the fact that the land-banking program has also been abolished by the government, and in light of the fact that the special adviser to the task force on land-banking said that "profits being made in suburban land development are very, very high," can the minister tell us how much money the Canadian taxpayer is giving to the private land developers as contained in the two specific measures in the budget relating to housing that were announced on Thursday night?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would take the trouble to read the documentation tabled in the House Thursday night, on budget night, he would find the exact figures.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that I have taken the trouble to do that. I can also assure the minister that those figures are not there. If the minister will check, I think he will find that those specific figures are simply not in the budget, just as the unemployment figures are not in the budget.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is not satisfied, he can always put the question on the order paper or put a question in writing. I do not bring the figures with me to every question period.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REDUCTION IN DEPARTMENTAL BUDGET

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the minister aware of a proposed $60 million cut in the Indian health services program of the Department of National Health and Welfare? If he is aware, did he make representations to the minister, on behalf of the Indians, and what was the minister's response?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure about the exact numbers. However, of course, the budget of my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, was affected by the recent cuts and it has had an impact on the Indian community. I have made that known to her. She had a very useful and constructive meeting with representatives of the Indian people across Canada and, as a result of that meeting, they have set up a working relationship to ensure that the impact is as minimal as possible.

FINANCE

TAX RESPECTING CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It relates to the situation of the new tax form, T-3010, which the Prime Minister may not be aware of but which came into effect January 1 last year, having to do with the filing of public information on charitable organizations, of which there are some 50,000 in the country.

I wonder, since the law went into effect on January 1 last year, with the filing to take place by March 31 this year, why it is that on May 12 the Minister of National Revenue—I think the Prime Minister may remember him; he used to be a member of this place and he is now in the other place—this information is not available, and in fact it goes against section 241 according to the legal information he had obtained. First of all, can he indicate why that discrepancy should exist at all, with respect to the Minister of National Revenue, and why the information that was to become available in March has not yet been made available either to the general public, members of parliament or in reply to any inquiries from the media?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Acting Minister of National Revenue who is not here I am pleased to advise the hon. gentleman that in terms of providing information it is not as a result of section 241 of the Income Tax Act; it is because there has been some delay in certain quarters in filing returns under the new legislation. That is, in large measure, as a result of the volunteer nature of the staffing of some of the public charities that have to make returns, and also because of the change in legislation which has necessitated additional information being made available to the charitable corporations that would require them to make a return at this time.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister explain why, in light of the recognized obligation on the part of the government as expressed by the Solicitor General in responding for the Minister of National Revenue, we still have no commitment on the part of officials to make this information public, and why the Minister of National Revenue would specifically write to me as late as May 12, 1978, indicating that the legal opinion he had received was to the effect this information could not be supplied?

What information has the Prime Minister gained from the Minister of National Revenue that he could be so far in disagrement with the answer just given by the Solicitor General?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to inquire. I take the question as notice.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POLICY VIS-À-VIS CHILE AND ARGENTINA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs: it is with regard to the steady deterioration of relations between Chile and Argentina.

As the minister is no doubt aware, this has caused considerable international attention. Can the minister advise the House and the country of Canada's posture regarding the dispute between these two nations, both enjoying friendly relations with Canada, strategically situated in South America, and whether this country, either alone or together with other nations, is doing anything to help resolve the matters at issue?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member's definition of a "steadily deteriorating" position would have been correct up until perhaps a couple of weeks ago. The word that I have received within the last week or so is that there has been an improvement and that the negotiations are proceeding.

I am not certain that I am at liberty to indicate the country concerned, but there is an optimistic expectation that a particular country, a third party, will be able to serve as a mediator or negotiator between Argentina and Chile. Some word on that may come either before the end of the present month or early in December. Up to the present time, as the hon. member knows, we have taken a totally neutral stance on the grounds that we did not feel it was a matter in which it would be appropriate for Canada to take sides, particularly in view of the fact that the United Kingdom was seeking to act in a mediating role previously. I repeat my last point, namely that it should be possible to announce something with regard to a new mediation effort within perhaps a week or ten days.

[Mr. Blais.]

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate the minister's answer. Can he state whether he has any indication of the attitude of Bolivia and Peru with regard to this? Reports indicate that they are poised to take appropriate action, perhaps to get back some of the territory they lost 100 years ago in the Pacific war, if any hostilities should begin, keeping in mind the territorial claims to the Antarctic which could be analogous to our claims to the Arctic. That is the reason I asked the question. I wonder if the minister has contacted Peru or Bolivia and possibly Brazil, to see what their posture has been.

Mr. Jamieson: I have not done so in the immediate past. I have had conversations with Brazil and Peru during the past year on this subject. I must say that I have not talked to Bolivia on it. Certainly, the impression I got at that time was that all the parties were anxious for an amicable solution. The hon. member said it properly when he indicated that this is a dispute of long standing. Obviously, the best solution would be through this kind of third party intervention that I am hopeful will come about in the next little while, and perhaps the other parties could be brought into that same over-all settlement. I agree with the hon. member that it does have certain ramifications for Canada in terms of the Antarctic, but I doubt very much if the parallel is very exact.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PROPOSED MERGER OF MANULIFE-STANDARD LIFE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It was reported at noon today that the proposed Manulife-Standard Life merger agreement had been cancelled. Can the minister indicate whether that is so?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have any official information on this. At one time I agreed to accept in principle, but subject to further study, the proposed merger. I understood last week that there was some problem between the two partners, but I do not know whether they have made any official release with regard to it. I will inquire.

ASSISTANCE TO PROFESSIONAL FOOTBALL TEAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister who is responsible for federal lotteries. It was learned this week end that Loto Canada has promised a Canadian professional football team $350,000 for improving its stadium facilities. As the minister knows, this parliament approved the extension of the original olympic lottery to the present Loto operation with the understanding that the distribution of profits would benefit amateur sport, fitness, the arts and so on, and not, I emphasize the word not, professional teams or organizations. Can the minister advise this House why this obvious change of government policy has taken place, particularly without having consulted parliament?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I would first refer the hon. gentleman to clause E2 of the final section of the memorandum of agreement with the provinces which clearly makes united distribution activities between the provincial and the federal government. This is the first co-operative venture by the Saskatchewan government-licensed Sasksport with Loto Canada. It is the first such action in this regard. I think E2 spells it out quite clearly. However, final arrangements as to amounts, dollars and so on, have not been made. The rather premature announcement by the Saskatchewan Rough Riders was taken up by Saskatchewan Information Services and put forward, in very favourable terms I might add. Further information will be forthcoming in a formal way in the near future.

Mr. Jelinek: The minister having read that answer, I would now like to ask her this. In the past she has made it clear in this House, as well as outside the House on a number of occasions, that Loto profits and distribution of profits from Loto Canada would not go to professional teams and organizations. Will she very clearly advise this House whether this is an isolated incident, or now that the government has changed its policies, whether it intends to distribute these profits to anyone as long as the provinces are in agreement?

Mrs. Campagnolo: No, Mr. Speaker. I can assure the hon. member that the philosophy of the lottery expenditures is still the same. What we are dealing with here is in the promotion and advertising section of the sale of the lotteries. We are looking, at co-operation in some 17 kiosks with Sasksport, selling both their tickets and ours, as was expressed in the federal-provincial agreement. This particular one would be over a three-year period. Saskatchewan officials are fully aware of and are in complete support of it. I believe that the hon. gentleman, as a friend of sport, might be as pleased, as I am, that this federal-provincial agreement and lottery are beginning to turn around some of the disagreements that have existed previously in sport, and of course he knows this facility is not limited to professional sport. A great deal of amateur sport also takes place in this facility.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It follows on questions last week to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the tax convention problem between Canada and the United States. I did not have a chance to ask the minister about this earlier. However, I know he is well briefed on all subjects. What is the present status of the negotiations with the United States regarding this tax convention problem whereby conventions held in Mexico and Canada do not receive the tax benefits, which is also linked to the border station problem involving telecommunications?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a rather complex question to try to answer briefly. The situation is that we are continuing to make our representations to the United States. As far as the administration is concerned, I think it is fair to say, as vice president Mondale indicated while visiting Canada, that they are prepared to do something with regard to it. However, when the legislation was introduced in Congress, there were certain waivers and related issues that were brought into play. As a result, the bill did not pass prior to the mid-term election. That is the status at the moment.

We continue to insist through my colleague, the Minister of Communications, that there is no linkage between the convention tax on the one hand and the border television issue on the other. However, a number of Congressmen have taken the position that one has a bearing on the other and we are seeking to make representations to them. I may say that members on both sides of the House have been helpful through the Canada-U.S. Parliamentary Association in making representations in this regard.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the complexity. There is obviously a dispute about linking these two issues. I am informed that some of the border stations have applied under the United States trade act for what is in effect retaliatory action and that that complaint is going to be heard by their commission on November 29. Is the government going to be represented at that hearing, or are we just going to read about it in the newspapers?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, we will certainly do considerably more than read about it in the newspapers. I would like to take the question as notice because I am not sure what form our presence is going to take. I know that Canadian broadcasting interests are going to appear. Whether it is appropriate for the government to appear before the United States or any foreign tribunal is another question. I would like to check it out from a legal point of view.

Income Supplement and the introduction of children's tax credits?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this legislation has not yet been passed. People in my department are looking very closely at this. We hope to be able to cope with the situation.

HOUSING

PROPOSAL TO AMEND NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, but I will put it instead to the Deputy Prime Minister because I think it affects him.

The failure of the government to extend existing neighbourhood improvement programs will have an enormous impact on programs across the country by curtailing government spending at the expense of municipalities. Municipalities will be forced to raise property taxes or renege on their commitments. In light of the fact that a notice of motion to amend the National Housing Act appeared on the order paper a number of times before October 31 and has since disappeared from the government notices set out in the order paper, will the Deputy Prime Minister say whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation enabling contributions to be made so that municipalities may live up to their commitments in this field?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is true that there was notice of a bill in the name of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and that it was later withdrawn. The reason it was withdrawn was to bring in the bill at a later point when certain policy matters had been finally resolved. That will be done soon, and the bill amending the National Housing Act will be brought before the House within a reasonably short period.

Mr. Brewin: In view of the housing needs of Canadians and the need to maintain employment may I take it from the reply of the Deputy Prime Minister that the government will make the necessary commitments to ensure that contributions will be made to municipalities so that they can proceed with essential housing, sewer and water programs? Will this be done after the matters referred to by the Deputy Prime Minister have been cleared up?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell the hon. member what will be in the bill. It will be a good bill, and I am sure the hon. member will support it, but its details will be disclosed later.

[Mr. Condon.]

URBAN TRANSPORTATION

DELAY ON PROJECT AT ATHALMER, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to ask my question of the Minister of Transport, but possibly his parliamentary secretary can be of assistance. Given increasing local concern about the inability to proceed on a much needed grade separation project at Athalmer, British Columbia, which is apparently dependent on the signing of a master agreement with B.C. regarding the urban transportation assistance program, will the minister personally intervene to expedite the completion and signing of that agreement?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, following my most recent conversations with the minister of economic development of the province of British Columbia, I think I can say that there were in fact discussions between the province and the municipality about the supply of fresh water for Castlegar. We are still hoping to find a mechanism which will enable us to help the municipality as much as possible to obtain that supplementary piece of equipment for its municipal services but at this time I cannot report any progress since there are ongoing discussions between both levels of government.

FORESTRY

FOREST MANAGEMENT INSTITUTE BUDGET REVIEW

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the Minister of State (Environment) is aware of a zero base budget review according to which the Forest Management Institute was under review, that the conclusion of this zero base budget review, among other things, was that the Forest Management Institute should not be cut and that it has since been cut by a cabinet decision? If the minister is aware that the zero base budget review came to this conclusion, can he explain why the cut was made?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware that there has been a zero base budget review of my whole department and that it has been gone over very thoroughly. I was not aware of the recommendation with respect to the Forest Management Institute, but I am very much aware that this institute has done much good work. I remind the hon. member that the work of the Forest Management Institute has not stopped. We have moved that work to what used to be called the Petawawa Research Station. We are contemplating giving that station a new name and giving new emphasis to the research program which is going on there. The Forest Management Institute is very much part of that work.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, since the minister is not aware of the recommendation regarding the Forest Management Institute, I wonder if he would agree that it would be a good thing to have that review looked into by the appropriate parliamentary standing committee. Will he ensure that a reference is made to that committee so that it might examine the documents involved and the cut proposed?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the committee can, of course, examine the estimates of my department. Its members can ask any question they want. However, the decision to move the Forest Management Institute to Petawawa has been made. A decision to move the Forest Fire Research Institute to Petawawa has also been made. There will be an amalgamation at that station which will contribute greatly to forest research in this country. The station will be one of the best forest research stations in Canada.

GRASSLAND NATIONAL PARK—DATE WHEN AGREEMENT TO BE SIGNED

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister say when we can expect an agreement between Canada and the province of Saskatchewan regarding the Grassland National Park to be signed? As the minister knows, the land owners involved have been waiting patiently for several years.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that was a subject of discussion during the course of the summer, and my latest information is that there has been a reconciliation in areas of difference. What I am not able to tell the hon. member at this point in time is whether we are close enough to an agreement to be able to predict a date. However, I will check that out and report back to the hon. member.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. I am curious as to whether the minister is aware of the resignations of five employees at the Edmonton regional offices of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, the resignations being due to what has been called gross mismanagement at the upper levels of the corporation. If the minister is ware of this, is his office conducting an inquiry into these resignations?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the management of the corporation is taken care of by a president and I am certain that if there were resignations and a new team was appointed it was done to ensure the greatest possible economic efficiency of the corporation.

Mr. Elzinga: Would the minister assure the House that he will do nothing to deter the appearance of the president of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation before the appropriate standing committee, if that committee wishes to hear evidence?

That is a pattern which is showing up, and that is exactly what is happening regarding those 2,300 miles of line.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACDONALD (EGMONT)—ANSWER OF SOLICITOR GENERAL DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give notice of a question of privilege arising out of today's question period. The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), speaking for the Acting Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), confirmed that access to information on registered charities has in fact been the law of this land since January 1, last year. On May 11 in raising this very same matter, which is reported at page 5316 of Hansard, I received a very clear indication that the information would not be made available, and the following day I received a letter from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) confirming in very definite terms that such information could not be made available.

Ordinarily I would proceed with the question of privilege at this point, but in view of the commitment by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to investigate the very great differences of opinion which presently exist between the Solicitor General, the information generally available about the provisions of that legislative action, and the communications directly from the Minister of National Revenue himself, I will await a further report from him. Certainly this situation parallels very closely the present situation confronting the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) and the question of privilege he has raised in this House.

MR. CHRÉTIEN—CORPORATE AFFAIRS—PROPOSED MERGER OF MANULIFE-STANDARD LIFE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I would like to answer a question asked by my friend, the House leader of the official opposition, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that indeed both Manulife and Standard Life have decided not to proceed with the merger.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege that is raised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), I would like to thank him for the answer. The question now is, what was the minister's involvement? As I understand it, is was a transaction involving $5.7 billion. Has there been approval of any kind given by the Minister of Finance with respect to the transaction itself, and has there been approval by the minister of the decision not to proceed? Would the minister be prepared to make a statement on motions so that we can understand exactly what did happen, and the involvement of the Department of Finance in that transaction?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, last summer the Superintendent of Insurance held talks with Standard Life and Manulife about the merger. Our position was that in principle we were not in disagreement with the merger, subject to verification of certain legal, accounting and actuarial problems, but the parties decided not to proceed, which concluded the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Statements by ministers.

POST OFFICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POSTAL RATES

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to make a brief statement on motions, and in particular to say a few words about the Post Office and Post Office rates. As hon. members will recall, on October 20 when I tabled the 1978 Post Office annual report, I also gave a statement to the press noting that, for the first time since the fiscal year 1971-72, the upward trend in the Post Office deficit had been reversed. I attributed our improved financial picture to the rate increase in the previous fiscal year, and to improved mail volumes.

The rate changes actually began with the two-stage increases of September, 1976, and March, 1977, and continued with the rate change of April, 1978. They are part of a staged process, not only to narrow the gap between revenues and costs but also to restore an appropriate balance between postal revenues and general taxation required to offset the costs of providing postal services to Canadians.

That balance had been changing over the years, with the taxpayer paying a higher percentage of postal costs and the postal user paying less. The portion of postal costs in excess of revenues, subsidized by government from general taxation, averaged 13.7 per cent during the 1960s and early 1970s, with no year exceeding 20 per cent. But rapidly rising costs outstripped the growth in revenues, and by 1975-76 the percentage of costs funded by government had risen to 49 per cent. Rate increases help to shift the balance back in the other direction. In fiscal year 1976-77 the percentage of costs funded by the government declined to 42.8 per cent. In the fiscal year ending March, 1978, subsidization through general taxation declined to 37.2 per cent. By asking the postal user to pay more for his share of the cost of mailing a letter, we help to reduce the cost to the taxpayer while increasing it for those who are actively using the service.

[Translation]

There are, of course, certain things that the Post Office cannot do. I cannot ask some Canadians to pay more for mailing their letters for the only reason that they live in one of the largest areas of the country far from cities or main transport systems. I cannot decide to serve some Canadians and not others because it would not be profitable.

[English]

The Post Office is a complex blend of service and business. Because it is a service the Post Office must provide basic, national mail coverage to all Canadians, wherever they live, for the same reasonable price. Rightfully, therefore, there must be some element of government funding to help provide this national service. But the public purse and the public patience both have limits. Because the Post Office is this hybrid of service and business, its stockholders, the people of Canada, have the right to expect that it will live by the same economic rules that govern any large business. That is the only way that the Post Office will keep its costs and revenue figures under control, and its demands on the pocketbooks of the taxpayers to a reasonable minimum.

On the costs' side of the ledger, wages and transportation continue as the major costs of doing business. For more than a year the Post Office has been cutting back on those budget items that do not contribute directly to the operational side of the business. This means stringent control over the use of man-years, less spending on administration, and limitations and cutbacks on some programs, and we are keeping at it daily.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the transport of mail is another very costly factor of postal operations. The Post Office can act in some sectors where they can control costs, through energy saving, the use and design of vehicles. It is more difficult to control other transport sectors, because the rates are set by airlines, railways and shipping companies. At this time when the cost of fuel is constantly increasing, transport companies can hardly control their expenditures and that is reflected in their rates.

[English]

Postal revenues are determined by mail volumes and postal rates. Mail volumes continue to increase, but at a low rate. Volumes for the past fiscal year were 5.9 billion pieces of mail, an increase of only 2.8 per cent over the previous year.

That leaves postal rates. Sensible and business-like measures to control costs, and vigorous action in the marketplace to increase volumes are contributing to an improved financial position. By themselves, however, these measures are not enough to bring down the size of the Post Office deficit. To be fully effective they must be coupled with rate action that will bring in more revenue.

We feel that an increase in postal rates is warranted at this time, Mr. Speaker. It could be viewed as a continuation of the process commenced in September, 1976, to restore an appropriate balance between postal revenues and the general taxation revenue needed to offset the costs of doing business. However, equally important, a postal rate increase now also will help to improve the financial position of the Post Office at a time when the department is preparing for the complex change-over to Crown corporation status. Accordingly, we propose to implement price increases to most classes of domestic and international mail to take effect at the beginning of the next fiscal year, April 1, 1979.

At the same time, the basic first class letter rate will be increased from 14 cents to 17 cents.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Lamontagne: Also there will be selective increases in other classes of mail and in some service fees. Full details of the new rates will be spelled out in a news release which will be issued from my department today. Also, postmasters will be given details of the rate revisions.

[Translation]

Taking into account what I have just said, Mr. Speaker, we suggest the implementation of rate increases for most mail classes at the domestic and international levels beginning next fiscal year, that is on April 1, 1979.

On that date, the basic rate for a first class letter will rise from 14 to 17 cents. There will also be rate increases for other mail classes and fees for some services. The new rates will be explained in detail in a press release which my department will be issuing today. The postmasters will also receive detailed explanations on the new rates.

[English]

Indeed, even with these increases, Canadians will be paying among the lowest rates of major western countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: Australians now pay the equivalent of 26 cents, and the French pay the equivalent of 30 cents. The people of Great Britain pay the equivalent of 19 cents Canadian for a first class letter. The current rate in the United States, expressed in Canadian equivalents, is approximately 17 cents.

While I am on the subject of postal costs and rates, it might be a propitious time to announce that the proposed rates for second class publications are the result of consultations with my colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). They were reached under the terms of a memorandum of agreement which we both signed on behalf of our respective departments.

Briefly, the agreement indicated that the Post Office will no longer be responsible for establishing postal rates for certain types of mail. Instead, the responsibility for reimbursing losses incurred through publishers' postal rates will be transferred to the Secretary of State. The effect of the agreement will be to reduce that portion of our deficit incurred by carrying publications for postage far below the cost of providing the service.

In conclusion, I hope I have demonstrated to hon. members of the House today that a postal rate increase is necessary, and that it will help to bring about a better correlation between postal rates and the cost of providing postal service. It is part of our ongoing efforts to reduce the size of the deficit which must be paid for by all the taxpayers of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Post Office

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, all hon. members are aware that the Canadian Post Office service, which used to be one of the most efficient in the world, in recent times has fallen upon less happy days. Unfortunately the Post Office Department has become the butt of a lot of humour across the nation doday.

I do not think the statement which the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) made in the House today will do anything to enhance the reputation of Canada Post, at a time when it is most urgently needed. As I listened to his presentation, I realized that it was almost a detailed repetition of the statement made in the House one year ago almost to the day. On November 21, 1977, his predecessor, the present Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), made a statement. That was almost identical to the one we heard today. If this type of procedure continues, successive postmasters general should dust off the old speech and rise in their places to table it as read.

At the outset of my remarks this afternoon I want to make the point that something much more positive than this annual, ritualistic increase in postal rates must take place if Canada is to have the quality of postal service which is urgently needed. I admit that the statement last year was a little more realistic than the one made today by the Postmaster General, because it indicated that there were some real problems which had to be be dealt with if we were to bring the growing deficit into line.

The Postmaster General indicated that there were two sources of revenue: volumes of mail and increased subsidies from general revenue. Unfortunately over the past decade the balance has been going in the opposite direction, as between the positive and negative. The subsidies from taxpayers' revenue have been going up, and the volumes have been decreasing. This point was made in specific terms last year when the then postmaster general mentioned, because of the growing problems in the Post Office, that the projected volumes of first class mail, which is the real revenue earner, were down by one billion pieces. Also he made the specific point that the parcel post volume was back to the level it had been 20 years ago. By personal investigation I know that situation has not improved during the past year.

If anyone visits the huge Gateway plant in Toronto, he will find that the mechanized parcel sorting facility, which still has to be automated, is not functioning as intended. Instead of having increased volumes, which might have derived from improved marketing procedures, most of the parcel post, except for experimental runs which are being conducted in order to keep the computers in operation—

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to tell the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) that it is true. If he visits the plant, he will find out for himself that the computers are not functioning as originally intended. Because his constituency is in that area, the hon. member knows that the Post Office has rented the Canadian Arsenal facilities in order to process the parcels manually, rather than using the expensive machinery and computers which were supposed to handle the mail at this time.

The essence of the Postmaster General's statement this year introduces a new philosophy into Post Office financing. Referring to the announced increases he said the following:

> They are part of a staged process, not only to narrow the gap between revenues and costs, but also to restore an appropriate balance between postal revenues and general taxation required to offset the costs of providing postal services to Canadians.

● (1522)

That is a new philosophy for financing the Canadian Post Office. It is almost a new mandate, as I am sure the hon. gentleman is aware that the mandate prescribed in Post Office regulations is to the effect that the Post Office is to provide postal service to the people of Canada at reasonable rates and at a standard of service adequate to meet their needs without incurring subsidies from general revenue.

The Postmaster General speaks optimistically of the declining deficit. I have the appropriate figures before me as compiled by the Canadian Tax Foundation in its report for 1977-78. This makes interesting reading.

In 1970 the Post Office Department registered a surplus of $14.3 million. The Post Office was then living within its mandate, providing an efficient service without incurring subsidies from general revenue. In 1971 there was a deficit of $31 million. In 1972 the deficit was $9.5 million. In 1973 the deficit increased to $26.4 million. In 1974 the deficit was $111.2 million. In 1975 the deficit was $252.4 million. In 1976 the deficit took a great leap to $468.9 million. In 1977 the deficit was $488.8 million, almost half a billion, and the estimated deficit for the current fiscal year, as indicated by the Postmaster General's own figures, has soared to over one half a billion, or $524 million. That is a pretty bad picture, as I am sure the hon. gentleman would agree, and these figures are from the Canadian Tax Foundation report. Coincidentally, they parallel the years this administration has been in power.

This is typical of the pattern of rising costs, soaring inflation, and other difficulties that have befallen the Canadian economy during the past ten years of the present Liberal administration.

In the few minutes that remain let me indicate to the Postmaster General that much more positive policies will have to be instituted if we are to reverse this unhappy state of affairs. This is not the first time the official opposition has outlined these matters in the House. The minister refers to a Crown corporation requiring additional infusions of money from the treasury. I suggest that does not necessarily have to be so.

As we have pointed out on several occasions, the Crown corporation method of organization and administration in the Post Office has been operating in the United Kingdom now for almost a decade. It was instituted in 1969 after very careful study and reports, both parliamentary and private. This is something we have been urging for the past several years in order that we can get at the facts.

Following this institution of the Crown corporation system in the United Kingdom in 1969, almost immediately there was a strike. That strike took place in 1971, so Crown corporations do not represent the solution to all the problems of the Post Office. This was a strike in that newly formed Crown corporation in the United Kingdom as a result of management failing to consult with unions on mechanization and automation programs. The process of mechanization was slowed down in the interests of labour-management relations.

Management and the unions came together, along with the postal users, in advisory committees where there was constant and continuous consultation. Training programs were instituted for supervisors and shop stewards in order that problems would be resolved on the plant floor as they arose rather than being allowed to accumulate in thousands of grievances as they have in Canada where there are some 10,000 plus grievances clogging up the present grievance process. Parliamentary investigations were organized on a regular basis to get at the root causes of problems in the British Post Office. The experiment of industrial democracy has been instituted, and this has induced in the British Post Office a spirit of co-operation rather than confrontation, and has resulted in returning the British Post Office to its former efficiency.

I maintain that exactly the same happy situation could obtain in Canada if the government would only provide the necessary leadership. The British Post Office is living within its mandate, showing a surplus of $83 million in postal operations at the present time.

My final suggestion to the Postmaster General is that he must do something about creating happier relationships with postal users. We have pursued this subject in a series of debates in the House in the last year, specifically regarding the method used by the government in increasing postal rates.

The Post Office Act, section 10, says this must be done by the authority of parliament through a formal legislative amendment. This was sustained by the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. As a result of the arbitrary procedure on the part of the Post Office Department one of the major postal users in Canada, periodical publishers, took the government to the Supreme Court. They lost the first round but are now appealing. I am not going to discuss that in any more detail today other than to point out that this is no way to create good customer relationships, with customers having to take the government to court because of the arbitrary manner in which it has increased their costs.

I am sure we all understand why the Canada Post Office is in such difficult straits today, and why it is not working as an efficient operation. Just a month ago we had the last confrontation between labour and management in the Post Office. I had hoped the Postmaster General might have used the opportunity of this statement to report some positive developments. The moment of truth is now upon the Postmaster General and the government. We have reached a point of no return.

If the Postmaster General thinks that the establishment of a Crown corporation will be the sunnum bonum, or a universal solution to all his problems, he is sadly mistaken. We insist that there must be a parliamentary inquiry so that the people who are most vitally concerned with postal services, the unions, the customers or postal users, will have a chance to appear before that committee to express their concerns. We are confident that if this sort of dialogue or consultation takes place, and if an atmosphere of co-operation replaces the present atmosphere of confrontation, we can restore the postal service to its position of high efficiency.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in responding to the Postmaster General's statement this afternoon first of all I want to observe that since 1972 this is the fourth postmaster general we have had. Can you imagine any kind of corporation operating with that sort of revolving door leadership—the fourth postmaster general in six years, or a little over a year and a half for each?

What has the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) announced today? He has announced a first-class mail rate increase from 14 cents to 17 cents, an increase of 21.5 per cent. For greeting cards he has moved the rate from 12 to 15 cents, an increase of 25 per cent, and this by a postmaster general who is so tough with the workers, saying that they have to hold the line. The average wage increase last year was 6.8 per cent. The increase in the cost of services is three times the average increase in wages last year. What increase has he made in the rate for junk mail? It is a marginal increase.

I cannot understand why the Postmaster General and the government continue to subsidize those who are obviously advertising to make money. Why are the taxpayers being asked to subsidize these corporations? Does it make sense that, with a very costly mechanized system and well paid workers, we subsidize junk mail in this country? I just do not understand that.

Since the Postmaster General has been in his post we have had two increases in postage rates and deteriorating relations between postal workers and Post Office management. As a matter of fact, asking this Postmaster General to run the Post Office is like asking Evil Knievil to park your car—it is absolutely hazardous. What is the Postmaster General's rationale for these increases? His rationale is that in the United States they pay the equivalent of 17 cents and in the U.K. they pay the equivalent of 19 cents. I can be equally ridiculous: in Uganda they pay the equivalent of 30 cents, and in Nicaragua they pay 27 cents. Service is what counts, and it is service that has been deteriorating.

My colleague from Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe tells me that to mail a newspaper first class from St. John's, Newfoundland, for example, to Ottawa, takes five to six days. The Post Office Department has not yet heard about the airways. The service just does not justify these massive percentage increases in postal rates at all.

I suggest to the Postmaster General in all seriousness that the people of Canada are looking to see how effectively the Post Office is run and how cost conscious it is. I want to put on record some of the obvious misuse of public funds taking place in the Post Office Department. The first one I want to deal with is the whole slew of grievances outstanding, and I want to deal specifically with the breach of clause 39.07 by the Post Office. There is an expenditure in the Post Office that should never have occurred. We have the case of the workers grieving the use of casual help in the Post Office. They wanted an adjudication. The Post Office Department appealed it to the Federal Court and lost that appeal. Then they took the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada.

I want to put on the record a statement by Mr. Corkery, the deputy postmaster general, in the submission he made to the Supreme Court of Canada. Paragraph six states:

> If the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in O'Toole is allowed to stand, the moneys that would be required to be paid out to all the grievors would exceed $2 million. Further, there would be substantial costs that would be incurred in the future.

There, Mr. Speaker, is an expenditure that was unnecessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is digressing and dealing with history rather than with raising postal rates. At the moment he is discussing the grievances of employees of the Post Office. We are presently setting up a mechanism to see that these are settled. Arbitration is going on and discussions are taking place with the union. Why does the hon. member not start discussing the rate increases?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would suggest that that is not a point of order. The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I understand the sensitivity of the Postmaster General; he has a thin skin, and with reason. He is asking the people of Canada for a rate increase, and they want to know how he can justify a rate increase. How efficiently has he been running the Post Office? How has he saved more money? It is going to cost us over $2 million, according to Mr. Corkery, to give justice to the people who have grieved, and that does not include the cost of litigation all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. When the case got to the Supreme Court of Canada it was thrown out, the court holding there were no grounds for appeal.

I wonder, whether the Postmaster General will now put the people of Canada to the expense of having all of the remaining 2,699 grievances, taken all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. That would amount to a pretty cost, but I suppose that he would say that it will come out of the Justice Department's funds. It still comes out of the taxpayers' pockets.

About a month ago we saw a great campaign being conducted in all the newspapers across the country, local as well as national. This campaign cost $150,000. Did it help solve the problems in the Post Office? Not one whit. What it did was make propaganda to enable the Post Office to amass public support against the inside workers in the Post Office. It did not move one piece of mail faster or more efficiently. I think that expenditure was an absolute waste of money and certainly should not necessitate a rate increase.

One must look at all of these things in total, Mr. Speaker. During this period 53,000 employees were called in by management, each one individually, for a period of one hour. For each employee there was a flip chart regarding the offer made by the Post Office to CUPW. This process was repeated a second time. In other words, 53,000 workers times two hours, times a base rate of $6 an hour, I work out at pretty close to $630,000, and that does not include the wages of management who had to take these people through the mulberry bush in going through this process for the benefit of the ego of Post Office management.

Another costly item is the provision of television cameras which have been set up in the Post Office to watch people sort mail. I think this is a cost which should be eliminated immediately, and the cameras taken out. Instead, effective line management in the Post Office should be developed. At least management would be able to talk with the workers when supervising them on the job. A bloody camera does not do that. No personal interrelationship or rapport is being developed within the Post Office with that kind of snooping.

I also want to raise the question of the proposed Crown corporation. This is another objection we have at this particular time to this increase of 21½ per cent in first class mail postage rates and 25 per cent for cards. It seems to me there ought to be a moratorium on any rate increases until this Crown corporation is put in place and is able to take a look at the needs of the Post Office and the way in which improvements can be made in service to the taxpayers of Canada. The way this whole system is going to work should be examined.

I know that the minister, in the twilight of his postmaster generalship, wants to feel important at this point. We can all appreciate that, and an ego massaging is going on right now. But he would have served the public better, I think, at this time, one month after creating havoc, and continuing to create havoc in the Post Office, and then having the gall to come here and tell the people of Canada that on April 1, 1979, there is going to be an increase in first class mail rates of 21½ per cent and a 25 per cent increase in rates for greeting cards, if he had got up in this House and shown that he had done something great for the people of Canada in terms of mail service.

I think it is absolutely imperative that there be no increase in rates whatsoever until the Crown corporation takes a look at the way the Post Office operates and how best the costs can be borne. It seems to me that is what the minister should be looking at, and not coming here making announcements on the eve of the defeat of this government. That is equally unacceptable.

Last of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to say in all seriousness that the government is using expediency. The Postmaster General says, "We are going to be tough; we are going to clean up those workers in the Post Office, and I am going to make this thing all service and business." I like that, Mr. Speaker! The twins of the minister's imagination—"This is a corporation of service and business." Having moved in the Post Office with Mr. Corkery from de Havilland, and a gentleman who has now gone to another department from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as well as Mr. Paré from Steinbergs, via Princeton or somewhere in the United States, all with the businessman's mentality, the minister is going to run the Post Office like a business.

He tells us, "We are going to make this thing pay its way, so we will increase the costs," and he uses this fallacious argument of comparing us with the United States, Uganda, and all the rest. They are the most ridiculous comparisons, Mr. Speaker.

What the minister has done is to use expediency in this announcement, rather than planned postal development. There is no planned postal development. It is an expedient measure with which he hopes to convince the corporate sector that we have a tough minister in charge and that things are going to start rolling. It is hoped there will be some financial support from the Liberal party when the bagman goes calling.

In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, I think if the Postmaster General were to do the honourable thing he would resign his position.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Hon. members opposite scream. All I ever heard in this House when the minister first came was that he was mayor of Quebec city and that there was never an industrial dispute there. But there never was a union either! Now he has found out what it is like to deal with unions, and not with pussycat unions or sweetheart unions, but tough unions that are concerned about working conditions.

I think if he were to do the right thing by the people of Canada he would do what—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The minister rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, first of all, the hon. member is always talking about the Post Office with a kind of masochistic delight. He seems to say practically anything he wants to say. I want to raise a few points, Mr. Speaker, that are absolutely false. When he said that we subsidize junk mail—we do not subsidize it—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Lamontagne: I can answer. Mr. Speaker, may I speak?

I think what he said was that we are subsidizing junk mail. That is absolutely false. We do not subsidize junk mail. He said that in Quebec city we have no union. Mr. Speaker, we have four unions that are members of respected international unions—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest to the hon. Postmaster General that he is now in a position of dispute or debate. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) rises on the pretence of a point of order and is proceeding to carry on a debate. I think it would be a debate we could all get into, and the Postmaster General should resume his seat unless he has a genuine point of order. I ask Your Honour whether he has a point of order and, if so, what it is.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to use the words of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). He is talking about debate. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has been on his feet for twenty minutes. He has not stuck to the original purpose of the Postmaster General's remarks in this point of order, which is to announce the rate increase. He is making a political speech for the benefit of his friends in the postal unions. I think order should be called. At the least the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) stuck to the topic.

Mr. Rodriguez: Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary is very sensitive. I can understand the sensitivity over there and the need for support. I doubt, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member is getting into a position of debate. He has used fourteen minutes, the time that was allotted to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and I would suggest that his time has expired.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the final proposal I make—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

Mr. Rodriguez: —with respect to these rate increases is that the Postmaster General ought to do the honourable thing and vacate that position, because certainly what he has announced today is expediency and not planned postal development.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will try to speak more briefly than the previous member, but I would like at least to congratulate the minister for having had the courage this afternoon to announce an increase in the postal rates and to propose turning the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation.

It is quite obvious that Canadians are wondering when those constant increases will come to an end and when we will at last have a Postmaster General who will have enough time to learn what is the Post Office Department. When we consider that there were four postmasters general over a six-year period we should not expect a member who has never held such portfolio to learn his job in two, three or four months.

That is very tough and I pity those who after having been minister for two years or two years and a half have to quit for whatever reason, sometimes probably because of the hardship of their job but maybe sometimes also because of the criticism to which they are subject from everywhere. Of course, the Post Office concerns not only the government but also the public as a whole because people pay for the postal service. One must also bear in mind that this is a service and that it cannot be transformed into a profitable business as long as it is considered as a social service, as a service to the whole population. We are told that the current increase is due to a salary raise, to lower productivity in the Post Office as compared to the productivity level in other areas, in private industry or in Crown corporations where productivity is said to be better.

Mr. Speaker, that is where a question crops up in my mind. We must ask ourselves what is the cause of this. Why are the Post Office employees not interested, like other workers, to work industriously?

Mr. Boulanger: There are too many socialists.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): An hon. member from the government side tells me there are too many socialists, but I personally do not believe it. Rather it is because the employees feel they are isolated. I think the crux of the problem is the lack of dialogue between employer and employees. It is a well known fact that when a boat is running adrift, it is not easy to get it back on course. And I think this is what the present minister is trying to do, to get back on course a boat which has been running adrift for several years. Are we going to achieve this by creating at last a Crown corporation where the same old mentality will remain unchanged? That will not make any difference. The employee will still face a boatswain wanting to foist his wills on him. That is the point I want to make.

The government insists on imposing its dictatorship in all sectors without previous consultation. It does so in every field. It does so even with the provinces imposing its will upon them year in and year out without consulting them to find out what is good for them. The government does the same thing with the postal union. I have often had the opportunity of chatting with the postal workers; they would love to see a healthy atmosphere created in which they could live and breathe freely, in which they could enjoy working. But no! That atmosphere has yet to come.

I do not know whether the present minister will manage that outstanding feat of straightening out matters in the Post Office. On the other hand, the people complain about getting just about the worse service in fifty years despite all the streamlining, namely, automation and all the other experiments the former speaker mentioned a while ago, including a television hook up to supervise the workers—all we need now is a television set for every worker so that he can supervise his own work—but that is where money is being spent foolishly. In addition, the employees are not trusted. I have employees and

I know very well that if I did not trust them, I would not be here today because my business would have gone belly-up. But it works because I trust my employees, and a department whether it be the Post Office, Public Works or Transport must trust its employees. That is a must, and I am convinced it would pay dividends. Let us then stop saying we will win that point, and we will do this or that; we will fight and go before the courts and things will work out—Let us put an end to that!

The government is going to have to give up its dictatorial approach and acquire more social manners. We are no longer in the eighth or tenth century—we are in the century of social life. If the present minister keeps that in mind and wants to succeed—I know he wants to succeed and put back together that famous postal service to the great satisfaction of everyone in this country who need it urgently—I believe he is going to succeed only if he puts himself at the level of the postal workers, postal officials and talks with them on an equal basis. That is the secret, Mr. Speaker. If he does that, I can guarantee the minister he is going to succeed with his reform. But if he does not do that, we are going to continue to have what we have today.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) which concerns the latter part of his statement. The minister mentioned with respect to second class publications that he would enter into some kind of agreement with the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). Apparently a memorandum of agreement has been signed but I do not know whether that document has been made public. The proposal as outlined by the Postmaster General reads:

Briefly the agreement states that the Post Office will no longer be responsible for establishing postal rates for certain types of mail. Instead, the responsibility for reimbursing losses incurred through publishers postal rates will be transferred to the Secretary of State.

There was considerable concern expressed about earlier rate increases last year, particularly by representatives of the Canadian Periodical Publishers Association, who also spoke about the nature of the consultation that took place. As I understand it, some agreement was entered into that there would be at least six months' notice given to this body. The minister shakes his head no, but I think there is a good deal of correspondence from officials, on record, which could be tabled quite easily to indicate that the lack of notice that currently exists would be remedied respecting future rate increases.

Has any significant notice, and by that I mean at least four to six months, taken place? Second, was there any consultation with the periodical publishers of this country about this radical change, and third, what kind of criteria is the Secretary of State going to use when he decides which publications are going to receive some form of subsidy and which are not?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, first before I answer the hon. gentleman's question, I would like to move that I be given the privilege of looking at the blues. After listening to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) I may be able to raise a point of privilege. There have been so many things said, I would like an opportunity to check the blues because I cannot translate material that fast.

Mr. Peters: Get on with your job. What is your job?

Mr. Lamontagne: I am doing my job, and just keep quiet.

Mr. Peters: Total incompetence.

Mr. Lamontagne: To answer the question raised, we never promised the publishers notice of six months. We told them many times in letters, by other conversations and communications with them, that they would be given ample time to raise their own rates for advertising and for publishing. If I remember correctly, at the last users' conference in Toronto, when they were all present, I said they would have to expect an increase by next April because it would be normal. These are normal business-like principles and attitudes. It was obvious that rates would have to be raised in view of the costs incurred by the Post Office by way of transportation and wages. There was no use in hiding this. The rates had to be raised. It is the same in business; if costs increase, fees must be raised. That is what we told them. Therefore they will have four and a half, five or six months to raise their rates. Furthermore, I have quite a few reports which we received following the users' conference in Toronto. They were sent from practically everyone involved. They all said it was expected and they would look forward to being informed of when and how the rates would be raised. We have informed them as soon as we could.

Our people are in constant communication with postal users. We have people in our office in the marketing department who are in consultation with them. I do not think there is any objection at the moment to that raise being effective by April 1 if they understand the business-like attitude we must have with the Post Office. Furthermore, this raise in postal rates will give the Post Office, as I have already mentioned, around $160 million. I think that is just normal so that we can decrease our deficits. As far as the agreement with the Secretary of State is concerned, I would prefer if you put your question later on to him and have the details of the agreement, considering the fact it is up to him to judge the increase of rates for people who use postal publishing rates for cultural matters. That is up to them to decide in consultation with us.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I find this very strange. Up to now we have had a non-discriminatory rate structure. Suddenly the Postmaster General tells us there is to be an entirely different basis on which rates are to be administered, and not even by his department. I would think, at the very least, if the Postmaster General carries any responsibility for the Post Office he can table that agreement today. He can also give us, by tabling because it will take too long in the course of questions and answers, some statement as to the criteria to be used. Also he should tell us whether or not this totally new principle which has been enunciated by the Postmaster General today has been agreed to by those who primarily use this service. He has given no indication that there was any consultation about this new method of administration. In view of the dangers that exist in this kind of radical departure we should have much more assurance than we have had so far.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, first of all there is nothing discriminatory about the rates we are setting today. It has been studied for months by our department to see what the market can take, and along with that, how we can compete in certain classes. If the hon. member had attended the users' conference he would have witnessed the discussions we had with these people. There were many working groups working with us at that users' conference. Some people suggested that this agreement with the Secretary of State should be done as quickly as possible and in such a way that the Post Office will be responsible for a kind of a cost which is due to the government's policy of subsidizing a certain class of publisher. It is logical that some part of the government policy should not be borne by the Post Office deficit. We will know exactly what amount it is. When the Secretary of State studies that with us, we will know the exact amount.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is a very alarming change that the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) has outlined. The document speaks about the responsibility of reimbursing losses to periodical publishers. In other words, a decision will be taken by the minister responsible for culture in this country as to how much money will be paid and to which publications. As far as we know, no guidelines have been established. It could be entirely discretionary. It holds open the prospect for a very real capacity for censorship in this country. That is what worries us.

The minister indicated to us that there was a memorandum of agreement signed between his department and the Department of the Secretary of State. We in this House of Commons, as well as anyone else concerned with freedom in this country, have a right to an undertaking from the minister that the full details of that memorandum of agreement will be published and put before this House of Commons and, if necessary, that the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) will make himself available for questioning as to the implications of a new power which could very well become a censorship power.

Will the Postmaster General, as a senior minister in this House at the moment and as one of the ministers who co-signed this memorandum of agreement, give us an indication that this memorandum of agreement will be published in totality in the House of Commons?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) misunderstood what I said when he says that we will be reimbursing the publisher. That is not the question. The Secretary of State, in collaboration with our officials and staff, will set the rates for those publishers who already have special rates. They will not reimburse the publishers. They will reimburse the Post Office for what we estimate will be the cost of the policy of the government in trying to help these publishers. The question for the Secretary of State is strictly a question of developing and formulating a current postal policy for cultural mail users. That is not a subsidy to the publisher. It will be compensation to the Post Office to ensure that the Post Office deficit picture is real. It is not because of a certain policy of government to help publishers.

There is nothing secret about the agreement. However, I think it is up to the Secretary of State to table it. I do not have it with me now. It is not secret. It was signed by myself and the Secretary of State. It is just an agreement by which hon. members will see that—

Mr. Dinsdale: Table it.

Mr. Lamontagne: It is not only my signature.

An hon. Member: You signed it.

Mr. Lamontagne: I am sure hon. members will understand that I do not want to make a decision without consulting my colleague, the Secretary of State. There is nothing secret about it. I will table it in due time if agreed.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong this. The language here refers explicitly to the word "reimbursements." That is alarming language. It speaks about reimbursements made at the discretion of the Secretary of State, presumably to certain publications which he, for whatever reasons he establishes, deems worthy of receiving those reimbursements.

The minister, for some odd reason, is claiming that he does not have authority to make available to the House of Commons a document which he signed. Of course he does. He is giving away by this document, as much as we know about it, responsibilities which now attach to his department. At the very least I would ask him to give us his undertaking now, without any equivocation, that he will recommend to his colleague that they act at the earliest possible opportunity, today if possible, and I will interrupt my budget speech if I ever get it started, to have presented here in the House of Commons in all of its detail that memorandum of agreement which we on this side of the House think could have very dangerous implications for freedom of information and freedom to publish in this country.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has again spoken about reimbursement to the publisher. It is not a reimbursement to the publisher. It is compensation to the Post Office. That is completely different. Second, I will consult with my colleague to see whether I can table the document. I repeat, it is not a secret document. I think it is just normal to consult with my colleague because we both signed it. We should both be in agreement if it is to be tabled.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister keeps saying it is not a secret agreement because both he and the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) have seen it and signed it. That does not make it a public document. The minister today is announcing a policy which I fear will be put into effect later on without being submitted to parliament. We will be told that it was announced on the twentieth day of November by the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) and that parliament had been consulted. We have not been consulted at all.

I agree with what has been said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) that this must be tabled with no ifs, ands or buts about it.

I want to know three simple things. First, when will this policy come into effect? Will it be April 1, the beginning of the fiscal year? The minister nods his head. I think that is correct.

Second, do I take the minister's statement to mean that the Secretary of State will set what he thinks is the rate the publications should pay, and then the Secretary of State Department will pay the difference between that rate and what the Postmaster General's department estimates it costs? Is that correct? If that is correct, I may point out that the Secretary of State will have to pay an amount dependent entirely on what the Postmaster General and his department set as their cost. It could be an inflated cost. It could be anything at all. It means that the taxpayers of Canada will start to pay in order to give publications a preferred position.

We have known for a long time that people put out tons of junk mail and periodicals for which the first class postal users and the general public have to pay. What control is there going to be to see that this is not going to be abused?

My final question is, what publications are involved? The minister says the effect of this agreement will be to reduce that portion of our deficit incurred by carrying publications for postage far below the cost of providing the service. Which publications? Who is going to decide?

The minister referred to cultural publications. Does that cover Time, Newsweek, Macleans and Playboy? Does it cover weekly newspapers, or will it only cover Economic Review and magazines for academics? Who is going to decide that? Does this mean that the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) or, preferably, the Secretary of State is going to decide which privileged groups in this country will have their postage costs subsidized and which will not? Is that a power which the government thinks should be put in the hands of any minister without having it included in some type of legislation approved by parliament?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the policy of having a special rate for second class publications already exists. It was judged during previous years and this year which ones would be at the special rates. This was because of a government policy to try to encourage some publications. The policy of the government is specifically set out in the Post Office Act. There is nothing new about it. If it is a policy of the government with regard to giving help to this cultural mail, as it is called, I think we will have double control.

In its wisdom the Post Office felt that certain publications should enjoy the special rate. We said to the Secretary of State that it is government policy to help certain cultural publications which need help. I feel that the Secretary of State is a much better judge in this regard than the Post Office which, in a way, is a business, and which provides a service. I indicated to the Secretary of State that we should sign an agreement regarding who should enjoy these special rates and what the special rates should be. In view of the policy of the government to help these publications, I am sure we do not want to terminate that assistance tomorrow. If we did so, I think the reaction toward the Secretary of State would not be good.

I felt that we should both consider these publications and how they should be classified. In a way it is a double control. This is much better than having the Post Office acting alone, because sometimes we do not know exactly what the Secretary of State decides regarding policy on culture. We try to collaborate with his department, and I think that is an improvement. I think there is a double control.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is a very serious matter, and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) were correct in raising it. In his statement the minister said, "The agreement states that the Post Office will no longer be responsible for establishing postal rates". I listened very carefully to his replies to the Leader of the Opposition. In his replies he looked down, and he was quoting from a document. Under the rules of the House the minister has to table the document. He quoted from it in his statement as well as in replies to the Leader of the Opposition. The Minister has no alternative but to table the document. In support of that contention I refer Your Honour to citation 159(2) of Beauchesne, which reads as follows:

> A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he is prepared to lay it upon the table.

Under the rules the minister now has a clear obligation to lay on the table of the House the agreement between himself and the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) dealing with this very important matter.

Mr. Speaker: I did not understand the minister to say that he refused to table the document. I understood that there was another signatory to it, and he thought he ought to get the permission of the other person whose signature the document bore. Therefore I think that the question of any refusal to table the document for the moment is suspended. If we come to a point at which the minister does in fact refuse to table the document, I think then the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) could return to his point of order and proceed at that time. However, I understand the minister's response at this point to be that there is another signatory and that he feels that out of courtesy he ought to consult the other signatory to the document before deciding whether to table it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I think we can now see the wisdom of the specification in the Post Office Act to the effect that postal rates should be dealt with only by parliament through an amendment to the Post Office Act. If this procedure had been followed, the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) obviously would not be in the dilemma he is in at the present time.

My question is on the specific point regarding who decides what groups, publishers or periodicals have the special privilege of second class mailing rights. It is obviously some mysterious committee deep down in the bowels of the Post Office Department somewhere.

Incidentally, when we get to the Crown corporation issue, this whole business of postal rates will have to be dealt with in a more forthright manner. For example, why do the Postmaster General and the Post Office Department exclude controlled circulation magazines, which represent one of the growth industries in Canada and which deal exclusively with Canadian topics? The magazines are published in Toronto and Montreal. They are magazines in every sense of the word. They have Canadian content only and deal with cultural matters, yet for some inexplicable, mysterious reason the Post Office has refused to give them the second class category mailing privilege. Rather, the Post Office has placed them in the third class category. How does the Post Office Department reach its conclusions, in secret, about these special, privileged groups under the special category of postal rates?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is implying regarding a secret way of deciding who gets special rates. Very clearly, there are certain conditions regarding second class. Nobody makes decisions because he likes or does not like a certain publication. The act clearly provides for certain rates. Nothing is done arbitrarily because of mood or anything like that. There are very precise conditions. Certain mail is put into certain classes, to which certain rates apply.

Mr. Dinsdale: If that is the case and if all magazines are included, particularly those with Canadian contents, why are direct controlled circulation magazines—I believe they are called that—excluded from the second class privilege, when they meet all the criteria?

Mr. Lamontagne: I cannot list all the criteria involved in putting publications into certain classes which involve special rates. Nothing is done arbitrarily, and everything is very well judged.

Certain conditions must be met before publications are put into special categories.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a few questions to the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne). The minister mentioned the postal users' conference which was held, I believe, on September 27, 28 and 29. The minister said that the chairman of our caucus Post Office committee and our official critic, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), was not there. I was there taking his place for the entire convention, and I reported back to him. Much excellent information was presented at that postal users' conference.

Postal users account for about 83 per cent of the total revenue of the minister's department, and I wonder when all the material which was presented at the conference will be studied by the department and when it will be made available. That might tell us a few stories. It might tell us about what the big users are thinking.

I wonder if the minister realizes that these drastic rate increases might be killing the goose that laid the golden egg and that the postal users may revert to some other method of delivery. I am thinking of magazines which might end up being delivered door to door. If that happened, the Post Office would lose.

I have great sympathy for the small weekly newspaper industry. I have spoken time and again on its behalf. Are weekly newspapers still getting a 40-mile preferential rate? Will the rate for weekly newspapers going further than 40 miles be increased? Postage for weekly newspapers going further than 40 miles is already at an astronomical rate. Some newspapers are now charging $20. I know many weekly newspapers go to the United States, and if there is an increase those subscriptions will be stopped. The Postmaster General might say that he is not interested in circulating weekly newspapers beyond 40 miles, but I would appreciate his comments in that regard.

One other matter: is the three-cent increase for first class letters carved in stone, or is it negotiable? That is the highest increase I can recall ever being put into effect at one time. The Postmaster General did test the water and make noises that the increase may be one cent or two cents, but I am surprised at three cents. As was mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), this is really a big increase. I would appreciate the Postmaster General's comments on what I have said.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member was at the users' postal conference. Regarding the cost of mailing an individually addressed, daily newspaper the cost is to increase from three cents to 3.8 cents. As far as certain weekly Canadian newspapers go, they will still enjoy a free mailing within a radius of 40 miles under their stated conditions. I was able to spend a good deal of time at the postal users' conference despite the fact that it was held at the same time as negotiations were being conducted with LCUC. There were reports given by many firms, for example, the Retail Council, Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Canadian Telecommunications Carriers, Robert Simpson Co., a major user across Canada, and many others. The consensus among these users with regard to rate increases was that as businessmen they understood that there must be a raise coming.

[Mr. Darling.]

At this time we sounded out the market through the various users to determine how far we could go without causing harm to the market or to the volume of mail going through the postal system. As a result of these consultations we arrived at a rate increase of three cents. In general, the users felt that they could handle this increase so long as it was not higher than other people pay. They stated that they wanted continuity and consistency in service. We informed them that we would try to keep the service consistent in spite of the difficulties we were having with labour. They also said that they understood the logic of users paying more. These were the principles upon which we based our rate in our attempt to balance the users' share with the share of the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, on October 16, 1978, the Supreme Court of Canada tossed out an appeal by the Post Office which would have resulted in over $2 million in pay to 2,700 workers. Would the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) tell us whether he intends to accept that decision by the Supreme Court and whether he will make sure that the collective agreement with respect to casual help, clause 39.07, is followed by the Post Office and does not lead to 2,700 more grievances?

Can the Postmaster General also assure the House that at this particular time under the collective agreement he will abide by that decision until such time as the med-arb comes down with something different?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the first question asked by the hon. member is not relevant to the discussion this afternoon. He can obtain the answer when I table the estimates or at committee, but not here.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is with regard to this announcement made by the Postmaster General this afternoon which deals with projected increases in rates. The reason for the increase is because there has been an overrun in terms of what the taxpayer must pick up. Surely the way in which the collective agreement is honoured, and if they are going to continue to run up these increases of over $2 million, is related to the increase in rates. There is a connection there, and the Postmaster General is responsible for telling the Canadian public that he will honour the collective agreement so we do not have these cost overruns.

Mr. Speaker: I would not have gone so far as to rule that the hon. member's question was off the point, but I cannot say that I am surprised that the minister has made the reply that today he is talking about a rate increase, and to try to answer questions under the umbrella of labour relations, particularly with respect to a Supreme Court of Canada decision, is stretching the point.

I will conclude the questioning with two other members, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday).

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clear up a matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). As I understand it, the minister indicated that he would discuss with the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) whether or not this memorandum of agreement should be tabled. What we want is an assurance and/or an undertaking by the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) that he will recommend to his colleague, the Secretary of State, that the memorandum of agreement entered into by both of them will be tabled. In other words, I do not want a discussion, but an assurance and/or an undertaking that the Postmaster General will recommend to him—in other words, he will accept what we are talking about this afternoon—that this document be tabled as soon as possible.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am not refusing to table the document, but before I decide anything I think that it would be wise to discuss the matter with the minister to determine whether he agrees or not.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, as the debate closes I think that it would be appropriate to indicate to the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) that there is a reservoir of milk of human kindness on this side of the House toward the minister. I would like to congratulate him for having the courage to come before the House with his statement today, because over the past few years we were very unused to having this kind of statement made by the government.

My concern in rising now has to do with the minister's comment and emphasis upon the consultations he has had with the users in Toronto. Generally he is to be commended for that, and I am sure that the Postmaster General has consulted with his cabinet colleagues and his officials. On several occasions during the past year and a half we asked the Postmaster General to consult with the House of Commons, but so far he has not. A number of times we have asked the Postmaster General to set up a parliamentary committee to study the whole problem of the Post Office, and on one occasion he even indicated that if there was continuing difficulty he would be glad to do so. It seems to me that the difficulties are continuing.

Today the Postmaster General is confronting us with rate increases that may not be justified, but they may be justified if, as he says, we look at the situation around the world. Would the Postmaster General tell the House why he refuses to set up a parliamentary committee? Is it because his cabinet colleagues advise against it, or is it because his officials, who know that there are certain reports available, which we have not seen, that are not complimentary to themselves, will be offended and he therefore refuses to set up a committee?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, there is no question of setting up a parliamentary committee at this stage because I do not see how it could help in view of the fact that within the next couple of weeks we will probably be presenting a bill converting the Post Office to a Crown corporation. This bill will go to committee and hon. members will be given the opportunity to ask all the questions they want. I am sure that in view of the number of studies that have gone on in the Post Office over the last six or eight years, including the last study headed by Mr. Darling and the two days of discussions at the users' postal conference, that hon. members will agree that a parliamentary committee at this stage would serve no purpose.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify the Postmaster General's commitment and ask him whether he will permit us to call any witnesses that we choose before the committee?

PETITIONS

WHARF AT HARBOUR MAIN, NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, having tried every other way to get the Government of Canada to build a badly needed wharf in the community of Harbour Main, Newfoundland, we now resort to this final alternative, which is a petition to this honourable House. I therefore present a petition from the residents of Harbour Main, Newfoundland, calling upon the government to replace the wharf which was destroyed by a storm. The wharf is absolutely essential for the people of that community to carry on with their livelihood of fishing.

CANADIAN DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Question No. 281—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Export Development Corporation guarantee a loan of one billion dollars to the Republic of Panama and, if so, on what date?

2. Will such funds be used to develop copper mining and, if so, will this therefore be in direct competition with similar industry in Canada and, if so, what are all the reasons that the government can justify guaranteeing funds to other countries which could indirectly result in the undermining of Canada's industrial structure?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Export Development is concerned: 1. By tradition and as a matter of commercial principle parliament has not required the corporation to give details of its activity in individual transactions. GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Friday, November 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government and the revised amendment of Mr. Stevens (p. 1249).

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a procedural matter which I should have attended to before calling the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I hope he will give us his indulgence for just one more moment. On Friday there was a procedural dispute about the regularity, in the first place, of an amendment, and in the second place, of a subamendment.

The result of that discussion was the setting aside of a subamendment with leave for the reintroduction of an amendment with procedural regularity with the understanding—and I am addressing myself to that point now—that no other subamendment would be received until such time as another member of the New Democratic Party had an opportunity to introduce it. It would seem to be more regular that a member, who does not intend to speak to the subamendment, could introduce that subamendment now. Simply by introducing it, that would be technically considered to be a speech. But as long as it is a member who is not intending to speak to the subamendment, no prejudice is done to the speaking rotation, and it would not in any way prejudice the right of a further member of that caucus to speak later. Then at least the subamendment would be on the record during the debate this afternoon. Is that agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, thank you for not only giving me the floor but for explaining the situation. I gather that I am being charged with a speech, even though I shall not make one.

I rise on behalf of my party, in the absence of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) whose subamendment on Friday was ruled out of order, for reasons we need not go into, simply to present our amendment to the amendment which is before the House. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the amendment be amended by deleting therefrom the words "the continued acquisition of private corporations by the government and," and by changing the period at the end of the amendment to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and condemns the government in particular for carrying out a policy of deliberately high unemployment."

Thus endeth my speech.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, the question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure one of the intentions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in introducing the amendment was to ensure that should I seek the opportunity, I will have an opportunity to speak twice in this budget debate, after the amendment which he now introduced is disposed of by the House.

As this afternoon moved along, I was beginning to think that through no choice of my own, I might be forced into on of the several reprehensible habits of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which is to make statements and speeches only after six o'clock. I am pleased that did not happen, and to have an opportunity to speak to the House while the afternoon is still upon us.

It is of some significance that this part of the budget debate was delayed to some degree by the introduction of a statement by the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne), dealing with the situation in the Post Office. When the government took office, the Post Office was operating at a slight profit. Now, after ten years of the government's continuance in office, it is running at a deficit of nearly half a billion dollars. Indeed, it proposes to pass the burden of that deficit along to ordinary Canadians who can least afford it. These ordinary Canadians have been counting upon the mail as a reasonable service.

This is not the first time this sort of thing has been done. It is precisely the same situation as in the case of who pays for the mistakes made by government in terms of its Taj Mahal and air transportation policies. The government built airports like Mirabel and others in the country, which were far beyond the needs of the nation. Then it passed the burden along, as the minister proposed in his budget the other night, to ordinary Canadians who are required to fly. As a spokesman for Quebecair indicated the other night, it ensures that the particular and hardest burden lies upon those Canadians living in some of the smaller centres of the country, who fly in and out of Newfoundland, Atlantic Canada and northern Ontario. They will be paying more regularly that kind of extra burden than will citizens who fly in and out of some of the larger metropolitan airports of the country.

The series of events in relation to the budget would have almost comic character to them, if they were not so serious. We have a Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who is introducing in effect his third budget; at least his third new pair of shoes in 14 months.

Mr. Chrétien: Second.

Mr. Clark: Is the minister talking about a pair of shoes or the budget?

Mr. Chrétien: The shoes.

Mr. Martin: Both.

Mr. Chrétien: Both. I want the record straight.

Mr. Clark: Naturally I am reluctant to accept the minister's judgment on matters relating to the economy, but on matters relating to a pair of shoes I am prepared to trust his assessment.

I understand that the other night the Minister of Finance in speaking to television, or the enemy as the government characterizes them, said that he will not bring down another budget before an election. I imagine the emphasis was upon his not introducing another budget, because there is some very real suspicion on this side of the House that there will be another budget and another minister before we go to an election some time in the spring after five years of delay.

Another element of the comic character of what has been going on has been that the minister has three major stimulants to his credit. The first was the two-month tax holiday which was effective the beginning of this year. It was supposed to help increase our gross national product. Indeed, the GNP went up by .7 per cent in the first quarter. Then he talked about his employment tax credit, which was the second stimulant he was to introduce. It was to provide 50,000 new jobs for Canadians. Well, it is providing 8,000 new jobs for Canadians. The minister is wrong by approximately 85 per cent. Once again, the six-month wonder of the reduction in provincial sales tax was timed not to boost the economy but to attempt to boost the prospects of the Liberal party in the election. As the need for stimulus becomes more acute as winter comes on, that kind of stimulus is withdrawn.

As I will indicate later on in my remarks, we are left in a situation where for the remaining months of this year—the hard months, the winter months—there will be less stimulus provided by the government for economic growth in the country than there was in the relatively easy months prior to the termination of the provincial sales tax arrangement.

Again it is the minister whose forecasts are always wrong. In fact he is so wrong in his forecasts, I would suggest that after his defeat in the next federal election he might want to move to Toronto where he can support the Argonauts. I know of no other group of people who are so often wrong in their forecasts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Again in terms of being frank with the House of Commons, this is a minister who has brought in statements we find difficult to accept as complete. We know, for example, that when he talks about his deficit figures, those deficit figures exclude at least $854 million in liabilities incurred by the Government of Canada through three Crown corporations alone. We do not know, because he will not tell the whole truth to the people of Canada, the full extent of the rest of the obligations that have been incurred by this government or its agencies but which count against the accounts and the credit of Canada and which should be considered as part of the deficit this government has built up.

Finally, sir, in terms of the comedy we face, we have the explanations, which vary, as to just who exactly is at fault here. One moment it is the weather that has caused all these problems in the Canadian economy, then it is the Arabs, then from time to time it is René Lévesque, and from time to time it is me. The Minister of Finance said I was causing all the problems in the country. Now he has discovered another enemy. It is the media that is causing all the problems in the country. Indeed, if you read his budget, or if you were listening to him the other night, you will have noticed he has one more cause for Canada's economic problems. Who are these people who are working against the interests of Canada? They are the coal miners of the United States of America. They are the culprits, the coal miners of the United States who are causing all the problems we are having here.

I suppose the minister read that in his conflicts with John L. Lewis, Harry Truman, who was a legitimate street fighter, came out on top. Even though the spirit of Harry Truman does not really linger on over there, and John L. Lewis is gone, perhaps the minister thought some luck might rub off if he too were to ascribe all Canada's economic difficulties to the members of the United Mine Workers of another country.

In fact, the reality in this country is that other nations with whom we should be compared are doing considerably better than we are, and the reality is that we have the highest unemployment rate in the western industrial world—a country with the potential of Canada—that our inflation rate is second only to Italy among nations in the industrial world, and that those problems were caused not by some foreigners, not by some coal miners in some other country, but were caused by the incompetence of this government on the other side of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What is perhaps most alarming to Canadians is that we recognize now that, particularly with the decline in the United States and with the absence of any stimulus, no one outside this country is going to help this country up. The only people who can build this country up are Canadians themselves, and the only way they can do that is with leadership from the government. This government indicated the other night that it intends no leadership at all. So the obligation is clearly upon us, and it is an obligation we will accept as soon as the Prime Minister finds the courage to move from making speeches to calling elections.

An hon. Member: Canadians have that choice.

Mr. Clark: I understand the interjection from an hon. member from, of all places, Scarborough, was that Canadians had the obligation to make that choice. Well, the Canadians in Scarborough made that choice not long ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There are some aspects of this budget that we think valuable. We are pleased to see that, after rejecting it for a long time, the government has finally accepted our view that there should be some movement toward a reduction of the manufacturing sales tax at the federal level, although we think it should have been more selective in its cuts rather than across the board. We are very pleased that the government has finally moved to encourage activity again in the creation of jobs in the mining industry in the country. I was a little amused to note the minister said in his budget address, "I want to take the lead here." We know what happened. The minister was with the provincial ministers of finance who made it very clear to him that unless the federal government stopped putting obstacles in the path of mining development, there would be no help from the provinces. It was the pressure from the provinces that caused this government finally to make the changes that will perhaps create some growth in the mining industry in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Again we are pleased to see that the government has begun to move toward the encouragement of research and development. This government, which under the former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, as one of its first acts began the discontinuance of the incentives to research and development that had been introduced by the hon. Georges Hees when he was the minister of trade and commerce in the Diefenbaker government, is moving again in this direction. The Conservative government brought in the incentives which the Liberal government then abandoned for ten long years. We are pleased to see them coming back.

I have to say to the minister that I am sorry the government has not accepted the detail of my advice in this regard, and that the government is not giving more attention to directing the research and development incentives in this country toward a focusing upon those companies or innovators who will deal with specific Canadian problems or specific Canadian potential, because our R and D problem in this country is aggravated by the fact that there is so much leakage to head offices elsewhere. What we need in terms of an effective research and development policy and approach in this country is a policy which will focus in upon those Canadian innovators who will face Canadian problems and deal with Canadian potential and not be tempted to leak this away to head offices in some other countries.

I have indicated that over-all there are some specific matters we find of value, not the least because we proposed many of them. We are getting used to that on this side of the House. In over-all terms this is a budget that provides no real stimulus. My colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), got the minister to admit today that its purpose is not to deal with inflation, and its purpose is not to create jobs for Canadians, because it is not going to deal effectively with inflation and it is going to create new unemployment in Canada rather than create jobs for Canadians. The government's purpose is simply to try to survive.

I see the minister holding up three fingers and I will come to what he means by those three fingers a little bit later. The fact is that those three fingers should really be taken as indicating strike one, strike two, and strike three.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What we have here is a government with a budget that has no real stimulus, a budget with a larger deficit, the effect of which will be stagnation, as usual, of the Canadian economy. It is a budget that promises, as I say, to create more unemployment. We already have the worst record in unemployment in the industrialized world, but his minister is going to make it worse.

[Translation]

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) mentioned the creation of some 250,000 new jobs for next year. If the rate of real growth is between 4 per cent and 4½ per cent, this prediction—and we must admit that the Minister of Finance has not been very successful up to now with his predictions—this prediction, should it come true, will only make certain that a still larger number of people will be unemployed because it has already been established that 325,000 new people will join the labour force. This figure has already been confirmed, and the new incentives contained in the budget will create at most 250,000 new jobs. Who will look after the 75,000 other people without jobs?

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated recently in Toronto that with his Quebec members he can represent Quebeckers best. The problem stems from the fact that the right hon. Prime Minister is taking Quebeckers for granted, and based on this assumption, he comes up with all sorts of measures which create unemployment. How could he speak on behalf of workers when unemployment is particularly severe in the province of Quebec? What is needed are new members who will increase possibilities for Quebec, namely Quebec Progressive Conservative party members who will not accept policies or budgets conducive to unemployment. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that if there are unemployed in Quebec, the Liberal members will be among them.

[English]

Mr. Boulanger: That's a good punch line.

Mr. Clark: I am very pleased that my friend from Quebec got the first punch line, because when the election comes he will be sure to get the second punch line.

Mr. Clark: The excuse that we are being given here for a budget that stimulates nothing at all is that the government has very limited room to manoeuvre. Well, Mr. Speaker, who limited the room to manoeuvre of the Government of Canada? Indeed, how good were the choices which were made in that limited room to manoeuvre? We are in a deep deficit position today in this country, and the question has to be asked: why we are in that deep deficit position? Did it just happen overnight? Did somebody else do it? Was it really the coal miners, the Arabs, or somebody else? Or was it, perhaps, successive ministers of finance, some of them now reduced to writing memoranda, who have occupied the treasury benches of the government opposite?

Let us take a look at what happened in years when the people of Canada did not need spending by government for economic stimulus. In some of those years this Liberal government deepened the deficit of Canada by increasing budgetary spending 17.3 per cent in 1974, 18.8 per cent in 1975, 26.5 per cent in 1976, and 19.3 per cent in 1977. You speak about limited room to manoeuvre. Now you know who limited the room. It was yourself and the other ministers in the Trudeau Liberal government of Canada who have been mismanaging the economy of Canada for the last ten years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: One problem that we face as a country is that this government has developed a virtually incurable spending habit. But it has also dangerously crippled some of the natural strengths of the country. We talked earlier about research and development. I see the new member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) is in his seat. I want to say one thing about his predecessor, a man I generally admired. In my judgment, one of the most dangerous decisions for Canada ever to be taken by this government was the decision that went out over the name of the previous member for Westmount, when he was minister responsible, that we in this country will buy our technology elsewhere, because by abandoning the responsibility for research and development and innovation in Canada, we drove hundreds, indeed thousands of innovators, researchers and scientists out of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Unfortunately, sir, that policy is being carried on today as the Government of Canada shuts down research station after research station across the country.

Mrs. Sauvé: Not so with telecommunications.

Mr. Clark: Telecommunications is an interesting case because of what has happened in the field of telecommunications.

Let me come to another field where the Canadian capacity to grow has been crippled by this government, that of small business. We now have a government department that deals with government bureaucracy. Government service to small business in this country is to try to cut down some of the government paper with which the government has been smothering small business for years. That has been the total effect of their policies up until this budget. There are a few more proposals that they are following now.

Clearly, what is needed here is a far more comprehensive small business encouragement policy. What is needed here is what I have proposed several times across this country, namely, a tax incentive in the form of a tax credit up to a maximum of $5,000 a year available to those Canadians who are prepared to put their money into Canadian-owned small business. We need that, we need it now, and it should have been in this budget. It will be in ours.

We need to move quickly to give permission to small businessmen to form consortia for competition internationally. I know that is part of a stillborn bill that this government introduced, as it introduces so many stillborn bills. But that provision should be taken out of the bill and put into law right now so that we can allow and encourage small business in Canada to get out into the world and build upon their industry and their opportunity, and so they can form the kind of consortia in Canada with which they have to compete abroad.

Again, sir, this government has to begin to take seriously its obligations, followed in other countries like Japan and the United States—countries with which we have to compete—to shape its purchasing policy in a way that does not buy everything from the government's friends in the big corporations but instead extends a certain strong proportion of its purchases to small Canadian entrepreneurs and small businesses. Again that is what we are going to do as a government, given that opportunity.

There have been a number of other fields, sir, in which the actions of this government have crippled the Canadian capacity to compete in the world. We have spoken of the mining industry in which we have lost thousands of jobs as a result of stagnation stemming from the conflict between governments in regard to mining policy. Another field that has clearly been damaged severely in this country is agriculture, which used to be among the priorities when Canadians went abroad to negotiate but is now a matter whose interests are traded away.

I could give many, many other examples, Mr. Speaker. Think of the negative impact upon this country of the tremendous investment outflow. In the 30 years prior to 1974 money used to come into this country. This was a country to which people came from around the wide world to invest. But in the last three years more Canadian money has been invested outside Canada than foreign money has been invested in Canada. That is a mark of the lack of confidence that investors here and around the world have in this government.

That is some of the damage that has been done, Mr. Speaker. The Trudeau government has made Canada's position very difficult. Given that difficult position, it is now making the wrong choices in regard to what we need to do to improve our situation. The government claims now to acknowledge the need to combine a policy of restraint and one of stimulus. It claims to acknowledge that, although I remember the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) saying earlier this year, on February 22, 1978, when being pressed from this side of the House to make reductions, "We are cutting the fat wherever we can". That is what he said then, and the implication was that there was nothing more that they could cut. That was before the first of the series of nocturnal admissions on August 1, when the Prime Minister announced that he had discovered these new areas in which economies could be made.

The fact, sir, is that throughout this budget, indeed throughout the term of office of this government, there has been too little restraint and too little stimulus. I want to speak about restraint. The restraint announced on August 1 reminds me of the one consistent element of the government's economic policy, and that is that when the government has anything important to announce it sends the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) out of the country. On August 1 the government sent him to Japan. When the Minister of Finance finally decided on a budget date, they sent the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce down to the Caribbean. I understand there have been other ministers on that side who have been travelling around the Caribbean lately; the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) did. I am given to understand that some of his officials in his department thought that he should have taken along the expert who knew what was being discussed at the conference that he attended, and that they took up a collection to send the relevant expert.

Mr. McGrath: That was the commissioner for patents.

Mr. Clark: Yes, the commissioner for patents. And knowing the esteem in which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is held by public servants, I would not be surprised if his public servants took up a collection to try to keep him in the Caribbean.

The government announced a program of restraint by surprise on August 1. A lot of us were wondering what pattern was going to be followed in this period of restraint. We wondered what would be the priorities, what would be the guidelines that would lead the government to decide where to cut and where not to cut. It was very, very difficult to come to any sensible conclusion, looking at where the cuts were made. I thought I had discovered a pattern at one point. I thought that they were cutting where the ministers were weakest and that it was simply a matter of who around the table could argue most strongly for their private empire.

I know it is difficult, Mr. Speaker, to try to make any comparison of strength and weakness in a cabinet like this one, but I thought for a while that that was the standard. I think I was wrong. I think it is increasingly becoming clear now that the Government of Canada—and this is a very serious matter—applied restraint to projects that it knew were popular enough or necessary enough that there was going to be very strong protest. Ministers wanted to go out into the country and say, "Look, we are restraining; we are cutting back. How can you tell we are cutting back? Sure, we are taking airlines to Grey Cup games and things like that, but how can you tell we are cutting back? Listen to the screaming. Look at the people who are complaining". In other words, what they were interested in when they established their list of targets for restraint was not the size of the saving; they were concerned about the size of the protest. If the protests were strong the government could take that as proof of its own seriousness about restraint.

That, like so much that was followed by this government, was a very short term strategy. The proof that it is a short term strategy is that the government has already been forced to back down on some of the particularly foolish proposals for restraint, proposals such as the phasing out of forestry stations, the phasing out of weather ships on the west coast, the phasing out of weather forecasting which could have meant a matter of life and death in the province of my colleague from St. John's.

The real proof that the so-called restraint of this government was a fraud, the real proof of the fraudulent nature of that restraint, was given to the House in the eight days immediately before the minister brought down his budget. It became clear then that this remains a government that, given the opportunity to extend its own control over aspects of the Canadian community where it should have control, is prepared to spend without restraint. It did that in the case of Nordair and the attempt at the Pacific Petroleums Ltd. acquisition.

What is significant and what indicates how fraudulent this commitment to restraint is, are the things the government has not cut. First of all, there has been a very insignificant cut, certainly not as significant as is possible, in the practice of contracting out. This is a very dangerous practice, dangerous to our system of government because it allows a government that wants to, to get around the protection against patronage, to get around the protection against incompetence that is built into the Public Service Commission, that is built into the system of ensuring we have a government that makes its decisions in accord with the facts and not in accord with improper pressures, and makes its appointments with regard to competence and not with regard to friendship.

There has been an immense increase in contracting out by this government, Mr. Speaker. Indeed the cost of contracting out has increased six and one half times in the period this government has been in office, from $214.9 million in 1968 to $1.424 billion in the latest year. That is a six and one-half fold increase in contracting out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I hear some protests from ministers on the other side. There is no question that there may well be some areas in which contracting out makes sense, but there is also no question at all—it is always easy to tell when one strikes close to the bone, Mr. Speaker, because ministers start to complain. It is also very, very clear that there has been an immense capacity for abuse not only of spending but of controls to ensure that there is protection against patronage. That capacity was there, and I suggest that if this was a government that was very seriously concerned about practicising restraint we would have had some significant cuts in the practice of contracting out.

One of the areas where there has not been a dramatic indication of a determination to have restraint has been in relation to that invention of the Prime Minister in the Canadian political system—in effect, I believe, a cancer in the Canadian system—the building up of the strength of the Privy Council office and the Prime Minister's office at the expense of the cabinet, at the expense of parliament, at the expense of democracy in this country. During the first six months of fiscal 1979, the year of restraint, spending on the Privy Council office has increased by 86 per cent. The Privy Council office hired 80 new people last year. The Prime Minister's office hired 54. Perhaps these people are all necessary; perhaps they are the people who will administer restraint in the country. I cannot be sure about that, but what is clear is that the one agency of government that has been most free of restraint has been the agency that encircles the Prime Minister. In terms of establishing policy direction in this country it has taken the place that used to be occupied by cabinets when cabinets were filled with strong people determined to represent the interests of the regions from which they came.

As I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, the most dramatic example of the fraudulent nature of restraint came in the two most recent acquisitions. I say most recent because we do not know what they are going to try to buy up next. They went into the private market to spend $28 million on an airline. They say they are going to get rid of it after a year, but they have said that before about other Crown agencies. They said that four or five years ago—

Mr. Chrétien: What about Pacific Western?

Mr. Clark: I see the Minister of Finance is suggesting that the Government of Canada is now taking the government of Alberta as a model. I would simply suggest to him that, if he is going to do that, there are a number of better areas than in relation to the acquisition of aircraft. I say to him also, Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

—and it might be essential for me to point out the fact that one of the differences between the situation with the airline owned by the government of Alberta and the airline bought by the Government of Canada lies in the fact that other people were able to buy Nordair—

[English]

And that was not the case in the Pacific Western Airline's situation. Nonetheless, the government practised restraint by spending $28 million on an airline it does not need, an airline for which a private purchaser was available. It was not exactly a fire sale in the case of Nordair because Great Lakes Airlines Limited or other purchasers would have bought it. The Government of Canada, however, with the interest in control that was so clear in the speech made the other day by the Minister of Transport and Justice (Mr. Lang) and of the Wheat Board and anything else he can get his hands on—that instinct for control led this government to buy an airline it did not need, in absolute disregard for the restraint aspects of its policy.

Having struck out in their attempt to acquire Husky Oil for Petro-Can, they looked around and found another oil company. They incurred obligations of $1.4 billion in this period of restraint which they have tried to hide. One of the things that interests me about Petro-Can—

Mr. Railton: Tell it the way it is.

Mr. Clark: I am telling it the way it is. I am pleased that once again the good doctor, who served as such an effective foil for my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) the other night, has taken an interest in this debate. If he knows the oil industry—

Mr. Railton: Do not get personal or I will.

Mr. McGrath: Tell us about unemployment in the Niagara peninsula.

Mr. Clark: The truth about Petro-Can, Mr. Speaker, is that since it became clear a government would be elected that intends to have the state move out of activities in which the state should not belong, the main exploration activity of Petro-Can has been in the boardrooms of other companies. Their means of discovering oil is to buy a company that has some, and buy it at the potential cost to Canada, the incurring of obligations by Canada of $1.4 billion.

Mr. Railton: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for me with the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) shouting from across the way. I know that he does stand up to speak in this House from time to time, and I hope he will be able to influence his colleagues in the Liberal party to give him a place to stand and speak so that he will not have to make his whole speech by interrupting mine.

The other night the hon. member for York-Simcoe indicated that the great significance of buying an airline that was not necessary and an oil company that was not necessary is that the purchases indicate how wrong are the priorities of this government. In our judgment, we should be divesting ourselves of some of these Crown agencies we do not need and putting that money back into use in ways that will stimulate the Canadian economy. Even if the government does not accept that view, even if it does not want to rely on the private sector to generate growth and jobs in the country as we do, even if it wants to stay true to its own statist philosophy, surely it could have found better use for $1.5 billion than buying an oil company and an airline it does not need. Surely there are old age pensioners in this country who could have made better use of that money than the American owners of Pacific Petroleums.

● (1712)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Clark: Surely there are a number of Canadians looking for homes who could put that money to better use. But instead this government, so intent on controlling everything it can, ignores the elderly Canadians and those Canadians who need homes, ignores the taxpayer in this country, ignores the legitimate priorities in Canada—

Mr. Chrétien: No taxpayers' money.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Let us try to get some quiet in here because the Minister of Finance has made an important point. He has shouted from his seat that there is no Canadian taxpayers' money involved here. There is an obligation on the part of the Government of Canada to the extent of $1.4 billion. That obligation, if it comes to be honoured, will have to be paid by taxpayers' money. I am asked about the assets. I think it is understood that there has been a remarkable difference between the quoted market value for Pacific Petroleums shares and the value that is being paid by the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: What about AGTL and Husky? The margin was bigger.

Mr. Clark: The minister is making another speech from his seat. I heard him, but it is difficult to hear because there is so much shouting from over there. I heard him talk about Husky. I want to say something about Husky because the Prime Minister of Canada—outside this House naturally—defended the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums by saying that it was in the interests of Canadian ownership. The Husky deal showed that there is more than one way to acquire Canadian ownership of international oil companies. The private sector will do it when the private sector has an opportunity to do it. And speaking for this party, we would prefer to see private ownership in the energy industry accomplished by private Canadian entrepreneurs going out and building for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We believe there has to be a combination of real restraint and real stimulus. I want to spell out again the elements of the restraint program that we will introduce as a government. First of all, it will be permanent restraint, not the kind of cosmetic restraint that this government has talked about. It will be permanent restraint accomplished in the following ways, and accomplished in accord with three principles.

First, we will permanently reduce the operating costs of government. We will do that by not hiring new public servants when vacancies become open due to death, retirement, or by moving away. We have an immense respect for the capacity and ability of serving Canadian public servants. We know that many of them are frustrated and underutilized. We intend to give to Canadian public servants the opportunity to move into positions of responsibility in the Canadian public service, to which access is now denied them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We will follow that policy of attrition in public service size and of calling upon the best from Canadian public servants. That will result in a net reduction in the size and the cost of the Government of Canada. Second, we will introduce into the practice of the government and Parliament of Canada, some of the cost control techniques which this nation has been without for far too long. We are going to introduce zero based budgeting throughout the Government of Canada. We are going to return to the House of Commons, this parliament which was established to represent and protect the interests of all Canadians, all the power to control government spending.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I was not a member of this House at the time, but I am familiar with one of the first items on the agenda of this government, when it was first elected in 1968. Indeed, it forced a measure through parliament in 1969. I use the word "forced" advisedly because for the first time in the history of British parliamentary tradition anywhere in the world, this government changed the rules of parliament by the use of closure.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Clark: They did that, sir, with one goal in mind. The goal was to take away from the House of Commons the power to control government spending.

Mr. Chrétien: Not true.

Mr. Clark: Absolutely true, and the record makes it clear. Recognizing that while it took the Trudeau government less than a year to undo the principles which were established centuries ago, we intend in forming a new government to give the highest priority, to bringing back reforms that will allow the then Leader of the Opposition—I do not know if the member for Mount Royal will hold to that office or open it up to the queue that is already forming behind him—to choose two departments whose estimates will be examined without any restriction of time. The choice will be made after all estimates have been prepared, so that estimates will be prepared in the expectation of the kind of scrutiny which is the only guarantee of responsible government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Again, the third principle we will follow in terms of ensuring there is real restraint will be to get the government out of areas where it does not belong. Earlier today I talked about Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada is one of the classic cases of what can go wrong when the government gets in where it should not be. It is justified as being a window on the oil industry. I would not be surprised if other companies competing with Petro-Canada, particularly as Petro-Can now moves to larger and larger status, are less prepared and more reluctant to make confidential information available to a government regulator which they know is a regulator on one day and the owner of a competitive company the next day. I would not be surprised if it is having a negative effect and closing the window which the National Energy Board already has. That is one point in relation to Petro-Can.

Mr. Chrétien: The French, the English, The Netherlands, everyone. You are of the sixteenth century.

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Finance tells us there is a justification for the government's policy, that is, that other countries have oil companies.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

Mr. Clark: Other countries have monsoons, other countries have state police agencies, other countries have censorship rules, other countries have a number of things. Because they exist in other countries is no reason for them to exist here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The standard which should be established and guide government decisions here is not what is good for other countries but what is good for this particular country, Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There are two other reasons. I will not debate the whole Petro-Can matter. This determination to become involved in the private economy is dangerous. One of the reasons has to do with the conflict of interest between a government which owns one company and sets the rules for all companies. That is most evident in relation to the northern land regulations where the northern land regulations have been changed, quite clearly to give specific advantage to the company the government owns. It is just like anybody in this room who has a son who plays softball or baseball, if anyone has a daughter who plays hockey—as they should be in Barrie,—you know very well that if you were called upon to umpire a game there would be a strong suspicion among other parents and players that you are giving preference to your son or daughter. That is exactly the situation here. There is evidence of this because the northern land regulations have been changed explicitly to confer special advantage on the company the government owns.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Clark: The other day in this House we had another indication of a conflict of interest. It was a conflict of interest of a very invidious kind because it put a leading and outstanding public servant in a very difficult position. I speak, of course, of the deputy minister of finance who is required by law to participate in confidential government budget decisions and is also required by law to sit as a member of the board of directors of Petro-Canada. He was put in the invidious position of knowing what Petro-Canada was going to do at a time when he might have been seized of knowledge about the budget. No Canadian public servant should be put in that situation. The minister is nervous. I ask him to check—

Mr. Chrétien: No, I would like to reply. It is dicey. Make an accusation if you can.

● (1722)

Mr. Clark: One sign of panic and decay on the other side is that every time an issue arises, they say, "Make a charge". Well, I will make the charge that I have made. The Government of Canada has put the Deputy Minister of Finance in a very invidious postion. That is the charge. The people against whom the charge lies are the Government of Canada. The reason it is subject to that charge is because it is so determined to control so many of the activities in this country that would function better if they operated without the heavy hand of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Naturally our view of achieving restraint by getting the government out of activities where it should not be is opposed by some other parties in this chamber. It is opposed for different reasons.

Mr. Chrétien: He is running away.

Mr. Clark: If the Minister of Finance cannot make it as a shoe salesman, he will certainly make it as a humourist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There are two different kinds of objections. The Government of Canada, the Liberal party, which speaks most eloquently from its seat and to its discredit and sorrow speaks most eloquently by its actions, because by its actions it is known, as the last series of by-elections in this country demonstrated so dramatically, is concerned about divesting control of any of the more than 300 Crown corporations.

An hon. Member: Three hundred and eighty-five.

Mr. Clark: There are 385 Crown corporations which they like to control. It was very interesting listening to the Minister of Transport the other day talking about the process of de-regulation in the air industry in the United States which has brought down fares and increased usage, saying it would not work here. He said there are public interest factors which you have to consider. That is short for saying he does not want to let go of any of his control. That is really the philosophy of this government.

This is a highly statist government, and it is not for philosophic reasons. There are philosophic reasons to my left. It is because this government enjoys running things, even if it runs them badly.

The New Democratic Party are interested in public ownership because that is their ideology. It has been their ideology since the Regina manifesto. They have changed very few of their views since the Regina manifesto. That is, nonetheless, a relatively legitimate reason. Certainly philosophy is a more legitimate reason for a statist approach to government than simply a desire to keep your hands on everything that moves, which is the control orientation of the Liberal party.

In relation to the NDP, I have had a chance to look at the amendment they have introduced.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Subamendment.

Mr. Clark: As well as reading the Regina manifesto, it is beyond dispute that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has also read the rules of parliament. The effect of that subamendment is to strike out the objection which we in this party take to the incessant acquisition by the Government of Canada of ventures which are better operated by others. That is the deleting effect.

The adding effect is redundant. It talks about creating employment in the country. It is redundant to our motion because our motion makes it clear that what we believe is necessary is a stimulant budget. There is no question that that kind of stimulant which I and my colleagues have outlined for some time, many elements of which have been adopted by the government, would provide the employment that is called for explicitly in the NDP motion.

I might say a word about Crown corporations. There is no question that in a nation like this, young, large, still developing, still a place that has to attract capital and develop its own capacity to increase its investment capacity to do the things we want to do but cannot quite do, there is going to be a continuing need to have the state intervene from time to time. However, the rule must be that the government should intervene as a last resort because it needs to, not as a first resort because it wants to intervene. Indeed, that distinction led predecessors of mine in the leadership of this party to establish some of the great Crown corporations and Crown agencies in this country, corporations like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and agencies like the Canadian Wheat Board. That is a tradition which is essential to this country.

There is no question at all that we must continue to have the state ready to move in as a last resort when the private sector cannot function. However, these Crown corporations and agencies established for one purpose at one point in time should not be above examination. We should look at them to see if they are doing what they were set up to do.

We should see if the country has matured to the stage where such activity is no longer as necessary as it once was. That is the approach that we in this party intend to take to a number of the activities in which the Government of Canada is now involved. We will do it directly in some cases, such as in relation to a Crown corporation like Petro-Can where our view is clear. We will do it by empowering this parliament through the sunset laws to examine the continuing need to exist of various Crown corporations and agencies so that we can improve those we keep and get rid of those that should not continue to be supported by public funds.

I can name some examples where it would be well to have a committee empowered with a sunset law, reviewing the need to keep as an acquisition something possessed by the Government of Canada such as Canadian Arsenals, the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and the Defence Construction Corporation. Do we need to keep those? Should we not be asking this kind of question rather than making the knee jerk reaction of, "Now that we have them, should not we hold them?"

Parliament should be acting now to reform activities like the Canadian Dairy Commission which has some areas that clearly need reform, as well as the pilotage authorities. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited clearly needs scrutiny and reform by this parliament. CIDA would benefit substantially from scrutiny and reform by this parliament, particularly in light of some of the recommendations of the Science Council, as would the Foreign Investment Review Agency.

Why should these be sacrosanct? Why should parliament be prevented from reviewing their usefulness and continued need to exist? Why should we put that prohibition upon ourselves at a time when it is so necessary for us to practice restraint and save the money of the taxpayers of Canada?

[Translation]

When I said that having partners was essential I was speaking of steps to restrain government expenditures; but today we also need strong incentives for barely half of the real economic possibilities in Canada are being developed. Our rate of unemployment is the highest of all industrialized countries; our rate of inflation exceeds all others with the exception of Italy. Almost all Canadian private forecasters claim that things will be no better next year.

In Canada, we can do much better than that. According to the Conference Board, even a rate of real growth of 4.75 per cent and a rate of unemployment of 5.5 per cent would increase the wealth of the nation by $41 billion within two years, wealth which could be used to generate new investments and new jobs. The Conference Board also believes that if those growth and job objectives were achieved this year and next year, federal and provincial government revenues would grow by over $13 billion, which would contribute immeasurably to restoring balance in the government accounts.

What we need above all is incentives. In the aggregate, our stimulants would include a decrease in federal income taxes of at least $2 billion in favour of Canadians who would spend that money quickly here in Canada; cuts in the mortgage rate and income tax up to fixed limits spread over a four-year period; a tax credit on investments for those Canadians who are willing to invest their money in small Canadian businesses; and specific steps to encourage research and development, to protect capital gains, to protect inventories against inflation and, in particular, to encourage regional development.

[English]

As I said earlier, the effect of the budget introduced by the minister the other night will actually be to reduce the stimulus for the remainder of the current fiscal year. The minister needed a tax cut of $750 million for the second half of fiscal 1978-79 to maintain the stimulus which was given to the economy by provincial sales tax cuts. Instead of the $750 million which was needed, this budget provides only $300 million. That is by the minister's own admission. The stimulus is down for the remainder of this fiscal year. It is down, after the minister has failed to meet his April growth target. It is down at a time when we are heading into a winter of one million unemployed. At a time like that, the Trudeau government reduces the stimulus in the Canadian economy.

I want to talk for a moment about the budget process. I will not speak for much longer, but I want to talk about the budget process because part of what has gone wrong here in the last ten years is that this government has been so certain that it knew all the answers that it has moved away from people who might have other ideas and might have contributions and suggestions to make.

The minister has boasted that he had more consultation this time. He had a series of private and secret meetings across the country, and I congratulate him for that. That is a step forward, but it is still a step in the shadows. What should be happening is that this kind of consultation should be taking place here in the open. I say "here" advisedly because, before a budget is brought down, the obvious place for discussion of the economic climate and economic potential of this country is in a committee of the House of Commons. That is what we are here for. That is what parliament was established to do. If we were able to do that, we would be able to invite, to a committee of this House, the consumers' association, the manufacturers' association, the Canadian Labour Congress and all groups which have legitimate interests in national economic policy. We would be able to sit down with them, as well as with representatives of the C. D. Howe Institute, the Fraser Institute and a number of other private agencies which are concerned about economic policy. We would have public discussions which would increase and improve public understanding of the economic problems and the economic potential of this country.

Other countries do that, and we need to do that. As a government, we are going to do it as part of our reform of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: A reform which we will introduce will be the annual publication of five-year spending forecasts and five-year revenue forecasts of the Government of Canada. What is almost unbelievable and almost impossible for me to accept is that in the United States, in the United Kingdom and in Canada there are five-year revenue projections and five-year spending projections, that in the United States they are published, that in the United Kingdom they are published, but that in Canada under the Trudeau government they are kept secret.

Why are they kept secret? Why should parliament not know what public servants know when they set budget policy? Why should the people of Canada not know about the implications, five years down the line, of budget policy which is being brought in now? Why should there be so much secrecy? Why should Canadians be kept in the dark about the basis of national economic policy? There is no reason. This government, which has grown so old in office, is so captive to the old habit of secrecy that it simply will not break it.

I give to the people of Canada and to this House the commitment that after the next election we as a new government will break that bad habit and let the sun shine in on the five-year forecasts and projections on which national economic policy is based.

I think all of us in this parliament are concerned about how much, if anything, must be kept secret and how much can be made public. We must take a hard look at taking away part of the veil which now covers our budget-making process. We know that the way the United States deals with the problem of holding a potential special advantage because of special information is by making sure that all information is available to everybody. Here we keep all information from everybody. I think we must take a hard look at whether the system in the United States does not have more to recommend it than the system which has led us to so much economic difficulty here.

With regard to those technical changes in budgetary policy which can confer no positive or negative advantage or disadvantage, we in this party think that those matters should be discussed in public and that they should be moved out, from the preparation of this budget onward, into the open so that there can be that kind of consideration.

Unfortunately, this secrecy which has cast a shadow and a cloak over budgetary policy is pervasive in this government. In the budget documents there is a brief, seemingly innocuous but dangerous reference to some $300 million which the government of Canada is going to make available to those companies which are adversely affected by the negotiations at the Geneva round of GATT. The government knows what went on at GATT; parliament does not, the companies affected do not. The government does know, and the government is of the view that at least $300 million worth of damage was done to the Canadian public interest and to the interests of Canadian companies by what was negotiated away at GATT.

Part of the reason that that causes so much concern is that the industries whose lives and future are being affected by these negotiations at GATT have consistently been kept outside. Once again, other nations with economies far more complex than ours have found ways to ensure that industries whose lives are affected by tariff negotiations have a means of participating in those negotiations. That is not the case here.

Mr. Martin: They have had a lot of input.

Mr. Clark: The parliamentary secretary correctly says that they have had a lot of input, but they have had input up to a point, and then public servants—admittedly good people—have had theirs. The industries involved have been sent away, but there is no role in Canadian delegations, as there is in the delegations of other countries, for representatives of some of those industry groups to participate directly in the negotiations. One consequence is that not only do people live with the certainty that the Government of Canada has concluded that there has been at least $300 million worth of damage done to the Canadian economy by the GATT negotiations, but also there is the suspicion that if somebody who knew more about an industry which was bargained away had been present at the table, then the injury done to that Canadian industry would not have occurred. That is the tragedy, and we must change our procedures to prevent that.

The basic weakness of this budget and, indeed, the basic weakness of this government is that it is standing pat. It is dealing with the past. It has no sense of the future of this country. In ten years the government has wasted and crippled some of the great building assets of Canada.

This budget promises us a deeper deficit and stagnation as usual. There is no excitement in this budget, and there is no excitement in this tired old government. There is no excitement about the potenital of this country, and this budget certainly offers no encouragement.

It is quite interesting to look at the threads which run through the language of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. They talk about the problems Canada faces and about this being a difficult world. They talk about all the obstacles we face and about all the bad things which are in the atmosphere. The fact is if they would get out of their cocoons and visited this country, if they would stop apologizing about what they had done and began to look at what we can do as a people, they would realize that this is not a country beset by problems, but a country beset by opportunities and possibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Nobody pretends that this is an easy country to govern, it never has been, but there is no question at all that Canada can be governed, that it can grow as an economy. What is necessary is to have a Government of Canada that is prepared to trust the people of Canada more than this government does. There has to be a determination to encourage the instinct to build which is part of Canadian life, whether it is evident in a company like Great Lakes Air—which wanted to buy the airline which the government bought—in a company like Alberta Gas Trunk Line—which moved in and ensured Canadian ownership in a far preferable way to having Petro-Can move in—or, indeed, whether it is evident in the aspirations of countless Canadians across the country who simply want to own, buy or build their own homes and want this government, through mortgage interest deductibility and other means, to help them. These people want the Government of Canada to adopt that kind of policy because it indicates that it is prepared to back up with its policy those Canadians who want to go out and build for themselves.

Mr. Martin: Talk about the cost.

Mr. Clark: I shall talk about the cost, and I will talk about the consequences as well.

Mr. Martin: In real figures.

Mr. Clark: I shall talk about the cost in real figures too. I am sure the parliamentary secretary is aware, and I know he is doing his job as a parliamentary secretary and as a partisan, that the two industries which would be most dramatically affected by my policy would be the house building industry, which is almost 100 per cent Canadian-owned. We would not only be helping young, older and middle aged Canadians who want to build homes, we would also be stimulating a highly productive part of the Canadian economy. We would be creating jobs for Canadians and growth for Canada, which in turn would provide revenue for the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces. It would provide the kind of stimulus which is singularly absent in the budget brought down by this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: All members are proud of the constituencies they come from and I am sure they think they cannot be matched by any other constituency in the country. I had the opportunity to be home in my riding on the weekend, to meet some of the people who work and live in the constituency of Rocky Mountain which stretches along the western mountains and foothills of Alberta. These are people who work harder than we do in this House of Commons, people who go down in coal mines every day, who work outside in winter, and who run farm operations which require them to keep the schedule that calves keep when they are being born, a schedule much less predictable than you, sir, can enforce in this House of Commons. They are hard working Canadians who have their counterparts in every constituency in this country.

One of my privileges as national leader is to have the opportunity to travel this country, to go to Newfoundland and visit the little community of Trepassey and see people who go out every day in violent seas to fish for food, and to travel across this country and see people who want to build.

Many of these people came to this country because they knew that there was opportunity to build, and that is the nature of this country. What we need is a national policy, including an economic policy, that is in keeping with the building nature of this country, rather than in conflict. For a decade we have had a government which has not trusted the people of Canada, and it is evident again in the budget. Instead of allowing private entrepreneurs to acquire businesses which could be best operated in the private sector, the government moves in and buys. Instead of helping young Canadians and other Canadians who want to go out and build their homes, the government says no. Instead, this government goes out to younger Canadians and Canadians on low incomes and says: "You are too rich. How do we, those of us sitting in Outremont, know you are too rich? Because you want to own a home." That is what the Prime Minister said, and that is why he opposed our policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I will not get into that matter, Mr. Speaker, because it is a subject for another debate, but it certainly indicates an attitude toward Canadians. There is here, in this party, a determination to establish a government which will introduce policies which will encourage the building instinct of ordinary Canadians. It will be a refreshing change and we look forward to introducing such policies as soon as we can after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): These are my first remarks in this House, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, it is a great honour and privilege for a number of reasons. First of all, simply being an elected representative of the Canadian people is a great honour, as is representing the riding of Westmount, which, as hon. members know, will soon be redesignated as Saint Henri-Westmount. It is an unexpected pleasure to have the opportunity to listen to and follow the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and accordingly I would like to depart from some of the general comments which I intended to make at the outset about my riding—which I understand are traditional and to which I will come back in due course—to comment briefly upon some of the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the budget.

I have sometimes been a critic of budgets in the past, but I must say that I am proud, as a humble backbencher, to be associated, however indirectly, with the budget handed down last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): I have to assume that the Leader of the Opposition, because he really did not address himself to any of the substantive issues contained in the budget, must be in agreement, by and large, with the proposals contained in it.

I learned some things in the course of my campaign. I am a neophyte and a debutante with no political experience, and, in the course of my campaign, my Conservative adversary, who was a very able adversary, let it be known to me that he had been at a candidate's school. This was my first criticism of my own party, because I did not have the benefit of candidate school. It appeared to me during the course of the campaign and after listening to a number of members of the opposition, including its leader, that candidate school specializes in a particular form of humour, a good deal of gloom and doom, and the preaching of a lot of platitudes.

The comments which I intend to make to this House today will be less humorous, with less doom and gloom, and I hope that there will not be too many platitudes. However, I would like to point out that the Leader of the Opposition did make one statement which I share wholeheartedly with him, and that is, that this is not a country beset by problems, but a country of unlimited opportunity. I was delighted to hear the Leader of the Opposition make that statement, because it has long been my impression during the course of the last several years and, in my election campaign that too much gloom and doom is being preached in this country, not only by the opposition but from other quarters as well.

I see this country today as a country of unlimited potential and energy, with enormous coal reserves, untapped riches in the tar sands, hydroelectric power which could double within the next 15 years, and with one of the great forest reserves of the world, unmatched by any nation except, as I understand it, Russia and Brazil. We are endowed with one of the great freshwater reservoirs, minerals, and twice as much farmland per capita as the United States, although we are not quite as productive. Canada is a country of unlimited opportunity. That is why I say, that I am delighted to see those opportunities married to responsible financial policies, such as those contained in the budget brought down by the government.

It is clear to even the most cynical observer that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), in his budget rejected seductive political proposals in favour of long-term economic growth which the country requires.

Turning for a moment to my own riding, I should like to point out that indeed it is not only an honour and privilege to represent Westmount, but also a challenge. I am called upon to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of the Hon. "Bud" Drury, whose distinguished career as a soldier, public servant and politician is well known to members on both sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): I was delighted to hear the hon. Leader of the Opposition pay homage to Mr. Drury. Even in his retirement from the House, he has gone on to accept several difficult mandates, and still serves the Canadian people.

In its wisdom, the riding of Westmount selected a Liberal by an overwhelming majority in the recent by-elections. Yet, I feel that in the minds of many Canadians, the Westmount riding conjures up the image of one of the two solitudes about which Hugh MacLennan wrote so many years ago: the solitude of the affluent English in the province of Quebec. The riding of Westmount is not such a bastion or fortress of the English-speaking population of the province of Quebec. In fact, Westmount today is symbolic of the Canada of the future, the pluralistic society which brings together so many of the wonderful differences present in Canada, such as racial, religious, economic and social. All those differences are present in that great riding. The riding comprises one of the most important influential Jewish communities in Canada, as well as one of the most important business communities and universities, combining all that in a riding which is predominantly English and very substantially bilingual.

From time to time the premier of Quebec, Mr. René Lévesque, has made reference to the metaphor used by Sir Winston Churchill of two scorpions in a bottle being representative of the relationship between the French and the English. I can assure Your Honour and all members of the House, that if that metaphor is applicable anywhere is Canada—and I personally do not think it is—certainly it is not applicable in my riding or in the city of Montreal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): In fact, Mr. Speaker, the Westmount riding represents the Canada of tomorrow, where learning and speaking both official languages will be considered an opportunity and not an obligation.

At present, Mr. Speaker, we are observing in the Westmount riding a profound change in the attitude of the English-speaking population which is willingly taking part in the francization of Quebec. Anglophones, for example, are seeking opportunities to communicate and speak French with their fellow citizens, and it is astonishing to see, Mr. Speaker, that most of my Anglophone friends' children are attending either French schools or French immersion schools where both languages are taught. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, despite the Parti Québécois' efforts to create an attitude of confrontation between Anglophones and Francophones, exactly the opposite is happening today.

Mr. Speaker, since the conquest, Canadian history has taught us that the division between French and English in the province of Quebec is based on religious rather than language differences. Up until now these religious differences have almost separated the two societies or prevented their integration. In my view, the ease with which English-speaking Irish Catholics have integrated themselves into the French community, for example, is proof of this theory. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that is why today we find Francophones with names like Burns, O'Neill and Johnson, even in the Parti Québécois.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, these religious barriers have nearly disappeared. This is a very great change in Quebec. In my opinion, relations have never been as friendly and as positive. I believe that far from being confirmed, these two solitudes, of which Hugh MacLellan wrote, are rapidly getting closer together. We, English-speaking Canadians, who have not the slightest intention of leaving the province of Quebec, see in all this the potential for a multicultural society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.03 p.m. the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned at six o'clock, I was discussing the attitude of the English community towards the francization of Quebec. I was explaining that we, English-speaking Canadians, have no intention of leaving Quebec because we are very pleased with what is now happening in the province. We see a dynamic, multicultural and bilingual society which could become the most dynamic society in North America if the economy is not overly weakened by the present political uncertainty.

[English]

Notwithstanding these very positive attitudes all of us in the riding of Westmount have, it is also fair to say that all Montrealers and all residents of my riding, be they Francophone or Anglophone, are fearful of what may lie ahead. We have heard our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others say on a number of occasions that the health of the Canadian economy is inseparable from the subject of national unity. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I know there are many Canadians who may not share that view, but we who live in the riding of Westmount know that view to be correct.

Daily we witness an exodus of talent, French and English, young talent, often the children of friends, sometimes to other provinces in Canada but quite often to the United States. Daily we witness the exodus of businesses and assets. We see businesses closing and families displaced, as I indicated before, again sometimes to other provinces in Canada, but again quite often to the United States. The professional community in the city of Montreal, be they lawyers, auditors or professional counsellors, have been presiding over transactions of this kind on a daily basis for the last several years.

I ask you, is it any wonder that the people of Westmount are more sensitive to the problems of national unity and the relationship of those problems to the economy than Canadians elsewhere in this country?

[Translation]

—as we say in French, to ask the question is to answer it.

[English]

Imagine my disappointment when I attended the first ministers' constitutional conference several weeks ago here in Ottawa and listened to the discussion about entrenching given rights and freedoms in our constitution, hearing Premier Lougheed declare that as far as he was concerned such entrenchment was unnecessary, that Alberta had a bill of rights and that the legislature of any particular province would be able and should respond to the needs and the will of the people at any particular time in this regard. I sat there and thought to myself, how would Premier Lougheed feel were he an English-speaking merchant in the third—perhaps the second, but probably the third—largest English-speaking city in Canada serving almost exclusively an English clientele, unable to erect a sign on his premises in English? So much, I said to myself, for the protection that is to be afforded the minorities of this country, not only in Quebec, but by other provincial legislatures.

Returning for a moment to the budget itself and the economy, I would point out that during my campaign I learned that in Westmount, economic issues are of as much concern as elsewhere in Canada. The people in Westmount want lean, tough government. That message came through loud and clear. They endorsed the policies introduced in 1975, the tightening up of the money supply, the basic freezing of the civil service over the last several years, and cutback in government expenditures. Furthermore, the mandate they gave me was: you go there and make sure these additional budget cuts and this economic plan of August are implemented. They approved the policies of this government as shown overwhelmingly by their vote on October 16.

As I said earlier to day, I am confident they will approve wholeheartedly the very responsible and very economically sound budget introduced by the finance minister last week.

I was very pleased, as, I noted, was the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), at the added incentive given to research and development in this country. This is very important to all of Canada and particularly to my province, Quebec, where, in the relatively near future, we must establish competitive high technology industries to replace those which we regard as being in the secteurs mous whose years are obviously numbered.

I was also heartened by something for which I have been asking for years, and that is a re-examination of our Income Tax Act to see that it is fair to all Canadians. A carefull look should be taken at the concept of tax neutrality—namely, that Canadians in the same financial circumstances should bear the same burden of tax. I am not by any means satisfied that this job is being done, but certainly in many respects this budget is a step in the right direction.

I might say that I learned several things this afternoon from the Leader of the Opposition, though none had anything to do with the budget. This leads me to conclude that fundamentally the Conservative party endorses the principles set forth in the budget. One of the things which came through loud and clear was that members of the Conservative party have an aversion to Crown corporations, which apparently is not shared by their colleague, Mr. Peter Lougheed. I too favour greater private sector participation wherever possible, but understandably the private sector looks to the competitive return on investment that it can derive from any particular area of endeavour. Those returns are not necessarily readily available in the capital intensive energy areas in which Canada is required to invest in the latter part of this century, not only for our generation but for that of our children, our grandchildren and for the future.

Hence, nineteenth century Conservative philosophy is not appropriate to the kind of capital intensive energy situation we are facing in Canada today. By the same reasoning that I heard this afternoon, I would think that the Leader of the Opposition should postulate that private industry in the United States should be financing outer space exploration. I would doubt that he would even convince General Motors of the validity of that kind of investment, yet who knows what kind of benefits may be ultimately derived by mankind from that kind of expenditure in the public sector?

Another thing which I found fascinating was the idea that the acquisition by Petro-Can of Pacific Petroleums was a current government expenditure of some kind. As I understand the transaction—and since I sit on the backbenches perhaps I do not understand fully—the acquisition is an asset. So I said to myself that if the acquisition of an asset was regarded by the opposition as a current expenditure, then it is small wonder that they believe that mortgage interest should be deductible. In fact, the entire purchase price of a house should be deductible.

The Leader of the Opposition also told us that he believed in cutting costs, freezing the growth of the civil service and reducing the deficit, all programs, I would point out, Mr. Speaker, which the government has undertaken. It is not clear to me how he manages another $2 billion in cost saving, but I am somewhat new to this game of politics and perhaps that is what is regarded as opposition licence, rather like poetic licence. If so and that kind of licence is available to us, I think at the same time we should look to full employment, no deficits and reduced taxes. He may be saving that platform for the spring, but I want it on record, Mr. Speaker, that it first came from the backbenches of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): I should like to close, Mr. Speaker, on a rather more serious note. I said earlier that Canada has enormous potential, and the Leader of the Opposition agrees with that. We have a tremendous asset base and we have a population that can exploit that base. The constituent elements of economic growth, as we all know, basically consist of the marriage of resources, labour and capital. We need capital in this country, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, political uncertainty does not create a secure environment to attract capital, be it Canadian or foreign.

● (2022)

We in the Westmount riding, Mr. Speaker, are on the front line of the battle not only to save our own economy in Quebec and that of Canada, but to save the country itself. The people in the Westmount riding, be they French-speaking or English-speaking, live with this problem every day. I believe that the people of Westmount, like the troops on the front line of a battle, are in a better position to judge what kind of leadership and what kind of leader is required to win that battle than the reserve troops who are stationed many miles away. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the vote on October 16 whereby the Liberal party was given an overwhelmingly increased percentage majority compared with 1974 was a message which the people on the front line sent to the people of Canada. And they sent a message that was loud and clear, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Johnston (Westmount).]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to speak about a budget such as the one under consideration. Since I have been sitting in this House, Mr. Speaker, several budgets have been introduced but I think that none has ever been so eagerly awaited. Not unlike previous finance ministers this one has only partly succeeded in sitting on the fence, to provide a nice picture while giving as little as possible. The business world is rather satisifed with the budget, because financial restraint is essential, but the small taxpayer is not happy as a result of the budget.

Nothing substantial appears in the minister's speech. For weeks he had been receiving much advice from various quarters about the direction to take to promote the economy. The Economic Council of Canada among others urged him to reduce the excise tax, cut the sales tax from 12 per cent to 6 per cent as well as personal income tax. On the other hand the Canadian Manufacturers Association advised him not to include any personal tax reduction, but to provide tax changes for companies and the business world generally. The minister could choose between one of those options, that is please the large company by taking a more cautious approach or please the small taxpayer by taking stronger steps. He has decided to follow the first option at the expense of the second.

This having been said, let us consider the details of the highlights of the new budget. At the outset, let us examine the sections which seem to be of a certain interest at first sight. The fiscal changes which will prevent professionals from incorporating in order to pay less income tax will be welcomed. Canadians will also welcome the changes relating to income debentures and retractable preferred shares. A number of companies invested their money in that fashion and by so doing avoided paying their taxes. We must note however that Petro-Canada took advantage of that fiscal loophole to buy the Pacific Petroleums Company Ltd. Could there have been a leak of information relating to the budget, Mr. Speaker, a leak that would have allowed Petro-Canada to acquire that company before the budget abolished that form of investment? The increase in the taxes of air carriers means that users only, and not the whole population of Canada, will pay the costs of transportation.

Generally speaking, those are the aspects of the budget which seem acceptable to us; unfortunately, they help only a very small part of the population. The government provides very few new measures for ordinary people. The sections of the budget which seem to favour these people do not actually. Let us take a closer look at them. In his introductory comments, the minister stated that the Canadian economy has made great progress in 1978, but without the results which had been anticipated. Real production growth will be around 4 per cent while the increase in domestic production prices will reach 6½ per cent. What has happened in recent months when a 5½ per cent increase in production was foreseen by the minister? Why this anticipated decrease of 1½ per cent? Moreover, this decline could be more important as economic experts are predicting an increase of approximately 3½ per cent. In addition, the minister maintains that the increase in domestic production prices will be 6½ per cent. Is he taking into account the increases resulting from imported products? In his speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) specified, and I quote:

> But action is needed now to encourage investment, to respond to the needs of sectors and regions, and to keep our costs competitive, while reducing our cash requirements from the present high level.

Anyone hearing such a statement wonders what the minister is getting at. First, apart from Ontario and maybe Alberta, what real advantages will the other provinces of Canada stand to gain from the incentives advocated by the minister? Second, when the minister suggests raising from 30 per cent to 100 per cent the write-off for mining development expenditures it certainly helps the development of enterprises but it does precious little for those who work there. Let us take for example the recent ruling by the Anti-Inflation Board which refused an 8 per cent salary increase to miners in Thetford Mines because it was supposed to be too much: so, there is one law for the rich and another for the poor. In addition, always with a view to helping development, the minister extends the incentive for oil drilling funds. That is another gift for that industry which was going to invest anyway, even without help from the government.

The government, in a sublime and noble effort, saw fit to include in its new tax legislation a new maximum for the deduction of expenses relating to employment, that is $500. At first look, it seems to be a very generous action, but it is not so. First, that change in tax legislation will take place only in one year from now, not in 1979, which would have had immediate effects. Second, that increased deduction will benefit rich taxpayers, those who pay income tax. That exemption means an average real gain of $100 to $125 a year. Mind you, that reduction does not apply to taxpayers whose income is less than $10,000. Provincial income tax will decrease by $400 million for provinces which have signed an agreement in relation with income tax collection.

However, this measure is dependant upon an agreement between the federal government and the provincial government. The terms and conditions are not specified. So the greatest uncertainty prevails. Lastly, we note this quite mysterious sentence by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), and I quote:

> The federal government and a number of provincial governments are working together to reduce the high cost of wood supply.

In his budget, the minister grants these companies other fiscal advantages which will have both directly and indirectly the effect of lowering their supply costs. That is a nice gesture, however the minister ignores the fact that in Quebec, for example, the cost of forest operations concessions in already low. Why then give grants to reduce these costs further? In fact, most of these measures will directly help such already privileged areas as Alberta and Ontario. The wealthy will get richer and the poor poorer.

Mr. Speaker, I will now comment on the measures announced by the Minister of Finance to promote research and development. As for increasing the basic investment tax credit for R and D from 5 per cent to 10 per cent throughout Canada, and to 20 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé region, I think that that is in itself a good measure. But I wonder why the minister did not increase it to 100 per cent as he did elsewhere, for example for expenses related to mining development. I really believe that small and medium-sized businesses, especially in the pulp and paper industry, would have benefited from such measures, when one considers that the main reason why various sectors of job creating companies were closed is their lack of competitiveness because of old, unsatisfactory and inadequate facilities for our time.

As for companies whose head office is outside Canada, I really do not think that the small tax advantages offered by the government would compete with those already offered by countries such as the United States. In that sense, the measures put forth by the Minister of Finance will certainly not have the impact which he wants Canadians to believe, and he knows that, Mr. Speaker.

I want to deal now with another far more important aspect of this R and D issue that the government is trying to hide from the Canadian people. On September 6, 1978, the present government announced budgetary cutbacks which, I believe, will be disastrous for the future of basic and industrial research in Canada. I can already hear short-sighted Liberal ministers say, as they have in the past, that basic research is good only for egocentric researchers. But I for one, Mr. Speaker, predict that the way things are going within two years industrial research will feel the countereffects of the way in which basic research is presently being mistreated, and I think the minister is the only one who cannot understand that the application of new technologies comes after the basic research necessary to discover those technologies.

The minister says on the one hand that he wants to help small and medium-sized businesses, but on the other hand the government announces cutbacks of $14.8 million in the nationally important sector of agriculture. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) will hear about this later on because I think that all hon. members must have received representations from their local federation representatives saying that they are not at all pleased about the Canadian dairy policy which has been frozen for the last two years. I shall come back to this question at the proper time, but I simply want to underline in passing that the government has done absolutely nothing in this area.

The budget of the Medical Research Council had been reduced by $500,000 and that of the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch has been slashed by $6 million. Is fitness not also a matter of national concern, Mr. Speaker? And the list goes on. If the minister continues to damage university research as he has been doing for too long, who will train our scientists, even in the field of industrial research, and will we have to rely even more on foreign technology?

Mr. Speaker, recently, the Science Council of Canada raised the problem of industrial underdevelopment in Canada. Does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) not agree that this fact coupled with the drop of the dollar on international exchange markets will increase even more the already enormous cost of the transfer of foreign technology? Does that really represent a saving in the long term? What good can such a policy do to Canada? This government seems to have no ingenuity whatsoever, Mr. Speaker.

Indeed, why did the government not subsidize on an equal basis with small and medium-sized businesses the allocation of contracts for research made in government or university laboratories, which already have all the infrastructures needed to carry out this work? In addition to developing and maintaining our scientific customers in Canada, this could have had an obvious beneficial effect on industrial and pure research. This is the type of positive action which calls for the participation of everyone concerned and which could re-establish confidence among the various groups which constitute the Canadian scientific community, which confidence has been dangerously eroded during the last three years by the lack of an adequate policy in the area of research and development.

When I talk about an adequate policy, Mr. Speaker, what I mean is this: first of all, an adequate budget, which implies that the funds allocated to research and development should be increased to 2.5 per cent of the gross national product before 1985, with 50 per cent of these funds contributed by the public sector and 50 per cent by the private sector. This would encourage the business involved to be more serious in its application and in its work on research projects since it would have a 50 per cent financial involvement in these projects.

To avoid the type of political blackmail we are presently facing and to ensure the stability necessary for a good technological performance, a long term science policy supported by three year budgetary commitments revised every year should be established as soon as possible. The final element of an adequate research and development policy would be intensive consultation with the Canadian scientific community and the appointment of competent people to key positions in the research and development field, excluding in fact those experts in general administration. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need to be more accurate. The minister certainly understands what I mean.

In conclusion, the government predicts a reduction of 112,000 jobs in 1979 compared to the 1978 performance. In fact, some 362,000 new jobs were created in 1978 while they will increase by only 250,000 in 1979, again according to the Minister of Finance: Informetrica Ltd., a statistical data research corporation in Ottawa, predicts that the proposed $2.5 billion financial cuts will result in the loss of 94,000 jobs in the federal government by 1981.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

Last August the Minister of Finance predicted a 5½ per cent growth rate but Thursday evening he said that this rate would hardly reach 4 per cent. The weekend edition of the newspaper La Presse referred to a possibility of a mere 2½ per cent growth rate. Each statement made recently by the minister seems to demonstrate the government's inability to stimulate the economy.

In Canada, we have gotten into the habit of taxing production and employment through a large number of very complex fiscal laws while at the same time we subsidize inefficiency and non production through various government programs. The inability of the present government in economic matters as well as the performance of previous governments demonstrate without any doubt that the Keynesian system, the economic bible of our governments for years, is no longer adapted to our present economic and fiscal problems. The coexistence of soaring inflation and high unemployment rates as well as the behaviour of current governments towards budgetary deficits are there to prove it.

Considering the incompetence of the present government, we propose the immediate adoption of the policy advocated by the Social Credit Party of Canada since 1962 in this House.

That policy is what the sum total of money supply plus credit balances must be strictly controlled by the Bank of Canada to avoid inflation or deflation at the retail price level. Moreover, within the framework of an over-all monetary policy ensuring that enough credit is available for all Canadians to buy the goods and services they are able to produce, the national government must adhere to a "cash payment" fiscal policy rather than sinking lower into debt all the time, and undertake to eliminate the national debt in a specific period of time. Since the credit worth created by chartered banks issues from the producing systems capacity and the consumers' desire to consume, the government must maintain a balance between dollar demand and the cost of consumer goods, which they failed to do until now. In order to make available to Canadians sufficient purchasing power to maintain that kind of balance, the government should revert to the 1967 6 per cent maximum interest rate on chartered bank loans. Finally, the total personal exemption for income tax purposes should be increased to $5,000 per person, which means that the basic exemption should now be $5,000 for a single taxpayer, $10,000 for a couple, plus an additional $1,000 per dependent child. Those are initiatives that are called for by many people. Indeed, I urge the Minister of Finance to promptly consider them, if he has not yet done so, because the Progressive Conservative candidate in the Toronto constituency of "Beaches" made comments quite similar to that of Major Douglas, the initiator of the Social Credit, in a recent speech before the Toronto chapter of the Society of Management Accountants.

Although we developed the fiscal proposition he put forward, and quite some time ago, and some people apparently have been making political capital at our expense on the issue for a number of years, we are happy that some federal political organizations finally saw fit to endorse our analysis of the economic situation.

It would suffice, just to name a few, to mention for instance family allowances and old age security pensions, which have been advocated by us since the beginning and which we now have today. The government has again started to talk about a guaranteed annual income program and we are pleased with that. They are even talking about Canadian harmony. I have just read an article in La Presse and I am glad to quote from it:

> That is what comes out of the annual congress of the Ontario wing of the Liberal Party of Canada ... Three days of debates on the double theme of Canadian harmony and the economy—

So they will no longer talk about Canadian unity, the new word is Canadian harmony. And this is precisely what we have been saying for a long time. We know that it is impossible to achieve unity if unity is to be taken in the strict sense of the word. People can live in total harmony but they cannot live in complete unity. I am most happy to see the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) using this new expression. This was very comforting Mr. Speaker.

We now have the impression that changes are taking place slowly but surely. Let us administer this country to the advantage of its human resources instead of sacrificing its human capital for the sake of profit. The Social Credit party represents the triumph of men over money. How simple these words can sound yet how heavy their practical consequences. I see that you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker. I will save you the effort and resume my seat.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has brought down his budget at a time when new directions in economic policy are urgently needed. Canada is entering the second winter in a row with more than a million people out of work. The minister has predicted that the job situation in 1979 will be even worse than it was in 1977 and 1978. The cost of living, the deficit in government and our foreign debt, all continue to increase while Canadians wait for the long-term promised economic turnabout of which they have heard from this government.

In the face of our great unused capacity in manpower and resources, the net effect of budgets and mini-budgets brought forward in the past 15 months by this Minister of Finance is zero. If we had not had a budget this year—and we have had two or three—we would be in no different a situation now than we were a year ago.

First the minister took 3 per cent off the sales tax. Now he is proposing a reduction in the manufacturers' sales tax. Each of these cancelled itself out.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) returned from his meeting with the western leaders at Bonn, he promised the government would adopt policies which would mean an increase of 5 per cent this year in our gross national product. Instead, the increase is less than 4 per cent, about 3.9 per cent. The Minister of Finance now predicts an increase in the gross national product in the coming year of 4½ per cent. We have every right to assume that the minister's 4½ per cent target will come no closer to being met than was the Prime Minister's target of 5 per cent. We are likely to see an increase in the gross national product of about 3.5 per cent. If, as is likely, the United States moves into a period of recession, the 3.5 per cent about which I am talking may be an optimistic forecast. In the coming year we will see an unemployment rate of 9 per cent. The rate of inflation will not be the 6.5 per cent about which the minister talked but probably somewhere between 7.5 per cent and 8 per cent.

An hon. Member: That is much better than 10 per cent.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member says that is better than 10 per cent. I remind him that we are almost back to where we were in October of 1975 when the government brought forward its anti-inflation program, which has been a failure. Unemployment has increased since the minister's October, 1977 mini-budget and his April budget. Official Statistics Canada figures show that 910,000 Canadians were unemployed last month. That is a substantial increase over the same period a year earlier. During the course of the last year the unemployment rate in my province of Manitoba went up from 5.6 per cent to 6.5 per cent.

In October of this year 4,000 more Manitobans were out of work than in October of 1977. We Manitobans know what a Conservative government means because we have had one for the last 15 months. It is not surprising that unemployment in Manitoba is increasing faster than in any other province. Actual unemployment in September of this year was 30 per cent higher than it was in the same month in 1977. On a seasonally adjusted rate, unemployment rose by 24 per cent. It is not hard to understand why that happened. Manitoba has a Conservative government, and the Conservative party in this parliament is urging the Canadian people to adopt the same policies nationally as those policies which are in existence in the province of Manitoba under a Conservative government.

What has been done in Manitoba, and why is unemployment up? Let us look at the record. Because of the contention of the Conservative government in Manitoba that the province needed more restraint, that government reduced the number of civil servants in that province by 1,500. That meant a reduction of services. A complete freeze was put on all government construction for a whole year. That meant that no government buildings were built. No senior citizens' housing was constructed, and no public housing was constructed.

In the whole province of Manitoba work on only one hospital was done in the whole year. It is not surprising that 2,000 construction workers who were working in 1977 are not working in 1978. That is what a Conservative government and restraint mean.

What the program of the Minister of Finance means, and has meant until now, is an increase in unemployment across the country. Our most industrialized province, Ontario, governed by a Conservative government, experienced a very large increase in unemployment in October of this year compared with the year before. The same was the case in the province of Quebec. The number of jobless in Ontario and Quebec exceeded 520,000 people. Let us face the fact that over 40 per cent of the 900,000 unemployed in Canada are young people between the ages of 15 and 24. That means that probably between 80,000 and 90,000 young people are unemployed in Quebec. It is no wonder that young people, in Quebec, particularly Francophones, have moved to support the separatist government in that province. I would have been surprised if they had not, in view of the record of this federal government in dealing with the major problem of unemployment in the province of Quebec.

The hardships and deprivations suffered by unemployed Canadians also mean losses for the people of Canada as a whole. The difference between the number of unemployed in 1973 and in 1978 is about 350,000. This represents a loss of almost $11.5 billion in terms of our gross national product. It means substantially less tax income for all levels of government and more spending under the unemployment insurance program.

The Minister of Finance has predicted that there will be 112,000 fewer new jobs in 1979. That is a prediction of further recession, less government revenue and more ineffective spending on job-creation programs to cushion the effects of unemployment, which to a large extent has been created by this government's lack of action. Unfortunately, the minister and his colleagues would rather cut government spending and slow down the economy even more than adopt measures which would tackle unemployment. As I have already pointed out, the effects of solutions like than can be seen today in Manitoba.

High unemployment, no major increase in funding for job creation and no real tax cuts demonstrate that the budget is a stand-pat budget and that there are no new policy directions.

The Minister of Finance is standing pat when our economy is at a standstill, consumer spending is low, prices are high and about 13 per cent of our industrial capacity is still unused. The minister continues to predict expansion, but the record of past predictions by this minister and this government give Canadians little hope for the coming year.

Only one element of society has welcomed the budget. Not surprisingly, it is the group which has gained most from the economic policies practised by this government since 1974. I refer to business people. A variety of tax cuts for corporations has been introduced in recent years, although four years of economic downturn suggests that this is the worst possible way to try to stimulate the economy.

Instead of the stale, unimaginative advice which the minister has been getting from his advisers since he took on his portfolio—advice which has proved to result in failure—the minister should have listened to the Economic Council of Canada. In its recent annual report, the Economic Council of Canada pointed out that economic prosperity will not be assured if governments get out of the way of the private sector. Following the principle of less government—now accepted by both the Liberal government and the Conservative opposition—means more government austerity, more unemployment and more hardships for Canadian people.

The second principle which the Economic Council discussed was the idea that inflation can be eliminated if the rate of growth in the money supply is cut to 5 per cent, approximately the potential real growth of the Canadian economy. This is the policy which is being followed—or at least espoused—by the governor of the Bank of Canada, and I believe it is the policy of the Official Opposition, as expounded often by its spokesman, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). What that policy will mean is that real growth will drop, interest rates will rise, unemployment will rise and the rate of increase in the cost of living will rise sharply. What the Economic Council proposed instead was real tax cuts, not just in the sales tax but also substantial cuts in income taxes for most Canadians, particularly low and middle income Canadians.

These tax cuts which the minister has put in, and the minister's faith in the improved competitiveness due to a lower dollar, reflect his rejection of a real industrial stategy and any real long-term policies to improve the state of the Canadian economy. The long-term prospects are disastrous, even if the most optimistic projections for 1979 are met. The structure of our economy, especially foreign domination of key industries and a multitude of small branch plants, is such that economic opportunities are not now used to Canada's advantage.

A recent background study for the Science Council of Canada entitled, "The Weakest Link" makes this situation very clear. The authors documented their case as follows:

> During the 1950s and 1960s Canada lost ground economically to European economies in spite of expanding domestic and international markets. Expanding markets provided a superb opportunity for new investment, new processes, and new products, and should have influenced both productivity and profits. Canada has appeared to have squandered the opportunities of the past 20 years and has been left with inefficient, unprogressive secondary manufacturing firms.

The authors state later on that, even if Canadian costs were reduced:

> —the economy would still be less well equipped, compared with most advanced industrial nations, to make positive responses to the problems posed by the growing industrialization of the underdeveloped world. Furthermore, it would still be a weak competitor against other advanced countries which, with their higher levels of technological capability, are more able to replace dying exports with new products.

These long-term structural problems are ignored by the budget. The recommendations of industry, labour committees and the sectoral committees have been almost completely ignored, and the result is likely to be the shameful spectacle of taxpayers' revenue being used to finance corporations' continued movements of jobs and investment out of Canada.

The budget gives another $755 million to business through a variety of new tax cuts and the extension of older ones. This will be in addition to the billions of dollars in corporate tax cuts already provided by the present minister and his predecessors. These taxes are cut with no strings attached, and corporations have taken advantage of the fact.

I would like to point out the ineffectiveness of the tax policies, which have been followed until now and are continued in the present budget, in fostering research and development. We will continue to fail in the future because the minister has not faced up to the problems. The Toronto Star, in its October 12 issue, did some research. They called some of the largest multinational corporations in Canada to find out how much research and development they were doing on a world wide basis and how much of that R and D was being done in Canada. Here are some of the glaring examples of how these giant multinationals have ignored Canada until now.

Ford Motor Company, which spent $1,170 million on world wide research and development, said:

> Most of our R and D is done in the U.S., Britain and Germany. We do some here but there are no figures available.

An hon. Member: Is it U.S. Ford?

Mr. Orlikow: It is Ford worldwide. I would like the hon. member to realize that Ford of Canada, one of the largest, most profitable corporations in this country, does not have one science Ph.D. graduate employed in Canada. General Electric spent $463 million for R and D world wide, and $9 million of that was spent in Canada. Kodak spent $351 million on research and development world wide. A spokesman for that company said:

> All pure and applied research is done at our Rochester, N.Y., facility. We do some product development in Canada but no figures are available.

Chrysler spent $337 million on R and D international, and they responded by saying:

> We don't do any R and D here in Canada. All our design and development work is done in the U.S.

I could go on, but I do not have the time. Most of the multinationals have the same dismal record.

I have not mentioned the large Canadian corporations, but some of them are no better. They are interested in profits only, not jobs for Canadians. One example is Northern Telecom, a Bell Canada subsidiary which has been viewed as a model for Canadian industry. Northern Telecom is treated well by the federal government. The company has received grants and loans that amount to almost $14 million. Its deferred taxes as at December, 1977 were about $50 million. The Export Development Corporation loans to foreign countries for the purchase of Northern Telecom equipment have reached the $200 million mark. The returns to Northern Telecom have been excellent. Its sales have more than doubled since 1971, going—

Mr. Condon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I direct a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to accept a question from the hon. member if I have time at the end of my remarks.

Sales have increased from over $500 million in 1971 to approximately $1.2 billion in 1977. In the same period, profits have increased almost sevenfold from $12 million to $85 million. Similar increases have been recorded in other indicators of this company's wealth. It is today a large and much more profitable corporation than was the case in the 1960s.

This profitability came, Mr. Speaker, at the expense of Canadians in more ways than just tax cuts. In the 1970s, Northern Telecom employed 26,000 people when the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, Mr. Pepin, assured a union representing the employees that the company would not leave Quebec. However, it has left Quebec and other provinces since that assurance. Last year, about 15,000 people were employed in Canada by Telecom, and in 1978 they estimate that it would have only 14,000 employees. At the same time, foreign plants built or bought by Northern Telecom—I suggest with Canadian money, either through profits, tax rebates or loans—now employ 10,000, slightly less than the number of people who lost their jobs in this country. The net effect is that, in my view, taxpayers paid this company to export jobs during a period of immense growth in that company's profits.

Another example of a company using across-the-board tax cuts is International Nickel Company. This corporation, with profits of $1.7 billion between 1967 and 1976, could defer $368 million in federal taxes, although it eliminated 4,000 full time jobs in just one day in 1977. All this was done in Tory Ontario at Sudbury and in Tory Manitoba at Thompson. Inco was able to use profits made in Canada, $17.5 million in federal tax credits, a $25 million provincial sales tax exemption and a low cost $70 million loan from the Export Development Corporation to export jobs to Guatemala and to Indonesia.

The Inco story raises questions about the value of this budget's special tax cuts for the mining industry. The foreign owned firms which dominate this industry seem ready and willing to use such tax cuts to finance their expenses elsewhere, and even to eliminate jobs here. It seems incredible to us that the minister's response has been to help increase the profits of such companies which they use to pay for foreign expansion at the expense of Canadian workers.

Northern Telecom and Inco are two examples which illustrate the flow of investment funds out of Canada. Indeed, the United States department of commerce estimates that there will be $720 million worth of direct Canadian investment in that country this year. Total investment abroad was $1,365 million in the year ending June 30, 1978, according to Statistics Canada. Canada is now the third largest source of foreign investment in the United States economy.

At the present time, the pulp and paper industry should be using its enormous profits to modernize Canadian plants. The budget provides extra help for this industry, but what happened? B. C. Forest Products recently invested $75 million in the purchase of Blandin Corporation, a Minnesota paper company. Olympia & York invested $350 million in Manhattan, at a time when approximately 170,000 building trade workers were unemployed in Canada. This month, the Bank of Montreal will invest $1 billion in New York State, although key Canadian industries are falling behind in domestic and world markets because they lack the credit needed to innovate and modernize.

These exports of investment funds and jobs came after the corporate tax cuts of 1974, 1975 and 1976. Those carrots were not even sufficient to keep our own money in this poorly structured and declining economy. The November 16 budget offers more carrots, oblivious to the flow of investment under current economic conditions. We need a strategy to revitalize the economy, and sticks, such as the monitoring of Canadian investment abroad, to keep money here and make the economy attractive to investors.

Alternatives are available to the Minister of Finance. He did not have to maintain the pattern of across-the-board unconditional corporate tax cuts, a pattern which has been damaging to the economy and increasing the deficit. He could have applied to all corporate taxes the rule which he announced for small business tax. About the latter, he said the following:

> The very generosity of the measures makes it essential to ensure that they are effectively targeted.

Despite what he said, the budget did not adopt any of the recommendations from the second tier committee which represented both industry and labour in the more than 20 industries which it examined. The committee made specific recommendations about research and development incentives. It recommended write-offs and tax credits which could be applied flexibly to each project; a payback mechanism where the subsidized research leads to new profits; a special effort to increase Canadian research and development by foreign firms; and safeguards against the free transfer out of Canada of publicly financed research and development benefits, such as the ones to which I referred in connection with Northern Telecom. Not one of those recommendations was included in the budget, although the minister implied that the changes in research and development tax credits were made in response to the second tier committee. If they were, it was a poor response.

We need to adopt an industrial strategy along the lines suggested by the New Democratic Party for approximately two years. One goal of such a strategy would be the development of industries which supply inputs into key sectors of our economy: housing, transportation and food. Instead, we received cuts in the research budgets for transportation, fishing, farming and energy. This should be done in a way which would improve both the quality and quantity of Canadian production, as well as make maximum use of Canadian products.

Canada now relies too heavily on imports in the basic high technology industries, such as industrial machinery and equipment, chemicals, plastic materials and telecommunications equipment. Priority development in these industries would replace imports and lead to an international specialization in some of the categories. This would increase the proportion of industrial goods in our over-all exports. Despite what is being done by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), we depend almost exclusively on the sale of raw materials for export, rather than on manufacturing to provide the necessary jobs. Further processing of our natural resources in Canada would represent another opportunity to strengthen the economy and increase employment. These are investment imperatives for future economic strength, not just opportunities.

An industrial strategy will not be achieved by tax giveaways or passive acceptance of the export of jobs and capital from the country. The budget should have replaced the broad range of corporate tax cuts with a Canadian investment fund as proposed by my party. Such a fund, built up of private profits deposited to gain tax credits, would be available for investment under public authority to help rebuild Canadian industry. That is precisely what the Swedish government has done, and that country has surged ahead, while Canada has fallen behind. There would be a penalty for unapproved use of such profits; large firms could be required to contribute a share of their profits in times of inflationary pressure. A constantly revitalized economy, with well planned investment in Canada of at least some corporate profits, would be the result.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am really delighted to take part in this debate, and I wish first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston), who has presented his ideas and remarks with quite a remarkable eloquence. I take also great pleasure in mentioning that the hon. member represents a linguistic minority within his province, just as I represent one within mine.

[English]

Also, it augurs very well for the contribution of that hon. member to future debates. I strongly encourage him to bring to this House in the future the quality which he contributed today.

At the outset, I should like to indicate that as a representative of a northern Ontario constituency, I have followed issues affecting that area with a great deal of interest. I was extremely pleased with the budget and its provisions in terms of how the areas of northern Ontario are affected. Advantage will be made available to industry in northern Ontario, particularly the pulp and paper industry, by the 10 per cent investment tax credit. Northern Ontario has experienced the phenomenon of older mills and equipment in the pulp and paper industry, at a time when the industry is facing a bull market. I strongly encourage major corporations involved in the pulp and paper industry in northern Ontario, to avail themselves of the 10 per cent investment tax credit in order to renew equipment and refurbish old plants.

One item in the budget of considerable interest and importance to me, was the encouragement given to the mineral industry. Since the advent of the railway back in the 1880's, northern Ontario has seen the development of mining, unsurpassed anywhere else in Canada. Indeed, the mining industry has been an essential ingredient to northern Ontario and, as a consequence, to Ontario and the whole of Canada. It is encouraging to see the positive reaction within that industry to the initiatives of the government, such as mining tax incentives, including the write-off of development expenditures which is being increased from 30 per cent to 100 per cent.

In addition, the government has advanced its declared intention to allow costs associated with town sites and social assets of new mines to be subject to depletion write-offs, again a welcome intitiative supported by the industry.

Another example of co-operation with the province in the recent past can be found in a bill introduced at the last session of the Ontario legislature to provide a tax write-off for mining equipment. That tax write-off marries very well with the write-offs that are to be made available, and I would encourage the Ontario government to renew its efforts to pass that legislation which died on the previous order paper. This is a great initiative that we are presenting, and I hope it will receive the support of the Ontario government.

We have received encouragement in the past as a result of co-operation with that government. One example is to be found in the recent agreement between the federal government and the government of Ontario to provide $2.3 million for geoscientific surveys undertaken in the Kirkland Lake area of the province, an area which Your Honour will recognize as one of the most productive mining areas in the past.

Having regard to these budget proposals, let me say that my office has contacted a number of major mining concerns. In the last year I have visited some of those major mining operations in northern Ontario in order to familiarize myself with conditions there. As a result, I have established a rapport with the industry, and there has been a great exchange of information. Following the budget, the industry gave primary approval to its provisions.

I listened with some interest on Friday to what was advanced by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). I listened to a small portion of his speech, and that was enough. For a number of reasons I had to leave, but I found, upon reading his speech, there was not very much I missed after the few remarks I heard.

He criticized the government in terms of Crown corporations. He attempted to wax eloquently about these corporations, and he advanced the notion of privatization. He indicated that the government should abandon its initiatives in terms of Crown corporations and launch itself into a program of privatization. Unfortunately, he seized upon two shining examples of government initiative in the Crown corporation field. The first was in respect of Petro-Canada; the other was in respect of a Crown corporation styled the Enterprise Development Corporation.

Let me deal first with Petro-Can. I have very fond memories regarding this corporation. I was a member of the committee on National Resources and Public Works when the concept was approved by the committee and parliament. I have watched its development as a concept and as a fact and its subsequent progress within the private sector. I suggest its progress has been commendable. I find it strange that the Tories selected that corporation in order to exemplify their response to Crown corporations and in trying to discourage the government from protecting the national interest. I find it strange that the Tory opposition, in this instance, should take exception to a national corporation acting within a very important industry in Canada, namely, the petrochemical industry, particularly at a time when they know full well there are other national corporations of foreign governments operating within this field. Hon. members recognize full well that British Petroleum has a large operation and capital investment in this field. They seem to have no objection to that corporation's operations within Canada and would not suggest at all that the British government should discourage BP from taking part in the North Sea play. I find it passing strange that members of the opposition should resist the initiative of this government to introduce a national oil company in the play in western Canada.

Hon. members of the opposition also know full well, especially members from Alberta, that other national corporations have capital investment in this field, including national corporations of Italy, France, Germany and Japan. There is an involvement on the part of the governments of those countries, yet there is no objection to that. However, as soon as the Canadian government introduces a national corporation to protect our national interests, there is objection.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) stated, and I quote:

—the government no longer can afford the luxury of owning things as Petro-Canada.

—and—

—that the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums will not contribute to the production of one extra barrel of oil in this country, and it will not mean the employment of one more person.

The Progressive Conservative party therefore wants to return Petro-Canada to the private sector. Let it be known that I am against such an idea. Energy resources have become a major factor of public life. The interaction between government and private industry has become increasingly important and complex. The communication gap that sometimes exists between the government and the private industry represents a stumbling block to the development and realization of major national policies.

Petro-Canada was set up to help fill that gap and to facilitate a more immediate and close interaction between public policy and the operational realities of industry. Petro-Canada is also used for another purpose, that is to increase strongly the part played by Canada in a mainly foreign controlled industry. It also provides to Canadians the best possible profit for their substantial rights as owners of oil and gas deposits held by the Canadian government. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) forgets the basic objective of Petro-Canada when he suggests that Canada cannot afford such a corporation. It is incredible. No doubt he forgets that the utmost priority for Petro-Canada is to help increase oil and gas supplies and assess the potential of main areas offering significant prospects for the increase of Canadian reserves.

Mr. Speaker, you will remember that some time ago the multionational corporations were stating that there were huge oil reserves in Canada, so much so that a government was prompted to promote exports when 100 per cent of that industry was controlled by multinationals. So it became obvious that to protect itself Canada had to have available an industry that could shed light on the sector of the oil industry, and that is why Petro-Canada was set up to be able to see exactly what happened in that industry. And, of course, we used extensively the information we have available which can guide the policy we wanted to adopt. It is important to remember that unlike certain national petroleum corporations, Petro-Canada was also set up as an alternative to the nationalization of the industry.

So it is not a matter of Petro-Canada taking over the area but rather acting in parallel with other corporations in the private sector. The hon. member for York-Simcoe cannot be very serious when he says the acquisition by Petro-Canada will not create a single job and not produce one more barrel of oil in Canada. He does not seem to realize that through that transaction Petro-Canada will have access to a production of oil and natural gas in southern Alberta beyond the bounds of his imagination—if one can find any because imagination on that side of the House, Mr. Speaker, is not in our supply—and as the result of the combination with Pacific Petroleums would become the second natural gas producer and the fifth oil producer in Canada a few steps behind the giant producers. Pacific Petroleums alone ranks second in Canada with respect to natural gas reserves and fifth with respect to natural gas production. Furthermore, Pacific Petroleums ranks fifth and ninth respectively for oil and production reserves.

[Mr. Blais.]

The hon. member of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, is pessimistic as to the effect the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums will have on oil production. He does not even dare expand on his argument because he knows quite well that it is not well founded. If he examines the performance record of Petro-Canada, he will see that in 1977 that corporation as a result of its development operations, added 21 billion cubic feet of gas to its reserves. In addition, in 1977, Petro-Canada added 2.9 million barrels of oil and of liquid natural gas by-products to its reserves. Furthermore, in 1976, Pacific Petroleums had estimated reserves of 3.2 billion cubic feet of gas and 180 million barrels of oil. Its production was 396 million cubic feet of gas and 31,650 barrels of oil a day. Those facts clearly show that the Progressive Conservatives did not understand at all the transaction and the role of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) says he is concerned about the fact that the purchase will create no new jobs. Once again his affirmation is without basis and does not take reality into consideration. On the contrary, such a purchase will allow Petro-Canada to undertake daring projects, in addition to strengthening its position in the marketplace. Doubtless those endeavours will create employment. Canadian money spent to finance exploration, production, development and transportation of oil and gas generates economic activity in Canada. At the same time, we have the opportunity of acquiring direct and precious experience in the technology of resource development and international economic activity.

In short, in this world where oil companies play an increasingly important role, Canada is developing expertise of great advantage to it. In any event, by operating at the international level, Canada, through Petro-Canada, will be able to open important markets, among those which supply equipment to the oil industry, allow drillings and offer professional and technical services. Speaking of exports, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to you some of the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) about the Export Development Corporation. He said he was taking that corporation to task and, again he was on the wrong track. The corporation proved that he knew nothing about the principles which govern it and it continues to serve the Canadian people well. In denouncing the increased support capacity of the corporation, the hon. member for York-Simcoe proved to us once again his lack of competence in economic matters. For the benefit of this House and the Canadian people, I should like to set the record straight and put things back in their right perspective.

First of all, it will be remembered that on June 30 last, Bill C-36, An act to amend the Export Development Act, was given royal assent and increased from $8.5 billion to $26 billion, the capacity of the Export Development Corporation to support and help Canadian exporters who in turn create jobs.

[English]

We are to be reminded that this increase in the level of support was not pure fantasy. It was brought about as a result of the increase in demand for the services of the Export Development Corporation. We as a nation must recognize the importance of exports. Twenty-five per cent of our GNP is represented by exports. Canada must increase its exports if it is to survive as a nation. The Export Development Corporation has assisted nearly 40 per cent of the exportation of equipment and products.

[Translation]

What's more, the corporation has always shown profits.

[English]

We have heard from the opposition comments to the effect that somehow $26 billion of support was going to come from government coffers. There is no recognition by the opposition of the fact that the Export Development Corporation has been a profitable enterprise. It has made money and it has obtained all the financing that it has needed from the international money markets. It has been able to meet its obligations always.

[Translation]

It is important to understand—but the hon. member for York-Simcoe has not yet understood it—that the loans made by the Export Development Corporation do not leave the country, but rather are paid directly by the corporation to the exporter on behalf of the foreign buyer. The only object of the loans is to finance sales of Canadian goods and services to better meet the international competition of other trading countries.

[English]

If the suggestion that the Export Development Corporation ought to be disbanded, or somehow done away with, were adopted, it would really put Canadian competitors in the international market at a disadvantage. Hon. gentlemen opposite will recognize that all of our major competitors have organizations similar to the Export Development Corporation which assist their own exporters. They should recognize as well that the Export Development Corporation is most efficient compared with other export development corporations, or their facsimiles in other countries. It just stands to reason that all members of the House need to encourage this particular corporation if they are serious about increasing the manufacturing sector in Canada.

[Translation]

Canada needed the additional capacity I was talking about, that is the $26 billion to reach the export level it would need in the future. Canada ranks among one of the most export-relying countries in the world. Exports account for $1,900 per Canadian. Given the fact that our domestic market is weak and that without exports our manufacturing prices would be a lot higher than world prices, Canada always had to strive fiercely against international competition.

[English]

It is recognized that in an industrialized society, the competitive nature of the goods in the Canadian market depends on production rates and the level of investment. That, in turn, depends on markets. No Canadian entrepreneur is going to invest money, his or somebody else's, unless he knows there is a market for his goods. If there is no market for the output of his production, he will not invest any money.

So far as international consumption of goods is concerned, 20 per cent only of the world's population consumes 80 per cent of the world's production. There is a massive untapped market for Canadian exports, Mr. Speaker, and that is the market where our exports should go. I congratulate Canadian entrepreneurs who have been bold enough to go to communist China and seek out markets within that area. These are the areas for which the EDC would be ready to furnish funds to finance transactions. I might mention that in the recent past there has been a number of countries with whom we have had no trading experience but which have now benefited from EDC financing, thus encouraging the presence of Canadian businessmen within those areas.

In 1977 the Export Development Corporation offered lines of credit to Morocco, Egypt, Gabon, Algeria and Iran. They are contemplating other agreements with countries strongly interested in Canadian exports which are in a position to honour the loans made. Not only did the corporation join its efforts to those of exporters to make a breakthrough in foreign markets but even here in Canada it placed the emphasis on the closest collaboration with exporters in their own area. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe would like to dismantle the Export Development Corporation and use the money in Canadian projects in Canada. He is making a mistake once again because the Canadian economy cannot operate in isolation. It is quite the opposite and I am basing my argument on the statement made by the president of the Corporation Mr. MacDonald, and I quote:

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I see the leader of the opposition has joined us—or had joined us.

Mr. Baldwin: When he heard you, he went out again.

Mr. Blais: I simply want to indicate to him as the leader who wants to see the disbandment of the Export Development Corporation and the disappearance of Petro-Can, that those are two major corporations which reflect upon our future. They make Canada, of all the western industrialized nations with which we compete, the only one that has any chance of becoming self-sufficient in energy and the only one that has access to new technology and new technological developments.

We in Canada have advantages in terms of foreign trade which are not enjoyed by any of our competitors.

We need the instrument of the Export Development Corporation in order to get into those markets. Anyone who does not see that has blinders and blinkers and everything else. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is the prime mover of the retrograde policy being advanced by the Tories.

[Translation]

We have to shift more and more to exporting equipment goods and related services with a view to obtaining the kind of economic growth Canada needs to provide the number and type of jobs corresponding to the skills of our labour. It is precisely these labour intensive goods and services, products of the Canadian technology which will contribute to create future employment. And it is to this effect that EDC support is absolutely necessary.

GRAIN

CALL FOR INCREASED EXPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. As the $1 billion loss in Canada's grain export program so far this year is seen by many producers as a deliberate attempt by the government to hold down inflation and economic activity in the prairies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government bring in new and innovative measures to increase exports before grain producers are killed off economically and told by the responsible minister that it is all for their own good.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACTIVITIES OF SO-CALLED RELIGIOUS CULTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent necessity. In light of the recent tragic events in a so-called religious community in Jonestown, Guyana; in light of the fact that the scientology cult has operated in a clandestine fashion, including the theft of government documents within the federal government of the United States; in light of the fact that the Children of God cult has influenced young Canadian women in Europe to serve as "hookers for Jesus" to raise funds for the cult; and, finally, in light of the fact that some of these cults have destroyed the family unit, creating untold heartbreak for the parents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the government, bearing in mind the rights of individuals to religious freedom, give consideration to the necessity of inquiring into the activities of these so-called religious cults.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST GOVERNMENT RECONSIDER DECISION RESPECTING YUGOSLAVIAN REFUGEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent question of pressing necessity.

Considering that the Government of Canada wishes to offer political asylum to 600 refugees aboard the Hai Hong who will be entirely dependent on Canadians; considering that the government denies political asylum to three Yugoslavian refugees who are prepared to invest $675,000 in a lumber company in the Val-d'Or area; and considering that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has shown inconsistency by rejecting individuals who are anxious to serve the country while he accepts refugees who will be on social welfare, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House condemn the decision of the Minister of Employment and Immigration about the three Yugoslavian refugees and immediately enjoin the minister to review his decision and encourage immigrants who can really help our country.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the introduction of such a motion for discussion can be done only with unanimous agreement. Is there unanimous consent?

In light of the information I received this morning, that a supply ship operated by Canadian National and serving communities on the northern coast of Labrador, left the community of Nain in Labrador without unloading, due to ice conditions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to make immediate arrangements to have these supplies delivered in some other manner so that the community will not suffer undue hardship this winter.

FORESTRY

PROGRAM TO COMBAT DUTCH ELM DISEASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Winnipeg office of the Canadian Forestry Service may be closed because of the government's restraint program, since Dutch elm disease now is well established in Manitoba, particularly along the banks of the Red River, and since the Canadian Forestry Service was the only agency acting against the spread of Dutch elm disease, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House instructs the Department of the Environment to establish immediately an alternative and active program to combat Dutch elm disease in order to prevent complete desecration of the Red River treeline.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity resulting from the columns by Frank Howard appearing in the Ottawa Citizen yesterday and today in which the plans by the opposition, if they come to power, to fire public servants and increase the size and salaries of ministers' staffs are currently revealed. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert):

● (1412)

That this House orders that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton be provided with full medical assistance every time that he listens to a speech by the Leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for York-Simcoe in case he really does have a heart attack.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PRICE OF TURKEYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) promised to investigate the possibility that there is turkey price-fixing in Canada. Pending the results of this investigation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this House instruct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to persuade turkey processors and retailers to roll back excessive prices and to supply the domestic market immediately with turkeys presently held in artificial storage in this country.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

EFFICIENCY OF POSTAL SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General but in his absence perhaps I could direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister, who once declared that everybody knows that the postal service is lousy. In light of this comment and the fact that every time postal rates increase, deficits also increase and postal volumes go down, I wonder if the Prime Minister would indicate whether the government has undertaken to study the effect of the latest increase on the volume of mail handled by the Post Office and on the efficiency of the postal service.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General is absent from the House today, but will be back tomorrow. He will be pleased to answer the hon. gentleman's question, and I will bring it to his attention.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Prime Minister would not give us the benefit of his advice. Perhaps he would answer a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the cost of mechanization and modernization of the Post Office in the past decade that the right hon. gentleman has been in office has amounted to some $900 million, and that the authorized man-years have increased from 36,000 to 61,500 employees—which is an increase of 70 per cent—will he indicate to the House that the whole matter will be turned over to a parliamentary committee so that they can get at the root causes of the difficulties and come up with some constructive recommendations to end this farce?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to have this whole matter discussed with the hon. member who has shown such an interest in the Post Office. He will note, of course, that in these ten years the number of households has increased at a very rapid rate. The government has the best record in housing starts at any period of our history which, of course, means much greater delivery to households; that is the reason the Post Office has had to grow. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, in our expenditure-cutting exercise that we began three years ago and which has been proceeding apace, while we have seen the civil service grow at less than 1 per cent in the past three years, the hon. member will be aware that this means that in the Post Office growth has been rather more rapid than in any other department, which means that other departments have even had negative growth because of increased service to the Canadian public.

Mr. Dinsdale: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the Prime Minister is aware that one of the great protests from the Letter Carriers Union of Canada is the freeze on the expansion of letter carrier service. In view of the fact that this freeze has now been in effect for at least three years and has deprived at least 400 Canadians of jobs which would otherwise have been available had the service been increased to provide door to door delivery to the burgeoning suburbs to which the Prime Minister has referred, would he not now take seriously—because this is a serious issue—the decline in postal service and the mess in the Post Office and refer the matter to a parliamentary committee for detailed examination?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in the second last question the hon. member complained that we had increased the number of postal workers by 70 per cent. Now he is pleading that we increase them more in order to serve more people. I do not see how this kind of contribution would really be helpful even if it came from a parliamentary committee.

PUBLISHERS POSTAL RATES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. I am delighted to see him here today. I am sure he has heard about the discussion yesterday following the presentation on motions by the Postmaster General and the reference to a new memorandum of agreement between himself and the Postmaster General which would basically transfer responsibility for losses incurred through publishers postal rates to the Secretary of State.

Since this document has not yet been tabled—I assume it will be, following the question period—could the minister inform the House of the date of implementation of this agreement? In particular, could he tell us whether there will be a separate parliamentary allocation, or if the existing postal subsidy will be subsumed in existing votes such as the one for arts and culture? Perhaps he could also give us some idea of the actual cost of this new arrangement.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I will not be able to oblige the hon. gentleman by tabling the document today.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. gentleman asks, why not? The reason is I should like to table one signed by both ministers. The copy in my office has only been signed by me. I will undertake to table the agreement. The agreement between the two ministers has both our signatures, and I am trying to track down the appropriate copy for the hon. member. I hope to be able to do that tomorrow.

The hon. member asked how this would be presented in the estimates. It will be within a vote of the Department of Secretary of State. I am not exactly sure how that will be presented or what form it will take. In terms of a rough, over-all estimate of the transfer, the tentative figure is something like $135 million or $136 million.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I have to assume the reason the minister has not received a document with both signatures is that it must have gone through the mail. I presume we will receive a copy of it for tabling within the year.

In view of the fact that, according to our information, there has been no consultation with those who will be directly affected by this significant change in postal rates for periodicals, may I ask the minister if he will be establishing some formal, consultative committee with industry representatives to, first of all, review their criteria and prepare guidelines and, second, to establish a fair form of postal rates? What mechanisms have already been put in place with respect to what is obviously a need for consultation—something that, interestingly enough, did not occur during the last postal rate increase?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I believe there has been consultation by the Post Office Department in the past with people to be affected by changes. It will certainly be my intention to continue that kind of consultation. It may be that, as a result of a review, we will even find improved mechanisms for such consultation. It is certainly our intention to continue consultations with groups that will be affected by postal rate changes.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am quite surprised that the minister has not indicated the nature of any consultative mechanism he is planning to put in place.

In view of the real fears expressed here yesterday about the possibility of censorship, or the use of some form of discretionary power by the minister which would be very much against the purposes of free and open information which the minister discussed a few weeks ago at UNESCO, I wonder what assurance he can give that criteria for postal subsidies for periodicals and publications will be contained in a public set of guidelines which do not allow for unilateral power by the minister or any of his officials.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared and, indeed, would welcome any suggestions about how the processes of consultation could be improved, including those coming from hon. members opposite. I would hesitate to stand before the House and say that, having just received this responsibility, I have decided in exact detail how these matters should be handled. I would welcome constructive advice which the hon. member may provide.

In terms of the reference to censorship—and I am not sure I exactly seized the purport of the hon. member's comment—there is no intention to change the mechanism which has been established. As has been the case in the past, we will be dealing with postal subsidies related to the various categories of users. We will not be singling out, say, one periodical rather than another for assistance or not. The mechanism will be exactly as it has been in the past, and I do not think that mechanism is one which has aroused cries of censorship from the other side. What has happened is that there was a transfer of responsibility for formulating, for government decision, the recommendations as to what the rates in those categories should be.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Roberts: An hon. member asks, why? I think the answer to that question is clear. We believe the extent of postal subsidies is a key element in cultural strategy of the federal government. That strategy, basically, relates to how taxpayers' funds are to be expended in the desirable objective of establishing a context favourable to the development of the arts and the other aspects of culture in the country. It was, therefore, felt appropriate—and I think it is appropriate—that that responsibility of recommendation in the development of policy ideas should rest with the Secretary of State, whose general responsibility that is.

[Mr. Roberts.]

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTOMOTIVE PACT—CREATION OF JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister knows, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance will be meeting with the Prime Minister and a number of ministers of the Crown, presumably tomorrow, to discuss important matters.

Since the U.S. ambassador to Canada said yesterday in Windsor presumably with a straight face, that Canada was getting more than its share of jobs under the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement, a statement which flies in the face of an Ontario government study which shows that for years we have had fewer jobs than would warrant in our share of the market, could the minister tell the House whether he or the Prime Minister will be putting before Mr. Vance specific proposals to ensure that we at long last, will get a fair deal from the auto pact?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am certain that if Mr. Vance wants to discuss the auto pact with the Prime Minister or myself we are prepared to discuss it. We do not accept the figures that the Ontario government gave with regard to employment. I can say to the House that employment in the automobile industry is up substantially this year over what it was last year. Our deficit with the United States in auto parts and automobiles is down considerably from what it was last year.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, it is down all right—down to a $500 million deficit, which is hardly something in which the government can take any pride.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the American ambassador did concede, in his speech yesterday in Windsor, that precisely because the government in 1965 got letters of commitment from the Big Three in the industry and for the three-year period after the pact came into being we got our share of investment, and since it worked in 1965, is the Canadian government now prepared to suggest to Mr. Vance that they intend to get new letters of commitment from the Big Three to make sure the pact's stated principle about fair share of growth is lived up to on this side of the border?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I intend to make public the Simon Reisman report on the automobile industry and then the hon. member will be able to check his figures. In the auto pact, our deficit with the United States was about $600 million last year. This is under the auto pact, not in total auto trade. One has to be clear about what one means. That is a fact.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: In the auto pact, our deficit this year will be half of what it was last year. So hon. members can readily see that it should be in the neighbourhood of around $300 million. Considering it is an industry which is in the billions of dollars, and can be balanced that closely, it is not doing that badly. However, I am not satisfied with it and I want to improve it, but we are not doing that badly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce knows that his own department produced one of the most able studies that this government has ever done just a couple of years ago on the pact. It was done by Mr. Arthur. He showed that with the present process of deficit continuing, we will be losing in excess of $10 billion, a net deficit loss, by 1985. That is $300 million a year, which may not be much to the minister but I can assure him that it is a lot to Canadians and a lot to those who are looking for jobs.

When the government releases the report the minister has referred to, will it announce specific proposals in terms of its course of action to improve the job situation in Canada?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we have announced a number of things which have improved the automobile industry and the job capabilities of Canadians in that industry. The Ford plant was one; the remission duty on Volkswagen parts was another. A number of other measures have been taken which substantially increased employment in the automobile industry this year over last year.

MARKETING OF FARM PRODUCE IN QUEBEC AND BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. We read in the papers and we heard in the news yesterday that the governments of Quebec and British Columbia no longer want the federal government to be involved in the marketing of farm produce, especially between the provinces. Could the minister tell us why?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that was not my impression from chairing the meeting. Only two provinces voiced some concern about harmonizing stabilization in Canada for those named commodities under the present Agricultural Stabilization Act, and said that they were going to give up some of their programs. It would be that kind of program with the farm producer and the federal government participating. They would want time to make sure they were phased in carefully and that their producers do not lose anything by it.

I do understand, that the minister from Quebec said he was against this kind of program, because Quebec now enjoys a federal stabilizing program. I do not know what their farmers would do without it. That is under the Canadian Dairy Commission for industrial milk products. It is one that is used nationwide at the present time. I do not understand the Quebec minister saying he is against this, because there was one topic on the agenda which we did not get to and he was complaining about the fact that stabilization payments or announcements for sugar beets were not made soon enough. Therefore, he did not say he did not want it; he said he wanted it sooner.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, could the minister advise us whether Quebec appeared to be the most unwilling to co-operate, and whether it meant to indicate this way its intention to assume responsibility, with the federal government's assent, for distributing the subsidies to dairy producers and controlling the export of our surpluses?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I do not remember them suggesting anything such as that at the meeting. He did not suggest that we withdraw from any of the regionally produced products under the Agricultural Stabilization Act as it is at the present time. He has said in the past that he is willing to participate in any program that will be beneficial to Quebec farmers. I gather, from his contribution to the meeting yesterday, that it is still his opinion that with regard to named commodities in the act which are produced across Canada, he is still going to participate in those programs. However, he would like to be able to participate by having us give the money to him so that he can give it to the farmers: in that way, he can be Santa Claus instead of the federal Minister of Agriculture.

COST OF STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture on the same subject. Has the minister had any discussion with Canadian producers and the respective farm organizations with regard to his proposal to require a one-third contribution to operate the cost of the plan?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This is nothing new: it is similar to what is under the western grain stabilization act. All provinces except British Columbia and Quebec are in favour of that kind of program. The farm producers, although they want more details of the program, have endorsed it. They said they wanted this kind of program and that it was less costly because it would mean less duplication with this kind of stabilization program.

Oral Questions

AIR TRANSPORT

INCREASE IN AIRPORT TAX—EFFECT ON TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In light of the announcement last week of the increase in air transportation tax from $8 to $15 in the case of domestic flights, and $8 to $12 in the case of international flights, and the fact that the domestic increase will take place in April while the international increase will take effect in July, can the minister explain the apparent discrimination against the domestic air traveller? Does he agree with this particular concept? Can he outline, in particular, his position with regard to this increase relative to the increase in our tourist trade deficit?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not agree that there is any discrimination against travellers in Canada as compared to travellers abroad. The apparent discrimination in this airport tax is explained by the fact that there is already a very heavy discrimination, if you like, against the traveller abroad, in the sense that the fees now charged against that kind of travel are significantly higher than the domestic fees, landing fees and the like. There was not room, in our view, within the cost to us of international air travel, to increase those fees more than the $12 in the initial stages, as indicated. In other words, the lower international transportation tax really reflects the fact that the domestic user charges are much lower than the international user charges.

Mr. Mazankowski: Is the minister concerned about the apparent discrimination which will affect regional and third-level carriers and passengers using those carriers, inasmuch as the manner in which the tax is to be applied will be disproportionately more severe on those using third-level and regional air carriers, or is this part of an over-all strategy to rationalize the regional air carrier industry? Could the minister tell us whether he still intends to go ahead with this planned sixfold increase in airport user fees and other user fees associated with airports?

Mr. Lang: It is very much our policy to encourage the development of the regional and third-level carriers. It might not be possible to contain special provisions for these carriers in an air transportation tax, but I can assure the hon. member that on the question of increases in any user charges we shall be looking very seriously at the question whether or not we can give special consideration to the third-level carriers and to the regionals in order to lighten the load upon them.

REDUCTION IN UNITED STATES TOURISTS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On February 2 of this year the minister reported to the House that there was general agreement, at a meeting of tourism ministers on January 31, that present costs impede our country when it comes to the successful balancing of tourist accounts. In June, Statistics Canada reported that travel costs for Canadians rose 71.5 per cent between 1971 and 1977, much faster than the 50 per cent gain shown in the United States. This year, the number of American tourists coming to Canada is down by 1 per cent so far.

In view of these facts, why did the minister permit the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport to impose an almost doubling of the air transportation tax? Will the minister now have this reversed and, therefore, have the government practice what it preaches in trying to control costs in connection with tourism?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As I said the other day in answer to the same question, I, as a tourist, would like to feel I am paying my way in whatever host country I decide to visit. Certainly, as a Canadian taxpayer who may decide to stay at home, I believe tourists who come to this country should pay whatever costs are incurred by our government and our taxpayers. It is that simple, really. If the costs are justified, the tourist should pay them.

Mr. Crosbie: That's it. They are not.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member says, "That's it. They are not." Certainly, I believe air transportation is becoming very reasonable to Canadians. We have brought in a number of measures. Something like 314 more ABC flights within Canada were used last summer to convince Canadians to travel far cheaper in their own country.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister's replies are balderdash, which means "nonsense", as the Deputy Prime Minister may know. On September 1, at a Toronto press conference, the minister said:

> Canadians traditionally have the idea that tourists are somebody we can rip off when they are going through—charge them all we can and then let them go.

The minister went on to say we have a lot to learn about hospitality when treating strangers. How does he square that criticism of the Canadian tourist industry and the hotels and motels of this country with the government's action in ripping off tourists, both Canadian and foreign, in this manner? How does the minister justify that rip-off? Or is there some difference?

Mr. Horner: I do not accept the fact that there is a rip-off at all. I believe the costs are justified and that the tourists should pay them. I could point out that tourism from Japan is up 28 per cent and that tourism from Europe this year is up 20 per cent, so the tourism deficit is not growing at all.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FAMILY REUNIFICATION PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the lack of success of the Maryasin family, living in my riding, in their years of efforts to be reunited in Canada with their relatives from Riga, Latvia, in spite of the fact that Canadian visas have already been issued, will the minister take a further initiative on their behalf with Soviet authorities?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My answer must be the same as I give on all occasions when such questions are asked. If there is a Canadian linkage, as there obviously is in this case, we shall certainly see to it that representations are made to the Soviet authorities—I suspect they have been made already in this case—and we shall make certain that this family's name is included in the next list and make special representations as well.

AIR TRANSPORT

INCREASE IN AIRPORT TAX—BURDEN ON REGIONAL AND THIRD-LEVEL CARRIERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question asked by my hon. friend from Vegreville. In response to the change in the air transport tax, Quebecair, which has as its president a former minister of transport in the government's Liberal predecessor, said:

> The tax will place a disproportionate burden on travellers on short hops and lighten the load on long-haul passengers.

They went on to say that the tax would place the regional carriers in the position of being tax collectors for the government to help pay for prestige and money-losing facilities such as Mirabel.

I ask the minister if he is serious in suggesting in his reply to my hon. friend that he wants to encourage and develop the use of regional carriers and third-level carriers in this country. Since that statement by Quebecair really represents the feelings of the regional air carriers about this tax, is the minister prepared to meet with the regional carriers to discuss with them ways and means of lightening the burden, in view of the fact that the tax, coming as it does on top of the increase in landing fees already announced by the minister, will place a disproportionate burden on the short-haul, intraregional traveller in this country, especially in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the report to which the hon. member referred bore no indication that it was in any way an official Quebecair position. In any case, I would tell the hon. member that we are meeting constantly with the regionals and other carriers concerning the provision of airport and other facilities, and are gaining their agreement before going forward with major expenditures or, indeed, significant expenditures. I think that is a very sensible policy arising out of a change in making sure that every expenditure is meaningful.

I can assure the hon. member, as well, that there is no way in which the short-haul carrier is being made to subsidize the long-haul traveller. In fact, a few years ago the reverse was true and it seemed to me it stepped over the bounds of reason in the way in which it was true. If in recent years some slight adjustments have been made so there is a relatively fairer burden being borne as between short-haul and long-haul carriers, I think that is all to the good.

Mr. McGrath: If the minister is serious about developing the use of the regionals and helping the regionals, as I believe he is, is he prepared to recommend to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, that this tax, essential though it may be to pay for colossal blunders like Mirabel, be spread evenly between long-haul, overseas passengers and short-haul intraregional passengers? Such is not the case at the present time, and the minister knows it is patently unfair and unjust to the regional carriers.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the short-haul traveller, of course, pays a percentage under the proposed tax of 15 per cent of his ticket tax, reflecting a certain portion of the costs which go with that kind of travel. In the case of a longer haul traveller, because the costs are less proportionate to the dollars of travel charged therefor, the limit of $15 has been put in place. That also recognizes the fact that a few years ago it was the long-distance traveller who was, in fact, paying more than it cost and thereby subsidizing the short-distance traveller in this country. That was not a desirable situation, in my view, and we are gradually correcting it.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

PATENTS FOR SUGAR CANE PROCESSING TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning the activities of Canadian Patents and Development Limited and the use of patents for sugar cane processing technology.

As the minister knows, in late 1976 patents for the development of this technology were awarded by CPDL to Hawker Siddeley, a large multinational company, rather than to the Canadian company that had actually developed the technology in Canada. As the minister also knows, an independent study—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Rae: My question to the minister is: can he give us some assurance that he is taking steps to see that the patents for this development will be awarded to a Canadian firm, rather than to an international firm?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of whether they be awarded to a Canadian firm or whether or not Hawker Siddeley is a Canadian firm or can be registered as such; the question is to get the patent problem cleared up so that Canada can benefit from the new method of harvesting sugar cane.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, I am not sure that the minister fully understood the import of the question. Perhaps I could rephrase it. The minister knows perfectly well that an independent study, commissioned by the minister himself, suggested very strongly that the awarding of the patents in 1976 was misguided and incorrect, and he also knows that certain aspects of the invention dealing with lumber and trade have yet to be awarded.

Can the minister assure this House that he is taking steps to see that future development for this key technology is granted to Canadian firms, guaranteeing Canadian jobs, Canadian scientific and trade development, rather than to a foreign company? That is a very simple question.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that I have personally looked into this problem in depth and hope to have a solution very soon.

PUBLIC WORKS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON COMPENSATION FOR EXPROPRIATION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Exactly two weeks ago 600 Sainte-Scholastique residents demanded payment of a fair compensation for tenants and a 5 per cent interest payment, as well as recognition of the principle of reasonable equivalence. In front of the group the minister promised to give an answer within two weeks. I believe he also met the representatives of that group today, although I am not sure of it. Is the minister now in a position to make his answer public and, if so, does he also intend to make a statement on the matter?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, indeed the representatives of the Mirabel expropriation are, at this very moment, discussing in my office with my assistant and the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes. We have settled a few points but there still remain a few others which I trust can be settled this afternoon.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. I wonder why some hon. members are getting excited on the other side. I am very happy with the answer of the Minister of Public Works on the matter of the Sainte-Scholastique expropriation. That is nothing new. My supplementary is this: The hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, speaking as an individual, has said that he would favour the idea of selling back to the province of Quebec the 70,000 acres of land which are not being used. The hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes made the statement as a private member. Can the minister say whether he intends to discuss with the province of Quebec the matter of the purchase of those 70,000 acres of land that are not now being used?

Mr. Buchanan: At the present time, no, Mr. Speaker. I must say I know nothing about that proposal, but I shall look into it.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

GUIDELINES FOR MINISTERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister dealing with the frequent practice by the government of putting deputy ministers on the boards of Crown corporations.

Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether there are in existence guidelines with respect to preventing a conflict of interest arising from the conflict that exists, or might exist, where a deputy minister on a board is acting within a certain market and, as deputy minister in his department, may be promulgating and advising his ministers with respect to the regulations that govern the market in which the Crown corporation exists and operates? Are there such guidelines in existence?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are no specific guidelines, but there is certainly a difference of approach between the government and the opposition party. We believe that Crown corporations are set up for the beneficial advantage of the people of Canada to pursue a purpose which is in the general interest.

The reason we put civil servants on boards of many agencies or Crown corporations is precisely in order that they represent the interests of the government and that they report to the government any knowledge which could be useful to the pursuance of the government's objectives in the interests of the common good of Canadians.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has indicated that, in his judgment, no guidelines exist. The Prime Minister will recall that he wrote the government House leader on October 18, 1976, in which he dealt with the principles regarding the activities of holders of public office, At that time he wrote:

> Current and former holders of public office must ensure by their actions that the objectivity and impartiality of government service are not cast in doubt and that the people of Canada are given no cause to believe that preferential treatment is being or will be unduly accorded to any person or organization.

Does the Prime Minister not believe that that guideline—which I take it he put forward seriously—does not apply to deputy ministers who are members of the boards of Crown corporations? If he does not believe that that applies, will the Prime Minister consider the preparing of guidelines that would apply to the case of deputy ministers who serve on the boards of Crown corporations, so that deputy ministers, such as the Deputy Minister of Finance, are not placed by the government in the invidious position of at least there appearing to be, whether it is there or not, a conflict of interest?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, of course the guidelines as I stated them apply to deputy ministers and other senior officials. I fail to see how the hon. member can make a case from those guidelines relating to the particular case he is referring to now.

These guidelines were made to prevent a public servant acting in a way which would be in his own self-interest, as opposed to the government's interests or to the advantage of some third party corporation independent of the government. In our philosophy, we set up Crown corporations and agencies in order to serve a public purpose, we do not see this as conflicting with any guidelines. I know that this is not the philosophy of the Tory party.

ENERGY

PRICE OF CRUDE OIL

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that an increase of $1 in the price of crude oil on January I would completely wipe out the anti-inflationary effect of the federal budget's 25 per cent reduction in the manufacturers' sales tax, and in view of the fact that the Ontario minister of energy now seems to be opposed to an increase in the price of crude oil, I wonder if, armed with this support, the minister will press ahead with his action to stop this increase in the price of crude oil which the Alberta government is demanding.

● (1452)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the Ontario minister of energy now is claiming that he supports the federal government initiative, that there be a pause respecting the price of oil come January 1, it comes as a great surprise to me. Also, it will come as a very great surprise to the other energy ministers who were present at that meeting, particularly since they too supported in the strongest way the continuation of the oil price increase come January 1.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FUNDING OF SOCIAL SERVICES PROGRAMS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Today, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in Toronto explaining the inexplicable to her counterparts in the provinces, namely, why the Minister of Finance unilaterally cancelled the block funding agreement for social services. Last week, the Prime Minister stated before the House that in his view there was no agreement between the provinces and the federal government relating to the block funding of social services.

If that is the case, why did the Minister of National Health and Welfare prepare a bill based on these discussions and present it before the House of Commons, if there was no agreement with the provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member refers to his question to me last week, I think he will see that he was talking about the signed agreement and such things. Of course, there were negotiations over a period of several weeks, perhaps months, between federal and provincial ministers. We were leading up to the presentation of this bill. The Minister of National Health and Welfare was taking the lead in this very forward-looking piece of legislation. But that particular piece of legislation costs a lot of money. The Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board went to the provinces indicating that, since transfers to them were growing at the rate of 13 per cent a year, it was too high and therefore it would be important to attempt to reduce that rate of growth.

We looked for various areas where there is agreement with the provinces to see if we could multilaterally, not unilaterally, reduce that rate of growth. It was in face of the refusal of the provinces to co-operate in having the federal government cut that rate of growth of some 13 per cent per year that we decided projects, enterprises and programs which had not yet taken effect in law would not be proceeded with. This is the position the minister has taken. We still think it is a good program. We would like to move forward with that bill, if the provinces and the opposition would co-operate with us in making sure that in other areas the rate of growth can be reduced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, it is nice to know this week that the Prime Minister agrees that there was an agreement but it involved more than just restraint; it was a whole new system of funding with the provinces. How can the right hon. Prime Minister justify the government becoming indebted for close to $1 billion in the buying of Nordair and Pacific Petroleums, while simultaneously cutting back on health care and social services with the provinces?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Churchill.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES PUBLISHED BY STATISTICS CANADA—STATUS INDIANS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for Statistics Canada. Are status Indians included in the unemployment figures compiled by Statistics Canada?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, status Indians on the reservations are not included in Statistics Canada figures.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Bill C-14, dealing with amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, uses Statistics Canada figures to determine the unemployment rates in 48 regions across the country. Are the figures for status Indians actually extended to determine the number of unemployed status Indians in those particular regions?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of Employment and Immigration could better answer the question, but I think there will be a special provision for Indian populations regarding the Unemployment Insurance Act.

URBAN AFFAIRS

CMHC DIVESTING ITSELF OF LOW-INCOME PROPERTIES

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, last week, in the document which the Minister of State for Urban Affairs was so gracious to table, there was mention of 438,000 households paying over 30 per cent of income for shelter. Since the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is not present, I should like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. Why is Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation attempting to divest itself of all its major low-income properties in the province of Quebec, some 62 so far this year? In particular, I am asking about the Cloverdale complex which is the largest CMHC complex in Canada. That complex has been appraised at $10 million and is being sold for $4 million.

For the benefit of the hundreds of families involved in this matter can the parliamentary secretary inform the House as to the state of the negotiations between CMHC and Grado Developments? Also, could he inform us as to who Grado Developments are?

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at this stage I am unable to report on the developments, but I will ask the minister to let me have more information and pass it on to the hon. member. At the present time, the thrust of the government is to assist low-income Canadians in obtaining better housing. In particular, in programs such as AHOP which the opposition has criticized, obviously there will be some increase in the risk, and possibly some small increase in the default. Rather than continue, as in the past, with the emphasis on housing for persons who can well afford it and who would be assisted by the suggestion of the opposition to make interest on mortgages deductible—

Mrs. Pigott: That is not my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NUCLEAR ENERGY PLANT IN ARGENTINA—POTENTIAL FOR PRODUCING NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question regarding a comment attributed to Admiral Madero, the national atomic energy commissioner of Argentina. The statement was to the effect that his country was planning to build a reprocessing plant which could produce a nuclear weapon. Since that time, Admiral Madero has been quoted as saying that the statement was misconstrued by the reporter for the Washington Post.

In view of the fact that usually the Washington Post is a reliable source, with a very competent staff, can the minister tell the House whether the government of Argentina has assured him that it has no intention whatsoever of putting up a reprocessing plant with a view to making nuclear weapons?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his patience in waiting for a reply to this question. We made some inquiries and I think it can be said that the government of Argentina has taken the position which the hon. member articulated, namely, that it has no intention of going into reprocessing. There appears to be some confusion as to the status of those who are speaking. In other words, the gentleman concerned is related to atomic energy development but may not be necessarily a formal spokesman for the government. I am still trying to clarify that particular point. There does not appear to be any substance to the report in terms of Argentinian government policy.

As well, I can say that I have checked on the question which the hon. member asked me regarding the use of Canadian materials and the like under existing agreements. I find that Canada has the right of prior consent over the reprocessing of any nuclear material supplied by Canada and any nuclear material produced in the Canadian-supplied reactor. In that sense, we would have a veto, in effect, over the use of Canadian materials for any reprocessing undertaking.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister one point which I am sure concerns all members of the House. How are the safeguards being monitored? It is rather significant that this statement appeared in the Washington Post and the Latin American Economic Report, yet apparently the department knew nothing about it. Who is monitoring the situation to ensure that the countries we supply with a Candu reactor and technology are not building plutonium reprocessing plants? What machinery and mechanism is in place for monitoring this situation, or should we wait until someone raises the matter by accident?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker, it is more comprehensive by far than simply waiting until the matter is raised. The ultimate responsibility obviously rests with IAEA, the International Atomic Energy Agency, by common consent of the signatory countries. In addition to that, the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada, on which my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources can, I am sure, report more fully, also has a capability for certain on-site inspections and the like.

● (1502)

We are satisfied that the controls in place are as good as exist in the world community. I would not, however, want to leave it at that, because I think both my colleague and I have indicated on many occasions that we would hope, and indeed are arguing, that the IAEA safeguards ought to be strengthened, and that is the direction in which Canadian policy is heading.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GILLESPIE—PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE OF PACIFIC PETROLEUMS SHARES—OFFICIAL OPPOSITION'S STATEMENTS

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A question was put today by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) which seemed to me to be part of a pattern of distortion which the opposition are using to discredit the financial transactions with respect to the Petro-Canada acquisition of Pacific Petroleums shares. I say a pattern of distortion, and therefore a program aimed at misleading the House and misleading the Canadian people. That was the burden of his remarks today, Mr. Speaker.

Last evening his leader, as reported at page 1288 of Hansard, also made a similar point when he referred to the government. He said:

—it could have found better use for $1.5 billion than buying an oil company and an airline it does not need.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) knows, as we all know, that the government did not raise $1.5 billion to buy Pacific Pete. The opposition quite clearly know from the information that has been given to them that Petro-Canada used its own credit, raising the money in a commercial transaction—

Mr. Stevens: Through a subsidiary.

Mr. Gillespie: —raised the funds from the banking system. It was not taxpayers' funds but a commercial transaction. I can be left with no other impression, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure other Canadians are, that the opposition are trying to distort and trying to mislead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister and other members who now feel themselves sensitive about this particular point, I am sure will avail themselves of the opportunity to participate in the budget debate which is carrying on this afternoon.

MR. FRIESEN—BROADCASTING OF CBC LICENCE RENEWAL APPLICATION PROCEEDINGS

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Last October 23 the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) raised a question of privilege in the House, and since I was not present at that time you deferred the matter until you had a chance to have me reply to him. Since both the hon. member and I are in the House this afternoon, I thought I might reply to him.

His question of privilege essentially was that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had not covered his remarks to the CRTC at the CRTC hearing. I have the information which the CBC has presented to me on the matter, which is relatively brief, and I would be happy to explain to the House its position at the present time in relation to the hon. member's question of privilege.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation rents four satellite channels for transmission of its television programming. One of these, Channel D, is used for closed circuit purposes, for gathering and distributing news items, for the exchange of regional programs and inserts, and for multi-point live productions. The CBC decided to make coverage of the CRTC hearings on its network licence renewal applications widely available, and made arrangements with a number of cable companies to carry the coverage across the country. Although it was intended that as much of the hearings as possible should be covered, there were technical limitations because of the necessity of continuing to distribute the items normally carried on Channel D. For this purpose, 1 p.m. to shortly after 2 p.m. each day was set aside for such distribution.

The CRTC was aware of this limitation and mentioned the 1 p.m. satellite cut-off time several times during the hearing. Indeed, the chairman, Dr. Camu, reminded the hearing of it immediately before the hon. member began his intervention at approximately 12.57 p.m. on October 6. The only area of the country not affected by the cut-off was Ottawa, where coverage was by direct cable service.

The hon. member's presentation lasted until about 1.16 p.m., and while the CBC regrets that his intervention was not received by those cable services outside Ottawa which had agreed to take the CRTC coverage, it would emphasize that, in accordance with the exigencies of broadcasting the prearranged schedule, it was necessary to provide its network stations with the other programming items they were then set up to receive.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I think the CBC must be speaking with tongue in cheek when they said they regretted that I had been cut off. I am sure they shed many a tear about that.

I do not want to carry on the argument interminably, sir, but I have looked at this matter for some time now and if, as the minister says, I was admitted to the table at about three minutes to one and it was customary for the CRTC to call the lunch break at one o'clock—and far be it for them to postpone the lunch hour, either for them or for the intervenors—then it seems to me a blatant piece of disorganization to have, as the chairman said, the only member of parliament to appear before the committee appear at three minutes to one, just before it was time to break. Either that was a very sloppy piece of organization or it was a very deliberate attempt, but I cannot imagine that the chairman of the CRTC is the kind of person who would deliberately ask the only member of parliament to come to appear at three minutes before cut-off time to make his presentation. Since it did happen, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether he did receive any kind of instructions.

I would add to that, Mr. Speaker, that I did check with people in the industry in the intervening days and I have found that it was not, as the minister said, at three minutes to one but considerably before that. While it may be that I could not have made my full presentation at that time, I could have made a considerable part of it. I still contend, Mr. Speaker, that there seems to be a deliberate decision made somewhere to make certain that my entire presentation would not be carried across Canada under the previous arrangements that were made available to all the other members who appeared.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In any case, the hon. member for Surrey- White Rock (Mr. Friesen) has what is, I think, because of other precedents that he may examine in relation to the activities of members appearing before various federal boards and tribunals, essentially a grievance and not a question of privilege, and I think it would have to be proceeded with in that way.

MR. MACDONALD (CARDIGAN)—STATEMENT MADE BY MEMBER FOR SELKIRK

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to rise on a point of order in reply to a remark made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway), as reported at page 1233 of Hansard for Friday of last week. I wish to inform the House that at no time did I agree with the hon. member that the issue he wished to discuss should be dealt with under Standing Order 43. I merely indicated to him that I would be happy to answer a question on the subject.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I feel I should say something on the point of order just raised by the minister because it implies that in my response to the point of order raised last Friday by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) I misrepresented the discussions I had with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald).

The minister will recall that I discussed the matter concerning one Mrs. Dall, of the Ladies Auxiliary of branch 81 of the Prince Edward Legion in Winnipeg, having been ordered out of a Canada Manpower office building on the Henderson highway while she was attempting to sell poppies for Remembrance Day. I discussed this with the minister because there was a sense of urgency. The lady involved, Mrs. Dall, was somewhat embarrassed, as you can imagine, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Surely the only thing at issue in this point of order at the present time is whether or not in fact the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) said that he had discussed it with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). I believe he was either aware or that he had some knowledge or understanding that it was going to be proceeded with by way of a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. That is the only issue that is relevant to this point of order.

● (1512)

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, the fact was that in that discussion I outlined to the minister the two possibilities that I had to raise this matter. One was through a question. The minister will remember that I also discussed with him the problems a backbencher has in being recognized and seen by Your Honour. That is exactly what happened. I also told the minister at that time that my second choice would be to raise the matter under Standing Order 43. The minister will recall that.

On Friday, sir, I had no choice, because it was the last day of the week, but to raise it by way of Standing Order 43. At no time in my discussion with the minister did he object. He thought it was important and ought to be raised. If he did not agree that it should be raised by way of Standing Order 43, that was the time to object. But quite the contrary, he encouraged me to raise it. To say now that he disagreed with Standing Order 43—that was the time to raise it, not after the fact.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I will answer this because I am trying to be very fair with the hon. member. The hon. member is quite conscious of the fact that I have no control over Your Honour or motions made under Standing Order 43, or questions either. He implies in his remarks that on Friday I agreed to the motion under Standing Order 43, and that is what I wanted to straighten out for the House. I did not agree. I did not say, "You cannot do this." Through you, sir, I say to the hon. member: you can do as you like, as far as I am concerned. Okay. Is that understood?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It certainly is well understood by the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PRIVILEGE

MR. STEVENS—PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE OF PACIFIC PETROLEUMS SHARES—MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from something that certainly is not well understood in this House. I simply wish to give notice of a question of privilege that I hope to raise tomorrow arising out of the unfortunate statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) a few moments ago. Once again, he has misrepresented the true nature of the Petro-Can—Pacific Petroleums transaction. It is in truth intolerable that this government persists in misleading the Canadian public concerning their transaction involving Pacific Petroleums Ltd.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is exactly reversing the whole element of truth. He, his leader, and all subsequent speakers have attempted in the last few days to distort the truth so as to try to convince the Canadian people that somehow tax money is being used inappropriately, and that moneys that would otherwise have gone into public works, etc. have gone into the acquisition of an oil company. He should either stop misleading this House or stop accusing the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources of doing so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. From the procedural point of view I think it would be salutary if hon. members would stop accusing each other of attempting to mislead the House. Members on both sides of the House have accused their opposite numbers several times of attempting to distort the real picture in connection with the transaction whereby Petro-Can acquired Pacific Petroleums Ltd. Surely the very nature of discussions again today by the minister, by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), and now by the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott), and by all who have participated, bring to this the essence of debate. The debate is what is before the House in terms of the budget. That has given everyone an opportunity, with the usual freedom that exists in a budget debate, to argue the very nature of these financial transactions.

This is essentially a point of debate and I do not propose to entertain it now, tomorrow, or any other time, under the guise of a question of privilege.

MR. TOWERS—CANADIAN PRESS REPORT ON AUDITOR GENERAL'S ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, thank you for granting me time to raise this question of privilege today to refute incorrect statements made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) in his November 10 question of privilege at page 1014 of Hansard in my absence, which related to the tabling date of the report of the Auditor General. As you know, I had intended to let this matter stand until later, but a third dimension has been brought to my attention and I feel I must set the record straight now.

The remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West not only aggrieved me but reflect on the performance and integrity of a member of the press gallery, if, in fact, they are not an attempt to muzzle the press.

Sir, in this democratic institution, honesty should not be ridiculed, for political expediency, or, indeed, for any reason. Often in this House press reporters are criticized for misinterpreting or misquoting members of parliament. My question of privilege today is in defence of a Canadian Press reporter who wrote a factual article, referred to by the hon. member for Ottawa West as "distortion of the facts". The statement attributed to me in the Canada Press story, and I quote: "I don't think we should be tinkering around with the report or with the date after it has already been announced" is exactly what I said in the public accounts committee.

The words included in that press account and quoted by the hon. member for Ottawa West in his question of privilege as, "It is clear the government does not want any criticism of its finances to come to light during the budget debate" were said by me outside committee and I stand behind them.

I do not condone placing blame on anyone else for anything I have said, and I certainly will not remain silent when the work of a member of the press gallery is unjustly placed in doubt, even if that writing happens to be inconvenient for the government or for any member of parliament.

My colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) said in the House on November 10, and I quote: "I would point out to Your Honour that the steering committee meetings are generally looked on as confidential matter." I agree with him. Under ordinary circumstances I would strictly adhere to that practice but, because the hon. member for Ottawa West made an incorrect statement in this House with reference to a steering committee meeting, I am compelled to refer to what actually transpired there.

This is the false statement of the hon. member for Ottawa West, in reference to the tabling of the Auditor General's report:

It was then unanimously agreed at the steering committee, at which the hon. member for Red Deer was present, that a more appropriate day might be Thursday, November 23.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a distortion of fact.

At the steering committee meeting I asked that the word "unanimous" not be used because I was not in agreement with postponing the tabling date of the report of the Auditor General to November 23.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa West should admit he misrepresented the facts as I have outlined, and should apologize to the member of the press gallery whose report did not "distort the facts." I might add that I abhor this type of attack in the House of Commons on anyone who does not have the opportunity to defend his or her position, which only adversely affects parliament and its members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When the point was raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) I indicated I would await a proper opportunity for all members who had been included in the discussion to make their remarks. I will now examine the record carefully to see if in fact a question of privilege is involved.

MR. ABBOTT—DEBATING PROCEDURES AND QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am in some difficulty about the point you last made about raising substantive questions. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) raised a matter in a question which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) took to be a distortion of the truth and, therefore, leading to some criticism of himself. He rose on this with a question of privilege.

I am trying to fathom either your forbidding questions of privilege arising out of distortions that might take place in the form of a question or, indeed, whether any member during the budget debate is able to smear and distort the government's motives and get away with it simply as a matter of honest debate.

I would simply ask Your Honour if it is not possible for members on this side to rise and correct the distortions and misstatements of fact that might originate in the debate.

[Mr. Towers.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is no more necessary now than it was before I intervened a moment ago. Of course, any member during debate at any time, this afternoon or any day hereafter, is entitled to intervene if he feels that the House has been misled or that, on any of the precedents, there is any irregularity or question of privilege involved. I have simply indicated to the House that if the substance of any question is to be the continuation of a disagreement as to the real nature of the transaction involving the Petro-Can acquisition of Pacific Petroleums Ltd., that remains, in my opinion, and has been since the very beginning, a disagreement on the facts of the matter. That matter has been gone into several times now, and I have indicated to the House several times that it remains an essential dispute, a matter of debate and not a matter of procedure.

If that is all that is involved in any of these points that are going to be raised, that is the same resolution that I will have to make, and I do not think I should have to make it again.

PRIVILEGE

MR. TOWERS—CANADIAN PRESS REPORT ON AUDITOR GENERAL'S ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, concerning the question of privilege brought up in regard to the article which appeared in the Globe and Mail, if you recall, Mr. Speaker, this matter was brought up last Friday morning in this House of Commons, the same day this article appeared. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) made his point and I made my intervention. I stand by it. Your Honour said there was no question of privilege at that time. I wonder why it can also be brought up today, some four or five days after the original article appeared. I would like to add that there has been no mention made of the reply given by the hon. member for Ottawa West or myself in the Globe and Mail since.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Tell him to write a column.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member consults the record he will see that my impression was to the effect there was probably a grievance about the quality of reporting, but there was not a question of privilege. In any case, since it involved two other members on the opposition side I wanted to give them an opportunity to balance the intervention of the hon. member, if that was their desire, and that is the opportunity the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) took advantage of today. I say again that I will examine the record to see if there is any procedural significance.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek your clarification in relation to responses to questions that are placed on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could wait for the calling of questions on the order paper, and we will deal with it at that time. We are coming to that point very shortly.

Committee Reports

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved that the first report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments presented to the House on Thursday, November 16, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved that the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments presented to the House on Thursday, November 16, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has some comments to make with regard to this concurrence.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for seeking concurrence. Very briefly, this second report is a statement of the criteria which the joint committee adopts when it comes to examine the thousands of statutory instruments which are laid before it, and to decide whether or not they meet that criteria, should be challenged, or sent back for further consideration. Included in the criteria, for example, are such statements that we consider whether or not the statutory regulation makes some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling statute or by the prerogative, that trespasses unduly on the rights and liberties of the subject, or appears for any reason to infringe the rule or rules of natural justice.

What I was hoping to do was to see if the House would give its consent to having these rules appended to Hansard so that they could be given wider circulation, particularly among those members of the public service who are charged with the responsibility of drafting regulations. Hopefully consideration of them would take place at the time of drafting. I ask this because I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is here. This would be a preferable method than having to come here session after session to ask the House for concurrence. As this same procedure takes place in the Senate as well, perhaps the government might give consideration to having these statements of criteria made a condition and attached to the standing orders, having in mind the jurisdiction of this particular joint committee. Therefore by doing so it would be unnecessary to come back each session and seek this particular concurrence.

As I say, we have had three or four sessions where this House and the other place have agreed to the criteria. They are very useful and they have been most helpful in our attempts to try to bring some order to the way in which statutory instruments are drafted. I ask that the parliamentary secretary give some consideration to bringing this to the attention of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), and maybe something might be done about it.

I ask the House to give its consent to having these criteria attached as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion about the possible appendix to today's Hansard. Is the House agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

[Editor's Note: For criteria above mentioned, see appendix.]

Mr. Speaker: The motion is for concurrence in the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments presented to the House on Thursday, November 16, 1978. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 71, 326 and 419.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

FLQ CELL—UNIVERSITY OF MONCTON

Question No. 71—Mr. Jones:

1. Is the government aware of a letter to the editor in L'Evangeline, a French language daily newspaper in Moncton, New Brunswick on December 5, 1977, stating that an active FLQ cell was operating at the University of Moncton and, if so, has the Solicitor General or the RCMP investigated the matter?

2. To the knowledge of the government, has there been any police surveillance or investigation of such an alleged group?

3. Is the government aware of the names of the persons who call themselves the Front for the Movement of Quebec Youth in Moncton and, if so, what are they?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): 1. Yes. The RCMP has investigated the matter.

2. See answer to question 1.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

3. It has not been the policy of this government nor that of previous governments to comment on individual police and security investigations.

AIRCRAFT—CF-101 VOODOO

Question No. 326—Mr. McKinnon:

For what reason was it necessary in this late stage of the CF-101 Voodoo aircraft's life to order technical publications at a cost of $867,231?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): The requirement for rewriting and publishing revised technical publications for the CF-101 Voodoo was established in the CF-101 Voodoo Life Extension Study which was completed in 1976, and the reasons for this requirement are as follows: (a) The increasingly greater complexity to maintain the aircraft in its last phase of life until phase out in the mid 1980s was not foreseen in the original publication and hence a complete revision of this original publication had to be implemented to provide efficient and safe maintenance of the Voodoo. (b) Problems associated with the aging weapons system were not foreseen when the original publications were written and hence had to be incorporated in the revised version.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION—EDMONTON

Question No. 419—Mr. Bawden:

1. How many persons were employed at the Edmonton Office of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation on (a) January 1, 1978 (b) September 30, 1978?

2. How many on September 30, 1978, were also employed on January 1, 1978 at the Edmonton office and if the turn-over is significant, what is the reason?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. (a) 7. (b) 5.

2. (a) 2. (b) Highly competitive labour market and office location.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. MALONE—ANSWER TO QUESTION NO. 376

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier, I am seeking your clarification in relation to the nature in which responses are given to questions that are placed on the order paper. I placed question No. 376 on the order paper, which I deem important. I am sure in every case when a member places a question on the order paper, it is deemed to have considerable importance. While this is not a direct quotation, the substantive response was that essentially it would take either too much time or too much labour to answer the question. I simply ask whether or not there is any recourse when the member feels the question is important and ought to be looked at and that kind of response is made. Must we simply accept it? I note that often when responses are given the government says that it is answering about 90 per cent, but one can read into that that in effect what it is saying is that at least there is some percentage of those questions it will not answer.

To summarize, may I ask that when an answer is given which is viewed by a member to be important but in effect the member is given a non-answer, with the government taking the position that it does not want to take time or make the effort, is there any appeal by which we can have the question asked again and an answer given?

MR. ELZINGA—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 223

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to question No. 223 on the order paper. I have shared with the House before the fact that this is the third session in a period of over two years that it has been on the order paper. I am simply asking a question with regard to special or annual passes in the year 1976 which were granted to various chairmen and presidents of Crown corporations and government commissions, and how often they have been used.

The parliamentary secretary has stated to me in the past that this question has proved to be quite expensive to answer. I should share with the parliamentary secretary that in excess of one year ago, somebody from the department contacted my office to receive further clarification dealing with this question. I should also share with the parliamentary secretary that to answer this question is going to prove a great deal less expensive that the cost has been to the Canadian taxpayer for those individuals who fly around on these annual passes.

MR. JONES—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 69

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I again rise on starred question No. 69. This question was also put down as a starred question in the previous session, and in the session previous to that. To date there has not been an answer. With all the efficient and inefficient bureaucrats in the public service, there has been plenty of time to give me an answer. I have asked the parliamentary secretary about this on several occasions. He has replied that he would look into it and that he expected an answer. One time, about a year and a half ago, the answer was that it would be a few days. Several "few days" have passed since then.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone), I hope he realizes there are in any given situation a number of courses open to him. It would be very difficult for me to advise him from the chair as to what those courses might be. In fact it may be difficult for me to advise him at all on what the courses might be because ultimately I might have to sit in judgment on my own advice. If he were to consult the officers at the table, he might find some help in determining some of the ways.

If in fact part of the question is, for example, of such a nature as to require a detailed and expensive sort of response to that part, it may be useful for the hon. member to think of severing his question into several parts, or of returning the question to the order paper without that part. At any rate, I suggest to him that he consult with the Table for some assistance on it.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there were three statements. The first one contained some comments and some criticism even if it was under the form of a question directed to Your Honour. All I can say to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) is that when answering questions we are always concerned about informing parliamentarians and the public as fully as possible. At the same time, we want to please the hon. member who asks the question and also, if possible, alleviate his frustrations. But we are not forced to do that, and we must give the most objective and useful answers possible in order to inform the public properly. As far as the second statement is concerned, namely question No. 223 for which the hon. member requests an answer, it is very fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that this answer requires a lot of research and that all the work involved in trying to answer that question costs a tremendous amount of money to the Canadian public. But I want to assure him that we are making representations to try to obtain an answer as quickly as possible, but we have not been given the details which are necessary to draft a complete answer by all the departments and agencies. Finally, as regards the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones), who requires an answer to question No. 69 marked by an asterisk, I urge him to be patient and to read in the meantime the answer to question No. 71 which was given to him today.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, November 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the revised amendment of Mr. Stevens (page 1249).

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is of course a privilege to participate in the budget speech debate, although in this one it is difficult to do so with pleasure. That is because it is rather unusual to have a government bring in a budget in which it congratulates itself on making things worse next year than they are this year.

Job creation, which was 362,000 this year, and not enough at that, will be 250,000 next year. The government also seemed proud of its deficit and intends to increase next year's deficit to a considerably higher level than this year's. It is rather reminiscent of the horse racing addict who made his way to the track saying, "I hope I do not lose too much today because I sure need the money!"

If I may be permitted to say a kind word about the unfortunate Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), I would point out that he seemed to be more comfortable when he was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) then began to move around his chessmen in order to make room for his acquisition from Crowfoot. I hope the word "acquisition" is parliamentary. I would not want to get into the semantic argument as to whether the hon. member for Crowfoot was bought, purchased, acquired, given away, was obtained on waivers, or played out his option. The fact is the Prime Minister was acting as godfather of the family opposite and made him an offer he could not refuse.

In any case, the shifting around did a disservice to both those portfolios. We now have cabinet ministers in both Industry, Trade and Commerce and Finance who seem to be in difficulty. The self-confessed street fighter is beginning to look a little punchy, I am afraid.

A few days ago Mr. Speaker suggested to the splinter party on our left that if they wished to discuss defence they should not do so courtesy of Standing Order 26, but should take advantage of the opportunity of the budget debate. I welcome the Speaker's interest in defence. I hope we will hear from the party on the left in this debate. As well, I hope that at long last we will hear a few words from the minister about defence, defence being rather consistently underplayed in this House. There has been no mention whatsoever of defence in the last three throne speeches. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) does not seem to care to address this House very often on this subject. The last policy statement on defence by the government was in 1971 with the issuance of the so-called white paper.

Neither the country nor parliament at the present time has any idea of exactly what the government plans to do in the immediate and long-term future. I realize this particular lot of Liberals will mercifully be removed from guidance of national affairs before the medium future arrives. Even so, one would hope they would have done some planning during their too long regime.

This lack of planning is important, because the minister spends a significant amount of time addressing audiences outside of parliament, speaking about fantastic re-equipment programs which he and his predecessor have announced, as well as spurious versions of the amounts of money that this government is actually providing to National Defence, to buy equipment. The fact is that because of the deliberate downgrading of defence by the Prime Minister ever since he took over as leader of the Liberal party in 1968, we not only have a crisis of obsolescence in nearly every field of the Armed Forces' equipment, but also an acute shortage of manpower, plus a vacuum in policy.

The fault for this situation lies entirely with successive Liberal governments, and the Ministers of National Defence who let both the equipment and the manpower of the forces run down so far that the over-all effectiveness of the forces is now at a disturbingly low level.

It is worth remembering that in 1963 the Armed Forces had 123,000 men. By 1968, when the present Prime Minister took power, there were 101,000, and today there are only 79,000, despite the promise made by the minister about a year ago that he was increasing the armed forces by 4,500. I suppose a lot of people in this country believed him. However, the increase so far has been in the order of 400.

In terms of equipment, the worst damage caused by the decade of neglect under the Liberals is still to come. Major weapons systems, like ships, fighters and tanks, have a useful life of 20 to 25 years, and they are extremely expensive. For this reason any responsible government ensures that it has a proper investment cycle whereby it replaces each year a portion of its heavy capital equipment. In this respect National Defence should not be any different from a large business organization. However, for eight years under the present Prime Minister, from 1968 to 1976, Canada did not place a single contract for a major weapon system, thereby distorting the investment cycle for capital requirements in the future.

Canadian taxpayers and the Armed Forces are going to have to pay for this long period of neglect, the Canadian taxpayers because they must foot the bill for buying 20 years of equipment over the next ten or 12 years, and the Canadian Armed Forces because they must suffer the effects of operating old and obsolete equipment. For the forces, though, the worst is still to come in some respects since there is no evidence the present minister intends to take action, as opposed to making endless promises, to ensure that enough new equipment will be delivered in time to maintain the effectiveness of the forces at even minimal levels.

Let us take a look at all three services, starting with the navy. At the present time we have a navy of 23 surface ships. If we exclude ships over 25 years old, by the time the six new frigates arrive in service we shall have only ten ships in our surface fleet, including the frigates—four left over from the present fleet and six new ships, for a ten-ship navy! How can Canada possibly carry out its commitments in ten years' time with only half the number of ships it has today? The question has particular relevance because the expansion of Canadian sovereignty into the 200-mile economic zone would certainly mean more, not fewer, tasks for the navy.

The Air Force is confronted by a more acute crisis involving timing, since decisions with regard to the acquisition of a new fighter which should have been taken before now have still not been taken by the government. At present the Air Force operates three different types of fighter aircraft. When first bought by Canada they numbered over 400 planes in total. The most modern of our existing planes, the CF-5, is also the least capable, reflecting the fact that it was one of our poorest defence equipment choices since the war. Evidence of how little the Air Force thinks of this plane is shown by its wish to relegate it to an advanced trainer role as soon as the government provides the new fighter plane. The choice of the CF-5 in the sixties has, of course, made the present situation much worse because we are having to replace three types of fighter at once instead of just the much older CF-101 Voodoos and CF-104 Starfighters.

Let us turn to consider the current problem, the purchase of the new fighter aircraft. About a year ago the Minister of National Defence announced that tenders were being called to provide Canada with between 130 and 150 planes, and that six companies were being invited to participate. The date by which bids were to be entered—the government stressed it was to be the final date—was February 1, 1978. Five of the six companies put in their bids at that time; partly due to a technicality, the French company, Dussault, was not able to comply with the requirements and withdrew.

The project office proceeded to work on the mass of detail which had been given it in the way of bids, and under the policy direction of the cabinet selected a short list in the course of the following three and a half months. However, during this period, partly due to the lack of credibility the government suffers in international circles—people were not certain the government meant what it said it meant—some of the aircraft companies sweetened their offers. Operating within the constraints placed upon it, the project office came up with a short list in June. The government, though, for some strange reason known only to its own paranoic circle, refused to admit, deny, or explain the presence of the short list.

I put a question to the Prime Minister on this subject at the time—it can be found on page 6716 of Hansard for June 26 last and might bear repeating at this point:

> Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman confirm that the new fighter project management office has recommended that a short list of three planes be considered for the impending fighter contract, the F-16, the F-18A and the F-18L?

To which the Prime Minister replied:

> I am not sure what the hon. member is quoting from and it is certainly not government policy.

The exchange continued:

> MR. MCKINNON: I was not quoting from anything at that point except my own question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the Prime Minister has noted the following quotation from a Canadian Press release—"One of the options the cabinet is considering is the so-called short list, dropping some of the competing firms", Danson said.
> Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether the choice is being dictated entirely by the fact that these three planes are the cheapest of those under consideration and that since only a fixed sum of money is available, $2.3 billion in 1977 dollars, other important factors such as air superiority qualities, range and target acquisition capability all have to be sacrificed in favour of financial considerations?
> MR. TRUDEAU: The question is truly hypothetical. However, I can tell the hon. member that we want to try to get the best plane for the least money.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here we are, five months later, once again discussing the short list. And once again it appears that the same three planes are under consideration.

What has caused this five months' delay? The Prime Minister told a press conference the other day that he had been requested by Mr. Schmidt of Germany to allow the company concerned a further opportunity to sweeten its offer in connection with the Panavia Tornado. I have nothing in particular against the extension which was granted on that occasion, though it did indicate a lack of managerial competence on the part of the government to the extent that it was not able, apparently, to convince prospective plane manufacturers that it was serious when it talked about the February 1 bids being final. Also, it indicated a lack of confidence in the government's own ability during the contract negotiation stage. As hon. members know, the companies were right and the government was wrong.

Be that as it may, August 1 was set as the date for the second and final bid. All plane manufacturing companies complied, although some of their second bids were almost identical to their first. But what has been the cause of the delay since August 1? We saw the unedifying spectable of the Minister of National Defence stating on September 6 that he would be presenting the short list to the cabinet committee on September 14 and to the full cabinet the following week, only to find that two months later he still has not done so. This raises several questions in the minds of parliamentarians, in the minds of the general public and, indeed, in the minds of those who manage the plane companies.

What is the purpose of this delay heaped on top of delay? There is one scenario, if I may use a phrase favoured by the Department of National Defence, which would provide all the answers to these repeated postponements. It is that the government intends to announce the new fighter aircraft at a time which would best serve the purposes of the Liberal party, that is, at a time close to a federal election. They will then announce the final selection, indicating to the forces that they are serious about this plane purchase, and, as they did so misleadingly in the case of the long-range patrol aircraft, they will indicate to all sectors of the country that all concerned are going to reap the benefits of increased employment resulting from the offset work. Speaking parenthetically on this aspect I might point out that the offset benefits accruing to British Columbia from the long-range patrol aircraft are now at the giddy height of one half of one per cent, up from one third of one per cent.

While the government still refuses formally to commit itself to a short list, the leaks coming out from cabinet meetings and from the minister's office indicate that the people influencing the choice of plane are a very odd lot indeed. It must be a little difficult for those members of the armed forces directly concerned with this plane to realize that the timing of the selection is being stage managed by Keith Davey, the rain maker who tells the Liberal party when to hold elections and what to do for months before the election, and that the final selection would depend largely on the Minister of Industry,

Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan).

If I might, I would like to suggest to the Minister of National Defence that partisan advantages should be dropped at this time. The selection of this plane and the provision of this plane are a very, very important matter for the Armed Forces and for Canada. The most important factor that should be considered is the military requirement, not whether it will gain votes in the area of Malton, and not whether it is the cheapest which we can get. I have already heard disturbing rumours that the next phase of this plane selection, that is, the contract phase, is not due to start until the middle of January. I ask the minister if he cannot wring a decision out of the cabinet to approve the short list and get on with the next stage now, rather than two months from now. It is my understanding that this would enable the final choice and final contract to be signed some four to five months from the start of the contract phase. If this is correct, and I am not certain that it is, that would enable the final decision and the final contract to be signed in the very early spring, perhaps as early as March.

I make this suggestion in the hope that the matter of partisan politics can be kept out of this, and, of course, it will be impossible if the final selection is to be made during the election campaign. Only the Prime Minister knows when the election campaign will be, but we know the date by which we are certainly going to have one. It seems to me that it would be politically immoral for this decision to be postponed for partisan political advantage and then brought up in the middle of a political campaign, to say nothing of the fact that it is also considered politically immoral to make a major commitment just before an election. I make this suggestion in all sincerity, that the government should attempt very hard to make a decision and have the contract signed by the end of March, because it would then avoid being accused of doing it for political purposes. If it cannot come to a decision by that time, it should guarantee that it will put the matter on the shelf and have it dropped during the campaign period. This would at least give us the hope of coming up with the best plane most suited for Canadian needs.

I would like to move now to the situation in what used to be known as the Canadian army. The present situation of the land forces, or the army, is compounded by shortages of both manpower and equipment. It has suffered most from the cuts in defence since the present Prime Minister took office. For example, in 1965 the army had 48,000 personnel, and it has 27,000 today, of which only 17,000 are assigned to Mobile Command. No element within the army has been harder hit than the infantry. Even within the last four years the infantry has been cut back from 7,500 to approximately 6,500. No army in the world can retain high morale or remain efficient if there is such a continuous loss of manpower, especially in what is referred to as the teeth arms.

However, the loss in manpower is matched by the fact that the army has very little modern equipment when compared with either our allies or our potential adversaries. For example, the government has ordered new tanks, but has bought the Leopard one, a tank whose basic design is now 13 years old. The reason that this is significant is that all other countries which operate tanks are moving very rapidly to a new generation of tanks, with bigger guns, improved engines, and the new "Chobham" armour which protects them from the anti-tank missiles with which most Warsaw pact infantry units are now equipped. It is rather daft to ignore the fact that a new generation of tanks will have new guns, new engines, and new armour. If you take those three things away you do not have much tank left.

The other disturbing aspect of the tank purchase is the very small quantity involved. We are replacing more than twice the number of old Centurion tanks with a total of 128 Leopard ones. Under present plans we will have only 78 based in Europe, of which a third are to be held in reserve. This will be our total contribution to NATO's tank forces, which face some 27,000 Warsaw pact tanks on the central front of Europe alone.

Another example is that when Canadian forces are committed to peacekeeping operations, they frequently find that either or both the parties they are trying to keep apart, as well as other elements of the peacekeeping force, carry personal weapons or small arms which are more modern and sophisticated than any possessed by Canadian troops. It should be a sobering thought to realize that our fellow peacekeepers in the Middle East, Ghanaian or Nigerian troops, now have better small arms than the Canadian Armed Forces.

I would now like to talk about the financial support that this government has promised but not delivered to the Armed Forces. The present minister inherited from his predecessor a commitment by the government to, at long last, begin re-equipping the forces. This was the "Richardson formula" whereby the capital budget would be increased by 12 per cent per year in real terms for five years, and the whole of the defence budget would be inflation proofed. The former minister achieved this in 1977-78.

After only one year the present minister voluntarily gave up almost 80 per cent of the promised real growth in the capital budget, and now under the government's restraint program the minister has apparently forgone another $150 million out of his budget. Whichever part of it he has surrendered, he will either be losing the inflation proofing, or yet more from his capital budget. In either case we have had more slippage away from the Richardson formula, which was the minimum necessary to maintain the viability of the forces in the long run.

Just the other day the minister took great umbrage in reply to a question of mine, when I said that they had not increased the budget by 12 per cent. I would like to read to hon. members a few words from the minutes of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on March 12, 1978, when we were studying the estimates for the Department of National Defence. I asked the associate deputy minister of finance in the Department of National Defence, Mr. Davies:

—tell us exactly how much the percentage increased, the real growth percentage increased, in the capital budget this year after you had deducted the $60 million?

Mr. Davies replied:

Mr. Chairman, I believe that worked out . . . to 2.8 per cent.

I said:

What a come-down from the 12 per cent that everybody expected. So it was actually the inflation rate plus 2.8 per cent.

Mr. Davies replied:

That is the way it worked out, sir.

Notwithstanding the fact that they had just broken the promise to increase the capital budget by 12 per cent in real terms, the minister and the Prime Minister attended a NATO meeting at which they made a second pledge, that they would increase the Canadian defence budget by 3 per cent in real terms per annum overall, so that the alliance's long-term defence program for the next decade could be meaningful, since the alliance pledged itself to do more than just maintain existing levels of spending. This promise, too, they had no sooner made than, in effect, they broke it. Already our annual increase for NATO purposes is down to 2 per cent, and this is only the first year of the program.

In both cases the present minister has used the device of pretending that his formulae are intact, money that he has not got, or he has agreed to give up, he insists is still there—in some heavenly treasury board no doubt, and he goes around the country claiming 12 per cent real growth for the capital budget. The particular ministerial fantasy which permits him to offer this piece of double talk is the so-called, and infinitely flexible, capital envelope. It is a concept which allows a minister to convert a 12 per cent real growth each year into 2 per cent or perhaps 5 per cent, and then at some future date—no doubt when the lions of the Treasury Board lie down with the ministerial lamb of National Defence—the minister of defence says he will get what is owing to him.

This talk of an envelope is simply a cheap political way of changing a definite commitment in the estimates into a political promise. If the minister is allowed to get away with this and the Prime Minister in his backing of it, no doubt we will soon be hearing that the redevelopment of Toronto harbour is still in the envelope, and that the replacement of the weather ship Estevan on the west coast is still in an envelope, although, I believe, the promise is now more than eight years old. We might even hear that the Prince Edward Island causeway is still in some envelope in some remote corner of some department. We are supposed to be happy with these and other statements of the minister.

With his characteristic urge to please, the minister does neither the forces nor the country any service when he continually makes promises which he knows he cannot keep. As well he has a penchant for slight exaggeration. For example, as recently as October 5, 1978, the minister addressed the Men's Canadian Club of Winnipeg. He said the following:

We will spend another $700 million this year on orders to replace equipment grown obsolete during years of austerity.

I should like to refer to page 15-12 of the 1978-79 estimates of the Department of National Defence. Under capital of the department, there is a grand total of $685,207,000. Of this amount, construction and acquisition of land, buildings and equipment totals $94,026,000; utilities, materials and supplies, $7 million; professional and special services, $19 million. Clearly the grand total is approximately $150 million less than the minister said would be spent on equipment this year.

With each year that the defence budget fails to get funds promised to it, which are the foundation for buying equipment for the next 15 years, the prospects of the new fighter and ship programs become grimmer. The compounding effect is completely lost, if the defence budget does not get the 12 per cent each year. One does not need more than a basic grasp of arithmetic to see that, unless increases come through now, the necessary base for later expansion will not exist. Without an expansion, obviously it is impossible to buy $2.3 billion worth of fighters, which the minister promised, and $1.5 billion worth of ships, expressed in 1977 dollars, just to name the two largest purchases, unless one stretches the programs and the envelope to the turn of the century. If these programs are delayed that long, it will be impossible for the Armed Forces to meet their existing commitments, simply because long before then the forces will lack basic equipment to do the job.

It is hard news to have to tell the people of the country the situation regarding the re-equipment program. This kind of factual reporting would come better from the minister, but if he is unwilling to come clean with Canadians about the financial jiggery-pokery which is going on with the estimates and budgets of the Department of National Defence, then someone has to do it. As I said earlier in my speech, the bitter truth is that we went for ten years without giving our forces the support which was absolutely necessary for them if they were to carry out the roles assigned to them. Now we must pay. During the next ten years we will have to pay for 20 years of defence expenditures, yet the government indicates its clear unwillingness to tackle the job.

I should like to compare the present situation with the past one in this regard. If we take the figures of the Maritime Command, the Mobile Command and the Air Command, and then add the unallotted troops on a prorated basis, we find that in 1965 the navy had 19,613 men and women and in 1978 it had 16,994; the Mobile Command has gone from 46,000 down to 27,000; and Air Command has gone down from 48,000 to 35,000. Since 1965 the navy has lost 14 per cent, the army 42 per cent, and the air force 27 per cent.

I hope the minister will take my suggestion about moving on as quickly as possible with the selection of a new fighter aircraft. Last week I was surprised to note that along with the discord which has existed always in the government, the Prime Minister talked about defence equipment at his press conference. He made a very curious comment which did not seem to be noticed by too many people. He referred to the selection of fighter aircraft and whether it would be cheap or expensive. He said the following:

> Well, that's a trade-off that DND will have to advise us on. There are cheaper aircraft of which you can get a greater number for the same price. But, obviously, they are not as good as the more expensive aircraft. And, what they are doing now is the same kind of operation they did when we bought a billion dollars worth of long-range patrol aircraft a couple of years ago. They had to choose between the Boeing which in terms of number of hours flight and so on was a bit better but so much more costly than the Lockheed that they could get more of the Lockheed to do the job and they chose the latter.

Clearly this implies that the Prime Minister thought the Boeing 707 would make a better long-range patrol aircraft. This is totally at variance with what the previous minister of national defence told us, as well as everyone else in the services.

In closing, I suggest the government should get its act together. It should move ahead quickly with this new fighter purchase. We should get it out of the way before the election campaign starts. Let us give the forces the support they richly deserve. Our party believes that they deserve this new fighter aircraft. Our party is in favour and has supported the government in its re-equipment program. We believe that the forces need to be a bit larger. We hope to have the support of other parties in this respect when we are in government.

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to support the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), a sensitive, responsive Canadian whom I respect very much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I respect him not only for what he is today, but for his great record of service to Canada since he came here from St. Maurice in 1963. I recall talking to him about Canada, and as no other Canadian he made me understand the depth of love of Canada by French Canadians. He told me his story, and I passed it on to my constituents on the opposite edge of Canada, 4,000 miles from his home, in order to explain the richness and love which bind us as a nation.

The minister's family settled in Lower Canada 325 years ago. The Chrétiens fought beside the English in the battle of Chateau Gai in October, 1813, when the Americans invaded Canada. In a private conversation with me, the minister said this:

> That is the way it will be today if René Lévesque tries to break us apart; we French and English will be together.

When he came here in 1963 from his riding of St. Maurice, he was unable to speak a word of English. He had no choice; he had to learn English. It is characteristic of this great and spiritually rich Canadian that he did not resent it. He said it simply: "That was the way it was".

To think that today, in this most complex of duties in Canadian affairs, he is so competent in both languages that he can handle himself articulately, and courteously, in responding to an English member in English and a French member in French!

[Mr. McKinnon.]

He is a true federalist. I recall one day when were talking about possible separation, he said:

> This is all my Canada. I worked for the north for six years.

He was referring to the time when he was Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He continued, saying:

> Nobody is going to say that is not my north or your north. Nobody is going to split it away or any part of my Canada away and turn the north into a Kuwait for about 60,000 people. My kids and every Canadian's kids have a right to everything that is Canadian.

Let us hope that there will be a spread throughout Canada of this example. It must have been a difficult decision, one of compelling duty, which convinced him to take on his present job. Of course his present job is one that only can cause him grief and be a political nightmare because of the economic crisis and social turmoil throughout the world. He took the job when others quit. Let us hope this love and duty to Canada in the hearts of the Chrétiens, many Anglophones and others of many cultures—a mix which makes Canada such a magnificent nation—will shame and quiet the hatemongers, those few who spew out their intolerance and irrational hate.

It is love and mutual respect between people which will keep us strong against all divisive forces, some of which are right in the House and up in "yon Fourth Estate."

I want to speak of the need of excellence in communication, the importance of the media as a responsible public utility, although in private hands, and the importance of an informed and wise electorate as fundamental to a healthy democracy. Conversely, if there is a dearth of responsible and fair reporting, as seems to be the case in Canada, democracy will fail and the first victims always will be the symbol of all freedoms, the free press.

● (1612)

Tragically, communication lines across the land have become warped and distorted. In fact there seems to be a concerted effort to keep honest and fair communication down to a minimum. It seems, as Thomas I. Emerson in his book "The System of Freedom of Expression" has stated, that the most formidable threat to freedom of the press comes less from government than from the media itself. Professor Emerson, who was a law professor at Yale, put it this way:

> —that it is no longer to protect the freedom of the press from government interference in order to guarantee freedom of expression. Today, "the overpowering monopoly over the means of communication acquired by the mass media" constitutes the "most significant threat" to our system of freedom of expression.

This country has been well managed. The results are discussed internationally with respect and with admiration. We should all be proud of the international recognition that we are receiving right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: This government—it is recognized throughout the industrial world—has given us the highest standard of living in the world, but few in the media are telling it. Praise in the international economic community for Canada's leadership, compared to the carping at home, proves the old truism—the prophet is without honour in his own country. Canada's economic record is excellent according to an independent assessment made by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, which is composed of 15 of the most industrialized nations in the world, of which Canada is one. These are countries with which we do 90 per cent of our trade.

Another independent voice that recognized Canada's position objectively is that of Earle McLaughlin, chief executive of the Royal Bank of Canada. He claims that in the past seven years Canada has outperformed the Americans by almost any economic yardstick. In that period, real personal incomes in Canada increased 38 per cent, even taking into account the weakened dollar. Compare that to our great neighbour to the south, which had an increase of 17 per cent. Mr. McLaughlin said that Canada's material standard of living increased more than that of the United States, and despite unemployment he notes that Canada has led the world in creating new jobs. We have done better than the second best, which is the United States, having created 50 per cent more jobs than the Americans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Total investment spending in Canada also rose, according to Mr. McLaughlin. He would be interested in that fact, and so should the Conservatives because he is their man. It rose by 168 per cent, compared with 107 per cent in the United States.

Dr. Carl Beigie, the highly respected economist, author, teacher of managerial economics at McGill University, and president of the C. D. Howe Institute, which like himself is proudly non-partisan and objective, analysed the Canadian economic record at a breakfast meeting I attended, along with others, sponsored by Reader's Digest, on October 31. He said that Canada has as sound a medium-term economic strategy in terms of its fundamentals as any industrialized nation in the world. He goes on to say that there have been tactical errors but that this is virtually inevitable in the real world of political economy. Anyone who imagines that we who live in a narrow belt stretching 4,000 miles across this land can solve all of the world's problems is a dreamer and not very realistic.

We in Canada did very well despite a decade in which there was a shocking upheaval in world economies, where the wealth and control of energy resources shifted from the traditional power areas into the hands of a few sheiks and dictators via a third world cartel. It was a transfer of economic power that set off a tidal wave of inflation in 1973 through the OPEC cartel's fabricating of an energy crisis and then overnight quadrupling the price of oil, and thus energy prices.

But despite all this the record from OECD shows that we survived and came out of it at the top of the economic scale. Our standard of living improved continuously. A recent OECD study ranked Canada second in quality of life among the 15 most industrialized countries. Our GNP increased 32 per cent in real terms. Personal disposable income grew 118 per cent. Average family income went up 35 per cent in real terms. Our 1973-76 growth rate of 9.9 per cent ranked us third in the western world. Our job creation rate of 8.8 per cent—that is, 250,000 jobs a year—between 1973 and 1976 was the highest in the world. Our export trade grew dramatically, with a record trade surplus of close to $3 billion in 1977. Private sector capital investment has run at about 22 per cent a year, compared to 14 per cent in the United States. Second quarter corporate earnings for 1978 are up 20 per cent over 1977. There are now 36 companies with sales of over $1 billion, six more than in 1977.

The whole world has been struck by spiralling inflation with economic stagnation. High unemployment has resulted as long used economic procedures failed to produce expected solutions. Who would be so childlike in the adult world here and in the media as to expect Canada to remain immune to the ailments of the entire world? Here we had virtually economic primitives controlling and manipulating the sophisticated industrialized nations, and the adolescents in the media—yes, even here in the highest institution in the nation—expect classic, old style results from old style procedures.

Listening to some members here and seeing the messages going out throughout Canada, one would think that 264 people, members of parliament, representing 22 million constituents living in a narrow band stretched across 4,000 miles along the 49th parallel, as I mentioned, would alone be able to solve the problems that beset the world. It is less than genius to pretend that Canada alone can solve these problems. One can only assume that the critics are either dishonest or stupid. To be charitable, one might suggest they are sincere but naive—a terribly dangerous combination.

One has to wonder if contemporary rules of journalism proscribe that positive news must never be reported, that the public must be harangued into an intense anxiety state by the unending barrage of cliches and verbiage that threaten the end of the good life. Sometimes we who sit here have the feeling that the news is bringing us to the edge of the world. But it is all too often that this brand of reportage as projected, not the reality or the facts, provides the basis for public anger, unrest, frustration and terrible anxiety. We members of parliament, regardless of our politics, must share in this and possibly in the destruction of our own parliament.

One must wonder if the reasoning behind this is so superficial and selfishly petty as to be ludicrous. Is it fear by media "stars" that their personal status as pundits will be threatened? The Fourth Estate, as we call it here, though it hardly deserves that name until it returns to the style by which it earned that magnificent title—

Mr. Lefebvre: What would you call it, then?

Mrs. Holt: My colleague asks me what I would call it. It is still the Fourth Estate in world affairs. If the Fourth Estate were doing its job it would have a right to claim its status as the fourth and greatest estate in a free society. But do some members of this Fourth Estate fear that their personal status as pundits is threatened? If their predictions of disaster and tragedy fail to materialize, it would be a personal blow to their small egos. They would find themselves going nowhere. What an irresponsible influence on Canadian democracy—on the need for a well informed electorate to select an excellent parliament and to structure a healthy nation.

● (1622)

I want to say that there are still high calibre reporters here. I could name them, but time does not permit it. Surely it is to the critical and large public utility that we must direct our attention. The monopoly owners must certainly look to what is happening here before it gets even further out of hand. The owners are fourteen men—all men, and maybe that is the problem. There are fourteen owners of the major communication media in this country. Montreal and West, the English media of every major city is controlled by three companies, Southam's, F.P. Publications, and the Thomson group. These three companies unify to tell us and tell Canada what is happening. They do not have to be honest, they do not have to face the checks of competition; they do not have to do anything but manipulate and control this country.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is the same thing in New Brunswick.

Mrs. Holt: That is just what I was going to say. East of Montreal it is the K.C. Irving group. It should be cause for fear for all of us. If they can divide this House they can conquer this House. They—those 14—will be the people who will be running Canada, if they are not already.

I say that the media has the most important duty of any profession in any free country. It is truly the most crucial agency for strength or for destruction.

For democracy to flourish it must have a free, responsible, fair, balanced and, most important, an accurate press.

The right of the public to know is the highest principle of a free society. The people who tout this the loudest today on this hill are the very people who use self-serving censorship—the media. Those of us who despise the secrecy that allows bullies and sadists to flourish within the public service feel that it is essential to have openness and that the public has a right to know. But it seems that this right to know in Canada gets mixed with the right of some journalists here to use their own so-called discretion as to what the public should be told. The distortion and censorship that are flourishing in this country have been described as one of the most "formidable threats" to society today. That is by Emerson and by other great leaders in both the United States and in Canada. It is as though the right to know must be submerged to the right to keep good news secret. It is as though the truth may spoil the fiction.

I recall following the appearance of the RCMP before our justice committee, about a year ago, when many accusations and so-called scandals were explained, even explained away by the RCMP commissioner on a morning show. It was a national network but I will not name it. The commissioner gave the answers to our committee. The interviewer, noted as much for his accusative style of telling facts as for questioning, got responses he obviously did not like. They answered the charges and exploded media scandal stories. The answers left the interviewer with egg on his face. He whined on the air publicly, "But that spoiled my story."

Recently, on this same show the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), being interviewed regarding cabinet ministers' appearances before the McDonald inquiry into the RCMP, said the ministers want to be heard in public. Minutes later, on the news, the story was sent across Canada that the Solicitor General wanted to appear in camera. I could not believe this was possible in a free and open society.

Another trick that hon. members opposite will know as well as we do is the "voice-over" technique. If the speaker is telling something and saying it well, making a forceful argument—whether it is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—they use voice-over and translate it the way they want, not necessarily telling what was said.

During the federal-provincial conference it was remarkable that the two pinch-hitters for CBC told of an end to the conference of discord between the first ministers of the provinces and the Prime Minister. People who watched it live saw the conference as it really ended. They also heard B.C. premier Bill Bennett and other first ministers talk of it as a successful up-beat conference. These realities inspired one caller to an open line show, in which I participated in Vancouver, to ask, "Does the CBC executive censor truth?"

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): What does Allan Fotheringham know about Canada anyway?

Mrs. Holt: He reports from Vancouver about Ottawa—a 3,000 mile perspective of Ottawa.

Donald McDonald, editor of the respected Centre Magazine, November-December, 1976, pages 15 to 35, sets out the duty of the media this way:

> The premise of democracy is that a people can govern themselves. The condition for this audacious assumption is that the people will have the information they need to make wise political decisions. Democracy, the philosopher Richard McKeon has pointed out, is a community based on communication. Judge Learned Hand has said that we have staked our all on the rational dialogue of an informed electorate.

Mr. McDonald said, and I agree, that the press, that is, broadcasting and print, as the chief medium of communication among people and for people, remains the most effective way to relay what is happening. He says that they have betrayed the greatest duty of one of the most important professions for a strong nation.

These are such exciting and challenging times for great communicators, not only because of the subject matter that changes so quickly, but because of the availability of the tiniest and most colorful events in every corner of the world through jet travel and space communication. Today we have spectacular devices for instant communication and for visual experiences in every home—not just television but satellite, bringing instantaneous information from all corners of the earth. The public that has invested so much in this, and has a right to expect so much, is being cheated. It is a critical, distrustful public, frustrated, betrayed, resenting the fact that it cannot rely on the printed word or even the voices on radio or pictures on their television screens.

The people are seeking information but cannot find an information source they can trust. The public today is not what the media were told 30 or 40 years ago—of an average mentality of fourteen years; the public today is educated and wise, perhaps much, much wiser than those in the media who are not classed, by law, as professionals.

We hear talk of paranoia. When the media is told that there is something wrong, something out of joint in the composition of its membership, they cannot think or talk about anything else but their hurt feelings. Their minds blot out everything else, all real news that affects the people of Canada. All their energy and thought are focussed on their own insult. Many know it is true. But nothing else matters, it is their ox that is gored. They become angry and dangerous, typical of paranoia. The killer instinct is the result of much paranoia. I would not be surprised if it is paranoia—schizophrenia, because many of them do not know what they are yet. I want to say that there are great exceptions.

The Prime Minister said that the media is the enemy. It is regrettable that they do not give equal attention to the Prime Minister's general statements, for example, that of October 12 in this House which was an important report to the people of Canada on the positive state of the nation.

Unfortunately the group, in the media, engaging in this paranoid-killer journalism, too lazy to do any investigative work, are wallowing in their own ego trips and giving a bad name to a great profession. The behaviour of this group ruins the responsible, fair job of reporting being done by others. It is tragic that this is happening, and nobody regrets it more than those of us who want to see a competitive press, a press that is rich and objective.

There is no doubt that the government must look into the whole business—another aspect of the press—of monopoly, and move toward an anti-trust type of legislation to restore healthy competition, to allow comparisons and force the industry out of sloth into the high standards that such comparison and competition impose.

It is also essential for the government to look into the power broking within its own agency, the CRTC, that has abused its mandate and is usurping power of parliament, diminishing competition in the electronic media and, worst of all, bullying the public and depriving the citizens of freedom of choice and freedom to have the best and most varied choices on which to base their knowledge and information.

The government must also review the CBC role as it lives off the public purse. It is costing the taxpayers more than a half a billion dollars a year to get distorted, biased, irresponsible information, in the name of national culture. The CBC had four cameras in the rotunda on budget night with which to do a poorer job than the other two networks—CTV and Global—did with one camera each.

Incidentally, the waste to Canadian taxpayers by an Ottawa bureau chief, who may have a serious conflict of interest in pushing his personal political interests on the Canadian public, must also be checked. I am surprised that the media never write about this type of thing. I would also like to know why we had all that equipment out on the hill for three weeks pushing for an election. Maybe someone should look into that. I notice the whip on the other side knows what I am talking about. And one member of the Fourth Estate in the press gallery, now. Congratulations to that member—

An hon. Member: Everybody is watching it on TV.

Mrs. Holt: As I said, it is the lazy way of doing it. They cannot see all the great things that you people are doing across the room or here if they sit and watch it on television.

Referring to responsible journalists, they are more important than the media charlatans in Canadian democratic life. None are more worried about the situation than the responsible journalists in Canada and the United States. Wherever these people meet, they talk of their fears and of what is happening to their profession and to the country because of the cretins.

Concerning the media's self-serving censorship, I would refer to a statement made by law professor Stephen R. Barnett of the University of California in Berkley, which appeared in 1973 in an article in The Nation. It reads:

> The media tend to look the other way on important issues in which they—and perforce the public—are involved.
> "One hears much about reporters' subpoenas and the threat they pose to the public's right to know, but considerably less about other controversies involving the media, the government, and the First Amendment . . . The whole subject of media concentration somehow eludes the nation's newspapers and TV stations. Two years ago, for example, when Congress made its own contribution to newspaper monopoly by passing the Newspaper Preservation Act, the publishers' lobbying campaign was backed up by studied blandness in the nation's press . . . Last summer, when the industry took another major step toward monopoly by killing major newspapers in Boston, Washington, and Newark, the help provided by the justice department was overlooked in the media. At present, the leading nonstory is the proposal of the Federal Communications Commission to break up common ownership of newspapers and broadcast stations in cities throughout the country—an uncommonly important and controversial issue that may be unrivaled for the thoroughness with which the media have blacked it out."

We have the same mergers, we have the same monopoly development, we have the same control, and we have the same irresponsibility of which Professor Barnett speaks. Is anyone reporting these developments? What about the takeover of newspapers by management groups, for example, F.P. Publications? The Globe and Mail was taken over by F.P. Publications and it deteriorated. Nobody has written about why that happened. It is essential now for Canada to halt and reverse this dangerous concentration of ownership by fewer and fewer people. The media character of the 1970s—neither technologically or structurally—could have been foreseen by the Fathers of Confederation when they planned this great democracy. They could not have foreseen what it would mean to a self-governing society spread across this massive land, that could not hear or know what was happening in its capitals, both provincial and federal, and even in municipal councils, because of deliberate distortion and evasion of truth.

McDonald in the Centre Magazine also notes two characteristics that bear most heavily on the performance of working journalists and the quality of public reporting. First is the big business nature of the media; and second is the increasing concentration of their ownership in fewer and fewer hands. Both jeopardize the freedom and diversity of expression.

Therefore they make problematic the possibility of realsitic and wise decision-making by the Canadian people. That is why Canadians are only listening to the stories of crepe hanging, the stories of doom, the stories of fear and the hate that have spread across this land from parliament. It affects not just the Government of Canada but everyone.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. lady that her allotted time has expired. She may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Holt: I think we all have to worry about the division and contempt that the whole of this parliament is feeling.

In an American Press interview 13 years ago Walter Lippman said:

A free press exists only where newspapers, which are competitive and rivals, exist, so that editorial comment and news reports can—regularly and promptly—be compared, verified and validated. A press monopoly is incompatible with a free press.

Nobody wants great journalism, great reporting, and great Canadiana more than great journalists want it. All who are confident in their own ability and have integrity want to compete in the largest markets.

Most good writers and artists try for the best and do not want to succeed in sheltered workshops. Only mediocrity and incompetence seek protection from competition. This hardly makes the nation better or provides an informed electorate. The one thing we must all worry about is an informed public. It affects everyone and democracy itself.

When the election was called in 1974, the monopoly press of Vancouver, which exists in every major city of Canada, called a meeting of the top executives of the Vancouver Province and the Vancouver Sun. These papers did not have to compete, so their representatives decided how to do the job on the cheap. A think tank was organized to decide how they would cover the election. Only the leaders got coverage, which meant the electorate of British Columbia went to the polls without knowing the strengths, weaknesses or the positions of the candidates for whom they had to vote.

If parliament is to have strength, and democracy is to survive, there must be an informed public and a responsible media.

[Mrs. Holt.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for the new member for St. Boniface to deliver his first speech in the House and that it should be about the budget. Allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that the fact that I have remained quiet for days while the other new members have already delivered their speech does not mean that I will remain so in the future. It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that my predecessor is the senator from St. Boniface, Mr. Joseph-Phillippe Guay, and my performance must be better than his own. However, at this time I want to pay him a tribute and say that during my two election campaigns, I have noted how well known and admired he was by every resident of St. Boniface.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that I am older than the other new members in the House. Indeed, I belong to the generation of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am also a grandfather.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear. And my neighbour too.

Mr. Hare: Yes, that is right. I would also like to tell you a very short story to explain why I speak like the member from——"the safest Liberal seat in the west".

[English]

My background has been primarily in the food and agricultural industry. Although I began many years ago in the academic and scientific research field, most of my 20 years in business has been in management, particularly in the budgetary and sales aspects of marketing.

After many years in the pharmaceutical, food and grain industry, I started my own business in agribusiness consulting. Our offices have been in the Winnipeg Grain Exchange for the past eight years. Our clientele has included food processing, chemical, and agricultural supply companies.

I represent a very small company. The employees are non-union. Although much of our work is in consulting, we are involved in sales of ingredients and inputs for the feed and farm industry.

Early in the 1970s when I started my own business we were going along rather smoothly, but shortly I found there was a rapid increase of government intervention. This involvement appeared to increase from year to year. We had more and more forms to fill out. There were more taxes to pay. It reached the point where our little company had the honour of having our own financial inspection of the books by government accountants, and that was a two week stint.

We noted a growing number of government offices surrounding us in the Grain Exchange. There were two floors of Manpower offices. Ministry of Transport people appeared on all sides. None of these people appeared to be working very hard with their long coffee breaks and long lunch hours. We noticed this as we were hurrying from one appointment to the other.

At the same time, the government was encroaching into individuals' lives more and more. The very size of government increased all around us. Taxes kept going up to the point where I felt I was carrying the whole load of government on my shoulders.

At this time, in the early days of his mandate, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) philosophized that if a person did not want to work, we really ought not force him to do so against his will, and so was born the costly social programs of the late sixties and early seventies such as LIP, YIP and other give-away programs. The role of unemployment insurance was no longer insurance as we know it, but in fact high level welfare. Young persons were given to feel that the money tree was there for the picking. My own sons, growing through their teens, told me of schemes whereby they could detour around work and still live rather well. Hon. members can rest assured that they were given short shrift by me with those ideas.

Along with this government intervention, other aspects of the economy were making me queasy. There appeared to be little forward planning by government, and the Auditor General inferred that the government was losing control over its spending. Inflation and unemployment seemed to rocket upwards.

At about that stage, with all those indicators giving me strong nudges, an otherwise apolitical businessman became fed up to the teeth. I felt that the younger generation was quickly losing the finer spirit that our forefathers needed to hew out their livelihood in the Canadian wilds, yet Canada possessed unlimited undeveloped resources, resources that would require a heavy dose of the old pioneer spirit, both physically and mentally, to bring them to market stages.

Here was a country with a paucity of population relative to size, lands as yet unexplored, and it was regressing into a country that within a short while would be unable to carry out its own development, all because of the application of artificial socialistic strategy. We needed that pioneer spirit and the rugged determined character in our young folks in order to maximize our potential. It was my feeling that as the character of the young people went, so would go our country.

I well knew that one person could not make much impression on the total process, so the next step was taken, involvement in the political process. To keep the story short, we did not make much headway in the 1974 election. However, in 1978 with tremendous effort by a lot of people and a fast running campaign, we presented the viable alternative to the citizens of federal St. Boniface in the hastily called six weeks by-election.

Such an upset as was achieved, along with the other nine by-election wins, I believe justified my position as a candidate for the past five years. At least I know that the voice of the people is truly being heard throughout the land. Come next summer, the final awakening of the Canadian public will occur.

Since my background is in business, particularly business management, I state here that the present management practices of government as shown in the recent budget are deplorable.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the reason for my intervention is that I think sound and generally accepted management principals should be applied in a country such as Canada. Without sound management, a company cannot be viable nor progress. Any profitable company establishes its objectives and a plan for action well before proceeding with each phase of both short-term and long-term development. Its marketing plan is complete and is prepared with all details including time and financial indicators. That is the practical application of the concept of marketing. This concept does not relate only to products for sale but to the whole process of production, transformation, transportation, promotion and to the economic factors or, in other words, to the planning process as a whole. The idea is to direct the various products towards the appropriate markets. It implies the analysis of potential markets as well as the internal movement of all information.

[English]

The budget brought down this week again illustrates the poor management abilities of the present government. As a businessman I can say there are many key problems under our present economic conditions that the budget did not touch. I would like to relate these briefly and present some of the reasons why they have not been taken care of now.

The first is the high cost of money. As a small businessman, this affects the development of my company and my ability to obtain working capital. Second is the impact of unemployment insurance and its effect on the high turnover rate of labour at the lower levels. It is almost impossible to get and maintain working people. Third, there is a lack of high quality and skilled labour. Fourth, there is a lack of incentives for entrepreneurial action. There is very little reason for me, as a small businessman, to keep on going, encourage larger growth, and continue to pay taxes, when I could do almost as well by taking a government job or going on welfare.

The whole thing has resulted in lack of confidence in the government because of its short-term, band-aid, month to month policies. All these things are adding to the cost of production and limiting our ability to produce low cost products allowing us to compete in the domestic and international marketplace.

Let me apply some of my thinking to an area with which I am more familiar—the food and agricultural sector. There are many things wrong in this area in Canada and I would like to point out a few items, and perhaps in future debates get down to detail. One of the greatest impacts on our cost of living is the price of food. Everyone is hit hard when food prices rise. Thus the optimization of our food industry is essential if we are to have any aptitude in the maintenance of low food prices. The fact that Canada is so large makes the transportation of our food products an important aspect of cost. Yet I see many things which make me shudder when I review the food policies in effect at this time. This is particularly true of my own location, the prairies and western Canada. I wish to refer briefly to a few instances but I shall not take the time to go into detail.

I refer to improprieties which relate to our high cost of food. Optimum management would not allow such things to occur resulting in the poor situation which exists in our economy. First, I would turn to the grain movement process. In the normal elevators of western Canada we have almost no cleaning operations in the prairies. Only in the newer and larger elevators do we find grain cleaning facilities. Thus the dockage or screenings which in some cases amount to some 15 or 20 per cent of crops such as rapeseed is shipped from the prairies to storage elevators in Vancouver, Thunder Bay, Prince Rupert or Churchill, where the grain is cleaned to international specifications. This represents a waste of transportation capacity at a time when railway cars are in short supply, and adds substantially to costs.

As to livestock production, I find that when I speak about agriculture in western Canada people in the east are astonished by how things progress. First we grow calves in B.C., Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and ship them to the eastern provinces. Then we grow feed grains—barley, wheat, etc.—on the prairies and then ship these crops to eastern locations. Farmers in eastern locations then raise calves for beef production using western grain. When one considers the shortage of transportation and the high cost of transportation, this is certainly not an economical process to follow.

I briefly mention the quota aspect of grain production. Under our Canadian system the average increase in wheat yield per acre has only been fractional over the past 25 to 50 years. On the other hand, corn production in the United States under the open market system has increased by four times. The potential for grain production in western Canada has only started. If we were able to optimize productivity by more intensive farming, our production could increase by a factor of two, three or four.

Another area in which the economy has gone awry is in the export of our commodities. Canada over many years has been an exporter of commodities. Why is this so? We ship raw grain, minerals, coal etc. out of Canada when we should be doing the processing and developing our industries, particularly secondary industries, on the prairies.

I would like now to pay attention to my own constituency of St. Boniface where there are many problems, some of which have to do with its particular relationship to the city of Winnipeg. It is also true, as I have heard stated here, that where there are problems there are opportunities. St. Boniface is one of the largest feed and livestock manufacturing areas of western Canada. Why then are we losing some of our meat packing industry to the east? Why is it that although we have some of the cheapest land in Canada for the production of agricultural products, our livestock production is not increasing in the way it should? Why is food production going out of the west where it can be produced at the least cost? The marketing programs required for increased sales and production and getting the food industry in the west progressing the way it should are not in place.

I would like to point to the downtown St. Boniface area which, as many hon. members know, is very close to the downtown area of Winnipeg, joined only by one or two bridges. In the downtown centre of Winnipeg the excavation work for the joining of the four corners of Portage and Main will be completed in but a few weeks. About three or four blocks to the east, in St. Boniface, you cross the bridge and enter into what is almost a slum area. The money which has been put into development has been expended on the west side of the Red River. The St. Boniface area is in great need of development if it is to be brought up to standards of manufacturing which it can attain.

The fact that St. Boniface has historically been the site of the greatest French-Canadian culture of western Canada is not being utilized to the best advantage. The old cathedral of St. Boniface, which was burned a few years ago, has been restored to some extent, but the whole area of St. Boniface, with its French flavour, has not reached the potential of which it is capable. There has to be some development to make St. Boniface truly the centre of French Canadian culture in western Canada.

There are two or three industries in my riding to which I should like to pay attention. One of them has been the object of some interest over the past few years. It is the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. I believe all hon. members know there have been many problems in the management of this operation in the past few years. There has been a good deal of fish spoilage in the accumulation process by the Fish Marketing Corporation, resulting in the loss of many hundreds of thousands of dollars. The fishermen are very unhappy at the prices they are receiving, to the extent that some of them are going around the Fish Marketing Corporation and bringing their fish directly into the city of Winnipeg to sell their product. Pickerell is fetching only $1 per pound, whereas on the open market it is selling at $3 and $4 a pound.

I turn now to an important part of western Canada's income earning capacity—the grain industry. Over the past five or six years we have produced many large railway hopper cars to handle grain transportation in western Canada. When I was involved in the 1974 election campaign the government was in the process of looking at this question of hopper cars, and at that time we made a strong point to utilize the CN yards in Transcona as a location for the manufacture of some of these cars. After all, the grain industry is in the west. The locations of these manufacturers of the grain hopper cars, however, are in Ontario, Quebec, and the maritimes. There should be a manufacturing location in western Canada, such as Transcona, which has all of the facilities. There would certainly be some capital involvement, but it would be an ideal site for such an industry to develop, and would establish a firmer base for the CN railway repair program.

● (1702)

In conclusion, I have presented several aspects of the Canadian economy that require better management. There are many others that I have not brought up, but the budget of last week will not solve many of these problems. This budget, like all the recent budgets, is not based on sane, sensible, business oriented decisions. It is more of an after-the-fact budget with all of its band-aid approaches, when major surgery is required. How much longer can the Canadian people endure the arrogance of the present government? How much longer can we stand the flip-flop thinking, as it primarily relates to maintaining the Liberals in power?

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): By way of an introduction to my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for introducing a budget which, contrary to what some expected and others feared, is a responsible document which reflects the difficult times we are facing, the long term preoccupations in the mind of a minister who does not intend to play tricks on Canadians or make rash promises, the concerns which are based on the extensive consultations which the minister has held with the various levels of activities in Canada, whether with his provincial counterparts, his colleagues in cabinet, the representatives of the money market, the business community, the unions and labour force.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has again taken steps to consult every productive sector within our society with a view to coming up with a document not only outlining the structural and conjunctural problems faced by our Canadian economy, but also guiding the economy and the economic agents in order that they take a better orientation for the better days which could not but come during the next few months and the next few years. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister must be commended heartily for this budget which, as every commentator pointed out, is an honest and responsible budget showing on the part of the government its intention to accomplish serious things with the economy and also its long term concerns, and in that respect I think the minister must be commended for his budget.

Having said that, I should like to transcend the detailed provisions in the budget, although I will refer to them a little later, to deal with a tremendous problem which is of great concern to me as a member from the province of Quebec; it is the endemic difficulties faced by the Quebec economy over the last fifteen years or so as shown by the gradual but persistent decline of Quebec's share in the Canadian economy and particularly in the manufacturing sector. That situation particular to Quebec, even though it can result from more general problems and from the over-all situation of the Canadian economy, might be more difficult to resolve. It will be difficult to remedy those structural deficiencies only through indicative actions, tax legislation or even monetary policies that can be provided in a budget. Indeed, the government, which is well aware of those problems, has undertaken consultations with all levels of economic activity in an attempt to find solutions to those structural problems, and I will return to that point later.

Coming back to the budget itself, I would simply like to say that, contrarily to what some defenders of extreme expansion or some defenders of extreme restrictions say, the economists, those people who were already watching the economic indicators, were fully aware, even before the budget was tabled, that the Minister of Finance was facing a dilemma. On the one hand, his margin was obviously very narrow; and on the other hand, the Economic Council of Canada and other organizations directly involved in economic issues strongly suggested that the government should continue to emphasize expansion through tax legislation.

I should like to refer to the monthly business review published by the Bank of Montreal for the month of October 1978 in which were pointed out the difficulties which the Minister of Finance met magnificently. I quote:

> The government therefore faces a dilemma: a huge dificit, and the need to contain the growth of the money supply in order to resist inflationary pressures, make tax reductions untimely; on the other hand, reducing the tax burden would be desirable to stimulate the economy.

All that to say, Mr. Speaker, that once again the two main opposition parties missed the boat. On the one hand, serving some sort of "pudding" to which we are starting to get used, though I hope Canadians never do, the spokesmen for the official opposition, through an alchemy the recipe for which we have yet to get—and again, I hope they give it to us some day—would like us to both contain expenditures and reduce revenues while stimulating the economy and giving back to private enterprise the role of leader it did not manage to assume in the past; in short, they serve some sort of "pudding" which really defies analysis. Anyway, economic commentators, after the speech of their leader, pointed out all sorts of incongruities which I leave to others the care of analyzing in detail.

On the other hand, we have the spokesmen for the New Democratic Party who, through a turn of mind I cannot fathom either, would have us—and Canadians believe that by stimulating the Canadian economy to death, and in particular, by increasing even more our current budgetary deficit, we could, even over the short term, reduce that deficit within two or three years while at the same time creating employment.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to you, though you surely are aware of it as well as I am, that this government is concerned about the creation of jobs. It has allocated hundreds of millions of dollars to this end, and I fail to see how a policy such as the one advocated by the NDP could cure the cyclical problems on the one hand, since these are often beyond our means of action, and on the other hand, and what's more important, cure the structural problems facing the Canadian economy.

Moreover, I would like once again to point out to members of the opposition that they who are changing their tune according to the fashion of the day and especially according to editorials of the day before, should perhaps take a look at the publication prepared by the Economic Council of Canada and entitled Horizon 1982. This document pointed out a number of objectives the government should examine closely in order to find a remedy to these problems they enumerated and that I mentioned before. In particular, it said, and I quote:

In general, we propose that governments should move rather carefully to maintain adequate growth in aggregate demand, while moving more vigorously to encourage needed structural change through incentives and improved mechanisms for consultation on basic economic issues.

The council then gave some recommendations, concerning in particular international competitiveness, which made the government put a lot of emphasis on the promotion of Canadian products in foreign countries, either by the government itself or through trade missions, sometimes under the chairmanship of government officials but also, as in the case of the recent trade mission to China, under the chairmanship and leadership of Canadian industrialists.

I am surprised that some opposition members have denounced this intensive action undertaken, for example, by the Export Development Corporation, whose role is precisely to encourage the development of foreign markets. This recommendation came from the Economic Council of Canada and I think that the government has followed up well on it.

Industrial adaptation, which was the second recommendation formulated by the council is a problem which, once again, is of concern to many Canadians; it concerns industrial markets and the government, I should say governments, since this issue was the subject of two federal-provincial conferences in less than a year, the one in February and the one held last week, and, as I said, I will come back to this problem which is the main topic of my speech today.

Unemployment was the subject of the third recommendation. While the Economic Council itself recognized that it would be extremely difficult to solve this problem unless we completely mess up the economic equilibrium and promote or create galloping inflation by instituting oversized job-creation mechanisms, this very Economic Council however mentioned some regional unemployment disparities which have to be dealt with. In this regard, I quote again its report:

The problem is rendered more difficult by the uneven pace of regional economic growth and the persistence of chronically high unemployment and underemployment in many areas of the Atlantic provinces and Quebec and in the rural and northern regions of Canada.

[Mr. Lachance.]

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to indicate that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance contains a provision which should allow us to correct some of the deficiencies identified by the Economic Council, particularly regarding the investment tax credit. I would like to congratulate the minister for having done away with that unhealthy attitude which prevented us from basing our fiscal policies on regional disparities and for having at last allowed for an investment tax credit taking into account the needs of the various areas of the country. These new investments eligible for tax credit generate jobs, and they do; according to the recommendations of the Economic Council this new tax credit will be raised from its present 10 per cent to 20 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and in the Gaspé Peninsula and, under the Regional Development Incentives subsidies will rise from 7.5 per cent to 10 per cent in other designated areas and from 5 per cent to 7 per cent in the other regions.

Mr. Speaker, I think this measure will have very important repercussions on the expansion in those regions that in the past for various reasons did not enjoy the same growth rate as other regions of the country.

I could go on enumerating the recommendations made by the Economic Council of Canada in the publication Horizon 1982 and we would come to the conclusion that, although this council is of course only one adviser to the federal government among many others, it took into consideration views from experts, and without indulging into the excesses suggested on the opposition side whether by the New Democratic Party or by the Progressive Conservative party, succeeded in giving the Canadian economy this growth rate, which, while being clearly slower than expected, brought along an increase in employment which was not sufficient but which was greater than in any other OECD country and could partly dampen the rate of inflation. Members on the opposition side always convey the bad news. I shall simply refer once again to the businesses review of the Bank of Montreal, the document I quoted from earlier which gives the good news for the last few months and which stated in particular that while the rate of unemployment is relatively stable because of the constant increase in inputs, there was a job creation rate of more than 3.5 per cent, which is a very high increase. There was a drop of 1 per cent in the price of food, the over-all index has remained stable since October, the number of housing starts increased to a yearly rate of 225,000, industrial production went up by 1.1 per cent in July, a very high yearly rate of 14 per cent, which brought the index up by at least 5.4 per cent, and so on.

● (1722)

Is this the example of a government announcing the failure of our economy, or rather is this the result of the progressive and reasonable initiatives taken by the government in the last several years to try to make the best out of a situation which is very difficult since it affects the whole world, and more particularly all the industrialized countries? To illustrate this point, I shall simply say that it is not for nothing that the prime ministers of all these countries have gone through the trouble of meeting three times now to attempt to find solutions to these problems, which are not national in scope, but rather international.

Having said this, I would now like to talk about the economic situation in Quebec. As an introduction, I would like to quote a very short article by Michel Bélanger, the president and chief executive of the Provincial Bank of Canada, which was published in February 1978 in the publication Commerce. Here is what he said:

The Quebec economy is vulnerable.

The Quebec economy, which is an integral part of the Canadian economy, has evolved more or less at the same pace and its over-all growth this year will probably be about the same as the national average. Of course, we have the same problems as every other area of Canada and our weaknesses are more of a structural nature. The important role of labour intensive consumer goods industries, which are particularly sensitive to wage increases, makes the Quebec economy vulnerable to international market conditions, because to the pressures exerted by labour costs must be added the effect of the lowering of customs duties in accordance with the liberalization of exchange. This is why there have been many layoffs in these sectors.

Mr. Speaker, this problem is very serious, because when we refer to the soft sectors about which there has been a lot of talk recently, especially in view of the problems caused by the provincial sales tax reduction, we are speaking about those sectors which are directly affected on the one hand by the tariff barriers, and on the other hand by the increase in production unit costs, and I am thinking about the textile, clothing, footwear and furniture industries, which play such an important role in the economy of Quebec that if they disappear, hundreds of thousands of jobs will be directly affected.

Mr. Speaker, you will certainly remember that recently, in June 1978, the Economic Council of Canada published a study entitled: Study of Canada relations with developing countries with the following subtitle: For a common future. This is a very disturbing document as it predicts for our future, and not really in the short term but rather in the long term, that those same sectors I just mentioned might soon, in a quickly developed economy like Canada, become a burden that we shall have to carry everywhere in our exchanges with our partners, in multilateral negotiations, in the distribution of investment incentives for Canadian purposes, at the research and development level, and that because of the very nature of those labour intensive industries and also the fact that in developing countries those industries are given the priority as the cost of labour, the production factor, is lower there than in Canada, those industries might considerably suffer from a general industrial development policy on a world wide or Canadian scale and, particularly, in the general context of tariff barriers and tariff reductions.

The Council recommended in that study that:

The federal government should inject a large amount in an industrial adjustment program undertaken in cooperation with concerned provinces, particularly Quebec and Ontario.

Secondly, upon the improvement of the economic situation that might be defined for instance on the basis of an established national unemployment rate level—Canada would phase out the special protection (special quotas and other quantitative restraints on importations) given to vulnerable industries.

Under these two simple recommendations lies a structural revolution of Quebec's economy which has not been matched in recent Canadian history and in that province itself. We are in fact talking about more than 150,000 jobs and the council spoke then about a fund of more than $3 billion which represents a considerable amount of money which had probably prompted the Economic Council to speak then of a healthier economic situation. Without necessarily sharing the views of the council which was taking as its underlying philosophy that in a world scale developmental context more chances would have to be given to the developing countries to build their own economy and to take their place under the sun and that consequently Canada had to give these countries that opportunity by gradually withdrawing from this market in order to concentrate rather on high technology industries, without necessarily completely sharing this philosophy, I repeat, I still consider that very soon, in spite of the fact that preliminary studies have been carried out, and I will come back on that topic, Canada will have to tackle the issue of progressive transfer of resources and means of production of those industries to high technology industries. In order to do so, there will have to be a very strong political will behind this move and there will have to be an understanding on the part of all parties concerned, be they the federal government, the provincial governments and obviously the industry itself. The other Canadian provinces which are less concerned by this problem will have to accept that considerable Canadian resources be rechannelled in order to help in the progressive transfer of the means of production of these industries toward higher technology oriented industries. In short there will have to be a national effort which will require a great resolve on the part of governments concerned.

That moment is getting nearer and nearer. In fact, under the GATT agreement negotiations have taken place to review the whole tariff structure. We have succeeded, Mr. Speaker, in protecting this time again the soft sectors of our industry. The question is whether we will be able to do it in the future when the pressure will become greater on the part of the developing nations on one side and on the other side mainly on the part of the high technology oriented Canadian industries which are now witnessing a drain in their resources and have to face a tariff burden a lot heavier because of these various industries which are asking for a tariff protection which is already very high. I am therefore only raising this issue in order now to deal with what is beginning to happen, what is becoming a common understanding of the different levels of government and what will soon become a more articulated policy.

At the federal-provincial conference in February last, the premiers agreed to ask the federal government to undertake sectoral studies dealing with the main economic activities in Canada. Those 23 studies have enabled us to publish a recent report dated October 15, the so-called Second Tier Report. I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that we find in those 23 studies 850 recommendations directed either to the federal government or the provinces and even private entreprise and what is still more interesting, those studies are not merely administrative analyses made by officials, but rather serious concerted efforts of all economic agencies. When the government is accused of doing nothing for the Canadian economy, I am rather shocked that such falsehoods are scattered everywhere.

When we know the government in less than eight or nine months set up 23 multidisciplinary task forces, Mr. Speaker, forced the 23 task forces to submit a report, the recommendations in that report were studied by an over-all committee which submitted a report, when we know that since then there has been a second federal-provincial conference of ministers of industry, is that the mark of a government that is dragging its feet? I cannot believe that! It is rather the mark of a government striving to try and solve the structural problems faced by our Canadian economy.

And we will have to go further that way. Some 450 recommendations were aimed at the national government. A number of them have already been implemented, after a mere few weeks. For example, announcements were made concerning the reduction of red tape. Recommendations concerning research and development are already included in the budget put forward by the Minister of Finance. Fiscal measures were implemented in the same budget concerning both pulp and paper industry and mining. All those recommendations stem from the 23 sectoral studies.

At the same federal-provincial conference, whose thrust was reporting progress, the provinces received the mandate of implementing 200 recommendations in their own jurisdiction. Finally, and perhaps most importantly, private industry itself now has a guideline, because its representatives on the committees developed nearly 200 recommendations to improve productivity and efficiency. And over and above that, Mr. Speaker, I believe we must now to some degree address ourselves to the long term.

If this is a serious effort at restructuring the admittedly ailing Canadian economy, because we never stopped to examine it during the last decades, and my contention is that for the first time a serious effort was made last year to make a general diagnosis of the economy, if we are serious we will have to set up a super-ministry of the economy. We will have to do as the Europeans did after World War II when, faced with the ruins of a devastating war and the prospect of seeing the old pre-war habits set foot again, people with vision like Jean Monnet and others decided it was time for a new departure in the European economy. We have seen that in France, for example, the planning board and other similar bodies have established a system where consultation with various economic agents has been institutionalized in order to modernize the European economy. This is what we need in Canada, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we are not in the same case as Europeans in 1945, 1946 and 1947 who were left in the midst of ruins and rubble.

We have an economy which still works relatively well. But must we wait for this economy to crumble down before taking action or should it not be wiser to detect immediately the cracks, and indeed if we find some faults in this economy why not consolidate immediately the foundations of our industry? I think we should rather follow the second path, Mr. Speaker, as we have seen in the work which has already been done by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce during the federal-provincial conferences which have taken place in February and November, with its various task forces and particularly at all levels of economic activity, at first and second levels. What we need is to carry on acting together and aim at a common goal, in an over-all effort of restructuration.

With this super ministry of the economy, let us call it that way, we could call it a sort of planification board, owing to this super ministry of the economy, Mr. Speaker, we would be able to give an over-all direction and to help various economic agents co-ordinate their efforts which would give our Canadian economy a sound basis for the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Before recognizing an other hon. member, I would like to inform the House of the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTERS OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government and the revised amendment of Mr. Stevens (p. 1249).

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be words of congratulation to the preceding speaker. Over the years I have heard many speeches in this House, some good and a lot more not so good. Let me say that the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) has demonstrated what should be a lesson to a good many of us. His speech showed that he had been doing some reading of the Economic Council of Canada reports, the Bank of Montreal reports, and ITC task force reports. Above all, it showed that he had done some thinking about them and reduced that thinking to some positive ideas and directions that the government should take. On behalf of the ordinary member of parliament I should like to express my appreciation. I think the hon. member is a credit to his constituency and to his father who preceded him.

I should also like to remark on the opening speech of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare). He is a man with considerable experience in business and trade in the west. He, too, has brought out some of the problems people there are facing. I think he is going to make a contribution to the factual input that has to go into the policies of any government. I think the country is being well served by the calibre of members who have come to this House in the last few years.

Recently, a very able and experienced man by the name of William Simon, who was secretary treasurer of the United States under President Nixon and President Ford, wrote a book called "It is Time to Tell the Truth". I should like to recommend it to everyone in Canada. It is a terrible indictment of politicians, civil servants, bankers, newspapers, the electronic media—he names names and is careful to name each one who is honest and who speaks up for the truth, just as he names those who do not. I recommend the book to all Canadians. What he describes in his own country, the United States, applies with devastating truth to the current situation in Canada.

There are people in this country who are trying to tell the truth; there are many more in high places who are not. Some of these people are genuinely, sincerely ignorant. Some are unable to remove themselves from the partisanship of their party. Some are smart and know what is happening, but are frightened to express different views from the current mythology of their profession. To me, these people are no longer intellectuals but are part of a brown-nosed pyramid seeking to ooze their way up in this pyramid, to win places of power and prestige. My parliamentary word for this latter group is "nit-wits".

Last week one more instance of this sad sickness that has such a hold on some of our senior civil servants, was demonstrated. On Friday, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) delivered his budget speech. I should like to quote from page 13 of that prepared speech as follows:

> I have also concluded that it is essential to amend the Income Tax Act to change the treatment of income debentures and term preferred shares.

That means nothing to 99.9 per cent of us. What a mess it is. The quotation continues:

> These securities are currently treated as equities for tax purposes, even though they are essentially debt obligations. As a result, income earned on such securities by banks and other financial institutions is tax-exempt. For the most part they are used for the financing of a relatively small number of multinational and large Canadian corporations. Their use has resulted in a very substantial loss of revenues to the federal and provincial governments. This has been of concern not just to me but also to my provincial colleagues.

When you think that statement through, Mr. Speaker, and realize the significance of what lies under it, you find that, in plain terms, there was an inequitable tax loophole for large corporations that the government was plugging.

The minister tells us that the government has had this under consideration for some period of time, yet, during that time a deputy minister sat on a board of directors of a large commercial company while it was arranging a massive rip-off of the public treasury. His responsibility was to sit on the board of that company and protect the public interest, yet all he did was report to the government that this scheme was being hatched and helped the minister get it approved by the government before the budget was introduced.

They even went further and put words into the minister's mouth to make absolutely sure that the new budget would not apply to this company now in the top big ten of the oil industry in Canada.

● (1742)

And again at page 13 of the minister's budget speech he said:

> The proposed amendments will generally apply to any such securities issued after tonight. They will not apply to issues outstanding or committed. Nor will they affect the tax treatment of common and ordinary preferred shares.

What reads as an innocent statement in the budget is the amount of truth which the government is giving to the people of Canada on how long it took them to plug this rip-off of the public treasury and the taxpayers. At the same time that it was planning to stop this loophole, representatives sat down with members of a commercial company, including a high-placed official from the board of directors, and planned to hold the budget up until this plan went through. How can one find a parliamentary word to describe that type of game?

An hon. Member: It could have been retroactive.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) would not want to indicate something that indeed was wrong. The minister made it quite clear that his decision regarding budget matters was finalized on Saturday morning. There are many commercial transactions going on all over the country—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the parliamentary secretary interfered because he ties himself up with this horrible thing that has happened, this immorality. The minister is an honest man, and in this whole thing he appears as a cuckold. If you do not understand that word, look it up in the dictionary. It is parliamentary. The deputy minister was exposed by his minister as being one or more of the following: (a) incompetent; (b) disloyal to the principles of the government; or (c) carrying improper orders from the government. Which one of those things he is I do not know, but that is enough. Neither the minister nor his parliamentary secretary should insult this country by saying they are protecting the secrecy of the budget. Any competent civil servant knows how to delay matters if the government does not want something done when it is against the public interest. If that civil servant is protecting the public interest, he could suggest all sorts of devices, such as committee meetings, or other delays until after the budget is over.

It is time to tell the truth, Mr. Speaker. The government knew that this tax loophole was there and it was not in the public interest. It was planning to plug the loophole, and yet at the same time it was planning and working to perpetrate a scheme on hard-pressed taxpayers. It ordered that the shareholders of Pacific Petroleums be paid off at $20 a share above market price. Heaven knows that the PC party has tried for years to have Canadians own the majority of shares in all Canadian companies.

We have our policies ready, but never, never did we plan to ask Canadians to pay more than the market price of any shares. We appreciated foreign investment when we needed it. But as Conservatives, we did not like foreign investors so much that we would ask Canadians to pay 50 per cent more for shares than they are worth. Phillips Petroleum, the U.S.A. company, must be laughing all the way to the bank on this one.

This type of immorality makes it difficult to show any form of charity to this government. The Minister of Finance knows that over the years some of us—and I include myself—have tried very hard to do the same thing as the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont did, and that is to give him evidence that there are other sources of authority besides these nit-wits who advise the Minister of Finance to do these horrible things to our country and to the people of this land. As the minister knows, when we debated Bill C-7 about a month ago, I put on the record for the umpteenth time that we were suffering not from a demand-pull type of inflation which is sending the prices up, but from cost-push inflation. I listed the causes, as I have done many times in the House. First is the cost of government, second, the increase of the money supply. If one charts the increase it will be found that it corresponds exactly with rising prices. Third, are the interest rates. I can recall when 3½ per cent and 4 per cent was looked on as high interest rate by the government. The bank rate has now risen from 7 per cent to 10.75 per cent in the last few months. Land costs around our cities are forcing up prices so that the worker has to ask for more and more money just to buy a home.

Labour-management confrontation is a tremendous cost to the country. We borrow obsolete techniques to work out difficulties between labour and management. Everybody suffers, particularly the consumer. Another example which I gave in my speech a month ago is the lack of fundamental knowledge which advisers to the government have of how to utilize this great opportunity which the financial system of the world gives to Canada at this hour, namely, the fluctuating value of the dollar. It is our system of helping a country that has gone down, for whatever reason, to get up and get going again. Instead of letting this force work, we have these nitwits in Washington and Ottawa advising their respective governments to put up interest rates, and, in the case of Canada, to borrow abroad and join a gambling game on the value of our exchange.

I was looking at an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail the other day. This paper used to represent the business section of Canada. The headline reads "Chrétien's paranoia". I do not know whether or not that term is parliamentary. This is the minister's paranoia with regard to the exchange rate. It is not Chrétien's paranoia. A lawyer from Shawinigan does not pay much attention to the exchange rate. He has been taken in by these people who look at the exchange rate as simply something that is causing bad headlines, not realizing that the exchange rate is the way the system works to help any country out of its trouble.

It means to our exporters of basic materials and finished materials that they should get out into the market and balance the international balance for us. This is the elementary truth. This country is not weak, it is strong, but for a group of nit-wits putting on the brakes every time the country tries to get out of its trouble, and we were coming out of our trouble these last six months.

The government did not listen to the Economic Council of Canada and all its recommendations over the last five years to move away from the type of budgeting it was following to potential budgeting. The country was still trying to get up and get going. For five years we have been at a stagnation level.

The floating dollar is the best system, under the present world financial system, to help countries like Canada out of their trouble. Instead, we are borrowing money, undertaking obligations abroad, and raising the interest rates because the Americans are raising interest rates. This is bad. First, it interferes with the forces at work that would save us. Second, it is a beautiful chance for the speculators to make money hand over fist out of the Canadian people.

Years ago we thought that an exchange fund would help us stabilize our money and help us get over these dips in our economy. However, that was when dips in the economy were only there for a few months. Now the dips have been there for four or five years.

When you have been gambling on your own exchange, you are not gambling with a few guys buying and selling your dollars. You are gambling against all the Euro dollars of the world, all the money that the multinationals have floating around looking for quick profits. You are gambling against the $100 billion to $200 billion in petro dollars. There is no way we can compete with that. We should have learned that 15 or 18 years ago when we were clobbered in 1962 with just a small sum of Euro dollars.

It is horrible to sit and watch a country make the same mistake twice, but it is the same nit-wits giving advice now as then. I wish to give hon. members some idea in figures of how large is this liability in our world trade, including tangible and intangible items. It is over $100 billion a year. In most business transactions, the terms are for 30, 60, 90, 180 and sometimes 210 days.

The biggest racket in the world today is to live and profit on the other person's nickel. Translated into business terms, that means delaying making your payments for as long as possible and hoping the other guy will pay his debts to you as quickly as possible. Vice versa, if we pay as quickly as possible, and our debtors take as long as possible to repay us, there is a long period of liability. I wish to show how big that is.

If our total trade is $100 billion and our trade deals are on a 30-day basis, in mathematical terms you have a $10 billion liability at any given moment of buying and selling dollars. Suppose the average length of time for a transaction settlement were 90 days, the hypothetical liability would be roughly one quarter, or $25 billion. More and more people are going for 180 days. Arithmetically, the liability then is $50 billion.

Even a little country like Canada, with its trade figure of around $100 billion a year, using a hypothetical example, cannot begin, with a $5 billion or $10 billion reserve fund, to cope with these tremendous demands that might occur if you take the widest extremes in the terms of trade.

This is known to Germany. They had their currency raided, as did France and Italy. The United Kingdom had its currency raided over and over again. The United States could not stand up. Why should Canada try to get into this type of racket? Other nations have experienced the reality.

I am not going to be entirely negative. I can recommend certain corrective actions. First, all these nations are aware of our trouble. The conference at Bonn illustrated that. Why not do the practical thing and establish bilateral defensive agreements with each one of our trading partners roughly equivalent to our potential liability in trade between our two countries? If you did that with your four or five main trading partners, you would not have to worry too much if there were a shortage one way or another in the daily demand on the respective currencies.

The second proposal regards export taxes. If you do a study of the export taxes applied to Japanese, European, Canadian, American and other goods, you will find that our exports are carrying a bigger load of tax on their back going into the markets than do those of our competitors, such as Germany, for example. I suggest that we as a government should guarantee unilaterally to our exporters that our tax load on them will be no greater than the Japanese exporter has to bear, that they will at least compete equally, and thus we will destroy this temporary great imbalance in trade in our respective countries.

Third, we should keep our domestic costs down, which is similar to saying you are for motherhood.

Fourth, there should be new types of trade institutions. It is 14 years since I stood up on this side of the House and proposed a list of six different types of new trade institutions to grapple with the problem that I foresaw with the coming great increase in world trade. It would be worthwhile for serious young members of this House to read that speech made in October, 1964.

Fifth, Canada, above all nations, should be pushing very hard for an international unit of exchange. There used to be a member in this parliament years ago, now deceased, who belonged to the New Democratic Party. He was the first person I ever heard talk about this in this House. He was talking about it 20 years ago, and he was right.

Since that time we have had the special drawing rights which are a step forward. However, until all the nations of the world accept the fact that they have to put all their business into one house, have a unit of exchange which is worldwide, get rid of the dollar exchange, sterling exchange, and other national currencies, we will be in trouble. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for the recess I was putting before the House a number of corrective measures which could be used in substitution for these costly and, I am afraid, fatal techniques of borrowing abroad and using the interest rate as a method of protecting our dollar.

I listed the bilateral defence arrangements between our natural trading partners and I put down as number two on my list the equality of taxes on Canadian exports as opposed to those of our trading partners. The third was the need to keep down domestic costs—and the fourth was the new type of trade institutions, which was very important and which deserves a speech by itself. Fifth, I was just starting to talk about the special drawing rights or international unit of exchange. This is not a new idea, as all the quantitative analysis of the major 20 industrial countries in the last 20 years indicates. There is no currency available to the trading nations sufficient to carry the weight of all this huge world trade, and Canada in particular and all the other trading nations in general should join together to push for an international unit of exchange in the next two or three years.

The sixth corrective action could be taken if we faced up to reality and told the people of the world the truth—that all the high hopes we had during the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade, using the obsolete tariff techniques, have ended in failure. We have developed into a rich man's club, handing out a few crumbs to the poor countries standing at the gate. Without going into that any further at this time, I would like to say I have tried on several occasions over the last 14 years to put forward a constructive theory which I call growth rate exchange. It has been used in several instances. It was used in the steel community in Europe. It was used in the automobile agreement here between Canada and the United States. I think this is the technique which we should be employing in product after product so that there is real equality in bargaining power between the nations with certain resources they are trading off by growth rate exchanges.

The final point I wish to make in the last minutes remaining to me concerns interest rates. The government is paranoid on this score, believing firmly that it must protect the dollar by using the device of raising interest rates since this will be better for the country than letting the dollar float freely. They are frightened because if the dollar goes down one point—one cent—cost of living in Canada will go up one-tenth of a point. So it takes a change of ten cents in the international value of our dollar before our cost of living goes up 1 per cent. But if you look at the comparative cost with which interest burdens this country, you realize once again, under this correlative analysis approach to all capital intensive enterprises, be it buying a home or a farm or building a $2 billion enterprise, that 75 per cent of the cost at present interest rates is made up of interest charges and that if you increase those interest costs by 50 per cent, as we have done in the last eight months, you add on to the cost of producing goods in Canada much more than you add on to the cost of goods bought by consumers through a drop in the international value of our dollar. The proportions are immense and amount to many billions of dollars over the cost to this nation in a one-year period.

I cannot develop this theme at great length at this time but I am simply saying, as bluntly and as candidly as I can, that to move along the road of raising interest rates as a device to keep our dollar from dropping is going to be costly for the people of Canada over the next year or so. And please God we can get out of this suicidal mania we have for using this technique which does so much harm to the people of this country, not only with respect to their cost of living but also to their ability to compete with trade rivals all over the world.

Interest costs are going to be much greater than the cost of letting the dollar float freely. The advantages of letting the dollar float freely are that you get rid of speculators because they speculate one against the other—they do not speculate very much, they stabilize the dollar for you—and you do not interfere with the great forces which exist in a free society of correlations, helping a nation that has a currency which is below the usual level to get on its feet again. I cannot emphasize that point too much.

In conclusion, I have tried here to put forward, on top of my criticism of the government and its advisers, my view that the use of the road of interest rates and borrowing abroad is going to be very hard on our economy over the next few months.

● (2012)

I predict that if we get these interest rates off our back within the next year, the dollar will come to about 90 cents through the very efforts being made by our producers to sell abroad and to produce goods at home. I predict that industries such as forestry, mining and the valued added industries, will all join in that growth. This is the way the minister could balance his budget and get rid of the deficits.

For five years now we have been in this stagnation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I had just completed my last sentence, but I would like to repeat it loud and clear. I would predict that if we prevent interest rates from rising for another six or eight months, the economy will stage a recovery, after five years of stagnation, and that by the end of this coming year our currency will achieve an international value of 90 cents. I believe that this is about the best level for our dollar for the best operation of our system at the present time. There would be more people working, more tax revenues coming into the coffers of the government, and it would alleviate our deficits abroad and at home.

This type of proposal is not without some merit or rational support in the economic analysis which I have given in my speech. I know that it is too late now for the government to change this budget, but I do hope that in the budget they must now be preparing for next spring, the government will not push our economy too hard and will give us a chance to live and to let this country do the job for which it is well prepared and which it is willing to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): My first remark tonight, Mr. Speaker, is one of congratulation to my colleague, the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston). I thought that his speech yesterday in the budget debate was not only one of the best speeches by a new member, but certainly one of the better speeches I have heard in this House. He is a welcome addition to this place.

I would like to indicate now my support for the budget, for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the government's fiscal policy. It is an extremely responsible budget and one that will be beneficial to the economy over the medium and long term. I am one of those who are of the opinion that what is required at the present time is confidence in the economy and the business sector. I believe that this relates to the stability of the dollar, which I am pleased to see has occurred to some extent in recent days.

I do not think that the dollar would be in its present state of stability if the Minister of Finance had adopted some of the suggestions put forth by the opposite side for large spending programs resulting in a large increase to the deficit, which would have made the problem to which the previous speaker referred much worse.

The budget was consistent with what has been a relatively long period of government fiscal policy in this direction, which started with the Macdonald budget in March, 1977, through three budgets brought down by the present Minister of Finance. It is consistent with the initiatives taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on August 1, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott), research and development under the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) and the consensus drawn from the premiers across Canada. I would also like to mention in that regard the very excellent work done by the member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) in putting together many of the initiatives which have found their way into government policy.

I would like to contrast that consistent approach to fiscal responsibility with some of the comments we have heard from the opposite side since this debate began. I read the press, and have been in the places across this country where members from the official opposition have been speaking on the banquet circuit. They have been making comments which are really quite detrimental in terms of the kinds of cuts they would advocate. They have been talking about slashing the public service on the one hand, and on the other they come into this House and plead almost daily for more spending and that none of these programs be cut. Indeed, this afternoon, in a committee of this House which I attended, I believe all of the speakers from the opposite side wanted the ministry involved to restore all of the cuts which have taken place. I cannot understand how they can argue for significant cuts, and then as soon as they are applied, join hands and argue it should not happen.

I would like to contest some of the comments made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I do not think that he intended to mislead the House, but I believe he did take some liberty in some of the viewpoints he put forward. By carefully edging around some hard facts and accusations, he may have left impressions which I think should not stand on the record. He indicated there may have been some patronage associated with the farming out to the private sector of research, and that this government may have destroyed the initiatives taken by the Diefenbaker government in research and development. He also took insupportable positions in terms of the growth of the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office. I would like to draw hon. members' attention to some of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition as reported in yesterday's Hansard at page 1287. He is talking there about patronage in terms of farming work out rather than doing the job within the public service. It reads:

> First of all, there has been a very insignificant cut, certainly not as significant as is possible, in the practice of contracting out. This is a very dangerous practice, dangerous to our system of government because it allows a government that wants to, to get around the protection against patronage, to get around the protection against incompetence that is built into the Public Service Commission—

Further on he says:

> It is also very, very clear that there has been an immense capacity for abuse not only of spending but of controls to ensure that there is protection against patronage. That capacity was there, and I suggest that if this was a government that was very seriously concerned about practising restraint we would have had some significant cuts in the practice of contracting out.

If the Leader of the Opposition is alleging that there is patronage associated with the contracting out policies of the government, then he should be very specific and bring forward instances, rather than make comments such as that. Just prior to making that comment, Hansard reports him as saying:

> —proposals such as the phasing out of forestry stations, the phasing out of weather ships on the west coast, the phasing out of weather forecasting which could have meant a matter of life and death in the province of my colleague from St. John's.

The Leader of the Opposition complains about lack of restraint, and when the government restraint program does wash across some of these other areas which have been handed over to the private sector, he raises a similar type of complaint. I am surprised that he would take such a strong stand against the private sector.

He made another comment yesterday, and it may be that he did not consult the public accounts for the past year or, the supplementary estimates for 1978-79. I am referring to the ludicrous charge he made that spending on the Privy Council office increased by 86 per cent in the first six months of this year over the first six months of last year. He also stubbornly maintained that the Privy Council office and the Prime Minister's office had hired respectively 80 and 54 new people last year. When this baseless accusation was first made in this House a couple of weeks ago by, I believe, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the Leader of the Opposition must have either been away, not listening, or maybe both, because at that time it was explained that budgets and expenditures are compared on a yearly basis, not just a half yearly basis. That was brought to the attention of the House in the response of the Prime Minister to the question raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). According to the public accounts for last year, the total expenditures for the Privy Council office, if services provided by other departments are included, amounted to approximately $26.5 million. According to the blue book of Estimates and Supplementary Estimates A, the comparable figure for this year would be approximately $28 million. That is an increase just under 6 per cent, not 86 per cent. How on earth can a person who is asking the country for confidence in him come up with 86 per cent rather than the correct figure of 6 per cent?

Perhaps I can shed some light on this matter. The cost of various bodies not in any way part of the Privy Council office are charged to the budget of PCO. These bodies include the Canadian Inter-Governmental Secretariat, the Chief Electoral Officer, the Commissioner of Official Languages, the Economic Council of Canada, and the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Surely there is no lack of understanding, on this point, for when he compared the figures for the first six months of this year to those for the first six months of last year, the hon. member for York-Simcoe indicated that he referred strictly to the day to day operating expenses of the Privy Council. A comparison of these figures—not forgetting that such comparison is really spurious—shows that there were substantial increases and entirely new expenditures which had nothing to do with the operating cost of the Privy Council Office, even though they are charged to the PCO in the public accounts. However, the hon. member would have us believe that these expenditure items show an outrageous growth in the size of the Privy Council office. Items which had nothing to do with the operating cost of PCO were the Task Force on Canadian Unity, the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability, the commission of inquiry concerning certain activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the office of the Special Representative for Constitutional Development in the Northwest Territories, the Northern Pipeline Agency, and the Institute of Research on Public Policy. Some of these items did not appear in the expenditures for the first six months of last year. Also, we might add a billing of approximately $1 million for the Canada Gazette in the first half of this year rather than the last half of 1977-78.

The only item which shows any substantial increase in the first six months of this year, and which might properly be called an operating expense, is salaries and wages. That increase was approximately $600,000 or an increase of 10 per cent over the first six months of 1977-78. The increase was 10 per cent, not 86 per cent. What was the reason for that increase? It was attributable largely to the establishment of the Office of Unity Co-ordination which is now in place.

This brings me to the second unaccountable error in the comments of the hon. Leader of the Opposition yesterday. Perhaps it was not an error; I could have misunderstood him. I thought he said that last year the PCO had taken on 80 new people, and that the Prime Minister's Office hired an additional 54. Actually, there are 90 man-years in the Prime Minister's office today, which was the case last year. In fact, there has been no change and no increase whatever in the last three or four years in the number of positions in PMO. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition counts the people going in, but does not count those coming out. Surely he should be sincere enough to say that only the people on staff at any one time should be included in a calculation.

As I have indicated already, in the period under comparison there was an increase of 22 man-years in the federal-provincial relations office. Under a Conservative government part of the costs associated with that office could be charged directly to the provinces. A similar increase would not be required since it would be necessary for the provinces to hire quite a number of people in order to handle all areas of federal jurisdiction which would be transferred to the provinces.

We should be much more optimistic in our outlook on the economy than we have been. Daily I have listened to questions raised by opposition members during oral question period. Also, I have read their comments in the press, as well as comments made during speaking engagements. On listening and reading these comments, one would get the impression that the economy of Canada is in desperate shape. But since the time the OPEC nations advanced the price of petroleum by a factor of approximately four, which dramatically influenced the economies of all countries if not of every individual, Canada is the only industrialized country with no negative growth.

[Mr. Milne.]

We have heard repeatedly that our economy is not doing as well as the economies of other countries. However, I should like to point out that the United States had two years of negative growth since 1973; Japan and Germany, which many people draw to the attention of the House as economies to be envied, had one year of negative growth, and the United Kingdom had three years of negative growth. Also, in that period the gross national product of Canada grew in real terms by more than 12.5 per cent. Only Japan has a record which can come close to that.

A significant number of members have talked about our good record in job creation which is not equalled by any other industrialized country. I do not mean to imply that our unemployment rate is satisfactory, but surely we must give credence to the fact that more new jobs per thousand people have been created in Canada than in any other country. As a matter of fact, Canada is the only country which has had no decline in employment over the past four or five years.

When one compares Canada to other OECD nations, our economy rates three points above that of the United States and eight points above that of Japan. Last year Canada achieved an all-time record by creating over one-third of a million jobs. If I were to take issue with the Minister of Finance on any point, it would be that his prediction in the budget of one-quarter of a million new jobs in the coming year is perhaps too low. When one looks at the expansion of the work force in Canada, one sees that it has increased at the rate of approximately 2.7 per cent annually. The United States average was less than half of ours, or 1.3 per cent; in Japan it was 1.4 per cent; and in Europe, only Sweden had a rate of less than 1 per cent. The labour force in Germany is smaller today than it was in 1970; it dropped from 26 million to 24.5 million. We should acknowledge that more people are working today than ever before. That is true in my constituency, and I am sure it is true in virtually every constituency across Canada.

We should be proud of the fact that our economy can absorb the new people who want to come into the labour force, many of whom are second and third wage earners in households. It is understandable that so many of these people want to enter the work force. During a high inflationary period, people have rising expectations. When the economy levels off somewhat, it is difficult for them to satisfy their expectations or indeed to meet them. Thus, more second and third wage earners in households are entering the labour force. The problem would be substantial if the economy were not able to absorb these large numbers of people.

While the number of people who are unable to become attached to the work force is high, I think it is good we have been able to absorb the number we have absorbed. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) put on public record some two or three weeks ago that for the period 1965 to 1977, on a comparative basis, we had about 146 people in Canada working in 1977 for every 100 working in 1965. That compares with 130 in Australia and 128 in the United States. However, in most other industrialized countries the size of the work force has changed very little. In fact, as I said a minute ago, in the case of West Germany, the size of the work force in 1977 was actually smaller than it was in 1965. I think we should be fairly optimistic in those terms.

I do not want to deal entirely in statistics, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to refer the House and people interested in the economy to the Toronto Star of Monday, November 20, specifically to an article in the financial section headlined "Money and markets". It contains the comment that considerably more growth in the economy is expected in 1979. Let me summarize what the author of that article indicates. Jobs in Canada will increase by at least 4 per cent, which I think is low; I feel our growth rate will be more in line with the prediction of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). That article predicts on a comparable basis that growth in the United Kingdom will be about 3.3 per cent; in the United States, 3.6 per cent; in France, 2.7 per cent; and in West Germany, 3.5 per cent. Again, when you look at those countries you will see they make up the majority of the stronger industrialized countries, yet none of them will have growth that will compare with Canada's, if these figures are accurate.

The other point I want to put on the record as strongly as I can is my support for some of the structural items in this budget. It seems to me the budget supports, as have previous budgets, efforts to become more self-sufficient in food and, more important, to become even more self-sufficient in energy, and to support and advance the position of the manufacturing sector which, if one looks at the creation of jobs, is without question the greatest creator of jobs whenever there is expansion.

It seems to me what we have is a country blessed with a tremendous number of resources. We have probably the most highly educated work force in the world. We have support policies that have come in through this government in the past two or three years, particularly in terms of support for small business and a better tax position for business in general. In fact, the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business now suggests that perhaps business in this country, particularly small business, has as good or a better tax position than any other country.

We have a research and development policy which I do not think many other countries can equal. Our labour rates, thanks to the kind of policy that has been followed in the past three years by this government, would indicate now that the increase in labour costs is growing much more slowly than in the United States. We have a dollar which gives us a real advantage in terms of exports.

I commend the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) for giving leadership in his sectoral reports. If people have not read the consensus of those reports, I suggest it is worth their while to do so, because it really indicates for the first time that there has been a very substantive meeting of minds between business leaders in this country and some of the leaders of the larger unions. It is significant in this regard that when they came and sat around the table, after some initial difficulty, the business people were not asking for more support, more subsidies and higher tariffs, and labour was not asking for raises that would endanger the well-being of employers. They were looking at where the strengths of this country are and how they could best maximize them.

In terms of the energy situation, I think I should refer back to Mr. Macdonald's budget of two years ago in May by which resource exploration was allowed as a 100 per cent cost write-off. This was the beginning of a pretty important policy which has resulted in a fairly significant increase in the inventory of energy we have available to us today.

I am anxiously awaiting, as I am sure other hon. members are, the National Energy Board report, because I think it will probably show that we have improved remarkably our inventory position of natural gas and oil.

I would think the measure in this budget to allow a better tax benefit for mining development costs will have a very important effect on the tar sands. I take it, from what I have been able to understand, that this measure will apply to the tar sands. The tar sands will be defined as a mining operation, and I certainly think it should be.

As a matter of fact, the materials handling aspect of the Syncrude plant will move more material in one year than all other mines in Canada put together. This is an enormous mining operation. What we need is a good deal more development in the tar sands. Surely with this type of incentive, the private sector will be encouraged even more to participate.

It would seem that if we are to meet the kind of energy needs that we will face in this country in the future, we should be hearing the announcement of the start of a new tar sands plant every three years. When you consider that they require in the neighbourhood of a $3 billion or $4 billion investment, you will see that this will certainly require the assembling of a good deal of technology, training of manpower and money. This will be important, as indeed it will be in terms of developing new uranium mines. I think the location of them has been identified in many cases, and it will also be important in terms of having a better and more healthy coal mining operation.

With our energy needs of the future, surely oil from the heavy oil deposits, oil from the tar sands, uranium and coal from mines will be the basis on which our energy equation will operate, to a large degree.

This measure which has been granted the mining industry, as applied to the development of energy, will be one of the important incentives. I hope it is and I hope that other countries will follow the resource policy of this government. I do not suppose it is for me, standing where I am, to suggest that to other countries, but it seems to me that, in terms of the dollar, one of the difficulties in the United States results from the amount of energy they are purchasing from outside the country. That has had a somewhat weakening effect on that economy, and that, in turn, has not done anything to strengthen the Canadian dollar.

I congratulate this government for having the kind of policies it has had for the development of energy resources. Had we not had these policies over the past two or three years, when the tax system really responded to the needs of the industry to improve the inventory, this country would be faced with the necessity of purchasing a much larger proportion of its energy, and that would have a very weakening effect on the future prospects of our economy.

That is why I am so astounded by the position taken by the opposition, particularly the Leader of the Opposition, in response to the government's initiative in terms of Petro-Canada. Having listened to the Leader of the Opposition pontificate his viewpoint in this regard, I must observe that I have not seen very many of his supporters from Atlantic Canada or, indeed, from some areas in Ontario, applaud his approach. It seems to me that most of the applause for his position has come from one part of the country. I have been watching for some members from Atlantic Canada to get up and tell this House they feel as strongly that the Conservative party is right in condemning the government for acquiring a handle on the energy business through Petro-Canada.

It seems to me there are two or three things required in this country in respect of energy policy: One is to have a pricing structure, and another is to have a taxation structure. In addition to that, surely we need some kind of mechanism that sets a time frame within which these projects must be commenced, so that in terms of manpower, money and demand this will be synchronized.

Sometimes this will happen through the private sector and sometimes it will not. Sometimes some of these projects, which will be very important to future needs, will falter as, indeed, the Syncrude plan was in danger of doing. It just seems to me that there are so many reasons why the establishment and perpetuation of Petro-Canada, and the expansion which has taken place in the last two weeks, is a correct government decision that I have real difficulty in understanding the viewpoint of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

In the years I have served in this House during this term I have associated myself fairly closely with the energy question. I have participated on the standing committee in a fairly major way in terms of looking at energy policy in Canada, and I think that if the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition are to be directed at anyone, surely they should be directed at the premier of Alberta. The Alberta Energy Corporation would not have been able to involve itself in many energy projects without the involvement and encouragement of that government. Therefore, it seems to me that when they make these disparaging remarks about their friends who sit on their left over there, they should really be directing such comments to their own province of Alberta.

The objective of Petro-Canada, of course, is different; it is to get involved in the kinds of things it would be difficult for the private sector to do. Perhaps I should not say difficult to do, but things that the private sector might not voluntarily do. I refer to continually putting millions and millions of dollars into exploration in the high Arctic islands, realizing that delivery of natural gas and oil, if they should find it, may be some years away. As a matter of fact, millions of dollars have been put into the Beaufort Sea and Mackenzie Delta, where delivery even of that resource, along with the resource of the tar sands and heavy oil, is still some time away. We certainly need this kind of corporation for that.

I am also waiting in the House to hear the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) applaud when the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York-Simcoe say derogatory things about Petro-Canada. I understand from something which came across my desk the other day that the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton is one of the directors of the Committee for an Independent Canada. I would like to know how he really feels when his leader who sits in front of him stands up and welcomes the multinational companies' operations in Canada as a good thing. You can almost hear them applauding down the street, him being a director of that organization and his leader being completely opposed to the Petro-Canada acquisition. It certainly seems odd to me.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are about to rise and I just want to conclude by saying that I wish I had time to talk about research and development. Since I do not have time, I will leave it to other speakers, but I categorically deny the statement the Leader of the Opposition made yesterday when he indicated—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) who just preceded me. He made reference to the sectoral task force reports which have been published by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He recommended that all hon. members take the time to read these reports. Perhaps he would be well advised to instruct some of the members of his own cabinet to read the reports, because if they had, perhaps they would have developed a different stance with respect to some of the policy initiatives which were outlined in the budget. I refer specifically to the report by the sectoral task force of the Canadian tourist industry, wherein it states at page 28 that the airport user-pay policy makes air transportation in Canada non-competitive with that of the United States and is detrimental to Canadian tourism development. That statement was made before the increase in the air transportation tax levied as a result of the minister's budget last Thursday. If the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has not read that report, perhaps he should; and if he has read it, perhaps he should pay some attention to the contents of the report.

In his opening remarks in introducing his budget last Thursday, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) stressed that it is important in this country that we create a climate—or an atmosphere, I believe was his exact word—of stability and certainty. He also pointed out that that was a common theme which was advanced to him as he travelled throughout the country discussing the budget with various leaders in industry, with economists, provincial politicians and members of labour.

He also indicated that they felt very strongly about the fact that we must take initiatives at this time to restore some semblance of confidence and stability. That desire has been prevalent for quite a number of years. It has been known for some time that there has been a pressing desire to restore our economic climate to some state of confidence and stability. While we recognize that that is a laudable requirement, it must nevertheless not be overlooked that this confidence crisis which we seem to be facing has been caused in almost every respect by the mismanagement of this government.

The Minister of Finance in his speech also tried to lead us into believing that at long last he has mapped a course on behalf of this government which will lead us out of the economic doldrums. He stated very bravely, as reported at page 1205 of Hansard:

> So tonight I have brought down a budget to build further confidence and to ensure continued competitiveness.

Those are indeed laudable objectives, objectives which I think every member of the House would support. But we have to ask ourselves whether or not these objectives are achievable by this government. Personally I doubt it, because it does not seem to be the nature of this government to be able to grapple with the things that need to be done. At the present time they are too preoccupied with an election and are addressing their priorities toward improving their electoral fortunes.

Implicit in the budget as well was a call once again to all Canadians to respond, to rally as good citizens behind the government. There is some difficulty there, Mr. Speaker, because Canadians are being asked to rally and respond to a government which is worn out, which is beleaguered and which is tired. While this kind of rally is probably necessary in the national interest, I submit it will not be forthcoming under the present circumstances because Canadians have been stung all too often by this government and simply do not have any confidence in this group. For this government, sir, has lingered on far too long. It is on borrowed time. It is stale. It is beleaguered, as I said earlier, and it has developed a kind of fortress mentality geared to survival at any cost. In the process, Canadians of every walk of life have lost their confidence and their trust in this administration. Very simply put, Canadians do not believe this government any longer and they do not trust it. That is the number one issue in this country today.

And why should they, sir? Let me review their record briefly. It was this government that said in 1974 that it would not impose wage and price controls. It did in 1975. This is the same group that promised to reduce inflation to 4 per cent by 1978. It is 1978 now, and inflation is at 9 per cent. It was this same government whose leader in 1975 all but abandoned the free market economy declaring that in the future, government would intervene more, that government would be more authoritative. It is interesting to read some of the statements uttered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at that time. An article in the Ottawa Citizen of January 20, 1976, notes some of them. On the issue of big government he said:

> 'The state is important, the government is important. It means there's going to be not less authority in our lives, but perhaps more.'

The same article, referring to big business and big labour, quotes him again:

> —the government is going to take a larger role in running institutions, as we're doing now with our anti-inflation controls, but as we'll presumably be doing even after the controls are ended—'

That was also on December 28. In fact, a great deal of uncertainty and instability was created in the Canadian economic climate.

In his television address on August 1, 1978, we see a complete flip-flop when the Prime Minister said:

> We will remove the intrusions of many government policies and regulations from individuals and businesses; in some cases this will mean returning functions to the private sector, in others it will mean removing the heavy hand of government and its drag on personal initiatives.

We saw that elaborated a bit more in the Speech from the Throne when two objectives were outlined. One was to impose severe restraints on government spending and the other was to encourage vigorous expansion of the private sector. Canadians are asking themselves how these two opposite positions can be balanced. What philosophical shade of the Prime Minister are we to believe?

While this new initiative toward the private sector is being advanced, this government sanctions and, in fact, encourages the biggest coup ever staged in this country—the takeover of Pacific 66 by Petro-Canada. They have joined the big boys in the oil patch, committing the Canadian economy to an expenditure of $1.4 billion. That is a huge financial drag on the economy of Canada. There is also the purchase of Nordair for $28 million. Of course, we are going to turn that over to the private sector within a year. We all remember the commitment made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) when the takeover of de Havilland and Canada Air were initiated in 1974, and he said it was not the view of the government that de Havilland by itself or Canada Air should be operated as a Crown corporation. That was in 1974; the company is still intact.

We have just witnessed an unprecedented government intrusion in the private sector on the most massive scale ever witnessed in this country. There is no question about that.

This is the same government that made an oil pricing agreement with the province of Alberta and before the ink was dry, tried to break the agreement.

This is the same government that, in its commitment to the private sector, has unilaterally set out to withdraw the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. That is clearly a very regressive measure. In response to that action, the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce wrote to the Prime Minister on October 4, 1978, as follows:

The Edmonton Chamber of Commerce views the repeal of this act as retrogressive and such repeal would place the private sector of the utilities, electrical and natural gas industries in an unequal position with the tax free municipal and provincially owned utilities.

Later in the same letter they wrote:

This is another illustration of the lack of permanence and stability so vital for a viable and effective private sector.

Who has created the uncertainty, Mr. Speaker? Who has created the instability? Who has undermined confidence in this country? These are the very actions that serve this purpose.

This is the same government that promised in 1974 to revamp the grain handling system from the granary to the ship in the harbour. I am glad the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is here tonight. He used that expression time and time again in the west. Today our system does not have the capability to move to export in excess of 21 million tons of grain, the figure we achieved in 1972-73. The situation in this country today is nothing short of chaotic—a paralysis in the grain handling industry with sales lost, deferred, and the system plugged. In spite of the minister's efforts to "strain the system" as he puts it so glowingly from time to time, we are not able to achieve the level of 21.4 million tons that we achieved in 1972-73.

This is the same government that promised that not one rail line would be abandoned against the wishes of producers. I should like to quote the Minister of Transport in regard to that, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press on June 11, 1974, as follows:

Otto Lang said 'as long as the Liberal party forms the government and as long as producers wish to continue to deliver to the elevator of their choice, not one rail line will be abandoned.'

But what happened, Mr. Speaker? I should invite the Minister of Transport to visit the constituency of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart). He would witness a very sorry scene there. The farmers in that area are hostile and are reacting. I understand they are burning an effigy of the president of the Manitoba pool, they are so unhappy with the decision brought down by the Prairie Rail Action Committee. This is outright hostility toward those hollow promises.

The chairman of the Prairie Rail Action Committee is a professor of economics in Regina. An article in the Manitoba Co-Operator reports as follows:

Anderson said the basic rail network, originally laid out and guaranteed by the federal government to the year 2000, 'is itself an irrational collection of lines derived from a series of politically expedient decisions.'

He said that events show that there is still too much mileage in the basic network and this means continued high rail costs.

If we are to believe the advice the minister is receiving from the chairman of the Prairie Rail Action Committee, we can assume that many more rail lines will be abandoned before this minister and the chairman of the Prairie Rail Action Committee are through in western Canada.

I could go on to talk about inaccuracies with respect ot budgetary deficits and growth targets, the inaccuracy in projections with respect to unemployment, but I think I have said enough to show there is a very, very marked credibility gap with this government.

● (2102)

Why should Canadians trust the government? The illustrations I have advanced simply mean one thing, they prove that this government does not keep its word. It is a government which has tinkered with the economy, it has tinkered with the books and it has tinkered with parliament. It is a government which shifts from left to right in its policies. It is a government which has lost control. These are the facts and the realities of the situation. I submit that confidence will not be restored by this budget. Confidence in this country can only come from a new government. I know the members opposite are very sensitive. They must be sensitive because we have been pointing out the waste, the extravagance and the mismanagement of this particular group. We are not the only ones. Yes, now there is the press. The press are the bad guys. The press and the opposition are the ones who have caused all the problems. They are the preachers of gloom and doom. And then we come to the provinces. Everybody seems to be against this government. The Toronto Sun says this about the government and the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: The Toronto Sun?

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, it is a fairly popular newspaper and its circulation is increasing all the time. Here again the Prime Minister is blaming everybody but himself. The Toronto Sun says this:

Trudeau and his policies have divided, undermined and alienated Canada. Few have started out with the trust and goodwill he had ten years ago; few have misused power and responsibility more crassly. Trudeau has been a one-man wrecking crew—

Trudeau insists he is "the best man" for Canada. Untrue. The record indicates he is the 'worst' man for Canada—and possibly the 'worst' Prime Minister in our history. The sooner Clark gets his job, the sooner Canada will recover.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I want to deal with one aspect of the budget which will create and cause a great deal of consternation—

An hon. Member: Constipation.

Mr. Mazankowski: Consternation, sir. Maybe you have never heard of the word before. I know that there are a few afflicted with that other word which you have just used.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: This has to do with the reduction in the manufacturers' sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. It concerns a statement made by the Minister of Finance which points out that the Minister of National Revenue will not entertain any applications for refunds of that tax—that is the difference between the 12 per cent and the 9 per cent—in respect of goods on which the 12 per cent tax has been paid.

This government is supposed to be the saviour, the friend of the small business community. There is certainly a lack of common sense and a blatant disregard for the small business community in the application and the manner in which that tax will be administered. I can assure you of that, sir. The minister is asking that all those involved ensure that this saving is passed on to the consumer, yet at the same time he is asking the retail dealers in this country to absorb that 3 per cent. I have to say this in all sincerity and I make it in the form of a representation. I ask the Minister of Finance and this government to reconsider that position because it will represent a huge loss on the larger commodities in the hands of the small private entrepreneurs. I have had a number of phone calls today in this regard, and I suspect there will be many more.

I have a wire in my hand which I will put on the record. I think it summarizes a view that is probably widely held in this country. This telegram comes from the general manager and principal dealer of Parkland Chrysler Ltd. in Lloydminster, Alberta. It states as follows:

Regarding the federal budget announcement of the reduction in federal sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent on Thursday, November 16 we join with FADA—

FADA means the Federation of the Automobile Dealers Association. The telegram goes on to say:

—in protesting the lack of rebate to dealers. This decision alone will cost our small dealership approximately $18,000.

I implore the minister to reconsider his decision, which would be only just and fair, and to entertain applications for refund of that 3 per cent tax differential. It will serve as a very serious blow and hardship on many small dealers.

We have talked about the importance of stability and certainty. We have talked about the necessity of having a co-ordinated approach to the administration of federal government programs. I want to deal now with the application of the new airport tax. I believe this is a clear, classic example where we have an unco-ordinated, disjointed approach by the federal government in its attempts to pursue an objective, and the objective is to improve Canada's tourist industry. This particular measure imposes a disproportionate burden upon the regional and third level air carriers. The percentage, in terms of the application of this tax, will be roughly in the area of 3 per cent on a transcontinental flight, while it will be 15 per cent on a small third level or regional flight. I think it is grossly unfair and simply flies in the face of the recommendations that have been advanced by the task force on tourism.

The air transport association of Canada has clearly outlined its position which, I believe, puts the whole question in perspective. I quote from a message by the Air Transport Association which was sent to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) from the president and chief executive officer of the Air Transport Association of Canada.

We believe the extension of the air transportation tax to be contrary to the thrust of other budget measures aimed at providing tax relief and encouraging industrial effort. Not only is the increased tax contrary to the general thrust of your budget, it is also contrary to the strong recommendations of the government's own task force on tourism which advocated tax relief in the interest of lower prices in transportation and tourism. The increase in the air transportation tax will add to the difficulty of Canadian carriers to compete with American carriers, and could lead to some diversion of travel to departure points located in the U.S.A. We see no evidence of real effort to reduce Transport Canada expenditures and regret that your efforts to reduce government spending did not find $72 million there.

We also view with concern the announced intention to convert the air transportation tax at a later date to a user charge as this will remove it from public view and the close scrutiny of parliament and allow the imposition of charges involving large arbitrary sums at the discretion of the Minister of Transport and his officials which is questionable in principle.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That said it all.

Mr. Mazankowski: As my hon. colleague, has suggested, it said it all.

There are a number of other matters on which I would like to have touched. I wanted to develop the matter of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. I wanted to talk about the uncertainty that is created by the enlargement of the bureaucratic web, which has created uncertainty, confusion, and downright hostility in many areas. However, time does not permit.

I do want to conclude by saying a few words about the grain industry and our inability to pursue the market potential that is available to us, and the impact that it does have upon our economy. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) pointed out very capably last Friday that there are many areas where we have missed golden opportunities as a resut of the misguided priorities of this government. One is in the field of pursuing our potential in the world grain export market.

On the prairies today there is frustration, hardship and downright anger as a result of our inability to deliver. We are losing sales every day. This is hurting Canada's reputation. We are losing our prominence as a renowned supplier of grain on the export market. It is costing each and every Canadian a lot of money.

If we look at the grains industry in terms of what it means to the Canadian economy, we find that traditionally our grain exports have been in the order of $2.5 billion. They constitute in excess of 60 per cent of our total agricultural exports. Hence, this is a major contributor to Canada's trade picture, particularly with regard to our balance of payments.

Directly related to the $2.5 billion of world exports we make annually, for every $1 of grain that is exported, $2 is generated directly through expenditures on inputs such as machinery, fertilizer, fuel, oil and the various input supplies that go to produce that product. When that $2 filters through the economy, it creates an induced multiplier impact of $5.5. That creates jobs, builds plants, builds homes for factory workers, gives them the capacity to buy cars and improves our technology. It stimulates investment, and we need stimulation at this time, particularly with our plants running at about 85 per cent capacity.

In addition, this original $1 for the sale of export grain ultimately generates $1 to $1.50 worth of revenue to the federal government in the form of taxes. We find that $2.5 billion worth of grain export sales adds $5 billion directly to the farm input sector, it creates $13.75 billion worth of economic activity, and it provides $2.5 billion to $3.5 billion in terms of revenue to the federal government. That is on the positive side.

In this last crop year, we missed opportunities for sales of some four million tons of grain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: That is true. If you can prove it is not true, stand up and give me that proof.

An hon. Member: You give the proof.

Mr. Mazankowski: I have the proof. Canadian Wheat Board spokesmen—and I trust them more than I do the hon. member—have indicated that we have lost sales of four million tons of grain. That represents about $500 million which the producers have lost. In addition, the farm input sector has lost $1 billion, and the total economy has lost some $2.75 billion in economic spinoff.

We lost the sale of four million tons of grain last year. So far this year we have been told by the Canadian Wheat Board that 2.3 million tons of grain have been deferred for later delivery. That is worth $350 million. The members of the wheat board say those are potentially lost sales.

We can no longer carry on without a strategic plan to improve our capability and capacity to remove grain. It is disappointing, disturbing and unhealthy to the farm economy. It is unhealthy for the general economy.

I see my time is up. I hope I will have an opportunity at some later date to develop this further.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure listening to my very good friend and respected colleague. I do not think there is anyone on that side more respected by those on this side than the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). However, we do differ on some points from time to time. Before expressing my thoughts, I would like to deal with a couple of the points he mentioned.

The hon. member referred to the oil price agreement between Alberta and the federal government. That should be considered carefully. In that agreement it is stated that the Canadian price should not go higher than the U.S. price so that we are not put in an unfavourable competitive industrial position with the Americans because of our oil. I would have preferred the government to have priced the oil in the same way as the Americans did, with one price for new oil and another one for old oil. Under those circumstances, the province of Alberta would suffer a good deal more than it does at present.

I would like to deal briefly with Petro-Can. I cannot understand why the opposition is making such a fuss about the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums. Over 95 per cent of our oil resources are foreign-owned and controlled. This is a very dangerous position, particularly in view of the fact that our conventional supply is likely to peter out over the next ten to fifteen years.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member how acquiring Petro-Can has increased the oil supply in Canada.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, there are many ways one can do that. I do not intend at this point—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McRae: All right, I will deal with it briefly. We need to have some holdings which we can develop. There are some heavy oil holdings which may or may not be developed. Protecting that supply is very important. As this industry is almost totally controlled outside our boundaries, it is time we started moving in this direction.

There is a third point that is important. Most Canadians do not believe the industry. There is a lack of credibility about the industry. Therefore, it makes sense for the government of Canada to have a piece of the action and to keep an eye on what is happening. The monitoring factor is relatively important.

I now wish to deal with specific parts of the budget. First, I will deal briefly with the Canadian economy in general and how it relates to the economies of other nations. There is a kind of negative attitude which was mentioned by the hon. member for Vegreville as well as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), although in a somewhat different way, regarding our economy. This attitude is harmful to Canadians. It is harmful to their attitude toward their government and the country. I will give an example.

The borrowing bill has been before the House for about a month, since October 20 I believe. Much has been said about the growth of the national debt. It is said it is growing at a horrendous rate and that we will be bankrupt in a short time. However, no real analysis has been made of the debt.

Debt, whether national or private, is relative to something. If I owe $5,000 today and ten years ago I owed $2,000, who is to say at what time I am better off financially? That would depend on my income, assets, and so on. These are factors which must be taken into consideration. If we look at the growth or lack of growth in our national debt, we must do that in terms of the gross national product. Let us look at this briefly in terms of the GNP. The net national debt in 1952 was 51.7 per cent of the gross national product for that year. The net national debt in 1962, the last full year in which the Conservative party was in power, was 33.4 per cent of the GNP for that year. In 1972, the net national debt was down to 19 per cent of the GNP for that year. In this portion of 1978, the national debt amounts to 18.7 per cent of the GNP. That is a meaningful way of approaching the issue. The debt has not gone up in terms of the gross national product. Indeed, it has declined. The average for the 25-year period from 1952 to the beginning of the present year is 30 per cent. This year, next year and the year after we shall be well below the average for those years I have mentioned.

I am trying to show that the state of the Canadian economy is not nearly as bad as many members on the opposition side would have us believe. There is no doubt that all industrial countries are experiencing great difficulty at the present time. There has been a massive growth in problems of the kind all governments face. We are talking about inflation rates of 1.5 per cent or 2 per cent up to 1950. Now we see inflation rates of at least 5 per cent.

All governments are also facing massive energy problems, coupled with an unprecedented outflow of dollars to purchase or ensure supplies, and the techniques normally used in such circumstances do not work as well as they used to. To show how well Canadians are doing, we must compare ourselves with the other industrial nations with which we trade.

An hon. Member: Such as Uganda?

Mr. McRae: I am going to compare our performance with that of 15 industrial nations outside the Communist world: the United States, West Germany, The Netherlands, Australia, Norway, Belgium, France, Japan, Switzerland, Denmark, United Kingdom, Sweden and Finland. There are a series of indices we could use. It is difficult when you compare these indices at the end, totalling them, but I will deal with that when I get there. The first index I will use has to do with the rise in employment, the number of jobs created. In those 15 countries, in the years 1970-1977—I could take the years between 1974 and 1977 and obtain approximately the same result—Canada was first among the 15, with a 27 per cent growth in the number of jobs. Let us not forget that in the same period there had been a much larger growth in the size of our labour force than was experienced in any of the other countries. For every hundred people in the labour force in 1965, there are 146 today whereas the average for the other six members of the summit group is only nine. I do not have the figures for all those countries in terms of unemployment, but we would certainly be below the average in that respect. On the other hand, our problem is about 500 per cent more acute than those of the other six members of the summit group.

Take another index. The United States department of agriculture carried out a study of food prices. It chose a basket of representative types of food, and shopped in all those countries. This was the result: the least number of dollars was needed to buy this sample basket in the U.K. Canada was second, Australia third, the United States fourth, and so on. Prices were converted into U.S. dollars. It was a very significant result, in my view.

Take the over-all cost of living, again measured in U.S. dollars. Taking the U.S. dollar as 100 cents, the cost of buying the same amount of all goods was $1.02 in Canada, $1.04 in the United Kingdom, and so on. We were second, the United States being first.

The next point has to do with inflation, that is, loss in purchasing power. It is measured on the basis of the same unit. This time it was the Canadian dollar, and of all those countries we come fourth in this period from 1970 to 1977. Our dollar is worth 60 cents, in West Germany the figure is 68 cents, in the United States, 64 cents and in Switzerland, 67 cents. Canada is fourth, with 60 cents. That is the way the purchasing power of the dollar is shrinking.

Take an index where we do not fare very well, that is, the balance of payments. In this group we come tenth out of 15. West Germany is first, followed by Japan. United States is eighth, very close to us. We do have a balance of payments problem. On the other hand, on the commodity trade side, the balance between exports and imports, Canada is third. We come out with $4.60 per capita, West Germany with $12.54, Australia with $7.31 and Canada was third.

In terms of housing starts, using 1970 and a base of 100, Canada is second with 126, Belgium is first with 152 and the United States third with 116.

Now take a very large item, the gross national product. Taking these 15 major countries, Japan is first with an average rise in the GNP per year of 7.36 per cent; France is second with 4.75 per cent; and Canada is third with 4.55 per cent. In the last year, (1977-78) Canada would be second with only Japan ahead of us.

In another area, hon. members on the other side are constantly going after the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). He is defending himself ably, though. There is a reason: our industrial production has shown a larger increase than any of those countries. The country that is first, Norway, does not appear high up on any of the other lists. The second country is Canada, and the third is the United States. The increase for Canada is 32 per cent; Norway, 38 per cent; and the United States, 27 per cent.

United labour costs have declined for the period 1970 to 1977 in Canada by 5.6 per cent, and in the United States by 18.5 per cent. Canada is second, and the other 13 countries have done worse than we have, because their unit labour costs have risen faster than ours. Another point is the rise in real disposable income, the amount of income left after taxes. Here Canada is first. The graph is a little obscure, but it deals with a 2 per cent increase over this period. Japan was second.

If we put all these things together and if we give 15 points for each index to the country which has the most and then range down the list with one point going to the country with the least, when we total the points, we find that Canada gets 144 and comes first. This is not an accurate way of doing it, but it is the only way I know that can be done. The United States is second with 125 points. I am sure that if we were to do this, including the unemployment figure as one of the indices, Canada would still be well ahead of the other countries. During the period from the Arab boycott in 1974, to the end of 1977, Canada would still be first. This is all plotted, but I do not have time to go through it.

Once again, the total points for each country are Canada, 144; the United States, 125; West Germany, 121; the Netherlands, fourth; Australia, fifth; Norway, sixth; Belgium, seventh; France, eighth; Finland, ninth; Japan, tenth; Italy, eleventh; Swizerland, twelfth; Denmark, thirteenth; United Kingdom, fourteenth; and Sweden, fifteenth.

There is something wrong when the bulk of the Canadian public believes that we are in such a terrible state, because if these OECD figures are true, then the rest of the world must be in unbelievable shape. This is the kind of misunderstanding that is fostered by the opposition. To some extent it is understandable because their purpose here is to oppose, but it is also taken up by the press. The press should be more aware in looking at this situation. But we on this side are also at fault because we have not explained the situation. We have not explained the relative position of Canada with the rest of the world in a careful way.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to put these facts before the House, and I hope that at least some Canadians will begin to see that our relative position has been very good and that we have fared rather well relative to other industrial countries. Canada is still the best country in which to live, and our economy has moved better than any other economy among these countries.

Very briefly, I would like to deal with some of the points in the budget. Many good economists today are saying that we are probably doing the best we can. Considering the general direction of the economy, the budget steps are probably as good as one can expect. I know that the other side will give me an argument, and legitimately so, about job creation. However, I do not think that there is any human way, short of doubling the deficit, that we can create a more substantial number of jobs than this government has created in the past seven or eight years. Canada is still ahead of everybody else, and we still have the problem of massive growth in the labour force—a problem that is unique to Canada—amounting to 500 per cent greater than any other country in the summit group. I do not have the figures for all 15 countries, but I do for the top seven, and we have a 500 per cent tougher job than the others.

The figure put out by the Economic Council of Canada that Canada's growth rate of 5 per cent—which is what everybody on the other side says we should have, even though the rest of the world will not achieve more than a 3 per cent or 3.5 per cent growth rate next year, except for Canada—will bring the unemployment rate down to 8 per cent. If the growth rate were to rise to 6 per cent, it would only reduce unemployment to 7.6 per cent.

There are answers, and redistribution of work is one of them. However, I do not think that we will solve the problem by dropping another $2 billion into the demand side, which is one of the alternatives proposed by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. This is the same $2 billion we talked about back in the 1960s when we had a gross national product of $45 billion. Now we have a G.N.P. of $120 billion, and we are still using the same $2 billion, which amounts to less than 1 per cent in its effect on unemployment today, and was about 4 per cent in the 1960s. I think that this kind of stimulus would only have a marginal effect.

The minister has rightly assumed that there will not likely be more than a 4 per cent to a 4.5 per cent growth in the economy next year. We are not likely to achieve a much higher rate of inflation next year than 6.5 per cent, perhaps 6 per cent toward the end of the year. The assumption is that we have done relatively well in all areas except in food, in spite of the condemnation of controls, and the food index should show an improvement.

The opposition has ignored some of the things in the budget. At one time we had a budget which would indicate a certain tax cut or increased exemptions. This is now automatic, and each year there are several billions of dollars going to the demand side. This year the exemption will be 9 per cent. If one looks at the revenue curve and the expenditure curve, one sees that they have paralleled each other over many years until 1974 when the government brought in this indexing system. Since that time the revenue curve has almost levelled off, and the expenditure curve has continued to rise. This is a problem with which the government must wrestle.

One thing in the budget which is rather important to me, and, I am sure, to all the members from northern Ontario, the Atlantic provinces and Gaspé, is the increase in the investment tax credit. This is a fundamental change which occurred last year. Also it is being brought into the Unemployment Insurance Act. Instead of devolving power to the provinces, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) would do if his party were in power, we decentralized some of the power. Not only do we decentralize people, we decentralize policy.

We have told the people of northern Ontario that they will receive an investment tax credit of up to 10 per cent, and up to 20 per cent in the Atlantic provinces. It is a change in the operation of government. Also, it applies to the regionalization of the Unemployment Insurance Act. These are answers to some of the problems articulated by hon. members on the other side. We are not turning the government of the country over to the provinces. We are attempting to make it work better as a national government.

I should like to refer to another aspect which affects northern Ontario. Because of the present value of our dollar at 85 or 86 cents, the woods industry, pulp and paper, logging, timber, and so on, is in very good shape at present. Most of the communities in northern Ontario dependent upon the lumber industry are doing well. In fact, Thunder Bay has the lowest unemployment rate of any Canadian city. That has been the case for over a year. This fact is attributed directly to the state of the dollar and the fact that this industry is involved in the export business.

Communities involved in the mining industry have not had the same success. I am pleased that the budget contained a write-off increase from 30 per cent to 100 per cent for mining development. Also there were increased write-offs for town sites, social purposes and so on. Because of depressed prices of various minerals on world markets, the mining industry is depressed. These extra write-offs certainly will help communities in northern Ontario.

In conclusion, given the state of the Canadian economy, the relative good performance of our economy, the best of all industrial nations in the world, and the difficulties faced by all 15 industrial countries, the budget is extremely appropriate to the nature of the country and the nature of our times.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to take part in this budget debate because it gives me an opportunity to commend the minister for some measures he has taken, to offer constructive criticism, and to express my disappointment at some measures which have not been included.

I like the $500 employee expense deduction which will confer upon working Canadians some of the tax benefits already enjoyed by professional and business people. The decrease in the manufacturers' sales tax will help to stimulate the economy to the extent it is passed on to consumers. The increased tax incentives for research and development and the increase in the investment tax credit will be beneficial to Canadian business, particularly small business. The improvement in resource taxes is long overdue.

However, the over-all impact of the budget falls far short of Canada's needs. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) seems to be telling us in many ways to expect another year of economic stagnation, as well as a further deterioration in the federal government's fiscal position. Of the $1.3 billion loss to the federal treasury, it would seem that only $300 million will be returned in increased tax revenues. Clearly the economy needs greater stimulus.

I am disappointed the federal government did not choose to adopt our proposal for deductibility of mortgage interest and property taxes from personal income taxes. This proposal in itself would have given the Canadian economy a bigger boost than the entire budget.

There are over 7 million households in Canada and 4.6 million home owners. This reflects the strong desire of Canadians to own their own homes. But in 1975, the last year for which income figures are available, only 9 per cent of Canadians could afford to buy the average new house which was then priced at $42,800. It is socially desirable that Canadians who wish to own their own homes have a reasonable opportunity to do so. These measures would make the Canadian income tax system at least as attractive as that in the United States.

A key difference between the two systems is that the Americans are able to deduct both mortgage interest and property taxes from their annual income. This results in a major reduction in the financing of home ownership for Americans. While the American system allows for mortgage interest and property tax deductibility in all residences, the plan which we propose would allow deductibility on principal residences only. This program would provide a major stimulus to the economy by returning significant amounts of after tax dollars to Canadian consumers on a permanent basis.

The depressed rate of consumer spending is a critical weakness in the Canadian economy at present. In fact, a recovery in consumer spending, a stimulus to the building industry, and an increased accumulation of private pools of capital are central to a revitalized economic growth. Clearly these measures would allow more Canadians to purchase their own homes by returning significant amounts of money to them. The effect of increased home purchases will be a major stimulus both to the Canadian home furnishings and construction industries which are almost wholly domestic.

On November 14 of last year, I placed a question on the order paper concerning the revenue loss of tax deductions of interest payable on mortgages on residences. The answer from the Department of Finance indicated that the department had analysed this proposal. The revenue loss would depend upon the structure of the measure and what sort of limits were applied. It could be as high as $1.5 billion per year. On the question of permitting income tax deductions of municipal property taxes, again the Department of Finance indicated that it had analysed the proposal, that the revenue loss would depend upon the structure of the measure and what sort of limitations were applied. It could be well over $500 billion. Thus, we have an indication of the cost of these measures from the government. One measure to reduce the cost is to phase the program over a four-year period. Another restriction measure is to place a limit of $5,000 per year on the allowable interest deduction and a ceiling of $1,000 a year in respect of property taxes.

The benefit to an average Canadian can be measured by taking as an example a family of four with one working spouse, two children, a home with a $30,000 mortgage and annual property taxes of $500. This is not an unusual Canadian situation. It is a good example. This family would gain $197 in reduced taxes in the first year of the program, and $756 when the program is fully in place. This would be a real stimulus to consumer purchasing. It would put more Canadians to work in the building trades and sell more Canadian materials. It would create more Canadian taxpayers. It would help our economy to move forward again. It would help renew consumer and investor confidence.

This program of mortgage interest and property tax deductions, like the programs the minister proposed, can be financed by increases in the gross domestic product and hence our revenues, without increasing taxes, or by identifying programs of a lower priority where expenditures can be eliminated. The government has announced a restraint program. We will be watching to see if it continues restraint in a meaningful manner. The projected deficit of 34 per cent in federal revenues is a record for Canada and one of the highest in the western world. It is a record which is not really wanted. But like the ghost of Christmas past, it has come back to haunt the current Minister of Finance and to restrict severely the area in which he can manoeuvre in his very serious battle against both inflation and high employment.

I would like to leave some thoughts with the minister in his search for restraint. I suggest that he take another look at the $1.4 billion we pay out to consultants, in an attempt to determine if some of these services could be supplied by other departments of government. Information advertising expenditures have increased remarkably over the years to somewhere around $180 million.

I know that Crown corporations have a necessary role to play in the structure of government, but I do believe that periodically they should justify their continued existence as government agencies. That is not to suggest that they have to go out of business, but once their role exceeds the necessary function of the government, it seems to me the government would be quite justified in giving the private sector of our economy an opportunity to assume the risk of owning and operating the business by purchasing it from the government. We have long debated the merits of Petro-Can, Eldorado Nuclear, Canadair and Northern Transportation Limited. Without repeating the arguments pro and con, I would be inclined to add to the list the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

One feature of the budget I find highly commendable is the special provisions to encourage research and development by small Canadian businesses. Such businesses qualify for the low rate of corporation tax and will get an investment tax credit of 25 per cent of their research and development expenditures, irrespective of their location in Canada. This measure, coupled with the proposal to double the basic rate of investment tax credit for research and development from 5 per cent to 10 per cent, which is set at 20 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé, is a good measure.

I thought the 25 per cent tax credit for research and development was an excellent idea, and I said so in this House on June 21 last when I spoke in respect of Bill C-56. I would like to say so again today. My colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), was one of several members who did considerable work on research and development issues which were debated in the last budget debate and under Clause 6 of Bill C-56. With background help, various substantive amendments were made which would have improved all industrial aspects of research and development in Canada, and would have put in place very real incentives which would have worked to smooth out this area of need in the Canadian economy. These amendments were passed on to the government during committee of the whole debate on that bill, and they were suggested as being superior to the measures which the government had proposed at that time.

One other measure which was proposed by my colleagues and myself at that time, and which I would like to recommend for the consideration of the minister now, is that in arriving at the definition of a small business in order to stimulate research and development, we consider the amount of research and development carried out by a small business. I suggest that for purposes of this tax credit, any business in Canada which does less than $1 million worth in research and development in a fiscal year should be considered a small business.

The present federal government tax incentive program is inadequate in the following respects: The incentive is based on incremental research and development expenditures only; the consolidation of capital with current expenditures penalizes firms making substantial capital outlay for R and D purposes; the incentive discriminates severely against the smaller firms whose net cost of R and D could be 70 per cent higher than for larger firms, and the incentive is not available to firms not having a taxable income, for example in the start-up phase of new technology-based firms.

When the minister has an opportunity to refer back to the debate I have mentioned, as reported at pages 6626 to 6632 of Hansard, he will find some very helpful suggestions along these lines made by colleagues.

I would like to suggest that any review of industrial support policies should involve the full participation of industry. New incentive programs should minimize elaborate administration. For example, where applicable, self-administered tax credits are preferable to grants which require lengthy and complex applications and detailed monitoring. The contracting out of government R and D projects, which have been a step in the right direction, should be intensified.

Federal procurement policy should aim to stimulate promising Canadian companies. The procurement policies of local and provincial governments, as well as publicly supported institutions, should be similarly co-ordinated. The federal government should take the lead by making this a condition of various incentives and cost-sharing programs. International trade and technological agreements should make special provisions to strengthen Canada's industrial capacity. Opportunities for co-operative activities should be sought out and supported. Fragmentation and polarization of the activities of various groups, whether in industry, government or universities, must be overcome. Eventually, incentive programs and other related activities that are designed to affect industry should be developed in the context of a comprehensive industrial strategy which would support the emergence of strong, stable Canadian companies and rationalize Canadian industrial capacities to meet industrial competition. This latter thought has been expressed and underscored by Dr. Kates and the Science Council.

It is imperative that we create a more attractive climate for technological innovation in Canada, if the research and development performed by a parent company in respect of the output of Canadian subsidiaries is to be expanded in Canada.

Our tax incentives must be strong enough to make it attractive and profitable to perform the research and development in Canada, and as a precondition to receiving any such incentive, R and D must in fact be done in Canada.

The bottom line is that it is not enough to have the best tax incentive system in the western world. Our ministers, deputy ministers, assistant deputy ministers and department heads have to get on their bicycles and travel to the board rooms of the parent companies of Canadian subsidiaries and sell our program. We have to give the private sector the confidence that our government understands that research is a long-term proposition, and convince them that the incentives will remain in position and be constant for at least ten years.

In the past 15 years we have witnessed a number of major unrelated programs involving tax incentives put forward and then cancelled by the present government. It is small wonder that the private sector takes no confidence in this performance and is not prepared to commit its funds to a program of long-term scientific research and innovation.

Prior to 1962, Canadian firms could deduct 100 per cent of their current capital expenditures for tax purposes. In 1962, an amendment to the Income Tax Act added a new section, section 72(a), which provided an additional tax deduction of 50 per cent of the increase in research and development expenditures for capital and current costs over the 1961 level. This special allowance was replaced about five years later by the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act, and late in 1975 this program too came to a grinding halt, but it was not immediately replaced. The make or buy policy was then in force and the PAIT program was also in place, but neither of these could be classified as a tax incentive.

Last year the tax investment credit was announced. Earlier this year the government moved the clock back to 1962 by returning to the special tax deduction allowance feature for income tax purposes. Now the government has had the wisdom to take a step in the right direction with the current proposal of a 25 per cent tax credit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. In accordance with Standing Order 40, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time. Therefore, the question is that this House do now adjourn.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—RCMP INVESTIGATION OF BOEING CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight because of an unsatisfactory answer I received yesterday to a question I put to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). I asked the Solicitor General, as recorded at page 1263 of Hansard, what progress had been made with the investigation into kickbacks that were paid in Canada by the Boeing Aircraft Company concerning deals whereby Canada bought aircraft from Boeing.

There were five companies in Canada that did buy aircraft from Boeing, and this might have happened to any one of them. These included the Department of Supply and Services of the Canadian government, Air Canada, Eastern Provincial Airways, Nordair and Transair.

Somewhere in Canada there is a crook who has gypped Canada. Some 20 months after the first clear indication, and four months after absolute declaration that there is a crook in our midst, nothing seems to be happening. Progress is far too slow. India has out-distanced us in this. I would like tonight to point out why we should have moved considerably faster.

First of all I would like to read from a complaint by the Securities Exchange Commission of the United States which commenced a suit against the Boeing aircraft company requiring it to conduct its business so it was no longer fraudulent. On examination of the documents provided by Boeing we find the following stated:

In some instances, Boeing used dual consulting contracts with identical terms except for the compensation payable to the consultant. One contract provided for nominal compensation to the consultant while the second contract specified payments of additional compensation to the consultant—

I suggest there is no way that the Securities and Exchange Commission could look at these dual contracts without realizing that they were made out to the same person. There is no way they could make that statement unless the same person's name appeared on both contracts. If it did, the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States must know the person to whom those dual contracts were made out.

Further on in the same complaint the Securities and Exchange Commission had this to say:

Certain of these disbursements were improperly described as commissions on the books and records of Boeing. All of such payments were made to nominee and conduit accounts in Switzerland.

Once again, if they knew to what consultant they were made out, they must have had the consultant's name.

If I have established that the Securities and Exchange Commission knew the name of the consultant who took double payments, then why should Canada not have made faster progress than it has? I refer to a news release dated March 15, 1977 when Canada signed an agreement with the United States. In the news release which accompanied the agreement issued by the then Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Basford) this passage appears:

The agreement provides that following requests for assistance, the United States Department of Justice and the Department of Justice of Canada will assist each other in making available relevant information and material pertaining to the sales activities in Canada of The Boeing Company—

In the first paragraph of the agreement itself appears the words "with respect to alleged illicit acts pertaining to the sales activities in Canada of The Boeing Company." This quite clearly establishes that illegal acts had been taking place as early as 20 months ago. Paragraph 2 of the agreement goes on to state:

—the parties shall use their best efforts to make available to each other relevant and material information, such as statements, depositions, documents, business records, correspondence or other materials—

I submit that should include the name of the culprit.

I should like to point out that during this time Canada has asked the United States department of justice about this and has received co-operation, at least according to the Minister of Justice who answered me on this matter about a month ago. I therefore cannot understand the delay in laying charges against the culprits.

I particularly want to point out that it is quite clear from the evidence before us that these complaints were filed by the SEC before the United States district court for the District of Columbia. The district court of the District of Columbia records are available to the United States department of justice. Since they are made available to the department of justice of the United States, according to our agreement they should be delivered to us if we ask for them. If we have not asked for them, we should do so immediately. If we have asked for them, then the name should be in the hands of our government. I want to know from the minister why nothing has been done and why we cannot seem to make any progress whatever.

A month ago the Solicitor General's parliamentary secretary said that we would have the information soon. Yesterday, he was not as promising. He gave no date and said that he could not guarantee when the final report of the RCMP would be in his hands. I should like those two questions answered tonight, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) asked a question of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) concerning an ongoing RCM Police investigation into the Boeing Company's contract transactions. As the hon. member is very well aware, it is not now, nor has it been, the practice of the government to divulge detailed particulars of the results of ongoing criminal investigations in the House of Commons. This is necessarily so, as all hon. members will know, because of the danger of impairing these investigations.

● (2207)

I can state for the benefit of the hon. member that the RCMP investigation has been going on for a considerable period of time and that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) is optimistic that it will be completed soon.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—INQUIRY AS TO FINANCIAL MEASURES TAKEN TO REDUCE NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on November 7 I asked the Minister of Finance a question concerning the measures he intended to submit to the House in order to reduce the number of unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, this question as reported on page 866 of Hansard was the following:

According to a recent article Canada is in the leading position on the world wide level as far as unemployment is concerned. This is not in accordance with the statements made by the Minister of Finance. The article says that Canada has a record 8.5 per cent of unemployed.

I asked the minister what he intended to propose in his budget to try to further develop the use of our manpower in order to increase our gross national product to become as prosperous as the other industrial countries in the western world. The minister said that he required a complete budget to give a thorough answer to my serious question and that he regretted that our unemployment level was so high. He added that in that last 12 months we had created 362,000 new jobs in Canada and that our performance as far as job creation was concerned was not equalled by any country in the world.

Mr. Speaker, it is not a pleasure for me to tackle this question nor is it my intention to embarrass the government. We hear so many complaints that there is no point in raising questions likely to put the government in trouble. What we want in this parliament is that the government face up to its responsibilities and solve the situation in a clever and efficient way.

Mr. Speaker, I would like very briefly to prove the seriousness of my question, with some figures on the level of unemployment in eastern Quebec. Especially in my own area of Bellechasse. Unemployment in Bellechasse is not due to its having a Social Credit MP, because there is just as much in any other constituency in the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada. It is because we have the same system as everywhere else.

The head of Montmagny's Manpower Centre, Mr. Claude Boileau, whose photograph appeared in the local newspaper Peuple Courrier, was quoted as saying in July that the level of unemployment is nearly a quarter of the work force. Later, figures were published concerning communities under the jurisdiction of the Montmagny Manpower Centre. The total population is 23,401, the labour force is 7,090 and the number of unemployed 1,663. The number of unemployed female is 492, on a total 2,155. This is becoming serious when there is a 7,090 work force. Another table shows there are 1,346 men receiving unemployment benefits and 317 people receiving other help, for a total 1,663 people out of 7,090 capable of working. This means there are a number of other people that are without revenue or live off welfare.

The situation is therefore, disquieting, and we must absolutely see to it that the number of people looking for work be reduced. Some will say, and perhaps they are right, that there may be some people who have not worked for such a long time that they have lost the desire to work and no longer understand that work is normal and that it is a tool which must be used to earn a living and to transform in detail what God has given us to meet the needs of men. God could have created everything ready for consumption, but He wanted men to join Him in His work of creation. This is why He has given us this tool of work. The public authorities, the governments, must find the means to close the gap when the private sector cannot absorb all the manpower available. This is the role of the government, to intervene through public works to absorb this manpower, to maintain this desire to work and to give those who want to work the possibility of supporting themselves honourably.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government has established various programs, including Canada Works, within its field of responsibility. Some projects submitted under this program may not be very good and some may be quite bad. However, I believe that the quality of projects has improved a lot in the last few years, and I want to pay tribute to the people of my constituency who go to the trouble of submitting useful projects. However, when these projects are implemented, they should not cause us problems such as that which occurred last week with a project in my constituency when the mayor offered his services free of charge to help the residents of the municipality. He was provided with the funds required to implement a project which would have enabled him to build sidewalks and repair his municipal workshop. And three days after the work started an inspector from the Quebec Construction Office came and ordered him to stop the works and told him he would be penalized and fined unless he had a good member of parliament to defend him. So the mayor, a very intelligent man, told him: It is incredible, you set the fire and then you say: If you have a good member, he will put it out.

Mr. Speaker, that kind of situation is not acceptable in a Christian and civilized society. I think that an agreement should be possible between federal and provincial authorities so that we can really work and ensure public services and employment opportunities for the people.

Mr. Speaker, I brought that matter to the attention of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) who committed himself to communicate with the Quebec labour minister. So I hope that consultations have begun and that they will have positive results so that such situations will not reoccur.

Mr. Speaker, here is the most efficient measure that the government can take to lighten the unemployment burden: public works. As recently as last week, I received representations from municipalities asking that retaining walls be built along the St. Lawrence River because every year the water eats away part of the riverside properties.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat embarrassed in answering my friend, my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), as I have before me an answer written in the other official language, so I must answer in that language and I hope he will excuse me for that.

[English]

As the hon. member has indicated, unemployment in Canada has recently been at a level of 8.5 per cent of the labour force. However, it should be noted that in October the unemployment rate dropped to a seasonally adjusted rate of 8.2 per cent, the lowest rate registered in over a year.

Because our labour force has been growing much more rapidly than in other industrialized countries—since 1970 about 3½ per cent a year, compared to 2 per cent for the U.S., under 1 per cent for the U.K., France and Japan, and a decline for Germany—unemployment has reached very high levels, despite the rapid increase in the number of Canadians who are working. Employment increased by more than 3.6 per cent in the last year, and 362,000 more Canadians are working today than one year ago.

One of the main reasons for the fast growth of the labour force is the rapidly growing participation of Canadian women in the labour force.

Another important reason for the growth of the labour force has been a surge of young people coming into the labour market. This surge is not expected to last. The population in the 15 to 19-year-old age group is expected to decline after 1979. However, the immediate challenge has been to create enough jobs for all our young people and to alleviate other structural unemployment problems.

In the field of manpower-training and job creation, the government has recently announced an employment strategy for 1979-80 which continues the key objective of increasing the employment and employability of all Canadians, while shifting the emphasis to helping industry train and employ Canadians, and particularly young job seekers.

A main feature of the 1979-80 employment strategy is the development of a strategy to increase youth employment, particularly in the private sector, at a cost of $225 million. The summer youth employment program will be expanded, which includes programs such as Young Canada Works, Summer Job Corps, and so on. Expenditures will be increased on year round youth employment and employability programs, Youth Job Corps—a new program—job experience training, and so on, from $14.5 million this fiscal year to nearly $110 million in 1979-80. It is expected that the JET program alone will provide private sector employment and experience to over 63,000 youth in 1979-80.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but his time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—REQUEST HOUSE BE INFORMED OF REASONS FOR RAISING INTEREST RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my questions arise out of questions I asked in the House on November 6 concerning the rise in the interest rate announced the day previous to my questions. In asking my questions, I brought to the minister's attention the fact that the rise in the interest rate represented something far more serious than the government appreciated at that time.

In considering the financial measures brought in by this government, we have to take all things in context. For example, we have to take the budget in context, not only of the cutbacks announced on August 1 by the government, but also in the context of the rise in the rate of interest which has taken place since January of this year.

This rise brings us to the unprecedented point where our interest rate is at 10¾ per cent. Our concern is that the impact of this increase and the effect it will have right through the economy has not been sufficiently appreciated by the government in bringing down its budget.

In his evidence on November 6, the main rationale expressed by Governor Bouey was that he was preoccupied with the concern that unless we did something about our interest rates to keep them at a higher percentage than the American rate, Canada's dollar would decline and we would be in a very dangerous position. He described it as depreciating our way into inflation. The governor referred to the British disease. Members of the official opposition referred to the danger of Canada catching the British disease. That disease manifests itself if a currency depreciates too quickly and the cost of imports go way up. That will have an effect on inflation right through the economy.

In attempting to avoid catching the British disease, we are subject to another disease which can be called the Canadian disease. The Canadian disease in respect of the economy and high interest rates is our dependence on the U.S. If the Americans take a decision with regard to American interest rates, that decision is based on a set of decisions which apply in the United States. However, the same concern as would lead to a decision being taken in the United States with respect to its economy, may have nothing to do with the decision taken with respect to our economy. So in effect we are taking a decision over which we have no genuine control as a result of a decision made in the United States. I do not say this out of any knee-jerk anti-Americanism or anything of that kind. That is not the case on my part. My concern is that in responding to what basically it sees as external requirements, the need to guarantee that the Canadian dollar does not fall below 85 cents, the government is tying itself to a high rate of interest for a considerable time—I suggest it has no idea when interest rates will go down in the United States.

Answering my question, the minister said he would take into account the problems of the interest rate when he brought down his budget. I see no evidence whatever that the budget will be able to provide an antidote to these serious inflationary measures affecting the economy. Therefore, without being a prophet of gloom or doom, the question I direct to the parliamentary secretary is this: if the government intends to carry out a policy of high interest rates, can he not tell us what policies it intends to carry out at the same time to make sure we do not sacrifice our internal strength, our industrial strength and our economic health to the need to protect our foreign exchange markets?

This is a dilemma. It is one which the government has not faced straight on. It seems to me we are sacrificing much of our industrial health to maintain the standard of the dollar and in following this policy, in attempting to avoid the British disease, we are in danger of getting the Canadian disease. Many military men are accused of fighting wars that are already over, instead of addressing themselves to the circumstances of today. In the same way, economists would be well advised to fight the current war instead of seeking to apply solutions which are now outmoded. I fear there will be serious deflation as a result of the government's determination, I would say blind determination, to keep our interest rates one point ahead of rates in America.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my response I should repeat the comment made by the minister at the time he replied to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae). He stated clearly that it is the Governor of the Bank of Canada who establishes the interest rate. It is not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who makes that decision.

The decision to raise interest rates required a balancing of judgments of the consequences of raising them against the consequences of not raising them.

The bank and the government would have preferred not to have been faced with the need to make this difficult decision, but the move by the U.S. authorities forced us to consider the consequences for Canada of higher interest rates in the U.S.

If the higher interest rates in the U.S. were likely to lead to an outflow of capital from Canada, a resumption of the decline in the value of our currency and an increase in the cost of imports and domestic production, this would be damaging to domestic stability and our capacity to employ Canadians. These consequences would develop quickly but linger to plague our economic performance for some time. In arriving at a decision they are to be compared with the restraining effects of higher interest rates. It is not possible to predict when circumstances may change, but when they do, we can contemplate lower interest rates again.

● (2227)

Higher interest rates are certainly an element of increased cost to business. The risk was that without an increase in interest rates we might get other costs rising and built more permanently into the cost structure of Canadian industry.

The policy of the government continues to be to seek to establish the conditions for further declines in our prices and costs so as to consolidate our improved competitive position in order that we may, with renewed confidence, increase our share of world markets and our ability to satisfy our own needs. That is the surest way to increase the employment of our growing labour force. It is our judgment that the action taken on Sunday night—to which the hon. member has referred—in the face of the U.S. move, is much more consistent with this objective than a policy of no action would have been.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn this House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF TAKEOVER BY PETRO-CANADA OF PACIFIC PETROLEUMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion concerns the refusal of this government to bring before parliament all aspects pertaining to the state takeover of Pacific Petroleums by Petro-Canada.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That the annual report of Petro-Canada, together with the subject matter of the takeover of Pacific Petroleums, be referred immediately to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED LEASING OF GRAIN ELEVATOR AT PRESCOTT, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning the fact that the government has called for proposals for the leasing of the grain elevator at Prescott, Ontario, rather than continuing on the present basis under which it is operated by the government at a substantial profit.

I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

Whereas the government has not made clear its full intentions, and whereas members of local 583 of the United Food Processors Union at the Canada Starch Company in Cardinal, and public service employees at the elevator itself, have expressed deep concern about the impact this situation will have on their job security, this House requests the Minister of Transport to immediately clarify the matter in a way that will not affect job security in these areas, and also that he guarantee the Prescott grain elevator will not be leased to foreign interests, particularly United States interests which reportedly have some advance arrangement with the government which can only be considered highly improper.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN SUPPORT PRICE OF MILK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

Because, when he announced the dairy policy of the government for 1975, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) stated that the support price of industrial milk would be revised periodically to take into account increases in the cost of production of 4 per cent or more; because production costs have risen to an extent that would justify a higher support price; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House urge the Minister of Agriculture to authorize an increase in the support price to be paid fully and directly to dairy producers, that it be recommended to them that they spend a few cents per additional hundredweight on publicity urging the people to consume more dairy products.

Mr. Speaker: According to Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARKS CANADA

PROTESTED REDUCTION OF TOURIST SEASON AT FORT LOUISBOURG, N.S.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of statements of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) urging Canadians to take domestic vacations, and in view of the fact that Parks Canada has cut down the operating season for Fort Louisbourg by four weeks, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development immediately restore the full tourist season at the fortress to promote tourism and local employment, and his department begin immediately on the restoration of the Royal Battery as requested by the Louisbourg and District Planning and Development Commission.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

GUIDELINES FOR MINISTERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed, I suppose, to the Acting Prime Minister, pro tem, who I think is the minister of everything across the way. My question relates to an answer given by the Prime Minister yesterday to my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, who was inquiring about any guidelines that might exist in relation to the role of deputy ministers who serve on Crown corporations.

The Prime Minister indicated that the purpose of the presence of the deputy ministers or other representatives of the government on Crown corporations was to ensure that they represent the interests of the government. What is of concern is the possibility that their presence may confer some special advantage upon a Crown corporation; that is a matter which is of concern both to the public and to the public service. In light of the possibility of some special advantage being conferred upon Crown corporations which is not available to their competitors, because of the presence of deputy ministers, I wonder if the government is now considering the preparation of any guidelines to cover the conduct of deputy ministers in that kind of situation? If the government is considering such a preparation, could we have an undertaking now that these guidelines will be presented to the House of Commons?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course, it is the nature of some Crown corporations that they are in a very special position in the economy as instruments of government policy in order that certain things can be accomplished which would not happen otherwise in the private sector through the ordinary operations of the free enterprise system. In that sense, a very close relationship, obviously, is a rather natural thing.

● (1412)

It has been our broad practice to distinguish between those corporations which are in that position, where they are relying very heavily on ongoing votes of money from this House for their continuing work, from those others where they have a greater amount of independence and are more in the straightforward competitive field. I am thinking now of the moves we have made in relation to CN and Air Canada.

Generally speaking, I would say that as we see a Crown corporation move into the second category, we tend to move away to independent boards of directors as well and sever that closer connection except through the appropriate forms of capital budget approvals and such estimates as may be required in this House for specific projects which they undertake at our request.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I take it, then, that there are no formal guidelines and, indeed, that the informal guidelines, if they exist at all, are very general. If that is incorrect the minister might want to correct it when he rises.

My specific question now is, is it the practice of the government, in relation to a Crown corporation such as Petro-Canada, to restrict in any way the activities of any deputy minister who might be present on the board of that Crown corporation to a role that would narrowly ensure that the specific purposes of the Government of Canada are accomplished by this Crown corporation? If so, is that restriction conveyed by way of any guidelines or any kind of communication?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the question is essentially too general in its nature. The reason for not having a specific or single set of guidelines is that each of those Crown corporations may be quite different from the others in the exact purpose they are to serve, and in the exact relationship between the Crown corporation and the government. Therefore, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition has a specific question about a specific relationship, it would be better directed to the minister with the responsibility for the Crown corporation, or at least to the minister whose deputy minister is serving on that board.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the reason I am addressing these questions generally is because there is an increasing policy on the part of this government to become active in more and more areas of the economy. I am interested in the general policy that applies in this situation.

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell this House, in relation to this general policy, whether there are any restrictions on deputy ministers who serve in a capacity as members of the board of Crown corporations as to the transmission of inside information pertaining to the policies of the Government of Canada to other directors of the same Crown corporation?

Mr. Lang: Again, Mr. Speaker, I would say that that question is put too broadly. There may be times when a specific form of government information is needed and is exactly part of the way in which the corporation would carry out its mandate.

That has no reference whatever to the recent debate about Petro-Canada. It is not this government's view that greater intervention is required in general by the government in the private sector; but nonetheless, notwithstanding our broad belief that the private sector is the basis and the mainstay of our development in Canada, it continues to be our belief that it may be necessary occasionally to take steps where we or Crown corporations are involved. I would think that the acquiring of a big oil company from otherwise foreign interests is a very good step indeed.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Committee for an Independent Canada does not agree with that, and the minister has overlooked the fact that 30 per cent of the shareholders of Pacific Petroleums are Canadian citizens.

In light of the fact that there are a wide number of concerns resulting from the discrepancy between the view as stated by the minister, and the government's practice in acquiring airlines one day and oil companies the next day, I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister would be prepared to give this House an assurance that the government would make an immediate reference to the appropriate standing committee of the House of the annual report of Petro-Canada, with specific reference to the possibility of that committee having a mandate large enough to look into the several questions arising from the proposed acquisition by Petro-Canada of Pacific Petroleums?

Would the Government of Canada make that reference immediately, so that the Parliament of Canada can look quickly into the implications of an arrangement which causes very real concern across this country?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly convey that request to the government House leader. I am sure it has been noted by the ministers responsible for this area.

I would say, again, that the Leader of the Opposition is quite wrong to take note of the purchase of Nordair as some acquisition by the government that is in some strange way inconsistent with our policy. That was made for a very specific reason having to do with the whole restructuring of airlines. As the hon. member knows, it was Premier Lougheed, a Conservative, who acquired an airline, apparently intending to keep it, and only agreeing gradually to dispose of it after I talked to him about the matter.

DEPUTY MINISTERS ON BOARDS OF CROWN CORPORATIONS REPORTING BACK TO MINISTER

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Obviously, if the purpose of having senior civil servants and deputy ministers on these corporations is to solidify and to be an implementation of public policy, at the very least the top civil servants or the deputy ministers on the board have to report back to the minister. There is at least an expectation that they will report back.

Surely there is some general policy. Is there some general policy, is there some directive, is there some guideline in respect of the manner of reporting back to the minister by the deputy minister, especially in the sensitive post of Deputy Minister of Finance in a time of budget-making? Are there guidelines? Is there policy in respect of that particular matter?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did indicate that the various corporations involved are so different in their make-up and the nature of their role in the private sector, or in the economy generally, that that question cannot be answered in a general fashion. If the hon. member would like to put it in committee in relation to each of the corporations in question, I am sure he can be answered fully then.

REPORT OF DEPUTY MINISTER TO MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, it is unbelievable that there is no general policy. May I now put a question to the Minister of Finance? How did, when did, and what did the Deputy Minister of Finance report to the Minister of Finance just prior to the budget, in respect of the Petro-Can, Pacific Petroleums deal?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was informed at the time by my deputy minister of the desire of Petro-Canada of the acquisition of these corporations. In relation to the retractable term preferred share system, I should like to give information to the House that this system was used by Petro-Canada two years ago when they acquired Atlantic Richfield of Canada. they negotiated the same type of operation when they tried to acquire Husky.

When people are trying to convey the impression that they could have been informed by my deputy minister, in fact this technique was known by Petro-Canada for two years and had been used two years ago. The hon. member should not be afraid that the Deputy Minister of Finance had given any indication before the budget.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RIGHT OF EMPLOYEES TO RUN FOR PUBLIC OFFICE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Secretary of State. On November 16 I asked the minister about the firing of Mr. Garth Brewer by the Department of Revenue because he had decided to become a candidate for the New Democratic Party in the recent election in New Brunswick.

In his letter to me, which arrived this morning, the minister seemed to give his full support to the commission's decision that, by becoming a candidate, his function in the civil service would be impaired. Considering that the Liberal candidate in the riding of Winnipeg North is on leave from a senior position in the minister's own department which involved making recommendations on grants to ethnic groups, would the minister agree that such a position is at least as politically sensitive as that of a clerk in a Customs department in New Brunswick? If so, what action does he plan to take to see that Mr. Brewer is treated justly?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am slightly surprised at the interpretation the hon. member places on my letter. It is not for me to support, endorse, criticize or deny the decision of the Public Service Commission. It is really my function simply to report, which I was seeking to do without editorial gloss, the news which had been conveyed to me by the Public Service Commission.

If the hon. member interpreted my letter as either an endorsement or criticism of the Public Service Commission, he is mistaken in this regard. He has asked me to intervene. I gather from his comments he is asking me to take some course of action, perhaps to overrule the Public Service Commission or have their opinion changed. I do not have that power, so I would not intend to follow the advice of the hon. member in that regard.

● (1422)

I can add, however, that if he were to think there was some sort of calculated plot against the New Democratic Party there is, in the Post Office, a Mr. Serle who applied for and was granted leave to seek the NDP nomination for Brandon-Souris, Manitoba. Mr. Serle has not yet taken his leave; he is waiting for the writs to be issued. In that case, at least, the solicitation of an NDP nomination has not, as a result of the Public Service Commission or the department's actions, been denied. So the case which he has raised is one that you can see was considered by the Public Service Commission as an individual case. The conclusion that they came to is their conclusion and I simply reported it to the hon. member.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, a question of fundamental rights is really involved. I raised the Liberal candidate's position, not to disagree—because we fully support that man having the right to run—nor to raise the general question about discrimination against candidates in my party. I am talking about a particular man who was denied. The minister said in his letter:

The department, therefore, took the necessary action to deal with this offence.

It is for this reason that I said to the minister that he seemed to agree with the commission. Since other courses of action were open to the commission, short of dismissal, it was not necessary for them to take this action. Would the minister intervene, as a minister of the Crown who has some responsibility in this area, to ensure that this man gets his job back? It is absurd to pretend that the function he has in the civil service would be impaired if he became a candidate for any political party.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I will consider the hon. member's representations, but I must say my response at this moment is that my responsibility is to report. It is not to make my own assessment of the justice of the case and to intervene with the Public Service Commission to impose my assessment on them. I believe that is not the role of the Secretary of State in his relationship with the Public Service Commission.

I will reflect on the hon. member's remarks, but it would be wrong for me to mislead him by saying that it was likely, as a result of that reflection, that I would take the course of action he has recommended.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is this: since there is no provision in the law that permits another appeal by this individual, I ask the minister to consider very carefully what he has just said, which seems to lead to a negative conclusion. Considering this man is not doing a job that any reasonable person could consider to be politically sensitive, and considering that there is no other recourse open to the individual, he has lost his job, and there was no criticism about it before, will the minister intervene on his behalf and urge reinstatement? Also, will he consider amending the laws that now exist to avoid such cases in the future?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member, as I did in my previous answer, that I will consider it very carefully. I do not want to mislead him by saying now that there is a course of action which I am disposed to take, that is to say, the one which he recommended. There is perhaps an alternative which I will also look into, that of the Human Rights Commission being seized of the issue.

I must say to the hon. member honestly that on the basis of the exploration which I have so far undertaken, while I would consider seriously what he has recommended to me, I cannot say at the moment that I am disposed to follow the recommendation that he has made.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN SUPPORT PRICE OF MILK

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and relates to the dairy industry. As in the case of many other matters, this question must be raised from time to time.

The heads of the federation of Quebec agricultural producers are now meeting with federal members of parliament to inform them of their grievances concerning the indexation of industrial milk support price. Could the minister tell the House whether he has received representations to this effect from the authorities for this federation? As far as the Canadian Dairy Commission or the Department of Agriculture are concerned, were these representations examined in order to determine by how much production costs have gone up and to raise the support price accordingly, if need be, in a reasonable proportion?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the formula that is used for pricing and triggering the support price for industrial milk products showed that it should be triggered, I believe, around October 1. The statistics we use are from Statistics Canada. It takes about three months to have them finalized, so that you can tell when the price should be triggered.

However, the Canadian Dairy Commission has authority to recommend to the Minister of Agriculture certain changes at any time they see fit. They recommend that at the present time we not go ahead with a price increase because it would not necessarily be beneficial to the producers of the product, as consumer buying would probably back off if the product were priced too high. In turn, they would stockpile more industrial products. We have a surplus, although not a big one, at the present time. Therefore, they would not be enjoying the extra income some think they would be receiving.

We have a new program advertising industrial dairy products which is just getting off the ground. We are satisfied that this will be beneficial. I understand the Canadian Dairy Commission will be making a written recommendation to me within the next few days on just what action we should take.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's answer, I would like to ask him if, following the recommendations of the Canadian Dairy Commission, a price is set and an increase decided?

Can the minister take the necessary action, even if that means amending some regulations, to ensure that the increase is passed on directly and totally to producers and that the producers, on their part, agree to put a few cents a hundredweight at the disposal of their organization or the Canadian Dairy Commission to help finance publicity aimed at encouraging Canadians to consume more Canadian dairy products?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are running an advertising program with the dairy producers and processors to do just what the hon. member is asking be done. I generally follow the Canadian Dairy Commission's recommendations. As I said, they are concerned about a drastic increase in the price of industrial products which would turn off the consumers. At this time, I do not know what their final recommendation will be to me. However, I am sure it will be for the benefit of all concerned, both the consumers and the producers.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SENTENCE IMPOSED ON KEITH RICHARDS FOR POSSESSION OF DRUGS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. On October 24, Keith Richards was convicted of possession of heroin. He is famous for being connected with The Rolling Stones. He had previous convictions for the same offence a week before coming to Canada the last time. He was given a suspended sentence of one year and was admonished to improve his general situation with respect to drugs.

I endeavoured to move a motion in the House the next day calling for action to be taken to appeal that ridiculous and preposterous sentence. It was turned down by the Minister of Justice, who was vocal on that occasion, and other Liberal members. At that time—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: If the right hon. member has a question, would he put it forthwith, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I always have to make it clear. Apparently I cannot do it, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member has already had a rather generous preamble. Would he put his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is most unusual that I am treated generously by you.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If that's the way you want it, all right.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS BY PERSONS CHARGED UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General which relates to the rather ridiculous affidavit filed by the minister under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act denying access by Douglas Creighton and Peter Worthington of the Toronto Sun to 548 documents which reputable counsel says are necessary to their defence against charges under the Official Secrets Act.

Since this government action and that of the minister is in violation of ordinary principles of criminal law and could lead to a possible miscarriage of justice, and since it also indicates vindictiveness and bad faith on the part of the government on this particular issue, will the Solicitor General review his decision and withdraw his affidavit?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows full well that the charge was laid under the Official Secrets Act, and no comment is to be made by me on a matter which is sub judice. I wish the hon. gentleman would abide by the same principle.

There were two affidavits filed. One related to section 41(1) of the Federal Court Act and dealt with some 16,500 documents which are made available to the court in order that the court may determine the validity of the grounds I have advanced in terms of the documents themselves, in terms of their sensitivity and in terms of the necessity of not producing those documents during the trial.

As for the 548 other documents which are the subject of the second affidavit, Mr. Speaker, the reason for that affidavit being filed is simply that it relates to documents obtained from third country agencies and the hon. gentleman knows, or ought to know, that the security we maintain with third country agencies must be respected and is dependent upon the confidentiality of information received.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on the question of sub judice, I am dealing with bad executive action, not questioning what is before the court. Having in mind the admission of one former solicitor general that he signed a letter containing inaccurate information, and bearing in mind it is very doubtful that this Solicitor General examined every one of those 548 documents, would he not withdraw his decision and allow the court to examine the documents and make its own decision?

Mr. Blais: The major portion of those 16,500 documents, as I have already indicated to the hon. member, are subject to section 41(1); the court will have access to those documents and will review them. I have spent the better portion of 17 hours going through every file containing those documents, and I stand by the affidavits I have filed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL SECURITY

ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS BY PERSONS CHARGED UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River for a final supplementary.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): My final supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. As this instance of government secrecy follows on the heels of the refusal of the Prime Minister to live up to his undertaking to Mr. George Bain of the Toronto Star to make available to Mr. Bain certain documents in the Treu case, will the government get off their collective, asinine fear of secrecy, words which the Prime Minister well understands, and bring in strong freedom of information legislation first promised in this House by Mr. Mitchell Sharp in February of 1976 and, by so doing, pension off this ridiculous section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act and the discredited part of the Official Secrets Act which we have been talking about?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a lot of confusion in that question. I do not know whether I can draw all the threads of it together, in spite of the hon. member's asinine considerations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: He referred to a promise I made to George Bain. That promise had to do with saying we had no objection if NATO had no objection. They were NATO documents which somebody had worked on. I still have no objection if NATO wants to produce them, and if Mr. Bain wants to address himself to NATO I see no objection to that.

An hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, he did? Then complain to NATO. I don't know what NATO will say. They are not our documents, Mr. Speaker, they are NATO documents and it is NATO which asked certain individuals to work on them. I have no objection if NATO wants to respond to the advocate of Mr. Bain sitting on the opposition benches here.

As far as section 41(1) is concerned, I know the hon. member has stated before that he thinks this section should not exist. That is a matter of disagreement. We think the government cannot discharge itself of its obligation to protect documents which, as the Solicitor General has said, were given to us in confidence by other countries. When they make us party to their information and security operations, such documents are given to us on the understanding that we will not make them public. I am surprised to hear the hon. member say we should go back on our word and just treat these matters very lightly, as I know the hon. member would.

SOCIAL SERVICES

FUNDS TO PROVINCES FOR SOCIAL WELFARE PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that the minister has held the meeting with her provincial counterparts, a meeting to which she had to be shanghaied in order to get her to attend, and now that the block funding proposal as presented in a bill before the last parliament is dead, can the hon. lady tell the House whether she has set a ceiling on the amount of funds to be transferred to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan for social welfare programs and, if so, what is the amount of that ceiling? Would she also tell us whether she consulted with the provinces before setting that ceiling?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with what the hon. member has just said in the preamble to his question. Following consultations with the provinces, I have decided to wait until the conference of finance ministers is over to discuss this matter on a more solid basis. I had a fine meeting with my provincial counterparts yesterday and the day before. We dealt among other things with the postponement or in fact the temporary cancellation of block funding and we agreed on the necessity to control the immediate expansion of the social service sector. As the hon. member has just indicated, no ceiling has been set.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, given the penchant of this minister and of this government to act unilaterally, and given the fact that the provinces have been trying to have this meeting since September 1, since which time two bills have been presented to us, specifically the unemployment insurance legislation which is of special concern to the provinces, as the minister well knows, because it will transfer some of the responsibility for unemployment to the provinces, thus adding to the welfare burden, will the minister consult with the provinces either bilaterally or on a multilateral basis, especially with provinces such as New Brunswick which has already told the minister it will be obliged to pay an additional $8 million in welfare on account of the changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act and the decrease in the amount of the equalization payment?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the Canada Assistance Plan is made up of two sections, the largest being a federal payment of about $1 billion a year which goes to personal welfare. This is a cost-shared program on a 50-50 basis which we intend to continue, fully honouring our commitment. I remind the hon. member that the restraint program put to the Canadian nation by the federal government last summer was accepted by all my provincial colleagues, and their own governments have set the tone by agreeing with the Prime Minister last February. They have the same problem we do: there is no more money in their budgets than there is in ours.

We are all honouring the CAP commitment to provide personal welfare to protect Canadians who are having difficulties because of unemployment or for other reasons. As a result of the reduction in the monthly family allowance, some of the richest provinces will lose small amounts of revenue because family allowances are taxable. But I remind the hon. member that the huge additional child tax credits and the increased guaranteed income supplement will be spent in provincial economies. More money will therefore be made available to them as a result of the federal sales tax cut.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not really address my question. There is concern in the provinces where unemployment is highest and, consequently, where welfare is highest. This applies particularly to the five eastern provinces. Given the fact that in their presentation yesterday, the ministers lumped the UI proposals, the family allowance proposals and block funding all together—because obviously these things are of concern to them—will the minister consult with the provincial ministers, either on a bilateral basis or meet with them in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, where unemployment is most concentrated, to discuss ways and means of offsetting the additional burden which will be placed upon them by the proposals which are now before the House in the bill sponsored by her colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, dealing with unemployment insurance? Will she deal with that, because she knows that this will mean a substantial additional burden on many provinces and municipalities?

An hon. Member: You voted for it.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it quite clear that if the welfare rolls of the provinces become larger—we have estimated the cost will increase by $50 million—the UI program is being tightened up and there will be a saving of over $700 million to the Canadian taxpayers. We are going to share half of the additional welfare cost through CAP personal assistance.

When the very generous UI program was first introduced a few years ago, the provinces made a lot of money because many people were taken off their welfare rolls. I remind the hon. member that, generally speaking, the philosophy of the welfare ministers of the provinces favours tightening up the Unemployment Insurance Act much more.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

RELATIONSHIP OF NET NATIONAL DEBT TO GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the national debt, which is a meaningful subject only if it is compared with income. In 1952 the net national debt was 52 per cent of the gross national product; in 1962 it was 33 per cent; in 1978—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, would he put it.

Mr. McRae: With the amount of borrowing that has been going on in the last year and which will be going on in the next year, can the minister assure us that this debt will remain well below 25 per cent or well below 30 per cent, which is the average for this period?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can give the assurance to the hon. member that the present debt level in relation to the gross national product level is well below what it was in 1962, when it was 33.4 per cent. For this year it will be 18.9 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

FUNDS ALLOCATED BY MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS IN CANADA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that many of the largest multinational corporations in Canada allocate very small percentages of their research and development expenditures to their Canadian subsidiaries, and since this failure has meant the loss of thousands of skilled jobs in Canada, was this question discussed with the U.S. Secretary of State in meetings in the last couple of days?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire. I myself did not discuss this subject with the Secretary of State of the United States. We discussed mainly international issues, disarmament in particular.

GOVERNMENT POLICY VIS-À-VIS RESEARCH BY MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS IN CANADA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the government any views on what the appropriate level of research and development expenditures by these multinational corporations should be in Canada, and does the government have any intention to discuss this marked reluctance of multinationals to establish effective research and development programs in Canada with their corporations; or does the minister believe that the tax concessions and write-offs offered by the Minister of Finance in his budget the other day will be enough to persuade them to invest in research and development in this country?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have stated publicly that we would like to see the private sector spend 1.5 per cent of our gross national product on research and development in this country. With regard to every application before the Foreign Investment Review Agency respecting new companies or the takeover of existing companies, we stress that a greater amount of research and development should be conducted by corporations and in some cases multinational corporations which are coming into Canada.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PROPOSED MERGER OF MANULIFE-STANDARD LIFE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Last Monday the minister confirmed that the proposed Manulife-Standard Life merger agreement had been cancelled. Now can he tell us the real reasons behind the failure of those negotiations?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it does not fall on me to give the real reasons for this development, it is up to the companies to give explanations to the public. I think they have issued a press release and I was told that Standard Life intends to keep operating in Montreal. When this whole matter was submitted to me, I was concerned with maintaining the rate of employment in Montreal and I thought this was the best solution. According to Standard Life, things seem to have improved and it has decided to stay in Canada. I am very happy about it.

INQUIRY WHETHER STANDARD LIFE WILL STAY IN MONTREAL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, following the comments of the minister which we found interesting, could he tell us also whether he has been assured that the Standard Life Company estimated $200 million surplus will remain in Canada and whether it will continue to operate in Montreal with the same labour force? What kind of assurance did he receive to tell us that the company will remain in Montreal and will keep the same labour force for the benefit of Montrealers or Quebeckers working there?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the officials of the company have decided to continue to operate and I hope that the climate in Quebec will improve to enable them to operate in both official languages so that they may be in position to serve their clients throughout Canada. As for the mandatory reserves of course they must comply with the standards set by the superintendent of insurance of Canada and they must maintain the necessary level to protect their policyholders in Canada.

IMMIGRATION

ADMITTANCE TO CANADA OF VIETNAMESE REFUGEES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and it relates to the proposed admission to Canada of the Vietnamese people on the Hai Hong.

Can the minister inform the House as to the authority upon which these refugees are being brought to Canada? The Hai Hong is assumed to have arranged its voyage with the co-operation of ship operators who have collaborated with a Vietnamese policy of allowing persons deemed undesirable to leave the country in return for their money and other possessions.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I doubt that anyone who is familiar with the plight of these individuals would deny the fact that they are refugees. It has been determined in a prima facie way by the United Nations High Commissioner that they are refugees. During the Second World War there were many people of the Jewish faith who paid exorbitant sums of money to get out of a particular country. I do not think anyone would deny that they were refugees. This is an escape route which has been found by some people.

I think it is reprehensible: I think very little of people who trade in this kind of human tragedy. My suggestion has been that these people should be allowed off the ship, that the ship should be seized and sold and that the money be used to look after the refugees. However, we are not going to turn our backs on these people who are in very desperate need.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I—and I think everyone in this House—accept absolutely the proposition that people are being victimized. However, I am concerned about the over-all refugee problem and the quota the government has on refugees, and I am concerned about the position the government is taking with respect to this particular Vietnamese policy.

This government is becoming an unwilling partner in a situation in which the Vietnamese government is apparently victimizing people. The situation is very tragic. I wonder if the minister is taking any steps regarding this apparently growing international situation. We may be faced with the very same situation again in the not too distant future.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, this matter is obviously of concern to the Canadian government. We are concerned about the actions which are being taken, but I do not think that those who are being victimized should be punished. To the credit of the Malaysian government, I must say that that government has accepted in excess of 35,000 people who have been considered to be legitimate refugees. The Malaysian government does not want to do anything to encourage this particular trade.

● (1452)

In this particular instance, we just felt some action had to be taken. We have taken what we think is an appropriate step. Probably we could have taken more, but obviously it has acted as a catalyst: it has made Canada a leader in this particular instance. I am very pleased to see that other countries have now taken up our initiative. We are concerned, as Australians and others are, about the impact of encouraging people in this particular way. That is something we will have to look at. I think probably the United Nations is the proper forum in which to do that. Right now they are people in need, and we are going to help them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POST OFFICE

CRITICISM OF PROPOSED INCREASE IN POSTAL RATES—REQUEST DECISION BE REVIEWED

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. Considering the great concern the decision of the Postmaster General has engendered in the Canadian direct mail industry, and noting that various alternatives to postal services are being considered by the direct mail industry which will lead only to an even higher deficit for the Post Office, is the Postmaster General now willing to review his decision to increase postal rates? Is he looking at alternatives to reducing the Post Office deficit, including introducing a heavy dose of hea!thy labour-management relations?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think there is no question of reviewing our decision about postal increases. Consultation has taken place with direct mailers and I think they understand our situation very well. I think they realize, if we want to act on businesslike principles, that we had to act the way we did.

As far as labour-management relations are concerned, I think we are doing everything we can at the moment to return to a climate of stability. We had a meeting today with the union in an attempt to discuss grievances and the differences we have with them. In general, the atmosphere is much better than it was before the strike.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Postmaster General: it concerns the postal users' conference which I attended in Toronto approximately two months ago and about which the Postmaster General has talked so profusely.

In view of the fact that postal users, the substantial ones, account for 83 per cent of the total revenue of the minister's department, and that the input from the conference may help to provide some guidance in matters currently afflicting the Post Office, can the Postmaster General give an undertaking to the House that the proceedings of this conference will be studied carefully by officials of his department and made available, at the earliest possible time, to members of the House and others concerned?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that the postal users' conference was not the Post Office conference; it was the users' conference. It was organized by them, for them and for us. We had some input. They gave us some reports on what they thought. They had working sessions and some small groups working together. If the hon. member was there and if some opinions were issued, he could have registered the opinions of different groups. The Post Office had some input in it. I can deliver to the hon. member, if he wants, some of the opinions we received from some of our users. But if my memory is correct, there was no report of the conference as a whole.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY RESPECTING EMPLOYEES FOR NEXT THREE YEARS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the President of the Treasury Board. When he introduced Bill C-12, on indexation, he indicated that in due course, or in the matter of a few weeks he would give some indication as to the special arrangements for 1979-81.

Has he given some consideration to this particular problem? Does he have an answer in terms of what the special arrangements will be, given the fact that he has some $535 million in the kitty and that the public service is quite concerned about knowing just what will happen in the next three years?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the hon. member had to confuse us by talking about a hidden $535 million.

Mr. Alexander: I did not say it was hidden.

Miss MacDonald: He did not say that.

Mr. Andras: In March, I believe, I clearly stated that this was the potential income. If I did not hear the hon. member properly, I apologize. At any rate, as I have indicated to another hon. member, those figures are now decided. The chief actuary as made his recommendations. I have consulted with the advisory committee on superannuation. I hope to reveal the exact degree of supplementation of basic pensions related to Bill C-12 on second reading which, hopefully, we will be dealing with next week. Then we can proceed from there.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the answer given by the minister, but at the same time there is another question which is equally important. Once we start talking about indexation, of course, we are concerned about the classification study, a report which was taken outside of the capital region.

As I understand it, the minister has had this study on his desk for a few weeks. Is he in a position to report whether he has taken action, in light of the fact that I have heard there is a move afoot to red circle? More importantly, the minister has given an undertaking to table this very important report, given the fact that we are dealing with millions of dollars in terms of overclassification. Is the minister prepated to table that classification study or report regarding overclassification of public servants? If so, will he do it this afternoon? Has he arrived at any solution to this very serious problem which is costing taxpayers millions of dollars?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will be making the results of that classification audit, inside and outside the national capital region, public within the matter of a few days. Also, I will deal with the response of the government to the findings of that audit at the same time.

DETRIMENTAL EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CANADA'S SCIENTIFIC COMMUNITY

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology: it relates to the demoralizing effect of current government policy on the Canadian scientific community.

In view of recent statistics released by the Professional Institute of Public Servants, PIPS, to the effect that more than 250 scientists will be out of work by next April, and recognizing recent statements by the president of the National Research Council expressing concern for Canada's economic welfare if our technology continues to be imported from abroad, will the minister advise the House as to what short-term policies he proposes in order to reverse this frightening trend?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather interesting that the party across the way, which I think is advocating cutting 20,000 or 30,000 public servants, is suddenly so concerned about 250 scientists.

Mr. Alexander: Don't mislead the House.

Mr. Buchanan: I am sorry—60,000 over three years. My arithmetic was wrong. There are two points I should like to make in response to the hon. member. We have put in place certain programs to try to increase the use of government laboratories. One of these is the scientific and technological employment program, which is a program under the economic growth component of Canada Works. It encourages the private sector to make use of university laboratories for conducting research. That is useful in the private industry.

In the budget of the Minister of Finance, we put in place a 25 per cent tax credit for small business and doubled the tax credit for larger size firms to try to increase the level of activity in research and development in Canada.

FISHERIES

FISHING QUOTAS IN NORTHWEST ATLANTIC

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the hon. Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. On January 1, 1979, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization will replace the International Commission for North Atlantic Fisheries as the regulatory body governing fishing in the Northwest Atlantic.

In light of the fact that this organization will be establishing regulations and setting quotas, I should like to ask the minister what steps he has taken to assure that fisheries ministers in Atlantic Canada, as well as Quebec, and representatives of the fishermen and fishermen's unions will have a chance to make some input into the establishment of quotas for fishing in the Northwest Atlantic?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the ministers of the various provinces are involved, but certainly their dputies are. I assume they communicate with each other. In fact, the provinces are fully represented on the offshore groundfish advisory committee and on all committees which deal with these matters.

I might underline, for the hon. member, that the stocks we are talking about today are outside the 200-mile zone, and that in fact it is very much in Canada's interest, and I think a tribute to our negotiators, that we have been able to have a say in respect of what takes place outside the 200 miles because that does have a considerable impact on the economies of these provinces, particularly Newfoundland.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's answer, it is my understanding that the NAFO convention has been signed by Canada, the U.S.S.R., Romania, East and West Germany, France, Italy, Portugal, Norway, Denmark and Great Britain. I would, therefore, ask the minister whether the United States, Spain, Poland, Cuba, Japan and Bulgaria have signed the NAFO convention and, if not, what effect will this non-compliance with regulations laid down by NAFO have on foreign fishing, not only in the areas the minister mentioned off the Flemish Cap, outside the 200-mile limit, but also in respect of established quotas within our 200-mile zone?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check on this, but I know that the convention has been open for signature and that some countries which did not sign indicated that really was because of problems of procedure. For example, in the case of the United States there is a procedure through Congress which has to be followed. I understand from discussions that they agree with the substance of the new convention or treaty. I know in specific cases that subdelegates told us verbally at the signing ceremony that once they had overcome procedural problems involved, they would sign, and that meanwhile they would live up to the expectations of other countries.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to a comment made in the House yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). It may well be, sir, that this could have been raised as a question of privilege, but it came to my attention only during the question period and I did not have the opportunity to give you notice. In any event, I would prefer to treat it as a simple question of disorder.

The matter arises from page 1319 of Hansard of yesterday in relation to an alleged question of privilege which Your Honour dismissed by indicating it was simply in the nature of debate. I do not want at this point, of course, to deal with the subject matter of that debate, which has to do with a difference of view between those of us in this party and those in the government as to the reality of obligations incurred by the people of Canada in the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums.

What concerns me is that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in reference to my party, and in reference particularly to me, made the following statement:

—that the opposition are trying to distort and trying to mislead.

Those were his words precisely.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Clark: I am sure that in spite of the rather Pavlovian reaction of some members on the other side the minister will recognize, as we all do, that from time to time in this House we state things a little more strongly than we intend. He will know, I am sure, that the imputation he has made in this statement is contrary to Beauchesne's fourth edition, Rule 154(3), and so I will not go to the extent of quoting it. I am sure he would want to take the opportunity now, as a gentleman, in the House to indicate simply that he spoke more enthusiastically than he intended, and withdraw the suggestion that we in this party are trying to distort and to mislead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to those words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I think any reasonable person who had followed the debate, as I have tried to follow it, would come to the same conclusion that I came to. I think the kind of statement put before the House yesterday by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) was clearly aimed at using the television media to create the impression that the Government of Canada had borrowed funds for the purchase of Pacific Pete, funds which the Government of Canada might have used, in the words of the Leader of the Opposition, to assist the people. I think his words which appear at page 1288 of Hansard were:

> Surely there are a number of Canadians looking for homes who could put that money to better use.

The Leader of the Opposition picked up exactly the same theme used the day before. It seems to me there was a clear implication in those words of the Leader of the Opposition that the Government of Canada might have used those funds for this purpose, implying that the Government of Canada had borrowed those funds to acquire Pacific Petroleums.

The Leader of the Opposition knows that Petro-Canada raised the funds, and I challenge him to say otherwise. He knows, from repeated evidence that has been put before this House, that Petro-Canada, or a subsidiary of Petro-Canada, raised these funds from the banking system, using a commercial instrument to finance a commercial transaction involving a Crown corporation of the government. This was organized by that Crown corporation, Petro-Canada.

As I have read the record it seems to me I can come to no other conclusion than that the opposition was trying to mislead. Whether it has been successful—

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Gillespie: Whether or not the opposition has been successful, I am not sure. However, if in your judgment, Mr. Speaker, the words I used are unparliamentary, of course I would be the first to wish to put the record straight. I really want to make the observation that quite clearly there seemed to be an intent to create an impression other than the fact.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I rise to my feet, of course, to accept the offer of the hon. minister to withdraw that line, and I presume that is what he did by his last sentence. I will give him the opportunity to make that perfectly clear in a moment.

I think what the minister has just said, and what all other members who have contributed to this in the last few days will realize, is that the rules which surround parliamentary propriety never govern what an hon. member is able to say, what they govern rather is the manner in which a statement can be made. The minister has said today that his impression was that remarks and questions by members of the opposition have been designed to create a certain impression which he has said is not in accordance with reality. That is precisely what he wanted to say, and that is the parliamentary way of saying it.

However, to say that there is an attempt to mislead or an attempt to distort, if not unparliamentary is certainly dangerously close to unparliamentary language. Therefore I welcome the offer of the minister to withdraw that language. I wish he would do so now unequivocally so we can close the book on this as a procedural matter and leave it in the realm of debate where, I said yesterday, I believe it belongs.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, you have used a felicitous phrase in describing what was my concern. Certainly I have no intention, and I make this quite clear, of in any way jeopardizing or in any way abusing the rules and practices of this House. I want to make that quite clear. In addition, I realize now that I might have used other language to convey my sentiments and to say exactly the same thing. However, for judicious reasons, I am quite prepared to withdraw those words.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I think the minister is being unduly generous in his withdrawal.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Abbott: I would refer you, Mr. Speaker, to page 1321 of Hansard of yesterday, where the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—

Mr. Speaker: Order. With due respect to anyone who wants to participate in this matter raised by way of a point of order to request the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie)—

An hon. Member: By way of privilege.

● (1512)

Mr. Speaker: It was not done by way of privilege, but by way of a point of order, requesting that a given minister withdraw certain remarks that he made, and the minister has done so. I have no authority to deal with that matter in any other way. The matter is closed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ABBOTT—STATEMENT MADE BY MEMBER FOR YORK-SIMCOE

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question of privilege. It relates to a similar type of incident in which the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) stated—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Where?

Mr. Abbott: —at page 1321 of Hansard, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) "misrepresented the true nature" of the Petro-Canada transaction, and that "it is in truth intolerable that this government persists in misleading the Canadian public" concerning this transaction. Why, Mr. Speaker, with language like that, can the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) get up and ask that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources withdraw his comments? I would ask that you instruct the hon. member for York-Simcoe, in light of this situation, to withdraw his comments made yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister will realize in respect to the point raised by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that I am not even sure that, as a result of his point of order, I had jurisdiction to compell the withdrawal of that remark. Under the circumstances it was not done on procedural grounds which would give me the authority to do that. However, the minister very happily withdrew the remark.

In respect to proceedings which have taken place earlier, without notice of some question of privilege today I believe that the Chair loses jurisdiction, as I indicated just recently to three members from the province of New Brunswick who were offended by remarks that were later gratuitously withdrawn. Therefore, if any withdrawal from those remarks is to be made, it would have to be done, not upon the basis of any procedural order from the Chair, but on the same basis upon which the minister just did so a moment ago, on his own.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Abbott: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see the consistency between your having the good grace to listen to the Leader of the Opposition and accept a withdrawal from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and my situation, when I raise an equally improper comment that was made yesterday and ask for withdrawal. You have said that I am out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I did no such thing. I think that we had better close the book on this before we all get into more trouble.

I will take the hon. minister through it step by step, if I must. Today the Leader of the Opposition stood in his place on a point of order, and the minister made a contribution to that point of order during which he indicated his willingness to withdraw certain remarks. I then saw the minister on a similar point, which he misdescribed as a question of privilege. Had the hon. member for York-Simcoe risen to make an equal contribution, he would have had the floor, but he did not. Therefore I have no procedural jurisdiction, and the matter is closed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POINT OF ORDER

MR. LANG—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—PROVINCES IN FAVOUR OF LINGUISTIC RIGHTS IN COURT

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. On November 15 I was answering a question asked by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) when he inquired about the implementation of a bill passed on June 23 last year with regard to linguistic rights in the courts. I had said that New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario had in effect responded affirmatively to our suggestion of April 1, 1979, as the date for implementation. It has now been brought to my attention that the correct date which we had suggested and to which they had agreed was March 1, 1979.

STARRED QUESTIONS

PROCEDURE IN DEALING WITH ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS REQUIRING ORAL ANSWERS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to starred questions and their status in parliament. I first brought this topic up in February, 1975. At that time I inquired about a question which had not been answered for approximately a month. Your answer on this point, sir, was that there was no way which you knew of by which you could enforce an answer on the particular question.

I would like to go over the history of the starred question and to say that I am fighting this case because of your position, sir, as well as the position in which it puts every member in this House, no matter on which side they sit. The starred question goes back to the time when the nation of Canada was formed. At that time the rules and regulations came from the Mother of Parliaments at Westminster.

During the Confederation Parliament of 1867 questions were put only on the order paper, and there were no oral questions or starred questions. It was not until members began to get fractious, as they do here occasionally, and were asking questions, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the only pure blooded French prime minister that we have had, in 1910 brought in the policy of putting an asterisk behind the question on the order paper instead of asking oral questions, because they were becoming too obstructive. The rule he introduced was that an asterisk would be put beside the question on any given day, and the following day that question would be answered.

● (1522)

It was not until the years 1929 to 1955 that starred questions were no longer put on the order paper. It was the Liberal government under Mr. St. Laurent that saw the wisdom of the starred question and had the procedures committee meet, which you and I have asked for several times, to try to establish the status of the starred question as one of the important procedures of our parliamentary system. At that time one of the speakers ruled that a starred question had to be answered.

As you know, custom dictates what this parliament does over the years. There is an idea prevalent among the newer members of this House, however, that a starred question need not be answered by a minister and may be left to fade away. I think Your Honour will agree that far too many questions are left on the order paper today.

In 1955, in order to speed things up, the Liberal government under Mr. St. Laurent saw fit to establish the status of the starred question. When I came here in 1957 it was a very well known fact that a question was to be answered within a period of seven days or less. Otherwise the minister of whom the question was asked was to get in touch with the member and ask for more time. I understood that to be a courtesy, that the question might be deferred for an answer, but we see it happening every day now. A question requiring a little more research was starred for the minister. In the United Kingdom they have two days, but under Sir Wilfrid Laurier we had one day.

It all goes back to the efficiency of parliament. Some members recently elected may find it difficult to catch Your Honour's eye or even to get up and ask a question, so it is much simpler for them to put it in written form. Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that one of the reasons for doing this was to give a member the opportunity to bring up something of particular concern to his riding but not necessarily to the Dominion of Canada. This is as relevant today as it was in his day.

One meeting of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization has been called in the last five years, Mr. Speaker. It was an organizational meeting and is referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the vice chairman of the committee, at page 4204 of Hansard, as follows:

> I want to put on record that the committee has not met once during this past session except for the formal organizational meeting. Not only in this session but in the long prior session, the government House leader has refused consistently to refer one item of House rules to that committee.

I went to the government House leader about this on three occasions. The first time he told me it would probably take six weeks, and the next time he said it would take a couple of weeks. I went to him again and he said he would call it within a week because there were other things that had to go on. I know, and you know, Mr. Speaker, and all members of the House know that they do not always carry out the things they want to and, indeed, it is sometimes impossible for them to do so. But it is three times—and you're out!

Be that as it may, Your Honour also asked for help from hon. members. It puts you in a very embarrassing position not to know how to rule on a particular question. It also takes something away from parliament that two prime ministers, Liberal leaders, had seen fit to introduce. For these reasons we have tried to get the matter back before the House. I would bring to Your Honour's attention that it was not until 1964 that even the oral question was accepted under the rules.

Custom dictates why these things are done. Just two weeks ago I spoke to the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who was very courteous and told me that he would see a meeting was called to look into this, as he was not aware of the situation. Today he sent me a note saying it was unfortunate he would have to leave the House because he was meeting Mr. Vance, the Secretary of State for the United States.

That is the situation to date, Mr. Speaker. Someone is certainly dragging his feet when a member of this House does not have the privilege of asking for a ruling and for that committee to meet. I say they should all be fired, although I do not know how the House leader can be fired. I have sat in this House a good many years and found him to be a man of wisdom, knowledge, and capability. I have a lot of respect for him and I hope he will—I am sure he will—see that the committee meets.

I am not fighting this thing for myself, Mr. Speaker, but I am going to keep on until something is done, out of respect for Your Honour. I realize your decisions must be made quickly, with wisdom, with honour and knowledge, and in all conscience.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the remarks made by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) with respect to the past look fairly accurate to me. He was quite right in his description of the historical context of the rules of this House which included provisions for starred questions, and the only reservation I might have has to do with his description of my very distinguished predecessor, Sir Wilfrid Laurier who once sat as the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska in this House; I agree with the hon. member that he was a very great man and the terms I would use is that he was and still is a very great Canadian, a genuine Canadian, and I think it is good to point that out and refrain from making distinctions based on one's mother tongue.

With respect to the starred questions itself, Mr. Speaker, if Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right in 1910 in introducing it in the rules, things have changed entirely today. As the hon. member pointed out, he now has the opportunity to put a question during a 40-minute period every day, and if it is not urgent he can have it put on the order paper. I do not see what difference it makes whether the question he puts on the order paper is answered orally or just printed in Hansard the next day as in any case he is not entitled to a supplementary question. So the reasons which historically justified the introduction of starred questions are no longer valid today. If the hon. member has a question to ask, all he has to do is rise any day of the week and put his question to the appropriate minister. If the question is not all that urgent, he can have it put on the order paper and he will get an answer printed in Hansard. I do not see what the hon. member would gain if I were to rise and, instead of quite simply having the answer printed in Hansard, read to him an answer which he cannot debate and on which he cannot ask a supplementary question. So I think that Standing Order 39(2) could be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization; I personally think that it is the most insignificant rule in our parliamentary procedures. And as to referring such a limited and unimportant matter in my mind to the Committee on Procedure and Organization, it seems to me that if we are to make this parliament work more effectively, as the hon. member would wish us to do, all the rules of this House should be referred to that committee. What the hon. member is actually proposing, Mr. Speaker—I mentioned this to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who was complaining about motions introduced under Standing Order 43 last year—represents 1/116 of our problem. There are 116 standing orders making up the rules of this House. I think they should all be reviewed together so we could modernize our procedures and make parliament younger, more modern and more efficient. And in that context I agree with the hon. member that this will provide an opportunity to review Standing Order 39(2) which I find has become insignificant in the context of 1978. But beyond that, referring to that committee only scraps of the procedures of this House I say is a waste of time, we have been procrastinating for too long and time has come to proceed with an in-depth reform which will enhance the role of members of parliament and make our presence in this House more rational, more efficient and all that to the benefit of the people of Canada.

● (1532)

[English]

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Why does the parliamentary secretary talk in this language? A week ago I spoke to the House leader who said that this matter would go to the procedure committee. As well, why did he say last year that it was because of some Tory decisions that he could not get the procedural committee to meet, whereas today he is saying that it does not matter? Mr. Speaker was put in an embarrassing position in February, 1975. At that time he had to rule on the matter as it stood. Here the parliamentary secretary is leaving it up in the air and he is not helping any member of this House by his attitude today. I might add that I intend to carry this matter further.

[Mr. Pinard.]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the revised amendment of Mr. Stevens (page 1249).

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, when we concluded our sitting last night I had just reviewed a number of discursive measures of short duration employed by the government over the past 15 years to stimulate research and development in Canada. I concluded that it is no wonder the private sector has not confidence in the government's programs to promote research and development. Research programs by their very nature are long-term operations. While the rewards are great, the waiting time for results is frequently not short. The transfer of technology from government and university research laboratories to the private sector of our economy has not been accomplished with the efficiency and frequency that I would like to see.

Recent Canadian research has shown that the use of particular semi-conductors of electrodes in photoelectro-chemical batteries may be a promising alternative to the costly power lines presently used.

Basic research led to the development of soft contact lenses with enormous commercial potential. Scientists have found that a placenta derived substance may confer considerable protection against cancer of the breast.

Engineers have invented a device which enables a rapid and complete separation of the components of sugar cane. This could lead to a relatively low cost alcohol which can be distilled and used as a gas supplement. Many of these could be the invention of the decade. They are just a few of the recent Canadian innovations which, if properly used, promoted and marketed, would assist our economy.

The government has before it a proposal from my own province, New Brunswick, that was alluded to at the recent federal-provincial conference of ministers responsible for science, research and development. The New Brunswick proposal relates to the basic resource of the province of New Brunswick, that is to say, forestry. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) made an announcement in this House last June about centres of excellence. He gave indications that the federal government would assist in the development of regional centres of excellence, both to build upon the diverse strength of Canada and to ensure local expertise and initiative.

The Canadian forestry service and Agriculture Canada are well represented in New Brunswick. The New Brunswick department of natural resources, the maritime forest rangers school, and the Fredericton area conservation school are also located in the area and are related to the forest industry. The University of New Brunswick has an excellent forestry faculty, and related faculties of engineering and science. It has ongoing programs such as forest extension, a fire science centre, and forest engineering. It is establishing new activities, such as a forest materials institute, a forest soils research centre, and a remote sensing research centre. The University of New Brunswick also has the largest wood lot of any university in Canada. With forestry as a principal dynamic in the Canadian and New Brunswick economies it is only right that these facilities should exist and be fully utilized.

Clearly a forestry complex which could focus the attention of all levels of government and the most advanced research on the problems of the forest industry, and transfer new technology quickly and efficiently to industry, would be a tremendous step forward in New Brunswick. I support this concept and this program strongly.

I believe that if the centres of excellence program is to have a maximum impact, it should focus its attention on programs like this and on areas that suffer from chronic regional disparity, rather than fragmenting its effort over a large area with less regional impact. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will use his good office to encourage recognition of the forestry complex at the University of New Brunswick as one of the important dynamics in moving our economy forward.

I would ask the minister also to take another look at the $5,000 tax credit my leader mentioned in his address, for investment in small business, and to re-examine our proposal to negotiate long-term tax contracts with companies locating in slower growth areas. Both these measures are predicated on new enterprises coming into being. There is no real net loss to our public revenues by simply deferring their tax paying potential for a few years to bring them into being.

I would also ask the minister to examine the success rate of the small business program which is promoted by DREE. My impression is that this is a very good program. My deepest regret is that this discrimination which this particular department of government practises against Fredericton is now about to be perpetrated on the county of Sunbury which has a very high unemployment rate.

It seems that a part of the Fredericton industrial park, the new section in fact, is located in Sunbury county, and qualifies for this program, while the rest of the park does not. I am advised of a movement to disqualify all of the park. I think that the minister will find the Sunbury portion of this park is easily identified and should continue to be included in the program that is intended for Sunbury county. This is the right thing to do, and I want to bring it to the minister's attention. Indeed, I recommend that the program apply equally throughout all of New Brunswick.

Finally, I want to point to the extreme importance of enabling the universities to produce the young scientists who are essential if we are to stimulate our economic recovery through research, development and innovation, and to get back in the world markets and to get our country moving forward again. We have a double plus with the research that we promote at the university campuses. We not only improve instruction and the level of learning, but we develop excellent young scientists for the future. The $60 million or so in research and development cutbacks announced in September that are reflected in different departments of government will have to be examined on their own merits as the estimates come before our appropriate committees.

It would be premature to make any judgment at this time, but it must be embarrassing for the Minister of State for Science and Technology to announce measures to strengthen and encourage research and development in Canada, and to meet with his provincial counterparts and still not be able to produce guidelines for a procurement policy by his own government, a policy designed to encourage the purchase of Canadian manufactured goods with a high research and development component. It must be embarrassing for him not to be able to tell the minister from New Brunswick where that province's proposals for a forestry complex stand. It must be embarrassing to have to indicate repeatedly that these programs are held up in Treasury Board. But the most embarrassing thing of all must be to see the sun set on the highly visionary but rapidly fading national research and development goal of 1.5 per cent of gross domestic product by 1983. In relation to all the other industrial nations of the western world, it was a small target, but it was a goal.

● (1542)

The new national priority for research and development in Canada is unclear. The government is continuing its ad hoc approach to financial decision making in Canada. We have a short-term budget. There are some good measures in it, but there continues to be no long-term planning, no national industrial strategy and some good opportunities have been missed.

In concluding, I wish to refer to a telegram I received today from one of my constituents identifying a problem with the budget proposal to reduce the federal sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. It contains a suggested remedy. I will read it and credit the author, Mr. John Clark, of Fredericton. I quote:

> With reference to the recent budget whereby the federal sales tax was reduced from 12 per cent to 9 per cent it is imperative that this reduction include present vehicle inventory of auto and truck dealers. Assuming the average cost of $7,000 resulting in a tax reduction of $200 and that the average dealer has 100 vehicles in stock which is minimal then the 3,000 dealers who are members of a federation of automobile dealer associations of Canada (F.A.D.A.) would incur a loss of $60 million or more.
> There is precedent for this kind of relief. In 1958 the removal of the excise tax from cars included inventory and in 1974 we received tax rebates on heavy duty vehicles.
>
> Would appreciate any steps you can take to have 3 per cent tax reduction applicable to present dealers' inventory.
>
> J. T. Clark
> Past President FADA 1976-77

I commend this solution to the minister.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to take part in this debate. As a Prince Edward Islander I appreciate the positive steps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has taken toward the preservation and expansion of industry and business in Atlantic Canada. The greatest need in that region is for a strong industrial base that will provide year-round employment and lessen our dependence on grants and subsidies from the federal government. The importance of programs like Canada Works and unemployment insurance to the Atlantic is well known to all hon. members.

No one would be happier than maritimers and Newfoundlanders to lessen the importance of these programs to our economy. The sad fact is that few large employers have found it profitable to locate outside the already prosperous areas of Canada.

There was a time when the maritimes were the economic centre of Canada. In my own province of Prince Edward Island, we at one time had a thriving shipbuilding industry. The lumber would come from our own forests, and the boats would be sailed by our own fishermen. We were self-sufficient to a far greater extent in food. One of the legacies of becoming more and more dependent on the central government was a general decline in self-sufficiency.

Maritimers are a proud people. It is not easy to accept assistance from what we call the "have provinces" when the desire is to be self-reliant and productive. It is difficult to watch each new generation leave to find work in Toronto, Calgary or Vancouver, when we know we have the natural resources, the manpower, and what should be an ideal location for carrying on trade that should make the maritimes a centre of commercial and industrial activity.

I see now a new era beginning very soon, however. There are very positive and concrete reasons for this. As I mentioned, the incentives for increased investment and research and development included in this budget should prove a tremendous boost to the economy of Atlantic Canada by encouraging the establishment of permanent industries which will continue to expand and provide year-round employment opportunities.

[Mr. Howie.]

The budget also contains provisions for an increase from 30 per cent to 100 per cent in the write-off for development in the mining industry. This, coupled with the extension of the incentive for oil and gas exploration, should go a long way toward ameliorating our energy supply problem. There is an abundance of coal in Cape Breton, and positive signs of the existence of significant offshore oil and gas deposits. These factors provide a further encouragement for industrial growth.

The development of the region is dependent on a secure source of energy. Atlantic Canada has that energy. In addition to coal and oil, possibilities exist for massive hydro development at the Bay of Fundy and Gull Island. As well, a system of inter-connected power lines, such as that recently laid between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, will provide further security of supply.

The oldest industry in the Atlantic region has again become the most promising for the future I believe our fisheries are on the threshold of an era of fantastic growth and prosperity. The main reason for this change was the government's declaration of the 200-mile limit. The other reason has been the very responsible and successful policy of my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), who has demanded that care be taken to nurture the fish stocks back to a healthy, exploitable population before beginning a program of greatly increased fishing activity.

I know the pressure the minister has been under at times to relax that policy for certain species of fish, but his wisdom has been proven by the success of his program to rebuild the Altantic fishing industry. Our main concern now will be to ensure that it is the fishermen themselves, as well as the rest of the Atlantic region, who benefit from this huge potential growth in the fisheries. This means encouraging the orderly development of a strong, independently owned fishing fleet, continued surveillance over the 200-mile limit, and programs to increase the value of the fish catch. This can be done by expanding processing facilities so that an increased amount of processing can take place in the Atlantic.

Also, there is a need for expansion and improvement of fish marketing efforts and increased exploitation of under-utilized species. I can best describe my optimism concerning the future of the fishing industry by comparing it to the discovery of oil in Alberta, only our oil is swimming in the ocean.

One development of which I am particularly proud is the move of the headquarters of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Charlottetown. This, of course, is in keeping with the government policy of decentralization, the reasons for that policy being well known. They bear repeating, however, for they demonstrate the commitment by this government to positive action to counter regional disparity. That attack on regional disparity is certainly a primary consideration in a relocation of this magnitude.

It should also be remembered that by decreasing the concentration of public servants in this part of the country, we are responding to a widespread feeling that the federal bureaucracy, by being cloistered in the national capital region, is insensitive to the needs and concerns of Canadians from coast to coast. The proportion of public servants in the Ottawa area is up to twice that of federal employees in the capitals of other western nations. This policy of decentralization, therefore, has my unqualified support. It is only fair and just that Canadians in all parts of Canada—and we all pay federal taxes—should benefit as greatly as possible from the presence of the federal government throughout the land.

With particular reference to the move of DVA headquarters to Charlottetown, the benefits which will spread to all parts of the province are very significant and exciting indeed. For just the construction phase of the relocation, our studies indicate that the direct impact will be to create approximately 300 jobs. About $5 million will be paid in wages and salaries for those jobs.

During the operating phase we estimate that the number of jobs available for Islanders to compete for will be from 350 to 450. The wages paid to Veterans Affairs employees on the Island should total approximately $10 million per year. Of this it is projected that about 70 per cent, or $7 million, will be spent by those employees on various commodities every year, with most of that, presumably, being spent on the Island. The impact of this spending by DVA employees will, it is estimated, mean the creation of approximately 250 new jobs over and above those new jobs within Veterans Affairs headquarters. In addition we have estimated that the total indirect income generated will be in the area of $2.8 million.

Additional local employment and income are expected to be generated by the ongoing expenditures necessary for the operation of the departmental headquarters. It is anticipated that approximately 77 new jobs will be created, and that additional income of about $675,000 will be generated as a result of annual head office expenses of $1.8 million.

Including this indirect employment, along with the number of employees who will be working at DVA headquarters, we arrive at a total figure of around 1,000 new jobs being added to the Prince Edward Island work force. The total additional income created by the move has been estimated at about $15 million per year.

In a province with a total population of just over 120,000, an employer providing 1,000 jobs is obviously going to have a major impact, not just on the economic life of the province but also on the social and cultural areas. For a city of its size, Charlottetown already boasts considerable cultural amenities and educational facilities. The involvement of Veterans Affairs staff in the various activities of the community will be most welcome.

I see this relocation of a federal head office as one of the keystones of the economic development which is about to take place in Prince Edward Island. It is a non-polluting industry which will not have a negative impact on the high quality of life on the Island. The department will require the services of diverse professional, clerical and other support staff, thereby providing opportunities at home for our youth now enrolled in college and university. It is an incentive for our young people to remain and help with the developing of our other resources. That will mean putting the emphasis on those areas in which we do our best, and ensuring that the maximum added value is placed on our products before they are exported.

Farming and fishing will remain the economic mainstays of the Prince Edward Island economy. The increasing sophistication of these industries demands the continued updating of our knowledge in those fields, and I am hopeful that the research and development incentives which have been so substantially increased in this budget will be used to full advantage to benefit those two very important areas.

Liberals have been criticized recently for being too optimistic and expressing too much confidence in the future. I feel strongly that at no time in the last few decades has there been more reason to be hopeful about the future prospects of my own province and Atlantic Canada in general. A new frontier has been opened up with the 200-mile limit, the possibilities of which are endless and not yet even dreamed of. The energy resources I mentioned earlier are real and in the process of being developed. Moreover, there is a new realization on the part of maritimers that their area, with its long history and well-known and envied spirit of community and common cause deserves another chance to regain the proud place it has held in the past. There is a quality of life in the maritimes that cannot be found anywhere else in Canada—a concern for one's fellow man, and a sense of identity which was never broken by the economic privations of the past. With the bright future ahead, those traditional values and qualities will stand us in good stead as more prosperous days become a reality.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to follow the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). I think he made a fine speech and I commend him for his optimism, speaking as he does as a representative of the last provincial outpost of liberalism. As we know, very shortly the present administration will have presided over the complete disintegration of federal liberalism in this country.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Don't fool yourselves.

Mr. MacKay: Well, the minister, with that indomitable Scottish fighting spirit, says "Don't fool yourselves". But I think he would be quite willing to concede privately that the chances of halting the onslaught of the leader of the opposition, Mr. Angus MacLean, in Prince Edward Island, are almost negligible at this point.

An hon. Member: Another good Scot.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, another good Scot. Which makes it all the more difficult to do.

Mr. Speaker, to start off this speech on a gracious note, I was interested in the very sincere tribute paid to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). I thought it was a most deserved and gracious tribute, and I would like to associate myself with much of what she said.

The Minister of Finance, who brought down this budget, is certainly held in great esteem as a person by all members of this House. However, I must say in all candour that I think his talents do not lend themselves to the portfolio which he holds. It has been suggested that to ask the minister to adjust our economy is like asking the Boston strangler to adjust your necktie! I don't believe it is quite that bad, but I see the member from Toronto who represents small business here in the House today and perhaps he would agree with me that the minister has had about as much success in the financial league as the Argonauts have had in the CFL during the past few years.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, there are measures in the budget which do deserve some commendation. The federal sales tax reduction and the removal of the special excise tax on marine engines, private aircraft and motorcycles, were measures that were applauded by those opposite when they were imposed, and are now applauded just as vigorously when they are removed. So you see this government is capable at times of learning from its mistakes. The sector and regional incentives are also sound moves. However, the minister's room to manoeuvre in this budget has been severely limited by past mistakes, excesses, and mismanagement on a massive scale during the last number of years by this government.

Huge expenditures on non-productive projects have put our country in a position where funds for worth-while projects of the type which I am sure the Minister of Veterans Affairs would agree would be appropriate for the Atlantic region, are hard to come by. They are hard to come by because of past mismanagement and there just aren't enough funds available to go around any more.

The initiatives regarding the unemployment insurance legislation, which were proposed in the name of restraint and in an attempt to save money, are commendable. However, there are some pitfalls which I see implicit in what the government is doing. These amendments have to be fine-tuned in committee in an attempt to prevent the savings being made at the expense of people in those areas of the country where there are no jobs to be, shall we say, an object of evasion. There is really no disincentive factor which affects the maritime region at this time because, frankly, there are no jobs there, in most cases, for people to avoid taking.

A reduction in premiums is risky at this time. It is welcome in some ways, and while it is tempting to look upon premiums as a tax because they are deducted at source, they really are not. Although contributions will be $300 million less, unless unemployment insurance benefits are reduced accordingly, the savings on premiums will become increased government expenditure, and the increased spending will have to be financed either by increased revenues or higher deficits, neither of which is desirable.

I think the government should take a very hard selective look at what it is doing with respect to unemployment insurance legislation because it is not in the Atlantic region, where the problem is greatest, that the abuses are taking place. The abuses are taking place in the more prosperous areas of the country, and they are being perpetrated by middle income families who are systematically using unemployment insurance to supplement their incomes.

A lot of money has been lost by this government through foolishly conceived projects. Certain tax concessions, however, have been made in slow growth areas. I think they are well intended, but, frankly, I had hoped to see in this budget a greater input from DREE; for example, a widening of eligibility of the industries which can participate in DREE programs to allow industries other than manufacturing and processing to benefit from DREE grants, provided they meet the other criteria. I think this would have been a sound thing to do, and I am sorry the minister did not see fit to do that in his budget.

Another thing which should be done soon—and again unfortunately it was not done in this budget—is to reduce some of the confiscatory aspects of the capital gains tax. Many sound financial people across the country have been urging the government to consider, if not abolishing the capital gains tax, at least modifying it. Our party strongly believes that it must be indexed and perhaps done away with altogether because the benefits received are not commensurate with the harm done to the free enterprise system. As has been said by a former deputy minister of finance of many years, Dr. Kenneth Eaton, it is a bad idea, that a tax on capital gains comes mainly out of capital or out of income that otherwise would be saved for capital formation. The absence of a tax on capital gains, while ordinary income is being taxed at high rates, results in a positive incentive to capital formation, particularly equity capital. On both counts, therefore, in a country which must import capital for development, a tax on capital gains is not a good idea.

I also suggest to the minister that capital gains taxes to some extent are inflationary because when people are confronted with capital gains taxes their first reaction is to ascertain how much extra they have to pay in tax, and they adjust their asking price accordingly in an attempt to get away with as much profit—deserved in many cases—as they can.

I think that the incentives given to the mining industry are acceptable, but if it came to weighing the balance of benefits it would have been more appropriate to have been a little less generous in that field and to have applied some relief on the capital gains tax side in order to provide incentives and promote the desire to take the risks which have always been part of the Canadian industrial and development psyche. To have had this present tax in place has done immeasurable harm to the development of our country.

Another thing which has been counterproductive to some extent—and I do not think it was thought through carefully enough, particularly when nothing was done about the capital gains tax—is the way that the minister singled out certain small business service corporations, which have been incorporated and have been paying taxes as small businesses, and made it impossible for them to obtain the preferential small business tax rate. This measure does not apply to small businessmen engaged in production or trade. Although the wording is somewhat unclear, this measure seems to catch doctors, dentists, accountants, professors, management consultants, entertainers, journalists, engineers, and other professionals who have structured their financial affairs so as to qualify themselves as businesses. This kind of ad hoc measure which is being taken by the minister, while well intentioned—particularly in the absence of relief for small business on the capital gains side—is not, on balance, a good thing for the economy.

Even though by some measurements our country is nearly broke because of our excessive borrowing and spending in the past for needless capital works projects and things of that nature, about which we all know and which we have discussed many times in this House, there still has to be some massive capital works expenditures if we are to promote growth and better the standard of living in areas of Canada such as the areas which the Minister of Veterans Affairs and I represent. I come again to the merits, for example, of a corridor road through northern Maine which could, in partnership with our American friends, provide important benefits to Atlantic Canada and some to the United States. It would greatly facilitate tourism and the marketing of Atlantic Canada products. Transmission facilities to bring electricity to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia are critical. The minister referred to this as well.

These projects require the expenditure of vast amounts of money, and there is no choice but to proceed with them because high energy costs are hampering the standard of living and the prospective development of this important region of our country. Greater efforts must be made if this part of Canada is to realize the destiny it must achieve.

This government has had some very strange fiscal and financial policies. I want to mention specifically the situation with regard to Canada Savings Bonds. Last August in a newsletter the Bank of Canada made reference to the maturing of past issues of Canada Savings Bonds. On October 1 the 1968 special replacement series, SR, came due, followed by the 1969-70 series, S-24, on November 1. Over 900,000 Canadians held maturing bonds worth approximately $2.6 billion. In addition, said the Bank of Canada in its newsletter, accumulated interest and cash bonuses on the bonds added an additional $1.9 billion to the amount coming due.

My point is that on the current issue of Canada Savings Bonds, of the initial $4.5 billion, $2.6 billion will be for refunding purposes and $1.9 billion to cover the cost of accumulated interest and special bonuses.

I think that Canada Savings Bonds ought more often to be a topic of discussion and consideration in this House because having such a large percentage of our national debt in call money, whereby holders may redeem their investments at any time, has proved to be very costly. In each period of high interest rates investors have rolled their issues into better rate bonds, or the government has reacted, as it has done again—it had to—by raising the interest rates on all outstanding issues. Substantial fees are paid to advertisers and to financial institutions. In addition, there are many hidden charges tied to the Bank of Canada internal process. I believe that Canada Savings Bonds should be available through the payroll system and to small investors. The government should periodically announce the rate of interest which is payable and adjust the rate up or down to reflect current conditions.

There are many financial problems facing this country, but one of the reforms which should be implemented is a change in government policy regarding our debt financing. After all, when we are faced with a deficit of $11 billion or $12 billion, which works out to about $1 billion a month over the year, it is shocking that we must meet our interest obligations by borrowing. I trust that the Minister of Finance will look into this and make the needed adjustments.

I see my friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) is in the House today. I would like to say a few things about the McDonald commission of inquiry in the context of the budget debate. I think it is quite relevant to do so because it is financed through the Privy Council office, the budget expenses of which have increased about 78 per cent over the past few months.

I think that the McDonald commission is something in which many members of parliament and most people in Canada are very interested. They hold great hopes for its success. I have a few comments to make which are constructive suggestions. I hope they will be of some use, and I hope they will be accepted in the spirit they are given. I am under the impression that the maximum information available is not coming out in the hearings to date. Also, I have some concern that the talents of all counsel are not being utilized to the fullest. In some areas I have the fear that counsel are not asking the right questions, and perhaps from the investigative side some potentially valuable witnesses are not being contacted.

● (1612)

I should like to deal with two main areas of interest to the commission. They are mail openings and the relationship of the security service to the Department of National Revenue. When a case file or files are opened on an individual by the security service, always there are two parallel files, one of which is secret. When an investigating officer decides that they merit hard investigation, a number of procedures are available. There are telephone taps, surveillance, checking tax records, mail openings such as Operation Cathedral, and so on. But practically all these procedures must be approved by the officer in charge of the division, and then sent to headquarters in Ottawa for final approval. As the Solicitor General well knows, periodically warrants are brought in for his personal signature.

Let me first speak of mail opening. My impression is that the commission and the Canadian public need to know a great deal more about the scope, size, and the procedure of this operation. For example, in almost every sizeable city in this nation an interface has existed for many years between the security service and the Post Office. The "watcher" service of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which many people do not know about, also was an important part of the operation outside the Post Office. In Ottawa, if it has not already done so, the commission might consider contacting Mr. Harry Hurd, who has had major responsibilities in this now civilian oriented service. As a matter of interest, it takes a lot of personnel to keep a suspect or target under 24-hour surveillance. For two suspects at a time, on a 24-hour basis, perhaps as many as 200 people are required.

Let me come back to the procedures involved in opening mail. I know the Solicitor General is interested, because who could ever forget the expression on his face that day in the House as Postmaster General, when his colleague, the then solicitor general, told him, yes, in fact mail was being opened? I will speak in the past tense because I do not know exactly what is happening today. When a person was being followed and posted a letter, a large envelope about the size of the interior of the post box immediately was dropped in by the person observing him. All of the mail below that envelope, which sealed off the box, was then available to be opened.

One could say, "How did they get access to the post box?" It is very simple. The superintendent of a shift of the "watcher" service had a key. The mail was opened in due course and examined In many cases it was opened on a wholesale basis. By necessity it involved a lot of people who had nothing whatsoever to do with the target or suspect, but whose mail just happened to be below that strategically inserted envelope. So much for mail outside of the Post Office.

When one looks at local post office one finds some other very perceptive and definite methods of operation which were followed. For example, in Montreal Sergeant Rick Neal happens to be the contact. I am sure the commission would want to talk to a man like Rick Neal. His job was to check with the designated supervisor or person at the Post Office and collect mail periodically which was set aside for that purpose on a daily basis. He brought the mail to the identification laboratory where it was opened and, if appropriate, photographed and processed. Sometimes it was brought back to the post office in the same day, which at least is very commendable. I emphasize that this type of operation does not exist in merely one or two isolated instances. It is nation-wide. It must be approved by the appropriate security service officer in the division. In Montreal it would be someone like Chief Superintendent Cobb or one of his predecessors, Chief Superintendent Larry Forrest or Ray Parent. At any rate, it has been going on for years.

Before an "Operation Cathedral" is put in place, as I said, each one has to be approved by RCMP headquarters and by the Solicitor General, in theory. This is from where the commission ought to seek additional information, by asking officers in charge across the country just how long this situation has gone on. My information is that this has been going on for many years. Indeed, I spoke with an officer who told of setting up photographic facilities in a post office in an out-of-the-way spot in an attempt to develop techniques which would allow mail to be photographed without being opened.

All of these things are relevant, because I am convinced that sufficient testimony has not been brought to the attention of the public or the commission, about the scope of the operation. Goodness knows there are many witnesses whom I suggest the commission might want to contact. Perhaps they have contacted some of them, but I do know the commission has not seen fit to bring Warren Hart back yet. He opened mail on a wholesale basis in Toronto. They should talk to Don Cobb, or perhaps the director of the security and investigation services branch of the Post Office in Ottawa, Mr. Paul Boisvert.

As the Solicitor General would say, "without breaching national security", let us have a look at what the RCMP security service has been doing in offices of the Department of National Revenue across the country. I am not talking about the CIB branch or the correspondence which was exchanged between the then solicitor general and the then minister of national revenue. This correspondence has been alluded to in the commission hearings. I am talking about contacts over the years between the RCMP security service and the Department of National Revenue. There were everyday methods by which the security service would be in touch with its contact men in the Department of National Revenue. The security service would then be handed a complete file on one of its targets. I do not believe that type of procedure could be justified, unless there was ministerial and departmental knowledge involved.

I commend to the commission for questioning, for example, Superintendent Fernand Bossé, if they have not questioned him already. Superintendent Bossé of "C" Division in Montreal would go into the National Revenue office and talk with his contact there. I understand at one time his contact was a man in the verification and collection branch of Taxation Canada, Mr. Côté. He would say to Mr. Côté, "I want a file". It could be the file on anyone. Mr. Côté would bring him the file, and he would look at it. If the file was informative, then he would have complete access to it. But, as I understand it, if the file was not sufficiently or completely informative, he would say to his contact at National Revenue, "Go and do an investigation", and an investigation or audit would be done.

I do not want to belabour this point. I do not want to drop names and hurt people who are doing security jobs in the national interest. I do not pretend that I know it all, or even very much, but I am disturbed about what I have learned so far. The counsel and investigators are more to be faulted than the commission itself, because they have not asked the right people the right questions. The Solicitor General would be well advised to talk to more rank and file officers in the security service, assuming indeed he wants to talk to them. It is no secret. This has been going on for years and years. Practically anyone of any rank in the security service knows about this. The reason they are not testifying about it is that they are not being asked the correct specific questions. In some cases counsel are so ill-informed or have done so little homework that they do not know the type of questions to ask, and the answers complicate matters even more.

I will make the Solicitor General an offer. If he wants to, on a confidential basis I can tell him of a man who will go before the McDonald commission and testify in great and specific detail about a lot of things which so far have not come out.

● (1622)

I got the impression from ex-Commissioner Higgitt's testimony that "Cathedral" operations were fairly seldom invoked procedures about which he knew nothing, or very little. If Commissioner Simmonds had said that, it would have been more credible because he did not spend very much time, if any, in security services. Ex-Commissioner Higgitt spent almost all his time in security services. I would put to the Solicitor General and to the commission, through you, sir, that surely in the national interest, since this commission has been given such an important mandate, it should take a more in depth approach to what it is doing and should contact people such as some of those I have mentioned here today.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many budget debates in the course of the last seven or eight years I have taken part in, but I am not particularly pleased to participate in this one. However, I feel an obligation to the House, and particularly to my constituents, to enter into this debate, not entirely in a negative way, but certainly to bring attention to and to counter some of the statements made in a general sense by Liberal speakers, and to bring out the meat or lack thereof in the budget, as this will affect the average Canadian, those lower and middle income people who pay most of the taxes in this country and contribute most in terms of numbers because they make up the largest group.

The message delivered in the budget is clear. The government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) have abandoned any pretense of providing economic leadership in this country. At a time when unemployment is high, when inflation is running at close to 9 per cent and real growth is lagging far behind expectations, what we need is a dynamic program of economic recovery. What we got was a do-nothing budget that will not even inject enough stimulus into the economy to undo the damage done by the government's spending cuts announced during August and early September.

In this budget the government has deliberately chosen a policy of slow growth and high unemployment, in short, a policy of economic stagnation. The victims, as always, will be the unemployed, and the average Canadians who are trying to cope with inflation.

Apparently the reason for the finance minister's budgetary inaction is his belief that the economy will perform as well in 1979 as it did this year, although 1978 was hardly an impressive year in terms of our economic performance. There is no indication in the minister's budgetary remarks, as there has been from private economists, that the economy is likely to weaken next year in line with a U.S. recession. Rather, the government is trusting the United States to ensure our continued economic stability. The budget makes the unsupported assumption that the United States will achieve real growth of 3 per cent this year, despite the fact that American forecasters are predicting hard times in that country that could cut growth to 1 per cent at best. We cannot wait for the Americans to bail us out. They are just as much in trouble as are we. It is time to embark on a course of forthright and independent economic action. One look at the finance minister's forecasts for 1979 will underline this fact.

We know now that Canada will not achieve 5 per cent growth for this year as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pledged at the Bonn economic summit. He said we would achieve 5 per cent this year, but obviously we will not. In fact our growth this year is likely to be closer to 3.5 per cent and, according to the Minister of Finance, growth will not increase much next year either, when the best we can hope for is 4 per cent or 4.5 per cent. This is significantly lower than the 5 per cent rate of growth required just to hold unemployment at present levels. The minister recognized this when he forecast only 250,000 jobs will be created in 1979. That is 110,000 fewer jobs than were created in 1978 which has been a year of record unemployment.

In light of the fact that this budget will increase the number of Canadians without jobs it is understandable the minister neglected to mention in his remarks that unemployment is likely to climb to 9 per cent next year. Prices, according to the minister, would increase 6.5 per cent. This is higher than earlier recovery path projections made by the finance department, but still lower than this year's 8 per cent or 9 per cent increase. Unfortunately the minister gives very little justification for his inflation estimate beyond his oft expressed hope that there will soon be a dramatic turn around in food prices. If there is a significant drop in inflation it will certainly not be as a result of his efforts in this budget.

As one listened to the Minister of Finance and other members on the government side who spoke during this debate, one got the impression that he was still listening to R. B. Bennett and Herbert Hoover. We are back in the 1930s when prosperity "is just around the corner."

Given these forecasts, Canadians can be forgiven for believing the government would introduce budgetary measures designed to improve our economic performance. This is especially true considering that the majority of economic forecasters have indicated that growth in 1979 will be substantially lower than the minister's own projections, and that inflation will be substantially higher.

I have before me seven economic outlooks for 1979, issued by various banks, securities firms, and advisory bodies, all of which suggest the minister's figures over-state the health of our economy. The most optimistic of the private forecasts was issued by the Conference Board in Canada, and puts growth at 3.7 per cent, inflation at 7.4 per cent, and unemployment at 9 per cent. The most pessimistic of this group of references was issued by Wood Gundy, which puts growth at 2.2 per cent, inflation at 7.6 per cent, and unemployment at 9.1 per cent.

Faced with these discouraging economic forecasts, the minister had a clear responsibility to stimulate the economy. As he said at page 5 of the budget, and I quote from his statement:

> Consumer spending rose by less than was expected, and this was the main reason for the shortfall in growth.

This opinion has been seconded by economic experts who have pointed to the fact that the minister's last two budgets failed precisely because they did not provide enough stimulus to boost the purchasing power of Canadians. Without more purchasing power in the economy, business simply cannot afford to expand and jobs will not be created.

The budget before us today demonstrates that the minister has not learned from his mistakes. He ignored the advice of his government's own economic advisory body, the Economic Council of Canada, and, I might add, of my own party, the NDP, and refused to make personal income tax cuts of any real significance.

We have to inject money into the economy in order to put people back to work. We in our party have estimated that a $1.5 billion tax cut, through increasing purchasing power and the accelerated economic activity it would promote, would create up to about 100,000 new jobs.

Certainly the Minister of Finance tried to show in his remarks that he was injecting stimulus into the economy but, despite the impressive snow job, the fact remains that he did not. This becomes painfully clear when we examine the specific provisions of this neutral and ineffective budget.

The only real tax cut in the budget is the doubling of the maximum employment expense deduction from $250 to $500 annually in 1979. The government estimates this will put $270 million into the economy and that 6.2 per cent of the 11 million taxpayers in this country will benefit from the change.

However, because Canadians will still be required to claim for only 3 per cent of their income up to the $500 maximum, those Canadians earning less than $8,333 a year will not receive any benefit from this cut, and those earning over $16,666 a year will get the full benefit, that is, up to $500. Once again, in typical Liberal fashion, the rich get richer and the poor get poorer.

It is time that the government tried to revitalize their very antiquated tax policies. The effect of the increased employment expense deduction to the average taxpayer earning $12,000 a year, will be $110 a year more in deductions. If he is taxed at a rate of 20 per cent, he will receive a tax cut of between $20 to $25 a year, or about 50 cents a week. The story is much the same for the unemployment insurance premium cut highly touted by the minister, where the rate will decrease from $1.50 to $1.35 per $100 of insurable earnings for employees and, from $2.10 to $1.89 for employers. This means that Canadians will be taking home approximately 35 cents more a week, or about $18 a year. I am basing my calculations on the maximum insurable earnings allowed under the UI plan, which will be $11,700 in 1979.

There are a lot of people in this country who make far less than $11,700 a year, and they will not even get 35 cents off their payments a week. It will be less. However, it should be noted that while premiums are being reduced, unemployment benefits are being drastically cut back as part of this government's restraint program, from 66⅔ per cent of insurable earnings to 60 per cent. This is very significant, not only for those who are getting the maximum UI benefits, but also for those who are getting minimum benefits.

It is not generosity which inspires this premium reduction, since the Unemployment Insurance Act legally requires that contributions be cut when the unemployment insurance fund is running at a surplus. This is currently the case, so the minister had no choice. Yet he made it look as if he was giving this paltry 35 cents a week out of the goodness of his heart.

Together the increased employment expense reduction and the UI premium cut add up to less than $1 a week for the average Canadian. This is hardly enough to boost significantly consumer spending in this country. In fact, it is nowhere near enough to help the average family even catch up to inflation, which I would remind hon. members, by all the best forecasts for next year, will be at least 9 per cent if not higher.

Although the minister attempted to make next year's 9 per cent indexing increase in personal exemptions sound like a new tax exemption, Canadians are not so easily fooled. This exemption results from the automatic adjustment of tax rates to past inflation, and was introduced by this House into the Income Tax Act in 1974. In fact, it is a means to prevent the government from automatically raising taxes due to inflation, and not in any way a tax cut that can be spent by the consumer.

The cut in manufacturers' sales tax from 12 to 9 per cent is the most positive aspect of this budget. It is a proposal which we advocated and which we welcome. However, by itself it is not enough. The federal sales tax cut will continue the stimulative effects provided by the retail sales tax cut contained in last April's budget, but it will be far less effective. First of all, the cut amounts to only $1 billion over the whole of 1979, whereas the retail sales tax cut amounted to more than $1 billion over a six to nine month period. In fact, the economy will suffer net loss in stimulation.

Secondly, and more significantly, there is no assurance the cut will be passed on to consumers. The finance minister states that "experience suggests that such tax cuts are passed on", but he knows that is simply not the case. What generally happens is that much of the impact is lost among the middlemen. The minister's appointment of three government agencies to monitor the cuts shows he is aware of this fact. This is true whenever you take away part or all of a hidden tax; immediately prices tend to drop, and then there is a mysterious tendency for those prices to climb slowly back up again within six months, and this is not necessarily due to inflation.

Although this cut goes into effect immediately, its impact will not be felt until current inventories are run down. The best that can be hoped for, if the benefits are passed along to consumers, is a reduction of one-half of one percentage point in the cost price index next year. To this extent the measure is at least a step, albeit a tentative one, in the right direction.

Disregarding for a moment an analysis of the altogether more generous incentives provided for business in this budget, the government says the total impact of its measures will be a

$1.38 billion cut in taxes in 1979. This level of stimulation is far short of the $2 billion worth of spending cuts that have been taken out of the economy in recent months.

When the Prime Minister returned from Bonn last August with his pledge to stimulate the economy toward 5 per cent growth, he said this would be accomplished "by reduction in both our expenditures and our taxes". We have seen the spending cuts, but we are still waiting for the tax cuts. The government, in its policies announced last August, and in this unbelievably regressive budget delivered last week, is actually restricting the economy.

For the one million Canadians who want to work but cannot find a job, this hold-the-line budget offers no hope. Without stimulation in the economy, unemployment is likely to climb over 9 per cent, not go down. Canada is in a mess now as far as unemployment is concerned, and here the government is bringing in a budget that will not only not stimulate the economy, but will exacerbate the unemployment problem and make it even worse.

The minister has given generous incentives to business and the resource section to expand, but even if jobs are created—and experience suggests they often are not—these will take at least a year to materialize.

The unemployed need jobs now, and what was needed in this budget was an immediate program of public investment in transportation, housing and public works projects. My party has long been advocating such a program, which would put an estimated 225,000 people back to work. Spending on needed facilities in communities where they are lacking is infinitely preferable to the make-work programs the government has relied on in the past few years. For example, we need a $400 million federal-provincial-municipal capital works program. This has been demanded by the premiers of the provinces and supported by most municipalities. Such a program would create 60,000 new jobs.

The second element in our program is a $500 million investment in modernizing and rebuilding Canada's obsolete rail system. This would provide better grain transportation facilities and has been recommended by the Hall commission. It would create 70,000 jobs.

Thirdly, we have suggested a $300 million urban transit program which would improve much needed rapid transit services in major cities. This project has the recommendation of the Prime Minister himself, who committed the government to just such a program on the eve of the 1974 election. Or perhaps the Prime Minister has forgotten. At any rate, we believe this would create 40,000 new jobs. I suggest that the Prime Minister remember that proposition, particularly in the city of Toronto, considering what happened in the by-elections there.

Finally, we need a $500 million special housing program which would provide funds for non-profit, co-operative and public housing, and also for neighbourhood improvements and residential rehabilitation projects. These are socially oriented programs on which the government could spend money that would in turn go to the purchase of goods and services and thereby get the economy moving again. This need is particularly acute in view of the fact that the housing market and construction industry are seriously depressed, and that high interest rates and land prices make it impossible for many Canadians even to consider buying their own homes. The minister's only housing proposal in the budget—a tax shelter for land speculators and developers—certainly will not improve this situation. We estimate our program will create 70,000 jobs in the construction industry.

Unfortunately, rather than having the courage to introduce innovative programs, the government chose to stand pat. That is precisely the reason for the economic malaise in this country. The government refuses to take the positive economic action required to reduce unemployment, to stimulate growth, or to chart a course toward economic recovery.

● (1642)

Even more glaring than the government's failure to come up with immediate, short-term measures to deal with our economic problems is the minister's failure to plan for the future. Other countries plan for the future, but this government seems to be very sluggish about it. There is no strategy in this budget. In fact, in his budget remarks the minister said, as reported at page 1199 of Hansard:

> I am frankly skeptical about the search for a single grand industrial strategy in a competitive market system.

I do not believe that there is just one basic strategy for the next five years, seven years or four years or whatever, but why does the minister at least not bring in a budget that would give us several alternatives so that we could plan ahead for our monetary and fiscal activities? The Minister of Finance refuses to recognize that government has a vital role to play in the economic management of our country. Canada does not have an industrial strategy, and until we have another government, we probably never will.

I think the minister has been listening to too much conservative talk across the country. After all, private enterprise plans years ahead, whether in the manufacturing or resource oriented industry. I cannot, therefore, understand why Conservatives say that private enterprise should plan ahead, but that they do not have to and can operate on an ad hoc basis and blunder their way through. Even more glaring than the government's failure to come up with immediate short-term measures to deal with our economic problems is the minister's failure to plan for the future. As I said, there is no strategy in this budget. I quoted the minister as saying that he is frankly skeptical about a search for a single program.

The aim of such a strategy would be to develop the industries involved in the key sectors of our economy, such as housing, transportation and food. Instead, the government scatters its development incentives all over the place, without knowing the consequences. That is why from the same government we get budget incentives to increase research and development in this country, but drastic spending cuts in the research budgets for fisheries, farming, forestry and transportation. This budget will grant at least $750 million to businesses through new tax cuts and the extension of existing ones. These will supplement the billions of dollars provided to corporations in previous budgets.

The government should seriously examine the consequence of its policy of across-the-board corporate tax cuts. I will not dwell on any specific examples here, but it is relevant to note the effect such cuts have had on a corporation such as Northern Telecom. Going back a few years I will use two examples of tax concessions, rapid write-offs and concessions that previous ministers of finance have used as vehicles to stimulate the economy but which did not stimulate the economy.

Northern Telecom has received close to $14 million in federal grants and loans. As of December 1977, its deferred taxes were about $50 million. In addition, the Export Development Corporation has loaned $200 million to foreign countries to buy Northern Telecom equipment. Between 1971 and 1977 sales doubled and profits increased from $12 million to $85 million. Yet while the company profited from the government's "no strings attached assistance," Canadian workers and the Canadian economy have been less fortunate. In the early 1970s, Northern Telecom employed 26,000 people. Last year, it employed 15,000 and by the end of 1978, 1,000 more jobs are expected to be lost. Obviously the government's program of corporate incentives is not working. It is certainly not working in the interests of the employees or of consumer demand.

Inco is another well known beneficiary of the government's corporate largesse. Between 1967 and 1976 Inco had a profit of $1.7 billion, and could defer $368 million in taxes. It also received $17 million in tax credits and a low interest $70 million loan from the Export Development Corporation to develop operations in Indonesia. The result was 3,000 people laid off in Sudbury and Thompson last year.

These abuses, Mr. Speaker, are precisely why we need an over-all industrial strategy. Instead of across the board tax cuts for corporations, which only increase the deficit and do nothing to decrease unemployment, the government must take an active hand in directing where its investment in business goes and what it will be used for. Instead of handouts with every budget, the government should be prepared to negotiate long-term planning arrangements with the corporate sector.

In other words, there should be strings attached; taxpayers' money should not be just handed over to the government to create a certain number of jobs within a certain period of time. Of course, once that obligation was fulfilled, the lay-offs would begin with the excuse that there was something wrong with the market or with the product. Industry could always find excuses to lay people off and cut back on the cost of operation. Specific tax incentives should only be granted to specific corporations in return for the company's pledge to do more research and development or increase investment in Canada.

For this reason, I question some of the incentives included in what can only be described as this "pro-business" budget. The government is extending the investment tax credit for an indefinite period and raising it from 5 per cent to 7 per cent. Is such an incentive really necessary when the government tells us plant utilization has already increased from a low of 82 per cent last year to 87 per cent now?

This credit has not worked in the past as an incentive for companies to expand and create new jobs. All too often, the money has simply been used to re-equip plants with more up-to-date equipment, with the result that fewer employees than before are needed to produce the same amount of goods. With plants already expanding, there is no justification for the continuation of this credit.

I would like to reiterate once again, Mr. Speaker, that if the government is going to grant incentives out of the public purse, those benefits must be directed to create jobs, to promote research, and to benefit the economy. Across the board incentives to companies do not and will not accomplish the purpose for which they were intended.

We need more planning, and this will mean more government direction of our economy. That will require more courage than this government demonstrated in its budget, where it has managed once again to avoid its responsibility to put people back to work and get Canada growing again.

A few moments ago I alluded to the impression I have that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and other members of cabinet are listening to conservative elements in the country with the feeling that perhaps there is a great wave of conservatism moving from one ocean to the other. I dispute this. The results of the by-elections, and particularly the result of the provincial election in Saskatchewan a few days afterwards, show that although people may be conservative on certain specific issues, certainly in my riding in southwestern Ontario and in other parts of the country people are not taking a broad, general, small "c" conservative attitude to every aspect of government and every aspect of life. We still have progressive thinking people in the country and we still have great numbers of reform-minded people. I think it is a shame that in a panic, knowing he has only a few more months to go, the Prime Minister is prepared to bow, to bend, to twist and to cater not just to moderate "c" conservative opinion in the country, put to large "C" Conservative opinion, politicized, of course, in the Progressive Conservative party.

The Prime Minister would do well to be his own man for the next two months. Instead of giving in to pressures from my colleagues to the extreme right, he should think things out for himself and remember the purpose of small "1" liberalism as well as the philosophies of social democracy—philosophies which he espoused ten years ago. As a result of certain pressures being brought to bear on him by certain outspoken and vocal conservative elements in the country, he seems to have forgotten those philosophies and be prepared to go the conservative route in order to get votes.

I notice my time is just about up, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to say that people in this country are demanding action. They did not get action from this budget. They will not get action and they will not get assistance. Business, particularly small business, the main street retailers, shopkeepers or whatever term one wishes to use, will not benefit either. What businesses need is customers. They do not need government assistance and hand-outs, they need customers, and if they do not have customers they are in trouble. Businesses will not have more customers as a result of this budget. This budget will not in any effective way increase the purchasing power of ordinary Canadians who make up the vast majority of the consumers in Canada.

● (1652)

I do not know how many times we on this side of the House, particularly we in the NDP, have to drive the point home to the Liberal government that people need money. They need substantial tax breaks in order to increase their ability to consume. In this way we can get things moving again and not have to sit back with a constrictive budget waiting for Uncle Sam south of the border to bail us out. In the interests of the Canadian public I hope that over the next few months the government will pull itself together, get some new blood in it and attempt to rectify and turn around what is at the present time a depressing economic outlook.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the night of the budget, I was both astonished by and happy about the attitude of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I was astonished because everybody knew what temptations the minister had to fight against in the preparation of his budget in the present circumstances, and I am not thinking only about the fact that there is a general election coming, but also about the fact that various groups had given him pieces of advice as to what to include in the budget.

The Minister of Finance, and I am quite pleased, has proceeded in a responsible manner, in a prudent manner that the previous speaker has identified as being a certain conservatism, but prudence is not conservatism; respect for reality and prudence about decisions which are extremely important for the future of the country and all Canadians is not a conservative but a responsible attitude.

Mr. Speaker, it was strange to hear some commentators on budget night say that there was nothing in the budget, that there was no substantial personal tax reduction and so on. Mr. Speaker, such an attitude was all the more ironic that, had there been substantial personal tax reductions in the budget, we knew that the same commentators would have said that the Minister of Finance was an opportunist looking for vote-catching manoeuvres before the general election, but as they could not lay that charge, they said that there was nothing in it. Mr. Speaker, it is obviously extremely difficult to please everyone and when a politician adopts a responsible attitude it is seldom recognized. That responsible attitude on the part of the Minister of Finance is obvious in the main objectives of the budget. The first objective is to allow our industry to maintain and increase its capacity to be a serious competitor in international markets. That, Mr. Speaker, is extremely important for us Canadians.

Its second objective, Mr. Speaker, is to keep inflationary pressures as low as possible. Obviously it would be tempting to resort to the solution proposed by the New Democratic Party and to slash personal income taxes thus increasing purchasing power but one had to ask himself seriously, and that is what the Minister of Finance did, what effects such cuts, that extra flow of money would have on inflationary pressures; whether such a decision might not precipitate a new wave of inflation, and whether it might not reach the level we have known in the last few years but have now managed to contain. The danger was that much greater that we are just coming out of a period during which controls were applied to subdue inflationary forces. I am happy that the Minister of Finance resisted that suggestion and took a far more responsible decision, namely that of containing inflationary forces by refraining from opening too wide the gates of purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, we also know that those forces could have led to greater expectations in salary demands destroying what we managed to get from all workers, that is recognition that lower increases were needed as compared with those we saw during periods of development. They recognized themselves that it constituted an inflationary force; as we know, a renewal of high demands in salary increases would exceed the present capacity of the Canadian economy.

As I see it the fourth objective is designed to stimulate investment in as many Canadian firms as possible. I shall refer later on, Mr. Speaker, to some measures which can actually help us achieve this new economic impetus. Finally another objective has to do with research and development in all sectors of the Canadian industry.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about some measures that will enable us to achieve these objectives. First, the reduction of the federal sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. I think this measure is very significant and that everybody should be involved not only the manufacturers but also those who are situated between the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian consumer to see that this reduction is actually passed on to the consumer. If we can achieve these objectives, I am sure that everybody from the producer to the retailer will recognize the useful repercussions of this measure on the economy and that they will help the government reach these objectives by passing on this 3 per cent reduction to the Canadian consumer, for not only will the consumer benefit from this but also the business firm because reducing the price of goods by 3 per cent will create the demand, which had been the purpose of previous tax cuts, by lowering the cost to the consumer by 3 per cent. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this measure is of significant importance.

Mr. Speaker, I reiterate my trust in all intermediaries between the producer and the consumer. I dare hope they will do their utmost to pass this reduction on consumer goods on to all consumers.

There is a second point which I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, in connection with personal income tax. For instance, with fiscal year 1979, the deduction for employment expenses will be increased from $250 to a maximum $500. It will enable 6.2 million taxpayers in Canada to take advantage of a tax deduction representing a loss of revenue of about $270 million for the government. It is extremely important.

Someone said earlier that with a reduction in personal income tax it would be possible to put more money in the consumer's pockets; well, those $270 million will in fact go into the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer to enable him to buy more new goods. This is a relief from employment expenses.

The third measure, Mr. Speaker, relates to the indexing mechanism which is incorporated in the Income Tax Act. We know that it was already implemented and that it will reduce federal tax by $1.2 billion next year. I come back once again to what was said earlier about the request for sizeable tax cuts, and I shall say that this indexing provision makes it possible indeed to put new funds in the hands of taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, there is also a provision about registered retirement savings plans which will benefit minor or disabled children where their parents die. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the budget provision concerning unemployment insurance will benefit the employer or the employee. It will also enable us to stimulate our industry.

Mr. Speaker, now I would like to say a few words on provisions which will affect more particularly our economy in terms of natural resources. Among those provisions, I want to mention first the investment tax credit. This provision, as everybody is aware of, is extended for an indefinite period and above all its rate is higher. Also, although not limited to natural resources it will benefit that sector significantly because of its regional impact. Indeed the rate is raised to 20 per cent in the Gaspé area. Recently I was listening to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) commenting on what is happening in Murdochville and Madeleine mines and I am sure he is very happy that this increase to 20 per cent should apply to his riding.

I am also convinced that all hon. members from the Atlantic provinces share the opinion of the hon. member for Gaspé. In the other designated areas it was increased to 10 per cent. These include the major part of Quebec, all northern Ontario and western Canada, except for the southern part of Alberta and British Columbia. Since most future investments in mining and forestry will be in these areas, the impact of this measure is far from being negligible for the mining industry. Thus most of the $500 million allocated in the first year by the recently introduced budget will affect the sector of resources in the areas I have enumerated.

Exploration and development in the mining and oil industries will be particularly encouraged by the new measures reducing considerably the corporate tax paid by companies operating in this sector. For example, new mining development expenditures will be deductible at 100 per cent instead of the 30 per cent rate previously used. That is a considerable raise, Mr. Speaker. That is to start from 30 per cent and say that from now on everything you spend to develop new mines will be deductible. Expenditures incurred by resource industries for new social assets or local facilities will be eligible for the additional deduction of $1 for every $3 spent, as will the expenditures for exploration and development of the industry itself. This would increase the interest on investments and stimulate the economy of many mining areas. This measure would also improve the welfare of the people living in those areas where mining facilities are being installed.

The Department of Finance has estimated at about $25 million the cost to the federal government of these two measures.

The accelerated amortization of pollution control equipment is extended indefinitely. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that it is extremely costly to instal pollution control equipment, either in the energy, mining or paper sectors, and companies engaging in such programs will be granted a tax reimbursement. This will also be in the interest of the people living in those areas, as we are increasingly conscious of the dangers of pollution for those people. As the mining industry is going through a period of uncertainty, this extension will be very beneficial to them. It is sometimes difficult for companies which are experiencing overproduction and a reduced rate of profitability to make the necessary expenses in the fight against pollution in order to improve the quality of life. That measure will help us in the pursuit of our objectives relating to the quality of the environment, and at the same time it will stimulate the economy in many regions.

The extension of incentives for drilling funds is also an extremely positive measure. That program, which was supposed to expire on June 30, 1979, gives individuals an opportunity to get directly involved in oil and gas research through a drilling fund and to benefit from the generous incentives offered to that industry. That program also makes it possible for us to find right here in Canada the capital needed for the implementation of our energy policy. The extension of that measure will only confirm our commitment to government policy and our determination to take all necessary steps for its implementation.

There are other things, Mr. Speaker, and I quote:

Extension of coverage to transportation

The coverage of the investment tax credit is to be expanded to include expenditures on rail, air, water and . . . road transportation equipment. The basic rate of credit of 7 per cent will apply to all such qualified expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, we know that many and substantial investments are necessary in the transport industry, and you will see that this measure will be particularly helpful to the mining industry transporting, for example, sulphur, potassium and coal.

I would now like to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, about the business transaction that allows all Canadians to be able to say that today their oil company, Petro-Canada, is now one of the giants in the oil industry. By acquiring Pacific Petroleums, Petro-Canada has become one of those giants. As a Canadian, Mr. Speaker, I am very proud of that transaction and I suspect that most Canadians are going to reject the idea of the Leader of the Opposition who would sell the Canadian corporation that is Petro-Canada.

I would like to point out what I believe to be a great abuse of language, namely that that was an act of nationalization. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it can be said that that transaction freezes government funds and requires serious outlays by the government at a time of spending restraint. As was suggested on several occasions in this House, the purchase by Petro-Canada is a business transaction in which all the rules of business transactions were followed. Petro-Canada went and got its funds through the Canadian banking system and bought shares of Pacific Petroleums. So that transaction is a business deal, and Petro-Canada through the profits it will derive from that new organization will be able to invest a lot more in the research for and supply of energy in Canada. That will allow us to achieve the objective of meeting more than 70 per cent of Canada's needs in petroleum products. That purchase will also allow us to have better guarantees as to our reserves of energy. The amounts generated by Petro-Canada will also allow us to reduce the government expenditures that will be necessary to give Petro-Canada a second breath, new energy and a new financial capacity to broaden its operations.

And, as was said and repeated, Mr. Speaker, that purchase was made without having to use government funds but on a commercial basis, financed through the banking system.

Mr. Speaker, those were the few remarks I wanted to make on the budget and I am sure all Canadians will give their support to those budget measures, they will also give their support to that transaction, and I would invite them to read the editorial in today's Toronto Star which contains an excellent analysis of the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the purchase of Pacific Petroleums by Petro-Canada.

[English]

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to preface my comments, if I may, with a special word of appreciation and thanks to all my workers in the recent by-election in Ottawa Centre for their efforts, for the long hours they put in and, in many cases, for the sore feet they suffered, indeed for everything they did in responding so well to a hotly contested campaign. I am highly indebted to them for their efforts in getting me into this House. I should also like to take the opportunity to thank the electors in Ottawa Centre for the clear-cut mandate they gave me to represent them in this place. Finally, I should like to thank all the hon. members in this House who have helped me make the transition to parliamentary life as easy as it has been in the last month.

It is with great pride and very real humility, Mr. Speaker, that I came forth one month ago to this chamber to represent the people of Ottawa Centre. It is a responsibility I do not take lightly, particularly at this time in our country's history. The challenges are great and the opportunities before us unparalleled in the industrial world. Yet as I travelled across this land I could only detect to my sorrow a lack of confidence in our ability to meet these challenges, uncertainty about our future and, indeed, fear at our current situation.

These deep-rooted concerns among Canadians are graphically portrayed by the comments and queries of my constituents in Ottawa Centre. To many to the east and to the west of us, Ottawa Centre appears as a constituency unique in Canada. It is a riding situated at the heart of the nation's capital. Its topography is graced by rivers, lakes, canals and parks. It is the riding in which this House is located and as such it is the major focal point of political activity in this country.

Yet in reality, Mr. Speaker, far from being highly unique and highly favoured, the riding of Ottawa Centre is in most respects a microcosm of Canadian society. The income level of my constituents parallels very closely that of Canadians as a whole, ranging from wealth to poverty. So does the educational background of my constituents parallel that found elsewhere in Canada. While there are many employed in the service industries, not the least important of which is the federal government, Ottawa Centre also has a strong constituency of small businessmen, of professionals, of tradesmen, of construction workers.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Ottawa Centre also has ethnic characteristics which are comparable to the ethnic diversity of our country. Moreover, there are as many tenants as homeowners in Ottawa Centre. This constituency is therefore very representative of Canada as a whole in many respects.

[English]

But, Mr. Speaker, Ottawa Centre is not a highly favoured riding. It is a riding which suffers a rate of inflation equal to, or higher than, that of most major urban centres in this country. It is a riding which, surprising though it may be to people from elsewhere, unfortunately has a rate of unemployment which is generally higher than the average for Canada as a whole. In this respect the concerns and expectations of the people of Ottawa Centre mirror well those of many Canadians. In electing me to the House last October 16, the people of Ottawa Centre gave me a strong mandate to speak out, and speak out strongly, on their behalf and to make their concerns known in this forum of public debate.

In addition to these general concerns, there are also considerations over and above the over-all situation of the economy of this country, of the state of the nation as a whole and of the management of the public sector. My constituents are concerned about the industrial future of Ottawa Centre in the near term; and they are concerned about the relocation program of the federal government and the policies the federal government intends of pursue unilaterally in terms of its employees.

But, Mr. Speaker, today—

[Translation]

I would especially like to talk about the proposals made last week by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), concerning the present economic situation in Canada as he sees it. I would therefore like to talk briefly about the economic situation in Canada. However, I am getting more and more concerned, Mr. Speaker, to find so many different opinions and different interpretations about the present economic situation. I also deplore the fact that the debates often become personal attacks. To underline my concern, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention as an example, the recent discussions in public forums such as this institution about the situation on the labour market. If we talk about unemployment during such debates, we are quickly accused of being prophets of doom. However, if we look only at job creation in Canada in the last 12 months, we always forget to talk about the unfortunate situation of those who attempted to join the labour market without success. I have another example, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Another example, Mr. Speaker, of this divergence in the interpretation of current economic conditions, can be found in the debate over the rate of real output growth in this country. Less than a year ago I had, I believe, the unique distinction of being in full agreement with the Minister of Finance in terms of the prospects for the Canadian economy in 1978. Both our evaluations of possible developments this year, led us to believe that real output would grow by 5 per cent. Yet, Mr. Speaker, for the government that 5 per cent, became a goal to be achieved and against which it has fallen short, while for us it was a barely acceptable economic performance that desperately needed to be surpassed through more aggressive economic policies.

Other examples of widely diverging interpretations of the same numbers abound. I need not detail them because I feel I have made my point. Essentially, my point is that the current situation hardly provides an environment of factual analysis, that leads to appropriate policy proposals.

● (1722)

What, then, is the current economic situation against which the measures introduced last week by the Minister of Finance must be evaluated? First let me talk about the positive elements, because there are many. Let me start by calling attention to our human resources.

[Translation]

First of all, Canada is a young nation with a young, dynamic and aggressive manpower. If we compare the age of Canadian workers on the basis of the total Canadian population with the average age of the population of our main trading partners, we find that Canada's population is much younger on the average. The Canadian population also has an education level greatly superior to that of the manpower of our trading partners. If we look first of all at access to education, we find that in Canada, between ages 3 and 34, 49.8 per cent of the population enjoy direct access to the educational system, which is much more than the percentages of 44 per cent in the United States, 22 per cent in the United Kingdom, 16 per cent in West Germany and 23 per cent in Japan.

If we look at another statistic, Mr. Speaker, which concerns the number of years spent full-time in the educational system in Canada, between ages 7 and 25, we find that Canada ranks third among the countries of the OECD, behind Sweden and the United States. In addition to a young, aggressive and well-educated manpower, Canada has an abundance of workers, which instead of being described as one of our great advantages, is often thought to be one of the weaknesses of our system and one of the main causes of our high unemployment. For my part, I like to consider this abundance of workers as one of the positive factors of the seventies and future decades.

[English]

The human resources of this country are unparalleled in the industrial world. They are the cornerstone of the future development of this country, particularly as we enter the 1980s. To the same extent that our human resources are the cornerstone of that development, our physical resources are the tool of that development.

Let me assure this House that we are far from being deficient in physical resources. Let me name but a few. We have a total forestry inventory equal to that of the United States. We have proven oil reserves per capita twice those of the United States. Proven gas reserves per capita are two and a half times larger than those found in the United States. In terms of cultivated land we have a factor of 2½ per cent per capita over the United States. Our uranium resources per capita are three times the size of those in the United States. I need not tell the House that we exceed by much larger factors the wealth and resources of countries such as the U.K., West Germany and Japan.

Turning to our mining sector, our production levels for nickel, zinc, copper, potash, asbestos, uranium and iron ore, to name but a few, surpass absolutely those of our major industrial trading partners. If they do not surpass in absolute terms, they do in terms of per capita production.

Our resources are not running out. We have an abundance of resources left in the soil. That is our potential, and realizing that potential will be the main challenge facing Canadians in the 1980s.

[Translation]

But to date, Mr. Speaker, our economic performance remains far short of the potential I have just indicated. I would like to take a few moments to deal with the economic conditions now prevailing in Canada. At this point in time, in the last months of 1978, we find ourselves in a period of economic stagnation that has been going on since the 1974-75 recession which, it will be remembered, is the most severe experienced since World War II. Since that time our economic performance record, although it may be considered acceptable based on certain international comparisons, is indeed noticeable for its failures to realize our potential. We have been performing much below our potential. In 1975, our growth rate in real terms was 1.3 per cent. In 1976, thanks to a strong first quarter, growth was 5.5 per cent. In 1977, the figure was 2.7 per cent and to date, this year, we have had a first quarter where real growth was 0.7 per cent, and a second quarter where growth was only 1.1 per cent.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, over that 13-quarter period, ever since the 1974-75 recession, we had ten quarters when economic growth in Canada was below the level needed to accommodate the increase in the labour force and to maintain the level of our industrial capacity utilization. In other words during three quarters only of those three years did we experience the kind of economic growth this country needs to fulfil its potential.

[English]

If we consider current economic indicators, about which we hear in this House every day and about which we read in the newspapers of this nation every day, there is very little to lead one to make a statement as to the emerging recovery of this economy. Our real domestic product is increasing at a rate of approximately 2½ per cent per year. Our industrial production is increasing at a rate of less than 4 per cent per year. When we consider new orders, retail trade, machinery and equipment, we find indicators which show no great vigour and no move toward a sustained recovery.

In terms of housing starts there has been a very serious slump over the last 12 to 18 months. Only when we look at employment creation do we find a glimmer of hope. That will soon be dashed by labour force growth, the increase in the number of those Canadians who are legitimately entering the labour market to seek employment. There again by comparison there is a significant shortfall, and there will be a consequent increase in the rate of unemployment.

I have described our economic potential and our economic performance to date. There is a very great distinction between our potential and our actual economic performance. The fact that there is a difference between our potential and our performance is the tragedy of this government. This government has been unable to understand and appreciate, in policy terms, the distinction between what we can be and what we are at the moment. I can say only that no amount of comparisons with countries which are not as well endowed with natural resources as we are and which are not as fortunate as we are in terms of human resources will hide from Canadians the basic fact that we are experiencing some very serious economic difficulties.

We must not compare our economic performance with that of other industrial countries, because at this time and into the 1980s we are and will be a country which stands in a class of its own, given those resources and our potential. The meaningful comparison which has to enter public debate and serve as a basis for policy formulation is that between our actual performance and the potential we know we can realize. In that respect I am afraid we will find ourselves seriously lacking in terms of initiatives. We will find ourselves in great need of new policy directions, new initiatives, new leadership and, in one word, new government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Cotret: In response to the current economic situation and to our potential, let me review briefly what the policy stance in this country has been and how it has evolved in the last 12 months. Let me say very boldly that 12 months ago we had a more aggressive and a more expansionary monetary policy. Twelve months ago we had a more aggressive and a more expansionary fiscal policy. Over the last three years, the monetary targets set forth by the Bank of Canada, as a prime indicator of its policy direction, gradually have been reduced from a range of between 8 per cent and 12 per cent to a range of between 7 per cent and 11 per cent last year; to a range of between 6 per cent and 10 per cent this year. The last reduction to a range of between 6 per cent and 10 per cent was accompanied by no less than six increases in the bank rate, leading to unprecedented high levels of interest rates across the country.

● (1732)

That is not to say that is a restrictive policy. Money is available, but money is very expensive. It is a high priced policy. But definitely it is a policy which is less expansionary than that which we could find in the country only 12 months ago.

On the fiscal side, the situation is much the same. We have gone from a position where we had temporary income tax cuts earlier this year to a temporary reduction in sales taxes. Recently we have seen the end of that measure, the introduction of significant expenditure cutbacks, and in this latest set of proposals from the government the reintroduction of only a small part of the stimulus which we could find in the economy in the earlier months of this year.

When I look at the measures presented by the Minister of Finance in his budget last Thursday, I find the biggest criticism which can be directed toward those measures is the one which flows logically from my comments—that we are not addressing the question of our economic potential.

There are specific measures in the budget which must be applauded. Let me applaud them and name them. I was happy to see the government make a move, as timid as it may be, in the area of manufacturers' sales tax. Also I was very happy to see the investment tax credit measures introduced. I think the R and D initiatives are in the right direction; we have been talking about that for a long time. The move in the area of resource taxation is one which should be applauded, as well as the employment expense deduction. This is something we have favoured and recommended to the government over the past several months.

When one looks at the over-all budget, what does the government offer to Canadians? Certainly it offers no hope that Canada will enter in the near future a period of economic recovery and sustained economic growth. It offers another year of 4 per cent growth, a rate of growth which is inferior to what is required to accommodate new entrants into the labour force. It offers employment creation of 250,000 jobs, which is exactly the same number as the increase in the labour force, if we assume absolutely no increase in the participation rate. I know the minister would be the last person to make a forecast of the participation rate, or for that matter the unemployment rate. In my own timid way, let me say that given the social and economic environment in this country, I expect to see continued increases in the participation rate. On that basis, a job creation forecast of 250,000 inevitably leads to a forecast of higher unemployment for the 12 to 14 months to come.

With regard to inflation, the minister offers the hope to Canadians that our inflation rate next year will be about the same as it is this year. The budget does nothing to restore the stimulus we had in the system earlier in the year. The budget does nothing to offer Canadians the reasonable expectation that they will know better economic times in the next 12 to 18 months. It is a stagnation budget.

In looking at the over-all budget, my second observation is that it is a short-term budget. I am not sure if that should be viewed as a criticism, because in the tradition of recent budgets it seems to me that all we can expect is a five-month budget from the government. It is a budget of adjustments of the margin. It is a budget which does not deal with the very critical problem of addressing where we are going as a nation in the 1980s and 1990s. It is a budget which gives no indication of direction or goals, and no commitment to stability in policy. In fact, it is a budget which is a stop-gap measure. It is a stand-fast budget which inevitably will lead to the continuation of the period of economic stagnation which we are now experiencing. The proposals introduced in the guise of a budget do nothing to help Canadians realize the potential they have and to get Canadians, as they have in the past, enthusiastically behind a move toward economic prosperity.

In conclusion, I should like to address specifically three myths which have been perpetuated in the public debate generally, and to some extent in the recently introduced budget measures. The first myth I should like to dispel is that at best in Canada we can expect an economic performance equal to that of the United States. Have we forgotten that over the years we have had a stronger growth in income per capita in Canada than in the United States? Have we forgotten that in the whole post-war period we have had more rapid productivity growth in Canada than in the United States? Have we forgotten than on average over this period we have had more rapid real growth in Canada than in the United States?

Mr. Pinard: Because of the Liberal government.

Mr. de Cotret: We have. To suggest that the best we can achieve is a rate of real growth equal to the United States, and that we should be thankful for that, should be put aside immediately. We can and we must achieve a rate of economic development, growth and wealth generation in the country to allow the kind of distribution of income we would like to achieve. We must and can achieve a rate of economic development superior to that of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Cotret: The second myth I should like to talk about briefly is that only a high level of unemployment will solve inflation. I am sure members of the House will remember that myth because it has been widely publicized across the country. Have we forgotten the costs of unemployment, the costs of having available human resources who are non-productive? There are human costs, social costs, and some very real economic costs which must be borne by the rest of us who are productively engaged.

In an environment in which there is rampant excess demand, inflation, shortage of manpower, shortage of goods and in which we are facing bottlenecks, certainly a higher level of unemployment traditionally has led to a decrease in inflationary pressures. But in an environment in which no such pressures exist from the demand side, in an environment in which there is ample excess capacity, in which demand is weak, and in which unemployment is hovering between the 8 per cent and 9 per cent level, the economic and social costs of unemployment, far from decreasing inflation, are fed right through the line, add to the over-all cost pressures on the economy, and contribute to a higher rate of inflation. At that point the policy prescription is clear: we can fight both unemployment and inflation at the same time. I remain firmly convinced that that is an objective which we should set for ourselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Cotret: The third myth which I was most disappointed to see emerge in our nation approximately a year and a half ago is that Canadians must accept a slower rate of growth, no doubt a justification for the fact that our rate of growth already was quite slow. What exactly does that myth mean? When we look at it on a per capita basis, does it mean that we must accept permanently a higher rate of unemployment of human resources? If not, the only other thing it could mean is that we must accept permanently a lower rate of productivity growth.

Very frankly, I reject both. We need not accept a higher rate of unemployment of human resources We have all the means at our disposal to achieve at least the same kind of productivity growth in the next decade or two, as we have in the last decade or two. On a per capita basis, we can and we must achieve the kind of economic growth this country is capable of, given its potential.

● (1742)

If I have been able to dispel these three myths, Mr. Speaker, what must we accept? The basic proposition is that we must accept that Canada's potential is unique among industrial nations; we must accept that this potential has to be addressed; we must accept the need for a set of comprehensive strategies and policies to ensure that Canadians can maximize that potential over the decades to come. The Progressive Conservative party in the last several months has put forth suggestions, policies and initiatives that would provide Canada with just that type of policy—not a marginal policy, not a policy of adjustment or of tinkering and not a policy to deal with specific issues, but a framework in which the potential of this nation is clearly identified and against which policies can be introduced to help maximize this potential. These are policies dealing with individuals, housing, small business, the corporate environment and labour relations. These policies have been made public and we will discuss them further.

These are the policies for the 1980s. They are the policies of hope and they are the policies of a country that will realize its potential in the next decade.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member would permit a brief question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a decision for the hon. member as he still has a minute of time.

Mr. de Cotret: I would be very happy to entertain a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to congratulate the hon. member for an excellent maiden speech. He showed a very high degree of skill. My question is, will he not agree that in light of his thoughtful remarks it is high time he replaced the wholly discredited financial critic of the opposition?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, in view of the policies this party has put forward in the economic area and the direction we are trying to give the debate on economic policy for this country, that question answers itself. There is, of course, no such need.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think it might be important to note on this point of order that what we have seen here today is a violation of a very long-standing parliamentary tradition in relation to a new member of parliament making his maiden speech in the House of Commons. There is no question but that the hon. member of parliament for Ottawa Centre (Mr. de Cotret) dealt very effectively both with the issues facing the country and with the intemperate intervention by the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What a bunch of cry babies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the best solution to this matter is to put the question and I will do so. I would ask hon. members for their co-operation.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 60(7), to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question on the amendment now before the House.

[English]

The question therefore is on the amendment by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Stevens), which was negatived on the following division.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

SPILL OF PCB CHEMICAL AT REGINA, SASK.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, which I trust will meet with the approval of the House.

In view of the alarming spill at the city of Regina of a least 1,500 gallons of Askral, a PCB, a chemical that has been linked to cancer, birth defects and other ailments, this being the biggest known spill of PCBs in Canadian history, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the House instruct the minister of the environment to make provision in his department and in co-operation with provincial environment departments for the establishment of a detection and correction squad, being an investigative and action-oriented task force which in the future could act quickly on such industrial spills as have occurred in Regina and at Dowling, near Sudbury, thus affording protection to the health and safety of Canadians and literally saving millions of taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

MEDIA COVERAGE OF COMMITTEE MEETING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, and seek the unanimous consent of the House for my motion.

Whereas the Standing Committee on Public Accounts will have the Auditor General of Canada before it at 3.30 p.m. today to be questioned on his 1978 report, as this report is possibly one of the most important reports tabled in the House of Commons, and because there is high media and public interest in this subject matter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker):

That the electronic media be allowed to join their colleagues from the press gallery and report on the special meeting of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can only be done with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REMOVAL OF RAILWAY TANK CARS TO LESS POPULATED AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It has been reported that a tank car of lethal hydrogen-sulphide gas was left standing unguarded at the Sydney CNR depot for 30 hours on the weekend of November 4.

In view of the fact that a former professor of chemistry at the college of Cape Breton says leaving such a potentially dangerous commodity—comparable to hydrogen-cyanide in its destructive capabilities—in a highly populated area is a dangerous threat to the people, I move, seconded by the member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That in future the CNR be instructed by the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to place such tank cars at a siding in a less populated area.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR CREATION OF CHICKEN MARKETING BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that poultry producers in Quebec requested some time ago the establishment of a national chicken marketing board and that it is urgent to set up such a board immediately to avoid the deterioration of the market at the expense of Canadian producers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle):

That the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) be directed to proceed immediately with the creation of that board for marketing both Canadian and imported poultry.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

GOVERNMENT STRATEGIES ON MOVEMENT AND SALE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity regarding reports from Washington of a further United States wheat sale of 145,000 metric tonnes to China, bringing the total United States wheat sales to China for this year and next to four million metric tonnes.

● (1412)

In light of the serious implication this has for Canada's position in world grain markets, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board make a statement on motions detailing the government's strategies for the sale and movement of grain for the balance of this crop year and inform the grain producers of this country of all immediate and future measures he is planning to take to ensure that world markets for Canadian grain do not continue to slip away.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CALL FOR INCREASED BIOMEDICAL RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the government abandon the foolish idea that you can make significant savings in the health care field by cutting back on biomedical research, and that the government recognize that the only way to affect such savings is to increase expenditure on research.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

RETURN OF MAIL BECAUSE SIN NOT INCLUDED IN ADDRESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity and of great public concern, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas mail addressed to military personnel in Canada and elsewhere is being returned because the social insurance number is not included in the address, and whereas it is not possible to legally obtain the social insurance number of any Canadian citizen except, of course, from the individual, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the Prime Minister, the Postmaster General and the Minister of National Defence issue a joint statement to cease this procedure, practice or policy and, further, that the same ministers take steps to make certain that these practices, procedures or policies halt for all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done, in conformity with Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AUDITOR GENERAL

TABLING OF 100th REPORT

Mr. Speaker: Before beginning the oral question period, I have the honour to lay upon the Table the 100th Annual Report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978. I would remind hon. members that, pursuant to Standing Order

65(1)(a), this report is deemed permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I take particular pleasure in introducing this report into our proceedings in the presence in our gallery of the Auditor General of Canada, Mr. James Macdonell.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POLICY RESPECTING SELF-PERPETUATING PROGRAMS— REFORM OF STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I say, on behalf of this side of the House, that we hope the second century of reports of the Auditor General receives much more careful attention by the government than has been the case in recent years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question is to the Prime Minister. I understand that the Auditor General's report talks about the problems created by self-perpetuating programs and about the very real difficulty of parliament being able to ensure that programs are accomplishing the purpose for which parliament established them. Would the Prime Minister tell us if it is the intention of the government to adopt some species of my proposal to introduce into practice in this parliament a form of Sunset law?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the Leader of the Opposition's concern about the first century, particularly the early part when it was dominated by so many Conservative governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I wish the Leader of the Opposition would make some specific proposals about Sunset laws. He has talked about them, I understand in various forums. I remember introducing into this House a Sunset law in one particular piece of legislation and department, and having all the Tory party oppose it, saying we should not have anything disappear.

● (1417)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in terms of that long period of Conservative domination, we intend next year to start another century of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: For the Prime Minister's reference, I draw his attention to a proposal placed on the order paper by my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, outlining in detail a proposal for a Sunset law.

My question now for the Prime Minister has to do with recommendations with which I am sure he is familiar, coming from myself and other members of this House on various committees, relating to procedures in this House. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to introduce reforms to the rules of this House that will allow there to be consideration of the estimates of some departments without a time limitation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question of House rules has been before this House a few times since I have been Prime Minister. We have never had the co-operation of the opposition party in any of our attempts to make this House more efficient.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We made specific proposals. We suggested forms of allocating less time on second reading, for example, as is the case in the British parliament where they spend one day in principle on second reading. We have seen this opposition talk for days and days and days on second reading, while it should be the occasion, under the rules, when they would only state their position in principle.

However, with this kind of a party, they have no position on principle. They get around that by talking for days and days on the subject. This is against the spirit of the law as it is practised in the British parliament.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, that is the second question the Prime Minister has refused to answer in the House. Since that recommendation came from a committee which includes members of his party, I can only assume that there are some members of his party, and not just us and the media, whom he considers to be the enemy of the country.

I would like to direct a final supplementary, in the hope it might begin the tradition of having some questions answered here. I direct it to the President of the Treasury Board.

In light of the concern expressed by the Auditor General that parliament and the people of Canada have inadequate information on which to judge the estimates which are brought forward in the House of Commons and have to be approved by this House, I wonder if the Auditor General would give us a guarantee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: He is not here.

Mr. Clark: I inadvertently referred to the Auditor General. There is no question that we would have more information forthcoming from that gentleman were he occupying that seat instead of the President of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question to the President of the Treasury Board is the following: will he give us an unqualified guarantee that any future estimates he might bring into this House of Commons will be estimates that have the fullness of information—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I am not sure, but I suppose the government is always nervous—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we had better conclude this question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I will conclude the question, Mr. Speaker, when the government members conclude their attempts to interrupt and stop us from putting questions in this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Possibly I can get a little quiet from over there. Can we have, from the President of the Treasury Board, an unequivocal guarantee that any future estimates he or his short-lived government might introduce into this House will contain the kind of fullness of information that was requested and recommended by the Auditor General in his report?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the development of new forms of the estimates is a matter that has been under consideration by this government; in fact, in co-operation and in consultation with the public accounts committee. The deliberations are going on. There are some very interesting advances being thought out. We will only put them in after we have had exposure to and advice from the public accounts committee. Therefore, I am not making any time guarantee; I will only say that progress is being made.

PUBLIC SERVICE

USE OF PERFORMANCE MEASUREMENT SYSTEMS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. A good portion of the Auditor General's report just tabled by Your Honour deals with the lack of performance measurement systems, that is, some way by which the government is able to measure the productivity and efficiency of people in the public service. For instance, he says that in 16 performance measurement systems covering 100,000 man-hours in 12 departments, only two systems were satisfactory. I ask the Prime Minister, who has for ten years been leader of the government, why there should be such a deplorable record as that in the public service.

[Mr. Clark.]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): I should like to reply to that question having more direct knowledge about it. Indeed, we want to see vast improvements in performance measurement, vast improvements in the techniques and methods used to evaluate programs. I think objective observation would indicate that the practices this government has already installed are applauded by other governments around the world and are, in fact, the subject of considerable encouragement from the Auditor General as to what we have done and what we intend to do.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Andras: That is not to say they are perfect, but we are advancing and our methodology is being given great credit by many observers outside the government and in the private sector.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: The hon. gentleman says they are not perfect. The Auditor General says they are non-existent; that is the point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: Another section in the report deals with the evaluation of programs, that is, information on the accomplishments of programs and policies. In 23 programs in 18 departments, the Auditor General says there is no evaluation process. Either the Prime Minister or the President of the Treasury Board should tell us why not.

Mr. Andras: I think the hon. member would be more credible if he presented a more balanced approach to this subject. He should read the Auditor General's overview comments. There is no doubt that in the so-called spice observations there are many criticisms, many of them justified. We welcome those criticisms. They do date back, however, to events, projects and undertakings of several years ago. They are very valuable to us, enabling us to refine our programs and devise improvements which we want to instal in the future. I think the hon. member would serve the House better if he took a more balanced approach to the report.

Mr. Lawrence: In dealing with parliamentary control, the accountability of the government to parliament, the Auditor General recommends a brand new approach. But he does say that after three successive auditor general's reports, three successive reports of the public accounts committee on three separate occasions, Treasury Board indicated its intention to follow the recommendations which were made. He says now, in this year's report, that little has been done.

Again, my question is a simple one; it is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and it affects the credibility of Treasury Board. Why has Treasury Board not done what it said it would do in three successive years?

Mr. Andras: Again, an objective examination of the facts and of the report would indicate that the Auditor General himself has noted a great deal of progress on many fronts by Treasury Board and by the departments which come under its examination.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

WORKERS EXPOSED TO ASBESTOS HAZARDS—UNITED STATES COURT CASE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the minister charged with responsibility for protecting and maintaining the health of Canadians. I should like to ask whether the minister and her officials are familiar with documents filed in a recent U.S. court case which show that as early as 1949, Canadian asbestos companies were aware of the serious health hazards to which their employees were exposed.

If the minister is not familiar with these documents, would she assure the House that the department will get copies of them and look into these charges?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will, Mr. Speaker. The general problem of asbestos in relation to health is well known to us. The hon. member refers to particular documents going back to 1949. My department probably has them, but I will pass on the information.

● (1427)

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, in the United States court case to which I referred, Judge James Price stated that the documents filed in his court——further reflects a conscious effort by the industry to downplay, or arguably suppress, the dissemination of information to employees for fear of the promotion of lawsuits.

In view of the fact that thousands of Canadian workers who have been exposed to asbestos hazards may have had their lives put in jeopardy by such suppression of information, will the minister look into this matter and discuss with the provinces what action, including the laying of charges, may be necessary under federal or provincial legislation?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, a question like the one the hon. member just asked is meaningful if it applies to a particular case; otherwise, it creates unnecessary panic in the public.

I know of one case which was brought to my attention recently by my colleague, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. That case involved the Baie Verte asbestos plant in Newfoundland. I promised the hon. member that I would consider favourably any request for medical research regarding that particular case. Asbestos problems generally are being studied now by the Department of the Environment and by my department, with a view to further action being taken with the provinces.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY OF WORKERS EXPOSED TO ASBESTOS HAZARDS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, there is much medical evidence to show the dangers of working near asbestos. My final supplementary is directed to the Acting Minister of Labour. Has the Department of Labour's new centre for occupational health and safety had any discussions with the provinces concerning workers who have been exposed to asbestosis, asbestos hazards, and specifically whether there is a need for joint action in determining what persons have been affected and what medical attention is appropriate?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the new council is currently being set up. As a matter of fact, there have been consultations between federal and provincial officials on this subject, and if the hon. member wishes to obtain further information, I should be pleased to send them to him.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR CREATION OF CHICKEN MARKETING BOARD

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): As the Minister of Agriculture is absent, Mr. Speaker, could his parliamentary secretary advise the House whether, pursuant to Bill C-76 which was adopted a few years ago "to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products," chicken and poultry producers in Canada have submitted an application for the establishment of a national marketing board for chicken, and if so, what stage of the examination process has their application reached now?

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the various provincial marketing boards for chicken have indeed submitted to the federal government applications for the establishment of a national marketing board for chicken.

As to the application per se, I must advise the hon. member that we, together with several hon. members on the government side, recently met the representatives of the Quebec poultry producers, who have submitted this application which in turn I have referred to the Department of Agriculture, and an important decision is forthcoming concerning the establishment of such a board.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Since this is of nationwide capital importance, could the Prime Minister advise the House, if the request for the creation of a national chicken marketing board has been brought to the cabinet's attention? If so, can he also tell us if a decision is forthcoming on this, as was suggested by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture? I want to specify to the Prime Minister that I do not want to cause any embarrassment through this question. I am simply asking a logical question which is of concern to a great many producers and which also affects Canadian harmony, because that is the basis of common understanding throughout Canada as regards marketing.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the hon. member does not want to cause any embarrassment. I apologize, I was not following the prior questioning, that is why I referred to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. But if he would take note of the question, I will gladly discuss it with him.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—CONTROL OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the President of the Treasury Board with regard to the report tabled today by the Auditor General, in which he details millions of dollars of waste of the taxpayers' dollars.

As the President of the Treasury Board will know, in the report the Auditor General examines some 13 acquisition projects worth $700 million, and of those 13 he found that 11 lacked adequate controls on expenditures, with the consequent waste of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money.

In view of that fact, what assurances can the minister give the Canadian taxpayers that the same pattern of inadequate controls and waste of the taxpayers' dollars will not continue all the way through the $10 billion in expenditures which are currently under way in capital projects for this government?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to disappoint the hon. member in telling him that I do not for a moment think that that is the situation throughout the government. As all hon. members know, this very valuable and comprehensive report tabled today by the Auditor General is the first one he has filed under the very expanded mandate which this government brought in within the Auditor General's bill last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Indeed, the Auditor General is now embarking on one very valuable expansion of his powers, the exercise of exploring value for money.

Mr. Baldwin: That is nonsense.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. Andras: The exploration by the Auditor General into value for money is nonsense? I find that an extremely interesting comment.

Mr. Baldwin: He had more rights before.

Mr. Andras: There have been many steps taken. The Auditor General is aware of that and he makes reference to them in his comments in the report, with regard to very much improved systems of control, not the least of which is also another measure by this government and that is the installation and recruitment of a very effective officer in the position of Comptroller General of Canada. Indeed, he is beginning to install the systems working in co-operation with the Auditor General, and I think you will see further vast improvements over those we have made in the last two, three or four years.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, Canadian taxpayers will not rest easy tonight after that answer from the minister. I want to ask the minister about one specific example with regard to the 13 projects audited by the Auditor General. It concerns the way in which the taxpayers' money is being squandered on the C. D. Howe building here in Ottawa, the lavish headquarters for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the fact that the Auditor General's report discloses that the government's decision to have the developer finance the project, as opposed to financing it itself, cost taxpayers $12 million, can the President of the Treasury Board tell this House how he justifies that waste of the taxpayers' money?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we will be very glad to go into that in great detail in the appropriate forum, which I think would be the first available meeting of the public accounts committee. The people who are directly involved in any one of the several spice examinations recorded by the Auditor General will be present to answer in detail.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, in his report the Auditor General points out that before engaging in major capital projects for acquiring new office space, particularly in Ottawa, the government has not looked adequately at all the alternatives, including the possibility of renting space. The result has been the loss of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money.

What assurances can the President of the Treasury Board give this House and the Canadian people that in the future all these alternatives will be examined and that, in particular, they will examine the option of renting before building themselves?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we have been examining those options. Indeed, there is a major study under way on the question of lease versus purchase and contracting for buildings ourselves versus leasing space. Those details are available to the House.

FINANCE

REDUCTION IN SALES TAX—REQUEST FOR REBATE TO AUTOMOBILE DEALERS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, but in his absence I will put it to the Prime Minister. A great deal of concern is being expressed by automobile dealers regarding the reduction in the federal excise tax as set forth in the recent budget. Many of these dealers have three and four months' inventory on hand as a result of the introduction of new models of vehicles and they estimate that they could lose as much as $60 million because of the tax reduction.

Will the Prime Minister consider and entertain a rebate program for certain large dollar items? There is precedent for this in the 1958 budget and the 1974 budget.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that seems to me like a rather extraordinary suggestion. When the government introduces a budget which cuts indirect taxes, the federal sales tax, the effect of which is that manufacturers and sales companies will cut the price of automobiles to the Canadian consumer, the hon. member is not happy: he would like us in some way to pretend that this tax had been known and that people could, in advance, get some kind of remuneration for it. I do not see how we can seriously contemplate indemnifying people whose stocks of cars were bought before the sales tax was cut. Surely, the consumers' interest is foremost.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Prime Minister understands. These people had already paid the 12 per cent excise tax before the government arbitrarily reduced it to 9 per cent. I am not disputing that it should be less than 9 per cent. I am saying that in good faith the dealers paid 12 per cent, they have these automobiles in stock and they are asking now if the government can follow a precedent set in 1958 and 1974, and give a rebate.

Furthermore, there is a great-deal of inventory in transit that will not reach the dealers' hands for three or four weeks. They will be charged 12 per cent on that as well, when they do not even have it in stock. Will the government not consider that?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, will the government also have to indemnify all the consumers who bought—

Mr. Kempling: I did not ask you that.

Mr. Trudeau: —any object which was hit by a sales tax? I wish the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the heckling is all about. They were told to keep quiet, not to heckle, and to wear blue suits—and they should do that.

Mr. Dick: You're the only one wearing a blue suit.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I even saw the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert hammer his desk yesterday rather than applaud, and I think this should be drawn to your attention.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SUBSIDIES RELATED TO FIVE-YEAR PROGRAM CONCERNING MINORITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

In view of disturbing comments made by non-government groups, could the Secretary of State assure the House that the government does not intend to cut funds for the $75 million five-year program to support both French-speaking and English-speaking minorities announced by himself in December 1977. Even if no announcement has been made so far for 1978-79, it is rumoured that the Secretary of State might have reservations about the amount of $12 million. I would like to have the assurance today that this is not the case.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there will be no reduction in the commitment made by the government to support the development and the progress of minority groups in both official languages. Thus, as I announced last year, in December I think, an increase of $75 million was earmarked for that purpose. There was no cut in this financial year as far as programs for minority groups in both official languages are concerned, and it is still true. In that respect, we did not change our decision to fulfil the commitment I made last December.

URBAN AFFAIRS

HOUSING PROJECT IN PIERREFONDS, QUEBEC—PROTECTION FOR PERSONS INVOLVED IN SALE

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the man in the grey suit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Pigott: In light of recent remarks made by the minister that he wanted to better target the housing dollar, specifically with regard to the Cloverdale project in Pierrefonds and the fact that the people there have not been able to meet with the minister, I wonder if he could give this House a guarantee that the 2,000 people involved in this sale will be protected under the conditions of the sale?

● (1442)

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that when Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation sells such a project, there is of course quite a normal condition in any transaction, which is that leases continue for the current year. Therefore the tenants do not have to fear that during their lease the rent might be increased.

Second, for those living in subsidized housing, there is a formal warranty to be agreed to by the new owner, which is that the same conditions in force under the ownership of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will continue for one year under the new ownership.

Now, for those who might fear that rents could be increased unduly, it is obvious that in the Cloverdale case, which is a housing complex located in the province of Quebec and subject to rental board regulations, any undue rent increase could be submitted to the rental board and be rectified where necessary.

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the minister whether he would inform the House about this particular sale, as this property has been evaluated at $10 million and is to be sold for $4 million cash to a group called Grado. Can he tell us a little more about the sale and the conditions of the sale?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the procedure for selling projects owned and taken back by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation following bankruptcy is always the same in all cases. I do not want to make this an exception. I sent the hon. member a document she now has and which she can read, I hope, and which clearly states that before offering it on the public market, we first offer it to provincial corporations. So, first, in the case of Cloverdale, the project was offered to the Quebec Housing Corporation, which turned down the offer. Second, we considered the possibility of selling it to a non-profit venture. Such organizations are more interested in smaller projects. Since this is a large project, no non-profit organization could afford to buy it. Third, it was therefore possible to sell it on the open market by calling for public bids. That has been done and in principle, the transaction was to be closed on December 1, the project being sold to the highest bidder.

FORESTRY

FUTURE OF CANADIAN FORESTRY SERVICE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Environment), and is with regard to the effects in his department of a recent cost-cutting exercise, to use the Prime Minister's words, which turns out to be more of a cost-shifting exercise.

It is clear that the Canadian Forestry Service has undergone a policy review. Judging from the recent acts of the government, it would appear it is the policy to phase out the Canadian Forestry Service. Can the minister tell the House whether he still lives by his commitment to the private sector to enhance the role of the Canadian Forestry Service instead, or is he really presiding over the demise of that most important public service?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada treats the forestry service that we have in this country as a very important one. The recent cuts were really regrettable, but I think the cuts made in the civil service were perhaps far less than those that would have been made by the party on the other side. Since that party opposite talks about a cut of 60,000 civil servants, I think the hon. member had better reconsider the kind of question that he is asking.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Just 30 days prior to the cuts that he is referring to, the minister committed himself publicly, to the forestry service, that no such cuts would be taking place in that crucial area. The fact is that the government is shifting responsibility to the provinces and the private sector. Can the minister tell the House what reaction he has received at this point from the private sector in response to his attempts to shift that responsibility, which is really one of government, to private industry?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, we have had a very positive response from the private sector, and to the privatization of the two labs in particular, the forest products lab in Vancouver and the forest products lab in Ottawa. The Canadian Forestry Advisory Committee, which is chaired by Mr. Rogers of Crown Zellerbach, and other meetings I have had with the private industry, have welcomed this move. I have said on many occasions in this House that we are going to get very great co-operation from private industry and from the privatization of those two labs. We will also get very great co-operation from the universities as a result of the privatization of those two labs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S. NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING HYDROCARBONS IN BEAUFORT SEA—PROGRESS REPORT ON FISHERIES SITUATION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it concerns the discussions just concluded with Mr. Cyrus Vance. I wonder whether the minister could advise if the report that Canada is now willing to compromise in terms of our claims in the Beaufort Sea is accurate. If it is accurate, can the minister advise whether he has sufficient information from the industry as to the value of hydrocarbons in that sea to make any kind of meaningful proposal?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the context of the hon. member's question, there has been no compromise. I suppose the whole negotiating process on any issue can be regarded as being, in a sense, a compromise in that a number of propositions are put forward and changed as the process goes along. Incidentally, no firm commitments have been made on any of the boundary issues as of this moment.

I personally cannot answer with regard to the hydrocarbon assessments. I would take the question as notice, if the hon. member agreed, or perhaps refer it to my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am not myself competent to answer that question.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that one of the other subjects discussed was the question of fishing rights with respect to the two countries in an attempt to put an end to what has been termed as the "fish war".

In British Columbia, we have 300 to 400 halibut fishermen who have been kicked out of the Bering Sea and who do not know whether they will fish next year at all. They have made a massive investment in their boats. Can the minister give the House some assurance that those fishermen will be allowed to continue fishing next year, or will be taken into the salmon fishery itself if they do not have the right to fish for halibut?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am very well aware of this problem from the representations and discussions I have had with the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), who has a direct interest in this matter because it is in her part of British Columbia. In so far as whether we can give the kind of assurances to which the hon. member referred, of course, it depends on the outcome of the negotiations. Halibut fishing is one of the issues; groundfish is another of the issues. Indeed, there is a whole complex of questions now being resolved.

In order to eliminate the uncertainties to which the hon. member has made reference, yesterday we gave the negotiators a very specific instruction to end their negotiations by the end of this current year. If there are unresolved problems at that time, they are to refer them to the ministers concerned, namely Mr. Vance and myself.

We are reasonably confident now that we will get a comprehensive fisheries' agreement between now and the end of the year. I can assure the hon. member that the interests of the halibut fishermen and, indeed, the interests of all fishermen, will be taken into account in that agreement.

If I may just have a few more seconds, Mr. Speaker, we have been consulting with literally every group on both coasts, and this is the process which has slowed up a final resolution, because we want to make sure that all of the inputs are there. Obviously, we may not be able to satisfy everyone on every issue, but we will do our best to get something that is in the best interests of the maximum number of fishermen, including the halibut fishermen.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF SIMPSONS BY HUDSON'S BAY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Will he confirm the bureau of competition policy is reviewing the proposed takeover of Simpsons by the Hudson's Bay Company, since if it goes through it will mean that one company will control more than two-thirds of the department store market in Canada, a level of concentration which could be contrary to the best interests of consumers?

● (1452)

Also would the minister and the government now agree that this proposed transaction shows a need to finally complete the reform and updating of our existing competition law, since it is likely not adequate to permit the government to deal fully with this or any kind of merger? Could he tell us when the government is likely to present a bill to this House to complete the revision of this important branch of the law?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, under the Combines Investigation Act, the director of investigations has been made aware of the proposed transaction between the Hudson's Bay Company and Simpsons Ltd. and is taking his responsibilities under the act.

As the hon. member knows, I cannot say anything further on that at the present time. With respect to a further reform of our competition laws, we are continuing discussion of this matter and hope we can announce something in due course.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS BY PERSONS CHARGED UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have addressed this question to the Minister of Justice, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Solicitor General.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Peace River asked some very important questions in reference to the use or abuse of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. We are dealing with a question of personal liberty and a charge made under the Official Secrets Act. I should like to ask if the minister would reconsider his position, because the guilt or innocence of an accused is decided by a judge alone or by a judge with a jury.

In light of the fact that the minister, by the use and abuse of this section, has withheld the documents that may determine the guilt or innocence of a person and affecting their personal liberty, will he reconsider his position and at least use section 41(1) and allow the judge to examine those documents in camera, so that a proper charge can be made to the jury? This is particularly important when we are dealing with a case of personal liberty under the Official Secrets Act, under which the charge was laid by this government.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. gentleman permits me to offer further clarification. It seems that he has misunderstood the position I have taken, judging from some of the reports about the action I have taken. If he reads carefully what I said yesterday in the House and what the Prime Minister said yesterday in the House, he will see that I filed two affidavits. One was filed under section 41(1) and covered 16,500 documents, more or less. Those documents are made available to the judge so that the judge can put his own evaluation on the nature of the documents and agree with me that they ought not to be produced to the court.

In terms of the very small portion of the total documents involved, namely, 548 documents, I felt that it was my responsibility—and in that I am supported by precedent—to decide whether the documents referred to information received from third country agencies, agencies which provided us with that information in confidence, and if providing those documents to anyone would be in breach of that confidence. Section 41(2) permits me, as is my responsibility, not to produce those documents to the tribunal.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, that was a very interesting answer.

Mr. Jamieson: I thought so.

Mr. Woolliams: The Solicitor General said "a small amount of documents". "Small" means 548, which is something like the money this government spends.

I am asking the minister, again, a very serious and important question that goes to the liberty and freedom of the individuals in question. Respecting those 548 documents, does the minister not have trust in the judiciary of this country and the judges in question to examine the documents in camera? If he feels there will be some injury to the state, or some breach of security, then they would not be made public; but at least those documents would be examined by the court and not withheld from the court by a discretion maybe wrongfully used by the minister.

Will the minister reconsider his position and let the judiciary do the work, rather than the executive, of trying people in this country for acts of which they may not be guilty?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will recognize that the 548 documents he has referred to are basically part and parcel of working files. There were 117 files. There is no great distinction in the documents, in terms of what they contain. It is simply the source of the information, so the judge will be able to see, if he wishes, the documents that he has available to him and will see quite readily that there is no need to see the balance of the documents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I might indicate to the hon. gentleman that I am ready to trust the judiciary to exercise its own responsibility in terms of dealing with the issues which they have before them.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS TO THE JUDICIARY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I just have one question for the Solicitor General. Has he read these documents to which he refers? If so, does he think that he is any more trustworthy than a judge of the superior courts of this country?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question yesterday. I exercised a political responsibility, and in my view I exercised that political responsibility in accordance with the law of this land.

NATIONAL UNITY

COMMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE RESPECTING PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the blanket accusation by the Minister of Finance that the provincial premiers constitute the greatest threat to national unity in this country, would the Prime Minister now name those provincial premiers; and that word was used in the plural by the Minister of Finance? Would he now name those provincial premiers who he and his colleagues feel are actively working to destroy Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady quotes from a speech by the minister. I did not see the speech and I do not know in what context it was made. He said "premiers"; I suppose he has in mind more than one. I have in this House, and outside, taken the occasion to say personally that I thought the view of Canada propounded by the premiers, particularly in the constitution debate as they formulated it last summer in Regina, was not conducive to the kind of strong Canada in which we on this side believe. I know that is not the view of the hon. lady, and I think it is perhaps an honest disagreement. I wish she would name the premiers, singular or plural, who are contributing to the kind of Canada for which she stands.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that the provincial premiers I know are working for the unity of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I realize it is much easier for the Prime Minister to offer evasive answers or to offer sweeping indictments outside this House than it is to give precise answers within the House.

I should like to ask if he believes that such a sweeping and irrational indictment by his Minister of Finance really constitutes the kind of approach that we should have in this country on the eve of a very important first ministers' economic conference when, surely, all of those involved are seeking to bring about the unity and co-operation in this country that we all seek. Is that the kind of approach of which he approves?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady may be making some rhetorical point, but when she accuses me of an evasive answer I would point out that I began my answer by saying that I did not know to which speech of the Minister of Finance she referred. I am prepared to put on record my own views. She holds up and shows me a copy of a newspaper.

Mr. Clark: The enemy.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition now describes that newspaper as the enemy.

Mr. Fraser: That is how you described it.

Mr. Lawrence: He is not that stupid.

Mr. Trudeau: Then you must be.

Mr. Clark: Keep it going.

Mr. Trudeau: I will keep it up if the Leader of the Opposition would keep quiet and permit me to give my answer. He should show a little bit of the self-discipline he is asking of his colleagues. Mr. Speaker, I understand this is Mickey Mouse week, so I want him to take over.

● (1502)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in relation to the Prime Minister's offer that he wants me to take over. I am prepared to, as soon as he has the courage to call a national election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Chicken.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. BALDWIN—REPLY BY PRIME MINISTER ON ACCESS TO DOCUMENTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what is either a question of privilege or a point of order, the information in respect to which I put before you only came to me about ten minutes ago. It affects a question which I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday and the reply he made. However, I put the matter before Your Honour for clarification and decision. Yesterday I asked the right hon. gentleman about some documents which had been requested of him by Mr. George Bain of the Toronto Star. The Prime Minister, with something less than his usual agility in jumping over the truth, said to me in response to my question the following. It appears at page 1368 of Hansard:

> He referred to a promise I made to George Bain. That promise had to do with saying we had no objection if NATO had no objection. They were NATO documents which somebody had worked on. I still have no objection if NATO wants to produce them, and if Mr. Bain wants to address himself to NATO I see no objection to that.
> An hon. Member: He did.

The hon. member referred to was me. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> Well, he did? Then complain to NATO. I don't know what NATO will say. They are not our documents, Mr. Speaker, they are NATO documents and it is NATO which asked certain individuals to work on them. I have no objection if NATO wants to respond to the advocate of Mr. Bain sitting on the opposition benches here.

I am really not the advocate of Mr. Bain. We really only share one thing, that of being on the Prime Minister's enemy list together.

Mr. Bain did in fact request the documents from NATO. Those particular documents were in respect of the case of Peter Treu. NATO responded to Mr. Bain and said to him, "This is a matter for your national government". Mr. Bain then made a request of the national government. He waited several months without any response. He then wrote an article. At about the time he wrote the article he received some documents from the government, by no means the documents he had requested.

This relates to the point that Your Honour has considered with respect to Standing Order 43. I had exhausted, and possibly gone beyond the limit of questions which I could ask under the provisions allowed. I received an answer from the Prime Minister which was 180 degrees different from what the facts were. I do not think the Prime Minister erred deliberately. He erred through ignorance, as he frequently does. Under those conditions the country is left with the impression that Mr. Bain had not done what he had been requested to do. In fact, he had done so and had received this kind of run around.

I make that statement to Your Honour today because the impression left by the Prime Minister's answer yesterday is completely inaccurate. I may well be in a position to raise this as a question of privilege later, but certainly I raise it as a point of order to see if the record should be set straight.

MR. MACKAY—REPLIES BY SOLICITOR GENERAL ON ACCESS TO DOCUMENTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, briefly I believe my point of order would fit in very conveniently under the one raised by my friend, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Yesterday and today the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), in view of the seriousness of an affidavit filed under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act in relation to a matter under the Official Secrets Act, said that he had gone through the files. This is what he said yesterday, that he had examined every file. I asked him today whether he had read the documents. I think you will agree, sir, there is a big difference between going through files containing documents and reading the documents. I wish the minister would be more specific and say to this House whether he read all the documents on which he signed this very significant affidavit.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT AND ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHRISTMAS RECESS

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it might be convenient for me to ask the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader about business that we will be dealing with after the budget. While the parliamentary secretary is on his feet could he, on behalf of his principal, designate December 1 as an opposition day, which is the next day in accordance with our discussion? I believe it is a day which will be taken by the Creditiste party.

There are one or two other matters that I might deal with as well. Last week I asked the government House leader if he could indicate when the Christmas adjournment will be taken. I understand my hon. friend may be able to make an announcement today on behalf of the government.

Finally, is there any intention of bringing back Bill C-5 from the Senate in the event there is any time lost as a result of what Senator Perrault has called the grossest miscalculation in terms of communication between the government House leader in this House and the Senate, which may have caused some delay? Is the government bringing in an amendment to that bill so that, if there is some lost time, the House can deal with that matter and no one will suffer as a result of the lost time, regardless of whose fault it may be?

As I indicated to him earlier we are prepared to give very swift passage to that bill if the government intends to proceed that way. I ask this question because that very matter was raised in a committee of the Senate, not addressed in the Senate, but raised in a committee of the Senate directly. If that could be done, the government would find us willing to co-operate.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, today and tomorrow we will terminate the debate on the budget. On Monday we will be dealing with the second reading of Bill C-2, following that Bill C-10, which is in committee of the whole, and after that Bill C-12. Concerning the next allotted day it will be Friday, December 1. As well, the last two allotted days will be Tuesday, December 5, and Thursday, December 7.

[Mr. MacKay.]

With regard to the Christmas break, it seems discussions have been held with the representatives of all parties and, that we shall do everything in our power to be able, as we hope, to adjourn on Thursday, December 21, until Monday, January 22, thus allowing hon. members to attend to their devotions, their families and their electors.

With regard to the question of the hon. member on Bill C-5, I shall convey his representations to the Deputy Prime Minister who, I am sure, will be in touch with him at the very first opportunity.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter which we have not discussed and that is the question of the commodity tax review. I had indicated at one time that we were ready to let that reference go to the appropriate committee without debate. Is it the intention of the government to take advantage of that very generous offer?

I feel it will be in the interest of all concerned if I were allowed to consult some precedents with respect to my question, of which I think you are familiar, and also to consult some others, especially those respecting the public accounts committee. If it is in order, I would like to speak to this matter more fully tomorrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT ON ACQUISITION OF NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce today that, based on conclusions of one of the most thorough evaluations of a defence procurement program ever carried out in this country, cabinet has now approved a set of directions regarding the next stage of the process towards acquisition of a new fighter aircraft for the Canadian Forces.

• (1512)

In arriving at these conclusions I have been guided by, and the judgments reflect, the military advice which I have received from the Chief of the Defence Staff. The government, through the offices of the NFA program manager, has now informed four of the competing manufacturers that their aircraft are no longer in the competition. These are: Grumman with the F-14 Tomcat; McDonnell-Douglas with the F-15 Eagle; Panavia with the Tornado, and Northrop with the CF-18L Cobra.

The finalists will be the General Dynamics CF-16 and the McDonnell-Douglas/Northrop CF-18A, which are the Canadian versions of these aircraft. The government has also decided against further consideration of a mixed fleet of fighters. The governments of the Federal Republic of Germany, Great Britain, Italy and United States, which all have been following this selection process with keen interest, are also being informed of this development.

Direction has now been given to the interdepartmental program office to initiate discussions leading to the negotiation of draft contracts with the two prime manufacturers remaining in competition. In addition to the very important questions of aircraft capability, fleet size, delivery schedule, and optimum phasing of payments, emphasis will be placed on negotiating the best mix of industrial benefits for Canada. In these negotiations particular attention will be paid to arrangements that could contribute to the growth of research and development activity in Canada, as well as high technology industry which complements our geography and resources. Emphasis also will be given to ensuring that all regions of the country will have full opportunity to participate in this program.

I expect that it will be several months before I am in a position to present a comparative analysis of draft contracts to cabinet for final selection of a new fighter aircraft. I am sure that those of you who have followed the evolution of the program since its start, in March, 1977, have come to realize the magnitude of the task facing the government in this selection process. At the end of June, as you will recall, the government decided to allow additional time to permit manufacturers to refine their initial proposals. I am pleased to report that by the new deadline of August 1 all had responded with offers that contained substantial improvements over their earlier proposals.

Our numerical requirement of between 130 and 150 aircraft is critical to our capability to meet our domestic and European commitments. We are indeed disappointed that procurement of sufficient numbers of F-14s, F-15s or Tornados could not be accommodated within our set budget of $2.34 billion in August 1977 dollars.

Our evaluation also revealed that acquisition of a mixed fleet would bring little or no benefit in terms of fleet size and that operation of such a fleet would bring substantial liabilities, including double training and logistics support systems over the life span of the aircraft.

The two most severe constraints that we face, and will continue to face, are the number of aircraft required and the set amount of money to buy them. Our task, then, is to buy the best military aircraft available within those constraints, while seeking the best possible industrial benefits with a minimum of project risk.

In addition to cost and numbers, there are other considerations that serve to favour the two aircraft we have kept in the process. To begin with, there is the military and political assessment that we have made of the current—and to a certain extent, anticipated—strategic situation that we are facing.

We have come to the conclusion that an adequate number of the smaller aircraft equipped with radar guided air-to-air missiles and suitably deployed across Canada, could afford us the capability to exercise our sovereignty fully by intercepting, identifying, and if necessary, destroying aircraft that might be probing into Canadian airspace. Having this type of prudent capability, we believe, would deter probes and offer adequate protection against the possibility of a bomber attack on the North American continent.

Having eliminated the three most expensive systems from the competition, three remained—the CF-16, the CF-18A and the CF-18L—that met or came very close to meeting our numerical requirements within the budgetary envelope while being able to meet the most likely military challenges.

The CF-18L proposed by Northrop could meet these most likely challenges and probably be acquired in sufficient quantities. Potentially, it also provides a very attractive package of industrial benefits. However, we have assessed as very considerable the risk of committing Canada to buying a sophisticated aircraft that is not in service with any other country. At this time, I consider all the various types of risks which could be involved in the development and initial introduction into operational service of this aircraft are greater than we either need or are prepared to accept. Moreover, even in the best of circumstances, the delivery schedule of the CF-18L is likely to be markedly behind that required for the timely replacement of our CF-101 and CF-104 aircraft.

The CF-16 is a single-engine aircraft which has been selected by five of our NATO allies, including the United States. Should the CF-16 be acquired, Canada would of course have extensive commonality with NATO allies in Europe. While this aircraft does not have the degree of sophistication of the larger aircraft, it does have acceptable capability and is the only aircraft which at this point meets the numbers required.

The other fighter remaining in the competition, the CF-18A, offers us another set of possibilities. It may be more expensive than the CF-16 would be; therefore we can expect to acquire fewer, although I am optimistic that an adequate number to meet our roles can be acquired in negotiations. Purchase of this aircraft could allow for co-operative logistics arrangements with the United States.

On the other hand, being a twin-engined, somewhat larger aircraft, the CF-18A offers some definite advantages of its own. These include a good potential for growth, or a capability to be fitted with new systems that may be necessary to cater to future demands made of a fighter aircraft. The CF-18A also currently has more advanced all-weather capabilities in the context of sovereignty protection and air defence.

We must recognize, however, that in both military and political terms, a major consideration for Canada is collective security in Europe. This is where the philosophy, or strategy, of deterrence, common to all members of the NATO alliance, is subject to its greatest challenge, in the light of qualitative and quantitative improvements to the forces of the Warsaw Pact countries.

It is important that our own contributions to collective security be quantitatively and qualitatively adequate for deterrence. Quantitatively, this means a number of aircraft at least equal to that we now commit to the Alliance in central Europe and to the northern flank. This total number of aircraft, plus some for training and attrition, makes up well over half of our total requirement. This is clearly a factor that influences the type of capability that we must seek in the fleet, the qualitative aspect of the contribution. We want that capability to be prudently adequate for the sovereignty and air defence roles in Canada and also to be effective in particular roles in central Europe and in northern Norway.

As you can appreciate, there are pros and cons to both types of aircraft. I can assure you that there were also some pros and cons to all aircraft that have now been eliminated. Our request for proposal provided a standard which enabled us to obtain truly comparable data for all contenders. No single aircraft could possibly have met all specifications given in the request for proposal. Nor was it the government's intention to acquire an aircraft whose capabilities far exceeded those required to carry out assessed roles adequately.

We are convinced that we have now made a very judicious decision in selecting these two aircraft for further consideration, taking into account the factors of military requirements, budgetary considerations, the minimum number of aircraft required, the risk element, and the potential industrial benefits.

We expect that a reduction to two contenders will have a very favourable impact on Canadian industry's ability to participate with prime manufacturers in the development of detailed industrial proposals.

● (1522)

To the prime manufacturers who have devoted considerable resources to this competition so far, and particularly to manufacturers' representatives who have displayed so much energy and sincere efforts in presenting their companies' proposals in the best possible light, we owe thanks for their exceptional co-operation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I am confident that in this next, critical phase of the fighter program, the interdepartmental team and all others who are in any way involved will continue to work in an atmosphere of fair and keen competition, and that rapid progress will be made towards selection of a new fighter aircraft to meet Canada's needs to the end of the century.

[Mr. Danson.]

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, our party has for many years advocated that movement should be made by the government to re-equip our forces. Normally I would be very pleased at the announcement—the announcement of any progress brings with it a certain amount of gratification, I suppose. However, to say the least, the statement the minister has made today is very unusual. In the very short time available to me since I received the statement only a few minutes ago, I have made some notes. I would have preferred to have had more time, but if I cut my remarks fairly short now, perhaps I will be able to make it up by the number of questions I am allowed to put. I see at least ten outstanding questions which have not been dealt with in the minister's statement and which have a considerable bearing on the new fighter aircraft.

First, I would point out that the minister states they have been guided—I presume he is referring to the cabinet—and adds:

> The judgments reflect the military advice which I have received from the Chief of the Defence Staff.

That is a rather peculiar admission when one understands that most of the consideration was done by a project team. I am already beginning to hear disturbing rumours that the project team's advice was largely ignored in the selection and that the cabinet called together another group of senior civil servants at the deputy minister level to rewrite the proposal which was given to the Chief of Defence Staff and to the minister in early September. That is one of the reasons for the unseemly delay we have undergone so far.

Elsewhere in his statement the minister said:

> Emphasis will be given to ensuring that all regions of the country will have full opportunity to participate in this program.

That bears a striking resemblance to the long range patrol aircraft proposition which was put to us, under which all parts of the country were to have an opportunity to participate in the offset work and the industrial benefits. As I pointed out to the House the other day, British Columbia so far has managed to obtain one half of one per cent. To a province that has 10 per cent of the population and an industrial capacity to match, this hardly indicates that anyone out west has reason to dance in the streets over the work they are going to get out of any project this government offers. Their reputation is too well known at present.

Again, the minister said:

> Our evaluation reveals that acquisition of a mixed fleet would bring little or no benefit and would bring substantial liabilities, including double training in logistic support systems over the life span of the aircraft.

This, of course, does not stop them from flying three different types of fighter at the present time. It never seems to stop Air Canada from buying different planes from different companies. In my opinion, the statement is merely included to validate a bad decision rather than as containing any truth insofar as problems from having two or three different types of fighter plane are concerned. I have yet to hear the minister or anyone else in a senior position in defence complaining bitterly that we have F-104s in Europe and F-101s in Canada.

On page four of his statement the minister says he came to the conclusion that an adequate number of smaller aircraft equipped with radar guided air to air missiles could afford us the capability to exercise our sovereignty fully. No mention was made of the range of the two fighter aircraft which the announcement tells us have been selected. I would have been more pleased if the minister had managed to discover the range of the F-16 and the F-18 as compared, say, to the F-15.

Later we find the minister saying that the F-16 has acceptable capability and is the only aircraft which to this point meets the numbers required. Then in another part of his statement he said that unfortunately the F-18L, I believe it was, could not quite make it in terms of the numbers they would be able to provide, and that the F-15 could not make it for the same reason within the limitations of $2.34 billion. Now if the F-16 is the only one, it means that its running mate, the F-18L, also cannot qualify under the same set of regulations that caused the minister to turn down the F-15, the F-14, and the larger and more expensive planes. Either they had a dividing line there or they did not. It is my understanding they could have provided about 117 F-15 planes within the $2.34 billion limit, and there is certainly no doubt in anyone's mind that the F-15 was far closer to being the favourite of the project team than the F-16 or the F-18A.

The final choice, as the minister said, comes down to the F-18A and the F-16, and I must question whether the 18A is in there just as a straw man to be used by the government to get betters bids out of General Dynamics, because the F-18, let's face it Mr. Speaker, belongs on an aircraft carrier. It carries around some 2,500 pounds of surplus machinery which enables it to land and take off from carriers, and unless the minister intends to buy a carrier, or buy back a carrier, I see no reason why we would want to select the F-18A over, say, the F-18L. I realize there is a difference in the time at which they would be available and I hope to bring this out in my questioning. However, it seems to me a most peculiar choice of planes has been made by the minister, considering the preferences expressed by his project team. I hope I will be given the opportunity to carry out lengthy questioning later on today as to the reasons for the unusual choice.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I, too, think it necessary to comment on the fact that on a matter involving well over $2 billion we received notice of this statement only a few minutes before it was delivered in the House. I must in all fairness add, though, that it does not embarrass me one little bit because the point of view we take makes the total exercise of choosing between different suppliers irrelevant.

We think that what the government should be doing is looking at the total strategic purpose which lies behind this proposition to acquire between 130 and 150 fighter planes. It is our view that this is a misapplication of roles, that it is going back to something which is totally obsolete, something which has nothing to do with the security of Canada or the stability of the world as a whole.

So far as I know, we have never had a clear statement of the strategic purpose of what is the largest purchase of military equipment ever made by Canada—the minister can correct me if I am wrong. We have never been told the nature of the threat which is to be met. We know that the fighter planes based in North America are intended to replace a number of Voodoos and other aircraft which were designed to meet the threat of a manned bomber attack. Indeed, the statement just made by the minister does contain a reference to the possible threat of the manned bomber. We do not believe in the reality of that threat.

We think that the role of a government or of anyone making decisions in this field, should be to look at the basic situation and then fit the equipment into the roles which are necessary. We say that a manned bomber threat is unthinkable at the present stage of history, the missile age. Aeroplanes involved in attacking Canada and the United States would have to travel two or three hours. Their coming presumably would be made well known to the American defence system, by the forms of detection which are in existence. We believe in the necessity of such detection, and if it is not adequate, let us improve it.

However, once we have adequate detection, the defence which exists both for Canada and the United States as far as North America is concerned, is the fact that the Americans have available defences in submarines and elsewhere to meet any first strike. Perhaps, fixed missile sites are no longer as secure as they used to be for the placing of the strategic weapons of the United States, but as far as submarines are concerned, the whole society of the U.S.S.R., could be blanked out.

With adequate mechanisms the targets of attack would not be there. It seems we have to assume an irrationality on the part of the leaders of the U.S.S.R. which, whatever else some of us may say or think about them, is totally inconsistent with the facts.

We say we should not be choosing between this and that. This proposition will cost $2.3 billion in 1977 dollars. We must add to that the extra cost of inflation and any other extra costs which may be involved by reason of our present exchange rate. I think somewhere around $3 billion would be a modest figure to expect. What could be done with $3 billion? Many things need to be done. I propose to speak in the budget debate on this very subject and to elaborate on the points I am making now.

I know that this is an occasion for brief statements, but we say to the government that it ought to look at this all over again. We need a clear strategic statement. From time to time the minister has made highly exuberant and optimistic assertions, but he confines himself to assertions like "It is necessary for the security of Canada." Let him show us why he says it is necessary. What threats have to be met, and how real are they? Is this just a fantasy against which we are supposed to defend ourselves? We think it is, and therefore to be picking one fighter plane against another is not necessary.

I want to say a word about offsets. I will have more to say on this subject when I participate in the budget debate. It is, of course, a good idea to have offsets, including our technology, but at the present time the aircraft industry is very buoyant, and what we need is improvement in the technology for the things we can sell commercially. We do not need to build up our capacity to supply sophisticated weaponry to the countries of the world. Perhaps they would buy it. The insanity which pervades this world is such that $400 billion per year is spent on armaments, which have no purpose but destruction, even at a time when human needs throughout the world cry out for attention, capital, and personnel.

All we can say regarding this statement is that it is not too late to look at the reality of this situation. The commitment has not been finalized. Let the government look at the reality of this situation and then tell us, if it is possible, where, why, and how it proposes to undertake this colossal expenditure. Why is it necessary for the security of Canada or the stability of the world? I wish the minister were coming before us and saying that we are moving into the field of so-called smart bombs, which are precision guided weapons which hold out a much greater hope to small countries. These are light weapons, armed with laser guides, which can hit targets. They are highly effective in stopping tanks and in shooting down fighter planes.

We know we have obligations. When I have a chance to speak in the budget debate I will set forth the important obligations Canada can meet in the military sphere. We must meet them. That naturally will cost money, and the job must be done well. There is no point in doing a thing half-heartedly, but for goodness sake let us not be led astray by this mirage of an attack, which no sane person would ever make upon North America in this missile age. Granted, conditions can change, but I am talking about conditions as they exist now.

The government should look at the whole thing again, and consider it from beginning to end. It is not just a matter of which is better and which is worse. I am sure that if the government considers the whole matter again it will arrive at a decision which will be far more beneficial to the people of Canada in this time of strain and so-called restraint and retrenchment. A re-examination of this matter would be far more important than any other contribution the government has made in the past few years.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make very brief comments on the statement the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) just delivered to the House. I want to thank the minister for making available to me a copy of his statement which I received only around three o'clock. I do not feel strongly about that because at 1.30 I received a phone call, probably from his office, telling me that I was about to get a copy of his speech. But given the fact that the postal service is very poor, the minister is obviously not responsible for the delay. Hon. members who spoke about the minister's statement before me said the same thing.

But I do not have only bad things to say. I want to seize the first occasion I have to thank the minister from the bottom of my heart for having authorized the band of the Royal 22nd Regiment to come to Montmagny on Remembrance Day. On such a beautiful day the local residents were very happy to see a detachment of the armed forces and the air cadets and I can assure him that that is a good way to ensure harmony exists in our country. You should have seen the onlookers! For the first in the 12 years I have witnessed such ceremonies I saw people give rousing cheers. It is a sign of the times and I am very happy that the minister authorized such a visit to our city of Montmagny.

Mr. Speaker, at the time of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) visit to Bonn for the summit conference, I also remember seeing on TV our Prime Minister surrounded by aircraft manufacturers trying to convince him that their type of aircraft was the best. Canada was really the centre of attention. We could see that for those manufacturers this was a big occasion to make a deal. Some businessmen from different countries were also present.

The Minister of Defence has just announced that we need to buy between 130 and 150 fighter planes. I assume, or at least I hope that these will not be used in a new world war but that they will help those who really want to maintain peace in the world. Canada is prepared to do its share, but to do so, it must be well equipped. I had a few occasions to visit countries throughout the world where our armed forces do an examplary job, a tremendous job to preserve peace. Naturally, there is the odd trouble here and there, little conflicts that break out, but were it not for the NATO force in which Canada participates, unfortunately I think we would have faced major military confrontations. I believe it most deeply. However, I must say that I am not an aircraft specialist. I trust the experts in that field whose duty is to advise the minister. I hope their advice is in the best interest of Canada rather than in the best interest of those who want to make money at our expenses.

I fully understand that it is normal to make profits even in manufacturing aircraft, but we should also make sure that our money is not wasted. I am sure the minister is smart enough to detect those who might try to profit from the circumstances to take advantage of him and convince him that some type of aircraft is better than some other type, without he being sure that it is the truth. Thus, the minister tells us that he chose the CF-16 rather than the CF-18A. I hope he is not mistaken.

But I would like to ask something of the minister. We are being told that the contracts have not been signed, that the details are still under study. I would like to suggest—the minister made reference to that point in his statement—that we go further than that. All kinds of parts will be needed to build those planes, to put them together. Obviously those parts, like in the automobile industry, can be manufactured in Quebec city, in Trois-Rivières, in Sherbrooke or even in Montmagny where the unemployment rate reaches 30 per cent. These parts could then be sent to companies for assembly. It should then be seen that the Canadian industrial sector benefit from these contracts, that it be given the opportunity to manufacture some of these parts. This would enable us to create jobs in this country and to make a good deal with other countries.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister has a rather sizable budget and that he must do his utmost to apply the principles of moderation while providing our armed forces with the equipment required. This is essential. So I would like the minister to inform us more regularly of what happens in his department as concerns not only the organization of the air force but also the equipment needs of our armed forces, our naval forces and our vessels.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to remind the minister that two or three times he announced shipbuilding projects to meet the needs of our armed forces for national defence. I would ask him whether it would be possible to accelerate this decision to help our shipyards keep up with the times, keep up with their more sophisticated competitors and give them the opportunity to provide jobs for the many unemployed Canadians. So, if we are to make a decision as it is required, we should make it when unemployment is at its highest level.

I think it is more important to spend money in a way which encourages the use of our manpower and our expertise rather than to pay those people to do nothing and make them loose the desire to work, because after a while you finally believe it is not necessary to work and you find it difficult to go back on the labour market.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a document I have just received, the Right to Information. Parliament, ministers and courts. Who said this? The government. Here again, I wish we were better informed. In parliament particularly we can understand when we are informed of the facts. And if we have suggestions to make, we are responsible enough, I think, to do it and instead of being prejudicial to the minister it would help him exercise his difficult responsibilities as Minister of National Defence.

● (1542)

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to keep my questions as short as I can, and I hope that the answers will be equally brief because I have several questions that I wish to get through. Could the minister tell me does this choice mean that the doors are closed forever on the possibility of a two-plane purchase, that is, the F-16 or the F-18A, but not a combination of the two?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, that is correct. We have rejected the two aircraft fleet concept. It will be a single aircraft fleet, either one or the other.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, what did the selection team, that worked so assiduously from last February to this September, report, and what were their recommendations as to what plane or planes should be bought?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the team did not say which one should be bought. They evaluated all the aircraft against specific criteria, and those were the ultimate criteria for each role. Some served some roles better than others, but in essence it was left to the judgment of the Chief of Defence Staff and his advisers, a judgment which I support and cabinet supports, on which planes would actually be chosen based on the strategic assessment, which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) referred to, the military capability, the quantity of aircraft needed to fulfil our roles and, finally, industrial benefits.

Mr. McKinnon: Could the minister tell the House if the story, which has received a certain amount of publicity, is true, that the F-16 rated fifth under the heading "military evaluation" and also rated fifth under "industrial benefits" among the six planes?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I will not be able to give that immediate information, but it does not mean much because the difference between one and five or six was very close in many cases. They are all excellent aircraft. Some of them achieved the total range of roles better than others, but would not give us the numbers we could possibly work with and still fulfil our roles in any meaningful way.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, would the minister table a résumé of the industrial benefits promised by these two finalists on the short list, and table it so that it shows what industrial benefits are expected for the regions in Canada? I must say to the minister that the LRPA distribution of benefits has left a bad taste in the mouths of a lot of Canadians, and it does little to help us solve the alienation problem that we have in western Canada.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that it is in the best interest of the program to produce at this time the industrial benefits or their regional location. I would say that there is a very great effort being made to make certain that there is a greater distribution of regional benefits than under previous programs and that it is a much larger program than the LRPA program. I must express some disappointment because on that program even the contractor has had difficulty getting people to show interest, submit bids, or in some cases even the answering mail from some regions of the country. These are our individual firms who, of course, have to make those decisions. In this case, those who are bidding are aggressively seeking out contractors in different parts of the country, and I think it is very important to note that this is not concerned only with contracts for aircraft. There are other types of industries of high technology and research and development that might serve us well in other areas with this particular aircraft.

I think the hon. member may be assured that the greatest effort will be made in this regard. As a matter of fact it is the specific direction of cabinet that the negotiating team seek out those areas that best complement our geography and our resources so that we have an opportunity to be competitive in areas where we are good and which suit us naturally, rather than those for which we have to pay a premium.

So far as making a list is concerned, I think the hon. member for Victoria might realize that that might be counter productive at this stage because we are in a very tough bidding competition between two firms which will be upgrading, significantly I would think their industrial benefit packages as the negotiations continue. I think, it would be inappropriate, certainly in terms of industrial or commercial secrecy, to indicate what one or the other is doing at this time. Perhaps I will consider that when a final decision is made.

Mr. McKinnon: Could the minister tell the House how many planes in each case is the short list of tenders offering? How many planes of each type are there?

Mr. Danson: Based on the best assessment, the CF-18A comes close enough to the 130 minimum that we required, with a reasonable expectation of exceeding that when we get to the final negotiations. The CF-16 is in adequate number in their proposal to meet our requirements. There will be refinements of these proposals as they go along; perhaps other things will be required in the aircraft and that will affect the total number. In either case we expect to have adequate numbers to fulfil at least our minimum requirements, and hopefully all or close to all of our maximum needs.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I am rather disappointed about the last answer; I would rather do without the adjectives and adverbs and find out how many planes are involved, which was the question I asked, whether the number be 137, 127 or 117. I understand that for the CF-15 they were able to bid 117 planes.

My final question for now is this. The Dassault Mirage 2000 was talked about before the competition was closed, but then the French company did not enter the final bid. My understanding is it was turned down because the Mirage 2000 was not yet in flight, but it would appear that the F-18L lasted until today. I am curious as to the difference between these two planes. It seems that the French company was cut off rather summarily back in January of last year, yet the F-18L, which the minister says will not be ready in time, which is one of the reasons he turned it down, was considered right up until now.

Mr. Danson: The Mirage 2000 team themselves withdrew, Mr. Speaker. It was not our assessment; they themselves said that they did not believe they would be ready in adequate time and they did not believe they could marshal a sufficiently attractive industrial benefit package, and on their own volition they withdrew from the competition, really before it started.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister, first of all, to inform the House what is the present assignment of fighter planes as between North America and our European theatre. My understanding is that we have an air group of 45 planes in Europe, and the minister's statement seemed to lead toward the view that we are now going to equalize somehow or other our commitment, which would seem, if my figures are right, to mean a substantial increase in our commitment to NATO, one that is far beyond our commitment of ground forces there or anything relative to that, with a diminution in our commitment to North America. Perhaps he could say, in this new dispensation—I am sure they are not all allocated yet because they are not even built or ordered yet—what is the proposed distribution of the 130 to 150 planes as between the two different theatres, the North American and the European theatres?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the number is precisely the same as now, namely, 36 assigned and, I believe, 18 in reserve, for the central front, and 24 aircraft for the north flank. That commitment will remain the same. At the present time there is a larger total fleet. There was a figure I ran across of 160 total front line, but with these new aircraft of all models there will be a much, much lower attribution because of the higher technology and safety features put into them. Because it is only one type of aircraft there will be a reduction in the number we need in our training and replacement systems. So there is a one for one replacement there.

I think that what might have led the hon. member to that conclusion is the ability to maintain our sovereignty role, which I would take from the hon. member's remarks today and at other times he still considers rather important. Protection without enforcement does not leave us with sovereignty; it just leaves us with information. We need something to enforce that sovereignty, and that role we will fulfil with the same number of aircraft, I believe 36 being assigned to that specific role.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have only one question to ask since the minister has just replied to many of the questions I was asking myself and since my colleagues have asked very specific questions. I would like to know the approximate cost of the CF-16 and CF-18A aircraft and whether that cost includes all the equipment needed to enable those planes to fulfil their role.

[English]

Mr. Danson: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not broken this down in fly away cost per aircraft, though I am sure I can get that; but the $2.34 billion program covers equipment, manuals, spare parts and training systems, implemented with enough reserves in each case to provide adequately for our needs.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Since the minister has quoted the figure of $2.3 billion and since the figures we have been given for the number of planes vary from 130 to 150, there is quite a difference. Could we at least have an approximate figure? Will we go over $2.3 billion to purchase 130, 140 or 150 aircraft? This is where the unit price can make a difference. Could we know the approximate cost of these aircraft?

[English]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, we are attempting within that budget of $2.34 billion to acquire 150 aircraft. That will allow us to do our job, to fulfil our roles on a one to one basis for our training system, and give us sufficient back-up aircraft to account for natural attrition. As for the price, if one takes a very much ball park figure—I am sure that people who sell aircraft would not do it in this way—I always talk about a $10 million aircraft and a $20 million aircraft. If we look at it in terms of a $10 million aircraft for individual fly away cost, then that would be reasonable. One of the studies that I have read, and I have read many in connection with this program, indicated it would be about $1¼ billion for the aircraft program itself. The rest goes towards support for the particular items about which the hon. member is concerned. Those are not the precise figures, but I would be pleased to get them for him.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions, unless some of the replies lead to further ones. First, now that it has been determined there is to be one aircraft and that the two aircraft in the fleet concept has been abandoned, can the minister say if the configuration of the aircraft for the two different roles that the single aircraft will have to play—the sovereignty role on the one hand, and the close support role in Europe on the other—will allow for interchangeability of aircraft, or will there be one aircraft with two distinct configurations?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I expect that they should be able to remain in one configuration for both roles. There may be a difference in the way they are armed, but they would be interchangeable in those roles. There would be room to have two different CF-18As or two different CF-16s. There may be some small adjustments in the roles, but not what one would consider different configurations.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my other question concerns the power plant. I understand that the power plant in the 16—if the designation of the F-16 is the same in Canadian terms as it is in United States terms—the power plant which is the F-100, I believe, of Pratt and Whitney, has run into some pretty scary problems. I wonder whether that has all been taken into account in the choice. I am not sure whether the 18A might not also have the same power plant, whether the minister is aware of these problems, and whether due allowance has been made for the work that is still to go into the F-100 engine, Pratt and Whitney, before it is ready to power even the American F-16.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, that same engine is used to power the CF-16, the F-16 and the F-15. There are some teething problems as there generally are with new engines. Our team has looked into this very carefully and compared notes with other nations. Five of our allies are using this aircraft. I have personally spoken to colleagues in NATO and they are satisfied that this is a normal part of the development of a new engine that is taking place, and they are all confident that these problems will be overcome. Fortunately, if something arose that made that an invalid conclusion, it would be one of the things that our own evaluation team would follow extremely closely to make absolutely certain that we are not risking aircraft or, more important, Canadian pilots.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the minister said that five of our NATO allies are using the aircraft. Did he mean using them, or that they are on order by five other nations?

Mr. Danson: They are on order by Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, and the United States.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could clarify an answer that he gave to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) earlier about the distribution of the acquisition when it takes place. Perhaps the minister will correct me if I am wrong in my reading of the statement, which is that the new allocations will be divided approximately 50 per cent to our NATO commitment and 50 per cent to our North American zone. That would lead me to the conclusion that we are increasing our commitment to NATO very substantially in terms of the number of aircraft we now have committed. I understand we are in the area of approximately 45 and are going to increase that to about 75 aircraft for our NATO role. Would the minister comment on that? If my figures are in error, perhaps he wishes to correct them.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member's figures are in error but I think incorrect conclusions have been drawn from them. There are the 36 committed to central front in Baden. I believe there are 18 attrition and reserve aircraft and that works out to 54—I think I am right—that are there in the reserve role. They would have fly-over crews to support those. It may not be necessary with these new modern aircraft to maintain those additional aircraft in Germany because they all have fly-over capability—an unrefuelled fly-over capability—to the central front.

In addition, 24 are presently assigned to the north flank role. That is a fly-over role as well, from Bagotville and Cold Lake. The others are all in the North American defence role.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I have concern to know how much study the minister and his officials have made in two areas of technology. The choice has been reduced to the two aircraft, the CF-16 and the CF-18A. My information is that in mock combat both of those aircraft have been very successful in eliminating each other in the air. In fact most new fighter aircraft have become so technologically advanced that they cancel each other when they get into combat. I would suspect the same would be true with Soviet aircraft, if we want to deal with the NATO question. Has the minister any figures of the survival rate of these new proposed fighters in competition with themselves or other fighters? Will he table that? Perhaps he would respond to that, and I could have one more question.

Mr. Danson: First of all, Mr. Speaker, they may cancel each other out. That is why we are only buying one kind, so that each will survive. I guess the likely combat is with Warsaw Pact forces. They are all highly sophisticated, but the survival rate has certainly been studied. I have the information in front of me but it would take some time to find it as it is a rather complex equation. I would be pleased to go over it with the hon. member at any time, however. Those are judgments that have been made and tested, computerized, and in some cases, I believe, in mock trials.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister gets my point in that question, which is that air cover that simply destroys itself in competition with the enemy is not air cover at all. My last question deals with the studies the minister has done on new weaponry, that is, heat seeking laser beam weaponry, which is the new technology in terms of support for ground forces, rather than fighter aircraft. Has the minister an assessment by his officials or his project team which deal s with the capacity of the new weapons using ground forces to eliminate fighter aircraft? Can he advise why it is that Canada seems to get in at the tail end of technology rather than at the beginning?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, those studies have been addressed. They are in my briefings and have merited consideration. I think this is one of the fortunate things in this buy, that we are phased in with the technology at a pretty reasonable stage—not so far in advance that we are getting into a "Never-Never Land" but sufficiently mature that we can make a wise judgment and at an early stage of the technical life of these aircraft that we have selected. They are at an early stage in their life cycle. None of them is actually in service per se yet. They are in the prototype and early production stages, but they have been fairly evaluated by others. One has been purchased by a number of nations, the other by the United States in significant quantities and is being looked at very seriously by others. I think we are at a rather good stage in the technology to have a high performance aircraft through the life cycle of 15 or 20 years.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I only have four more questions and, I might be able to put two of them together. I would like to ask the minister for the date of signing. Two statements were made by him today, one that we are making rapid progress to that end, and the other that it would be several months. I wonder if he could put an approximate number before the word months. Secondly, when does he expect that we will get the first plane out of this contract?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, we are proceeding as rapidly as we can to the date of signing in several months. That is the best way to describe it. To prepare the documentation, which is considerable, to sit down with the contractors will take one month or close to it for completion—it is close to completion, but until the decision was made it could not be completed. It will likely be after Christmas before the vendors, the two contenders, have an opportunity to assess this. That is if they give up some of their Christmas recess for it. Our team should be able to sit down with the first group immediately after the New Year. This would be done by the same team sequentially, rather than at the same time, because it is necessary that the same people do the assessment so that we get the same qualitative judgment.

As I said the other day, I hope this will be all done by late spring. It is pretty difficult to be more definite than that because we want to make sure the negotiations are as exhaustive, as tough, and extensive as possible, and that we get the best buy and the best benefit from it.

Realistically one could only hope to look at April as a possible date of final completion. May or early June are real possibilities. I would not want to rush those and not get as good a deal, although I am anxious to see this purchase completed. I would rather have the best deal we can get by April. I would not want to put that additional pressure on the team to report when they are not satisfied they are ready. We will all be watching this closely. In so far as the first delivery is concerned, I believe the first delivery would be early in 1982. Depending on the number of aircraft we finally achieve, the rate is about two a month because of our cash flow requirements and abilities. This could take us to 1986 or 1987 before the final attrition aircraft are delivered.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the minister on April 25, 1978, said that the government expected the first plane in 1981. Apparently there has been a slippage of one year, which is a considerable amount of slippage. Would the minister tell us if he is aware of any unrest or discontent in Air Command over the selection of these two planes? I have heard there is considerable discontent in Ottawa and several senior air force officers are most unhappy about the selection of the F-16 and F-18A.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I would be a little surprised if there was no criticism. I do not question the fact that airmen have favourites. I have spoken to many pilots throughout the system since I have been in this job and involved with new fighter aircraft. One does hear varying views. I know there are some concerns, some of which have been talked out and worked over by the Chief of Defence Staff, his senior people and everybody involved. There is full support of those people who have major responsibility. I believe what the hon. member is referring to, and I am sure it will be reflected in comment, is that the F-15 is a pretty hot aircraft. We know it is an excellent aircraft but so is the Tornado and the Tomcat.

I think in the main everybody realizes the need to have a sufficient number of aircraft in the total system and the capability which is realistic in terms of our assessment of the threat. More important and which must be taken into consideration here, is the question of the lifecycle cost. This is the cost to keep those planes flying through their training system and exercises during their lifecycle. I have been apprised of the reservations each of the senior officers have had. The Chief of Defence Staff has kept me fully informed in this regard.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the F-16 is something less than the world's greatest ground support plane, has the minister given consideration to a change of the role of our air arm in Germany?

Mr. Danson: No, I do not think that will be necessary, Mr. Speaker. SACUER might decide. This will be discussed because of the new aircraft and the different set of capabilities, or a better capability really for the present role. These planes have considerable flexibility and may be used in a different role. That is not in the cards, and it is not necessary in the present considerations. However, that will develop perhaps as the strategic situation changes.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, is it the minister's intention to bring down a white paper on defence in this session?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to bring one down on defence in this session. I would welcome the opportunity to discuss the defence policy concerns at much greater length which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) have. The reason for not bringing down a white paper is not that I would not like to because there is work going on, but that it is not possible in this session due to the tremendous strain on resources in our department, particularly in the policy areas that have to be attributed to such a task.

It is not possible to do it in a short period of time and I would not want to see less than a first rate job done. I am sure the quality of people that we have would not want to attach themselves to anything they did not consider first rate. It is a matter of timing. In the circumstances, I think the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) will agree that while thinking is taking place and input is going into what will ultimately be produced as a white paper, I just cannot put a date on it. It is keeping the ball bearings in everybody's two and one-half pound computer going.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I am sympathetic to the minister and his department's problem with ball bearings. I am concerned that if we are locking ourselves into a technology which will not become fully available until 1987, and which presumably will be in use until the year 2000—or who knows—it might be worth taking a little time. The minister said that he did not want to enter into something without a good deal. I put it to the minister and ask him to comment on it that if we are locking ourselves into a military strategy which will last, if the minister's plans take place, for at least 20 if not 25 years, would it not be a good idea to produce a white paper at the same time and allow members on all sides of the House, and the press at large, to discuss these matters before locking ourselves into these major decisions?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly consistent with the priorities of the government, the assessment of military advisers in Canada and their joint considerations with NATO and NORAD. What we will buy is a capability with sufficient flexibility in growth that one can reasonably expect. This is always a difficulty with any major purpose. One would never buy anything if one would always wait for the next generation. That difficulty crops up every time something is put into production and it is taken from the drawing boards. Some engineers spend their lives keeping things on drawing boards which never get produced. They usually do not work for the same company for very long, but this happens. Sometimes you have to freeze drawings to get into production and get going. I think we are at the right end of the cycle with two flexible aircraft that could allow for any foreseeable change in role or strategy.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and honour to participate in this budget debate. For the past week we have heard a lot of blather by the official opposition, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), about Petro-Canada's purchase of Pacific Pete.

I submit that the hon. member for York-Simcoe and the Leader of the Opposition have misrepresented the facts on this matter. It is not only my opinion, but the opinion of the editorial board of the Toronto Sun. I wish to quote from its editorial dated November 22. As I indicated, I will quote directly from it. It is entitled "Clark Misleads on Petro-Canada", and I quote:

Conservative Leader Joe Clark is both naive and misleading in his obsessive attacks on Canada's national oil company, Petro-Canada. The company was set up in 1975 to give Canadians a stake in their own oil and gas industry, which is largely controlled by the big international oil companies.

Clark is naive when he says that Ottawa has all kinds of leverage which it could use to regulate the oil industry rather than acquiring its own national oil company.

Interestingly, Clark has never spelled out what kind of regulations he would apply to control the oil industry, perhaps because he's also promising to deregulate much of the Canadian economy and to cut the size of the civil service.

But to properly regulate something as complicated as the oil industry would require volumes of regulations and an army of civil servants, who would have to keep their eyes on every operation from the service station to exploration.

The country couldn't afford such an army. Even if it could, it would be difficult to ascertain the true situation. Canadians have only to recall how, based on industry-supplied forecasts and statistics, the National Energy Board thought there was a natural gas surplus when there was a shortage and how there was a shortage which turned out to be a surplus.

The last thing the international oil companies want is for the public to get an insider's view, which explains why the major oil companies in Canada have conducted such a strong campaign against Petro-Canada.

If Clark is naive in thinking he can control the oil industry through regulation, he is downright misleading when he suggests the $1.4 billion spent by Petro-Canada to acquire control of Pacific Petroleums Ltd. is an added burden on the taxpayer or that it represents reckless new spending by Ottawa.

Taxpayers' money is not being used by Petro-Canada to buy Pacific Petroleums. Instead, Canada's national oil company has borrowed the money from the Canadian banks and will be able to pay all the interest and principal from the future profits of Pacific Petroleums—and still have money left over for exploration and development. This is the same way takeovers are financed in the private sector.

The government's role is that of ultimate guarantor of the loan, but that doesn't cost it any money unless Pacific Petroleums, a highly profitable and oil-and-gas-rich company, should go bankrupt.

Clark is also wrong when he says, as he did this week in Parliament, that the money used to acquire Pacific Petroleums could have been used instead to help senior citizens or make it easier for Canadians to buy new homes.

There's a big difference between taking these worthwhile steps and giving Petro-Canada the green light to take over Pacific Petroleums. Taxpayers' money would have to be used to help the senior citizens and new homebuyers whereas there is no taxpayers' money used in the Petro-Canada acquisition.

In view of this editorial I submit that the hon. member for York-Simcoe and, particularly, the Leader of the Opposition, should withdraw the comments they have made which, not only in my opinion but in the opinion of the Toronto Sun editorial board, fail to reflect accurately the Petro-Can-Pacific Pete transaction.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), clearly and succinctly, put before the Canadian people the economic direction in which this country is to move within the ensuing year. It was a budget based not on political gimmickery but on sound principles of financial management; I submit a responsible budget. Generally, with the exception of the proponents of further deficit financing, the reaction has been favourable.

The reduction in the federal sales tax will help the consumer by slowing the rate of inflation. Other measures will help industry and induce them to invest. This creates permanent jobs in the long run. For example, Mr. Harvey Parliament, president of the Mining Association of British Columbia, is reported in the Express, November 20, 1978, as follows:

The next tax incentives improve the climate in the industry a lot. If there are mining properties that were thinking of going into production, but were teetering on the brink of making a decision, this may make them decide to go ahead.

As hon. members know, the proposal allows mining companies to write off 100 per cent of mining development costs, instead of the 30 per cent allowed up to now. Mining men and those in forestry are pleased with the budget's decision to allow a $100 deduction for every $300 spent on construction of townsites and the social assets that are involved. Similar favourable reaction has been received from these B.C. industries respecting the federal government's decision to maintain the write-offs for pollution equipment. The increase in the tax credit for new plant and equipment for expansion was also welcomed by industry in British Columbia.

Favourable reaction to this was given by the Employers' Council of British Columbia. They issued a press release on November 16, 1978, written by William Hamilton, President of the Employers' Council of British Columbia. I quote from their brief:

Given the constraints he faced, Chrétien has produced a better budget than most business people expected. He had distributed a variety of tax changes between the personal sector and the business sector which will stimulate the economy. The western provinces will enjoy some particular benefits: He has re-emphasized the importance of our resource industries, especially mining, forestry, and petroleum, as a very basic source of Canadian economic growth.

We agree completely with the great emphasis Chrétien placed on the responsibility of the private sector and individuals to pass on the benefits of this budget and to exercise personal restraint. In this way all Canadians will benefit from the measures announced which should provide a framework for further improving Canada's competitive position internationally.

We have some reservations about Mr. Chrétien's forecast of inflation and economic growth which seems to us somewhat optimistic. However, we are encouraged by what seems to be the government's determination to exercise restraint and begin to build strength in the Canadian economy for the 1980s.

Unquestionably the budget was not expansionary. I submit to add to an already large deficit would have exacerbated our present economic situation. Canada is living in a tough, competitive world. Our unemployment rate is too high, especially among young Canadians. Prices are coming down, but not as fast as we would like. The Canadian dollar has declined in value.

Underlying these real economic challenges is the issue of national unity. We see a provincial government aiming to break up this country, to remove one province, a part of Canada, from this land of ours.

All hon. members have seen the deliberate, staged performances of René Lévesque at first minister's conferences. We have heard all his blather about the federal government not helping the province of Quebec, that the federal government was not spending any money in Quebec. I could not believe it. Here was the premier of the province of Quebec saying his government does not receive any financial help from the federal government. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) corrected this fabrication. We are not only helping Quebec, but in many instances Quebec isn't even availing herself of the help we are offering.

● (1632)

Then we hear the cynics say the whole national unity issue is a government plot, a conspiracy to hold on to power. Well, I am not going to apologize for wanting to fight back when I see somebody, whether a pequiste or a western separatist, setting out deliberately or overtly to destroy my country. Neither does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have to apologize for being determined to keep Canada strong and united.

There are cynics who say national unity is a government smokescreen to distract people from the economy. That's nonsense. I have talked to business people from the United States. They are not prepared to invest in a Canada that might fall apart. Of greater concern is the movement of Canadian business and industry from Quebec—I think, for example, of the Sun Life Corporation. It doesn't take a financial wizard to know that the unity crisis affects investment.

People in Vancouver East are concerned about national unity, but I know the issue can be pretty remote when one is unemployed and the cost of living isn't coming down fast enough. I know the people of Vancouver East are more concerned with the bread and butter issues, jobs and inflation. Even so, I don't have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that unless we remain a strong country we won't have to worry about the economic challenges facing Canada.

Let's talk about the economy. Back in 1975 I spoke at the convention of my party and outlined Canada's economic problems as I saw them then. I should like to restate a few of the points I made because I think they are still applicable today. I began by talking about inflation, about what it was doing to Canada and to Canadians, about the way in which it disrupted financial planning by business and government, how it priced our goods out of world markets and created more unemployment. I talked about the way in which inflation undermines the position of those least able to protect themselves—pensioners and others living on fixed incomes. I said that the uncertainty caused by inflation provoked frustration, social unrest, and a distrust of private and public institutions. I said that it threatened the validity of collective bargaining and that it set labour up as a scapegoat for all our economic ills. I said that people were looking to the federal government for leadership and that, in my opinion, the federal government has fallen short of handling the economy as well as it could have done.

I called for a system of flexible wage and price controls. One month later, the federal government introduced them. Mr. Speaker, the anti-inflation program has worked. Controls were a success. When controls are phased out starting April 14 we shall all have to exercise the self-restraint which both labour and management have been telling government it would have to demonstrate once the controls are lifted. I, personally, do not anticipate any "bubble" of high wage demands and unwarranted price increases and, from what I have seen, this has not occurred. For one thing, Canadians are more aware than they were two and a half years ago of the impact which wage and price levels can have on our competitive position. There is a greater appreciation on the part of both labour and management that jobs and profits can be lost if our wages and prices get out of line with those of our competitors. We are more aware of the importance of economies of scale, entrepreneurial skills, and access to markets, as factors in our competitive situation.

I believe most Canadians feel that, despite its rough justice, the wage and price control program was about as fair as any such program could be. Workers, for example, are aware that while the guidelines may have restrained their wage demands, they also restrained prices. On balance, workers came out a little ahead of the game, which is better than one can say for their inflation experience in the two years before the controls program. The statistics support these calculations. Over the two-year period 1976-1977, wage increases under collective agreements monitored by the AIB amounted to roughly 18 per cent while the consumer price index increased by 15.9 per cent. This represents on average a gain in real wages of better than 2 per cent.

Another measure of the wage-price relationship is our experience with shares gross national product. The share of the GNP accorded to wages increased from 51.8 per cent in 1961 to 56.6 per cent in 1976, an increase of 5.1 percentage points. The wage share continued to rise, and in 1977 it was 57.2 per cent. It is wrong, therefore, to maintain as some still do, that the anti-inflation program was anti-labour. It is true that the guidelines placed restrictions around collective bargaining, but price increases have been restrained relatively more. The share of national income going to corporate profits has been fairly constant at 10.7 per cent to 11 per cent over the last decade, including the period under controls.

What has the government done about the bureaucracy? For two years there has been almost zero growth in the federal public service. The first ministers' conference agreed that compensation, wages and pensions to civil servants should follow those in the private sector. The first ministers also agreed to submit the growth of bureaucracy and regulations to the Economic Council for study. A good start, but much more can be done. While there are many highly competent and highly dedicated people in the civil service, some civil servants are bilking the taxpayer by not giving a fair day's work for their pay. When I served on the sub-committee studying the penitentiary system I definitely saw this and I believe I could find the same thing in every federal department.

The federal government has lately regionalized many operations. Unfortunately, regionalism has come to mean little more than duplication of head office positions in the field without due concern for line and staff functions. I am gratified to see the government taking this aspect of the sub-committee's report on penitentiaries very seriously. What is required is not regionalism for the sake of regionalism, but real decentralization. Let me illustrate them with an example.

Some guards from the Kingston maximum security penitentiary went to the Ottawa airport to pick up prisoners. Because the plane was late, the guards went and got drunk. Fortunately, the RCMP officers accompanying the prisoners refused to turn the prisoners over to them. What was done about these guards? Their director wanted to fire them. The regional director wanted to fire them. Were they fired? No. Treasury Board officials advised they could only be suspended for a few days because of red tape. That is intolerable, Mr. Speaker.

We need to put the work ethic back into the public service. Managers should be able to hire, fire and transfer personnel more easily, and be able to offer cash incentives for good work. This is what we recommended for the penitentiary service, and I am sure the same is applicable to other departments. Managers, just as strongly as the public, want to get rid of the red tape that ties them up until they cannot function.

Now I should like to outline some of the things the government is doing to ease unemployment. First of all, why are so many people out of work? Is there something basically wrong with the system? The fact is the system is working pretty well considering that Canada is in the midst of an international economic recession. Last year the economy created more than 250,000 new jobs. In fact we had led the world in job creation and economic growth for years. Right now, though, two factors are coming together during a world-wide economic slowdown. We are still trying to absorb the last wave of the post-war baby boom into the labour force. At the same time, increasing numbers of women are leaving the home and entering the job market after being out of the work force for a few years. The result is a bulb in the labour force, and the job creating ability of the economy cannot keep up because our export and production performance is slowed down by world conditions.

Once the world recovers sufficiently from the present recession, the Canadian economy will pick up, and we will be able to bring unemployment down to normal levels. In the meantime the federal government is providing a gradual stimulus to production and investment, creating jobs directly and providing training and experience to young people so that they will be employable workers when the economy has recovered.

Let us look at the record. First, there have been income tax reductions amounting to $2 billion so that we can stimulate consumer demand.

Second, there has been a $900 million cut in corporate taxes to encourage private enterprise to invest and create jobs.

Third, more than $1 billion has been spent on direct job-creation programs. Since 1974 Vancouver East has received $6,751,499 under the Local Initiatives Program, the Canada Works Program and the Young Canada Works Program, and 1,278 jobs have been created.

Fourth, the experimental $100 million employment tax credit program will encourage the private sector to create more permanent jobs.

Fifth, the Alcan pipeline legislation will create 100,000 man-years of employment. For British Columbia a total of 1,800 man-years will be required from 1981 to 1982 to construct the pipeline. At peak periods the work force will reach 1,750 people.

Sixth, the $150 million salmon enhancement program for British Columbia will help ensure adequate stocks of this natural resource and double the existing $200 million wholesale value catch.

Seventh, the 200-mile economic zone for coastal provinces will be a distinct advantage to the British Columbia fishing industry. Presently I am working with the port of Vancouver to establish better facilities for fish processors.

Eighth, a government subsidized loan of $1.5 million has been made to establish a proper drydock facility in the port of Vancouver.

Ninth, of a $117 million expenditure for West Coast ports $40 million was spent on the new Vanterm container facility and $26 million on Lynterm, the sister facility of Vanterm, which is designed for bulk loading.

Tenth, there has been a commitment by the federal government to build a new federal building in Vancouver. Unquestionably, that will pick up the slack in the construction trade, which is suffering 30 per cent to 40 per cent unemployment. It will create 250,000 man-days of work.

Eleventh, a $50 million tourist agreement has just been signed with the British Columbia government.

Twelfth, there is a $186 million agreement for agricultural and industrial incentives under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

I would like to say a few words about western alienation. There is a myth that somehow we in the west are bankrolling the rest of the country. Lately this myth has attached itself to the equalization policy, under which all taxpayers in Canada share equally in the services for which their taxes pay. One sometimes gets the impression that the people who believe this myth think that bags of money are being loaded on to planes in Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton so that they can be dropped from the skies on to Quebec and the maritime provinces. The fact is that Canada is one country, and we all contribute to the well-being of all Canadians. Quebeckers and maritimers pay taxes just as Albertans and British Columbians do, and the federal income tax rate is the same wherever we live.

I suspect that there is a certain amount of prejudice behind the myth that the west is paying for the east. The complaint is always about how much Quebec receives in equalization payments. We never hear people complaining about how much the federal government gives in equalization payments to Saskatchewan and Manitoba, or even Newfoundland. The other half of the myth is the false assertion that the federal government has not done anything good for the west. This old chestnut is still being kicked around, despite the fact that we need only pick up a newspaper to see how the west has benefited from confederation.

Let us look at some of the things which have been done by the federal government in the west. The government has recognized that the economic base of western Canada must be widened. That is why massive amounts of federal money and effort have gone into saving the Syncrude development of the Alberta tar sands.

The federal government has recognized that Canada's old trade patterns, based on trans-Atlantic trading, are outdated. That is why Ottawa has been pulling out all the stops to boost trade with Japan and other Pacific Rim countries which will buy our products. I note that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is in the House. He just returned from a trip to Pacific Rim countries with that very object in mind.

Ottawa has recognized that the decision-making, employment, and purchasing powers of the federal government should apply outside central Canada. That is why the mint was moved to Winnipeg. That is why a taxation data center is being opened in Surrey, British Columbia, to handle all tax returns from British Columbia and Yukon. That is why the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been decentralized all over this country.

Let us consider the massive federal assistance which will be needed to make development of the northeast coal deposits in British Columbia a major shot in the arm to the provincial economy. A $10 million study into environmental, social, engineering and transportation aspects of coal development has been initiated as a result of a federal-provincial agreement. Let us consider the millions of dollars in federal subsidies which will support coastal transportation communities on the north coast.

The main contribution to British Columbia which the federal government makes is in the area of federal-provincial transfer payments. From 1975 to 1978 the federal government gave British Columbia more than $3 billion in federal transfer payments. That figure includes direct federal payments to individuals through family allowances, old age pensions and veterans' benefits. Apart from that $3 billion blockbuster, the federal government pours hundreds of millions into the British Columbia economy every year to keep normal government operations going.

The people who work in local Manpower offices, the Federal Business Development Bank, the Post Office, immigration offices and so forth, are British Columbians whose salaries are being paid out of the taxes which all Canadians pay to the federal Department of National Revenue.

In 1975 and 1976 the Post Office spent more than $95 million in British Columbia. Transport Canada spent more than $44 million, and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce spent $10 million. The Department of Supply and Services, which purchases all the equipment and goods which the federal government uses in its operations—from paper clips to trucks—spent more than $146 million. Just think how many suppliers of government contracts keep their businesses alive because they have the federal government as one of their customers. Just think how much that means to the economy of British Columbia.

Unfortunately the total amount of federal spending in my province is unknown. No one has ever worked that figure out because our nationhood is not based on a balance sheet.

Before I finish, there is one other topic I wish to spend a few moments discussing, and again I draw attention to the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is in the House. In the throne speech debate back in 1976 I spoke about the desire of western Canada for freer trade. With the government's decision to impose quotas on shoes and textiles I submit that the government is moving away from its commitment to freer trade. Protectionism costs Canadians from coast to coast money. We are all consumers, whether we live west of the Rockies or east of the Ottawa River. If we do away with import duties, we will all be better off from an economic point of view.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

● (1652)

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): It is amusing, Mr. Speaker, to witness this government in its last gasping death throws. The backbenchers are handing out statistics to show Canadians, who know otherwise, that things are very good economically. It reminds me of Louis XIV who was about to disappear when the minions were handing him his towel as he jumped out of the shower. Such was the speech the hon. member just made. In fact he made quite a good speech but I think it was more or less prepared for the hustings in the election which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did not have the guts to call. I think that my analogy of Louis XIV is accurate in terms of the statistics the hon. member was quoting.

There was a headline in the press today that the present Auditor General does not like horror stories. Although he may not like them, and although we on this side of the House have only had a few hours to study his report, already the horror stories are coming out. There are plenty of them in this Auditor General's report, as in the reports of other auditor generals that have been produced since this government has taken power.

We on this side of the House have only had a little time to study the general meaning of the report, but there is one comment in the report which I would like to refer to all hon. members. It says that there are no criteria in place guiding the decision-making powers on over $10 billion for capital projects in place for 1977-78, and that competitive bidding practices are not in place over a high percentage of this. This confirms my view that this government is the most patronage ridden government this country has had since Confederation. I have said this all along, and I have been accused of being too partisan, but now the Auditor General is saying it.

The Auditor General also says that we are now moving into an era of comprehensive audit, with emphasis on special procedures in cost effectiveness, designed to change the attitudes of those managing the systems because as it appears now the quality of management leaves much to be desired. There is no myth about who is responsible for this; it is the government. The only thing wrong with this country is the mismanagement of the present government. A little kid in my riding last week told me that this government is going to go out like a bullet in the next election.

The Auditor General also said that in his opinion there was widespread lack of due regard for economy and efficiency in the operation of the government, and that inadequate attention is being given to programs costing millions of dollars and whether they are accomplishing what parliament intended. This report, together with reports of previous auditors general, and the views of millions of Canadians confirm that this government is the most wasteful government since confederation and is mismanaging our economy as no other government has mismanaged it since confederation.

In looking through chapter three of the Auditor General's report with regard to airports, the Auditor General virtually suggested that he was going to withhold what is referred to in the private sector, as the normal time of auditing certification. In other words, he almost wanted to disown himself from the disaster. What is implicit in his comments is that he is withholding normal auditing practice certifications. It is the first time that this sort of thing has happened in any Auditor General's report in my time here in the House of Commons.

If this government took as serious the reports of the auditors general over the last number of years—and I know that my hon. friends to the left will support me on this—we could have saved millions and billions of dollars and channeled them into vital social and welfare programs.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are of course in agreement with some proposals in last week's budget including, as the hon. member for Ottawa-Centre (Mr. de Cotret) would have clearly indicated yesterday afternoon, the reduction from 12 per cent to 9 per cent in the federal sales tax as it affects a number of manufactured goods.

However I would have to put a number of questions at this point to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). These questions are clear and simple. I would like to ask this to the minister: What proposals does your budget include to help low income people, the poor? What proposals does your budget include to help small businessmen, solve unemployment, stimulate the economy, or eliminate economic stagnation? And here is another question of significance to the Auditor General: To control budget deficits, to control inflation, what proposals are there? This is another question I am putting to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker, the answers are quite obvious. This budget means no real growth for the economy, and an analysis of the proposals put forward by the minister clearly shows that unfortunately we will have more unemployment in the future, no improvements in the inflation rate and a larger budget deficit.

In his speech, the minister discussed the outlook for the future. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I did not listen very closely because the minister's forecasts have always been proved wrong. The public and the House both lost confidence in the minister forecasts. And I repeat, the Canadian people have lost all confidence in the government.

Mr. Breau: No, they did not!

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: Like many Canadians I said to myself a number of months ago, "Why did Mr. Goldfarb"—I mean the right hon. Prime Minister—"not call an election?" I do not think that I am known on Parliament Hill as being a hidebound traditionalist, but there is one tradition that has been here a long time, and that is that we are supposed to have an election every four years in this country. Since he did not call the election Canadians assumed that the Prime Minister must have something, apart from civil war in Quebec, very big in mind. He gave no explanation of why he was not calling an election.

We all then awaited the throne speech. In my 20 years on Parliament Hill, the last throne speech was the worst. I am not kidding myself, but when we were in power, although the throne speeches may have been a little vague, they at least had some meat to them. After hearing the throne speech and realizing there was nothing in it, I thought that we should be patient and wait for the government's legislative package. Once again there was nothing. Perhaps the hon. ministers opposite have isolated themselves in their ivory towers in their death throes, because there was not one single thing.

The Prime Minister said that he had something big in mind, but in the view of the Canadian people it was certainly not in the throne speech or in the legislative package which has been presented to parliament. And we are almost at Christmas time. But no matter, Mr. Speaker, even if he did present something relatively big now, it would be far too late for anything that may happen this winter, so we can rule out anything happening in terms of meaningful legislation.

Now we have this budget, Mr. Speaker. When I was a parliamentary secretary many years ago with the minister of finance, we regarded a budget as a major document which told the Canadian people where we had come from and where we were going. It was a major document that showed the Canadian people the economic direction and economic policy of the government of the day. By bringing down three budgets in one year the federal government has virtually undermined the credibility of a budget. I challenge the government opposite to go to the Canadian people on this budget, on their legislative package, and on their throne speech. I say there is not one single item that authorizes the Prime Minister to go beyond the traditional mandate for calling an election.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, budgets are supposed to be a grand design that indicates government policy to the Canadian people. I admit that because of the gross economic mismanagement of the worst government we have had since Confederation, the poor Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has been placed in a hopeless pickle. He had two alternatives. One was to dare to go ahead with a bold new design and cut new ground; the other was to work within the confines of the narrow parameters set out for him by this awful government. He chose the latter, and what we got was tinkering and lack of vision.

I ask, is that what has kept parliament going on? I hope not. The only possible excuse, having seen the government's budget, its throne speech, and its legislative package, is this. The Prime Minister used to be an NDPer in Quebec but he took over the Liberal party. As a result, there now exists this Liberal disease, which is that hon. members opposite have some divine right to continue to rule this country, even when they have brought this country to its economic knees. This parliament has been prolonged not for the survival of Canada but for the survival of the Liberal party. They keep underlining day after day and year after year this divine right to govern this country, even after the years of gross economic mismanagement.

Just what do we have, Mr. Speaker, after ten years of this government? Unimaginable budgetary deficits, record unemployment, inflation, the lowest dollar relationship to the United States dollar since confederation, and, last but not least, record interest rates that hurt most of all Canadians of low income. These are the very people I have always said members on both sides of the House are here to protect. These are the very people who have been shafted most by the gross economic mismanagement of this government. Certainly they have been shafted the most by high interest rates.

I do not care what statistics the minions of the Prime Minister hand him as he sits in his ivory tower; in the last ten years more and more Canadians have fallen below the poverty line because of Ottawa's foolhardy policies. Gathered in cabinet on the opposite side of the House is the worst collection of economic illiterates that this country has ever seen. With their record, Mr. Speaker, how can they presume to prolong this parliament over and above the traditional mandate? But it will not be long, Mr. Speaker. You bet it will not be long. However, we on this side of the House have to look at you guys over there for another winter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: What have they done to help small businessmen in this budget?

Mr. Pinard: A lot, and you know that.

Mr. Grafftey: I know a lot of hon. gentlemen across the way do not think I am the greatest guy who ever came down the pike, but I do keep in touch with the people, with the foot soldiers in my part of the world. These next two sentences express the mandate that they have given to me. The right hon. Prime Minister, by not calling an election after his traditional mandate expired, has deprived Canadians of removing the worst government we have seen since confederation. We on this side of the House say: after looking at your budget, after looking at your throne speech, after denying that you have the divine right to rule, and after looking at your legislative package, in the name of God, go!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: They may be laughing now, Mr. Speaker, but they will not be laughing when their quarterback finally calls the election.

I am glad to see that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) is in the House this afternoon because I want to talk about our attitude to the proposed purchase of Pacific Petroleums. Certainly their attitude with regard to the purchase of Nordair and Pacific Petroleums underlines how completely even the so-called free enterprise businessmen in the cabinet have lost touch with private sector realities.

The minister of energy proposed to give us a lecture the other day on how companies get finance. I am quite well aware, I will tell the minister, as is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), of how Petro-Canada, with the aid of the chartered banks, proposes to take over Pacific Petroleums. Like hon. members opposite, I too have read the details of the proposed chartered bank financing of this takeover. I am as aware as the government of how it is proposed to buy Nordair. The government may have competely lost touch with reality somewhere along the line, but although they have diddled the books enough in terms of public accounting, they cannot diddle this book.

I had Frank Scott, a constitutional law expert, as my professor at McGill, and compared to him the lectures that I have had from members on the other side of the House on constitutional law, and on varying degrees of governmental responsibility for actions taken in the name of the Crown, have been pretty bad. Nevertheless, having gone through the plethora of combinations of argument, the fact is that somewhere down the line the government will indirectly incur a liability for taking over Pacific Petroleums and Nordair.

I ask the minister of energy to state yes or no a little more clearly than he has in the past just what is the position. I do not buy the argument that the government can satisfy its quasi-doctrinaire propensities for cutting back because it has an ex-NDPer who took over the Liberal party as a short-term prime minister. That side of the House has the worst of both worlds—the worst of the free enterprise world and the worst of the socialist world. It is on that basis of lack of principle that the government has brought this country to its economic knees.

• (1712)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They also have the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Grafftey: He has only been hitting about .125 since he has been on the other side of the House.

Having said that, I would say to the ministry opposite that in purchasing Nordair and Pacific Petroleums Ltd., somewhere down the line they will be incurring indebtedness, indirectly. I think it is a pretty poor show during a week when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is in Toronto telling her provincial counterparts that we will cut back on health resource programs, health research and bloc funding of social services at the community level, that the government, to satisfy its quasi-doctrinaire urges, purchases Pacific Petroleums Ltd. and Nordair.

I am a little surprised at my colleagues to the left. I usually have a great deal of honest admiration for their spokesman on energy, but I was a little surprised the other day that he supported this move which involves billions of dollars at the same time as we are cutting back on health and welfare services and the like. They, too, lose their sense of reality when they get caught up with their doctrinaire urges, which I submit are more realistic for a bygone age.

This week and last week the Minister of Finance announced the unilateral cutback of programs affecting the provinces. The Prime Minister said this is because of fiscal restraint. I reiterate that in the case of bloc funding of social services at the community level not only the question of money was involved but also a whole new system that the federal and provincial ministers of welfare had worked out with the provinces over a long period. Holus-bolus, unilaterally, the Minister of Finance cancelled the programs. Apart from considerations of restraint, is this the way to deal with the provinces? I suggest that when programs like that are cancelled unilaterally, the waste of money is incredible.

Let me be more specific about the government's plans for cutting back on the health resources fund, Mr. Speaker. The position of this party on restraint is very clear. I am sure I am representing the party when I say we must be selective. Very often Treasury Board moves into certain programs like a bull in a china shop, without understanding the implications, and so the results are incredible.

If there is one thing I have some knowledge of it is the health resources fund. It was a multi-million dollar fund put in place not only to organize community health services, to humanize and make more decent the delivery of health care services, but also one of the centrifugal aspects of the fund was to rationalize costs. One of the means of doing this was to train paramedical people to take the place of high cost doctors, by building units less expensive than the curative community hospitals, and by helping research. In the name of restraint, however, the government went hog-wild. Treasury Board, with no knowledge of the centrifugal aspect of this program apart from its human dimensions, just cut costs. They went in to cancel and cut. I maintain that by cutting in the area of health resources you waste rather than save.

I want to lay another myth to rest, Mr. Speaker. Time and time again in past weeks the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and his party have put forward propositions vis-à-vis local tax deductions for housing. With an almost Pavlovian dog reaction, the government said this was for the rich and not for the poor. I think we have laid to rest the argument that not all homeowners with young families and sizeable mortgages can automatically be classified as rich. Apart from that, however, it is quite a fallacious argument.

The benefit we want for homeowners is a benefit that lessees have been getting indirectly for years. The owner of buildings, houses and condominiums, rents them and directly or indirectly has been able to benefit from the tax provision that we provided for homeowners in the past. The benefits that we are proposing for future homeowners are benefits that have largely been enjoyed by lessees in the past.

Hon. members opposite sneer at our proposal. It is not just an ad hoc proposal like so many made by the government but is one that goes to the heart of the principles and philosophy of this party. As we go to victory at the next election, we say that we believe that democracy is well served, in the best sense of the word, when the individual citizen has an ownership stake in the country. Unlike the socialists and the Liberals, holding on to their doctrinaire ideas which were more relevant in the thirties than today, we believe that government has a role to play in encouraging what I call a property-owning—

Mr. Gillespie: Like Petro-Canada.

Mr. Grafftey: While the minister is out buying more and more for the government, we are encouraging individual Canadians to own more and more. We believe that governments have a direct and indirect role through tax incentives and the like, in encouraging more good farmers to own their own farms, more businessmen to own small businesses. The government is not interested in the small businessman and did nothing for him in the budget. We have and are articulating policies, as our leader said, to get our money "out of the sock and into stocks". We have a policy to encourage more Canadians to invest in Canadian enterprise.

We believe that democracy is well served when more Canadians are encouraged to own their own homes. That, Mr. Speaker, is a private sector or individual policy; it is not just an ad hoc thing we thought of overnight. It goes to the heart of the principles of this party. It is one of the reasons that I am a Progressive Conservative, because I believe in a property-owning democracy when the people own the property, not the government.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did so well in the private sector that he now wants billions of tax dollars to satisfy his quasi doctrinaire propensity. We on this side of the House believe that our—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would accept a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. minister is seeking permission to ask a question. That can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Paproski: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if he can have more time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There does not seem to be unanimous consent. I did not get unanimous consent.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to allow him to finish his remarks. If he is allowed more time, that is fine by us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I asked if there was unanimous consent, and it was not given with conditions. Now conditions are applied to it, so I recognize the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Duclos).

● (1722)

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take part in this debate to state openly and publicly that I fully agree with the responsible approach of the government with regard to the financial and economic management of our country. Mr. Speaker, the government could easily have taken advantage of this budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to pander to the tastes of the people. On the other hand, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could easily have abstained from making the decisions which required the support and co-operation of the Canadian people, but he chose to do so, because we know that in spite of all the speeches made by members opposite and all the half-truths spread by them, the Canadian people prefer a government which assumes its responsibilities and tells the truth.

Mr. Speaker, the best proof given by the government that it intends to run this country in a responsible fashion and to seriously curb its spending has been its decision to come to grips with a program which was indeed very popular in some quarters but gave rise to abuses and excesses that could no longer be tolerated, namely, the unemployment insurance program.

As a result of the decisions taken by the government to reduce and make more stringent the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act covering benefits and the eligibility of Canadians, Mr. Speaker, from now till the end of the current taxation year we will save $150 million while for 1979-80 we will save some $580 million and for the following year almost $1 billion by making the unemployment insurance scheme much more restrictive.

Mr. La Salle: On the back of the unemployed.

Mr. Duclos: The member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) will have the opportunity to speak in due time, Mr. Speaker. He makes me laugh because a survey made by Ottawa University Professor Bodkin shows that the generosity of the government with its unemployment insurance policy has created an artificial unemployment of at least 2 per cent so that the real unemployment rate in our country must be about 6 to 6.5 per cent. Indeed, what happened is that the original intent of the unemployment insurance scheme has been distorted. This is not an insurance against unemployment any more, Mr. Speaker; it has become a social welfare measure which too many Canadians take advantage of as soon as they meet the legal requirements. Mr. Speaker, I think it is time that the government thought about those who work, who pay taxes, who get up in the morning and have the guts to go out and earn a living and I think the government is doing just that. Of course, the present economic situation makes it impossible for some of us who really want to work to find jobs and we deplore that fact. The government does not want to penalize these people anyway, but to punish those who found a way to systematically take advantage of the generosity of our program.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

Mr. Speaker, one of the big deceptions I had in recent weeks or even months was to hear some ministers of the Quebec government mislead Quebeckers by pretending that the federal budget restrictions were aimed first and foremost at jeopardizing the interests of the province of Quebec, and yet they had already recognized the advisability and necessity for the federal government to reduce its spending in some very specific fields. For example, using an analogy, the finance minister said that it was a bit like someone clearing the snow in his driveway by shovelling it over to his neighbour's entrance. I think the Quebec finance minister could have told the population that those people who will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance because of the new requirements in the law will in some cases get welfare benefits of which, Mr. Speaker, 50 per cent are financed by the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan.

I would add, Mr. Speaker, that in any event fewer than 10 per cent of those who will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance will become recipients of welfare benefits because in several cases they are young people still living at home with their parents, and their parents can support them. In some cases it is a man or a woman whose spouse is working and earning an adequate income. Mr. Speaker, when I was a student, I never thought about that, it never occurred to me that by working so many weeks I could have applied for unemployment insurance. Not only me but also my fellow students. People with whom I used to study managed to work during summer. We were saving enough money and then were studying for eight, nine or ten months at the university with the modest amount of money we had managed to save.

● (1732)

Mr. Speaker, I was also deeply disappointed to hear in the last few months a minister in the Quebec government, the Minister of Industry and Commerce, denounce throughout Quebec the position of the federal government on the Ford matter. He stated on several occasions that the federal government prejudiced Quebec's interests by allowing Ford Motors to build their plant in Ontario. Mr. Speaker, the people in Quebec should know that the choice was not between Quebec and Ontario. The choice was between an investment by Ford Motors in the state of Ohio, in the United States, or an investment in the Windsor area, in Ontario.

An hon. Member: That is all!

Mr. Duclos: All in all, would the Quebec minister of industry and commerce have preferred the investment to go to the United States rather than benefit Canada because it was made in the province of Ontario? I think, Mr. Speaker, that the benefits Canada will derive from that investment will also be felt in Quebec, if only indirectly, and I can assure Quebeckers that the government is making every effort in the case of General Motors to have that investment made in Quebec. But such decisions are not made by governments finally but by business leaders who think in terms of economic profitability.

Mr. Speaker, I am a member of a party which is very tolerant, and for that reason, I feel well at ease to bring that matter to the attention of the House, and I am glad to note that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) is now in the House because it is a matter which I know is of great interest to him. What I have in mind, Mr. Speaker, is the issue concerning the heavy water plant in Laprade, Quebec.

Strictly speaking, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the arguments raised by the minister make a lot of sense because there is no point in building a heavy water plant if, on the one hand, there is already overproduction of heavy water in Canada as a whole and if, on the other hand, the cost to Quebec consumers is going to be higher if they are supplied by the heavy water plant which could be built in Laprade. However, Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the federal government signed that agreement earlier this year. I suppose the reasons we have been bringing forward since last August were already as good in January and February.

Mr. Speaker, rigorously and objectively speaking we are certainly right but I think the minister should understand the significant political dimension of that matter. The minister should understand that the credibility of the federal government is at stake in the province of Quebec and that its credibility is very important given the important debates now taking place and given the major decisions that Quebeckers will have to make in the coming months. I think there is a symbol here and it would therefore be very important to reconsider the entire matter. Indeed, 1,500 jobs are at stake and I think that it is imperative that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make a proposal to the government of Quebec. What he should do is offer a compensation such as the extension of the natural gas pipeline to the east or simply accept to give further action to the agreement already signed because what is noticeable for people is that an agreement has been signed and that we withdraw unilaterally from it now.

Mr. Speaker, the government budget restrictions cannot be prejudicial to Quebec's interests. It is easy to prove, regardless of what the Quebec government may say. Let us take, for example, the revision of family allowances. In 1979, Mr. Speaker, this change, which will benefit low income families and require of the more privileged that they forgo $5 a month for each child, means, as far as Quebec is concerned, an additional injection of $60 million during the coming year.

Also, I should like to take this opportunity to stress that as far as the riding of Montmorency—which I have the honour to represent here—is concerned, the net result of this measure will be an additional 2.7 million in family allowances. This means that the population of Montmorency will get a total of $25 million, only in family allowances. And if we add to that old age security, a sector where the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has performed a feat in spite of budgetary restraints, has managed to raise almost $300 million, of which $82 million will go directly to Quebec, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how one can say that this government do not serve the interests of Quebeckers.

As far as my constituency is concerned, the riding of Montmorency, and as far as old age security is concerned, with the guaranteed income supplement being raised by $20 a month, an additional sum of $1.5 million will be injected into the constituency during the coming year, which will increase to $36 million the money received from the federal government by the senior citizens in my constituency. In all, Mr. Speaker, following the revision of family allowances and the increase in the budget for old age security, Quebec will receive in the coming year $142 million more than it did last year.

Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, we studied Bill C-5, a measure which specifically provided for this $20 a month increase per household for senior citizens, and also a six-month extension of the spouse allowance to help the spouse who loses his or her partner to death to face the situation more easily. Naturally it is easy to say that something is not enough. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is a step in the right direction. I find that rather strange. I remember the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) expressing pity for the fate of the women and the men who, having lost their spouse, would also lose their pension. I found that strange, that taken individually, those hon. members of the opposition may be sincere; I am willing to trust them. But, Mr. Speaker, they should realize that their worst ennemy, if they are really sincere, is their party, taken as a whole, which constantly and indirectly, with great subtlety, attacks the social policies of the government, insinuating that it does too much for the people. That is very easy to do, Mr. Speaker, to create an atmosphere in the country, to have the country sway to the right, so that tremendous pressures—

Mr. La Salle: It is going to hell.

Mr. Duclos: —are exerted against the government. Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member for Joliette ever use parliamentary language! I think he should be a bit more polite. In any event, I feel I should not attach too much importance to such despicable comments. About this whole matter, the problem of older people, I think we have to be extremely careful lest in allowing the spouse, aged 60 to 65, to keep the pension—which in itself is desirable, we create at the same time an injustice towards the other individuals of 60 to 65 who, being single, are under no circumstances entitled to the spouse's allowance.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the answer, which must nevertheless take into account the taxpayer's capacity to pay and the government's capacity to spend, would be to lower gradually the age of eligibility for old age security in the case of people who leave the labour force and have no other source of income. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the government that starting next year, let us say in 1980, we start paying the pension from the age of 64 and that we lower the age of eligibility by one year annually so that in 1984, all Canadians over 60 who will have left the labour force and have no other source of income could receive a pension.

Mr. Speaker, according to the studies which have been made, about half of all Canadians between the ages of 60 and 65 would take advantage of this pension and retire from the labour force. If we brought about such a reform of our social security system right now, it would cost $1 billion, Mr. Speaker, and I do believe, as my colleagues do, that Canadians have enough of a sense of their responsibilities to understand that in the present economic situation the government cannot spend an additional $1 billion. However, I believe that the government could spend a bit more than it does now so that eventually old age pensions would be available at the age of 60. One of the beneficial results of such an action, Mr. Speaker, would be to free jobs for our young people who want to work, and there are some young people who want to work, Mr. Speaker. There are a number of spongers in our society, but I believe that most young people want to work, to have an interesting job and to be motivated.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to discuss the attitude of our friends opposite concerning the economic situation of Canada as a whole. On the one hand, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) asks for a considerable reduction in our deficit. This is not a bad idea; I believe that it is a valid objective, Mr. Speaker. On the other hand, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) maintains that we must reduce taxes. It would not be a bad idea to reduce our deficit and reduce taxes. However, I believe that this would entail lower expenditures.

When discussing income tax reduction, Mr. Speaker, we are immediately reminded of the proposition made by the Leader of the Opposition who would have municipal taxes and mortgage interests made deductible from the taxable income of the taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if we think about it for one second we see this is a totally irresponsible proposition. Mr. Speaker, it is known for instance that after four years—because this scheme would cover a four-year period—the federal government would lose at least $2 billion in fiscal revenues, not to mention the $750 million lost by the provinces which, of course, would not collect these revenues. Besides, I would like to point out the interesting fact that we are very often blamed for not consulting the provinces when we implement various policies. Mr. Speaker, in an area closely related to provincial taxation, I do not believe that the Leader of the Opposition bothered to consult very many provinces, I believe that in future he should not teach us too many lessons in this respect. And besides, if the home owners who have completely paid off their mortgage or have paid part of it were to decide—as they would probably do because nobody is stupid enough not to grab such and opportunity—to refinance completely their house, we cannot even project the possible costs, the taxes that might be lost by the government.

Mr. Speaker, the effects would be first an increase in mortgage interest rates. When money goes to the mortgage market, there are less funds available for industrial development, mining development and the various economic developments required by our country. Mr. Speaker, with the increase in interest rates, municipal financing would be much more costly, and in order to meet their responsibilities, municipalities would have to increase property taxes, thus offsetting the benefits that taxpayers might derive from the proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition. Mr. Speaker, it is also a socially unfair measure as, considering the progressive nature of tax rates in Canada, savings would increase with higher taxable incomes.

Furthermore, it is obvious that people with luxury homes, with the most expensive residences, will take advantage of the $5,000 maximum provided by the proposal of the official opposition leader: the owners of small bungalows would not get the maximum, but rather the people who are able to pay for luxury homes and with a high standard of living. Mr. Speaker, I do not consider this as a socially equitable policy and I am prepared, in my riding, to defend the government's position on that issue and to attack the irresponsibility of the opposition party. Mr. Speaker, I know that it is not enough to criticize. For my part, when I criticize a proposal made by my political opponents, I like to propose an alternative. The aim in my view should be to help homeowners who really need this help, while maintaining a responsible fiscal and budget policy. One proposal I would have in that respect would be to allow small homeowners to deduct up to $1,000 from taxable income, depending on how much deduction they claimed for interests and dividends because, as you know, there is a maximum $1,000 exemption for dividends and interests.

Mr. Speaker, this would help small homeowners and we know that thousands can barely pay their mortgages and taxes, and are unable to save. They would use the maximum $1,000 deduction.

Mr. Speaker, the more affluent homeowners, those already receiving dividends and interests in excess of $1,000 could not benefit, and rightly so. Such a policy would be socially fair, because the government's first priority is to care for the small in society.

Mr. Speaker, an exemption is also needed for the aged. We are aware that a number of old age pensioners essentially live off their savings, they receive dividends and interests, so they could be allowed a deduction at the uniform and flat rate of $1,000. The advantage in that proposal, Mr. Speaker, is that we know the cost. It would be roughly $300 million. This might be implemented on a gradual basis, to conform with current economic and financial conditions, but such should be the goal. As I said, Mr. Speaker, deficit reduction is good. Income tax reductions I support. But the opposition should be a little more specific when time comes to talk about spending cuts. One hears relatively few suggestions. We have been told about 60,000 civil servants who should be laid off over a three-year period. What an intelligent proposal! Self-made unemployment, but one hopes—

Mr. La Salle: This is not true.

Mr. Duclos: But, Mr. Speaker, one knows very well that there are not 20,000 civil servants who voluntarily retire each year in the federal government. Therefore, it would be voluntary unemployment creation. I wonder what the hon. member for Joliette is going to answer to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. La Salle: This is not true.

Mr. Duclos: Mr. Speaker, we prefer to propose some raises. We do not suggest cutbacks but higher expenditures and I am going to give you a few examples.

• (1752)

I referred earlier to what the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) said, that the spouse's allowance should be paid in all circumstances to people between the ages of 60 and 65. That is $10 million more, Mr. Speaker. I listened to the hon. member—unfortunately, he is gone—the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) who talked about the financing of social services. I will tell him first that he has not done his homework because there has been no agreement yet. There was a discussion between the federal government and the provinces but no agreement has been signed. He said it was only a matter of reorganizing budgets. I will tell the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that if that agreement were to be signed it would result in an increase in spending of $160 million for the federal government. Always spending!

I was listening yesterday to the new member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon) who urged—and I think it was legitimate—that the 250 scientists working for the federal government not be fired because that would have a bad effect on the development of science in Canada. I am sure of that, Mr. Speaker, but there will come a time when there will have to be a little consistency, when there will have to be an elimination of the contradictions in the economic and financial policy of the opposition.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it is not hard, to reduce a deficit there are not very many ways of going about it. Either you reduce spending or you increase taxes, or a combination of both. There are no alternatives. If you reduce taxes, you essentially have to reduce spending. I noted that the Progressive Conservatives are even prepared to contradict themselves, are so power hungry that they are prepared to make the worst contradictions, and they think that Canadians are going to fall for that farce. You can fool all people from time to time, you can fool some people all the time but you cannot fool all people all the time. I think it is time that the opposition dropped their masks, that they showed their real face. The time for truth has come in this country. I challenge the Progressive Conservatives to present a budget. It could be called the budget of the year I of the Progressive Conservative party. A budget. We are going to be waiting for that. I ask them questions. Present that budget and answer the following questions: What would be the size of the deficit? How and by how much would taxes be reduced, by how much and by cutting into what expenditures, cutting into what programs would spending be reduced? I challenge the Progressive Conservative to put before this House a budget before the forthcoming elections with all their so-called experts who are members of the Tory caucus.

There are elementary principles which should not be forgotten. To achieve both a deficit and tax reduction expenditures must be curtailed more so than taxes. The La Presse newspaper from November 18 quoted a fairly typical statement by no less an authority than the most honourable Progressive Conservative member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), a former prime minister of Canada under whose administration our country experienced a high rate of unemployment.

An hon. Member: Quite high, indeed!

Mr. Duclos: Under the Liberals in 1955-56, the unemployment rate had been fluctuating from 3 to 4, and 4½ per cent. All of a sudden it went up to 6, 7, 7.1 per cent and when the Liberal party came back to power in 1963, unemployment started to go down. The 7 per cent unemployment rate in the conditions prevailing then, when the rate of participation in the labour force in 1960 was much lower than it is nowadays would mean a rate of unemployment of 10 per cent to 11 per cent by today's standards. Such were the achievements of the Progressive Conservative government under the leadership of that prime minister—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the honourable member but his time has expired.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely eager to join in this debate. However, I wonder if, in order to allow all these hon. gentlemen to have a good supper in view of the fact that it is already 5.55 p.m., I could not ask for the adjournment of this House so that I may resume. It seems that Mr. Speaker does not quite seem to feel that way. I certainly would like to take advantage of the few minutes which I am granted to join in this debate, in answer to the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

Mr. Speaker, once again this House has to deal with one of these quarterly interventions by the Minister of Finance in the shaping of our economic policy.

Those numerous and awkward efforts to steer to the right and then to the left prove only one thing—the glaring incompetence of the Minister of Finance. If he had seen right last spring, we would not have to discuss once again such important economic issues. Had the minister listened to advice from the opposition, because we gave him good opinions and also those of experts, Canada would now be on the road to economic recovery. The Canadian dollar would be in a stable position and we would have registered real success against inflation.

In light of past efforts and if I consider those failures which have marked all those interventions last year, this budget will fall far short of the lofty goals at which the minister is so confidently aiming. However, as the minister is crossing a political desert, he can do nothing but whistle to recover his morale while he is spending our money. Economists agree on one point: this budget will fail to stimulate the economy and appreciably cut down unemployment. On the contrary, it is evident that the Minister of Finance has decided to use unemployment as his principal instrument to fight desperately an ever threatening inflation.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, thousands of Canadian workers are going to pay for the mistakes, the foolishness and the maladministration of this government. While attempting to deceive us by talking about expenditure cutbacks, the minister is in fact increasing federal spending. Mr. Speaker, under the present government, words have lost their real meaning and only the minister has the nerve to pretend that we will reduce our spending by increasing them. Our party proposes long-term budgeting—preferably five years—but the minister prefers to table a hold-the-line budget, desperately hoping that the situation will improve as if by magic and that the government will not be defeated in the months to come.

Mr. Speaker, in the hands of this government, the budget is no longer an instrument of economic policy but simply a ploy of electoral propaganda. It is in fact one of the reasons why we heard so many economic statements this year. And in spite of a few welcomed initiatives, the same applies to the last budget. Indeed, a deficit of at least $12 billion does nothing to restore confidence among business circles nor does it strenghten our dollar on international markets. It is not the first time the Minister of Finance is engaged in double talk. While bragging about the merits of devaluating the dollar, he is increasing its value by putting the interest rates to an unprecedented level which will only worsen the stagnation of our economy. The so-called benefits of a decrease in the value of the dollar will be wiped off for the consumer by an increase in financing costs and economic activities. It is as if the minister was trying to save a drowning man he has just thrown in the lake with a milestone around his neck or as if somebody was feeling compelled to sell his stove to buy wood. In my view, this is more or less the attitude of the Minister of Finance. Our dollar is likely to go on sinking straight to the bottom as it has been doing since the minister assumed his present portfolio. Mr. Speaker, I think I am hearing some strange noises, therefore I hope to continue at eight o'clock.

[The Acting Speaker.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I will continue my speech. I readily admit that tax exemptions for some industries are very commendable indeed. My only regret is that they have not been granted earlier, as we in the Progressive Conservative party have been advocating it for a long time, especially in the case of resource industries. The reduction of the federal sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent is definitely a step in the right direction, but it is not addressed to the heart of the problem of the costs that overburden the Canadian manufacturing industry. Moreover, it is not entirely sure that the benefits of the operation will be fully passed on to consumers. The indexing of the basic exemption for personal income tax purposes will at the most enable a taxpayer to keep his purchasing power.

The tax credit granted for employment expenses which is raised from $250 to a limit of $500 seems generous at first sight, but it is really quite small for workers and will not fully compensate for the increase in transportation costs and the price of tools. I sincerely regret that the minister has found necessary to increase the airport tax by 15 per cent. There is no clearer evidence of the wealthy bourgeois mentality which characterizes this government than this tax increase the principal victims of which will be the passengers with little or no means. Air travel in this country is not for the exclusive use of the rich businessmen and vacationers .

The airplane is a vital means of transportation in the outlying areas of Canada, be it in the North or in regions where other means of transportation are not available, or on the many islands off our coasts. I am especially referring, as far as my province is concerned, to the people of the Magdalen Islands among others, who can reach the mainland by plane only and who are not exactly among the richest citizens of our country. I am also referring to the workers of the north coast and of new Quebec who once in a while want to visit their families in the Gaspé peninsula. I am also thinking about the Indians and the people working on the James Bay project whose transportation expenses will go up again. And what about the people of Prince Edward Island, of Newfoundland, of the Northwest Territories or of the northern parts of all our provinces? What about all the Canadians who are scattered all over the country and who have no other means of transportation but the airplane to get together at Christmas time or for the funerals of one of their relatives? I am thinking of those new Canadians of less than modest means who may want to go back home, to the old country, for one last time. The government would not have acted otherwise even if they had actually wanted to get at the most needy of Canadians.

I also regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has not seen fit to adopt our party's recommendations regarding deductibility of mortgage interests and property taxes on a homeowner's principal residence. This measure, which would be of immense benefit to our economy in several industrial sectors, will be one of the Progressive Conservative party's top priorities after the Canadians have given us the mandate to govern this country. And since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) likes to link the economic problem with that of national unity, I do not think that it is irrelevant for me to say a word about the pitiful and deplorable speech given over the weekend by the head of this government before the Ontario Liberals.

I am not much impressed, Mr. Speaker, by the Prime Minister's efforts to propel himself into the role of defender of Canada's unity. The Canadian people are not too willing to forget that it was under his government and because of his political actions that disunity came to Canada. Nor are they too willing to forget that his arrogance and his rigidity as regards constitutional matters are the main reason why so many Quebeckers want out and why the present Quebec government was elected. Recent polls published in Montreal's La Presse also show that opposition to the Prime Minister, his policies and especially his government, has reached an all time high. They are of such nature as to convince voters that maintaining this party in power any longer is the surest way to push a majority of Quebeckers into the arms of the party currently in power in Quebec. Even though the right hon. Prime Minister drapes himself in the Canadian flag in an effort to present the figure of a national hero, he cannot prevent anybody from seeing through the desperate manoeuvre of a politician eager to divert the attention of the public away from the economic chaos in which he has plunged the country and the serious divisions he has created among the various Canadian ethnic groups. Canadians will not fall for this pitch by a man whose credibility has fallen to the zero level. They will remember his stand against controls during the 1974 election campaign. They are not about to forget this huge political fraud, Mr. Speaker.

Should the right hon. Prime Minister decide to masquerade as the saviour of our country, Canadians would only laugh. This so-called rempart against separatism reminds one of the famous rempart the Liberal party claimed it had risen against conscription. It was not very solid. Such ridiculous claims would only make people jeer if they were not accompanied by slanderous remarks against those who oppose the government. Never has there been a party leader, let alone a Prime Minister, who has questioned his adversaries' loyalty to Canada. I do not doubt the sincerity of the leader of the government when he claims that only his policies can save Canada from disaster and I have nothing but pity for his blindness, but I deny him the right to accuse the leader of the opposition or any other public figure for that matter of being disloyal to Canada, just because he happens to favour a greater decentralization of power and a more active role for provincial governments.

Incidently, we have an indication of the sincerity of the right hon. Prime Minister when he states that he is willing to discuss a new power sharing formula with the provinces. The right hon. Prime Minister goes too far when he calls all those who do not agree with him "enemies". This man who claims to be the only one capable of uniting Canadians is the only one who, to date, has dared use words likely to provoke division among Canadians and create a truly explosive social climate.

But the worst, Mr. Speaker, is not that the right hon. Prime Minister should have made such unworthy remarks. Today we know that he is quite capable of doing anything at all to save his bacon. The worst is that there should have been Liberals to applaud, to support those unbecoming and unfortunate calls. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I heard several speeches and I should like to demonstrate the lack of trust in the government that has grown in this country. When the right hon. Prime Minister visited Ontario last Sunday, he went as far as to say that if the country were to have a Progressive Conservative government it would separate. I refuse to accept such a statement, Mr. Speaker. Let us remember the story of the three wisemen.

I feel it is important to recall the time when the right hon. Prime Minister, accompanied by his two attendants, came to Ottawa and decided to sink into the Liberal party. Of course, the Liberals of the day did not see them as their friends and especially not as their counsellors. Of the three wisemen, you will recognize with me, Mr. Speaker, that two have chosen fairer climes. As for the third, I think in fact he is faring about as well as the Canadian dollar. But when we look at the background of the right hon. Prime Minister, at the bed-fellows he had at the time, it is not surprising to see the type of politics we have had in the last ten years and why a lack of trust has settled in the land.

He dared claim that a Progressive Conservative government could lead to the separation of the country when he is fully aware, and all hon. members opposite know that, that the situation began to deteriorate in the last ten years, under his administration. Should I recall the fraternity which existed between the two founding peoples, between the two largest groups in Canada, during the centenary of Confederation? What happened in the last ten years? There was a lack of economic policies which increased social problems all over the country, and the Prime Minister travelled across the land making people believe that he had the whole situation in Quebec under control. He accused the mass media of making false statements whereas he alone described accurately and exactly the situation in Quebec. And we wonder today why so many Quebeckers show a lack of trust and even a lack of interest in our federal system. I should perhaps remind hon. members opposite, who have shared the same experiences, that we have witnessed many betrayals on the part of this government and of those members who came here to save the country ten years ago. In view of this terrible political and economic fiasco, we certainly cannot agree hastily to support this budget without making appropriate comments.

I would like to remind those who state that the government has managed the affairs of Canada well and who wonder about the indifference of Quebeckers and the objective that many of them have, that what has brought about this lack of trust and this rejection of federalism in the province of Quebec is the attitude of this government. For instance, the conflict over the French language in air traffic certainly did nothing to gain the confidence of Quebeckers even though the department involved was headed by a Quebecker, and we should perhaps ask some questions to the then minister of transport who was well aware of the situation in Quebec and who has now gone to rest in the Senate. We could also talk about the Prime Minister. Who is the cause of this lack of trust? This same Prime Minister who had as his main objective bilingualism throughout the country. He had promised a bonus to those who could work in both official languages, and in his cutbacks last summer, without any prior consultation, he boldly took back this bonus and reneged on his promise. If such an action is not liable to create a lack of trust, a lack of confidence and a lack of credibility for these people, I wonder what is.

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) who, with great subtlety, wanted to say to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) that he was greatly disappointed that the federal government had broken its agreement with the government of Quebec. The hon. member for Montmorency was very careful about what he said, but I could see that he was very disappointed and that he disagreed in principle with the minister. The federal government had signed an agreement with a provincial government and it broke this agreement in this budget without any prior negotiation. Not one member on the other side can suggest the opposite. Few people complain about that. So far, so good. Recently the minister told me the closing down of the Laprade site was in the interest of Quebec consumers. If such was the case, Mr. Speaker, how come twelve months ago this government took the lead and invited the Quebec government to start such a huge project? This proves no sufficient revenues had been collected, which points to utter incompetence.

That kind of decision can only worsen the situation as viewed from the province of Quebec. These are decisions that hurt. Of course the Quebec government recently published data proving fiscal restraint was costing Quebec 18,000 jobs. I put the question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I asked him whether he had made projections, assessments before announcing those cuts. The minister never answered. He suggested he wanted to put the country's finances into better shape, but he could not prove data published by the Quebec government were inaccurate. The Minister for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde), who is in the habit of announcing the big bad wolf is coming, had no hesitation in suggesting those data were baseless. Of course this is no proof, and it can hardly help the government regain credibility and public confidence.

I hope that the Minister of Finance and all the ministers who have cut their spendings... We are not necessarily against cuts, we did ask for them, but I would like to know if serious assessments have been made and I would like to make sure that the province of Quebec particularly, and other members from that province will mention it, will not be unduly penalized by those budget cuts.

Until now this government has not been able to answer and I am quite sure that these cuts were made without any serious analysis, and I think we should blame this government for it. How could this government possibly maintain its credibility when there has been nearly 500,000 young people on unemployment rolls for over a year? And they will tell us all about Bill C-14 when this government has allowed the number of unemployed to reach 1.5 million. We are talking about one million unemployed but 500,000 more are not even registered. As we exceed the one million unemployed level, in the name of spending reduction they go after that category of unemployed who have no other alternative but welfare and I consider that this proposal is inhuman and ill-advised. Of course there has been some abuse in that department and in the administration of the government administration which was unable to identify those abuses soon enough. We will not blame the government because it wants to set things straight, on the contrary.

If the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is really convinced that through these savings he can create 350,000 jobs under the 14 programs he announced—the few assessments that were made do not guarantee that he will reach his objectives—but if the minister is convinced that he can create 350,000 jobs, why did he not implement those programs sooner? And if he can really create 350,000 jobs, Bill C-14 might become useless because that number of job opportunities will reduce the unemployment rate by 30 per cent. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing to prove that the minister will succeed in meeting his objectives and if we base ourselves on the falsehood of the predictions made by the Minister of Finance since he has assumed his present portfolio, we are quite entitled to think that the Minister of Employment and Immigration will not meet his own objectives and that, Mr. Speaker is a troublesome matter. There is also an attempt to win back public confidence.

I stated earlier that little concern was given to those affected when certain cutbacks were unilaterally decided. How can this government regain public confidence when Canadians have not forgotten its position on the sales tax last summer? How can this government gain public confidence after having pledged ten times over to build Place Guy Favreau which is a project which has just been started very recently? How is it possible to trust this government which has implemented a dairy policy which has compelled thousands of milk producers to leave this market, not to mention the fact that it is still refusing indexation?

An hon. Member: It is not true.

Mr. La Salle: No, it is true. Mr. Speaker, a member opposite is telling me that it is not true. Hundreds of milk producers have been compelled to give up production some two years ago because of bad management, bad projections and bad advice on the part of the then minister of agriculture and all members know that. Of course he is careful enough not to try to justify this position. All these factors, Mr. Speaker, can only lead to distrust for this government. Nobody has yet complained on the other side. We are being told that the users of commuter trains in the Montreal area will probably have to pay 50 per cent extra for their daily ticket in order to travel from their homes to their places of employment. Here is a form of penalty because the government allows itself to forecast increases in production costs and wages, yet it will accept without a word of protest an increase of 50 per cent for the users of commuter trains in the Montreal area.

• (2032)

That seems to me a flagrant breach of the guidelines it set for itself. For a long time, Mr. Speaker, we have been perfectly aware that because the federal government kept refusing to write off the deficits of the CNR, that is why the users of commuter trains are going to have to pay an extraordinary increase. And I know that several members are very concerned by that and I simply ask them to exert pressures on their own government so it will come back to reason. This afternoon I heard an hon. member on the government side talk about reducing the age of retirement to 64. He was referring to incentives and services—

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Laval on a point of order.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would accept a question?

Mr. La Salle: No, Mr. Speaker. I know those questions and hon. members opposite had the opportunity to speak on this. And I did not hear the hon. member for Laval rise to blame the minister for the increase I am referring to. That is his business but I am doing so as a Quebecker and I think he should do the same, I think I have to do it—

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Laval on a question of privilege.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I think I am entitled to rise on a question of privilege because when he talks about commuter trains the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) is referring to a jurisdiction that is purely provincial and highly recognized by the Liberal government three years ago and turned down—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must advise the hon. member that the point he is raising is simply a point of debate which he will be able to put before the House in his contribution either later today or tomorrow.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member that the minister responsible told me last week that his officials were still negotiating this issue with the Quebec government and that he himself is still negotiating in order to arrive at some kind of solution. That is why I asked the minister to delay this increase as long as this dispute between the two levels of government remains unsettled. That is all I asked, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Laval is appalled, but there is a certain uneasiness at this time. Just look at the situation on the political front and you will understand the reason for this uneasiness. However, Mr. Speaker, I have the impression that you are soon going to ask me to resume my seat, so I would simply like to conclude by saying that, as far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, that is not the way we intend to achieve national unity. We respect our opponents' positions. We never treat them as enemies simply because they do not think the same way we do, and our aim is not to divide Canadians in two tight clans, but to encourage them, despite their opposite views, to have mutual respect and a common love of the great country that we dream of rebuilding under the wise leadership of our leader, the Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to cover all the aspects in this budget we are debating. What I want to do is to expose an outstanding example of a wasteful program, which, if it were cancelled, as it should, could save Canada and its taxpayers $2 billion at least.

Before I deal with that, however, I want to express a few general comments first. I accept the view put forward by my party that this budget does not adequately stimulate the economy or relieve Canada of its depressed economic conditions. To put the matter another way, unemployment will not improve. Indeed, if the prophesies of the U.S. lack of growth are fulfilled, the situation of unemployment in Canada may become a good deal worse. To my way of thinking, unemployment should have the highest priority of all. It should come first in any sound scheme of values in dealing with the economy. I am not thinking only of the economic waste of 1 million employable Canadians making no contribution to the growth and economic prosperity of the country. I am thinking also of the individuals, many of them in my constituency, who are living and will live frustrated lives, not having employment which is the economic base for individual well-being and a necessity to their sense of identity and success in life. I am thinking particularly of those many Canadian children whose lives may well be stunted by the apparent economic failure of their parents.

Why does the minister, who is clearly a man of compassion and intelligence, accept this situation? I can only attribute it to the devotion of his party to private enterprise. Private enterprise, is not, cannot, and will not do the job or provide the jobs—

[Mr. : No, M.]

An hon. Member: I thought you people were always talking about small business.

Mr. Brewin: —and an industrial strategy in which both private and public enterprise, combined to provide full employment, is essential if we are not to drift on in our present unhappy situation. I have reason to think that the Conservatives would not do any better.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): That is right.

Mr. Brewin: They equally pay obeisance to private business.

However, to get to the main thrust of what I have to say, we all know that we are in a time of stringency and restraint. Above all, waste in government and private expenditures must be ended. It is tragic that the most conspicuous example of such waste is entirely overlooked by the government. I refer to a matter discussed briefly this afternoon when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) made a statement concerning the proposed purchase of 130 to 150 fighter planes. Of course, defence and security are high priorities, but they are not sacrosanct. Defence expenditures must be scrutinized like any other expenditures, and firmly resisted if they are not necessary.

The purchase of these planes, we are told, is to cost roughly $2.3 billion in 1977 dollars. With continued inflation and the decline in the Canadian dollar, I would estimate that at least $3 billion is involved. This is by far the greatest expenditure on armaments made in this country in its history. By far the greatest expenditure is to be on manned interceptors to defend this country against a massive bomber attack by the U.S.S.R. Some part of the total no doubt, will be used for providing cover for ground troops in Europe under the provisions of NATO. Whatever may be said now, it is clear that by far the largest amount is to go to the so-called active North American defence.

I propose to show, Mr. Speaker, that these fighter planes are obsolete in the missile age. The essential task of anyone determining the distribution of defence dollars available is to weigh the importance and necessity of the proposed role for our military forces. The task is to weed out those roles not essential to the security of Canada and the stability of the world. There is ample evidence to suggest that fighter planes are not required on a substantial scale in any intelligent consideration of Canada's role. The reason for this is simple, namely, that the threat of a massive Russian attack by manned bombers is non-existent. The allocation of substantial Canadian funds for fighter planes in North America is an outstanding example of the wrong allocation of roles.

I well remember hearing more than ten years ago, in the parliamentary committee on national defence, two very distinguished Canadian soldiers, General Simonds and General Foulkes, who had risen to the top in active service during the over the world. The need has been suggested in Namibia and in the Middle East; no doubt, other needs will arise. This contributes to the peace of the world, it is something Canada has shown it can do, and it is something we should be prepared to do. We are not against Canada taking a share of responsibility for military commitments, and it is essential that we arm our forces to fulfil these roles. But let us get away from commitment to expenditures that help nobody yet hang a vast debt around the necks of the Canadian people.

All of us are looking at the effects of the cuts that are being made. Many of those cutbacks are painful and unfortunate. We regret the effect they will have on such things as equalization payments, assistance programs, health and medicare. We regret that the cuts affecting the CBC will help destroy the high level of artistic endeavour and quality which has been built up. We object to the CIDA budget being frozen at the expense of those throughout the world who are most in need. We object to the cuts in loans for public housing. We object to the cutting back of forest research stations. There are many acts of this kind, inefficient and selected at random, though some of them are necessary. But let no one say that we in this party did not criticize them and offer alternatives. By all means let us strike out programs and expenditures which we need, to use common parlance, like a hole in the head. The axe must fall, perhaps, but let it fall on what we do not need, on what we could well do without. Let it fall on this unnecessary production of highly sophisticated aircraft whose capability, I believe it is safe to prophesy, will never be used at all. Let us get rid of fantasy and look at the world as it is, making the best contribution we can and minimizing those cutbacks which adversely affect the welfare of the poor, the development of productive resources and the artistic future of this country. Let us use sense about these things and not be swept away by the theory that defence expenditures are sacrosanct. Of course, some are necessary, but none of them are sacrosanct and when we are told by our allies in the United States that the manned bomber is no longer regarded as presenting any considerable risk,—it has been downgraded to almost nothing—why must we go ahead with a project of this kind that we do not need? Is it because we are committed to it, because we do not dare to say no to the military? I believe the military people are wise enough to recognize that it is only when they are doing something worthwhile that they earn the true respect of the people of this country. I hope they will earn that respect. Let us have the guts in our government to say no when no is the obvious answer.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity of taking part in the closing hours of this autumn budget debate—perhaps tonight I should call it a winter budget. I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on a budget which is appropriate and responsible.

● (2102)

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Philbrook: It is nice to hear from one of the new members opposite. His interjection was typical. I point out that I have been attentive and quiet while members of his party have spoken, and I am sure he will afford me the same courtesy. This budget has been called many things in the last few days. It has been called a pro-business budget, and I for one do not apologize for that. I think private business and industry are the most capable of bringing about a healthy economy and a better life for all Canadians.

I would also like to congratulate some of the new members who have spoken in the House. One has been my colleague, the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston). Another has been the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. de Cotret). Both those hon. members made very fine maiden speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: Of course, they were based on their own points of view. I would like to say a word of thanks to the official opposition for recognizing some positive features in this budget. I think that is a step in the right direction.

Political parties still have far to go in that direction, but that recognition is certainly better than nothing.

In my speech tonight I would like to deal with positive public reaction to this budget. I will also deal with some complaints which have come in from my constituency. I want to make a few general remarks on budgets and then deal with the general economic picture which provides a context for this or any other budget. I know that my hon. colleagues opposite will understand and forgive me if I quote some of the positive remarks which have been made in reaction to this budget. The proof of the pudding for any budget is found a few weeks or months down the road, but in the meantime we can learn a great deal from the important sectors of our society. Their reactions are articulate, and they tend to be accepted as non-partisan. For example, Mr. Sam Hughes, executive director of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, said:

> It's a sensible and responsible budget, and he has avoided going political.
> Mr. Chrétien apparently listened to bankers and economists who urged him to refrain from over-stimulating the economy.
>
> He could easily have been much more stimulative but has chosen the more practical route.

A spokesperson for the Canadian Federation of Independent Business said:

> We're delighted. It's a masterful job.
> We're particularly happy with the special 25 per cent research and development tax credit for small businesses.

Mr. William Small, president of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada, said:

> The government's decision to extend for another year the capital cost allowance for multi-residential building construction will be helpful.

Mr. Erik Nilsson, not our distinguished colleague opposite but an economist with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, said:

> It was basically a good budget.
> Chrétien didn't have much leeway, but we're pleased he didn't fly in the face of economic realities and introduce a program of massive stimulation.

The CMA has recommended the R and D incentives and improvements in investment tax credits.

Peter J. Dawes, foreign trade director of the Canadian Importers Association, said:

We are generally pleased and particularly happy with the federal sales tax cut, which we expect our members and the Canadian importing community generally to respond to and pass along with future shipments to Canadian consumers.

That has been a point of concern. He went on to say:

We're pleased to note the minister's reaffirmation of its commitment to General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade negotiations and of course we're delighted that the tariffs remain unchanged for the present.

The commitment referred to was the commitment of the government.

Mr. Reg Ryan, president of the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada, said:

It is important to take an over-all view of what Chrétien was trying to do.

We have to endure some more pain before we get back to the days of low inflation and low interest rates.

It showed some restraint and some stimulation without going too far in either direction.

Mr. Cliff Bulmer, secretary of the Council of Ontario Contractors, said:

It will allow developers to write off the carrying cost of unused land, which may have the effect of encouraging developers to order builders to build because it will keep their costs a bit lower.

Mr. H. J. M. Watson, comptroller, Steel Company of Canada, said:

Chrétien has provided some stimulus, but we as a country have got to bite the bullet a little harder to reduce the deficit.

It will benefit the steel industry from the cut in the sales tax, investment credits, and unemployment insurance cuts.

From my home town of Oakville, Mr. Ron Bennett, president of Ford of Canada, said:

We welcome the reduction in sales tax, and this together with the cumulative effect of the other measures taken, will contribute to a sustained growth in vehicle sales and the economy in general.

Since the budget, we know that both Ford and GM have announced average $150 car price cuts.

Mr. Russell E. Harrison, chairman of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, said:

In view of Canada's complex economic problems, I expect it will be mildly stimulative, which is essential if it results in increased over-all production, through the economic stimulus provided by the appropriate tax reductions.

From the very important province of Ontario, treasurer Frank Miller was reported to be pleased by what he considers a private sector budget, with special incentives for manufacturing industries and positive steps such as the 3 per cent reduction in the federal manufacturing sales tax, added encouragement to research and development and enhanced investment tax credits. Mr. Miller considered this budget a private sector budget. I also mentioned that, and proudly, at the beginning of my speech.

Mr. Miller said that the reduced sales tax and the research and development incentives will make manufacturing more profitable and more attractive to new investment, and that that means the creation of new jobs. He said that the reduced sales tax will make Ontario more competitive with the northern United States.

Several economists reacted in a positive way to the budget. Two were Mr. Douglas Peters, chief economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank and Mr. Ben Gestrin of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Judith Maxwell, who I believe is no stranger to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), endorsed the budget and said:

He has used all the room that's available to him to stimulate the economy.

That is a remark with which we agree, but it is sometimes greeted with strange reactions when we say it. Economic investment houses like Pitfield, Mackay, Ross and Nesbitt, Thomson, Bongard saw other things in this budget, according to their comments. One comment was that costs and inflation will be relieved by tax cuts and unemployment insurance reductions. Another was that investment and manufacturing expansion will be aided by the investment tax credits.

Another was that it is difficult to affect unemployment directly overnight. Another was that expansion is up to Germany and Japan, not Canada.

There has been some favourable reaction from the general media. Mr. W. A. Wilson of the Ottawa Journal, a distinguished journalist and political analyst, reflected on the budget.

Mr. Friesen: A good friend.

Mr. Philbrook: The Ottawa Journal is not usually considered a Liberal newspaper. With regard to restraint, Mr. Wilson said:

The budget's tax changes can be defended in good conscience.

He acted with restraint and despite all the howls of disappointment that have followed, a large increase in the deficit would have been contrary to the public interest.

On inflation he said:

There has been some post-budget scepticism about Mr. Chrétien's optimism over inflation, but he is by no means alone in this outlook.

On growth, Mr. Wilson said:

The problem of estimating next year's growth with any accuracy is, however, complex and difficult because conditions in this country will inevitably be affected by American developments.

Coming from Mr. Wilson, it is hard to interpret that as an alibi. On stimulation he said:

The budget contains other devices aimed at stimulating investment so the government's emphasis remains what it must be: that an increase in business investment is essential to this country's health.

I emphasize the word "remains".

In the latest edition of Maclean's magazine, Ian Urquart covered essentially what the minister covered. He said:

On the evidence of the first day following the budget, he won that gamble as the dollar did not merely hold its own, but actually picked up a bit.

Its value rose to above 85 cents American. How did he do this? According to Ian Urquart:

war, stating that a manned U.S.S.R. bomber over North America would only be possible if the Russians were crazy. They said, that of course, this is not the case.

As I said, we live in a missile age. A manned bomber attack would involve a couple of hours' transport from bases in Europe or the U.S.S.R. to North America. The important thing is the means of detection. If the attack were detected a matter of hours before it actually happened, targets in the American strategic arsenal would be removed and the defence prepared. Suppose, however, that the Russians did attempt a first strike. They have not now, and are not likely to have in the near future, the means of destroying the American retaliatory power. Swift retribution destroying the U.S.S.R. as a civilized community would follow even a successful first strike. A first strike capability cannot prevent a retaliatory attack in which all the cities of the U.S.S.R., and the strategic bases would be wiped out. This has been recognized both in the United States and the U.S.S.R.

Brian Cuthbertson, writing in "Canadian Military Independence in the Age of the Superpower," published in Toronto in 1977, says, at page 81:

—it appears fairly certain that Soviet strategy sees only a small role for the long-range bomber and for the U.S. anti-bomber defence has become a strategically redundant role.

That is really saying in round-about language what I have been trying to say. It is a waste of money because it has no purpose from the military point of view. He goes on to say that the United States plans to reduce its present 405 interceptors to 212 F-106s by the mid-1980s. At page 87, he refers to the strategic redundancy of anti-bomber defence.

● (2042)

Mr. James Schlesinger, who was the United States Secretary for Defence, visited Ottawa in September, 1975. That was for the express purpose of consulting about Canada's role in the alliance. He saw the then minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson), and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

According to the report which I have, dated September 27, 1975, he played down the Soviet bomb threat and urged Canada instead to beef up its forces and equipment in Europe. To use his own words, well equipped ground forces in Europe would be the most illustrious contribution Canada could make to western security.

In 1977, Mr. Cuthbertson wrote about the weaknesses of NORAD in the following words. He referred to the vulnerability of its installation to destruction by missiles, its poor capability in the detection of low level flights and lack of capability against bombers launching missiles outside the interceptor range.

These circumstances demonstrate that the defence of North America depends upon maintenance by the United States of a retaliatory force, either in fixed sites, ICBMs, which may become vulnerable—they have not yet, but they may—or in submarines equipped with missiles which are not now, and are not likely in the foreseeable future, to become vulnerable. This submarine-based force exists and is not likely to be substantially reduced by technical changes for many years to come.

It is suggested by some that the Russian development of the backfire bomber has changed all this. The Russians presently have 50 backfire bombers in commission, according to the International Institute of Strategic Studies Military Balance for 1978-79. That is not a great many.

They lack intercontinental range, but with a compatible tanker force can be refueled in flight. It would not be correct or fair to say they could not reach North America directly. They are also capable of flying below radar detection. Cuthbertson suggests that when employed with a tanker force, they would have a "peripheral role". However that may be, there are two main defences: the first is the same as the defence against any manned bomber, namely the impossibility of destroying an effective retaliatory force and therefore the assurance that the use of such bombers would provoke a retaliation which would destroy the U.S.S.R. as a functioning society. The second is that efforts could be made to improve the detection capacity of defence forces in North America.

It is sometimes said that Canada's commitments under NORAD, while strategically useless, are justifiable on political grounds. When this question of the political grounds is pressed, it appears that the political ground is the view that the United States desires the continuing of NORAD and of the Canadian contribution to a fighter anti-bomber.

There is no evidence to support this. Indeed, the view expressed by Mr. Schlesinger is exactly the opposite of this, as is the down-grading of the American interceptors to a secondary role.

When pressed for positive evidence, neither the former minister of National Defence nor the present President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who was then Secretary of State for External Affairs, could give any basis whatever for their statement that the United States was anxious that the NORAD arrangement be continued. Indeed, the former minister of National Defence in the committee on external affairs, said that his belief was based on a conversation with an unnamed person at NATO and was not supported by any documents or evidence whatsoever. The same is true of the similar claim asserted by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, now President of Privy Council. It would indeed be a strange surrender of Canadian judgment if we were to be governed in our views of policy by a non-existent, non-proven political view that the United States desired Canada to maintain this role, in view of their own actions and their own words and the clear indication that an anti-bomber is strategically redundant in their eyes.

It is to be noted that I have concentrated my remarks on the defence of North America and not on the need for air protection for our troops committed under NATO in Europe. We, in this party, fully recognize that whatever we may think of NATO, Canada is committed and Canadian troops are committed to that theatre. We must give them all necessary support. However, it does not appear that what is needed to strengthen NATO is a provision of sophisticated fighters by Canada. Indeed, Mr. Schlesinger's statement, which I quoted, is to the contrary.

One could only wish that Canadian military plans were not based upon obsolete and outmoded concepts, but upon new developments. There are highly important new developments taking place in military concepts and weaponry which affect NATO and Canada. I refer to the "smart" bombs, which is a nickname for what are more accurately described as precision guided weapons, which use lasers to secure an infinitely more accurate means of hitting targets, promise revolutionary changes. Throughout the course of military history, very few weapons actually hit the targets. These new precision-guided weapons will, in fact, hit the targets.

They can be used with light portable weapons with greater accuracy and are effective anti-tank and anti-battlefield aircraft weapons. They enhance defence and strengthen the position of smaller powers.

There is still much development required before "smart" bombs are in general use but they promise the strengthening of defence, and such defensive alliances as NATO making more important the individual contribution of trained men. They may indeed represent a sharpening of the distinction between nuclear and non-nuclear weapons.

Haziness of distinction in this field is one of the greater dangers of war developing into an all-out nuclear holocaust. It would be a happy change if proposals for Canadian expenditures were imaginative and looked forward, rather than proposing the substitution in obsolete roles of more obsolete weaponry.

In the Scientific American of October, 1978, there is an interesting discussion on precision-guided weapons, and there is an Adelphi Paper published by the Institute of Strategic Studies in 1975 by James Digby of the Rand Corporation spelling out in some detail the implications of the PGM.

There is one good ground for questioning the proposed expenditure on the acquisition of fighter interceptor plans, and that is that it has never been clearly explained. The whole process of seeking these replacements has been shrouded in secrecy. It is not enough for the Minister of National Defence to say that these planes contribute to our national security. Such a statement begs the question. Nor can it be said that they are demanded by our commitment to NORAD or NATO. Both of these treaties leave to individual member countries the decision as to the nature of their contribution.

In the debate in the United States Senate on the neutron bomb, Senator Clark set out the Senate approach as follows:

> Any program with respect to nuclear armaments shall include a complete statement analysing the impact. The requirement of an arms impact statement is fully justified for it demands of the executive a thoughtful and reasoned analysis of the over-all significance of the weapon under consideration.

● (2052)

Senator Clark added:

> The requirements of the law are clear; before we appropriate money for a system, we must know what the system will do; we must have this statement; the lack of this alone justifies withholding Senate approval at this time.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Not only has this House not received any such impact statement related to these proposed purchases, but we are told a new white paper on defence is on the way. If I understood the minister today, they are too busy at present to get out a white paper, so what we are doing is this—we are putting the cart before the horse, we are getting the weapons and then deciding on a policy to fit them, rather than deciding on a policy and then acquiring the necessary equipment. So the minister is doing precisely the reverse of what he should be doing. The minister emphasized the advantages to Canada of providing "offsets" by the employment of Canadian resources and the development of Canadian technology. Others will no doubt do the same thing. This, it is said, will be followed by other advantages. Offsets are the amounts of money which will be spent by those who sell the planes to employ Canadian labour and technology. This is supposed to provide considerable advances in Canadian technology. The argument is without substantiation. At the present time the aircraft industry is extremely buoyant and the effects of further purchases in this field will be highly inflationary.

There is a very good article by Mr. Sheppard, the Executive Director for the Science Council, which appeared in the Globe and Mail of October 2, in the course of which the author stated:

> The answer ought to lie in the transfer to other sectors of Canadian industry, technologies critical to our future competitiveness in commercial markets, for instance in energy products, automobile parts, communications equipment, transportation and computer equipment.

We are not objecting to spending money on improving Canadian technology. What we wonder is whether it is necessary to improve technology to supply weapons systems to countries which are already, in the global insanity of the day, spending $400 billion a year on armaments which, if they were ever used, would destroy us all and which, if they are not used, will suck up the resources, both material and monetary, of the whole world so that the pressing problems of mankind cannot be met. There is no need for us to contribute to this madness. My plea to the government has nothing to do with a choice between various suppliers of aircraft. We do not care whether there are three, four or ten possible suppliers. My plea is that we look carefully at the question of the basic need for what we would be committing ourselves to buying if the government goes through with its plan.

The first decision to be made is whether we should proceed with the purchase of fighter planes at all. I know there have been verbal commitments, that promises have been made, that there have been talks about all this, but there is no firm commitment at the moment, there is still room for the government to use a little common sense and change its attitude toward the whole thing. There are many roles of great importance that Canada has to play in the military field. One of them, of course, is the protection of our sovereignty by providing surveillance of our air space. Another is to build the naval craft necessary to protect our sovereignty over our territorial waters and, incidentally, to protect our fishing industry from depredation by fishermen of other countries. Lastly, there is a continuing need for Canada to supply peacekeeping forces all

He cut both the prices and taxes, and plugged loopholes. Chrétien decided to hang tough rather than give in to opposition demands for deductibility of mortgage interest payments, massive spending on housing and transportation, or any vote-grabbing gimmickery.

Something even bigger is happening for manufacturing, the government's industrial strategy program through the federal-provincial conferences.

The GATT meetings also have an important bearing.

Now we are starting to get the general background to this budget. In the Financial Times it was said that this is a "non-political budget" and, to its credit, "not dramatically stimulative." It goes on to say:

But a major upturn is just around the corner. Let the recovery take place of its own momentum, helping it along very gently, and not attempting any measures that might diminish business confidence or put increased pressure on the dollar.

Chrétien and his advisers are pinning their main hopes for improved performance on forces already at play in the economy; the devalued dollar, controlled labour costs and increased corporate investment plans.

One of the key aspects of this budget is the background economy against which it is set. The Financial Times describes two reasons for the budget at this time as it plays its small part in the whole economic picture. They are, first, an accounting of the August announcements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and, secondly, some useful measures which are better than nothing.

In terms of positive community reaction, it has come from the various business associations, such as the chamber, small business, CFIB, the CMA, and the CIA. We have had a positive reaction from the area of construction and housing such as HUDAC, the mortgage associations and the Ontario Construction Association. Other positive reactions have come from such sectors of our economy as steel, Stelco; automobile manufacturers, such as Ford, and banks, such as the Bank of Commerce and the Toronto-Dominion Bank. There has also been a good reaction from some of the provinces, including my home province, Ontario, one of the key provinces in our economy. We have had good reactions from various economists and from the media. It is a fair cross section of the Canadian community.

There are always complaints. There are two or three areas where I would like to see improvements, and I would like to mention them, in the hope that the government will perhaps take a look at them to see if something can be done. One area was mentioned earlier today, that is automobile sales. Many automobile dealers are stuck with cars on their lots which will be more expensive than the new ones because they were purchased before the manufacturers' sales tax was reduced from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. Perhaps it could be written off as the luck of the game, because we did not hear from the car dealers in the spring when the provincial sales tax cut took place. We heard from the consumers then because they were the ones who lost out by buying one day early. However, it amounts to a lot of money to these dealers, and apparently there are precedents where the government has provided rebates, I believe, in the years 1958 and 1974.

There is also concern in the area of personal service corporations. Here the special rate of tax was provided for small businesses in manufacturing, not services. It was provided for small Canadian businesses competing against large foreign owned ones. It does not apply to athletes or entertainers who have incorporated and have had the advantage of low tax rates. However, there are concerns from people providing services who are incorporated, such as people in consulting, various kinds of management services, and perhaps development services. People in these areas can put up the argument that they are providing something valuable for the country and the economy. Certainly they are providing employment which may be reduced if they have to scrap their small corporation. Perhaps we have cast the net a bit too wide and some adjustment could be made there.

Another area of concern, a matter which is held over from the April budget, is the area of RRSPs. The minister was good enough to take care of the problem of child dependants whose father and mother are killed at the same time. According to the information I have received, there still remains the problem of widows who are under age 60 who cannot afford to transfer their husband's RRSP into some other plan or annuity upon his death. These widows need the cash to live, but they cannot afford to pay income tax on it. They are in a very poor financial situation, and it is aggravated when they see civil servants able to retire at an unusually young age. The widow, however, is held to age 60 on this particular benefit.

One of the difficulties for the public is understanding budgets. I think that the media provides good coverage for the public if they will use it and refer to post budget developments to point out adjustments which should be made. The limitation of a budget is that it is supposed to provide a few specific changes, but things do vary from time to time, and it may not necessarily be the same type of thing each time. For example, in one case it may have an effect on the general economy through what economists call macroeconomics, and at another time it may be individual benefits or microeconomics. In some cases it can even be a combination of both.

It is all part of the ongoing process built up through previous budgets and other major programs which influence the economy. For example, perhaps even more important than this budget, are the GATT negotiations presently going on in Europe which will affect our trade for a long time to come and have an effect on all levels of government. Another influence would be federal-provincial conferences, such as the one coming up. It is an important area of industrial strategy. I think all parties agree that it would be beneficial to have an industrial strategy. The only question is, how do we get there? I think at the present time there are some very exciting happenings which are the outcome of our federal-provincial conference on the economy. We had one in February and another one is coming up soon.

● (2122)

One of the main programs coming from that conference was a study of our industry and a positive basis for long-range planning. It was a study, in the first instance, of 23 sectors of the economy, and leading from that, there was a more select group which produced the so-called "Tier 2" report. This is one of the most exciting and important developments of our time. I hope it will produce concrete results that we can all support.

I spoke last week at a conference in this regard and found that the people there, our fellow Canadians, were tuned into the subject and looking forward to things happening. We have something very worthwhile on which to work in this regard and we will see more come from that in the next week or so, right here in Ottawa.

Finally, as I said, I think sometimes that a budget can be disappointing as a result of it being overrated. It may be important in itself but when thought of in terms of being a panacea for everything, including our economic concerns particularly, it may be disappointing because it is cast in the wrong role.

There is a great deal going on at the present time and a more general positive economic outlook developing. We have seen many positive economic statements regarding the near future made by people such as Mr. Earle McLaughlin, chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada, and Mr. Andrew Kniewasser of the Investment Dealers' Association of Canada. He spoke here in Ottawa recently, claiming that the 1980s will be the best decade in Canadian history. This was documented by John Bullock, the head of the small businesses group, CFIB. We have seen positive results from the new computer wonder, Trendicator of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, as well as from statements in the Financial Times to the effect that the 1980s will see a return to economic stability. I hope that is the case. There have been many other positive reports, such as the one in the Globe and Mail which said that a nationwide gain will be seen for domestic growth in 1979. We have seen all of these generally positive predictions for the near future in respect of the Canadian economy.

Certain writers, like Jack McArthur and Anthony Westell of the Toronto Star, and James Reston of the New York Times, have been pleading for people to look on the brighter side, and questioning the gloom and doom which has been with us for far too long.

There are other more specific signs of better days ahead. For example, after tax profits have been reported to be up by 31.9 per cent in the third quarter of this year; the August consumer price index was up only 0.1 per cent, the smallest rise since 1975; consumer buying and confidence is reported to be up, according to the Conference Board; there is no surge in wages in major contracts this year; higher production and employment is predicted for 1979 by the Conference Board; farm cash receipts jumped 14.3 per cent in the past year; and there is a general belief that the lower dollar means more jobs, and that it is working, in fact, in terms of increased trade, increased exports and increased industrial activity.

In terms of the important area of business expansion, there has been more investment, more expansion and more production. Recently we had the very good news that business spending in this country will probably double next year to a rate of increase of 16.2 per cent, and also that next year United States companies intend to increase their investment in Canada. We have heard the news that manufacturers expect production levels to increase in the fourth quarter. In addition to generally improved economic outlook and plans for expansion, there is this important area of trade which, as I just said, has been undoubtedly stimulated by our lower dollar, and the predictions in this regard also are good.

Our trade surplus may be as high as $4 billion this year, up again, and apparently our trade performance for next year would indicate a bright picture. Again, in a general way, predictions for the 1980s indicate that our trading position will strengthen.

We have a reasonable budget here, and again I believe the minister deserves credit. The budget should be seen in perspective for what it is and what it cannot be. It should be seen against the background of a great deal of other economic events and activities which will make a very positive difference for this country.

In concluding may I say that I know everyone would wish the same as I do, namely that the federal-provincial economic conference coming up in the next week will be very successful and will provide another step forward, just as I believe this budget has. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I recognize now the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. Crosby) and I should like to remind hon. members that this is that hon. member's maiden speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege for me to participate in this budget debate and, with your indulgence, I shall make some remarks of a more general character relating to the economic state of the nation.

First, let me express to you the compliments and good wishes of the people of Halifax-East Hants, and may I ask that you express my greetings and best wishes to His Excellency, the Governor General, and his lady.

It is not difficult to bring to this assembly the views of my constituents on our economic problems. Time and time again during the recent by-election campaign the concern of the people for the financial and fiscal future of this country was brought forcefully and emphatically to my attention. Make no mistake about it, the state of the economy is the number one issue in Halifax-East Hants, and I suspect it is the number one issue in the great majority of constituencies across this country.

In rising to speak in this chamber, hon. members may be interested to know that I follow belatedly in the footsteps of my grandfather. He was elected to this House over 70 years ago along with Sir Robert Borden as a dual member for Halifax.

Before making some remarks on the subject of the economy and other aspects of the budget I should like to comment very briefly on my constituency and on some of those who have represented Halifax-East Hants and Nova Scotia in this chamber and elsewhere.

All hon. members of this House are well aware of the importance of the contribution made by yourself and your confreres in the chair. As it happens, the hon. member whom I have succeeded has made the same important contribution as Deputy Speaker. In addition, for many years he served his constituents and all Nova Scotians in parliament in matters of special concern to them. Judge Robert McCleave, whom I succeed, was a long-time member of this House and an articulate and effective representative. It is apparent he was as much admired in this chamber as he was in Halifax-East Hants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: Let me record the admiration I hold for Judge McCleave. I know the same sentiment is held by all his former constituents.

I would like to mention how honoured I feel at taking my seat in this House in the presence of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Again I want to record the respect and admiration I hold for those hon. gentlemen. I was engaged in the public service of Nova Scotia during the early years of the administration of that province by the former Leader of the Opposition. Recently he celebrated his 30th year in government and in public service. Not only Nova Scotians, but all Canadians have benefited from his dedicated service over the years as premier of Nova Scotia and as the national leader of the official opposition. The reverence and respect with which the right hon. member for Prince Albert is held by Nova Scotians has not diminished in the years since he first held office as prime minister. When the right hon. member speaks, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that Nova Scotians listen and will continue to listen.

My references to Nova Scotia prompt me to mention that we now have in the province a new administration. The new government, headed by Premier John Buchanan, took office in October of this year. I have said on many occasions, and I repeat in this House, that Premier Buchanan will follow in the footsteps of the right hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) in providing leadership that is responsible and that is concerned. That is what I believe all Canadians expect of government today: they expect responsibility in the management of the nation's financial matters, responsibility in the administration of the affairs of state, and they expect those who govern to be concerned with the lives and the legitimate pursuits of all Canadians.

And so we should ask ourselves whether and to what extent the government and hon. members opposite have demonstrated responsibility and concern in this budget and in the other affairs of government. First, my thoughts extend not only to the constituency that I represent, but to my province and the Atlantic region as well as to Canada. It is a fact well known, and often recorded in the debates in this House, that Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada have not prospered in the passage of time since confederation. Nonetheless, the loyalty of the Atlantic people to confederation and to the sovereign lady who heads our state is unwavering and undiminished. Our loyalty will continue, whatever events the future holds. We are proud to be Nova Scotians, but we are equally proud to be Canadians, and we will never change. There is no support in my area for any policy or stratagem for our nation that does not embrace one Canada and our sovereign, the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: Nonetheless, Mr. Speaker, the economic forces that are present in our confederation demand review and reassessment. Halifax-East Hants, like many areas of Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada, does not have an assured economic base. This leads to an economic psychology in which hope for the future is often drowned in despair.

Historically, Canada has developed into regions which have been differently defined, but always on the basis of provincial boundaries. Over the past number of years, those who attempted to define the regions of Canada nearly always join the four most easterly provinces as the Atlantic region. Regardless of the measure used to determine the economic state of the regions, be it per capita income, employment or unemployment, or population and growth, the Atlantic region always comes out at the bottom of the scale. Needless to say, Ontario always comes out on top, although the areas to the west now challenge the economic superiority of central Canada.

What has developed from a comparison of the regions of Canada, however defined and whatever the measurement device, is the concept of regional disparity. What is more important is the question whether the federal government and the provincial administrations will recognize that we must move from a state of economic disparity to a state of economic equality.

The movement from disparity to equality is not an easy goal to reach. Some would regard it as improbable, if not impossible. To date, despite federal programs and provincial cooperation, there is no real evidence of progress toward economic equality across Canada in income, employment or opportunity.

Many knowledgeable people, particularly in the academic field, will contend that unless we resolve the problem of regional economic disparity and create equality in Canada, we will live with the possibility of national disintegration. I for one do not believe that this nation will disintegrate for economic or any other reasons, but I do believe the spirit of Canada can be so adversely affected by our economic state that, while we will not die as a nation, we will not obtain the quality of national life that we ought to enjoy as Canadians.

While all hon. members are bombarded on a daily basis with statistics respecting income levels, unemployment rates and other economic indicators, I think, Mr. Speaker, you will permit me to remind you that residents of Atlantic Canada suffer an income level not much more than half the income level in Ontario. And the rate of unemployment in some provinces is twice that of provinces with high levels of employment.

National unity has become a key phrase to support a great rush of government sponsored activities. Expensive brochures and materials are dealt out to schools, exchange visits are arranged, programs are erected and disbanded, new policies are formulated and then abandoned, institutions are established and then collapsed, services are implemented and then terminated—all in the name of national unity.

If there is a real concern, Mr. Speaker, with national unity, and if there is a real belief in the danger of national disintegration, then I believe the government should sponsor and implement a national assault on disparities of income and employment. These differences arise out of the structure and history of the Canadian economy and have led to the regional disparity suffered by Atlantic Canada.

If we cannot have an all-out national assault on regional disparity, then at least we can have a national strategy designed to reduce, if not to eliminate, those disparities in income, employment and opportunity. We cannot simply redistribute existing economic activity. Transfer payments and grants are not enough.

Any national strategy must locate and foster new opportunities, new sources of capital and new entrepreneurs. We must combine our strength in natural resources with capital investment and managerial and technical capability. The new strategy must embrace a new natural resource policy, a research and development program, and public support for enterprise that will create consumer products from our resources.

There is nothing, Mr. Speaker, in the budget that even remotely indicates a move toward a new national strategy designed to eliminate the disparities that exist between the regions of Canada. In fact, we have been told that the transfer payments intended to equalize services or correct deficiences will be reduced. In the result, Atlantic Canada cannot look to the future with great expectations of a changing economy, and that is my first and foremost criticism of the budget. I will not even mention, Mr. Speaker, the failure adequately to support the revitalized fishing industry, because I know my colleague from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) will speak to that.

I mentioned my grandfather and the fact that he was a member of this House. I should mention that he also held a seat in the other place for several years. I was interested in what he might have said during his term in office, possibly in the hope that he might have uttered something more profound that I am likely to offer. In reviewing the debates of more than 50 years ago, I was struck by the timelessness of the interchange. While I found nothing especially profound or prophetic, I discovered that the matter of national unity was, then as now, the preoccupation of many. What my grandfather said on this matter over 60 years ago is a very simple statement but is still apt today. He said, that the great trouble we have in this country is misunderstanding, that we do not know each other well enough, that we do not mix and that we do not get together.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that good faith, common sense and mutual respect can resolve the differences between us once we know and understand the problem. In this as in all other matters government must be fair but it must be firm.

My second area of concern in relation to the budget and economic matters is the plight of the young persons in my constituency and in my province. Mr. Speaker, there is no greater despair in a nation that embraces the work ethic than to enter the employment market for the first time and find no job waiting.

The many universities, technical institutes and other educational facilities in Nova Scotia train and graduate an increasingly larger number of young people qualified in professions, technical occupations and trades. These young Nova Scotians cannot put education and training to use in their home province or elsewhere in Atlantic Canada. It is not uncommon for university graduates to work as waiters and waitresses or as sales clerks.

You will not convince these young people there are no solutions to these problems. They believe, and I believe, that a greater effort can—and must—be made. It is prudent to warn those who do not regard the legitimate demands of our young people that about one-third of the voters at the next general election will be in the 18 to 25 age bracket.

While age and experience have a value that is recognized by all, youth and enthusiasm cannot be discounted as a national asset. It is trite to say that the future of this nation is in the hands of the young people, but how many listen to their demands? I suspect those who do not listen to the young will not survive to govern the people.

What does the standard of living enjoyed by most Canadians embrace? I heard hon. members opposite and other supporters of the government decry and debase the proposal to permit tax relief for mortgage interest payments. They say this is pandering to the rich. They say we are neglecting the poor people and the less fortunate, that their numbers are so great they will rise up and strike us down.

I cannot speak for the great constituencies in central Canada in which home ownership is apparently reserved for the rich and powerful, but I can say this for myself and for my constituency—I believe, and have always believed, that every working Canadian should have the opportunity and the financial capability to acquire, in his or her lifetime, some form of home ownership. I believe that the national government should, to the extent possible, assist Canadians in reaching that goal.

While I am on the subject of young people and young Canadians, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I was one of those who sat in the House and listened to the remarks of the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott) in defence of the budget. What he said, Mr. Speaker, is recorded in Hansard but I take his point to be that the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), in his opinion, is too young, too youthful, a mere child, and not of sufficient status to form a government. Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition will be 40 next June. I can say from my personal experience and observation, being beyond that milestone, that the law of diminishing returns sets in well before that date. With the greatest respect to the hon. minister, I can think of no better age for a person to take over the office of prime minister than the magic mark of 40.

Mr. Speaker, I had the honour in Nova Scotia of establishing the first province-wide legal aid program. I did so with the help and support of a dedicated group of young lawyers who were full-time employees of the program.

My experience with those young people taught me many things but, most important, it taught me this: the young people of my province and of Canada are ready, willing and able to respond to the challenges of the day. The hon. member opposite will never convince me a man of forty is too young to govern.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to describe to hon. members very briefly my constituency of Halifax-East Hants so that I may describe the budget and the performance of the government from that perspective. The Halifax county portion of the new constituency contains two of the fastest growing communities in Nova Scotia; I refer to Sackville and to Bedford. The residents of these communities have shown active and dedicated interest in the development of their areas. Before much more time passes, I expect that these communities will attain town status and may even become cities. In any event, because of the dedication and work of those concerned citizens in each community, I know these areas will become models of good urban development. Certainly, I will do all I can to assist them.

There are other equally progressive communities in my constituency which stretches from the Atlantic ocean near the famed Peggy's Cove to Cobequid Bay on the Fundy Shore. We have typical Nova Scotian rural life in East Hants county and we have the finest of residential suburbs in the city of Halifax area. I am proud to say that the new premier of Nova Scotia is an elector in Halifax-East Hants. I know the support I received from his provincial constituency of Halifax-Atlantic, and I want to record my thanks to the residents of that area and to all the electors of Halifax-East Hants for electing me as their parliamentary representative.

I have spoken, Mr. Speaker, of problems of regional disparity and their resolution and I mentioned my special concern for and interest in the young people of Canada. For my own constituency, let me say this: this budget offers nothing new and nothing progressive and nothing that will change our situation.

The tax benefits are not the kind that will filter down to the market place in such a way that economic activity will be generated. In terms of buying power, the amounts involved will not alter the life-style which already is below the standard of the national average. I believe the gulf will be widened rather than reduced.

What we require, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, is a national strategy and a national assault on disparity. Failing that, we, in the Atlantic region, require more direct aid and assistance. It might be said that this kind of help is available through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. As many know, DREE is the successor to a long line of government institutions designed to help the maritimes. I well remember the great hopes we had for the Atlantic Development Board. Unlike that misadventure, I think DREE, as a legitimate department of the government, can help.

It must be remembered that government departments are designed to perform functions. DREE's activity is geographical—it cannot assist the areas it is intended to aid if functional decisions are made in the Department of Transport, the Department of Public Works, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other departments which destroy the programs designed to benefit deprived regions. Dree must be given a better foundation and a stronger voice in government decision-making if it expects to accomplish its aims. There is no evidence that the government intends to change its ways in that regard.

Hon. members opposite may say: you want us to cut back on government spending and yet provide assistance to your region. Can that be done, Mr. Speaker? I say it can.

First, you must cut back on government spending in functional areas and in regions where it is not essential to generate activity. You cannot cut spending in the Atlantic region because you will end up spending more on welfare and unproductive benefits than you save on cuts.

● (2152)

Second, one must examine the kind of expenditures that are being made and assess the economic value of the expense. There is no member of this House, and, I suspect, not one Canadian, who cannot catalogue many items of unnecessary and useless government spending. If these funds were redirected to economic development, the Atlantic area would prosper.

I am not forgetting the vast amounts required for Petro-Canada, Nordair and other ventures.

I do not want to end on a pessimistic note. There is hope for Halifax-East Hants and Atlantic Canada. That hope is a new government which will look more kindly on us and move to correct the imbalance and disparity which now exists.

I said earlier, the Leader of the Opposition will celebrate his fortieth birthday on June 5, 1979. If our electors give him a proper birthday present and allow him to form the new government, I am sure he will respond to the needs of our people with responsibility and concern.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Just before we proceed, I believe there may be some disposition for us to continue beyond the ten o'clock hour and have two additional speakers, namely, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) and the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley). In the process, we would forgo the normal late show.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, yes, there has been agreement in the House that we would allow time to speak to the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) and also the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley). We would hope to adjourn at 20 minutes to 12 a.m.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, there is a slight correction to the hon. member's statement. I am sure the hope would be that these speeches would each be of approximately 20 minutes' duration, and that will take us to about 25 to 11.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The suggestion is before the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. Crosby) on his maiden speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pelletier: Being a native maritimer from New Brunswick, I would also like to tell the hon. gentleman that I have studied at St. Francis Xavier University in his province. I subscribe completely to what he said about youth and about the maritime provinces, although I do not share his last few words concerning this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the budget speech like the Speech from the Throne gives us a chance to discuss matters that we cannot deal with when legislation comes before this House since we are then restricted to the specific subject matter of the bill introduced in the House. I would like to avail myself of the few minutes I am allotted today to tell my colleagues about a problem which faces the Sherbrooke area, which I have the honour of representing here. I would like to deal with the controversial question of relocation, that is the federal government plan to relocate in Sherbrooke the mapping branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. This was announced a year ago and until now the negotiations have not led to any positive results. But before that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the textile situation in the Eastern Townships since this industry was and still is the most important of the area in terms of employment.

The situation of the textile industry has never been more encouraging in the last ten years that it is now. The action taken by the Canadian government in November, 1976, to redress an unbearable situation which had been denounced by union, labour and industry has yielded positive results. The government has agreed to implement the recommendations and proposals made by the Canadian Textile and Clothing Board as well as the corrective measures proposed by some members in the House, such as the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard), the hon. member for Gamelin (Mr. Portelance) and the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier). The devaluation of the Canadian dollar has also contributed to the recovery of the textile industry. The Quebec government's sales tax cut on clothing was also instrumental in bringing about an improvement in this area. There are of course a few sectors in the textile industry which will need special attention over the next few months. These sectors are a little softer than others which we have improved to a large extent by implementing the measures we announced in November, 1976.

Last year, negotiations between Canada and seven of the major textile exporters have led to the signing of renegotiable five year agreements. All these developments have contributed to a large extent to the recovery of the textile industry. To put it in a nutshell, at the present time, the textile industry is in excellent shape in the eastern townships, the province of Quebec as a whole and Canada in general. We can say that the industry is expanding and it is important to mention it, Mr. Speaker, because the area I represent, in spite of commendable efforts at industrial reorganization, is still a region where soft sectors predominate, which makes the whole area of the Eastern Townships and more particularly Sherbrooke very sensitive to adverse economic conditions This prompts me to deal with the problem of decentralization, that is the mapping branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Five years ago, the federal government decided to decentralize some departments which could easily function outside the federal capital. In Quebec and this criticism has often originated with provincial members, organizations and even governments—the federal government has often been blamed for centralizing everything in the national capital, while some of the services could very well have been operated normally in other areas of the country. That is why the federal government has been led to consider the possibility of relocating several of its agencies or departments in the provinces. In this process, Sherbrooke was elected to receive a complete section of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the mapping branch, and on October 3, 1977, the then solicitor general, the hon. Francis Fox, announced in a press conference that he was advising Sherbrooke of the official decision made by the Canadian government to decentralize that department, and relocate the mapping branch in the eastern townships.

In August 1974, the cabinet asked the Treasury Board to examine in detail the removal of public services and the decentralization of certain departments. The cabinet ministers thought that if it was well executed such a specific program could promote the federal policy of national unity, regional economic development, balanced urban growth and better services for Canadians.

In May 1975, the then president of the Treasury Board, the hon. Jean Chrétien, was asked to develop a program and to designate the groups of civil servants in the national capital area and of the large urban centres in Canada who could be transferred. The main objectives of the Government of Canada were first, to bring the administration of federal programs closer to those directly concerned; secondly, to help slow growth and high unemployment areas; thirdly, to make the federal administration more conspicuous in the communities where it was not much felt and, where activities related to the country as a whole can contribute to maintain national unity; and finally, to reduce the undue concentration of civil servants in the national capital area.

In Canada, the federal public service is mostly concentrated in the national capital area, where are found more than 30 per cent of the federal civil servants, that is more than 75,000 people. Such concentration is much higher than in other confederations, in the United States, for example, where only about 12 per cent of the federal employees work in the area of Washington D.C. The total capital expenditures required by the government for the decentralization program will amount to some $200 million. This will not require additional expenditures, since most of these are charged against the normal construction budget of the Department of Public Works.

The capital expenditures related to the decentralization will obviously benefit the communities, where these services will be established way before the actual move. In many cases new buildings will have to be built, and it is estimated this will directly create some 4,000 man-years of employment in related sectors. The re-establishment and the decentralization will also contribute to promote the government policy as regards regional economic expansion and balanced urban growth. The federal government's decentralization efforts in the last few years have already produced concrete results. For example, Northern Transportation Company Limited headquarters, were moved to Edmonton, Petro-Canada headquarters, to Calgary, the Royal Mint to Winnipeg, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion's activities and services, were divided between four areas and established within the provinces, only the headquarters remaining in the national capital.

We all know that 24 Canadian cities have been selected by the federal government to receive these transfers. Six cities have been chosen in Quebec, and Sherbrooke is one of them. The projects in Matane and Shawinigan are already operating. I am told that a week or so ago tenders were called for excavation works at Jonquière. The cargography service of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has been selected to move in Sherbrooke, and on October 3, 1977, the federal government announced its intention to proceed, by 1983, the target date for official opening, with the moving of over 750 public servants and their families to Sherbrooke in the eastern townships.

The surveying and mapping branch is the Canadian government organization responsible for basic mapping in Canada. Its major programs include grids for geodesic control surveys, the topographical maps in the National Atlas and the aeronautical maps. The maintenance of the international border and the surveying of Canadian lands are other major activities of that branch. The surveying and mapping branch head office now located in Ottawa includes some 945 jobs, of which 75 per cent are filled by people in the scientific, professional and technical group. According to current plans, some 750 jobs will be transferred, the remaining work being gradually farmed out. Total annual salaries for the relocalized part of the branch will be in the order of $15 million. The relocation should cost some $40 million. It seems the government decided to relocate the branch to Sherbrooke for a number of reasons: the presence of two universities—one French and one English—two CEGEPS—one French and one English—a number of high calibre education institutions, both French and English, and finally the Eastern Townships environment, a bilingual environment that perfectly suited the relocation as admitted by everyone.

Sherbrooke, with a population of about 90,000, is some 90 miles east of Montreal and 135 miles southwest of Quebec city. It is large enough to absorb an organization of that size and is considered the most important growth centre in the eastern townships. Because of the major economic impact of the project, its numerous employment opportunities both current and potential in an area that has a great need of it, and the leading effect of an organization of that size, the decentralization to Sherbrooke of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has become for us a very urgent and most important issue. Large investments in our areas depend on the decisions that will be taken by the Canadian and Quebec governments. I am also convinced a large number of foreign, Canadian, Quebec and Sherbrooke investments would be made at very short notice if both levels of governments were to come to an agreement.

Therefore, the decision to implement that plan will have for Sherbrooke and the eastern townships as a whole a leading effect that is difficult to evaluate at this point. We can readily realize however the considerable impact this would have on an already weakened Sherbrooke economy. As regards employment the announcement made on October 3, 1977 gave rise to great interest. Mr. Speaker, it has always been our view that too many young people in the eastern townships and Sherbrooke had to leave our area because they could not find a job. It is abnormal indeed that people in the eastern townships and Sherbrooke, having acquired institutions of higher learning and great quality, cannot benefit from those investments. Many of them had to make sacrifices to build our two universities and our two junior colleges and today too many of our graduates have to leave for Montreal or elsewhere in Quebec, sometimes outside Quebec, to find a job. That seems to me absolutely unacceptable. The federal relocation proposal brought much hope for young people especially for graduates of our two universities and our two junior colleges because there is so much unemployment among young people. Everybody agrees that the project is very important for our area, for economic development of course, but also for social and cultural development.

I would now like to say a word about this proposed relocation. Since the beginning, that is 1974, among the basic principles set by the federal government at that time there is one that the federal government has particularly emphasized and still emphasizes. This principle is as follows and I quote:

The transfer of any administrative unit of the federal public service implying a considerable number of an official linguistic minority will only be made when it has been ascertained through a permanent agreement with the host province that the children of federal civil servants will have the opportunity to be educated in the official language that they usually speak.

It is only after long and hard negotiations with public service officials and the provinces that the agreement was reached to abide fully by this principle when federal decentralization or relocation projects would take place within their boundaries. None of the provinces having accepted the federal government decentralization program could back out of this basic principle. When the Matane, Shawinigan and Jonquière programs were announced and implemented in Quebec—since all the other provinces had agreed on decentralization—it decided to stand by this fundamental principle of the Federal government. And when the second stage of the federal relocation program was announced in the autumn of 1977, three other cities in Quebec had been chosen and the same 1974 principles to which provinces had agreed from the outset were still included in the conditions set by the federal government. This requirement of free choice for the language of instruction has not been changed despite the changes in provincial governments since 1974. It has not been easy to obtain such linguistic guarantees from other Canadian provinces, in which francophones represent less than 5 per cent of the population in certain cases. As far as Sherbrooke is concerned, all the other conditions set by the federal government do not seem to be causing any problem to the relocation project.

At least three ministers of the Quebec government came to Sherbrooke after the announcement of October 3, 1977. One said that the provincial government "would never go down on its knees before the federal government", a second said that the federal project was "stillborn", and finally, Minister Camille Laurier said in his press conference of March 17, 1978, and I quote:

This is why we cannot accept the statement by the federal government that . . . "any relocation of an administrative unit of the federal public service involving a significant group of an official language minority will occur only when we are assured, by a permanent agreement with the host province, that the children of federal government employees will be taught in the official language that they usually use."

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Mr. Laurin then said:

It is up to the provinces to sign mutual agreements to ensure fair and desirable reciprocity because they alone are constitutionally empowered to do so. By trying to assume the right to sign a permanent agreement in this regard with a province, the federal government is once more invading the jurisdiction of the provinces and reveals its desire for centralization.

During the same press conference, Minister Laurin also said:

First, the Quebec government recognizes the economic advantages that the establishment of a service including 750 employees would have for the Sherbrooke area; and second, the government was willing to offer its full co-operation for the implementation of this project while scrupulously respecting Quebec laws.

He reminded us in this regard that Act 101 provides for a renewable authorization of temporary residence for a period of three years and that it would therefore be normal that a period of six years be provided for employees moving to Sherbrooke. This section of the French language charter—section 85—refers to temporary stay in Quebec and then suggests that those six years should remove all anxiety from the mind of public servants who might be transferred eventually. On that matter, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the proposed relocation will not be for three years or six years but it will be permanent. Therefore the federal public servants who will be transferred to Sherbrooke will not be in our province on a temporary basis, but most of them will settle permanently in Sherbrooke with their family. That is the substance of the problem. The federal government, which does not have one law for the rich and another for the poor, has a principle which applies to all regions of Canada since 1974, including Quebec which is still part of Canada. On the other hand, that provision of the French language charter would not allow Canadian citizens from outside Quebec who would take up permanent residence in Sherbrooke to send their children over six years of age to the school of their choice. On several occasions, the federal government has stated that it could not accept that view of the Quebec government.

In the House last spring I asked the following questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien):

In connection with the Quebec government proposal to allow the federal public servants who would settle in Sherbrooke a six year maximum during which they could send their children to English schools would the minister be prepared to discuss whether, under the 101 legislation, the cartographers who expect to be moved to Sherbrooke might enjoy the linguistic privileges of the military?

And the minister answered:

Mr. Speaker, I would surely be interested in discussing such a proposal with the Quebec government. I feel it would be very desirable to have a certain number of public servants transferred to Sherbrooke as provided in the decentralization plan.

When it was advised of this reply made by the Minister of Finance, the Quebec government indicated that it could not accept this proposal. Because of the problems resulting from the conflicting principles and positions put forward by both governments, several independent local organizations tried to put together solutions which could be acceptable to both governments, but to no avail.

This is the stage we have reached now and it seems that no progress is being made, that this is some sort of a dead end, and that the project in Sherbrooke, as well as those in Rigaud and Quebec city for that matter, are greatly jeopardized. Here are two basic approaches by two levels of government which seriously endanger the realization in Sherbrooke of this relocation project. The fact remains, however, that the people in Sherbrooke are very eager to see this project come true, a project which should mean significant economic benefits for Sherbrooke and the eastern townships generally.

For the sake of political decency, we cannot let the hopes of a whole population hang in midair without knowing what will happen. The federal government is determined to relocate that service in Sherbrooke, in accordance with the commitment given to the public servants and all the provinces in the House in 1974. Let us think about it: it concerns 750 employees, plus their spouses and children, a total of about 2,000 people. It means creation of at least 1,500 direct and indirect jobs, total annual wages of over $15 million, and capital investments in the range of $40 million. In brief, a project with absolutely tremendous economic repercussions.

I would conclude by recalling what a distinguished editor in the region very appropriately wrote about this last winter. I quote:

> It would suffice that the Parti Québécois acknowledge that all-out nationalism does not put food on the table and does not create jobs whereas simple logic would help bring 700 new jobs to Sherbrooke.
> There is nothing humiliating about that; it is just a matter of knowing how to add, of recognizing what everyone knows, except the government, that Quebec is still part of Canada and that Canadians are not immigrants in the province of Quebec.
>
> If the Péquiste government persists in refusing jobs like that, in being haughty in several respects, the political balloon that will burst will be its own. It will have lasted only four years.
>
> We have always maintained that English-speaking Canadians from the other provinces could not, as long as Quebec is part of Canada, be assimilated with the immigrants like the others, as far as the language of schooling is concerned.
> If Quebec were to persist in applying Act 101 in its entirety to English-speaking Canadians, it would prove that it cares less than it professes to about economic development. Ottawa does not ask that Quebec deny its principles it does not intervene in its legislative process, it proposes—

—always according to that editor—

—acceptable terms.

> Mr. Lévesque should soon agree that he is not expected to capitulate but simply to try to cooperate a little.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the government offer is there; it is explicit and unequivocal. The requirements are the same for all provinces in Canada, and they were felt acceptable everywhere else in Canada. It seems to me that by depriving Quebeckers of a fair distribution of federal expenditures, therefore of their own taxes, under the relocation program of the services of the Government of Canada which was established to extend better service to the population, the government of Quebec fails to pay attention to the most urgent needs of an area like the constituency I have the honour to represent in this House.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First, I want to express my appreciation to the members of the House of Commons for agreeing not to see the clock tonight, and also to the staff of the House of Commons.

Reflection on this budget leaves one wondering increasingly just what deserves praise. On the face of it, the budget appears to be cautious and, as the media describe it, responsible. Well, here perhaps is one quality that deserves praise: compared with the wild riot of spending we have grown to expect from the government, this budget is responsible. It is a sad commentary on the state to which our economy has been brought that we can praise a government as responsible simply because it is not quite as irresponsible as it was before. It is as if we were to congratulate a murderer because he had cut back to aggravated assault, or an arsonist because his fires were getting smaller. Nevertheless we recognize that while this government clings to office, we cannot expect the best of all possible worlds, and this being the case we can still welcome the decision not to penalize private industry in the resource sector, particularly mining and pulp and paper. What we should bear in mind, of course, is that the government has not given anything new to these industries; it has simply decided to take less away. It is slackening its chokehold.

The intention to increase tax credits for investment and to encourage more research and development is a welcome feature, but it draws attention to an underlying pattern, namely that the budget is directed toward winning the approval of big business. The fact that a loophole, used mainly by large corporations for debenture financing at bargain rates, has now been closed should not obscure the underlying pattern. This is essentially a budget to make big business happy.

With this pattern in mind, I want to look at the budget from two points of view and from the perspective, not of large and often foreign-owned businesses, but from the perspective of small businessmen, particularly the kind of small businessman I have been sent here to represent, the self-employed farmer who sustains a good many small Canadian communities. From this perspective I want to talk of areas of government performance as they are reflected in the budget, one dealing with the government's enormous capacity for spending money, and the other with the feeble measures with which it has come up to help this particular kind of Canadian business earn money.

This government has proved to be extremely good at spending money, a habit it increased as if it were a drug addiction during its short marriage to the big spenders in the NDP while we had a minority government a few years ago. Until circumstances and a strong public protest forced it to haul back a little in its dying days, the government has shown no more concern than the most short-sighted freeloader on the socialist benches about the sources of the money it spends.

In the real world, you do not just print money; you earn it. I want to offer an example of how Canadians have shown they can earn money. I use this example to examine what this government has done to help or hinder them. I have chosen an example from my own riding with which I am familiar. In my riding, people have been quietly producing wealth for the country for years, only to see this government squander it faster than it can be produced. I refer to the business of producing white beans. That is not a crop which attracts headlines. It does not have the prominence of wheat, but within several counties of western Ontario, and especially in the riding I represent, it is an essential crop produced, on the average, by about 3,500 producers. It may not be a prominent crop, but white bean production has grown in Ontario by well over two and a half times in the past 15 years, even though the domestic market has declined steadily during the past decade.

What has sustained this industry, is the powerful growth of exports of these beans. Ontario is the world's largest exporter of white beans, having surpassed the United States as an exporter several years ago. Since 1963, the export share of the market has grown from about 30 per cent to about 85 per cent.

In 1975, exports of white beans were worth about $24 million. This strong exporting position makes this particular crop of considerable interest within Canada's agricultural export picture. It earns foreign currency which is badly needed to save the country from the government. This industry deserves support by the government.

White beans are only one crop of many, and I mention this crop because I know about it. How many other industries in Canada go begging because this government ignores the potential to produce demontrated by small Canadian businesses?

A study conducted by a Nobel prize-winning economist suggests that the world population will be rising rapidly in the next 20 years and that demand for farm products will be rising at the rate of 5 per cent per year. If the government is serious about its commitment to research and development, let us see its commitment in support for proven research programs from which Canadian producers have benefited in the past and from which they continue to benefit.

We in this party support the idea of stimulating Canadian research and development by private industry, but we will continue to argue for a genuine commitment to research. In terms of many small businesses in this country, the present budget proposals seem more like a pat and a nod and a bid for business support than a fully thought out commitment to move the economy ahead.

Agriculture seems remarkably under-emphasized in this budget, which is surprising since only this summer when the cost paring knife was being wielded, agriculture attracted more than its fair share of attention. Before the summer cutbacks, agriculture accounted for only 1.6 per cent of the government's budgetary expenditure, but it was asked to accept a full 6 per cent of the cutbacks. Whether the government has decided that farmers and everyone else associated with agriculture are already lost votes anyway or whether it simply does not understand how important agriculture is and always will be to this country, it has done precious little to take advantage of the strength in this industry in its plans for the future.

The milk industry offers another interesting example of how low agriculture figures in the government's mind, or perhaps I should say of how agriculture figures in the government's low mind.

Late last summer a director of the government centre for the study of inflation and productivity suggested that Canada was producing too much industrial milk and that farmers would benefit, while the government would save on subsidies, if industrial milk production was cut by a third. In other words, he was proposing a cut in our gross national product of over $1 billion, which the National Dairy Council of Canada estimates would cost tens of thousands of permanent jobs. Why did he propose this cut? Because this year we are facing a depressed world market for skim milk powder, and we will have a surplus. If this cutback in production occurs, it might save the government $130 million in subsidies this year, but it would also result in a cutback in Canadian butter production of 135 million pounds, which the government would then import and sell to consumers. Consumers would save nothing by this proposal. The government would save subsidy money, and apparently it did not look ahead to decide what or who would provide for the dairy farmers who would be put out of business. Again, short-term expediency, a paring down of the government's own expenses rather than a genuine contribution to the economy of the country, seems to underlie the dealings of the government.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) seems to feel that consumption of dairy products in Canada is bound to drop so that a price rise to producers would merely hasten the process. He has even suggested that dairy men agree with him, although the howls of indignation from that quarter have caused him to invite producers to Ottawa to give him some proper lessons.

This proposed drop of a third of our industrial milk production comes at a time when industrial milk is already in short supply in Ontario. The problem with the international market at the moment has to do with surplus skim milk powder which might, under prevailing circumstances, become a precious and desired part of our food aid to other countries. Yet in Ontario very little powder has been shipped to the Canadian Dairy Commission for some time. Furthermore, under its present milk quota, Ontario is barred from producing even as much butter as it consumes, and it is not producing anything like the amount of specialty cheeses, yogurt and ice cream that it could absorb. It continues to import specialty cheeses with a continued outflow of Canadian dollars—more and more as the dollar continues to sag, of course—when it could be producing them in greater quantity if quotas did not operate against producers. This year farmers were so heavily penalized for over-production, that many have tried to produce less than their allowed quotas. That, with a little help from unco-operative weather and other factors, has led to the present shortage of industrial milk in Ontario.

Something is drastically wrong with our milk policy, when the successor to the Anti-Inflation Board can propose importing 135 million pounds of butter while cutting industrial milk production by one third. Something is drastically wrong with our quota system when Ontario must produce less industrial milk than it produces. Something is drastically wrong with this government when, instead of seeking ways to increase the prosperity of this industry, it argues that higher prices would, nevertheless, cut demand. The fact is that the milk industry is not treated by this government as an industry out of which wealth may come, but as an arm of policy. It suggests cutting its subsidies by $130 million, even though the country as a whole will not be saving this amount, but instead will pay to import foreign butter. In other words, the present initiatives of the government in dairy policy are calculated to cut down on the visible spending of the government, whether the cutback benefits the country or not. The government wants to cut its spending even when it increases the country's costs.

Here again in dairy policy, then, Mr. Speaker, we have an example of confusion and of disregard for the economics of our vitally important agricultural sector. Years of milking the public have not taught the government's economists to milk a cow. You do not turn on production overnight, nor can you cut it off overnight without severely dislocating a heavily capitalized industry, and of course, cutting back milk production by a third certainly does not cut back a dairy producer's costs by one-third. It forces him to absorb fully the losses which subsidies are designed to cushion.

What benefits, one might ask, can the government expect from damaging the Ontario dairy industry? One is that it can get out of some subsidies it does not want to pay. Another is that Quebec can become an exporter of milk to Ontario, a consideration that might satisfy some policy requirements of this government that have nothing to do with producing wealth but a lot to do with maintaining the government's last bastion of voter support in the country.

So far, Mr. Speaker, I have been looking at how the government fails to support Canadian industries in the important agricultural sector as it attempts to cut its own spending and its losses with the public.

I want to now look at ways in which the government spends money, and again I want to employ an example with which it is my responsibility to be familiar. I refer to the government's public works spending, which has grown during the period of this present parliament to astronomical proportions. I want to refer in particular to the mushrooming of the government's office inventory in the national capital region. Again in pursuit of policy objectives which have nothing to do with saving the taxpayers' money, the government has singlehandedly and at one and the same time saddled future governments with enormous commitments of the taxpayers' money—much of it comitted in rents to private developers—and handed the city of Ottawa, which has grown up as the service centre for the government, a crisis of yawning, empty office buildings.

Let us look very briefly at the pattern of spending this government has shown in its public works policies. In 1972, the Department of Public Works administered 42 million square feet of Crown-owned office space across Canada and 17 million square feet of leased space. It spent roughly $100 million in 1971-72 on building construction and acquisition.

By 1976, it spent two and a half times that much on building construction—almost a quarter of a billion dollars in a single year. Its Crown-owned inventory grew by 25 per cent, while its inventory of leased space more than doubled.

Recently, the Department of Public Works has gone from a system of accounting for space in square feet to a system using square metres. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) told us in the House a while ago that he was an old-fashioned man who still had to multiply these metric figures by 11 to understand them. If we multiply the current figures by 11 and then knock off a bit so that we are more accurate than the minister, we find that the government inventory of space stood, at the beginning of this year, at 67 million square feet, while in 1972 it stood at only 58 million square feet. Accordingly, the total inventory increased by 9 million square feet, or about 15.5 per cent from 1972 to the beginning of 1978.

Now let us look at the jump since January of this year. It is a jump of over 20 million square feet in 10 months, or 30 per cent in this year alone. No wonder the government has gone metric during the last few months; the figures do not sound nearly as harmful when they are divided by 11. The government will say that this last figure of 30 per cent is unfair, that many projects have suddenly been added to their inventory this year that were in the planning and construction stages for several years. Allowing for the sudden addition of projects that have been several years in the works, we are left with an increase, since 1972, of over 50 per cent in the space administered by the Department of Public Works' accommodation program.

The cost of the program, then, has increased two and a half times since 1971 and the space administered has increased one and a half times. In the last three fiscal years, building construction and acquisition has totalled $750 million, which is roughly half of the total cost of government accommodation in those years. Half the budget for accommodation goes simply on new building. How fast is this country supposed to be growing?

What are the benefits of this amazing program, Mr. Speaker? Have Canadians enjoyed so much better government that the boom in government building has been worth it? For that matter, have civil servants noticed a huge increase in their ability to serve the public?

Before I close I want to draw attention briefly to comments in the annual reports of the Department of Public Works for the years 1975-76 and 1976-77. In the first of these reports is the following comment:

The five-year accommodation plan was updated by PP&C (The program planning and co-ordination branch of the department) in January (1976) in the light of new federal constraints on public service growth and the implications of decentralization—

In the following year's report, we are told

The January 1976 accommodation plan for the national capital region was approved by Treasury Board in July 1976. Based on this approval, outline implementation plans were prepared: this affects more than half of the public servants now occupying space in the national capital over the next four or five years.

The year 1976 appears to have been a key year, Mr. Speaker. Despite an acknowledged awareness that restraint was called for, the government decided to go ahead with a spending program to house new departments, which has cost $750 million since then and which has left downtown Ottawa dotted with empty buildings and rental signs. The ripple effects on the economy of this city must make other cities, which have to deal with the federal government, shudder. But the costs will go on, Mr. Speaker, because this government did not know when or how to stop. It has these enormous buildings now, and the country is stuck with their cost for years into the future. Only now, now that the damage is done, has the government announced what should have been obvious long ago to anyone with sense, that the public service is too big and must be cut back, with a corresponding cutback in the office space needed for it.

I could elaborate on the figures which document the government's mismanagement of public spending through the Department of Public Works, a great deal of which is not in the least attributable to the hard-working servants of the department but simply to the economic incompetence of the government. There is the $150 million spent on expropriation at Mirabel airport, and the $88 million spent on expropriation for the Pickering airport, and the sum—which is far from final—of over $100 million which the government is spending on a new office building in downtown Montreal so that it can create more empty office space there. Mirabel, Pickering, and more empty office space in Montreal: these are government follies which all Canadians can see, even if their final costs can not easily be measured.

No wonder we have a debt this year of over $12 billion. No wonder the international community has lost confidence in our currency, when the government spends it hand over fist on unnecessary offices, unneeded or even unbuilt airports, and unworkable postal plants. No wonder the people of Canada have lost heart, and no wonder the Auditor General, for the third year in a row, has had to call attention to the inadequacy of the government's accommodation program in the Department of Public Works.

I want to end my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by drawing attention to a few of the comments of the Auditor General in his report just issued. Last year he suggested that:

The government should consider establishing long-term guidelines on the growth of the public service to facilitate planning for office accommodation, with due consideration to decentralization and other government objectives.

Well, of course, if the government had had an adequate plan for accommodation when it updated its accommodation plan in 1976, the Auditor General should not have had to make such a comment last year.

[Mr. McKinley.]

In this year's report, the Auditor General notes that two years ago he had also commented on the inadequacy of accounting for accommodation. This year, noting that under present arrangements parliament is not informed of "the cost of accommodation services requested and used by individual departments", the Auditor General has added his voice unequivocally to the voice of the national finance committee of the other place in its report this fall, and to the voice we have raised in opposition, with a recommendation that departments be required to pay Public Works for the space they use.

● (2242)

This concept of revenue dependency was proposed as long ago as 1962, and the Conservative party then in government had already instituted a method of showing, in the annual estimates of departments, the cost of their accommodation. Since the last Conservative government was in office, the recommendation of the Glassco commission urging this concept of revenue dependency, or "user-pays", has just sat there. The Department of Public Works itself has welcomed the proposal. It is the government which has not acted.

A week or so ago I asked the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology if he intended to introduce legislation to update the Public Works Act, as a committee of the other place had recommended. He said he did not intend to introduce such legislation now. Now that the Auditor General has joined the chorus of voices which recommend a change in the nature of accounting for government accommodation, we can only hope that the government will think again. Its hesitation becomes a bit more understandable when we notice that the Auditor General, whose concern is that public spending should be both visible and accountable to parliament, urges this change, because at present the accounting system used to keep track of the cost of government accommodation buries much of the actual cost. The real costs would be even more startling if they were shown openly.

One quotation from the Auditor General's new report will suffice, Mr. Speaker. The report states that both when the government builds a building of its own and when it leases accommodation on the private market "current reporting arrangements understate the actual cost of new accommodation; consequently, it is difficult to make valid comparisons of the relative merits of construction, purchase and leasing alternatives." This suggests that the government could not and did not know what it was getting into when it committed itself to lease-purchase agreements for new office accommodation, agreements which by one estimate may cost $179 million more than if the government had built Crown-owned buildings in the first place. Once again, the government has appeared to save money by committing future governments to years and years of rent, instead of showing openly and honestly what money it has spent.

Mr. Speaker, in indicating our lack of confidence in this government, I am merely echoing what Canadians from coast to coast and from the American border to the Arctic have been showing all year, that this country is strong but that the government is weak and must go. It has harmed us enough. Let us look forward to the end of it and a beginning of recovery within the country. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being 10.45 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order.

At 10.45 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CALL FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF ALLEGED MISAPPROPRIATION OF PUBLIC FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to put forward under Standing Order 43 which should appeal to all members of the House. It being quite plain from the 100th report of the Auditor General, outlining details of government spending, that the government and its bureaucracy continues to bilk Canadian taxpayers, in disregard of reports of auditors general over the last ten years or so and will continue to do so until parliament, collectively and individually, gets off the sidelines and reasserts its authority to detect, prevent and punish such action, I move:

That a parliamentary committee or committees be directed to propose ways and means of achieving the objective of coping with this massive misappropriation of public funds, and that the prime minister assign to a sympathetic minister responsibility for collaborating with such committees in bringing about parliamentary reform along these lines.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires, pursuant to Standing Order 43, unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL CPI FOR SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), I move:

That this House notes that the consumer price index issued today is based on a basket of goods and services in which the importance of food has been downplayed, which works against senior citizens, and this House therefore calls on the government to establish a special index for senior citizens, based on the goods and services they have to buy, so that the indexing of their pensions will more accurately meet their situation.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires, pursuant to Standing Order 43, unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON IMPORT QUOTAS FOR BEEF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the statement attributed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the effect that he favours higher import quotas on lower grade beef, and some form of maximum-minimum price for beef products.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that he may be fully briefed on the cattle industry in this country, because if his ideas were implemented they would certainly cause a Canadian beef shortage in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

REQUEST WHEAT BOARD OFFICIALS APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE TO EXPLAIN POLICY RESPECTING PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the announcement by the Canadian Wheat Board that it intends to purchase from 500 to 2,000 hopper cars, apparently out of producers' funds, and in view of the fact that the board was set up to ensure the orderly marketing of grain, and by no stretch of the imagination on the part of the producers and responsible politicians, was the board to involve itself in the movement of grain by using producers' money to purchase hopper cars or any type of rolling-stock, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and officials of the Canadian Wheat Board appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture to explain their action, and that the standing committee be authorized to carry out a study to determine the reason for the deferral and loss of sales which has cost the producer and the economy of Canada countless millions of dollars.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REQUEST THAT AUDITOR GENERAL STUDY BOARD'S ACCOUNTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

As high-handed and sloppy transportation programming by the Canadian Wheat Board is largely responsible for the billion dollar loss sustained by western grain producers so far this year through lost and deferred sales, interest and demurrage, etc., and the Canadian Wheat Board's move to purchase up to $100 million worth of additional grain cars with producers' money is an abuse of their authority under the act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

● (1112)

That the government immediately refer the Canadian Wheat Board accounts to the Auditor General for study and comment.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

EXPLANATION OF OVERRUNS ON CAPITAL WORKS PROGRAMS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, whose last words in this House yesterday afternoon had to do with Mickey Mouse.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: While the Prime Minister is in this inward-looking mood, I would like to ask him, in relation to the very gross overruns and runaways as far as capital expenditure projects are concerned, if he has an explanation to give to the Canadian people and to the House today in relation to these expenditures—on capital works programs, for instance.

In addition, what explanation does he have for the "R" class icebreakers costing six times what they were expected to cost and what the contracts called for when they were originally let? What explanation does the Prime Minister have for a runaway cost like that?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House will realize that I have not verified all the statements by the Auditor General, but each minister has been informed of them and is studying the report. They will be prepared to deal with each particular case that the hon. member or other hon. members opposite might want to concern themselves about. This particular one would come under the Minister of Transport, and I can undertake to ensure that he will be informed of the hon. member's concern.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I am one, and I am sure there are countless thousands across the country, who believes that the Prime Minister, being in charge of this government, simply cannot ignore the problem any longer, having a merry-go-round like the one we have seen this morning. For instance, the gentleman who was in charge of Public Works was promoted this morning. Can the Prime Minister indicate how in the world, presumably under Public Works, the Malton, Toronto, airport additions would increase almost three times over what they were expected to cost? This is not something he has to confirm: it is there; it is a fact. What is the Prime Minister's explanation? Don't shuck if off on somebody else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I must confess, in all humility, that I do not know the detail of every item of expenditure by the government. That is why we have ministers with different departments. The ministers will gladly give the answers and explanations for the cases which interest the hon. member. I do not think it is too much to suggest to the hon. member that it is not possible for the Prime Minister to verify, personally, every expenditure by every minister in every department. That is indeed, why we have an Auditor General, so that he can make this kind of report. It is the duty and the role of the opposition to ask questions on it either in the House or in committee when the estimates of the particular minister are before the committee.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I would have expected that since the Prime Minister and his ministers have had notice of these items for many weeks, it is also the duty of the Prime Minister to be informed especially of major capital projects such as this and the obvious ball-up in his own government respecting them. In any event, that is past history.

What guarantee can the Prime Minister give to the people of this country, today, that this type of exorbitant overrun in respect of capital projects will not be repeated? We have a $10 billion program this year. Can the Prime Minister give his guarantee that this will not happen again?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, when the budget of the government is in the order of some $40 billion—

Mr. Stevens: Fifty billion.

Mr. Trudeau: —it is not surprising that there shall be some instances of regrettable financial accounting or expenditure control. This would exist, and indeed it does exist, in any large corporation. The difference with the Government of Canada is that we have an Auditor General who pinpoints these publicly. He is an Auditor General who is chosen by parliament to do this very job.

• (1117)

The hon. member wants to know what guarantees there will be in the future. I could say there has been no time in the past one hundred years since we have had auditors general that he did not, in every government, of whatever stripe, find some instances of neglect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not of this kind.

Mr. Trudeau: If the right hon. member for Prince Albert wants to get into the act, I welcome him, because I see that his successor is not in his seat. I am sure that, in his absence, he would welcome the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Don't be childish all the time.

Mr. Trudeau: I am very willing to answer questions, but out of deference I am asking the right hon. member to say that the auditor general never found any concern over spending during the time he was in office.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT CONCERNING DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. I do not want to disturb his serenity: he just had a cabinet shuffle of the lost souls. It is a question of the quick leading the dead.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister this: very serious charges have been made by officials of the Department of Transport against ministers. I refer the Prime Minister to page 539 of the Auditor General's report, where officials of the Department of Transport state that recognition of the political process is not evident in the reports on the choice of sites for the training institute and the motor vehicle test centre, or Toronto or Calgary airports. I quote:

> The early commitments made by ministers based on circumstances extraneous to the department were particularly significant in the decisions on the timing, location, size and scope of these projects. The strength of these early commitments made it difficult to contain projects at later stages.

In view of these serious charges, is the Prime Minister going to ask for the resignation of his ministers of transport since 1972? Or if he will not do that, will he at least have a public inquiry into these charges by officials of the Department of Transport against their ministers over the past six years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General's report has been referred, as the hon. member perhaps noticed yesterday, to the public accounts committee. The hon. member can use his rapier wit at that particular committee to show how bright he is at reading texts from the Auditor General's report.

Mr. Crosbie: It is not rapier, Mr. Speaker; it is rape of the political process.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: It is not a matter of the public accounts committee; it is a charge of political interference which caused the waste of hundreds of millions of taxpayers' dollars. In those circumstances, does the Prime Minister agree that the matter to which I referred, and the charges made by these officials of the Department of Transport, reproduced by the Auditor General, as their explanation of these increases, warrants more than a public accounts committee but, in fact, a public inquiry with proper powers of subpoena and complete independence from the government? Will the Prime Minister not realize the seriousness of this?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not share the hon. member's contempt for the public accounts committee. I think they do a good job.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, because of the dance of the macabre this morning, the Prime Minister will not take this matter seriously. The public accounts committee does not have power: it is in the hands of the majority; it is controlled by the Liberal majority.

An hon. Member: It has your chairman.

Mr. Crosbie: The chairman is independent, but he is one of a minority. The Prime Minister and his ministers have referred to the Auditor General in glowing terms. Will the Prime Minister investigate this serious matter, or try to forget it as he is trying to do? This is a most serious charge. I do not think a previous auditor general's report ever had a department make this kind of statement about its minister and the political interference it suffered. Will the Prime Minister take this seriously and quit joking about the public accounts committee?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCREASES IN OLD AGE SECURITY PAYMENTS AND FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Some of us are pleased that she has not been shuffled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the light of her tentative statement the other night on a CBC television program that she was hoping to get an assurance from the provinces that they would not take any steps to cut back the increases Canadians will get by way of old age security payments or family allowances, is she in a position to tell the House that she has received such assurances from the provinces?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The only response I have from the provinces is that Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta are going to pass on the increases to the recipients of the provincial supplement such as GAINS in Ontario. Newfoundland and other provinces are recommending it to their cabinets now. As to the child tax credit for children which we want to be fully passed on to mothers on mothers allowance and other welfare payments I am unfortunately still not in a position to give assurance to Canadians and I would like to give a last chance for provinces to go to their cabinets.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I express the hope that the minister will have this assurance from all the provinces before we get back to the discussion of Bill C-10 some day next week?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ASSURANCE THAT WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE WILL NOT BE REDUCED BECAUSE OF INCREASED GIS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the same subject, may I put a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs? It arises from his tentative assurance that an effort is being made to make sure that recipients of the war veterans allowance will not have their allowances cut back because of the increase in the guaranteed income supplement. Is he yet able to give the House and the veterans that assurance?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This is in the normal process of discussion. The assurance which the hon. member is seeking is not possible to give today. As he knows, the act pertaining to this supplement sponsored by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has received royal assent, so I expect to have some information for the hon. member shortly.

AGRICULTURE

REQUESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MARKETING BOARD FOR POULTRY—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Yesterday I called the attention of his parliamentary secretary to a question of paramount importance, namely the establishment of a national marketing board for poultry. The parliamentary secretary replied that this question is very seriously under review and that a decision is forthcoming. Then I directed a question to the right hon. Prime Minister, and I understand better this morning the reply he gave me yesterday when he said that he could not always look after everything himself and that is why he has ministers. I accept his reply.

Therefore, I should now like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether poultry producers may expect in the very near future the establishment of a national marketing board to protect the interests not only of producers, but of consumers as well, as Bill C-76 would have it?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): My parliamentary secretary answered that question correctly yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

ALLEGED PRICE-FIXING RESPECTING TURKEYS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister.

It will soon be Christmas and it is customary for families to buy a turkey for the supper after the midnight mass. According to reports this morning, some combines have taken steps to make believe that there will be a shortage of turkeys in Canada thus inordinately increasing prices. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is aware of that situation and if he is not whether he would be prepared to inquire so that the marketing of that important meat will not be left in the hands of combines for Christmas.

• (1127)

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have heard about the situation. We have done some checking with the National Farm Products Marketing Council, which has been in touch with the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency. I think it should be remembered that that agency does not have the same control as the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency. There has been hardly any increase in the price of eggs for over two years because the pricing formula is such that the agency controls the price producers receive, as well as the distribution of eggs, which is not the case with turkeys.

There are statistics which show that there should be a surplus of 17 million pounds of turkeys for Christmas. There will be no shortage at all and there should be a substantial carry-over into the new year. Projected production for the first quarter of the new year is substantially increased, so as far as we are concerned there is no shortage of turkeys. There may be a shortage of marketing turkeys. There are over 50 million pounds of turkey in storage. There will be over 50 million pounds of fresh turkey before Christmas, so there should be a surplus of turkeys when imports are included. There should be a substantial surplus, at least half the surplus we had last year, so there should be no shortage of turkeys whatsoever. Also, turkeys should be at reasonable prices because producers have received an increase of only about 4½ cents a pound for the total year, so as far as we are concerned there should not be a further increase in price.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SENTENCE IMPOSED ON KEITH RICHARDS FOR POSSESSION OF DRUGS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the new Minister of Justice and also of other ministers involved in this matter, I will ask the Solicitor General whether there is any communication between the Department of Justice, the Department of the Solicitor General and the Department of Employment and Immigration. When the two former departments I have mentioned have complete information concerning criminal records of individuals who come into Canada, I want to know what communication there is. I am referring to the matter of Mr. Keith Richards who has a record as long as your arm and who was admitted here. I want to find out what communication there is among departments.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in view of the vague nature of the question which the right hon. gentleman has asked regarding a very specific instance, I will take notice of the question and report subsequently.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister is anxious to get information. I will give him the record of Keith Richards. He was convicted in 1973, in the United Kingdom, for offences relating to dope, arms and ammunition. One of the charges was possession of Chinese heroin. In 1973, in France, there were convictions for using, supplying and trafficking in hashish and heroin. There was a fine of 5,000 pounds. The minister wants information, and I always provide it. In 1977, one week before Mr. Richards came to Canada, he was convicted in the United Kingdom for having dope. What communication is there, and why are individuals like this allowed into Canada?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is free to provide information, and I take note of it. It is unfortunate that the right hon. gentleman did not make that information available to me previously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: In a situation such as this one, I find it odd that the right hon. gentleman did not give some indication prior to the question period in order to give me notice so that I could ascertain the information he has solicited. It is odd, in view of the sensitive nature of the information he has advanced.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT CONCERNING LETTING OF CONTRACTS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question about the Auditor General's report. As the Prime Minister will be aware, the Auditor General states in his report that throughout the government, contracts of great value are given out without calling for competitive tenders. For example, the Auditor General points out that the Department of Supply and Services alone signed about 90,000 contracts, totalling over $1,800 million, without calling for competitive tenders.

Would the Prime Minister tell the House how he justifies this action by his government, particularly in view of the fact that such action appears to fly in the face of the government's own regulations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question was asked in detail of the minister of supply and services at the time concerning the different contracts, and in each case he gave an explanation. The general explanation is that it allows the minister, as he is so authorized under the law, to use his discretion to help certain parts of the country where we want to assist in regional development.

This answer was given in the House by the minister at the time. If the hon. member has any other questions on any particular case, I am sure we will be very anxious to give answers.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General is fully aware of answers which have been given previously by the Department of Supply and Services. However, the Auditor General thought the matter was of sufficient importance to include it in his annual report. His officials stated yesterday, before the public accounts committee, that they were dissatisfied with the procedures followed by the government and that they found the explanations given totally inadequate.

I ask the Prime Minister about another government activity covered by the Auditor General. As reported, he states that the government often signed open-ended contracts based on fixed-time rates and cost-plus pricing methods which actually give incentives for time-wasting on construction being carried out and for cost overruns. When will the Prime Minister accept his responsibility as Prime Minister and ensure that future contracts do not provide incentives to waste the taxpayers' money?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is never any incentive to waste the taxpayers' money. The government follows procedures which are common in the private sector and which happen at all levels of government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that some hon. members over there want to enter the fray. I can only attempt to answer questions as they are asked of me. If hecklers want to get into the act, very well.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, how does the Prime Minister justify the statement he just made with the statement on page 178 of the Auditor General's report which reads:

With fixed-time rate and cost-plus pricing methods, there is often no incentive for the contractor to control his costs; indeed, there may be a positive incentive for him to maximize hours spent or costs incurred.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, all I said was that in the private sector, as well as at all levels of the public sector—federal, provincial and municipal—there are cases where cost-plus contracts are entered into. It depends on the particular circumstances. That is why I invited the hon. member to not make general statements but to raise any particular contract he is concerned about. The minister, if he is given notice, will be happy to answer either in the House or before the public accounts committee.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST PRIME RATE NOT BE FURTHER INCREASED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of the figures released this morning, which are being described by market analysts as atrocious—inflation up 1 per cent in the month, the trade surplus down dramatically from last month, the dollar, before the Bank of Canada intervened substantially, caving in by almost half a cent from its close yesterday—would the Minister of Finance tell the House whether he now intends to at least speak to the chartered banks in the hope that they will not increase the prime rate still further, bearing in mind that the prime rate in the United States this morning went up a further half point?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as is usual, I do not speculate in the House on the movement of interest rates. These problems are discussed by myself with the governor of the Bank of Canada when there are circumstances which call for it.

With regard to the figures which came out this morning, I said in my budget speech last week that I expected to see price indexing increase for the month of October because of the return of the provincial sales tax. Another factor is that in the month of October we always include the CPI increases in taxes levied by the municipalities. I said that it was a phenomenon that would happen in October, but that the trend of the decline of the CPI as predicted would carry over. In the last three months, the increase in the CPI has been the lowest for any three-month period in years.

THE MINISTRY

PRIME MINISTER'S CONFIDENCE IN CERTAIN MINISTERS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, before putting my next question to the Prime Minister I would point out that the Minister of Finance obviously still does not understand his portfolio. I was referring to the prime rate, not the bank rate. The prime rate has nothing to do with the governor of the Bank of Canada.

My question to the Prime Minister centres around his escapades this morning referred to as a cabinet shuffle. In view of the fact that he has bypassed the Minister of Finance, has demoted the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and has even shorn that minister of his deputy minister, would the Prime Minister confirm to the House that this move—appointing a nanny, if you like, over various other ministers—is a clear indication of his lack of confidence in the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but that he did not want to hurt their egos?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure if the question is of urgent and pressing necessity, as called for under the rules.

Mr. Paproski: It is an oral question, not an S.O. 43.

Mr. Trudeau: It is a question about nannies. I think that is of more interest to the other side than it is to this side.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST POPULATION DESK BE SET UP WITHIN DEPARTMENT

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Considering that the problem of world population is still very serious, in spite of encouraging reports recently, and that there is now an international group of parliamentarians working on population and development which is, in fact, headed by a Canadian MP, would the minister consider setting up a specific population desk either in his department or perhaps in CIDA or IDRC?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the hon. member's interest, as well as that of other hon. members of the House, in this subject. I am not exactly sure what the formulation ought to be or what technique ought to be employed, but certainly I will look into it and see if there is merit in having a special centre either in CIDA or in External Affairs in order to co-ordinate these kinds of activities on a world scale.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF TURKEYS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Earlier this week, the minister was advised of charges made by the chairman of the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency that turkeys were being stockpiled and, hence, withheld from the market in order to drive up prices. The Minister of Agriculture said in the House this morning, "increases should not be there as far as we are concerned."

In view of the fact that the price of turkeys is already 25 per cent more than it was this time last year, and the information already given to the House by the Minister of Agriculture, what has the minister learned from his inquiries with respect to this obvious profiteering at a time when more and more Canadians are depending on turkey as a cheap source of protein?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we did find that the wholesalers had held back approximately one-third of their produce but that that was not irregular in terms of what is usually done. It is usually found that producers sell about one-third of their production each year during the Christmas holiday season. What is being held back this year is pretty much in line with what was held back in other years. In fact, what is being held back has already been sold to different retailers.

On the other hand, I was disappointed by the fact that as of November 1 the stocks on hand were only 50 million pounds, whereas last year they were 72 million pounds. We believe that there should have been an increase in production this year because of the increase in the price of beef and a tendency by consumers to move to alternative sources of protein. Therefore, we would have liked to see greater production this year, but that has not been done.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter, especially in light of the consumer price index today which is showing a substantial increase in food prices, even with the new weighting scale that is now in the CPI which places less emphasis on food.

Has the minister examined the cause for price increases, in light of what the Minister of Agriculture said? For example, he said that there are adequate supplies. Now we know that the price increases are not going to producers; someone is ripping off consumers. Clearly, it is the minister's responsibility to find out who, and to take the necessary steps. Is he doing that?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, we have looked into it and we are continuing to look into it. We have not had any evidence that anyone is ripping off the consumer. We have found that supply has decreased and demand has increased, and that as a result of those market conditions prices have gone up. If one compares the production of last year—72 million pounds in stock as of November 1—last year there was more on hand than this year, with a lower demand. The demand has gone up sharply this year because of the increased price of beef, and the supply has not been there. That is the reason for increased prices, not any ripping off.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE ARGENTINIAN POLITICAL PRISONERS AND FAMILIES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to address my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Wellington.

On May 16, 1978, the minister announced with some fanfare that he was setting up a special program to admit up to 100 Argentinian political prisoners and their families as refugees. He described the situation of these political prisoners as extremely desperate. On October 30, the hon. member for Egmont, the hon. member for Montmorency, and myself, wrote to the minister giving him the information that the military authorities in Argentina had refused permission for the Canadian government to visit all but two persons with a view to carrying out this promise. In fact, no one has been admitted under this program. So far, apart from—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the minister has barely acknowledged the question. Will the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether the Canadian government has forcefully called the attention of the Argentinian government to its failure to co-operate in the case of these persons who, to use the minister's words, are extremely desperate and are presently imprisoned as political prisoners?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question and get back to the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I hope the parliamentary secretary will impress upon the minister the urgency of answering this question. I put the question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sorry?

Mr. Brewin: I do not know whether he heard the question I put.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brewin: I do not intend to repeat it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: However, I intend to put the question, if I may.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs communicated with the government of Argentina because of its refusal to allow Canadian immigration authorities to visit political prisoners whom we have promised to admit to this country as refugees?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I would have to take notice of the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: First of all, let me apologize for not having heard the preamble to the question. I will take notice of it so that I can give the hon. member and the House a precise answer.

In a general way, we have made a number of representations to the government of Argentina. We have been seeking, in every way we can, to facilitate the exit of those people who have had our authorization and encouragement to come to Canada; but whether we have made a specific kind of representation of the type asked for by the hon. member, I do not know. If we have not, certainly I do not see any reason why we should not and I will so instruct my officials.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MINISTER'S RESPONSIBILITY RESPECTING EASTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the new Minister of Labour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In the cabinet which has been described as a recirculation of tired blood, his entry is the only case of the infusion of old blood.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Andras: That is not befitting you, my friend.

[Mr. Maine.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Among his responsibilities as Minister of Labour, has responsibility been given for him to represent the interests of eastern Ontario which once again has been neglected respecting the infusion into cabinet?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Does he have specific responsibilities respecting eastern Ontario?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much that clear precedent prevents the hon. minister answering the question. If he had responsibilities of that sort, they would be political and geographic in nature, rather than administrative. There is a clear precedent that questions must be confined to administrative responsibilities.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

AUDITOR GENERAL'S CRITICISM OF ACCOUNTING PROCEDURES OF INDIAN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the report of the Auditor General regarding inadequate accounting and control procedures for the Indian Economic Development Fund involving many millions of dollars, and the fact that the minister and his officials have been aware of this problem for some two, three or four years, can the minister advise why he did not take steps to clean up this mess when he first learned of it, rather than let it continue?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has put the question very accurately. The fact is that there has been a serious clean-up of the program and it has led to a new set of problems. With the available funds we have stabilized some of the previous projects. That was agreed to by the committee. I do not think it can be argued by the Auditor General unless one argues that the only type of operation we get into in the Indian Affairs program is one which meets absolutely all the criteria of the Woods, Gordon report.

The hon. member knows perfectly well that when we are dealing with economic development on or adjacent to reserves, there are certain risks involved. If the Tories are not prepared to take those risks, let them say so clearly. In my view, unless we are prepared to take some of those risks there will be no development at all on the reserves.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, if the Tories take a risk, certainly they examine the situation beforehand to see whether the risk is worth taking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: If the minister refers to page 557 of the Auditor General's report, he will find that the computer system which was set up is not adequate as far as the fund is concerned.

I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the report of the Auditor General respecting the lack of authority for compensation payments under the James Bay Agreement, has the minister taken or does he intend to take any disciplinary action respecting the officials who were involved?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, certainly I will look into that matter. I will be pleased to answer the question in committee. I think I meet with the parliamentary committee next week. Of course, the hon. member avoided dealing with the other recommendation or area brought out in the Auditor General's report, namely, the arts and crafts fund. He studiously avoided that because, in fact, we took action. Where we take action does not seem to be the subject of any comment in the question period.

FISHERIES

DREDGING OF MIRAMICHI RIVER

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Can he tell the House whether he is prepared to sign an ocean dumping permit to facilitate the dredging of the Miramichi River? If so, can he assure the fishermen of that area that all of their concerns will be adequately protected in that permit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, repeatedly we have made it very clear that no permit would be issued until all doubts were removed. Obviously, there may be some situations in which monitoring will be required. To this effect I suggested a committee on which fishermen will be represented. The operations we put together when we had the cable going from New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island, with fishermen involved in the monitoring, were most satisfactory. I am willing to look into this as a precedent.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

AWARDING OF ADVERTISING CONTRACTS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister: it refers to the report of the Auditor General.

● (1152)

Studies now indicate that the federal government is the largest single advertiser in Canada, exceeding any of the large companies. At page 307 of his report, the Auditor General indicates that one company, namely, Vickers & Benson, was given advertising accounts by the Employment and Immigration Commission without tender. In fact, 80 per cent of that commission's total advertising went to Vickers & Benson.

In view of the statement of the deputy minister to the committee yesterday that it is the minister who decides who will get the advertising budget, may I ask the right hon. Prime Minister on what basis the government decides who will get its advertising contracts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, regarding the size of the advertising budget, I should like to point out to the hon. member that the government considers that it is its duty to ensure that Canadians are informed of the programs and policies which are of interest to them, so that they can benefit from whatever government policies exist. I would wager that if you total the ten provincial budgets for advertising, they would probably be higher than that of the federal government. That is the way federalism operates, Mr. Speaker: each level of government must inform its citizens of the programs which affect them.

With regard to the choice of advertisers, we look for competence, imagination and economy.

Mr. Epp: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has indicated that there are certain criteria, but when one looks at the Auditor General's report and at the answers of the deputy minister, political patronage seems to be very much a factor as to how the minister will decide who will get the advertising. At page 307 of his report, paragraph 14.172, the Auditor General recommends that tendering procedures be used in advertising, and in fact the commission has said that they will follow those guidelines if treasury so dictates. Therefore, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether it will now be the policy of Treasury Board that these advertising contracts be awarded under the competitive tendering system.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in a matter as abstract as judging the quality and efficiency of one type of advertising as against another, somebody has to make a decision. We think it is better that the elected representatives of the people make the decision, rather than the bureaucracy, and I would be surprised if the hon. member disagree with that.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER OF THE YUKON

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As he knows, the provisions of the Yukon Act require the governor in council to appoint a commissioner of the Yukon Territory. In view of the fact that there now exists, as of the last election in that territory, a clear and decisive majority, having been exposed to the party system, will the Prime Minister assure me and the people of the Yukon that the appointment of the next commissioner of the Yukon will be made by, and with the advice and consent of, that elected majority?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we will be looking for the best possible commissioner, and in that we will be influenced and advised by the people of the Yukon who are the ultimate sovereigns in that part of the jurisdiction.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister kindly answered the first part of my question but refrained from answering the second part, which was: will the appointment be made with the consent of that elected majority?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, because they are a reasonable group of men and women, I am sure they will consent to anything reasonable that is done by the government.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ESTABLISHMENT OF MULTIPARTITE NATIONAL FORUM TO RESOLVE PROBLEMS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. It was, and continued to be for some time, the first plank in the former minister of labour's policy to establish a multipartite national forum which would include labour, business and other community groups. May I ask the minister whether this is still the policy of the government and, if it is, what progress has been made recently toward this objective?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank the House for this very warm welcome and expression of good wishes; I do appreciate it.

So far as the question goes, Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that a good deal of progress has already been made toward consultation. It began less in the form of a large forum, but it is growing in the form of consultation, working its way up through the 23 sector task forces into the second tier committee. Both business and labour have made very excellent proposals for policy development to the two levels of government. Therefore, we are working at this coming up, rather than starting with a large new structure. We are working toward it, and I think all would recognize that very significant progress is being made and I would seek to continue that.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it from what the minister says that the policy remains an objective; the procedure in obtaining it has been somewhat changed. May I ask the minister this: recently the acting minister of labour said in the other place that the Woods royal commission report advocating the establishment of a public interest disputes commission was under active study by the government. A few days later the right hon. Prime Minister seemed to indicate that that was not so.

In view of the fact that I am sure all hon. members would not want this place to become a constant labour court, can the minister advise whether the acting minister, who said that the Woods royal commission public interest disputes commission proposal was under study, is correct and, if so, is the minister prepared to make a statement in the House in order to indicate what structure the government may be prepared to establish at least to diminish the number of strikes that this House has to settle?

Mr. O'Connell: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the question of bringing about labour peace and stability will be one of the first questions to which I would wish to address myself.

So far as the specific question of the study goes, I personally have studied the Woods task force proposal with respect to the public service public interest disputes commission. I would have to say that, whereas we do need to look further at that issue, it is not the answer because that commission would, after it had done what is suggested of it, in effect dump the question back into this parliament. So we would not be relieving ourselves of activities in settling disputes simply by going to some new kind of commission.

I personally will be reviewing that, as I have done recently. I would like to discuss the matter with the critic from the opposite side because I think we on all sides of the House would be deceiving ourselves if we thought some new commission which nobody takes the trouble to really examine would resolve these issues for us: they would come back here, Mr. Speaker.

FORESTRY

ALLEGED DEPLETION OF FORESTRY SERVICES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, against the great losses to the Canadian treasury that have been revealed in the report of the Auditor General, and against the news last night that his department is losing some very highly trained and well motivated public servants, I wonder whether the minister is now prepared to admit that he is presiding over the demise of the Canadian Forestry Service.

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): That is ridiculous, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand: The Canadian Forestry Service is a very important part of my department.

Mr. Fraser: What about the forestry labs, especially the Vancouver one?

Mr. Marchand: The forestry labs are, also. The privatization of those labs will be one of the most forward steps taken recently in connection with the cuts which have been made by the government.

Mr. Fraser: The whole thing has already been agreed to.

Mr. Marchand: I think the hon. member talks a lot of "bull" on this question. There is some difficulty with the Ottawa lab, but as far as the Vancouver lab is concerned it has been accepted very warmly by the officials in the lab, by the universities, by the provincial government and by the industry.

● (1202)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious from the reply just given by the Minister of State (Environment) that there is a contradiction in the information he is receiving from I know not where and the information that is public and is reaching everyone else in this country, namely, the forestry lab in Vancouver is also at the point of disintegration: he is going to lose more people.

I still want to know whether the minister can reveal, and if he is prepared to reveal right now, those parts of private industry which have demonstrated some interest in maintaining this forestry establishment. The information we are receiving is that there is no interest in private industry to assume this responsibility.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I have had conversations with private industry—a group that I met a few weeks ago in Ottawa. I met recently with the Canadian Forestry Advisory Council which, as I said in the House previously, is chaired by the chief executive officer of Crown Zellerbach, Mr. Rogers. He received that very warmly. Dr. Solandt reported verbally to me. He found the same thing, a very high degree of acceptance in industry and a lot of enthusiasm in industry, the universities and some provincial governments for the privatization of those two forest products laboratories.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—ANNOUNCEMENTS OF CABINET CHANGES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly on a point of order. I am sorry that the Prime Minister has left, but perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) will pay attention to the point I wish to raise and speak to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about it.

It used to be the practice in the House of Commons—and it is dealt with in citation 89, at pages 82 and 83 of Beauchesne's fourth edition—that whenever a major change in cabinet positions is made a statement is given to the House.

Mr. Gillies: But there was nothing major.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the citation makes it quite clear that if there is no change of policy, this obligation does not rest on the Prime Minister. If there are changes in policy, however, such a statement should be made. I would point out that although the information we have thus far is not complete, it seems to me it is quite a change in policy to drop a ministry such as that of urban affairs, and also that it is a significant change to set up a board of economic development headed by one minister under whom a number of other ministers serve.

As I say, in the citation to which I refer it is clear that such a statement does not have to be made immediately, but it is also clear that the opposition has the right to ask for more than a general exposition of the main principles on which a government is formed.

I would hope that the Deputy Prime Minister would bring this to the attention of the Prime Minister. It seems to me that there is more than a shuffle; there is this new board and the dropping of a department, and a statement ought to be made about that matter. I hope any such statement might also communicate to us what minister is now responsible for the status of women.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will draw the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I would provide the information at once that the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Lalonde) will continue his current responsibilities for the status of women.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was afraid of that.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is a disappointment.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe the women of the country will not share the view expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because they have had a very good and satisfactory relationship in the advancement of the cause of women in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is not the way I hear it.

Mr. MacEachen: With respect to providing an opportunity to the House to comment on what the hon. member regards as a major change, in that view I believe he is correct. Later on there will be an opportunity for the House to comment upon the creation of the new portfolio of President of the Board of Economic Development. In that respect, the requirements set forth by the hon. member will be fully met and the House will have an opportunity, as I understand it, not only to comment but to judge and decide whether it wishes to accept or reject the creation of this board.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the dropping of the Department of Urban Affairs?

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister and government House leader has indicated that he will speak to the Prime Minister (Mr.

Trudeau) about this matter. I presume he will be speaking to the Prime Minister about making a statement on motions—I hope he will speak to him in that light—which can be examined in detail following our procedure of questions relating to the formation of the ministry.

In the course of that conversation, I wonder if he could speak to the Prime Minister about explaining the fact that a couple of very important ministries, in terms of the future of the country and the policy of the government, are joined. I note that the Department of Science and Technology, for instance, is still joined with another ministry, now the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. That, coupled with the fact that National Revenue and Taxation is now joined with Small Business may indicate a bit of downgrading of those very important functions. I hope this will be dispelled in the statement of the Prime Minister.

I hope the Deputy Prime Minister will draw these matters to the attention of the Prime Minister, and I hope the Prime Minister will deal with them if he makes a statement on motions. I hope he will also deal with the very unfortunate question of what is going to happen to Central Mortgage and Housing, the National Capital Commission and a host of other commissions, and to whom they will be reporting. It was in that light that I directed a question today to the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell). He is the closest to the national capital area. I do not know whether it is the intention of the government, but at the moment the national capital area and eastern Ontario have no minister in the House, and there has not been one for some time. Perhaps the Prime Minister will be able to justify this in his statement. This area, which has been represented since confederation, is not now represented in cabinet and has not been for some time.

PRIVILEGE

ANSWER OF MINISTER OF STATE (ENVIRONMENT)

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege which relates to comments made by the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) in an exchange that took place a few minutes ago.

In response to a question from my colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) the minister said that the proposition being put to him, that there was no agreement by industry in British Columbia to privatize the forest laboratory in Vancouver, was a lot of "bull".

● (1212)

The question is of very grave importance to British Columbia. It is my contention that it is appropriate, when a question of that importance is asked, when it has been well established and it is common knowledge to the public that privatization is not going ahead and the industry has not agreed to pick up this laboratory, that this House and hon. members ought not to be told by a minister of the government that it is just a lot of bull.

I would say that that is a point of privilege. If you hear me out, Mr. Speaker, I think that, through you, the minister, under the circumstances, is required not only to withdraw his remark but to explain in proper detail exactly what the situation is. What the minister said today in this House was that the information that is public is not correct and it is absolutely misleading, and I am sure the minister would not want deliberately to mislead this House.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I was rising on a point of order to comment on this matter, but there is a question of privilege. I think it is quite improper language to use in the House of Commons; only the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is permitted to use language like that.

An hon. Member: You use language like that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the role of determining the question of whether or not improper language was used. The terms used by the minister this afternoon may be slang in their nature, but there is nothing improper in the language used by him. I think we can quickly set that aside. If the minister wants to make that comment on suggestions that have been made, it is his right to do so as long as he does it in parliamentary language.

As to whether the minister disagrees with the position taken, of course, that is a fundamental disagreement and not a matter of privilege. I would need to know that there was something to this question of privilege which relates to more than a disagreement between members.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I was setting out the question of language. The question of privilege concerns the use by the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) of assertions to the effect that he has assurances from private industry that they are prepared to take over that lab and also the centre in Ottawa. Those assurances must be borne out by documentary evidence.

I suggest that since the minister has suggested that he has been in correspondence—he has suggested, but he has not stated explicitly that he has been in correspondence—with these people, if there is correspondence to prove his point then it should be laid before the House.

Mr. Speaker: That may well be a very worth-while suggestion, but there is surely no procedural compulsion on the minister to do so and no vehicle by means of which the Chair could compel the minister, or any other minister, who had made that kind of reference and follow the matter with the tabling of any documents. I have not found any procedural significance in the statements made by the minister during this afternoon's question period. I have not found anything in the nature of a question of privilege. If the member feels that he has some new point to raise, I will hear him.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to contribute to this suggestion. The point of privilege certainly must be that the minister misled the House today.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Oberle: He said that he has evidence with regard to the private sector and the province of British Columbia. Let us not belittle this question; it is a crucial question because 60 per cent of the economy of British Columbia depends on the forest industry. The minister said he has evidence that the private sector is prepared to assume the responsibility and the financing of the B.C. forest products lab. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has evidence that the private sector is not prepared to assume responsibility. I have the evidence.

Mr. Fraser: So do I.

Mr. Oberle: And so does the minister. He has clear evidence, in writing, that the private sector is not prepared, for obvious reasons, to assume this responsibility. I say the minister has misled the House by implying that he has—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we can see the difficulty that we get into when we embark on procedural grounds that are not well founded. As we enter into these discussions, the more permissive the Chair becomes in allowing discussion of points that are not well founded in procedure, the more likely we are to get into further and new questions of procedure. We are certainly very close to raising new questions when these kinds of accusations are made.

Essentially, the minister has stated his position. Members on the opposition side have stated that they disagree with the interpretation given by the minister today. That remains a disagreement and there is not, procedurally, either a point of order or a question of privilege.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria who performed services for the Export Development Corporation during 1977 and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned: By tradition and as a matter of commercial principle Crown corporations have not been required by parliament to answer detailed questions on their administration and operation, and in the case of Export Development Corporation, the Export Development Act places the responsibility for such matters on its board of directors.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR BUDGET DEBATE

Mr. Paproski: I rise on a point of order. Before we begin the budget debate, I believe there is agreement in the House to carry on right through the lunch hour on this particular debate, in order to allow the participation of more speakers this afternoon. I would like that to be put on the record at this time so that we will not interfere with the budget debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the whip of the official opposition is correct. However, I should like to add one comment to it. The purpose of this is to get in as many speakers as possible. I think it is generally understood that no one is going to force a recorded vote on the main motion.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If that is the case, why cannot debate continue right up until five o'clock? In effect, it would get one more speaker in. I do not know whom I am speaking for, but that is one more speaker.

[Mr. Loiselle (Chambly).]

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I did not hear about the proposal which has been made and on which all parties seem to have agreed.

In any case, I am not opposed to it. I think it is quite logical that such proposals be made occasionally because, as I see it, it aims at saving time in order to allow more hon. members to participate in the debate. I therefore say that we are completely willing to support that decision.

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the hon. member for Bellechasse is saying, but we are doing it to facilitate the maiden speech of the new member of the Social Credit party.

Mr. Speaker: The House seems to have consensus on some subject, but I am not sure what it is.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the point we were discussing is an agreement that was reached during the course of last evening to enable more members to participate in the budget debate. The idea was that by continuing through the lunch hour and lessening the time for speeches after the first three speakers, it would give an opportunity for more members to participate in this debate before 5 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: I have no difficulty with it, but I would simply like to know the details of what we are talking about. If the House wants me to make an order, I will be glad to do so. For the House to sit through the lunch hour, we must have an order of the House. Also, if there is agreement to shorten the speeches after the first three speakers, I will have to know by how much they are to be shortened.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that we wish to proceed through the lunch hour. Perhaps you would make that order now. I believe there is agreement on that. Perhaps we could discuss, through the usual channels, the other matter so it can be equally clear.

• (1222)

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed to at this time, that in order to assist the introduction of more speakers, the House proceedings will continue through the usual luncheon adjournment between one and two o'clock, and during that time there will be an effort to reach agreement as to the length of speeches after the first three?

Mr. Paproski: That is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think there is also general consent to my proposition that the motion not be called until five o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Those two elements can be introduced by way of an order at this time. Is it agreed the House will continue to sit during the usual adjournment between one and two, it being understood that no recorded division will be compelled, and that the House will continue to sit until five o'clock to continue the debate until that time? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed, and so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in the past four years I listened to the budget speeches from the gallery here in the House and unfortunately, on November 16, I realized that nothing much was new. This year, I sit in the House as member for the riding of Lotbinière, a riding which had been represented for nine years by Mr. André Fortin. Mr. Fortin had won the respect of all his colleagues and was well regarded by the people of his riding because he worked for them. Today I succeed him in this place and since André often said "Hang in there, boys!", I intend to pursue his work in that frame of mind and really protect the interests of the people of Lotbinière against the whole present administration and bureaucracy.

Last Thursday's budget contained very few good news for the average worker. The minister was forecasting a decrease in the number of new jobs for 1979, down from 362,000 in 1978 to 250,000 in 1979. The only income tax concession was doubling the amount the taxpayer may deduct as job related expenses. Thanks to that measure, 6.2 million taxpayers will be able to share $270 million, and this for next year only. Thus the government resolves to repay every Canadian an average of $43.55 more in 1980. Talk about a fortune. As for the growth rate, it is set at about 4 per cent for 1978 and 4.5 per cent for next year according to the latest forecast by the Department of Finance. Some extremely difficult times are therefore expected in 1978 and 1979 for Canadian workers. Indeed, since there is general agreement to fix at 5 per cent the growth rate necessary to absorb the number of newcomers into the labour market, a substantial increase in unemployment should be in the wind.

Will the new eligibility criteria for unemployment insurance allow young people to draw benefits? Will they depend only on their scarce resources to find a job or will they have to rely on public assistance to subsist? In his financial statement the minister also forgot to mention the percentage of unemployment insurance beneficiaries and of people who cannot get a job. Was this omission due to accident or to pre-electoral rhetoric? Let me refresh his memory. In October 1978, 910,000 men, women and young people were collecting unemployment insurance benefits. It means that 8.2 per cent of the Canadian population was unemployed. These persons will certainly not be able to benefit from the tax credits provided by the minister in his budget. Recently the minister blamed the Leader of the Opposition in the House under the pretence that his housing policy was discriminatory in the sense that it favoured the more well-to-do families, and yet he is just as unfair in his treatment of low-wage workers.

Now what about write-offs for development expenditures granted to mining and oil industries? According to the minister those write-offs to industries will create employment through the acceleration of their performance and development in a climate which is more favourable to production and growth. However, the minister forgets two things. It looks as though the first one will spring surprises. Most new production techniques will accelerate the marketing of products while creating very few jobs. In light of that argument, does the government still maintain that they will be able to create new jobs in the mining and oil industries through a tax incentives policy since the oil industry is now in full development and includes the most prosperous companies in the world? The natural development of that industry would probably have been sufficient to produce the jobs the government wanted so much without having to give tax incentives. Furthermore the government intends to bring Canadian oil prices gradually up to the international level. This policy alone should stimulate the oil industry.

In the special edition of the Financial Post published July 1, 1978 we can see a survey on the largest companies operating in Canada this year. According to that survey, 12 of the 40 main industries in Canada are found in the mining and oil group. The textile sector—which is represented by many plants in my riding—does not show up a single time. We therefore conclude that those industrial sectors, mining and oil, are less affected by the stagnation than the others. Still, they seem to benefit to a greater extent from the government's largess.

The November 16 budget only confirms that tendency. Statistics Canada reveals that in October 1978 there were, in agriculture, 17,000 unemployed; in forestry, 13,000 unemployed; note this, in the mines, quarried and oil wells, 8,000 unemployed, and in the manufacturing industry, 149,000 unemployed. Therefore, why does our Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) intend to promote employment in an industrial sector which already benefits from considerable tax advantages, and in which the rate of unemployment is relatively low, when there are 149,000 unemployed in the manufacturing sector which has the highest rate of all sectors of the Canadian industry?

Research and development in Canada have recently become the victims of political game of the federal government. Indeed, the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) and his colleague, the Minister of Finance, seem to act in diametrical opposition to each other in that field. On the one hand, they insist on the vital importance to our economic base of a policy, for the medium term, that stimulates research and development, while, on the other hand, the government tries to camouflage the budgetary cuts reducing their funding of R and D. So, while the April budget and last week's budget provide about $100 million to finance research and development in industry, that investment is made at the expense of far greater cuts in government funding to the universities and government laboratories in the next two years.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) promised to increase the proportion of the gross national allotted to scientific research and development by .6 per cent from now till 1983, that is from .9 per cent to 1.5 per cent. Unfortunately, attaining that objective now seems very doubtful, especially since last August when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced that a revision of the budgetary priorities was being undertaken.

The Canadian Federation of Biological Societies and the Canadian Association of University Teachers have sent us a working paper which illustrates the scope of budgetary cuts in research and development in Canada. A research recently done by the Toronto Star showed the low involvement of multinationals in Canadian research and development. The Federation of Canadian Biologists asserts that the apathy of those companies stems more from negligence and lack of interest on their part toward Canadian industry in general than from a lack of fiscal encouragement. This position seems valid to us because experience shows that the developing countries have been facing this kind of problem for many years. Moreover, these countries are unable to create local infrastructure favourable to research, which gives birth to insuperable trade balance problems. Is Canada secure from international technological domination? Can Canada afford to let its trade balance deficit grow? I do not believe so.

According to important national bodies, including the Science Council of Canada, the Canadian Association of University Teachers and the Federation of Biologists, we must protect ourselves against technological domination by foreign countries. We must make an absolute commitment to encourage research and development in our universities, in government laboratories and industries in order to prevent economic stagnation. Indeed, without technological stimulation, we will find ourselves in front of an aging, inadequate and non competitive industry.

[Mr. Janelle.]

If we persist in basing our economic development exclusively on a capital intensive machinery, on a resource industry and foreign technology, it will quickly give rise to an unbalanced commercial situation in industrial and manufacturing fields. If such is the case, we must expect a considerable increase in unemployment rates from now till the beginning of the eighties.

The federal procurement policy should be structured to capitalize as quickly as possible on inventions made in our universities. University researchers are not acquainted with marketing procedures for products. They cannot either personally bear the costs related with copyright of inventions. Those circumstances thus compel the scientist to seek the support of an organization having the assets and sufficient business experience to complete the implementation of new technologies. Therefore the government must promote constant contacts between industrialists and researchers and then facilitate the marketing of new inventions. For that purpose the Canadian government should base its promotion project for research and development on the American experience. Let us follow proven experiences.

Mr. Chrétien's budget tries to give us a good over-all picture, but it has no definite features. Although neither the Progressive Conservative nor the New Democratic Party, to say nothing of the Liberals, seem to be concerned, the Social Credit Party of Canada thinks that a high national debt is not the sort of factor that will stimulate the economy. When one considers that in 1978 the interest on that debt was equivalent to the total budget for 1962, the magnitude of the problem becomes obvious. Taxes used to pay this interest are funds lost forever for public administration.

As for the decrease from 12 per cent to 9 per cent of the federal sales tax, the Social Credit Party of Canada thinks that Canadian consumers will be the last to benefit from it. Why did the Minister of Finance not distribute this 3 per cent directly to consumers by way of a discount on the purchase of Canadian made goods? The small taxpayer has therefore nothing to gain from this budget. On the other hand, big business, principally the mining sector, received a large piece of the pie as the rate of write-off of its expenses was tripled. Help is given to big business but what about the workers of those large companies? The Anti-Inflation Board recently rejected an 8 per cent salary increase for Thetford Mines miners, saying that it was too steep. That is a double standard policy. Also, if the government really wants to improve the job situation in the country, why were these tax favours not granted to small and medium-size business? Considering that in October 1978 the manufacturing sector had 149,000 unemployed, compared to 8,000 for the mining sector, why were the manufacturing industries not granted a 100 per cent write-off of their expenses, since this sector generates three times more jobs than the other sectors of activity? I have another example that shows how this budget was ad-libbed. I have here a telegram from the Association provinciale de l'industrie du bois ouvré du Québec Inc. which represents the interests of 450 door and window manufacturers in Quebec. They are dissatisfied. This is what the telegram has to say:

> We strongly object to the 5 per cent tax imposed on materials exempted since 1975. As there was no prior consultation and as no valid reason was given for this modification, we condemn this action and want to see this discriminatory measure withdrawn. The immediate implementation of this 5 per cent tax has had serious consequences for all the people involved. At least a month's notice could have been given and many problems would thus have been avoided. Since your government wants to improve the situation of the Canadian construction industry, we cannot understand this action which will cause perturbations on a market already much affected by the slowdown in the construction industry, and we deplore the fact that all will have to pay for this decision, including manufacturers, builders and consumers.

This is signed by the general director of the association.

I believe that this telegram is quite explicit.

As concerns research and development, the government has once again failed to do anything positive. In September the government announced cutbacks of $20.5 million in 1978-79 and $55.1 million in 1979-80 for research and development alone. How can we imagine that the 10 per cent tax credit for investment will do anything useful for research in small and medium businesses when the government hacks away at the budget of university and government laboratories? At this rate our industrial research will be at a complete standstill within two years if the government does not do something soon to rectify the situation in the field of basic research. The Social Credit Party of Canada believes that we need a valid policy of research and development with a budget representing 2.5 per cent of the gross national product before 1985, of which 50 per cent should be paid by the public sector and 50 per cent by the private sector.

Moreover, in his budget the Minister of Finance has forgotten a vital and important sector of our economy. Among all the government proposals, no mention was made by him of the agricultural sector. Does this mean that agriculture has so little importance for this government that it prefers to forget it? For instance, in 1975 the Minister of Agriculture made a commitment to index the price of industrial milk, but the government has come back on this promise once again this year. Indeed the minister confirmed this in the House when replying to a question asked by my colleague for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). This seems to have become a habit since the same thing has been done in the industrial sector as concerns the contract about the Laprade plant which was signed with the Quebec government. They had made a commitment toward the province of Quebec relating to the Laprade plant, but they failed to respect that contract and thousands of jobs disappeared. In the industrial field, they have created unemployment; in the case of milk producers, they are making them starve to death, little by little.

In order to improve the economic situation, the Social Credit Party of Canada believes that the Government of Canada should increase the purchasing power of Canadians in the same proportion than as the increase in our gross national product. How? Through a 25 per cent discount on the purchase of any Canadian made product, through a national dividend and by lowering interest rates on loans. Interest rates were at 6 per cent in 1967, and they should come back at that level. We must keep in mind that when we say 1967, it means before the disastrous Trudeau government. The total exemption on personal income tax should be raised to $5,000 per person and to $1,000 per dependent child. Finally, as was proposed by the former Social Credit member for Portneuf, Mr. Godin, in January, 1973: "The government should give an income tax credit equivalent to the amount of mortgage interests paid on a family home and to the amount of municipal taxes up to an overall annual maximum of $1,000." Those are all measures which would certainly have been more profitable to the Canadian people than that parodical budget which was brought in by the Minister of Finance last October 16.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for bringing forward a budget which has addressed in a responsible way the main problems facing the country. I also congratulate the new hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle) for delivering his maiden speech. While I disagree with most of what he has said, I think his first effort was very creditable and certainly characteristic of the calibre of service we learned to expect from his predecessor with whom we had worked in the House of Commons for a number of years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: In participating in this debate I would like to address myself to four main subjects. The first is the northern gas pipeline, for which I have responsibility in the government.

The second is the multilateral trade negotiations, for which I have a co-ordinating responsibility in the government and about which a number of questions have been asked by hon. members opposite. I undertook for the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) to make a statement, or that another minister would make a statement on the current situation with regard to these negotiations.

Third, I would like to make some comments about the irresponsible criticism we have been receiving from the official opposition regarding the acquisition by Petro-Canada of Pacific Petroleums Limited and, in particular, the unfortunate and regrettable reflections which have been cast upon the Deputy Minister of Finance in his role as director of Petro-Canada. Comments which have been made earlier in the debate with respect to the conduct of the Deputy Minister of Finance should be answered.

Finally, I would like to return to a subject which was raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in his speech on November 20 when he talked about the power to control government spending. I would like to put on the record some history which would indicate that what the Leader of the Opposition said on that occasion was quite wrong and quite false.

In connection with the northern gas pipeline I would like to say that since the approval by this House last April of the legislation establishing the agency to supervise and monitor the construction of the pipeline, the next most important development was the approval by the United States Congress, following many months of debate and study, of the energy bill which, among other things, establishes a system which will govern the price of gas at the wellhead and the price at which shippers sell it to consumers in the lower 48 states.

As hon. members will realize, the determination of this pricing regime was absolutely essential to the negotiation of contracts between the producers and shippers of gas and between the shippers and pipeline companies. Such contracts are in turn a prerequisite for arranging for the commitment of the vast amount of funds required to finance the building of the system.

Just this week, on the occasion of the visit to Ottawa of the Secretary of State of the United States, it was possible for both governments to emphasize once again the high priority which is attached to the completion of this project. Certainly the Government of Canada has a very deep commitment to the completion of the project, and this commitment is shared by the Government of the United States. Both governments are committed to expediting the building of this system because of the substantial contribution it can make to energy needs, industrial development, and the creation of output and employment in both countries. Indeed, by all accounts these considerations were also an important factor in persuading the Congress of the United States of the necessity for moving forward with the energy legislation and the gas pricing regime embodied in the legislation, which is so essential to the outcome of this project.

Despite the short-term changes in the demand and supply picture there is every evidence that gas from Alaska will be required to meet a pressing United States energy need by the time it is available for delivery to southern markets in the early 1980s. For that reason we remain convinced that the project is economic and that it can be undertaken by private enterprise.

It is our expectation that negotiations for contracts between gas suppliers and gas distribution companies will now proceed, so that the basis can be laid for the financing of this great project. I wish to assure those who are involved, or who may be involved in these negotiations, that the Canadian government believes it to be in the national interest that the construction of the Alaska Highway pipeline should proceed as expeditiously as possible. Our policies and future decisions which may affect the project will continue to be directed to that objective and so, I am informed, will the policies and decisions of the United States administration. As I said, that joint commitment to the success of the project was restated once again this week by both governments in discussions with the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Vance.

Turning to the multilateral trade negotiations, I need hardly remind hon. members of the significance of trade to this country and the significance of a satisfactory world trading environment. This is why Canada has attached such importance to the successful outcome of the multilateral trade negotiations which are now approaching their final stage in Geneva. Our objectives in these negotiations must be considered an important element in our efforts to promote the efficient development of Canadian industry and to gain broader export opportunities for our manufacturers, our primary producers, our farmers and our fishermen. I shall deal by way of report to hon. members on each of these sectors.

On the industrial side, improved access abroad should allow us not only to increase exports and export earnings but to achieve the longer production runs and increased productivity that are needed in many cases for Canadians to compete more effectively both in world markets and in our own. The greater liberation of trade in a number of resource-based sectors should provide similar support to the government's policy of encouraging the further processing of our raw materials prior to export. We have a major interest in broadening our markets for agricultural and fisheries products, particularly, in Japan and the European community.

On the import side, while lower tariffs will obviously involve greater competition from abroad for Canadian producers, they should also, by reducing the costs of imported raw materials and other production inputs, strengthen the competitive position of our own manufacturers as well as bring lower prices or costs to consumers. Quite apart from the changes that will be made in tariffs, I think it should be borne in mind that the new trading rules which are being drawn up in the course of these negotiations will establish the framework for international trade for the next 15 or 20 years.

As a major trading country it has been essential for Canada to take part in this process and to ensure that Canadian interests are taken fully into account. As hon. members know, these negotiations are much more complex than any previous set of negotiations. The earlier negotiations to which we have become accustomed dealt primarily with tariff questions. This particular round of negotiations is attempting to deal as well with broader trade problems, including the reduction or elimination of a wide variety among tariff barriers, and the drafting of international codes of conduct in a number of specific areas.

Attention is also being given to the improvement of certain existing provisions in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to make them more responsibe to changing world economic conditions. In this regard considerable emphasis is being placed on the special problems and needs of the developing countries. At the same time efforts are being made to make the more advanced of the developing countries, a number of which are strong competitors for certain manufactured goods, more fully accountable within the framework of GATT rights and obligations.

I should say, Mr. Speaker, that we have made very extensive preparations for these negotiations. We have undertaken extensive consultations with all the sectors of the Canadian economy and with provincial governments which obviously have a very crucial interest in these negotiations. These consultations will continue, and at each state, as is required, the negotiators will be holding consultations with industry, labour, and the provincial governments.

On the negotiations themselves, I think that we can report a certain amount of progress in our negotiations with the United States. In so far as the reduction of industrial tariffs is concerned, one of the important elements in this area is the prospect of a substantial agreement with the United States. Both sides are still pressing for certain improvements in each other's offer, and complete agreement has not yet been reached. The outlook, however, is promising, but the final shape of the Canadian industrial tariff offer and, indeed, of the U.S. offer as well, will also depend on what other countries, particularly Japan and the European Community, are prepared to do. As matters stand now, further improvement is needed in both cases from the Canadian point of view, and we are pressing for additional changes which would go further to meet our special concerns. In the case of the European Community this is made more complicated by the fact that last summer the Community diminished its original tariff offers on a variety of items of interest to Canada, particularly in the area of non-ferrous metals and forest products.

Agriculture remains an important and sensitive area of the negotiations. Canada has continually stressed the importance of an acceptable settlement on agricultural products. This would involve improved access to markets, particularly those of the Community and Japan, and a greater degree of control over agricultural export subsidies. Special arrangements for dairy products and bovine meats are also being pursued. As a separate matter efforts are being made to reach new understandings on trade in wheat and course grains.

Broad success in the agricultural negotiations will not be easy. In so far as negotiations between Canada and the United States are concerned, each side is still seeking further concessions from the other, but there are prospects for a mutually advantageous agreement, one that would reflect the basic interests of the two countries in their future trade and that would promise a greater degree of harmonization of North American agricultural tariffs.

As the House will be aware from the statement made by the Minister of Finance, we are negotiating with the United States and other countries separately from the MTN with respect to changes in the Canadian tariff for fresh and processed fruits and vegetables, arising from the recommendations of the Tariff Board. Finally, on a more general plain, the Community and the United States proposed an approach designed to provide a new framework within GATT for looking at ongoing problems of agricultural trade.

On the very important question of fisheries there appears to be prospects for meaningful access to the United States market, although certain improvements in its offer to Canada are still being sought. The offers so far put forward by Japan and the European Economic Community are less satisfactory, and both are being urged to put greater concessions on the table. I can assure hon. members that in these areas in the negotiations, as in all others, the priority interests of various regions of Canada are being vigorously pursued. In so far as the fisheries are concerned the reduction of trade barriers is indeed important if we are to take advantage of the potential for greater exports of both traditional and underutilized varieties arising from the extension of our fishing zones.

I come now to a very important and technical subject, namely, the international codes of conduct. In this context work has been going forward on codes which deal respectively with technical barriers to trade, government procurement subsidies and countervail, and customs valuation. In these areas not only have we been concerned with the liberalization of trade but with its fairness and certainty from the import and export points of view. In broad terms, the principal objective is to attempt to bring a greater degree of international discipline to bear on certain measures which, whether deliberately or not, can have a serious effect on the flow of trade.

I draw to the attention of hon. members situation report No. 4 which was published on October 30. The report deals with international codes of conduct, and it describes the situation as of that date. That would be a more efficient way for hon. members to bring themselves up to date on the question of the codes which are being negotiated at the present time.

Earlier in my remarks I referred to the work which is being done to improve and clarify certain provisions of the general agreement, to make them more responsive to changing world economic conditions. One of the most important provisions under discussion is that relating to the use of safeguards, that is to say, measures by which imports that cause or threaten to cause serious injury to domestic producers temporarily can be restrictive.

At a time when efforts are being made to reduce tariffs and further liberalize world trade, it is important to ensure an effective mechanism is in place to protect ourselves against disruptive import competition. What we and other participating countries now are looking toward in Geneva are improvements in the current rule which will accomplish two things. One is to provide more effective, efficient and more certain procedures to deal expeditiously with whatever injurious situations may arise. The other is to make sure that such procedures are not used irresponsibly. Once again we have interests both as an importer and an exporter. These negotiations are of tremendous importance to Canada. In developing our position at Geneva we have tried to provide benefits for all sections of Canada and in all sectors of the economy. As we draw to the final days of these negotiations, that will be our continued objective.

Obviously changes will take place in the Canadian economy. Some of these changes will occur regardless of the conclusion of the multilateral trade negotiations. They have taken place already, but whether changes occur for reasons apart from trade negotiations, or whether they occur because of trade negotiations, it will be necessary in consultation with industry and in collaboration with the provinces for the government to provide adjustment assistance. Already arrangements are being made to phase in tariff changes over a period of years, perhaps a fairly lengthy period of eight years. In addition to that, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) indicated that a range of measures designed to assist individual workers and firms will be put in place. It is designed to assist them in adjusting to both the opportunities and challenges which the economic environment of the 1980s will bring, including those which will flow from trade negotiations.

In conclusion, the timetable established at the Bonn Summit last summer is still in effect. Last weekend the Canadian trade negotiator, Mr. Warren, was in Geneva. At that high level meeting, once again it was undertaken that a continuing effort would be made to conclude firm understandings by the middle of December. These firm understandings would provide the general framework for future tariff changes.

There were certain dangers concerning the inability of the United States Congress to continue the waiver provision on the countervail. That difficulty has been ironed out, and now it is possible and probable that all major participants will be able to maintain a schedule and reach certain firm understandings by the middle of December. These will not take the form of tariff changes until perhaps March. All these understandings will not be put into the form of agreements until March. At that time we anticipate taking legislative action to implement tariff and other changes which have been undertaken at these important negotiations.

I should like to turn to the question of the acquisition by Petro-Canada of shares in Pacific Petroleums Ltd. The House and the country have witnessed concerted attacks by the official opposition in recent days concerning this acquisition. So, I thought it was important to put the government's point of view regarding this very important transaction on the record. While the official opposition professes to be in search of the truth of the matter, it has done everything possible to confuse the issue. Because of the confusion which has been scattered so generously by spokesmen of the official opposition, a statement of a few simple facts are in order.

The acquisition of Pacific Petroleums furthers the objects of Petro-Canada laid down in an act of parliament. Parliament enacted a law which laid down the main purposes of Petro-Canada, namely, to help ensure adequate supplies of energy for Canadians at a reasonable price, and to establish a considerable Canadian presence in the energy industry. I do not think anyone will contest the fact that the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums will assist Petro-Canada in meeting its goals. Through Pacific Petroleums, Petro-Canada will be in a position to explore aggressively for and develop natural gas finds in the high Arctic, heavy oil in Alberta, and oil and gas off the east coast of Canada, in a manner which takes particular account of Canadian needs.

An important point is that the cash flow from the activities of Pacific Petroleums will enable Petro-Canada to reduce considerably its dependence on funds from the consolidated revenue fund, and to pursue innovative technology for use in the frontier areas of energy exploration and development. Finally, the transaction aims to patriate a corporation with major energy interests in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The transaction has been carried out on a commercial basis, without the use of government funds, but the government approved the necessary supplementary capital budget of the corporation to allow the offer, precisely because the investment furthers the aims of the corporation and is in the interests of the Canadian public generally.

• (1312)

So why does the official opposition constantly talk about the use of government funds? Why does the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) talk about a massive rip-off of the public treasury when he ought to know, as every other reasonable person knows, that no government funds have been used in this transaction?

Mr. Gillies: There is a contingent liability. You are misleading the people again.

Mr. MacEachen: Much has been made of the allegation that this transaction involves the nationalization of industry in the private sector.

Mr. Gillies: Certainly.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) says "certainly, there has been nationalization." It is not nationalization.

Mr. Gillies: What is it then?

Mr. MacEachen: The concept of nationalization is quite different from this particular transaction, which is a straight commercial transaction in which the shareholders have been free to make their own decisions as to whether or not they wish to sell. That is quite different from nationalization, Mr. Speaker, which is a coercive act by the state against the wishes of shareholders. In this particular case the shareholders are free to sell or not sell.

Mr. Gillies: You are confusing again.

Mr. MacEachen: The transaction will also extend the reach of the federal agency in the energy industry, but in doing so will provide Canada with a highly efficient corporation with major interests in this country acting to serve the Canadian public interest in the supply of energy.

Mr. Gillies: You have misled the House again.

Mr. MacEachen: The first question asked by the hon. member—I wish the hon. member for Don Valley would—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. Deputy Prime Minister that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Has the hon. minister unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald).

Mr. Lefebvre: Why don't you stand up and say no?

Mr. Gillies: I said no because he is misleading the people of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont has the floor.

Mr. Martin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Egmont takes the floor, I wonder whether we could clarify the situation regarding time for speakers subsequent to the hon. member for Egmont. I think there has been general agreement that speeches be limited to 20 minutes, with two exceptions. I think the one exception on our side would be the fourth member who may speak this afternoon from here on in, and I believe the House leader on the other side would like to comment.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary is correct. There is agreement to the extent he said. I believe he would also agree that it should be extended to include the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, who will be making his maiden speech later on today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it was a most fascinating exercise on the part of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). I think hon. members of the House would be interested to hear the minister's views on some of what I thought were the current topics of this week, including the budget debate which we are concluding today, the report of the Auditor General of yesterday, or perhaps more interesting than anything, the proposed new Board of Economic Development Ministers, which certainly raises more questions than it answers.

It is passing strange that the government has seen no reason today to come and explain or to give an indication to the House of exactly what are its plans in this regard. Presumably it knows, and presumably we will find out. Again, the Deputy Prime Minister has been engaged in a kind of explanation of the inexplicable, and that would cover the context of his speech today, whether in dealing with GATT or his views and thoughts on Petro-Can.

I want to do something a little unusual, Mr. Speaker. I want to speak about the budget. I am delighted to have the opportunity to do so because I want to focus upon budgetary matters from what may in the minds of most hon. members appear to be a rather unique perspective. I want in fact to focus on budgetary measures that have to do with artistic and cultural industries in this country.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, the proposals in the budget before us are a short sighted and limited response to the major challenges and opportunities of the Canadian nation. Never has the need been more obvious for a new government with a fresh and imaginative approach to economic planning. There is in this budget an almost complete lack of recognition of our potential in just about every field of endeavour. In particular, the opportunity and growth potential within our major cultural industries have been entirely overlooked.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this budget makes a negative contribution, if any, to cultural expression in Canada. The initiative taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in ending the lower tax rate for personal service corporations, which perhaps is justifiable in the broad view, will have a specific impact on the arts in Canada by driving out of this country some of our most talented and successful artists and performers whose commitment to Canada has until now enabled them to resist the strong financial lure to the south.

Earlier this week my leader presented in Toronto a totally different approach in the type of positive initiatives that we would bring to government to challenge and encourage Canadians to realize our remarkable potential, initiatives which would, if anything, attract back to this country the talented people we have lost and not drive them away. He promised, and I quote:

> —measures to encourage Canadian culture as an industry which can bring both income and identity to this nation.

I can assure my colleagues and all Canadians that this is no empty promise. As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, it is my intention this afternoon to present six fiscal measures to stimulate the arts and cultural industries of Canada. Had this been a Progressive Conservative budget, these measures would even now be under consideration by this House.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, the cultural community of Canada is crying out for a renewed and imaginative federal presence. Yet what do we have? We have the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) responding by playing numbers games to explain away this government's budgetary cuts to the arts. The fact is that support available to the cultural community primarily through the Canada Council has dropped in constant dollars in recent years in terms of real value to our creative people. I find it incredible that a Secretary of State would devote so much energy to muddying the waters on an issue so transparent to anyone involved with the arts in this country.

Today there is an increasingly crowded list of priorities for federal action in the field of culture which the present Secretary of State, in his two years in office, has been either unable to recognize or unsuccessful in convincing his cabinet colleagues of their urgency. This government has consistently ignored a fundamental aspect of the confederation debate—the need for Canadians to overcome the barriers of mutual ignorance and misunderstanding that separate us. We believe that a vigorous cultural life in a nation as diverse as ours should be the focus for communication for Canadians—not a target for government cutbacks—at a time when it is most needed.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for instance, is in urgent need of reform and revitalization. The CBC ought to be the centrepiece of Canadian culture, a living challenge to Canadians to share and appreciate our creative diversity. And yet increasing government opposition and insensitivity to the social, creative, and technological demands of public broadcasting have allowed the CBC almost to fade from the Canadian awareness and consciousness.

The Copyright Act is long past due for revision. Our composers are in fact locked into royalty rates unchanged since the act was brought in during the 1920s, which means, in effect, roughly two cents per playing surface to those who perform services as composers under the Copyright Act. Photocopying, cablecasting, video cassettes, even the long playing record album were unheard of in the 1920s. But it will be years before this government is prepared to give our creative talent even basic protection against a half century of technological development and exploitation of their work.

Abroad, Canada's cultural image is a shadow of its full potential. At home, our institutions of culture are starved for funding and our media of mass culture are foreign dominated almost to the exclusion at times of a Canadian presence. Such neglect of our culture, we believe, can only seriously jeopardize the well-being of this nation. We must bring a new vigour to federal responsibility.

● (1322)

The measures I am about to propose this afternoon are but a first step on our part toward confronting the serious problems in one particularly important part of our cultural life. Here I make it very clear that I am speaking primarily and most directly about the industries of mass culture in our country. I believe the federal government continues to overlook the oppostunities of culture as an industry in its own right. In just three areas of mass culture, books, films, and records' retail sales in Canada alone amounted to $1.2 billion last year. Of that, Canadian works represented only 8 per cent. Culturally, we are strangers in our own land, and economically we have been deprived of a whole market within our own borders. Yet the characteristics of the culture industry stongly suggest that a federal program of incentives would be a worth-while economic investment. For one thing, these industries are highly labour-intensive; they are overwhelmingly within the small and medium-sized business sector; they are directly linked to the rapid increase in leisure time, to entertainment spending, and have a high export potential. They could be considered a natural specialization for a country committed to diversity of culture.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

There is probably greater unused capacity in our cultural sector than in any other industry across Canada. In short, Mr. Speaker, our cultural industries are ripe for the type of economic stimulus which only the federal government can offer.

We have been holding a number of hearings and consultations with hundreds of people directly involved in the cultural industry over the last few months. I am pleased that yesterday in the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, the Secretary of State recognized in a positive way this particular initiative that our caucus has taken. We will continue actively to seek advice from the cultural community to this end. The measures we are proposing are, in our opinion, the minimum stimulus needed for these industries to develop their virtually unlimited potential.

The first measure would improve the present untenable positions of our artists under the Income Tax Act. Canadian performers and, to some extent, visual artists, can have sizeable expenses related to their work for which they are not compensated in their employment contracts. If they were self-employed, this would pose little problem, but for a variety of reasons they cannot claim self-employed status with the Department of National Revenue. If they had large incomes, this would not be a pressing concern, but the incomes received by our artists, with very few exceptions, are shamefully low. A fulltime professional actor, to give one example, earns in a year around $7,000, or just half the average industrial wage in Canada, despite years of difficult training and experience. There is, therefore, a serious inequity in our tax laws when these artists cannot deduct legitimate business expenses from their taxable income.

Even salesmen or railway employees have their special situation with regard to high work-related expenses recognized under the Income Tax Act. The United States gives to all of its artists the right to deduct such expenses, without distinction as to their status of employment. Yet in Canada the artist, one of the most precious resources of any civilized society, is seriously disadvantaged and even discouraged by our federal laws.

The Disney report, properly entitled "Federal Tax Issues of Concern to the Arts Community in Canada", devoted considerable attention to the problem. One of the key recommendations of this report, commissioned by the Secretary of State, was to eliminate the distinction, for the purpose of claiming business expenses, between self-employed and employed artists. Surely this is the very least we should expect from government—to alleviate the low incomes of our creative people, incomes which too often either force our artists to head south, or to work only part time at their craft.

On October 26, when I asked the minister what action he was taking on the Disney report, I was surprised to find that after so many months it is still only a matter of study and continuing discussion with his colleagues. I am really surprised and quite disappointed that the Secretary of State so far has been unable to convince the Minister of Finance of the obvious and clearcut need for such a measure. A Progressive Conservative budget would remove this inequity from our tax laws.

The second measure we would introduce concerns the definition of Canadian films eligible for investment incentives. I suppose the single most important reason for the present miniboom in our feature film industry is the 100 per cent capital cost allowance on film investments introduced in 1976. This measure enabled Canadians to deduct from their taxable income the full amount of their investment in film making. Unfortunately, this measure has allowed tax advantages for investments of dubious lasting value to the Canadian film industry. Some fly-by-night operators have moved in and out quickly to exploit and celluloid tax shelters. More seriously, the administration of the film investment allowance has undermined the independence of our fledgling, indigenous film industry. There exists a serious danger this infant industry will become a ward of the Hollywood majors, thus defeating the purpose of creating a genuine Canadian industry.

It seems to us that the heart of the problem lies in the definition of a film eligible for the investment allowance contained within the income tax regulations. We believe it is axiomatic that any fiscal measure in support of the cultural sector must encourage both the creative and the financial control of Canadians. By that basic yardstick, the present definition simply does not measure up. This is not news to the present Secretary of State, who, I am sure, has received representations from many sectors of the film industry to this effect since he assumed office, and I am disappointed that in this budget, as in his partial film policy of last spring, no action was taken.

We believe it is important to strengthen the definition of films eligible for the investment write-off. As a minimum, we would add three requirements: the film's director, production company, and distribution company with domestic rights, must be Canadian, which we would define as a citizen or landed immigrant with one year's continuous residence, or a company that is majority Canadian-owned. We believe that these three straightforward amendments to the tax regulations would significantly enhance the creative autonomy of our film industry and the financial return available to Canadian companies for re-investment. We would also, at the same time, ensure that this strengthened definition included the production of video cassettes, and we would move to ensure that there is significantly more benefit for Canada from film co-production agreements with other countries. By this recommended change you will recognize, Mr. Speaker, we could open up a new and enticing loophole through the co-production agreements.

The third measure would apply the highly successful principle of the capital cost allowance, to which I have just referred to investments in book and sound recording ventures. The major obstacle to the commercial exploitation of Canadian musical and literary talent in Canada, since I believe other countries seem to have no difficulty making money off our artists, is the lack of venture capital. Canadian firms in this sector are too small to generate internally the investment capital needed. Much of the present financing of Canadian books, for example, comes from either our publishers' profits as the agents for foreign firms, or from the Canada Council's block grant program. This is a highly dependent and sometimes subjective relationship. In a high risk business, outside capital will not become available without some form of sizeable incentive.

Within the film sector, production has been encouraged by not only the capital cost allowance, but also by a range of Crown agencies—the CBC, Canada Council, National Film Board, and Canadian Film Development Corporation, to mention just the most basic ones. The complexity and cost of film-making, in our opinion, does justify special assistance to this sector, but not to the virtual exclusion of such influential cultural media as books and records. A Progressive Conservative budget would, therefore, have recognized the urgent need for venture capital in our publishing and recording industries by allowing investments in most Canadian books and records to be eligible for the 100 per cent capital cost allowance.

As with film, we would establish eligibility criteria that ensure creative and financial control remain Canadian. Frankly, we have no interest in allowing tax deductions for investments that are of no value to Canadian firms or artists. Books eligible for the investment allowance would have a Canadian author, a majority Canadian-owned publisher, and a Canadian printer. Eligible sound recordings would have a majority Canadian-owned production company and domestic distributor, Canadian principal performer or performers, and depending on the type of music, a percentage of Canadian-authored music or lyrics.

Although Canada possesses a wealth of musical and literary talent, we have seldom been able to invest the large amounts needed for our artists to compete commercially either at home or abroad. Many Canadian recordings are produced for as little as $5,000, and $50,000 is the absolute limit that any Canadian company can put into an album. Compare this to the $150,000 routinely invested by an American company in the first album of a Canadian performer, plus another $200,000 on promotion, and one begins to realize why Canadian talent represents only 7 per cent of the record sales in Canada. The lack of capital forces our first-rate creative talent to accept second-rate technical quality. We would give this incentive to our recording and publishing industries because we believe Canadian talent deserves better than that.

The fourth measure would provide federal guarantees on loans to Canadian firms producing or distributing Canadian films, recordings, books or magazines. Venture capital, as provided through the 100 per cent cost allowance, is by itself not enough to enable firms in the cultural sector to produce and market Canadian talent at their full potential. They have almost no access to credit through our regular lending institutions, although they face unusually heavy cash demands for sophisticated equipment, advance payments, and promotion campaigns, long before they can expect a return on their investments. The foreign takeover of Canadian firms, such as publishing houses, or more frequently their failure to expand with new market opportunities, can be largely attributed to this lack of operating capital.

A Progressive Conservative budget would make special provision within existing federal programs, such as the Federal Business Development Bank or the Small Business Loans Act, for those firms which are producing or distributing Canadian cultural product. We would provide federal government guarantees on loans from the financial institutions based on three criteria: the firm must be majority Canadian-owned, the firm must have a record of commercial viability, and the firm must have shown a commitment to the development of Canadian cultural material.

The fifth and sixth measures are somewhat different from the first four I have outlined because they would deal directly with the provision of incentives to the cultural market place for Canadian products. In the areas of film, books, magazines and recordings the same problem confronts Canadian works throughout the cultural market place. The distribution systems are so dominated by foreign corporations committed to the tradition of marketing foreign material that only a fraction of Canada's potential for creative output ever reaches the Canadian public. In our domestic market only 7 per cent of records sold, 5 per cent of movies seen, 3 per cent of newsstand magazine sales, and 9 per cent of book sales are Canadian. Unfortunately, we are unique in the industrialized world in the extent to which our mass media of culture, which is the lifeblood of a nation's identity, is controlled from outside our borders. I believe we would undoubtedly lose in comparison to a good many developing nations as well.

Quite obviously, it would be foolish to attempt to close our borders to the output of foreign cultures, as they are themselves part of the excitement and diversity of our own culture. But surely there must also be a reasonable level of communication among Canadians if we are ever to share, appreciate, and even make sense of this tremendous diversity we cherish. By no imaginable standard could we conclude that Canadians today do possess that reasonable level of access to our cultural media needed to communicate among ourselves. The reason is not that we have nothing to say, not that we lack the ability for creative expression. If anything, it has been proven in the last ten to 20 years that we have had a literal explosion of creative activity from one end of the country to the other. But we lack the economic leverage which, for better or for worse, is what gets the cultural product into the mass market in our system.

It will not be enough, as we are quickly finding out, simply to produce creative works of international quality, although there is no doubt in our minds that Canada's cultural community can do so capably. We must equally find ways to gain fair access for these works to the Canadian market.

Here I want to talk briefly about quotas because this seems to have been the primary solution the federal government has advanced over the last few years. Quotas, both voluntary and mandatory, have proven at best a limited success with television, radio, and the movie chains. Where the quota is not flaunted outright, its spirit is often seriously violated. We can well imagine the difficulties of applying or extending the principle of quotas on a broader scale to book and record stores, for example.

There are other ways, so far untried by this government, but which we believe have the potential to succeed. A Progressive Conservative budget would have included incentives to the market place itself to provide fair access for our own cultural works. What this approach would do, in effect, is create a demand or a pull for Canadian books, films, records and magazines, rather than pushing them onto an unreceptive market. There are two likely routes we could follow here, either separately or in conjunction with one another. I want to deal briefly with two market initiatives which I think are quite significant.

Our first option would be to initiate a nation-wide scheme modelled on Ontario's "Halfback" program which was so successful earlier this year. Ontario's experiment was successful because it allowed the holders of losing Wintario tickets to redeem them at half value or 50 cents each, up to a maximum of $2 on the purchase of a Canadian book or magazine subscription. A national scheme based on losing Loto Canada tickets would apply equally to Canadian films and recordings, as well as books and magazines, and joint participation from provincial lotteries would also be welcomed. While it is unlikely such a scheme would be very useful if extended indefinitely, it would in a given period encourage hundreds of thousands of Canadians to try a taste of their own culture, perhaps for the first time.

The second option involves a novel use of the tax system to give an incentive to firms in the cultural market place to promote and sell Canadian. Essentially we would exempt from corporate tax the net profits realized by retail stores on their sale of Canadian books and records, or in the case of movie houses from their exhibition of Canadian films. In the so-called mass market or rack sale of paperbacks, magazines and records, we would apply this incentive to firms at the distribution or wholesale level.

I recognize that a new approach as this will naturally encounter a number of administrative difficulties. On the question of eligible items we would use the same definition of what is Canadian as for the capital cost allowance. We would probably look to the distributors of the product, who will certainly be prime beneficiaries of this incentive, to implement the necessary bookkeeping procedures. We would have to devise an efficient formula for determining the proportion of the firm's expenses used to calculate the net profit figure which is tax exempt. But I am confident that any of these difficulties or technicalities can be resolved in consultation with the firms affected. The potential in this approach certainly makes it well worth the effort. It would not force anyone to "Buy Canadian". It would not subsidize mediocrity. It does give Canadian small businesses a significant incentive to promote and make available creative Canadian works on a more equal basis than is now the case. It goes to the root of our philosophy as a party that workable incentives are a more efficient and acceptable alternative than state compulsion.

These then are the six fiscal measures a Progressive Conservative budget would have introduced to stimulate the Canadian arts and cultural industries, rather than the pale and, in one instance, negative document that we are considering today. I submit to you that they would have a significant, if not a profound, impact on our creative and cultural life.

What about the cost? Our estimates, and I admit they are rough, indicate a rise in the Canadian share of our cultural market from the present 8 per cent to at least 20 per cent. In retail sales, this is a gain of $188 million. In terms of employment there is potential for the creation of at least 5,000 new full-time jobs. From economies of scale we anticipate a reduction in the unit cost of Canadian products of at least 5 per cent or perhaps even 10 per cent.

In terms of exports, once we have a firm foothold in our domestic market, the sky is the limit with our ready access to the multi-billion dollar mass markets of the English and French-speaking world. As my leader stated Tuesday night in Toronto, "We don't need to defend ourselves against the world, but to express ourselves to the world". I think we have to get beyond the stockade mentality with respect to our cultural industry. Instead of simply resisting what has always come at us from the outside, we may have things of international quality in two official languages that others want to share with us from one end of the world to the other. That is the kind of optimism and activity a budget should have entailed with regard to the cultural industries.

● (1342)

Our estimates indicate that the combined cost to the federal treasury of these six measures would be in the neighbourhood of $5 million. That is just a bit more than the Secretary of State paid for our national birthday party, or half the cost to the government of the National Discovery Train. In fact these measures would stimulate economic activity to the extent that they would soon realize a net gain for the federal treasury. The $5 million spent on these six measures could well prove the most cost-effective investment the government could make in any field.

This is the type of investment in our future which a truly concerned government would not hesitate to implement, not simply because it makes economic sense but because, again in the words of our leader, speaking in the city of Toronto, and I quote:

> Because countries are more than economies and constitutions. When we satisfy the last lawyer, and create the last job, we will still face the question: what kind of country are we?—
> That is the fundamental question being asked of those of us who live outside Quebec by those Québécois who want to stay Canadians. And the answer is here—in the turbulent diversity of this city—in the potters and the weavers and the craftsmen starting business across the land—in our 7,000 Canadian authors—and our legions of local historians—and our millions with memories of what this nation means to them.

At the present time we have a burgeoning potential for cultural expression. We celebrate a diversity of interests and activities which are the essence of our country. Yet Canadian culture today is a state-subsidized activity on the margins of economic enterprise. Canadian culture tomorrow could be the growth industry of the decade. And by making it possible for Canadians to express and to share our diversity through our own cultural media, we may in fact contribute something of inestimable value to the spirit of Confederation itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the new cabinet members, the members for Matane (Mr. De Bané), Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) and Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) and to wish them all the success they deserve in their new duties.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to dwell on a few points of the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). Allow me to point out that the moderate growth of the Canadian economy in 1978 is mainly the result of low consumer expenditures. I therefore want to congratulate the minister for reducing the federal sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent which will promote, I hope, increased consumer expenditure while containing inflation at a time when the Canadian economy is no longer subject to price control.

The control of inflation has always been and will remain the concern of the Liberal government's economic policy. And it is precisely the widespread inflation experienced from the beginning of this decade which has been one of the main factors responsible for the decreased competitiveness of Canadian products on international markets. It cannot be denied that this is the main source of our balance of payment difficulties which have brought about the Canadian dollar devaluation over the past two years. The significance of this devaluation should not be exaggerated however as it is one of the factors which are now contributing to the economic recovery of Canada as a whole and of Quebec in particular. As a matter of fact, this factor will doubtless contribute to the rising growth rate of the Canadian economy forecast for next year.

Mr. Speaker, the Gaspé peninsula has traditionally been recognized as an area of slow growth, in spite of the sustained efforts and repeated interventions of the government which sought to favour the development of this area through its regional expansion policy. This policy is now in full swing, thanks to the special fiscal incentives the Minister of Finance has reserved for the Gaspé peninsula and the Atlantic provinces in his budget speech. On behalf of all Gaspésians, I want to thank the Minister of Finance for the special attention he has paid to the slow economic growth of their region, and I am sure that a few hours from now, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) will do the same on behalf of his constituents.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the investment tax credit program which was to expire on June 30, 1980, has been extended for an indefinite period, and the basic rate has been increased from 10 per cent to 20 per cent. This is a change which I had sort of suggested myself last year. I certainly hope that these sectoral incentives will stop some of our young graduates from leaving, for lack of adequate employment opportunities in the area. Another fiscal policy which should hopefully improve the economic outlook of the Gaspé peninsula concerns the write-off for mining development expenditures which is being raised from 30 per cent to 100 per cent, as well as the fact that townsites and social assets required for new mines will qualify to earn depletion.

Mr. Speaker, the mining industry in the Gaspé peninsula is mainly based on the production of copper in the region of Murdochville. Despite the continuous problems that this industry was faced with in recent years, I do hope that these tax reductions together with the improvement of the competitive level of the mining production as a result of the drop of the Canadian dollar, will contribute to assist the mining industry in the Gaspé peninsula. These fiscal benefits are a new factor which could lead to the opening of the Madeleine mines, in Saint-Anne-des-Monts which have been closed down for two years now. I think we will come to a similar situation in the forest industry, especially in the pulp and paper sector. Mr. Speaker, the financial critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for York-Simcoe—who fortunately does not have to worry about a high unemployment level and about the insecurity in the activity of the two industries of wich I just talked—seems to be totally unaware at these facts.

Another measure announced in the budget speech by the Minister of Finance has to do with increasing the air transportation tax to improve government revenues necessary to finance airport services and investments. I do hope this measure will generate enough additional revenue to allow the Minister of Transport to carry out as soon as possible the commitment made by his predecessor in 1973 and reiterated by himself since he took over his portfolio to give the Gaspé area and the Îles-de-la-Madeleine a decent air transportation service. That, Mr. Speaker, is something I have been fighting for vigourously for over ten years. That lack of air service has been and will continue to be a major obstacle to the economic development of the Gaspé area wich could reduce the impact of the particular tax incentives the Gaspé area was given in the form of investment tax credits which I referred to earlier.

One last budget measure I would like to deal with has to do with the extension of the tax incentive for residential buildings. That, Mr. Speaker, is a measure which the financial critic of the opposition omitted to mention for very obvious reasons. Although those tax incentives are mainly for Canada's urban ridings, the people in the Gaspé area were able to benefit under several programs recently introduced by the Minister of State in charge of Urban Affairs, and let me name a few: Under its Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is offering federal funds to repair and improve single-family houses. Furthermore, the National Housing Act provides for various forms of assistance to private non-profit housing corporations trying to arrange for low rental housing for families, old people or groups like the handicapped. Under that same act, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation also offers various forms of assistance whose primary objective is to provide adequate low rental housing, which can be personal residences, homes for the elderly or collective residences.

Mr. Speaker, since 1971, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has contributed to the construction of 525 low rental housing units in the riding of Gaspé. CMHC loans total $9.4 million. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation also contributed to the construction of two homes for the elderly and loans stand at about $2 million.

For three years, people in the Gaspé area have been able to take advantage of the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. This new Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation program, which is called RRAP for short, will provide loans totalling $1.5 million and grants totalling $700,000 and will enable more than 200 homeowners to repair and improve their homes. Under the three programs for non-profit housing and for the rehabilitation of owner-occupied dwellings, the constituency of Gaspé has received subsidies totalling $14 million.

However, in 1976, the Quebec government, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, authorized the construction of low-rental housing in three different municipalities of my constituency, that is Gaspé, Grande-Rivière and Ste-Anne-des-Monts. The Lévesque government has not followed up on the projects for non-profit municipal associations. Moreover, a letter addressed to the hon. André Ouellet and dated January 18, 1977, says the following:

> The Gaspé, Grande-Rivière and Ste.-Anne-des-Monts projects are expected to be dealt with within the 1977 programs of the Quebec Housing Corporation and to be the subject of a subsequent agreement. Our Quebec regional office, which is responsible for this file, will therefore know the details of this project only when the Quebec Housing Corporation submits its assistance requests following the signature of a new agreement.

We are now near the end of November 1978 and nothing has been done yet. This situation has gone on long enough and there is an urgent need for the Quebec government to accept the millions of dollars that the Ottawa government has placed at its disposal to provide residents of the Gaspé area with low-cost housing for low-wage earners and senior citizens. I submit that the Quebec government has deprived the constituency of Gaspé of 200 housing units and of an investment of nearly $5 million in the last two years.

Another program of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which is very popular in the Gaspé peninsula is the one which aims at providing low-cost housing to individuals, families, elderly people or special groups such as the handicapped. Forty-eight housing units at a value of $1.2 million are now under construction at Chandler. Several non-profit agencies are participating in this program at Ste-Anne-des-Monts, Gaspé, Grande-Rivière and Chandler. Our forecast, Mr. Speaker, is that within two years the riding of Gaspé, thanks to this new program, will have 300 additional housing units if the government of Quebec decides once and for all to authorize the building of new low-price housing in those localities as indicated in the January, 1978 letter of the minister. In two year's time the riding of Gaspé will have 500 more housing units.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding my remarks, I would like to speak a few minutes about the fishing industry in Canada. I would feel guilty if I were not to mention the improvements which have taken place in the Atlantic fisheries since the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc) took over the fisheries department. In a speech which he delivered in Moncton last November 10, on the occasion of the meeting of fisheries ministers for the Atlantic region, he said and I quote:

> Our policy was based, secondly, on our wish to control fisheries for the good of the people. Although we are entertaining hopes of expansion for our fleet, too many extravagant projects have fallen through. We did not want, at any cost, to be fooled by the extension of our fishing zone to 200 miles. We wanted to use our resources, first of all, to improve the lot of the fishermen, who very often are at a disadvantage, and make them feel they were the main beneficiaries of that common property.
> To stabilize fisheries and give control back to the fishermen, we needed sound foundations such as quotas, restricted access and the fishery plan which every year from now on coordinates the development of ground fish. We have emphasized the quality aspect of the products and the importance of orderly industrial operations.
> Our efforts have worked. It is no longer a time for laments or blackmail. Never has the fishing industry been so well.

I agree with the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) when he says that the fishing industry is better off than ever before. However, in Quebec and particularly in Gaspé we have serious problems of supply, especially as far as herring is concerned. There is a lack of co-operation between the provinces, fishermen and producers to give Quebeckers access to the herring stocks. As fish go beyond limits without being aware of it, Quebeckers should be able to take advantage of the herring fishing industry just like maritime fishermen and producers. Herring stocks are limited and the question is who owns that herring?

It is unfair to let maritime fishermen catch all the herring; Quebec fishermen should also have access to those resources since herring is fished a few kilometers off the Gaspé coasts. The fishing fleet of Quebec cannot be equipped for purse seine fishing since the Government of Canada has not issued any licence since 1970. Fishermen and producers of New Brunswick have 27 licences for purse net herring fishing and those of Newfoundland have 32 licences. Not a single licence was issued in Quebec.

The herring plants of the Gaspé peninsula and the Magdalen Islands operated only for a few weeks in 1978. The fishermen of New Brunswick were supposed to deliver part of their catches to the plants in Quebec but the agreement was not respected. Gill net fishermen cannot supply the plants because their catches are too small. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment was made aware of the situation in Quebec by hon. members of the Gaspé peninsula, as were also his civil servants and those of Quebec fisheries.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the fishermen, of the workers in the processing plants and the producers, I appeal to the minister and ask him to take steps—the matter is urgent—to ensure that Gaspésians and "Madelinots" can be equipped and get licences like their neighbours in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, that they can get their share of the herring quotas in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Chaleur Bay. Unless a favourable decision is soon reached with regard to issuing licences to the seine fishermen, the herring processing plants which operated only briefly in 1978 will have to shut down, and that, forever. The jobs in the plants which process the larger herring and the value of their production have both increased by about 500 per cent in the maritime provinces in the last few years. Mr. Speaker, the situation is not the same in Quebec. We must find the remedial correctives that are required. The fate of the herring processing plants in Quebec is therefore in the hands of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment of Canada.

[English]

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to participate in this budget debate. I am particularly pleased to follow the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), who talked about a great number of things and concluded his speech—I do not have the "blues" before me—with the implication that members of my party and my leader have been spreading across this country a great deal of information with respect to the acquisition by Petro-Canada of Pacific Petroleums which is not correct. I listened with interest to what the Deputy Prime Minister had to say about this, and it seems to me that if anyone is spreading false information or alluding to aspects of this acquisition which need interpretation, it is the government.

Let me review what the Deputy Prime Minister said. By implication he said that by taking over Pacific Petroleums, Petro-Canada was increasing the supply of energy for Canadians. At this stage that is patently unprovable. The reality is that Pacific Petroleums is a well operated company. It is operating in Canada and finding reserves. By any measure it is managed well. By the measure of profit Pacific Petroleums is being managed much better than Petro-Can. But no one in this House can say that an increased or assured energy supply will be the result of the acquisition by Petro-Canada of Pacific Petroleums. One has to be somewhat skeptical.

We do not know whether the management of Pacific Petroleums will remain with Petro-Canada. We do not know whether the management of Petro-Canada, a nationalized company, will be as efficient as the management of a private company. If we look at other nationalized organizations in this country such as the Post Office, and if we look at the scandalous management of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited a few years ago, how can we be sanguine about the prospect that the management of Petro-Canada will be any better? We certainly do not know. Therefore the first statement made by the Deputy Prime Minister this afternoon was certainly open to question.

The Deputy Prime Minister dealt with security of supply for Canadians, as if the National Energy Board does not exist. Surely the Deputy Prime Minister knows that there is no export of energy from this country without permission from the National Energy Board. Has he no confidence in that agency, which his government had a great deal to do with setting up?

I do not have the words of the Deputy Prime Minister in front of me, but his words with respect to security of supply are clearly open to challenge. When he says that there has not been a nationalization because the government has not expropriated, that seems to be a very peculiar understanding of what nationalization is all about. To anyone who understands these things at all, government ownership is nationalization. It is national ownership. Just because there is no expropriation does not mean there is not nationalization. The confusion of the Deputy Prime Minister about this matter gives me a great deal of concern. If a senior spokesman of this government thinks something is not nationalized because it is not expropriated, we are going to have very serious problems.

If the government moved in and took over the department stores of Canada but did not expropriate them, I suppose the government would not consider those department stores nationalized. Of course they would be. Why is the government pretending that the Petro-Canada acquisition of Pacific Petroleums is something other than what it is?

I was in the committee when Petro-Canada was established. As a member of that committee I asked the then minister of energy, mines and resources whether the position of the Government of Canada was that the private sector could not develop our resources effectively. The answer of the minister at that time was that that was basically the position. The government is nationalizing, and pretending it is doing something else.

The most important issue, the one which brings me into this debate, is that every time members of the government talk about this acquisition they say it is a perfectly private transaction and that the money is being borrowed from banks. We are told that the assets of Pacific Petroleums are being pledged for security for those loans and that the Government of Canada is not involved. Well, that is not true. The fact is that under the Petro-Canada Act and under the Financial Administration Act there is a contingent liability on the people of Canada in relation to this transaction. Perhaps it is the position of the government that contingent liabilities do not matter, but that is dangerous thinking. It is the kind of thinking in which this government has indulged for a number of years.

The government thinks there is no need to be responsible about spending, about accounts, or about liabilities of any kind. I am sure the government does not know whether the people of Canada would be much better served if those contingent liabilities, which are not endless, were used to back loans for housing or to back loans in other areas. Who knows? But when we are talking about this transaction and about borrowing and then not making a final statement, or following the transaction to its conclusion and pointing out that Petro-Canada as an agency of the government, either under its act or under the Financial Administration Act, has a liability and is creating a liability for the people of Canada, that seems to me to be something less than open.

If the government wants to argue that these liabilities do not mean anything, that is all right, but today the Deputy Prime Minister said that the Conservative party is misinforming the Canadian people. He did not follow the transaction through to its conclusion and point out that a liability is being created for the people of Canada. That seems to me to be less than open. It is the government that is misinforming the people of Canada.

In terms of financial obligations, financial accounting, and recognizing liabilities of one kind or another, there is a difference between the party of which I am a member and the government. The position of the government is that these things do not matter, and the government does not talk about them. It was this very type of thinking, as the Auditor General pointed out—that taxpayers' money is a bottomless pit—which has placed us into this trouble that we are in today in the operation of our economy.

It is interesting to participate in the budget debate on its last day. The economic indicators in the country show that the cost of the living is up a full point, the Canadian dollar has declined again, unemployment is still high, and our trade balance is down. These are all negative factors in the operation of our economy. Why do we not, in a rich and prosperous country like Canada, have an economic performance which is more tolerable than we have been getting? No longer can Canadians believe that it is because of what is happening in the rest of the world. Surely Canadians realize now that we are in the economic difficulty we are in because of the total mismanagement on the part of the government.

What is a budget about, Mr. Speaker? Up until the middle 1930s, indeed up until World War II, it had a very simple purpose, to raise the money necessary to finance expenditures which are in the estimates. It seems really naive to think that way today. Nobody today thinks that the purposes of the budget is to raise money to finance the expenditures of the Government of Canada. If the people on the government benches would realize that the things they are promoting have to be paid for and had the courage to tax for them, then I think we would have some restraint.

After the 1940s, budget-making changed, and the purpose of the budget was more or less to set an economic policy for the nation. The goals of that economic policy-making are reasonably well known—to have relatively full employment and relative price stability. If the government is not going to use the budget to raise money to pay for its expenditures, I suppose it could always cop out and say, "We are going to use the budget to direct the economic performance of the nation in the course of the next year or two to get reasonably full employment and relative price stability."

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has brought down a budget which increases the deficit, so out the window goes any idea that the budget is used to raise finances for expenditures. The minister predicts that the unemployment rate will rise and that we will end up with an inflation rate of around 6 per cent. A year ago he said the inflation rate would be around 4 per cent. This budget does nothing for our economic policy and nothing to raise the revenues that we need for expenditures about to be undertaken by this nation. This budget simply deals with the mechanics of the operation of the government cash balances and cash needs.

Some people have said that we have a very responsible Minister of Finance because he did not bring down a political budget. In fact, it is one of the most political budgets that has ever been brought down, because what has to be the bottom line for this budget is that this government is not prepared, under any circumstances, to see the value of the Canadian dollar drop below 84-85 cents on the foreign exchanges. Indeed, in the budget address the Minister of Finance said that it is the position of the government that the value of the Canadian dollar should remain around 85 cents as compared to the U.S. dollar. What he is really saying is that the Liberals have to get ready for an election and that they cannot afford for the Canadian people to see the economic failure of this government dramatised by a falling dollar.

This government does not care about the millions of Canadians who are out of work or about inflation. It wants to keep the dollar at around 85 cents so that Canadians will not have a clear and simple indicator of how great the mismanagement of this nation has been under the administration of this government. Politically, it is unacceptable for the dollar to fall below 85 cents. I do not see how anyone can make the interpretation that this is a responsible budget and a responsible minister when the budget does nothing to meet the needs of the people of Canada, but merely attempts to ensure the political survival of a party.

If we ever needed in this country a budget with imagination that would do something for our problems, it is now. Yet the Minister of Finance did nothing, clinging to the hope that somehow he would manage to get along, fooling the Canadian people for another few months that the economy is not in as bad shape as it truly is.

The announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today of his cabinet shuffle is another disappointment. The Minister of Finance, who has presided over an increasing deficit, increasing unemployment and increasing inflation, is left in his portfolio. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), who has been something less than a world leader in his department, is left in his portfolio. Canadians who are really concerned about their country must be wondering what is happening. We get something called a board of economic development that leaves the Minister of Finance in an ex officio position. What kind of Minister of Finance would stand for the establishment of such a board without a major role being played by the minister himself? As for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, they even took his deputy minister away for this new board. Another bureaucratic structure is created when what is really needed is strong competent ministers who understand the problems and have the courage to bring in the solutions that are necessary to get this country moving forward again.

We need reform of economic policy-making in this country. It has been spelled out many times by members of my party. We need reform in the operations of the finance committee. We need to have hearings, before the budget is brought down, with competent people around the country, and we need to have some control over expenditures in this House of Commons. Every member of parliament knows that when he or she is elected, his or her constituents think he or she is going to do something about controlling expenditures, and every member here knows, if he is honest with himself, that this government has no control over the expenditures in the way they are set up at the present time.

Instead of moving where we need to move to strengthen our key portfolios, we find today that the Prime Minister has done nothing and has allowed to remain in these key positions ministers with proven records that they cannot handle their job.

I would like to put on record that I believe, and the members of my party believe, that Canada can enter, and is about to enter, one of the most prosperous periods in its history. I am very bullish on the next decade for Canada. There is so much to do in terms of pipeline, energy development, steel construction, light manufacturing and so on. The most prosperous nation in the world, bar none, in the 1980s can be and probably will be Canada. In that prognostication I am not speaking as a member of parliament. I am speaking as an economist. The strength of Canada is ahead of us.

• (1422)

This rightful prosperity will happen, however, only if we have the benefit of a government which knows how to manage the economy. What we have had for the last ten years will not do. We require a government which understands that the private sector uses resources efficiently. We require a government which has confidence in individuals and believes in rewarding initiatives. We require a government which will turn the strengths of the nation loose. We were built as a nation of entrepreneurs and individuals who had enormous confidence that they could operate within the framework of a government which understood its responsibility and left individuals alone to work and prosper.

I do not think there is any question that after the next election there will be a new government in the country. The speech of the Minister of Finance on budget night and the speech of the President of Privy Council today indicate the need for a new government, not more of the same.

Canadians have a clear-cut choice in the next election. Do they want a government which believes in government involvement in large segments of the economy, government regulations in large segments of the economy, and more and more nationalization? Do they want a government that believes the state operates things more efficiently than the private sector? I don't think so. What Canadians want is a government which will provide a framework in which they may work, prosper, and be rewarded. They want a government which believes in them as people and in enterprise as a system. My party will give Canadians such a government, a government which will turn the country around, so we may move into the last 20 years of this century and become, without question, one of the most prosperous nations on the face of the earth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, on budget night it was most heartening to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) say, "Let me turn now to the resource industries, and mining in particular". It was heartening because of the important role the mining sector plays in the economy of the country.

Since 1950 mineral production in Canada has contributed directly approximately 4.5 per cent to our gross national product. Minerals, excluding fossil fuels, account for 10 per cent of the value of Canada's exports, and fabricated mineral products account for another 10 per cent. Last year nearly $3 billion in wages were paid to workers engaged in mining industry activities. Mining continues to be an important influence in the frontier development of the country. With that background, it was heartening to hear the Minister of Finance turn his attention to this sector.

Despite what mining has contributed to Canada, the Canadian mineral industry continues to be under-developed compared to that of the United States and New Zealand. Studies have shown that higher exploration costs, falling returns, and increased risks have had a negative impact upon mineral enterprises in Canada. In April of this year the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources published a survey entitled; "Known Mineral Deposits in Canada that are not Being Mined". This rather substantial document presents a compilation of known Canadian mineral deposits which, while neither in production now nor announced for production, are either economically exploitable today or are within the reach of becoming so during the next 25 years, as a result of foreseeable economic and technological changes.

The authors of this survey have attempted to identify certain bottlenecks which have hindered primarily mineral resource development. Of course they mentioned national economic conditions, the international market situation, and metal prices. All of these play a large role in development decisions. One obstacle which stands out in the report is that of the unpredictability of trends in real costs of financing, development, and mining. The Minister of Finance helped in a significant way to offset this uncertainty by announcing that the current write-off for development expenditures in mining is to be raised from 30 per cent to 100 per cent.

In his budget address the minister noted that federal and provincial resource ministers have done an in-depth review of the tax situation in mining. This analysis was badly needed because of the uncertainty created for the mining industry by changing provincial taxation and the federal-provincial dispute on mineral taxation. During the 1970s increased taxation levels resulted in lower mineral production expenditures. The sector task force on the Canadian non-ferrous metals industry concluded the following:

> The taxation of mining income across Canada is chaotic and perverse. It has resulted in a situation in which development of all but the richest discoveries would be uneconomic even when demand and prices improve. As a result, exploration activity in this sector is far below the levels needed to sustain present production, let alone provide for growth.

To establish a level of confidence which will ensure future growth and stability, the mining industry has recommended that federal and provincial governments agree upon a uniform definition of taxable mining income, and a combined federal and provincial tax rate or rates not exceeding 45 per cent net of resource allowance.

By means of taxation, governments should be encouraging the growth and expansion of mining. The industry should be helped to become more competitive on an international scale. I know that not everyone agrees with this position. There are those who argue strongly against any tax preferences for the resource sector. In their minds, these preferences discriminate against investment in the manufacturing and service industries. I should like to challenge that thesis.

● (1432)

First, I would point out that mining, at best, is a high-risk enterprise. There is a high degree of risk involved in mineral exploration. For every mine eventually brought into production, there are hundreds of uneconomic "prospects" which have been evaluated at great expense of time and money.

Secondly, it seems to me that if we discourage the investment of capital for mineral exploration and development in Canada, it does not then follow that this capital will automatically flow into manufacturing or into the service sector. Instead, what is likely to happen is that we will choke off the inflow of foreign capital, and this capital that would have come into Canada, plus Canadian capital that would be designated for resource development, will simply go somewhere else in the world. It will go where the investment climate is more favourable than it is here. So there is no way in which, if we discourage mineral exploration and development, we are going to help any other sector in the country. In the long run we will simply be hurting ourselves.

Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, mining, rather than detracting from the manufacturing and service sectors, provides some very definite benefits. Canada is a world leader in the production of mining equipment and machinery. We have an enviable international reputation for the expertise of our professionals in the fields of mining and exploration.

There is a research paper, with which members may be familiar, produced by the Library of Parliament, on the subject of mining in Canada. This paper speaks of the changing image of our mining companies from that of hardy pioneers to one of profit-hungry plunderers of our irreplaceable natural resources. The paper makes it clear, as I want to do, that both these images are, of course, extreme. The mining industry, like any other business enterprise seeks to earn a reasonable return and it wants to operate under a set of rational rules which will not be subject to change at a whim. Our tax structure ought to promote the healthy, long-term growth of the mineral sector, while at the same time providing fair returns to the provincial and federal governments.

Any discussion about mining, Mr. Speaker, is bound to centre on such topics as investment, exploration, development, taxation, international markets and prices. But as well there is a very human side to be considered. Mining means jobs, and mining development involves the building or the expansion of communities. When an ore body becomes depleted, or when a mine cuts back because markets are soft and prices are too low, then we witness a community in crisis.

Atikokan, Ontario, which is in my constituency, is today facing the grim reality of a rapidly depleting ore body. Atikokan has a highly developed townsite, an existing pellet plant and other infrastructure necessary for a mining operation. What it needs now is another source of ore. It so happens that there is nearby, at Bending Lake, an iron ore deposit which is close enough to Atikokan that the townsite could continue to be used and the concentrates could be transported via slurry pipeline to the pellet plant in the town. Unfortunately, because of the over-supply of iron ore pellets in the Great Lakes region, it has been announced that at this time it is not possible to proceed with the development of the Bending Lake project.

Such a notice in the business section of the Globe and Mail probably gets no more than a passing glance from most readers, but in Atikokan the repercussions of this decision are deeply felt. The Bending Lake project would have provided almost full employment for the 600 employees now working for Steep Rock in Atikokan and who will, within the next year or so, be laid off.

The Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration did a study or a background report which was entitled "The Social Characteristics of One-Industry Towns in Canada." Many mining communities fit into this category. In summary, the report referred to the precariousness of such communities, and how uncertainty about the future encourages residents to perceive that they share a common fate. The report goes on to mention feelings of dependency, powerlessness, resignation, and fatalism which prevail. I refer to this social phenomenon, sir, because it is so easy to consider the mining industry only in statistical terms, and to fail to appreciate that there is a human dimension as well. Government programs and policies must more and more address themselves to this reality.

The royal commission background report to which I have referred uses a 1971 study by Rex Lucas entitled "Minetown, Milltown, Railtown: Life in Canadian Communities of Single Industry." Lucas has identified four stages in the development of single-industry communities, and those of us who represent resource regions know these stages all too well.

The first stage is that of construction, where the community attracts a highly mobile population willing to make many short-term sacrifices in exchange for some quick money.

With the construction stage under way, the second stage of recruitment begins. Here, the company seeks out professionals and labourers as company employees. For these people, resettlement from somewhere else is often difficult. The townsite itself, or the expansion of an existing one, is under construction. The emphasis of those who come is upon occupational opportunities. Population turnover nevertheless remains very high. Many young couples, for example, leave shortly after arriving, and they leave because there are few job opportunities in such circumstances for women, and there is a lack of physical amenities in the town. There is also an absence of recreational and entertainment facilities.

It is at this stage that governments could be of greatest assistance with various forms of financial support for infrastructure development. In his budget the Minister of Finance has proposed that for new mines the costs of associated townsites and social assets should earn depletion. This is a step forward and should ease some of the problems associated with the development of new mines. As housing and community facilities improve, the rate of population turnover slows and there is a reduction in various types of social problems.

Stage three is that of transition, during which control in the town passes from company or provincial administration to the citizens themselves. During this stage we see the genesis of a stable community, a substantial reduction in population turnover, and an upturn in and positive emphasis upon more community participation.

After a number of years the community may reach the stage of maturity. At this stage there is very little mobility in the adult work force. Retired workers remain in the community. Some of the young people become employed in the local industry. Workers build up seniority and benefits. Money is invested in homes. Nevertheless, people in these communities remain in a state of dependency, because they are aware that the industry could shut down due to factors completely beyond anyone's control. So feelings of insecurity and pessimism are common. As one researcher put it, "Only with a diversified economic base can a community achieve full maturity."

In mining, the productivity of labour and capital has been declining since 1960. The Science Council of Canada suggests that the origin of this problem lies in labour shortages and turnover, in the low level of technological innovation because of low return on investment, and in the low yield of ores that are being extracted. All of these, of course, are in addition to what I mentioned earlier, the high rate of taxation.

● (1442)

The Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration background study to which I referred earlier, suggests that to Lucas' four stages we might add a fifth, that of decline. Here, the industry does close down and the town goes on the skids. Those who cannot find work elsewhere are left with virtually nothing. There is little market value for the houses. Bitterness and desperation set in among those who have invested their lives in a community which is now dying.

I have taken a little time to describe this Pilgrim's Progress into the "Slough of Despond" so that other Canadians from settled urban areas may know a little of life in the developing resource regions of Canada. For those who live and work in those regions, I would suggest, as I have on other occasions, that there ought to be some special tax benefits. To reduce the turnover rate, and to attract employees from urban areas where unemployment is high into regions where jobs go begging, we should offer some form of personal income tax relief, at least for those employees who remain on the job for a minimum of two years.

The Sector Task Force on the Canadian Non-Ferrous Metal Industry recommends a graduated scale of income tax remission varying with the degree of isolation and latitude. Another suggestion was that the incentive scale be graduated on the basis of temperature, by isotherms rather than geographic parallels.

Canada's economic identity has largely been based on a long tradition of growth in resource-based exports. The probability of this pattern continuing for much longer is very low, even though much of this country's huge area has only recently been the subject of intense mineral exploration. It is not, therefore, that we are running out of these resources, but that increasingly other countries are emerging as competitors and cutting into Canada's traditional share of international sales and laying first claim to any market growth. The U.S.S.R., for example, is only now beginning significant entry into the world mineral markets, and it has a vast resource base with much capability to exploit it.

Canada is vulnerable to these changes. We must continue to be supportive of our resource industries by means of public policy—including a fair tax system, incentives for exploration and development, and built-in economic advantages for those who invest their working lives in mining communities. The regional increases in the investment tax credit can be of some value to the mining sector. Above all, strong domestic growth is urgently required. This is a time for more stimulus in the economy. Contrary to what the previous speaker said, I believe that the budget now before us moves cautiously and quite responsibly in that direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege and an honour to have been given the opportunity to speak in this House. My compliments to you, Mr. Speaker, for the admirable fashion in which you conduct the business of this House under what certainly has to be described as adverse conditions on occasions. Please convey my best wishes to the representative of the Crown and the personal emissary of Her Majesty the Queen in this country, His Excellency, the Right Hon. Jules Léger, Governor General of Canada, and his lovely wife, Madame Léger.

My congratulations to the other fourteen successful by-election candidates recently elected. Some have had the opportunity of presenting themselves to the House during this debate or in other fashions, ahead of me. They certainly have done so in a most admirable fashion.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, Fundy-Royal which was so respectfully and admirably represented in this House by the former Progressive Conservative member, Gordon Fairweather, is a diverse constituency, nestled in Her Majesty's picture province of New Brunswick, extending from, and including, a portion of the eastern section of the city of Saint John, to the borders of the city of Moncton, on the east. It runs from the west, from more or less the boundaries of the beautiful Saint John River valley, which is known among geographers as "The Rhine of North America", up to and including a portion of Sunbury county, which lies in proximity to the capital of New Brunswick, Fredericton.

It then extends along a northern boundary which includes the principal coal mining regions of New Brunswick, the towns of Minto and Chipman. In the heart of Fundy-Royal is Sussex, the dairy centre of Canada.

There are many areas I could speak of in relation to economic development—or perhaps I should say the lack of it—in the constituency of Fundy-Royal, including agriculture, coal mining, the forest industries, potash development in the Sussex region, the Fundy trail which this government and the provincial government of New Brunswick have been talking about for so long without seeming to get any closer to agreement, but, unfortunately, time does not permit me to do so. I will have to deal with these subjects at a later time.

I should like to discuss, however, the business of unemployment in Fundy-Royal. It is certainly an area that is neglected and one where we feel there is great room for improvement and changes.

The Atlantic region, as perhaps you know, Mr. Speaker, is handled by Statistics Canada on a seasonally adjusted basis. This is extremely misleading. There is a very high seasonal component to unemployment in the Atlantic region, and in Fundy-Royal it renders the figures provided by Statistics Canada meaningless on most occasions.

The proposed changes under consideration by this House to the Unemployment Insurance Act are very critical to New Brunswick. Under present circumstances, if the bill passes the way it was presented, it is estimated there will be an additional 10 per cent load on the social services budget of the province. At a recent meeting of the federal and provincial ministers of social services it was suggested that the government consider a two tier rate structure. I put this to the House and to the government for consideration. Very simply, it is based on a 50 per cent maximum insurable earnings structure without dependants, whereas clients who have families or dependants would remain at the 66⅔ per cent level or possibly be reduced to the suggested level of 60 per cent.

The saving in New Brunswick alone is estimated at something in the vicinity of $26 million for this year, which is worthy of note. Of course the saving across the nation would be much greater.

I was pleased to hear that the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration has apparently agreed to allow provincial ministers to participate. I am sure they will benefit from the experience and knowledge of those ladies and gentlemen who will be contributing to the proceedings.

The lower regions of the riding encompass the bedroom communities of New Brunswick's largest city, Saint John, and includes Kennebecasis Park, Renforth, Riverside, Kinghurst, Rothesay, Fairvale, Gondola Point, Quispamsis and Hampton, on the Kennebecasis River, and Grand Bay and Westfield on the Saint John River.

Mr. Speaker, Fundy-Royal is, as I have outlined, a diversified constituency which depends, to a great extent, economically, on the intuition and ingenuity of the people who make up the population. There is within its borders a goodly number of small business people, including a high portion of the productive farmers of New Brunswick. There are fishermen along the Fundy coast who depend on the seas for a living. There are small manufacturers, not so small manufacturers, service industries, and household managers, commonly known as housewives. All of these people have to try to make it in an economic environment which, thanks to the present government, is totally incompatible with the aspirations, hopes, and ambitions of an ambitious, conscientious and arduous population.

From the standpoint of the household manager, what has been offered in this budget for her? A paltry one dollar per week maybe! As for the rest of the small business community, nothing. There is absolutely nothing except a promise to professions, such as medical doctors and lawyers, that if they previously used a vehicle developed by the government to their advantage, which is what any prudent business person would do, be it someone running a multi-national company, or a small country doctor, then they were labelled as bad scamps, unfair, cheaters of the government, and they must be stopped.

Let us deal with a typical rural doctor. First of all he is regulated in most provinces across this nation by a medicare program, which regulates and dictates his schedule of fees, whether it be for the administration of a common laxative, or the delivery of a baby in a hospital 30 or 60 miles away from his office. He is, in most cases, on call 24 hours a day and tends patients in a hospital most every day miles from his office.

He maintains a telephone system, which is sophisticated enough to transmit and respond pertinent information to him when he is away from home. He inserts ads in local newspapers when he will be away from his office for more than a few hours. He maintains an office which is completely equipped with enough medical paraphernalia that would make most small hospitals of a decade ago look antiquated. He maintains a staff of at least two, that is, if he wants to clean up the office himself. He maintains records that are suspiciously similar to most legitimate businesses including accounts receivable and accounts payable. He attends seminars and continuing education programs to ensure that he is kept up to date with the latest technology. He often is a dispensing physician, which means that he must maintain an inventory of drugs and medications accounting for same, just as a druggist would. His salary, after expenses, is probably $30,000 to $40,000 per year, much less than that of many of the bureaucrats gracing this hill.

This is the villain, Mr. Speaker, that this government says is no different managerially speaking than the guy who goes to work at 9 a.m. in the morning and returns at 5 p.m. at night, and who collects his pay cheque every week. This is the villain, Mr. Speaker, that this government probably considers as another enemy. If it is the government's intention to discourage, and scourge society of this particular rascal, the family doctor, it is doing a particularly efficient job of it. Before the present measures that effectively ensure that a legitimate businessman is eliminated from taking his rightful place in the business community, the situation for MDs surgeons and others in their related fields, was unpalatable enough. This government knows they have been leaving the country in droves for greener pastures in the United States. It will be interesting, and I predict tragic, for this country to witness what the present measures brought in by this government will do to aggravate further an already serious situation.

But this is the attitude that this government has toward small business. They are to be used and intimidated. Not destroyed, yet, because they are the largest group of taxpayers, producers, and employers in the country. But they are certainly to be intimidated.

The Department of Justice keeps on staff a "stable of legal beagles" paid for in the most part by the labour of small business, whose sole purpose it is to prosecute, persecute, and short of execute whoever the Department of Justice can get their clutches on, as long as the villain is from the private sector.

Woe befall "chump citizen, small businessman", if he does not have resources equal to the Bank of Canada to take on this battery of would-be deputy ministers. Although admittedly that is not as ridiculous a thought today as it might have been in better times. No, I suspect the facts will bear me out that the majority of Goliath and Tom Thumb legal engagements end up with a hasty capitulation by Tom, not because he knows he is wrong, but because of the sheer financial terror with which he is not so gently faced.

Fundy-Royal is a constituency steeped in tradition, Mr. Speaker. It is a portion of the country that believes in the basic principle of freedom. Its people recognize the sacrifices that Canadians have in the past made for their country materially, psychologically, and physically. We honour and revere the symbol of the sacrifices our forefathers, sisters, brothers and cousins have made on our behalf to preserve the freedom of our nation.

The Crown is a symbol of these sacrifices. The Crown is the symbol of freedom. The Crown was the source, the blood, the cause that inspired free men to lay down their lives so that we may be free. I am reminded, Mr. Speaker, of that old verse, time worn but as meaningful now as it was then:

"It is only an old piece of bunting,
It is only an old piece of rag,
But millions have fought for its honour,
And thousands have died for the flag."

I know that those of us in Fundy-Royal, as well as by far the majority of Canadians, do not want any lessening of the role of the symbol of democratic freedom that has made this country great. Fundy-Royal will not tolerate any infringement upon the sanctity of the role which the Crown and monarchy have in this country. Canadians will not tolerate any infringement upon the role which the Crown and monarchy have in this country.

I see the present government's move in this direction as being most sinister indeed. In the process of the establishment of a totalitarian, one-party government system, the one measure universal and peculiar to all who seek to establish themselves in this fashion is to seek out and destroy the people's rallying point, their inspiration, the symbol of their freedom, the symbol of their future. They strive to seek out and destroy the institution, the heritage, the spirit, and the truth of the people. This is socialist ideology, Mr. Speaker. My socialist neighbours refer to the private sector as some sort of bogeyman. I would remind them that it is due to the perseverance of this group of ambitious and far-sighted individuals in the private sector that the country has given them the opportunity to espouse their rhetorical nonsense. They should be reminded that the public sector and the private sector in this country are comprised first and foremost, of human beings who all breathe and bleed, and who in most cases are Canadian.

The squacks and bleats so often heard from my immediate left are indicative of the disdain, disregard, and contempt in which most of them hold the House in our system of democracy. That, of course, is not surprising, as democracy is hardly their bag or game unless taken in the context of sport, in which case it is fair game, and they would destroy the animal. Any jackass can kick a barn down, but it takes a damn good carpenter to build one. The only time that these dreamers are quiet or still is when one of their own gaggle is spewing some of their ideological twaddle.

It is distressing that frequently the House has difficulty distinguishing between the party presently in power and these social whiners to my left. Although the direction that the government has taken recently with reference to its budget has not been inclined away from a more realistic attitude toward a reasonable and sane direction in political philosophy, this is not to be interpreted by the Canadian people as any great permanent change in political direction by the leader of this government whose socialist background—and I am being kind,—is well known to many Canadians, but it is rather a matter of political expediency.

It is obvious that the people of this nation agree that we, as a nation of Canadians, are psychologically and mentally sophisticated enough to cope with and thrive on the free market system and that we do not need, nor indeed want, Big Brother orchestrating and directing our affairs.

I am distressed and concerned, along with my neighbours and constituents in Fundy-Royal, and thousands of my fellow Canadians, when the Prime Minister of this country publicly states, as was reported on the front pages of the Toronto Star on November 18, that the media and the opposition are the enemies of the government. This attitude by the Prime Minister is indeed dangerous, and one to which I know the people of the country take great exception. What he has done is attack two foundation stones of our basic freedoms, one being the freedom of the press, and the other being the function, purpose and right of not only Her Majesty's Official Opposition, but indeed the freedom of expression of all citizens of this country.

We know that this is the same Prime Minister who instigated the War Measures Act in 1971. We know that this same Prime Minister has said that the free enterprise system no longer works. We know this same Prime Minister has developed friendly rapport with countries such as Algeria, Red China, and Poland, and we know as well his great love affair with Cuba and its dictator, the notorious communist, Fidel Castro. We know that this same Prime Minister allowed millions of Canadian dollars to be spent in Cuba during 1976-77 when that country was waging a bitter and bloody war in Angola, Africa.

This all points to an extremely ominous direction for this country, and one which I urge the people of this nation to recognize. Too often lethargic peoples awake to the fact that it no longer matters that yesterday they were lethargic. We, as Canadians, are not lethargic, and we must take care and pay particular attention to ensure that we do not awake one morning to find that yesterday we were that way.

The Prime Minister of Canada has conveyed the message to me and all other members on this side of the House that he considers me an enemy. The Prime Minister of Canada holds the most powerful position in the land. This is the Prime Minister who leads the government that has thrown this country of ours into the greatest economic calamity since the great depression, that has nurtured and fostered unemployment to an unprecedented one million work-seekers, that has throttled the dollar to a miserable 85 cents of its counterpart, the United States dollar.

And now, the same Prime Minister, leader of the Liberal party, leader of the country, the head of this government, is telling the people of this nation that he has had nothing to do with the plight of Canadians, that unemployment and economic stagnation are none of his doing. No, even the people of Fundy-Royal must have been somewhat taken aback to hear the Prime Minister tell the world that I, as a member of the opposition, in the short period of time that I have been in this House, a matter of days, that I am really responsible for the whole mess, that I am the enemy.

In view of the Prime Minister's statement I do not think that I could be accused of being paranoid when I say that I do not trust the Prime Minister of Canada, I do not trust the party that he leads, and I do not trust the government that he heads. Further, I submit that the people of Canada do not trust this government, that the people of Canada do not trust their leader, and they will convey this message loudly and clearly when given the opportunity.

In summation, the problems that beset the people of this country prior to the budget, still beset and will continue to beset the nation. The budget is about as much use to Canadians as a hairnet is to Yul Brynner.

This party and its members have and will continue to act in an accountable manner as the official opposition in this House. It is our duty to criticize, and with the present government our task is not difficult. We will continue to be constructive, we will continue to be responsible, and I suppose in the eyes of the Prime Minister and his followers, we will continue to be the enemy. But let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we will persevere, we will not be deterred, we will not be intimidated, nor will we falter, nor will we fail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member who has just spoken because I understood it was his maiden speech. Therefore, I did not think he should be interrupted. However, he did make some comments about the fact that members of the party I belong to did not believe in democracy. Let me assure him, in case he is worried about it, that there are no more stout defenders of parliament and democracy than the members of this party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) that that is not a point of order but a point of debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is a point of fact.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I have not come to my point of order yet. I am not asking the hon. member to withdraw, or raising a question of privilege. I am merely asking him to consult his predecessor, the generous and fair-minded former member for Fundy-Royal, to ask of him the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in this most important budget debate. As I represent a constituency in the province of New Brunswick, I believe it is fitting for me to congratulate the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett). It is an honour for a member to arrive at this House of Commons, as I did some ten years ago with you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. member will do a good job of representing the constituents of Fundy-Royal.

It is not customary that we criticize or respond too harshly when a member speaks for the first time. The fact that we respectfully listened to the speech of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal does not mean that we cannot respond to it. However, we will wait until he has made a few more speeches, listen to them carefully, and note what he says. Being a fellow New Brunswick member, I again congratulate him on the presentation of his maiden speech in the House today.

It is important in this budget debate to situate the perspective or economic context in which the government had to present its budget. In my view the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has presented a very responsible budget. The economy of the western world is recovering from and adjusting to the very severe economic dislocations created by the energy crisis of 1973-74.

If one looked at the economy of Canada today, he would realize that over two-thirds of what we produce in this country is exported, mainly to the United States. One cannot talk about the economy of Canada and, therefore, the policy of this government, without situating that policy in this kind of context.

[Translation]

Therefore it is important in my view to realize the Canadian government's objective is, first to influence the domestic economy, and second to help those who are in greatest need of help to adjust to economic conditions, and help mitigate the negative effects of these conditions on Canadians with the lowest salaries and those who live on pensions and cannot by themselves adjust to the new economic situation.

I submit this is a responsible budget, sir, because it aims at influencing the Canadian economy, to the extent the government can do so. Reference is made of course to economic stimulation. Hon. members opposite, especially Conservative members, suggest we should use the fiscal system to stimulate the economy. But, Mr. Speaker, how could we stimulate the economy and in addition have a budget deficit topping $12 billion? Some 25 per cent, or rather 30 per cent of the total Canadian government budget is made up of government deficit. Such being the case, I do not feel it would have been possible for the government to provide much more stimulus than they did. My opinion is we did so, as far as the domestic economy is concerned, by indexing income tax at 9 per cent for this year, which means more than $1 million when the reduction in unemployment insurance premiums is added. And with the reduction from 12 per cent to 9 per cent of the federal sales tax, this means more than $1 billion will be left in the hands of Canadians, not to mention the effects of the tax changes on Canadian firms which are difficult to estimate accurately.

However I am firmly convinced these changes will bring at least three-quarters of a billion's worth of stimulus to Canadian firms and Canadian entrepreneurs.

I would like to stress that, as far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned, the government operated along the policy established in the last budget—I mean the one before that of November 16, namely to use the fiscal system to help regional development.

Mr. Speaker, the 10 per cent investment tax credit will be increased to 20 per cent when investments will be made in the Gaspé area and in the Atlantic provinces. In my view, I think it ought to be pointed out. As a representative of the Atlantic provinces, the northwestern part of New Brunswick, I want to thank the government and congratulate it for its initiative because indeed the incentives granted by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to industries are most important for us.

However, it must be stressed that such incentives apply only when a new enterprise is operated, a manufacturing enterprise modernized or in order to enlarge or develop the handling or manufacturing industry or any other secondary industry. But by using the tax system through investment tax credit as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) did in his budget of November 16, one helps all Atlantic manufacturing industries which would like to invest either simply to increase their efficiency or for purposes of modernizing or enlarging. These measures also have a positive impact on those who wish to invest in their industries and increase their production capacity.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a reason to drop the industrial incentive program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I think that both policies are compatible and this is something I wish to emphasize as it demonstrates this government's determination to encourage regional development and particularly to help the Atlantic provinces, the Gaspé area and other areas which in the past did not benefit from the same level of industrial development as other regions of the country.

I also wish to stress that this budget should be considered not only from the standpoint of the economic situation in the occidental world but also that budgetary measures should be closely related to other programs, other decisions, other policies of the government aimed at helping Canadians. As some members said this afternoon that the budget does not do enough for low wage earners, I wish to point out that the government has tabled a bill, and I think it has priority as concerns parliamentary business, that will bring a significant change to the family allowance program so that these funds, or a good part of them, will be used to give a $200 tax credit for every child of families with a net income of $18,000 or less according to their income tax return. Mr. Speaker, for those who earn more than $18,000 this tax credit will be progressively reduced up to a net family income of about $30,000.

Mr. Speaker, this is just an example which shows what the government can do to influence the Canadian economy. Families receiving every year the $200 tax credit for every child will use that money to buy things for themselves. It will help our economy but it will also help Canadians, low wage earners, people with a lower income to adjust to changing economic situations.

[English]

Members of the New Democratic Party have been telling us in this House for the last weeks that inequalities are not being reduced. Indeed, they argue that the gap in incomes as between the rich and the poor is widening. In the course of a debate which took place here not long ago I challenged the position taken by the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) who asserted, during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, that inequalities have not been reduced in the last ten years. I say that such a statement is false. It is not in accordance with the facts at all and the hon. member, by repeating it, does not make his assertion more true. He is not looking at the facts at all.

Before I begin using figures, I should like to make it clear that when we are talking about the equalization of opportunity, about means of fighting poverty and helping people who cannot help themselves, it is, in my view, a mistake to reduce the argument strictly to figures; one cannot measure the welfare of human beings on such a basis. Thus, even though I use figures today, I do not wish to be taken as meaning we ought to be satisfied or that we have done enough to eliminate poverty and bring about greater equalization of opportunity. Nevertheless, I believe that figures, if used accurately, can show a tendency. Look at some recent statistics, for example. In 1968, salaries and benefits to workers in Canada accounted for 54.2 per cent of the gross national product.

In other words, workers were taking 54.2 per cent of the gross national product. In 1976, 57.4 per cent of the gross national product was going to workers in salaries, wages and fringe benefits. That does not mean that there is not still a gap, and it does not mean that we should be satisfied, but when the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) pretends to speak in this House for workers and says we have not done anything to reduce inequities in this country, he is just not looking at the facts, or he cannot recognize them when he sees them. We have increased the share of workers in relation to the gross national product by some 3.2 per cent in only ten years.

I want again to refer to some figures, not because I choose to, but because, of all people, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when speaking about the child tax credit bill in this House some time ago, referred to figures to help him make the argument that we have not reduced inequities and that we have not helped in closing the gaps.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that in 1951 Canadians in the lowest 20 per cent of the income group were earning about 4 per cent of the total national income. He said that in 1975 the figures had not changed much. I have the figures the hon. member used here today. I regret that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was misled regarding these figures. The figures he used were for all units, that is, unattached individuals and family units. He said that in 1951 they were receiving 4.4 per cent of total income in Canada, that in 1965 they were getting 4.6 per cent, and that in 1975 they were getting about 4.1 per cent. I say that the hon. member was misled. I know he is in the House most of the time, he works hard, but I think a New Democratic Party researcher handed those figures to him, and he thought that they would be an accurate reflection of the facts. Those figures came from a Statistics Canada study on total national income before taxes, but they do not represent a true measure of the extent to which we have helped people. They represent merely a measure of the capacity of Canadians to earn income. They include interest income, dividend income and even some business income which is earned by individuals as opposed to corporations.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could have used another Statistics Canada study which showed income distribution by size after taxes in Canada. The New Democratic Party researcher to whom I referred could have provided that study to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but he chose a study which would help with the political argument of the New Democratic Party. The study which was chosen just happened to be very bad because the figures used were for total income. They had nothing to do with income after taxes. They were for the years 1951 to 1975. I have found a report for 1976, so I can update the figures. The figures used by the New Democratic Party do not reflect what is referred to as transfers in kind; in other words, what governments have been doing since the 1950s to redistribute income through hospitalization, health care and education programs. Not only did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre not use a figure for income after taxes, but he also did not take into account that federal and provincial governments in this country have done much to redistribute income in order to reduce the expenditures of poor people on medical treatment, hospitalization and the education of their children.

I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre always wants to be honest, so I suggest that next time New Democratic Party researchers give him figures he should ask from where the figures came and make sure that his political arguments are based on true facts. He always makes good political arguments, and I just point these things out because I want to help the hon. member continue to make his political arguments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Were the facts not true?

Mr. Breau: Of course the facts were true, but New Democratic Party researchers advised the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the study they were giving to him was good, and there was an error made because that study dealt with total income, which has nothing really to do with the benefits governments have tried to redistribute to Canadians. That study did not deal with income after taxes, health care, hospitalization and education which have been provided to Canadians by federal, provincial and, in some cases, municipal governments. Those governments have taken in taxes and spent them to benefit all Canadians.

Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would like to refer to Statistics Canada catalogue number 13-210, "Income after tax, distributions by size in Canada, 1975." Perhaps the hon. member would like to write that down. The figures contained in that report are the latest available. According to that report, all units, including unattached individuals and families, which represent the 20 per cent of the population which has the lowest income earned 4 per cent of total earnings in 1975. But what is the figure for income after tax? It is 4.6 per cent. It is true that in 1975 the 20 per cent of the population which had the highest income earned 42.6 per cent of the total income, but what did those people get by way of income after tax? The figure went down to 40.6 per cent. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to use figures, he should look at what the figures say. If we look at after tax figures, the reverse of the hon. member's conclusion is the case. The 20 per cent at the bottom are getting more, and the 20 per cent at the top are getting less.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How much more?

Mr. Breau: Not enough.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the budget debate. During my 22 years as a member of the House of Commons I have been privileged to listen to many budget speeches. Many of them have been long on rhetoric and short on performance. This has been especially true during the past decade. I have always been intrigued by the little booklets which are prepared by ministers of finance and delivered to us as member of the House of Commons on budget nights. Their size and format have varied little over the years, and although the words are somewhat different the end result is always the same, namely. the taxpayer has to run a little faster, like the squirrel on his treadmill, just to stay in the same position. For example, when John Turner introduced his budget on November 18, 1974, for 1975 he stated, and I quote from his booklet:

> We in this country are confronted by two major economic challenges—dealing with persistent, deep-seated inflation and at the same time maintaining a good level of production and employment. This will require us to steer a narrow course if we are to avoid more inflation on the one hand, and the risk of a recession on the other. And in doing so we must also do everything we reasonably can to protect Canadians who are less able to protect themselves from the ravages of both. That is what this budget is all about.

Then Mr. Turner went on to introduce a budget which increased expenditures by 28.3 per cent, which followed an increase in expenditures for the previous year of 22.7 per cent and which plunged the nation into a predicted deficit position of $3 billion which ended up at something like $5 billion.

● (1532)

At that time the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was president of the Treasury Board and he boldly applauded these moves. On Thursday, November 16, the present Minister of Finance prefaced his comments in his little paper, which I doubt will ever become a best seller, with these words:

I believe that this budget will make a significant contribution to the containment of our domestic costs in the post-control era. This will enable us to take full advantage of the improvement of our competitive position that we have achieved.

My budget measures will, of course, provide a more direct stimulus to growth. Investment will be stimulated by the enriched investment tax credit. Consumption will benefit from the increase in the real spending power of Canadians as a result of the income and sales tax cuts.

There is a similarity in the words. Having said this, the Minister of Finance went on to say at page 13:

Total financial requirements of the government in fiscal 1979-80, exclusive of foreign exchange transactions, are forecast at $10,750 million. This would be down from the expected $12,100 million this year.

If you read these figures quickly, Mr. Speaker, you would almost think that next year the country would only require $10,750 million to look after the needs of our nation. You would ask, "Why not, it took a lot less than that to look after our needs only ten years ago." However, when we read the next paragraph we see the words:

Budgetary and non-budgetary outlays in 1979-80 are forecast at $52.6 billion, an increase of 8.9 per cent which would be well below the expected growth of GNP. Budgetary revenues are forecast at $38.1 billion with a further $3.7 billion available from non-budgetary transactions.

Adding these two figures together amounts to $41.8 billion, and if subtracted from the forecasted spending of $52.6 billion, we arrive at a deficit of $10.8 billion. The figures do not balance, and this simple example is indicative of the problem that the present administration faces.

The truth of the matter is, no one trusts this government, and their past record is valid reason for this mistrust. When you look at the words of the Hon. Walter Gordon, Edgar Benson, John Turner, Donald Macdonald and the present finance minister and compare their words with their performance, you readily see why Canadians no longer have any trust in a Liberal administration. For example, on page 7 of the minister's little booklet he states:

Budget proposals will cut income and sales taxes to increase the real spending power of Canadians, reduce pressures on prices and income demands, and stimulate investment.

What does the bottom line tell us? It tells us that actual expenditures, as listed by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) in "How your tax dollars are spent for 1978-79", will be $48,800 million. When that figure is subtracted from the finance minister's predicted $52.6 billion, the over-all increase in taxation for next year is $3,800 million, even if the estimated expenditures are achieved.

These are not Conservative figures, but the figures made available to Canadians by either the Minister of Finance or the President of the Treasury Board. However, when we quote those facts, supporters of this government say we are not telling it like it is. They accuse us of misleading the House and the country. I say that if these facts are incorrect, then "physician heal thyself" for these are the facts, the fiscal policy and the economic outlook for the Canadian economy based on this government's own figures. Nothing demonstrates more tragically the total over-all mismanagement of Canada's economy than what has occurred during the ten years under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues.

Because we dared to repeat the figures which outline this government's record in "blunderland", the Prime Minister has attacked my leader and my party—and by so doing he is attacking me—charging that we are dividing Canada because we have publicly stated that we would be willing to negotiate provincial problems with provincial premiers. In his efforts to lay the blame for his abominable record everywhere but where it belongs he calls us the enemy. In my 22 years here, that is the first time anyone has ever accused me of being an enemy of Canada. I resent that allegation very deeply, as, I am sure, do my colleagues. He also accuses the premiers of the provinces of trying to weaken Canada. He is never specific, or will he make a charge, but everybody is against him, including the media. If only the fourth estate would praise his efforts, everything would be all right.

The Prime Minister claims that the country needs the Liberal party now because they are the only party to lead the country and provide it with a strong Canada and there is no alternative. When that nonsense hit the street, the average Canadian simply asked, "An alternative to what?" In the last ten years, almost without fail, annually we have had record high unemployment, record inflation, record debasement of the purchasing power of our currency and a flight of capital from this country. If there is no alternative to the present administration, this average Canadian says, "heaven help us". The Prime Minister seems to forget that in 1974, the then president of the Treasury Board, C. M. Drury, in his book, "How Your Tax Dollars are Spent" showed a total expenditure of $9,872 million to look after the needs of 20 million Canadians.

In the last ten years our population has increased from 20 million to 23 million people. The predicted expenditures, however, have increased to $52.6 billion. Even if the government stays within this estimate, which I doubt, we will be spending as a government more than $1 billion a week. The finance minister predicts for this year a deficit of $12.1 billion. This is a debt of more than $1 billion a month which we must try to borrow at interest rates that are at a record post-war level.

Some will ask where the money was spent. Obviously some of it ended up in the construction of an airport for which nobody asked and which very few people use, namely Mirabel. It was constructed at a cost of $482 million, at least $100 million over budget. It was officially opened in October, 1975. It was supposed to handle six million passengers per year, with a potential for expansion to handle 50 million by the year 2025. It has turned out to be a colossal white elephant, handling little more than one million passengers in 1977, less than 19 per cent of its capacity. The Auditor General, in his report tabled yesterday, says that Mirabel has lost $119.7 million since it opened, which amounts to approximately $1 million a week. He tells us that this year the airport will lose $52.5 million. How much has the government budgeted to complete this white elephant? I would like to know what has gone wrong. I submit that this is one of the major problems that we face as elected representatives. When an expenditure is made, my constituents look to me and say, "You are our representative; why did you go along with it?" As I read the Auditor General's report, it seems to me that neither members of the Treasury Board nor bureaucrats have a clue as to what is going on. They seem to go along with one hand not knowing what the other hand is doing, making expenditures over which we have no say. My party and my leader, when we form the next government, will restore parliament to the people.

The industrial park established at Mirabel has been totally unsuccessful. MIRCA, the managing authority, has spent $5,440,000 on roads, water facilities, site preparation and marketing studies. But to this date there is not a single tenant in that industrial park. After ten years of planning and nearly $1 billion in public expenditures, Mirabel remains an airport operating at less than 20 per cent capacity with an empty industrial park. Did anyone on the Treasury benches or any of the government's experts realize at the time the tremendous mess they were creating, or the tremendous tax burden they were placing unnecessarily on the backs of all Canadians? They further compounded their mistakes when they bought or leased building space for offices in Ottawa and Hull. They took on long-term obligations for space, without proper planning, resulting in wasteful expenditures which will be a burden on our children's children.

In his 1975 report, the Auditor General stressed the need to establish tighter controls on government expenditures through the centralization of some financial management control procedures. Obviously it was not done, for in his 1978 report, at page 44, there is a list of 12 capital projects which were approved in 1973, 1974, 1975 and 1976 at a cost of $281.6 million. The final cost amounted to $699.7 million, or an increase over estimates of $418 million. This is why there is no money for improved forestry research. This is why the fisheries lab in Halifax faces closure, at a time when its output basically is very important to the fishing industry. This is why funds are limited for grain storage depots in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Breau: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: I listened to the hon. member without interrupting him. I would ask him to do the same for me. This is why there is no money for dredging which is urgently needed in my constituency, if not in his. This is why there are no funds for repairs to wharves, breakwaters and skidways. When we ask the minister responsible for small craft harbours development, this is why his plea is that there is no money. The government has blundered, misspent and misappropriated funds until the country faced financial disaster. This is the problem we face today.

As a result of these facts, the Prime Minister and his party are no longer credible in Canada. They try to lay the blame for our economic mess on anyone but themselves. The words of a modern song apply to our Prime Minister. They are as follows:

How many times can a man break faith
And pretend that he just doesn't see?
The answer, my friends, is blowin' in the wind,
The answer is blowin' in the wind.

I believe the future of this government may well be "blowin' in the wind", especially since the Prime Minister expressed the view that a new constitution is needed to restore Canada's national pride, economic stability and unity. He warned provincial leaders that unless they get their heads together and write a new constitution, others will write a uniquely Canadian constitution. Who the others are is left unsaid. However, having messed up everything else in the country during its ten years in office, what guarantees do the premiers and Canadians have that the Prime Minister's constitutional proposals will not lead to still further chaos? The real problem of the Prime Minister and his government is the credibility of the right hon. member who heads the Liberal party and the government today. Stripped of all political bafflegab and nonsense, there is nothing inherently wrong with our existing constitution. What is wrong is that it has been abused by the powers that be, since special emergency steps were taken for prosecuting World War II. Following the end of the wartime emergency, Ottawa retained the powers and proceeded on a course of centralization and bureaucracy building, while acting like "Big Daddy-O" to the provinces.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. While engaging in a flight of oratory, the hon. member used the word "misappropriated" in terms of the way in which funds had been handled by the government. I am sure the hon. member did not wish to give it the literary meaning. I ask him to reflect upon his use of that word and perhaps use a more appropriate term.

Mr. Crouse: I could use the term "lack of control".

Mr. Blais: Very well.

Mr. Crouse: Obviously that has happened time and time again during the past ten years. As the Auditor General pointed out, today there is no control. I was speaking about the proposals the Prime Minister and his party are trying to foist upon Canadians to rewrite the constitution. Stripped of all political nonsense, there is nothing inherently wrong with our present constitution. Following the end of the wartime emergency, Ottawa retained too many powers and proceeded on a course of centralization and bureaucracy building, while attempting to act like a father to the provinces.

As I understand it, the province of Quebec resisted this power grab. Unfortunately, the other provinces did not cover themselves with glory when they permitted the central government to usurp their powers and authority. The solution to this dilemma, though it will not meet with the approval of the Prime Minister and his colleagues, is a relatively simple one. We should insist that the original constitution be followed, that Ottawa and the provinces assume their designated responsibilities and jurisdictions, or in short, reinstate that which was functioning very well and very smoothly in 1939. It is not often by turning back the clock to 1939 that we can go forward in 1978. In fact, if we followed this course, the separatists would have no planks in their platform, and the crippling and inept Ottawa bureaucracy could be dismantled gradually for the enduring good of all Canada.

The Minister of Finance said that he cannot be held responsible for providing employment. I ask him why not, since he and his colleagues are responsible for creating unemployment. The direct result of the government's mismanagement of the economy is higher interest rates, and higher interest rates are the basic cause of inflation or the increase in prices of everything we use. Higher interest rates automatically destroy the profit system, private ownership and private enterprise. The course followed by the present administration for the last ten years rapidly increased our federal debt. In fact, it costs more than $8 billion a year just to pay the interest charges on our national debt.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to approach this matter in a non-partisan way and resist the temptation to comment on the frightful speech of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett). I will resist the temptation to say how much I regret that there has been a change in the member representing that constituency. The previous member who represented Fundy-Royal was a man who added a great deal of distinction to the House. I will resist that temptation and simply deal with a part of the budget which is of great interest to an area of the country for which I have some responsibility.

● (1552)

A week ago when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) spoke in this House about the economic outlook, his analysis necessarily dealt with the general indicators and the country's performance in the broadest context. My purpose today is to describe the promise that the budget holds for one region of Canada, the northern territories, and, more important, the tenacious people who find their livelihood there.

My colleague, the Minister of Finance, spoke of the renewed faith that Canada can launch itself on a new phase of sustained expansion, more investment and new opportunities. My purpose today is to show how this budget in fact answers some of the very important questions about expansion and development in the north and reinforces other initiatives that have been taken by myself and other members of this government who have a concern about the future of the north. The budget announced by my colleague last week recognizes the importance of northern development to northerners and to southerners as they consider what the north means to them.

Since I became minister of northern affairs a little over a year ago, I have travelled extensively, as have my two very distinguished parliamentary secretaries, one of whom is here today, and listened to the people's concerns. In the early months I became increasingly aware of the apprehension and uncertainty they were feeling about the pace and direction of development. Decisions surrounding a northern gas pipeline intensified those concerns both in areas which will share directly in construction of such a pipeline and in areas which will not.

The decision to build a pipeline through the Yukon left in the minds of many people in the Mackenzie valley an evaporating sense of expectation. For the Yukon, the decision meant an immediate acceleration of planning and preparation for the economic opportunities and social complications that will be superimposed on that territory when construction begins.

Last January I spoke to the opening session of the Northwest Territories Council about the policy framework in which decisions must be made to govern these and other activities in the years ahead. In my view, development must be for the north and not of the north. We must distinguish between economic growth and development. Any activity which gets its labour, capital and materials mainly from the south contributes to growth, but not necessarily to development. This is even more true when the product goes south, leaving a residue of social dislocation with nothing to compensate for it. Priority must go to those activities which are, by their very nature, capable of making direct and ongoing contributions to northern residents.

We must always strive in the north to achieve balance—balance between renewable and non-renewable resource development, between conventional wage employment and activities which support the traditional native economy, between externally generated development and that which comes from within. There must be balance in meeting the need for native people to protect their future and their past, balance between using the land and resources and conserving them, balance between protecting the environment and developing the available natural resources.

We must seek to provide every northerner with the opportunity to apply his skills in meaningful areas that use the resources available to him and allow him to make a contribution to the common well-being. Freedom is choice, and choice demands both opportunity and capability. Northerners have a contribution to make not only to the future of the north, but to the health and vitality of Canada. In this regard native people must be equipped to make a viable choice between following their traditional way of life, entering the mainstream of Canadian society, or a compromise involving the best features of both. To reach this objective, we will have to encourage meaningful development in every economic sector.

I have established a set of criteria consistent with those objectives to guide us. First, economic development must take the needs of northerners fully into account. It must be attuned to a young and in many areas a majority native population living mainly in small, isolated communities. It must be designed to promote the continued economic and social viability of these communities.

Second, jobs must be created not only for young people now entering the labour force, but, even more important, for the existing labour force, and tailored to their desire for continuing participation in traditional pursuits. The choice should not be either/or—modern or traditional.

Third, economic development must be diversified and dispersed. A better balance of economic activities will reduce the current dependency on major projects and on one or two economic sectors.

Fourth, northern based private enterprise—not just large companies, but small business and co-operatives as well as the hunters, trappers and fishermen—must be promoted and strengthened.

Fifth, the environment must be preserved and protected by the encouragement of advanced conservation practices. The north should take the lead in developing mechanisms to use local resources to the greatest extent possible.

Once again, I stress that every economic sector requires careful consideration in the balanced socio-economic mix of the north. The budget addresses this principle in the way it deals with various aspects of the economy. As the Minister of Finance emphasized, it is essential to maintain our competitive position, and we must strengthen our efforts to encourage investment and growth in all the regions of Canada.

Two highly important measures that will stimulate basic northern economic sectors are the changes in the investment tax credit and changes in the treatment of eligible deductions for mines. The investment tax credit is being raised indefinitely from 7.5 per cent to 10 per cent for investments in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. In addition, a basic 7 per cent credit will now be available for investments in rail, water, air and long-haul road transportation. The current write-off for development expenditures in mining is to be raised from 30 per cent to 100 per cent. Earned depletion allowances for new mines will include townsites and social assets; and the fast write-off for pollution control equipment will be extended indefinitely.

It has been said more than once that as the mining industry goes, so goes the north. That concept is too simplistic by itself, but embraces some truths that recognize the very real significance of mining in the economic and social fabric of the north. These measures will assist the mineral and transportation sectors. It is estimated that the changes will provide several million dollars of additional tax savings for new northern mines.

This budget applies quite specifically to northern needs. Prehistoric forces of nature deposited their resources with little regard to the convenience of modern man. To put it another way, mines are built where the minerals are, and if that happens to coincide with our limited settlement of the north it is purely by accident. What could be more practical in northern terms than the increased depletion allowance for townsites to complement new mining ventures?

The northern economy is certainly fragile. Thirty per cent of all private sector employment is in mining—a situation which dictates that we must be sensitive to the needs of that industry, while keeping an eye on the requirements for diversity. To this end, the 7 per cent investment tax credit for transportation equipment could have implications on several aspects of northern transportation. The White Pass and Yukon Corporation, where a number of capital improvements to its railway are required, could use it to advantage. For example, on a $6 million capital investment, the corporation stands to gain a $420,000 tax credit. Some northern aviation companies may require new or more efficient equipment. The tax credit should encourage these firms to purchase such aircraft, resulting in improvements to this service so vital to communities separated by such vast distances.

The value of continued incentives for frontier oil and gas exploration is recognized in the extension of the drilling fund incentives until December 31, 1981. This extension will provide Canadians with a continued opportunity to participate in the exploration programs and provide northern explorers with valuable alternative sources of domestic capital. This is particularly important as exploration progresses in the offshore areas, such as the Beaufort Sea and the Sverdrup Basin, where each well may cost $40 million or more.

In addition, it should not be forgotten that if natural gas in the Arctic Islands is developed using LNG tankers, the investment tax credit will be both an incentive to develop the gas deposits earlier and a further incentive to build the ships in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it should be recognized by now that the government's continued attention, through this budget and other measures, encourages renewed confidence among northerners and others with an interest in the north. As I said earlier, the budget addresses the basic needs and complements government initiatives which are already in play.

I think it is fair to say that my relations with the mining industry earlier this year were much less settled than they are today. This is a moment of modesty in the speech. The budget has had a substantial influence on that upturn.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the opposition is still awake. It is unusual to see them still alive and well on a Friday afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is nice to have you here.

Mr. Faulkner: I might add that maintaining a consistent equilibrium between the social and economic forces at work in the north requires constant adjustments: sometimes the scales tip in favour of one or the other before the balance is restored.

The northern mining industry and my department are just now going through a distinct phase in this ongoing process. A few months ago, industry representatives were clearly anxious about one or two of the courses we were following. We recognized they had legitimate concerns, so last month I met with mining industry officials in Yellowknife and invited them into the process of planning a comprehensive mineral strategy for the north. At the time, we agreed to assemble a joint industry-government consultative committee to develop that strategy. Its first meeting took place in Edmonton this week. I have also appointed a special adviser, nominated by the industry, to keep me abreast of its requirements and to support the consultation process.

I understand that both my own and the government's initiatives in the budget are receiving an encouraging response from people who are affected by them. After our meeting in Yellowknife, the president of the Yukon Chamber of Mines acknowledged that together we had made more "substantial progress". He further declared—and I am using these quotes very carefully and not taking them out of context—that:

We recognize that this direct participation of the industry . . . in the development of major government policy as an unusual and innovative step.

I understand that even the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), in what must have been something of a lapse for him, said the budget was very good news.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) mentions the vote. The vote went like this, Mr. Speaker: 37 per cent for the Conservatives, all the rest against. The majority were against—something like 68 per cent. The trouble with the vote is that those who were against were somewhat divided amongst themselves. Next time there may be a greater degree of cohesion.

Mr. Speaker, if I may continue to inform the House about the development in the north—I know the Conservatives are not particularly interested in the north but we on this side have a great interest, seeing it as the frontier of Canada, and we are attempting to address some of these issues this afternoon.

If I may, without further interruption from my friends opposite, I should like to take a moment to outline to the House a couple of other steps the government has taken in recent months that have encouraged confidence among people who depend on a healthy northern economy. Last May I convened a conference on economic prospects in Hay River which brought together for the first time, people from all walks of life and divergent interests throughout the Northwest Territories. Delegates at that conference developed a framework for working towards a balanced economy. By and large they were talking about general principles, but since then we have been tackling the specifics.

Among the most visible evidence of economic progress has been the numerous offers of financial assistance to small industry in the north. From May to mid-October, about $600,000 was committed to a wide variety of local and community enterprises. Earlier this month an agreement between the government and the Yukon was announced which proposes to spend up to $11 million over three years for special economic stimulation and job-creation. Officials in my department have been working with the government of the Northwest Territories and other federal departments on several new initiatives which arose out of the Hay River conference. These programs are still in the formative stages, but I can tell the House what a few of them involve.

First are the measures to promote tourism. The Northwest Territories government is establishing a tourism division. My department, together with the Canadian government office of tourism, the territorial government and the travel industry association of the Northwest Territories will be undertaking a $100,000 study to develop an integrated tourism strategy.

Second, through the special ARDA program, capital assistance is being made available to increase the amount of inter-settlement trade in such things as country foods. Training and managerial assistance will also be provided.

Third, assistance to improve the harvesting, processing and marketing of products from both the sea and the land is another area of activity at which we are looking. For example, Inuit harvesting of seals in the Northwest Territories provides an important source of food for local consumption, and the sale of sealskins is a major income factor.

An August conference in Yellowknife brought together all of the participants in sealskin harvesting, followed by a review of the market's quality requirements. Sealskin prices, which were depressed in 1977-78, have more than doubled since January, and with a new insight into market needs the industry will be better able to profit from this upturn.

Mr. Speaker, these are just a handful of the deliberate measures which are being taken to break the spell of postpipeline depression in the Northwest Territories, particularly the Mackenzie Valley. The government is also ready to meet unique circumstances when they arise—such as in the case of the recent setback in Frobisher Bay when weather conditions prevented a supply ship from unloading its cargo. The consequences could obviously have been dire for the people in Frobisher, but we gave the authority to go ahead and fly the materials in. Those flights are now en route.

Before I conclude, I would like to turn my attention to the role that land claims play in the northern economy. The House is well aware of the effects of culture clash that native people have suffered since this country was traversed by early explorers and traders. The legacy of anguish for native people that lay in the path of those early adventurers and the settlers who followed them is still straining our ingenuity. It is still draining the energies of natives and non-natives generations later. In a few relatively short decades, settlement and development have already had a dramatic impact on the north. We are on the threshold now of breaching workable accord with northern native people so that development can proceed with minimal injury to their traditional way of life and livelihood. But it would be negligent, Mr. Speaker, to say there will be no more development until we settle land claims. That would be unrealistic and unworkable.

Furthermore, I am convinced that the best way to achieve the objectives I outlined earlier is through settlement of comprehensive native claims. That is the way to secure their traditional economic base: that is the way northern native people will become equipped to make the choice between their traditions and the mainstream of Canadian society. Land claims agreements are the best method available for them to strike their own balance between these alternatives. I can assure this House that the priorities in this matter will not be neglected by this government.

Hon. members opposite may find that amusing. I must express my concern at this point that the matter of land claims is not a subject that has ever been addressed by the party opposite. I think it would be interesting for us to know what their position would be in terms of a comprehensive land claim settlement.

We are attempting to resolve land claims wherever there is a demonstrated willingness on the part of native people to negotiate. Mr. Speaker, it takes courage to make these kinds of choices and I want to tell you about some people who have that kind of fortitude. Only a few weeks ago, an agreement in principle was signed in Sachs Harbour with the committee for original peoples' entitlement covering the Inuit of the western Arctic. That agreement, which forms the basis for a final settlement, protects the traditional economic base of the Inuvialuit. Other measures are designed to encourage the Inuvialuit to diversify their traditional economy and to participate on their own terms with development interests.

It has not been easy for the Inuit of the western Arctic, and particularly their leaders on whose shoulders rests the responsibility for generations to come. Changes of this magnitude and the options they present are profound: but the Inuvialuit have recognized the necessity to make those choices now and have had the moral conviction to follow through.

With their inspiration to guide us, I am confident that there are ways to achieve the balanced economic opportunity necessary to protect native and non-native interests. The consequences of imbalance are awesome, but there is reason for us to be optimistic. The kind of co-operation that has been demonstrated since the Hay River conference, the complementary measures in this budget and the example of the Inuvialuit lead me to believe that the solutions are at hand—they rest with the goodwill and resourcefulness of dedicated people, and I have enough faith to believe it can be done.

● (1612)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Faulkner: Yes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us at what stage in the amending and consideration process of the cabinet are the amendments to the Northwest Territories Act requested by the legislature of the Northwest Territories in a letter written by their speaker, Mr. David Searle, to the Commissioner, Mr. Drury?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, yes, I am pleased to respond to that question. The amendments are now through cabinet. They are out of the Department of Justice. They are about to go to the legislation and House Planning Committee and I would expect, with the co-operation of all parties of this house, that we would have this bill in this House before Christmas.

May I just take advantage of the opportunity afforded to me by the question, to express appreciation to the hon. member and his party for their support in giving us all three readings, it is understood, with one speech per party. I understand that we may have the same agreement with the other parties, but discussions are still going on. If we have that, I think we could get the bill through the House quickly.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity to assure the minister that there have been appropriate discussions. On behalf of the Progressive Conservative party, I can say to him that we are prepared to do that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. May I just say the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to appear before this House to offer some observations on the budget which was introduced last Thursday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), to speak both as a candidate in the recent by-elections and as a representative of the people in Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

I am not usually known to express gratitude in a profuse fashion. However, I would like to begin by complimenting the Minister of Finance for some of the economic initiatives undertaken by this budget. Many of them look surprisingly familiar to me. Having been a candidate for some months and having studied the policy documents of my party, I found a remarkable similarity in some of the short-term initiatives which the Minister of Finance announced in his budget.

I would like to back away from the question of specific initiatives announced in the budget and talk for a few moments about the question of budgeting from a more general point of view. In my mind—and the minds of many constituents from western Canada—the trend of the current government is to lead this country into an unprecedented economic crisis. This has been ably described by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). We have a situation in 1978 where government spending, which is at a level of $50 billion, is arcing up in an ever increasing curve because of the complications of high interest rates, devaluation of the Canadian dollar relative to its American counterpart, indexing of expenditures in the forms of salaries and other costs to government, and, in general, inflation.

Similarly, we have a situation where revenues of government—$35 billion for the fiscal year—are not growing nearly as rapidly. They are in fact arcing on a downward curve. That results from the tremendous increase of disincentive in our society. The consequence has been higher and higher rates of unemployment. And now the tax rollbacks, which are necessary to get this economy working again, will further hamper the growth of revenues needed to offset spending. I do not advocate increases in taxation as a means of disposing of this problem. The big problem is the question of waste, the question of the ever growing margin of difference between the spending of government on the one hand and the revenues received on the other.

Canadians, and this includes members opposite are facing a devastating crisis. It is somewhat like approaching the edge of a cliff which is crumbling away and dumping load after load of rock and rubble over the edge to enable one to walk farther and farther out over the precipice. Mr. Speaker, the almighty collapse is soon to come if we do not take strong measures to implement means of restraint and to eliminate waste. This country is in for some devastating times in the decade ahead. In other words, a budget should offer more than a recitation of mere platitudes and half measures to stimulate. It should be more than a bump here and a bump there. A budget should deal positively with the question of restraint. It should deal with new initiatives to control the growth of government.

Indeed, given the present circumstances, it should stop the growth of government. A budget must provide all the information necessary, not only part of it, to restore the confidence of Canadians in the government which is managing their resources.

I suppose I entered political life at the federal level primarily because of the concerns I felt over some of the things our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was saying some ten years ago, of which Canadians did not take note. At one point, around 1969 I believe, he made the following statement which I quote:

> I suppose one has to be in the wheelhouse to see what shifts are taking place. I know that we have spun the wheel, and I know that the rudder is beginning to press against the waves and the sea . . . but perhaps the observer who is on deck and smoking his pipe or drinking his tea . . . doesn't realize it; perhaps he will find himself disembarking at a different island than the one he thought he was sailing for.

I submit today, hon. members, that indeed the Prime Minister has been leading this nation on a voyage—a long voyage to fantasy island—an island as fantastic as the one depicted in the television series of the same name. In those days the Prime Minister also suggested that the Liberal party may turn out to be somewhat different than what we had traditionally come to regard as the Liberal party, a party which developed with some degree of respectability over the past century.

I submit to hon. members opposite that if they looked back over the last ten years they would see that the Liberal party has changed tremendously in terms of its approach to economic matters, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister.

The first thing we must do in dealing with the budgetary question is to predict the anticipated spending for the next year. Then we estimate the revenue available. Finally, we find ways to balance the budget. I know that the concept of balancing budgets sounds strange in a modern industrial world so dependent on investment; investment in our future. By failing to distinguish between capital spending, that is five-year long-term budgeting, and an annual operating budget, this government has allowed the country to run uncontrolled for far too long. The people of Canada do not know what portion of the accumulated debt is purchasing real equity investment in the future of this country and what portion is being wasted through the many extravagant forms of abuse of access to the taxpayers resource.

I am disappointed that the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance does not come to grips in any way, shape or form with the question of controlling the rate of growth of government spending and eliminating the tremendously wasteful habits of the present government. These are ably documented in the one hundredth annual report—a condemnation of this government—which was filed yesterday by the Auditor General. The government cannot run the Post Office without incurring millions of dollars of debt. The government cannot run an airline without refinancing it from time to time with millions of dollars. These are either deficit dollars or taxpayers' dollars. How can this government propose to run a large corporation, such as Petro-Canada in an economically or fiscally responsible way?

The system of tax credits, the half measures, the gimmickery we are all talking about these days to get our economy moving forward again; the rebates, the filing of documentation back and forth with Ottawa to get a little off that tax penalty we are paying to the federal government, these are mere symptoms of the real problem in this country.

The real problem faced by the people of Canada is that taxes are too high in the first instance. I submit to this House that this introduces the concept of the tax revolt which was demonstrated in California in recent months. I submit that next June there will be a tax revolt in this country. The tax revolt will lead to the putting in place of a new government with new ideas to set the economy of this country straight.

This government is not totally honest. Perhaps that is a poor choice of words. This government is not telling Canadians the whole story when it files a statement such as the glossy budget of the Minister of Finance the other evening.

I wish to refer to some figures which the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) introduced into this House. He is not in the chamber this afternoon, but one evening last week he talked about the percentage of gross national product which rests in the form of debt. He pointed out that in 1952 we had 51.7 per cent of GNP residing in the form of debt, but that the percentage of debt, most of it having been accumulated through the war years, dropped to 18.7 per cent in 1978.

The hon. member for Fort William neglected to include figures for the years 1974 to 1978 which show that we went through, a minimum in those years in terms of percentage of gross national product, in the form of debt. The debt is beginning to take off again, not through the tremendous devastation and the costly burden of war, but because it is finally beginning to catch up and intrude upon the gross national product of this country in an ever increasing proportion.

I wish to produce some figures of my own. These are from Statistics Canada. In the fiscal year 1967-68, personal and corporate income taxes as a percentage of GNP were 6 per cent. In 1978, personal and corporate income taxes are 12 per cent of the GNP of this country. the GNP has grown, of course, but personal and corporate income taxes have doubled.

The tax bite this government is imposing upon the earners, profit seekers and risk takers of this country has doubled. Government spending has increased from 13.6 per cent of GNP in 1967-68 to 26.8 per cent of GNP ten years later. That is preposterous and unacceptable. Although the significance may seem lesser, it is significant that the percentage of gross government revenue, which is raised in the form of personal and corporate taxes, has increased from 50 per cent to 59 per cent in the past ten years. The burden of taxation on Canadians increased far in excess of reasonable proportion.

This takes us to a question of political philosophy. A government is elected to provide the basic essential services of government, and that is all, if we believe in the principles of free democracy. A government which does not put any burden on society—one which one might call a very extreme form of right wing government—is non-government; it is chaos. On the other hand, a government which wants to take all of the earned income of Canadians and put it into the funding of government, is an extreme left wing form of government. It is worse than democratic socialism.

There is an optimum level of taxation as a percentage of GNP. That optimum level was certainly less than 6 per cent for decades in this country. In the past decade, it has doubled to the point where it is 12 per cent. The people of Canada will not stand for it any longer.

I indicated that the government is not telling the whole story in submitting a budget and sending press releases to the media. When the government sends out information on the splitting up of the pie, it sends out circular disks to show what proportion goes to what. It should be straightforward and fair in reporting that information.

In the Canadian Press last week, I noted such a sketch which showed the expenditure dollar and the revenue dollar. Unfortunately they were both shown the same size. In fact, in the coming year this government will spend $1.35 for every one dollar it receives as revenue. I believe the people of Canada should be told of that fact. The Mint will have to begin stamping out rubber dollars.

On the expenditure dollar, as reported to the press last week, there is a 14 per cent pie shaped wedge called debt. That is not the debt. That is the debt charge of the interest on the debt. It leaves the impression that our debt is 14 per cent of the government budget for the coming year. It is not. It is 35 per cent, plus the interest on that debt, which in the coming year will be in excess of $8.5 billion.

The government must level with the people of Canada. It must tell the people of Canada what the elements of the gross public debt are, a public debt now in excess of $70 billion, more than half of it having been accumulated in the past ten years since this government has been in office.

How much is held outside Canada? How much is caused by waste, as reported by the Auditor General? How much is internal debt held in the form of Canadian notes, Canada Savings Bonds and term deposits in bank accounts? The people of Canada should know to what extent we are beholden to economic powers external to our nation. The government should tell the people of Canada what would happen if public confidence in Canada Saving Bonds was suddenly shattered.

What would happen to the economy of our country? Can we continue to rely on Canada Savings Bonds to bail out a government whose costs are offset by debt? There is no speculative capital in Canada; it is all in the form of bonds and term deposits. Therefore we must continue to encourage foreign investment in this country. As long a we have little old ladies in Connecticut and financiers in West Germany who are prepared to take a risk when Canadians are not, we must continue to welcome their investment in this country because investment produces jobs.

If the profit elects to go elsewhere, so be it until Canadians take hold of their own country. Why should we be debtors in a world where there are creditors? Why should we be debtors in a world when we have such tremendous natural resources to put at the disposal of our fellow Canadians, and indeed people in the rest of the world?

Let us get back to basic economics. Let us talk about balanced budgets. Let us not say it is a pipedream. If we do not believe in the ideal that we can balance the annual operating budget of this country, then let us forget about democracy because it just does not work when you start putting up borders and, borrowing money from other nations. You become beholden to them in order to keep your head above water.

My time is coming to an end, I believe, or do I have more time?

Mr. Paproski: Go ahead.

Mr. Siddon: I recited some statistics which showed that the tax bite imposed on ordinary Canadians has doubled in the past ten years. As the tax bite on the individual wage-earner and investors in our society increases, what happens to efficiency? Efficiency decreases because governments become irresponsible in the manner in which they dispose of the assets of the hard-working people who earn them.

What happens to waste as the tax bite increases? It is easy to get money if you take it out of the pockets of the Canadian wage earner or borrow it from West Germany, or wherever. The government has become wasteful. When governments become inefficient and wasteful, they become secretive. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has had much to say about the question of government secrecy and restriction from this parliament of the decisions on which government spending is based.

As the percentage bite of taxation on individual earners in this nation increases, it destroys incentive, then the only way to even come close to balancing the budget is to incur more debt.

Getting back to the question of foreign investment for a moment, there are certain political philosophies in this country which regard profit as a dirty word, whether it is earned in Canada or anywhere else, because somebody is getting that profit. I would rather have Canadians attaining a profit so that we can have productive industries in this country than have foreign lenders charging us enormous, staggering levels of debt interest. They help us maintain a false sense of security and a false sense of well-being based entirely on debt dollars. That attitude which allows an increasing imposition on the ordinary wage-earners of this country is tied in essentially to the whole concept of Keynesian economics—that we can continue to borrow more and more and continue to print paper dollars. But sooner or later someone else is going to keep the profit. We will become so far in debt that we will have to put up walls, ever-increasing levels of tariff protection, to pay the high wages and accept the low productivity which comes from an inefficient society, a society where it does not matter if you work or not. What do we then become? Look at the example of the countries which belong to the Soviet bloc. I submit that if we value our freedom we cannot afford to build these walls around Canada. We have to trade competitively in an international world. Our labour has to work for competitive rates of compensation and our tax system has to be competitive with that of our immediate neighbour, the United States.

● (1632)

I have not talked much about specifics, but I should like to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member will not have time. His time has expired.

Mr. Siddon: I should like to have a closing word, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The only way to do that is by unanimous consent. Is there consent to allow the hon. member a closing word?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Siddon: I do not believe we want a dual monetary system that keeps people locked in this country. I think we should listen to the things our Prime Minister has been saying. He says we must accept more authority in our lives, one party democracy—that seems to be a concept of his—and we should consider that we might be going in a different direction than the one in which we thought we were setting out. I ask hon. members to consider these facts and to consider that this budget is far less than adequate in coming to grips with the problems which confront our economy.

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been losing my voice today so I am not sure how long I shall be able to carry on, but I will do my best. First, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon) who has just resumed his seat. I understand this was his maiden speech.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Marchand: Maiden speeches in the House of Commons are all special occasions for hon. members. I cannot be so generous as to say I agree with everything he said. He was preceded in this chamber by two distinguished members from Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, Tom Goode, whom I knew very well, and John Reynolds, whom I also knew very well. They were both distinguished members who always addressed themselves to this chamber in a very good manner. I expect the hon. member will want to carry on the high tradition of his predecessors and, of course, the high tradition of this House.

Before I get into some of the notes I have here, I want to say in a general way that as a British Columbian I welcome a number of portions of the budget. One portion of the budget I particularly welcome is that which refers to the mining community. If anything needed a shot in the arm in British Columbia, it was the mining sector. It is a very important sector of the country and a very good sector of the economy of British Columbia. Coming closer to home, it makes a very important contribution to the economic life of Kamloops-Cariboo.

There are some on the other side who have said that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was cautious and unimaginative. Of course, there are always those on the other side who will say he has not gone far enough with respect to whatever happens to be their favourite target. If it is a cautious budget, I will not fault my colleague for that, given the delicate balance which has to be maintained, with respect to inflation, unemployment, economic development and the health of the Canadian dollar abroad. We certainly do not need any of the imaginative flights of fancy suggested by some hon. members opposite for the financial management of the country.

One of the areas in which the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) have quite rightly insisted on caution and restraint is in the field of total government expenditure. We have reduced planned expenditures for 1979-80 by $2.5 billion as a painful though necessary part of bringing government expenditures into better balance.

My department, the Department of the Environment, has, of course, made its contribution, and a significant one, to this necessary restraint program. Next year we shall be reducing planned expenditures by more than $40 million, and if anyone thinks this is a fictitious reduction, I shall be glad to demonstrate in some detail that it is very real. It is never an easy matter to cut one's budget, but we in the Department of Environment realize that cutbacks have to be made and rather than suffer because of this, we have honed our operation down to essential programs and activities. Where possible, as in the case of the Petawawa Forestry Experimental Station, we have combined rather than terminated programs. Certainly, the cutbacks were hard to make, but while accepting the necessity of these reductions, we did not resign ourselves to the idea of a poorer operation. On the contrary, we were guided by one principle, that of getting more for less from our department. Because of this commitment, we have produced a leaner and more efficient operation. We have, in short, produced a richer though less expensive Department of the Environment. We remain as strongly committed as ever to preserving and, indeed, to enhancing the quality of the Canadian environment, not just for those of us who want to enjoy it now but for future generations. The environmental decisions we make today will determine to a large extent the quality of the environment we pass on to future generations, and it is by the quality and wisdom of these critical decisions that we shall be judged.

I have said we are determined to maintain the most important work of this department even in times of needed budgetary restraint. Perhaps by way of illustration I should give the House a few examples of what the department actually delivers. Two days ago my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) signed with the United States Secretary of State a new Great Lakes water quality agreement to replace and extend the one originally signed in 1972. That first agreement undertook to reduce levels of pollution in the largest body of fresh water in the world. In successfully doing so, we set an example of international co-operation which has been remarked upon throughout the world. Great progress has been made in overcoming the sources of pollution of the Great Lakes, and with the signing of this new agreement we have committed ourselves to completing the revitalization of the lakes. Strict deadlines have been set for both municipal and industrial pollution control programs. Measures will be taken to largely eliminate the discharge of toxic substances into the lakes. New water quality objectives have been set and renewed attention will be given to the reduction of pollution from land use activities and from airborne pollutants. This major project, which brings together the governments of Canada, Ontario and the United States, continues as a high priority for my department because we can already see tangible results.

● (1642)

Another example: I mentioned the Petawawa Forest Experiment Station earlier. The preservation of that station in the face of our heavy budget reductions was one of the toughest chores the Department of the Environment faced. The goal of achieving more for less will, in this case, be accomplished by consolidating the work of the Forest Fires Research Institute and the Forest Management Institute with that of the Petawawa station. Because of this consolidation, which preserves and integrates the most vital elements of the station and the two institutes, we will have one of the most valuable forestry research resources in the world.

Forestry remains of primary importance to me and to the federal government. Even with the cutbacks, federal funding of forest management programs will actually increase through the use of DREE and Canada Public Works dollars with the provinces.

There is a growing recognition of the overwhelming importance of a strong forestry sector to Canada's economy, especially to our balance of payments and employment picture. In addition, it is increasingly understood that Canada's economy could be dealt a severe blow without measures to keep the cost of timber low, to keep the Canadian industry technically competitive and to stimulate the use of forests for new products, such as energy, chemicals and foods.

These facts are well known by members of the forestry fraternity, but only lately have they been gaining wide enough acceptance to be discussed by first ministers and to result in new federal programs in the coming year which will channel an estimated $49 million in federal funds to the provinces for reforestation, timber salvage and intensive forest management. The recognition of the importance of forests in meeting energy needs is reflected in two recently announced federal programs. These are the $143 million program known as FIRE to help the forest industry use wood wastes rather than oil and gas as a fuel source, and the $35 million ENFOR program for research and development on the use of biomass as a source of energy. In both these cases, the Canadian forestry service of my department has played a key role in providing technical input to the programs.

All of this indicates that a national forestry service remains vital to Canada. However, important shifts in program emphasis and new arrangements with the industry and the provinces are needed.

The Canadian Forestry Service will move toward a direct role with the research to support it, specifically in four areas. First, CFS will continue to play the leading role in federal forestry matters. This leadership will be based on the sound scientific knowledge which comes from a research program directed toward economic, physical and biological problems of federal interest. Second, CFS will bring a knowledge of the forest and vegetative environment to departmental decisions and policies on environmental management and protection. Third, CFS will work with the provinces to provide knowledge needed in direct forest management and protection. Fourth, CFS will work with industry to ensure provision of knowledge required for new product development and maintenance of the vitality of the forest industry.

For the first of these, federal policies and actions in taxation, transportation, trade, international relations and other fields can profoundly affect forests and the forest industry. International movement of damaging forest insects and diseases must be better controlled. Research and information programs in a number of areas, including national forest management and energy from forest biomass, are all of high priority if we are to provide the expertise needed to ensure that federal programs and actions are scientifically sound. To be effective, the Canadian Foresty Service will have stronger supporting mechanisms to ensure that all federal departments and all provincial governments are able to take full advantage of the available economic and biological knowledge.

As for the second responsibility, the CFS must conduct research and collect data on the impact of pollution on trees and other vegetation. The evironmental effects of forest management and exploitation practice must also be examined.

In working with the provinces it must be recognized that some of the research needed for federal purposes is also required by the provinces for the discharge of their management responsibilities.

In such cases provinces should assist in funding research needed to meet their needs. The CFS will negotiate this point with the provinces on the basis of research support, especially at the regional forest research centers.

A similar approach is required where forestry research and data collection in any way benefits industry. Like the provinces, industry should assist in the funding of such work. Federal contributions to forest products, forest engineering and pulp and paper research should cover research needs for policy input to federal agencies, support research needed where there is a large number of small companies unable to support their own research needs individually and ensure that nationally and internationally accepted codes and standards apply to Canadian forest products.

In short, to meet the needs of the next decade, the Canadian Forestry Service will, first, increase studies of economic and institutional aspects of forestry in Canada. Second, it will establish mechanisms at headquarters and in the regions to combine these studies with information in the natural forest science to improve federal actions and policy making affecting forestry and the forest industry. Third, the CFS will negotiate with the provinces a more realistic sharing of costs of research and data collection done in part, or largely, to meet provincial needs.

Fourth, the CFS will develop co-operative arrangements with industry to ensure direct financial contribution and management by industry of forest products and related research, while retaining federal financial and other involvement required for policy making to support small, scattered industrial enterprises and to establish and maintain suitable codes and standards for forest products.

When such changes are implemented, the Canadian Forestry Service will be able to play an enhanced role in forestry in Canada. Over the next decade and through the authority of its information base the service will assume increasing leadership of federal forestry activities.

Given the importance of forestry in Canada's economy, the enormous potential for growth and diversification of the forest based industry and the central place of forests in Canada's environment, the revitalization of the Canadian Forestry Service is one of the most compelling priority projects of the Department of the Environment.

The many different forms of life contained in our forests somehow manage to co-exist and to thrive. A natural system of management prevails which, though not completely understood by man, provides a benchmark by which all of our organizational efforts should be measured. We must try to integrate ourselves with this system if we are to prosper not only in our forests but also in our entire physical environment.

[Mr. Marchand.]

To this end every major federal project involving use of federal lands or federal funds is subject to the federal environmental assessment and review process. Agreed to by cabinet in 1973, the process was revised and given new strength in 1977.

Any projects likely to have significant environmental effects are subject to a study by an environmental assessment panel on the basis of an environmental impact statement submitted by the proponent. Panel reports have already been submitted to me with respect to matters as varied as the proposed construction of a uranium refinery near Port Hope, a highway in the far north of Canada and proposed drilling in the South Davis Strait.

● (1652)

Other panels are looking at proposed port expansion at Roberts Bank, a proposed port near Quebec city, three alternative sites for a uranium refinery, and the environmental terms and conditions which should apply to the Alaska gas pipeline. In all, there are over 20 major federal projects of this sort which are being subjected to environmental scrutiny by a variety of experts, an essential part of whose work is to hold public hearings so that we may hear what the affected public thinks of them. These panels, which report directly to me, are a major means of ensuring that the federal government in its activities acts in an environmentally responsible fashion.

I do not have enough time, Mr. Speaker, to detail all the work my department is doing and will continue to do in its regulatory activities for the protection of the Canadian environment. In this regard, it acts under the authority of important pieces of federal legislation—the Fisheries Act, the Clean Air Act, the Environmental Contaminants Act, and the Ocean Dumping Control Act.

In this important part of its activities my department is fully aware of the economic implications of our regulatory work, as well as the need to work as closely as possible with the provinces, in a way which recognizes the need to take into account the often conflicting uses of the physical environment. Our regulations and our guidelines will increasingly be developed in collaboration with our provincial counterparts and with those knowledgeable about the precise impact in both physical and financial terms of the regulations on the industry which will be affected.

In these days of growing concern about the total impact of the regulatory activities of governments on the economy, my department is working actively to implement the policy of this government which requires that each new major regulation in the field of safety, health and fairness be accompanied by a justification. The justification must take into account not only the costs, but the benefits to be derived from it. We must be willing and able to demonstrate that the costs we are placing on the Canadian economy are justifiable ones. Not only the immediate short-term impact on the affected industry must be considered, but any long run implications to the physical environment as well.

It is this balance of all our attempts to live as well as possible within our environment and our attempt to let our environment live as well as possible around us, that concerns the Department of the Environment. We can change our surroundings for our betterment, only if we accept and understand that we are dealing with an ecosystem of which we are a part. Our environment measures our actions carefully and responds accordingly. We will continue to be graciously accommodated by our surroundings only if we reciprocate. Knowing how to do this—divining a sort of environmental protocol—is the goal of my department.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Having tested my patience to the limit, I should like to request the unanimous consent of the House to participate as well in the budget debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already recognized the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker). The decision is no longer in the hands of the House; it depends entirely on the hon. member for Eglinton. If he wishes to yield, he may do so, but as far as I am concerned, I have already recognized the hon. member for Eglinton.

[English]

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): I will try to leave a minute or two for the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. That is about all that it will take to demolish this budget.

In rising to speak on the budget, it occurs to me that there are a great many similarities between this document and the cabinet shuffle that we had this morning. Both contained some minor measures, in one case, the movement of some minor people; in both cases, striking up the bland. There is nothing important in either document. I will give the government some credit though because there are some examples of Conservative policy in the budget. There is a sales tax cut, an income tax reduction, improved procedures for research and development, and all of these are Conservative policy.

This morning when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) shuffled his cabinet, he eliminated the Department of Urban Affairs, and that too is Conservative policy. In fact, when you see all these things happening, Mr. Speaker, when you listen to that kind of hooraw—coming from the other side—it is a wonderful example of the awful things that can happen when cousins marry.

If you examine what the government has done, you might be led to conclude that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) or even the Prime Minister are trying for a seat on the benches over here. I have talked to my leader, and I know there is a seat waiting for them in the row immediately behind me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that hon. members will understand that the hon. member has only five minutes, and that it is his maiden intervention. I think hon. members should be fair to him.

Mr. Parker: There is a difference between a non virgin and a prostitute, and undoubtedly the minister understands very well.

In the couple of minutes that remain, I would like to point out some of the ways in which the government has distorted figures used in the budget and in some of its accompanying documents. We are used to the idea that the government distorts figures to try to justify its miserable record of accomplishment. We have the CPI-2, which now leaves out the prices of food. The Prime Minister, in his speech to the Economic Club in New York said that, food excluded, the inflation rate is coming down. Presumably that means we will be all right if we do not eat.

In this budget the Minister of Finance noted that the indexing figure would be 9 per cent and indicated that for a family of four, that would increase the personal exemptions by $490. What he did not refer to was the fact that indexing has been part of the Income Tax Act for some time, and if he had not put it in at 9 per cent now, it would have been indexed by 8.6 per cent in any event, and that the net effect of his 9 per cent indexing is about $10 increase in exemptions. That is not all a tax saving, it is simply a reduction in taxable income. At an income tax rate of 35 per cent, it means that that individual wage earner would save about $3.50 which in many cities in Canada is enough to take him to a movie.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock p.m. it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forward the question necessary to dispose of the question now before the House.

CALL FOR EXPANSION OF WHEAT SALES TO CHINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on the basis of President Carter having virtually ended the OPEC style of co-operation, having launched an aggressive marketing strategy for wheat in China and apparently taking for granted that Canada has made herself vulnerable to competition. I therefore move:

That this House calls on the government, in order to preserve and expand the market in China which was secured under my government and has continued since, to send a delegation immediately to Peking, composed of representatives of the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and of Agriculture, the Wheat Board and national farm organizations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY TO FAMILIES OF COLLINS BAY PENITENTIARY GUARDS KILLED IN LINE OF DUTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek the unanimous consent of this House. In view of the tragic incident which occurred yesterday at Collins Bay penitentiary in Kingston, when custodial officer Francis Eustace, and food services officer Paul Maurice, lost their lives in the line of duty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais):

That this House expresses its deep sympathy to the bereaved families of these dedicated public servants.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUESTED PRORATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it could be that this is the day when the House will recognize the extreme urgency of this matter. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce at an early date an amendment to the Pension Act to provide for prorata pensions for widows of disabled veterans where the disability of the veteran was assessed below 48 per cent, it being clearly recognized that all members of this House of Commons would be pleased to pass such an amendment before Christmas.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

STATUS OF WOMEN

REPORT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL CONCERNING ADVANCEMENT IN PUBLIC SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because of the significant and disturbing delay by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women in the publishing of their annual evaluation on the advancement of women in the public service, and since this delay appears to be caused by the extraordinary action of sending preliminary copies of the report to the Public Service Commission itself for its comments, criticism and possible censorship, and that this essentially deprives parliament and the public of a full, frank and objective report, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the minister responsible for the status of women act immediately to ensure the report is published at once without amendment or deletion.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Paproski: As a former colleague of those who played in the Grey Cup, and as the owner of a jersey which bears the number 54, which is held in such awe by the Eskimos that they have been afraid to retire it, I would ask leave to move:

REQUESTED REMOVAL OF 5 PER CENT TAX ON DOORS AND WINDOWS MANUFACTURED IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion.

In view of the fact that in its last budget the government decided to reimpose a 5 per cent tax on doors and windows because they are not considered as acceptable insulating materials, and since over 450 small businesses in Quebec alone will be seriously affected by that decision, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House ask the government to review its decision and abolish that 5 per cent tax.

PREFERRED POSTAL RATES TO QUALIFYING CHARITABLE AND SOCIAL SERVICE ORGANIZATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and public concern.

In view of the fact that charitable and social service organizations, such as the War Amputations Association, Care Canada, and many others are finding it increasingly difficult, if not impossible, to use the postal service for fund-raising because of service disruptions and constantly increasing postal rates, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Postmaster General, following the example of the United States and other democratic countries, be directed forthwith to grant preferred postal rates to qualifying charitable and social service organizations, so as to ease their present financial difficulties and not be forced to cut back or eliminate vitally important programs to disadvantaged groups in Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRANSPORT

AUDITOR GENERAL'S CRITICISM OF DEPARTMENT'S FINANCIAL CONTROL PROCEDURES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. The Auditor General has documented, within the Department of Transport, items of poor financial control, cost overruns, poor contracting procedures and inefficient management which have totalled, in recent years, a cost to the taxpayer of $572.2 million. How can the minister justify this appalling waste and his failure to adequately supervise the expenditure of taxpayers' dollars?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the items to which the Auditor General referred very often occurred a number of years ago. In virtually every case, procedures have been put in place to try to make sure that whatever may have led to the problem in the first instance could not occur again. That has been a very important development for us.

In the case of airport facilities, for example, we have instituted very thorough, ongoing consultations with the users of facilities in order to have a complete double-check on the question of the scope of the needs for a particular facility.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister about two particular areas. First, the cost of the Calgary airport increased by some 255 per cent, from an original $57.7 million to an estimated final cost of some $127.4 million. From reading the Auditor General's report, it is apparent that the government proceeded without sufficient information on cost estimates, and incomplete, poor accounting and financial control procedures.

Can the minister assure the House that the sloppy and inefficient procedures which he just said were all right and which his department put in place have, in effect, been corrected?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is very much in mind. Since 1976, we have had procedures which guard against some of the problems that arose there. Of course, the statement that the original cost went from a certain figure to another figure may fail to take into account some very legitimate changes which occurred during the course of the construction period and from the planning period onward.

In the case of Calgary airport, we no doubt have an expensive facility. On the other hand, it reflects the very rapid growth of travel in and out of the city of Calgary and that whole area. In my view, the airport is only adequate having regard to the amount of growth we expect in the very near future. So while some of the expansion represents a change from the initial plan, a good deal of this change was desirable. This does not excuse the failure to adopt more stringent procedures as outlined by the Auditor General but, as I indicated to the hon. member before, since about 1976 those procedures have been changed.

● (1417)

Mr. Murta: My final supplementary is this: in the 1977-78 fiscal year, operating losses at Mirabel international airport totalled some $51.5 million. The Auditor General has also drawn attention to losses and cost overruns affecting other airports in Canada.

Is the Canadian consumer being called upon to pay the bills for sloppy management within the hon. gentleman's department, admittedly over the past few years, in the form of escalating airport taxes and higher landing fees? Is this the price the Canadian taxpayers and travellers are having to pay?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, it is not. Of course, the so-called loss at Mirabel is largely made up of such things as interest carried forward on the investment. In the old days, this used to be disregarded. Once the people of Canada, through parliament, had appropriated an amount of money to build an airport, no account was taken of the fact that it should be viewed as an ongoing cost in terms of the investment and that, therefore, an interest charge be made and depreciation shown.

We now carry these interest charges forward and show depreciation. This, therefore, shows up as a loss with regard to the Mirabel operation. In the long run, I have no doubt that the facility at Mirabel will prove to have been extremely necessary to accommodate the growth of traffic which will occur there. There is, of course, always a difficulty attached to a two-airport situation in moving traffic from Dorval to Mirabel. We have experienced it, and it came at the same time as a downturn in the expected growth in air travel.

Airport use is now surging forward again and in our many efforts, including the effort to avoid overloading Toronto, we are going to need a major facility at Mirabel to handle the load. I have no doubt that, looking back five or ten years from now, it will be seen it was very desirable to build a facility there.

INQUIRY WHETHER ROYAL COMMISSION WILL STUDY DEPARTMENTAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to remind him that in the long run, as Keynes said, "We are all dead". He is taking a very sanguine attitude toward these losses.

The hon. gentleman has been Minister of Transport since 1975, but he is blaming these misdeeds on previous ministers, such as his seatmate and the gentleman who is in the Senate. For the first time in Canadian history, officials of the department have blamed ministers for what went wrong. I refer to page 539 of the Auditor General's report, where the deputy minister in the minister's department said:

> The early commitments made by ministers based on circumstances extraneous to the department were particularly significant in the decisions on the timing, size and scope of these projects. The strength of these early commitments made it difficult to contain projects at later stages.

In view of these comments of his department, is the minister going to demand a royal commission to clear his name, if it can be cleared by an inquiry, or is he going to resign?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has missed the point of the Auditor General's comments vis-à-vis those of the officials in the Department of Transport. I think what the Auditor General is referring to there is the fact that it is not just economic considerations or practical bureaucratic considerations which are taken into account in many of our developments in the area. When we expand facilities at Gander it may not be totally on a cost-benefit basis.

When we proceed with an airport or terminal building at Wabush or at Charlo, to use two examples in the Atlantic region, it is not necessarily done on a cost-benefit basis which is supported by the bureaucracy. When we go to an airport at Charlottetown that is meant to reflect the desires of that province to have a tourist-attracting facility, it is not on an economic basis supported by bureaucrats. I continue to support the right and wisdom of ministers making judgments on the basis of social needs as well as economic needs, and I am glad to stand here and say so on behalf of my predecessors and myself.

● (1422)

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, this is a wonderful spectacle; the minister wants to spend money for a change. I was not referring to the Auditor General's comments; I was referring to the Department of Transport's comments made with reference to four projects where $200 million were spent that should not have been spent. The four projects were the airports at Calgary and Toronto, the Training Institute at Cornwall, and the Motor Vehicle Test Centre. The minister's officials said that it was "the impact of the political process, our ministers, who caused these transgressions, these overruns."

In view of these statements from his department's officials, will the minister ask for an inquiry, will he request the resignation of these people, or what action will he take? This matter is on the public record. Could the so-called minister advise us what he is going to do about it?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it was my impression that not only did I note that it was officials in Transport who made the comments, but I referred to that fact in my answer. It is also my impression that I fully answered the hon. member and told him why it is that sometimes, on a non-economic basis, a minister will make decisions and recommend situations to government on the basis of what is good for a province, region or development not necessarily justified on economics alone. I said that and I said it very fully.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, in a final plea to the minister, we all know that politics have some connection with such questions. Nobody is quarrelling with the site of these projects or whether or not the projects had to go ahead. We are quarrelling with the fact that the wool was pulled over Treasury Board's eyes, that decisions were made too quickly, that there was an unnecessary expenditure of public funds because of the mistakes of ministers, not because of politics intruding. We all know that politics is government.

In view of these circumstances, and the fact that the minister and his predecessors have been blamed for this situation, what action does he propose to take?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's West is using reasoning by which he would urge me to follow some bureaucratic advice in favour of closing down the railway in Newfoundland. We are not intending to do so. We are following, instead, political judgment based on an inquiry among people in Newfoundland and consultation with the provincial government and my colleague who quite ably represents Newfoundland.

Mr. Jamieson: Right.

Mr. Lang: We intend to follow a political route, not an economic one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GRAIN

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board.

As the minister knows, on Thursday the Wheat Board announced that they wanted to purchase some 500 to 2,000 hopper cars to move prairie grain. In light of the fact that the railways had an obligation to provide the rolling-stock, that the Wheat Board is apparently being blackballed by the railways into purchasing the cars themselves, and that this is a dangerous precedent where the user is actually purchasing his own hopper cars to move his own product, I would ask the minister if he authorized the calling of tenders and, if he did, would he tell this House how he rationalizes and defends his decision against the historical obligation of the railways to provide boxcars or hopper cars to move grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that it is not at all unusual for people who ship products to in fact acquire cars and make them available to the railways in connection with the shipment of the product. That would not ordinarily take place in this particular situation, simply because the user is only having to pay a very low rate for moving the product and there is really no room for that kind of flexibility in rate negotiations.

I was aware of the intention of the Canadian Wheat Board to acquire hopper cars, or to go to tender for them. My authorization was not required. I believe that what the Wheat Board is doing is making a judgment that it is better to have the extra cars available to avoid charges like demurrage which may lie on its doorstep if at a peak period it cannot move all the grain that it would like to move, or cannot move it as effectively.

The railroads have put forward certain arguments about when they would need additional cars and whether they have enough cars for next year. The Wheat Board, I believe, was not content to take a risk with regard to those arguments, even though some could make a case that with a better turnaround time we would not need the cars until perhaps a year later. Without doubt, we will need them soon and the Wheat Board felt it wise to have those cars and to proceed with a call for bids.

● (1427)

Mr. Nystrom: As we all know, Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board said we need about 4,000 extra hopper cars and we need to repair about 5,000 boxcars. They also said that because of the fact we do not have adequate cars to move grain, we lost about $350 million in sales last year.

My question to the minister is: why does he not require the railroads to purchase the cars? It is the first time that the Wheat Board has done it. Why does he not require the railways to purchase those cars? Does he not have enough political clout to do so?

Mr. Lang: It is hardly a question of political clout. I am not at all sure that I have the legal authority to require the purchase of equipment unless I can make an iron-clad case about equipment being required at a specific time. I have indicated to the railways that I am prepared to look at the power I have under the various pieces of legislation having to do with the Canadian transportation system, and I put them on notice that I will not countenance an inadequate supply of equipment to move grain. Their case is that for the immediate period ahead, they have that equipment. I have my own judgment about that.

It is a very tough question to argue in total, that the Wheat Board, instead of waiting for that argument, felt it was wise to have the cars, as they say, partly to guard against things such as demurrage charges which are a normal part of carrying grain and thereby to ensure they can move that grain to the market.

Mr. Nystrom: If the minister feels he cannot persuade the railways to purchase the additional cars, why does his department, as a last resort not convince the government to purchase the hopper cars as it has in the past? I believe the House was told by the minister a few weeks ago that if it were not for the government's restraint program, it might be easier to do that.

Will the minister now undertake to fulfil his obligation to western farmers to try to persuade the government to purchase those cars, so that this cost is not on the backs of the farmers?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, even with restraint, we looked very carefully at the question of purchase of cars and when it would be desirable to purchase additional cars. I have indicated that I have no doubt—and almost everyone agreed—that additional cars will be needed at some point in the next few years. The question that is at issue at the moment is whether that order needs to be made exactly now. That is a complicated question having regard to the efficiency with which the equipment is used.

In the years between 1974 and 1977, enough improvements were made in the way cars are handled that we achieved 3.3 more turnarounds out of every hopper car and boxcar in the system, and we were able to carry 34 per cent more grain with no increase in equipment. There is under way at present an intensive analysis, on a systems management basis, of whether we can do better with the equipment we have. If we can, we may indeed have enough equipment for the grain which can be hauled and offered to the market next year.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER MUNICIPALITIES' REQUESTS FOR ASSISTANCE WILL BE CONSIDERED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. I congratulate him for his appointment because we shall often have to work together and I hope we understand each other. I ask him this question as minister responsible for urban affairs because that department will remain in existence until March 31, 1979 if the right hon. Prime Minister's release is accurate, and I hope so. In an answer he gave on November 14 to an hon. member, the minister said the following:

> I understand that municipal incentive grants and sewage treatment programs will continue until December 31, 1978—

Can the minister tell the House whether the applications of municipalities introduced before December 31 will be considered as being part of the program which will not be terminated.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. However, to take advantage of federal funds the municipalities will have to have their projects approved by provincial authorities. I would also like to thank the hon. member for his good wishes.

INQUIRY WHETHER INFORMATION IS AVAILABLE CONCERNING MUNICIPALITIES' ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister also made the following statement:

> —the decision which was taken was that the community services grants program will commence as of January, 1979.

Could the minister tell the House whether documentation is now available so that we can inform the municipalities which would like to take advantage of this program, and if not, could the minister tell us when such literature will be available?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have already sent literature to this effect to hon. members when we announced the program. Now that we know exactly the costs and the content of this program, I will be happy to table an information paper on this program tomorrow, at the committee where my estimates will be studied.

AIRPORTS

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT ON AIRPORT SITE CAPITALIZATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, who perhaps has received one of the severest reprimands any accountant can give, in the sense that the Auditor General chose to qualify his report respecting the airport revolving fund under the supervision of the minister.

In connection with the comment of the Auditor General on the Pickering airport site capitalization amounting to something over $54 million, would the minister indicate if the department will accept the advice of the Auditor General and in future cease to capitalize these development costs?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be reflecting on the correct way to handle the Pickering site as a site in addition to the whole question of it as an item in the accounts. I think hon. members should recognize that it was a somewhat exceptional circumstance, in that we fully intended to move ahead with airport construction, in which case the handling of the amount involved perhaps would have been unexceptional.

As a result of the provincial decision, the province, in effect, selected the site for us: they asked us to build the airport at Pickering. When they disengaged themselves from the exercise and stopped the airport from going ahead, obviously we were left with an investment in land which had been intended for a purpose and which now is not being used for that purpose. This will lead us to reflect on the whole question of how we deal with the land as an item in the accounts.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of Transport overlooked the fact the Auditor General, in making his stiff comment concerning this transaction, pointed out that it was a federal cabinet decision to defer indefinitely the Pickering airport development.

In view of the answer which the minister just gave, would he indicate when in fact they intend to charge, as an expense, these capitalized items which have built up? It is a major item. Since they are simply for the development of a site which may or may not be developed, surely there should be a charge forthwith against expenditures, rather than fudging the figures and appearing to have an asset when in fact there is none.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we have an asset: we have the land which was accumulated for the purpose of building Pickering airport. Of course, it was a decision of the Government of Canada actually to stop the construction. The bulldozers were already on site when this decision was taken. Of course, it was taken as a result of the decision by the province of Ontario that it would not build the connecting roads, the services or in any way co-operate with the existence of an airport at that site. So it may have been a cabinet decision but it was made without very much choice, in the circumstances.

We might have had a choice at an earlier date when we were trying to select sites and when, having looked at some sites very carefully, we were asked by Ontario to put aside our site selection and even our choices—one, two, three, four—and go to a completely different site, namely, the Pickering site. The airport was being constructed there very much for provincial reasons—their view of development. It is worth commenting on this extraordinary matter. We went to a site which was the choice of the province, and when we were ready to move with airport construction we were stopped from going ahead by the message from the province that it would not co-operate in an airport at that site.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, presumably the Minister of Transport does not understand the figures respecting the Pickering site. The total capitalization for Pickering is $158 million. The Auditor General did not quibble with the land costs. He stated that the development costs were wrongly capitalized in view of the fact that by decision of the cabinet it was agreed that it would be postponed.

Will the minister assure the House that in future no further development costs at Pickering will be capitalized but will be shown as a current expense, as previous development costs should have been charged?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my first answer, obviously we will take seriously the recommendations of the Auditor General. Simply, I was pointing out to the hon. member, who made it sound as though something very extraordinary had happened, that it might not have looked so extraordinary at all if we had gone ahead with the airport development.

Mr. Stevens: Well, it is extraordinary.

Mr. Lang: For that reason, we were treating costs in a certain way. Obviously, we must reach our conclusion about what we are going to do with the land, the whole question of development there and, as a result, where the costs ought to be best shown.

Oral Questions

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MINISTER'S COMMENTS ON BEEF IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs: it arises out of last week's beef industry seminar in Regina at which the minister was a luncheon speaker.

In view of the minister's somewhat abrupt and abrasive remarks which clearly indicated his preference for higher beef import quotas and both floor and ceiling prices for live cattle, will he indicate if he was enunciating government policy in this part of his speech to the beef industry seminar?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I reject the suggestion that I was abrupt and harsh with the cattlemen. They invited me to speak to them as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and that is what I did. I do not know what else they would expect me to do but speak as a minister for consumers.

An hon. Member: They expected you to use common sense.

Mr. Allmand: I did. I suggested that we should get together—the government, cattlemen and consumer groups—to work out, at the beginning of the beef cycle, a system which would provide good incomes to beef producers as well as to provide stable prices for consumers. I thought the beginning of the beef cycle was a good time to do this.

Also, I suggested that perhaps we could increase the quota for low grades of beef which supply the hamburger market. This is important for low income Canadians and it does not compete with what Canadian producers produce, which is high quality beef. I suggested this as a topic for discussion. I hope we can carry through with those discussions. But the increase in quotas is not yet government policy.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST THAT BEEF IMPORT QUOTAS WILL NOT BE INCREASED

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. McGrath: This is going to be good.

Mr. Hargrave: The well-researched cattle and beef projections given at the Regina beef seminar pointed out that continued heavy kills of cows and heifers in both Canada and the United States will result in critical shortages throughout the last half of 1979, all of 1980 and through to 1982. That is plainly evident now.

Would the Minister of Agriculture give Canadian beef cattle producers some reassurance that beef import quotas will not be increased and that no floor and ceiling live cattle prices are to be brought in?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we announced government policy some months ago. At this time we have no intention of changing it. We said that we would leave it in effect at that time, and if the policy which was announced jointly by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and myself did not work, we would bring in an immediate import law. I am sure the hon. member is aware that there has been no change in that policy.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REFUSAL OF BENEFITS TO CERTAIN PERSONS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Does the minister intend to see to it that those who were denied unemployment benefits as a result of amendments made to the act which became effective on January 1, 1976, even though they have applied for the Quebec pension, will benefit from the ruling of the appeals division of the federal court to which the request was submitted by the three retired persons who reached 65 before January 1, 1976?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is very happy today because he made representations to me in this connection. I have not yet had a chance to read the decision of the tribunal today, but as soon as I have done so I shall have to determine what procedure will have to be followed.

GRAIN

SUGGESTION TRANSPORTATION RESPONSIBILITY REST WITH GRAIN COMPANIES

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. I take it from his earlier answer that he fully support the Wheat Board proposal to spend up to $100 million of producers' money for grain cars.

As lost sales, deferred sales, demurrage and interest costs are well into the hundreds of millions of dollars so far this calendar year, and more and more the responsibility for faulty programming seems to be with the Canadian Wheat Board, I would ask the minister whether he has considered moving this transportation programming responsibility to the grain companies.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I made it clear, in answer to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, that my authorization was not required in relation to this particular decision by the Wheat Board. I think the hon. member's suggestion that somehow the grain companies could handle this transportation misses some points about the kind of co-ordination that is required in a major movement of a product such as grain. I have not given any serious consideration to the kind of transfer to which he referred.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, in view of the situation at Vancouver, where we have seen ten or 12 vessels sitting around for the last two months, with no overtime being worked at any of the terminals, could the minister announce any new or innovative measures to assist our grain export program for the coming winter? It seems to be heading into a worse mess than last winter.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that at any time when we are shooting for the record or the limit of our capability to move grain, we will from time to time run into difficulties. Again this year, during the summer months when we had the capacity to move more grain, ships were not presenting themselves for loading. Now they are bunching in Vancouver, as happens quite chronically at this time of year and has done for many years, even years when we were shipping a rather light volume of grain. I refer to the very low periods of exports when there was a Conservative government in office and the difficulties which can be cited from the press at that time about the pile-up of ships, demurrage charges, and so on. That was, as I say, Mr. Speaker, when we were exporting 300 million and 400 million bushels of grain instead of the near-record volumes of 820 million and 850 million bushels we are exporting in these years.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REPORT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL CONCERNING ADVANCEMENT IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of women and it concerns the Advisory Council on the Status of Women which reports to the minister.

As the minister and other members are aware, on a regular basis the advisory council has published an evaluation of the advancement of women in the public service. This year's report has been considerably delayed, and it now appears that the report itself has been sent to the Public Service Commission, or a number of copies, for comment and possible alteration or censorship. Was the minister consulted about this unusual procedure, has he asked for a copy of the report, and has he approved this?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would, first of all, say I regret that the hon. member uses the provisions of section 43 to put on the record allegations of the nature he has made at a time when we are not in a position to immediately answer them.

As far as the report is concerned, it is a report which is made on a regular basis by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. That is an independent body for whom I answer in parliament. That body is completely independent and it does its studies in the way it wants, in respect of the subjects it wants and at a time it wants; and it releases its reports when it wants.

If at this particular time this body has decided to check with the Public Service Commission on the accuracy of statistics it used during its study, I would remind the hon. member that the Public Service Commission is also an independent body and that that is the right of the council. I find nothing wrong with that. On the contrary, I find it very commendable, and I would hope that the opposition would do a little bit of the same once in a while, rather than casting aspersions on devoted public servants and independent bodies which cannot defend themselves in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, since the minister is obviously not aware of this procedure, or at least appears to be unaware of it, could he indicate why this procedure was adopted this year and in no previous years? In view of the possible conflict of interest in respect of having a full, frank and objective report, will the minister take appropriate action?

While he is answering that, and since he is concerned about a full and objective report of information—over half a year ago he promised this House the reports and plans of action of the various departments in respect of the equal opportunities programs—would he indicate why we have been so unsuccessful in having any of this material published? Is deliberate action being taken by the government to suppress this information?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member again makes a statement to the effect that there was no such consultation in previous years. My question to him is: how does he know? The research section of the advisory council does its own work. They do not consult me about their work. I am not aware of what exactly took place in these specific instances, and I intend that it remains so. If you want to ensure that we have objective and reliable reports, I find it quite proper and quite normal for bodies of that nature to check the facts, rather than to do as the hon. member has done too often on this subject of the status of women, putting on the record of this House statements which are not correct and are not accurate.
