As to the general question about the equal opportunities program, I would remind the hon. member that departments are required to file with Treasury Board their plans of action. I have stated that those plans of action, once they have been filed with Treasury Board, are available for examination. I do not know exactly what the situation is today, but if the hon. member wishes to have access to some of those documents, he need only ask Treasury Board and he can see them for himself. I have stated repeatedly that those documents are available.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

INCREASE IN PRICE OF LUMBER—EFFECT ON HOUSING STARTS NEXT YEAR

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the minister responsible for housing. In view of the fact that all indications are that the number of housing starts next year will decline quite substantially because of the increased cost of building houses, the increased cost of land and the increased cost of mortgages, would the minister tell the House whether he and his officials have looked into the increase in the last year of between 45 per cent and 65 per cent in the cost of lumber used in housing, at a time when the forest products industry has had an increase in their profits of well over 100 per cent?

If his officials have looked at this situation, can the minister indicate what effect this increase in the price of lumber will have on housing starts next year?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this government has a projected five-year plan of close to one million new starts in Canada in order to meet the needs of Canadians in terms of housing. This projected plan of five years is well on target. In fact, we believe that within the five years we will meet the objective we have established. We do not fear that there will be a substantial reduction in starts this year or next year that would curtail that objective of one million new starts in Canada.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

Will the minister have his department, or the Anti-Inflation Board, look at this increase in the price of lumber of between 45 per cent and 65 per cent in the last year, at a time when the major corporations in this industry showed an increase in profits of 119 per cent in one year, and at a time when the wages of workers in the industry were restricted by the AIB guidelines to 6 per cent? Will the minister have his department look at this situation and make a statement at some time in the House explaining this deplorable situation?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my department does not have responsibility for that matter or the AIB. The problem is an important one and I will refer it to the appropriate agencies, AIB and CSIP, which is the new agency of the Economic Council to monitor prices.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHO WILL ACCEPT VIETNAMESE REFUGEES NOT REMAINING IN QUEBEC

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Gamelin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But first, I think it would be in order to congratulate him as well as his officials, the members of the Canadian Armed Forces and all the employees of the Department of Employment and Immigration for their magnificent performance over the weekend with regard to the transportation of the Vietnamese refugees who have new reached Canada. I should now like to ask the minister, knowing that Quebec will accept about 200 of those refugees and that it seems to be co-operating fully, what other areas of Canada will welcome the other refugees?

● (1452)

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome, as obviously the House does, the opportunity to pass on to all concerned in this airlift and the previous activities involved the congratulations of members for a very first-class humanitarian job. I will see to it that the message from the House is conveyed to the officials concerned.

I do not know precisely which provinces are involved. There are at least six, and perhaps seven, but I will try to get more specific information. The last figures I saw show that approximately one-third would remain in the province of Quebec and the balance distributed across the country; but I shall get more specific information.

PENITENTIARIES

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR FAMILIES OF COLLINS BAY PENITENTIARY GUARDS KILLED IN LINE OF DUTY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. Could the minister assure the House that a complete investigation is being carried out into the tragic deaths of custodial officer Francis Eustace, and food services officer Paul Maurice at the Collins Bay penitentiary over the weekend?

Could he further assure the House that, while no monetary compensation can adequately compensate for this tragic loss of life, nevertheless arrangements will be made so that the bereaved families will not be in financial distress?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am pleased that the hon. lady chose to present a motion under Standing Order 43 which permitted all members of the House to offer our condolences to the two families.

[Mr. Allmand.]

I would say, as well, to the hon. lady that she can rest assured there will be a complete investigation of the circumstances. I want to reassure her, as well as the staff of the Canadian Penitentiary Service, that in this instance we are considering an isolated incident in terms of security and there does not seem to be, at first-hand, any lapse in internal security. The circumstances would indicate, however, that the inmate concerned may have been under the influence of an intoxicant and, therefore, there is need for a complete investigation.

In terms of compensation for members of families, I might indicate there has been a great deal of interest shown both by the House and myself in finding adequate compensation so that members who are so affected are not left in a situation where they are at a loss financially as a result of unfortunate and tragic events.

IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. Could the minister give the House a brief account of the circumstances leading up to this tragedy? Also, is he aware that the report of the subcommittee on penitentiaries, which was adopted unanimously by members of all parties on that subcommittee, came to his predecessor in office, and thus to him, as a package remedy for many of the incidents such as this one we are dealing with?

Can he tell the House whether the government intends to implement that report as a package? I realize that some recommendations have been implemented. When is the package going to be implemented, so that this kind of thing might be avoided in future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the minister attempts to answer, I would say that I consider the question in the first part, an account of the circumstances, to be inappropriate in the question period because of the length of reply that would be required. The part about the committee report seems to be quite in order.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the second part of the hon. gentleman's question, I might indicate that on Thursday of this week I will be appearing before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, at which time I will be tabling a further progress report on the implementation of the recommendation of the subcommittee.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would invite the hon. member and all other members who are interested in this matter to attend the meeting and ask all questions they consider relevant.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SALE OF ARMAMENTS MANUFACTURED BY SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of National Defence with respect to the Space Research Corporation, a Canadian company which, as the minister knows, has been assisted to the tune of millions of dollars by the Canadian taxpayers and whose activities have been the subject of an investigatory TV program and recent action by the government of Barbados as well as that of Antigua?

I ask the minister if he can be absolutely satisfied that the armaments manufactured by Space Research Corporation have remained in the countries to which Canada issued end-user certificates, and whether it is possible that any of these armaments could have been transshipped to other countries?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that is not in my area of responsibility. I understand an investigation is being made. I do not know if the appropriate minister has an answer to that question at this time. I cannot answer the question.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I gather that the Solicitor General is not in his place at the moment. I should like to remind the minister that he knows inquiries have been made of him in the past. I would ask him if he would give the House his assurance that he will investigate this matter, talk to the RCMP officers involved in the investigation, or have the Solicitor General do so and find out once and for all whether armaments that are being shipped from this country to countries where Canada has offered or given an end-user certificate are being warehoused and transshipped elsewhere? I think he owes the House this kind of explanation.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, if I were the minister responsible, I would owe the House this sort of response; but I am not the minister responsible. I am sure the minister responsible will answer as he responded in the House the other day without any conclusive information, as I understand. As the Solicitor General is now in the House, the hon. member may wish to redirect the question to him. If he would start from scratch, the Solicitor General could hear it.

PENITENTIARIES

REHABILITATION PROGRAM FOR INMATES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, but it is on another matter. I should like to ask the minister if there has been any change in the policy and purpose of the Penitentiary Service; that is, not only to protect the public and impose punishment but also to provide help for rehabilitation.

I ask that question in light of the fact that in part of this restraint program consideration is being given to reducing by 50 per cent the chaplaincy service in the major institutions. Could the minister reassure the House that the purpose of the Penitentiary Service is still threefold, and that requests by somebody to reduce the chaplaincy service in many institutions, removing either the Roman Catholic or the Protestant chaplain—who by historic tradition have been in most of them—will not be proceeded with, in view of the fact that so many estimates for publishment have been increased in the Penitentiary Service?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his representation. I fully agree with him. He knows, as hon. members of the House know, that there is, as a result of restraints, a cutback in terms of total staff and in some areas, some of the chaplaincy has been affected, but not as a result of any concentration in terms of the chaplains themselves.

We have made every attempt to encourage representatives of the chaplaincy to communicate and consult with us in order to make sure there is a proper chaplaincy effort within the Penitentiary Service. I assure the hon. gentleman that it is an activity I am paying close attention to, for the reasons he has outlined.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would have given the minister notice, but this matter came to my attention over the weekend. As I left my church, someone very active in the chaplaincy service approached me. I must say I was rather startled with the information I received.

I understand that the minister or the commissioner of the Penitentiary Service is meeting with the Interfaith Committee on Wednesday or Thursday. Contrary to part of the answer of the minister, it is my information that over 50 per cent of the chaplains and/or the positions in the major institutions are being eliminated—either not being filled, or those that are filled are going to be cut back. This will distort the religious service that has been given to the inmates, and in the province of Quebec it will even distort the service given by Francophone and Anglophone chaplains to the inmate population. In that sense, it will have a very adverse effect on this rehabilitation program.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Interfaith Committee will be comforted in the sense that they will see that the information, or the scuttlebutt we have been hearing is not accurate. Regarding the Protestant chaplains in the province of Quebec, the situation is that there are only about 170 Protestant inmates in Quebec so, in effect, we have a surplus of Protestant chaplains in that province. Therefore, there may be a reduction that approaches the figure which the hon. member describes. I am sure he understands the motivation for the reduction in this instance.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Wm. Andres (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 288, 478 and 483. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ELECTRONIC DEVICES

Question No. 288—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government and specifically, the Department of External Affairs, aware of electronic listening devices or any other form of surveillance device found in the Embassy of Poland in Ottawa?

2. Did the government receive any representations on the matter from Polish authorities and, if so, from whom and on what date?

3. Is the government aware as to who installed the devices and, if so, what is the identity of the person or persons?

4. Has the government or anyone acting on its behalf, placed listening devices in a foreign Embassy or Consulate in Canada?

5. Does the government possess evidence that such devices were placed by other foreign powers in embassies and, if so, what is their identity along with dates, any incidents and the embassies involved?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1, 3, 4 and 5. The Canadian government has traditionally refused to comment on such questions, on grounds of national security.

2. No.

CBC—EMPLOYEES

Question No. 478—Mr. Roy (Laval):

1. Does CBC have a policy regarding employees who are prosecuted following verbal or written comments and, if so, what is it?

2. During the past ten years, have any employees been prosecuted and, if so (a) how many (b) what amount did CBC spend for their defence, if any?

3. For the same years, were any employees found guilty and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the amount of the settlement, including out of court settlements?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The CBC has no policy in this regard; however, individual cases are dealt with upon their merits and in accordance with the best interests of the corporation.

2. (a) Twenty.

(b) In all cases the employees were named as co-defendants of the CBC and the same counsel was retained to defend both the employees and the corporation. Since, in such cases, legal expenses are combined, it is impossible to determine how much the corporation has spent exclusively on employees' defence. However, in the context of one of these cases, that is still before the courts, one employee was named in a motion for contempt and the corporation was not named. The amount spent by the CBC in the defence of that employee in the motion for contempt is determinable and it was $6,207.93.

3. In matters finally determined, no employees were held responsible or found guilty. As for out of court settlements, in one case, while no finding was made by a court, the CBC settled out of court on behalf of itself and the employee involved for $1,000 damages and $450 costs. In respect of the motion noted in answer to question 2(b) the employee was found guilty of contempt and the corporation covered $3,368.09 in satisfaction of court costs.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION—LAWYERS IN VICTORIA

Question No. 483—Mr. McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria who performed services for the Farm Credit Corporation during 1977 and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Farm Credit Corporation advises:

Cecil Branson,

Sullivan, Smith & Bigelow,

505-645 Fort Street,

Victoria, B.C. V8W 1G2.

Fees paid to lawyers used in the constituency of Victoria, British Columbia by Farm Credit Corporation are paid as follows:

(i) by the borrowers upon their direction out of the proceeds of the mortgage loans in which case Farm Credit Corporation does not maintain records of amounts so paid;

(ii) by Farm Credit Corporation on mortgage proceedings—Nil.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STEVENS—CONDITIONS RESPECTING ACCESS TO CONFIDENTIAL DOCUMENTS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I gave you notice several days ago.

You will recall, sir, that my question of privilege arose from a certain declaration that I was asked to sign on November 23 should I wish to gain access to a lock-up dealing with the 100th Annual Report of the Auditor General to this House. In my notice to you, Mr. Speaker, I pointed out that my privilege as a member of parliament and my ability to function as such had been impeded by this unnecessary imputation that we, as members of the House, may not be taken as people of our word.

I will outline the four offensive statements that I was to agree to if I wished to go into the lock-up. The document was to be dated November 23. First, it was to acknowledge receipt of a copy of the report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978. I took no objection to that.

The four parts of the declaration to which I did take objection are as follows: First

I undertake not to remove them—

Meaning the actual report of the Auditor General and the Conspectus which was also to be furnished. It continues:

—from Room 308 West Block before the report is tabled in the House of Commons.

I agree not to leave this room without escort before 2 p.m. this date.

I understand that interviews on the publications mentioned above are not to be given until the report has been tabled in the House of Commons, and I agree not to divulge the content of these publications until after tabling.

The basis of my privilege would turn on two related but, I would suggest, separate points. First, I believe there should be an adjudication as to whether once you give the existence of a lock-up, and there has been no dispute about that, the lock-up was agreed to by the public accounts committee of this chamber, any member should feel free to attend if he wished. The only qualification stated by the chairman of the public accounts committee with respect to the lock-up was that the usual requirements of lock-ups would somehow be acknowledged and followed.

As I understand it, the actual drafting of the declaration that I was requested to sign was done by the office of the Auditor General. In short, the public accounts committee said that there would be a lock-up and the usual requirements would apply.

Having met that declaration I feel we must consider, given the existence of the lock-up to which I have referred, can a member be forced to sign a declaration saying he will divulge nothing? Can a member's freedom of movement be restricted as one of the conditions of that lock-up? What I am about to say, Mr. Speaker, turns very heavily on what is meant by that term "hon. members of this House". What is meant when we swear the oath before we take our seats in this House? I would say, when one relates the tradition of this House to the very heavy precedent that we are to be treated as men of honour, that our word is to be accepted, there is a serious challenge to that premise in the whole context of the draft declaration that members were confronted with on November 23.

In support of what I am saying I would point out that we have standing committees of this House that not infrequently hold in-camera sessions to prepare their reports for further tabling. This type of thing is dealt with from time to time in Hansard. At no time, to the best of my knowledge, has it ever been suggested that a member of this House who chooses to attend an in-camera meeting of one of our standing committees with a view to preparing any report, whether or not it is to be tabled in this House, has been required to sign a declaration such as the one I was confronted with on November 23, to give any indication that he would not discuss the report. As I understand it, that is taken for granted. It is understood. If a member is invited and does attend any type of secret session or one that is generally regarded to be off the record, as a man of his word, he will not breach that trust.

You will recall, sir, that on May 19 at page 146 of Hansard there was a question of someone apparently speaking out of turn concerning something that had transpired in an in-camera session of a then committee of this House. At that time it was generally felt that the proper course to follow, if someone breaches the traditional rules of this House, was that an hon. member should then get up on a question of privilege and ask that that individual member be dealt with. I would refer you, sir, to Beauchesne, citation 46, where the question of secret sessions of the Canadian House of Commons and the British House of Commons is explored. The keeping of the secrets that presumably might be revealed in those secret sessions is held as a member's duty.

There is no suggestion that any member has to sign some separate type of declaration or take any oath that he will not reveal whatever he learns in such a session. Again, I would say that the whole requirement that a member of parliament remain in a specific place until a specific time is obviously a restriction of his freedom of movement and his ability to serve as a member of parliament generally. Should we not accept that members who have due regard for secrecy whether locked into a room or not, since they are not locked up, for example, until a committee reports, to which I have just referred—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While the hon. member is on that subject, in the circumstances to which he is referring, would he be proposing that, given this lock-up, which is an arrangement that I might have to look at in terms of the rights and duties of members, when he or any other hon. member had appeared and entered the room and secured copies of documents, that they ought equally to be free to leave the room with copies in their possession, also on the understanding that they would have to be trusted not to break secrecy?

To keep them in the room once they have entered, even though voluntarily and without signing any declaration, even to prevent them from leaving the room with the document in hand, would somehow be equally an interference with the freedom of the hon. member in the circumstance. I would like the hon. member to deal with that.

Mr. Stevens: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I understand the thrust of your general comment, I feel that in truth would be another breach of our privilege in this House. The reason I am raising this is not so much to point the finger at any particular group, certainly not at the Auditor General. It is simply to get a new focus on something that I feel has not really been properly dealt with in this House. It is the question of how do we treat relatively confidential matters such as the tabling of the Auditor General's report, and in my case much more important, dealing with budgetary matters.

How do we treat these prior to their publication in a way that we can accept members of parliament as being qualified people who will deal on a confidential basis, if necessary, with the documents concerned and at the same time ensure there will be a meaningful discussion in this House with regard to whatever the document is, be it the Auditor General's report or a budgetary presentation in due course?

Perhaps this is the worst example I have run into to date of where ad hockery in dealing with the so-called lock-ups has led to an affront virtually of every member in this House in the sense of requiring a member to sign a declaration that I think most members would find most unusual and, I would hope in all cases, totally unnecessary, to ensure that whatever secrecy was to be preserved with respect to the publication of the Auditor General's report, would in fact be preserved.

I say this because I think we must draw a distinction between the nature of the Auditor General's report and, say, the more precarious type of report or statements that you have in a budgetary statement. After all, an Auditor General's report, while it may be embarrassing to the government and others in the country, is really after the event. It is simply the report of an Auditor General as to what he has found with respect to his examination of the accounts of government.

In a budgetary sense, where a minister of finance, inadvertently or otherwise, might make a disclosure, that would give somebody an opportunity to take advantage and make a windfall profit or in some way gain access to knowledge that he otherwise should not have. Whatever lock-up requirements are required for an Auditor General's report, they should be less severe than those generally necessary for a budget lock-up.

In the case of the November 23 situation, the actual requirements that were asked of me were the most severe I have ever encountered with regard to any lock-up since I have come to Ottawa. Certainly the budgetary lock-ups are handled on a more casual basis. We are treated as members of parliament in those lock-ups, allowed a certain freedom to leave, for example, before the minister rises in his place to deliver the budget speech. We are allowed to have some discussion with our leader concerning the budget, and that type of thing. That is totally within the context of operating properly as a member of parliament.

I feel there was a question of privilege on November 23 with regard to when I requested admission to the lock-up room to deal with the Auditor General's report. I feel there is a question of privilege as I was asked to sign a declaration with the four offensive parts in it that I have read. I say that, in order to underline the fact that I do not think the Auditor General's report is all that secret. I would point out that if you review the Auditor General's report you will find two letters at the beginning of the report, one from the then president of the treasury board, now the President of the Board of Economic Ministers (Mr. Andras), to the Auditor General, and the other from the Auditor General to the then president of the treasury board.

The interesting thing about these letters is that they point out that the contents of the Auditor General's report had been known, certainly to the then president of the treasury board and his staff. The whole point of the letters was that the President of the Treasury Board could reply to the Auditor General to what extent he felt the comments were fair and to what extent he felt he could improve or had already put in place certain mechanisms to relieve some of the problems to which the Auditor General had referred.

We have here a situation where a report is already being dealt with by members of parliament, certainly by one or more cabinet ministers and their staff. However, when it comes to the question of when can we in the opposition have access to and review the report, these harsh lock-up requirements are in effect forced upon us, or we do not see the report.

I would point out that in the letter from the then president of the treasury board to the Auditor General dated October 13, well ahead of the actual tabling of the report in this House, the then president of the treasury board stated:

> —my formal reponse to the information which you have imparted to my senior officials and myself concerning your forthcoming audit findings and observations.

He goes on to make some comments. He stated he felt there had been major initiatives taken by both the Treasury Board secretariat and the new office of the Comptroller General with regard to comments made in the Auditor General's forthcoming report. In reply to that letter, the Auditor General stated:

> Your letter of October 13 is a constructive and welcome response to the government-wide observations and recommendations that my current annual Report brings to the attention of Parliament.

He goes on to make certain other comments, and concludes by saying:

> In this connection, your letter of October 13 setting out the government's position and plans with regard to the more significant recommendations will be particularly helpful. I appreciate very much your precedent-setting action in making it available to me for inclusion in the Centennial Annual Report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons.

I underline that not only is the nature of an Auditor General's report not one where there has to be a great degree of secrecy, but in this case the contents of the Auditor General's report were known to members of the government, particularly the then president of the treasury board, at least a month in advance. There were exchanges of letters. The then president of the treasury board even indicated that he felt various mechanisms had been put in place to minimize some of the difficulties which the Auditor General was detailing.

I find it most remarkable, when it comes to the day that the report is to be tabled, that not only are we given little forewarning as to what is in the report, but if we wish to go into the so-called lock-up we are required to sign the declaration to which I have referred. After that it falls on us on that day to be the critics of the government. We have to question the government with regard to various points raised in the Auditor General's report as to whether they are true or as to what steps have been taken concerning the various points raised by the Auditor General. There seems to be a very unfair advantage given to those on the government side, compared to those on the opposition side in a very practical day to day dealing sense with regard to the Auditor General's report.

Since I began my activities in the House I have sensed that there is a wish on all sides that there be pre-budget reviews and pre-Auditor General report reviews. However, there is great uncertainty as to what should be the proper form. To what extent should people actually be locked up? To what extent should they be allowed to leave prior to a certain hour? To what extent should they be allowed to take documents with them?

If Your Honour accepts my suggestion to have this referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, I hope there will be some in depth study, not just on the immediate problem that I say confronted me on November 23 with regard to this declaration, but that the committee widen the reference and look at what would be suitable guidelines for all members of parliament to live by with regard to in-camera or lock-up sessions, with special reference to the budgetary side and the Auditor General's type of reporting.

This has come up previously. In 1976 the then minister of finance, Mr. Macdonald, stated on March 31, for example:

—I think it would be very useful if the House in general could give some consideration to the broader question as to whether the procedures that have been followed historically in this parliament, in Westminster with regard to budgets might be reviewed with the object referred to by the hon. member—

That is, myself.

—of having a more open scrutiny of the government's economic and fiscal planning, and either in the context of that discussion or perhaps with a special reference to the standing committee it would be of value if we could review the budget procedures and decide whether the time has not come now to make such changes in Canada.

I could go on, sir, and read the comments made by the minister of finance. That comment was made on March 31 and reported on page 12,319 of Hansard. He said, in general, that there must be a better way to have pre-budget reviews. Again, in his budget of May 25 that year, he specifically recommended a review be made and suggested that he and the House leader come up with a suitable plan.

In the budget debate which followed on June 8, a former minister of finance, the then hon. member for Eglinton, Mr. Sharp, dealt at length with the problems I am touching on here. His comments may be found at page 14,290 of Hansard for June 8. He referred to what was going on as an affront. He said:

It is an affront, and I trust that come next budget there will be a demand from all sides of the House that this farce will not be permitted to recur.

The farce he was referring to was the Minister of Finance rising in his place to speak at the same time that the press outside were on radio and TV running the actual budget speech as if it had been delivered. I believe there is a growing uneasiness within the House concerning such things as the so-called lock-up—the pre-budget submission, the pre-budget discussions—and now, with the tabling of the Auditor-General's report, the whole question of a lock-up prior to that report being tabled in the House.

I think everybody meant well, but in my view a reference to the privileges committee would be in order to try to get the question aired. If you find I do have a question of privilege, sir, I would propose that there be a reference to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections based on the requirements set out in the declaration drafted by the Auditor General, dated November 23, 1978, to determine whether my privilege as an MP and all privileges of MPs in this House were in fact infringed by the proposed declaration.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the hon. member that this is an important matter to discuss. He has in effect raised two distinct issues in the same context of privilege. One is the question of the document which it was suggested ought to have been signed vis-à-vis the Auditor General's report. Then he has used that incident to raise the larger question of lock-ups and general restraint on members where documents or actions in the House are being anticipated or are likely to occur within a matter of a few hours.

On the first question which prompted his intervention at this time, it appears to me that the matter is one for the Auditor General himself. It is my information that this was a decision of the Auditor General and that the wording concerned was drafted by him. I can assure the House that neither the government nor, to my knowledge, any member on this side, was involved in that particular exercise in any way. The Auditor General is, after all, a servant of parliament, and therefore in this context his relationship is directly with the public accounts committee. I would have thought the arrangement in that case would have been worked out between all the members of the committee and the Auditor General.

I emphasize again that this is a special case and I am not at all certain, though I have no intention of intruding on your jurisdiction, that it is a matter for parliament to decide, or a matter for the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. That would be something for Your Honour to judge.

On the broader question, I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has brought up something that merits discussion. But once again I am not certain that we would accomplish everything that I suspect most members of the House desire by going through the instrument of the committee on privileges and elections. Many of these matters are not specifically or directly involved with the parliamentary process. I am thinking, for example, of royal commission reports of various kinds. There is a whole range of documents of one type or another which, from time to time, are authored by people who are not officers of parliament or, indeed, who may not be officials of the government, and I am not certain, therefore, that a committee of this House could properly set down rules of procedure in that regard.

I can recall, over the many years I have spent here, a number of occasions when various commissions and groups which have been assigned tasks by certain departments, or by the government as a whole, have created considerable furore through the premature leak, as it is called, of the contents of their reports to elements of the media or to particular members of the House of Commons. By the way, the comments I am making now are completely non-partisan. They are designed simply to illustrate the nature of the problem.

I have myself been involved in the past with various reports on broadcasting when members of the opposition found themselves incensed at each other because some had been more favoured than others by a particular group which was reporting. Similarly, in the case of royal commission reports which, I suggest, are somewhat analogous to the Auditor General's report in the sense that there is no secrecy provision, some of them, resulted in members on the government side being upset because the opposition was in possession of more information than they had themselves.

As a result of this development there has evolved over the years the concept of a lock-up so that in the first instance the media could be assured—and this was the beginning of it on non-secret matters—that deadlines or release times would be respected. If the hon. member, and any other, wish to look up the antecedents of this they will find I am correct. It was always difficult to determine how all the media could be treated fairly.

The second development, one which has come about in comparatively recent times—as I suspect the distinguished member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would agree—was a genuine move on the part of government to ensure that the opposition had the opportunity of advance knowledge so that there could hopefully be some form of informed comment. This was unheard of, I think it would probably be generally agreed, until recent times. In other words, the government prevented the kind of problem which is now occurring simply by saying "You will hear about it when it comes up in the House." So the move to greater consultation, toward getting everybody in a position where the debate can be substantive and worth-while, has resulted in the kind of problems before us today.

But I do want to emphasize once again that as distinct from the budget or other matters where fiscal or monetary policy is involved and with regard to which, as the hon. member has said, special considerations apply, most of these other things have to do with ensuring that everybody—the media, and subsequently members of parliament—gets off on the same footing.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, as to whether or not the consideration of this matter in the context of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or some other committee of parliament, is the appropriate forum. I am quite certain that my colleague, the government House Leader, would have no objection to having some of the matters raised there, but I suspect that it would be useful if there were perhaps a consultation between House leaders in the first instance so that all of these issues would be embraced in the same consideration, rather than those which are exclusively under the purview of parliament, and therefore of you, sir, as the distinguished head of parliament.

Since television has come into the House it has given still another dimension to this particular problem. It was evident in the budget debate of a few nights ago when, as I understand it, in the absence of any signed commitment, but of what may be described as a gentleman's agreement, there was an understanding that comment would not precede the actual points in the speech which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was making. Therefore, there were certain understood time constraints. For one reason or another these were not, from my personal observation, adhered to. I do not say that this was done deliberately. To see what was occurring, I chose to watch the budget debate on television rather than from my seat in the House.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), and many members of the media, who probably triggered the response of opposition critic, were in their comments ahead of what was being said here in the House. I would suspect that almost any one of us is sufficiently egotistical not to want to be upstaged in this fashion, even if perhaps there is no particular financial concern with regard to the stock market or anything of that sort.

I wanted to put my views on the record, Mr. Speaker. I think that the movement toward more consultation and providing more information for the opposition and other spokesmen, is a move in the right direction. I would hope that any decisions which are made would not be designed to constrain that in any way.

On the specific point I do want to make it clear, lest there is any shadow of a doubt about it—and I do not think that the hon. member was seeking to do so—that this, I believe, was a rule of the Auditor General himself and was not something which the House leader or indeed the Secretary of the Treasury Board, who might normally be expected to do so, had imposed upon him. I think that this was the Auditor General's own rule and, therefore, I do not believe that there is any cause for a grievance in so far as any action by the government itself is concerned.

Mr. Speaker: There are several members who may want to contribute to this discussion, but I would like to leave it for a time because it seems to me that the hon. member has raised a point which might have a serious procedural difficulty in that since he, or any other member, does not have to go to the lock-up at all, it is difficult to tie it to a question of privilege, thereby establishing that somehow the member is prevented from doing something by the condition laid down surrounding a particular event when, in fact, the hon. member obviously does not have to go there at all if he does not want to do so.

I have not had a chance to think that through, but in terms of founding a question of privilege on the basis of the member being prevented from carrying out his duties in the House, it seems to me that that has always been tied to the duties, or aspects of parliamentary duties, which are absolutely essential to any member, and has to amount to the prevention of a member in his essential obligations—not in those obligations which may be, although closely tied, not tied or related in some way to his essential obligations. I am not making a final determination, but there is a procedural difficulty there which we face.

The reason I want to leave it without making a determination at this time is because there is a great deal of importance in what the hon. member has raised. As the minister has just pointed out, the matter of lock-ups is a rather recent development, and I think everyone has agreed that they have been established with the best of motivation. In fact the hon. member said quite specifically that this lock-up is no exception, that it is obviously for the best interests of members who wish to participate so that their performance in the House will be better, either in their own capacity or on behalf of their party. It is a recent development, and therefore this House has not addressed itself to the conditions which either ought to surround this kind of lock-up or not surround it, depending on the point of view taken.

It may be that with the expressions of interest, cited by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, of former finance ministers of very recent duration—both of whom have put their views on the record in a specific way—that they favour, as I am sure all hon. members do, greater consultation within the limits of possibilities on these matters, but no one has ever addressed himself to a series of conditions that ought to surround or not surround these kinds of lock-ups.

If the ministers' sentiments are broadly held on that side of the House, it may be that the consensus exists whereby some reference to a committee could be agreed upon in order that this matter be examined and reported back to the House with recommendations, without the necessity of establishing a question of privilege within the narrow strictures of privilege. Therefore I would like to leave it to see whether or not it can be explored over the next short while, as to whether or not some reference can be created or some vehicle found through which this matter can be explored for the benefit of the House in an attempt to set things down.

The hon. member has certainly raised a valid point as to conditions that ought to surround this kind of lock-up in so far as members are concerned. If it turns out that some agreed reference can be made, then so much the better. If some agreed reference cannot be made, then we will return to the question of privilege as raised by the hon. member, and I will then give all hon. members who are interested in the subject an opportunity to be heard at that time.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I simply rise on this particular point to accept your suggestion and to inform the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) that we are receptive to a proposal by the government House leader as soon as it is convenient. We leave the matter in abeyance until that time.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to be as brief as possible this afternoon so that the House will not a have to suffer too long my raucous voice. I therefore want to underline the highlights of the proposed termination two years before expected.

We all recall that the Health Resources Fund Act was given royal assent on July 11, 1966, a little over 12 years ago. It was our colleague, the hon. leader of the government, who held the health portfolio and that piece of legislation was one of the high points of his career. It was voted to make up, in a sense, for certain things as regards the teaching of medicine and related professions, laboratory equipment and research facilities in Canadian universities and hospitals, although the federal government does pay 50 per cent of all health costs in Canada through the ten provincial governments.

[English]

This fund, hon. members will recall, was passed some 12 years ago under the Health Resources Fund Act and was allocated $500 million to be divided into three parts—$300 million was allocated to the provinces on a per capita basis, $25 million was allocated to the Atlantic provinces for joint projects, and the balance, $175 million, was put aside to be allocated by the governor in council for particular projects.

What is important to know is that, basically, the fund did the job it was supposed to do. Of the $500 million appropriated under the act, 83.4 per cent has been spent or is committed and will be reimbursed on presentation of invoices, and that 83.4 per cent amounts to $416,700,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to review rapidly the way in which that fund was spent. Approximately one-fifth of the fund went to medical schools and multi-purpose buildings in the health science complexes; another one-fifth went to university hospitals; some money went to affiliated hospitals; a smaller sum, namely, $23 million, went to dental schools; and $76 million went to nursing schools, auxiliary schools and other health manpower training centres. Of the money committed to this date, $60.8 million remain to be paid in the next three or four years.

I should like to explain to members of the House that all the submissions which have been approved, and which therefore represent a contract between the Government of Canada and the provincial governments, will be fully honoured, despite the reduction due to the fiscal constraints which we think are essential to put the Canadian economy back to full productivity. We will honour all these commitments. For instance, in this particular fiscal year I anticipate some $3 million worth of claims which will be paid on presentation of invoices and auditing according to the usual rules of the game.

I have here a list giving the geographical distribution of the various projects which were approved. I should like to ask the permission of the House to table it as an appendix to Hansard because it might be unpleasant for members of the House to have to listen to the list being read. The list represents a fair distribution of the 238 projects throughout the provinces and territories of our country which benefited from the fund.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it would not be better to have the list appended to today's Hansard, because tabling it would not make it available to very many people.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I will never learn the jargon of the House, but that is what I meant. Perhaps the House could indicate to me how I am supposed to proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is there unanimous agreement to allowing the minister to append the list to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For list referred to above see Appendix "A".]

Miss Bégin: For instance, as concerns my own province, 57 projects representing more than $100 million have been approved. Quebeckers will certainly recall the opening of the new Cité de la Santé complex in Laval where the federal minister representing Canadian taxpayers was of course not able to speak, but whose presence was I believe noticed by everyone. If we emphasize the fact that we participate in such important hospital initiatives as the very beautiful Cité de la Santé in Laval, I believe it is quite clear that Quebec, since this is the example I have chosen, is one of the provinces which is a net beneficiary of the health resources fund.

Quebec Premier Lévesque, who made the official speech for this inauguration early last fall, laughed when he saw that I was not speaking and he said: "Of course, federal representatives think that they have contributed to the Cité de la Santé in Laval, but all that they have done is to give us back the money from our taxes."

I would have liked very much to take a few minutes to put the record straight because a national fund, like the health resources fund, not only gives back to the people of a given province the money that they have paid in taxes to the federal government, but in all the cases where a province is poorer or disadvantaged, it gives, through redistribution, much more money than the taxpayers of this province had paid originally.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, one of the major objectives of the health resources fund is the training of medical and para-medical personnel.

[English]

One of the objectives, other than the straight building of training and research facilities, is, of course, manpower training. I have here a list, which could be of interest to members of the House, of the more than 20 manpower categories which have benefited from the fund. Perhaps these tables also could be made an appendix to today's Hansard. I think the list would provide valuable information to all members of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For list referred to above see Appendix "B".]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, let me just single out five categories from among the health professions which have benefited from the fund. They are first, dental assistants and dental hygienists. When the fund was first created ten years ago, 58 dental assistants graduated every year throughout Canada; now there are some 917 dental assistants who graduate each year. I think this is a remarkable achievement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: In 1966, 82 dental hygienists graduated, and in 1976, some ten years after the establishment of the fund, the number increased to 350.

With regard to physicians—and we know how effective the health resources fund has been—the number of graduates throughout Canada rose from 880 in 1966 to 1,725 ten years later, so the number of physicians in our country has more than doubled. It is the same with physiotheraphists whose number rose from 232 to 446 graduates a year.

As to public health inspectors, we all know of the need for more public health inspectors if we want the new perspectives for preventive medicine to come into force in Canada. The public health inspectors who graduated ten years ago numbered 40, and are now 106. So, altogether this fund has done a great job.

Why put an end to a good fund two years before its natural end? The Government of Canada had a difficult decision to make in applying a major, traumatic restraint on its own expenditures. It has meant that in the current fiscal year a cut back of some half a billion dollars was made, and a cutback of $2 billion is proposed for the coming fiscal year.

In terms of expenditures and consequences on the quality of life in Canada, it is quite difficult for a minister with a major portfolio, such as the one I am responsible for, to select which programs have less priority or can be given second priority when compared to others.

I did not have much difficulty singling out the health resources fund as one which had done a great job. Regretfully it is to be terminated now because of the difficult conditions in the country. The economies of the federal and provincial governments face severe problems. By its nature the fund is cost-shared 50/50 by the provinces and the federal government, and approximately 85 per cent of its capacity has been used. Because of provincial economic situations, major growth in the near future is not evident. For these reasons, it is with regret that I announce an early termination or cancellation of the health resources fund.

Proposals under the fund are made to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in different ways. I should like to take a few minutes to refer to that procedure in order to inform Canadians what submissions will not be honoured by the early cancellation of the fund. In addition to stating the extensive use of the fund by the provinces, namely 83.4 per cent, I should like to say that many provinces have used their share completely, such as Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Ontario, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. With this bill and the amendment I will propose in a few minutes, these provinces will have used fully their share of the health resources fund.

Submissions are proposed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in several forms. They can be of a verbal nature, for example, when provincial ministers or doctors at certain hospitals mention a project which is taking shape. This can be mentioned to the minister during a conference or some official function. Also it can be done by way of a letter of intent. Then draft submissions are made. Proposals can be made in various forms, other than the official application form devised for that purpose. The submissions are studied and the costs are arrived at by consultation between representatives of the federal and provincial departments involved. Then the final submission with the signature of the provincial authority is presented to the minister for signature, and a binding contract is established. As I said earlier, all binding contracts and submissions approved by the federal government will be fully honoured.

Due to the economic circumstances of the federal and provincial governments, unfortunately we decided to terminate the health resources fund. At that point some submissions were ready for signature and on my desk, but they could not be honoured because of the last minute administrative delays and pending policy decision.

At committee stage I will propose an amendment to Bill C-2 to change the final date for approval of projects from September 9, 1978, to November 3, 1978. The reason I am proposing this change of date is that since first reading of the bill it has become apparent, in order to achieve an equitable distribution of funds within the various provinces and territories, that it is necessary to provide for approval of some additional projects in several provinces. This would bring the rate of utilization by the provinces to a level of 85 per cent. These projects have been submitted, and they might have been approved by September 9 except for the administrative procedures involved in reviewing submissions.

An additional step is required to improve further the equity in distribution. This concerns my province of Quebec and the Northwest Territories.

[Translation]

The Northwest Territories and Quebec show the lowest use of the health resources fund. I deeply regret to have to explain clearly that under the administrative procedures for the health resources fund, which is a 50/50 cost-shared program, the concerned province must take the initiative to send us a submission or a draft submission signed by competent authorities. In late September I received from British Columbia an application without even a signature. You cannot play like that with amounts of several million dollars. So the province in question must send in a submission, or a draft submission, signed by the appropriate provincial authorities which is then considered by us and eventually approved. I have reviewed in detail the case of the province of Quebec which underused the fund to see if a mistake or error had not been made in my own department; it is clear that even if we had wanted to help Quebec in a particular way, it was impossible to do so because all we had on file was a five-year plan of some 25 projects totalling a few hundred million dollars, actually a lot more than the total amount in the health resources fund, and on which we had been given no priority.

I pointed out the danger of leaving files open that way in an informal manner on the first occasion when I met my colleague from the province of Quebec, but without results, so that even if we had wanted to do so, it would have been impossible to honour other commitments than those I signed since last fall when I attended the opening of Laval's Cité de la Santé, the research wing at St. Luc Hospital and the Penfield wing at Royal Victoria. So, to give Quebec and the Northwest Territories a last chance to use a little more the portion of the fund equivalent to the number of people in the province of Quebec, I am proposing to add $3 or $4 million more. Unfortunately there were no tenders advanced enough for me to sign before November 3, so we are going to find within the department other ways of giving Quebec, if possible, $3 million more. So I invited my colleague, provincial social affairs minister Lazure, to tell me as soon as possible for which of the projects of his five-year plan he would like to receive $3 million more.

So I am giving the House notice of my intention to introduce an amendment to the bill providing, as I said, for a fairer distribution. That amendment will include the Queen Elizabeth Hospital in Charlottetown. It will also include a project for a childrens' hospital in Calgary, projects for Saskatchewan, others, I believe, for Manitoba, and as I said, for the Northwest Territories and for Quebec but I think that it would be more appropriate to discuss it only at the standing committee in order to be able to analyse the details of that amendment and its consequences.

● (1602)

[English]

I think that some of the members of parliament who will speak later on today on this funding may want to use this forum to give us help, if I may use that expression, in respect of the possible reductions, anticipated reductions, or non-existent reductions in medical research funds.

May I take a few minutes to review very rapidly the situation as regards the medical research scene in Canada. Basically two channels are used as sources of funds by researchers on the federal scene. The largest and well-known one is, of course, the Medical Research Council, which was provided with a budget of $60,002,000 for the current year in the main estimates, which was increased last June by an additional $3 million. This represents an 11 per cent increase over the previous fiscal year, 1977-78 and, therefore, is quite good. However, during the process of locating restraints in every department and agency I, unfortunately, had to reduce by $500,000 the base budget for the council for 1979-80. That is really a minimal amount. Negotiations are taking place at this time with Treasury Board to determine what will be the real increase for 1979-80 for the Medical Research Council. Up to this point I have been pleased with the government's stand on the increase for the Medical Research Council.

I am also very pleased that the cabinet is currently studying a proposal for the stable funding of the Medical Research Council to ensure that the level of biomedical research in Canada is maintained, and I hope to be able to make an early announcement in this regard.

As to the other avenue for grants and contributions for medical research use, biomedical researchers at the federal level turn to what we call in the jargon the NHRDP, the National Health Research and Development Program, of my own department. That program had a budget for the current fiscal year of $12 million. Unfortunately I had to reduce it by $2 million. At this point I would like to state quite clearly that I hope this apparently important cut of $2 million from $12 million will not affect the grants and contributions as much as it will overhead costs of NHRDP.

The MRC should be congratulated for the remarkable work it does in keeping administrative costs to a very minimum. I wish I had the figures with me. They can be given later in the debate. I want to mention particularly the fact that all the people who serve on the Medical Research Council, close to 150, and the experts who serve on the committees of the peer review system that exists in the MRC to allocate funds to the research projects submitted, work on a completely voluntary basis. That is remarkable when we think of the numerous corporations and Crown corporations, private and public, that pay per diem fees to their members. The people serving on the MRC are not paid, and I wanted to point that out to other Canadians because I think this represents a remarkable contribution to medical research in this country.

I hope to have the NHRDP of my own department take the example of the MRC and decrease their administrative overhead costs as much as possible. Let me point out that while the administrative costs of the program are comparatively higher, they are subject to the requirements of the Auditor General and to our own audit of various grants and contributions.

[Miss Bégin.]

Let me conclude by saying that the health resources fund during the period 1966-78 has met the objective of providing necessary facilities on a national basis to train health personnel in sufficient numbers to meet current and anticipated demands. This has also equipped the provinces and the territories with beautiful and very well regarded medical facilities, hospitals and laboratories, located throughout the country.

In concluding my remarks at second reading of a measure to cancel the national health resources fund two years earlier than forecast, let me say to the medical community, in particular the biomedical community, I wish them well for continuing development. We have established with Canadian taxpayers' money the basis of a good network of health facilities throughout the country; that is very important, and that was the purpose of this fund. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I was rather amazed at the approach the minister has taken, speaking on behalf of the government, concerning this rather shabby piece of legislation. She seems to indicate that medical research in this country is in better condition than it has ever been and that there really are no problems in this field.

Let me quote from Dr. Jacques Genest, director of the Clinical Research Institute of Montreal, the minister's own city. He said:

No other nation of the western world has treated biomedical research in such a disastrous way—

● (1612)

That does not confirm what the minister just told us about this. He went on to say that one of the results of this policy is that between 300 and 500 biomedical research workers were lost in the fierce competition for funds. I wonder why the minister does not explain that, if things are going so well in research.

Dr. Genest went on to say that professional insecurity has killed the motivation of young doctors who need to train for five years in a specialty and spend another four or five years becoming research workers.

Those are statements by a person who is dedicating his entire life to research. They are somewhat contrary to what the minister has tried to lead us to believe. In her introduction she seemed to praise the health resources fund while chopping it. That is a rather paradoxical approach to government. She cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker—she cannot be talking out of both sides of her mouth about this fund. Either the fund is good and deserves support, or it is bad and deserves to be chopped. She is saying it is good and deserves to be chopped. That kind of logic does not make much sense to me, and I am sure it is only logic that the Liberal government of this day could put forward.

In her comments she used the word "dramatic." She said that the government has to take dramatic steps in its restraint program. Whether she realized or not, she put her finger on the nail when she said that, because those are the only kinds of cuts this government is making in its restraint program—those which are dramatic, those which evoke or stimulate an outcry or response from the people of Canada. When this kind of dramatic cut is examined carefully, it is revealed as nothing more than political grandstanding. If the government were serious about making cuts it would forget about drama and would look at the Auditor General's report. If ministers took the time to study this report, they would see the hundreds of pages of suggestions of where the efficiency of government could be improved, where improved accountability methods could save millions of dollars, if not billions.

For some strange reason, however, these recommendations appear year after year in the Auditor General's report, except that each year the circumstances are worse. The government talks about dramatic cuts in spending but seems to avoid those recommendations which would not be so dramatic but which would correct the extravagant waste of millions of dollars. I have to object to this kind of an approach with all the vigour I possess—an approach by a government that is more concerned with drama than with increasing efficiency and doing something about the excessive waste imposed by its practices and policies.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are not very impressed with the proposals contained in this bill. As the minister indicated, the health resources fund was established in 1966. The sum of $500 million was set aside to assist provinces in the establishment of health training facilities and research facilities. About 25 per cent of this was to go toward research. So far, $416 million has either been committed or already spent. The proposal in this bill as it was originally drawn would allow the federal government to welch on its commitment to the tune of $84 million. Of that fund, three-quarters was allocated to the construction of facilities for training health professionals, acquiring research equipment, and training Canada's brilliant young people for careers in the health field.

Through its austerity program the government has decided to chop this fund. The thing that concerns me most is the method used, which again is typical of this government. It did not bother to tell the provinces in advance; it did not bother to consult with the provinces in advance but just sent a telex about five days after the intention was made public.

In order to confirm these statements, in case either of the ministers in the House should try to challenge them, I have here responses from each of the provinces about this bill. I specifically asked each province whether it had been consulted in advance of the government's intention to cut the health resources fund being made public. The New Brunswick minister replied that he was advised by the minister but not consulted.

Miss Bégin: New Brunswick used it up.

Mr. Yewchuk: Nevertheless, they were not consulted.

Miss Bégin: There was not a penny left.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that none of the provinces were consulted prior to a unilateral declaration about a change in an agreement which involved the federal and all provincial governments. The minister and her predecessor, who is also in the House, may shout across to me that some of the provinces have used all their allocation, and that may be so, but nevertheless they are still parties to the agreement—

Mr. Lalonde: There is no agreement.

Mr. Yewchuk: —and if federal-provincial relations are to work then there must be consultation when federal-provincial contracts are to be broken by the federal government.

Mr. Lalonde: There is no contract.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have here a comment from British Columbia, which was not consulted prior to the announcement that the health resources fund was to be terminated. The minister in that province indicates that he communicated his displeasure to the federal minister. The Nova Scotia minister replied to my inquiry that there had been no consultation since he came to office. The Newfoundland minister indicated that his province was not consulted prior to the announcement that the program was to be terminated, and writes that their experience in this respect is similar to that of other provinces. Manitoba was informed by telex but not consulted. The same applies to Ontario—"not consulted"; Saskatchewan, "not consulted"; Alberta, "not consulted"—

Miss Bégin: They used all the funds.

Mr. Yewchuk: They did not.

Miss Bégin: Ontario did.

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, Ontario did say they had used all their funds. Alberta did not. In any case the Ontario government was not consulted even though they had received their funds. It was still part of a federal-provincial agreement. Alberta was not consulted. Quebec was not consulted.

The minister went to great lengths to say that Quebec has not used up its funds and has not submitted any projects which were priorized in the proper manner. If that is the case, it is all the more reason why there should have been some consultation with that government prior to the announcement of this bill. I want to ask the minister why there was no consultation with the government of Quebec prior to such an announcement. Surely she cannot say Quebec received all its funds. This seems to me to indicate that the minister had no real desire to concern herself with the reaction of the provinces. She simply decided, according to the instructions given her, perhaps by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or someone else, that she would do a little bit of mass media grandstanding and make this announcement without consulting the people directly involved.

The minister also stated that Prince Edward Island had received all its funds. This is at variance with what I have been told. They indicate they have not received much of their funds as yet. That may be why the minister is introducing an amendment to this bill. Perhaps it would put them in a better position, but when the bill was introduced there was no evidence that Prince Edward Island had been consulted or had received a significant portion of its share of the funds.

There is no doubt in my mind that the provinces are objecting strenuously to the amendment. They find themselves in the middle of construction projects, training programs for which they—

Miss Bégin: They are opposing the amendment? They are begging for the amendment.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister is interjecting again. She has just finished her remarks but she seems to have a lot more to say. If she likes, Mr. Speaker, I will sit down and let her finish her speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question to clarify his speech, please?

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I will reserve five minutes at the end of my remarks for the minister to make clarifications. She can ask any questions she wants then, and perhaps also in the standing committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You have unlimited time. Five minutes at the end of unlimited time?

• (1622)

Mr. Yewchuk: We do have unlimited time. At the rate of interference from the other side we will need unlimited time to get through my notes before the day is over.

As I said, the provinces are indeed objecting to this unilateral welching out of a commitment. In my view that is not the way to run a country. Some provinces were advised at the outset that their projects would qualify. However, at the time of the announcement of this bill there are some projects which have not yet been approved with the result that the provinces are now left dangling. I am sorry the minister was not more specific in terms of her proposed amendment to this bill respecting an additional $15 million. We are not in a position to know what projects she had approved to cover that extra $15 million. I know it has been tabled—

Miss Bégin: I said it.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have not had a chance to see the materials to which she has referred. For example, the government of Alberta was left up in the air concerning a children's hospital in Calgary. This results in a $3.5 million shortfall for this project—

Miss Bégin: I signed it. I said it.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister now states she signed it.

Miss Bégin: You did not listen.

Mr. Yewchuk: I am glad to hear that.

Respecting the province of Manitoba, which I said was notified but not consulted in advance, it has committed capital projects based on the premise that at least for capital projects federal funds would be available to the extent set out in the Health Resources Fund Act. If that support is withdrawn, Manitoba will be required to fund an additional $7.2 million from provincial sources. Projects submitted for consideration by the federal health and welfare department to which no federal commitment has been made include the Seven Oaks project for $4.7 million. Planning and preparation are under way but projects which have not been submitted yet include the Cancer Treatment and Research Foundation for an amount of $1.4 million, and the energy system for the Health Sciences Centre for the amount of $1.1 million. A telex was received by Manitoba from the minister five days after this bill was made public to the press.

The province of Newfoundland was also informed but not consulted. However, Newfoundland announced it had received its allocated funds and was not too concerned. But it found that it was not now in a position to help the other Atlantic provinces which had helped Newfoundland with projects in the past.

Nova Scotia had not been notified. That province will lose $2.2 million for proposed projects planned but not yet approved as of September 9, 1978. These projects included renovation and equipment for nursing units, in the areas of physiotherapy and occupational therapy, as well as rehabilitation equipment and other non-specific projects.

In the case of British Columbia a large amount of money was required for its development program which, as the minister had indicated, had to fit into a five-year development plan for health resources. This has been severely curtailed.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the on again off again policies of this particular administration are causing serious discontent among the provinces, and have done so for the past ten years. The general approach that this minister and the Prime Minister uses, and which the previous minister of national health and welfare used when he occupied that position, seems to be one of confrontation. I will not use the word deliberate, but one could easily conclude that deliberate confrontation with the provinces is going on, perhaps to create a hassle for reasons which could include some political expediency for this federal administration.

It is nothing short of criminal negligence when funds are cut for health research and facilities in this way. We know that, in the long run, every human being in this country will be affected during his or her lifetime. This government seems to be saying in this particular instance that the saving of dollars seems to be more important than good health. In my view, and I am sure hon. members will agree, this is certainly false economy.

I mentioned earlier that about one-quarter of this fund has been allocated toward medical research. We already know from previous comments that I have made in this House along with other members, and indeed representatives of the research community both inside and outside of parliament, that funding of medical research has already been seriously eroded. Unsalvagable damage has been done to the research capability of this country as well. Numerous laboratories are idle. Hundreds of research workers have left the country, or have left their careers to do other things in order to keep body and soul together. Various technicians have been relieved of their duties and are on the unemployment rolls which are already bulging. In general, the policies of this government have been creating havoc in research and have caused stagnation in the general attitude toward research. In Montreal, the minister's own city, a researcher said last April that he was close to a breakthrough in successful eye transplants. However, he did not carry on his experiments any further because his laboratory was "broke". This researcher made a public appeal for funds in order that he could continue.

There is no doubt about it that biomedical research in Canada is in a critical phase. In my opinion, the minister's words sounded rather hollow, if not cynical, when she stated she wished the research community the best. On the one hand she is wishing the research community the best, and on the other she is cutting their throats. It seems to me that she cannot have it both ways. If she wishes them the best and understands the value of their work, she should not be cutting their throats.

I have mentioned that hundreds of research workers are out of work in Canada. As long as this government is in power nothing will be done about that. The reason that nothing will be done stems from the fact that perhaps research contributions in the past have not created enough political drama for this government. They have not given the government the kind of political expectations it expects, and the research community is therefore being dumped. It is time that this government realized that it is foolish to think that by cutting research spending, it will make significant savings in the health field. It has been proven, over and over during the past few years by various researchers, that spending on research is the only way that health care spending can be cut in the long run without reducing the effectiveness of the service. In fact, one can cut health care costs through research and improve the health care that is delivered to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: That is exactly what this party wants to do. I hope it will have the chance to do that when the time comes following the next election.

Just to outline some examples, a well-known researcher in Saskatchewan has recently concluded a study which clearly shows that for every dollar invested in research today, ten years down the road $20 will be saved in permanently reduced health care costs. If the minister is really concerned about saving money on health care, it is obvious that research is the best way to accomplish that.

Cutting research is not a saving. Indeed, it increases the cost to the taxpayer. I will give some examples of what I mean by that. It cost $41 million to develop the polio vaccine. That was the total cost. Since it has been in use in this country, since 1955, it has saved the people of Canada $200 million per year. Just that one successful piece of research has saved this country more than four times the amount of the total expenditure on research each year since 1955. It is astonishing, to say the least, that any government that has the slightest concern about its people and the cost of health care would say it can save money by cutting research. That one example clearly shows that increasing spending on research is the only way to save money in the long run.

I will give another example. Measles immunization represents a saving of at least $10 million per year in permanently reduced health care costs. Research on hemophilia, a bleeding disease, has saved $20 million a year in hospitalization costs alone.

The research project on blindness in premature babies cost $34,000. The annual saving from that research has been $24,000 for every one dollar spent.

I could give a lot of other examples. However, I will just refer the minister to the speech I made on this subject in this place on October 30, 1978. If she reads that carefully, she will be more informed as to why cutting research funds is not the way to reduce health care costs in this country.

The role of government has changed drastically. With this change has developed increasing confusion about the relationship between national and provincial governments. Moreover, the responsibilities of both levels of government have become blurred, with tremendous overlapping and confrontation in inter-governmental relationships. I have already touched on that. Evidence of confrontation is the provincial reaction to the amendment to the Health Resources Fund Act now under discussion.

In a federal system, direct consultation among the responsible governments is essential as a means of ensuring that the goals of all governments are better integrated and more sensitive to the regional and national requirements. For a federal-provincial system of government to operate smoothly, effectively, and for the benefit of the people, there must be mutual respect between the provincial and federal governments. There must be a mutual feeling of trust.

The provinces need to trust the federal government. If the federal government makes a commitment, they need to rely on that in order to do their planning for the future. When the federal government takes the position that commitments are made to be broken, the feeling of trust breaks down. This is why the federal-provincial system has broken down and why unity in this country has been so shattered in the ten years of this regime.

We in the Progressive Conservative party believe that if we can ensure that federal policies give adequate weight to legitimate provincial concerns, we will have gone a long way toward easing the present tensions of the system of government which has created unnecessary conflict in Canada, and toward ensuring that a government and Parliament of Canada will be an accurate reflection of our current realities.

Miss Bégin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) agreed to accept a question at the end of his speech. For the majority of his speech, he did not refer to the Health Resources Fund but spoke of medical research. We agree that more money would be welcome in medical research. He spoke of the bill under consideration for only a few minutes, and in that time referred to a broken contract. I have tried to show in black and white that all contracts presented have been signed and have been fully honoured. I would like the hon. member to clarify his statement.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the health resources fund was a commitment made in 1966 by the Liberal government of that day, for $500 million to be allocated to the provinces for the various projects which I outlined in my speech. That commitment was made by the then federal government in good faith. That was before the current Prime Minister and minister came to office with their own approach to federal-provincial relations.

The provinces accepted that in good faith in 1966. They were instructed at that time that they had to present five-year plans and submit specific projects. They were told that if they abided by the rules set out by the federal government, the commitments at that time would be met. The minister has now broken those commitments. Regardless of how she tries to weasel out of it, she cannot escape the fact that a commitment was made to the provinces, and today that commitment is being broken.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments on the speech just made by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) who spoke first in this debate on behalf of his party. His speech today was like virtually every speech made by members of his party, either in this House or in committee, when estimates are being discussed. They always oppose the government's proposal for a reduction of funds, in this case for the health resources fund, and pledge, directly or implied, that a Conservative government would do more.

I have not been able to understand, and still cannot understand, how that party can propose to cut expenditures, as it has said it will, and reduce the number of people working for the federal government by 20,000 for each of three years, and at the same time oppose every suggestion made by the present government for reductions. There is a basic dishonesty in that approach to which the members of the Conservative party ought to give serious consideration.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I would not do so because I have made my comments, but he accuses us of dishonesty, something I do not like. I think he should withdraw that remark. If the hon. member had not been sleeping in his seat while I was speaking, he would have heard me outline how increased expenditures on research would save this country money in the future. Our approach is that you can reduce health care costs in the long term by increasing research in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that is not a point of order, but a point of debate.

Mr. Orlikow: As you correctly pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that was not a point of order but a point of debate. I am not saying that the hon. member for Athabasca was dishonest. I am saying there is something improper, incorrect and, I think, dishonest in the arguments constantly advanced by the members of the Progressive Conservative party. They would spend more money on medical research, scientific research, or cultural affairs, as the hon. member who has just left the House has said, or agriculture or anything else, and at the same time substantially reduce expenditures of the federal government without reducing the standard or level of service. I think they would find, as the Conservative government of Manitoba has found, that there is not that kind of fat in any of the government's operations, and that if they really propose to cut expenditures they must do it by cutting standards of service.

I want to spend most of my time dealing with this proposal which has been put forward by the government and explained by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). I am sure she will not be surprised when I say we intend to vote against this bill. This bill is part of the cutback program announced by the government back in September of this year as part of its plan to defer, review, and cut back some $29 million which would have been spent under the provisions of the Health Resources Fund Act passed more than ten years ago. Under these cutbacks a total of $370 million was to be cut from federal-provincial programs. Cuts in such programs as the health resources fund amounted to $150 million, along with $220 in transfer programs between the federal and provincial governments. What the federal government has done by its recent action is this: it has already exceeded that cutback goal, and therefore we see no reason for proceeding with this bill. The minister shakes her head. She says no. We have the figures, however, and if she disagrees with them I am sure she will have plenty of time in which to disprove them.

The cutbacks to date are as follows: $55 million in equalization grants, $150 million by deferring the community services program, $160 million by deferring the social services legislation, and $25 million under the public utilities income tax transfer, making a total of $390 million. Proceeding with this bill would increase the cuts by a further $29.5 million, up to $420 million.

I suggest the government is out of control in its restraint program. It feels it must outdo the Conservatives who have been preaching restraint for a few years now. It is now $50 million above the target for cutting back federal-provincial programs it announced in September. Last Friday it wiped out another $20.6 million by eliminating the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs and 185 employees.

It is important to face the fact that the federal government is again going back on a promise made to the provinces. In 1967 the federal government promised it would put up $500 million for health resources fund programs. The minister takes some comfort from her statement that they had either spent or committed more than 80 per cent of that $500 million. I want to remind the minister that there is a hell of a lot of difference between $500 million in 1978 and the $500 million which was promised by the then minister of national health and welfare in 1966 and 1967. To meet the goals conceived in those years when this program was first proposed would require, today, close to a billion dollars.

Miss Bégin: How is it the provinces did not apply then?

Mr. Orlikow: That is an old story. Very often it happens that the provinces, particularly the have-not provinces, possess neither the financial nor the technical ability to meet the timetable set by the federal government. I would have thought the present minister would have known this and given them some extra time, rather than cutting the provinces off without discussion, in a unilateral way.

I do not know whether the hon. lady has read some of the speeches which were made by the then minister of national health and welfare when he brought this legislation forward, but there is a world of difference between what he proposed, the discussions he promised the provinces, and the unilateral decision which has been made by the government and by this minister who—under tremendous pressure from her cabinet colleagues, I am sure—has brought down the measure we are considering.

Consider what the minister of national health and welfare said in June, 1966:

> Such a program will undoubtedly help to create a professional climate to attract increasing numbers of able people to study and practice medicine and related professions and will thereby improve still further the quality of care available to our people.

He went on to say it would require large investment and lengthy planning in co-operation with the provinces, and that government proposals had been prepared on the basis of visits to provincial departments of health. Were visits made to the appropriate provincial departments when the federal government decided to terminate this program with almost $30 million unexpended? No, they were not. It was done on a unilateral basis without the consent or approval of the provinces. The basic purpose at that time, according to the minister, was to meet the need for trained people and catch up where there was a shortage of trained personnel. Have we done these things? Of course we have not.

I am sure the minister has received many more representations than have come to me on the subject, but I have received quite a few with regard to the shortages which still exist. If I have time I will put on the record some of the comments made by those who work in the field. They are the ones who ought to be satisfied, they are the ones who, if they are not satisfied, come to members of the opposition and communicate with the press.

When we object to cutbacks of this kind we are not speaking in a partisan way, though some may think otherwise; we are expressing the views of those who are most concerned with the situation.

The minister went on to say at that time that an ad hoc technical committee met with governments and national associations, estimated provincial needs, and dealt with needs for long-term projections as a basis for allocating funds and the creation of a health resources advisory committee. He was concerned there should be discussion of that kind.

What I want to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare now is this: were consultations of that kind held with the provincial governments and with the various professional disciplines before the government embarked on its present course of action? And was any agreement forthcoming with regard to those proposals? I do not think there was, but I would be interested in getting the views of those organizations as expressed to the minister if she has them.

The former minister said the federal government had stressed the importance of close consultation and continuing liaison between the federal and provincial governments at all levels and that, although the moneys would not be fully used in the early years, their long-range provision would ensure that adequate opportunities were made available for the provision of health facilities. That was the purpose of the bill. It is obvious to anyone who would want to look at the facts that we still do not have adequate physical facilities or funding of programs to attract into the field of health care the kinds and numbers of people who are required. We still have people who are working for salaries that are a disgrace. There is a case in Winnipeg, and I am sure that it is not an isolated one, of a man with a Ph.D. in chemistry who was working in the field of cancer research for a number of years and was drawing a salary of $13,000 a year.

The minister had some flattering words for the people who work in medical research, and they deserve them. However, this country does not deserve to have the kind of dedication it gets from these people in these fields because it does not treat them in such a way that they could get a feeling that the country appreciates what they are doing to help meet our health needs.

When the bill was introduced in 1966 many members on this side had reservations about it, which they expressed, but which were ignored by the government. I do not often go back to previous speeches I have made and remind hon. members of what I said, but I could not help, while looking at the speech made by the then minister of national health and welfare, looking at the speech I made on that occasion. At that time I pointed out that the figure of $500 million was not based, as far as we could see, on any scientific or realistic assessment of what was required. I said that the figures seemed to have been pulled out of thin air. I must have been correct because today, despite the very sharp increases in the cost, which means that the $500 million allocated in 1967 is worth today approximately $300 million, this figure would have to double or quadruple to be on a par with spending by the government of the United States on medical research.

I said that we needed to spend another $100 million a year if we were to come close to the efforts being made in the United States. We are a long way from spending that other $100 million per year on medical research, even though $100 million allocated in 1967 would probably be worth $160 million today.

I pointed out that if there were sufficient funds for personnel and the necessary facilities for medical research the brain drain of scientists out of the country would disappear. However, the brain drain continues and will probably accelerate given the stop-and-go approach this government has taken toward scientific research in general and medical research in particular.

The minister seems to have rationalized what she is doing by saying that things are going at least moderately well. What we must do, in discussing this bill, is not just look at the termination of this program and the elimination of $29½ million from this fund, but at the whole picture of what this government is doing.

Without going into great detail I would like to go over some of the cuts which have been made by this government. The government has cut $8.5 million from supportive science in the Department of Agriculture, $3 million from the extension to the Lethbridge Research Laboratory, $2.8 million in contributions toward construction at veterinary colleges, $2.7 million from the Canadian Dairy Commission for product research and promotion programs; $.8 million in grants to universities for water resources research, although much of our water is polluted; $1.4 million from the Alberta oil sands environmental research program, $700,000 in stratospheric research, $2.7 million from the pollution abatement technology program, $2.8 million from the Newfoundland Environment Centre and Maritime Forest Research Centre, and a support cutback to the Department of Fisheries of $11.1 million.

There were also cutbacks in the technology development program in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce of $2 million, $13.5 million from Statistics Canada, including $1.3 million in post-secondary education programs administered through the education, science and cultural division of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

I come now to the cutbacks made in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I remind hon. members that the cuts must be added to the $29.5 million which the minister is already proposing to eliminate in this program. The total science cutbacks—

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro)—Forestry—Decision not to close Petawawa research station; the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith)—Labour conditions—Unemployment figures published by Statistics Canada—Status Indians; the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan)—Feasibility study on coal mine in Donkin, N.S.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Are notices of motions Nos. 2, 4, 5, 6, and 7 stood by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): We will now proceed to notice of motion No. 8 standing in the name of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND RAILWAY SERVICE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West) moved:

That this House directs the government to reject the recommendation of the Sullivan Royal Commission on Transportation Services to and within Newfoundland that proposed the discontinuing of railway services in Newfoundland and reaffirm that Newfoundland should have a vigorous and effective railway mode of transportation and that the government accept the other recommendations of the interim report of the Sullivan commission and discuss the implementation of the same with the government of Newfoundland and this house urges the government to consider the advisability of the government agreeing to meet the financial losses of the Newfoundland railway, a railway system owned by the government but operated on behalf of the government by CN, so that CN will cease its attempts to sabotage and close the Newfoundland railway system and begin effective management to the railway mode of transportation for Newfoundland.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is most timely because, if the House passes it today, it will forestall what can only be described as the murder of the Newfoundland railway. The Newfoundland railway is being murdered today with malice aforethought by CN, aided and abetted by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) who has given CN carte blanche to "do in" the Newfoundland railway service as soon as possible, or within the next six to eight months in any event.

My motion asks the House, first, to direct the government to reject the recommendation of the Sullivan Royal Commission on Transportation Services. That was the recommendation that the railway service in Newfoundland be discontinued. The commission based that recommendation on the conclusion that it was no longer economically feasible to operate a railway service in Newfoundland. I will come back to that point later. The commission made that recommendation with reluctance; two commissioners for, against one who dissented.

The motion also asks the House to reaffirm that Newfoundland should have a vigorous and effective railway mode of transportation. Surely we should do that. How can anyone argue that one province in the Canadian federation should not have a rail mode of transportation? I should like to see anyone suggest that for Saskatchewan, Quebec, New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, and see where they would get.

My motion also asks the government to accept the other recommendations of the Sullivan commission and to discuss their implementation with the government of Newfoundland and this House, and that the government meet the financial losses of the Newfoundland railway. There is no reason in the world why CN should have to meet the losses of the Newfoundland railway. That railway is owned, lock, stock, and barrel by the Government of Canada, which was given it free and gratis on April 1, 1949, by the Newfoundland public. They own it and asked to run it, and there is no reason in God's world why CN should have to meet any of the financial losses caused by the operation of the Newfoundland railway. These losses should be met by the people of Canada through the House and through the government.

My motion goes on to propose that CN be instructed to start giving vigorous and effective management to this railway to see if it has a chance of becoming more viable in the future, because in the last ten years CN has done everything within its power to drive freight and cargo off the Newfoundland railway, having driven passengers off with the connivance of premier Smallwood in 1968. In the 1960s the premier was promised that Canada would meet 90 per cent of the cost of the inferior Trans-Canada highway if his government would not oppose the abandonment of the railway passenger service. The Pearson government, having achieved that, in the 1960s we had the obsequious slogan of the Newfoundland government on Trans-Canada and the passenger service was replaced by an inferior bus service, upon which this commission reports, and which I will mention in a moment.

We will not trust Canada again to do away with our railway on the basis that our freight and cargo will be moved more effectively by other means. Their promises have been broken with regard to the railway passenger service and they will be in this other connection.

I want to cite the following to members of the House. Surely no one argues that a rail service must be profitable. Let me quote from the Economist of July 15, 1978, where, in an article on railways, the following is stated:

> No major national railway makes a profit. Britain's is one of the few to come close. Austria spends 1.8 per cent of gross domestic product propping up its railways. Belgium 1.4 per cent, West Germany more than 0.8 per cent and France more than 0.7 per cent. British Rail's so-called "contract" with the government (to compensate for losses caused by "socially desirable" but unprofitable passenger services) amounts to $364 million a year—only 0.3 per cent of g.d.p.

We know that in nation after nation the railway does not make money, but that does not mean to say that those nations do away with their rail services. They are still needed, if not on economic grounds then on social and other grounds, and they are still kept operating. But in Newfoundland we are supposed to be different, we are supposed to agree that if our railway is not making money—at least CN says it is not—it should be abandoned, done away with, and we should depend thereafter on the highway or on the sea, and that we are not to have the rail mode. Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not agree to that.

The Sullivan report has been in the hands of the minister since June of this year. Six months have gone by without one shred of activity, without an acceptance or a rejection of it or of any of its recommendations. The minister made the report public on July 24, that is, over four months ago, and there is still no action by the minister.

When the minister appointed the commission on March 28, 1977, he had a press conference in Newfoundland. I wish to quote from the Evening Telegram of March 29, 1977, in which the minister is quoted as having said that this study:

> —won't be just another study to lie on the shelf because the province is "at a critical point" for decisions, transport minister Otto Lang yesterday maintained.
> "I consider this one the final one," he said following a press conference in St. John's, for "we cannot wait any longer for tough decisions . . . and good decisions for Newfoundland."

Further on in the article it is said:

> And it will report its findings and recommendations to the Minister of Transport by the end of 1977.

The minister was going to act, and he wanted the commission to report by the end of 1977. It reported in June of 1978, but he has not done a thing since. That is the kind of decision we are getting from this minister—he has not done a thing. What he is doing is standing by while the CN cuts the railway adrift. I will explain that in more detail in a moment.

Everyone in Newfoundland who has any position in public life is opposed to the recommendation that the railway be abandoned. I brought the matter before the Atlantic caucus of the federal PC caucus in Ottawa in August of this year and the party agreed that there should be a continuing rail mode of transportation throughout the Atlantic region. The following motion was passed:

> That the PC party affirm the need for a continuing rail mode of transportation throughout the Atlantic region as a national policy and as a tool for continuing regional development and opposes any attempt to abandon rail transportation services in any province considering that government must ensure financial support for a rail service with new direction and emphasis by competent management prepared to compete vigorously for the traffic available, and the PC party condemns the benign neglect of railway services, now the Liberal government policy in the region.

That was the position of the federal PC party on August 14, and it still is.

Then the provincial Liberals came out against abandoning the railway. Our leader went to Newfoundland and confirmed our position a few days after the caucus meeting here in Ottawa. On August 22, the Newfoundland government came out in opposition to the abandonment of the Newfoundland railway and said it must continue. It stated that under the terms of the union it cannot be abandoned without the consent of both governments. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was sent a wire to that effect.

Finally, the government broke its silence, and on September 12 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), the cabinet minister from Newfoundland, made a statement which was quoted in the Evening Telegram of September 13. He said that the Newfoundland government's decision not to accept that recommendation "puts this particular issue to rest". He went on to say that the Canadian government fully accepted that decision. The article quotes him as stating:

> Now that there has been a decision not to consider abandoning the railway, 'the onus is now on all concerned to test the validity of the proposition that rail freight traffic can be increased and the service made more attractive to potential users,' Jamieson said.
> This will require, among other things, 'a new sense of commitment on the part of Canadian National Railways. As the designated operator of the system it must accept the decision.'
> Jamieson said he has recommended to transport minister Otto Lang, 'that he require the CNR to prepare without delay detailed proposals outlining ways in which rail freight may be made more efficient and attractive.'

What has happened to all those fine words of September 13? The Secretary of State for External Affairs then went on to say that there must be federal-provincial negotiations to agree on an over-all approach to the report's recommendations, and that federal-provincial negotiations "on a very comprehensive scale" must begin right away. When are these very comprehensive negotiations going to begin?

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that I have been writing the Minister of Transport, (Mr. Lang), with copies to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, since early August? I asked him what action he was going to take on these recommendations, and what steps he was going to take to keep the railway operating in Newfoundland. On August 3 I wrote to the Minister of Transport concerning the bus service. On August 21 I wrote to the Minister of Transport concerning the recommendations for the railway. I pointed out to him that certain trains were being discontinued, that conditions of business were being changed, and that business was leaving the railways because of the uncertainty. I asked him to make a statement. I wrote to the Minister of Transport on September 6, bringing the same things to his attention. Then the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke in Newfoundland on September 13, and nothing else happened.

Around October 14 we learned that the CN in Newfoundland was laying off 20 people from its freight service, and cancelling two trains from Corner Brook to St. John's and from Port aux Basques to St. John's on weekends. The minister was questioned in the House on October 17 as to why this was being done, when he promised that there would be no layoffs until the final report of the commission was received. The minister gave us his gobbledygook that there would be no layoffs except those related to changes in the level and flow of business, the ordinary sort. The minister said that he would look into these layoffs, these changes in circumstances, and report to me. I have not heard a word since October 17. We cannot believe or trust the minister one single iota in what he says or does. He is the most untrustworthy, most heartless minister I have ever come across in my long experience, provincially and federally. I still have not heard from him.

Mr. Benjamin: What about Otto?

Mr. Crosbie: I am talking about the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Benjamin: He is the Grit who stole Christmas.

Mr. Crosbie: That was on October 18. Then I learned that not only were these trains being cancelled but that CN was cutting its capital budget for next year in half in Newfoundland, that there would be layoffs of dozens of people in January, that 200 would not be taken on to improve the railbed next summer as a result of the cuts in its capital budget, and that there would be cuts in its maintenance budget. In other words, they are doing in the railway altogether. The CN is determined that it is not going to lose any more money on the Newfoundland railway.

So, I wrote the Secretary of State for External Affairs on October 24, drawing this to his attention. On October 30 I drew the drastic budget cuts to his attention, the fact that CN will not replace personnel, and other details which I do not have the time to give now. Still I have received no answer from either one of those ministers, except a perfunctory acknowledgment of my letters.

I have been asking since August, as well as has the Newfoundland government, for a meeting between the Rail unions, the ministers, and the Newfoundland government. I have been asking the government to tell CN that the government will meet its obligations, that it will meet any cash losses which they can prove are occurring, and that it will meet the necessary capital expenditures on the rail service. I asked for the government to direct them to carry this service on vigorously, or to get someone else in there who will. We cannot even get a meeting six months after this report came down. I wrote the Secretary of State for External Affairs on October 30. He has not responded; he has not arranged a meeting.

But there is a meeting tomorrow with these two ministers and a group from North Sydney and Port aux Basques. That meeting has been arranged since. It is to do with certain events on the CN marine services, where they are now using a private service from Halifax to St. John's, not using CN vessels, and laying off certain marine employees. This is going to affect the longshoremen at Port aux Basques in the district of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. They are having a meeting tomorrow with these two ministers. But, the government of Newfoundland cannot get a meeting, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and myself cannot get a meeting with them, and the railway unions, which represent 2,000 to 3,000 people who receive their livelihood from working on the Newfoundland railway, cannot get a meeting with these mighty ministers. But when somebody from Port aux Basques in the district of the Secretary of State for External Affairs wants a meeting, a meeting is arranged almost immediately. This is the brutal political way in which these ministers operate.

Today the Minister of Transport, in answering a question, had the gall to suggest that support of the Newfoundland railway was one of the political and humanitarian aspects of his mighty service to the nation. I say the man is an ogre who has to be driven from office.

On Tuesday, December 5, we are having a meeting in St. John's. We are going to rock St. John's. The reverberations will be felt up here. Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's East will make it. He may have trouble with conflicting business which he has to do here. The railway unions will be involved, and other members of parliament from Newfoundland, if they are interested. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Transport, and Mr. Bandeen will be at that meeting to answer these 2,000 or 3,000 Newfoundlanders as to why they are being abandoned and thrown into the cold by the federal Liberal party here in Ottawa. They will want some answers: they will not like what they hear.

The railway is being crucified by inattention and neglect. I have confirmation from high sources in CN that the Minister of Transport has told them—

Mr. Collenette: Name them.

Mr. Crosbie: I will name them when I have to name them. He has told them, "You are to operate as a commercial operation. If you want to lay off people in Newfoundland, if you want to cut back trains in Newfoundland, if you want to use private shipping services in Newfoundland and this causes layoffs of dozens or hundreds, you can do it; you are to operate as a commercial service. Just let us know ahead of time how many you are laying off and when, but you have our permission to do it." That is the policy of the Minister of Transport here in Ottawa. But he will pretend, when he gets to the public, that he is trying to protect the Newfoundland railway.

The government's attitude is that the CN has permission to do away with the Newfoundland railway. By next February, if action is not taken by the government, the process will be well under way, and 2,000 or 3,000 people will lose their jobs. That is a serious thing in a province which already has an unemployment rate in excess of 16 per cent officially, and twice as much unofficially.

What will the government do? Will the government accept my motion or not? What will it do about the bus service? The Sullivan royal commission recommended no increase in fares and found no substantial bus service—it attacked the bus service being offered, and said that there should be no increase in fares until there is a substantial increase in facilities. Then a week later the CN applied to the Canadian Transport Commission for a 36 per cent fare increase, and the government in Ottawa did nothing to prevent that. It allowed its creature, the CN bus service, with this inadequate service, to apply for a 36 per cent increase. This is now being fought before the courts and before that commission in Newfoundland. The government had not dealt with both recommendations.

The Sullivan commission recommended that the federal government pay for 90 per cent of the cost of improving the substandard Trans-Canada Highway in Newfoundland. We have not received a word from the Minister of Transport on that recommendation. The synchrolift in St. John's was recommended by the Sullivan commission six months ago. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) was batted to his knees by nanny, by his own nanny. He has a nanny now in the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras), and he has a nanny in the Secretary of State for External Affairs who said, "No, you cannot have a synchrolift in St. John's until I tell you that you can have it." That recommendation was ignored by the minister.

We have the implementation of a year-round ferry service to Argentia recommended by the Sullivan commission. It was ignored by the hon. gentlemen opposite. We have a recommendation that there should be either no subsidies to direct water carriers to Newfoundland, or equal subsidies to all three carriers and not just a special subsidy which Clarke Newfoundland steamship service has been getting for the last ten or 15 years. That should cease, but there has been no action on that.

When the Minister of Transport was questioned here, he said that he was waiting for the final report of the Sullivan commission. Well, this is the final report. It does not say "interim." It says, "Report of the Commission of Inquiry into Newfoundland Transportation." He need wait no longer. In its preface, the commission itself said that the second volume of the report will contain, in addition to elaboration of important solutions, conclusions and recommendations based upon specific research projects completed during the summer. It is just a supplement. This is the final report; this is not an interim report. The minister has still not taken any action, because he said that he is waiting for the final report.

In March, 1977, he could not wait to get this report, its recommendations and conclusions. Today he does not care whether he has it or not because, in league with Mr. Bandeen of CN, he is hoping that CN will so cripple the Newfoundland railway in the next six months, that there will not be a chance for it to continue operating. There will not be a stick or a stone carried on that railway. Who will move their cargo with the kind of uncertainly which now faces the rail service? That is why this motion is before the House.

I know it will be talked out by gentlemen opposite because they have no choice. They have taken no action, and they will be guilty of allowing the murder of the Newfoundland railway to occur, unless some action is taken here and now. I know there are others such as my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, who will want to speak. Therefore I shall come to an end. But let me reiterate: we have a classic case here of the government trying to encourage CN secretly behind the scenes to do away with the railway, which Newfoundland brought into confederation on April 1, 1949. It was built from our sweat and blood. That little island off the coast of Canada that could not afford it in the 1880s and 1890s, in an act of faith constructed a railway across the 580 miles from St. John's to Port aux Basques, with a lot of vicissitudes, and it was a narrow gauge railway. We brought this in with us. It was given to the Canadian government, and now it is to be abandoned without even the admission that it is to be abandoned.

The Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice should have enough guts to say that he has told Mr. Bandeen he can shut down everything that is not making money in Newfoundland. If that is his instruction, let him come out and say it, because we want the answer. The 2,000 or 3,000 people down there working on this railway and their families, some 10,000 people, want this answer. This is the kind of heartless action that I am repeating to this House, with just a few of us here while down at the Conference Centre they are putting on a big pretence that they are interested in the economic development of Canada, and the saving of Canada economically. They are not interested at all. If they were, they would be acting to save the 3,000 jobs and the families of those who depend on the Newfoundland Railway. Therefore, I urge the House to support the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, if there ever was a need for being convinced about pretense, certainly the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has displayed that need this afternoon by taking up the time of the House with his motion.

I am always amused when listening to the hon. member who, as we know, was a former minister of finance in a Liberal administration in Newfoundland. We have heard him expound with equal enthusiasm the greatness of the Liberal Party of Canada when he was in that position. He always appreciated the transfer of payments, and he also appreciated very much the co-operation of the federal government in those times. He always went to great pain and at great length to express his thanks and appreciation on behalf of the people of Newfoundland. We now see some great transfigurations and great transfers in positions not only of philosophy but, indeed, of principle, when we listen to him.

I have the impression that for those of us in this House this afternoon and the listening audience the hon. member for St. John's West has given the best live definition of rhetoric in the way he addressed this House this afternoon. There is another word I suppose that would sum up equally well what he had to say about his motion, and that is gobbledygook.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

This is a convoluted and lengthy motion, but it does give members an opportunity at least to put a few positive facts on the record in respect of transportation, and particularly transportation in the Atlantic area. I certainly want to profit from the occasion this afternoon by speaking of the great accomplishments of the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I should have thought there might have been a question of privilege in some of the remarks made by the hon. member for St. John's West in his attempted attack on the character of the Minister of Transport, which I found to be totally unparliamentary. I am sure that on a reflection of the record in Hansard tomorrow there will be a prima facie question of privilege the minister might want to pursue.

Mr. Crosbie: I hope so.

Mr. Harquail: This is not uncommon. It is typical of the type of attack we see all the time, whether during question period or in debate, which makes one always ask whether this is really what the citizens of St. John's West expected and wanted to hear—this type of irresponsibility, and irresponsible remarks made in this House, such as shown by the hon. member in his attack this afternoon on the Minister of Transport. On the contrary, I am delighted to note that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has left that hon. minister in that portfolio of transportation, because that minister has shown real leadership in transportation. We always say that constructive criticism is all right, but criticism for the sake of criticism without foundation is totally unacceptable.

As a result of the leadership of the Minister of Transport and of the president of Air Canada, a New Brunswicker, by the way, Mr. Claude Taylor, as well as through the good work of the president of the CN, Dr. Bandeen, we have seen both these Crown corporations show a profit. No one seems to want to mention this. Certainly no one from the other side of the House ever bothers to mention that fact. We realize that during those difficult years when they were not able to provide an efficient operation or produce a profit, there was justifiable criticism. We looked for ways and means to rectify the situation.

As a result of vision and the dynamic approach of this government we have been able to turn the corner in transportation, not only in respect of Air Canada but in respect of the CN as well. There is quite a bit of truth in that commercial that the CN is a business as well as a responsibility. I suspect that is what underpins the Sullivan report and its findings, that we cannot just continue to carry out operations which are not economically viable. I am sure that is the reason Dr. Bandeen and his team at the corporate level have taken the steps they have taken and have been successful in the recapitalization of that corporation, and able to separate the losing passenger service with the provision of that new service known as VIA Rail. The setting up of that corporation was the result of co-operation between CP and CN. It was a step taken to provide efficient, modern passenger service facilities to Canadians, and Canadians are now aware of that very positive move, leaving the 90 per cent balance of business in freight and other services provided by CN in a most efficient fashion.

Having regard to air passenger service, I thank the hon. member for St. John's West for giving me, as a member for some years of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, the opportunity to state that I have had the privilege of travelling across this great country to visit harbour port facilities on the B.C. coast, in Vancouver, and on the east coast at St. John's, Saint John, New Brunswick and Halifax. I have had a first-hand look at the situation in those areas. Members of that standing committee have shown good faith in their interest in all transportation questions. They have gone from the nation's capital to examine, inspect and investigate at first hand the situations existing in respect of transportation, not only in central Canada but in western Canada and on the east coast.

I have many friends who are Newfoundlanders, and I am very proud of the contribution Newfoundlanders have made as Canadians, not only in respect of transportation but on all fronts. From what I have been able to observe, Newfoundlanders have a great deal more vision, more optimism, and a more positive outlook than we have had described by the hon. member for St. John's West this afternoon.

In reference to Newfoundlanders and transportation, let me take the opportunity of conveying my best wishes to the new president and chief executive officer of Eastern Provincial Airways, Mr. Steele. I certainly would want to take this opportunity of congratulating him on the assumption of those responsibilities. That airline has provided Canadian citizens in the Atlantic area with excellent air passenger service. It is a service that is first-class and compares favourably with any other in Canada today. Newfoundlanders can certainly be proud of the progress that smaller airline has been able to achieve in such a short period of time. One of the main reasons I am so pleased to make that comment today is that this airline has been able to provide a much needed service in the area of northern New Brunswick from Charlo to Montreal, linking us with the rest of Canada.

I have said on many occasions that not only do we find it important, from an economic point of view and for the future, to be linked with Montreal and central Canada, but on every occasion we have also urged the Minister of Transport and others in Air Canada and Eastern Provincial Airways as well as the CTC to consider this all-important air passenger service linking Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. It is an essential, fundamental development for the Atlantic area.

I am optimistic that through the new executive of EPA we will see an even greater expansion of the services they are providing already, keeping in mind that aspect that we are all pushing for, including the council of maritime premiers and the government of Newfoundland. We urge those who have responsibility for providing air passenger service to seize the first opportunity to provide that link in the four Atlantic provinces.

I should like to express my personal appreciation and admiration for the three commissioners and their spirit of public service to Canada and the province of Newfoundland which they have demonstrated in carrying out this difficult and complex task. These eminent and respected Newfoundlanders, at considerable personal sacrifice, have devoted the last year and one-half to this inquiry. They have given a high standard of service to the public.

It is because there is a need to understand more fully the implications of the recommendations to both the federal and provincial governments that the federal Minister of Transport and the provincial minister of transport and communications have set up a committee with representatives from each government to analyse the recommendations. Until there is a better understanding of the implications of the Sullivan report recommendations, I do not think it would be responsible for the government to reject the recommendations on the railway and accept all the rest, as proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West. Before any broad acceptance or rejection can be undertaken, the government must at the very minimum have available all the evidence that the Sullivan report can present. This, of course, includes the analysis of volume 2.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I oppose the motion on the ground that the government cannot give the commission's work the credit it deserves until it has studied it further. The full and immediate implementation of all the recommendations with the exception of the railway recommendations would lead to very serious financial problems in this period of restraint on government expenditures. Only when those factors have been fully explored and understood by both governments can a decision be made.

Again, through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for St. John's West for his initiative in bringing this motion before the House. It gives me the opportunity to acknowledge the excellent work carried out on behalf of all Canadians by the eminent Minister of Transport who, with vision, wisdom and his leadership qualities, has been able to accomplish so much in a short period of time.

That brings me back to my earlier comment about how much I appreciate the fact that in his wisdom the Prime Minister left to the Minister of Transport the grave responsibility of budgeting for our transportation needs and of leading that department and other Crown corporations. His success with the Department of Transport, Canadian National Railways, Air Canada, Canadian Pacific and other corporations such as Eastern Provincial Airways in the Atlantic area is a measure of his distinction. He has brought a high degree of expertise and skill to negotiating with the various unions in an effort to bring a mood of tranquility to that important aspect of our economy.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak on the motion of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). We in this party agree with the purport of the motion—that the Sullivan commission recommendations on the Newfoundland railway should be rejected. It will be interesting to see how the government of Newfoundland acts in this matter.

I wish the hon. member for St. John's West would talk to people in his own party, particularly those from central Canada, who while they talk about restraint do everything they can to cut the throats of public corporations, those people who demand profit-taking and profit-making out of public utilities at the expense of people in the outlying regions of the country. I do not know how the hon. member can reconcile his stand with the stand of his party on public utilities and public transportation. It is the Tory demand for restraint and cutbacks that has caused the Liberal government to implement Tory policy in transportation and in other parts of the economy.

Newfoundland has never fully been part of confederation as far as transportation is concerned. It is no different from Vancouver Island, the Queen Charlotte or the Arctic Islands in this respect. The nineteenth century mythology is that profit takes precedence over people, over providing service. The Newfoundland railroad should function as part of the national rail transcontinental system. Ferry service and rail car movements between the island and the mainland should be considered in the same way as the Trans-Canada Highway or the CNR and CPR main lines on the mainland. They can and should be efficient. They may or may not make money in a given year, or just break even—perhaps even lose money—but the point is that they should provide service.

We not only oppose the Sullivan commission recommendations in this area, but we submit that they totally ignore the economic realities and social and economic necessities of transportation in Newfoundland, let alone the rest of the country. If the government of Newfoundland opts for a short-term benefit under the Sullivan report recommendations, they will have to give up their historic and statutory rights. The implementation of the Sullivan recommendations would require renegotiation of the terms of entry into confederation for the province of Newfoundland. In fact, the commission submits that if the province refused to co-operate in the requested constitutional change, then in its opinion there would be no other choice but to continue to full rail service. That is all the government of Newfoundland and the people of the province need to know: they must fully and completely refuse to co-operate in the abandonment of their rail service.

I had the pleasure of spending a week in St. John's West at the time my hon. friend to my right won the by-election. I recall holding a press conference calling for the rebuilding of the Newfoundland railway lines to standard gauge and the enlarging of the transportation capacity of railway cars from the island to the mainland. I recall that an article in a St. John's daily newspaper pooh-poohed the idea and said it could not be done, that it would cost too much money. I did not hear about that from the then Conservative candidate in the St. John's West riding. However, he now makes a speech endorsing what I said two years ago in St. John's. The day will come, of course, when we "Mayo" implement my recommendations.

The Sullivan commission ignores some fairly fundamental things. The commission particularly ignores what energy costs in a place like Newfoundland. The abandonment of that rail line, according to our research, will mean a total energy increase of 6,350,000 gallons of diesel fuel annually. At the price people in Atlantic Canada have to pay for energy, what does that do to the people of Newfoundland and their economy in terms of goods and services? Add to that the costs of this mindless nineteenth century idea of profit-taking in the public utility advocated by the Tory party and implemented by the Liberals, and one will then get some idea of what it will cost the people of Newfoundland if they allow these nineteenth century ideas as proposed by the party represented by the hon. member for St. John's West to continue.

Energy consumption by the railways is over 3 million gallons, and as I have said, the total increase in energy consumption will be 6,350,000 gallons if the railway were abandoned. The Sullivan report is nothing more than an endorsement of the user-pay principle. It is clearly at odds with the original commitments made by Canada to Newfoundland in 1949. Under the terms of the union, the federal government agreed to take over the Newfoundland railway, including steamship and other marine services, and to maintain those services in accordance with the traffic offering and also relieve the province of the public cost involved. The commission recommends that the Newfoundland government renegotiate the terms of union to permit railway abandonment. I hope a government formed by the Progressive Conservative party that advocates private enterprise and profit-taking in public transportation will depart from their out-moded principles and refuse to renegotiate the terms of union regarding their railway.

Historically governments have recognized that Newfoundland's geography and distance from markets called for government intervention by way of subsidies and regulations. There has been nothing new about that since the middle 1800s in Canada. It is not new on the prairies, the Atlantic, the north or on the Pacific coast. The terms of union recognized that situation by extending maritime freight rate subsidies to Newfoundland and requiring confederation to cover the losses of rail, ferry and coastal services.

I do wish that in 1949 the people of Newfoundland and their spokesmen could have been a little more foresighted. They should have included in the terms of union not only a way to cover losses but also a way to cover the total cost of refurbishing and rebuilding their rail system, and as well the improvement of the water transport system connecting the island to the mainland. It is ironic that the terms of union recognized this latter point, and by the way it was recognized in the case of the prairie provinces in the Crowsnest pass rates, as well as in the other Atlantic provinces with respect to maritime freight rate subsidies, and in northern Ontario through the bridge subsidies. It took into account climate, geography and demography. The MacPherson commission was a royal commission of Conservatives appointed by a Conservative government in 1961. At that time Mr. MacPherson suggested:

—in the long run, a system can be developed that should enable the people concerned to pay the total cost involved.

While recognizing that at present user-pay could not be applied to Newfoundland, the Sullivan commission recommends:

—That it be recognized as a principle that in those areas where competition can viably exist, the transportation system be developed toward a future situation where the concept of user-pay may be appropriate and applicable.

This concept, as I have said, was started by a royal commission under a Tory government in 1961 and it has continued under a royal commission under a Liberal government. It betrays confederation. I do not want to hear another Tory speaker talk about user-pay, competition, free enterprise and profits when it comes to railroads or airlines. If the people are to be properly served with transportation in all parts of Canada, then the nineteenth century concepts they cling to have to be forgotten.

Nobody would argue in favour of subsidies just for the sake of a subsidy. Subsidies have to be applied to Newfoundland for a reason. Distances involved must be taken into account as well as the scattered population and the need to stimulate growth in a depressed region. Transportation is an essential element to accomplish this. Transportation must serve the people. Goods must be carried in a manner which meets the competition in markets in other parts of Canada and in other parts of the world. Subsidies to Newfoundland are not distortions. Government intervention in transportation is an instrument to counterbalance distortions that already exist, such as poverty, geography, climate and in the location of people.

The Sullivan commission does not view transportation as a tool to assist development. It views it as a way to get a government off the hook. It views it as a method to make a profit for somebody. The whole purport of the recommendation, starting with the first royal commission in 1961 under the Diefenbaker government and continued by a Pearson government and then a Trudeau government, is exemplified by what one sees today in transportation over the entire country. It is exemplified by what is being attempted in Newfoundland, not with or for Newfoundland.

I hope the House will decide at one minute to six to accept this motion. I hope members on the government side will realize that a notice of motion, which is really a resolution, even though passed by the House, places no requirement upon the government to implement it. But at least it will tell the government what all members in the House feel. Here is an opportunity to say something in an area that, while it might relate most directly to Newfoundland, also concerns many other areas in Canada including northern Ontario, the prairies, the Pacific coast and the Arctic. It would be an indication that parliament is saying to the government that the legislation, regulations and rules which now govern transportation do not work. We need only quote a former Liberal minister of transport who said that in transportation competition does not work. It never has in Canada. There is not a single mode of transportation, including walking, which is not subsidized. If you were to follow the private enterprise mythology about competition and profit in transportation and the principle of user-pay, you would need to set up a toll booth every six blocks and charge the pedestrian either a 25 or 50-cent toll. The property owners have paid for the sidewalks. Therefore, in order to follow private enterprise logic to its conclusion in transportation, the pedestrians should pay.

If, Mr. Speaker, you were to suggest that profits should be made and there should be competition on our streets, highways and sewer and water systems, you would be locked up. Even the Tories and Liberals would not suggest that. They gave up on such things when they had toll roads and what-not back in the 1850s with private enterprise competition and road allowances. The same applies to railroads and airlines as well as other essential public services.

I urge the House to accept this resolution so that the government will be under no illusion that the adoption of this kind of royal commission recommendation would be counter to the whole intent and purpose of confederation. It would do nothing more than continue the colonizing of a part of our nation. If the government will agree to reject out of hand the Sullivan royal commission recommendations, it logically follows they will have to implement the recommendations of the Hall commission on freight rates in western Canada. They will have to implement recommendations of railway unions, farm organizations and small business organizations in this country that have been made over the past 50 years. Both the government and the official opposition will have to make a 180 degree turn in their ideology on transportation.

If the hon. member for St. John's West spends as much time persuading his own colleagues as he spent trying to persuade members opposite, he may even succeed in persuading parliament. I will be interested in seeing the policy that comes out of any Conservative party conference on transportation in Canada. I hope the hon. member for St. John's West extends his argument to some of his colleagues from Saskatchewan who over the past few weeks have said and done all they could to betray us with regard to transportation, orderly marketing and the wheat board. Instead they have patted Canadian Pacific on the head, even though it has bled this country for 90 years. They have done all they could to encourage and applaud international bandits like the Cargill Grain Company—free enterprise—no matter what it does to our grain producers or this country. It does not matter to Tories what it does to fishermen in Newfoundland when you apply private enterprise principles in transportation.

I am delighted the hon. member for St. John's West has presented this resolution. I hope it means a fundamental change of heart on his part, if not on the part of his colleagues.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few minutes but I am not going to talk out the resolution. I hope the House will deal with it in a positive way. I just want to make a few remarks.

I commend to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) that he sit down and read the Sullivan report. He obviously has not read it. Otherwise he would not ask the House to reject it out of hand.

Second, the government of Newfoundland has already rejected that recommendation dealing with rail abandonment. As the spokesman for the New Democratic Party, he should be acquainted with that fact. As a consequence of that rejection by the government of Newfoundland, the Government of Canada had no choice, given the fact that the terms of union, specifically term 31, requires Canada to continue to operate the Newfoundland railway. The Government of Canada had no choice but to accept the fact that they had a constitutional obligation to continue with the Newfoundland railway as represented by a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) on September 13. Perhaps the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre should pick up on his homework.

Regardless of what the government of Newfoundland has done and regardless of what the Government of Canada through the Secretary of State for External Affairs has done, unless the Government of Canada is prepared to move very quickly, the constitution of Canada notwithstanding, there will be no railway in Newfoundland within 12 months. Unless there is a decision made now on the operating losses, abandonment of the railway will become a de facto situation, the constitution notwithstanding. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) know that. It is nothing short of scandalous that they avoid making this ultimate decision.

The people of Newfoundland are getting sick and tired of being looked upon as a foster child of confederation and a foster child of Canadian National. Instead, they want to be and expect to be looked upon by the Government of Canada as a partner in the development of the last great frontier of this country, namely the province of Newfoundland and Labrador with its tremendous storehouse of wealth. In order to develop that resource, we need a new approach to transportation.

I urge the Government of Canada to move very quickly before it is too late. I commend my colleague from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) on bringing forward this motion which I know will address itself to the House, because the Government of Canada has responded to it in a positive way since it has been placed on the order paper.

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, let me address my first comments to the New Democratic Party and follow up on what was said by my colleague from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I know they are flushed with success, but let me say this to them. If you want to win more seats, do your homework first. You have just rejected out of hand the concept of Port Labrador, the trans-Labrador highway, the development of airstrips along the Labrador coast and the interprovincial ferry service that is to be established in the province. You have rejected all of those because you have rejected all of the recommendations of the Sullivan commission. If you want to win more seats, do your homework first, because the people are not going to buy that line.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member has a real point of order, I am ready to hear it. However, it is six o'clock.

Mr. Rompkey: We have not got time for points of order. They had their day in court.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I therefore leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Miss Bégin) that Bill C-2 be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when I completed the first part of my speech at five o'clock I was dealing with the extent and effect of the cuts in funding affecting scientific research in general and research in the field of medicine in particular. I want to put on record what the cuts announced in September mean to medical research in this country.

In the Department of National Health and Welfare the total science support cutback for 1978-79 amounts to $10.3 million. It includes $3 million for the professional training program which was used for the upgrading of health personnel and about which the minister spoke so glowingly, and $4.8 million in programs for research into the non-medical use of drugs. The use of drugs is increasing. The complexity of the drugs being taken is growing and the effect of drugs in such important aspects of life as mind control can probably be seen in the tragedy which occurred at Jonestown some days ago.

The amount of $2 million has been cut from the national health research and development program, besides $500,000 from the research budget of the Medical Research Council. We are talking about the kind of stop-go decisions which this government has been making over a period of almost ten years and which in the view of researchers, medical researchers in particular, constitute a disaster. Each time this sort of thing happens it is an indication, almost an order, for some of our youngest and best medical researchers to take off for the United States where they consistently spend not just ten times the amount on medical research one might expect, since the population there is ten times that of ours, but probably one hundred times what we spend. In other words, they spend $10 per capita on medical research for every $1 we spend here. The result is that the discoveries are made in the United States and we become captives of the American market.

Then the research budget of the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) is $1.8 million; $1 million has been cut from the National Research Council and $500,000 from the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council. The National Research Council has a worldwide reputation for the excellence of its work, but if this reputation is maintained no thanks will be due to the government. The effects of what the government has done and is doing will be seen not just this year or next year but in the decade and the generation to come.

It is an amazing set of decisions the government has made. In view of our high unemployment and poor balance of trade record, and the overwhelming evidence from other countries of the benefits of a strong research and development effort, these cutback proposals make no sense at all. Research is a labour-intensive activity which employs people in each of our provinces and, dollar for dollar, yields high dividends by comparison with other work.

In his announcement last June the then minister of science and technology said that he was aiming in five years to spend 1.5 per cent of the gross national product on scientific research and development. More than half of that which other western countries are spending has already been cut in Canada in scientific research in the announcements I have already listed.

A particularly disturbing feature of the proposed federal cutbacks in research, health care and education programs is that now the responsibility for continuation of support for work in these areas could fall very heavily on the already financially beleaguered provinces. Although the established programs financing agreement requires the federal government to obtain provincial consent for any action that reduces or diminishes Ottawa's contribution, the announcement on September 8 shows that the Government of Canada intends substantially to reduce payments to these cost-shared programs, probably by cutting cash payments rather than through transfer of tax points.

The effect of any major federal withdrawal may be offset somewhat through equalization grants, but in the final analysis there is no guarantee that the less affluent provinces especially could afford to assume the high cost of funding research, health care and education on their own.

The minister suggested in her speech that since 85 per cent or 88 per cent of the money allocated under the legislation in 1966 had been used, the needs of the provinces had been met. Nothing could be further from the truth. In my own province there is approximately $8.5 million which has not been used, despite the fact that our largest teaching hospital, the Health Sciences Centre, urgently requires modification. That hospital is short of teaching staff, emergency care and laboratory care facilities. It is in need of advanced diagnostic laboratories and of upgrading in its child health facilities.

Miss Bégin: Did you say the Seven Oaks Hospital?

Mr. Orlikow: I am talking about the Health Sciences Centre. The psychiatric facilities in that hospital are a disgrace. The minister may think that I have exaggerated the situation. The former head of medicine at the Health Sciences Centre, Dr. Reuben Cherniack, a nationally known researcher, left Winnipeg for the United States because of the lack of opportunity and facilities in that hospital. He is quoted in an article in the Winnipeg Tribune, July 5, 1978 as saying:

> A chronic shortage of research facilities, coupled with a negative attitude toward research, has reduced the Health Sciences Centre to a second-rate community hospital and forced the University of Manitoba medical school downhill—

Further on in the same article he says:

> —research uncovers new methods of approach, new methods of treating disease which are then applied to patients in the hospital.
> But more important is these researchers developed labs that quickly became applicable to the patient. That isn't happening now.
> The researchers are getting frustrated (by the attitude), their students are getting turned off. The future researcher is not going to be turned on.

A news story in the Winnipeg Free Press of last Saturday reports on a letter of protest that was sent to the minister of health in the Manitoba government, Mr. Sherman, by the former president of the Manitoba Medical Association, Dr. J. H. Crust, who protested vigorously about the fact that in the hospital in which he works, the Misericordia Hospital, seriously ill patients are denied beds because there are none available. In another story Dr. Crust talked of a patient of his who needed an operation and was left in the corridor in the emergency ward for 24 hours.

The story would be amusing if it were not so sad. The organized medical profession in Manitoba worked so hard to defeat the NDP government because they thought that it was unsympathetic to the medical profession and health care, only to find that the present Conservative government is no better.

The minister said today that the situation was not that bad in the field of medical research and tried to create the impression that the medical research community was relatively satisfied with the state of research and the support which it is getting from the federal government. I have a news clipping from the Ottawa Citizen dated October 18, 1978, which reports a speech the minister made at a meeting arranged by an organization called Canadians for Health Research. It reads:

'I know you were hoping that I have been able to bring you an announcement that there would be increased funding made available and I wish I could have done that today, but regrettably I cannot do that'—

She stressed that while the $2 billion budget cutback hurt and meant a real 'tightening of the belt in government,' medical research would not be 'put on the back burner until our other economic difficulties go away'—

Further on the same article says:

"But the commitment that I want to make to you is that, even in a time of cutbacks and restraint, funding for medical research will be protected and will grow at least within the guidelines which the federal government has set to control its own growth."

The question is, do medical researchers accept the guidelines established by the government as being adequate? I suggest that they do not and that they have not for a long time. A letter written to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on March 1, 1976, by Dr. Victor Chernik, Professor and head of the Department of Pediatrics, and pediatrician-in-chief at the Children's Centre at the University of Manitoba, illustrates the current situation in medical research. It reads:

The level of funding for medical research in Canada on a per capita basis is approximately $2.00 . . . while that in the United States is approximately ten times this rate. Thus, we are in danger of losing our best people, scientists who would compete very favourably in the U.S. funding arena.

In the last paragraph of his letter the doctor says:

In my own department there are several excellent investigators who have had to curtail excellent research programs in the diseases of children and several other young but very promising scientists who have not been able to get their programs off the ground because of serious lack of funding of the MRC. I submit that if the current policy of the Government of Canada is not altered medical research in the country will within the next three to four years be in serious jeopardy because of a lack of highly skilled and trained technical help, a major decline in the number of research trainees and the emigration of skilled scientists to areas which have a more stable funding base and are therefore more conducive to medical research.

The fears of Dr. Chernick have proven to be well founded because all the things he predicted have happened.

I have another article from the Winnipeg Tribune, dated April 28, 1977, which outlines the problems of medical research in my province. Manitoba is far from being the worst province in this area. This article reads:

● (2022)

What is lacking in this province, as in others, is money—money to attract high calibre people to Manitoba to perform research, teaching, and patient care functions, and to sponsor projects initiated by residents of the province.

It goes on to say:

Manitoba researchers reacted to the decision with alarm—

That is to the cutback at the time.

—noting that their purchasing power was cut by 35 to 40 per cent. Several research projects were scrapped and 38 research technicians in Manitoba lost their jobs.

There are probably another 28 who will lose their jobs this year. Let me bring the story up to the present. I have here a letter written to me on May 1 of this year from Dr. R. W. Hudson, secretary, research committee of the faculty of medicine of the University of Ottawa. In that letter he says in part:

The research committee of the faculty of medicine of the University of Ottawa feels impelled to make a public statement to the effect that:

1. A crisis exists in medical and health related research in this country as a result of government funding policies.

2. Long-term effects on medical research will, in turn, seriously affect health care delivery in Canada and the effect will be with us for many years to come.

3. Over the last five years the government has failed to respond appropriately to representations by many groups from within the field of health care, as well as by those from outside.

It is clear that the present government must take full responsibility for the present crisis and for the consequences that follow.

Last but not least, I have a letter sent to me by Dr. Cinader from the Institute of Immunology, the school of graduate studies of the University of Toronto. He applied for a grant for a project entitled, "Geriatric changes of the immune system," and he received a reply from R. A. Heacock, director, contributions and awards division of the research programs directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare, which reads as follows:

As you have probably heard by now, the current series of expenditure cuts by the federal government will mean that the allotment of funds for the national health research and development program has been reduced by $2 million for the fiscal year 1979-80.

Having reviewed our budgetary commitments for the next fiscal year, it appears that in all probability no funds will be available to support any new projects and awards in 1979-80.

Dr. Cinader wrote to me. He is not complaining for himself because he is an established researcher who has access to other sources of funds, especially from the United States. He wrote to me on November 15 because he knows from past experience that I have been interested and involved in these discussions. His letter reads in part:

The recent decision that cuts of $2 million are to be made in external grants, given by National Health and Welfare (NHRDP), is a regrettable consequence of the current fiscal policies of the Canadian government. We are informed that the minister has decided to discontinue to consider newly proposed projects in 1978 and in the normal review period of 1979.

This will further increase the harmful long-term consequences of the scientific basis of our health services. When cuts are made, they must be carefully designed so as to protect the most valuable and original aspects of research, and must not occur at the expense of new progressive concepts. In short, it must preserve the capacity for recovery, when, finally, better funding has become possible and the tragically wasteful stop-go-stop technique of science funding has come to an end.

I do not have the time to put the whole letter on the record, but it is clear how Dr. Cinader, who is just one of the many adversely affected—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not intend to be very long, Mr. Speaker. I could go on quoting from any number of sources in the scientific community, but I know that the minister knows that the decision made by the government—and I hope forced on her against her better judgment—is not acceptable to the scientific community. In every sector of the scientific community in every province people are dismayed, in fact they are completely disheartened, at this government's intolerable view that scientific research is not really necessary, and that when cuts are made they can be made easily, without too much difficulty, without too much protest and without too many ill effects in the field of scientific research. It is a position with which most of us disagree, certainly one with which people in all the scientific disciplines in this country disagree. It is one more illustration of this government's failure to understand the role of government and the need to invest not less but indeed greater efforts, many more people and much more money in all fields of scientific research.

This bill is just one more example of the government's failure to understand the needs of the Canadian people, one more illustration of the decision of the government to impose restraint without thinking through the consequences on what those cutbacks mean to people and to their needs. It is such a serious mistake and failure on the part of this government that we in the NDP cannot and will not support the proposal contained in this bill.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to address a few words to the House on this bill, but before I do so I want to make a few points of clarification regarding some of the remarks of the last speaker.

First of all, no submission for medical or hospital research has been refused by the department. Second, all agreements that have been signed will be honoured. At present, 85 per cent of the funds set up for this purpose have been utilized. It is obviously false to criticize this bill in an attempt to promote medical research.

Having said that, may I say a few words about the bill itself. A royal commission on health services, commonly known as the Hall commission, was established in the early 1960s at the urging of the Canadian Medical Association. The association, encouraged by the success of physician-sponsored service plans, felt that the "supplement not supplant" philosophy of public funding of medical care insurance for low income groups only would find support. However, after carefully conducting the most thorough and complete survey of the health situtation in Canada so far undertaken, the commission came out strongly in favour of a shared-cost program parallel to the hospital insurance program; in other words, a universal and government operated medicare program.

The medical care program which was implemented in 1968 was based on the 1964 recommendations of the royal commission on health services. It is important to look at some of the significant factors that led to its recommendations.

During the mid-1960s when the program was being considered, Canada was one of the few industrial nations without a national medical care insurance program. Although universally available plans existed in a few provinces, in most provinces there were Canadians who found it impossible to buy protection against the cost of medical care. In some cases this was due to ill health or age, with no insurance company willing to take the increased risk associated with issuing a policy. In other cases, individuals who were not members of an insurance group could not afford the higher premiums required for individual enrolment. It was only in those few provinces which embarked upon the governmental prepaid medical insurance plan, pioneered in Saskatchewan in 1962, that any resident who was not a member of an insurance group could with certainty buy comprehensive coverage without producing evidence of being a good risk, and without the possibility of being asked to pay a higher premium.

I should like to interject a very personal note at this point. I was in that position myself. Because of certain conditions and situations, I was the father of a family which was subject to sickness in the household day after day, week after week, month after month. Because I had not been enrolled previously in any assistance plan, it was impossible for me to obtain the necessary coverage. Debts accumulated, and every time a member of my family had to enter hospital, the debts increased. I found myself in an extraordinary situation. I was running out of any method by which to pay my bills. I had gone to the bank and finance companies. I was paying a tremendous interest rate of 18 per cent per annum on the money I was borrowing. I was in hock up to my eyebrows.

An hon. Member: What does this have to do with the bill?

Mr. Herbert: I am pointing out how essential it was for the government to introduce a universal plan, so that persons experiencing extremely difficult financial conditions would be covered, despite the fact that no insurance company would touch cases similar to my own.

At the end of 1967, approximately 70 per cent of Canada's population was estimated to have some insurance protection against the cost of necessary medical care under voluntary plans. Eventually I was able to participate in one of those voluntary plans, but by then I had debts which I thought would never be repaid. An additional 4 per cent to 5 per cent were covered under a compulsory insurance plan in Saskatchewan, while others came under a variety of public programs for categorical assistance in receiving medical care. However, it should be noted that the Hall commission in 1964 reported that of those many Canadians who had private medical insurance, approximately 30 per cent had very inadequate coverage.

What benefits do we perceive from hospital insurance and medical care programs? The most obvious effect has been the removal of financial barriers to necessary medical, hospital and medical practitioner care for all residents of Canada. Again I should like to refer to my personal situation. Look at the embarrassment I faced when talking to a doctor who had performed a very expensive operation. I had to say to him, "Doctor, I have no way of paying your bill. I have borrowed to the limit." He said, "I will be sending you a bill. It will be a relatively small one. Pay it when you are able."

Ill health no longer means that families face crushing financial burdens related to costs, in addition to other misfortunes. Surely when one has sickness to contend with repeatedly, one should not also have to face financial concerns respecting the buying of one's daily bread.

The benefit of a medical care plan must be self-evident, but if proof is needed I should like to mention the 84 per cent to 88 per cent of the respondents in relatively recent Gallup polls who felt that they were receiving good value from health insurance, which topped the list of government finance services mentioned in the polls. The introduction of medical care programs meant that medical practice has become economically viable in any community with sufficient population to warrant a doctor, because of the virtual elimination of bad debts for medical practitioners. In itself this is a means of encouraging practice in areas where populations could not previously maintain an economically viable practice.

Once again, I should like to refer to a very personal experience. When my wife entered training school for nursing, she borrowed money from the provincial government, on the condition that either she repaid the loan or went to work in one of the areas where doctors would not go because the population was not particularly large, or because the population had no means of paying the doctor's bills. When my wife graduated from nursing school, she went to Baie Johan Beetz and spent a considerable amount of time there. She got to love the people of that community. As a newly graduated nurse, she did all the work one thinks of being performed by a doctor: delivery of babies, various kinds of minor surgery and extraction of teeth. These are the things one has to do when a community is completely cut off from the rest of the world for a period of several months, when there is no communication of any kind, other than that which can be dropped by aeroplane. There is no way of getting out and there is no way of getting in.

That is the type of medical service which was available to this community in the years prior to the introduction of a medical care program. The men and women who went into these areas certainly did not do so for financial gain. It was a tremendous strain on the individual concerned because most of them were young, enthusiastic, and had relatively little experience. They were called upon to perform some incredible tasks when helping with the problems of communities such as Baie Johan Beetz.

In addition to such general economic inducements resulting from the advent of the medical care program, the federal government contributed toward provincial monetary incentives to encourage physicians to establish in underserviced areas, such as the one I have mentioned. Obviously, those are areas where financial encouragement must be given in order to have the kind of medical service which is essential and necessary.

Every day we hear how bad things are in Canada, when really things could not be any better than they are at the present time compared to conditions in the rest of the world. We have more doctors per capita than any other country. We have extraordinary medical services. Any member of our population can go to hospital next week without having to worry about the bill. It is extraordinary that there should be objections to the kind of assistance which has meant that we are able to send some of our surplus doctors into areas, where there has not been viable business for doctors in the past. In these small communities, not only was there no means by which a physician could be paid, but the gratitude of the people was often shown in some unusual fashion. For example, in my wife's case, she would receive jars of pickled fish, and all kinds of things which were quite precious in a community like that, as compensation for the services she performed.

As well as encouraging physicians to reside and practise away from metropolitan centres—who would not practise in a metropolitan centre today, and one of our problems is to get people away from these metropolitan centres—the medical care program has helped stimulate visiting specialist services for smaller communities. Once again, we talk about specialist services. Imagine being in an area where, not very long ago, it was not a question of getting a specialist's services but rather a question of whether you could get a doctor's services at all. This program brings these specialists to towns whose population is such, that they could not attract these specialists on a full-time basis. Of course, to the extent these services are going into areas not provided for previously, there is some associated increase in costs. But in a country as vast as ours, we feel dollars are well spent when they lessen disparity by bringing about better distribution of skilled human resources. We all know that one of the problems of the program—abuses, if you like—is that people in metropolitan areas are able to shop around, often from doctor to doctor, and draw on the expertise of the many specialists in those areas.

Canada has also experienced some dramatic improvements in certain health indicators. At the time our hospital insurance program came in, in the late 1950s, our infant mortality rate was more than 40 per cent higher than that of Australia, 30 per cent higher than that of England and Wales, and nearly 20 per cent higher than that of the United States. By the end of 1971, which was the first year that all provinces were in medicare for the full year, our infant mortality rate had dropped from 21.8 per 100,000 live births to 14.3, still equalling Australia's but surpassing that of the United Kingdom and New Zealand. In 1975 the Canadian rate was 11 per cent below that in the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, it seems that the hon. member who has the floor has made an error in regard to the bill we are discussing. The bill before the House at the moment relates to the health resources fund, not medicare. It seems the hon. member either does not know the difference or has picked the wrong speech.

An hon. Member: Or is filibustering.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, what I have been doing is responding to the speeches already made by members of the opposition who chose to use this bill for a discussion of this specific subject. It is my opinion that what I am attempting to do is respond to the points which have been made by various speakers from the opposition benches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herbert: The maternal mortality rate on the eve of medicare was 27 per 100,000 live births. Incidentally, I was going to mention before I was so rudely interrupted by an hon. member opposite that one of the reasons for the mortality rate in days when we did not have a proper program was that in outlying communities more often than not—sometimes the percentage was as high as 75 per cent—the birth was not normal and required expertise. Often the people in those small communities were left with an inexperienced nurse who had to cope with some extraordinary problems.

The maternal mortality rate dropped a third by the end of 1971, and by 1976 was seven per 100,000. It is noted in some studies on the effects of implementing medicare that pregnant women were starting their prenatal care earlier than they had been doing before medicare. One presumes that, if prenatal care is of any value to the mother as well as to the baby, this earlier start of prenatal care may very well have had something to do with this marked drop in the maternal mortality rate.

Incidentally, I guess it goes without saying that if we can improve the facilities available to the mother at the time of birth, we are going to eliminate many of the problems encountered with all kinds of retardation in later life due to the inadequacy that used to exist in the facilities available at the time of birth.

I am not prepared to suggest that the improvements in maternal and infant mortality rates in the last ten years have been entirely due to medicare. However, it seems almost impossible to conceive that the tremendous change in the access to doctors, both physical and financial, since the introduction of medical insurance did not play some part.

With an increasing output from Canadian medical schools, Canada's doctor-population ratio is better than one in 600. We should be very proud of that. It has passed the target which the Hall commission despaired of reaching before 1991. As I mentioned a little earlier, I think we should sometimes talk about some of the good things in this country instead of always talking about the gloomy side.

All provinces have experienced a substantial improvement in their doctor-population ratios. Some changes have been especially gratifying. For example, the doctor-population ratio of Newfoundland, one of our less fortunate provinces economically, increased from one in 1,500 the year before medicare to almost one in 700, eight years after it joined medicare. As well as the improvement in the doctor supply over-all, more of the province's practitioners are settling in smaller communities. The increased supply of physicians and other health manpower relates to the significant impetus of the health resources fund established in 1966 which was complementary to the hospital insurance and medicare programs.

I felt it was essential, despite the interruptions by members of the opposition, to put on record some of the accomplishments, and some of the necessary responses to points raised by members of the opposition during this debate, points I might say that did not relate at all to the bill but which required some response. I have been very happy to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I do not usually start my speeches in this way but, in respect of a matter as important as this relating to the health resources fund, I do not understand how the government, following the minister's introduction of the bill, could follow with a speaker who carried on for 35 minutes without addressing himself for one minute to the bill. He delivered a speech that had nothing whatever to do with the bill. We across here have been incredulous. The hon. member suggests that he answered our points one by one. Now the hon. member smiles. I do not think it is all that funny that an hon. member opposite should speak on this bill without addressing himself to its subject matter, namely, the health resources fund. I think even the minister is embarrassed.

Miss Bégin: No, not at all.

Mr. Grafftey: She will have to stretch her imagination very far because she knows she will have to do a lot of convincing to convince me and others that the hon. member who preceded me addressed himself for more than 30 seconds to this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member did mention that in comparison with other countries we do have a very good doctor-population ratio. I have recognized this in the past as a result of research I have undertaken over many years. The one difficulty is, there is a bad distribution of doctors. We have an over-concentration of doctors in some of our high income urban areas.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: I think that hon. member should really leave the House. He has just disgraced himself with an irrelevant speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: I am not joking about that. We have more to do than listen to that kind of speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest that the hon. member get back to the bill.

Mr. Grafftey: I am right on the bill, Mr. Speaker. When we talk about the doctor-population ratio, we in this House recognize that the ratio in this country is pretty good. I think that the hon. minister would be one of the first to admit that in many, many areas of this country we are talking about poor distribution of doctors. There are many low income areas, rural areas and small towns going without doctors and paramedical help. It is not good enough just to quote the ratio of doctors in comparison to other countries.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) related this question to the debate on restraint that has been taking place during this parliament. Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record as saying that I support the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and my leader in their position on restraint but surely we should be selective. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North is drawing a very long bow when he says that every time the government brings in a measure that means cutting back, this party criticizes them. That is not so, Mr. Speaker. We are going to be responsible and selective and we are going to talk about the health resources fund with that in view.

In direct relation to the health resources fund I want to draw an analogy. Let us suppose that at nine o'clock tomorrow morning the government decided that it would be public policy that everybody in Canada should have free bread and we vote a supplementation into their pockets so that the people could have free bread, but nobody in the government told the bakeries what we had done. The government knows full well that in terms of medicare and hospital insurance they had the full support of this party. Although we had some misgivings about how things were done, we voted income supplementation into people's pockets for services and personnel that for many Canadians were not available. Costs skyrocketed and the system broke down. In many ways what we did was analogous to my story about a country voting free bread, voting supplemental income into people's pockets but doing nothing about notifying the bakeries.

We had the Hall report in Ontario, in Quebec the Castonguay report, and also the royal commission on the Healing Arts in Ontario, all of which said that whether we like it or not, whether it was forced on the provinces by unilateral federal decision or not, the fact is we have hospital insurance and medicare. Next came the establishment of the health resources fund which the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) dealt with in great detail in his remarks today.

I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North will pay attention to what I have to say. I researched the Hall commission findings, and the royal commission on the Healing Arts findings in the mid sixties when these commissions addressed themselves to the problems of medical financing, medical research, medicare and hospital insurance, and they said the health resources fund should be established not only for proper planning of personnel at the local level, but, in effect, to reduce costs.

I challenge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to research back to the mid-1960s. The health resources fund in relation to health research—which I shall touch on later and which the hon. member for Athabasca brought up in a responsible way this afternoon—was initiated to help plan the provision of paramedical personnel, to train more doctors, to work in co-operation with medical schools and to work at the community level in terms of rationalization plants and health care to people at the community level.

If the hon. minister were to read all the recommendations emanating from the Hall report in Ontario, the Quebec report and all the studies, she would find that one of the central recommendations for the establishment of a health resources fund was spending dollars in order to save dollars in the long run.

What a ludicrous display of lunacy we see on the floor of the House of Commons today, Mr. Speaker. The federal government, like a bull in a china shop, cuts back on a fund, one of the main reasons for which is to save money. Hon. members opposite laugh but they have not studied the bill. They are just voting automatically with the government. What happens is that Treasury Board takes a wide view, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says, "We are going to have to cut back," and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) says, "Restraint!"

I was once parliamentary secretary to a minister of finance, although it seems long, long ago. But I know that when you look at all the statutory items you can touch, there are not many you can logically cut back on. Treasury Board officials—and I challenge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to deny this—say, "Here is something we can touch—the health resources fund."

Miss Bégin: That is not true.

Mr. Grafftey: They say, "That is not a statutory consideration," and so the bureaucrats, aided and abetted by their Liberal counterparts opposite, decide to cut the health resources fund. They do it without any idea of what they are cutting. I ask the minister if she denies that one of the aims of the health resources fund in the mid-sixties—apart from the humanitarian aims—was to save money, to put the plant and personnel in place in co-operation with the provinces, as the long-term $500 million was voted. Was not one of the central reasons for the health resources fund to save money in the long run? Today, in a crisis situation, the government is trying to give the Canadian people the impression that they are going to save a few dollars when in the long run it is actually going to cost millions.

I should like to summarize what the hon. member for Athabasca, this party's spokesman for health, so ably articulated earlier today. The federal government's health resources fund was created in 1966 to help provide money to meet the capital costs of constructing, renovating, acquiring and equipping health training and research facilities. For these purposes, $500 million was made available for use over a 15-year period. The fund was to pay up to 50 per cent of the cost, the rest to be provided by the provinces or some other source.

In December, 1967, things got off to a bad start. The minister of finance at that time, Mr. Mitchell Sharp, announced that he would seek to limit the total fund allocation in the next fiscal year to $40 million. In fact, the total actually approved was $37.5 million. The same limitation was applied for the fiscal year 1969-70.

This change in rules in midstream caused chaos in the program ten years ago. In the first nine months of the fund, from July 31, 1966 to March 31, 1967, federal-provincial health officials agreed that $14.9 million should be given to various projects, but only $4.7 million was actually paid out by March 31, 1967, because of the federal government's intransigence. In the following fiscal year another $66.3 million was committed. Again because of the federal government's intransigence, the total payment was $32.6 million. That is how the fund got off the ground.

This on-again-off-again attitude of the federal government, aided and abetted by Treasury Board officials who cut into areas where they did not know what they were cutting, has created chaos when the object was to bring stability to the whole area. I say that Ottawa is slashing the health resources fund. I said this over ten years ago and I say it again today. This has had an alarming effect.

Let me talk for a few minutes about what the Castonguay report had to say indirectly about the province of Quebec vis-à-vis the health resources fund. The province of Quebec and the Castonguay commission typify only too well the Canadian scene vis-à-vis the delivery of medical and health care services, and indirectly the application of the health resources fund. Over 12 years ago the report concluded that regional planning was a number one priority in any progressive public medicare plan. Castonguay specifically recognized, as I said at the outset of my speech, that income supplementation through the hospital insurance plan and medicare was being voted into people's pockets for medical personnel and services that many times were not there, especially in low income and small town rural areas of this country.

The health resources fund not only had to address itself to this humanitarian difficulty but it had to address itself also to the cost spiral. At the centre of each region should be found a large health training centre with university affiliation, together with a large teaching hospital which should include all the highly specialized services, the report concluded. Decentralized from this large unit, often to be founded in smaller towns, cities and suburbs, the Castonguay commission recommended the establishment of general hospitals. I am now talking more particularly of the province of Quebec. These hospitals were to have over 200 beds for general surgery and specialized functions could be performed. Further decentralization as recommended by the Castonguay report should see the establishment of hospitals for the care of chronic diseases, old people's and nursing homes, ambulatory care centres, convalescent homes, health care clinics and so on.

When this bill passed the House, Ottawa obliged the provinces by allowing them to participate in a universal medicare plan, a hospital insurance plan, but we are voting again today meaningless sums to help make ready the facilities and personnel needed under programs that were voted on over ten years ago. Quebec is no exception, Mr. Speaker. I address myself particularly to the minister right now when I say that regions all over Canada have embarked on medicare programs before services were initially prepared, and still the government is doing nothing in co-operation with the provinces to rectify the situation. I say that if this government persists in its attitude of pretending to save short-term dollars at the expense of long-term chaos, no one knows what the results will be.

How many times did the minister have her say with Treasury Board officials before this ludicrous cutback took place? Can she convince this House during this debate that Treasury Board officials who recommended this cutback have any idea at all what the program is about?

Apart from the humanitarian aspect of needing to implement the plan at the community level in terms of building ambulatory care facilities, convalescent homes and the like, as well as the training of paramedical personnel to take the place of high cost doctors, if the minister had really pleaded her case with the Minister of Finance and Treasury Board officials she would have shown them how, in the long-term, short-term cutbacks will cost the Canadian taxpayer a lot more.

The case for medical research has already been made a lot better than I could make it in the few short minutes available to me tonight. Surely it is self-evident. For the last ten years we have heard about the exodus of research scientists leaving Canada for the United States. I do not want to get into that almost sterile debate because it should be self-evident. Again, I refer to the humanitarian factor. How can one put a cost on scientific research? I think of Dr. Wilder Penfield in the Montreal Neurological Research Institute. How can one possibly put a cost on the millions of dollars, again apart from the humanitarian considerations, that he has saved the Canadian taxpayer by his work at one of the world's greatest neurological institutions? How can one put a cost on what my old schoolmate, Charlie Scriver in Montreal, is doing? I single him out, but there are many others. How can one put a cost on what Banting and Best did in terms of scientific research, and how much they saved the Canadian taxpayer? In this respect we could go back to the fifteenth century.

I think hon. members opposite should treat this debate a little more seriously than they are. We all realize the excellence of the delivery of medical and health care services at the community level, and the excellence of our teaching facilities at universities which depend on the excellence of our scientific establishment. How many times do we have to tell successive ministers of health and welfare this? We have documented it and documented it to the extent that I will not document it again tonight.

Canada is spending per capita a good deal less on medical research than the U.K. and the United States are spending. Of all the false economies—and now I address myself to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It is Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Grafftey: Winnipeg North. The hon. member criticized us for criticizing the minister's position, and now like us he is going to vote against this proposition.

Miss Bégin: How do you vote on it?

Mr. Grafftey: If the minister thinks we will support her lunacy in this bill, she will be sadly disillusioned. I am sure the hon. minister is not really angry at us; she is probably angry at her own colleagues. If the hon. minister could relax and take off her partisan hat, she could tell us that she is a lot more annoyed with her own colleagues than she is with us. By cutting back on medical research the hon. lady is helping to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. How often—and I will repeat this as often as it takes for the minister to get a feeling for the proposition—have we been told the excellence of our whole delivery system of health care at the community level and the excellence of our teaching in medical schools depends on a well integrated and well financed research establishment here in Canada?

The minister might convince herself for partisan reasons that it does not matter much. However, she will not convince those on this side that this short-term cutback, apart from its humanitarian folly, is not going to cost the Canadian taxpayer in the long run millions and millions of wasted dollars. It is incredible that a government can find millions of dollars to buy Nordair, and can satisfy its quasi-doctrinaire propensities and go out and buy Pacific Petroleums—

An hon. Member: It hasn't yet.

Mr. Grafftey: Well, it is on the way.

Mr. Andres: Stick to the bill.

Mr. Grafftey: The government is going into debt for about $1 billion to buy Pacific Petroleums and Nordair. That will not create one job in this country. It is supported by its socialist friends. It can somehow find over a billion dollars of indebtedness to satisfy its quasi-doctrinaire propensities by buying out oil companies and airlines. What else does it do? It cuts back on medical research.

Miss Bégin: Come on!

Mr. Grafftey: The minister is so blindly partisan she just sits and groans. Can she deny what I said? The government is cutting back on medical research and the health resources fund, something in which my socialist friends to my left would be interested. Simultaneously, this government finds the money to buy Pacific Petroleums and Nordair.

I hope before this debate ends that the minister can convince us that, if she has not already done so, she will take her case to Treasury Board and do a little rethinking. I will bet my bottom dollar that she really has not pleaded the case with Treasury Board. With the way this government has balled things up, the minister would not have had a chance to plead the case. I am sure it was done unilaterally without her knowledge. We in the official opposition would like to think that before this debate is over the hon. lady will do a bit of reconsidering.

As I said at the outset of the debate, our position on restraint is very clear; we are being selective.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: You know where we stand on this issue.

Mr. Breau: We want to hear it again.

Mr. Grafftey: You were not in the House when our critic made his lead speech this afternoon. It was made abundantly clear.

An hon. Member: We would like to hear it again.

Mr. Grafftey: I am sure you would. I am not sure the minister would like to be closeted for very long with the leading minds of the medical health care scientific community whom this government is letting down.

What I have tried to put forward today is the historical fact of this government bringing in medicare and hospital insurance, supported in substance by members on this side. The vote is very clear. We in the federal authority imposed this on the provinces. I remember the debates. I hope members opposite remember them.

Intrinsic in the whole matter of the health resources fund was that it was incumbent upon us to work in a long-term way with the provinces. We were to make ready the plan, the personnel and update the scientific community to ensure that we were not just voting into people's pockets income supplementation for services and personnel that were not there.

It was a 15-year plan. Five hundred million dollars was voted. Because it was a non-statutory item, the finance minister of the day, aided and abetted by Treasury Board, even before the plan got off the drawing board in the sixties cut back. Today we are doing the same thing. The government may be penny wise, but they are pound foolish in this regard.

I ask members opposite not to automatically vote with the minister on this. Study what the health resources fund is all about. If they do that in clear conscience, they will not support this government. This will just lead to chaos. What is it doing to federal-provincial relations? How can a provincial health and welfare minister set out long-term goals in terms of putting paramedical people in place and in terms of community hospital planning? What should a provincial authority, with its plant ready to go, do when all of a sudden, out of the blue, without any warning it is unilaterally cut off by a federal government that has mismanaged the economy and wasted money?

This government has been the most wasteful administration since confederation. It has brought this country to its economic knees with its waste. What does it do in a crisis? It cuts back on health resources. I say to members opposite that if they support the hon. lady in this folly, it will be another nail in their coffin at the time of the next election.

Before a vote is taken on this measure, I plead with backbenchers opposite to be a little less jocular and to do a little research on the raison d'être of the health resources fund in terms of what it was meant to do, not only with regard to putting the plant and personnel together but in terms of control and cost. I will then be very surprised if they do not join with us on this side of the House in voting down the absolutely iniquitous measure proposed by the hon. lady today.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have something to say to my colleague the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey).

[English]

The item under discussion today is the health resources fund. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) says that we should research all of the data so that we can make an intelligent decision. I propose to put before hon. members some of the facts which I believe will be helpful in making up their minds as to how they should vote on this particular bill. When the debate is over, if these facts do not agree I ask them to bring them up for debate so that we can look at them. Indeed, I have done my research on this bill.

In order better to understand the proposed amendment before us, I will refer to other programs having significant linkages to it in the past and currently. In the postwar period, significant impetus was given to the improvement of health care and services with the introduction in 1948 of the federal general health grants program to which the hon. member referred early in his speech. These grants had been referred to and described as "fundamental prerequisites of a nation-wide system of health insurance". This meant that the whole nation was going to be covered as equally as possible in a health scheme so that all Canadian citizens would have the best care and protection we could provide as a nation.

The objective has not changed. This bill will not be detrimental to the original concept of 1948. These grants provided financial support to the provinces for the development and expansion of public health services intended to prevent illness and disability, as well as to control tuberculosis, polio, measles and other communicable diseases; for the detection and early treatment of mental illness; for the improvement of health services for mothers and children; for the early detection and treatment of cancer; for the rehabilitation of the disabled; and finally, for research into problem areas. This is what we have been doing and what we are doing today. This work will in no way be detrimentally affected because of the bill before us.

These grants also contributed to provincial health surveys of health services and resources, to the development of a standard accounting and reporting system for Canadian hospitals, and to improvements in diagnostic services. Through the hospital construction grant of 1948-1970, contributions in the amount of over $44 million were made to the provinces for the construction and upgrading of hospital and health facilities on the basis of $1,000 for each active treatment bed or its equivalent in diagnostic service areas, and $1,500 for each chronic or convalescent bed. Hon. members on the other side want to call this waste. I suggest it is not waste but a good investment for the benefit of all across Canada.

This grant assisted with costs of constructing space for more than 130,000 beds in active treatment, chronic convalescent, tuberculosis and mental hospitals; for more than 16,000 bassinets in newborn nurseries; for 24,300 beds in nurses' residences; for 900 beds in interns' residences; and for more than 8,300,000 square feet of floor areas for various hospital services available to both in patients and out-patients. Although not large in terms of the total cost of hospital construction, the grant provided an incentive which to no small degree assisted in providing new hospital beds and modernizing existing hospital buildings to meet the hospital bed deficit of 1948, the needs of a rapidly growing population in the 1950s and the increasing demand for hospital care following the introduction of hospital insurance in 1957-58.

The second step occurred in 1958, ten years later, with the implementation of the hospital insurance and diagnostic services program, under which the federal government shared in about half of the cost of provincial hospital insurance plans, which, of course, had to meet the minimum criteria of federal legislation.

With this implementation virtually all residents of Canada received more or less free hospital care, but given the inadequate level of private medical insurance coverage, there developed an incentive for both the doctor and the patient to use the hospital wherever possible. Canada had nearly seven insured hospital beds of various types per thousand of population throughout the sixties compared with approximately five per thousand in the United States; and, of course, with our program Canadians have greater financial access to those beds than the average citizen does in the United States.

So much for comparisons we always want to make with our neighbours to the south. So much for saying we are always the poor cousins. I suggest that the health care delivery system in Canada is second to none, not only on the North American continent, but the whole world over. As a matter of fact, Senator Kennedy is coming up here to get witnesses to testify before the United States senate committee, because he wants to implement a scheme there which is a good as ours. Here in Canada it is about time we told everybody how pleased we are with the things that we have, rather than always complaining about the things we do not have.

The net result was exactly what one would predict. Hospitals were used more. While admission rates per thousand are about the same as in the United States—between 162.1 and 162.3 in 1964—the days of short-term hospital care are greater in number in Canada than in the United States—1,547, compared to 1,318 in 1974. In Canada, the average length of stay was approximately one and a half days greater—9.7 as compared with approximately 7.9 in the U.S. However, many short-term Canadian hospitals have long-term units, and if these are excluded, the Canadian figure becomes 1,389 days per 1,000 of population which is much closer to the U.S. figure.

During most of the 1960s, with this demand for the use of hospital beds, hospitals continued to be built in that time. We had the great hospital boom. Consequently, about 85 per cent of Canadian hospital beds are relatively modern and good for many years. When there are too many general hospital beds, regardless of the sophistication of budget review techniques, costs are difficult to control, especially when the supply is out of balance with care requirements. Many acute general hospitals cannot readily be converted to alternative uses, which would reduce the acute bed-population ratio more quickly.

In the Department of Veterans Affairs, many of the veterans presently in hospitals are not necessary acutely ill. They are there for temporary care, for long-term care and for rehabilitation. The veterans affairs department is in agreement with the provincial governments, that these men who served their country so well can be taken care of closer to their own homes and nearer to their friends and their families.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: However, most provinces are trying to lower the active treatment bed-to-population ratio down to something more in the order of four to four and a half beds per thousand of population, from the six or more that most provinces have. A great deal of emphasis is being placed on ambulatory care. In my own riding of St. Catharines in the last four years, we have opened four of these personal nursing homes, which provide personal care for the aged and the chronically ill. In this way we have helped to cut down a great deal the number of people who are using the beds in hospitals, so that those in greater need can get in and be treated properly.

The planning guidelines to cut general hospital beds vary. For example, in Ontario and New Brunswick the goals are set at about four beds per thousand of population in urban areas, and 4.5 beds per thousand of population in rural areas. The goal for Quebec is 3.2 beds per thousand of population, while British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Nova Scotia have set targets of 4.5 beds per thousand of population. Saskatchewan is a little bit higher with a goal of five beds per thousand of population.

It should be noted that in Newfoundland the bed standards depend upon the service performed, two beds per thousands of population, where there is no surgery performed, 2.5 beds where minor surgery is performed, 3.2 beds for regional hospitals and four beds per thousands of population for provincial referral hospitals. These statistics give an over-view of what is going on right across Canada and enable us to compare how Canadians are being treated in hospitals; for example, how they are treated in British Columbia and how they are treated in New Brunswick.

These ratios reflect the practical recognition of several factors, including the current inventory facilities, the range of insured institutional alternatives—that is, special rehabilitation, chronic nursing homes and personal care beds—the extent of ambulatory programs and services, as well as the demographic factors such as age, sex, and distribution of population. Beds are currently being taken out of service through attrition or amalgamation of services, particularly maternity and obstetrical beds, because of the great population decline we have experienced in recent years. This population decline is also reflected in the schools, in the decline in the number of children attending, which in turn causes a decline in the needs of teachers and schools. In my opinion there will be very few new schools or new hospitals built in Canada in the next few years simply because we now have an adequate number of both. The adequate number of hospitals we now have enables us to deliver beds at an adequate level of health care, so that Canadians can be proud of what we have done, what we are doing and what we will be doing in the years ahead.

How is this being done? The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Andres) experienced the closing of a small hospital in his riding about a year ago.

Mr. Corbin: Caused by the Tory government.

Mr. Parent: My colleague from New Brunswick says that it was a Conservative government that caused this. The Conservative government of the province said that restraints had to be carried out and they tell us they restrained selectively. I do not know what that means, but the member for Lincoln made it known that he would not stand for such a thing and subsequently the hospital was reopened. The hon. member knows now that the same level of health care is being delivered in his riding as it was prior to this cutback by a Tory government.

The role of the few general hospitals is being subjected to closer scrutiny than at any time in the past, and rightfully so. By continual review and analysis of actual health care needs, provinces are gradually and proportionately reducing the number of acute care beds and service relative to the population. Not only are we dealing here with healing people who are ill, but we are also dealing with preventive medicine, as touched upon earlier by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

In the field of preventive medicine, Canada has made great strides. Recent unofficial figures for 1975 and 1976 show that the acute bed supply in Canada has decreased in absolute and relative terms from 128,000 in 1974 to 122,300 in 1976, or from 5.7 beds to 5.3 beds per thousand of population. The number of public hospitals in the last ten years has increased only slightly. The number of beds in public hospitals were 151,719 in 1975. With a beds-per-thousand ratio of 6.6, including chronic, acute and convalescent beds, this has doubled the number of beds which existed some 25 years ago when the ratio was five.

I would like to deal briefly with the hospital insurance program, and also the utilization review. One of the most important spin-off benefits accruing from the hospital insurance program has been the tremendous bulk of statistics and data which can be used for planning and evaluation. The federal government has played a major role in standardization across the country of this data base. It has provided expertise for the provinces to set up a comprehensive data gathering and analysis system and the majority of provinces now have, because of this government, sophisticated computer application of these statistics. With this information they can measure themselves against any other province or city in Canada and determine whether they are delivering the health care which Canadians deserve.

Several volumes of hospital statistics for use by the hospital industry or other interested parties are now published on a regular basis yearly. At the hospital level the data are used for local administrative and planning purposes. At the provincial level the data are used, among other things, to make comparisons of the activities of similar hospitals, to assess the kinds of care, to estimate future costs for program planning, for research, evaluation, interpretation and ongoing administrative control.

The hon. minister at all times uses this data before she makes any decision like this for program planning and research. I would point out that in the field of research we provided in the last budget a great many incentives which will be good not only for our own citizens, but which can be used for the betterment of health care delivery for the citizens of the world. Canada was the country where insulin was discovered, which today is the greatest controller of diabetes, once considered a killer disease. It is now under control because of research that went on in Canada.

As I was saying, these data are also used, for example, as a control on utilization. Most provinces require long stay reports to be submitted on in-patients occupying a bed for longer than a specified period of time, generally between 15 to 30 days. Sophisticated computer programs have been devised in some provinces to compare the utilization of services in comparably sized hospitals. Again I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is very good because then you can see that your costs and your delivery system in a particular area are equal to those in another area, and if you are delivering not only quantity—which is what the hon. member on the other side was referring to—but quality in health care, with which we are involved here, it is quality which will not be compromised. This government would not think of compromising the quality of health care.

• (2142)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I thought you were finished.

Mr. Parent: The hon. member wishes I had finished my comments. That is only because I am pointing out the good things while they on the other side are used to hearing gloom and doom. When anyone tells them the way things are, they clap two or three times and retire behind the curtains. Sometimes they are told to clap and wear blue suits.

Studies on the pattern of the flow of patients, particularly in respect of hospitalization, make facility planning and reorganization of services a more meaningful exercise. This is largely possible because of the wealth of data on patients and services which is being assembled continuously on computer tapes. All aspects of provincial health care, including hospital utilization, medical care utilization and supporting social programs, can be examined in the light of data now being acquired and put on computer tapes. These studies provide valuable information on the incidence of specific surgical procedures in relation to the age and sex composition of the beneficiaries, as well as data on the location and provision of service.

As a result, special committees are set up to determine whether the procedures are in fact necessary and, if so, whether they are carried out with the requisite quality considerations. For example, the rate of hysterectomies or tonsillectomies varies considerably between communities in relation to proximity to academic centres—

An hon. Member: One more time.

Mr. Parent: Hon. gentlemen opposite wonder why I am laughing. It is because of some of the remarks that were made by hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), the same hon. member who had the temerity today to table his football sweater. I am not sure of the number on the sweater. However, I do not want to get away from the subject. But this is why I laughed. I did not wish to be too serious about this. Now let me return to the more important things which we are here to discuss.

The cost of laboratory services for hospitalized patients and for ambulatory patients in government institutions, in hospitals or in private laboratories, can be obtained, analysed and evaluated.

An hon. Member: Don't you wish you had a sweater to table!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Parent: This brings me to the subject of utilization under the hospital insurance program. Utilization of Canadian hospitals, measured by per capita admissions, patient days and length of stay, historically has been higher than in the United States—there is no argument there. This was true for the period prior to the introduction of hospital insurance. On the whole, the margins were sustained during the 1958 to 1972 period. In more recent years, the differential between U.S. and Canadian hospital admissions has been narrowing and, in my opinion, will continue to do so. Canada's per capita admission rate is on the decline while the U.S. rate continues to increase.

With recent curtailments in the acute bed supply, per capita admissions are expected to decline further.

The number of hospital admissions per 1,000 population increased during the 1960s but since then has stabilized or has tended to decline. Patient days per 1,000 of population followed a similar pattern, and in fact have declined more markedly in the 1970s. The average length of stay, which has increased up to 1968 and 1969, has since tended to become progressively shorter and now seems to have stabilized below the 1961 level.

Now I should like to deal with what is probably one of the more important aspects of this bill, namely the quality of care under the hospital insurance program. As viewed by the Hall commission, quality——depends primarily on the supply, availability, knowledge, skill and dedication of professionally qualified personnel, secondly on the facilities at their disposal, and thirdly, on the organization services.

The quality of health care in Canada, as measured by these standards, has certainly been improved as a direct consequence of the health insurance program and related programs such as the health resources fund and professional training grants.

The supply of suitably qualified and trained health manpower increased significantly in the early stages of the hospital insurance program, with the funding available to teaching facilities and hospital nursing schools under the program, as well as the increased employment opportunities during the initial period of growth. Under the legislation, provinces were required to make arrangements so as to ensure that adequate standards were maintained in hospitals, including licensing and inspection. What good is it if you set up standards in hospitals, but you have no way of finding out what the quality of standards is in those hospitals?

The tradition of voluntary accreditation has been maintained in Canada through the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation which regularly surveys hospitals and related facilities and whose activities closely parallel those of the American Council on Hospital Accreditation. The accreditation program is actually financially supported by the provinces which recognize surveyor fees as an eligible cost.

All provincial hospital insurance plans have provisions for peer review for hospital care, that is, tissue committees, utilization, and length of stay committees. Peer review mechanisms also exist under the provincial medical care insurance plans in respect of services claimed by medical practitioners for in-patient, out-patient and non-hospital care.

While the approach and application of peer review procedures vary somewhat from province to province, the fact that collated utilization data are available in respect of virtually the total population of each province, contributes to more meaningful peer review. Generally speaking, each provincial plan requires standardized record and accounting procedures, including claims for the services of medical practitioners, so that a fair degree of interprovincial standardization has evolved in these matters.

[Mr. Parent.]

The organization of health services likewise has been influenced by the programs, especially after the implementation of the Medical Care Act which set the stage for more integrated planning and operation of health care facilities and services. Progressive patient care, unimpeded by financial barriers, became much more feasible, as did regionalization of health services once basic diagnostic and therapeutic services—that is, hospital in-patient, out-patient, physician care, public and private laboratory, radiology, etc.—became insured. So it would be wrong to suggest that health care would in any way be diminished or jeopardized.

The minister has discussed this bill with us in caucus many times. There have been innumerable committees from which she has gleaned information from her colleagues in the House. I am sure the hon. minister, as so many of us, welcomed the interventions of hon. members opposite; but instead of forever putting before us the negative aspect of things, perhaps they could point out some of the good things which have been done and are being done for Canadians.

In no small part these are due to the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has gone to great pains to see to it that not only the quantity of care is being maintained as much as possible in this time of restraint, but that the quality with which patients are treated in hospitals in no way can be affected detrimentally.

In the long run, the bill will be beneficial to all Canadian citizens. Also it will be beneficial in the short run, in times of restraint. I urge hon. members to vote for the bill now that some facts have been put before them, now they can judge for themselves and see the good things we are attempting to do in order to provide the health care which has existed in the past and will continue in the years ahead.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest and some measure of consternation to the words of the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent). I am reminded of a speech which was given to a group of uneducated people in the southern United States during a political campaign a number of years ago. The speaker was attempting to bring about the defeat of the other candidate and he said, "You know that this man who seeks to represent you is a pragmatist. Worse still, he graduated summa cum laude, and when he got to university, he was a Phi Beta Kappa". He threw these words at the audience and astounded them to the extent that they thought the other candidate was some kind of a creature from Mars. By his choice of words and the inflection in his voice, he confounded and confused his audience and they bought what he said.

This is the type of game the hon. member for St. Catharines is attempting to play. I cannot speak for his side, but I can for mine. The educational level on my side is such that we are not prepared to grab that kind of garbage. The hon. member did not say that it was his government which was responsible for the discovery of insulin and for the support of the discoverers of insulin, but he implied it by the tone and inflection of his voice. Then he went on to poke fun at the Conservative whip. He was not really poking fun at the Conservative whip. He was attempting to cover up what he thought was something humorous, because he does not know the difference between a tonsillectomy and a hysterectomy. I would be pleased to demonstrate that to him at any time.

I saw the man launch into full flight. He said, "How blessed we are". He sounded like Oral Roberts. According to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the enemies of the government are opposition members and the press. Do the enemies and the people of Canada consider that they are blessed by the government? They are not; they are cursed by the government. They will find out just how cursed they are when the government has the guts to pull the pin and call an election.

I listened to the astute observations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). He is capable and quite facile at distortion. He likes to pick at things, and he picked today. He talked about the Tories preaching restraint on the one hand, and wanting to bring in the program in its full bloom on the other. He spoke out of both sides of his mouth. He knows full well that there are programs of value which must be continued. Certainly the Auditor General described the programs and policies of waste which can be removed.

The other evening I had the opportunity to watch television at which time the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) was being interviewed. I could not help thinking then that for perhaps the first time in a long while we have a dedicated and sincere minister, and I have not changed my views in that regard. Frankly, if the minister could have her own way she would not contemplate for a minute the kind of bill which she introduced. The minister has a better appreciation of the social needs in Canada than that.

The Prime Minister went to Bonn, and he sailed the lake with his counterpart in West Germany. He went to Morocco, twiddled his toes in the sand and suffered a fit of sunstroke. In that blush of sunstroke, he returned to Canada and went on national television. He confused Canadians and confounded his cabinet. After it was all over and the debris had settled, we have the benefits which supposedly are being reaped by Canadians because of so-called restraint. The big free spenders suddenly realized the error of their ways. But they have cut holus-bolus. They have amputated without consultation with the patient, without the benefit of anaesthetic. I suppose I do not have to ask the classic question: How can the minister in conscience implement this bill without first consulting with the provinces? But I would be astounded if the government did anything else.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the late show, can an hon. member opposite tell us which comes first tomorrow as between Bill C-2 and Bill C-10?

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, we shall continue with the consideration of Bill C-2 and then proceed to Bill C-10.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FORESTRY—DECISION NOT TO CLOSE PETAWAWA RESEARCH STATION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, on November 14 and on other occasions the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand), in reply to questions concerning the amalgamation of the Forest Management Institute and the Forest Fire Research Institute in Ottawa with the Petawawa Forest Research Institute, indicated that the proposed amalgamation would result in considerable savings in administrative costs, and in his words would be good for forest services in general. He failed to say what it would cost in human terms, and said even less in terms of the loss of benefit to the forest industry in Canada.

I should like to put the picture into perspective. The minister spoke about the federal research arm of the industry which contributes approximately $6 billion to Canada's favourable balance of trade. This is part of the federal research arm of the industry which contributes something like $1 billion to the federal treasury and another $500 million to provincial treasuries. What are they slicing off? They are slicing $5.3 million from the budget.

What does the Canadian forestry service research cost in all? What does it cost when you consider the contribution it makes to the Canadian economy? I have made a rough calculation and it is something of the order of three-quarters of 1 per cent of the contribution to the export trade balance alone. I have made an attempt to find the figures in respect of federal contribution toward forestry research as a percentage of what the Canadian forest industry makes to the Canadian economy as a whole in terms of forest products, lumber, paper and employment, and I would suggest that the contribution there in those terms would be something of the order of .00 per cent.

Under this government, with the decrees after dark on August 1 on the road back from Bonn about which we heard just a few minutes ago, the Canadian forestry service finds itself in trouble, whatever the minister says. Why is the minister not prepared to wait, before following through with these cuts announced in August, until he has had the advice which he has sought, and which was due in June, from the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers, or until a task force has been put together to come up with recommendations on the future of the Canadian forestry service?

The minister has responded to other questions on the future of the Canadian forestry service and has allowed it to be believed that the Canadian forestry service is in good shape and will have no trouble whatever surviving the cuts that will be imposed on it. Does the minister know that he is in danger of losing the director of the institute, one of the senior scientists, the entire professional staff of the forest appraisal and remote sensor programs, all experts in fields in which Canada has led the world for 50 years, as well as some of the best technical support staff? Is this a service that is in good shape and will be in good shape after these cuts take place?

The minister has also led us to believe by his replies that the privatization scheme which he has in mind, and about which he is not at all clear—because he talked about Crown corporations on the one hand, and then he dropped that and talked about privatization—has been warmly received by the forest industry. That is what he has led us to believe.

In support of that claim the minister has stated that the chief executive officer of Crown Zellerbach, Mr. Rogers, and chairman of the Canadian Forestry Advisory Council, indicated his support for the proposal for privatization, and particularly in respect of the proposals for the forest products laboratories in the west and in the east. The truth of the matter is that the industry is not so warmly supportive of this notion as the minister would lead us to believe.

What the forest industry has done, in fact, through the Canadian Forestry Advisory Council, which incidentally had not met for three years until brought together in a panic by the minister about a month or two months ago in order to get some advice on this problem, was ask for bridging funds and for a bridging time so that the labs could be properly worked into the system. They could not accept April 1 as a date that is meaningful in terms of closing down, as has been proposed, or privatization.

I am sure when the parliamentary secretary replies he will ask where else the cuts could be made, and that is a most important question. I have suggested there are nodes of interface between the policy end of the operation by the government and the sharp end of implementation in the field. There are too many of these intervening nodes of administrative interface—that is the buzz word these days, as euphemism for roadblocks—between the government and the field operations. The Department of Supply and Services has to be brought in to negotiate contracts. The Auditor General recently warned us what that means in terms of cost and overruns.

There is a plethora of regional offices which have not been operational but which have been asked to recommend cuts.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

The minister said he has been advised by his officials but those officials are in the administrative field, not in the research field, and so do not know the value of the work being done. The administrative section is obviously not making recommendations for cuts in their own functions but have recommended cuts in the laboratories and the research stations.

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it has become apparent to me in the last little while that members of the House, and more particularly the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), are now fully realizing the importance of the forestry industry to Canada. Canada has always been known as a forest nation, and with the vast resources of its many provinces that will not change. In recent years there has been much diversification and industrialization in the forests, but that has really only gone to prove one thing—its limitless potential for the continued well-being of Canada.

One of the areas that has received more attention in the past few years is tree improvement and the intensification of forest management in general. Research has done wonders in the forestry industry, not only for the processing but more particularly as it relates to tree species and genetics. As a result of genetics, some of the new species can produce up to 50 per cent more wood than the older species in a given period of time. That is only a beginning and improvement in genetics will result in improvement in wood production.

This tree improvement research constitutes a major element of the Canadian forestry service research program. It is very important for the hon. member to fully realize and understand that the Canadian forestry service is much more than and plays a much larger role than mere research. It is responsible for the co-ordination of all federal policies which have anything to do with forestry. It must disseminate forestry statistics as they relate to the industry and it is very much involved in international activities and many other functions.

By far the largest part of these non-research activities falls to the headquarters of the Canadian forestry service. These offices are now staffed at the minimum level necessary and I am sure—at least I hope—that the hon. member would not want it to be otherwise.

I want to assure the hon. member that policy and economic studies will play a stronger role in the Canadian forestry service program in years to come. It is very important to keep all this in its proper perspective so that what the consolidation of the programs has meant and will mean to forestry in the future can be fully understood.

The consolidation of the Forest Management Institute and the Forest Fire Research Institute with the Petawawa forest experimental station will result in a strong, broadly based national research program. At the same time, substantial savings can be made in administrative costs. Again I say to the hon. member that I hope he is prepared to support savings and efficiencies as they relate to government spending.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member as his allotted time has expired.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES PUBLISHED BY STATISTICS CANADA—STATUS INDIANS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, recent changes in the unemployment insurance boundaries have combined northern regions of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta into one economic region. As a result the unemployment rate in northern Manitoba, which is the Churchill constituency, has dropped from 26 per cent to 4.6.

As you are no doubt aware, sir, the rate of unemployment in a region determines the length of work time needed to draw benefits and the length of time claimants can draw benefits. The more than 20 per cent drop in the unemployment rate in northern Manitoba means residents will now have to work 14 weeks instead of the former ten weeks required to claim benefits.

Contributing to this reduced unemployment rate is the fact that unemployed status Indians are not taken into account in Statistics Canada labour force figures. My question is: Why are status Indians not included in those statistics? Status Indians are part of the program; they pay into it, and they derive benefits from it. But now, because they are not included in the statistics of the unemployed, the qualifying period for unemployment insurance is longer and the re-entry period is extended to 20 weeks. This is a marked discrimination against Indian people. They are being treated as second class citizens and do not even rate Canada's statistics.

For the two years Canada Works has been in operation, the Churchill riding has received some of the highest grants for all of Canada. It is clear from the Statistics Canada figures used by Canada Works co-ordinators that northern Manitoba has a high percentage of people without work, and there are few jobs available.

Statistics Canada figures state that our labour force is nearly 35,000 in the Churchill constituency and that of these over 9,000 people are unemployed. More than half of the unemployed population, or 5,365, are status Indians. The Department of Indian Affairs puts the number of unemployed status Indians even higher at 7,993.

Regardless of the variations in figures, it is clear estimates exist that are at least semi-accurate. If the government can pinpoint our need for Canada Works dollars, surely it cannot turn a blind eye to the many status Indians who are unemployed and require unemployment insurance benefits.

The deputy minister of employment and immigration tried to tell me in committee on Wednesday that present survey measures are meaningless in assessing unemployment rates for status Indians on reserves, and that to devise alternate methods would involve substantial time and personnel resources. This is reprehensible. We are talking about people, the first people of Canada, being arbitrarily excluded from a government program to which they contribute, and in effect penalized because they are not part of the damned statistics.

The deputy minister of Indian affairs informed me Thursday there have been no discussions between the two departments of Indian affairs and employment and immigration regarding the present distortion of the unemployment rate of the northern communities. When will this government deem this matter important enough to do something about it?

Will the concerned departments consider accepting figures from the department of Indian affairs for the number of unemployed status Indians on reserves? Or, alternately, will they accept a band council resolution certified by the chief and council as to the number of unemployed?

It is time this government took some action instead of having me run around to the different departments—employment and immigration, Indian affairs, and industry, trade and commerce, which is responsible for Statistics Canada—to change this contradictory and discriminatory policy. I want a firm commitment now that measures will be taken to ensure status Indians are included in the unemployment statistics of Canada.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Unemployment Insurance Act as amended by Bill C-27 requires the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission to use rates of unemployment produced by Statistics Canada for the purpose of determining eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits. Status Indians on reserves are not included in the rates of unemployment produced by Statistics Canada. Therefore, unemployed status Indians on reserves are not included in the rate of unemployment for the 48 regions.

As the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) has noted in committee, this is a problem with the unemployment rate provided by Statistics Canada, especially in northern Canada. Officials of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission have been and will continue to be in contact with Statistics Canada to determine what can be done to rectify this situation.

I think it is fair to add that, based on official discussions held so far, it would not be an easy matter to adapt the traditional labour force survey to the particular conditions on reserves in which concepts of labour force employment and unemployment are different from those concepts when applied to the vast majority of the working population in urban centres. Indeed our advice from the bureau is that considerable time and resources would be required to come to grips effectively with the problem.

Nevertheless, we realize it is important that something be done, and we are therefore proposing to contact immediately the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to determine what action they, the bureau, and the commission might take to produce acceptable measures of unemployment statistics for status Indians on reserves, and gradually improve these over the years.

Hon. members will, of course, be aware that in the allocation of funds for the Canada Works program, labour surplus rates are calculated for Indians on reserves. These, we have to admit, are rough and ready estimates and are not produced by Statistics Canada. As a result, they could not be used for the purposes of the unemployment insurance program. Thus, it will be important for us to pursue immediately the course of action which I have outlined, that is to say, co-operative discussions between the commission, the bureau and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to determine the most practical and acceptable means of resolving the problem.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—FEASIBILITY STUDY ON COAL MINE IN DONKIN, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, further to my questions of November 15 when the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) was unavoidably absent, I should like to have the answers from his parliamentary secretary this evening.

Since the first phase of the feasibility study on the Donkin Mine has been finished, would it be possible to get a 12 to 20 page summary for myself and other interested members from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion standing committee? I realize that the report would be more than one volume and would be technical in detail, but I would be very interested in getting a résumé.

As I indicated in my questions, the more important second phase that involves the economic feasibility of the prospects for the new mine should be soon ready. It was indicated to me by a top Devco official last August that they expect the second phase to be finished by March or April before it goes to the Treasury Board. Can the parliamentary secretary to the minister confirm this or give us a more accurate date for when this second phase of the study will be finished?

This, of course, involves, among other things, whether the decision is going to be to build a mine that will have an annual production of a million, two million or four million productive capacity. It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that this is extremely important to an area with such high unemployment.

The employment selection officer for the Cape Breton Development Corporation informed me that as of October 1, 1978 there are 1,850 applications from Glace Bay for general employment in Devco. There are another 2,000 from New Waterford. The total for the whole of the Cape Breton area was estimated as of October 1 to be 4,900.

One can see how critical this mine at Donkin is to the future of the area from an employment point of view; it would have spin-off effects which would make for at least another 1.5 jobs per worker in the rest of that economy. It also indicates the prime need to go ahead with the modernization of the Sydney Steel plant so as to avoid even more desperate levels of unemployment in the area. Similarly, it becomes urgent to press on with the operations in Prince Mine to meet the employment objectives which were mentioned when the mine was first started.

[Mr. Maine.]

I referred to the steel industry in my remarks tonight because the future of the biggest employer in the Glace Bay area, mine No. 26 with its low sulphur and premium coking coal qualities, depends in part for its success on the Sydney Steel operation. One of the major concerns I heard expressed recently during my visit to the constituency is that the coal cleaning plant so vital to a reconstructed coal industry is still experiencing serious production problems.

I am told that in the last month there have been vast improvements in the operation of the plant, but as I mentioned in my question there are rumours that, because of its over-all failure to fulfil the expected potential, we may not be able to fill some of the coking coal requirements contracted for with such users of coke and coal as the Steel Company of Canada and Dofasco. If there is any truth to this it could be a serious blow to our prospects, because everyone with a knowledge of the industry knows that there is on average a $10 per ton premium at least for coking coal as against coal for use in generating thermal power. The prepared blends of coal from No. 26 with lingan coal make for an excellent metallurgical coking coal.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to provide answers to these questions which are bothering me.

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to reply to the hon. member; I only hope I shall have time in which to fully answer his questions.

The Donkin Mine feasibility study was originally scheduled to be carried out in two stages. Phase one was scheduled to begin in May 1978 with a report which would compare the economics of several project configurations using cost estimates and assumptions regarding marketability and the like. If phase one gave indications that the mine would be financially viable, phase two would be undertaken to provide definitive cost and performance figures which would be presented to the Government of Canada with a request for the necessary funds to develop the mine.

Unfortunately, it was not possible to prepare the phase one report by October 6 because of delays in getting information from the offshore bore holes and the seismic surveys, information which was necessary to determine the size, extent and quality of the coal seams which would be mined during the next 30 years or so.

On October 11, 1978, a preliminary verbal report was presented to Devco management. This was followed on November 20 by a second verbal report which showed that several mine layouts would be economically viable. The report also indicated there were additional possible mine layouts which should also be studied to determine which would provide the greatest economic benefit.

In view of the delays experienced to date and the importance of maintaining the final date of February 28, 1979, the date by which phase two was to be completed, it was decided to dispense with the preparation of a formal report marking the end of phase one and to proceed directly with the work required to complete phase two. This work is presently being done and the study is now on schedule.

The Cape Breton Development Corporation has not presented the first phase of the feasibility study to the minister. Verbal discussions were held with Devco management. The study is scheduled to be completed by the end of February, 1979.

Our metallurgical coal production has grown from approximately 417,000 tons in 1976 to 1.2 million tons in 1977. At the present time our production rate is running about 1.5 million tons. In the current year production rates have continued to improve, and had it not been for a short strike and operating difficulties in the early part of 1977, the full deliveries of coal would have been supplied to our Great Lakes customers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has gone beyond his allotted time and I must interrupt him.

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS BY BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of urgency related to the Canadian Wheat Board's intention to purchase grain cars.

The president of Palliser Wheat Growers Association says, "The current lack of grain movement off the prairies is not a railroad problem. The railroads are presently booked at only 50 per cent to 60 per cent of capacity to Thunder Bay, and only 40 per cent to 50 per cent of capacity to Vancouver" and, further, states, "Neither cars nor motive power are the problem"—when it comes to moving grain for export.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the Minister of Transport, in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, release figures on which the decision was made by him or by the Wheat Board to establish there is a requirement for that board to spend hard-earned farmers' funds to buy hopper cars, because there appears to be some question as to need at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

WORKING CONDITIONS OF NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES PATROL VESSELS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Newfoundlanders who man the four fisheries patrol vessels operating from the province are discriminated against, since they must work three, four and sometimes more weeks at sea with only an assurance of three weeks' holidays each year, while crews operating out of Nova Scotia have two weeks on duty and then two weeks off, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Fisheries cease treating his Newfoundland seamen, the finest in the world, as galley slaves and treat them as if they sailed from mainland ports, with the same rates of pay and working hours and conditions as Canadians, while they patrol from outside the Arctic Circle throughout the North Atlantic waters and that man-years be authorized for the additional crew needed.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate can be done at this time, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF CONSUMERS AGAINST EXCESS PROFITEERING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the report yesterday by the government's new watchdog agency, the CSIP, which blamed spiralling food costs on increased profits, up 63 per cent between the first and third quarters of this year, per unit of output—a much greater rate than unit labour costs—and in view of the fact that consumers are still bearing the burden of inflation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to dismiss as unfair and unworkable the reimposition of wage controls, and ask him instead to instruct his Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to take concrete action to protect consumers against unwarranted profit-taking, as clearly Ontario's minister of consumer and commercial relations is not prepared to act to help consumers, having instead suggested only that consumers not buy products such as turkey where profits are unnecessarily high.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS BY BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the alarming precedent, condoned by the government, of the tender by the Canadian Wheat Board for hopper cars at the expense of the western grain producer, thereby opening the way for the requirement of primary agricultural producers and other natural resource producers to supply their own rolling-stock, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That this House reject the policy of this government to extend the user-pay policy to a policy of producer-pay.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF NATIVE PEOPLES IN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek the unanimous consent of this House. In view of the harsh economic conditions suffered by the many Indian people of this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be included in the new super ministry responsible for economic development in Canada, to ensure native peoples' concerns are represented in the over-all economic development of this country.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED EXPLORATORY DRILLING IN N.W.T.—DETRIMENTAL EFFECT ON ENVIRONMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that four organizations—Canadian Arctic Resources Committee, Canadian Nature Federation, Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, and the Canadian Wildlife Federation—have raised serious objections to the procedures followed by the federal Environmental Assessment Review Panel which is currently reviewing a proposal for exploratory drilling by Norlands Petroleum Ltd. in the Lancaster Sound region of the Northwest Territories, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

● (1412)

That the Minister of the Environment investigate these charges outlined in a letter sent to him on November 23, 1978, by the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee, and state that the hearings which begin today in Pond Inlet, N.W.T., will be conducted in a manner that is fair to all parties involved.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

LAND REGISTRY SERVICE PROGRAM IN MARITIMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of an important and pressing nature to seek unanimous consent to put a motion before the House.

As there is considerable concern in the maritime region, as expressed by the Council of Maritime Premiers, the Public Service Alliance, numerous real estate boards, the New Brunswick Association of Professional Engineers and other responsible groups interested in promoting the maritime region, over the apparent decision of the ministry of DREE to withdraw its financial support of the land registry service just entering its second five-year option, and as this very valuable work provided by the public sector has progressed extremely well to date and is vital to the successful completion of a visionary program made possible by the joint co-operation of the federal and provincial governments of the region, and as the program provides employment for well over 200 people, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. Crosby):

That this House does forthwith instruct the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion to review the decision to discontinue his department's support for the land registry service program and continue to support this program which is so vital to the development of the land resources of the entire maritime region.

Mr. Speaker: Before the motion can be presented to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43, unanimous consent is required. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EXCESSIVE PROFITS IN FOOD INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my motion arises out of the study which was issued today by the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, which states that in the last 18 months, profits by food companies have increased by some 63 per cent, much faster than labour cost inputs. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House ask the government to instruct the corporations involved to roll back those food prices which have been artificially inflated by excessive profits in the food industry.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to this motion being presented under the terms of Standing Order 43?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CONSULTATION WITH UNIONS ON COLLECTIVE BARGAINING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the terms of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity affecting the Public Service of Canada.

The public service has been in a state of turmoil and depression since the presentation of the measures contained in Bill C-28 and because of the failure of the past president of the treasury board to consult with the bargaining agents for the public service on changes in the laws affecting public servants. Since the new President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) has now declared his intention to respect the concerns of the public servants of Canada, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare):

That the government direct the President of the Treasury Board to convene immediately a meeting with the officers of the Public Service Alliance and other bargaining agents for the public service for the purpose of establishing a consultative process to consider proposed changes in the laws affecting public servants and any amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act relating to collective bargaining.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, unanimous consent of the House is required before the motion can be presented. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS BY BOARD—CONSULTATION WITH RAILWAYS

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. There are presently some 360,000 tons of grain in transit to the west. That represents about 5,000 grain cars: many of them are only two-thirds full. Some were 1,000 bushels short because they were misdirected to branch lines which could not carry them.

As Canadian Pacific Railway has declined the government's offer to fix up 1,000 grain cars, saying they were not needed because its grain fleet was sufficient, I should like to ask the minister whether he discussed this proposed purchase by the Wheat Board of up to 2,000 hopper cars with the railways, and whether he is satisfied that these additional cars are really required.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of the number of cars which may be required is a very complicated one having to do, first af all, with the manner of using the cars; how many times, for instance, they are turned around between the prairies and Thunder Bay or the west coast. There can, therefore, be a number of opinions as to the number of cars required.

There is a further question which arises: do you have just enough cars to manage the ordinary heavy movement, or do you have additional cars to manage high peak movement when that is required, even though it be for only a five or six-week period?

The railways, particularly CP, have been arguing that the required number will be available, but I am not at all sure that I agree with their judgment. I reported back to CP and urged them again to enter into a rehabilitation program for 1,000 boxcars. We will be taking that suggestion to CN to see if they will enter into a further agreement with regard to rehabilitation.

The point is that the judgment about how many cars are required is a difficult one. I am satisfied that additional cars will be required in the fairly near future. Whether that will be in six months, 12 months or 18 months is the only question, because of the volume of grain that will be involved. The Wheat Board, obviously, did not want to take the chance of not having those cars so it made a judgment in favour of ordering up to 2,000 cars. I am sure the board will be mindful of the fact that there might ordinarily be an obligation to pay demurrage charges, and additional cars might avoid some of those charges.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, we are well aware that the grain cars in service now average 18 round trips a year. It would seem that better utilization of the fleet is what is required. Producers are afraid that they will be tabbed for $100 million to buy these additional cars and that, in addition, the Crow rate will be raised. Has the minister discussed this purchase with the farm groups of western Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board handles most of the discussions. But I would like to make it very clear, and I am sure hon. members will be interested to know, that the Wheat Board did discuss this matter with producers and, most particularly, with the elected advisory board which is elected by the 11 districts throughout the prairies and which is composed of those chosen by farmers to represent them. My information is that that advisory board, which includes some of the best known spokesmen for agriculture in the west, unanimously supported the decision by the Canadian Wheat Board to order the cars.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my impression is that this has come as a distinct shock to every farm organization in western Canada. There is now a 42-cent per bushel premium, Vancouver over Thunder Bay. We are getting off just over 500 cars a day there. We used to get off 750 cars a day. Has the minister considered appointing a transport controller to get us out of this tangle?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we have appointed co-ordinators at terminals, which has been a very effective step in bringing about far more unloads than was common a few years ago. I am not satisfied that the system is working to its maximum and, as a result, over some of the objections of hon. members opposite we appointed a firm of outstanding management consultants to look at the question of interface between the various parts of the grain handling system. What each part does is important in relation to the turnaround of these cars. Hon. members should remember that in the three years between 1974 and 1977, a very significant increase of up to 34 per cent, in terms of effective carrying capacity of our car fleet, occurred as a result of improvements which were introduced into the system.

LEGAL OPINION ON BOARD'S PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the minister satisfied that the Canadian Wheat Board has the power under the act to purchase hopper cars and to charge the cost to producers? Specifically, has he or the board received a legal opinion from the law officers of the Crown? If so, will he table that opinion? It seems, on the face of it, that the action of the board is neither within the spirit nor the letter of the law.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Canadian Wheat Board did seek and obtain a legal opinion before it took this step. The hon. member may again be painting a false picture when he says that the charges for these cars will be levied against farmers.

[Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek).]

The fact is that any such charging will be done only over a prolonged period of years in terms of the way in which the cost of these cars is incorporated into their ongoing operations.

Second, it should be apparent that any solution as recommended by Mr. Justice Hall and the Hall commission to the problem regarding how grain costs are paid could well include taking over the cost of these cars. As a result of my conversations with the Canadian Wheat Board, I know that the board has this aspect very much in mind. The Wheat Board may just assure that it has the cars, without any real or significant cost to farmers over any period of time.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, despite what the minister has said, the ultimate cost of these cars will be charged back to the producer. Is it the intention of the board, if it proceeds with this purchase, to charge the cost of these cars only to producers of on-board grains, or does it intend also to charge a proportionate share of the cost to those who produce off-board grains and oilseeds?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the board will know that if any charges are made in any way to farmers, it is those farmers in relation to whom the charge is made who will have the advantage of the cars and it is their grain which will be hauled by these cars.

The hon. member ignored all too lightly my statement that as we move toward a solution of the Hall commission recommendation in relation to carrying grain, it seems obvious to me that the cost of these cars will be incorporated in that solution and, therefore, in the end will not be borne by farmers at all. I do not think the hon. member should run away from that very important statement at this time and try to frighten farmers, when the Canadian Wheat Board has made what I think is a very useful decision to ensure that necessary cars are made available to haul grain.

Mr. Neil: Until this time the minister has not paid much attention to the Hall recommendations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: Because of the unprecedented move by the Wheat Board, and because of the opposition that is building up among producers in the farm organizations, is the minister prepared to make himself and officials of his board available as witnesses before the Standing Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows the minister and the Wheat Board are always very happy to appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO CURB HIGH LEVEL OF PROFITEERING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): In the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Considering that according to the report of the Economic Council of Canada which came down yesterday, manufacturing profits were up some 35 per cent in the last nine months—

Mr. Woolliams: Good.

Mr. Broadbent: My Tory friend, reflecting the philosophy of the Tory party, says "Good".

Mr. Woolliams: I like to see profits, don't you?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I always thought if we had profits we would have jobs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to ask the minister, since profits are up and real wages are declining, thus offering proof that we have had wage controls in the last few years but no price controls, whether the minister can tell us, on behalf of the government, what he plans to do about the high level of profiteering which exists in this country right now?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): It is true that the CSIP report to the first ministers does indicate that price increases of food have been due in large part to increased profits and wage developments. I think that if the hon. member reads the report, he will see that wages did increase rather substantially and that moderation came only very recently. But they do blame the increases in the price of food on those two elements.

I must say, however, that I am somewhat perplexed, because the AIB report on profit margins which came out in June presented a different analysis. Since I only received this report today, I am still in the position of examining the details. But I agree with the hon. member that the allegations are serious and should be pursued, and I will report further when I have completed my studies.

Mr. Broadbent: If the minister would read the report with care, he would see that profits "have increased at a significantly faster rate than unit labour costs over the same period". The words which I should like to underline for the minister are "significantly faster".

My first question was not specifically about the food industry, but about manufacturing in general. Profits are up by some 35 per cent, in some sectors by 94 per cent and in others in excess of 47 per cent. I should like to repeat the general question: what does the government have in mind, given the fact that real wages now are declining at the rate of about 2 per cent a year, to stop the profiteering that is going on in the country and affects every Canadian family?

Mr. Allmand: I think we will have to determine with precision whether or not there has been profiteering. It is true that this report indicates that the increase in food prices has been due in part to the great increase in profits, but I want to compare their work with the work of the AIB report to determine where the difference lies; and if action is required, we will look at it.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that this report provides in a pretty clear and graphic way a comparison of food price changes with profit changes and with unit labour cost changes, I think it would not be an excessive challenge, even to this cabinet, to produce a document to show that that evidence is false. Certainly, every Canadian buying food knows the prices are going up.

Would the minister have the heads of the major food companies come to Ottawa and get from them their figures to explain the profiteering? Then, if he is convinced it is taking place, will he take steps to order rollbacks so that this gouging of consumers can be brought to a halt?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have met on a regular basis with the heads of the food industry and other industries in the consumer business. As a matter of fact, this week I met with the manager of the Retail Council of Canada.

The hon. member made a good suggestion. I would be pleased to call them in and have them explain some of these figures.

POSSIBILITY OF DECLARING OUTAOUAIS A DESIGNATED AREA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. To a question put to him on December 14, 1977 by one of my colleagues on the possibility for the Outaouais region in Quebec of being recognized as a designated area, the minister replied in part, and I quote:

> We have considered the possibility of intervening and are now considering it; I trust that within coming weeks, or possibly months, we will be in a position to announce a decision.

As that answer was given in this very House almost a year ago, can the minister tell us what has become of the study asked of his officials? In addition, when does he intend to make the final decision promised such a long time ago?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, for several months now we have been studying the economic situation in the Outaouais region. Part of that area, as we know, is already designated and has already benefited from the programs of our departments, both as provided by the act on direct assistance to industry or the joint assistance of the two levels of government. We have revised those programs over the last few months. We have looked into the designation of that area and what that could give it concretely, as well as other alternatives, such as joint action with the provincial government or with other government levels or other departments in Ottawa. Just a few days ago I received a progress report on those negotiations and I still hope that the best decision can be reached between the various levels of government which were consulted and myself, so that we can come up with what could prove to be the best possible program under the circumstances.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Considering that several in-depth studies on the economic and industrial situation in that area have already been made by the Société d'aménagement de l'Outaouais and by several other agencies which represent that area; considering that the rate of unemployment is continuously increasing compared to the provincial rate and that the rate of industrial growth is the lowest in Quebec, can the minister say whether he is really interested in that file and whether he intends to urge a solution for that area, as he has just said?

Mr. Lessard: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am really interested in that file, and I have been for several months, but I am not the only one who takes an interest in that file; so do hon. members on this side, particularly those who represent the national capital region and the Outaouais area, the hon. members for Hull, Gatineau and Pontiac. We work together to find what would be the best solution for the development of the Outaouais area. So far, however, I am not satisfied that the mere fact of designating the area to make it eligible for industrial grants could meet the needs of the Outaouais area. Such a measure has already been applied to the area and it did not produce the expected effects. We were subjected to hard criticism by some people in the Outaouais area because that program was not considered as sufficient in the face of the difficulties. I do not intend to propose again the designation of the area, if it is the kind of reception we can expect. I would rather establish a concerted plan which will meet not only the needs but also the potential of the Outaouais area.

INVESTIGATION INTO RISING FOOD PRICES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Given the fact that the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, which released its report yesterday or today, has no investigatory powers but has available to it the same sources of information that are available to the minister, namely, the Consumer Price Index, given the fact that the CPI has shown a steady increase in the price of food and that CSIP reacted to these food price increases by saying, "The rapid increase in food prices over last year can be placed on soaring profits for food and beverage manufacturers", what steps is the minister taking within his department to ensure that consumers in Canada are not being ripped off? What ongoing investigations are under way within his department in the area of food prices?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not correct that we have the same capability as CSIP for price monitoring. As a matter of fact, the price monitoring capability for government is now centred in CSIP.

However, we do have the capability of receiving the reports. We have the report that was tabled yesterday and, as I answered an hon. member, I will be giving it very serious consideration and will be attempting to determine why there are differences in this report from the AIB report which was tabled in June, which indicated a smaller and more reasonable profit on the part of industries in the food business. Once these reports are analysed, we will attempt to take some action to help consumers.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the minister does have the power to investigate and I would like to give him a specific area. Last week in this House, in answer to questions put to the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with respect to increases in the price of turkeys, the Minister of Agriculture said that the price increases could not be justified; that there were, in fact, adequate supplies on hand and that producers were only getting a 4 per cent increase, whereas the minister said that prices would be going up because supplies had declined.

Who speaks for the government? What is the minister doing to lay the facts on the floor of the House of Commons and to tell the people of Canada why, for example, turkey prices in this country today are as high as $1.65 a pound. What is the minister doing about that?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is mixing turkeys and prices in general. That is not unusual for him. We do not have a price monitoring unit in our department. The price monitoring unit for the government is now with CSIP, under the Economic Council. I suggest that the hon. member check his facts on that. However, we do have the capability of examining the reports that are presented by the AIB and CSIP and suggesting action to deal with these problems. That has been done in the past and I will do it again.

With respect to turkeys, what I said to the House the other day was that as of November 1 this year we had only 50 million pounds of stock available, whereas last year at the same time there were 72 million pounds of stock. This is a decreased supply, in a situation where demand has increased.

The Turkey Marketing Board has asked for an increase in quotas this year, but they have been turned down by the National Farm Products Marketing Council, which indicates to me that the National Farm Products Marketing Council needs more consumer input.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I only hope that on behalf of the consumers of Canada these two turkeys can get together. We have the Minister of Agriculture, in the House on Friday, telling us there is a surplus on hand of 17 million pounds and that the price increases could not be justified, and now we have the minister of consumer affairs telling us there is actually a shortage of supply. Which minister do we believe: the Minister of Agriculture, who tells us that the producers in this country are not ripping off the consumers, or the minister of consumer affairs who seems to be like a toothless tiger?

AGRICULTURE

REASON FOR LICENSING GRAIN TERMINALS NOT OPERATING AT FULL CAPACITY

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to revert to the matter raised by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and the hon. member for Moose Jaw and direct to the Minister of Agriculture a question that is of particular interest to farmers across this country.

In view of the fact that the Board of Grain Commissioners has the power of licensing grain terminals on the west coast, would the minister consider asking the Board of Grain Commissioners, which comes under his jurisdiction, to meet with the companies having grain terminals on the west coast and asking them to show reason why they should retain their licences for those elevators when they are not operating them seven days a week at a time when the demand on these terminals is tremendous?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all I can say to the hon. member is that I will certainly contact the chairman of the Canadian Grain Commission and talk to him about this. It is the first time this has been brought to my attention.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his interest in this matter, because he has great power at this particular moment.

The second thing I would ask the minister to do is to ask the Board of Grain Commissioners if they will consider giving final export permit licences for barley, based on country elevator standards, so that barley shipments can bypass these terminals and go through the bulk loading facilities on the west coast.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I will consider the request and talk to the Canadian Grain Commission.

AIRPORTS

FOURTH RUNWAY AT TORONTO INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Members will remember that on November 8, I rose in this House and received assurance from the minister that he would not alter his decision not to build a fourth runway at Toronto international airport. I share the concern of the many people in Brampton-Bramalea when they read in the local paper last week that the airport manager said that the runway was necessary and that studies were continuing.

Would the minister reiterate his commitment not to proceed with runway expansion, which would cause further disturbance and annoyance to at least 75,000 people, at the Toronto international airport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret the interpretation put upon a statement made by the Toronto airport manager. I think that in fact he wanted to indicate that additional facilities in the Toronto area would be required in the near future, but that was said in connection with the fact that we were doing some technical studies with regard to the question of a fourth runway.

A couple of weeks ago I tried to explain to the House that these studies were being done in order to have information against any argument that we should go ahead with a fourth runway. I have been impressed with the uneasiness this has caused people who have built in the area where the fourth runway would have an effect on noise levels and who built there based upon the commitment of this government not to build such a major runway to their disadvantage. Accordingly, having concluded that I would find it difficult to ease their concern in any other way, I have today directed that the studies with regard to the fourth runway be stopped immediately.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MICROWAVE OVENS—HEALTH HAZARDS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, on a matter of some importance at this Christmas shopping time of year, and about which I have given the minister notice.

Given the fact that exposure to microwaves is suspected of causing numerous side effects and may, in fact, be a serious health hazard, and since the environmental health directorate of the health protection branch feels there is a definite need for further research on microwaves, can the hon. lady advise the House what steps she has taken to protect Canadians, considering the increasing use of microwave ovens? Are they safe, or not?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the standards for design, construction and functioning of microwave ovens are established under the Radiation Emitting Devices Act. We have issued a pamphlet on the question of microwave ovens, which is updated regularly. Standards are reviewed constantly, according to research results arrived at either in Canada or abroad.

At this point in time, I would like to assure Canadians because, as the hon. member has said, it is Christmas shopping time, there is no reason for concern about any additional, new danger with regard to microwave ovens. I am satisfied that the standards we have issued in the department are sufficient.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware that the Canadian standards allow levels of microwave radiation that are 1,000 times higher than the standards set by the Soviet Union, and that it has been alleged that our standards allow a certain level of emission only because Canadian measuring instruments are not technically proficient enough to measure smaller levels of emission?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that the media in Canada for years has used the U.S.S.R.'s unknown research data to spread the rumour that there are great dangers associated with microwave ovens. However, nobody has ever been able to ascertain what the results of that data from the U.S.S.R. are all about. We know that the National Research Council standards are much more restrictive than those used in other western industrialized countries, including the United States. The National Research Council of Canada recently announced that they are initiating a new study in order to explore the question further.

SAFETY STANDARDS FOR RADIATION FROM ELECTRICAL LINES AND MICROWAVE LINES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question concerning radiation from electrical power lines as well as microwave transmission lines. Can the minister inform the House whether her department has made any progress toward the establishment of safety standards governing radiation from electrical lines and microwave transmission lines?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to have a day to obtain an update on that subject. I will answer the hon. member tomorrow or the day after.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SPUR LINE AT MALTON, ONT.—ENVIRONMENTAL EFFECT ON NEARBY HOMES

Mr. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, of which I have given him notice: it concerns an article in the Globe and Mail today on the planned CNR spur line at Malton which could have serious environmental consequences for area homes.

[Miss Bégin.]

In view of the fact that the CNR did undertake an environmental design study on the project but withheld its findings until work on the spur line had already begun, will the minister ask the CNR to delay further construction until the independent study being financed by the municipality is completed next week? Will the minister instruct the CNR to meet with the Peel regional council to consider possible alternatives which would cause less disruption for the 4,000 people in northern Malton?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take the representation of the hon. member under advisement and consider whether there is any action I should properly take in this regard. I should say, however, in fairness to the CN, that it should be observed that before these houses were located in this particular place, the CNR considered that it was unwise to open up the subdivision for this development because of its operations. It made its view of the problem known at the time, but it was overridden by other decision-making bodies.

Mr. McCrossan: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of State (Environment). The ministry of environment for the province of Ontario recommended in August, 1974, that the CNR rail lines immediately north of Malton be relocated because of the likelihood of increased traffic and the noise levels which prevailed at that time. In 1975, the ministry again criticized the CNR for its failure to provide any public participation program in its study.

Could the minister explain to the House why Environment Canada approved the 1977 environmental design report for the project which provided the authority for the CNR to go ahead, despite the environmental violence the spur line would bring to the citizens living in northern Malton?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, with respect to that particular question, I will take it as notice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

GRAIN

SUGGESTION FEED GRAINS BE UNDER SOLE JURISDICTION OF WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that two commissioners of the board have said that the open market feed grains policy is congesting elevator space and undermining the board's marketing activities, in view of the fact there is enough private enterprise feed grain in Thunder Bay right now to fill the domestic market for the rest of the winter, occupying 15.5 per cent of the space at Thunder Bay at a time when the Wheat Board is short of board stocks, and because there is unrestricted delivery of non-board feed grain which is destroying the equality of the quota system that the western farmers fought so hard to get, will the minister consider recommending to the government and to the Wheat Board that feed grains be put back under the sole jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the current feed grain policy resulted after two years of deliberation by farm organizations which failed to produce any alternative solution to the problem of making sure that producers of animals anywhere in this country would have an equal opportunity to obtain supplies of feed grains at similar prices, plus transportation. In view of that fact, I do not think it is fair to jump at a particular problem in relation to the policy.

We have said that a certain form of quotas, and particularly the assignment of acres, would be a reasonable way of limiting delivery opportunities to the open market. In addition, I have no doubt that this year the fairly wide-open permission to switch grain from one elevator to another led to elevators being congested with what were essentially open market grains, even though technically there was a limit of 20 per cent on the amount of open market grain allowed in any one elevator. The Wheat Board has reacted to that policy by suspending switching; that problem should, therefore, gradually dissipate. I think the question of allowing switching may still be a live one. Perhaps if it is allowed, it could be limited to those cases where there is an actual sale of grain to a producer at the elevator to which the grain is to be switched.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, since the complaint is coming from commissioners of the board, let alone from myself, other hon. members and grain producers, and in view of the fact that the amount of off-board grain so far this year is double that which was delivered last year, which is displaced capacity the Wheat Board could have used to handle export grain, which in turn has meant lower opening Wheat Board quotas which coerce farmers who are short of cash to deliver grain on the open market, even though they get 48 cents per bushel less—as of yesterday's market—for No. 1 feed barley than they would through the board, will the minister instruct the Canadian Wheat Board to start implementing quotas on off-board grain and allow no deliveries until such time as we have sufficient board grain to meet our export requirements?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the problem can only be one of the specific location of the stocks. Hon. members may appreciate that since the off-board market has no access whatsoever to export markets, the amount of feed grain which can be disposed of in that market is to the animals eating it in Canada. That is very limited; it is a very definite amount. If any off-board markets acquire more than that stock, they will have to carry it at their expense and it will be their own lookout in terms of lost profit. The market has its own pricing mechanism to discourage unnecessary or overdelivery of grain.

Surely, the hon. member would agree that we would all want to see western barley and other feed grains supplying the deficit market in eastern and central Canada. As long as that is going to happen, that amount of grain will move and it will have to be in the system to move to that market, regardless of the particular manner of selling grain.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT—DELAY IN SOLVING TAXPAYERS' PROBLEMS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. It relates to an article in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, November 22, which stated that due to a recent reorganization of the minister's department, there would be an increased waiting period to have taxpayers' problems solved.

Would the minister assure this House and Canadian taxpayers that decentralization of government operations outside of the national capital region has not led to inefficiency in his department?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I have been advised that the change in organization will not affect the efficiency with which most questions are answered, 75 per cent to 80 per cent of which are routine and receive immediate answers. A few more require recourse to the central computer files, and very few require several days to be answered through having to get out the special material that may be involved. I have been assured that the same high standard that the hon. member's constituents and others have enjoyed from outside Ottawa will be maintained.

AIR TRANSPORT

JET SERVICE TO WESTERN MANITOBA AND EASTERN SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. G. W. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It arises from the minister's statement during question period yesterday that the government, rather than following bureaucratic advice on transportation policy, follows "political judgment based on an inquiry among people . . . and consultation with the provincial government."

In view of the many petitions, received from the people of western Manitoba and the government of Manitoba, will the minister review his decision not to provide jet service into western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan, a decision that contradicts the Prime Minister's promise of May 23, 1974, during the last election and the minister's assurance that first-class air service would be in operation well in advance of the Jeux Canada Games which open in Brandon on February 12 next?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member misstates the situation rather seriously. Surely he knows it was not a decision of mine not to supply jet service to either the Brandon area or the Yorkton area. Indeed, I had asked for applications from airline companies to provide exactly those services. At one point in time I had those applications before the Canadian Transport Commission. In the end, in each case the application offering jet service was withdrawn by the applicant, not by any action of mine.

I still believe that the best service, in the long run, for Brandon and Yorkton would be the institution of a service that connects them with the east-west direction of the main line, likely with jet service. I have had continuing discussions with the airlines to encourage some interest on their part to come forward with that kind of application. I still stand ready to provide whatever help is required to make that kind of application work.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it is the minister's controversial decision to have the Government of Canada purchase Nordair, rather than allowing the sale of Nordair to Great Lakes Airlines to proceed, which cancelled out the proposal of Great Lakes to provide daily jet service to the 200,000 people in the WestMan-EastSask area, will the minister instruct Air Canada, which overflies this area several times a day, to provide this service at least until a regional air carrier is available?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the airlines about this question. I think that is as far as I really should go at this stage. I did say "airlines" in the plural, rather than in the singular. At this point in time, the appropriate thing would be for one of those airlines to make a judgment about providing this service and then to make an application before the Canadian Transport Commission. I look forward to that happening.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REFUSAL OF BENEFITS TO CERTAIN PERSONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Gatineau, a question which to me seems very important, the minister stated that he had not had the opportunity to read the decision of the appeals tribunal concerning persons who reached 65 before January 1, 1976, and that as soon as he had read it he would have to determine what procedure would have to be followed. Can the minister tell us today if he is aware of the decision of the appeals tribunal as regards those 65-year old people who thought they were entitled to their unemployment insurance benefits, and if so, can he tell us if he will make a statement allowing those persons who were unjustly penalized to receive their benefits in the near future?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it will be necessary for legal counsel to look at this particular decision. There will be two decisions to be taken—a legal, or judicial, one and a policy one. I want to have advice from my counsel before I reach any conclusions on the next step.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's reply, can he assure the House that, since these people have indeed been waiting for three years and that January 1, 1979 is approaching, he will at least take a decision prior to that date and make it known to the House and, if so, that he will allow these people to receive the benefits to which they are entitled? That would be an excellent Christmas gift from the minister.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: It might be a nice Christmas present, Mr. Speaker, but in some instances these individuals opted to take their Quebec Pension Plan or Canada Pension Plan payments. In effect, they would be paid twice. Under the law, there is no provision for doing that. As I said, I have read the decision: that is why I indicated there is a legal interpretation to be made respecting a decision as to whether we file a further appeal or whether a policy decision on payments can be made in conjunction with the policy of Quebec.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SENTENCE IMPOSED ON KEITH RICHARDS FOR POSSESSION OF DRUGS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It relates to the conviction and sentencing of Keith Richards of the Rolling Stones rock group.

The Solicitor General will recall questions put to him last Friday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. It appears that the accused in this case, unknown to the judge who was pronouncing sentence, had a very lengthy criminal record, with some very serious charges resulting in convictions in jurisdictions other than Canada.

In view of the fact that this type of information is readily available to any Canadian prosecutor—out of CPIC, the RCMP computer in Ottawa—can the minister explain why the federal prosecutor in this case did not make the judge aware of Keith Richards' record? If the prosecutor did not have that documentary material on foreign convictions, can the Solicitor General explain why, when it is so readily available through the computer in Canada?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that the initial question was asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert at a time when neither the Minister of Justice nor the Minister of Employment and Immigration were in the House. I indicated at the time I would like to have had notice of the question so that I could have checked with those ministers in order to provide the right hon. member with that information. I think the hon. member asking the question today should direct his question to the appropriate minister.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to address my question to the new Minister of Justice. He may have heard the exchange which took place with the Solicitor General.

The larger question is this: in terms of drug prosecutions against accused who are citizens of jurisdictions other than Canada, there is available through CPIC, the RCMP computer centre, documentary evidence. In view of the fact that prosecutors in cases such as the Richards case are not regular Crown attorneys but, as the minister knows, are chosen from patronage lists of lawyers who are rather well paid for doing this, can the minister explain whether it is the policy to make available to those federal prosecutors not only convictions under Canadian law but convictions that may have resulted from accusations in other jurisdictions? If that is the policy, what on earth happened in the Richards case? Why did the judge not know about this?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member there is no difference in policy between lawyers in the department and lawyers who are hired to represent the Crown in particular instances. All the information that is available, is available to the Crown prosecutor.

As far as this particular case is concerned, I will inquire and check whether the particular facts the hon. member alleges are correct, and whether the Crown prosecutor had the information which the hon. member claims he did not have. I will report to the hon. member later.

NATIONAL REVENUE

USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER TO OBTAIN INCOME TAX REFUNDS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue. Is it, in fact, a prerequisite that in order to cash cheques for income tax refunds, one must have social insurance numbers as identification?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I was advised about the problem of people cashing Canada Savings Bonds requiring the SIN. Frankly, I will have to inquire whether tax refunds also require that. I will let the hon. member know immediately.

Mr. Ellis: Ten o'clock.

PUBLIC WORKS

REORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT AND ELIMINATION OF POSITIONS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. I congratulate him on his new responsibilities and wish him luck.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinley: I am sure he will need a little luck, with so much empty space being paid for by the government and so many buildings being built.

As indicated by the Deputy Minister of Public Works in a memorandum to all employees, the department appointed four task forces to investigate how the Department of Public Works might reorganize and retrench so as to eliminate 250 more positions as promised in announcements this summer. Since these task forces were scheduled to report by November 15 of this year, can the minister indicate whether they have in fact done so, and will these 250 positions be eliminated?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes on my new appointment. I assure him that the matter to which he refers is one that I have already discussed with my new deputy minister. We would like, indeed, to deliver what has been promised, namely, a reduction in the number of employees within the Department of Public Works. In order to arrive at this, we have taken into account attrition within the department and the possibility of appointing some of these people in other sectors, either the public or private sector. The report I have at the present time is that there are still about 100 employees for whom we have to find positions.

Later this week I will be appearing before the standing committee with respect to my estimates. I would like at that time to respond in more detail to the case of the 100 employees who have to find new jobs, and also to deal more extensively with the so-called accommodations that are vacant in the regions in order to give a more realistic report on the situation. The opposition has exaggerated tremendously the number of vacancies.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACDONALD (EGMONT)—STATUS OF WOMEN—MINISTER'S STATEMENTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, I want to raise a question of privilege arising out of the question period yesterday afternoon when an exchange took place between myself and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), the minister responsible for the status of women.

I wish to refer in particular to two statements which the minister made at that time. First of all, in answer to my second question, he said:

I find it quite proper and quite normal for bodies of that nature to check the facts, rather than to do as the hon. member has done too often on this subject of the status of women, putting on the record of this House statements which are not correct and are not accurate.

The minister then went on to say, with reference to the plans and programs having to do with equal opportunity:

I have stated that those plans of action, once they have been filed with Treasury Board, are available for examination. I do not know exactly what the situation is today, but if the hon. member wishes to have access to some of those documents, he need only ask Treasury Board and he can see them for himself. I have stated repeatedly that those documents are available.

As the minister suggested, I have raised this matter with him on a number of occasions. As far back as March 6, when we had a debate on an opposition day here, the minister made remarks referring to the programs for equal opportunity. He indicated, as reported at page 3484 of Hansard—

And for fiscal year 1977-78, on top of their annual program, the various departments had to develop long term programs, that is, five-year programs and measurable objectives.

A little later he said:

What is important is that the trend being established is a positive one. It is quite clearly established by the statistics that have been published and made available up until this time.

Inasmuch as I pointed out to the minister on that occasion, that the statistics up to that point were very superficial and were, indeed, only over-all summaries of a succession of departmental reports, I asked him on March 8 whether he would assist the House by arranging for the publication of the full reports of each department. As reported on page 3565, the minister replied:

I want to assure the hon. member that reports which have been requested of all departments have been filed and have been received by Treasury Board. Treasury Board has assigned officers to review these reports with the individual departments to see whether further improvements can be made in terms of plans. I will be glad to see what information can be made public in this respect, in addition to all the information which is being made public by the Public Service Commission on an annual basis and also in appearances before the parliamentary committee.

If Treasury Board can also provide additional information to the hon. member when the estimates come, I will certainly be very happy to help: and I am sure my colleague will be very happy to make that information available. At the present time, these reports are being reviewed with individual departments by officials of Treasury Board.

Further, on March 20, again with respect to these reports and plans, the minister said:

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the President of the Treasury Board will want to expand on this. The only thing I can tell the hon. member is that we have, indeed, decided to make these figures available. I understand the President of the Treasury Board is reviewing the appropriate time and method of making them available. This is a matter of compiling and getting the information translated. As far as the availability of the information and the content of the plans of the various departments is concerned, the government has agreed to make the information available on a regular basis as soon as it is available.

After all that, Mr. Speaker, and the very definite commitment by the minister yesterday afternoon following what I can only assume is the kind of hit and run response in which the minister likes to engage on this issue, I find, on conferring with my office this morning, that as long as one and a half months ago, in response to direct inquiries of Treasury Board officials we were told that these annual reports would not be made available. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, when I conferred again myself with a Treasury Board official today I discovered not only that there was no plan to make them available this year but that a definite agreement was made earlier this year, I think during the summer, between Treasury Board and all the various departments submitting these equal opportunity reports, not to make them public. There is apparently some possibility of publishing them next year and there will, as usual, be some kind of over-all summary which will tell us little or nothing.

I do not intend to use this occasion to deal with the minister's debating point—whether or not I provide accurate comments with respect to this matter. That is a matter for debate, as you would no doubt agree, or else a grievance on the part of one hon. member. But I am very much concerned that the minister should tell me on two successive occasions that he is making every effort to make this informatin available—he has said on two occasions that it is available—yet when I make representations directly to Treasury Board I find not only that they are unaware of these commitments that the minister has made in this House but that they have taken a definite decision in the opposite direction. I think the kind of answer given successively by the minister in this House affects the privileges of all members on a matter which I regard as being of very great importance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think there has been some confusion between the hon. member and myself about certain aspects of this question. As he well knows, the annual report tabled by the President of the Treasury Board is a summary of the reports tabled by various departments. It has been produced this year and was published, I believe, before the summer adjournment.

As to the individual reports by departments the hon. member is quite right. These have not been released as yet and have not been made public. I am sorry if I misled the hon. member yesterday in that respect—it is obviously just stronger evidence that we should perhaps check the facts very carefully before making statements such as he himself made when he made allegations about so-called possible censorship by the Public Service Commission of an Advisory Council on the Status of Women report.

As far as my own statement of yesterday is concerned, indeed, it stands to be corrected. These reports have not been made accessible as yet but I can assure the hon. member that the Treasury Board has not made a decision not to make them public. I checked at two o'clock with the official the hon. member spoke to and he assured me that his problem was not that he had given a commitment to the departments not to make them public but that he had not told the departments when they were drafting their reports that they would be made public. So the matter is still an open one.

I have talked to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) and have recommended to him that the reports be made available to the public. I understand the Treasury Board will take up this question and, I hope, resolve it in the way the hon. member and myself would like to see it resolved so that all these reports in the future will be made available to the public.

Mr. Speaker: It would seem to me that, from a procedural point of view, the matter between the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), who is responsible for the status of women, has been resolved.

MR. CROSBIE—ALTERATION IN OFFICIAL HANSARD RECORD

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege has to do with the Hansard record of a debate in this House which took place yesterday afternoon during private members' hour. I refer to page 1535 of Hansard of yesterday where we see a speech made by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin).

● (1512)

The subject under discussion was the Sullivan royal commission on transportation in Newfoundland. The hon. member said—I heard him say it, and other hon. members I have checked with heard him say it—

If the government will agree to reject out of hand the Sullivan royal commission recommendations, it logically follows they will have to implement the recommendations of the Hall commission—

I have checked this with the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. Hansard reads as follows:

If the government will agree to reject out of hand the Sullivan royal commission recommendations—

Then the words "regarding the railway" are inserted.

—it logically follows—

That is completely different from the statement that was made. There are about 100 recommendations in that report. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre came out against them all. He may have done that by mistake.

He was picked up on that by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who spoke right after him for about five minutes, and then by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey), who criticized the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre for not having read the report. However, when we looked into Hansard this morning, we found that the meaning of what was said was completely changed to "recommendations regarding the railway."

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has told me that he did change the Hansard record. I am not accusing him of anything dishonourable because, if the Hansard office agrees, why should we not change the record whenever we like? Whenever we make a mistake in the House, we can just get the "blues" and change what we said. I remember that a month or two ago the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) changed entirely the sense of what had been said.

I also point out that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, who will speak for himself, has said that he has no objection to removing those words. He will say that, but something needs to be done to see just what the rules for changing Hansard are.

In this case the meaning has been changed utterly and completely. When we look at the record, which may be useful to us in certain future activities, the meaning will have been completely changed, and I submit that that is a breach of the privileges of the members of this House.

Although the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre is willing to have those words taken out, I think there should be some check into this so that we can determine what is permitted and what is not.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to get your eye, as was the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

In the course of the private members' hour yesterday afternoon I was speaking in support of the hon. member's motion. As usual, I did not speak from a prepared text and, as many hon. members frequently do, I went to check the Hansard report of my remarks.

I did insert the words "regarding the railway" in the sentence referred to by the hon. member for St. John's West, and if that goes beyond what is allowed, I am prepared not only to have those three words stricken from the official record of the House but also to apologize to hon. members and to Your Honour. That was what I wanted to say and what I meant to say, and if I did not say it, I have no business making that change, even though it is on the record that my party, my leader, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour), and others support most of the Sullivan commission recommendations. I am in that same position, the exception being the Sullivan commission's recommendations regarding the railway.

If it is the view of the Chair that the insertion of those three words, which were inserted so that that part of my remarks would be consistent with the whole purport of my speech and the motion presented by the hon. member for St. John's West, go beyond what a member should do, I am pleased to apologize and to have them taken from the record.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has raised a matter which I think we ought to consider as being one of order as opposed to one of privilege. I think the explanation given by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) closes the door on it in terms of procedure. However, the hon. member for St. John's West has raised a larger question which is really a matter of continuing concern for the Chair, and I think it is appropriate to pause a moment and to consider the background of the experience of the Hansard reporters here, which has been an excellent experience and, over the years, an excellent service to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will understand that their efforts are in no way qualified, reduced or diminished in their endeavour to serve the House at the present time. However, in the past, particularly recognizing that it has been a tradition of the House that speeches ought perhaps to be assisted by some notes but ought not to be given from a prepared text, it has always been a well accepted and respected practice of the House that speeches are given extemporaneously—or most of them.

Certainly during the question period when pressure is at its greatest in terms of time and tension involved in questions and answers, and when exchanges are of a nature a little more dynamic than the exchanges which take place in regular debates, there is great strain, not only on members who occupy the floor, because in the excitement of the moment the language a member uses expresses his ideas but does not necessarily translate grammatically when it is reduced to print, and it has always been an accepted practice of the House that when the editors of Hansard or the reporters prepare their reports, members have looked at them and reporters have said from time to time, "When this is reduced to print it just does not read intelligibly; it may have sounded all right, but it does not read well; do I have the sense of what was said?" That has always been done, and it has been supervised by the editors under the best principles and practices of the House in an effort to do a faithful service to the recording and, at the same time, to be faithful to the sense which was intended.

At the same time, however, this also puts a great strain on the reporters and the editors of Hansard because, after all, they are servants of the House of Commons, and when they are consulted by a member they are being consulted by someone to whom they owe a duty of service. They find it difficult to take a position and to tell the member emphatically that he has gone too far in his grammatical clean-up of the work. That is a very difficult role for reporters or editors to take. When that has happened, which, thankfully, I think has been rarely, hon. members have invariably done what the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has done, and that is to indicate that he made a change, and that if he did more than what is allowed by the practices, he accepts responsibility, as was done on the earlier occasion mentioned. That has always been done.

That is almost the whole story, and we could go on from there, but I think we must take into account the recent introduction of electronic recording equipment and the introduction of radio and television recording which is being used quite happily and being resorted to increasingly. It is being used more than even the most optimistic estimates given at the time we were planning and installing the equipment.

However, an examination of the record through these electronic recording devices is being resorted to by more and more Canadians all the time. Therefore an additional strain is being put on the reporting staff, who have enjoyed this editorial licence in the past. They now find themselves under the constraint of matching their record exactly with the language used on radio and television. This is a recent experience for us, and it is not an easy one for the reporters. We are adjusting to it, but when these instances take place it certainly is helpful to have them brought to our attention.

I am confident that we can go forward. Recognizing the constraints which are placed on the shorthand reporters and the additional burden of the electronic media, if we all continue to operate as we have, in the best interests of the House and in good faith, I hope the problem will not occur too often. If it does, the hon. member for St. John's West can certainly raise the point again.

[Mr. Speaker.]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 240, 264, 415 and 631.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

"SHOPPING FOR FOOD AND NUTRITION"

Question No. 240—Mr. Epp:

1. What was the cost to the government for the book Shopping for Food and Nutrition?

2. Who designed the book and at what cost?

3. (a) How many copies will be distributed and at what cost per book (b) who will receive the book?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as Agriculture Canada in concerned: 1. $39,158.

2. The publication was designed by Design Partnership of Ottawa Ontario, at a cost of $5,183 which is included in the above cost.

3. (a) A total of 134,900 copies printed by the department will be distributed at a cost of 29 cents per copy, plus postage.

(b) The publication will be distributed to various agricultural organizations and to private related institutions or agencies. The consuming public in general may obtain copies in response to individual requests. Educational institutions may obtain quantities for distribution according to their requirements.

In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: 1. $25,973.01.

2. To be answered elsewhere.

3. (a) Ninety thousand copies will be distributed at a cost of 29 cents per book, plus postage.

(b) It is directed to and will be received by the consuming public and will be distributed via social and health agencies at provincial and municipal levels, e.g. provincial nutritionists, public health nurses, and visiting homemakers. There will be direct distribution to the public upon request.

LAWYERS IN THE CONSTITUENCY OF PROVENCHER

Question No. 264—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Department of the Solicitor General and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: none.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION—NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 415—Mr. Howie:

Does the Farm Credit Corporation have a list of lawyers to whom legal work concerning mortgage loans is restricted and, if so, what are the names of such lawyers in New Brunswick?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Farm Credit Corporation advises as follows: the corporation retains the services of solicitors, advocates or notaries approved by the chairman to place and disburse loans, to recover moneys lent and to perform related incidental legal services on such terms as the chairman may prescribe.

The name of the New Brunswick lawyer through whom the corporation's legal work is handled is Clarence H. Roy.

COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Question No. 631—Mr. Epp:

1. What is the annual budget of the Western Regional Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages which was opened in St. Boniface recently?

2. Who is the director?

3. What is his/her annual salary?

4. What are his/her qualifications?

5. How many persons will be employed on a (a) full-time (b) part-time basis?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): The Commissioner of Official Languages reports directly to parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be made directly to him.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I filed the required notice for this motion. The move by the Canadian Wheat Board to purchase up to 2,000 hopper cars at $100 million is an unprecedented move in the 40 years of their lifetime, and we see it as a breach of the spirit and intent of the National Transportation Act. We question the legality of the Wheat Board's action in describing these hopper cars as personal property—it is too much to figure out.

This purchase was made without the consultation of the interested parties out west. Producers are up in arms and farm organizations are outraged and, despite what the minister said, there was no consultation. The railways are telling us there is unused capacity in the system, as evidenced by Canadian Pacific's refusal to have 1,000 cars fixed. I see no other way of bringing this matter before the House. Neither our motions under Standing Order 43 nor our questions in the question period can deal with this, nor can we deal with it in the next opposition day, which is a week away and which may be too late.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton):

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) has given the Chair notice, in accordance with Standing Order 26, of his intention to make this application for a motion to adjourn the House or, in other words, for a motion calling for a special debate on that matter, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 26.

There are two aspects of the matter which I think I should bring to the attention of hon. members. The first is that I consider it to be a very dangerous precedent to accept this subject under the terms of Standing Order 26 on the basis that it is, as the hon. member has described it, a policy decision or a policy initiative. The hon. member says that this is the first time in 40 years that such a move has been made and it is a policy which he ascribes to the Wheat Board or, alternatively, to the government. It is a policy which he says will have drastic effects on certain segments of the population.

My concern is that if I were to accept those conditions for an emergency debate pursuant to Standing Order 26, the hon. member would realize the frequency with which applications might be made, and I do not think Standing Order 26 was intended to take into account applications where a member wishes to disagree with a particular government policy. I would refer the hon. member to paragraph 16 of Standing Order 26, which reads:

The right to move the adjournment of the House for the above purposes is subject to the following conditions:

(a) The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency calling for immediate and urgent consideration;

It seems to me that the emergency referred to is a situation which is certainly not a matter of policy initiative or of the creation of a decision with which the hon. member wishes to express his disagreement.

I know hon. members might want to argue that there are many policies which do create emergency situations to which they might want to lay claim. Nevertheless, I would not consider the opportunity to disagree or differ with government policy should be used as a subject for this rule.

It seems to me that the whole regime of our orders, regulations and practices here, is to give hon. members, either individually or collectively, an opportunity to disagree with policy in one way or another, whether it is through questions, through motions pursuant to Standing Order 43, through questions put in the late show to get more definitive answers, through questions put to ministers in examination of their estimates before the standing committee, or through voting against items in supply. But the whole structure is to allow an opportunity to an hon. member, to his caucus or to members on all sides of the House, to express at one time or another support or disagreement with a policy.

I believe that if one policy decision is considered as a subject for an emergency debate, it would make it difficult for the Chair in future to refuse similar requests when on occasion policy initiatives are announced which obviously meet with disagreement. That goes without question. The Chair would be in a difficult spot having to refuse or grant applications for a special debate on every policy decision that was announced.

The hon. member made reference to the fact that the next allotted day is a week away, which may be too late. I have to refer him back a few days to a debate which took place on November 13 in which the following motion, put by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), was debated. It read as follows:

That this House condemns the government for its failure:

(a) To require the railroads to add 4,000 hopper cars and 5,000 repaired box-cars to their grain fleet; and

(b) To give the Canadian Wheat Board total authority to co-ordinate all aspects of grain movement and any other authority necessary to protect and expand grain exports.

So the House has directed its attention specifically to this matter. It may be that the decision to which the hon. member refers has been made since that time, nevertheless it remains a policy decision, with which the hon. member has other means at his disposal to differ. I do not think policy decisions like this should be made subject to motions pursuant to Standing Order 26.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

The House resumed from Monday, November 27, consideration of the motion (Miss Bégin) that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue the remarks I started last evening with reference to Bill C-2. First I should like to correct for the record, and more particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), the statement he made in his speech yesterday. He referred to the policy of restraint of the Conservative party. The hon. member for Winnipeg North said:

They would spend more money on medical research, scientific research, or cultural affairs, as the hon. member who has just left the House has said—

Indeed, the hon. member for Winnipeg North also stated that the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) was dishonest.

I should like to deal with just one small facet of that comment, his reference to culture, although the bill does not deal precisely with it. I should like, for the benefit of the hon. member, to refer him to page 1477 of Hansard where he will find the comments made by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) from which he will clearly see that his comment yesterday was incorrect and, although I would not say it was dishonest, it was certainly a deluded reference.

I also think—perhaps it is a view shared by members of my party and also shared by the hon. member for Winnipeg North—that, in terms of the manner in which this program will be terminated some two or three years before its time, any sensible and far thinking government would realize that the funding of medical facilities, be they research facilities, hospital training or teaching facilities, will not and simply cannot end when this bill comes into force. A natural conclusion is that there will be some form of ongoing federal support. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has not said that. Perhaps that position is shared by the NDP. I do not know, because I have difficulty understanding many of their positions. In terminating the fund, it is disturbing that the minister has not made any reference whatsoever to what the future holds for the research community or the welfare of Canadians, in terms of hospital care and teaching facilities.

I should like to ask hon. members to reflect on the government's decision in 1966. At that time there was a proposed expenditure of $500 million which was to be spent over a period of 14 years. In terms of the government's view of cash flow today, and the manner in which it treats the dollar, that $500 million is relatively insignificant. After all, the government talks now about a $12.1 billion cash deficit this year. So, what is $500 million? It is a shrug of the shoulders of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). But in 1966 $500 million was a very substantial sum of money. Clearly one did not expect the government to spend that amount in a short period of time. It was a bill which covered the expenditure of that amount of money over a period of 14 years.

The cost-sharing arrangement of the program roughly is 50-50. If one examines the purpose, dimensions, and the manner in which funding is initiated, clearly they demonstrate that parliament gave this bill a considerable amount of thought. I took the opportunity of reviewing the debates in 1966. They were substantial, and there were excellent contributions from all sides of the House. Now the bill is being brought to a hasty conclusion almost three years ahead of the intended date, and $69 million short of the sum intended and appointed by parliament in 1966. Perhaps the most reprehensible action by the government is the decision of the minister to terminate the program without prior discussion with the provinces.

Yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare participated in this debate, responded to some speeches, and engaged in across-the-floor shotgunning with the hon. member for Athabasca. The minister said that there were some discussions. She did not state that there was a uniform degree of discussion with all provinces involved, whether a province still qualified for assistance under the bill or not, such as the province of New Brunswick.

The program encompassed in the original bill has been of enormous benefit to the establishment of facilities for the treatment of the sick, and for the training of those who treat the sick. One wonders what consultation occurred with the health resources advisory committee, a committee estabished by the original bill in 1966. I should like to refer to chapter 42 (11) of the Revised Statutes of Canada which reads as follows:

> The advisory committee shall
> (a) advise the minister on any program for the development of health training facilities submitted to the minister by the government of a province;
> (b) advise the minister, at his request or on its own initiative, on matters relating to a health training facility in respect of which a province has requested a contribution under this act, including a reasonable cost thereof; and
> (c) give consideration to and advice the minister on such matters relating to the operation of this act as are referred to it by the minister.

It is section 11(c) which I find most interesting. I should like to refer to the annual report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977. It contains the signature of the minister, and finally it was tabled on Friday, March 10, 1978, approximately one year later. Any reference to the advisory committee in that report is absent. One wonders what role the advisory committee played in the latter years provided for in the bill.

When one reviews the history of the involvement of government in the medicare system of Canada, the health and welfare of Canada, and when one thinks of Bill C-68 introduced by the then minister of national health and welfare, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), one will realize that some of the points raised by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) yesterday were most valid. Indeed, the health care delivery system for Canada has progressed. If it had not progressed, those responsible would be appearing before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and certainly parliament would be concerned if the vast expenditures were not producing a satisfactory end result. I have served on that standing committee since 1974. I recall the praiseworthy statements, support and declarations of the Minister of National Health and Welfare which indicated that all was well.

I should like to draw the attention of the House to a document entitled "Symposium on Health Research Priorities in Canada." It is a summary of a series of papers and discussions presented on May 25, 1973, on the implications for the health care system. In the summary excerpts were taken from the remarks of the then minister of national health and welfare. One such excerpt reads as follows:

> There may be those who would recommend bringing about a reapportionment of resources provided for health care research vis-à-vis bio-medical research by a transfer of funds. I am not one of them . . . An appropriate balance should be achieved by a steeper rate of increase in the funding level accorded to research on health care, including its promotional and preventive aspects, compared to the rate of increase in support of more basic research.

That is what the then minister of national health and welfare said approximately four or five years ago. He continued:

> Although the reasons for this lack of interest in the field of health care research are undoubtedly numerous and complex in nature . . . one important factor must surely be the widespread misconception, held even in academic and other well-informed research circles, that applied research must necessarily be short term, rather superficial and related to immediate problems . . . If we do not start research on a predictable problem until it confronts us in all its urgency, the research attack on it must all too often be hastily contrived and carried out in as short a time as possible, if the result of the research is to have any relevance to solving the problem before it passes into history . . .

● (1542)

A classic example is the rather rushed implementation of studies into Asian flu which took place about two years ago.

The minister went on to say:

> The time duration of an applied research project and the depth of treatment should be determined by the nature of the problem and the type of analytical study required.

The minister sounds like an academic and as though he had a sudden appreciation of the research problem in 1973. There must be a reason why this minister has failed to influence or at least pass along his concerns to the present Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the former minister done a flip-flop between 1973 and 1978?

The then minister said:

As a general statement on research priorities "increases in effort and resources should be more rapid with respect:

He then goes on to list a number of priority areas of concern.

The vice-principal for the faculty of medicine at McGill University, Mr. Maurice M. McGregor, said at that time that:

Viewed within this schema the scientist had no right to complain when governments asserted their duty to direct in some areas of research.

I go along with that because, after all, parliament is paying the bill. He continued:

They had, however, every reason to expect governments to identify their problems and to subsidize the necessary research to find the answers. Since this, itself, requires expertise, it is hoped that we would soon see a major augmentation of intradepartmental research capacity.

The people at this symposium were well known in the research community. There were people such as John Evans, the president of the University of Toronto. Surely that name rings a familiar note. Others subscribing to this point of view were people such as John Laidlaw, director of the Institute of Medical Sciences, University of Toronto; the dean of the faculty of medicine for the University of Manitoba, the professor and head of the department of physiology at the University of British Columbia, and the associate dean of McGill University. These are people who are regarded highly within the community. Surely the then minister had to have his homework done when he spoke to them in 1973.

Like many other policies of this government, they suck the provinces down the road until they are committed beyond any shadow of a doubt, and then they snatch the rug out from under them because it is politically or fiscally convenient to do so. In this case it is both fiscally and politically convenient to do so. This government by its policies has now boxed the provinces in so well that it can cut willy-nilly.

Perhaps I should not say what I am about to say, but I will give the hon. member for Winnipeg North an opportunity to correct me if I am wrong, because it is not on the record of the meeting in camera with the Auditor General prior to the meeting of the public accounts committee last week. If I am not mistaken the hon. member said, "Was it necessary for the Auditor General to inquire into programs for people?" Surely, regardless of the program, without fear or favour it is the responsibility of the Auditor General to look into any program, any facet of the government's operation, whether it be designed for people or not. I hope the member will read my words carefully. I may have misunderstood or misinterpreted the comment by the hon. member, but that is the way in which it struck me. I was astounded, if that be the case, at that kind of rhetorical comment by a member of such long standing and experience in this House of Commons.

I would like to get a statement from the minister or her parliamentary secretary to the effect that when this bill is passed and becomes law that this government will then sit down in concert with the provinces and consider in what areas it must inevitably become involved in terms of future research within the medical community and all the other communities involved in health care delivery, whether they be primary or secondary modes of delivery. I would like the minister also to consider what will be done to upgrade hospitals across this country.

There are two things the minister cannot expect. One is the beautiful picture painted by the hon. member for St. Catharines of healthy Canadians who have cradle to the grave care and not a thing to worry about. The other thing is that with government cuts in funding that they can expect the provinces to carry on and deliver the same quality of health care they are presently able to deliver, because it is impossible. If the quality of health care deteriorates by virtue of budgetary constraints, provincial economic conditions, or national economic conditions, then it falls upon this government to explain why it has failed the country and the people on this issue.

There is much more that can be said about the failure of this government to live up to its commitments, and its arrogance in the face of a fiscal problem which ministers themselves generated by pulling the rug out from under programs that are good and ignoring the rug under programs that should be affected and the priorities of care for Canadians.

The other day I had an opportunity to fly across this country with a senior civil servant who happened to be with the minister's department. I will not name him, or the location of the conference he was attending or anything else, knowing the Grits the way I do, but he said that the genuine concern of those in attendance at the conference was that "our department and the ministry were top heavy with people studying other people to determine what the hell they were all doing, instead of us getting out and doing the job that Canadians expect of us." That gentleman was right on. Unfortunately the minister and the government have not got the message, and I doubt if they will until the next federal election.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): The position of our party, Mr. Speaker, in opposition to Bill C-2 was well outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) yesterday. I would like to spend a few minutes this afternoon talking about two different things which I think are quite important to this debate. The second is in response to what some of the Conservative members have been talking about so much, namely cutbacks and restraint. However, before touching on those subjects, I want to say that I oppose this bill.

If one looks at the programs that Canada has, there is one very glaring omission. Not enough money is going into the whole area of preventive medicine. We have done very well in many other fields in Canada including the delivery system for medicine, medicare and hospitalization, etc. We have had some great accomplishments. However, when it comes to the area of preventive medicine, Canada, the United States and indeed most of the industrial world are lagging way behind.

I will refer to some studies that I have looked at that have been done during the past few years. One particular study was done by Senator George McGovern in the United States. In that study there is a conclusion that about seven out of ten causes of death in the United States were directly tied to diet. In other words, people are eating their way to the grave. Americans are eating far too much sugar and salt. Their intake of fats, processed and refined fabricated foods and so on, is far too high. The World Health Organization said that about 80 per cent of the causes of cancer in the world are tied to the environment. An important part of the environment includes the food that we consume.

Before the Canadian food prices review board folded up a few years ago, they said that about 40 per cent of our hospital stays were tied to diet problems. I think it was in 1975 they said that if we had proper nutrition in this country we would have saved about $2 billion a year in hospital bills. If that figure was $2 billion then, I am sure that figure will reach $3 billion or more in 1978 and 1979.

I am concerned when I hear that a government wants to cut back on medical research and the provision of money in the field of medicine. I am concerned with the whole area of preventive medicine. Radical changes in our diet have occurred over the last 25 or 30 years. If one checks into diets of people before the Second World War, one will find that an overwhelming amount of food that was eaten was what we call natural food. It was unrefined or unprocessed food, or natural food that one grew in a garden. Since the end of the Second World War we have moved into the whole area of highly refined and processed food. A lot of minerals and vitamins are taken out of the food. The effect that this is having on our health is something that we are only now just beginning to realize. It is not just the refining of food or the fact that we are eating more of our meals in restaurants, perhaps even in greasy-spoon restaurants, or even at places like McDonald's.

If one has a McDonald shake, most people think it is a milk shake containing milk. However, it contains no milk at all.

There are many things in our food system now which are totally artificial. As a matter of routine there are about 1,800 chemicals in our food system that each of us consumes each and every year. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) consumes these chemicals as a matter of routine. It is like going into a lab and ordering about five or six pounds of chemicals and downing them. However, we do not know what effect these chemicals will have on us.

We do know, medically and technically, that roughly half of the Canadian society is obese according to the medical definition of obesity. It is well known that a lot of people suffer heart attacks now, whereas at one time there were not many heart attacks reported. People say in answer to this phenomenon that "people are living longer now." But that is not really the case. The only reason the life span is significantly longer now than at the turn of the century, is due to the fact that we have been able to combat the problem of infant mortality. However, if one takes a look at the life expectancy of a five or six year old child in 1900, and compare its life expectancy with a five or six year old child today, it is roughly the same. It is roughly the same despite the tremendous steps and leaps forward that we have made in modern medicine, surgery, health facilities, and the like. With all of this technology and medical aid which has helped save so many lives, and take away the question of infant mortality, the life span of North Americans has not really increased over the last 70 or 80 years.

I would like now to talk about some of the sprays and the chemicals they contain. I had a conversation with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) one day and I remember asking him, "What do you think about some of the sprays and chemicals that we are using in the production of our food?" I also mentioned the way chickens produce eggs sitting in little cages, being stuffed with hormones and antibiotics, and the way cattle are fattened in feed lots with growth hormones. I asked him what he thought this was doing to human health. The minister answered that he did not know but he was terrified at the thought of what might happen. He said he thought the scientists did not know either. That thought is even more terrifying to me.

I have talked to many scientists, biochemists, and people in related fields. They all said they did not know what effects there would be on human beings. Perhaps some of the cancer cases and heart attacks, as well as some modern diseases that are around today, are tied to our food system, and in the years to come the results of what we are doing now may show up in the health of human beings.

I plead with the government that instead of cutting back on money provisions to health care that it put more money into nutritional and biochemical research so that we may understand what our modern food processing system is doing to the human body. If that is not done, the rapid altering of our food is going to continue at an even greater escalated pace. The day will come when people will be eating very few natural foods and few foods that have not been exposed to chemicals. We will be so woefully ignorant of nutrition that we will have a very sick race.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) interjected a few minutes ago and mentioned the comparison between a 30-year old Canadian and a 60-year old Swede. He makes a point, and it is something that we should be examining. What he says is absolutely true. If one looks at the condition of the Swedish people and their life span, or indeed if one looks at the condition of people in countries such as Israel, one will find that their food systems are different. People are more educated about the types of food they eat in their various countries.

For example, in France they allow only a few artificial food colourings in their food system. By comparison, in Canada we have dozens.

A lot of countries do not have huge supermarkets and the assembly line way of selling and buying food. Instead one finds market places where the farmers come to sell their fresh produce to the people.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They have more respect for their stomachs.

Mr. Nystrom: They have more respect for their stomachs than we do here, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has said.

The hon. member for Dauphin made a point when he said that we should look at the 60-year old Swede.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member would not want to leave that remark on the record. Canada has indeed advanced over the previously sad commentary on our fitness. It is now a matter of record that a Canadian male lives one-tenth of a year longer than a Swedish male, and the Canadian female lives three-tenths of a year longer than a Swedish female. I believe that puts the lie to the old cliché about the 30-year old Canadian being in worse condition than a 60-year old Swede.

● (1602)

Mr. Nystrom: I do not dare repeat the comment from behind the curtain. I am glad to have that information. I would like to see the breakdown of infant mortality rates, health rates, and things of that sort in Sweden as well. If we have made that much progress, I am very pleased. Perhaps it is because Sweden rejected their socialist government and elected Tories a year and a half ago that they have gone backward so quickly. That is probably it. It is those Tories again.

I tried to make the very serious point that I believe this is an area of public policy in most countries in the industrialized world where things happen so quickly, that most people do not realize what has occurred. We should be spending a lot more money on medical research, nutritional research, and research on how we produce our foods, into whether we are doing the right thing, and what is happening to the soil. There are all sort of studies, such as the Rennie report, which says the quality of soil in Saskatchewan deteriorated about 60 per cent in the past 20 years or so because of modern farming.

There are many things we should be looking at, but that we are not examining. We will be taking a step backward if we do not put money into medical research, research into the human body and how it responds to the environment. I make that plea as one of two I will be making in the debate this afternoon.

The second point is that I get very disappointed when I start seeing the Liberal government implementing some of the policies of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). We hear them talk about restraint, rollbacks, cutbacks and so on. When I see someone like Joe Trudeau taking on Pierre Clark's policies, it really upsets me, because a lot of innocent people are hurt in the process.

It particularly upsets me when I see members of the Conservative party, including the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, who took my colleague from Winnipeg North to task, talking out of both sides of their mouths. They say we need more cutbacks and restraint.

Yesterday, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said that more money must be put into Newfoundland because it has a stagnant economy. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) wants more money for creating employment. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) wants more money put into agriculture. He says there are too many cutbacks there. The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) says that the arts are really suffering. The Indian Affairs critic says that the Indian people are being hurt by the cutbacks and restraint. Last night over television, the premier of New Brunswick said that that province is being cut back by $15 million in federal funds and that will really hurt them.

All these things are true. Therefore, we do not know where the Conservative party stands. Are they just trying to cash in on the Proposition 13 mentality and psychology that started in California? Is that what they are saying and trying to do? Do they really believe there should be severe cutbacks?

The Tories say to us in this party that we are socialists and that means big bureaucracies, huge debts in government, all kinds of government spending and the like, as well as inefficiency. I want to refer to a few facts today that the Canadian people should be aware of so that they can see at times the Conservative party speaks with a forked tongue, indeed out of both sides of its mouth.

Let us look at the per capita debt. A couple of weeks ago the Tories were saying the debt in this country is too high, that a Conservative government would lower it.

Mr. Paproski: Are you afraid of the Conservative party?

Mr. Nystrom: I am not afraid of the Tories at any time. The Saskatchewan results have shown that. In the Saskatchewan campaign we told the people the facts. When the people saw what the Tory party was all about, they rejected it decisively in that province.

Let us look at the provincial debts in this country. Listening to the Tories, you would think that Tory provinces have the lowest per capita debt in Canada. When you look at the statistics, you find that in 1976 the province of Saskatchewan had an average per capita debt of $980.

What about big, wealthy Ontario, with 35 years of Toryism and, I take it, balanced budgets, no debts and so on? According to Statistics Canada, the average per capita debt in the province of Ontario is $2,059. In fact, about eight cents out of every dollar in Conservative Ontario goes to pay off the debt of that province which is held up as a model of Toryism in this country. In my province of Saskatchewan, one seventh of one cent of the taxpayer's money goes to pay off the interest charges on the debt of that province. When the Conservative party talk about debt and deficit financing, we think they speak with a forked tongue.

Look at oil rich Alberta. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) knows very well what is happening there. He knows of the tremendous mismanagement of that economy, even though they sit on a pot of black gold in that province. The per capita debt in that province in 1970 was $775. In 1976 the per capita debt had more than doubled to $1,880.

Mr. Paproski: Is that on your research?

Mr. Nystrom: That is Statistics Canada information. In the meantime, the per capita debt in Saskatchewan was only $980. When the Conservative party talk about deficit financing and the debts run up by the NDP and the types of things we are talking about, I say they do not know what they are talking about. They seem to say that if you have good government programs, you should have big bureaucracy. That is not true. You can run very efficient government without a huge bureaucracy. In fact if you want to know how to build bureaucracies, look at Tory governments in this country. They are the best empire builders, the best builders of bureaucracy that I have ever seen.

Look at the statistics that are readily available from Statistics Canada. In the province of Saskatchewan, which has had an NDP government most of the time since 1944, only 1.8 per cent of the population is employed by the government. In the province of Alberta, that so-called picture of free enterprise, 2.4 per cent of the population is employed by the province. We again see that it is the Conservative party that is inefficient, the party that builds these huge bureaucracies and deficits, that imposes heavy taxes upon the ordinary people of this country. In the Conservative province of New Brunswick, it is 3.4 per cent of the population. In Nova Scotia, it is 2.3 per cent. In Canada as a whole, it is 3.3 per cent. In Saskatchewan, it is 1.8 per cent. Therefore, when the Conservative party start talking about cutbacks, rollbacks and things of that sort, the Canadian people should realize the record of that party when they are in government.

Mr. Paproski: We are not in government yet.

Mr. Nystrom: There is mismanagement of the economy, huge bureaucracies that are totally insensitive to the people of this country, just as that party is totally insensitive to the provinces where they govern.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Beatty: I have listened with a great deal of interest and enjoyment to the polemics of my friend to the left. He has denounced various Conservative administrations for the size of their bureaucracies. Has the hon. member consulted with the NDP leader in Ontario, Mr. Cassidy, and was he speaking on behalf of the NDP in Ontario when discussing the size of the government in that province? Is it the policy of Mr. Cassidy to cut back on the size of the public service in Ontario?

Mr. Nystrom: I was not denouncing that, Mr. Speaker. I was denouncing the incompetency of the Conservative government.

Mr. Paproski: You are as phony as the rest of the NDP, sucking and blowing at the same time.

Mr. Nystrom: There is one province which beats Saskatchewan in terms of the number of people it employs in its public service. That is Ontario, where the figure is 1.2 per cent of the population.

• (1612)

If you look at the tax load, I am glad you mentioned this, I can see if I can give you some of the tax comparisons between the province of Ontario and the province of Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: What about Alberta?

Mr. Nystrom: I will give you Alberta as well. Thanks for mentioning Alberta. I will take a taxpayer who is over 25, who has a spouse, who has two kids under the age of 16, who is earning $15,000, owns a home with a property tax assessment of $9,200, who is insuring a 1975 Impala with public liability coverage of $200,000 with $100 deductible—he's consuming about 600 gallons of gas a year in that 1976 Impala. Now let's have a look at the tax load on that ordinary citizen in the province of Saskatchewan, in the province of Ontario, and in Alberta. First of all, let us look at his personal income tax. In Saskatchewan it was $681 for that person. Income tax, of course, is a more progressive tax. In Ontario, the income tax is some $674. In Alberta, it is $590. That is on the income tax side.

Now let us have a look at health premiums. Health premiums in Saskatchewan are zero. Health premiums in Ontario, which are a tax, a tax which is very regressive, a tax on ordinary people, amount to $456. Health premiums in Alberta, with all that money in the Heritage Fund, are $184, which I think shocks even some of the Tory members of the House.

Mr. Murta: Not at all.

Mr. Nystrom: I turn to sales tax. Alberta has us beat. They don't have any. In Saskatchewan it is $172, and in Ontario it is $264, again very heavy for a province as wealthy as Ontario. Gasoline tax—there isn't any in Alberta. In Saskatchewan it is $114. In the province of Ontario it is $114.

Car insurance—in Alberta it is $366. In Saskatchewan it is $186, and in Ontario $348.

Last but not least are tax rebates provided by the provinces in each case for the ordinary taxpayers. In Alberta the rebate amounts to $202, in Saskatchewan $230, and in Ontario it is $139.

Mr. Paproski: What's the price of turkeys in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Nystrom: When you do a total of all that, the tax load upon someone we think is an average taxpayer in Saskatchewan is $923. In oil-rich Alberta it is $938, $15 more. But when you come to Ontario it is not $923 but $1,717, almost twice as much imposed upon the ordinary citizens of Ontario as in the other provinces I have mentioned. I am very glad I was asked to make a tax comparison between the average people in the provinces.

An hon. Member: What is the net per capita income after tax?

Mr. Nystrom: I am talking here about families with the same income. Maybe I will go over it again because I am sure the hon. member, being a Tory, finds it hard to understand.

Here is a taxpayer who is over the age of 25, who has a spouse and two children under the age of 16. He earns some $15,000, owns a home with a property tax assessment of $9,200 a year, insures a 1975 Impala with $200,000 public liability and $100 deductible, and which consumes 600 gallons of gasoline a year. So I am comparing identical families in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario. The ordinary person is getting along a lot better in Saskatchewan under NDP policies than the same person in the province of Ontario. He is even getting off slightly better in Saskatchewan than in Alberta, even when you take into account the tremendous wealth which Alberta has at its disposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest we all talk about Bill C-2.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I am very happy you interrupted, Mr. Speaker, because I never intended talking about taxes. It was only after our Tory friends asked me a couple of questions about tax levels in Ontario and Saskatchewan that I did so. Another hon. member asked me about Alberta, and then they wanted me to repeat it because they could not quite understand it. I am even happier, Mr. Speaker, to talk about health. Again, you can look at a comparison between the provinces when it comes to health care. You have to know which party has a philosophy which looks after ordinary people. It is one thing in the House to talk, but you have to look at political parties and judge politicians by what they do when they are in government.

We know what the government across the way has done. We have said many times we do not like a lot of the things it is doing. It should not be cutting back in this bill. But we have difficulty, sometimes, in knowing where the Tory party stand because they will speak out of both sides of their mouth depending upon which audience they are addressing. So I believe it is very important to look at their record in the provinces, and that is what I was doing in terms of per capita debt, the size of the bureaucracy, and the tax load. Now they ask me to talk about their hospital care record.

Let us have a look at Saskatchewan. Premiums on medicare in that province are zero, but the premiums in Ontario for a family of four are some $456 a year.

An hon. Member: What about New Brunswick?

Mr. Nystrom: New Brunswick as well. I do not have the figures. I assume they are high. They must be because it is a Tory province.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

An hon. Member: No, they are zero.

Mr. Nystrom: Look at the additional charges for patients. Saskatchewan does not have any additional charges, at least not now, but if we have tremendous cutbacks by the federal government then the province will have to get some money from elsewhere, and I assume they will not charge but that they will get it from resource revenue and the like. We do not have any additional charges to the people in the province, but in the province of Ontario there is an $8.60 deterrent fee for extended care in a hospital. In other words, there is a tax on the sick. I know the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) as a good Progressive Conservative, is violently opposed to such a tax—I remember his speech on the haves and the have-nots.

Look at the children's dental plan. There is one in Saskatchewan; there isn't one in Ontario. There is a hearing aid plan in Saskatchewan, there isn't one in Conservative Ontario. There is a drug prescription plan in Saskatchewan; there isn't one in Conservative Ontario. There is a plan to help people who are handicapped in the province of Saskatchewan; there isn't one in Ontario. Indeed, in Ontario they collect more money from hospitalization and medicare fees than they collect from resource revenue. I think this is a commentary on the Conservative party that every Canadian should know. Mr. Speaker, it is an utter and absolute disgrace.

One can go over all the statistics and see what the record of the Conservative party is. When they talk about restraints and cutbacks they do not mean to cut back on services to the wealthy, they are not going to cut back on their fancy tax gifts and being Santa Claus to the corporations. What they cut back, Mr. Speaker, are services to the ordinary people. They do it in areas such as the one we are discussing today, namely, medical care and hospitalization. What makes me angry is why the federal Liberal party, when they are desperate because of the results in the Gallup poll, adopt some of the policies of the nineteenth century party which sits here to my right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: There are two Tory parties. Two too many!

Mr. Nystrom: There are many things that can be said about restraint, about how it affects ordinary people. Another thing that is very interesting is the unemployment statistics which have been published recently. We find that the biggest increase in unemployment in the last year has been in the province which has been beating the drum the loudest about restraint and cutback, namely, the province of Manitoba. The average increase in unemployment in that province year over year, according to the statistics for November at least, was about 30 per cent.

If the hon. member for Lisgar has figures to refute what I say, he should get up and document them. If you look at the report from Statistics Canada you will find there has been roughly a 30 per cent increase, year over year. Of the economists I have read, most of them say that a large part of that increase is due to some of the severe cutbacks, the meat axe that Premier Sterling Lyon has taken to many decent programs in the province of Manitoba. If that is indeed the Tory policy, we should know about it before the next federal election, because we all know what the result was in Saskatchewan when people were told about Tory policy. The Tories were kept out of office in an overwhelming landslide for Premier Blakeney. In the next federal election I am sure that when the people of Saskatchewan realize where the Tory party stands—they already know where the Liberals stand, so that does not matter—the federal Tory party in that province will be about as successful, if even that successful, as Dick Collver of the provincial Tory party in the election of October 18.

I was happy to say a few words this afternoon in this debate. I think the subject matter of this debate will be at the core of a big election issue. The issue will be the whole question of restraint, cutbacks, rollbacks, and where the Tory party stands. We know where the government stands because it is government policy we are debating. We do not like it. We are voting against this bill, but I maintain that it is very important that we know where the Conservative party stands, because Conservatives are going from one part of the country to the other and saying different things to different people, and different things in different regions.

The Tories are not saying the same things about unemployment in the province of Alberta as they are saying about unemployment in, for example, the province of Newfoundland. We should know about that. We should know where the Tories stand.

It has been a long time since the Tories formed the government. In provinces were there are Conservative provincial governments the people should know where the federal Tories stand. I think actions speak louder than words, and that is why I have taken some time to respond to some Tory questions about taxes on ordinary people, about per capita debt, about bungling, and about inefficient bureaucracies which are built by the Tory party. The biggest bureaucracies and those most prone to empire building and featherbedding are those built by the Tory party, the very party which criticizes anything which is more progressive than measures taken in the nineteenth century. These facts should be pointed out to the people of this country.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, at the close of this debate I would like to make a few brief remarks on Bill C-2, the health resources fund bill. Although the bill is not a major one, its subject matter is important. The minister and a number of others who have joined in this debate have dealt with it in detail, and I do not wish to repeat their remarks.

This essentially is a bill involving federal support for training and research in the health field. That field traditionally comes under provincial jurisdiction, but over a limited period of about 14 years the federal government has provided support in the amount of about $500 million. At the present time the fund is about 85.52 per cent committed. About 15 per cent of available funds are left in the fund.

I suppose we could say that this is a motherhood issue. We all agree on the worth of the program. We all support the idea of training and research in the health field, but I think the important thing here as between the two sides of the House is the matter of understanding the situation and of setting priorities. As a country we simply cannot afford all the good programs there are or of which we could think, especially in these tight economic and competitive times. I do not believe there is any serious conflict of motives between the two sides of the House. I think there is an understanding of the situation and of the priorities.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has evoked some comment during this debate. I am thinking in terms of certain feelings the minister has about this bill which may be in conflict with the times. I think we all agree with the minister's fine human sentiments and with her support for social programs. We recognize her ability to fight for her department and for her beliefs. I think that is beyond question, but it is also beyond question that she supports this bill as a minister in a difficult and responsible position, like the other ministers in the government.

It is not easy to cut back programs. It is not easy to go into a time of restraint, particularly when we have enjoyed many good years and expansion. However, the reality is that we are in a time of restraint. Some hon. members in this House are very well qualified and have their backgrounds in health and research fields. Some of our members are physicians, chiropractors and veterinarians. Some are trained in scientific research, so there would be a natural bias in favour of research in the health field. I call on my own experience in medicine and pharmacy as well as pharmaceutical research, in making comments on a bill such as this. Naturally this bill goes against the grain. We would like to keep expanding; however, that is not our only point of discipline at the present time.

Research, particularly Canadian research in the health field, has been referred to in this debate. There is a tendency to talk about cost benefits in health research, and to some extent this is valid. However, from what I have heard it seems to me that there is a tendency to talk about successes and the cost benefits of those things which have been successful, such as the polio vaccine program. Other examples have been given. However, it seems to me that such talk is somewhat misleading, although probably not deliberate. Such talk deals with only part of the picture. It does not deal with programs which have not succeeded, and the majority of research programs in any field do not succeed in producing significant results. It does not deal with the total research picture and with how much has been invested in research. Some of our comments are very selective and very much in support of research spending.

I think back to the United States cancer program, a massive program which was announced a few years ago. The idea then was, similar to their foreign aid program after the war, that if enough money was thrown into something, good results would be the reward. There were some responsible researchers at that time who wanted support but who criticized that concept as being naive. They felt that that concept would lead to disappointment because that was not the way research worked.

There is no question that money must be involved, but what is basically needed is the right idea or a breakthrough in very sophisticated and complex scientific knowledge. One example which is often cited is in relation to my own area. At the University of Toronto Medical School two famous Canadians, Banting and Best, discovered insulin back in the 1930s. That was perhaps one of Canada's most outstanding medical discoveries, if not the most outstanding. However, it is thrown in with all the other examples, usually to indicate a need for support for medical research. However, the example itself exemplifies just the opposite. In that case a couple of devoted researchers, without any support at all—they were just allowed the use of a laboratory—and using their own funds, one summer produced a great result. That was one example of research without government or any other support.

This bill is not a major bill but it deals with an important matter. Its subject matter relates to government spending and government restraint. There are three lessons in point. One is that we have limited programs which are designed to be limited in terms of time and effects. In this case this program has almost satisfied its objectives. This matter is not far removed from the concept of sunset laws which have been suggested by many people, including some hon. members opposite.

The second point is the federal-provincial jurisdiction and responsibilities. As I mentioned before, this area should, strictly speaking, be under provincial jurisdiction. It is one area where, for the usual Canadian reasons, such as differences between provinces, temporary problems and so on, the federal government has stepped in to give support to the provinces. The provinces are usually anxious to have the feds out of their business—this is a very hot current subject. This matter is strictly under their jurisdiction and they should take it over and take responsibility for it. Of course, this matter is being resolved at present at the very important federal-provincial conferences on the constitution and on the economy.

The third point is with regard to the restraint programs in general. It involves all governments, as well as all parties, which will have to co-operate on this, despite debating techniques. There is always the question of where and how to get agreement on this. The provinces in particular are always pressing the federal government to cut back. Ironically, the greatest problem for the federal government in its spending program is the amount of federal transfer to the provinces, the amount of money the federal government returns to the provinces, according to our good colleague, the former president of the Treasury Board, now President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras).

How do we resolve the problem of waste? It will have to be taken care of by good, tight, improved management. The information which is brought out in the Auditor General's report is useful, but it is not the entire answer to this problem.

I should like to say in conclusion that although I think a cutback such as proposed in this bill, or any other type of restraint, always hurts, and there is no question that we will always be inclined to oppose it because expansion is much more fun—that is what we had for 20 or 30 years—unfortunately it is necessary at present. There is a conflict for all of us after all these good years, but obviously this bill is necessary. I believe it was undertaken responsibly by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The best we can hope for is that that type of action, although necessary, will be temporary as our economic restraint programs begin to pay off and a healthy, expanding economy begins to allow more support in this field.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable interest that I rise to speak on this bill. Perhaps it is somewhat sad to have to speak about a program, which was of considerable value, being phased out. In retrospect, it seems obvious that it is really a return to the 1960s when there was a vast push by the federal government to inflict on the provinces a heavy burden in the comprehensive health care system, over provincial objections in many cases. The principle of universality was thrust on the provinces, a move which will now have to be limited. We recognize now that these plans cannot be continued. I should like to say to my friend, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), speaking of the record in the province of Manitoba, that in the last 13 months 12,000 new jobs have been created, almost as many as the government of Mr. Schreyer created in the last three years.

Speaking of the health resource fund, it seemed like one of the better ones in that it trained people in the health professions or in occupations associated with the health professions, and in conducting research in the health field. Now that the fund is being wiped out by the federal government, the tab will have to be picked up by the provincial taxpayer or the programs will have to be deleted altogether.

It is unfortunate that the type of programs financed by this fund will fall short, and that any research program that was started in the previous three years will be wasted in view of the fact that programs are based on a five-year period. In fact, most of the programs which are in the mill, so to speak, will be of little value. Furthermore, education and research, have been the most promising fields for governments so far as health return is concerned, because the education of professionals in the area of health has brought a return over many years.

I should like to say that when the Fathers of Confederation designated the provinces to care for the health, welfare and education of their citizens, they chose very wisely. The strains on confederation in the last ten years can be directly attributed to the move of the federal government into the tax field through income tax in order to finance the federal government's incursion into health, welfare and education, areas which rightly belong to the provinces. Previous Liberal administrations have inflicted on our citizens grandiose health plans which we find we cannot now sustain. The federal government is washing its hands of the dollars needed for health care and allowing the provinces to make do as best they can, all the while attempting to force on the provinces expanded language training, thus moving into areas under their jurisdiction.

I would like to use this opportunity to discuss some of the problems associated with medical practice and health care. This bill only deals with one small portion of health care, but I should like to point out the differences between the health professions and the government and the direction of medical care in this country. Also, I should like to point out some means by which we might avoid some of the bad features of the socialized government health care system which we have at present. Although I will speak mainly of physicians in the health care field, I would like to include also other professionals involved in the health care delivery system. When I use the term physician, other disciplines in the health field are included.

There are many points of conflict between doctors and politicians, but the most fundamental one is their differing attitudes toward individual patients. Doctors who devote their professional lives to the care of patients like to feel that they have a duty to their patients on an individual basis in a one to one relationship. This is where the conflict arises between the attitude of the doctor and that of the politician who claims to have a much wider responsibility for the health of the people, so that he is not primarily interested in providing the best possible care for individual patients but is more interested in providing that care for as many people as possible, within the constraints of the available resources. The tension between the groups arises because of the demands of the individual and the priorities of the doctor, and the demands of the group and the priorities of the politician.

Politicians and doctors in their respective ways attempt to act for the good of individuals, but the doctor's action is a narrow one while the politician's is much broader. The conflict between the two groups may be summarized thus: the politician wishes to ensure that scarce skills are used for the general good, while the doctor who is confronted by a sick patient sees the good of the patient as the dominant factor. Doctors struggle for what they consider to be professional freedom and independence, whereas politicians put the need of public provision and public decisions over private decisions in health care.

Mr. Enoch Powell, the minister of health in Britain in the previous Conservative administration, has pointed out that one of the basic attitudes of the medical profession is respect for the independent and individual professional judgment made for the benefit of individual patients, whereas the politicians' concern is with the general consequences of individual decisions or, as he stated:

> The politician practices the subordination of individual judgments, while the doctor glories in the development and exercise of it.

There are other aspects to the politician. Politicians can achieve nothing without power, and in order to attain power in a democratic society they need votes. To win votes, they must convince the voters that their programs are worthy of support. Therefore it is easy to see that in the decades gone by, packages of health care programs, growing greater and more elaborate, have strained our resources, along with other transfer programs, to the extent that one-quarter of every dollar spent by the federal government has to be borrowed. Certainly this cannot continue. Of course politicians must be concerned with the health of the nation in broad terms. The scope of modern medicine is so broad and costly, and the expectations of the public so high, that politicians have become more involved in health care programs, particularly where there appear to be inequities both in terms of access and in the ability of individuals to provide for their own medical needs.

It is interesting to note that in the United Kingdom the dialogue between doctors and the state has been a long and continuing battle. Medical physicians in the United Kingdom have been attempting to preserve some independence, while the state has attempted largely to control their actions and limit their freedom of treatment. One of the great difficulties was the approach of the state to health care programs. The conventional feeling was that poor health is the direct result of poor medical care, and that if the health of the nation could be brought up to standard, then the need for medical treatment would diminish. But time has proven that the demand for health and medical care is insatiable, and that we can expect ever-increasing demands on the nation's resources of money and workers to feed this persistent expanding demand.

Medical care brings with it infinite demand on finite resources. Furthermore, it brings to the political side the necessity to make decisions as to whether primary care should be provided. Should primary care be provided by an office staffed with highly and expensively trained doctors, or should this be done by less trained and presumably cheaper professionals? Should there be increased services for the elderly and infirm? In what manner should these increased services be carried out?

At the present time there is a drive to reduce acute care beds on the basis that they are expensive and unnecessary. But, in practice, acute care beds are occupied by the productive age group of society. Keeping them out of hospital beds only prolongs their absence from work. Outpatient treatment is now in vogue. In the days of fee for service medicine, outpatient treatment was a means of saving money. But it has its drawbacks: how can we expect many people to drive 50 miles in order to attend at a hospital each morning?

Medicare and hospitalization have been installed for a number of years. They were patterned on the private experience previous to the inauguration of the health care program. But so many years have passed now that the experience of private medicine has been blurred and no longer provides signposts for guidelines. New planning must come into effect, and it must be done by people who have little actual contact with the medical world for which they will be responsible. It must come from either Ottawa or the provincial capitals. With the thrust of the bill before us, it would seem that Ottawa is tending toward getting out of this area. In the long run it will be good idea, but it poses a number of problems.

At the present time we have reached a situation where the health care system requires reorganization. Some questions must be asked. How can the health care program be constructed and administered? We must decide on the global sum available to finance such a program. How will the global sum be apportioned regionally and locally? How can individuals attain access to the system? How will physicians and others in the system be paid? In what manner will they be paid?

The obvious disadvantage of such a system is that political expediency may make the state decide to construct a health care system which does not recognize the genuine needs of patients. Because health care is more infinite in its demands and resources are finite, perhaps politicians will have to minimize expenditures on health care so that other social policies can be pursued. Politicians run from one social program to another expending their energies, particularly in an attempt to ingratiate themselves with the electorate. An attempt at distributing resources to provide an adequate level for all certainly will downgrade the maintenance of high standards and threaten excellence. The creation of a monopoly in health care will remove freedom of choice almost completely, except in a few cases.

What about physicians themselves? Individually patients usually trust their physicians, but society as a whole does not care much for doctors. Of course doctors are no different than any other professional. I should like to refer to what Samuel Hartlip once wrote of Puritan times. It reads as follows:

> The liberty of our Commonwealth is most infringed by three sorts of men—priests, physicians and lawyers. The one deceives man in matters belonging to their souls, the other in matters belonging to their bodies, and the third in matters belonging to their estates.

Indeed the profession seemed to be under some kind of attack. Now some suggests doctors must administer a proper professional altruism, while others think the public expects too much of doctors. In a general way, perhaps society expects doctors to display unalloyed altruism, and indicates surprise and indignation when doctors take on the habits of the larger society of which they are a part.

Students of the welfare state have expressed some views as to where we are going. One suggestion was that the welfare state, as we understand it, more properly should be called "the entitlement state". People accepting welfare from the state now feel they are entitled to a considerable portion of the nation's largesse, regardless of their contribution to it. Perhaps it can be described as the expectation of the ultimate responsibility of public authority that individuals are not permitted to suffer persistent deprivation and despair. We have reached the stage where we feel no one should be deprived, but this poses a challenge to both freedom and responsibility.

One can well ask how we can revive and preserve in an entitlement state the sense that rights must be earned. Entitlement is not a one way street. Society demands a contribution to the whole, not each individual securing for himself as much as he can. The transition from a welfare state to an entitlement state will result in great disruption of benefits, unless individuals capable of accepting responsibility for their welfare are encouraged to do so.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

I would regard this bill as a high water mark. In a sense it can be used to signal a new era. It can be used to ensure that those who can afford to provide their own health benefits will do so at their own expense, either totally or partially.

The criteria laid down by the federal government in many cost-shared programs always were too rigid. Many provinces had different plans to limit and provide control over the infinite demands of free health care service. Even though the federal government still provides a large amount of money, it should loosen demands and constraints in order to allow the provinces leeway to innovate and make health care delivery systems suitable to peculiar circumstances and regions.

The retention of the fee-for-service provided a much better method of payment to physicians than a total salaried or a per capitation service. A salaried system would be inappropriate because it is very difficult, as we are now finding within the civil service, to measure productivity. At one time it was thought that fee-for-service would be expensive and make for excessive medical income, but it seems to have turned out just the opposite. Medical fees have not risen as fast as the wage structure has in the early 1970s. Those who practice in offices have had their overheads substantially increased to the point where 50 per cent of their gross fees now go to overhead expenditures, as compared with 35 per cent a few years ago. Nearly all the offices of which I am aware have had little increase in actual dollars in the last few years, and if you consider inflation they have suffered a decrease in their income. This has resulted in the migratrion of physicians to the United States, particularly those who are ambitious, energetic and perhaps individualistic and who have generally found that the practice of medicine in that country has less bureaucratic interference, and that they can practice a better standard of medicine in their own individual way.

Under the present fee structure in Canada it is impossible for a physician to spend much time with an individual patient and still have a high enough income to make the profession worth while. Many doctors have stated that each year they average one or two more consultations per day. An older practitioner once said there is no way under the present fee structure that he could give the time he would like to give to individual patients and still make an adequate income or even keep his office overhead at bay. Nevertheless, the fee-for-service system has allowed physicians to give extra service and consultation to patients who wish it over and above what the medical plans allow. The plan has allowed these physicians to charge extra, enabling them to limit this demand and at the same time satisfy their patients' requests for greater care. Perhaps the provincial agency could encourage physicians who wish to practice in this manner to take on patients who may wish the extra care.

However, there is a tendency for bureaucrats to be suspicious of both physicians and patients who depart from the accepted pattern. Doctors are limited in practising outside the plan even though there is a demand for their services over and above what the plan allows. In fact if this demand grows, it indicates, presumably, that either fees are too low, the government's pay is too low, or that there are not enough physicians to go around.

As I said, Canada has lost some of its doctors to the United States. I do not consider the loss serious, however, because we are probably in an oversupply situation, and with the immigration of doctors into Canada from other parts of the world, I am sure that we have adequate numbers, even though they may not be distributed quite the way people would like.

At the hospital level, it is obvious that great changes are taking place and that bureaucratic administration, of necessity, seems to be an all-encompassing grey blanket over the time of physicians and other health care professions. I would estimate that fully one third of a physician's time in a small general hospital is taken up with paper work, which takes away from the medical treatment for patients, but seems to be necessary to get through the bureaucratic jungle of a hospital. The accreditation service of hospitals may have originally been a help, but it has created a vast waste in terms of the time of physicians, management and other staff within the hospitals, who must get ready for the visit of the often uninformed inspector who comes from an entirely different environment.

It seems to me that hospitals should be encouraged to set aside a small number of beds for patients who desire privacy or admission at their convenience and are willing to pay for it. I have already stated that there is an infinite demand for medical service today, but only finite resources. The rate charged for those wishing these special services would have to be high enough to return to the hospital enough extra income to provide for some of the amenities, but more than that, would provide extra funds at the administrative level for their own use. One of the great difficulties of hospital management is that they have no money to spend on their own, but are controlled by the provincial paying agency.

Of necessity, health care and health decisions must be made by managers who are not themselves health professionals, and it is difficult for them to understand the rationale of health decisions. The management of hospitals and general medical care must become more divorced from the day to day operations of medical care. Unless conditions change, many professionals now in the health care field will leave and take up other endeavours where the pay and conditions of work are better and where they would not have to work under a non-understanding bureaucracy.

I am glad that I have had this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to put on the record some of my thoughts with regard to health care, of which this bill forms a small part.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook)—Health and Welfare—Request government reconsider cut in family planning grants program; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway)—Urban Affairs—Interdepartmental committee to study urban affairs; the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Grain—Movement of grain—Purchase of hopper cars.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

AMENDING MEASURE TO EXCLUDE MINING CORPORATIONS FROM APPLICATION OF ACT

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved that Bill C-205, to amend the Export Development Act (mining business), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my bill, C-205, is to exclude mining companies from the application of the Export Development Corporation, a very straightforward proposal and a rational approach to a serious problem.

I am sure that there is no question in the minds of many thousands of Canadians that we face a crisis in this economy when workers in Stewart, British Columbia, in the riding of Skeena, are laid off because the mine is closing down. The situation is further illustrated when Inco announces a lay-off of 3,000 people, when Falconbridge cuts back its work force, when Alcan closes its flourspar mine in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland and moves to Mexico, and when Inco moves to Guatemala and Indonesia, when Buchans in Newfoundland is threatened by Arco that they will be closing down their operation, when Thompson workers are affected by lay-offs. There are many workers who recognize that there is a crisis in the economy.

I believe all Canadians recognize that we have a serious problem with respect to unemployment in this country. It seems to me that the government has a serious responsibility having given so much of the Canadian tax dollar and so much Canadian property to so few in terms of the mining companies. The quid pro quo would be more employment generated as a result of those particular handouts. Indeed, we do have a serious problem in the mining and manufacturing industry in Canada.

I found some very interesting reading in a book put out by the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The book is entitled "Mining to Manufacturing—Links in a Chain". I thought the title was excellent because it shows that mining and manufacturing really are links in the same chain. The writers of the publication set out to have a look at the situation as it exists in Canada and to find out how many jobs were lost because we did not do enough manufacturing, and what could be gained if we started to do the work here. To quote from the book:

> Canada exports large quantities of relatively unprocessed materials and in return imports more highly fabricated products, and consequently, exports goods producing relatively low economic impact while importing goods are potentially high economic impact.

There was an example given of the mining sector. It said:

> There are apparent opportunities for proportionately much greater economic benefits to Canada from all the major mineral commodities if mine output were metallurgically processed and fabricated either for export or to replace imports.

The specific example of nickel was given as follows:

> Thirty-eight per cent of the total fabricated nickel supply is imported.

Does the seriousness of that statement impact on us at all?

The book continues:

> Approximately 10 per cent of nickel primary supply is imported.

It was also stated that 83 per cent of nickel was exported by the second or smelting and refining stage. What all of this boils down to is about the same thing that we have been saying all along on this side of the House. We are exporting raw materials. Along with those raw materials we are exporting jobs. We are exporting jobs in the manufacturing sector to those countries that refine and use our minerals in industry and in turn sell those finished products back to us. We are talking about a rather vast amount of money and hundreds of thousands of jobs.

In Canada the value of non-fuel mineral production reached $8.2 billion in 1977. That came to 4 per cent of our gross national product. Now consider that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in its book has already admitted that we export our raw materials and import manufactured goods. Consider also it was stated in the book that ten times as much labour was required at the fourth level of production, say the making of copper pipe, as is required at the first level, or mining. Consider that four times as much work and labour are required at the third level which might be, for example, fabricated nickel, as is required at the mining stage. When all of that is taken into consideration, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that we do have a great potential for jobs in Canada. Indeed, it amounts to hundreds of thousands of jobs.

It is equally clear that this country lacks any sort of long-term planning and development of an industrial strategy that will put Canadians to work and create hundreds of thousands of jobs. The book graphically describes that this feat could be within our grasp. The export sector of our economy is an integral part of that kind of long-term planning. Incidentally, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) dismissed this out of hand the other night when he brought down the budget. When we permit the export of capital from Canada we are ensuring that we are locked in forever into a cycle of ripping out resources and shipping them abroad, and along with those resources we ship out the jobs.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has said repeatedly that we have a kind of co-ordinated strategy. On June 20, 1978, when I said in this House there was no co-ordinated strategy, the minister said, "It is being co-ordinated". That, Mr. Speaker, is not true. We do not have any kind of long-term strategy, let alone a co-ordinated one. That is the problem which my private member's bill meets. We are trying to prevent this kind of fiscal adventurism by foreign mining companies, multinational in nature, beyond the borders of Canada at this particular time, in our development of the mining industry. We are not talking about nickels and dimes. We are talking about billions of Canadian dollars which are being diverted out of the country to develop foreign mines which at some point will compete with Canadian mining industries. There can be no question that this will have a detrimental effect on the Canadian economy.

There can be no doubt that as we set up loans to sell mining equipment to Panama, what we have is a trade-off between the gain of short-term manufacturing jobs in Toronto at the expense of long-term mining jobs in such places as Stewart, B.C., the Sudbury basin, Thompson, Manitoba, and in Newfoundland. The list goes on and on.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce made the point obvious to me in a letter he wrote on August 31, 1978. I had previously written to the minister criticizing the EDC loan to Panama which was made to develop copper resources of Panama. The Minister said this in his letter:

> A project such as the one in Panama cannot be completed over night. By the time the Canadian companies involved and EDC have made the most careful assessment of risks, analysed feasibility studies, applied the strict rules we have concerning Canadian content of any of the equipment, machinery or services in connection with such a venture; planned the project, shipped the machinery, installed it, ensured that the right infrastructure is in position and handed it over, many years will have gone by. We must not look at the situation in 1978, but rather in 1983 or even later.

That is exactly the point, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed unfortunate that this government and the Export Development Corporation are not looking into the future of what the development of one of the world's largest copper projects will do to our own copper mining industry. The billions of dollars we are investing now have both long and short term effects. There is no denying that the support for exports does provide jobs. EDC does an ample job of showing this money which they send out of the country does produce short-term manufacturing jobs in Canada, and we cannot object to the jobs they create. We have no objection to finished rails being shipped to Mexico for its railway system. We cannot object to the EDC selling components to Brazil for a hydro system there. We have no quarrel with that.

Let us look at some examples and keep in mind the short-term and long-term benefits. The one most prominent example is Inco. Inco is involved with the development of lateritic nickel in Indonesia and Guatemala. In fact Inco's Guatemalan operation went on stream on July 12 of this year and will produce 25 million pounds of nickel annually. The Export Development Corporation supported those two developments in Guatemala and Indonesia to the tune of $77 million.

Here we have a situation in which Inco has laid off thousands of workers this year in Canada while at the same time bringing a new nickel source on stream. We must keep in mind that the Guatemalan operation will lose money this year because of the process being used. Inco, however, has guaranteed that the product will be sold at a price that will bring a return to the Guatemalan economy. That statement is supported by the Latin American Economic Report, and I quote:

> Since 1973 the price of oil and worldwide inflation have raised production costs above the world nickel price, forcing Inco to give guarantees that all output would be sold at a price which would allow the Guatemalan company to cover its financial obligations until they were paid off.

Isn't that wonderful? This large multinational mining company is presently laying off workers who are on strike because they are crying poverty. They only made $100 million last year in their profit. In the third quarter, they only made $67 million net profit, yet they cried poverty. They cannot afford to pay their workers a decent wage even though they originally allowed to build up a stockpile of over a year's supply of nickel.

That company has fled Canada and is developing the resource in Guatemala and Indonesia. Lo and behold, who is there helping them—the Export Development Corporation! I know the parliamentary secretary will argue that that loan of $77 million created some jobs. Sure it did, but where are those jobs?

Mr. Philbrook: In Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: Those jobs are in southern Ontario, in the golden horseshoe.

Mr. Philbrook: That is in Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is not in northern Ontario where the stuff is mined. That is where the people suffer. That is where they are laid off. I wish the hon. member from southern Ontario who has the temerity to interject from time to time would make a speech.

Mr. Philbrook: I will.

Mr. Rodriguez: None of these workers can leave the Sudbury basin and pick up a job in southern Ontario. That is a dangerous situation. We have not developed the mining industry in this country to maturity. We do not have the infrastructure to develop the resource to a finished product. That is where the jobs are. They are in finishing the raw resource, not shipping it out.

Every time the Export Development Corporation makes a loan to a multinational mining company for it to develop its resource abroad, it does us considerable harm down the road. That is compounded by the announcement in the budget speech that the mining companies will now get a 100 per cent write-off on the development of new mines. Those policies are superimposed on a situation where we have developed over the years and will continue to develop as hewers of wood and drawers of water. I cannot see any attempt to turn that around. It would be better, as recommended in the booklet of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, to go from mining to manufacturing. It is a chain. It is interconnected.

Recognizing that, would it not have been logical for the Minister of Finance to have given the 100 per cent write-off on developing the infrastructure at the source where the resource is mined to take it to a finished product? Would that not have made more sense? It would have at least indicated that we are trying to break out of this vicious cycle of ripping out stuff and shipping it abroad. We cannot go on in that way.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) comes up with doling out more Canada Works money. Does that make sense, shoving it one end and allowing a rip-off program at the other?

How do you justify the Department of Economic Expansion, which has designated areas, pumping out money to industry to go into those areas, while at the same time the Export Development Corporation is inciting corporations to stay and in fact expand in the golden triangle? If you look at those new programs, you see that one negates the other. It does not make any sense.

I now want to touch on the Panamanian deal. That is quite an interesting situation. It is a real rat's nest. There we have one of the world's largest copper deposits.

Let us look at the firms that have been involved there. Canadian Javelin first opened the project. John Doyle was the promoter of the Canadian Javelin Company. Later on Noranda became involved. Note all these good corporate patriotic citizens. Guess who finally ended up managing the whole shebang? Guess who is doing that while enjoying a nice 20 per cent equity in the project? It is none other than Texas Gulf Incorporated. What is a nice Canadian Development Corporation Company like that doing in such a den of snakes? Canadian taxpayers own that company through the Canadian Development Corporation. One would expect that corporation to be dedicated to creating jobs in Canada. I do not understand it.

The minister says that operation will go into effect in 1983. It will compete in the area of jobs with the Canadian copper industry which does not have the infrastructure strength that it ought to have at this time.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are giving me the signal like horses coming through the gate for the start. I will, therefore, conclude. The argument we make is that the mining sector should be excluded from the provinces of the Export Development Corporation. Jobs are at issue. An infrastructure around the mining sector in this country is important. If the EDC has money to lend, it ought to be loaned for the development of that sort of infrastructure and to develop those kinds of jobs in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Export Development Act voted in 1969 gave extensive powers to the corporation, which was in a position to borrow, deal with or provide security for loans, conclude insurance contracts, grant export credits and provide guarantees for export and investment operations abroad. I think that the best way to proceed is to analyze its activities and their effects in each sector.

Let us begin by the export loans area. Those loans are granted to importing countries to enable them to purchase goods and services from a Canadian supplier. It makes it possible to preserve if not to create some jobs. In 1977, the value of export financing exceeded $1 billion for the first time. This was an increase of 30 per cent over the 1976 figure which amounted to $736 million. Canadian export sales made possible by those loans were beneficial to more than 50 exporters and over 250 main subcontractors under 42 agreements signed with 22 countries. That money is not going out of the country, it is used to pay for the purchase of machinery manufactured in Canada which will serve in the development of these projects. As far as the export credit insurance program is concerned, this service offers to Canadian export companies general or individual insurance policies which cover any risk which commercial insurance companies do not cover. Among these risks, let us mention wars that might start in the importer's country, default in payment by the foreign purchaser of Canadian services and products, and so on.

These insurance policies favour the export of Canadian goods and eliminates certain risks which unfortunately do exist in some countries. Mr. Speaker, in 1977 the balance of insured exports reached the record level of $1.45 billion. The increase in the value of exports insured in 1976 is about $100 million. Moreover, the corporation offers services to companies wishing to invest in foreign countries, which allows Canadian businessmen to invest without worrying about policies which could jeopardize their investments.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the corporation is relying more and more on international money markets as a source of funds. Which means that it is borrowing abroad to lend abroad. The result of this, as far as our balance of payment is concerned, is to transform a credit operation into a cash operation. Thanks to this new procedure, the corporation need no longer borrow from the consolidated revenue fund, as it used to.

I should like to remind hon. members that this Crown corporation is a profitable venture, as its net benefits for 1977 amounted to $18.7 million, an increase of 6 per cent over 1976. Our per capita exports amount to $2,000 and represent approximately 22 per cent. Canada ranks among the top countries of the world which rely most on their exports. In 1976 it could become the seventh largest exporting country of the world for the value of its exports and the second for its per capita value.

This clearly demonstrates the importance of our exports and of the part the Export Development Corporation must continue to play to help our country create new jobs and realize its trading potential.

We must rely more and more on the export of goods and related services to ensure our economic growth and reinforce our industrial sector. I have often heard hon. members say in the House that our manufacturing industries could not sustain competition or that our deficit was way too big in view of the products manufactured here. Surely, the Export Development Corporation has helped enormously to increase the exportation of our manufactured products.

The EDC is probably the most misunderstood corporation in Canada. Many members opposite and many Canadians do not really understand the government and the EDC role. A few months ago there were lay-offs at Inco. Deep concern was expressed because Inco had built nickel mines in Guatemala and Indonesia and it was said that in some way this resulted in fewer jobs for Canadians. In this particular case, EDC granted approximately $20.75 million for the Guatemala mine and $57.25 million for the Indonesia mine.

I will explain what really happened. The project was well underway and Inco came to EDC to obtain financing guarantees. It stated it would buy about $1 million's worth of goods in Canada. EDC accepted that amount as being sufficient and, after many discussions, finally obtained that the other party agree to purchase more goods manufactured in Canada, in fact up to $60 million worth of them. About $900 million were spent on the project and nickel mines were opened up in both countries thanks to financing advanced by Japan, Germany and Great Britain. On the other hand, EDC gave assistance by selling mining equipment in both countries. We sold for 4,800 man-years of work in Canada, which is why I can say that EDC thus creates jobs.

Here is another example of the work performed by the Export Development Corporation, with a view of creating jobs in Canada: On April 5 last, the biggest insurance contract ever for a company, covering sales for $1 billion, was signed by Bell Canada with Saudi Arabia; that figure includes $250 million in guarantees and $180 million in export credit guarantees. That sale will represent no less than 2,500 man-years of employment for Canadians. I am giving you those few specific examples to give parliament and our fellow citizens an idea of what EDC really accomplishes.

On March 9, 1978 it agreed to make loans for a total amount of $57 million towards the sale to Argentina of technical and mining equipment estimated at $67 million made by the Canadian companies Sandwell and Company Limited of Vancouver, and SNC-Rust Limited of Montreal. There again, those decisions led to the creation of an incredible number of jobs in Canada. On October 3, 1978, EDC announced that it had agreed to lend $218 million to H.A. Simons (Overseas) Ltd. of Vancouver, to help it build a pulp mill in Czechoslovakia. The following day, Mr. Speaker, it announced that it had set up an important line of credit, for $1.2 billion, with Algeria, which will allow the creation or continuation of Canadian jobs, for Canadians, in the country. Small business profit as much by these operations as large ones. For example, one need only refer to the list of subcontractors for the steel mill project on the Raritan River, in Perth Amboy, New Jersey.

Suppliers include Provincial Crane Limited of Niagara Falls, which will supply $2.6 million worth of cranes; the Lake Ontario Steel Company of Whitby which will supply $461,000 worth of steel reinforcements; Canadian General Electric of Scarborough which will supply $1,780,000 worth of main control continuous current motors and thus create 77 man-years of work; Whiting Equipment Ltd. of Welland will supply a $1,521,000 electric arc kiln; Concast Canada Limited of Montreal will supply a $2,230,000 molding machine and Brown Boveri Canada Limited of Pointe-Claire will supply $1,730,000 of electric systems and controls and thus create 54 man-years of work.

Here are other companies who took part in similar operations.

The EDC helped Versatile Manufacturing Limited of Winnipeg, shipyards both on the east and west coasts, and mining and nickel industries in Ontario. In fact, it helped substantially the nickel industry. If we are to encourage our secondary industries, we need agencies like the EDC. All the large exporting countries have exactly the same type of agency. Anyone who has the slightest idea of what economics are all about knows that it is ridiculous to question that corporation, perhaps to ask for its abolition, to refuse to export machinery and equipment to countries like Poland.

We would not leave our industries to their own fate on world markets where they will have to face the American EX-IM or Japanese, German and French financial companies; they need the help of a similar agency. The EDC works hard to help Canadian manufacturers, just like EX-IM helps U.S. manufacturers and financial companies help Japanese, German and French manufacturers.

The main criticism levelled at the Export Development Corporation concerns the fact that it is used to finance industries which compete with those already established in Canada. Since certain people and certain parties have left Canadians with the false impression that by financing Canadian industries in other countries, the EDC somehow contributes to the loss of jobs in Canada, I believe it is important to refute this immediately in the House. Major capital projects will be implemented in Indonesia, Poland and Iran whatever happens, with or without Canada's participation.

These projects will be launched. Third world countries and other developing countries will build their own paper plants. If they have nickel or copper deposits, they will not be content to do nothing about them.

If my friends in the opposition do not agree with me on this point, if they refuse to admit that these projects will be seen through with or without our participation, if they wish Japanese, West German or British companies to become established throughout the world while ours remain in Canada, let them say so! Let the Japanese, the West Germans and the British open up mines in Indonesia and Guatemala. Let them submerge us with their capital while we do nothing and refuse to invest in industries which could compete with our own. When they suggest that capital projects in Poland, Iran and Indonesia would not be carried out without the participation of Canada, they are misleading Canadians. These projects will become reality whatever happens. The only issue is whether Canadian manufacturers will benefit from a part of these projects. It is only a matter of allowing them to participate.

There is no alternative. We must simply decide whether Canada will participate in certain projects and whether employment will be created because of this participation. It is ridiculous to pretend that these financing programs reduce the number of jobs in Canada. This may create a certain competition for Canadian products, but if Canada did not participate in these projects, this competition would come from Japan, Germany or the United Kingdom. Their plants manufacture the material. You either take advantage of it or think we are poor economists. In this era of instantaneous world communications, locally minded people do not go very far. Indeed, the figures speak for themselves. The Export Development Corporation is a Crown corporation of which Canadians can be proud. The good reputation it has all around the world is shared by Canada and all its people. In addition, through its operations it contributes a lot to the industrial and economic expansion of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) speaks of industrial strategy and coordination, I say to him that this government in the past two years got on the best track with respect to coordination, and the appointment of Mr. Andras to the new department is a concrete sign of that. But it is easy, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Nickel Belt does, to sit around a table with good wine and theoretically write the best industrial strategy. But in that respect, I think my experience is somewhat broader than his, and I ask him to table a serious document really showing us what to do. Did we not do enough through the interventions of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in his own area, in the case of the investment by Ford, among other things? Coming from Quebec, I can easily imagine the frustration of the people of Sudbury at not getting that project. But, Mr. Speaker, we offered a clearly more substantial amount to that company to go and locate in a designated area, whether it be Quebec or Sudbury, and they refused. Economic planning the way the hon. member for Nickel Belt would want to have it is the best way precisely to see our investment go away.

The haphazard socialism of the hon. member for Nickel Belt should be a disgrace to many other members of the New Democratic Party who do not share at all the same point of view as the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Fortunately, that party has members with another and clearly more practical approach than that hon. member who is only trying to get elected by blaming it all on a company, a Crown corporation, and thinking that by getting everyone upset in his riding he is going to get re-elected. I will be looking for him in the next election campaign.

[English]

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to add a few comments in the debate on Bill C-205 proposed by my friend, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). The hon. member seems to have a one-track mind: right train, wrong track. Or to put it a little more diplomatically, he has a single-minded approach to the subject of the Export Development Corporation. The questions he has raised here today are not new. He raised them during the debates on Bill C-47 in May and June of 1977 and on Bill C-36 in April, May and June, 1978. He has asked the same question dozens of times and has received the answer dozens of times. Just for my friend's sake we will try it just once more.

The hon. member seems to believe that Canada can arbitrarily influence other countries to cease developments if we refuse to supply them. We do not have a unique technology. If we do not sell, others will.

Mr. Rodriguez: Let's develop our own first.

Mr. Philbrook: I will elaborate on that point in a few minutes. On the other hand, one thing I would like to know is how the hon. member and his colleagues in the New Democratic Party, with its humanitarian posture, feel about development and jobs in less privileged countries than Canada including—and I say this respectfully—his own place of origin, Guyana.

Let us look at what the Export Development Corporation does. It is probably the most written about and talked about Crown corporation—favourably—and probably one of the least understood. First, let me describe what it does not do. It never gives away money, never subsidizes anyone for any reason, never lends money to Canadian companies, is self-financing and is not in the aid business.

According to EDC brochures, its goal is to facilitate Canadian export trade through the provision of loans, insurance and foreign investment guarantees. Its insurance covers many risks. It can be protection against non-payment for goods and services by foreign buyers, covering either commercial risks, bankruptcy, insolvency, repudiation of debt and so forth or political risks, war, riot, insurrection, convertibility problems and other problems. This insurance can be on all export volume in a year or on a contract by contract basis. The EDC also provides surety insurance to Canadian exporters, covering the risk of wrongful call on bank guarantees or surety bonds by foreign buyers. A new service offered is contractors' surety, which covers contractors involved in construction projects abroad. The EDC's insurance covers all sizes and varieties of exporters, large and small.

Another service is foreign investment guarantees. This insurance covers investments abroad by Canadian companies. Insurance is offered only when the EDC is convinced that the proposed investment is beneficial and acceptable to the host country and, more importantly, that there is a major return to the Canadian economy.

The service which attracts most of the attention and misguided criticism is the EDC's loan facility. The EDC lends money to foreign buyers of Canadian goods and services. These loans are fully secured and negotiated at rates of interest above the cost of money to the EDC.

Funds for these loans come from world capital markets, not out of taxpayers' pockets. The money never leaves Canada, as the EDC, acting on behalf of the foreign buyer, disburses directly to the Canadian exporter as he exports. To assure that Canadian jobs are being created or maintained, the EDC ensures that in each transaction Canadian content is maximized. In recognition of the importance of the role of developing and maximizing Canadian industry participation in each transaction, the EDC closely monitors the application of corporate Canadian content objectives. Thus, when loans are made to finance sales of Canadian equipment and services to projects being built in other countries, jobs in Canada's manufacturing industry are being created or maintained. One thing must remain clear: If there are no Canadian sales, then there is no EDC financing or any EDC insurance.

All the major trading nations of the world provide government support to facilitate trade. EDC facilities help Canadian exporters to meet competition on a non-subsidized basis. If a product or service is competitive in price, quality, delivery and service, the EDC enables the exporter to offer competitive credit terms. The EDC attempts to neutralize financing as a consideration in the awarding of contracts.

This bill is based on one of the most frequent misconceptions about the EDC. The hon. member feels that the EDC and Canada should not finance sales to industries or projects which may prove competitive to the Canadian mining industry. This rests on the belief that such action would benefit Canada by eliminating this competition. The problem with that thesis is that, by corollary, it must presume that Canada can prevent another country from developing projects and, that Canada is the sole proprietor of viable technology. However, the fact remains that, whether we like it or not, we live in a fiercely competitive world economic environment. If Canada does not sell mining technology, Great Britain, France, Germany, Japan, the United States, Sweden and a host of other countries will.

Canada has no monopoly on either the technology or the capability for sale and construction of capital intensive projects. This has been explained and re-explained to the hon. member. He said during his speech that he hoped the hon. member from southern Ontario over here would have the temerity to stand up and say something. Well, now he is hearing it, but he is hearing the same thing he has heard many times. On May 3, 1978, during the meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs studying Bill C-36, the extent of EDC's participation in the Inco-Indonesia and Inco-Guatemala decisions was explained step by step.

The decision to go ahead in these cases had already been made by the buyer—that is, the foreign country; and EDC turned $1 million of procurement into $80 million on a $900 million project. This rationale was repeated over and over at subsequent meetings, but some hon. members, including the hon. member for Nickel Belt, would not accept the explanation.

Mr. Rodriguez: Never.

Mr. Philbrook: They seem either unwilling or unable to accept some very basic truths.

Mr. Rodriguez: Both.

Mr. Philbrook: Indonesia and Guatemala decided that they wanted to develop their nickel deposits. Had Inco been unable to go along with government plans, another company would have been given the options. The basic decision having been made—whether or not Canada liked it being of very little importance—the next step was equipping the mines. Canada, largely through EDC, received, as I said earlier, $80 million worth, creating or maintaining 4,000 man-years of employment. Had EDC not participated, the net result would have been $80 million going to another country, 4,000 jobs going to another country, and the unfortunate lay-offs in Sudbury taking place anyway.

Mr. Rodriguez: What about R and D in mining?

Mr. Philbrook: The question for the foreign buyer was "Where will the equipment be bought?", not, "Should we develop our resources or not?".

The Export Development Corporation has had an excellent track record in assisting Canadian manufacturers to land sizeable contracts which would otherwise have gone to foreign competitors. In Poland, for example, the recent contract for the construction of a pulp and paper mill had virtually been awarded to the Findlanders, a fait accompli, including the sale and financing. Through the efforts of a Canadian trade official in Warsaw, negotiations were reopened with the Poles. He persuaded them to hire H. A. Simons Ltd. of Vancouver as consulting engineers, thus helping to open the door for Canadian equipment subsuppliers as well. EDC supported H. A. Simons and got the Poles to use their services on a $50 million plus contract. Also forthcoming were equipment orders of at least $250 million as part of the whole package.

We have no direct control over what other countries do with their economies. We must try to capitalize on these opportunities to sell as many goods and services as possible. They are going to proceed, whether or not we fight, yell, scream and protest. Given a choice between half a loaf or none, which would you choose?

Mr. Rodriguez: Developing our own industry.

Mr. Philbrook: I think most Canadians would agree. The effect of this bill would be to prevent the use of EDC's services by viable sectors of the Canadian economy. All mining equipment, mining exploration and support companies would find exporting much more difficult. Not only would we lose the jobs related to these sales, but also the capacity to keep up with foreign competition, which is probably the most important challenge we face today. The effects on the Canadian industry would be horrendous.

This is an ill-advised bill. It is worse than ill-advised, it is harmful and should be withdrawn. From the prattling I have heard from the hon. member who introduced the bill, I doubt whether he has been able either to understand or accept this explanation.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-205 which was introduced by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) represents a long standing issue, one which relates to the old chestnut that the Export Development Corporation is financing mining projects abroad which some day might compete with mining projects in Canada.

I should like to quote from the News of Truro, Nova Scotia, an article by John D. Harbron, a foreign affairs analyst from the Thomson News Service. He writes:

> It's hard to understand why the trade union movement and the New Democratic Party, so concerned with our high unemployment, continue to attack the Export Development Corporation for financing overseas business for Canadian industry—
> The Export Corporation's latest annual report indicates it had created 200,000 jobs during 1977 with a total of $1.2 billion in new export sales.

Bill C-205 aims to restrict EDC from supporting companies and individuals engaged in the business of mining in Canada or controlled by persons engaged in the business of mining. As has been pointed out by my colleagues, whether or not the Government of Canada supports mining companies in Canada through EDC in exploration or development abroad, as sure as God made little green apples those projects will go ahead. The hon. member for Nickel Belt laughs, and well he should laugh because he has no idea of economics.

Perhaps it would be a good idea for me to quote a Timmins newspaper because maybe it relates to the hon. member. This is from an article which appeared in the Timmins Daily Press of September 16.

Mr. Rodriguez: Another Thomson paper?

Mr. Anderson: It reads:

One of the beauties of being the mouthpiece of labour, which means that favour must be curried at all times, is that logic can be tossed out the window and your intelligence given a permanent holiday.

The decision to establish a nickel mining operation in Indonesia or copper mines in Panama is not dependent upon decisions made in Canada. They are decisions made in the host company, and the only question that comes up is whether Canada will participate in those developments, whether goods and services will be bought in Canada or, as the hon. member for Nickel Belt would have it, whether those jobs should go to Germany, Japan, Italy, France or Great Britain. For a person who is interested in jobs for Canadians, I must say the hon. member is a sad example of someone who wishes to create jobs in Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: What about our mining industry?

Mr. Anderson: If a project is proven feasible on the basis of world commodity markets and on the basis of the economics of the mining operations, then the host country, with or without Canada's acceptance, rejection or participation, will exploit the opportunity. Does anyone blame them? Would there be any company in Canada in the mining industry which, on discovering a fantastic gold body, would wait to find out whether the United States or the United Kingdom would wish to participate in it? It would be exploited and explored to the benefit of Canadians, regardless of what other countries became involved.

So why do we have to go through the exercise every three or four months of explaining to the hon. member for Nickel Belt that all we do through EDC is to make sure that a part of the development which takes place in other countries is of some benefit to workers in Canada? I wish the hon. member would stand up on some other occasion, perhaps in areas where jobs are created by EDC, and tell the people that his party is opposed to having industrial development in Canada based on the development that is taking place in another country. I do not think he would do this for two reasons: first, he knows it is patently false; and second, I do not think he has the nerve to do it.

The technology and the sale of equipment to Canadian companies, especially in the mining industry since we are talking about the mining industry, is tremendously important in the sense that many of our companies which supply mining material and which supply technology for the mining industry can only exist in Canada if they have a foreign market, because Canada is not the largest market in the world for this type of development. These companies rely on having access to foreign markets. If we allowed the hon. member's bill to go through, it would bankrupt numerous companies which supply the mining industry not only in Canada, but throughout the world.

Unfortunately the hon. member for Nickel Belt has no idea of economics. That is evident from the remarks he made when introducing Bill C-205 and other occasions when the Export Development Corporation subject was brought up in the House.

Mining projects abroad are costing in the order of $1 billion each. These projects span a period of at least five years. They require extensive planning and result in long-term manufacturing jobs. Although these particular projects are worth $1 billion each, they add only a few percentage points to the world stock of nickel, copper or whatever.

Mr. Rodriguez: Baloney!

Mr. Anderson: Apparently the hon. member for Nickel Belt disagrees with that comment. Of course, he does not agree with very much, so one would not expect him to agree with that comment.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt brought up the question of Panama. I should like to refer to that matter. Recently there has been some press coverage regarding EDC financing in the order of $1 billion to Empresa de Cobre Cerro Colorado S.A., a copper mining project in Panama.

Mr. Rodriguez: Your Spanish is awful.

Mr. Anderson: Perhaps my Spanish is awful, but I was referring to a copper mining project in Panama. The required financing would be to support the sale of equipment and servicesby Canadian exporters for copper mining, concentrating, smelting and to cover local costs. The project would be for one of the world's largest copper ore bodies. It involves a four to five year construction period and the development of a port facility. Feasibility studies have been undertaken by some of the leading consulting firms in the world. Approximately six companies have studied engineering, capital and operating costs, price and market demand forecasts, and financial analyses.

Texas Gulf Canada, Ltd. and a consortium of Canadian companies will supply equipment and services to the buyer. The project calls for an open pit mine, fed by 25 million to 30 million tonnes of ore per year.

I should like to refer to the cruncher, and I hope the hon. member will pay close attention to what I am about to say. The project could involve approximately 30 Canadian companies. It will provide some 30,000 to 40,000 man-years of Canadian employment for manufacturers and suppliers across Canada. This is at a time when we recognize that our economy is soft, that we are not utilizing fully the resources in Canada, and when there is underemployment. When we have an opportunity to create this number of man-years in jobs, the hon. member for Nickel Belt says, "To hell with it, we do not need those jobs. Let the Japanese have them; let the Germans have them".

Mr. Rodriguez: That is not what I said.

Mr. Anderson: Bill C-205 would not allow that participation of Canadian companies.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is misinterpreting what I have said. At no point did I say—

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Then I rise on another point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): If the hon. member has a point of order, the Chair will hear it.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member is taking what I have said and extending it beyond its original meaning. He is misleading the House and the public when he does that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member is giving his interpretation of what the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has said, which is his right in the House.

Mr. Anderson: Bill C-205 aims to restrict the Export Development Corporation from supporting companies and individuals which are engaged in the business of mining in Canada or are controlled by persons engaged in the business of mining in Canada. In the case brought forward by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the Panama project could involve some 30,000 to 40,000 man-years of Canadian employment in mining for suppliers located across Canada. Bill C-205 would not allow the 30,000 to 40,000 man-years which would accrue to Canada if our bid on this project is successful.

Mr. Rodriguez: Bull roar!

Mr. Anderson: The hon. member cannot have it both ways. He has brought forth a bill which would restrict EDC from supporting Canadian enterprise in the mining field.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is not correct.

Mr. Anderson: Perhaps the hon. member would want to withdraw the bill. I would have a difficult time going back to my constituency and saying, "We have just cut 30,000 to 40,000 prospective jobs in Canada because we agreed with the bill put forward by the hon. member for Nickel Belt". If the hon. member is not against the creation of these jobs in Canada, then he should withdraw his bill. That would be the honourable thing to do. It is absolute stupidity to bring forward a bill which would curtail industrial development in Canada at this time when we are underutilizing our present industrial capacity.

This is not the first time this has happened in the House. One cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You ought to know.

Mr. Anderson: According to the annual report of the Export Development Corporation, it created 700,000 jobs in Canada and $1.2 billion in new export sales. That means jobs are being created in the country. Yet the hon. member for Nickel Belt said that we should get rid of it.

Mr. Rodriguez: How many jobs have we lost?

Mr. Anderson: The hon. member for Nickel Belt opposes the Export Development Corporation. He is willing to lose the 700,000 jobs and any further jobs which EDC can create.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Miss Bégin) that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to take part in this debate on Bill C-2 regarding the Health Resources Fund Act it is interesting to note that I was here in the House when the original bill was first introduced by the present government House leader, who was then health minister. I have followed the act's progress with a good deal of feeling over the years because of my interest in how it might increase research activity, an increase that was certainly necessary at the time. This is apparent when we stop to consider that more scientists lived and worked in this century than lived and worked since dawn. When we realize this we must concede that there have been terrific advances in science, not only because of the numbers involved, but because each discovery has led to something else and there has been a compounding effect. Scientists have carried on with new ideas and new discoveries.

I have listened to the speeches during this debate with a great deal of satisfaction. They have been excellent speeches. I was in the House when national medicare and the Health Resources Fund Act were introduced. Let me give a little of the scientific history of the nineteenth century. During that time Jenner discovered vaccination which has proved to be such a boon. This was a scientific discovery by a general practitioner in the U.K. In France there was the discovery by Pasteur of the germ theory, and Lister put this theory into practice in surgery using an antiseptic spray in the operating room to kill bacteria. I have had the privilege of seeing the equipment used in the operating rooms of hospitals in England, here in Canada and elsewhere. In addition, Madame Curie in France made a great discovery—radium.

At the beginning of the twentieth century our average life expectancy was a little over 40 years. Today the average life expectancy is about 75 years. In the early days infectious diseases were our main killers. We had our pneumonias, scarlet fever, typhoid fever and diphtheria. These were the major killers of individuals up to age 35.

This picture has almost changed completely. The big killer today of individuals from birth to age 35 is accident. This is an altogether different world from that point of view, and an altogether different world we are living in from a scientific point of view.

At the beginning of this century the wards of the existing hospitals were filled to overflowing with patients suffering from typhoid fever in the fall months. Every bed in the hospitals was filled, and you could see the ice buckets out in the wards for the fever baths. I have talked to doctors who have experienced this. We then learned that this was a disease caused by the environment and hygiene. We then took measures to stamp out typhoid fever by isolating the organism and developing a vaccine, thus treating the environment. Had this not been done the first world war could not have been fought on the scale it was.

From there we go on to the antitoxins and the development of toxoids to prevent diphtheria. I can still remember vividly an experience, when I was seven years of age living on the farm, concerning the family next door. The mother had gone to Toronto where she had died in hospital. One of her children who had been to Toronto contracted diphtheria, and in that family of 13 five of the children were wiped out in the space of about three weeks. Diphtheria antitoxins did not come into general use until around 1905, and they were used on this particular family.

After the antitoxins we go on to the great discovery by Banting and Best that wrote history for Canada around the world. They had discovered a treatment for diabetes. I was raised not far from the town where Dr. Banting was born, and I can remember his telling me about the impression that he had when he was a young school boy of seeing a young girl in his class who had diabetes. Day after day he watched her get thinner and thinner, and every time she went by the water pump she had to take a drink. She eventually died. There was always the strange smell on her, which we now recognize as acetone. That gave Banting an impression which carried him through medical school until he and Dr. Best did research on the pancreas of dogs at the University of Toronto and finally found a treatment for diabetes.

Insulin allows the diabetic to live a normal life, contributing greatly not only to the economics of this land but to the health and well being of people. One of the outstanding doctors of diabetes in the city of Toronto was a diabetic himself who lived and was able to practice as a doctor because of the discovery of insulin.

Another great story is the one of two scientists, Minot and Murphy, at the University of Chicago who discovered that an extract of liver would cure pernicious anemia. There probably is not a confrere of mine in this House that has ever seen a case of pernicious anemia where a person would have a relapse of fever and the red blood cell count would go down. It is similar to a cancer of the blood. These two researchers found that a shot of extract from the liver every week would cure and control this disease. We no longer see the disease any more than we see a case of diabetes which is not properly treated.

Sulfa was the first drug to be discovered that was able to kill bacteria. In 1936 I brought some prontosil home from the Mayo Clinic where they had been using it to cure strep infections, the scarlet fevers, tonsillitis and diseases such as that. Patients responded very well to this treatment and it took strep out of the category of a dangerous disease.

The next drug used was dagenan. I spoke to a lady on Sunday whom I had once treated for pneumonia by the use of dagenan. After dagenan came the discovery of the penicillins. A researcher found that bacteria would not grow on a mould, and from that mould came penicillin. This drug has saved so many young people's lives, particularly those who had pneumonia. The death rate from pneumonia, before the discovery of penicillin was one in five, but today it is about one in 25, and that rate will be cut down further with the development of the newer, stronger penicillins. The next drugs to be developed were the aureomycins and the tetracyclines and so forth, again setting a new pattern for killing off infections.

At the end of this era we found that the whole ball game had changed and that we now had to face the fact that we were running into chronic diseases. We found that one in every ten people had a cardiovascular disease of some type by the age of 50. After this came the arthritic disorders, diseases of the respiratory system, emphysema, etc. These are chronic diseases and by the time people had reached the age of 60 they had four times the illness they had at 30 years of age. This brought to the fore the need for chronic care and the problem of research, because at this point we were treating chronic diseases, not the acute infections of previous days.

What has happened in the meantime? We have gone through the fifties and the sixties and we find that four million people have immigrated into this country in a few years. We are short of doctors because very few of the medical schools have enlarged sufficiently to meet this increase in population. What we were doing then was cheating, because it now costs more than $100,000 to put a person through medical school, as compared with $60,000 then. A third or half of the people entering the field of medicine were either graduates or immigrants who came to this country from some other country in which they had been educated.

We talk about foreign aid. If that is not taking foreign aid from countries that could ill afford it, I do not know what it is. Most of these countries had a doctor-patient ratio which was much higher than Canada's. In India there is probably one doctor for every 5,000 people, whereas in Canada it would be about one doctor for every 2,000 people.

Something had to be done, and as a result the Hall commission report came about. This House approved the establishment of the Hall commission to determine what could be done about the enlargement of medical schools, among other things. They realized that they were getting into a chronic care situation and that more research would be needed. The report of the Hall commission was largely adopted.

In 1966 the Health Resources Fund Act was passed on the basis that it would add facilities to medical schools to give them an opportunity to bring in teachers, professors and scientists to develop the best medical schools in the world. The principle behind it was to give us the best there was, and they pledged $500 million for a period of 15 years, which would bring us to 1981. In 1978 we find that we have been cut off.

I believe I forgot to mention the disease poliomyelitis when I mentioned the great work that has been done by scientists on the North American continent and around the world. But when they found a preventive measure for this crippling disease which could kill a young person in the space of 48 hours, and if it did not kill it could cripple and handicap a person for life, the return on polio research amounted to more than $2,000 for every $1 spent, although it is almost impossible to arrive at any kind of an accurate figure. Nothing pays off so well as research.

Here we have a government that brought in a health resources act now wanting to cut off the money supply. It seems incredible, when one looks at the Auditor General's report and finds such carelessness in the spending of money, that this government dares to cut off something that saves people's lives. There are so many crippling diseases. The statistics show that cancer kills one person in every four. Emphysema is on the increase. There are many other diseases from which people suffer. There is hardly a family in Canada that will not be touched somewhere along the line by a disease that we have yet to conquer. We can only conquer these diseases by continued research.

At this point I would like to pay tribute to those researchers who spend their lives doing this type of work, many of whom at the end of their careers have discovered nothing but have steadfastly worked hard in the hope that some miraculous breakthrough will occur. These researchers suffer trials, tribulations and frustrations in an endeavour to restore health to the people of this country and throughout the world. Many of them have given their lives by experimenting with injections or treatments performed on themselves. I say with a source of pride that there are still people who are willing to enter this field of endeavour without adequate funds or any kind of tribute.

A cramping of resources in the health care field has occurred over the last ten years. It has been a fight all the way to get a little more money for the research necessary. At the beginning of this century there were few scientists. Today we have many. We have conquered many diseases but there are still chronic diseases to deal with.

If we look at the statistics we find that there are more than two million people over the age of 65. There are diseases of all kinds that can take a man who is at the height of his career and in the prime of his life out of the work force and make him a liability. It is our responsibility to see that we retain the health and work abilities of those people as long as it is possible to do so, and in many cases beyond the age of 60 and 65. As hon. members know, a bill was introduced in the United States stating that it will not be mandatory to retire at the age of 65 if a person is physically and mentally fit. Instead a person will be allowed to carry on working until the age of 70. If there is enough money put into research to keep people healthy, perhaps people will be able to work until they are 75. If that cannot be accomplished the social service scheme will be in trouble.

There is another bill in the United States covering people academically trained. If they are physically and mentally well they can carry on without time limitation. This not only applies to the field of health resources but also industry. The government admits they should be spending five times as much, and yet here we are cutting funds. Can you tell me, Mr. Speaker, what is wrong with a government that does that?

The other night I went outside the House of Commons at about eleven o'clock. I looked across the river and saw that every one of those buildings on the other side was lit up. I thought of people raising families. With the rate of inflation today many families are finding it difficult to pay their electric light and heating bills. I could take you to homes owned by old people and pensioners who are paying their taxes, heating and lighting, but the government does not subsidize them as far as housing is concerned. These senior citizens have been neglected. There is, however, subsidized housing in some cities. When I looked across at all these buildings lit up it occurred to me that for the cost of one night's electricity for those buildings something more beneficial could be done. Not only that, I thought of the cost of construction of those buildings. There is no return on that and no research from a project such as that. Space that is empty is being paid for in Ottawa. The provinces are already saying that they are not getting enough money for things they want to do.

There is something wrong. I do not believe the government realize what they are doing. I do not believe this government understand what research is. I do not believe they understand that they have cut off research or that there will be a breakdown in the social system. The minister is a nice lady but I do not know if she is tough enough in cabinet to tell her colleagues what the situation is. Once the government starts on a path of cutting funds for research, researchers will be lost. They will leave one by one. Good teachers will be lost. Many universities have lost professors over the last two years that now have leading positions in the United States. Once these people have left and are set up in another university it is very difficult to entice them back. Every day we lose some people in this field. We are losing younger people as well, because these people say that research has been cut back 20 per cent, and that means that 20 per cent of the jobs will disappear.

This is not only a disastrous course in the economic field, but a disastrous course pure and simple when it comes down to the saving of lives and doing the necessary research. I hope the government will take another look at this, but not in three or five years because by then we will have lost our researchers. We are losing them and our economic value.

I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will realize you cannot hurt the people of this country from the standpoint of not providing the funds to find a cure for cancer and disabling disease. We must find a way to treat people beyond the age of 60 or 65 so that our whole social system does not break down.

In conclusion, I hope the Prime Minister will take another look at this before allowing it to go completely by the board.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate, it is a very welcome privilege to follow the eloquent plea made by my colleague from Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) to the government benches. He asked the government to realize its responsibility, and to take it seriously, with regard to the development of innovative research in this country and the stimulation of that very important field, a recognition that too long has been lacking. He stated that we as a country will not progress in this century or the next until we give research the kind of attention it justly deserves.

I want to take a few minutes to dwell on this bill. I do so for several reasons. First, it has been a field of continuing interest to me. It is of continuing interest to the area I represent, both with regard to health research and medical research as well as the broader sense of industrial research. It is an area that is of great concern to me as an individual Canadian who believes that the future of this country is based on a recognition of research and what it can do for us.

It is somewhat ironic that this bill dealing with the elimination of the health resources fund should come up for debate in this House at the very time that a federal-provincial conference is being held just across the street from the Parliament Buildings. While the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers meet to discuss federal-provincial co-operation on economic and fiscal matters, we are here discussing a bill that represents just one more example of the heavy-handed and unilateral approach of the federal government in its dealings with the provinces.

[Mr. Rynard.]

The irony is really just on the surface, since in all of the recent meetings between the federal and provincial first ministers the themes of federal interference in provincial affairs and provincial repercussions from federal action such as cutbacks in social programs emerge again and again. This is so because the government's commitment to consultation and co-operation is really very superficial, one to be dusted off and shown for display over national television when it pleases the government to do so, but quickly forgotten in the weeks and months that intervene. Certainly it is forgotten when it comes to policy formation and the impact of policy formation on the regions of this country. How else can we view the actions of the government when we are faced with such a blatant example of non-consultation as the demise, in this particular example, of the health resources fund?

Some provinces were indeed informed of the impending cutback, but none were consulted. For example, the minister of health in Manitoba was informed by telex five days after the announcement in the press. Some provinces were placed in the position where projects were already under way, projects they had been led to believe would be supported by ongoing funding from the health resources fund. True, the specific funds had not been committed, but the over-all budget was there. Now, according to the minister and the government, these funds will never be committed. The provinces will be asked, as they have been in many other cases, to pick up the tab.

This has been all too prevalent in some of the fiascos the government has introduced in recent months. For example, equalization cutbacks, a fund that is supposed to be a contract between 11 governments in this country. The equalization cutbacks were imposed unilaterally. Let the provinces shoulder the burden either by cutting back on essential programs or increasing taxes; that is the view of the federal government. Cutbacks to the unemployment insurance budget? Let the provinces make it up through welfare payments.

Here again with this bill we have the same attitude on the part of this government. The federal government says it will save $84 million, not by cutting back on its own operations, but by cutting back on provincial programs, and that without a word of prior consultation.

Not only does the cutback of the health resources fund represent another in a long series of blows to provincial budgets and provincial planning, but it is an indication of the irrationality of many of the cutbacks announced by the government since August. What is more, the government does not seem to recognize the irrationality and incohesion of many of the actions it has taken, it says in the name of restraint. It amazes me that government spokesmen seem to feel that their restraint program is a model of economic sense. Nothing they have done in the past ten years can be held up as a model of economic good sense.

Recently Treasury Board circulated a copy of a speech by the Comptroller General of Canada. It was a speech he had given to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants on the problems and opportunities facing government as it accepts the challenge of fiscal restraint. I recommend it to members on the government side. The speech was entitled "Controlling Federal Government Expenditures . . . Doing More with Less". What caught my eye was the title "Doing More with Less".

That is an admirable goal, one that could be easily attained by cutting waste and over-expenditure. The kind of over-expenditure referred to in the recent Senate report on accommodation would come under the category of doing more with less. That report showed that the government will be spending at least $179 million more in rent for office space over the next 35 years than if it had built the building itself.

Auditor Generals' reports are filled with examples of waste and over-expenditure that could be cut with no adverse effects on the taxpayers. The most recent report, the one we saw just last week, stated:

During the period of rapid expansion in the federal government it appears that the public purse was gradually deemed virtually bottomless.

The most recent report, the one we saw just last week, stated that during the period of rapid expansion in the federal government it appeared that the public purse was "gradually deemed virtually bottomless" and that there was very little attempt made to study whether or not a program was effective or efficient. It is both necessary and desirable to cut out waste and mismanagement in the spending of taxpayers' money. That is what I would call rational restraint—to cut out the fat and keep the meat; to do more with less. But some of the cuts which have been imposed during the government's burst of restraint are not that kind of restraint. They represent what I would call totally irrational restraint, restraint that does not make sense, restraint that keeps the fat and does away with the meat.

I received a letter earlier this year, in October, from the Canadian Federation of Biological Societies, a group of scientists very much concerned with the way the government is going in its irrational restraints upon scientific research. The letter reads:

While the recently announced federal cutbacks to health and education budgets do not as yet have operational meaning, they provide a clear indication of the government's current thinking and intentions. It is truly a hollow government policy that last June 1 proposes to stimulate research and development in this country and then, just a few months later, reneges on the same promises by cutting back on investment and innovation.

That letter, written before the introduction of this bill, reflects the concern which has been expressed by the biological scientists and by many others who are devoted to scientific and medical research. As they point out, restraint affecting research programs, restraint which is harmful in its effects, cannot be called rational. It is not "doing more with less." The long-term effect would be quite the opposite—doing less with more. This is because every dollar which is not spent on research today will mean about 20 additional dollars which will have to be spent tomorrow. That is not real restraint.

Some of the proposed cutbacks are likely to have very detrimental effects and their adverse impact on the economy is obvious. I could list a few. The termination of the health resources fund is a prime example, as are the cutbacks affecting the various branches of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I think of the $3 million cut in the professional training program; the $4.8 million cut in the program concerning the non-medical use of drugs; the $2 million cutback in the national health research and development program, and the general reduction of $500,000 in the budget of the Medical Research Council.

Cuts of that kind are fairly obvious and we recognize immediately that they are capable of a serious adverse impact. But there are other cutbacks which are less obvious and whose potential for adverse impact is not so quickly discernible. I will list a few. There is the $1.3 million cutback in post-secondary education programs administered through the education, science and culture division of Industry, Trade and Commerce; there is the $1 million general reduction in the funds available to the National Research Council; there is the reduction of $300,000 in the budget of the Canada Council and of $2.1 million in the funding available to the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. Nor does this list include the millions cut from research and development funding affecting agriculture, the environment and cultural programs.

All this makes one wonder what the government has against the whole field of scientific research. It does not have a good record anyway, as we all know. But at a time when we should be building the future of our country on scientific research and development, they are particularly hard to defend.

The minister makes light of these cutbacks. In an interview reported in the Ottawa Citizen on October 18 she said the cut of half a million dollars from the budget of the Medical Research Council was small in comparison with others, for example in comparison with the cut in the operations budget of her own department. She said it made only the smallest dent in the council's total budget for the support of research in 1978-79.

This ignores two things. First, it ignores the fact that there are many other cutbacks affecting medical research—I have already mentioned some of them—in addition to the cuts in the Medical Research Council's budget. It also ignores the fact that in terms of 1971-72 dollars the council's budget has decreased annually by an average of 7 per cent. So that represents a further reduction in an already inadequate medical research budget.

Furthermore, the cuts in the funding of the Medical Research Council, the national health research and development program and the professional training program will affect more than the researchers themselves. Their impact will go far beyond the immediate research community. The loss will affect the training of physicians and other health professionals and will directly reduce patient care as trained personnel leave Canada. That is one of the very real tragedies of the approach taken by the government to health care and research in general. It illustrates the lack of sensitivity and awareness in this field.

What we have as a result of severe spending cutbacks in a very important field is the Canadian research community's losing a number of its most brilliant people. Already the reality of the Canadian research situation has caused many scientists and technicians to abandon that particular livelihood here in Canada or, indeed, to go elsewhere to pursue it. This year, for example, of 23 new applications to the Medical Research Council for grants for programs which were analyzed and deemed worthy of support by the Medical Research Council, only three were funded. What happened to the other 20 researchers and their programs? What happened to the benefits they might have brought to this country?

The health resources fund which the minister is in the process of eliminating—and she has eliminated other programs in the social services field—has provided a means for continuing scientific development in all regions of this country. It has contributed to the expansion of university hospitals, research centres and medical library facilities as well as to general health and hospital services across this country. According to the minister's own figures which she quoted when she spoke in the debate the other day, the fund has increased the number of graduates in health manpower categories by up to 9,000 a year in the ten-year period between 1966 and 1976. In 1966 there were only nine graduate respiratory technologists in Canada. In 1976 there were 138. The number of graduate laboratory technologists in 1966 was 265. By 1977, thanks in part to this program, that number had risen to 1,200.

One might say that that is enough and that we should be content with that. That seems to be what the government is saying when it suggests cutting off this program and abandoning it before it has run its full course. "There are 1,200 graduate laboratory technologists; surely that should satisfy the Canadian market". That seems to be the way the government is approaching this, but that is part of the irrational thinking of this government when it comes to something like research and development in this country. We are a growing country. We are a developing country. We depend on research and technology to take us forward, but their funding and importance are being reduced by this government. The cutback about which I am talking will retard development and reduce the number of skilled and professional people in a field where they are much needed. The cutback will reduce their numbers as well as practical and theoretical medical facilities.

The health resources plan is a good plan. It has been working well. But in order to save $84 million over the next two and a half years the minister has served notice that she will be putting an end to any further commitments under the plan. The provinces are left holding the bag. There are planned and uncompleted projects. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but, more importantly, Canadians in general are also being deprived of a program which would have benefitted each and every Canadian had it been allowed to continue.

In the light of so much waste in other areas, the government's allowing such a situation to develop is shameful. This cut is both unnecessary and irrational. Furthermore, in light of the current tragic state of affairs in medical research generally and in light of cutbacks, hidden and otherwise, in other medical research funding, the termination of the health resources fund is just one more nail which the government seems willing to drive into the coffin of Canadian medical research. It is one more blow to the health scientists of this country and, regretfully, one more indication that the government does not recognize a dollar spent wisely. What is worse, it does not care.

[Miss MacDonald.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to register a few concerns I have about Bill C-2, which would amend the Health Resources Fund Act. Over the years I have been quite amazed at the attitude of this government. As just pointed out by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), the government seems to be misguided in its priorities. The hon. member said that the government is attempting to save $84 million. As I understand it, the Health Resources Fund Act was to expire in 1981. In order to give some indication of restraint—and I smile at that—the government wants to cancel the health resources fund. The government wants to cut the three-quarters of the fund which is earmarked for buildings and the one-quarter which is set aside for research.

The position being taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is a unilateral one. It was taken without consultation. If there was consultation, it was meaningless. Consultation is not a telex giving three weeks' or six weeks' notice. When I think of consultation, I think of getting together as ladies or gentlemen, as the case may be, and accepting responsibilities in terms of what confederation is all about.

This government is mistaken in believing in the process of confrontation. Confrontation politics seem to be what this government dwells on. We on this side believe in and attempt to practice co-operation and consultation, because in the long run this is how strides are made. This is how dialogue is brought about. This is how good communication is brought about, and this is how results are produced for the Canadian people. The consultation to which I refer should not be for the benefit of any particular party but for the benefit of the Canadian people. Unlike this government, we would rather talk about goals than fight about jurisdiction. If there is to be a fight, obviously we would have to sit down as rational people and get our priorities straight.

In the past five or six years I have received many letters from McMaster University. McMaster University is a centre of learning, and it is profoundly concerned about the attitude of this government regarding medical research. As a result of the prodding of this party and the concern which is registered, the government "bends over backwards" every now and again to throw out a pittance in the hope that that will satisfy a very viable segment of Canadian society, that is, medical research.

The government talks about saving $84 million, but it spills and wastes more than that in one year. Where are its priorities? What are we doing? What the government intends to do and what it has done is incite and inflame the Canadian people. The government has been misleading the Canadian people with regard to restraint. The government picks out something like the forestry industry and proceeds with restraint in certain programs, knowing that the Canadian people will become excited. The government makes cuts and then says, "Look at what we are doing".

● (2102)

This is the wrong approach, sir, because when you start playing around with the health of the nation—and that is what this government is doing, never thinking of the long-term effect—ultimately the nation is doomed. Because this type of response to restraint affects the health of the nation, the care of the individual, our ability to be the technological leaders and, in the long run, it affects employment. I am getting sick and tired of the attitude of this government, which believes that for its technology and expertise it can rely on the United States and other countries. In fact we are sacrificing our young people, our doctors and our research people, people who have the knowledge, people who have the motivation, people who have the aggressiveness to make a fantastic contribution to this country. But what does this government say? They say, "We don't need it because we can rely on someone else."

Where are we going? When I think of the Auditor General's report and his continuing admonition to the government in terms of waste and mismanagement, I know that this is where the government should look in order to bring about some savings when we talk about restraint. Why pick on health care? Why pick on medical research? Are the priorities of this government not mixed up?

Let me refer the government to "The Legacy of Spending". Everyone knows about this book written by a radio announcer on the west coast named Mr. Murphy. The book is a best seller because it documents the waste, the mismanagement and the callous disregard of the public purse. It is all true. That is where the government should direct its attention, to the legacy of spending and to the Auditor General's report. If they want to save money and practice restraint, that is where they should direct their attention. Let them not jeopardize my son's and my grandson's future by this tunnel vision approach adopted by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Let me ask her, with all due respect, where are her priorities?

Miss Bégin: In the right place and with heart.

Mr. Alexander: Does she know that she is destroying medical research?

Miss Bégin: That is not true.

Mr. Alexander: Does she know she is affecting employment? Does she know that as a result of her heavy-handed, unilateral, arrogant action, medical research is going down the drain? Does she know that the Canadian people are suffering as a result of her approach?

Mr. Nystrom: The Sterling Lyon approach.

Mr. Alexander: I was not going to speak, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Parent: Thank God.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) says, "Thank God." He is another one who joins hands with the minister to make sure that our health care is destroyed.

An hon. Member: He would like to.

Mr. Alexander: He is not capable. I want to end by saying this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I do not know whether our socialist friends to the left have made a contribution as yet, but they do not care. They are the ones who voted against the pipeline which was going to bring about employment.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Alexander: Don't say "Order" to me. The hon. member opposite wishes to rise and make a contribution. Give him that opportunity, Mr. Speaker, so that we can see whether he will follow the same irrational course as the minister has followed. Because he will have to report to his constituents. He is the one who will have to justify his position. I think I will recommend to McMaster University that they write to all the Liberal members, and the socialists as well, seeing that I was interrupted by them, asking them where they stand on this vital and important issue, and where they stand with respect to priorities in medical health and therefore the future of our children.

This government must get its priorities straightened out, and it must start approaching federal-provincial relations with some meaningful ideas in terms of consultation and co-operation, rather than confrontation. If you make a deal, then in my view—I am not one of the most excellent lawyers here but I know this—you cannot break a contract unilaterally because you end up in court. That is what the minister does. She did it with block funding and she had the provinces all upset. She even stands up and pulls the rug from under the provinces and says to them, "Carry on, do what you want, but I will not get involved even though we had a form of an agreement or an intent to proceed in a particular direction."

Miss MacDonald: She was dictated to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

Mr. Alexander: Then she is just as bad as he is and she is part and parcel of the same gang.

Mr. Nystrom: They are all too conservative.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The "Gang of Four".

Mr. Alexander: Mark my words, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to become partisan because this is not my role, but I just want to let that party know something. It is this kind of attitude, this carelessness, this lack of concern and unresponsiveness that sends them down the drain. If you walked into Hamilton West you would hear people say, "Linc, when will you get rid of those people?" I say to them, "Listen, I am doing my bit." Mr. Speaker, I am doing my bit tonight. I say to my constituents, "I expect you to do your part as well."

The government are callous, they are arrogant, they do not care. They say: "We govern, we are right." Did you hear that, Mr. Speaker? That is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said. He considers the rest of the population to be enemies. He considers the media to be enemies and the people of Canada to be enemies. What is so right about a million unemployed? This government's policies have helped magnificently to bring that about. What is so right about saving $84.5 million at the expense of the Canadian people?

Mr. Boulanger: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Has my friend contributed to this debate as yet?

Mr. Boulanger: Why should I? You are doing it now.

Mr. Alexander: He is part and parcel of the same gang. He also will have to justify his position with regard to medical health and research in this country. He comes from a province which is concerned about cutbacks which will affect their children and their grandchildren. He sits there trying to make fun of me because I am trying to knock some sense in his sick head.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I think I have said enough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare is becoming nervous.

Miss Bégin: Not at all.

Mr. Alexander: She does not have the confidence of the Canadian people.

Miss Bégin: Yes, I do.

Mr. Alexander: She does not have the confidence of the provinces, and it is doggone sure she does not have the confidence of medical researchers.

• (2112)

Miss Bégin: That is not true.

Mr. Alexander: Medical research is a very significant segment of the country.

I thank Your Honour very much for providing me with an opportunity to say a few words in order to try, as I have done for ten years, to knock some sense into the government's head. The polls indicate that we are winning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boulanger: Will the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) permit a question?

Mr. Alexander: Yes.

Mr. Boulanger: Can the hon. member anwer my question honestly and seriously: From where did he get the figure of one million unemployed in this country? Is it a true figure, or did he pull it out of the air?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, that is a very easy question to answer. When I talk about one million people, I am including the hidden jobless.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate; however, faced with this despicable performance, quite unworthy of a serious member of this House, I cannot help but respond to the quite improper and quite unfair statements that have just been made by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). Undoubtedly, the kind of remarks he just made before the House and the Canadian public listening through television will be judged according to their own merit by the Canadian public who has witnessed this shameful performance by the hon. member for Hamilton West, glass in hand, uttering quite improper and incongruous remarks.

What must be said about this proposal is that unfortunately, in these times of restraints, at a time when all Canadians urge the federal government and the provincial governments to reduce their expenditures as much as possible, so as to curb public spending, the Canadian government had to take some decisions and to make some budgetary cuts, obviously difficult to carry out but absolutely essential to maintain the Canadian economy.

[English]

I should like to say a few words in English, because the words expressed in the House were in English and they should be answered in the same language.

A policy of expenditure restraint had been advocated widely for some time. I am surprised to hear hon. members of the loyal opposition referring to a unilateral move by the federal government, when in fact there has been no such move. Such a policy of restraint is necessary to increase confidence in the Canadian economy, and to provide room for the private sector to expand and create jobs. Hon. members of the Conservative party have lost track of these important matters.

Expenditure restraint was a major feature of the federal anti-inflation program announced in the fall of 1975. In fact, this desire has been present since then. At the first ministers' conference last February, it was agreed that governments should strive to reduce their rate of increase in expenditures to something less than the trend rate of growth of the gross national product. At their last conference, the ministers of finance agreed that restraint was necessary. It is with this high degree of consensus that the Canadian government implemented a substantial reduction of expenditures totalling $2.5 billion last summer.

I have heard members of the opposition expressing surprise and attempting to convey the message to the Canadian public that all of these matters were done unilaterally, without consulting the provinces. This is totally untrue and unfair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: They should know better than to attempt to convey such a message again tonight.

Miss Bégin: It is a big joke.

Mr. Ouellet: It is more than a big joke. It is a very sad approach by an opposition which expects to form the government one day. They act so irresponsibly that I am sure the Canadian public will never give them the mandate.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order because I am sure the minister does not want to mislead the House intentionally. I know he is doing it unintentionally, because he is uninformed on this matter. I personally was in touch with each of the provinces, and all of them told me that they were not consulted in advance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member should confirm his facts. This was decided at the first ministers' conference.

Miss MacDonald: It was never mentioned.

Mr. Ouellet: I have notes in my possession which were used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the last meeting with the provincial finance ministers. He said the following:

> The federal government cannot reduce the level and rate of growth of its expenditures and at the same time carry the main burden for the achievement of a satisfactory growth rate for the whole economy, without affecting transfer payments to the provinces. Reducing expenditures is a difficult task. While there is widespread support for a reduction in government expenditures in general, each particular sector of our society seems to feel it is being asked to carry more than its fair share of the burden. But only if we are all prepared to accept some discipline will we be able to achieve our common economic objectives.

Also the minister indicated that transfer payments to the provinces in 1978-79 amounted to more than $10 billion, plus the transfer of tax room amounting to over $3.6 billion. Thus, a total of close to $14 billion was given to the provinces by the federal government.

Miss MacDonald: Given?

Mr. Ouellet: When the Minister of Finance indicated that some cuts must take place, he outlined various options to the provinces. He indicated that it could be done through the financing of established programs, the financing of social services, the community services grants program, the existing equalization program, or the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. Through the Minister of Finance, the federal government told the provinces that they had a choice.

Miss MacDonald: Take it or leave it.

Mr. Ouellet: He was ready and willing to receive their recommendations and suggestions concerning the appropriate cuts. The federal government felt that it had no alternative but to take the obviously difficult step of proposing to the provinces that some features of fiscal arrangements must be modified.

● (2122)

I must say that the bill we are studying today is a direct consequence of a joint effort by the federal and provincial governments to arrive at some restraints in public expenditures, be they federal or provincial, which ought to take place in order to help the Canadian economy. I think the opposition cannot have it both ways.

There is no doubt that the attitude of the Progressive Conservative party, the official opposition in this House, is to try to be on both sides of the fence at the same time, to go and tell the businessmen that government expenses are outrageous and, that if they were the government they would cut those expenses drastically. Just as we have a bill which is the obvious result of a discussion, of a consensus which was reached at the last finance ministers' conference, the official opposition have a good laugh at us, pretend to be disgusted because the Canadian government takes its responsibilities and cut certain expenses. They try to make believe that if they were the government, they would make those cuts.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the opposition have showed us irresponsibility tonight and that clearly reflects their lack of seriousness. When they are talking to a certain group of people they use a certain language; when they speak to businessmen they say that they are going to cut government expenses. But when they speak to the citizens who can indeed be directly affected by the proposals which they advocated before the first group, they say that they are going to do something different.

Mr. Speaker, I think the bill we are considering now comes as a logical consequence of serious decisions which were difficult to make, but were essential and that it is in the best interest of the Canadian economy and I believe the House should pass it.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important at this stage to inform you of an agreement reached by representatives of all parties in the House, to the effect that before ten o'clock tonight, the second reading debate on this bill will come to an end and that, should a vote be required, it will be deferred until tomorrow after the oral question period. I talked about this with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I have his agreement. I had the same conversation with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who told me I had a firm deal. So, before Your Honour recognizes the hon. member, I wanted to make you aware of this agreement and I understand that at 9.59 at the latest he will end his remarks in order that we can comply with the agreement all parties came to.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion that an agreement has been reached between the parties to the effect that the second reading stage of this bill is to be completed before ten o'clock tonight, and that if a registered vote is necessary it will be postponed until tomorrow afternoon after the question period. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on this bill. I should tell the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) that he may be sorry for making the deal that we stop at ten o'clock, because by the time I get wound up he may be so enraptured he will not want me to quit.

An hon. Member: Enraptured! We need some raptores.

Mr. Friesen: I suppose we could use some raptores here, and there would be no need for health care.

The hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) wanted to know where we got the one million unemployed figure. Let me say to him that after the next election there will be quite a number from that side added to the unemployment list.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: I want to thank the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) for warming up this crowd for me. He did an admirable job.

An hon. Member: Don't cool them off.

Mr. Friesen: I promise not to cool them off. The people from Saskatchewan are used to having things dry, so I am sure the hon. member won't mind if I speak.

An hon. Member: You go ahead and I will see you tomorrow.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, we are debating Bill C-2 which is one paragraph long. For the record I should like to read that paragraph. I think it is the shortest bill in the history of parliament. It states as follows:

[Mr. Pinard.]

> No payment shall be made under this act in respect of any cost incurred in respect of a health training facility unless payment of a contribution toward the cost thereof was authorized by the minister pursuant to subsection 4(1) or 5(1) before September 9, 1978.

As I said, that is probably one of the shortest bills in the history of Canada, but it could have been even shorter. It could have been just two words, namely, "we quit". It has been the history of this government to introduce programs, twist provincial governments' arms to participate in the programs, make a commitment and when the economic pinch is a little tight or sharp it quits, leaving the provincial governments to carry the ball. That is the record of this government.

I have been reading, as I am sure other members have, a book by William Simon of the United States entitled "A Time of Truth". I see the hon. member from Quebec city reading it.

Mr. Dawson: Louis-Hébert.

Mr. Friesen: I am sorry, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson). I would hate to have him transplanted so quickly. I know he will be after the next election but I do not want to hasten the process. I am glad to see that hon. member reading the book. I hope he takes it to heart and applies some of the principles it contains in his caucus. I would refer hon. members to page 113 where Mr. Simon says some very enlightening things. He is speaking of those who have adopted the small "l" liberal ideology which he says:

> —is actually committed to a steady erosion of our wealth and freedom, although its advocates are usually unaware of it.
> They are unaware of it because they no longer know the relationship between wealth and freedom. Indeed, it is not too much to say that they no longer understand the concept of freedom. FDR actually redefined that concept, corrupting it so hopelessly that, save for a few philosophical diehards, succeeding generations were never again clear as to what it meant. Political freedom means only one thing: freedom from the state. FDR, however, invented a new kind of 'freedom': a government guarantee of economic security and prosperity. He thus equated "freedom" with cash. However desirable economic security may be—and it is profoundly desirable—it is not the same thing as political freedom.

He goes on a few sentences later to say:

> The state ceased to be viewed as man's most dangerous enemy, to be shackled forever by constitutional chains. It was henceforth proclaimed to be the precise opposite; it became man's tenderhearted protector and provider. Statism and collectivism were brought into this country—by the back door—and, ironically, were heralded thereafter as the saving of free enterprise.

That is the significant change that has taken place in our countries, and I say that advisedly because it is a change that has taken place not only in this country and in the United States, but in England and many western democracies. There has been a change in philosophy. At one time we devoted all our energies to protecting ourselves from the state, or from intrusions by the state into our privacy and decision-making process. Now things have shifted to the point where we see the state as the power benefactor. One thing which the state does very well is govern, because it is designed to do that. It is infatuated with that process, and given the latitude and opportunity the state will govern. As readily as we are willing to turn over to the state the decision-making processes of our lives, even more ready to accept it is the state, to come into our lives and to take them over.

As I reflected on what Mr. Simon said, I could not help but flip over the pages of history in my mind and to think of the process of democratization of our countries. In the United States the watershed occurred in 1787 and 1789, when they passed their bill of rights which said in substance that Congress shall be prohibited from invading the lives of the individual citizens of that country. A few years later the republic of France did the same thing. One hundred years previous to that England passed its bill of rights as a statute, not as part of the constitution—because we all know that England does not have a constitution. When William and Mary took over the throne of England the good citizens had the foresight to ask for a bill of rights to ensure that the constitutional monarchy could not invade their private lives. That is the history of the democratization of the constitutions as we know them. Essentially they free us from arbitrary control by the state or the government.

Here we have a government that again moves into the area of arbitrary decision-making. A few years ago it instituted a program of training for health facilities in the provinces. It induces the provinces and twists their arms to participate in that process and to use their funds in it. Once their tax structure training facilities and their capital expenditures are committed, then all of a sudden the federal government says, "Too bad, we can't afford it any longer; you're on your own". These are the ways in which the federal government intrudes in our lives. They come to us as though they are the great benefactor of the citizens, but in actual fact they become our governors and our masters.

Mr. Nystrom: That sounds like Bill Davis.

Mr. Friesen: It can sound like whomever you wish. If my socialist friend wishes to align me with Bill Davis, I certainly do not mind it. However, I do not want to be aligned with the socialists to my left and in Saskatchewan who want to take away this whole decision-making process and give it to the state. They want to enlarge the bureaucracy and they say, as my friend's leader has done across Canada, that there ought to be more government spending in a period of deficit financing.

If this government would really like to help the poor, they had better cut back on their deficit financing and their waste. Because every time a dollar is wasted it is a dollar that is taken away from the poor of this country. The Auditor General's report last week pointed out that the government wastes many dollars as, for example, where they allowed the cost of ice-breakers to multiply six times through uncontrolled accounting and uncontrolled spending. As soon as they allow those costs to escalate six times, they are taking those dollars away from the poor in our country who really need the money. This government cannot justify and honestly explain how their Liberal philosophy is helping the poor when at the same time they carry on this kind of waste.

Mr. Simon goes on to talk about what it costs in New York to carry on the operations of that debt-ridden city. He pointed out that much of it was a kind of collusion between civil servants, the unionized workers and government officials—the dishonest politicians who did not want to call a spade a spade. What this country needs more than anything else is a political will to make hard decisions.

Miss Bégin: Bill C-2 is one of them. Why don't you approve of it?

Mr. Friesen: The minister interrupts. I wish that she would participate and tell us all the implications of this bill. If the government is really serious about helping the poor in this country, why don't they do something?

An example of the way they are not helping the poor is illustrated by the social conditions the native Indians of our country must face. The 1971 census showed that there were approximately 295,000 native Indians in Canada.

Mr. Dawson: Talk about the Grey Cup.

Mr. Friesen: If the members would let me finish my speech, maybe they would learn something.

Miss Bégin: We will try.

Mr. Friesen: I know that the minister will try because I have sat with her on committee and I think she shows a good deal of logic. I think that some of her senior officials have sold her a bill of goods, but I respect her and her ability to deal with her concepts.

There were approximately 295,000 native Indians in Canada in 1971. In 1975 there were approximately 12,000 civil servants in the Department of Indian Affairs and northern Development providing services to these native Indians, approximately one civil servant for every 24 Indians. I wonder, does it really take that many people to administer the budget of the department of Indian affairs? This department with its staff of 12,000 in 1975 included 59 Indians. Now there are almost 6,000 native Indians on the staff of the department of Indian affairs.

The fact is that the money in this department is not being spent on the native Indians who need it. It is not helping the poor and people who really need help, but the middle class. The native Indians are not getting the money; the people working in the department are using it in the administration of those funds. It is for reasons like this that 43 per cent of every dollar in our country is spent on government.

With this kind of overhead we cannot possibly be helping the poor in this country. When we say we are giving the poor a dollar, we are really giving them only 60 cents. Because of our high inflation, government waste and this government's propensity to spend money where it is not needed, or to overlook or run short of money in areas where it is really needed, the poor are not getting the money the government says it is giving them. There is no way a 50 or 60-cent dollar for the poor can be justified. As a matter of fact, statistics indicate that in 1968 the dollar was valued at 49.9 cents but those statistics did not look very good around 1970 or 1971, and we changed the plumb line for evaluating the dollar. When that did not look very good around 1974, we changed it again. Rather than deal with the economy in such a way that we preserve the dollar and give it some buying power, we are actually taking money away from the poor by this continuation of wasteful practices by the government.

Another matter that comes to my attention is that authorities are predicting that in the year ending in April, 1979 there will be about 27,000 bankruptcies in this country. Only 6,000 of those will be businesses; the rest of them will be personal bankruptcies. I think all of us will agree that small business is the most labour intensive part of our economy. When we have that kind of bankruptcy rate in our country, surely it is not hard to understand that the fiscal policies this government is engaging in are destroying the purchasing power of the dollar. They are increasing the debt load on the Canadian public. By doing that the government is taking dollars away from the poor. They are the people who need this buying power.

Because of those 27,000 bankruptcies this year the unemployment rolls will increase. This will add to the debt of the unemployment insurance fund and create yet a bigger problem. The Fraser Institute said that spending by all levels of government now amounts to $3,635 per capita. That amount is outrageous. With that kind of expenditure there is no way we can consider ourselves free people. When 40 per cent of our wages is taken away by three levels of government, it means that for two-fifths of our time we are working for somebody else. What do you call that, sir? It certainly is not freedom. It is a kind of serfdom. As I thought about that, my mind went back to the days of serfdom—

Mr. Parent: Do you have notes?

Mr. Friesen: If the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) will pay attention—

Mr. Parent: I do not know of anybody listening to you.

Mr. Friesen: If the hon. member for St. Catharines does not like listening to quotes from William Simon, I will give him a book that he will appreciate, a volume of Encyclopedia Britannica; maybe he will accept that.

Mr. Parent: Are there any pictures in it?

Miss Bégin: Does this relate to Bill C-2?

Mr. Friesen: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) wants to know if I am dealing with Bill C-2. I am, the same way that the former minister of urban affairs who is now Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouellet) was dealing strictly with Bill C-2 the whole time he was speaking.

Miss Bégin: That is the very reason for dealing with Bill C-2.

An hon. Member: You are hurting. Get some vaseline; it is soothing.

[Mr. Friesen.]

Mr. Parent: That will go down in Hansard.

Mr. Friesen: Do I have the floor, Mr. Speaker? As I was saying before I was so rudely interrupted, when taxpayers are spending approximately two-fifths of their time working for someone else, they can hardly consider themselves free. I recall visiting some industries located in my riding during the 1974 election. One manager in particular told me how distraught he was. The man was practically in tears. He said that he could barely keep his machines operating on a Friday night because everyone was leaving. What was the reason for this? The men felt that they should not work on a Friday night because all they would earn would be income tax dollars.

An hon. Member: They voted NDP.

Mr. Friesen: The Casanova who is quoted in the paper as always having a bevy of beautiful women around him said the people in my riding voted NDP. I want him to know that it was an NDP riding before I ran. We turned the vote around by 16,000, which I think is fairly good.

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mr. Friesen: We will dispense with a few after the next election, sir.

An hon. Member: Silence is golden.

Mr. Friesen: When we are spending almost half of our time working for someone else we can hardly consider our time our own. That is one of the reasons we have productivity problems in Canada. People see there is nothing in it for them. Hon. members opposite are wondering why investment dollars are leaving Canada. My riding borders on the United States and it has one of the largest major ports of entry in it. People tell me that they moved to White Rock because it is closer to the United States. That is very discouraging to hear. But there is a reason for this. People ask why we should invest in our economy if the government takes it all. There is no way that the government can put walls high enough to keep that money here.

Miss Bégin: That is not the reason. There was a strike in the grocery stores in Vancouver. That was the reason.

Mr. Friesen: You are two years behind the times, as usual.

Miss Bégin: That is what started it. You are being absolutely dishonest right now.

An hon. Member: You are distorting the facts.

Mr. Friesen: The minister of health is still reverting back to the days when she was minister of national revenue, which brings up another point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: That point is the high turnover in this ministry.

An hon. Member: Where is the order in this place?

Mr. Friesen: We have had four ministers of health in ten years. When there are so many revolving doors in the ministry there is no way that the best minister of national health and welfare can keep control of that ministry, regardless of how brilliant and dedicated that minister is. If a minister keeps a portfolio for only two years he cannot get a grip on it. I do not blame ministers for that. It is humanly impossible. But there is another reason why costs are escalating. When the upper level decision-makers have control over finances, the minister no longer has control over spending and it is no wonder that costs escalate.

I was trying to get to a point but hon. members opposite are continuously interrupting me. We are forever being criticized as being medieval.

Mr. Parent: You start out to be.

Mr. Friesen: I would like to mention to the member for St. Catharines that actually it is this government that has taken us back to medieval times. The longer I thought about the taxation policies of this government and the degree to which we are burdened with taxation, I could not help but think of the feudal system. There was a time when the people of western Europe were being governed by overlords under the feudal system. One of the conditions of serfdom was spending a certain amount of time working for an overlord.

An hon. Member: Let us get to the late show.

Mr. Friesen: That was a kind of taxation process.

An hon. Member: Let us have some order.

• (2152)

Mr. Friesen: That was a kind of taxation process where these serfs had to work a few days for the overlord. This is what is happening again today. I noticed, as I said ten minutes ago before the hon. member for St. Catharines interrupted me, that in the Encyclopedia Britannica there are a couple of paragraphs regarding serfdom. One of the principles of serfdom was that the obligation was the payment to a lord of a head payment, an income tax, a capital tax, or personal tax. The other one, which is very reminiscent of this government and of what this government has imposed upon us, is the obligation of surrendering part of the peasant inheritance to the lord on the death of the servant or subject tenant. What you have there is a capital gains tax or succession duties. We have come full circle. This government has taken us back to the medieval period where we spend our time working for someone else. It has taken the incentive away from the people.

I started out by saying that this government has developed a mentality that wants to initiate programs and get people dependent on them. We have a kind of dependency mentality. Once that dependency has been created, they get into the act and say, "I am sorry, we cannot afford to continue it now."

There is nothing like a pending federal election to clear the vision of the leaders of this government. It is like Murine for the eyes. The election scare of this last year was a lot of Murine for them; it really cleared their vision. All of a sudden they realized there was a taxation revolt, just like Wat Tyler's rebellion. When the serfs had finally had enough, they realized there was a taxation revolt, just like Wat Tyler's rebellion. When the serfs had finally had enough, they said they were tired of working for the overlords. They thought they could pull it off.

There can be a kind of Wat Tyler's rebellion today. Proposition 13 in California signalled the act there. That spilled over into British Columbia. The rest of the provinces have caught on to that idea. All of a sudden this government realized it had a problem on its hands. It could no longer carry the oppressive tax burden, and it shoved it on to the rest of the people because it was not willing to carry it. We had on October 16—

Miss Bégin: What has happened since Proposition 13?

Mr. Friesen: We had October 16. That was a kind of Wat Tyler's rebellion, telling this government it could no longer pull these kinds of deals, that the taxpayer is no longer willing to carry those burdens. They have said that they have had enough.

I want to go on record as saying that this government deserves a steady stream of denunciations for the kind of policies it has foisted on to the provinces, now wanting them to carry the full load of the burden. Yesterday the premier of my province said to the first ministers that rather than have a redistribution of the wealth, which incidentally this minister wants to carry on with all the time, we ought to have a redistribution of the opportunities. I agree with that. I know that the people of Canada want to express themselves in an entrepreneurial spirit. I know they have the vision. I know that given release from the oppression and burdens which this government has placed on them, there will be an infusion of spirit across the country. Once we take away the disincentives that this government has loaded on them, we will see a new spirit born in this land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wanted to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouellet) to table the document from which he quoted during his remarks. I gather that the document that he held in his hand while he was quoting, was a speech which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) made to a meeting with the provincial ministers of finance. The minister has now left the House. However, I think it is possible that he be ordered to table it even though he is not here in person.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member might have been right if he had raised the point in due time. I do not think his point of order is valid at this time. It would be impossible for the Chair to bring back the minister and ask him to table it. The minister might have referred to some document; however, the practice provides for members' interventions to take place immediately.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister was indeed reading from a document which he identified in his comments as coming from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not quarrel with that. However, the hon. member should have got up at that time and requested the minister to table the document. It could have been identified while the minister had it in his hand. The minister is not here and the document is not here. It is impossible to have the document now.

Before I recognize the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), I wish to inform the House that if she speaks at this time, she will close the debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have two minutes left before ten o'clock, and I will use them to correct some of the wrong impressions created by the opposition and which are laden with consequences. For example, they related the health of Indians, which is one of our priorities, to the fact that this act is being repealed two years before its legal termination, after 12 years of a well-functioning health resources fund. That makes no sense. That is a blatant lie to the Canadian public. I would like to clarify that. The health resources fund is a $500 million shared cost fund which was used to 85 per cent of its capacity in the last 12 years and which was due, in any case, to terminate in two years. The provinces, whose economy is in the same state as on the national scene, do not have the money to pay their share of what is left of the Fund.

We therefore, took a wise decision, which we made with regret, but which is a totally responsible one. We have honoured, and I emphasize this, all the contracts which were signed, and all bills will be paid within three years; I have signed all offers which were submitted and considered acceptable by the government. Therefore, no province will suffer from this premature suspension of the Health Resources Fund. I have stated that there were projects for Prince Edward Island, two projects for Manitoba, including the Seven Oaks General Hospital in Winnipeg, and the Calgary children's hospital, for which I have just signed a supplementary submission.

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We deeply regret that we did not know the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) wanted to speak. We would have given her at least half an hour of her precious time to tell us exactly what she wanted to say this evening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to special order made this evening, to put the question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of Bill C-2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the special order adopted by the House earlier, the division stands deferred until tomorrow on calling of the orders of the day.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—REQUEST GOVERNMENT RECONSIDER CUT IN FAMILY PLANNING GRANTS PROGRAM

Mr. F. A Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, on November 17, I posed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on family planning programs. It involved specifically my concern about these programs being cut back, based on a cut in the budget of almost half, from $2.1 million to $1.1 million, and therefore a substantial cutback in these important activities. I also mentioned these savings were illusory because equivalent expenses would be created of at least that amount or maybe greater. Certainly prevention was better than teenage pregnancies, certainly unwanted ones, and an increase in therapeutic abortions, which are increasing anyway.

I did not realize it at that time but the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) asked a similar question on November 10, seven days before, in which he mentioned that legal abortions had increased by 5.5 per cent in the previous year. I had asked the minister whether she could possibly reconsider the situation. The hon. member for New Westminster had already asked her whether she would restore the funds available to the amount originally to be provided, that is, to $2.1 million.

We understand the difficulty the minister faces, along with all members of the government, in trying to balance, on one hand, the effect of spending restraint against the benefits of very worth-while programs, on the other hand. I think the minister has been very fair and reasonably effective in this area. She is certainly one who supports social programs very strongly. Strong representations have come to her from the community, from voluntary associations such as the Family Planning Association and, of course, from other parliamentarians along the lines I have indicated.

The minister's attention was also drawn to an article which appeared in the Toronto Star of October 20 entitled "The Teenage Pregnancy Explosion". That article emphasized the appalling consequences of unwanted pregnancies, the danger to the mother, whether or not she went through with the pregnancy, and to any children which might be born. It dealt with the related problem of child abuse and so on. We realize that this situation of immature mothers with, in some cases, unwanted children imposes a heavy burden on municipal and provincial welfare systems. The federal government has played a very important role in recent years in attempting to relieve this burden.

Certain aspects of what I am discussing are, evidently, similar to those which arise from the bill we have been debating here during the last two days and on which I spoke today, Bill C-2, the health resources fund bill, which imposes a serious restriction in an area where nobody wants to cut back, namely health training and research.

There is a similar dilemma here. Of course, whatever expenditure the provinces incur in the running of these programs, the federal government pays half. We realize this. It is a dilemma and we appreciate the difficult position in which the minister finds herself. But the human need is one which remains the responsibility of all three levels of government working together with private volunteer organizations.

As in any important matter, the federal government is looked to for leadership. Voluntary organizations always rely partly on government support, particularly federal government support. They need to know where they stand, particularly with regard to forward budgeting. I refer to organizations such as Planned Parenthood of Canada and other so-called non-government organizations.

I would like to refer briefly to another dimension which is especially important to me as well as to other hon. members: our international activities and the business of Canada's setting an international example. Just recently the united fund for population activities for the first time organized a world-wide group of parliamentarians to work on the problem of population development in third world countries. The problem involves more than just population; it involves family planning and all the social programs related to that. It even involves economic development programs. I feel very honoured to have been elected secretary-general of this group, and therefore I feel a special responsibility.

Countries around the world, especially third world countries, look to Canada as an example. They look to Canada to help them with their problems. The help we give them reflects our own domestic situation and how we handle different but delicate matters such as population and family planning. I know this is a difficult problem. I would simply like to ask the minister to consider, within whatever limitations we have at this level, working with the provinces and volunteer agencies to make sure, even if we cannot spend as much money as we have spent, that we still try to get the job done and not cut back on important family planning programs.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) on bringing the important matter of family planning before the House of Commons once again. The matter needs to be considered. I think all hon. members would agree that family planning is something about which we must be more concerned because of the tremendous population growth today.

Further to the question raised by the hon. member for Halton on November 17, I would like to add the following comments. The reduction in family planning grants for 1979-1980 is firm. The minister has no intention to review the cutbacks already announced since these reductions were based on very careful consideration of all the options available.

The minister does, of course, recognize the importance of prevention and the concern of the hon. member for the continuation of family planning services. I would like to remind the hon. member that these services are a provincial responsibility and that the Department of National Health and Welfare, through its special grants, has ensured that services are available for the residents of each province and territory.

In addition, welfare services are to be shared under the Canada Assistance Plan when provided by provincially-approved agencies—which are listed in an agreement under the Canada Assistance Plan—either to persons in need or to persons who are likely to become in need if they do not receive the services they require. Likelihood of need is determined on the basis of economic as well as social need criteria.

With regard to family planning services, certain services such as information, referrals and counselling have been accepted as welfare services for cost-sharing purposes under the Canada Assistance Plan. The essential point relative to cost sharing in welfare services is that federal contributions are made toward agency costs associated with the provision of such services.

The cost associated with providing family planning means—for example, the pill or IUDS—are cost-shared through the assistance provision of the Canada Assistance Plan when provided as items of assistance to persons in need.

In summary, I would like to assure the hon. member that the social services and health systems of the provinces will continue to receive the necessary funding to provide family planning services on a preventive basis to those in need.

Adjournment Debate

URBAN AFFAIRS—INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY URBAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond tonight to an answer given to me by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) on November 15 when I questioned him in the House concerning the senior interdepartmental committee on urban affairs. I have with me tonight a copy of a report dated September, 1975. I asked the minister why this committee of deputy ministers has not met since 1975. It is important that this committee meet because when the Minister of State for Urban Affairs was first conceived, it was to be a co-ordinating ministry. The minister's function was to be only that which would co-ordinate activities related to housing and would include the co-ordination of programs affecting some ten other ministries. That was the promise given to the House of Commons when, some eight years ago, the government created the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs.

I have here a confidential cabinet document dated July 3, 1973 when the cabinet discussed the need for this co-ordinating committee of deputy heads to discharge the mandate given to them by parliament which requires a high and continuing degree of interdepartmental consultation at the senior level—I am reading from this document. I also have another confidential cabinet document dated July 17, 1973, just a couple of weeks later. According to this document, the cabinet decided that it was critically important, in order to make the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs work effectively as a co-ordinating ministry, that there be established a senior interdepartmental committee on urban affairs to be composed of deputy heads. These were not just joe-boys or boys from the mail room; these were deputy ministers.

That is how important this committee was. Some of the responsibilities of that committee were to meet no less than twice a year at the call of the chairman; that is the deputy minister of state for urban affairs. Now that deputy head is Bill Teron. It was to assist in the preparation of, and to present to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the transmittal to cabinet of an annual review and evaluation of the range of federal programs which have significantly affected the urbanization of Canada. To this date we have had only one such report.

I maintain, sir, that one of the reasons this government is following the suggestion of the official opposition that the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs should be wound down is, that they failed to have the departmental heads meet as they were supposed to. You cannot have a ministry whose job it is to co-ordinate and report to the House of Commons through the minister not knowing whether or not they are doing the job of co-ordination. The only way to evaluate the efficiency of the ministry and of the programs that ministry was co-ordinating was to have an evaluation; but the people who were to do that job, the deputy heads, did not meet. So there was confusion and mismanagement. As a result the government decided, because the ministry has not been working, to disband it.

[Mr. Robinson.]

I commend the government for that decision because it is exactly what we on this side suggested a year and a half ago, namely, that the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs be dismantled because it has not been effective in co-ordinating the various programs. But the difference between what they are doing and what we would have done is simple. The government announced out of the blue this great revelation, this great turnabout last Friday, and not a province in the country knew it. No one knew it except the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the minister involved. It is that kind of mentality that has characterized this government—on-again-off-again, without consultation with the provinces.

On page 31 of the report of the western premiers task force on constitutional trends of last May, it is stated that in the broad area of housing consultation has been virtually non-existent. They disband a whole ministry dealing with the whole range of programs in which the federal government involved the provinces, without even asking the provinces what they thought of the dismantling of the entire Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. It is that kind of irresponsible reflex action by the government that has put it into the position it enjoys today with the Canadian public. Now the Canadian public is determined to get rid of the government.

I applaud the government for innovative programs such as CHIP, NIP, RRAP and AHOP. If the government survived another couple of years, we would have had jump, skip and a lot of others. No program is meaningful unless it is evaluated. The government should take a second look at its programs to see whether they work, and if it was a targeted program, whether it had the effectiveness on the target area for which it was conceived. The government did not do that. It brought in a program of graduated payment mortgages, not knowing whether AHOP worked. There were massive defaults in AHOP. A senior departmental group was supposed to meet and evaluate these programs, and now the government is graduating payment mortgages. Right in the middle of all the new changes, the government said, "Sorry, boys, we are going to dismantle the ministry." That is an irresponsible government. Given the opportunity, at the drop of a writ we will replace them.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, of course the allegations of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) are completely false, and as wild and discriminatory as the Tory suggestion that mortgage interest should be deductible.

He tied in with his question on November 15 some allegations concerning AHOP defaults, which he mentioned again tonight. AHOP defaults obviously are greater than the defaults on conventional mortgages. He tied in defaults with walkaways. There is a difference which perhaps one day he will learn. He tied in defaults with conventional mortgage problems. As the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) alleged, there is an increase in defaults on AHOP mortgages because we are attempting to help people who have less money in their pockets and therefore are more likely to default.

The senior interdepartmental committee on urban affairs was formed in 1973 to assist in the preparation of an annual review and evaluation of the range of federal programs which significantly affect the urbanization of Canada. Also it was to assist the Department of Urban Affairs in advising the Treasury Board secretariat and the Privy Council office on policy and program proposals of federal departments and agencies which could have a significant impact on urbanization and urban development patterns.

The department, jointly with relevant federal departments and agencies, chaired both the senior steering and working groups in undertaking the work on the social policy on shelter. By working with the Department of Public Works, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and other relevant departments, the Department of Urban Affairs played an important role in making federal investments in specific areas more effective to provincial and municipal concerns.

At the standing committee this morning, the minister answered the hon. member for Selkirk by indicating that when "officials of the various departments were doing things which had an effect on urban development in the cities, they were naturally automatically consulting the ministry". Also he indicated that there have been a number of meetings involving officials of various departments to study the over-all performance of the government in terms of housing and in terms of shelter.

The Department of Urban Affairs effectively fulfilled its role for which it was created, that of co-ordinating delivery of federal urban-oriented policies and programs and of identifying priority concerns.

I hope this is the last we hear of defaults in the AHOP program. Since defaults in conventional mortgages have been extremely small, to the point where we do not require the 1 per cent coverage on these mortgages, naturally the defaults in the AHOP program will be greater.

GRAIN—MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my comments tonight refer to the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board has put out tenders to purchase 500 to 2,000 hopper cars. I maintain that the Wheat Board was blackmailed into doing that by the fact that the railways of this country are on strike when it comes to purchasing more hopper cars. In other words, they are not doing it. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board has his hands tied by restraint and, therefore, he is not doing it either.

For the first time ever the producers, namely, the farmers of western Canada, are in the position where they, through their wheat boards, have to purchase between 500 and 2,000 hopper cars. I maintain that is a very, very dangerous precedent, a precedent that is being set which may end up being carried on. I think it is wrong. What other commodity group has to purchase the cars to move their goods? Do General Motors have to do it? Do big companies have to do it? Do the fishermen have to do this, or do other people have to do it? I maintain that in most cases the answer is no. Therefore, it is very dangerous to ask farmers to do it.

I want to give a few background facts showing why we are in this type of situation today, why the railroads have been blackmailing the Wheat Board, and why the government has been implicit in this action. First of all, the capacity to move grain in this country has been slipping drastically. In 1972 we had 22,000 boxcars. By July 31, 1978 we were down to 12,800 boxcars. In the meantime, the federal government had purchased some 8,000 hopper cars. One hopper car equals about 1.5 boxcars in terms of grain moving capacity. Therefore, if you add in the 8,000 hopper cars in terms of capacity to the 12,800 boxcars, our capacity would equal about 24,800 boxcars. Therefore, even though the government has purchased 8,000 hopper cars, we still had less grain moving capacity than we had in 1972 before that purchase. As a matter of fact, the system has a two-million bushel less carrying capacity today than it did in 1972.

To make matters worse, we need more hopper cars and grain cars for the future. The Wheat Board says we need 9,000 more cars. The Wheat Board breaks it down this way: We need 4,000 more hopper cars and we need to repair some 5,000 boxcars.

Forest Hetland, who is a commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, said that by 1985 Canada could be exporting about 20 million tonnes of wheat and ten million tonnes of feed grains. He said that 4,000 new hopper cars could generate over $700 million each year in increased export sales and foreign exchange earnings. Mr. Hetland went on to say that even at a cost of $50,000 each, or $200 million total, for these hopper cars this would still be a good long-term investment for Canada.

Charlie Gibbings, another commissioner of the Wheat Board, was quoted by the Leader Post as saying that car supply is the most immediate problem. He said that 20,000 hopper cars and 5,000 boxcars will be needed to meet the 1985 target of moving 30 million tonnes of grain.

Then we have Commissioner Kristjanson, assistant chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, a 19-year veteran with the Wheat Board, 13 years as a commissioner and therefore a man who knows a great deal about the business, who is confident that the board could achieve export sales of 30 million tonnes by 1985, which is a 50 per cent increase, if transportation systems improved. We need three essential ingredients, he suggested. We need a fleet of 20,000 grain hopper cars, a 20,000-tonne terminal facility at Prince Rupert and an improved system of rail delivery through the Rockies to the west coast. It is obvious we need more than a faster turnaround time, although we need that too. We need some 20,000 hopper cars and 5,000 boxcars to meet our target for 1985.

What I am saying to the government now is that we need these hopper cars and we need them very fast. The fact that we do not have them now means we have lost sales. Our current inability to deliver has cost the Canadian farmers about $350 million in lost sales this year. Farmers have also lost about $25 million in demurrage charges this year because of the backlog, due to hopper cars and boxcars not being available. Last year, according to the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board, transportation delays cost the Canadian farmer about $150 million.

Then we have the China sale. We sold around three million tonnes of grain to China this year. The Wheat Board tells me we could have sold around four million tonnes if we had had the proper facilities to move the grain. If we were really doing things well we could have sold about six million tonnes, as that is the amount of grain the Chinese wanted to buy. As it is, Canada sold about 21 million tonnes of grain in the last crop year. We could do a lot better. The main problem is that the railways are not providing the service they should to western farmers.

I am sure that the parliamentary secretary is very embarrassed about the government handouts to railways. The branch line subsidy to the railways by this government last year was $90 million, and the savings to the railway on the cost of capital and depreciation for government hopper cars, which are supplied by the government, was $35.7 million. The saving to the railway on the cost of capital and depreciation for branch line rehabilitation was $98 million, and on the cost of capital and depreciation on Canadian Wheat Board hopper cars $14 million. This amounts to a subsidy from this Santa Claus government of $237.7 million per year. At the same time the railway profits for the first nine months of 1978 were $163 million. In the new budget they will be getting another tax subsidy of 7 per cent for an investment tax credit on transportation equipment.

If we look at the subsidies the railways have received from this government and the profits they have made, there is no reason why they should not be supplying the hopper cars and repairing the boxcars, or that the farmers of western Canada or the Wheat Board area farmers should be purchasing between 500 and 2,000 hopper cars out of their own money. It is a dangerous precedent that should not be allowed to happen. The government has an obligation to force the railways to purchase those cars, and if it cannot force the railways, then it has the obligation to provide the cars itself.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is worth remembering that over the last five years the government has added 8,000 hopper cars to the grain transportation network at an approximate cost of $260 million. It is also worth mentioning that during the past two years an amount of $170 million has been invested to improve railways in the prairie provinces and that the government is committed to earmark another $500 million in the next five or seven years to complete the upgrading of railways throughout western Canada.

When the railway companies tell us that they have enough hopper cars and boxcars for the transportation of grain, it is then a matter of interpretation and also a very complex issue. The minister stated today that he does not quite agree with the Canadian Pacific for instance which is of the opinion that the required number of cars is presently in use throughout the Canadian Pacific network. The minister has even offered a new arrangement to this company and to the Canadian National for the joint financing of a car repair program.

As I stated earlier, Mr. Speaker, this issue concerning the number of cars which might be needed is further complicated by the fact that it boils down to the question of knowing how many round trips are made by the cars between the prairies and Thunder Bay on the one side and the west coast on the other side. One also has to know if we have the minimum number of cars required to satisfy regular needs or if we have at our disposal the required number which would meet the requirements of a peak season when necessary, even if it is only a matter of five or six weeks during the grain shipment period.

The railway companies have suggested that the required number of cars is available, yet it remains rather difficult to determine in advance how many cars will be needed.

The Canadian Wheat Board and the minister, as he stated himself this afternoon, are convinced that more cars will be needed in a rather near future. The Canadian Wheat Board may differ with the railway companies in its interpretation of what constitutes a sufficient number of cars. The board must be concerned about the fact that it could have to pay demurrage charges. Consequently, the cars that the board would purchase would enable it to avoid paying demurrage charges during future peak periods on the market. For their part, the producers share the concerns of the board and, through their representatives on the Canadian Wheat Board, they accepted in principle this purchase proposal when the board consulted them. I also want to mention or emphasize the other initiatives taken by the minister in this regard. Since the branch line rehabilitation program is now being implemented, cars presently available and those that the board could acquire later on will be put to a better and more effective use.

As for ensuring a better use of the whole system, the minister reminded the House this afternoon during oral question period that he has appointed an analyst to study grain handling and transport operations and to make suggestions to improve these operations. The very recent up-date of the Snavely report, which was published a while ago, shows that major improvements have already been made as concerns the use of railway cars. Nevertheless, we must determine whether it is possible to do more and to make other improvements in the near future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.33 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity namely, that the railway companies are engaged in a national propaganda campaign to abolish the statutory Crowsnest freight rates which have been in existence since 1898 and which have been a cornerstone of benefit to the western wheat farmer and to tens of thousands of farmers who otherwise would have been unable to carry on.

Should the railways be successful in their objective, a body blow will have been struck to western farmers. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House declares there shall be no interference with these rates and that they should be continued in full force and effect.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 permits the introduction of such a motion for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The announcement by the government of the removal of the per bushel subsidy on the price of domestically consumed wheat will mean an increase of seven cents in the cost of a loaf of bread. First the turkey; now the stuffing. I, therefore, move:

That this House directs the government to implement the recommendation of the Auditor General to effect economies in government spending, rather than increasing the price of a loaf of bread, a move which will place a heavy burden on low income families.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUBSIDY ON DOMESTICALLY CONSUMED GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has announced a reduction of the subsidy on wheat used by millers for bread, which will result in an increase in the price of bread by five cents a loaf, and in view of the great hardship this will impose on people on low incomes, particularly old age pensioners, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House directs the government to cancel this decision and restore the full subsidy.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUESTED FIRING OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to propose a motion under the same Standing Order. In September, 1973, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board told the special food prices committee that the cost of wheat used in a 24-ounce loaf of bread, "is now fixed and firm at 7½ cents a loaf for the next seven years".

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That this House remind the Prime Minister that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is about to break a promise he made to the Canadian people and that we therefore request that he be fired.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vegreville.

CALL FOR INDUSTRY MEETING TO IMPROVE GRAIN MOVEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of Canada's continuing loss of grain export sales and the forced decision by the Canadian Wheat Board to withdraw from the monthly Japanese market because of the failure of Canada's transportation system, and noting that the current atmosphere within the grain industry is rapidly deteriorating, to the point where the parties involved are engaging in verbal warfare and exchanging accusations rather than addressing the issue positively, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the Minister of Transport provide leadership by immediately convening a grain summit which would bring together representatives of all components of the grain handling, transportation and marketing system to deal with and arrive at solutions not only to resolve the immediate grain and transportation crisis but also to develop a comprehensive plan of action for the expansion of the system to meet the challenges of the eighties.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

REGINA, SASK.—DISPOSAL OF SOIL CONTAMINATED BY TOXIC CHEMICAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of public and scientific concern about an expeditious solution to the problem of the 1,500 gallon spill of PCBs in Regina, and taking into consideration the apparent inability of the governments involved to find adequate storage space for the highly toxic pollutant, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton):

That the House instruct the federal environment minister, in co-operation with the Saskatchewan department of the environment, to pursue the option of transporting the contaminated soil to a special incineration facility, perhaps the germ warfare incinerator at Suffield, Alberta, or an appropriate site in the United States where the chemical could be destroyed by high-intensity heat.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

REQUEST HOUSE COMMITTEE STUDY GRAIN HANDLING SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter which is obviously urgent because so many members have become involved. My motion arises out of the worsening situation in grain movement which prevents the Canadian Wheat Board from increasing benefits for Canada and its grain producers. Railway service is so bad that ports do not receive sufficient carloads of grain per day to allow terminals to operate at maximum capacity, and since it is obvious that railway management is conducting a campaign to bog down grain movement and to sabotage the Crowsnest pass grain rates, which is costing farmers millions of dollars, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House requests that the government introduce an order of reference which instructs the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to hold hearings on an emergency basis concerning all aspects of grain movement to Thunder Bay, Vancouver, Prince Rupert and Churchill; that the committee be authorized to travel, hear witnesses and, where necessary, to subpoena witnesses; and that the committee report back to parliament with recommendations for government action no later than December 15.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF NATIVE PEOPLES IN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion. I have handed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a copy of this motion, and he says he will not say no to it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Smith (Churchill): In view of the harsh economic conditions suffered by the many Indian people of this country, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be included in the new super ministry responsible for economic development in Canada to ensure native peoples' concerns are represented in the over-all economic development of our country.

It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has now left the chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

REBATE OF MANUFACTURING TAX TO APPLY TO ALL INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a mattter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that there exists among the auto dealers of Canada a current inventory of automobiles amounting to close to $2 billion, and that this inventory will not be subject to the 3 per cent discount in manufacturing tax, which means that the auto-buying consumer will have to pay $60 million to cover this inventory, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the government immediately initiate steps to rebate the 3 per cent tax differential on the present automobile inventory, and it should be not only for the auto industry but for any industry where purchased inventory contains a significant dollar value.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

REDUCTION IN TRAINING ALLOWANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the training allowance for married women and young, single people has been decreased from $45 to $10 per week, in view of the fact that the deputy minister of employment said in committee recently that this was in response to a direct order from Treasury Board, and in view of the fact that this is most discriminatory toward married women and young, single persons living at home who should be receiving an increase, rather than a decrease, because of the rise in the cost of living, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That Treasury Board immediately restore the allowance to these groups to at least the original $45.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GRAIN

REDUCED SUBSIDY ON DOMESTICALLY CONSUMED GRAIN—RESULTANT INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport, in his capacity as the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. In 1973, the government responded to an anticipated five-cent increase in the price of a loaf of bread by putting in place a subsidy on domestically consumed wheat. That program was to last for a period of seven years. The Prime Minister said at that time:

In present world conditions the most urgent task of the government is to ensure that those who are least able to defend themselves against the effects of inflation are protected.

Since this will make little or no difference to wheat producers, why is the government now moving to cancel the subsidy and pass a large percentage of the burden to low income families in Canada who have to rely to a very large extent on bread and pasta in this period of rising food prices?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the arrangement made in 1973 was an arrangement with wheat producers that for seven years there would be a certain range within which the returns to them might move in connection with wheat sold for consumption in Canada. That range was originally set between a floor of $3.25 and a ceiling of $5. What we are now proposing is to raise the floor to $4 having regard to changes in the costs of production, and to allow the price to float in that range.

In 1973, because there had already been a very rapid escalation in the price of wheat to the $3 level and through that figure, the government decided to cushion the immediate impact of the rise by paying a consumer subsidy effective on everything over $3.25. That has gone on for some five years, to the benefit, I believe, of consumers to the extent of some $385 million. Now the government has decided that its spending restraint program requires this to be reviewed. Therefore, the cost—which perhaps would have been a cost to the treasury of $100 million this year—will now be changed in terms of a non-spending item and the Wheat Board will be free to make such a charge as the world price would indicate between the $4 and $5 range, which is a continuation of the old agreement.

While there will be an unfortunate, but necessary, increase in the price of bread, it should be recognized that it follows five years of complete stability in the part of the bread price which represents wheat. Other factors have gone up, of course, and the price of bread has continued to rise over that period—but not because of wheat. Now an adjustment is being allowed in relation to wheat which in total will have, I am told, approximately a 0.1 per cent impact upon the cost of living index compared to, say, 0.5 per cent to 0.7 per cent that the oil price increase would have meant.

Mr. McGrath: Surely the minister knows that that 0.1 per cent increase will lean most heavily on the group in society which needs protection most, that is, low income earners. When that policy was introduced, bread was 36 cents a loaf; it is now 60 cents a loaf. As a result of the government's move, it will go up to 70 cents a loaf by June of next year.

I ask the minister, why did the government, if they felt it was absolutely necessary as a restraint measure—I think the House and the country would seriously question that—not ease it in over a period of years, as it has done with oil prices, to offset the impact on consumers? Why is the government not doing this in the case of bread, given the impact it will have on poor families in the country who are finding it hard enough as it is to get by?

Mr. Lang: Lack of action in 1973 would have meant a very high proportionate increase in the price of bread, because bread was priced lower and wheat prices went up to $5.50 at that point. This shows the reason for the change today. As a proportion of bread prices, the increase will be far, far lower than it would have been if that had been allowed to happen in 1973.

However, the answer to the over-all question is that we have to exercise restraint in government spending from the point of view of the over-all impact on the economy of dollars spent by the government, whether through a deficit or through additional taxes. That was an essential program. As part of that program, we are transferring large amounts of money through improved social programs to those who need them most, and hence we put before the House recently the proposal to increase the guaranteed income supplement to older persons. Also, of course, we have the tax credit for families with children under the $18,000 bracket. These people will be helped substantially by these measures.

Mr. McGrath: I would remind the minister that we also have before the House the Auditor General's report. Perhaps he could look there for a way of implementing restraint, instead of on the backs of the poor.

I ask the minister whether he consulted his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, before implementing this move, given the fact that we have already removed this year the consumer subsidy on powdered skim milk in Canada—again, a move which will lean heaviest on low income earners. Did the minister consult the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and did he satisfy himself about the social impact on low income families in this country of this heartless, Marie Antoinette move which he is now taking?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Resign.

An hon. Member: Callous.

Mr. Lang: I am not sure Marie Antoinette would have been satisfied either, because the price of cake might go up as well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: The fact is that the government as a whole had to take this decision, although not gladly because we are never glad to see a price increase. The government took the decision after having arranged, through our policies, to transfer a significant amount of money to families most in need, families with incomes under $18,000. I need not remind the hon. member that those families will be receiving in the new year a tax credit, even if they do not pay tax, of $200 per child; so that a family of five will be receiving $1,000 in the next few months.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Stevens: On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York-Simcoe on a supplementary.

● (1422)

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR WHEAT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it follows on the questioning of my colleague.

In responding to questions, the minister indicated that this was a kind of floating price plan. Does the minister not recall, when the plan was brought in, that the minister of agriculture at that time said it would enshrine, to use his words, the two-price system for wheat for seven years? He went on to say that it was "a measure to help keep down the cost of bread to Canadians by freezing the price of bread wheat to millers at a maximum of $3.25 per bushel." Would the Minister of Transport now indicate why that word has been broken by defreezing the bread wheat price from $3.25 to $4?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of defreezing it from $3.25 to $4. In fact, if the hon. member would check the legislation, he would find that the legislation itself requires a review of the minimum price in the seven-year arrangement having regard to costs of production. Accordingly, last year we increased the minimum from $3.25 to $3.55. This year we are increasing it to $4, much in line with the suggestions made to us by farm organizations about the costs of production.

In 1973, at the same time as we introduced the program of two-price wheat, we introduced a consumer subsidy. We had to change that decision to have a consumer subsidy in relation to bread and wheat, in light of the exact fiscal situation. Surely hon. members will recognize that two-price wheat traditionally has been a program designed specifically in relation to the needs of producers. It is a program for which we from Saskatchewan and other parts of the prairies fought for years until we finally achieved it. It should be seen as a producers' program and not anything else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, when we take the rhetoric away from what the minister has said, once again the government has broken its word to the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Dealing with the question of the supposed saving of $100 million—which is a nice way of loading an extra five cents to seven cents on every loaf of bread for Canadian consumers—would the minister indicate if he considered cutting back on some of the losses which are being incurred at Mirabel: $51 million, as pointed out by the Auditor General, and an accumulated loss of $119 million since the airport was opened in 1975? If he considered somehow eliminating those losses, did he not feel that would be a more suitable restraint than to take it out on those in the country who have to eat such a basic commodity as bread?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what kind of extraordinary suggestion that is, coming from the hon. member who purports to know something about financing. We have an existing airport. He might wish that it had not been built, but it will prove that it is very badly needed over the next number of years. He might wish that it had not been built, but since the only loss on the airport, effectively, is the carrying of the actual interest charges against the original investment, nothing we do now will change that fact.

The fact of the matter is, money does not appear easily, in terms of savings, for the whole financial account. This government knew, when it was going about the cost-cutting exercise, that it would be cutting a lot of good programs. Even though hon. members opposite always made it sound as though programs could be cut easily and painlessly, we knew that would not be so. We do not like cutting this particular program in relation to the price of bread. But we had to make choices to keep our over-all financial position in order and to avoid the spurring of inflation, which is a very important priority for the government. Therefore, we had to act.

Oral Questions

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—SUGGESTED PROFITEERING

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my questions were for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in view of his absence I will direct them to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council. They also concern the Christmas gift of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to the Canadian people.

The cost of wheat in a loaf of bread will rise by 3.3 cents as a result of the subsidy being withdrawn by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, but the Bakery Council of Canada indicates that the price of a loaf of bread may rise by as much as seven cents. Why does this 3.3-cents increase in the raw material result in a seven-cent increase in the price of a loaf of bread for Canadian consumers? Is that profiteering? If it is, will the minister look into it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I want to assure the hon. member that the events following this policy announcement will be monitored to ensure that no profiteering will take place.

• (1427)

Mr. Nystrom: In other words, what he is saying, Mr. Speaker, is, "Let them eat crackers".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Salted?

Mr. Nystrom: I should like to bring to the attention of the Deputy Prime Minister, again in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the fact that profits of the food companies went up by some 63 per cent in the last 18 months. Maple Leaf Mills, for example—one of the largest bakeries—had a profit increase of 28 per cent in 1977, over 1976.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister assure us that the milling and baking industry will not take advantage of the withdrawal of the subsidy to artificially mark up the price of bread higher than it need be? If he can give that assurance, what will he do to make sure the promise is carried out?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, going back to the first question which the hon. member asked me, namely, whether it was the intention of the government to monitor any unjustified price increases that might result in profiteering, the answer is yes, the government will undertake that type of supervision.

In answer to the question put now, the government has received assurance and I am informed that the millers and others will not take advantage of this situation in order to realize windfall profits.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. The Deputy Prime Minister has said the millers will not take advantage of the situation. Since 1973, of course, the price of wheat to millers has been frozen but the price of bread went up by 56 per cent and the price of flour went up by 66 per cent. Can the minister explain to the House this large increase in the price of bread and the price of flour, when the price of the basic raw material has been frozen?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that has been explained to the House and to the people of Canada by various investigations into the question surrounding the price of bread. I believe the Food Prices Review Board, for one, made an exhaustive examination of the question; also, other bodies have done so. Obviously, other costs, such as the cost of labour involved in the milling process and the cost of packaging and distribution, have been rising even while the price of wheat has remained the same. I think that is really the proper perspective to put on this last increase in relation to the price of wheat. Other price elements in the price of bread have been going up along with inflation; only wheat has been held absolutely stable.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER MEETING QUEBEC COUNTERPART TO RESOLVE DIFFICULTIES WITH CERTAIN PROJECTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

On November 10 I moved a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 concerning a serious problem which exists, at least in my province, because of rules which apply to and paralyse certain Canada Works projects. Later on I asked the minister whether he intended to have a talk with the Quebec labour minister to try and find a solution so that work may resume on certain projects and not be stopped on others. In his reply the minister stated that he would contact his Quebec counterpart about this as soon as possible.

Could the minister advise us today whether he has had discussions with the Quebec labour minister? If so, have there been any tangible results and can we expect that the work will continue to be carried out normally on the project I mentioned and not be paralysed on other projects?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, because of the technical terms I must use, I shall reply in English.

[English]

I did look into the particular project the hon. member raised with me, because I wanted to discuss it with Mr. Johnson, the minister of labour, if that should be necessary. The program was travaux modifiés. Upon examining it, we found that project had gone outside the terms of reference of the Canada Works project; in other words, beyond the criteria. They had engaged workers in laying a concrete or cement floor. That was not an activity allowed for in the Canada Works contract. Because they had gone beyond the contract, they required a carte de compétence. That matter has since been resolved and the program is proceeding on course.

• (1432)

With respect to requirements under regulations established by the provinces, of course we expect the people participating in the Canada Works operations to abide by those regulations. We have indicated to them some of the problems they may run into as a result of the carte de compétence and it has not become a massive problem. Projects are proceeding apace. If the hon. member has further projects that might be applicable, I would be happy to hear from him.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF CHANGING ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I see that no solution has been found and that the situation will continue to create problems. At any rate, I have a question for the minister which arises from a communication from the first ministers' conference. It says: "The Canada Works program will be used primarily in areas with a high rate of unemployment". Given the present circumstances and in order to obtain results and so that the local authorities of these regions choose projects which will really serve the community, could the minister tell the House whether it is possible to change the criteria in order that projects will not only be announced, but also implemented without excessive difficulty? Moreover, given the fact that the workers who are on unemployment are not all skilled workers, would the minister be willing to change the criteria in order to allow these people to earn a living by working on the development of Canada Works projects?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are making some changes to tilt the benefits of Canada Works into the areas of high unemployment; we are looking at modifying some of the criteria. For example, where a concern may start up an operation that will employ people and result in a small profit, not a windfall profit, we are prepared to look at that kind of enterprise because it does create jobs and meets the needs in particular areas. We hope, through either ministerial advisory boards or through hon. members themselves—who I think know the ridings better than anyone—that the selection process will be followed. As the hon. member knows, we listen very carefully to representations from members of parliament.

In the final analysis, I must accept responsibility for the projects that we approve, but I lean very heavily on ministerial advisory boards from local areas and, most assuredly, on members of parliament to see that the projects in place are the ones that should be in place and do the most good for the area.

REPORTED RETURN TO CANADA OF FORMER FLQ MEMBERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with reports made today that officials of his department are involved in some way in arrangements which might facilitate the return to Canada of two members of the FLQ who were exiled from this country in 1970.

Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to confirm or deny those reports; and if they are correct, could he give the House of Commons details as to why these two members of the FLQ are returning to Canada? What is the role of the Government of Canada in facilitating their return?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I could give the one-word response that the hon. member has asked for in the phrasing of his question, by simply denying it. There has been no direct contact or, in any sense, interviews or anything of that nature between representatives of the Department of External Affairs or, so far as I know, of the federal government abroad.

The rumour which had some credence with one story this morning, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition may know, has this afternoon been diminished substantially in the substance of it, and we can only go by what we read in the papers or hear on the radio. There has been no contact with any officials abroad.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. It relates to an understanding given in this House in 1970 by the then minister of justice—the Hon. John Turner—who, in relation to the War Measures Act said, as reported at page 215 of the October 16, 1970, Hansard:

> It is my hope that some day the full details of the intelligence upon which the government acted can be made public, because until that day comes the people of Canada will not be able fully to appraise the course of action which has been taken by the government.

To this point, eight years later, there has not been any publication of the full or, indeed, even partial details of the intelligence upon which the government acted, so there is a state of ignorance in the Canadian public. Does this Minister of Justice have any intention of following the word given parliament by his predecessor in 1970?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my predecessor expressed a hope at that time. As far as I am concerned, I see no reason at this time to get involved in rehashing these events. If there are particular allegations or particular problems relating to the situation, I will be very happy to try to answer hon. members when they have questions.

If there are elements that should be examined by the McDonald commission, it has a completely free hand and access to all documents, including those relating to the 1970 crisis.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Justice tell us for what reason or policy this information is being kept from parliament and the public of Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, the Parliament of Canada and the public were as fully informed as was possible and advisable at the time. I see no reason why intelligence collected at the time or since should be released to the public.

INDUSTRY

POLICY ON INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On November 8, after a meeting between the minister and his counterparts in the provinces, the minister spoke to reporters, including those of Canadian Press. As it is outlined in the Citizen of November 8, 1978, he told them that—> —his grand design for industrial development during the next few years is to prepare Canadian companies to be ready for the major developments ahead. He offered the Alaska natural gas pipeline and the hydroelectric power project on the lower Churchill as examples.

> When asked how he knows his new approach will work, he replied: "Because I am in charge."

Now that the minister is no longer in charge—as we have seen from the announcement of November 24 on the formulation of a new board of economic management what guarantees do we have that this new approach of the minister's will work?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I intend to set up very soon a task force from the private sector, composed mainly of businessmen involved in engineering and in these types of projects, to examine all the projects so that we can maximize Canadian benefits those projects will provide for our industrial sector.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I wonder how the minister can say that when, surely, his proposal will have to go to the board of economic management. The Prime Minister has said, "The board will have the responsibility of reviewing and approving all programs and policies directly affecting economic development, secondary industry, resource industry, such as tourism, not only co-ordinating but also approving the delivery of federal programs." In view of these pronouncements by the Prime Minister, what does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce have left to supervise, except perhaps the metric commission? Does he now like the metric commission? Could he tell us what is left for him?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is still my responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: It has about 2,700 employees working on thousands of projects to assist industries right across Canada. The minister of economic development, the other ministers of the committee and I will work very well together, and we should see greater co-ordination of greater efforts to help industry in this country.

GRAIN

CALL FOR INDUSTRY MEETING TO IMPROVE GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. The grain movement in this country is continuing to deteriorate. It appears that no visible action is being taken to improve the situation. There seems to be some degree of uncertainty in identifying problems, isolating them and taking the necessary corrective action. The parties involved in the movement of grain are engaged in verbal crossfire.

● (1442)

Would the Minister of Transport undertake to exercise his leadership responsibility by convening an emergency meeting of all components of the grain handling, transportation and marketing sector of the grain industry, to bring all parties together in an attempt to resolve the current problem and lay the groundwork for increasing the capacity of our grain handling system to meet the challenges of the 1980s?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that it is not very useful for one sector within the grain handling system to point the finger at another sector. That has happened in the past and we are trying to minimize it.

Meetings of the type to which the hon. member refers have taken place and have been attended by expert management consultants. At an early date they will be in a position to make recommendations to me of specific action for improving the system. That action may require some change of position, whether on the part of the railways or the grain handling companies. At that point I may require the co-operation of all hon. members to make sure that all the pressure possible is brought to bear upon such a sector in order to act according to the recommendations.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Since the matter is so urgent, in the minds of producers and all concerned at this time, and nothing appears to be taking place to improve the situation, could I prevail upon the minister to call for such a meeting immediately? If he has had such a meeting, I am sure it is not known to this House or to producers and all those engaged in the grain handling industry. Because of its importance right now—and, I am sure, as a result of the study that has been undertaken he has some facts and figures before him—can he not immediately convene such an emergency meeting so that all the facts can be laid on the table and we can arrive at a solution before it is too late?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is really contradicting his earlier position, because such a meeting would only have a tendency to organize finger-pointing by one at the other—

Mr. Mazankowski: What about your leadership: you have not exercised your leadership?

Mr. Lang: What we have had, instead, is leadership in terms of making sure that working meetings were going on which would produce results and sound recommendations upon which we could act. Many people in the west know that these sessions have been going on, and I expect to have results from them.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL CONTRIBUTE FINANCIALLY TO RECONSTRUCTION OF EXPERIMENTAL WINDMILL AT ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE, QUEBEC

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his new position of Minister of State for Science and Technology, but in his absence, I will put it to his very efficient parliamentary secretary.

Following the deplorable accident which occurred last July at the experimental windmill built at Îles-de-la-Madeleine by Hydro-Quebec, with a contribution of over 90 per cent from the National Research Council, and following the recent decision to rebuild this generator, can the parliamentary secretary tell the House, as well as the population of Magdalen Islands, of Quebec and of Canada as a whole if NRC, and therefore the federal government will support financially this reconstruction project?

[English]

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to reply in the affirmative. This project, the wind turbine vertical axis generator, the Darrieus type, will be negotiated as a joint project between the province of Newfoundland and the province of Quebec for an even larger type, when it will be reconstructed.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I might mention that Dr. Schneider, Director of the National Research Council, will be appearing tomorrow morning before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and will be available to answer any further questions that members may have with respect to that project.

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT INACTION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in his absence perhaps I could direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday's Economic Council of Canada report stated that the rapid increase in food prices can be attributed to soaring profits for food and beverage manufacturers. Since I have received a secret cabinet document dated June 20, entitled "Possible Response to Food Price Increases", may I ask the minister if he can indicate to the House why the government has reneged on its responsibilities, as indicated in that document, to take action to prevent rising food prices and profits?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have no way of authenticating the source of the hon. member's question. I will draw it to the attention of the minister so that he can deal with it when he returns to Ottawa.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Perhaps I might ask the Deputy Prime Minister a question that will not require any authentication.

In view of the fact that, according to the council's report, over-all profits in the food industry increased 63 per cent in the last six months, and since individual food companies such as Weston's, with a 113 per cent profit increase, and Burns Foods with a 199 per cent increase in profit, are profiteering off the Canadian consumer, will the minister request these companies to rescind their food increases?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has already made a statement to the effect that he has been taking a keen interest in these developments and reviewing possible action that could be taken. I should like to refresh my memory on the policy point.

FISHERIES

SALE OF SWORDFISH TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wished to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister, as the fishing industry is one in which he has considerable expertise.

According to Mr. D. A. MacLean, director of the federal fisheries department, planning and co-ordination branch, some 1,000 tons of swordfish—representing a multi-million dollar industry—have been caught this year by Nova Scotian fishermen and sold to United States buyers at sea, which is reminiscent of the prohibition era when Nova Scotians delivered good cheer to their thirsty friends below the border.

In view of the fact that Canadian fishermen are obviously selling swordfish at a fraction of the real value, is the minister aware of any steps that have been taken recently to legalize this fishery in order to make possible direct shipments from Canada to the United States?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such steps.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since it is obvious, from the tonnage I have mentioned, that the United States is no longer concerned about the level of mercury in swordfish, and since Canadians are obviously geared to catch this particular species, would the Deputy Prime Minister consult his colleague with a view to initiating the immediate opening of the swordfishing industry for Canadian consumption?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has demonstrated his interest in following up all possibilities with respect to increasing the income of fishermen, including swordfishermen. All I would hope, in concert with the hon. member, is that the prosperity that was yielded to Nova Scotia in the earlier era to which he referred might be renewed at the present time.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELEVISING OF HOUSE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications which is related to the policy of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission that proceedings of this House shall not be carried on the community channels of Canadian cable television companies, which effectively restricts access to those proceedings.

Considering that funds to generate television coverage were provided from general tax revenues, and that restriction of viewership to those who own a converter amounts to a viewing licence, will the minister tell the House whether it was the purpose of this policy to restrict first-hand exposure to the government's incompetence, as revealed during question period, to Canadians wealthy enough to own a converter; or was it, rather, the purpose to delay that exposure in the same manner as it has delayed an election, trying to put off the date—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. One of the restrictions the hon. member will have to get accustomed to is that against asking argumentative questions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER ON SERVICEMEN'S MAIL

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of National Defence? Would the minister advise the House whether he agrees that social insurance numbers shall be a condition prerequisite on all mail addressed to servicemen so that it may be delivered to them; or is it just a matter of a quirk in his department that this is now being requested and that mail not bearing the social insurance number is being returned? The social insurance number concerns social insurance.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am looking into the question of social insurance numbers. As I am sure the hon. member knows, it replaces the old regimental number. It is required for overseas mail and for ships at sea because of the great difficulties experienced if there is not specific identification. We may have a number of "Al Jones" on a ship or in a Middle East force. It is necessary in that system: in my understanding that it is not required for any base in Canada. It has been brought to my attention that some mail has been returned, and I am checking into that now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In view of the fact there are ever-decreasing numbers of servicemen involved in the armed forces, perhaps the danger of duplication is more apparent than real.

What justification is there for using the social insurance number, rather than the regimental number, for purposes of the Department of National Defence? Social insurance numbers are for the purpose of social insurance.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I have had no complaints from those in the service with reference to this matter. It seems to be a logical application of the social insurance number as a replacement for the regimental number of the past. It is for easy identification. I am a little astounded about all the fuss that is made about this. I have never had any objection to it myself. In fact,I would be happy to have my thumbprint on it, if it would help in identifying me.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DANGER OF EXTINCTION OF BELUGA WHALE THROUGH FISHING PRACTICES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries I would direct my question to his colleague—if they are still speaking—the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns the fate of the beluga whale population in an area over which the minister exercises jurisdiction. Is the minister aware that this particular breed of whale is in danger of extermination as a result of fishing practices?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, if I may comment on the gratuitous observation of the hon. member as to whether I am on speaking terms with my colleague, I want to assure him that not only are we on speaking terms but we are working very closely together to resolve some of the problems in which we are mutually involved.

As to the beluga whale, I will have to take that question as notice.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MINISTER'S REMARKS RESPECTING NEGATIVE INCOME TAX

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare: it is based on an interview she recently gave outside the House. Is it now official policy to redistribute wealth via the method of the negative income tax? I base this question on her interview.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the hon. member is very hypothetical and theoretical. I do not know to which interview he is referring; he did not state that. However, as an ideal goal of redistributing revenues in terms of achieving the most dignity for those in need of assistance, in reaching all those in need and in keeping the incentive to work, surely a negative income tax is excellent.

REPORTED RETURN TO CANADA OF FORMER FLQ MEMBERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs: it arises from the answer he gave our leader in which he said the veracity of the story had somewhat diminished. I would like to ask him just a plain, ordinary question. Can the minister, on behalf of his government, department or any other department, deny categorically that there are any negotiations proceeding at the present time with regard to the return of the two FLQ people mentioned in the newspapers?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think that is what I said, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member wants a straightforward answer, yes, I deny it. I said there have been no contacts made through our embassy or our consular offices. In that sense, obviously that is the case.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REASON FOR CHANGES TO FRENCH REGIONALIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Secretary of State could tell us why the National Film Board has decided to cancel from the regionalization program the French production centres of Toronto and St. Boniface and to freeze the budget of the Moncton centre while almost nothing has been cut from the budget of the English regional production and almost nothing from the French regional production in Quebec? Has the cabinet approved such decision?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet is not responsible for that matter but the decision was taken by the National Film Board. There were obviously some cuts in the budget of the National Film Board but these did not reduce proportionally the funds available for the production of French films outside Quebec for the regionalization program. Two offices were closed, I think, one in Winnipeg and the other in Toronto, however, to have more money available for operations. They kept the Moncton office. It was a matter of using truly professional people. The program in Winnipeg and Toronto was for training purposes. As in the past, the board will continue its efforts to maintain the same ratio in the allocation of its funds taking into account that total National Film Board resources have been reduced. It is also true that the same ratio will be applied in the allocation of funds for that purpose.

HEALTH

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL SCHOOL NUTRITION PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday, at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, the Minister of Agriculture confirmed that the sale of skim milk powder is continuing to drop.

Given the fact that in some Canadian cities, including the city of Montreal, there are now operating very successful school nutrition programs which have contributed very much to the better health of children attending those schools, has the minister's department, either by itself or in co-operation with the Department of Agriculture, given any consideration to the establishment of a national school nutrition program which would go a long way toward using up some of our surplus foods such as skim milk powder, cheese and powdered eggs and would help to improve the health of young Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the question is fundamental and has been put to me repeatedly outside the House because of the current American practice in the matter. What the hon. member is suggesting here is that we distribute our surpluses of nutritional food such as cheese and milk in the schools. To begin with, though it may seem attractive, we are not in favour of free distribution of nutritional meals in schools as a solution to the problem of poor nutrition because studies made in the United States now reveal that the children were more poorly fed at home, at the other two meals, that is breakfast and supper, than before the program was set up. Still, I have not given up the idea completely, but I want to give an idea of the general trend of my department.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

HUMAN RIGHTS ATROCITIES IN CAMBODIA—CANADA'S REPRESENTATIONS TO UN SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Canada's severe denunciation of human rights atrocities in Cambodia are among the most severe of any ever made in the United Nations. In spite of this documentation and the potential threat to international security that could result from escalating the China-Vietnam and Cambodia-Vietnam conflict, Canada has not attempted to bring the IndoChinese situation before the Security Council. Does the minister intend to undertake such an initiative in the near future before Canada's Security Council term expires?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we had considered it but concluded, after canvassing the situation, that the initiative would not have any chance of success. Incidentally, that was the same conclusion arrived at by the United States. Therefore, that is not the route we have followed. I understand, however, that in so far as Cambodia is concerned, the Secretary General has received an invitation to visit personally in order to examine the situation from a human rights point of view. I believe he is now considering ways through which he might be able to carry out that mission.

● (1502)

Mr. Wenman: In spite of Canada's specific recommendation to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva with respect to the gross violations of human rights in Cambodia, no response has been forthcoming from that commission. What iniatives will the minister be taking to have the Geneva commission address the Cambodian issue?

Mr. Jamieson: I think the meeting to which the hon. member refers will take place on December 11 and 12. We shall be fully represented there and we shall, of course, be making the most vigorous intervention we can, which, by the way, will have considerable credibility in view of our recent action in taking some 600 refugees from their unfortunate situation in Malaysia.

It is pleasant to be able to report that the United States announced yesterday, that it will be taking some 23,000 refugees, in total, from that part of the world. Mr. Vance and I discussed these matters when he was here last week, and we shall be working in concert at the Geneva meeting, taking all the steps we can possibly take.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 9, consideration in committee of Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose on Thursday, November 9, 1978, clause 1 was under consideration. Shall clause 1 carry?

On clause 1—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I suggest that hon. members pursue their conversations behind the curtain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, a good deal of the discussion that has taken place on this bill has had to do with the desirability of its benefits being passed on to the families of this country. In that context, quite a bit has been said about the desirability of the provinces not cutting back on any of their benefits because of the benefits provided under this legislation. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has said on two or three occasions that she has made a very strong plea to the provincial governments in that respect, and I hope that by today she may have something to say to the House as to what assurances she has received from the provinces.

Before she rises to comment on that aspect of the matter, I should like to ask her to comment on something else which is in the same vein. As we all agree, it is very important when old age pensioners receive an increase in their pensions that they receive the full benefit of it. The same should apply to any improvement in family allowances, whether it is in the amount of the allowance itself, or in the form of a tax credit which is to be received in April or May of each year.

Today concern has been expressed in the House regarding the rise in the price of bread. This has led to reminders of the rise in the price of milk and other foodstuffs. In view of the desire of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that this money be of benefit to families, a desire which she has expressed by making appeals to the provincial governments, did she do her best to persuade cabinet not to drop that subsidy and let the price of bread rise? If she did not get into that battle with all her clout and influence, I hope she will do so even yet.

There is not much point in granting an increase of a few dollars a month by the provision of the child tax credit and the changes in family allowances if the cost of bread, milk and other basic necessities rises and, as a result, the families of this country lose the benefit before they receive it. That is precisely the situation. The families of the country will find their family allowance cheques reduced in January; they will not receive any money by way of tax credit until April, but in the meantime there is a rise in the price of bread, as there was in the price of milk. What part has the minister played in attempting to get cabinet not to make the unfair decision announced today by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will give me a chance to explain the exact state of affairs regarding the guaranteed income supplement and the child tax credit. As to the child tax credit, it is time to review the situation. It is an important matter, as has been indicated by hon. members of all parties during the debate.

On October 20 I sent letters to my provincial counterparts urging them to pass on the child tax credit, and clarifying that the credit could be ignored for CAP cost-sharing. On November 16 I sent telexes to all of them. I made further representations and had discussions with them in Toronto at the November 20 and November 21 meeting of welfare ministers. On November 27 I telexed the provinces clarifying that CAP asset guidelines could be waived as required, to permit a full passing on.

At the federal-provincial conference last week, five provincial colleagues officially indicated to me their cabinets are in the process of recommending that their governments pass it on fully. I am referring to the provinces of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. I have received no official word from the other five provinces, although every one of them is concerned and understands the problem fully.

I have not received the final approval from any province. I have not received word that their cabinets have approved the recommendation. It is time for groups representing the interests of mothers, underprivileged citizens and families in general to request a clarification of the positions of the provincial governments on this matter.

As I have said, it is good politics at no cost to the provinces. It is federal taxpayers' money which will be transferred to individual Canadian families by a program similar to family allowances. We do not think it should become an additional transfer payment to provinces. That viewpoint and philosophy was expressed by all parties in this debate. I invite voluntary associations interested in the development of social policies or my colleagues in parliament to make their views known to their provincial governments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the minister is able to report some progress. She has reached the point where she knows that in five provinces the mills are grinding in the right direction. I hope she will stay with it, and that in the end no Canadian family or child will lose the benefit of Bill C-10 because of cutbacks by the provinces.

However, I should like to hear the minister's comments on the other point I raised. I realize she was busy discussing things with her officials so that she would be ready to participate in this debate and perhaps missed my point. This must be a pretty sad day for her. She is the co-pilot of a bill which provides for increases in family income, and on this very day we received an announcement that the price of bread will rise five to seven cents per loaf, on top of increases in the prices of other foodstuffs.

Every time there is an increase in old age pensions, all of us receive letters from pensioners indicating that rent increases or other cost increases are greater than the actual increases they receive every three months in their old age pensions. In January the cheques mothers receive will be down to $20 per month, and the tax credit will not be in their hands until April or May. In the meantime, the prices of bread and milk as well as other costs of living rise for these people. The entire exercise in which the minister has been engaged can be brought to nought by these other increases.

I am not attempting to persuade the minister into saying that she disagrees with her cabinet colleagues, such as the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board; but we have the right to know whether she has made any effort to persuade cabinet to take other steps, or refrain from taking the wrong steps, so that the benefit of this legislation will not be wiped out before it is on the books.

Miss Bégin: I would not say that it is a sad day for me. Measures taken by the government in fields other than my own, but having consequences for the same Canadians, always concern me. However, it would not be fair to the Canadian producers of wheat or milk to freeze the prices of these two commodities. That is important. The role of the Minister of National Health and Welfare is to make sure that Canadians who may suffer a bit ultimately are equipped to fight back and accommodate themselves to the new prices by receiving more than the increase in the cost of commodities. The increase in the price of bread which may result, some say in one or two cents, and the hon. member said maybe five cents—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or seven cents.

Miss Bégin: Nobody knows that yet. But nobody necessarily makes an illegitimate profit between the farmer on the one hand and the consumer on the other. It is only the price that is in question. It will be a few cents a loaf, and that could not amount to more than $10 a year for a family.

We are effecting a net additional amount of $140 per child, and I am pleased about that. I am watching the scene for any measures that may erase or cancel out the benefits of this new child tax credit. I cannot honestly accept that this updating of the price of wheat in Canada will cancel out the benefit to Canadian consumers of this new child tax credit. I want to say that, of course, I care, like everybody else.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I realize it is difficult for one minister of the cabinet to express disagreement with a stand taken by another minister, but I point out to her that today the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, in defence of his announcement, referred to the increase in the GIS and the increase in the family allowance as an excuse for what he had done, which will produce an increase in the price of bread.

I hope I did not give the impression that I thought the increase in the price of bread by itself was going to wipe out the net increase being made available to families through Bill C-10. However, when you take one thing after another—an increase in the price of bread, an increase in the price of milk, an increase in the price of turkeys, an increase in the price of beef and in everything down the line, including rents and so on—the good move that she has won could be wiped out.

We are getting a little tired of listening to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board giving us excuses like this, and we are getting a little tired of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs telling us that these things are being looked at and monitored. The grand assurance given by the Deputy Prime Minister today was that the increase in the price of bread will be monitored. In the meantime, the benefits that are supposedly being granted by this parliament, on the initiative of the government with this bill, are being cancelled.

I suggest that most of us in this place appreciate the hard battle the minister has waged in the cabinet in this time of restraint to win anything at all; but we call on her to keep up that fight, to keep using her clout and influence to protect the interests of families in all ways. It is not good enough just to give them a net increase in family allowance and then let the government, by action or by inaction, bring about an increase in the cost of living to the medium and low income families of this country, so that in the end they are no better off, if not worse off.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, maybe I should add one thing. Special measures with special consequences, such as the increase in the price of a loaf of bread as a result of the readjustment of the domestic wheat price, are of special concern. However, generally speaking, the increase in the cost of living is met by the indexing of our programs. I am sure the House knows and regrets, as I do, that indexing could not take place for family allowances in this year, and that in addition there is a slight reduction. However, the child tax credit has been indexed and that is a major feature of this bill of great importance. According to the financial projections the child tax credit next year will be $218 per child.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is in 1980.

Miss Bégin: The first cheques to go out in a few months will be $200, and the year after they will be $218. The ceiling in respect of a family's income, that is the take-home pay, which is now $18,000 for a family with one child, is also indexed. That seems to me to be of great importance, and I would say we have to fight to keep indexation. I do not want to backtrack from the basic idea of keeping the full or as close to the full value of this child tax credit.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I really just want time for one more question, for I notice that other hon. members are trying to get the floor. When the minister first stood up this afternoon she said she hoped soon to have information about the guaranteed income supplement increases in relation to the provinces. I know that is not in relation to this bill, but it is awfully close to it. If she now has that information it would be useful if the committee could be given it. I am referring to—

Miss Bégin: I still do not have the information in question, Mr. Chairman; I simply want to confirm that British Columbia, Ontario and one of the prairie provinces, whose name I forget—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Saskatchewan?

Miss Bégin: No, I don't think so. Those provinces have agreed to entirely give back to the old age people, through their fiscal benefit program, which is usually called Gains, the increase in the guaranteed income supplement. However, as I have just said, I need the information which my assistants will send me immediately.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I should like to pursue the questions raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It had been my intention to pursue them at the outset, but you went, as opposed to our custom, to the NDP first.

Let me say this to the minister and make it very clear. If she does not know this, it is regrettable. The increase in the price of a loaf of bread as a consequence of what her colleague, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, did yesterday, will be in the neighbourhood of at least seven cents a loaf. I am told that by this time next year, given the ordinary escalation in costs experienced by the bakeries in Canada, it will be up to about six cents—I am sorry, ten cents a loaf. That "six cents" was a Freudian slip. During the great depression that is what a family in Newfoundland had to get by on—six cents a day.

I want to take the minister back to events of 1973. She will recall that the government of the day, albeit a minority government, met here in emergency session to deal with a national rail strike. At that time, in response to the growing concern in the country over the escalation in food prices and the full impact of inflation, which was then beginning to make itself felt in rising food prices, the government came into the House and introduced a subsidy program for the domestic consumption of wheat, the program which the government has cancelled today. At that time a loaf of bread cost 36 cents.

The reason the government brought the program in at that time was to prevent a five-cent per loaf increase in price. The prime minister introduced that program and gave as his rationale the statement that world conditions make it a most urgent task of government to ensure that those who are least able to defend themselves against the effects of inflation are protected. That action was taken at a time when the universal family allowance payment was substantially increased and bread was 36 cents a loaf.

Now, coincidental with another change in the family allowance law, the government does the very opposite; instead of lowering the price of bread, it removes the consumer subsidy. Bread will probably go to 70 cents a loaf, and not only bread. There is also pasta, which is a very important part of the daily diet of low income families. I am referring to pasta in the form of macaroni, spaghetti and so on. It is especially important now, given the fact that since 1973 beef prices have escalated considerably.

It is not enough for the minister to try to talk her way around this, as she did in response to questions by my hon. friend. Was she consulted by her colleague about this subsidy program coming off, resulting in increases in the prices of bread and pasta? Has she done studies to satisfy herself as to what this will mean to low income families? My hon. friend has already referred to other price increases, such as the increase in the price of fowl and turkey, which low income people are depending on more and more as the principal source of meat protein due to increases in the price of beef. This whole thing comes at a time when the consumer subsidies on powdered skim milk are eliminated, resulting in an increase in the price of milk. This is a disaster for low income families in this country.

I have great sympathy for the minister. She has been under tremendous pressure since the House started because she has been in the House continuously to deal with her three bills. These bills deal with increases in the GIS, medical funding, which we voted second reading today, and this bill to amend the Family Allowances Act. We have a bill before us which will reduce the number of people eligible for unemployment insurance and a measure which will eliminate the consumer subsidy on domestically consumed wheat.

We also have a situation which was addressed in the House recently whereby the Minister of Agriculture said that there is no way that the increase in the price of turkeys can be justified at this time because there are ample stocks on hand. Yet the price of turkeys is going out of sight. From a survey taken yesterday, I discovered that prices in Canada on turkeys range anywhere from $1.44 to $1.60 per pound. This is a robbing Peter to pay Paul type of situation. I do not understand how the situation has changed.

In 1973 the government responded in a positive way by putting in a program to provide a subsidy on domestically consumed wheat to eliminate an increase in the price of bread. At the same time they brought in a subsidy on liquid milk. These were moves designed to protect the poor against inflation and were coincidental with a measure which parliament considered at that time to change the concept of the family allowance program by increasing substantially the universal amount of family allowance payments.

I repeat, was the minister consulted by the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers? I understand that he was the culprit. We are told by the press that the minister responsible for the Wheat Board resisted having his program removed because it would result in an increase in the price of bread, but the president of the economic development board had his way. It seems to me to be patently unjust for the government to be moving in a counter-productive direction to that in which the Minister of National Health and Welfare is trying to move.

I implore the minister to tell the House that she will recommend to her colleagues that they reconsider this move in light of what has happened. We are now in the post-controls era. We do not even have the Food Prices Review Board any longer. All we have is the paper tiger known as CSIP, which has no investigatory powers. We know that that other wonder, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will not do anything because he has demonstrated that he does not have the capacity or the will, even though he has the power, to act on behalf of consumers, especially those in the low income brackets.

I would ask the minister to tell the House if she was consulted on this move at any time before or after she brought in her bill and if she gave her consent—presumably she must have—what steps does she intend to take to offset the situation, given the social impact it will have on low income families already crippled by rising poultry prices and suffering the effects of the elimination of the subsidy on powdered skim milk?

These are important questions, and I say to the minister, with great respect, that she cannot sluff them off as she did in replying to the questions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have to answer because the hon. member's questions were not with regard to Bill C-10. What is relevant to Bill C-10 in his questions has already been answered in my replies to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

If hon. members wish to see the money this bill will provide go to families in need, it will have to be passed. We have not yet completed consideration of clause 1, and the more discussion we have the longer this bill, which will give a child tax credit of $200 to all the families in need in this country, will be held up.

Today the hon. member has tried to link this bill to the increase to $4 per bushel of the domestic price of wheat. I was a party to this decision and I studied it carefully to satisfy myself that it was essential to give that increase to Canadian farmers. I also satisfied myself that the people in need in this country would be equipped with enough additional cash over and above the indexation to absorb these additional costs.

The hon. member, in an attempt to be exotic, has referred to pasta. I represent 75,000 Italian Canadians, and we know what pasta is in Saint-Michel. The hon. member does not know what he is talking about, and I am not sure that he has ever experienced poverty. I do not know whether he has ever lived the way that they live back home. His playing politics with what everybody considers to be a good bill does not help the child in need in this country. I welcome suggestions to improve the bill, but none have been forthcoming.

We are passing a bill to tighten up the unemployment insurance program which, by definition, will mean more welfare, of which cost this government will pay 50 per cent. The question is not so much that we are increasing the welfare rolls, which cannot be avoided, but whether the people who are the victims will be given allowances. What the hon. member forgot to say with regard to tightening up the UI program at the request of the public was that he has also been telling the government when he felt Conservative that the UI bill was too sloppy, too relaxed and so on. We are going to save $700 million of the taxpayers' money. Can he oppose that? Can he oppose $40 million more in welfare payments, of which we will pay half, in order to save $700 million? I should like to understand his reasoning.

I am not going to recommend to cabinet that it reconsider its decision on the wheat price because I am satisfied it is a reasonable decision. I detest price increases but I think it is unfair for somebody who cares about poverty—and the hon. member is one of them except when he plays politics—to use the symbol of the increase of a few cents in a loaf of bread. That is a powerful emotional symbol for people. The hon. member is using the symbol of milk and bread to prove that life is collapsing in Canada. That is not true, Mr. Chairman. Life is improving in Canada. The quality of life will be better with the child tax credit of $200, non-taxable and indexed to the cost of living, for every child of every family in need of it. I plead that we move on with the bill and start the clause by clause discussion to try to improve the bill.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, there were so many cheap shots in what the minister had to say—

An hon. Member: Well deserved.

Mr. McGrath: There were so many uncharacteristic cheap shots in what the minister had to say in response to my legitimate concern that I am tempted to ignore them.

An hon. Member: What is your concern?

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member opposite interjects. What about the press release you issued a few days ago—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he should address the Chair.

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member for Assiniboia interjects. What about the press release he introduced the other day in which he rejected the suggestion made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding an attempt to bring down beef prices? Unless he is prepared to put up I suggest he shut up.

The Minister accuses me of urging the government to tighten up on the unemployment insurance program. I have urged that they tighten up on the sloppy administration of the unemployment insurance program. The Auditor General has shown that $145 million has gone out on overpayments. Every time there is that kind of sloppy administration it is the legitimate unemployment insurance recipient who has to bear the consequences, because it is then that the screws are tightened.

The minister talks about getting on with this bill. We are anxious to do that, but why did the government not continue with it when they had it in committee of the whole? We did not ask the government to suspend committee stage of the bill. They elected to do so and have to take full responsibility for the delay, not the opposition.

With regard to the question of consultation, the minister has been able to satisfy us that only five provinces have agreed not to deduct the amount of the child tax credit. That is some improvement, but what about the other five provinces? The minister asks us to use our influence in our own provinces. Why does she not use her influence with her counterpart in Quebec to get some kind of guarantee that they will not deduct the amount of the child tax credit from their welfare programs?

The hon. member for Churchill has raised legitimate questions with regard to native people. That is a matter within the control of the Government of Canada, but we cannot even get a guarantee from them that they will not deduct the welfare that they administer to native people from the amount to be paid out under this child tax credit bill.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has raised questions with respect to orphans, and the hon. member for Egmont and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands have questioned the discriminatory provisions of the bill regarding the position it places the unmarried person in as opposed to the married person. These are all legitimate questions.

The minister is obviously not used to this phase of parliamentary procedure. Before we get into the bill clause by clause it is traditional that the minister satisfy us on general questions. These are general questions and we will have questions of a specific nature when we get into the bill.

I want to ask the minister if she can tell the committee exactly why she could not get agreement from all her colleagues when she met them in Toronto last week instead of from just five. I should like to ask her if she intends to take into account the ceilings to be imposed under the new Canada Assistance Plan regarding transfer payments to the provinces.

There are other questions we want to ask. If the minister wants to get to clause by clause consideration, I would have no objection to reserving clause 1; but until we have answers to our questions, we have no intention of passing clause 1.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, for Christmas I will give the hon. member for St. John's East a short text by Aneurin Bevan; he may not read his writings as he is a former labour minister in Great Britain and the high priest on procedures. I just want to say once and for all that I am never like the high priest on procedures because that is to keep things from moving. It is against life.

This being said, I cannot, of course, obtain from provincial ministers something that is purely of provincial jurisdiction. I want to make it clear that we are now talking about a federal bill which will operate through the federal income tax system. It is difficult for a federal minister to obtain a deal from a Péquiste minister whose government wants to break away from Canada. It should be easy for a member who is supposed to know politics as well as the hon. member opposite to accept that. I made representation to Dr. Lazure—a man who usually has his heart in the right place—and I hope he will obtain permission from his cabinet to pass on to the mother on welfare all of the new child tax credit. I have taken every opportunity to invite the provinces to take that course of action. Until a few months ago I did not want to provoke provinces into unnecessary confrontation, but I think the time has come for people in the province of Quebec to ask their government for an accounting. That is the spirit in which I informed the House of this passing on to mothers on welfare the full child tax credit.

I should like to take the opportunity the hon. member has given me to answer a few outstanding questions.

On the question of the supposed discrimination against women on the ground of marital status put forward by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for Egmont, I have answered that already and it is recorded in Hansard. I confirm again that there is no discrimination against women in this bill other than the fact that the cheque goes to the mother instead of to the child or the father. That is a very important feature of the bill and I am very proud of it. It will put in the hands of mothers of poor families $120 million additional cash. That may be discrimination but I do not go for philosophy, I go for the practical realities of life.

As to the second possible discrimination which, if I understood the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands correctly, is the possibility of discrimination against people living common law, I have answered that. If there is discrimination, it should be addressed in the income tax bill as such because it is a basic feature of the bill. I have said that often.

I do not know if it is part of the rules and regulations that I should repeat something ad nauseam. I do not know who this helps, surely not my throat. However, I will repeat this and maybe the hon. member for St. John's East and I will then understand each other.

Common law situations are not recognized for any purposes under the Income Tax Act. That may be right, it may be wrong. The fact is it would be very difficult to control the situation of common-law marriages in many cases, especially in a society where the standards of behaviour have changed, as they have in all of the western world, toward more trial marriages and so on, which is good. However, how do you control such a situation if time is not an element of it?

I am a bit surprised that the hon. member for St. John's East would advocate a change in the sense of a rejection of the family unit as a basis for policy development. I do not know what he has in mind when he suggests that; he did not explain his reasons.

As to the other outstanding questions, I have been able to obtain answers which I will provide through the hon. member for St. John's East to his colleague.

The hon. member for Provencher asked about the administrative cost of family allowances. The total administrative cost of family allowances is $6.25 per family per year, or 52 cents per family per month. In other words, it is one dollar of overhead for $100 of benefits. As far as I know, it is one of the best if not the best administered programs with regard to keeping the administrative cost as low as possible.

The hon. member for Provencher and the hon. member for Churchill, who is presently in the chamber, asked for clarification of the consequences of this child tax credit on Indian children and Indian mothers on welfare. I can confirm to both hon. members today that the department of Indian affairs will fully pass on the new credit to native people on welfare. I think that clarifies that situation.

I have met, as I said I would, with the National Indian Brotherhood. We have already had two meetings at which time we spoke of the program. I of course asked for their co-operation in helping to train volunteer women who in turn can help mothers on reserves fill out the form. Indeed, an education program may be needed for every Canadian so that they will not be the victim of tax discounters and so on.

A question was asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, who is also in the chamber. The question is rather fundamental and does not necessarily touch on this bill. It has to do with a cause which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain has been putting forward for years. That is what I understand from the investigation that I promised. It involves the case of an orphan where the child's income is too high to qualify for family allowance. At present the situation is the way the hon. member described it. In other words, this bill does not change the regulation that family allowances are not paid in respect of children whose income exceeds $2,780 per year.

My personal philosophy is that because the family allowance is universal in nature, it should go to all children in Canada. However, that is not the situation now. There are exceptions made for children with income. I want to satisfy myself that their income, by way of estate or otherwise, is taken care of by Revenue Canada the way it should be, not by the loss of their family allowance. I undertake today to take this up with my cabinet colleagues so that orphans with income will be included in the universal program of family allowances in the same way as every other Canadian child.

With regard to orphans vis-à-vis the receipt of the child tax credit, which is a selective program by nature meant for children of families in need, this question is too difficult to settle today on the floor of the House. It is not a question of principle. The principle is for children in need. The income may be adequate to meet the need. On the other hand, the method of income could be discussed.

With regard to orphaned brothers and sisters who have been separated, should the family situation be taken into account? How should that be tackled in order to give the child tax credit to orphans with income?

The second part of the question regarding the relationship of orphans to eligibility for the child tax credit requires some study. I have instructed my department to carry that out as part of the review which will take place in 1979 on the functioning of the new child tax credit with a view to making amendments, corrections or improvements.

I do not know if I have made myself clear enough to satisfy the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. To sum up, I will undertake to raise with my cabinet colleagues the question of orphans with income under the universal family allowances program. As to their eligibility in relation to the child tax credit, this question has to be studied.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Chairman, I begin by saying that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is a good minister who appears to be on top of her department. She is a progressive minister who is going in the right way. We have said that many times.

The comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for St. John's East have been very relevant. While the minister is trying to do something for the ordinary poor people, other arms of government are doing things that will nullify some of the benefits she is trying to bring about. That is a real tragedy.

There are one or two matters I would like to have clarified. The minister knows that between January 1 and April 1 there will be a decrease in family allowances from $25 and some odd cents to $20. There will be a natural decrease despite the fact that some commodities people are buying for their children are going up in price.

There is something the minister said that should be corrected. She does not appear to know the Wheat Board operation very well. She said the withdrawal of the subsidy meant the farmers would be better off. The subsidy does not have anything to do with the farmer. What we are talking about here is a subsidy to the millers. It is part of the two-price wheat legislation that was introduced and became law in September 1973. It was to cover a period of seven years. As the minister in charge of the Wheat Board said, the law would ensure that the price the millers paid for their wheat would stay at $3.25. He gave a commitment that the price would be frozen at that level, which amounts to seven and a half cents for a 24-ounce loaf for seven years, up to 1980. Today he reneged on that promise in the name of restraint.

Some of the things we are saying today are very relevant indeed. While the minister is doing some really good things, and we compliment her for them, her colleague is doing exactly the opposite, making it more tough for the ordinary citizen.

As the hon. member for St. John's East said, and as I said earlier in the debate, the bakery council of Canada has stated that the average price of bread will increase by about seven cent a loaf. This is despite the fact that withdrawal of the subsidy would put the price of wheat up by only 3.3 cents a loaf. The sum of 3.3 cents a loaf in terms of the cost of the raw material will equal 7 cents a loaf in terms of what a person is going to pay for it retail. That is a big increase.

The minister said it means only about $10 per family per year, but I would like to have her ask her officials to check their arithmetic. With respect, I think they are wrong. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board said the subsidy was worth $100 million this year, Mr. Chairman. And as I said, you are not just looking at the cost of wheat going up; you are looking at what the miller, the baker, the retailer and the wholesaler are taking in between—up to 7 cents a loaf. The rise will be not 3.3 cents but 7 cents. So if the subsidy at 3.3 cents is worth $100 million, then an increase of 7 cents is worth over $200 million. If you divide the Canadian population into $200 million you come out with about nine dollars for every man, woman and child, or $36 a year for a family of four. That is going to nullify a lot of the good things which are being done by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I don't blame her for that.

I really got to my feet here this afternoon to defend her and to say I wish other ministers were doing what she is doing in terms of looking out for ordinary Canadians. But because the price of bread will rise by about $36 per year per family, a lot of the good things she is doing in terms of raising the family allowance will be nullified.

We also heard her comment that the farmers need price increases. Of course they need price increases, but this lifting of the subsidy will not increase their incomes. Look at turnkeys, for example. The price of turkeys, as the hon. member for St. John's East said, has gone up, in some cases as high as $1.40 or $1.60 a pound. I'll bet you, Mr. Chairman, that whether they sell for $1.60 or $1.40 a pound, the retailer is paying the same wholesale price for those turkeys. I also know that the Canadian turkey producers received only an extra 4 cents this year over last year. So again you have potentially a rip-off by some of the middle men. The ordinary people the minister is trying to help are the ones who will be buying those turkeys for Christmas. We know that 35 to 40 per cent of our turkeys are bought before Christmas, so we can see the impact this will have on those families the minister is trying to help.

These are the points I wanted to make this afternoon. I think they are extremely relevant to the debate. The situation is hypocritical in some ways. We are trying to do something really good on the one hand, and we are appealing to the provinces to make sure that they deduct from their welfare calculations the additional tax credit bonus for children. There are five provinces now which have apparently decided to make that commitment—three Conservative provinces of Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Ontario, the NDP government in Saskatchewan and the Social Credit government in B.C. But there are five which so far have not made any commitment, although I gather from the minister that she is highly optimistic about the province of Quebec where the minister of health is Mr. Denis Lazure. We have gone forcefully to the provinces and said: "Don't count the new family allowance benefits to the kids as income when you calculate welfare payments." We have been able to congratulate the minister for being able to persuade the department of Indian affairs to do the same when it comes to the Indian kids on welfare. Yet one of her colleagues, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, is doing the very thing she is asking the provinces not to do, the very thing parliament is asking the provinces not to do. This seems rather hypocritical to me, as I say.

That is not very good planning. It just does not make sense. I think my arguments are very relevant with respect to the debate which is taking place in the House today. It is fine and good to do all these great things, but if they are to be nullified it will just create more cynicism out there among the Canadian population.

There are other things I could mention. It is not just a case of bread or turkey prices, but food prices. The subsidy on skim milk was taken off last year as of March 31. The Minister of Agriculture said consumption of skim milk powder had declined since the subsidy came off. One can see from the studies that low income families consume more skim milk than families with high incomes. It is the low income families with children, particularly those with many children, perhaps five, six or seven, who would normally consume the most skim milk powder of all. They are consuming less of this skim milk powder today because they cannot afford it. This is the question the minister will be forced to face with some of her colleagues in cabinet, particularly the new minister in charge of the economic board who was formerly President of the Treasury Board.

I think we need more planning. We need more social and economic planning within the government. If we do not have it we will just create more and more cynicism out there among the Canadian people.

I am sorry I went on so long, Mr. Chairman, but I thought some of these points were worth making, not as a criticism of the minister but, I suppose, in criticism of a government that does not appear to have its act together and which does not appear to be following the same philosophical road as the minister. They appear to be confused about their social priorities, let alone their economic priorities.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member should hold his horses. He has referred to the few cents increase in the price of bread and to the recent price increase of milk, but I suggest that the new children tax credit which every mother on low or medium income will get early in 1979 will much more than compensate for these price increases for certain items of the family budget. As the critic on consumer affairs for his party, the hon. member made a speech which in my opinion he should deliver in the proper forum, namely during a debate on an allotted day; I think there are two of them coming tomorrow and the day after tomorrow. Why should the New Democratic Party not decide to have a debate on that? Surely it is not up to me, not being the minister of consumer affairs, nor to the minister responsible for the decision concerning Canadian wheat prices, to decide to hold a debate on that matter. That is of no help to anybody. The hon. member has taken as an example the families with five, six or seven children. Thanks to the child tax credit legislation now before parliament, the mother of those five, six or seven children will get a new additional cheque for $1,200 or $1,400 tax-free starting mid-March, and that is what is important, that is what matters.

[English]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the committee is fully aware of the significance of the answer the minister gave to my problem of the orphans. I think it is a very historical occasion when the minister corrects a wrong which has been in existence for six years, namely, discrimination against orphans in Canada. The parliament of this nation, with the support of all parties, passed in 1971 legislation that gave to all children, regardless of the wealth of a family, family allowance of $20 per month per child. Yet when the regulations under that legislation were produced, those regulations barred orphans on the ground that they were adults once their parents died. If your parents had both died, it was said that you must have inherited an estate, and if that estate produced enough money to meet the minimum amount under the Income Tax Act, which several years ago was $1,660—for next year it will be $2,780—you did not receive family allowance.

After five years of effort on my part the minister's word today gave me confidence that there is still hope for our parliamentary system of government. Because after the years of protest from 1974 until now I have finally found a minister who has not just listened and examined the facts and the truth of my statements but is doing something about it. Any person who believes in universal programs and in the universality of this program for family allowances, as this minister does, is duty-bound to tell her colleagues that it is going to be enforced and that the will of parliament is supreme, not the will of those nitwits who make this type of regulation which goes against what parliament has ordered.

I think the minister has established a niche for herself regarding parliamentary procedure. She has courage and conviction. That courage is being used to stand up for what she believes and for what parliament stands for. I accept without any question that what she says is the correct procedure, namely, that under this legislation we are discussing, Bill C-10, the proper procedure is not to amend any part of this legislation. The proper procedure is for the government to amend the regulations under the Family Allowances Act of 1971.

Because there is a monetary consideration at stake, the minister will have to go to the Treasury Board, which accepted these changes when they were brought to its attention. The minister will have to tell her colleagues in the Treasury Board that she has stood up in this House and given her word that the legislation she is putting through is universal as far as children are concerned with regard to the $18,000 provision. The minister has given her word, and as far as she is concerned, what she has said will happen will happen. Then if the Treasury Board fights her, she has no choice but to go to the Prime Minister and put it in his hands, because the Treasury Board will have overruled not only parliament but also the minister's word in this House.

I think the minister has shown great courage and conviction in relation to something about which she feels very strongly. I am sure every one of us thinks so as well. For seven long years families with young children under 16 years of age have had this hanging over their heads, and they have not even known it. If the parents in a family were to die simultaneously or separately but within a short space of time in an accident of some kind or of natural causes, because both parents were dead their children were not given the benefits of legislation this parliament passed.

The minister has promised to correct that situation in the proper way by changing the appropriate regulation under the Family Allowance Act. Then this legislation she has brought in will be fully operative, because under clause 4 the eligibility is the same as the eligibility under the Family Allowances Act. I am sure the machinery the minister is putting into place for this legislation will handle the problem of orphans. If the total income of a family of orphans is greater than $18,000, that family will follow the same rules as other families. If the income is $18,000 or less, they will follow the same rules as other families earning $18,000 or less and benefit from the negative income tax. I think my concern is completely met.

The significance of this is that when a minister does what this minister has done today, we in this House and all Canadians owe her a great debt of gratitude, not only for her convictions but also for her courage in taking the stand she has taken. Even though mothers and fathers will probably not know what the minister has done, the fact is that some of us here do, and I want to make sure the record shows it. I thank the minister very much.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I wish I had the right to accept these congratulations. I do not stand alone as a member of the government. I am very pleased that my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, was in the House and heard the presentation of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

The hon. member is correct in his description of the procedure. The procedure should be to change the regulation under the Family Allowances Act. I am going to recommend that. I must go to the Treasury Board to do that because of the financial dimension of the proposal. I will do that in order to correct what seems to be an injustice to orphans. I should include all children with incomes above the tax threshold; I forgot to point that out earlier. I hope to win my case. I will do everything I can to fight it. I am convinced of the inequity involved.

Regarding eligibility of children with respect to the child tax credit, the proposal made just at the end of the hon. member's presentation might be a route which could be chosen. I consider all the orphans of a given family to be a family unit and judge their income from an estate as if it was the income of the parents; but I continue to submit that this matter requires some study. In this regard I am not sure of the route we could or should take. Eventually an amendment will be brought in at a later date.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I will not take too much time. I know the minister's difficulty, and I trust completely that, working with her, her department will apply the same justice and equity to orphans in the handling of this new legislation as is applied to other children. That is all we are asking for. We are asking for equal treatment for orphans.

Miss Bégin: That is the idea, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to take a moment to make a reply with respect to the guaranteed income supplement being passed on to senior citizens by provincial governments.

Mr. McGrath: Why aren't you nice to me like that?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. John's East will really appreciate my answer. I will give it slowly so that he can take down the names of the provinces. Top-ups are presently being provided by six provinces. Four provinces have officially announced that they will pass on the new guaranteed income supplement increase in full. Those four provinces are Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. We do not know about Manitoba and Nova Scotia. In order to give a more complete answer, I should say that Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta will pass this on in full to individual senior citizens in receipt of provincial top-ups, but not to people in institutions.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I find it rather amusing that the minister accuses us of holding this bill up. The last time the committee of the whole met to consider this bill was on November 7. Today is November 29, so 22 days have gone by. We have been prepared to meet in the committee of the whole and to get this bill passed, but several questions asked in our meeting of November 7 have still not been answered.

At that time I was asking about status Indians living on reserves who are on welfare through no choice of their own. I was concerned about the reduction in income beginning January 1, 1979 when family allowances will be reduced to $20 per month per child. I was referring to a family with five children. The minister assured me that the decrease in the family incomes of those who are unfortunately on welfare would be supplemented by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by way of additional income. Reference to this matter can be found at page 894 of Hansard.

Now that the minister has referred to the fact that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has confirmed that the full tax credit will be taken into consideration where welfare is involved, I would like to know if it has been confirmed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that families which will lose their total income on January 1 will receive supplementary welfare.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I gave that assurance in very plain English to the hon. member for Churchill on November 7 before the budget debate. It appears at page 894 of Hansard, in the last paragraph on that page.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, it is made very clear by the minister, but it was not made very clear by officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On November 7 the minister said she had written to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development asking for clarification, but on November 23 I was told in the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development that no supplement would be paid to families on welfare because welfare payments were tied to the provincial welfare system. If the minister had that confirmed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, could she table the correspondence? She said she had written to the minister and was awaiting a reply from him.

Miss Bégin: It seems I am not at all understood by the hon. member for Churchill, unless he is talking about something quite mysterious that escapes me. I said on November 7 that I had received a confirmation from my colleague that welfare will be supplemented whenever needed.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I think I will have to read into the record what the minister stated, as reported at page 894 of Hansard. I was trying to establish at that time the fact that a family living on welfare would have less total income coming into the household on January 1, 1979 because of the reduction in family allowance. The minister stated:

> I have put that exact problem to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I wrote to him requesting the co-operation of his staff in setting up a special information program.

That was one part of it. Then she went on to say in the next paragraph:

> In the first two or three months, Indian mothers with large families will suffer to a degree because of a reduction in their family budget. That decrease in budget will be supplemented by additional welfare whenever it is needed from the usual source, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am referring to Canadian Indians on reserves.

I am saying now that the information given to us in committee on November 23 by the deputy minister was that this is not the situation whatsoever and that discussions are going on between the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The deputy minister said that the subject is one that is still under discussion between them and the Department of National Health and Welfare. Although the minister has confirmed this, as reported in Hansard at page 894, we were told six days ago that the matter was still under discussion. Now I would like to have it confirmed again that families will be supplemented for the loss of income on January 1.

Miss Bégin: For the third time today, Mr. Chairman, the answer, as it was on November 7, is yes. The hon. member for Churchill said that when he put the question to the deputy minister, he received particulars from him. The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development has not discussed Bill C-10 and the officials might not have fully understood the question. However, the answer to his question is yes, as it was on November 7.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): That is true, Mr. Chairman, we were not on Bill C-10. But I have a real concern for the Indian people of this country and I think this piece of legislation was drafted so hastily that no consideration was given to the Indian people. As a colleague of mine once said, this government does not really care about the Indian people. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the situation in which we now find ourselves—I still have not received a clear answer to this—is that if you are going to provide additional welfare for January, February and March until, as the minister said, the cheque arrives at the end of March with the family's tax credit, the individual family might well have to pay back this additional welfare they will receive in the interim for January, February and March. Can the minister say whether that is so?

I suppose the minister absolutely refuses to answer my simple question. Will the family have to pay back the additional welfare? She has confirmed they will receive additional welfare for those months when they will have less income coming in in January, February and March. Will they have to repay this money?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, this is really the place where one has to learn patience, without any reason in this case. The hon. member for Churchill is playing games. He knows full well the commitment of the government and the actions taken by the government to alleviate injustice and the economic impoverishment of the Indians in this country. He also knows full well how important to me and to my department is the health of our Indian population, and he knows of all the steps we have taken. He knows that the child tax credit applies to Indian mothers, but he does not tell the House what some of his own colleagues have said to me privately regarding what Indian mothers are going to do with that money. He does not say that in public. He would not dare say it in public. He wants to pretend that only he cares; that nobody else cares for the Indian people, only he has the monopoly on caring. That does not help anyone.

He should help to pass this bill as fast as possible in order that we can work on the forms and on helping mothers to fill them out. He does not do that, of course. I thought I had said ten minutes ago—I am not asking for a long span of concentration from him—that the child tax credit will be passed on fully to Indian mothers on welfare by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. That means in good English that, of course, mothers will not have to reimburse the money.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I am glad I finally received that answer. The reason I am asking the question is that this government drafts sloppy legislation which causes problems for people throughout the country. I can tell you that this piece of legislation will cause monstrous problems in many of the isolated communities in this country.

Miss Bégin: What amendment have you?

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I do not have an amendment as yet, but just wait and see. What I would like to ask, now that the minister has met with the National Indian Brotherhood, is if she could put before us and explain to us the proper mechanism to reach people in isolated communities.

Miss Bégin: No, I am not in a position to do that, Mr. Chairman. We are still discussing the strategy required for passing on the information the way I want it so that it will reach people in their own communities. The proposals from various groups are not yet ready for discussion in this forum.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, what action has been taken to ensure that social insurance numbers are all in place in order for mothers to qualify for the tax credit?

Miss Bégin: Is the hon. member referring to Indian mothers or mothers in general?

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I am referring to mothers in general and Indian mothers in particular. The minister laughs at that because she does not realize status Indians living on reserves do not pay income tax, and therefore many do not have social insurance numbers. The minister said very clearly that in order for mothers or families to qualify for the tax credit plan, they must have social insurance numbers. The minister laughs as if it is some sort of a lark. What program is under way so that Indian mothers on reserves will qualify for the tax credit plan at the end of the taxation year in March?

Miss Bégin: I just laugh at the confusion in the mind of the hon. member for Churchill. I have informed him of things which he did not know concerning the new child tax credit because he had not read the bill or asked me any questions. I brought to his attention the necessity of Indian mothers applying for social insurance numbers.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. It was the hon. member for Provencher who brought that matter to the attention of the minister.

Miss Bégin: I brought that to the attention of the hon. member for Churchill when he asked about it, and I am just repeating it today. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is looking into the feasibility of his officials doing some of the paperwork necessary to provide social insurance numbers to Indian mothers who will be receiving child tax credit.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I should like to refer to the comments of the minister as reported at page 895 of Hansard:

> Mothers can decide to allocate that cheque over the coming months to make up for the reduction in family allowance, or the total amount can be used for a major purchase by the family.

She went on to say that the cheques could be distributed over the following months, that it was up to the families. Can families have that money distributed over 12 months, or will it be received in a lump sum at the end of the taxation year?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: If I have correctly understood the hon. member's question, Mr. Chairman, he is asking me whether an administrative mechanism would allow recipients to choose to receive monthly payments. The answer is no. We have discussed the issue in the House on several occasions. It is impossible to get anything but an annual cheque in the first year of implementation. My answer, which the hon. member has just read in Hansard, is that the mother, when she receives her cheque, may wish to spend the whole sum or part of it to buy home appliances or for any other expense which would be useful to her family, or else decide to save that yearly lump sum or what is left of it in order to use that money in her budgets for the following months.

[English]

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I have some other questions concerning the total income of families in many remote communities. I hope the minister is aware of the problem which will be created there. In the majority of those communities, there are no banking facilities. Problems will be created when families receive cheques in the amount of $1,000, $1,400 or $1,500 because some of them do not have opportunities to go to the bank and many of them do not have bank accounts. Problems will be created when a mother flies out of a remote community with a cheque of that amount. If she wants to go to Winnipeg or some other large centre in order to purchase some of the things which the minister referred to on November 7, perhaps she will not even be known to the banking people or merchants in those centres.

If that amount of money was distributed over a 12-month period, it would be much easier because the cheques would be in smaller amounts or could be included in regular family allowance cheques. It will be difficult for some families to cash cheques in the amount of $1,000 in many communities, because that amount of cash is not on hand. Perhaps it will be necessary for those people to carry identification or to have someone accompany them to vouch for the fact that the cheque actually belongs to them. In many cases there are duplications in names. I can think of communities where there are five John Rosses or Mary Jane Rosses. Has the minister given any thought to the people who will cash these cheques?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, we are considering that problem. It exists for other Canadian mothers who do not have bank accounts. Often family allowance cheques are cashed in stores which put on special sales around the time of the month when family allowance cheques are received. Often the amount of family allowance cheques can total hundreds of dollars. For example, in the province of Quebec the fourth child and any additional children receive close to $60 each. Therefore, the amount of one cheque can easily amount to hundreds of dollars.

I do not think the problem should be made any bigger than it is. It does exist, and we are attempting to see what can be done about it. I would mislead the House if I promised several instalments in the first year of the operation of this program, because it would be technically impossible. The possible problem described by the hon. member can be added to that of tax discounters and family budgeting as reasons for implementing a system of more than one instalment in future years. We are looking into that problem jointly with the National Indian Brotherhood and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I trust people will find ways to cash their cheques easily. I was told that it was not necessarily a big problem.

I will answer the second part of the hon. member's question as to the general information campaign for all mothers. There was an insert accompanying the October family allowance cheque which gave basic information about the program. There will be another insert in December which will be much simpler in form, consisting of questions and answers and explaining the need for a social insurance number. Accompanying the family allowance cheque for January will be an application form, a Department of National Revenue information sheet explaining how to fill out the form, and a reminder of the need for a social insurance number and how to go about getting one.

At the end of January or the beginning of February there will be a mailing to mothers who are non-filers. The total number of such mothers is approximately 1.5 million, including Indians. It will include a basic income tax form in order to avoid any additional hardship which could be created by the system. In February there will be a reminder to those who have not applied for either social insurance numbers or the benefits. The Departments of National Health and Welfare and Revenue Canada have a joint pamphlet giving basic information about the program. It will be available in all federal offices and, of course, to members of the House. There will be a question and answer guide to that program to inform applicants.

In terms of my own staff, I can confirm that all personnel in regional and local offices in what we call income security, those who look after pension cheques and family allowances, are developing special training for all our officers to help mothers fill in the new forms, in a way similar to the one followed now by our officers in helping elderly citizens. They assist about 60 per cent of all Canadians who fill in GIS forms each year in January, February and March.

What I am developing, and in respect of which I said earlier to the hon. member for Churchill I am not in a position to give more information now, is an information strategy using the local press instead of the national press, something that mothers read. This strategy will eventually involve the use of volunteer organizations, but this is in the making. When I speak of volunteer organizations I am referring to those who can reach a segment of our clientele, including Indian mothers, new Canadian mothers, immigrant mothers and mothers on welfare, particularly in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal.

In this regard I want to tell hon. members that the provinces have confirmed that officials in the provinces, social workers, for instance, will help mothers fill in the forms.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member's allotted 20 minutes, including answers by the minister, has expired. Actually he has had more than the maximum allotted time. I can recognize another member, following which the hon. member for Churchill can again seek the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I have a few questions for the minister who spoke a moment ago of the acceptance by five provinces of the proposals or amendments to this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to tell us if she will ask these provinces to provide a written agreement because, if I understood her well, she has made no mention of any correspondence or written agreement on the discussions she had with them.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure I grasped the meaning of the question. If the hon. member wants to know whether we have made written representations to the provinces, then the answer is yes. We have made numerous written representations but there is no question now of waiting for a written answer or for an answer from all provinces. We are dealing here with a federal program, and I strongly urge the hon. member for Joliette to contact his péquiste acquaintances, simple members and ministers alike, to make sure that the Quebec government will pass on to all social welfare mothers the full benefit of the new child tax credit.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, if I were entrusted with government responsibilities, I should deal the same way with the Quebec government, whether it is headed by a péquiste, NDP, Liberal or Conservative party. As a matter of fact, I could reply to the minister that two of her colleagues on the government side are very good friends with the Quebec government, and I see nothing wrong with that.

The minister indicated that she has made a number of proposals to all the provinces and that five of them have replied. Could she advise the House whether these five provinces have reacted negatively? Could she report briefly on the response of the five provinces which have not still accepted?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier this afternoon the five provinces other than those which I mentioned did not have a negative response either. For one reason or another the provinces are considering the matter, being confronted with inconsistent points of views which they are trying to reconcile, but they do not necessarily disagree about allocating the new child tax credit to mothers on welfare. As far as I am concerned as Minister of National Health, I wish to repeat that I do not want to intrude in the provincial administration, they are responsible to their people who will elect them or not. So the five provinces which did not notify me that they had made a recommendation to their cabinet are: Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, should the provinces refuse, what would be the minister's attitude?

Miss Bégin: I have already replied to that question on several occasions, but I will readily do so again in French, Mr. Chairman. First we will call on members opposite to support, as I think they already do, and pass Bill C-10 as quickly as possile so that the administrative machinery can be set up to print the forms and all the rest. In addition, as I reported today, following many requests made during the past few weeks to the provincial ministers, who incidentally are free to manage their provincial programs as they wish, I would call on all hon. members of the House, my colleagues and members opposite, the voluntary organizations looking after the interests of needy mothers or families and those which for another reason are concerned with social policies in Canada and the citizens in general to ask their respective provincial government what is their position and whether they are prepared, yes or no, to apply good policies for them and which will not cost them a penny that is pass to mothers on welfare the full $200 child tax credit. In practice that means not to deduct a penny of the new tax credit from the welfare payments. I know the hon. member for Joliette will do his share and I would invite every member to do so, him first. I am anxious to read his next parliament bulletin which hon. members are entitled to send four times a year to their constituents, and I hope hon. members will invite the population to support that position.

● (1712)

Mr. La Salle: I thank the minister for calling upon us to do so. Of course we support that amendment which indeed appears generous to us. Besides, I said so at the second reading stage. There is no problem in that regard. However, what could be cause for concern, Mr. Chairman, is that we mentioned consultation with the provinces during second reading, I recall it very well. The other side of the House said there was no need to consult the provinces on this matter, that they had nothing to do with it and that the federal government know what it had to do. Today the minister tells us about the representations she made to her colleagues and she even asks us to request from our provincial government that mothers benefit fully from the subventions which will be granted to them. We are in full agreement on this.

However, I could ask the minister why she did not discuss this matter well before the last meeting with her provincial colleagues where it was officially discussed? I wonder whether she did not have other opportunities well before today to get the provinces to give their opinion before introducing legislation in the House. I imagine the minister or her officials have had many opportunities to meet with provincial representatives in the past year. I imagine this legislation was not born last month, so how is it for example that at the very last minute it suddenly becomes urgent to ask the provinces to guarantee housewives the maximum amount? I think, however, that the minister has had the opportunity to ask her officials to do the work she is asking us to do today.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, in a province it is not always easy to be a member of parliament. If the hon. member for Joliette cannot accept that, I do not know what he is doing here. Sometimes in life one must put up a struggle not only against the opposition nor against the government but also against provincial governments whose interests are sometimes opposed to ours. That is very simple. I do not know why he thinks that politics is going to be a big love affair. That is not the way it is. The objectives of provincial governments are not always identical to ours. Their ministers of finance have economic problems just like everyone else. Bill C-10 is a federal bill, concerning a federal program, which uses federal income taxes to redistribute money to families with children, to families in need. As everyone knows in the House, in June 1976 the provinces asked us to look into programs using the tax system to grant supplementary social benefits on a selective basis. We identified three groups, targets which I have often discussed in the 14 months since I have been appointed minister, two of which are the poor children of Canada and the single parent families. The provinces are fully aware of the direction in which our work is evolving. At the end of last August, I advised my provincial counterparts of the new program. The best I could do for everyone involved was to introduce a bill, as soon as possible, and giving all the details of the program. Only a bill tells us exactly what we are striving for and what can be changed. What, to my mind, is important and interesting is that none of the provincial ministers suggested any amendments to the bill. All of them told me that they thought the child tax credit program was excellent. Some of them are even a bit envious that they did not introduce it themselves. Or at least, that is what they told me.

Only in the last few years, and I would not be surprised if it were only relatively recently in this House, have hon. members of both the government and the opposition realized that when we approve federal programs dealing with social benefits, particularly for older people, which means increases, whether through quarterly indexing or increases of $20 a month such as the one we just passed for elderly couples and which will start in the month of January, or whether new programs even imperfect such as the spouse's allowance, the provinces take with the left hand what we give individuals with the right hand, in the form of increased rents or more expensive services and so on. It is clear—and federal members of parliament have to fight for that—that the money of Canadian taxpayers paid out in the form of redistribution, which is the nature of the Canadian confederation as far as I am concerned, when the money of the taxpayers of this country through a program like the child tax credit is used for redistribution to Canadian individuals in need, the provinces cannot consider that as an additional transfer payment and pocket the money.

Mr. La Salle: We agree on that. There is no problem there. I hope this $200 credit will benefit the mother and the child who will need it, and I do hope that the government of Quebec will make sure they get to benefit from it 100 per cent. I know that there are some who are worried about that. Some often try to leave the impression that I have close friends in the government of Quebec. I am very happy to be able to communicate with members of Quebec. I was doing so at the time of the Liberal government, at the time of Mr. Johnson. And God knows I had excellent friends too, but sometimes it was quite useful, and I had the impression earlier that the minister said she had had discussions with the minister, Mr. Lazure, or that Mr. Lazure had in any case been rather receptive to the objective she is pursuing. I am one of those who wish, of course, that Mr. Lazure will succeed in convincing the cabinet about the idea we are pursuing but I ask the minister what was the kind of consultation she had with Mr. Lazure, what were his comments and whether she can say more specifically that earlier she undertook to recommend to the provincial government that specifically children in Quebec be allowed to benefit 100 per cent from that provision of the act, what was the reaction of the Quebec minister and whether the minister is in a position to say whether the provincial minister undertook to act like the federal minister would like him to?

Miss Bégin: I need an information document which I almost sleep with because I try so hard to promote this bill in which I believe.

Quebec is a particular case, and it is faced with particular problems of adaptation, which I am not entitled to discuss in this House, I think, but since indeed the money comes from the same taxpayers, I will talk about it a few minutes to explain my particular position. I did say that minister Denis Lazure has his heart in the right place, the hon. member did hear me well, but then again I am not stupid. I know his government wants to prove that confederation does not work so he will certainly not send me flowers on a silver tray. I mean, there should be no confusion. Having said that, I do not know the recommendation he made to his cabinet, but since the very first time I talked to him, in the evening of August 23 or 24, if my memory serves me well, he has always shown his interest in that program. This, I can confirm, he gave no information about the nature of his recommendations to his cabinet at the federal-provincial conference.

The problem which he faces is unique to the province of Quebec and concerns what they call harmonization. The province of Quebec chose, as it was free to do, a program where family allowances are distributed differently than in other provinces. Canadians in general receive $25.68 per child every month. Alberta has a somewhat different program, but Quebec has a completely different system about which we were not consulted. This is what the provincial government chose to do, but this is now causing the following problems: Quebec—and I hope I am not wrong because this issue comes under the jurisdiction of the National Assembly and I hope that it will be brought up in the proper forum—Quebec gives $15.42 for the first child—and I should say first of all that Quebec asks us to give $15.42 for the first child—the second child in a family receives $23.11, the third child, $47.45, and the fourth and all others receive a cheque of $59.13 a month. Then, there are some adjustments made to increase these amounts if the child is older, that is if he is between 12 and 17 years old.

As I understand it—but once again, I am not the Quebec minister of welfare—Quebec decided to give these welfare payments to mothers who are on welfare only for the first children in a family. Now I hope that the hon. member will not be angry with me if I do not know the answer—I am not the provincial minister—that is if I do not know whether this means the first three children or the first four children. I believe it is only the first three children of a family on welfare who can receive assistance, as well as the mother and the father if it is a two-parent family. The fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh children receive nothing under the welfare program. However, the Quebec government considers that our large family allowance cheque, that it distributes as I described a few minutes ago, will compensate social welfare. Quebec is in a bad position at the present time. I do not know what this means in actual facts for the distribution of welfare costs, of which we must pay 50 per cent, but I do know that the principle of harmonization is suddenly being questioned and that the minister is reconsidering the whole matter.

Of course, many people say that at first sight it seems better to give much more money for the second, the third, the fourth child and so on. But there is a problem of which everyone with children is aware and which governments and especially members of the National Assembly sometimes forget, I think there are not enough women in any of our governments. Even if ours has made some progress in that respect, people forget that the first child costs more money. Essentially, when you have a first child, very often it means, at least in cities, that you must move to have one more bedroom which increases considerably your rent, you have to buy the little bassinet, the bed, diapers, clothing, all the basic equipment. So I consider that the first child should get a larger amount. Furthermore, the second child does not cost much. As everybody knows, he lives on hand-me-downs. According to psychologists, it may be the source of problems but it is another matter. For the third child, many things are worn out and must be replaced. At any event, this is much controversed in circles interested in family policy matters. This issue is also in the background of discussions in the provincial government cabinet.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I wish to come back to a comment made earlier by the minister. She emphasized the importance of ensuring that the money made available or redistributed by Ottawa will go to the right place. I believe that in other areas also the federal government had the same problem, for instance, about the use of amounts spent on bilingualism and education in the provinces. I think it is a very relevant question.

However, could the minister tell us today what kind of mechanism she has in mind to ensure—precisely what kind of mechanism from a consultation point of view with the provinces or from a monitoring point of view her government could prepare in order to ensure some monitoring. I am aware that the Auditor General is also raising some questions regarding this lack of monitoring. It is considered as a weakness, I think, namely whether the funds available for such and such purpose are indeed going to perform the target objective or if the funds are well allocated in the case of the legislation dealt with by the minister today. It is just a case but I think that it could become a generalized practise in other fields and could the minister tell us if the government feels it is important to get something prepared for that purpose so that justice be made from one parliament to another, for any department concerned. We are today talking about a specific department but up to what point could the answer be sufficiently general for this side of the House to be told if the government is showing the desire of instituting these mechanisms which have been apparently wanting, up to now at least?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, we are talking of a cheque for mothers. I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that we should institute a special monitoring mechanism to ensure that the money will be properly used by the mothers because I for one fully trust them.

Mr. La Salle: What is the total amount going to the mothers?

Miss Bégin: The total amount will go to the mothers and this is why we are using the tax approach. It is our way of ensuring that it will go to the individuals. Yet there are now much more subtle methods to recuperate that money and we do not want for instance the welfare payments of these same mothers to be reduced because we are improving their standard of living. So my answer to the hon. member who is saying: but what must we do, will be the following: get involved politically all the way. One has to go to Joliette, to Crabtree and to the other localities of your riding which I know, including Crabtree, the member's beautiful village. Needy mothers have to be told to write a letter to Mr. Denis Lazure and ask him if he is going to give them—during weekends, the hon. member can do that in his constituency office. Certainly he goes to his riding every weekend. In his MP bulletin that goes out to each of his constituents, he can tell them to write their provincial minister, asking him whether it is agreed he will pass on to mothers the full child tax credit, rather than deducting welfare payments. This is politics.

The Chairman: The time allotted to the hon. member has expired. Is it agreed that the hon. member way put another question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, a single comment. I have the clear impression the minister is convinced a negative answer will come from the Quebec government, because she is asking us to put pressure on this, to invite mothers to write their provincial government. How can the minister leave us under the impression the Quebec government will say no? Originally Mr. Lazure appeared quite agreeable on this, and now we are asked to put pressure on. This is worst than asking us to pressure people to buy Canadian. As far as I am concerned, my impression is there is no need to worry on this. It is my hope every provincial government will pass on the maximum benefits. But the way the minister explained this, I would appreciate it if she would tell the House whether she has serious reasons to ask us to do this, for thinking the Quebec government will react negatively to her proposal.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, surely I have misunderstood the hon. member's position. I thought he was somewhat anguished by the situation in Quebec. He asked me how we could react, and I answered him. This of course goes for every province that is not yet committed. Now I said a number of times, Dr. Denis Lazure in my view is very much a man of good will, but he is not alone in his cabinet. I am not sure of Mr. Parizeau, his minister of finance, because Mr. Lazure has a minister of finance. He is not alone. I am not sure that the minister of finance does not want to collect federal funds by all possible means. I am not sure also that Mr. Parizeau is in favour of the poor. I have never heard such a thing. I have never heard that Mr. Rodrigue Tremblay was a minister of the poor. I wonder whether Mr. Bernard Landry shares the interests of the poor. As a minister, I want to fight against poverty in Canada, it is my job. It is also the job—

Mr. La Salle: I am not alone, we must have a chance.

Miss Bégin: No, I know. I was also going to say that it is the job of Dr. Lazure. I hope that Dr. Lazure will succeed.

[English]

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister pertaining to the single parent. In many communities there are single parents where the children are not in the household of the single mother but are usually in the household of a grandmother. Sometimes there can be as many as three or four illegitimate children in a household. At the present time the family allowance cheque goes to the grandmother, possibly because the real mother of the children is working away from the community. In such a case who qualifies for the child tax credit? Does the mother have to make application or can the grandmother who is looking after the children do it?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I deeply dislike the word "illegitimate" children. All children are legitimate. These are words we should not be using. They mean more than the word itself.

As a rule the person who now qualifies for the family allowance receives the new child tax credit. That may be the grandmother, as in the case described by the hon. member for Churchill, or it may be the father, depending on who gets the family allowance. Quite often it also depends on who has legal custody, but this is not necessarily the case.

In the thrust of his question I think the hon. member made a plea for the children of single parent families. They are a vulnerable group. By all standards in 1975, 31.2 per cent of them were poor. Of those, 90 per cent are headed by women. This group will be significantly helped by the new child tax credit. They will receive $106 million in credit payments. To use another measure, 87 per cent of all single parent families in Canada will get total or partial benefits from the new child tax credit.

I think that answers the hon. member's question. If there are particular cases, the officials will be pleased to give answers on a personal basis. I do not know if the hon. member is referring to a particular case.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I am referring to one case in particular. However, I think it can be duplicated in many communities. A grandmother may be collecting the family allowance for some of her own children and at the same time collecting for grandchildren who may be in her care. Will this grandmother have to file two separate forms in order to qualify for the child tax credit for the two families, that of her own family plus her daughter's children? Will she have to file two separate applications?

Miss Bégin: In so far as I understand the particulars of the questions, it appears that the answer is no. That grandmother would file one tax credit form and one income tax form declaring all her sources of income, showing a net income of so much, and claiming both her children and those of her children or other relatives whom she may care for. If she is in receipt of a family allowance, she is absolutely assured of the child tax credit, if she qualifies. If there is a case where she should get the family allowance and she does not, this will give us an opportunity to rectify the situation.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I want to put something on record concerning the additional welfare payments to families that will have a smaller income because of a reduction in family allowance at the first of the year. This should be on record because it is going to be very confusing for many people in our isolated communities.

In committee, I asked the deputy minister of Indian affairs some questions. Even though this question does not pertain to Bill C-10, the department of Indian affairs is responsible for the welfare of Indian people in Canada. It seems there was very little on communication with the department of Indian affairs concerning Bill C-10. At this committee meeting on November 23, I asked the deputy minister what effect Bill C-10 will have on Indian people living on reserves. I quote:

Will the reduction in family allowances be compensated for by an increase in social assistance payments in cases where a family is in receipt of social assistance, I think that is the first order of questioning.

The second question is the adverse of that. What happens to social assistance payments to families that are in receipt of the once a year tax credit.

The deputy minister replied to those questions in this way:

I think I read a transcript of a different exchange between Mr. Smith and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I do not know whether I can answer all of those questions, but I could make a couple of general observations. Our practice across the country is to conform with respect to social assistance payments to provincial practice, that is, to say we tie ourselves to provincial rates and when the province increases its rates we increase whatever a province's rules may be off reserves we normally apply on reserves.

It is my understanding that in calculating eligibility for social assistance and appropriate levels for social assistance, provinces do not take account of family allowance payments. It would allow from this that since they are excluded from the calculation of the requirements for social assistance, that in your monthly, or whatever, payments, you would neither take cognizance of the reduction in the monthly rate nor of the lump sum payment and the tax credit. The subject is one that is still under discussion between ourselves and the Department of National Health and Welfare. I think it is possible that at some point the two ministers will need to meet to make a determination on some of these issues. It is probably going to be fairly difficult to arrive at firm conclusions about what kind of regime should be applied until we have a picture of what the provinces are likely to do. And in outlining existing practices and the sort of one logical conclusion that you could draw from that practice—I am speaking hypothetically, the subject is not decided, but if we were to conform to our past practice of tying what we do on reserves to what provinces do off reserve, and given the family allowances are excluded from the calculations for requirements for social assistance, then on that particular hypothesis, you would not get an adjustment upwards in the monthly social assistance payment, nor would you get an adjustment downward from the tax credit payment point of view.

The deputy minister said they would not be affected as far as the downward adjustment would be concerned. However, I was concerned about the other adjustment we were talking about. That indicated to me it was not conclusive that the additional welfare would be paid. The minister emphatically says it will be paid and that the individual will not have to pay back any payment that is made to a family now living on welfare because of a drop in income to that particular family. While the minister says this is going to happen, the deputy minister of Indian affairs says that some meetings will have to take place. Perhaps that meeting has taken place since November 23. Can the minister confirm whether that meeting has taken place? If so and it has been decided, there is no point in my going any further.

Miss Bégin: The hon. member was reading from answers given by the deputy minister at a recent Indian affairs committee meeting. In all fairness, he said at the beginning that he was not fully apprised of all the dimensions of the child tax credit. The next time I will have him at my briefing sessions. I did not know he would be asked these questions. It is a bit unfair.

What I said to the hon. member for Churchill, and I repeat it for the tenth time, is that the minister of Indian affairs and myself have agreed on supplementing any families on welfare wherever it is needed, whatever the method of distribution. There is agreement upon its objective. Of course, the officials will have to work out the particulars, but that is agreed. There is no doubt about it. One of my assistant deputy ministers who is present in the gallery today will clarify this as soon as possible and bring the comments which have been made today to the attention of the deputy minister of the department of Indian affairs.

When the deputy minister of Indian affairs referred to the provincial welfare scales he described the right mechanism. We want to keep a balance for all Canadians. Indian affairs is rather like a provincial department when it comes to social assistance, so we maintain consistency in welfare policies and payments in the country. Provinces, within that general framework, have very different modes of accounting for income. I can possibly say that in fact they all count family allowances as income. I can also say that they don't. It is an accounting practice by which two or three of the provinces count the family allowance one way and the others count it in another way. In any event, it is always taken into account. I wrote to my colleagues and I also told them orally that with respect to any social assistance payments, whatever the accounting practices, they should not count the new child tax credit as income. Nevertheless, it does appear somewhere on the total balance sheet.

It is a bit complicated but it is really a matter for provincial welfare ministers. It may be that the deputy minister of Indian affairs is referring to that mechanism when he speaks of maintaining consistency with the provinces—that may not be the phrase but I do not have the long text which the hon. member read. However, I can assure the hon. member that for the first three months in some families in which there are many children, the decrease in family allowances will mean a manque à gagner, a need, an additional need which will be made up from the payments under Indian affairs. The child tax credit in itself means for Indian mothers in Canada in 1979 an additional net $19 million. The hon. member referred to that at the beginning of his question. For poor families in Canada it means a net additional $108 million taking into account reduction of the family allowance.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I understand that the $19 million covers all the status Indians. I believe that for Indians on reserves it will mean an additional $14 million. I think I have this straight now. I am sorry the minister had to explain it at length but I know I shall have to try to explain it to many of my constituents, who in many cases do not have the advantage of television and live in areas where radio reception is very poor; there are certainly no newspapers going into these communities.

For status Indians living on reserves on January 1 the government will reduce the family allowance to mothers. One department is taking money away and another department, namely the department of Indian affairs, is going to give that money back to the families concerned, after I don't know how many forms have been made out—tax credit forms and so on. Then at the end of March or whenever a cheque comes in, they will receive a lump sum for the previous year.

It looks like a circle; the money is just going round and round. It appears to be a nice little mechanism to get a few votes, perhaps. What is actually happening is that the individual family is not going to be responsible for paying back any of the money that the department of Indian affairs is giving that family to supplement its income because of the drop income tax. When they get their lump sum cheque at the end of the 1978 or 1979 tax year, they will not be penalized one iota for the additional funds they are going to receive, or have received, through welfare or through the department. If the minister can get up and say she has already given the answer ten times, I should like to hear it 11 times because I would like to have her confirm it.

Miss Bégin: The hon. member has given us an absurd description of what is going to happen in terms of difficult forms and so on. The fact is that two signatures will be needed, one on the one-page form, which will be the family allowance cheque, and, because there is no money, one at the end of the income tax form. I will also need the name and the address of everybody and the number of children. I regret we have to use forms, but we do. They will be too numerous for my own taste but we intend to simplify them in the coming year and have only one simple shorter form.

The hon. member suggests this is to get votes and that it is a gimmick. It is not a gimmick. It means a net $140 of new money per child, indexed every year. It is actually $200, but because of the loss of monthly family allowances it amounts to $140 net of new money. So it is not a gimmick. As to getting votes, why not? It is not my fault that the Conservative party did not pass any resolution at its annual convention in favour of such a program. That is probably what political parties are all about. When it comes to good programs which affect Canadians, I always think they will bring more votes because they are what the people want.

I repeat to the hon. member that his description is basically accurate, though he forgot what I said in reply to the thrust of his earlier question, that is to say, that there is no pay-back.

[Translation]

How do we say that there will be no deduction on tax credits.

[English]

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Which department will determine the circumstances of individuals who will be receiving welfare payments because of a decline in income? Will it be the Department of National Health and Welfare or the department of Indian affairs? At this point the department of Indian affairs does not have enough community workers or social workers to undertake this task. I am wondering whether extra staff will be needed to determine which families are going to qualify for the additional payments to offset the drop in income.

● (1752)

Miss Bégin: The usual mechanism will be used to determine who has additional need. That will not increase staff or man-years. We are talking about the first three months of the year. It is quite easy to determine. In most cases this is done with the co-operation of band councils, so it is the same mechanism which will determine additional social assistance needs.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I want to return in my question to my old friends the income tax discounters. I have two questions relating to them. I am sure the minister has received a brief from the national anti-poverty organization. I know she will recall from that brief that that organization raised the question of the effect of the lump sum payment on the way mothers who receive this payment will react. In other words, the proposal of the organization was that families at least be given the option of receiving the money four times a year.

I do not want to labour this point because I know the minister has already expressed an interest in looking at this matter after the first year of the program. I simply want to ask the minister to remain open and to keep looking at that possibility, because I think there is a severe deficiency in the present approach which is being proposed by the government.

There is another point I want to make with respect to this problem. I was not in the House at the time but I understand that the minister told the House that information is already going out to people with the current family allowance cheques. Is any information going out with respect to the tax credit?

Miss Bégin: The basic information strategy is not yet finished.

Mr. Rae: In that case, perhaps my suggestions will have some effect, who knows? Stranger things have happened. I suggest that a pamphlet which is not written in bureaucratese, which includes pictures and which would be lively would be read. Perhaps the minister should consult some of her political advisers in this regard rather than her civil service advisers. Those of us who are in this game know that we have to get information across to people, and I would like to see this information put across to welfare mothers. I intend to do that in my riding in my next household letter. I intend to tell people who will be receiving these cheques that they should wait and that hopefully there will be no need for them to go to income tax discounters.

I return to this point because when the income tax discounting bill was introduced and passed last year, it was suggested that the people who would be seeking income tax discounts would be people who would be filling out income tax forms which are complex, difficult and involve some work in filling out. In other words, the people filling out the forms were getting fees for their services as well as straight security for loans.

Let it be said that anybody should be able to fill out the form which is intended to be sent out in January of next year. I hope it is the intention of the government that the form will be very simple and extremely straightforward. Let us hope that it will be a one-page form and that it will be possible for recipients of the forms to fill them out on their own, or they will be counselled to go to community groups, to their members of parliament, to their MPPs or to people who will be filling out forms in relation to the graduated guaranteed income supplement, which the minister knows is filled out at the same time, so they do not have to go to income tax discounters to get the form filled out.

I assure the minister that people in the income tax discounting business are going to be going through housing estates and communities. They will be distributing leaflets telling people that they can get their money quickly. Discounters will be using that commercial approach. I think the government is making a mistake, but let it go ahead. The government is making the mistake of allowing income tax discounters to take this money as security. However, let us at least fight the commercial approach which will be used. Let us undertake that fight with our own public relations efforts.

I hope there will be a public relations effort in which individual members of parliament who feel as strongly as I do about these people will be assisted by the government in seeing that information is provided and that people will have some basic consumer counselling with respect to these forms.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes left I want to say that at times I am tempted to agree with the hon. member on the non-assignability of these child tax credit cheques; but I am always reminded—rightly so, it seems to me—of the freedom of people to obtain their money early if they want to.

Mr. Rae: They don't "want" to, they have to.

Miss Bégin: It is not a matter of wanting. They do not even know as yet whether that money will be included in their family budgets.

The balance of the hon. member's remarks represented an excellent suggestion which as far as my department is concerned will be implemented. The particular dimension described by the hon. member by which tax discounters help people in filling out difficult forms is very true. Unfortunately, the insert for the month of December is in the process of being printed. It is too late to include the hon. member's suggestions in that insert. However, in subsequent inserts there will be special paragraphs for children which I hope will be "alive".

I can assure the hon. member that the next insert will be the result of advice from my political staff. It will contain pictures and it will be colourful. I hope it will not be boring. There will be pictures of children on it. It will be a small insert which will not tell the whole story, but it will be a beginning. I will supply hon. members with material. I like the idea that members of parliament should conduct clinics in their own constituencies. All the other suggestions made by the hon. member will be explored. I am not sure if the hon. member was in the House earlier, so I will repeat that social workers in all provinces and other provincial officials will also help mothers who are on welfare.

Mr. Paproski: Will you send us a copy?

Miss Bégin: Yes.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I understand that there is a disposition on the part of hon. members opposite to pass clause 1 before we adjourn. Could that be done?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the shameful partisanship which has been demonstrated by the minister today, the cheap shots she took at one of her admirers, the hon. member for St. John's East, and her general abrasiveness, we are anxious to make progress and to get into some technical aspects of the bill. We would be disposed to passing clause 1.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, without any qualifications we are prepared to pass clause 1.

Mr. Rae: The minister was nice to us.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 6.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

SUGGESTED MEASURES TO MINIMIZE PRICE INCREASES TO CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the unilateral and untimely decision by the government to remove the subsidy to the milling industry, which will cause not only instability within the processing industry but also dramatic price increases to Canadian consumers, especially those who can least afford these increases at this time, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Transport revise this policy and implement a program to include a three-year phase-out plan and, secondly, establish a price quotation system by the Canadian Wheat Board for two or three-month periods to reduce market fluctuations, to add stability to the industry and to minimize price increases to Canadian consumers.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart):

That the Prime Minister make a statement to the House confirming or denying statements made last night by Marjorie Nichols, Washington correspondent for the Vancouver Sun, on the CBC radio program "As it Happens" that the government is recalling Gérard Pelletier, the Canadian Ambassador to France, for purposes of advising the Prime Minister as to whether he should or should not leave office by the middle of January, and whether it is present government policy to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae).

EMPLOYMENT

OUTREACH PROGRAM—APPLICATION TO WOMEN AND YOUTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the problems of women and youth in finding employment are very severe, and in view of the apparent determination of this government to lower the participation rate of these groups in the economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That women and youth remain target groups for the Outreach program of the Department of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF CERTAIN DEPARTMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion.

I present this motion to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister on his decision to abolish a department he himself created, namely urban affairs, and I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That he continue his clean sweep and abolish all the departments which intervene in fields of provincial jurisdiction.

FORESTRY

PRIVATIZATION OF FOREST PRODUCTS LABORATORIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The minister of the environment has been saying to the House that privatization of the government's forest products laboratories is being welcomed by industry and that the nature and independence of these laboratories will not be jeopardized.

In view of the fact that there is a lack of hard evidence that industry is prepared to support the laboratories financially, as witnessed by the recommendation of the Council of Forest Industries in British Columbia not to extend industrial support, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the minister abandon his plans to privatize these important forest laboratories.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO REDUCE HEROIN ABUSE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that 60 per cent of property crime in British Columbia is drug-related, that property crime in Vancouver has risen 36 per cent over the last year, that the number of heroin addicts has increased 256 per cent over the last decade, that 60 per cent of drug-related crime happens in B.C.—which has only 25 per cent of the RCMP drug forces—and that half the cost of the $111 million justice system in B.C. is directly related to heroin abuse, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That the federal government partially fund the B.C. government's health entry plan for heroin users.

AIR SERVICE DEFICIT OF CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43 which will help the government increase its revenues. It is urgent and pressing, in view of the fact that Canadian Pacific Air placed a false and misleading advertisement in the November 29 Globe and Mail stating as follows:

[Mr. Symes.]

We have received no government subsidies from the public treasury, nor have we requested taxpayer assistance.

Since CP Air uses airports and other air services subsidized $355 million annually by the taxpayer, has deferred income taxes of $9 million, and since the Air Transport Association—of which CP Air is a member—pressed the government to introduce the recent 7 per cent tax investment credit on transport equipment which will benefit CP Air by another $14 million, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the Minister of Transport send a bill to CP Air for $90 million to cover their share of the air service deficit, and that CP Air immediately pay taxes owing.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a most urgent matter.

Because of the impending increase in the cost of bread, by its very nature this increase will considerably affect the budget of large families with a low income, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval:

That this House recommend to the government that it order a serious inquiry into the operations of the large mills to establish whether this increase is really justified.

Mr. Speaker: Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MANUFACTURING SALES TAX REDUCTION—EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue who is also Minister of State for Small Business: it involves both his portfolios. My question refers to the manufacturing sales tax and the fact that it now appears the implementation of this sales tax will have serious consequences for the general economy of Canada.

Would the minister indicate whether any consideration has been given to rebating the sales tax which has already been paid in the case of inventories held by various retailers and wholesalers in Canada?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware of the difficult task this presents, because it is impossible in many cases to disgorge the tax which might have been paid at the manufacturing level on inventories in stock. I recognize that it has sometimes imposed on retailers a feeling of moral obligation to pass on the discount immediately because of the reduction of the tax. However, I think most reasonable purchasers understand that if the tax has already been paid on the inventory, the price cannot be reduced to take advantage of a tax reduction at the manufacturing level.

Mr. Stevens: When the minister says it is a difficult matter to deal with, surely he is aware of the fact that section 17 of the Financial Administration Act covers the point: it allows for the remission of taxation. Surely he is aware of the fact that the previous minister of finance, in the 1974 and earlier budgets, set remissions with respect to reductions of sales tax at that time.

In view of the fact that a hiatus is developing and people are delaying their purchases until January or February, in the earnest hope they will get the benefit of this manufacturing sales tax reduction, will the minister not instruct his officials to get on with it and work out a proper remission plan under section 17 of the Financial Administration Act?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member will allow me a little time to consult my officials on the point he raised and on the advice he has given. I will do so and perhaps be more fulsome in my answer at a later date.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I admit that my question may be one which the minister will want to take up with his superior minister, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers.

Does he acknowledge that a hiatus is developing in the current period, in that the provincial sales tax had the effect of moving sales back into that six-month period, especially in provinces such as Ontario? Now that the manufacturing sales tax encourages people to delay their purchases until early next year, there will be a very difficult three months at the very time we need production and jobs created in the country.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, by his emotional, alarmist tones, the hon. member is attempting to raise a spectre which does not exist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: I acknowledge that there are some difficulties and some expectations, but I deny that consumers are withholding purchases on this ground.

An hon. Member: Of course they are.

Mr. Abbott: Purchasers are quite aware that the system eventually will show the savings which will result from the reduction in the sales tax. I do not want to appear arbitrary on the point raised earlier, because I am less familiar than I should be with these aspects. I will consult my officials and perhaps be able to offer a more fulsome answer.

Mr. Stevens: And consult your superior.

STEPS TO ENSURE CONSUMERS BENEFIT FROM TAX REDUCTION

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. In his budget, the Minister of Finance indicated that the reduction of the federal excise tax was for stimulation of the economy. He also said, "I want this cut passed on to consumers". Without tax refund or relief, it is now evident the reduction will not be passed on by retailers to consumers. What provision does the government have in mind to ensure that the excise tax reduction will be passed on to consumers?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is as aware as I am that the manufacturers' sales tax has been reduced and that the savings achieved by that tax reduction at the manufacturing level will be passed on to consumers when they reach either the retailing or the wholesaler level. Ultimately, consumers will benefit very rapidly.

Also, I think he is as aware as I am that if an inventory is in stock, it may have been in stock for many months and the tax has been paid on it at the manufacturing level and not by the retailer. The task of disgorging the amount, in my judgment, is a very difficult one. The hon. member for York-Simcoe said that there was no difficulty at all and that there were adequate provisions to do it. I disagreed with him, but I reserved on the point.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. We have contacted many retailers and automobile dealers who have told us that their sales have dried up since the budget.

An hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Kempling: I will name them for the minister, Mr. Speaker. I understand the Canadian Retailers Association told the minister and officials of the Department of National Revenue privately that the cost of repricing inventory would be more than the 3 per cent. In other words, the tax reduction will not be passed along. Many retailers of large dollar items such as automobiles want to pass on the excise tax reduction—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would ask his question.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Kempling: If the hon. member wants to ask a question, he can get on his feet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: Will the minister recommend a rebate system on items in inventory over $1,000 in value at cost on which the 12 per cent excise tax has been paid? Will he go at least that far?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, first let me correct the hon. member. I have not had any discussions of the type he mentioned with the retailers' association. I would reiterate that in my judgment the task of remitting in respect of any dollar volume or dollar item over a certain amount, as has been referred to, would be a difficult, if not impossible, task. The consumer will benefit through the path that will result in reduction of the tax at the manufacturing level. I certainly do not want to appear to be indifferent to the problem; that is why I assured the hon. member for York-Simcoe that I want an opportunity to discuss the matter with my officials.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING OF PROGRAMS TO ASSIST WOMEN IN FINDING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. On Tuesday, October 31, I put to the minister certain questions about the funding under Outreach of programs which specifically help women. On that occasion the minister said that this matter was being looked at and that there would be a review during the month of November. Now that we are at the end of November, can the minister tell us whether that review has taken place, and whether the Outreach programs which specifically help women with employment and other problems will be continued?

[Mr. Kempling.]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, under the criteria women are not shut out from the Outreach program and they do participate in it along with men. We have indicated that where an Outreach program, in our view, is specifically directed at women only, we will be taking a hard look at it to determine if it meets the criteria of the program. That was the reason for the evaluation. This was also expanded on at some length in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. As the hon. member has said, the review was to take place during the month of November. However, I have not personally received the evaluation reports.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell the House, if that review is still proceeding, whether there will be any consultation with women who are working in some of the projects under Outreach that deal specifically with women? While he is answering that question will he comment on the situation that certainly has arisen in our society, that women are having such a difficult time obtaining employment that there is need not just for them to be grouped in other programs but also for affirmative action programs to help them with their problems?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there are affirmative action programs in place and many of them have been advanced by my own department. I do not think we have to take second place to anyone in respect of that particular concern.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my final supplementary question to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as the minister responsible for the status of women. In view of the fact that any real help for women with regard to their employment and other problems is, in effect, being phased out by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will the minister responsible for the status of women interest himself in this matter and try to persuade his colleague to do the right thing by the women of this country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have interested myself very thoroughly in this particular subject over the past few months, especially in relation to the question raised by the hon. member respecting the Outreach program. I disagree with his interpretation and his allegation that my colleague has not been doing his very best in this respect and has not been doing a great deal. I have had an opportunity to examine the programs in Employment and Immigration. There has been a reallocation of resources and a reassignment of functions. There are many projects dealing specifically with women in that particular department at the present time, independently of the Outreach program.

I want to assure the hon. member that the Minister of Employment and Immigration and myself are working closely on this subject and have this matter very much at heart. We would like to be doing even more than has been done, but we must consider all the people who are unemployed and not just one particular category at a time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY WHETHER REDUCTION OF MANUFACTURING SALES TAX WILL APPLY TO AUTOMOBILES ON INVENTORY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. Since last November 17, the day after the budget speech by the Minister of Finance, the manufacturers' sales tax has been reduced by 3 per cent. Can the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether consumers buying cars which were in a dealer's parking lot will have to pay the full tax since the latter had to pay it before, or whether a measure has been taken to make the customers buying cars since November 17, 1978 benefit from the reduction?

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has stated in his budget speech that there would be no special arrangement with regard to the dealer's inventory at that time.

[English]

I think this question is much along the lines of the one raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. It is important to note that this tax measure is passing through to the consumer, which I think the Leader of the Opposition and other members opposite felt probably would not happen. I think it is important to note that it is happening, and that is why problems are arising. The minister made it clear that for this normal tax reduction no special provision would be made for inventories on hand as of November 16.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT RECEIVED REPRESENTATIONS FROM AUTOMOBILE DEALERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary. I understand that the minister's answer has been categorical in that regard, but it sometimes happens that positions change as a result of logical representations. Can the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether official representations have been made to the Minister of Finance by the automobile retailers association and whether they have received the same answer the parliamentary secretary just gave to the House?

[English]

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a number of people are raising concerns about this particular matter. I think the point has to be made that whenever there have been past reductions or increases of a general nature in sales tax, it is not the normal thing for particular adjustments to be made for various inventories of commercial organizations across the country. It does not apply strictly to automobiles, but to furniture and every other commodity on which sales tax is imposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to check whether a precedent has not been created already, so that we can give an unequivocal answer to those who contact us and pretend that such a situation has occurred before and that special legislation had been passed by parliament to solve the problem.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, there have been exceptions to this general rule when a special reduction had been granted.

[English]

There was a special reduction in 1974 and an even earlier reduction for that purpose was aimed at specific industries. At that time an exception was made, but no exceptions have been made in the normal course of sales tax changes. Most reductions or increases have been of a very general nature and have applied across the board, as is the case with this 25 per cent decrease in the rate of tax.

REPORTED RETURN TO CANADA OF FORMER FLQ MEMBERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said there had been no involvement of any kind, and I think he said there had been no information of any kind, by his department or any officials of the Government of Canada in relation to the return to Canada of two members of the FLQ who were exiled from this country in 1970. That was the statement made yesterday.

In light of the events of yesterday, I wonder if that is still the position, or if there has been some involvement by some agency of the Government of Canada; and, if so, what is the nature of that involvement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that is still the situation as of today: there is no involvement of any agency of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, there are some questions that arise about the exact status of these two individuals. My supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. I would assume that at the time of granting safe conduct out of Canada to these two members of the FLQ, the Government of Canada would have established some conditions regarding their future relationship to Canada.

I wonder if the Prime Minister can tell the House exactly what conditions were established in 1970 and whether any of those conditions would be breached by the return to Canada of these two members of the FLQ.

Mr. Trudeau: The only conditions of which I am aware, Mr. Speaker, were stated publicly at the time. They were to the effect that if ever they returned, they would be prosecuted with the full force of the law.

● (1432)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I assume that determination to prosecute will continue. So that I am clear, the Prime Minister is telling us now there was no attempt by his government in 1970, when these two members of the FLQ were required to leave the country, to impose upon them any condition of any kind that would affect their citizenship or their power to return to this country, other than the threat that they would be subject to the normal processes of law, no matter what length of time had passed between their leaving this country and their return. There were no other conditions attached by this government to those members of the FLQ at that time; is that correct?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is a repetition of the same question.

An hon. Member: Poor old Joe.

ENERGY

POLICY RESPECTING CRUDE OIL PRICES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is there any change of intention or government policy respecting crude oil price increases and, in particular, the package proposal which was rejected by the majority of premiers at the recent meeting? I am specifically referring to the deferral of the crude oil price increase from January 1, 1979, for six months and the newly required increase of $1 a barrel on January 1, 1980. Has there been any change in the government's intention or policy with respect to that package deal?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there has been no package deal put together in those terms. Let me make it quite clear that the government believes it would not be desirable for an oil price increase to take place on January 1. We believe there are very good reasons for this—

Mr. McGrath: What about bread?

Mr. Gillespie: —in terms of the competitiveness of the Canadian economy relative to the United States economy, for reasons of growth and for reasons of the inflation index and the cost of living index. Accordingly, the position we took in August of this year, that there should be no increase, is still the position of the government.

I will be entering into discussions with the government of Alberta and the government of Saskatchewan with a view to replacing the existing agreement whereby an oil price increase would take place on January 1 and entering into a new agreement that would defer that increase.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the minister should be so hesitant about the second part of the package proposal. I am asking if there has been any change in the avowed, determined, announced policy of the government. It is a two-pronged one; the deferral of one for six months and a newly required increase on January 1, 1980. Is that still the minister's intention? Is it still the government's policy? A "Yes" or "No" reply would be sufficient.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, let me go over some of the same ground again for the hon. member. I do do not think he understood the situation.

An hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Gillespie: He does not seem to understand that we now have an arrangement, a written agreement between the federal government and the government of Alberta and an exchange of letters between myself and Mr. Getty. That covers an existing arrangement which would require an oil price increase on January 1, subject to an important condition or two. Before we can get agreement on the deferral, we have to get a new agreement. That is what I will be seeking from the premier, from the government of Alberta and, I hope, with the concurrence of the government of Saskatchewan. But let me make it quite clear that we are not talking about any other automatic increases after that date.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER INCREASE IN OIL PRICES WILL BE DETRIMENTAL TO QUEBEC

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montreal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The minister has stated at the federal-provincial conference that the oil price adjustments had saved $2,400 to every Quebec citizen. In view of the different position assumed by the province of Quebec, which has opted for an immediate oil price increase, will this decision cause the residents of the province of Quebec a loss in saving?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed unfortunate that the Quebec premier did not see fit to support the proposal and the agreement reached by the federal and Alberta governments. Quebeckers so far have certainly greatly benefited from the equalization formula which has maintained the price for oil at a reasonable level both in Quebec and the maritime provinces; in fact everywhere in Canada. We had thought that the Quebec premier would support the proposal in question, whereby Quebec consumers could have saved some $200 million over a six month period, specifically from January 1 to July 1, 1979. He has decided to opt instead for the maintenance of the previous agreement calling for a price increase effective January 1, which will make his province eligible for a somewhat higher transfer payment, thereby increasing the amount available for the government's budget at the expense of Quebec consumers. He wants to get a few million dollars more in equalization payments on the back of Quebec consumers who will be stuck with a bill of over $200 million.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

CRITICISM OF EXTENDED USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration: it has to do with social insurance numbers. I have made a study of this matter during the last several days in order to find out the comprehensiveness and the degree to which the rights of Canadians can be interfered with as a result of this action.

I have found out that if computers are linked in a network, they can reveal the date of your birth, the name of your parents and your record at school, that is, whether you passed or failed. Indeed, everything that happened in one's life would be available to public knowledge. I ask, why is the government not desirous of restricting this social insurance plan to taxation and to social security. I simply ask that to begin with, and a supplementary question will cover the rest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly wait for the supplementary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The very form of the right hon. gentleman's question is hypothetical. He started his question—I think Hansard will bear me out in this—by saying computers in banks were all grouped together, then this information would be available—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, come on.

Mr. Cullen: I listened very carefully, sir. It is my turn. Okay?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: The fact is that there are three areas where the federal parliament has indicated, by statute, that social insurance numbers are necessary and people have to use them where they are appropriate: the Canada Pension Plan, obviously, social insurance, and one other area. There has been an extension of this use by banks and by police forces, and in practically every instance they say, "There is no requirement to give a social insurance number, but we would like to have it". Some of them are doing it in that particular way.

I would share the concern of the hon. gentleman if, as he said hypothetically, the data banks were linked; but they are not. There is also the human rights legislation which has just been passed by this parliament, which also affords protection in that the social insurance number and access to that information is not available without the consent or permission of the individual.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would have to tell the minister that there is nothing to prevent these computers joining together: there is no law against it.

I come back to this one simple question: why permit what has all the appearances of bureaucratic tyranny? Why permit this to continue? Parliament is the place where freedom must be determined. This legislation passed, but it passed in the dying moments of a session. I suggest to the minister that this passport to tyranny should be removed, if freedom is to be preserved in our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I said that I could hardly wait for the supplementary. I thought it might be that kind of diatribe—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not diatribe; it is fact.

Mr. Cullen: It is not fact. There is no particular tyranny here. The best way to limit the extended use of social insurance numbers would be to pass legislation that they can only be used for certain purposes—A, B and C. But if we were to do that, many people would find themselves at a disadvantage because a lot of people want to use these numbers; they want to volunteer them; they want to make sure that a cheque due to them goes to them and not to a neighbour down the street.

COMMUNICATIONS

INDEPENDENT COMMITTEE TO STUDY FUTURE OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS IN CANADA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. It has direct reference to a press release issued today—it was not delivered to my office; I guess I had to ask for it at her office—regarding the setting up of an independent committee to make recommendations on the future of telecommunications in Canada.

My question refers particularly to the first part of this press release which states that this committee of distinguished Canadians from coast to coast will not have to engage in formal hearings in the discussion of this very large and complex subject. Does this mean there will be no public hearings and, if that is to be the case, does the minister not think the way to stimulate public debate in this area, as she said she is interested in doing, would be to hold public hearings rather than to make decisions behind closed doors?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): That committee is set up for a very restricted purpose. It has been created in order to help me consolidate a number of studies made within the department on what might be the new architecture of telecommunications in Canada. The idea is that before we get into discussions at the federal-provincial level or start making policies for the future of telecommunications, it is important for me and for everyone concerned to get a picture of what the future architecture of the industry is likely to be.

As I say, this is a restricted committee and there will be no public hearings. But the report will be made public when it is completed and, of course, it will then be available for public debate.

Mr. Nowlan: I must say I gathered from the press release and from the appendix to the press release that that would be the minister's answer. I find it totally incredible that this course should be taken in a field which is so perplexing to Canadians. The only documentation with reference to this distinguished group of Canadians is the press release and the appendix to it, which says in the first line:

The Canadian communications system is in the midst of a crisis more profound than any which has affected it since 1920.

Does the minister really believe it is possible for Canadians, however distinguished, to come up with solutions in the two months available to them, according to this press release? Was the committee advised beforehand that there would be no public hearings and that they had to meet a "guillotine" at the end of two months?

Mrs. Sauvé: Yes, Mr. Speaker, they were advised in advance that the report would have to be finished by February. This is because it is important for me to have this report in my possession when I discuss telecommunications with provincial ministers and when I have to decide certain important questions concerning, among other things, the introduction of new technologies which are likely to come on stream.

That report is a necessity to me, for it is a means by which I will be able to accelerate a process which has been going on in the department for the past year and a half. Since we are on the verge of discussing these matters with the provinces, it is important for me to consolidate the studies which have been made. That is what the committee is going to do.

Mr. Nowlan: Read the press release. I shall be raising this at ten o'clock.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS WITH ALBERTA ON CRUDE OIL PRICES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham that he was about to enter into negotiations with Alberta regarding the wellhead price of oil on January 1, 1979.

I ask the minister whether the proposition he intends to put before Alberta is the same as the one he has been propounding lately, a policy which might be called "Save now and pay later", by which the consumers of this country would save $1 a barrel before the election and pay $2 a barrel more after the election. Is that the proposition the minister will be placing before the government of Alberta?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The hon. member knows better than most members of this House the policy of the Canadian government with respect to the pricing of oil. Our policy has been, and still is, to move crude oil prices at the wellhead toward world levels and to do so in measured steps in a way which will not put the Canadian price ahead of the United States price; to do so at a pace which will not have a serious impact on the economy. We all recognize the fragile nature of the economic resurgence and the importance of timing in this regard.

I indicated in my reply to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham that there would be no automatic increase. It is on that basis I would be prepared to enter into negotiations with Alberta and Saskatchewan toward reaching a new agreement to replace the existing one.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am not sure whether the minister is confused or whether he is trying to confuse the House. As he knows, the proposed increase on July 1, 1979, was to be the fourth and final step in a four-step increase.

Mr. Trudeau: January.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The proposition the minister has been making recently is that in return for forgoing the increase on July 1, 1979—

Some hon. Members: January.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —on January 1, 1979, Alberta would be prepared to accept an increase on July 1, 1979, and on January 1, 1980. What possible excuse could there be for suggesting a proposition under which the consumer would save $825 million a year by cancelling out one increase and then allowing two increases which would cost consumers $1,650 million?

I am therefore asking the minister point blank: will he assure the House that if there is any increase at all, it will be for one period only, namely, January 1, 1979, and that there would be no subsequent increase later on?

Mr. Gillespie: I have made it clear that the policy with respect to our oil pricing is to move to world levels in a series of steps so that over a period of time I do not know how many years we would expect the Canadian price to be close to the international price. But we would not move toward that international price unless certain conditions were accepted such as, for example, the competitiveness of the Canadian economy; the Canadian price relative to the United States price. We would never exceed the U.S. price, depriving our industry of its competitive edge, or advance prices at a pace which would have a negative impact on our economy.

The hon. member talks about two future increases of $1 and that sort of thing. He is speaking with a degree of precision which the facts do not merit. I have indicated to him that I am not entering into discussions on the basis of automatic increases.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHETHER QUEBEC OFFERED TO PURCHASE NORDAIR

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Quebec minister of economic development announced yesterday, at the first ministers' conference on the economy, that the Quebec government intended to buy a regional carrier such as Nordair or Quebecair.

Had the Quebec government made an offer of purchase to Nordair before the conditional purchase of that airline by Air Canada, in line with the intentions expressed by Mr. Landry, without mentioning the terms of financing? What would then be the position of the Canadian government?

● (1452)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge there was no indication from the province of Quebec—certainly none conveyed to me—of an interest in relation to the purchase of Nordair.

I think the broad policy of the government with regard to provincial ownership of airlines was stated fairly clearly during the debate on amendments to the Aeronautics Act when, among other things, I made the point that there are always serious difficulties regarding possible political argument instead of simple examination of the public interest if a provincially-owned creature is before a federal regulatory tribunal, and that could create long-term difficulties in the administration of the field in question.

SMALL BUSINESS

ESTABLISHMENT OF EXPORT CONSORTIA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Small Business). In view of the fact that the deficit on manufactured end products—and most of this is in relation to the small business sector—has grown from $3.3 billion in 1968 to $11.1 billion in 1977 and is presently growing at an even faster rate, and keeping in mind that Canadian small and medium-sized firms could in fact compete more effectively in the international marketplace in this area if only an export consortia vehicle were made available, can the minister advise this House if and when he intends to accept our long-standing proposal to help establish and promote the formation of such export consortia in Canada in order to establish our small and medium-sized businesses in the international marketplace?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the hon. member has been using as a source of his research the recent speech of the Leader of the Opposition in Toronto, which is quite an unreliable source at best.

Mr. Clark: We will test it in Mississauga.

Mr. Abbott: Under our combines legislation there is now no prohibition against organizing consortia among small and medium-sized enterprises for export sales, so it would be well within the law for this to take place. Indeed, examples exist: Bill C-13 gives ample provision for this kind of consortia. So I reiterate my suggestion that instead of consulting the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, larded as it was with verbose excesses and attempts to convince the small business community that we are not doing our job, I urge the hon. member to research the law. He will see that what he is suggesting is well provided for in the present law.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I have seen many people skate around in circles in my time, but this is ridiculous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: The source of my research is international small business symposia—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his supplementary question.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, the source of my research is the international small business symposium which I attend on a yearly basis. I ask the minister to stop skating around in circles and to be more specific. For example, can he tell us what specific measures his government has taken to introduce these consortia and to make them functional, and when can the small business community begin to take advantage of such export consortia? I advise the minister that that community will be able to do so after the next federal election.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I attended the same international small business symposium. As we both know, it was held at Disneyland. Unfortunately, I think the hon. member spent too much time in Fantasyland instead of doing his homework. I am telling him it is now provided in the law that businesses can form export consortia. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and my own secretariat will be glad to help small businesses if they want to do this, and I encourage them to do it.

INDUSTRY

REBUILDING OF AIRPORTS IN TRINIDAD—GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who coached the Minister of State (Small Business) in his answer regarding his trip to Disneyland.

Recently, the minister signed an agreement with the government of Barbados to provide $10 million in cash to help that country rebuild its airports. The government pretends to encourage the private sector to export products and expertise. Why is the Department of Transport providing expertise rather than the private sector through consulting firms and construction engineering firms which would be willing and able to provide that kind of expertise?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the country involved was Trinidad. There were two airports. Our Department of Transport was chosen to act as a key contractor. It will seek out and sublet contracts to Canadian engineering firms in order to complete the work.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, to what extent did the minister urge the government of Trinidad to use our private sector in rebuilding those airports?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I was assured by the Prime Minister of Trinidad that there would be as much Canadian content as possible in the rebuilding of the two airports. I think the project will be very beneficial. It is estimated that there will be between $150 million and $200 million worth of Canadian work and Canadian material.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GRAIN

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY ON DOMESTICALLY CONSUMED WHEAT—REQUEST POLICY BE RECONSIDERED

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It relates to the government's change in policy with respect to the removal of the subsidy to millers on domestically consumed wheat. The minister was made aware yesterday of the impact such a move will have on consumer prices which, incidentally, the minister described as insignificant.

Is the minister prepared today to reconsider his position and to give serious consideration to a phasing-out period? I suggest a phasing-out period of two or three years.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we obviously considered the question of the extent of continued government financial support in this area at the time we took the decision, and decided that the saving of $100 million to the treasury was important and should be accomplished as quickly as possible.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider a policy of having the Canadian Wheat Board quote domestic wheat prices, as recommended by the bakery industry, for two or three-month periods? This certainly would reduce market fluctuations to a very large extent, provide greater stability in the industry and, no doubt, would be beneficial to Canadian consumers as well.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take whatever steps can be taken to try to encourage a relationship between the Wheat Board and its pricing and millers, so that the price rise is as slow as possible.

MEASURES TO IMPROVE MOVEMENT OF RAPESEED

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Approximately $1 billion of rapeseed sales are in jeopardy at the present time because of the transportation mess in which we in this country find ourselves. That is illustrated by the fact that the Alberta Wheat Pool is now moving rapeseed by truck to Vancouver, which is unheard of. What action, if any, will the Wheat Board or the railways be taking to move this very valuable crop which is now at a very good price?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member was putting that question either to the Wheat Board or to the railways, they would explain that they are attempting to move grain as required to the Vancouver area and to other destinations. The hon. member knows that I have not been satisfied with the way in which action by the various participants, including those to whom I referred, as well as terminal and elevator companies, has worked. As a result, I have appointed a special consultant to examine, from a business management point of view, such improvements as can be made.

I would prefer to receive the conclusions of that source and then have discussions with the individual participants, rather than to attempt to lay blame without a complete foundation in terms of concrete recommendations as to what can be done better.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, surely to goodness we cannot continue to consult and to study problems forever while the transportation system in this country suffers and, consequently, one particular region suffers.

I would ask the minister, in terms of barley which is a very important crop and is not moving, what barley producers can expect in the next two or three months, in terms of movement, because movement of the barley crop out of western Canada is virtually non-existent.

Mr. Lang: The Wheat Board could tell the hon. member that the expected sales of barley will be significantly higher this year than they were last year. The export market is excellent, so over the full crop year the sales will be good.

Of course, the Wheat Board had had to time its sales according to the needs of its buyers. If that means that in its judgment more wheat must move at one time of the year and more barley at another, I for one will not try to second-guess the Wheat Board in its judgment in that regard. The hon. member asks whether we will keep on consulting. I say to the hon. member that in a complicated transportation and handling system you need every week, every month and every year to re-examine whether you can handle the system better and make it work more efficiently.

The fact is that in 1974 and 1977, concrete steps which we took produced an additional 3.3 turnarounds on all the cars in use, effectively allowing us in 1977 to carry 34 per cent more grain than we could have done on the basis of our techniques in 1974.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NOWLAN—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In accordance with our rules I gave you notice of my question of privilege, and also I notified the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) that I would be raising a very short question of privilege. I appreciate the fact of the parliamentary limitation on most questions of privilege raised on the point that I will try to advance. The essence of a question of privilege is whether the duties and work of members of parliament are affected, and I do believe that on that basis my question of privilege carries just as much credibility as do many others, but whether or not it finds favour in your eyes, only the next two or three minutes will tell.

My question of privilege arises out of a question which I put to the Minister of Communications on November 14. It appears on page 1095 of Hansard. I asked the minister:

> I wonder if the Minister of Communications is prepared to communicate today. Perhaps she could confirm the reports across Canada indicating that officials in her department are requesting very distinguished Canadians to sit on a royal commission on communications.

The minister answered:

> No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm that: there are no officials of my department crossing Canada to set up a royal commission.

Then I asked a supplementary question regarding the communications bill. It might appear at first blush that there might have been a semantic problem. In my question I referred to reports across Canada, and the minister answered that no one was crossing Canada. But if I really and honestly believed that, then I would have to accept that the brain power of the minister is of such a low quotient that she should not hold her seat. She knew what I was getting at, and other questions had been put to her.

On June 20 I asked the minister, in view of the recommendation and suggestion of Mr. de Grandpré, president of the Bell Telephone Company, if she thought there was some merit in setting up a royal commission, and she gave me an answer then. On numerous occasions, in press releases and in speeches, the question of a royal commission on broadcasting or on telecommunications has been mentioned. Thus, when I received the answer from the minister which to me sounded categorical, that, "no, she cannot confirm that any officials of hers are crossing Canada to set up a royal commission," I interpreted that, in the widest, most generous sense, that no officials of her department were thinking about setting up a royal commission.

You can imagine my surprise when yesterday I was advised by a friend—not through the minister's office—of a speech which the minister gave in Montreal, Tuesday, November 28, to the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, nine tenths of which dealt with the Quebec problem and Mr. Lévesque, on several points of which I was prepared to question the minister yesterday if I had caught your eye, Mr. Speaker. The reason I was trying to catch your eye was that tucked away at page 8 of that speech there were two paragraphs headed "Creation of Committee." Under that heading the minister stated:

> The pace of technological change in this area is so swift and the convergence of telecommunication technologies so imminent that it is time for us to rethink the entire structure of our telecommunications system . . . There could be no better time to restructure our system. To this end, I intend to set up a small committee and to give it the task of consolidating all the studies we have undertaken thus far.

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a lot of hubbub over there, although I know the minister hears me—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan).

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the end of what I would like to say.

Mr. Cafik: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: The Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Cafik) can make his speech later. I will take him on any time he wants, but I am trying to direct my question of privilege to the Minister of Communications in a most serious way.

Yesterday I did not know the extent of what she meant by "the small committee to consolidate." Quite frankly, I thought it was a departmental committee to consolidate the many studies on communications and then perhaps suggest advice or make recommendations to the minister. I had a few questions to put to her to find out what she meant.

Thus my surprise increased this morning when, over the wire service, I was advised of the following:

Communications minister Jeanne Sauvé announced Wednesday night—

Not in her Tuesday speech, and none of this came to me as the opposition critic on communications, which is a very real disappointment to me. The minister disappointed me, quite frankly. I do not know what has happened. If two colleagues who have the same interest at heart in terms of parliament cannot communicate, no wonder we have problems in communications. This wire really started to shed light. It goes on to read:

—that she has asked a nine member committee to make recommendations on the future of the Canadian Telecommunications System. The committee, under chairman John V. Clyne—

I happen to know him. He is an eminent ex-chief justice of British Columbia.

The wire goes on to read:

—chancellor of the university of British Columbia, will not hold public meetings and has been asked to complete its work by the end of next February. It will be known as the consultative committee on the implications of telecommunications for Canadian sovereignty.

Madam Sauvé said in a news release that telecommunications is at a crossroads. There was growing concern about the extent to which it might be falling short of expectations and opportunities.

The wire goes on to read:

—as well as the role of broadcasting to contribute to the preservation of Canadian sovereignty.

Other considerations include: Use of communications satellites . . . foreign program imports; the status of cable companies . . . the framework and timing for the introduction of pay television nationally.

I do not care what you call this committee, consultative committee or any other committee—a rose by any other name—and the same applies to a thorn. This is obviously not an in-house study. It is a fundamental study undertaken by admittedly distinguished Canadians on fundamental problems affecting the communications industry in Canada.

This morning I asked officials in her office if she had a press release, and someone from the PC research office went to her office at about eleven o'clock and was given a press release of her speech made two days previously. After twelve o'clock, my secretary, following another phone call, finally received the minister's press release dated November 30, which gives in more detail the subject of the wire story which was brought to my attention this morning.

The press release refers to distinguished Canadians across the country, which was exactly the subject matter of my question. It sets out the qualifications of those distinguished Canadians. These are distinguished Canadians from coast to coast, from British Columbia to Nova Scotia and many great places in between. I do not question the character and intelligence of the people named to this consultative committee, which was given terms of reference to study the issue, and I believe they might produce a very interesting report. After all, there was the Fowler report in 1957, and 20 years before that there was the Massey report. That is why I and my party suggested more than two years ago that this whole tangled web of communications deserves another over-all objective look from someone outside of the interested parties and of the Department of Communications.

I should like to say, in conclusion, that the press release refers to distinguished Canadians and to a strategy to restructure the telecommunications system. It states the areas of study which involve new technologies, such as fibre optics, satellites, interactive television, and computer technology.

Some of the questions asked on the floor of the House today may very well have been within the terms of reference of this study, but I do not have the terms of reference in my hand; all I have is the press release.

The horrifying thing is: how can there be a study on communications with no formal hearings? The minister confirmed today that there is no intention of conducting public hearings. I agree with her that this matter has been studied ad infinitum, that there have been many substantive studies.

The fact that there have been studies on a topic does not preclude it from being aired and generated before distinguished Canadians, so that they can make up their own minds with the interplay of examination and cross-examination on many of these studies, some of which have been done by vested interests who have their own points of view to project.

Communications should be the most open field, yet a two-month study will be conducted behind closed doors. In coming to the conclusion of my question of privilege, I should like to indicate that either the minister knew her officials were asking distinguished Canadians to serve on a commission or a committee, or she did not.

I do not have to educate Mr. Speaker regarding the definitions of the word "commission", since they are used very freely, and the minister understands what I mean. Among other things, the Oxford Dictionary, taken from the table, defines "commission" in terms of royal as follows:

Commission of inquiry or committee appointed by the Crown at the instance of the government.

These eight distinguished Canadians did not come from the sky. They were not the creation of someone's imagination.

They were appointed by this minister of the Crown in the name of the government, and I presume they are being paid by the government.

I do not know whether the minister wants to play tricks with semantics. I gave her notice of my question of privilege so that she could stand in her place and indicate that she made a mistake on November 14. Either she knew that was going on almost two weeks ago and thus misled me, which affects how I discharge my duties as a member, or if she did not know something so fundamental was going on within her department, there is no use in a member on either side putting any questions to the hon. minister in this field. Perhaps she can admit her status today, that she did not know what was going on within her department, or that she misled me on November 14.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I apologize if the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) did not receive the relevant press communiqué. It is a habit within my department that these are circulated, in the first place, to the hon. member who is the critic on communications on the other side of the House. I apologize profusely if he did not receive the communiqué. Indeed I am very surprised if he has not received it. As for my speeches, I suppose he is on my mailing list, but it takes a little more time for copies to be distributed to the different offices. However, I am grateful the hon. member goes to the trouble of reading my speeches.

I should like to comment very briefly on this matter. I fail to see that there is a question of privilege in the hon. member's intervention, since it is quite obvious that I did not mislead the House. On November 14 the hon. member asked me if I was aware that some of my officials were travelling across the country in order to invite prominent people to participate in a royal commission. My answer was, no, they were not inviting people to participate in a royal commission. I stand by that answer because, of course, there is no question of a royal commission in this particular case.

Today I announced the creation of an independent group of distinguished Canadians whom I have asked to produce specific recommendations on the strategy to restructure the Canadian telecommunications system and to contribute more effectively to the safeguarding of Canada's sovereignty. As I said during oral questions, this is a very small committee which was set up more in the nature of a task force in order to assist me in what is a very important and urgent task.

I do not want to imply that the hon. member does not know what a royal commission is, but he must be aware that a royal commission is established under the Great Seal of Canada and is constituted under the Inquiries Act. This committee has not been constituted in that fashion. As Minister of Communications I made nominations and asked seven or eight people to come and work with me on the objectives which I have just stated.

I repeat that there will be no public hearings and the committee will not be receiving evidence in the usual way. It is not a royal commission at all. These people will help me to consolidate several studies which have been conducted within my department and in other instances as well.

The studies on the recent and not so recent evolution of technology in the field of telecommunications are numerous. Somebody must sit down, read them over, and attempt to make a new synthesis of all innovations which will take place in the near or not so near future.

We are on the threshold of complete and great changes in this area. We are on the threshold of an information society. New services will come in at one time or another, but we do not know how soon. They all have to fit into what is already a very good system of telecommunications. A new architecture obviously will emerge from the gradual introduction of all of these new technologies and the new services which accompany them. That is why I asked these people to work in very close contact with the department and to use the studies which I commissioned within the department, so that I will be assisted in a task which has become more urgent because of the new proposed services a lot of people in the country are interested in introducing.

I must devise policies so that these new services will be introduced in a gradual fashion and in a manner which will not confuse or disrupt the entire system. The hon. member mentioned pay television, which is only one of the new services that will be available. Therefore it is my responsibility to foresee the appearance of these new services, and to perceive the changes which will take place in the entire structure of telecommunications. I need to accelerate my consolidation of all of these new innovations, so that I will be in a better position to implement these policies.

I feel there is no question of privilege. The only thing which is correct is what the hon. member has read from this communiqué, that the people who have accepted to participate in this committee, and to whom I am very grateful, indeed are very prominent and very well posted on the questions I will put to them. I suggest I should have a question of privilege rather than the hon. member, because he is attempting to lead the House into believing that I have indeed set up a royal commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In his initial remarks the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) very accurately anticipated the disposition which would be made by the Chair in the circumstances, and very kindly did not attach to his question of privilege a motion which would require any action by the Chair. In addition, the member indicated that the minister might stand by her answer. In some terms, the minister has done that.

Wherever an answer of this sort is put into question by any kind of question of privilege, once the minister stands by the answer and indicates that in her interpretation the answer was perfectly correct in the circumstances—whatever other results or disagreements that may bring into play—from a procedural point of view it takes the Chair out of the matter. That ends any question of misleading the House, either intentionally or accidentally, because the Minister stands by the answer and indicates that on reflection the answer was correct. On those two grounds there is no procedural basis for the Chair to take any further action at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the government House leader could I ask the parliamentary secretary the usual House business question?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the hon. Deputy Prime Minister and St. Andrew are very good friends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: The minister is in his riding in the beautiful province of Nova Scotia, celebrating St. Andrew's Day.

The business for the next days is as follows: tomorrow, next Tuesday and next Thursday will be allotted days. This afternoon we will resume debate in committee of the whole on Bill C-10, followed by the public service pensions bill, C-12. As soon as they return from committee, priority will be given to Bill C-14, the unemployment insurance bill, and Bill C-2, the health resources fund.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary. I hope that his leader comes back to us restored and in good health after the celebration of St. Andrew's Day.

Would the parliamentary secretary consider raising with the government House leader the problem and importance of a discussion between House leaders with respect to the establishment of guidelines on lock-ups? The problem arose out of the lock-up prior to the Auditor General's report. The purpose of discussions would be to establish rules so that all parties and all members would be aware of the procedure, in the hope that there would be no misunderstanding in the future. The problem did cause some difficulty at the time and perhaps it could be settled in the usual way.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of the problems to which the hon. member alluded. I will check the matter and if necessary I will report to him.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 175, 190 and 380.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

PHYSICAL POLICY

Question No. 175—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,945 of the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament which showed the name of P. Ansell as a member of the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group of the Department of the Solicitor General and listed him as being in charge of physical policy, what is a complete definition of the term "physical policy" as used in this regard?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): The term "physical policy", relates to physical security and means, for the purposes of the job title referred to, policies relating to the effectiveness of preventive physical security measures used in the Government of Canada to protect information, material and personnel.

CANADIAN FORCES—GAGETOWN

Question No. 190—Mr. Howie:

As of October 1, 1978, how many PMQ units at CFB Gagetown were (a) unoccupied (b) occupied by non-military personnel or their dependents?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): (a) The number of unoccupied permanent married quarters (PMQs), as of October 1, 1978 was 435. However, of these, 356 PMQs were held by the engineers at Gagetown for renovating projects and/or requiring major repairs. (b) One hundred twenty-five.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EQUIPMENT

Question No. 380—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Is the Department of National Defence ordering $63,081 worth of tools and gauges for the M61A1 cannon and, if so, for how many cannons are such tools and gauges being ordered?

2. What units are, or will be, issued with the M61A1 cannon?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes, 82 cannons.

2. 1 Canadian Air Group, Europe.

417 Squadron, Cold Lake, Alberta.

10 Field Technical Training Unit, Cold Lake, Alberta.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 29, consideration in committee of Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose yesterday clause 1 had been carried. The committee will now proceed to the consideration of clause 2.

On clause 2—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, this is a rather surprising proposal at this particular time in that the government is faced with a general program of expenditure cuts. The government has proposed on the one hand that it would contribute to this cut by cutting back to the amount of $20 per child in the family allowance program, and on the other hand, to balance what it saw as a serious reduction in income for families in the low income bracket, it has proposed a tax credit of $200. This is payable even though there will not be any tax payable by the parent in the particular case.

Has the minister considered what the effect will be in four or five years of indexing both the $20 payment, plus the $18,000 income ceiling, plus the $200 tax credit? How does this fit in with the government's concept of establishing a control on expenditures? This control is not just on spending money—

The Chairman: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member is aware that we are on clause 2? Yesterday at the end of our proceedings, as is reported at page 1642 of Hansard, the hon. member for St. John's East indicated to the committee a consensus on the adoption of clause 1 so that the committee today could proceed to the more specific clause by clause consideration of the bill. The hon. member seems to be touching the more general debate which is normally permitted on clause 1 only. Would he please restrict his remarks to clause 2?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I invite you to read clause 2. I am asking a question precisely as to the indexing and being able to forecast the effect of that indexing on the annual government spending programs.

• (1532)

The first marginal note is "Annual adjustment", which is the legal way of saying annual indexing of the $200 payment and of the $18,000 ceiling on income.

With the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how I could be more in order than I am. I am strictly talking about indexing and its effect. I think it is a legitimate question. The minister may be able to tell us what she told the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board will be the effect of indexing the $200 a month and indexing the $18,000. That is within the program of real control of expenditures as recommended by the Auditor General last year and this year, of which we are very conscious at the present time.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, the indexing factor really has no effect on the over-all self-financing of the plan. As the hon. member pointed out, we will continue to index the family allowance but will start at a lower base of $20 rather than the base that would otherwise be applicable. We will be indexing the base amount of the maximum payment. In effect the net cost over the years will vary slightly. I think a document has already been tabled during the course of these discussions, and the minister has spoken about this before. The document indicates the net difference in 1979 to 1980 as roughly $35 million. Our estimate is that the net difference in subsequent years will not vary a great deal.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, could the parliamentary secretary indicate when the document to which he refers was tabled? This is undoubtedly an estimate from the Department of National Health and Welfare of how much this particular part of the program would cost. I am sure the minister was not able to convince her colleagues of the efficacy of this plan without detailed figures. I have been involved with some other committees during the time this bill has been under discussion and so have not been able to get the information. An indication of where the information is will be sufficient.

In his remarks the parliamentary secretary was under some misapprehension, I think, because he said there will be some sort of compensation. I cannot see how there would be any compensation or compensating adjustment in the workings of the equivalent of the cost of living index on the three bases, because the $20 is increased by so much, the $200 will be increased by so much, and the ceiling of what is called the low income family will also be increased. Thus there may be more payments to be made at all levels. It is for that reason that I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can tell us that by 1980 the government estimates the additional cost will be some $35 million as against the cost forecast for next year, and that in 1981 the estimates are—of course they are gambling on what the cost of living index is going to be. Then we can more readily understand whether this is a pig in a poke or something that can be justified.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should correct one point that the hon. member made. In the document tabled, the figure for 1979-80 actually indicates a savings of $35 million rather than an additional expenditure.

The hon. member is correct that we did not table figures beyond 1979-80. I was just indicating that it works both ways. Sources of funds used to provide the tax credit are being indexed, but starting at a lower base, or the outlay is starting at a lower base. The source of the funds is being indexed as well. We get it both ways. The index affects both outlays and savings made from a reduction in the level of payments.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I must confess to some mystification, unless I have the wrong end of the stick with regard to the program. First of all the minister proposes to reduce the family allowance to $20 from the present scale. Then there is the introduction of an index to the $18,000 ceiling, because anything over and above $18,000 will disqualify a family from receiving this $200 tax credit, or in any event there will be a declining entitlement because of it. Those two applications of an index represent an increased outlay, assuming that the index is going up.

There is a third component. Providing also that the index is going up, there will be an increasing outlay on the $200. First of all, by reason of the fact that the $200 is going to be indexed, it is in effect a payment to those families who do not pay any income tax and it is a diminution of revenues for those families who do pay income tax. It is, therefore, the equivalent of an outlay of moneys. On three counts, therefore, there is an outlay, or the equivalent of an outlay, of moneys, all three being indexed. This is my understanding of the program. That is what I think we in the opposition are entitled to have presented to us—the minister's forecast of the future cost of this program that she may or should have presented to her colleagues in order to get cabinet approval for it. No one can make me believe that cabinet accepted this plan merely on the projection of the 1979-80 figures which have been given as a statement. There is a table of either the next five years or ten years showing the effect on the cost of the family allowance program as a result of the changes. Surely if that has been used as a basis for presenting and having this program accepted by the cabinet, the minister should be in a position to table it, in order to convince her colleagues and the public that this is something worthwhile.

● (1542)

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I think this assurance has been given before during the debate. The whole concept of Bill C-10 was accepted on the basis, and indeed it is before parliament, that it will be basically self-financing over the years, not just for the immediate years ahead but for years to come. Perhaps the point that is possibly being missed by the hon. member for Edmonton West is the fact that the indexing of family allowance payments has been on the books for some time. Where substantial savings occur, which is something I do not believe is entirely clear to the hon. member, instead of the indexing starting in 1980 say on a base of what would otherwise have been $28, it will be applied on a base of $20. Thus the savings, for instance in the next year, could be $8.48 if we assume an inflation rate of 6 per cent next year. This figure would be $8.48 in 1980 rather than $8 this year. In effect the indexing is providing for a higher pay out of the $200 tax credit, but it is also providing for higher savings in government expenditures month by month in terms of what the family allowance payments would have otherwise been.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I do not mind, comparing two things in actuality. What I am looking at is the abandonment of a family allowance plan as it exists today. It is being set aside. The minister has declared, "All right, fine, by setting that aside we are going to save as of next year whatever it would have cost to index the family allowance program".

That is all that would have been saved next year as compared to this year if there had been a continuation. Now there is a new plan. I say in order to convince the House that this new plan is valid we should start from square one, which is 1979-80, the effective date of the new plan, and progress on a period of say five to ten years, and see how much that will cost. I am sure that the then minister of national health and welfare, when the program of indexing the family allowance first started some years ago, had to lay a schedule showing estimated costs over the years to his or her cabinet colleagues. Goodness, that is fundamental. I am trying to find out what costs this minister foresees for the next five to ten years for this family allowance program. She has given us the costs for 1979-80 but there are some shell-game operations going on with regard to expenditures in the past, and this year. This is a comparison in effect of apples and oranges. What I want to know is the cost of the oranges. This information has not been given to us, with the greatest of respect, with the exception of the first year, and in that case I have to sort out the figures. It is not as clear as has been indicated.

If the minister says, "We have estimated it, on the basis of our proposal of indexing, that the first year is going to result in an increase of expenditures under the family allowance program as it will start out effective with the new program of $25 million or $35 million," all right, we will accept those figures. Then we will say what about the second year, and let us go on down the line?

I do not think that my colleagues and I are prepared to buy a new program just on this basis without some idea of the cost. We do not know that some of these indices tied into particular items may not result in some sort of a shooting star on expenditures. On the other hand, with the expertise that is available to the minister, surely these tables have been produced. I am sure the President of the Treasury Board did not buy this change in the program on the basis of the minister saying, "I think it will cost $35 million the first year." What if someone said, "What about the following year?" What if she replied, "I don't know"? Her colleagues would be out of their minds to accept that kind of a statement notwithstanding all of the charm she might want to use on them. The minister has a reputation of being pretty hard-nosed about things like this. I am sure if the minister's colleagues approached her in cabinet session with a new program, her first question would be, "How much will this cost us in the foreseeable future?"

This is the information we are seeking. This is the information we would like the government to share with us. If it is not available, then I must say somebody has to go back to the drawing board.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I can only repeat that when the Minister of Finance entered the debate on November 9 he indicated very clearly that there would be no substantial difference in total because the family allowance program estimates were calculated through the use of models that bring into account all sorts of things, for instance, potential growth of income, rates of inflation, number of children, distribution of incomes, and all the other factors. That has demonstrated satisfactorily to the Minister of Finance, which I think is important. After all, we are dealing with a bill to amend the Income Tax Act, and in particular with clause 2 of that bill. It is important to the Minister of Finance that there be no additional substantial costs as a result of changing this program around.

I defer to your judgment, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think we should be discussing the total cost of family allowance programs per se at this time. I think we are dealing with a technical amendment in Bill C-10, clause 2. We have endeavoured to point matters out as best we can to satisfy the hon. member for Edmonton West. Over and over again the statement has been made that not only in 1979-80 will there be very little change in the next effect of the program, but that indeed will continue in the years ahead. All the reasons for that have been put on the record more than once. I am not sure what else we can add on that score. If the hon. member would like to come up with a guesstimate as to what the rate of inflation might be for the next year or two, then the figures could be reworked, based on that. However, it would work out to roughly the same thing.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, could I be given a few minutes by the hon. member?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes.

Miss Bégin: I would just like to repeat once more what I understand of the question put by the hon. member regarding indexation. What seems to me to be important is the key concept that this program is self-financing. Second, out of the three sources from which we created the new child tax credit, two were indexed. That will continue in years to come. Each year where it is cancelled results in more savings.

The new program has two features which are also indexed. The child tax credit is indexed. It will be $218 next year per child. The ceiling of net income, which is our point of reference by which we start cutting off the credit, is indexed. The sources which make up the amount are composed of the $50 tax exemption, which is cancelled. That is a saving in itself. It is not the indexing of it. It will create savings through the years, not just one year. Then the special tax privilege for 16-year olds and 17-year olds which was indexed is cancelled and brought back to the level of other children. That amounts to a saving of close to $400 per child per year, plus indexing through the years. The third source of it is the family allowance reduction and the reduction of the base allows for not only a net saving in the allowances for this year but a major saving in its indexing in the coming years.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I thank the minister for reviewing elements of the program on both sides of the ledger. On the other hand, the mere statements which have been given to us are not sufficient. The minister says she is eliminating the indexing of family allowances at the present level. Very well. Let us assume that the present level continues for five years. A certain figure would be reached, and there is a projected cost; the cost can be forecast within certain limits of accuracy. Then, based upon population figures, estimates can be made of the number of children who would qualify under the program. The effect of the elimination of the $50 allowance would also be determinable, and the special indexation plan for the 16 and 17-year olds is similarly predictable. Let us see this in tabular form. Then, on the basis of an annual increase in the cost of living of 8 per cent, family allowances will cost us so much starting at $20. A ceiling of $18,000 for low income families will amount to so much. Tax credit will also be indexed at $200.

You can judge costs on the basis of the micro-economic studies which can be performed as background for such a plan. This information should have been available, and I am satisfied that had the cabinet been doing its job properly—and that is questionable—the minister would have been asked to put before the full cabinet, or the cabinet committee, a résumé on two sheets of paper showing how much this program would be costing at the end of five years and, possibly, ten years. If this has not been done, I say the Auditor General is right in declaring that the government does not have control of its expenditures because it does not know what those expenditures will amount to—it cannot tell the committee what they are going to be. This is not to be taken on the strength of their word. After all, I have already found enough gaps in government thinking on this particular measure. If the information is not available, I say the plan is not viable as one which we can buy. That is all there is to it.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, again I would remind you of your ruling that this particular discussion, which deals with the whole of the bill, is related to clause 2. I will respect that judgment. But we have to say again that the details of this plan were examined very carefully. Computer models were run and calculations were made, and the Minister of Finance satisfied himself that the government was not getting involved in a program which would cost it any substantial sums of money in future years additional to what the present family allowance plan is costing. If the hon. member is not prepared to accept that statement which the minister has made, there is not very much we on this side can do about it, but I do not think it is fair for him to conclude that there will automatically be large increases in expenditures in the years to come.

Assuming a rate of inflation of 6 per cent next year, the table the hon. member mentions would result in a saving in the following year of about $45 million, instead of the $35 million which shows up for 1979-80. This assumes that all the other factors are constant—population growth, the number of children and so on. I put this example on record merely to indicate that we are not creating ideas which are not supported. The calculations have been done, and they support the concept that this program will not result in substantial additional government expenditure in the years to come.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

The Minister of National Health and Welfare would probably have had trouble in convincing the Minister of Finance of the legitimacy of this program if the fears expressed by the hon. member for Edmonton West were justified. But the Minister of Finance was satisfied there would not be substantial additional expenditure in the years to come, and on that basis the bill is now before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I enter the discussion on clause 2 mainly to indicate my strong and solid support for this clause. As the minister knows, I am unhappy about a later clause, clause 10, which reduces the basic amount of the allowance to $20 a month but, having said that, I want to express my strong appreciation of the fact that the principle of indexing will apply to all elements of the family allowance program. I say this because I believe it is right.

I am a little surprised that the hon. member for Edmonton West should have questioned the application of indexing to the program and I hope we shall hear from other members of the Conservative party as to where they stand on the matter.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I want to know what it costs, that is all.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says he wants to know what it costs. However, I do not know any other way to interpret what he has been saying for the last 15 or 20 minutes but to interpret it as opposition to the indexing of the family allowance program.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Good God!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for St. John's East will tell us where they stand on the essential feature of clause 2, which is that all elements of the family allowance program are to be indexed.

Miss Bégin: Bravo!

• (1602)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, we support the principle.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Good.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am merely asking how much it will cost.

An hon. Member: Order!

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that at this point the voting in the Conservative party is 50-50. One is questioning this provision, but one is for it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Come along, Stanley. That is demagoguery of the worst kind.

Mr. Stevens: You are being just like a kid.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am hearing all sorts of comments, but I sat here and listened carefully to the entire intervention of the hon. member for Edmonton West, and if he was not questioning this clause I do not know what he was doing. I want to support it very strongly.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Regardless of the figures.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In case the House is wondering about relevance, the clause has to do with indexing, and that is what I am talking about. I happened to be here in 1944 when we passed the first Family Allowances Act under which we provided payments of $6, $7 or $8 a month, depending upon the age of the child. A little later on the $7 was raised to $8, so there were only two categories. However, we went more than 25 years before that amount was changed. An amount which meant something when it came into effect in 1945 became meaningless in the late sixties and early seventies. Finally we raised the amount and provided for its indexation. That is a principle to which I think we must adhere without any question.

I point out that we have provided for the indexing of many other things such as old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, veterans pensions under the Pension Act, war veterans allowances, public service pensions, and others. I point out also that my friends in the Progressive Conservative party led a strong campaign over a number of years for the indexing of the exemption levels under the Income Tax Act. The government finally came through with that, and the Progressive Conservatives took credit for it. That does not bother me one way or the other, but the point is that we have it in all these other programs, and not to have full indexing of the family allowance program would be a hoax so far as the mothers and the families of this country are concerned.

I should like to emphasize again that this clause is right. That is why I am prepared to support it wholeheartedly. It is known and accepted that the basic amount of the family allowance is to be indexed starting in 1980. It is to be indexed from the $20 in 1979. However, if that is all that was done, the whole thing would soon get out of kilter. If we were to index the $20 but not the $200 and not the $18,000 cut-off figure, it would be a matter of only a few years before the whole thing would be out of balance. It seems to me that the only way to put this program on a fair and proper basis is to index all three elements. The indexing of the basic amount, which will be $20 in 1979, is provided elsewhere in the legislation, but what is before us now is the proposal to index the $200 tax credit each year and the $18,000 cut-off level. It is my view that these things are right, and that is why we should support them.

I have listened to the discussions about costs, and I will say that I think the answers which the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance gave were a bit ingenious when they pointed out that we are saving money because we will not be paying that $8 next year and so forth, but I am not bothered by that because I look at this matter from a broad perspective.

I think it is perfectly true—and I see no reason why the government should not admit it—that both the family allowance payments and the tax credits will cost more in actual dollars in 1980 than they will cost in 1979. They will cost more in 1981 than they will cost in 1980, but the thing to bring into this picture is that this indexing is being done in accordance with the consumer price index. It is not being done according to a wage index.

There are times—many workers are experiencing such times right now—when wage increases do not match increases in the cost of living. However, over the long haul, if we look at statistics for a 40, 50 or 60-year period, the tendency is for wages to rise faster than prices and for the total package of income from wages and salaries to keep moving up. The revenue which the federal government gets by way of taxation is geared to the rise in incomes, and this means that when we index all three elements of the family allowance, the basic $20, the $200 tax credit and the $18,000 level, we are indexing those only in accordance with the rise in the consumer price index. However, since the income which the government will get from taxes is related to increases in wages and salaries, the percentage of the total revenue which will be spent on family allowances will decline.

Granted, in absolute dollars the amount paid out will go up. There is no question about that, but I submit that the argument I am making is valid. I argue that as a percentage of the country's total income it will decline, and I say that for there to be any question about this principle being applied to all elements of the family allowance program is a mistake, and I am very pleased to hear the hon. member for St. John's East state that he and his party support the principle which is in clause 2.

The only thing that worried me when I looked at this clause was the explanatory note on the opposite page. It worried me only for a split second, but I think I should indicate the worry I had anyway. The explanatory note says:

> Clause 2: These amendments would permit adjustments of amounts arising out of the child tax credit.

If I thought that all the bill does is to leave it at the option of the government, I would be concerned, but according to the language of clause 2 it is not a matter of permission, concession, discretion or the word "may". The word "shall" is there. Clause 2 reads in part as follows:

> The amounts of $200 and $18,000 referred to in subsection 122.2(1) . . . shall be adjusted annually——in accordance with the rise in the consumer price index.

I had intended to speak just briefly and to indicate how much I welcome clause 2, but in view of the discussion which took place I felt that perhaps something more had to be said.

I recall the first bill we passed back in 1944 and how deficient it was in that it made no provision for those small amounts of money to increase. I was glad that in the early part of this decade we increased the family allowance and indexed

it. I am glad that clause 2 carries that principle forward. I am still disappointed and annoyed that the basic amount is being put down to $20 and I shall say so on clause 10. I think we could have kept it where it was and provided this tax credit as well, but at least what is in this clause is right and deserves the support of this entire House. The principle of indexing must be applied to all three elements of the family allowance program.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that as far as I know everybody on this side of the House is in favour of motherhood. The hon. member made a long statement. He is also in favour of motherhood, and he thinks indexing is a good idea. Of course indexing is a good idea because all indexing assures is that if we give somebody $20 today, in buying power that person will have $20 next year or $20 five years down the road.

Having said that, I think the New Democratic Party has demonstrated the careless, reckless type of argument which has led this country to the point of a $12 billion deficit in our budgetary position. Instead of hon. members in this House accepting the glib words of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance that the Minister of Finance is satisfied, we have to start examining why the Minister of Finance and his predecessors have been satisfied with the deficits this country has experienced. In an earlier session on this same point my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West, and I asked for concrete figures.

To bring this matter of indexing down to the simplest of terms, let us take the situation of one child whose parent will be entitled to $20 a month in family allowance, that is $240. So far as the tax credit is concerned, his parent will be allowed $200. Accepting the government's figures that for the fiscal year 1980—which is the election year, of course—by reducing the $8 on family allowance they have saved enough in expenditures to offset the diversion of revenue in the tax credit, what we are saying is: pray, tell us what will happen in current dollars in the fiscal years 1981 to 1984?

Take a look at it, Mr. Chairman. If we start with a revenue loss of $200, we know that at the 9 per cent inflation index figure which the government is accepting, next year it will mean a $218 expenditure, which is not an expenditure. I emphasize that the government is very crafty on this. It is not an expenditure, it is a diversion of revenue. So we have a net reduction in revenue in that year of $18. On the expenditure side, because the $240 which goes out in family allowances is also indexed, we have an increase, as I calculated, of $21.60. So, in simple language, with one child, in the year after the base year the expenditure goes up $21.60 on a 9 per cent index basis and the revenue loss is $18. If you add those two, between revenue loss and $20 expenditure increase, you have a deficit or a deficiency of about $40. All we are asking for is that the government tell us what its statistics show year by year, taking into account that its revenue will decrease and its expenditures will increase.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member for York-Simcoe is not entirely serious in the argument he put forward. He is endeavouring to relate this clause in the bill to the general indexing provisions in the family allowance program. The indexing in the family allowance program has been a component part of the program since 1974.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since the minority government.

Mr. Martin: I think it is essential, if the hon. member for York-Simcoe is going to talk about the 9 per cent figure of $240 being $21.60, which he says it will cost in addition next year for the indexing, to compare that with what the 9 per cent indexing would have otherwise cost. According to my quick calculation, it would have been applied to the $336, which is the $28 monthly payment which would have been otherwise payable, times 12. This works out to $30.24. The officials here are looking a little nervous, but I think that my calculation is correct. So that instead of having an additional cost of $30.24, we have a new cost of $21.60 from indexing. I think that that is where the obvious saving is coming about, and when you project that saving per child over the many millions of dollars, again I make the point that has been made over and over again, it offsets, indeed perhaps more than offsets, the indexing that is applied to the actual credit, the $200 credit.

It is completely unfair to relate the over-all cost of the indexing program associated with the family allowance payments to this particular bill. As I said, indexing of family allowance payments, income tax exemptions, and so on, are part of the over-all government program which was introduced several years ago. All we are doing in this bill is simply making a major shift in the manner in which the benefits from the family allowance program will be received by Canadians.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am disappointed in the parliamentary secretary. Once again he has tried to confuse what is really a simple situation. What he is asking us to accept is that because they are reducing the family allowance payments from $28 to $20, somehow the $8 will create the buffer they need to offset the tax credit they are giving. The fact is that they cannot spend the $8 saving twice. That is in effect what the parliamentary secretary is trying to get away with.

Let us look at their figures. They will save $690 million by de-indexing in the fiscal year 1980 family allowances down to the $20 level. We all agree with that. But in fact they will lose in revenue $810 million, which is partly offset by what they are saving on $690 million. By some addition and subtraction, they come to the net effect on financial requirements which is minus $35 million. We all agree up to that point. For that immediate year we will save $690 million—if you accept their figures. That comes of expenditures. But also, according to the parliamentary secretary's figures, they will lose $810 million of revenue. So both expenditures and revenue will go down. After adding and subtracting a few other things, they end up with a net financial requirement of minus $35 million. My point is simply that you cannot spend that saving next year because it will be gone by then. You have a base where your net benefit is $35 million.

To use my simple example again, if you take one child, in the first year after the base year the family allowance going to his mother will go up $21.60 in current dollars, and on his tax credit it will go up $18. That is a deficiency of approximately $40. If you amplify that year by year in current dollars, you have a very significant figure with which to deal. We are talking about hundreds of millions of dollars. It is irresponsible for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to say; "Let us not get too cluttered with figures, it is nicely indexed." We are saying it is time this parliament regained its supremacy and said to the government of the day: if you bring in new schemes and new proposals, back them up with five years of statistics to show us exactly what you are putting us into over a period of time.

I ask the parliamentary secretary again: based on my simple example, can he not give us the impact of this program year by year, assuming 9 per cent inflation? Surely, as clause 2 makes clear, if you are going to use the CPI, you have to bite the bullet and admit, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that in current dollars it will be a sizeable sum year by year. What is the figure?

Mr. Martin: I will give the hon. member a couple of additional figures which might be of some assistance to him, to substantiate the point that is being made over and over again that the Minister of Finance and his officials have satisfied themselves that this program will not cost the taxpayers of Canada any more money in the years ahead than was the case with the former family allowance program. But before I put any other figures on the record I should like to reiterate that in Bill C-10 we are not talking about the total cost of family allowance payments over the years, nor are we talking about the total cost of indexing various government benefit plans. They have always been indexed. The bill does not refer to the total cost of indexing this program.

We are not talking about the total expenditures involved in this program, any more than we are talking about the total expenditures which might have been involved in some of the programs recently put forward by hon. members opposite. We are not talking about the total costs of the program. We are talking about the effect Bill C-10 will have on net revenues or net expenditures of the government relating to family allowances.

The officials performed a very quick calculation, which assumed a 6 per cent rate of inflation. The calculation was projected for one more year. The hon. member for York-Simcoe has the figures for 1979-1980, but I should like to refer to the quickly calculated figures for 1980-1981. Instead of producing a cost of $810 million, the refundable tax credit will produce a cost of $858 million. That calculation is a rather simple one: 6 per cent of $810 million added on. Instead of a savings of $690 million, the reduction in family allowances will amount to $731 million, and the tax implication of that would rise from $130 million to $138 million. The elimination of the current $50 child tax credit carries on. It is a one-time thing which is not indexed. It will amount to $260 million. The modification of exemptions for 16-year old and 17-year old children will work out to $50 million, because it is a phased-in program and only half of it is picked up in the first year. The net effect of those figures comes out to a difference of $45 million, whereas $39 million was mentioned for the year 1979-1980. As we can see, it is savings in both cases.

It is blatantly unfair to introduce into the discussion of clause 2 the total cost of the family allowance program, because we are not dealing with the total cost of that program or the total cost of indexing it. We are dealing simply with the effect of Bill C-10 on the total program, as against the program which exists now.

The Chairman: Order. The time allotted to the hon. member for York-Simcoe has expired, but I will allow him to put his last question.

Mr. Stevens: Today we are seeing something very similar to the old "three-card monte" which people used to despise so much. It is unbelievable what the parliamentary secretary asked us to accept as an explanation for fiscal 1981. In effect he reworked the figures, assuming that the same dodge can be done every year as was done this year. The parliamentary secretary said that this bill does not affect the over-all family allowance program. Eventually we will deal with clause 10, but if he has forgotten what that clause contains, perhaps he should look at it.

Clause 10 de-indexes the present family allowance payment of approximately $28 to $20. Unless the government intends to pass clause 10 or a parallel to it each and every year down the road, there is no way it should be suggested that the saving can be repeated in 1981 and 1982. That is exactly what the parliamentary secretary suggested, that somehow or other the $690 million, which will be saved in the current year, will be resavable next year. It cannot be resavable. The bill moves us from $28 down to $20, which will be a saving of $690 million. If we accept the base of a $35 million net benefit, we must know what the net difference will be between expenditures and revenue. Obviously if the figures are projected to 1981, they will come out roughly the same, but that is not what we are dealing with here.

The minister and the parliamentary secretary should make up their minds that there is absolutely no way parliament should be asked to rubber stamp this bill, in spite of the active support of the New Democratic Party, until they can put before us five years of meaningful figures, using a 6 per cent inflation rate, showing what will be the net cost to treasury of the rising expenditures and diminishing revenues resulting from the passage of this bill.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare can become flustered and frustrated, but it is high time parliament asked such ministers for the hard facts, instead of rising and simply indicating that the Minister of Finance is satisfied. The country has been led to a deficit of approximately $1 billion a month because the Minister of Finance has been satisfied. The minister and the parliamentary secretary are ruthless toward the poor of Canada, to the extent that they are contributing to inflation in future years by this type of deficit approach.

Miss Bégin: That is rubbish.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps the hon. member for York-Simcoe is getting somewhat carried away.

Mr. Stevens: Somebody had better start.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member referred to clause 10 and I should like to refer to the same clause, even though we are dealing with clause 2.

Some weeks ago the hon. member registered concern by way of a question, to which I should like to respond. There seems to be some confusion in his mind in terms of the new base upon which the indexing will take place. He expressed the concern that clause 10 would result in only one year of reduction in family allowance payments, and that in subsequent years the amount of family allowance payments would revert to $28 plus indexing. This is simply not the case. It is a complete misconception on the part of the hon. member for York-Simcoe, if indeed that is what he thinks. Judging from his earlier remarks today, he is still of that opinion. Subsection 13(1.1), as amended, sets the new base amount for family allowances at $20 for 1979. The indexation of family allowances, as set out in subsection 13(1)(a), will remain in place. However, in future years the indexing will use the new $20 base.

Mr. Stevens: The committee will deal with clause 10 later. We are dealing with clause 2 at this time.

Mr. Martin: Simply, this saving carries on. If there is indexing on a lower base, obviously it does not cost as much as indexing on a much higher base. The difference between $28 and $20 simply grows a little bit each year as the inflation rate is applied. The 6 per cent or 7 per cent applied to $28 will be larger than the 6 per cent or 7 per cent applied to $20.

Mr. Stevens: No wonder the country is in trouble.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for York-Simcoe says that the country is in trouble. He has referred to a $1 billion per month deficit, but he made no reference to the various irresponsible promises made by members of his party during the course of recent campaigns. Approximately $3 billion would be a conservative estimate of the increased deficit which would arise if one of their proposals were put in place.

• (1632)

Last week in Toronto the Leader of the Opposition came out with another one. He wants to allow all Canadians to invest $5,000 a year in small companies and to deduct it from their income tax. If we are worried about shams of corporations that are being formed or have been formed recently to benefit from small business tax breaks—a situation which has been corrected in the current budget—can you imagine the numbers of corporations which will be quickly put together to manufacture widgets one year, to get this $5,000 tax deduction, and the next year they will move the money out and start another corporation?

There was no estimate in the speech given by the Leader of the Opposition on the costs of this particular proposed deduction. Any Canadian who wanted to throw $5,000 into a company would have a deduction for income tax purposes if that party were in power. The hon. member talks about irresponsibility on this side and nonsubstantiation of facts and figures. I do not think that he is in any position to continue that kind of argument.

Mr. Stevens: You will be surprised if you think that.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I quite understand the concerns of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). Yesterday afternoon she stated repeatedly in committee of the whole that she was seeking to help underprivileged families increase their income and thus reduce their level of poverty. Mr. Chairman, there are many ways to reach this objective. But we are now considering one of them, which is Bill C-10.

I remember well when family allowances were established by an act of parliament in 1945. I was not a member of this House at the time, but we would then, as today, read Hansard and keep abreast of what was happening.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was 1944.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Maybe. If I erred by a year I am glad because that makes us younger.

An hon. Member: In 1944!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): In 1944, I thought it was in 1945, but I will take the word of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because he is an old war horse and he has a fantastic memory.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was here and I voted for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): When the hon. member gives us dates he is sure of them; I therefore accept his correction. For many years the monthly rate remained just about the same; it did not change much. Then, in 1974—and I hope I am right in this case—it was increased considerably and the cost of living index was decreed by amending the act. Now, to my mind Bill C-10 suddenly changes the nature of this social legislation. The allowance is reduced by $5 to $20 a month. Of course, I know the bill introduces a child tax credit of $200. That is why

I say it alters to quite an extent the nature of that very important social legislation. I therefore ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether this change in procedure does not create a potential for discrimination against the mother. Because it is directly related to a tax—

The Chairman: Order. I should like to remind the hon. member that yesterday the committee passed clause 1 and that we are now dealing with clause 2 on indexation. Unless I am mistaken, those questions are general in nature but there may be a specific clause—

Miss Bégin: Clause 6.

The Chairman: —under which you could perhaps put them to the minister; but it would be difficult for me to allow those questions now, under clause 2, which deals specifically with indexing the formula proposed by the bill before the House.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I am aware of what you have just told me, as I was also yesterday when the House was adjourned. It was at that moment that I went out, and reached that point. When we came back, after the sitting was suspended, someone—perhaps the parliamentary secretary—moved passage of clause 1. I intended to speak to clause 1 yesterday, but the sitting having been adjourned, I thought I could do so today.

I am not at all questioning your decision. I just felt I had to make this clarification. If inadvertantly I should derogate from the Standing Orders again, please call me to order and I will be glad to comply with your instructions.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister in which month of the year approximately will this $200 tax credit be paid to those mothers who are not eligible for any tax credit because their income is not large enough for them to pay income tax. Is the minister in a position to tell us in what month approximately these payments will be made?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, to answer that question, I should wait until we consider clause 5, I believe, which deals with the procedure relating to tax refunds.

As to the first part of the question, which deals with who will be eligible and will receive these cheques, the hon. member will have to ask his question again when we get to clause 4 which we will consider in a few moments.

[English]

Mr. Hare: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak very briefly on this bill in that I am a new member in the House. Since this House has been sitting—it is over four years now—there has been a decided change in the thinking of the people in the country, and I think the by-elections showed this.

I represent a constituency which has a large number of thinking people in it, and I have before me a letter which will indicate what these people are thinking. It is from an individual on behalf of a group of people who held a meeting concerning:

—amending the family allowance legislation and providing what is, in effect, a negative income tax through the back door, and calling it a child tax credit, but I think there are a lot of dangerous aspects.

The intent apparently is to impose a means test, taking into account income of both father and mother. From the standpoint of equity this may be desirable, but in practice it would be much simpler to restrict the recovery to the parent claiming the deduction for the child. If the combined income concept is to be applied, surely it should be applied—if equity is essential—to other discriminatory provisions relating to spousal income and transfers—

The Chairman: Order, please. I am faced with the same problem. I have to be fair to all members and apply the rules accordingly. I know that the hon. member for St. Boniface, last night when we were about to call it ten o'clock, was trying to seek the floor. However, he did agree to the passing of clause 1 just before ten o'clock and has therefore yielded his right to speaking on the general subject of the bill. His present intervention would have been more appropriate had it been at second reading of the bill because he is really talking about the principle of the bill in general.

We are on clause 2 and I do not see how I could relate the remarks he is reading from people in his riding, to this clause. There may be other clauses which would permit him to comment as he is doing now, but I do not see how I can allow it without being unfair to the hon. member for Bellechasse who had the floor and was trying to ask general questions on the principle of the bill or a different application that was not related to each specific clause. Under the rules I cannot even ask the committee to revert to clause 1. It has already been debated. I think the remarks of the hon. member and those included in the communication from which he was reading could perhaps be related to third reading of the bill.

Mr. McGrath: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, your ruling is obviously procedurally correct and we are not going to challenge it. I would ask Your Honour to keep in mind, however, that the hon. member is new and he did forfeit his right to make a general argument last night when we passed clause 1. Perhaps if he tightened up his argument Your Honour might give him leeway so that he could present his comments.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, to accommodate the request just made so courageously by the hon. member for St. John's East, I might say that in the last part of the presentation of the hon. member for St. Boniface I heard something about combined income. That could surely fit in with submissions on clause 4 which relates exactly to that point. Hopefully, we are proceeding rapidly to that clause. I am not sure if it is a question of white running shoes running too fast, but perhaps the hon. members would be ready for clause 4.

The Chairman: Order, please. We are studying the bill clause by clause. I think the minister's comments are valid. If I am to allow special permission to hon. members on clause 2 for all kinds of reasons, we will never get to the other clauses.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order, I have had an opportunity to read my colleague's letter. I think if you heard him out you would see that it is quite relevant to clause 2 as it deals with administrative problems that will ensue from the $200 amount. He referred to the tax credit which, of course, is the meat of this clause. As far as relevance is concerned, I think all of us, and certainly we on this side, rather enjoyed having the parliamentary secretary once again outline some of our party policies. He took us through the $5,000 small business program and that sort of thing. Every time I hear it, it sounds better and better, so I have no objection to him doing that. But, of course, it was all under clause 2. I hope you can let the hon. member for St. Boniface go ahead and make his submission. Surely it does not matter too much whether he does it under clause 2 or clause 4.

The Chairman: If I tried to answer the question raised by the hon. member I think I would be getting into debate and I do not want to bring the Chair into debate. I have made my ruling. There will be opportunities for the hon. member for St. Boniface to make his intervention on any other clause, but I think we must restrict debate on clause 2 to consideration of indexation.

Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Stevens: Now we have heard from the hon. member from Saskatoon who shouts out "carried". They do these things in total disregard of the—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is from Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Stevens: As long as we have him pinpointed. The irresponsibility of that party amazes me. My first question on clause 2 is to ask the parliamentary secretary to give us the figures for 1981 to 1984 that I have requested.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, in debates of this nature it has not been the practice to table schedules of projected expenditures or revenues for several years ahead. I think the Minister of Finance has made it abundantly clear in this case that there is no proposal to change the general rule. I have given the hon. member for York-Simcoe some figures that were calculated quickly and which relate to the year 1980-81, assuming that the factors of population, number of children, income distribution and so on, would be the same. It is not the intention of the government to change the manner in which such bills are handled in this House and to create a precedent by giving projections many years into the future.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not blame the parliamentary secretary for not wanting to look too far into the future as far as his future is concerned. I tried to bring my question down to the most simplistic situation of one child getting a $240 allowance—or his mother getting it—and the $200 tax credit becoming operational, which means that there is a deferral of that revenue. Would the parliamentary secretary indicate whether I am correct in saying that in the year after the base year, as far as the tax credit is concerned, there would be an increased loss of revenue? We are then up to $218 in loss of revenue as far as the child is concerned, and as far as the $240 is concerned we are up by approximately $21 to $261. In current dollars this would mean approximately a deficiency of $40 to the treasury with respect to one child.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, to the extent that the hon. member for York-Simcoe has indicated, the treasury will be spending more money for that one child in the year 1980 than they will spend in the year 1979. There is no argument about that. I have not worked out the exact figures, but the hon. member has probably indicated them correctly. The point to bear in mind is that, regardless of this bill passing, there would be a substantial increase in the outlay per child in 1980 over 1979.

A further point is that the total net outlay for all children in the country will be no greater in 1980 with this bill in place than it would otherwise have been. I indicated to the hon. member for York-Simcoe that the over-all saving would be $35 million in the first year and about $45 million in the second year. I reiterate that calculations would indicate that in years to come, if hon. members opposite will allow this bill to go through at some point so that Canadians may benefit from the useful measures in it, there will be no additional cost to the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, we make progress so slowly, but at least the parliamentary secretary agrees that on the one child scenario there will be a $40 widening—

Miss Bégin: No. In comparison—put it in comparison. Relate it to current programs.

Mr. Stevens: Our point is that every year they cannot claim the same savings that they claimed in the last year. They just cannot do it.

We are willing to accept the net financial gain of $35 million for the first year. I know you understand this, Mr. Chairman. It is simple. The government arrives at the $35 million gain by reducing the $28 payment to $20. We agree with that, that is where some money is saved. But on the other hand, and this is significant, the government is offsetting that saving by dropping below the line and having a revenue loss. The net difference is a gain to the treasury of $35 million. What we are asking is the figures for the next year. We are satisfied about 1980 if their figures are accepted. But I would like to look at the figures for the years 1981 through 1984.

● (1652)

I would like this done without using mirrors or the "three card monte" type sleight of hand trick. Just tell us in simple language what happens when that difficult position is reached of indexing both ways. This is a situation where expenditures go up and revenues go down. Then there is an opening, a canyon if you like, which gets bigger and bigger, representing an ever increasing deficit. Government members will tell you privately that they are already in trouble because, while revenues are indexed one way at the present time, expenditures which amount to something over 50 per cent of total expenditures, are indexed the other way. It does not take an Einstein to realize that if revenues are regularly plateaued and expenditures rise as fast as inflation, something falls in between. That is known as a deficit.

We are trying to avoid embarrassment in future years. We are asking them to tell us what is to be the net increase in the deficit as a result of putting into place family allowance on the basis of a tax credit.

I know you realize, Mr. Chairman, that the parliamentary secretary is most misleading when he says this has always been in place. It is not just $200 frozen in fiscal 1980, it is $200 indexed. That is what is new. And that is what I think should be better explained. We can all work out roughly what the on-going family allowance increase will be year by year. What is more difficult—and certainly it is unique to the family allowance system—is the negative income approach they are using. I want to know year by year based on their indexing how much expenditures will go up and how much expenditures will go down. I ask this simple question: will the parliamentary secretary tell us what the gross loss of revenue in the fiscal year 1981 will be as a result of this tax credit indexed for the 9 per cent?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member for York-Simcoe is hoping his rhetoric will carry on sufficiently long that we will have to close out the day without even getting clause 2 passed. We have had endless debate on clause 2 as we did originally on clause 1. This question has been answered over and over again. I gave the hon. member the figures for 1980-81 a short while ago so that he could mark them down with his pencil against the figures he previously had for 1979-80. I indicated the net result was a $45 million saving. I honestly do not know what else we can do, or say. If it is the determined position of the official opposition to filibuster the bill—

Mr. McGrath: Oh, come on.

Mr. Martin: —I understood from a conversation I had some time ago with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that one member could hold up the process for weeks. I do not know what other new information I can offer. I could repeat everything that has been said earlier this afternoon. It is very clear, and I repeat again that the cost of this program will not represent any additional outlay to the Canadian taxpayers over the existing program. That is the important point.

I emphasize that the indexing which is calculated on a substantially lower base, that is $20 versus $28, will have the effect of increasing the saving year by year. In other words, the first year it is $8. The second year, with an assumed 6 per cent inflation rate, the amount will be $8.48. And so it goes up all the way through. There is a continual saving. It is not just in that one year. We are starting off with family allowance payments at a new level. The indexing will start from that new level which is $8 lower than the old level. That particular saving in large part is providing the funds for the $200 tax credit. That is where the two major factors come in, and I do not know how we can say that any clearer.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, if it is beyond the parliamentary secretary's grasp I hope his minister will come in and perhaps we can get the answer from him. I asked a very simple question. That question was, could the parliamentary secretary tell us for fiscal 1981 what the total gross loss revenue will be as a result of the tax credit being indexed. We have a figure for 1980, which is an estimate of $810 million—

Miss Bégin: We gave it to you. It is $858 million.

Mr. Stevens: Will he give it for 1981?

Miss Bégin: We gave it to you.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair and report progress.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard)—Administration of Justice—Firearms control program—Request for progress report; the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton)—Canadian Wheat Board—Purchase of hopper cars by board—Consultation with railways; the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn)—Urban Affairs—Alleged failure of department to promote home insulation program.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

J. H. POITRAS & SON LTD.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) moved that Bill S-8, to revive J. H. Poitras & Son Ltd., be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

J. H. Poitras & Son Ltd.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank hon. members, and particularly the member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), for allowing me to proceed with Bill S-8 at this time. Since this bill was introduced in the other place by Senator McIlraith and has been studied by the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, my remarks will be brief and, I hope, to the point.

● (1702)

The purpose of this bill is to revive the company known as J. H. Poitras & Son Ltd. This company was incorporated in 1965 and had its principal place of business in the city of Hull, Quebec. The company sells, services, and instals fire protection equipment such as fire extinguishers, as well as fire and burglar alarm systems, in the Ottawa-Hull area.

In September, 1977, the present owner of the company decided to sell his shares to another company. In the course of completing the documentation arising from that sale, it was discovered by the lawyer that the company had been dissolved in 1968. The reason was failure to file with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, for three consecutive years, the annual information returns required under the Canada Corporations Act. It was discovered also that the notices from Consumer and Corporate Affairs requesting the filing of returns did not come to the attention of the company. These notices were sent not to the company's own address but to its lawyer.

The notices were of course published in the Canada Gazette but were apparently not read by the company. In any case, no returns were filed and the company was dissolved before the new owner, Normand St. James, acquired shares in it.

The petitioner, Normand St. James, and the original owner of the company were not aware of the dissolution of the business. Mr. St. James carried on his activities despite the fact that unknown to him no corporate body existed.

In the circumstances, this bill asks that the company be revived and that it be deemed not to have been dissolved. This would regularize the situation. If it is agreeable to the House, I would propose that if second reading is granted, the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for study.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has, indeed, consulted with respect to this matter. He was good enough to supply me with copies of minutes from the other place and a record of the debate in the Senate in respect of this bill.

It is really an astounding matter. It is not altogether surprising that a notice might not be referred to the company, but what is surprising to me is this: notwithstanding the fact that the company in question had died in law, and that its death had been duly noted in the records of the government through the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, another department of the government, the Department of National Revenue, should continue to collect taxes from this corporate corpse. On the other hand, there is no reason why this House, or any member of it, ought not, in the circumstances, to deal appropriately with an agency or a citizen coming to parliament for relief.

I gather from the debate which took place elsewhere that if this House does not deal expeditiously with the matter, as the Senate did, an innocent party would be placed at considerable disadvantage. Thus, on behalf of my hon. friends I am prepared to let this matter go and consent to the reference to the committee as proposed by the hon. member.

I know that in referring to the Canada Gazette as a document which was not read by the proprietor of the company who was so innocently misled, he was not implying that the Canada Gazette was on the best-sellers list by any means—it is a publication which is not always read even by some members of the bar. I appreciate the detail which the hon. member has supplied other members of the House with regard to this matter, and we should certainly like to see the bill dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) certainly practises non-discrimination. He supplied me with the same information he apparently supplied to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

I may say I do keep track, to a certain extent, of what is going on in the other place. It might not always be there, so one should keep track of it while it is. I noticed this bill when it was going through the Senate and it did strike me as reflecting an odd situation. One of the things that interested me when I read the debate in the other place, both in that House and in the committee, was that the Senators themselves, many of whom are lawyers, were shocked to discover that at least one of the culprits in the picture was the lawyer who made the sale, the lawyer who acted for both the parties concerned, the old company and the new company. The lawyer who made the sale was, in effect, selling his new client a decreased corporation. This was obviously a bad situation, and Mr. Normand St. James is the innocent party and should not suffer because of that.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to let this bill be read the second time and go to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I must confess I am astonished to see that businessmen can operate without knowing they are in business, or at least without knowing that they are operating under the name of a company that has been legally dissolved.

In any event, I received representations from the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) who was kind enough, I would say, to pilot this bill in the House of Commons, a bill that came to us from the Senate. I leafed through the report in the Hansard of the other place rather quickly.

Naturally I did not have the opportunity of checking the testimony of all witnesses before that committee. But, be that as it may, I trust people who seem honest like the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier. I trust this bill will be deferred to committee where it will be looked into very seriously, because we must always be serious in our work when we pass bills, even private ones. That is why I feel it is my duty to give my approval to this bill, that it might be sent to committee where the matter can be settled once and for all, and at the same time to invite the new group that is operating under the name of the company, J. H. Poitras et Fils Ltée., to periodically have to look at the notices published in the Canada Gazette.

[English]

Motion, agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Pinard: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is unanimous consent to proceed with the public bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), Bill C-232.

May I ask that all the preceding bills be allowed to stand by unanimous consent?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOLIDAYS ACT

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF DOMINION DAY BY CANADA DAY

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved that Bill C-232, to amend the Holidays Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill, which I have introduced in every session of parliament since I came here, has been the subject of fairly lively discussion each time it has been brought forward. I must admit that I was somewhat surprised that it was called so early in this session. I note that there are about 25 private bills ahead of this one on the order paper, and I am concerned because 25 members who have put bills on the order paper are not prepared to discuss them at this time. However, that is their business. I am certainly ready to go ahead with any one of my bills, and this one happens to be the first on the list.

This bill was debated fairly fully in this House on March 14, 1975. At that time it was decided to refer the subject matter of the bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

In my opinion, what this bill seeks to do is regularize a situation which for all practical purposes is a fait accompli. In most parts of the country the July 1 holiday is at the present time designated Canada Day. However, according to our statutes it is still Dominion Day. As soon as one talks about changing the name of the holiday from Dominion Day to Canada Day, there are some stalwart supporters of the word "dominion" who immediately rise and exclaim that we are trying to do away with old traditions and so forth.

As someone who was born in Great Britain, who came to this country as an immigrant, and who likes tradition, parades and so forth, I am not overawed by the suggestion that we should be respecting certain old traditions and guarding the word "dominion" in our statutes. Whether we change the name legally now is probably of very little consequence because for all practical purposes, as I have already said, from coast to coast we use the present terminology "Canada Day", and we use it with pride when we refer to the anniversary of the founding of our nation.

There has been some concern about this change among members of the Royal Canadian Legion. I am a member of the Royal Canadian Legion, an ex-serviceman, an ex-military man. I understand the concern of the Royal Canadian Legion. I understand its feeling about the word "dominion", but I suggest to the Royal Canadian Legion, and to everyone who is concerned about the use of the word "dominion", that in a country with the difficulties we are experiencing today it is a relatively minor matter to eliminate a word, despite all its history and ancient significance. Surely the name of the day which should be of major significance to all of us, July 1, should be acceptable to all Canadians. I say "all Canadians" advisedly, because even those people who speak against this change have not, at least to my knowledge, spoken against the terminology "Canada Day". They speak for retention of "Dominion" without speaking against the word "Canada".

I think there is little else to be said. I honestly believe that this bill is just a tidying up. There are few people left in this country who do not recognize that the connotation which is attached to the word "dominion" is divisive in itself. It is an ancient terminology. It has a significance which is certainly not helpful in uniting all parts of the country today.

In terms of importance perhaps the name "Canada Day" has little significance in that, as I have previously said, it is now a fait accompli. However, in terms of significance to a certain section of the population in this country which does not like the somewhat subservient nature of the word "dominion", it is important. For these reasons I strongly urge passage of Bill C-232, which would change the terminology "Dominion Day" to the popularly acclaimed and generally used "Canada Day".

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), I am a little amazed that this bill came up as early on the agenda for the session as it did.

I want to take exception to one expression used by the hon. member twice, and that is that Canada Day is a fait accompli. I am not at all sure it is. To any Canadian, whether of British birth or, as I am, descended from parents of British birth, or who has been here eight or ten generations or who has just come off the boat from Europe or other countries, the word "Canada" has a very special meaning. I do not disagree that the expression "Canada Day" has been used a great deal, whether appropriately or not. However, I think this is important, particularly to the people I represent, many of whom are descendants of United Empire Loyalists.

I do not downgrade the hon. member at all, but I think that a matter of this significance should not be brought up in a private member's bill. The government has been using the expression "Canada Day" for the past few years. If the government wishes to use that name, it should bring in legislation changing the name of the holiday. This is an important matter. I was not here at the time, but we all know about the debates in this House on the flag. Many institutions debated long, hard, and sometimes bitterly about the flag.

The hon. member mentioned one institution, the Royal Canadian Legion, of which he is a member. I am proud to be an honorary member of Branch 99. I think perhaps you, Mr. Speaker, would remember the lengthy flag debate. I know others in the House remember. It was a very acrimonious debate, but because there was an act of parliament all Canadians are now prepared to accept the new flag. A few, of course, would like to have the old one, and I admit that in my heart there is a warm spot for it, but I think most Canadians now accept the new flag.

We have that new flag because of a debate in this House. There was a vote in this House. There was proper committee scrutiny and finally a decision of this House that Canada would have a new flag.

I do not think this matter is a party matter, but if this new name is to be accepted by all Canadians, it should be dealt with in this House as a matter of importance. I think there would be acceptance from many parts of the House and I think there would be considerable debate on the matter, but I do not think it should be taken lightly as a matter to be considered during private members' hour and to be given less than an hour of debate on a quiet Thursday afternoon, with just a few dozen of us in the House who are regularly here at this time of the day. I really do not think this is the time to slip a matter of this importance through the House. I think the matter deserves full debate.

I have to correct the hon. member on the slip that he made when he asked us to pass the bill. If we allowed it, it would be given second reading, approval in principle, and then would go to committee. But it would be wrong to send it to the committee without the full weight of a debate in parliament and without the weight of government support.

I have said virtually all I want to say on the matter. I will be interested to see, in fact, if members on the government benches are prepared to let this bill go through. If they are, then it would be a very interesting situation.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Ellis: In my view, if the matter is to be given any credence, it should be put forward by the government in the usual manner. I commend the hon. member for Vaudreuil for showing initiative in bringing this bill forth, but I think that on a matter of this importance and magnitude—it is of some magnitude for those Canadians who are concerned about this sort of thing—it is inappropriate for it to be brought forward in the private members' hour. I will let it go now. I do not know whether any of my colleagues will intervene on this bill, but I think it deserves the weight of government action.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks concerning Bill C-232, an act to amend the Holidays Act, in order that July 1 be known as Canada Day. The hon. member opposite who spoke last pointed out that in his opinion it was inappropriate for this bill to be brought up in private members' hour. I beg to disagree with him. I do not think that good ideas come only out of cabinet. I think good ideas come from all sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: I believe that this act is a step in the right direction. However, I would point out that the hon. member is correct in assuming that if this bill is passed by us here today, it will go into committee, be debated there, and then will come back to the House and be debated here again. So there will be a great deal of discussion of the matter and, I hope, a great deal of deep thinking about it before the bill is passed and becomes a fait accompli.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about this bill in the context of my riding. The census of 1971 showed that 69 per cent of all the people whom I represent in St. Catharines list their home origin as the British Isles. Notwithstanding that fact and the great tie and great love they have for tradition and for things that are British, the majority of the people in my riding, I believe, would be in favour of calling Dominion Day on July 1, Canada Day.

As you know, this day is currently designated as Dominion Day in the act, but I think most hon. members would agree that over the past few years there has been a growing feeling that such a designation is no longer suitable or desirable. Indeed, throughout what is now almost a decade, it is on what is known to many as Canada Day, Canada Week, and Festival Canada, that millions of Canadians have celebrated the birthday of our nation. I submit that the official designation of July 1 as Canada Day would reflect accurately the feelings of Canadians.

The hon. member referred also to the flag debate. I make no apology for taking great pride in the fact that after 98 years we finally chose a flag that is uniquely our own. A great many debates took place across Canada in which people from all walks of life and from all regions had something to say about whether or not we wanted our very own flag. I am an honorary member of the Legion, Branch 24, in St. Catharines. When I went back to my riding on Remembrance Day to join the veterans of the two world wars who marched on that day, it seemed to me as if hundreds of years had passed since we had debated so vehemently whether or not we should have our own flag. As I travel around the world, I feel, as do other hon. members and other citizens of Canada, a great deal of pride when I see our very own flag raised.

Let me point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that on November 5 of this year I represented the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) at the ceremony in Vimy marking the sixtieth anniversary of the end of World War I. During my stay in Europe I visited many Commonwealth war graves. These graves, where our soldiers, our fellow Canadians, our brothers and sisters of another year lay buried, had the maple leaf engraved on their headstones, an emblem of Canada which was chosen many years ago, the emblem which we display so proudly on our flag.

I know it may be argued that the designation "Dominion Day" is somehow related to the historical development of Canada and that it should be retained for reasons of tradition, nostalgia, and so on. However, I would like to think that Canada has undergone great and vital growth and has emerged from the colonial status and, in the process, has acquired strength, independence, and a sense of identity, and that therefore Dominion Day is no longer a suitable title for that day set aside for all Canadians, Canadians of all origins and from all regions, to celebrate Canada's birthday and to take pride and joy in being Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: I suggest that giving that day the more appropriate name of Canada Day is only logical, and I agree 100 per cent with the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). Most of us think of the day as Canada Day, feel it to be Canada Day, refer to it as Canada Day, and celebrate it as Canada Day. I say we should therefore call it just that, that is, Canada Day. But I wish to make it clear that I am not belittling the importance of tradition. No, that is the furthest thing from my mind, because our roots run deep to all the great countries and cultures in Europe.

We have emerged with our own Canadian culture, and I think we must recognize that fact over and over again, if needs be, because it took us 111 years to become the Canadians we are today. We did not just happen in the last 12 years, notwithstanding the fact that we have had our very own flag only since 1965. I believe that without a tradition a nation cannot be said to exist. Indeed, I do not believe a nation can exist without the traditions and the roots we acknowledge here today.

I am sensitive to the concerns of those who, in perceiving the importance of tradition, question closely all proposed changes, however seemingly superficial. Without such questioning there would be no balance, there would be nothing to impede those more interested in change for the sake of change. Indeed, it has been due to the efforts of those who are convinced that tradition has an important role to play in the forging of national identity that much of our heritage has been preserved, many of our traditions retained.

That which makes Canada and Canadians unique will continue to play a role in the Canada of the future. I cannot lend support to any move which I consider to be detrimental to any part of the fabric of Canadian heritage. I do not endorse change for its own sake. However, dynamic change which comes in the course of growth and development or the evolution of a nation cannot be impeded, any more than the day when we wanted to have our own flag. I believe one day Canada will have a day on which to celebrate its birth. We will be able to rise and say that this is our day, our birthday, that this is "Canada Day".

• (1732)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: The burgeoning of this nation from its origins to its current independence is an example of dynamic change. We have grown to a nation called Canada. I submit that the day on which we celebrate that growth should be called "Canada Day".

I endorse this bill 100 per cent. It should be considered for future debate and referred to the appropriate committee. We must have an opportunity for debate, input and contribution concerning the day which should be called our very own, that day being Canada Day.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to take part in this debate and I shall be very brief, but I would not have wanted to miss the opportunity to say a few words to congratulate the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on presenting this bill. I am in complete agreement with the hon. member who spoke before me and who said that ordinary members can have excellent ideas, and the fact that a Liberal member of parliament, who is also a parliamentary secretary, thought it appropriate to introduce during this hour set aside for private members' measures a bill which concerns the whole country. That deserves to be emphasized and encouraged. For my part, I must consider his bill in the context of the major public debate on national unity.

Mr. Speaker, since in certain areas of the country we are much more aware of the importance and the urgency of solving the problem of Canadian unity, I want to take this opportunity in this national forum to give my opinion on all the initiatives, whether they be symbols or bills, which aim at strengthening our sense of belonging to this beautiful and great country of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I support such initiatives. The fact of wanting to confirm the designation of Canada Day for July 1 instead of the name Dominion Day seems to me an initiative which aims precisely at strengthening our sense of belonging to Canada in the present context of Canadian unity problems.

In my opinion, the fact of being able once a year on July 1 to celebrate the day of a country called Canada reminds me of the importance of living in total harmony and also in strict equality among the two great founding peoples of this country, that is the French and the English. We have a very vast country where many cultures co-exist in what is commonly called multiculturalism, but two great peoples have contributed to build a society inspired on the one hand by French humanism and on the other hand by British parliamentarianism. This is a very rich heritage that we have been given by two great founding peoples whose languages are French and English, and in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the fact of celebrating each year a national holiday which would be called Canada Day could make us more aware of the wealth of this great country, not only on a material level, but in terms of its origins and of that need to consider the great importance once again of living not only in mutual respect for each other, Mr. Speaker, but also of living together in the strictest equality. And that is what justifies our role as members of parliament from Quebec here in Ottawa in trying to make this country a truly united country in that context. And when we have before us such a legislation to change the name of Dominion Day for Canada Day, we feel more at home, we feel more pride in being Canadians, we feel more authenticity, and we feel better prepared to live in harmony and on equal terms in this land of ours.

Mr. Speaker, I think we must not overdo traditions. There is a right balance to keep, and I always have had much respect for the saying In medio stat virtus, virtue stands between extremes, and I feel that traditions in certain instances, I imagine, have to be respected, but one has also to be realistic and try to present and support measures which make us live according to the reality. Yesterday is gone, Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is yet to come, the present is today. I suggest that we should forget the past somewhat more easily to avoid nostalgia, that we should not live too much in the future to avoid anxiety and that we should be practical and live in the present and in the reality.

And today, Mr. Speaker, when we just had federal-provincial conferences, whether on the constitution or the economy, and that we realize a tendency to hoard a bigger share of the pie, to monopolize, to be selfish, we realize, I think, the importance of having a Canadian government, a federal government, a central government really representative of our two great funding nations and strong enough to maintain unity at the constitutional level and to make sure that our two great linguistic communities will live together with equal opportunities and that, at the economic level, there will be a fair distribution of our wealth in all areas of the country.

I think that the recent federal-provincial conferences emphasized the need to have, first, a central government with a minimum of power to create that balance, to maintain it and to keep the country united. They also make us realize the need to avoid an over-decentralization which might cause some prejudice to the needy provinces like the maritimes and the province of Quebec.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, again I commend the hon. member for Vaudreuil who took the initiative to introduce Bill C-232 urging us to call Canada Day the July 1 holiday. I for one support his initiative and I hope that hon. members will make sure that his bill will be enacted as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with my colleagues on this side of the House in thanking the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for bringing this bill before us. I would like to address a few remarks to the subject of the bill before us today.

• (1742)

Before getting to the subject matter, I want to address myself to the remarks made by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis). I could hardly believe my ears when he suggested that because this matter was coming before the House at this time it was being taken lightly. I could not believe that this came from the same side of the House after hearing the catcalls, cries, demands and pleas from the other side that certain matters should be allowed to go forward, that they were important and should not be taken lightly by this House and talked out.

That side of the House has spoken about this government's not respecting the rights of individual members and has said that not just the government should be coming up with ideas, that all members of parliament should have the right to bring forward ideas and see them achieve fruition. They now suggest that we throw out that principle and that only the government should bring forward ideas at this time. I cannot believe this either, and I wonder what it is they really believe.

I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) suggested at one time that we should be giving credence to the committee system and that there should be a role for committees. I can understand why he would be seeking a greater role for committees because members of his party do not understand the committee system as it exists now. They believe that any subject matter that goes to committee is an indication that it is being taken lightly, and robbing hon. members of the opportunity of debate. My understanding of the committee system is that it gives hon. members an opportunity to debate.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil indicated that this matter is not something that was drawn up and put into the House yesterday. It has been before this House on many occasions and has even gone to committee before. It has been the subject of much debate. To say that it has been foisted upon us quickly, not affording an opportunity for debate or quiet contemplation, is a total misunderstanding and misconception of what has in fact taken place. This matter has come up before and it has been approved and disapproved of by members.

It is important that we understand some of the basic concepts behind this bill. Unfortunately there are Canadians who in the word "dominion" sense something more than sovereignty, that they are being subjugated, put under thumb or throttled. I would like to disabuse those people, along with the hon. member for Hastings, of the idea that the words "dominion" and "monarchy" are linked.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He didn't say that.

Mr. Daudlin: I agree that he did not use those words, but if there is to be any rationale at all for the concern he has when he raises the argument of the United Empire Loyalists, many of whom are in his riding, he must mistakenly conceive that to remove the word "dominion" somehow emasculates the monarchy. I do not understand how a person could arrive at that reasoning and at the same time say that that must be the kind of rationale behind the hon. member's argument about the United Empire Loyalists.

In my particular area of the country there are a number of people who trace their roots to the British Isles and the French-speaking countries of Europe, and they have a deep tie to the Queen and to the concept of the dominion of Canada. There are those, however, who have difficulty with change, but I find that most people are able to understand change and accept it. I find very few people who stand steadfast and resist change regardless of reason.

I challenge the hon. member for Hastings to go back to his riding and ask the youth there whether they see themselves as United Empire Loyalists. I suggest that the hon. member will find they do not, that they see themselves as Canadians. The youth in my riding, their parents, their grandparents—who, admittedly, link themselves to their origins more strongly than do the youth—the people of my generation and those after me have the idea that in fact they are Canadians and want to see the indicium of Canadianism. They want to see names like "Canada Day" instead of "Dominion Day". They want to be able to stand up, when they are abroad or indeed in other parts of Canada, and share with other Canadians and say "Canada Day! Canada is my country and yours."

What it takes, Mr. Speaker, is understanding on the part of those people who see subjugation in the word "dominion" and who see a strong attachment between the words "monarchy" and "dominion". Both I think are wrong. There are dissenting voices, and we heard one today from the other side. There is no doubt that there will be—

Mr. Nystrom: You're worse than he is.

Mr. Daudlin: I must be touching some soft spots because there is more noise coming from the other side. I must have awakened them. I regret that my time is being used like this because I have but a few moments to speak, and I assure hon. members that I intend not to go the full length of time. If they will allow me to complete my remarks they will be pleasantly surprised to see that the matter will proceed forward.

As I was saying, while there will no doubt be dissenting voices and while no doubt much will be made of it by a few, I perceive this bill as being a sensible piece of housekeeping that will bring the statutes up to date in order that reality be accurately portrayed therein. The hon. member is to be congratulated for his good sense, and while we in the past have been back and forth on this issue many times, unofficially we have been celebrating July 1 for many years now as Canada Day. Let us have the common sense to change the statute so that it can reflect the facts as they are.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I too rise in support of the bill introduced by my colleague because I believe that if we cannot find causes for the weak Canadian political situation in Quebec at this time, it is probably because we have not been able to identify with Canadian symbols. Take examples in history, for instance, when Quebeckers were calling themselves "Canayens" while the majority of English Canadians in other provinces were calling themselves "British subjects" or "British citizens". Quebeckers got tired of calling themselves "Canayens". They then called themselves French Canadians and now, to a certain point, feeling alone as Canadians, they decided that if no one else wanted to get in the boat, they would call themselves Quebeckers. Talk about Calixa Lavallée who decided to write the anthem "O Canada" in the beautiful riding of Louis-Hébert in Quebec—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dawson: —with words and music coming from Quebeckers. English Canadians continued to sing "God Save the Queen" or "God Save the King" when we, French Canadians—this has improved over the past several years—were the only ones at the time singing "O Canada", the others were singing "God Save the Queen" or "God Save the King", as I just said. Here is another example where Quebeckers not feeling part of a group decided that perhaps they are not in the right boat. Take the example of the flag, the famous debate on the flag in 1964 when once again, perhaps, I believe, a majority of members from Quebec, who were Liberal members to boot, and the Liberal caucus were fighting to have a Canadian flag so Quebeckers would be able to identify with something else than a fleur-de-lys, the fleur-de-lys which basically all Quebeckers respect but which was adopted in the 1950s only to fill a void because French Canadians could not face a flag called the Union Jack or the Red Ensign. They were looking for something Canadian. They were looking for something they could feel they belonged to. They could not find that feeling in a flag that for them was the flag of colonizers. They fought within Mr. Pearson's caucus, they fought within the government, so we would have a flag, and today all Canadians everywhere, with a few rare exceptions—

Some hon. Members: Everywhere. Everywhere.

Mr. Dawson: —in a few groups a bit too much on the extreme right, I think that all Canadians are proud of their flag—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dawson: —all Canadians rise with pride at the sight of their flag. For the same reasons, I believe that today the motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is something entirely natural. Why Dominion Day? That is going to frustrate monarchists who are afraid that the word Dominion, if it is taken out of the vocabulary, will mean that we are against the monarchy. I think it is not being against the monarchy to want to identify with Canada Day, it is not being against the monarchy, it is being realistic, identifying with something you belong to, and not something you belonged to in the past.

• (1752)

I would like to add another point, especially in view of the statements made by the hon. member of the opposition. I am surprised, after a year and a half in the House, to see that we are being blamed for introducing a bill which in effect encourages the "Canadianization" of our institutions. I think that Quebeckers would surely be astounded to be told that Canada Day is improper, that what we must have is a Dominion Day. The present political tension which exists in Quebec—and one need only look at the latest polls on sovereignty-association—and the fact that Quebeckers are wondering if they should continue to belong to this country are probably due to such acts and symbols, it is because of the failures of the past that Quebeckers, French Canadians can no longer believe in the future. It is indeed up to us, as a political party, as government, as militants, as members of a political force to try and identify ourselves as Canadians.

There are several other symbols, one could refer, for example, to this summer's famous debate on the patriation of the constitution. That is yet another symbol which for the past hundred years should have been the property of Quebeckers, of Canadians, but those who oppose changes and evolution have decided against the patriation of our constitution, saying: "Let us leave this famous document in England. After all, this is nothing but a piece of paper. We all know that the real power is in the hands of the Canadian parliament".

It is a fact that we are those who are governing, but as a symbol, it is very bad, because it gives the people the feeling that they belong to something for which they cannot find any reference point. Canadians of British descent or born in English-speaking countries may find there a certain relation, but we cannot expect the same from Quebeckers or other French-speaking Canadians. If we want to maintain unity among Canadians and develop a feeling of belonging within the limits of this political entity called Canada, we shall have to make sure that they identify more and more with purely Canadian symbols. We must look for these new symbols within our own institutions, and I suggest we could find some in this very hall which are historical memorabilia, for which we have a sort of attraction because they remind us of our roots. However, those who are in a position of power may sometimes give the impression of a lack of will on the part of Canadians to identify with their own geography and characteristics. Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I support the bill introduced by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert).

[English]

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add just a few words to this debate. I was touched by some allusions to what Canadians did in 1944. I remember some of the things that happened on June Beach in 1944.

I feel there has been a fair amount of emotional outpouring today which is sometimes worth while on subjects like this. It is always nice to think of our ancestors, whether they were United Empire Loyalists, whether they have been in the Annapolis Valley or Quebec for 300 years or more, or whether they arrived across the Aleutian Islands 25,000 years ago. They all became Canadians whether they came from central Europe in the last generation or, more recently, from Viet Nam.

I believe Canada Day is a more appropriate designation than Dominion Day which really has outworn itself. It refers to part of our history of which we are all proud but which has passed by. Canada Day embraces everyone who is a Canadian and is the name that should apply to the holiday on July 1. That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour provided for consideration of private members' business has now expired. Perhaps the House would permit us to go back into committee of the whole before the Chair calls it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

● (2002)

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I can see by the expression on the parliamentary secretary's face, that after a good meal he has now come back to the chamber ready to give us the information which I have been requesting. Perhaps in order to expedite this matter I could put my question again. Will the parliamentary secretary now give us the 1981 fiscal figures? In short, we have the refundable tax credit amount of $858 million for 1981. Would he tell us what the total expenditure would be for the family allowances in 1981? Specifically, how much will those family allowances go up compared to fiscal 1980?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I would be quite happy to repeat a series of figures that I gave to the hon. member a little earlier. As I indicated at the time, he could pencil them in on the table that he has. These figures that we have calculated for 1980-81 would correspond with the figures on his table for the fiscal year 1979-80. He has read out the first figure, the refundable tax credit, which moves from $810 million to $858 million. As I mentioned, I am putting these figures on the record for a second time today. He may not have heard me in the first instance.

The reduction in the family allowance figure moves from $690 million to $731 million. The offsetting figure from the lost income tax is $138 million, as compared to $130 million in 1979-80. The figure for the elimination of the $50 child tax credit remains at $260 million. The modification in the exemptions for 16 and 17-year old children moves to $50 million from $25 million, being the second year of the phase in process. Incidentally, these calculations are worked out assuming a rate of 6 per cent inflation and would vary depending on what assumptions one uses. This has the net effect of a $45 million benefit to the government in the second year.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, if we could take those individual figures, we could arrive at the point I am trying to reach.

When the parliamentary secretary says that expenditures will be down $731 million with respect to the family allowances, could he give us the basis on which he is figuring that? What is the total family allowance payment anticipated for fiscal 1980? As the parliamentary secretary knows, all that we have before us is by how much the figure is reduced. In order to arrive at the base, we need this information and then we can figure out the 6 per cent from there.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat hesitant to get into a dicussion regarding the total amount of family allowance payments on clause 2 of a bill that deals only with certain changes in the method of paying these benefits when we have indicated there is no over-all net effect. I am told by the officials that family allowance payments for the year 1980-81—I think that is the year we are talking about—would have been in the neighbourhood of $2.3 billion. This figure would now be in the neighbourhood of $1.6 billion, from which the $731 million flows.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I think we are making a little progress, I am pleased to say. I think part of the confusion that has arisen has been caused because the government is working backwards. They are telling us what they are saving. That may be the way the Liberals like to express things. Normally I think the other way. We know presumably what the government will anticipate spending in 1980. After there is a reduction of $690 million in fiscal 1980, could you tell me what you anticipate to be the family allowance pay-out in that year?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, again I defer to your ruling, but we are dealing with a clause in the bill that talks specifically about indexing the figures of $200 and $18,000. If you feel that it is in order for us to continue having a discussion on the over-all concept of family allowance payment, we can continue. The latest question which the hon. member for York-Simcoe is asking relates to the total family allowance payments for—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

● (2012)

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, yesterday I was talking about the effect this bill would have upon the status Indians. I am sure this question comes under clause 2 which we are presently discussing and that this is a suitable point at which to make my comments.

The Indian people of Canada have been given little time to review the implications of Bill C-10, not having been invited to comment on it until the meeting between the minister and the National Indian Brotherhood on November 14, 1978. In spite of the brief time for consultation among Indian people, there are a number of concerns about the bill that they would like to raise, as well as to offer two amendments to the bill that would help resolve these difficulties.

For many reasons, Indians in Canada historically and traditionally have not been and should not be part of the process of taxation of income. Freedom from taxation is one of the fundamental rights the original occupants of this land possessed, this being but a partial compensation for the land originally occupied by them. This relationship was and still is an understood condition of the treaties, and of the establishment of the reserve system. Parliament recognized tax exemption of Indians in the Indian Act itself.

In spite of these previous understandings, the Indian exemption status has been subjected to what appears to be a planned, progressive erosion by government forces. The government, through its Ministry of National Revenue and that ministry's departmental bureaucrats, has been using tax questions as a form of unjustified harassment of Indian people, both at the Indian organizational level and the individual level. This harassment is on the increase, and the department is expanding its attempts to collect income tax from Indians engaged in their traditional pursuits, especially trapping.

The Indian people of Canada have no choice, therefore, but to view Bill C-10 as yet another surreptitious attempt by government to establish a mechanism for taxation of Indian people on Indian lands, this time by arbitrarily indexing all Indian mothers into the tax system through mandatory acquisition of social insurance numbers and the filing of income tax returns prior to receiving the child tax credit.

Is it fair and just to ask the mothers of the most impoverished and disadvantaged group of this country to forgo the very much needed financial benefits offered by this bill in order to protect the Indian people from the bill's inbuilt potential for violation of their traditional and historical rights?

The National Indian Brotherhood has another great concern. The requirements for receiving the tax credit—those of acquiring a social insurance number and filing an income tax return—would prove quite complicated to many thousands of Indian mothers who have relatively negligible experience in matters of business and paperwork when compared to their non-Indian counterparts. I mentioned this in my remarks yesterday, Mr. Chairman. There is a strong likelihood that as a result of this requirement a significant number of Indian mothers will not receive the tax credit to which they are entitled.

Reports from departmental officials indicate that between 15 per cent to 25 per cent of pensioners eligible for the guaranteed income supplement do not receive it. We expect that the percentage of Indian mothers not receiving the child tax credit will be at least as high. Suppose that 20 per cent of the qualified mothers were not receiving child tax credit because the forms had not been completed or because they did not understand how to obtain it. A large sum is involved here. Twenty per cent of the $14 million which, we are told, would go to the status Indian mothers on reserves amounts to about $2.8 million.

The government has offered a small amount of assistance to Indian mothers as far as the paperwork is concerned, but the National Indian Brotherhood strongly feels that this will not be adequate to ensure that the tax credit will be distributed as planned.

[Mr. Smith (Churchill).]

A further concern is that the payment of the credit in one lump sum annually will likely lead to unwise spending of the money by families unused to handling such large amounts at one time. We discussed this yesterday. I brought up this question of the lump sum payment to Indian mothers and pointed out the difficulty they would experience in cashing these cheques. Further, it might not be easy for the mothers concerned to understand that, because of the $8 increase in family allowance per child and the nature of the lump sum payment, they would have to distribute it over a seven or eight month period. If this is not well understood, perhaps the money will be spent unwisely. I am glad to have this opinion confirmed by the National Indian Brotherhood. Unwise use of this money by people unused to receiving money in lump sums could have harmful consequences, including even family breakdown.

The National Indian Brotherhood suggests that the department should be considering putting out a special form distinct from the income tax return form and devised especially for use by status Indian mothers. They suggest that this form be considered complete with the use of the mother's band number, and that a social insurance number should not be required. It is well known that all status Indians have a number. They keep this number from birth until death and they refer to it frequently. I cannot understand why Indian mothers should be required to have a social insurance number in order to qualify for the child tax credit. Status Indians living on reserves do not have to pay income tax. I ask the minister to pay particular attention to this request.

The second suggestion the National Indian Brotherhood made is that the child tax credit be paid in quarterly instalments rather than in a single annual payment at the option of the mother.

● (2022)

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that clause 2 refers to indexing, and the statement he has been making does not.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I mentioned indexing as I was going through this, and I thought this pertained to this clause. I will just finish up and then sit down. I will refer to this again when we come to the appropriate clause, if the Chair feels that way. The National Indian Brotherhood concludes as follows:

> That payment of the child tax credit in quarterly instalments, rather than in a single annual payment, be allowed at the option of the mother, and that this option be allowed for the year 1979.

Yesterday the minister gave us a run-down of the various forms mothers will have to fill out merely to qualify for this child tax credit. If she would consider quarterly payments to mothers who opt to have quarterly payments, a part could be added to one of the many forms mothers will have to fill out so that they could indicate whether they want quarterly payments.

I will finish my remarks, Mr. Chairman, when we get to the appropriate clause, if you will alert me.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, in future discussion on this clause I hope it will be possible for us to direct our attention to the provisions of the clause, bearing in mind that there has been a great deal of discussion in the committee on clause 1, which is the clause under which general discussions of this nature are more appropriate.

The Deputy Chairman: I suggest to all hon. members that we should get back to clause 2, which refers to indexing.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance says that we should get back to the bill and that we had lots of time to make statements like this when we were considering clause 1. There has been so little consultation with the people this measure will affect that they are only now beginning to understand what this bill means. Much information is now coming to us, and we feel we should put it on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: I suggest to the hon. member for Churchill that third reading is coming up and that he can participate in all the discussions he wants to at that time.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order with respect to your ruling. Of course, I am not going to challenge it, but the fact of the matter is that the hon. member for Churchill has just put on the record a communication which came to him subsequent to the second reading stage of this bill. That communication has to do with one of the subjects dealt with in clause 2, namely, the indexing of the $200 credit.

What the hon. member has asked on behalf of the National Indian Brotherhood is whether the government is prepared to consider making the payments on a quarterly basis. The minister cannot ignore the question; it has to be dealt with. If we are going to be treated this way, hon. members opposite will get themselves a filibuster. I say to the minister that the hon. member for Churchill has raised a very important matter on behalf of the National Indian Brotherhood. This is the only time he can do so. With respect, he cannot raise it on third reading because that stage does not allow for the kind of detailed discussion this matter would entail. The third reading stage does not allow for questions and answers.

The hon. member has laid the very serious reservations expressed by the National Indian Brotherhood on the record of this committee. He has framed a very legitimate question to the minister, namely, given the potential socialogical consequences of this lump sum payment to native peoples, is the government prepared to consider paying it out on a quarterly basis? That is a simple, straightforward but serious question. The hon. member is entitled to an answer.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, to use an English expression, I am in your hands, but clause 8 would be the proper clause under which we should be discussing instalments.

With regard to the form prescribed for the transmittal of this credit, that should be dealt with under clause 4. I do not know what to do. I could very easily answer, provided this game will not be played when we are dealing with clauses 4 and 8. I answered this very question last night. It was answered in October and early in November. I am sorry that I do not have researchers with me to refer me to the pages of Hansard where the answer is very clearly set out.

Our tax machinery is being used for this purpose for the first time. The tax system has never sent payments to people except for income tax refunds. Those refunds are made once a year. For the first year of operation of this program there is no way we can arrange for several instalments. There will be one lump sum payment. If the hon. member persists in using Indian mothers in this way, at some point people in this House who are close to children and family budgeting will tell him that Indian mothers are like other mothers. They know how to operate their family budgets. I do not know what the hon. member is suggesting. At one point last night he made a Freudian slip: he spoke of illegitimate children. I did not like that at all.

Mr. McGrath: You are out to lunch.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Foul ball.

Miss Bégin: I do not want to go on like this.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, the minister has her head in the sand. The National Indian Brotherhood, which represents Indian people, brought this to my attention today, November 30, at 3.15, because the minister did not have the courtesy to meet with the National Indian Brotherhood until November 14, after this bill was already in committee of the whole.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, again this has nothing to do with this clause; clearly it should be discussed when we are dealing with clause 4. Perhaps the hon. member did not hear me last night or did not understand me. He can check Hansard, but I told him that yesterday at lunch time that I suggested to the National Indian Brotherhood we should explore this. I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to do that. That is confirmed by letter. There is a possibility that officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will help Indian mothers with the paperwork. Did I not say that last night? Did the hon. member not listen? Did he not read Hansard? I said that. We think it is very important to help all mothers overcome the paper burden which, unfortunately, big governments sometimes impose. I said that before and we are looking into it.

It is important to arrive at solutions and to make the system as simple as possible. Surely we should not create barriers for mothers who will need this money. One barrier is wasting the time of the House, not passing this bill and therefore stopping us from preparing these forms and working with groups for the best possible implementation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Boulanger: Not him again. Don't be too long.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend opposite wants to ask a question, I am prepared to let him.

Mr. Boulanger: That is very nice of the hon. member. I appreciate that, but I was getting up on a point of order. In any event, I thank the hon. member. At least once he has remembered to be a gentleman toward me. I appreciate that.

My point of order, Mr. Chairman, is that twice you have said that we should stick to clause 2. The hon. member for Churchill rose on a point of order which turned out to be a question to the minister. Now the debate begins again. If hon. members in the official opposition have made up their minds to filibuster, they should at least respect the authority of the Chair and the rules. I think hon. members opposite are playing a game, and that is very wrong.

Mr. Stevens: I know we do not have to tell you again, Mr. Chairman: we are dead on clause 2. We are dealing with indexing of the $200 tax credit. What I am trying to establish with the parliamentary secretary—and this is the important thing—is what will be the net impact in 1981, 1982 and 1983 of the indexing on family allowance increases. As you know, Mr. Chairman, we must relate this to clause 10 because the two clauses are joined together. In clause 10 the indexing which otherwise would have applied to the $20 family allowance payment is reduced. The last time I questioned the parliamentary secretary, when my time ran out, I think he was just about to give me that information. My question is: What will the budget pay-out for family allowances be in 1980, after the $690 million will have been saved as a result of the reduction in clause 10?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, once again I say that I do not think we should be discussing total family allowance pay-outs in relation to this bill because, as I said before for the record, the net effect of this bill on the total cost of the family allowances program is virtually nil. As we have pointed out, in the first year it will save the Treasury $35 million. We have given figures to the hon. member for York-Simcoe indicating that in the second year we would save $45 million, and the amounts would be of a similar nature in the following years. So it is not clear to me why we are continuing to talk about the total cost of the family allowance program. I did give the hon. member for York-Simcoe a figure for 1981; now he is coming back to 1980. I am not sure whether or not we have that figure.

Mr. Boulanger: It does not matter. He does not need it.

Mr. Martin: We do not have it at the moment. I suggest that it is simply not related to this clause.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order—

[Mr. Stevens.]

The Deputy Chairman: We are not on a point of order.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, you know I was chairman before. It is very easy to see that the hon. member does not wish to respect your ruling. If you do not show that you are running the House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boulanger: —he will show no respect for your ruling.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Nielsen: Maybe the hon. member opposite should run a school.

Mr. Stevens: Certainly it is not my wish to delay this committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: I mean that, Mr. Chairman, but I think we are entitled to certain information. Frankly, if you check what the parliamentary secretary said in reply to me in his last answer, you will find it is still pretty incomprehensible. He is saying that the government cannot tell us what will be the fiscal 1980 pay-out for family allowances, notwithstanding the fact they can tell us by how much it has been reduced. That cannot be so; they must have a gross figure. They subtracted $690 million and that amount gives us the figure they anticipate to be the amount paid out in family allowances in 1980.

To show that I have no desire to belabour this point if I can get the facts, may I ask whether we could possibly stand clause 2 and go on to some of the other clauses. If the parliamentary secretary is upset that I should be asking about family allowances under clause 2, then let us stand clause 2 and we will deal with clause 2 and 10 at the same time. If that suits his neat little mind a little better, it is fine with me. But I emphasize again that even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre understood the first time around about what I was getting at, and if he can understand it I do not see why the parliamentary secretary, supported by a minister and three officials, still cannot understand my elementary question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What does that make me?

Miss Bégin: He is slow, but he will understand.

Mr. Martin: I do not see any rational for standing clause 2. I think we have answered all reasonable questions quite adequately. As a matter of fact, some of the answers are on the record at least 12 times.

Mr. Nielsen: Not this one.

Mr. Martin: I gave the hon. member a figure a little while ago for family allowances for one year which indicated how the $731 million was arrived at. It seems to me that he has this table, he has figures for each of the two years, 1979-80 and 1980-81, which indicate the net savings of the various aspects associated with this problem and which support the contention made over and over again by the Minister of Finance, by myself and by others in this committee, that the net cost of the program will not cost the taxpayers of Canada any additional amount.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, let me put this into perspective. This is literally what has happened. In response to my question about fiscal 1980-81 we were told, first, that the net reduction in family allowance was $731 million. That was established. We were also told that the gross amount was $2.3 billion, and that leaves a net amount of $1.6 billion for 1981. The parliamentary secretary is agreeing with me. They gave me the figures for which I was looking. Now I ask: Would you please give me those figures for 1980, and I am being refused. That does not make sense. I will bring out later why I think I am being refused these figures. I ask the parliamentary secretary again: Can he furnish us with the 1980 figure comparable to the 1981 figure he gave me?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, we did give the hon. member for York-Simcoe the figure he wanted for 1980-81 because he was looking for some support for a previous figure, for the $731 million. There is no reason why we should put ourselves in the position of having to give supporting schedules for each of the figures which have been tabled during the course of the discussion in this committee. That is why I am resisting at present going into the background of these various figures. The figures are there and they speak for themselves.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, perhaps this will put it into perspective. What the parliamentary secretary is trying to get away with is similar to a woman who goes into a store, buys a fur coat, comes home and tells her husband that she saved him $2,000 because, although she spent $2,000, there was another coat there for $4,000.

Some hon. Members: Sexist.

Miss Bégin: Why can't you talk about a man? Do you agree with that garbage, Flora?

An hon. Member: Male chauvinist pig.

Mr. Stevens: I think it is fundamental for us, in continuing to study this bill, to get this figure, and I am surprised at the resistance we are encountering. I realize this is embarrassing to the government. They will finally have to admit that there will be a widening deficit, but I think members of parliament are entitled to hear those facts before getting on with this bill.

In view of the frustration we are experiencing, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

An hon. Member: This motion is not debatable.

Some hon. Members: Question.

• (2042)

Motion (Mr. Stevens) negatived: Yeas, 14; nays, 27.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I will try again with the parliamentary secretary. Can he explain why they will not give us the figures for fiscal 1980 respecting the total family allowances pay-out expected in that year, bearing in mind that they were set out in gross terms in the budget presented on November 16? Why can those figures not be given to the committee tonight?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, it is really not part of the bill under discussion to come up with the total amount of family allowance payments. A lot of factors go into that calculation, including the rate of inflation.

Mr. Stevens: I am asking for the 1980 figures.

Mr. Martin: One could take into account various rates of inflation and come up with various numbers.

An hon. Member: Give us the numbers.

Mr. Martin: There is no relationship between the request being made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe and the specifics of clause 2.

Mr. Stevens: Is the parliamentary secretary serious in what he is saying? How was he able to give the figures for 1981? Why are the figures for 1981 clearer to him than those for 1980?

Mr. Martin: When I gave the figures to the hon. member for York-Simcoe, I indicated to him that the officials were attempting to meet some of his numerous requests which were unrelated to the clause under consideration. In attempting to do this, they came up with a quick calculation of what the family allowance pay-out would be in 1981, making a certain assumption as to the rate of inflation. Those figures can be varied, depending on whatever rate of inflation one wishes to use. In this particular case, I think they used an inflation rate of 4 per cent.

Mr. Stevens: Hopefully we are reaching a point where we will receive this information.

Miss Bégin: What does the hon. member want?

Mr. Stevens: Presumably the 4 per cent inflation rate can be taken off in order to arrive at the base figure for 1980. Can he tell us what base was used for 1980?

Mr. Martin: There is an assumed growth in the payments of 4 per cent. The officials do not have the 1980 payments with them at the present time. Once again, those figures are not related to the particular clause under discussion. I do not intend to put any further hypothetical figures on the record without substantiating them or having the officials do a very careful calculation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the mystery grows. Why is it hypothetical to talk about 1980 when presumably it was not hypothetical to give the figures for 1981? A 4 per cent inflation figure was used by the parliamentary secretary. I would ask him to check the record in this regard. Before dinner we were told that a 6 per cent inflation factor was used; now we are told that it was a 4 per cent inflation factor. Be that as it may, I do not understand how officials can come to the point of giving us apparently non-hypothetical projection forecasts for 1981, yet when we ask for the base for 1980, they say that is hypothetical and cannot be given. Can the parliamentary secretary explain this?

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for York-Simcoe has given as very good explanation why we should not put any more figures on the record which do not basically relate to clause 2. As soon as we attempt to come up with a quick or rough calculation, it is used by the hon. member as a substantive figure from which he can move forward and say, "All right, given that, what is the next figure", and on and on we go.

Basically these figures are not related to clause 2. They were read into the record in an attempt to help the hon. member get to the bottom of his question. I believe he is having trouble comprehending his own question, as he carries on with the rhetoric. The figures we gave him were examples containing very many assumptions. The 1981 figures referring to the costs and savings in the new program were based on a 6 per cent inflation rate, with an assumption that all other factors would remain the same.

Mr. Stevens: Was it 6 per cent or 4 per cent?

Mr. Martin: There were very many assumptions. Basically the hon. member has given his own explanation why I am very reluctant to place any more background figures on the record. It is because he will turn them around to serve his own purposes.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am not using these figures to serve my own purposes. I am attempting to serve the House and the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: We have received a budget for fiscal 1980. Surely the parliamentary secretary has not forgotten that. It came in just two weeks ago. It included estimates for expenditures for 1980 and also figures for 1979. An estimate had to be included in those expenditures as to how much the family allowance payments would be in fiscal 1980. We are in the ludicrous position where his officials, on some basis, tell us what 1981 will look like, and when I request the assumption for 1980 in order to perform my own calculation, I am told that those figures are hypothetical and that I cannot have them.

The parliamentary secretary has refused my request once. In all fairness, and in view of the type of confusion we are facing, can he not agree to stand clause 2? If he likes, I can speak with one of his officials in an attempt to explain exactly what I want. If we can save half an hour, so much the better. There is no mystery about what I am asking. I do not want to prolong the debate in committee, but the committee is entitled to the information. I cannot understand why it is not forthcoming. Can we stand clause 2?

Miss Bégin: No.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I am not agreeable to standing clause 2. The information the hon. member for York-Simcoe is seeking is not directly related to the clause at hand. There are various computations, calculations and figures which could be produced. I am sure that if the hon. member had the opportunity, he would ask for each one of them individually. That would assist him in further prolonging the passage of Bill C-10. We have given him some background information additional to the table submitted earlier in this debate. I do not see any reasonable purpose being served at this time by furnishing additional background information which is unrelated to the particular clause at hand.

• (2052)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary keeps referring to the fact that I am not relating my remarks to clause 2. I suggest they could not be more clearly related to that clause. Clause 2 deals with indexing of the tax credit amounting to $200. We had it established that in the fiscal year 1980 it is estimated this will mean a diversion of revenue in the amount of $810 million. The parliamentary secretary gave us a figure for 1981 based on a 6 per cent inflation rate. He said he thought it would then be $858 million. What I am trying to determine is whether in fact that is going to be the scenario in which we have a widening—or dropping, if you like—of revenue to the extent of that $200 indexed and, on the family allowance side, an increase in expenditure to the extent it is indexed. If that is so I would like the figures, and my point is as simple as that.

Let me come back to this point and perhaps I can accomplish what I am after in this way. As the parliamentary secretary will recall, during a previous occasion he gave me the schedule showing how he arrived at a net benefit of $35 million or, as he has said, a self-financing mechanism which occurs between the tax credit and the family allowance. Included in that schedule, and it is now a part of Hansard, was reference to the reduction in family allowance of $690 million. Can the parliamentary secretary tell me what the gross figure was that they used to arrive at that reduction of $690 million?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, what I think is very important and what is at stake here is a bill creating a new child tax credit using several sources of funds; a reduction in family allowances this year and the freezing of the indexation of family allowances for this year as well. We gave members the figures for both 1979-80 and 1980-81 in respect of the refundable tax credit, the reduction in family allowance, the elimination of the current $50 child exemption and so on. That is a modification of the fiscal exemption for 16 and 17-year olds.

We gave all those tables, and this afternoon they were given again at great length. We concluded from those that in the fiscal year 1979-80 the government will be, if I may use the expression, saving $35 million on a 6 per cent inflation assumption. Next year there will be a saving of $45 million based on the same assumption. I explained, as did the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Finance, my co-sponsor of the bill, when he was in the House, that the concept of the refundable child tax credit was based on a self-financing proposal which is slightly in favour of the public purse in the sense that there is a small savings now.

I think the hon. member was very sexist and very stupid in using the example a few minutes ago of the woman going to buy a fur coat. We can see the kind of people he goes with. There are no fur coats in my riding. I want to remind him that the very easy and bad imagery he is spreading around I do not think is shared at all by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Miss MacDonald: Don't worry; I don't agree with what you are saying either.

Miss Bégin: I think that by using this imagery he is making a profound mistake. This afternoon he was in the Grand Canyon using other imagery which misleads the public. He is assuming, which is the mistake behind all his apparently learned calculations, that if we were not today putting to this House clause 2 relating to the child tax credit we would be cancelling family allowances. He is making an obvious mistake.

The public finance of this country functions on forecasts. He regrets that we do not have the exact mechanism the Americans use, which is a five-year plan. That is another question which has nothing to do with this bill. It is a theory of public financing. He regrets that our forecast is different. We still operate on forecasts, and in next year's budget and the budgets of years after, family allowances of today with full indexation at a rate higher than $20 were forecast. When I came in with the proposal, which the Minister of Finance endorsed, regarding the creation of a new child tax credit the total arithmetic in this proposal was offset against future forecasts of what the total bill for the children of Canada would have been. Because of the nature of the proposal it has to be self-financing. He has not gotten that into his head yet, but I think it is pretty obvious.

We gave details and more details to prove that. He wants to make us look stupid by saying that by proposing a new credit we are increasing the expenditures of the country. He has forgotten that today on the statute books there is family allowances legislation which would cost much more than the plan of today, the indexed one. There is a child tax credit of $50 in the tax system for upper middle class and wealthy people which is worth a lot of money. That provision is on the books today and has not yet been cancelled. It is, therefore, included in public finance forecasts.

The hon. member does not want to accept that. He wants to suggest that we are going to bring the country to bankruptcy. This is a profound mistake and I do not think we should continue to play the game he wants to drag us into. We have given all the facts and figures for the two coming fiscal years showing, based on an assumption—and we gave him the points of reference—the order of magnitude of the proposal, what it is all about, with all of its components. I think that should satisfy more than reasonably his need to understand clause 2.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, my question to the hon. minister, who we know is a very bright minister, is a very simple one. She has referred to some figures including a reduction in family allowances of $690 million for the fiscal year 1980. Will she please tell us what the gross figure was from which that $690 million was subtracted?

Mr. Nielsen: "We haven't got it."

Mr. Martin: No, I did not say that. As the minister has indicated, we have indeed co-operated far beyond what really would be required by reasonable people in terms of answering questions on clause 2 of this bill. However, to show how co-operative we are attempting to be in trying to get this bill passed for the benefit of Canadians who are going to receive some money as a result of this bill, as opposed to members of the official opposition who seem to be doing all they can to retard the passage of the bill and slow down the effectiveness of this new benefit program, let me say that in 1979-80 the old system would have produced an amount of $2.4 billion in total payments. The new system will produce a figure of $1.71 billion.

At this time I would again go back to the fact that those figures are being drawn out specifically to serve the requests of the hon. member for York-Simcoe and are fast calculations made by the officials.

Let me refer back to the 1980-81 figure I gave the hon. member earlier. I think I mentioned that it was based on a 4 per cent rate. Here is a figure worked out on a 6 per cent rate. At 6 per cent for that same year, instead of being 2.3 million and 1.6 million, the earlier figures I gave him based on 4 per cent, it would be 2.45 million and 1.81 million, again producing a difference of $730 million.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting back here minding my own business and not paying a great deal of attention, because my family are all beyond the family allowance limit. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has spent a great deal of time evading a very simple question and now he magnanimously tells my colleague what are the figures after trying to hide them for three hours.

I want to go back to a comment made by the Minister of Health and Welfare a few moments ago. She pontificated, called the hon. member for York-Simcoe a sexist so-and-so, and that sort of thing. The implication of giving parables has been around for almost 2,000 years, and sometimes making a parable is a way of getting a message across, but I wonder if I heard the minister correctly. Did she say in her remarks that if we do not go along with her proposals she would cancel the entire family allowances plan? That is what I heard her say, and I am anxious to know whether or not she actually meant it.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I knew that I was the female Jean Chrétien with my bad English, but I did not think that it was that bad. Nobody has said that, and I think the hon. member has been imagining things. I see that he is also signing his Christmas cards as he is sitting there, so perhaps he did not listen carefully enough.

I am the minister in charge of family allowances. I am not interested in cancelling them at all. That is the interest of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. I see that the hon. member for Hastings is signing his Christmas cards again. He will not understand the answer if he does not listen and will be up again five minutes from now. The hon. member for York-Simcoe, who just asked the hon. member for Hastings to buy some time for him, does not understand this clause very well. He would like the public to believe that this child tax credit is a new expenditure and would not have existed were it not for Bill C-10. I can tell him that identical expenditures would have been brought in through the actual fiscal exemptions for some children and the actual rate of the family allowances.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to hear the minister say that she in fact did not mean that she would withdraw the family allowance.

An hon. Member: She didn't say it either.

Mr. Ellis: The little seals over there are starting to make a lot of noise, but it does not bother me at all. I will take a quick look tomorrow morning at Hansard. Certainly the inference was, as far as I am concerned, that if this bill did not go through she was interested in perhaps cancelling the family allowances plan.

An hon. Member: Get serious.

Mr. Ellis: I have all night. I thank the minister for her reply. She is bound to make slams at any member who stands up and speaks, no matter where they come from, whether Churchill or York-Simcoe. I am quite capable of signing this material in front of me and paying full attention to the minister. It does not take that much attention.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, it would be wise for the committee in a very sober sense to realize what has happened here tonight. We are told—and it is on the record in Hansard—that the 1981 figure is $2.3 billion and that after the reduction and certain allowances it will be $1.6 billion. After my pressing to find out exactly what figures they are using for 1980, we finally got it established that the figures were to be $2.4 billion and $1.71 billion. That is the gross figure less the $690 million.

Before I had a chance to ask for an explanation as to why the 1981 figures were actually lower than the 1980 figures, I think they realized that they had bombed on the 1981 figures and they quickly gave us the revised 1981 figures which are $2,540 million gross and $1,810 million net. These figures are significant because they substantiate the point I was trying to make earlier, that expenditures on family allowances according to their own figures based on 1980 will go up $100 million. If the parliamentary secretary disagrees with that, I would like to hear his comments.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York-Simcoe has made a mathematical calculation that is quite accurate; 6 per cent of $2.4 billion is approximately $100 million.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, will the parliamentary secretary also be as frank about telling us that the revenue loss between 1980 and 1981 will be $48 million as compared to the base year 1980? Is that not correct?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, again using 6 per cent calculation figures, the hon. member for York-Simcoe has done a correct mathematical calculation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary agrees when I use 6 per cent, but it is 9 per cent that we should be using. That is the indexing figure for September 30, 1978, and the indexing figure that will be used for income tax purposes. I hope all hon. members will realize when the government suggests that this is a self-financing mechanism that they are overlooking the fact that it is self-financing in the base year 1980 only. From that year on the expenditure will go up, on the one hand, as we have said, using the figure of 6 per cent, by $100 million. On the other hand, on the revenue loss side, again using the 6 per cent figure we will have a loss of $48 million.

If we project that ahead to 1984—and I will not delay the committee to do it—we can see the colossal deficit that will fall in between those two lines. What is so serious about this misrepresentation is that the parliamentary secretary and the minister are using mirrors and trying to confuse us by saying that the figure could have gone up or could have gone down by x amount, so they subtract that, and then they net out the two subtractions, ending up with this figure that they talk about.

The point that I am trying to make is that the only year where they can gain an advantage in the family allowance write-off is in the base year. From then on, if they index both ways their expenditures will go up and their revenues will go down. I hope before we deal fully with this bill that all hon. members will realize this.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I cannot believe what I am hearing from the hon. member, who is the official financial critic as for the official opposition. Presumably people look upon him some day—many years hence, and I doubt it will ever happen—being minister of finance.

An hon. Member: No, it will be de Cotret.

Mr. Martin: I do not know how to explain the situation any more simply. We have two figures. Going back to his 1979-80 figures, the two main figures are $810 million, and $690 million on the other side. If the indexing rate goes up, both those figures go up, not just one. Using his own figures, the $240 annual payment for one child will grow by $21.60 in the following year at the present rate. That is on the outgoing side. On the saving side, as a result of the lower base, those payments would have gone up by $30 from a level of $336. As indexing goes on year by year, we are bringing in additional funds as well as paying out additional funds.

I am sure the hon. member for York-Simcoe understands that. I could not conceive that he would seriously hold himself out as the official finance critic of the official opposition if he did not understand that there are two sides to this matter.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, after over an hour I have the figures established. I think we have demonstrated that, contrary to the rather unfair presentation the government has been trying to get away with, in fact the family allowances expenditure will go up from the base year. The parliamentary secretary agrees that it is about $100 million even at a 6 per cent index rate. Revenues will fall by $48 million, again based on a 6 per cent indexation, which is well below the 9 per cent the government has used as far as income tax figures are concerned.

Before we vote on the bill I hope that all hon. members project ahead on the basis of the figures now in Hansard to see what the impact will be as far as future budgetary deficits are concerned. That is, if the bill passes in its present form. The time is long past when we should accept ministers of finance coming in after the event and telling us they miscalculated, or whatever reason they like to state, and that we now have a billion dollar deficit. The government has stumbled us into a $25 billion deficit for the coming year and they are now putting into position a widening deficit by this plan.

The final question I should like to put to the parliamentary secretary concerns clause 2 which refers to subsection 117.1(1) of the act and suggests adding a subsection (b), which in part reads as follows:

—the consumer price index for the 12-month period that ended on the 30th day of September next before that year bears to the consumer price index for the 12-month period that ended on the 30th day of September, 1977.

As the parliamentary secretary knows, the basis of the CPI has been changed and this month we got new figures. May I ask him if he has some assurance from Statistics Canada that they will furnish comparable figures to allow the base to be taken as September, 1977. Because as I understand it, the comparable figures will not be forthcoming on a month by month basis.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member would not want me to leave one comment on the record without responding to it. We have pointed out that it is not the case that this particular bill is going to have any net effect on over-all government expenditures and widening the deficit, as he has continually attempted to suggest. That is not the case. As a result of passage of this bill, there will be a net saving to the over-all cost of the family allowances program in the first year of $35 million, and in the second year of some $45 million.

On the specifics of his question, the inflation rate to apply for next year was indicated in the budget; it will be 9 per cent. I believe subparagraph (b) gives the Minister of Finance discretion to establish the appropriate CPI applicable in subsequent years.

Mr. Stevens: This could go on all night, Mr. Chairman. One thing I want clearly understood is that the parliamentary secretary's interpretation of the effect of the bill in 1981 and ensuing years is totally wrong. I have taken the pains to try to demonstrate that, from their base year of 1980, in the first year there was going to be an expenditure of $100 million and a loss of $48 million. I hope that will clear up the record for most members, if not for the parliamentary secretary.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Amount deemed paid in prescribed manner.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I listened to much of the debate today with a great deal of interest and watched the minister act indignant from time to time as she threw out charges and countercharges. I have a particular interest in this clause. Of all the things that upset me about this bill, nothing upsets me more than the sexist language in which this clause is written. I am absolutely aghast at the minister saying she is the co-sponsor of a bill written in language such as this.

Let me just read one or two phrases from clause 4 into the record. Dealing with definitions, when talking about family income subclause (2)(b) reads as follows:

"income of the individual's family" for a taxation year means the aggregate of all amounts each of which is

(i) the income for the year of the individual, and

(ii) the income for the year of his spouse while married, if the individual resided with his spouse at the end of December of the year.

I will come back to this later in discussing the whole clause. In the phrase "income for the year of the individual", for the word "individual" read "male". And in the second part where it says "income for the year of his spouse", it does not even specify the "other" spouse—not anything of that nature. The minister then gets up and puts on a great sham show of sexist charges. There was a time in this House when the former member for Vancouver-Kingsway would have raised the subject time and again on behalf of the party to my left, but I am not at all sure where that party stands on questions of this nature any more.

• (2122)

This clause embodies not just a repugnant kind of language written, into a bill of this importance, but also, and even more significant, there is a basic philosophical difference here. Certainly there seems to be between the minister and myself. That basic philosophical difference is embodied in very clear language. The difference between the minister and myself, in the interpretation of this clause and in the general approach of this bill is the way in which she views the rights and responsibilities of women as individuals and the way I view them.

I am sorry that the minister has not been able to see the point I have been trying to make over and over again during the course of the debate on this bill. Income of women cannot be looked upon as appendages to their husbands' income, any more than they can be looked upon as appendages to their husbands. They are individuals in their own right. That is the way any kind of a change to the tax system should be discussed.

I raise this point because I am extremely concerned as to the way in which the government has been looking at the role of Canadian women in society over the last few months. I am concerned because I see a pattern emerging. This pattern is here again in this clause where the Minister of Finance makes the statement that women are taking jobs away from men. By insinuation he implies that women going into the labour force and increasing their participation in it are the cause of mounting unemployment.

An hon. Member: He said he has nothing against that.

Miss MacDonald: If he has nothing against that, why does he not stop saying it?

Bill C-14 is now being discussed in committee, and the adverse impact of that bill will fall heavier on women than it will on men. We have had group after group come before us who have made that point. We have seen this kind of legislation recently with the changes to the spouse's allowance and in the niggardly approach the minister took toward elderly women.

As I say, this seems to be a pattern that is emerging, and it is seen more clearly than ever as set out in this particular clause. Embodied in this clause is the principle of family income. It is a new principle as far as the Income Tax Act is concerned. The principle of family income has not been written into the Income Tax Act before. It is the first time a provision is being put into the Income Tax Act based on the joint income of spouses.

The minister refuses to acknowledge any connection between the joint income provision in this bill and the principle of joint filing. She has discounted it on a number of occasions. Whether there is a single sheet of paper on which both incomes are added together or whether there is a joint, complex tax form is quite beside the point. It is important to point out that the filing unit for the purpose of the child tax credit is the husband and wife, if both are working. This is very clearly stated in this clause.

I refer the minister to a document that was put out by the Minister of Finance on November 16, the night of the budget. This is a document which dealt with filing units. The document is called "Integration of Social Program Payments into the Income Tax System". In this booklet the Minister of Finance deals with four options of filing units for the purposes of the income-tested refundable tax credits. The four options include (1) the individual; (2) the primary earner—this is the spouse with the higher income; (3) the primary earner plus spouse; and (4) the family, including children. This clause that the minister has before us clearly uses the third option that the Minister of Finance presented in his integration of social program payments into the income tax system. In this document the minister speaks about this particular option; that is, the primary earner plus spouse; the husband plus the secondary earner, which is the wife. At page 14 of this document he says:

> However, a move to any type of "joint filing" for purposes of the Income Tax Act would be very significant, both conceptually and in terms of administrative complexity.

The Minister of Finance recognizes that there is a connection between the two. He considers it very significant. At page 19 of this document, under the heading "Family-Based Benefit and Income-Testing", the statement appears:

> Since supplementation is intended to assist low-income families, it would be appropriate to adopt a filing unit which included both spouses. . . . As noted under general features, any move to "joint" or "family" filing for purposes of calculating a tax credit would involve major changes to the present tax system.

That is the point I want to underline, that the Minister of Finance said it would involve major changes to the present tax system. However, the Minister of National Health and Welfare when she was responding to me earlier in this debate passed it off as having very little meaning whatsoever. I was glad to read that the Minister of Finance recognized that the introduction of the concept of family income into the Income Tax Act is a very major step. On the other hand, the Minister of National Health and Welfare denies there is anything new in the family income provision. It is just the same old thing, she said; all the other programs are based on it.

This is the first time it is built into the income tax provisions. That is what is new. That is what is different, and that is what is major about it. I ask the minister, does she disagree with the Minister of Finance on the significance of this step that is being taken in introducing the family income provision into the Income Tax Act? Does she agree with him that it is a major step or doesn't she? The other night she dismissed it and said that it was already in practice. I would like to ask her as well if she disagrees—and I quote the Minister of Finance—if this step comes under any move to joint or family filing for purposes of calculating a tax credit. The other night the minister dismissed that as well. I hope that she will not answer as she did the other night, when she said that the income tax form used is "just a slip of paper".

I have attempted previously to express to the minister my concern about the concept of family income based, as it is in this bill, on marital status. I have expressed my concern that it is a regressive step to put such a principle in the Income Tax Act at a time when the human rights commissioner is looking into all legislation, but especially if he is looking into the Income Tax Act for discriminatory clauses. This is also a time when society is in transition, a time when a more complex analysis of household units and income would make much better sense.

I have raised this matter, as the minister knows, on several occasions. The family income provision in this bill is discriminatory since it is based on the marital status of the individuals concerned. I have read the particular portion of this clause which sets this out clearly. The commissioner of human rights has written to the Minister of Finance expressing his concern about assessing family income as a basis for taxation and social policy. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance could tell me whether the Minister of Finance has responded to the concern shown by the human rights commissioner. The commissioner wrote:

We would like to be assured that the government does not intend to base its future taxation and social policies on the joint income of two spouses, which is not an adequate definition of family income.

That is the definition we find in the bill. The commissioner goes on to state in his letter of November 2, 1978:

The basic principle of using the income of the total family or living group will require extensive examination before its implications are fully appreciated.

I should like to know what views the Minister of Finance expressed in response to his letter.

Aside from the fact that the family income provision discriminates against couples who are married, the principle falls back on the notion of dependency against which women have been fighting for many years. I would have expected the minister to have recognized this. The assumption inherent in the bill is that a man who earns $5,000 or $20,000 or $50,000 shares that income equitably with his family. We all know that in law a wife has no claim on her husband's salary. She may be entitled to half the house should the marriage dissolve, but she is not entitled to half the monthly pay cheque as long as the marriage holds together. The family income provision in this bill presumes that married people pool their income and share it. I hope that is true in many cases but I am sure that in many other cases it is not. Large numbers of married women go out to work to improve their economic status and that of their children. They may need an individual income because they do not get a fair share of the husband's income.

That is the reality of the world we live in, yet this clause proposes to lock into legislation a presumption that the husband automatically shares his income with the wife. The wife becomes a dependant who is looked after by the husband at all times. The family income provision lumps the income of the wife with that of the husband and assumes it to be one income. As a result, many thousands of married working women will be deprived of the child tax credit. As long as women on the whole make significantly less money than men, and as long as they have no claim in law to their husband's income, the family income provision as set out in this clause will hurt them. As long as married working women are looked upon as an excuse for high unemployment figures, as long as their income is regarded as secondary income, any kind of family income provisions will work against their attempt at equality in the work force and in the home.

I should also like to ask the minister what kind of study went into the family income provision as set out in this clause. I would like to ask her how much consideration was given to the other options listed in the background paper put out by the Department of Finance. Did she, for example, consider option number four which talks of taking total family income into account rather than just the income of the spouses? Did she consider a total "household income" option? Did she give consideration to any options dealing with individual income? Or did she choose the joint income route just because it was easiest from an administrative point of view? Is that the real reason we find this proposal before us today, one which will, indeed, hurt women?

I should like the minister to tell us as well whether she intends to have those sexist clauses redrafted—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but her time has expired.

Miss Bégin: First, two corrections to statements made by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands. When she referred to the study carried out under the Minister of Finance, she made a mistake. The book is entitled "Integration of Social Program Payments into the Income Tax System." It is a paper written by officials of the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Finance and the Department of National Health and Welfare. This document—it is particularly boring to read, I must say—studies the avenues existing within the income tax system for the delivery of social payments. Two different task forces from the three departments considered what could be done and which of the four avenues listed in this report would be the best and most equitable. This work was carried out over two years. The last report was submitted to me in March, if my memory serves me well. We did the work at my level and then within the cabinet committee system. So the question has been well studied.

I wish to correct the hon. member further. She suggests the bill is sexist. Bills are boring, as far as I am concerned, in their jargon but the French version, the one with which I am most familiar, is absolutely neutral if there is such a way of referring to men and women. The English version could be improved upon as far as I can see. If there is a discrimination in this bill it is that the cheque goes to the mothers in the vast majority of cases, except where fathers have legal custody.

I am very proud of that feature of the bill. It is a discrimination. It could go to fathers, but it is going to mothers. That is something of which I am particularly proud. That means $120 million more net money—after compensating in my calculation for the slight reductions in the family allowances—in the hands of women in Canada who are at the low end of the middle class and at the low end of the social and economic class of the country. This amounts to economic independence in the hands of women. It is exactly what I wanted, and I am very pleased about it. It is money for children, but it must go through the hands of adults. We had to choose which adults. After much discussion we on this side of the House chose women. This money will be good money. There were opposite viewpoints on that question. We chose women. It is a discrimination, I acknowledge that, and I am very proud of it. I have waited and waited, but again this morning in the Globe and Mail there was a long article tending to depict this bill as being discriminatory against women. I cannot accept that, because that is not true.

I would like to point out a few truths to the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands. She knows and I know very well that ideologies at times carry us away from a few realities. I suggest to my hon. colleague that she is becoming impractical when she pushes an ideology to the ultimate. She loses track of the realities of families and of life. In fact, she is attaching her name and her credibility to a very elitist argument. In lower middle class and poor families women and husbands work together. Each knows what the other earns. Their money is put together. There never is enough money. The economic autonomy which is the symbol of some women's movements happens only in rich social classes. In those classes wives do not work outside, and husbands do not give their wives enough of their salaries. That is not what happens in poor families and in the lower middle classes.

The view being pushed by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands is a mistake. The arguments she is putting forward are clearly not applicable here, and she has taken an elitist view regarding the economic independence of women. By equipping mothers in the poor classes with $120 million more, we are equipping them with economic autonomy. That is very important. That is not discrimination.

I would like to remind the hon. member that numerous women's groups are supporting this bill. Native Indian women are supporting this bill. The National Advisory Council on the Status of Women is supporting this bill.

Miss MacDonald: A Liberal patsy group.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: The Quebec Women's Federation supports that bill. I repeat it.

[English]

The Quebec Women's Federation, of which I am a co-founder, supports this bill. That federation has told us so. We have documents. The National Action Committee on the Status of Women supports this bill. The Liberal Women's Commission supports this bill.

[Translation]

The Quebec Action and Information System for Women, the AISW of Quebec—

[English]

—supports this bill as well. I could go on and on. In order to be just and fair, I said earlier that women's groups in this country regret that to do what we have done we had to reduce family allowances. I appreciate that. It is about time women fought for their share of government programs. I regret that too, but this tax credit is supported by women. The opposite is not the case.

I would like to remind my hon. colleague of two other dimensions. I mentioned briefly native women's associations. I want to tell the hon. member that there will be $90 million more for native women in 1979. Is that good or bad? As far as I am concerned, it is good. It is cash. It is economic autonomy. Of course, it is for children. When people have relatively limited budgets, it is always for children, but it goes to mothers. That is important. Mothers are very good at making decisions regarding families and often are family ministers of finance. I think 90 per cent of single parent families are headed by women, and $30 million more is going to them. From all angles this measure benefits women above men, and in that respect it may be discriminatory. I do not apologize for that; I am very pleased about it.

With regard to the philosophical basis for asking mothers to declare their incomes—and the incomes of their husbands in two-parent families—I want to say to my friend the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who has been my friend in the women's movement until this bill came under study, when she became carried away by ideology, that for years women have been fighting to get fathers to assume parenthood with them jointly. They do not want to be left alone to solve problems, to provide care and to take responsibility for their children.

If that is what the women's movement has wanted, and rightly so, why does the hon. member suddenly want to have it both ways? It is impossible to have it both ways. Both parents are usually responsible for their children. It is impossible to put that responsibility on the shoulders of one of the two. It is wrong and unfair, and the imbalance now existing by which mothers have almost the sole responsibility, for all practical purposes, should be corrected. Women have fought to have fathers assume parenthood with them. This bill has nothing to do with implementing joint filing for tax purposes in Canada.

Miss MacDonald: Not according to the Minister of Finance.

Miss Bégin: I have often tried to explain this. I should have brought with me a draft of the single page which will be sent with all family allowance cheques in the month of January. In that draft we discuss a form which will be used to establish the number of children and the incomes of their parents. This bill makes provision for children in poor families and in lower middle classes. It provides more money.

When it comes to children we cannot speak of autonomy of women as opposed to men. This is not the forum for that. We want two parents to be responsible for their children and to exercise their responsibility jointly. When there are two parents and two sources of income—or one, depending on the choices of the families involved—we have to know what amount of money is available for the children. We will ask about that on a simple one-page form. That form will have space for the identification of the mother. There will be a space for her social insurance number, her address and so forth. In the second part we ask for the arithmetic of the family, which means the take-home pay. The form asks for a declaration of take-home pay and the number of children. This will tell us how much is requested in the form of child tax credits.

Then there is a certification. There is space for two signatures stating that this is the truth, the only truth and the whole truth. Those signatures are the signatures of the mother and the father. If there is no father, only the signature of the mother is required. In cases of separation, divorce and so forth only the mother's signature is required. Of course, she will declare, whenever it applies, all moneys or other payments she receives on behalf of her children because those are forms of family income.

This is no discrimination. If there was need for proof, and that is the ultimate proof—I regret it in a sense because it means an additional paper burden on women in the country—each partner in a family will have to file an income tax form separately. So individual taxation, which is the key to the taxation system in Canada, is totally respected here. I hope that next year we will be able to have only one form for the 1.5 million mothers who do not file an income tax return. I cannot repeat more clearly that this bill reflects the reality that children depend on parental resources and that parents are jointly responsible for their children. Nothing is more basic to our society or to any society, and that is what the women's movement has strived for.

I could speak and speak on this subject because it is one of my favourite topics. It happens that I want to do things that will help women take their full place in society and get what they are entitled to. Today I am sponsoring a bill which discriminates in their favour, and I am proud of it. I ask: Is the hon. member opposed to the GIS procedure by which every month both partners in a marriage put their income together and declare it so as to get the supplement? What is wrong with that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, in the short time remaining I want simply to point out to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that no party has a monopoly on fighting discrimination. Certainly if you look at the statements I have made—I admit I am not the kind of member to whom one would instantly refer while reading Hansard—you would find that on November 7 I raised this matter with the minister and with her colleague. We were sitting in almost the same places and we discussed precisely this isssue which was raised at that time by Mr. Fairweather of the human rights commission. So I do not think she can say that this party has been either silent or unconcerned about whether or not there are discriminatory elements in this aspect of the bill.

However, I think the issue is a little more complex than the hon. member has allowed, for the very simple reason that what we are trying to do in this bill, as I understand it—we support it, I want to make that perfectly clear, but I am certainly not sure where the hon. member for York-Simcoe stands on the bill after having heard him this evening—is not simply to deal with whether a woman or a husband can file separately. That is not the only issue.

The other question is, what is the income of the household unit, of the family unit which is supporting a child or children. It is a middle class illusion of the worst kind to think that we cannot take into account the income of the family unit because it would give rise to all kinds of other discrimination of an economic nature that is much more profound.

What will you do in a situation where a middle-class lawyer or doctor is earning $40,000, $50,000 or $60,000 a year, his wife is not working because she has children and they have decided that that is the way they want to do things, so she is not making any money? That is a household unit supporting a family. It would be highly inequitable if the poorer members of this population were to support the children of that family because we were allowed to carry out a bourgeois illusion—if I may use that word in the House—that the woman was independent in that situation.

In this situation we are looking at the whole family unit, and we have to ask ourselves not only whether there is discrimination against women, but whether there is discrimination of an economic kind and the money is getting to the people who really need it. That seems to be the critical question.

I have some concerns, which I have already expressed to the minister and to the parliamentary secretary, in that I am not sure that the wording in section 121.1(a) as it now stands really addresses itself to the reality. The reality is that a family unit today is much more broadly defined. Here I agree with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who brought out the same point. Today, the family unit is much more complex than this bill allows for.

I do not wish to put forward an amendment tonight, so I will give the minister notice of the amendment which I propose to bring forward on Tuesday. It will take into account the fact that we have to deal with common law relationships where people are not necessarily married but nevertheless are providing a joint income for the support of the child, and it will deal with a form which will be quite separate from the income tax form, as the minister has already said—and I was delighted to hear it. There is no reason why we cannot have the concept of a family income or household income, and a definition of a household which will ensure that there are no inequities in this system. I gave an example on November 7 but I will give it again. If you have two common law spouses living together and, let us say, they have been separated from their previous marriages, and they have children from those marriages to support but they do not happen to be married, and both happen to have a sizeable income, it would be discriminatory to give that upper middle-class family with a high standard of living a benefit to which they are not entitled in economic or social terms.

I want to say on behalf of my party that the real discrimination with which we are concerned—we have expressed our concern for women, youth and the unemployment problem yesterday and today in committee and in the House and we will continue to do that—is the fact that we want to be certain that under the bill the money will go to those households and families where there is a need for it; and we want to ensure that we keep intact the redistributive effects of this bill. We congratulate the government on the redistributive intent in the bill and we want to see it preserved.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—FIREARMS CONTROL PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, on November 14 a Montreal newpaper, The Gazette, published in its daily edition a disturbing article, under the circumstances, about the restricted firearms recall campaign undertaken by the Canadian government. With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a few excerpts of that article entitled:

● (2202)

[English]

Guns amnesty may misfire, police fear.

Operation Exchange—the two week old amnesty campaign started by the federal government to encourage people to hand over illegal or restricted firearms—appears headed for failure in Quebec.

Police believe there are about 10,000 illegal firearms in Quebec but say this year's program will fail unless the government steps up its publicity campaign.

"Many people aren't aware of the amnesty program because of poor publicity," said Quebec Police Force Constable Marcel Bélanger.

[Translation]

Such are the comments of Mr. Steven Kowch, if my pronunciation is correct, which led me on the following day to direct to the Solicitor General a question which appears on page 1149 of Hansard and which was stated as follows:

With regard to the restricted firearms recall campaign undertaken by the Canadian government and more particularly by his department, could the minister tell the House and the Canadian public whether it is true that this campaign has had disappointing results in the province of Quebec? At the same time, could he indicate whether this campaign is having encouraging results in other parts of Canada?

[Mr. Rae.]

If, in his answer, the Solicitor General said he was satisfied and very much encouraged by the results of that campaign among the general public, he was far from answering my concern about the results of that operation in Quebec, which arose from the statements made by Mr. Kowch. If encouraging, an accurate answer would have enabled me to ignore the statements published in the Gazette, and consequently to regard them as a reinstatement of the frequent regard and absolutely political criticism of the relations between the Government of Canada and the province of Quebec. The people of my province want only to feel as completely secure as possible, and consequently they would have also welcomed a clear answer with some relief. As a result of this incomplete reply by the minister, the concern which Steven Kowch's remarks had raised in me, instead of being dispelled or reduced, increased.

You are certainly aware, Mr. Speaker, that this campaign—which by the way is supposed to end today, unless it was extended—is part of a process initiated by the Solicitor General of Canada to encourage Canadians to register their restricted weapons or get rid of them if they want to. The public must also understand that this service was set up to protect individuals from a possible accusation of simple possession of illegal weapons as provided under the act. Hon. members, needless to say, need not being reminded that the government, in order to maintain law and order in this era of violence which began several years ago, had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to reinforce the Canadian statutes dealing with gun control and introduced a legislation which was adopted by parliament in 1977 and entered into force on January 1, 1978.

We should consider that over a five year period before the adoption of this gun control act, the number of casualties due to firearms increased constantly every year. For instance, the number of suicides which account for the greater part of these casualties increased by 17.12 per cent, the numbers of murders or homicides increased by 27.10 per cent, while, accidents decreased by 19.82 per cent. There is no longer any need to prove the relevance of this measure passed in 1977. That is why, Mr. Speaker, the article I referred to at the beginning of my remarks has created some concern in my mind and among a large sector of the people in Quebec. In the hope of obtaining tonight a clear and precise answer, I will again put this question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General: With regard to the restricted firearms recall campaign undertaken by the Canadian government and more particularly by his department, could he tell the House and the Canadian public whether it is true that this campaign has had disappointing results in the province of Quebec? At the same time, could he tell us whether this campaign is having more encouraging results in other parts of Canada?

● (2207)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member last queried the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) on the results of the firearms amnesty program in Quebec and other regions of Canada, the program was only at its halfway mark and results were available only for the first ten days. It was, therefore, difficult at that point to make an accurate forecast of the final outcome.

Today at midnight the program comes to an end. Figures released today by the Solicitor General make it clear that the program has in fact been a resounding success. With statistics only up to November 24, the national total stands at 23,331; that is, firearms of all types brought forward for registration or disposal. I am confident that by the time the results of the last six days are tallied we will be very comfortably over the 30,000 mark for the entire month. That is 1,000 guns a day, most of them illegally held guns now made legal, but large numbers also being unwanted guns turned in in the interest of safety. This demonstrates a tremendous vote of confidence in the gun control program on the part of the public.

I also wish to stress that, based on figures available to date, the program has been a success in all parts of Canada, including Quebec, where for years the authorities have been actively encouraging owners of illegal weapons to bring them forward to police for legalization or disposal.

It has been said that the Quebec figures were too low. Indeed, if one judges only by the rough statistics, of the more than 23,000 guns received to date, Quebec was responsible for only 1,300 or so, while Ontario accounted for over 10,000, over 80 per cent of the guns in all cases being handguns.

In fact, those figures should be analysed in relation to the gun ownership pattern across the country. Quebec, for instance, holds only 8.1 per cent of all the handguns in Canada, according to an extensive gun survey done in 1976 by Statistics Canada. Under amnesty, they account for 5.2 per cent of all handguns brought in across Canada. Although this is slightly below their share of the national stock, the discrepancy is probably more than offset by the fact that under its unofficial amnesty policy, Quebec received about 2,500 such weapons in 1977 alone. It is fair to say that most of those guns would otherwise have quite probably turned up this year. This parallel holds true for other regions, none of which is very far above or below its share of the national stock.

Our Quebec figures are a little bit light due to difficulties in obtaining returns from certain districts. Full figures for all regions will be available next week and I am sure they will confirm that the program has been totally successful in all parts of the country.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS BY BOARD—CONSULTATION WITH RAILWAYS

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in the debate tonight because of a three-part question I put on November 28 to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. My question was inspired by an announcement that the Canadian Wheat Board was tendering for 2,000 hopper cars to be purchased out of the proceeds of the sale of producers' grain, and the government was using as its authority section 4(4)(d) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act which gives the board the power:

—to acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property, but the board shall not acquire or dispose of any real property without the approval of the governor in council;

The first part of my question asked if there was a need for these cars. The minister presently has a study costing $650,000 under way on this very subject. The second part of the question asked if producer groups had been consulted. Despite what the minister says, Mr. Speaker, no farm groups were consulted. The advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board, however, was consulted, but this group ceases its functions very soon when their terms expire, and a new committee is about to be elected.

The third part of my question asked if any new or innovative ideas were forthcoming to improve the situation at Vancouver, to which the minister replied no, there were no new ideas.

We see this move as a breach of the spirit of the National Transportation Act. In effect, what it does is change the statutory freight rates on grain without consulting parliament. It is unprecedented in the 40 years of Canadian Wheat Board operations. On this side of the House we feel that the Canadian Wheat Board has been an outstanding example of the implementation of government in action on behalf of the individual producers. It must be assisted by the national government, and we want to keep it that way.

I fear, because the present minister has let things slide so badly, that the board probably had no alternative but to take this unprecedented action in order to focus national attention on transportation problems. This government has a responsibility to act and to act now. The situation at present is that we have greater markets overseas than the Canadian Wheat Board can serve, and there is greater productive capacity on the prairies than our producers have used. The tragedy is that unless this changes there will be no incentive to use the modern technology that is available. It is easier to sell grain now than to transport it to tidewater.

Lost sales, deferred sales, interest and demurrage claims will total well over $500 million this year, something over $4,000 for every permit holder in western Canada. We are sold out right through 1979 and will not be in the market in a meaningful way until after that time. So the story is, lost sales, deferred sales, boats waiting and customers waiting out there.

The question is, how can we make better and more effective use of the system we have? This fall the railways claim that they have unused capacity. If, as they contend they have unused rail capacity in the summer when weather is good, then surely we should be looking at stockpiling or positioning our grain in overseas terminals during that period. It seems to me that in a great port such as Rotterdam there should be a terminal elevator with "Canada" written on it, and a Canadian inspector stationed there so that when a miller sends his barge down the Rhine he will be assured he will be getting the proper grade. We have never allowed one bushel of Canadian wheat to leave this country unsold. I know the old argument, that if you put us in a long position it will force the price down, but in 1978 I cannot buy that.

We have unused capacity at Pacific seaboard in the form of the bulk handling terminals, Canadian Pacific at Port Moodie, Neptune Terminals and Vancouver wharves. These could be used to supplement the existing terminal system at no additional cost. Put the wheat through the terminals, but let us put our feed barley through the bulk handling facilities. Certainly farm run feed barley is equally as good as our export grade. It seems to me that the fastest way to get the price of this grain up is to get rid of it; but instead we continually advertise to the world that we have a tremendous carryover here in Canada of half a billion bushels. Nothing could be more depressing to the world price than a statement like that.

We could have given special over quota privileges at the interior government elevators which would have helped shorten the turnaround time required for the railways. This method was tried in Lethbridge and was found to be very successful. All we needed in Prince Rupert was a commitment by the Canadian Wheat Board and this government that grain would move through there. If this commitment had been given the grain companies themselves would have had terminal facilities at Prince Rupert years ago.

Our western grain farmers go about the business each year of producing wealth for this nation, and I believe that they deserve a better shake than this. It is time for new and innovative ideas as we get ready to move into the 1980s.

[Translation]

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question relating to the number of cars we might need is a complex one because we have to know how many times they are turned around between the prairies and Thunder Bay or the west coast. We also have to know if we have a minimum number of cars to meet the needs in ordinary times or peak periods, when necessary, even though it be for only five or six weeks.

Railway companies have argued that the number of cars required would be available but it is still difficult to determine how many cars are required. The Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), as he stated this afternoon, are convinced we will need more cars in the very near future.

The Canadian Wheat Board may have a different view from the railways as to what constitutes an adequate number of cars. The board must be concerned with the fact that it might have to pay demurrage charges. Consequently the cars that the Board is planning to buy might enable it to avoid demurrage charges in the future during peak periods of market demand.

Producers have the same concerns as the board and when they were consulted they accepted in principle the proposed purchase. These past few days, the minister supported the steps taken by the Canadian Wheat Board. However, I must also emphasize the other steps taken by the minister. The branch line upgrading program being over, greater and more efficient use will be made of the cars now available and all those the board might acquire later on. In order to ensure better use of the whole system, the minister announced this afternoon the appointment of an analyst to study grain handling and transportation operations and make suggestions for improvements.

The recently released Snavely report indicates that major improvements have already been made with respect to the use of cars. Nevertheless we have to determine whether it is possible to do more and make further improvements as soon as possible. In concluding, I will say that we can prove that the government took a benevolent attitude towards the handling and transportation problems this country is facing.

URBAN AFFAIRS—ALLEGED FAILURE OF DEPARTMENT TO PROMOTE HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, on October 23 I addressed questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) regarding cutbacks amounting to $116 million in the Canadian home insulation program. At that time I did not receive satisfactory or substantive answers from either minister.

When the program was unveiled last year it was described by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as the "key item" in a campaign to reduce the rate of growth of energy use to zero per cent per person by 1985. I do not think anyone would dispute the aims of this program particularly at a time when the conservation of our non-renewable resources is recognized as being more important than ever before. The minister envisioned that CHIP would save this country 50 million barrels of oil a year, which would amount to a saving of $1 billion on the annual cost of imported oil. What is more, the average Canadian who took full advantage of the insulation program could expect to cut his heating bill by 37 per cent. According to the minister, that would amount to a saving of $140 a year for the average family.

After such ambitious beginnings, it was difficult to believe the government announcement that CHIP, barely a year old, would become a victim of this government's misguided restraint program. But it did. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has announced that the CHIP budget has been cut in half, leaving only $116 million to continue the program over the next two years. When I asked the minister if the cutbacks mean the government is abandoning its commitment to help home owners reduce their energy consumption, he replied that it was not. In fact, he suggested he was satisfied with the success of the program and said it would go forward on a much less ambitious scale in future.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain the government is indeed abandoning its energy saving conservation objectives. With funds for the "key item" in its energy conservation program cut in half to $56 million this year and $60 million next year, that conclusion is obvious. These cutbacks in home insulation grants are going to mean a long, cold winter for thousands of homeowners who will be disqualified from the program.

Under CHIP, owners of homes built before 1946 can apply for a grant of up to $350 to cover the cost of insulation materials. As it was originally conceived, the program was to be advanced so that by 1984 all homes built before 1977 would be eligible for grants. The cutbacks mean that the qualifying date for CHIP grants will be held at 1946. This completely disregards the fact that by far the majority of Canadian homes were built after the second world war. Because of the restrictions imposed by the cutbacks, only 20 per cent of Canadian home owners will be able to participate in what is—or was—a very important and beneficial program.

I addressed my supplementary question to the minister of urban affairs, who was responsible for the administration of the Canadian home insulation program through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I regret his answer was no more informative than that supplied by his colleague.

It is a sad fact that only 50,000 of the 1.2 million owners of single unit dwellings eligible for insulation grants have taken advantage of CHIP. I suggested to the minister that the reason for this poor showing was his own department's failure to promote the aims and objectives of the program. The minister preferred to turn this around and he blamed the public for being slow to respond.

The minister's department optimistically claims that more than 100,000 home owners will take advantage of the program next year, which will fulfil all the demand there is. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that if this program was better promoted, and if eligibility was not limited by budget cutbacks to less than 20 per cent of the home owners in Canada, demand for this program would be increased tenfold.

Energy conservation is no less important today than it was a year ago when CHIP was first introduced. In the process of reducing energy consumption, this program has created jobs and boosted industry. This is not the time to cut back. It will also cut out the creation of jobs in the Canada Works phase 2 for senior citizens and those eligible under the CHIP program. That is another problem that we will have to face this winter. It will add to unemployment.

All in all I was not satisfied with the answer to my questions. I hope the parliamentary secretary will have some good news in his brief remarks.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this subject was discussed in committee just this afternoon. It is not a question of budget cuts but of utilization of the funds that have been made available. It is true the requests that have been coming have not been coming fast enough to use up the available funds.

When the Canadian Home Insulation Program was first introduced there was concern over the possible impact of such an incentive on the supply and price of insulation materials. As a construction man I was concerned because at that time there was a shortage of insulation materials in the province of Quebec. Even when the program was introduced in Prince Edward Island and another maritime province I was concerned that this would create a further shortage of insulation materials. There was a belief that the manufacturing capacity had not yet been put in place to meet the extra demand that would be stimulated. This was true.

During the preceding summer, manufacturers had not been utilizing their full manufacturing capacity. There was a fear that consumer protection mechanisms had not been sufficiently developed. The government wanted to provide an incentive for people to insulate their homes but it did not want to do so in a way that would result in dislocation of the new housing industry, or put inflationary pressures on materials and cause problems of faulty insulation. Obviously if there had been a bigger demand for insulation materials, it would have had some effect on new house construction.

The nature and amount of grant offered needed to be tailored to a deliberate and responsible introduction of this new factor into the market. Now we have more than a year's experience and it is clear that if the Canadian Home Insulation Program is to meet its targets, some additional inducements will be needed. Obviously the first effort must be to have the older houses well insulated. These are the houses which have the poorest insulation as a general rule. The program has been structured so that these changes can be brought in with a minimum of complication. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation staff have been studying through sample surveys and other means what advice to give to the minister on this matter. He should be in a position to make an announcement within a few weeks.

The home insulation program staff have worked hard and conscientiously to promote the program. Over 272,000 Canadians have been sent application kits, and requests are coming in at the rate of more than 1,500 each week. I have no doubt that ultimately the program can and will achieve its objectives.

In conclusion, I was personally concerned that the demand would be such that the construction market for insulation products would be disrupted by the program. I expressed that concern to the minister at the time, and I was not then occupying my present position. I feel that the way the program has been introduced is the best way to proceed, and as time progresses I have no doubt whatever that the moneys allowed for this program will be utilized to the full.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT REGARDING RETURN TO CANADA OF FORMER FLQ MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgency to many Canadians, namely, concern about the imminent return to this country of two FLQ terrorists exiled from Canada in 1970.

Since the feeling persists that some preconditions may be attached to the return of these people, while they retain their Canadian citizenship, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker):

That this House requests the appropriate minister to make a full statement on motions as to what the original deal was when the terrorists were exiled in 1970, was it verbal or in writing, and to confirm or deny whether any discussions have taken place with any authorities at any level of government to allow these people back on to Canadian soil in time for Christmas.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENITENTIARIES

CALL FOR CHANGES WITHIN PENITENTIARY SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on an urgent and serious matter, under Standing Order 43, dealing with the lack of safety within our penitentiary system. My motion, therefore, does not require a lengthy preamble as members are well aware of the necessity to improve the system in this regard, as underlined once again in the recent tragic events at Millhaven and Collins Bay penitentiaries. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley):

That this House instruct the Solicitor General to implement forthwith measures dealing with changes related to the safety within the Canadian penitentiary system as outlined in the parliamentary subcommittee report on the penitentiary system in Canada, currently collecting dust and, further, introduce legislation outlining a return to capital punishment for first degree, premeditated murders.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION INTO OIL SPILL IN ARCTIC WATERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that a gash in the hull of the John A. Macdonald, an icebreaker currently on lease to Dome Petroleum, has resulted in a 70,000 gallon oil spill in the Beaufort Sea, and in view of the fact that the oil has not been located, arising from the fact that there was no knowledge of the spill at the time it occurred, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls upon the government to undertake a full investigation into the circumstances surrounding one of the largest oil spills in Arctic waters, a spill which has confirmed the fears of many northerners.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous agreement. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

REQUEST FOR INCREASED ASSISTANCE IN RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion concerning a matter of pressing and urgent necessity dealing with research and development.

Following a statement made last June in this House by the minister then responsible for science and technology to the effect that the Government of Canada would use science and technology to strengthen the Canadian economy, increasing public and private contribution to that sector by 1.5 per cent of the gross national product up to 1983, in view of the fact that this national priority has been jeopardized by cuts of over $200 million in that sector, announced on September 8 last by Treasury Board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the government put an end to its irresponsible and unilateral action in the field of science and research, which violates the commitments taken by its department last June.

Mr. Speaker: Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF PROGRAM FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Treasury Board is currently deliberating next year's budget for the Canadian search and rescue service, and recognizing that 60 per cent of search and rescue incidents during 1977 occurred on Canada's Pacific coast, whereas only 30 per cent of the search and rescue vessels operate on the west coast, and because the 1978-79 search and rescue plan does not significantly alter this disproportionate situation, thereby putting the lives of west coast seafarers at risk, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

• (1112)

That the government move immediately to distribute the resources of the search and rescue program in a more equitable fashion, bearing in mind the disproportionately larger number of rescue calls on the west coast.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

PENSIONS FOR HOMEMAKER SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I move:

That this House urges the government, in view of its contention that it recognizes the role of spouses working in the home, to bring before the House, at an early date, legislation to provide pensions for all homemaker spouses, in their own right, equivalent to those earned by contributors to the Canada Pension Plan, thus recognizing in full, for pension purposes, the contribution to our society made by those who work in the home.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

AUDITOR GENERAL'S CRITICISM OF ACCOUNTING PROCEDURES OF DIAND

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his parliamentary secretary, I will direct my questions to the right hon. Prime Minister.

The Auditor General's report pointed out very clearly that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development does not have any management or control whatsoever. In pointing out some of the cost discrepancies, especially in school construction, the Auditor General indicated that no monitoring whatsoever was done on several projects. The ones he pointed out very clearly were school construction projects, with an estimated cost of $5.6 million and the actual cost ending up being $12.8 million. What is being put in place to ensure that these cost overruns will not occur in the schools, projects already committed for this year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to take notice of the question and confer with the relevant minister. I think he will be in the House today.

PHASING OUT OF INDIAN ARTS AND CRAFTS PROGRAM

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In the Auditor General's reports for 1977 and 1978, the Auditor General pointed out that the Indian arts and crafts central marketing revolving fund system will be phased out on December 31, 1978, mainly due to mismanagement of the fund.

In view of the fact that $1 million was paid out to Indian people for arts and crafts and that a number of people across the country operate the fund, what action is being taken to supplement this particular fund to ensure a marketing system for native peoples?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to take notice of that question as well. I should remind the hon. member that the Auditor General's report will be discussed in the normal manner in the committee and the hon. member will have a chance to go into detail on all these questions there. Of course, it is his privilege to raise them in the House if he wants, but since I cannot be expected to have answers to every item in the Auditor General's report, it would be useful if I could receive notice of his questions in advance.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my first question, or portions of it, to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Because of the mismanagement and lack of control in his department, the Auditor General pointed out very clearly that major school construction programs across the country in five particular locations had an estimated cost of $5.6 million and the actual cost ended up at $12.8 million. He pointed out very clearly that this is through lack of management and control within the department. We have—

● (1117)

An hon. Member: "Suspected."

Mr. Smith (Churchill): —suspected this for quite some time. I wanted to use another word, but I just could not get it out, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to ask the minister what controls he will put in place to ensure that the schools which are now under construction for this year will not have these outrageous cost overruns.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think it is probably worthwhile to point out that all these questions were asked and answered at the parliamentary committee during the course of the last two weeks, which suggests to me that maybe the hon. member is getting at a broader question of principle. I should like to address myself to that, particularly in terms of building schools involving Indian labour.

What the hon. member is suggesting is not a matter of controls; he is suggesting that what we should do in terms of reserves is to get a company from outside the reserves to come in and build the schools as cheaply as possible. That is what he is really suggesting and that is what that party stands for. I am saying, on the other hand, that if that party is at all interested in socio economic development on reservations, it must be prepared to use Indian labour, Indian craftsmen and people like that. I am saying that may be more expensive in the short term, but it is the only way we can get at these chronic problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POST OFFICE

AUDITOR GENERAL'S CRITICISM OF METHOD OF LETTING CONTRACTS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of the Auditor General's report.

As the Prime Minister will be aware, the Auditor General audited some 67 contracts which were given out by the Post Office to a value of some $132 million of taxpayers' money. One of the findings of the Auditor General was that the Post Office made a practice of splitting up larger contracts into a series of smaller ones so that the dollar value of those contracts was lower than the amount whereby Treasury Board approval would have to be sought.

Can the Prime Minister assure the House that in future the Post Office will be instructed to avoid trying to circumvent Treasury Board guidelines, and that in future the approval of Treasury Board will be sought for contracts of this nature?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat my previous answer, in the absence of the Postmaster General—

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is really interested in answers to these questions, this matter is being debated in the parliamentary committee. I understand he will not be on television as much there, but he will get the facts and he will then be able to make up his mind whether he wants to advocate a change in policy.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is quite testy today.

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Beatty: In view of the fact that he is apparently incapable of getting the President of the Treasury Board or the Postmaster General into the House to answer questions—we received word from the Postmaster General's office only 15 minutes before question period that he would not be present—we have no choice but to question the Prime Minister on the activities of his government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would answer the question after I have asked it. I want to ask the Prime Minister about a further finding of the Auditor

General, namely, that it was the practice of the Post Office Department, in instances where contracts had expired, to continue to pay for services being provided by contractors without going back to Treasury Board to get new contracts signed or the approval of Treasury Board.

Will the Prime Minister give Canadian taxpayers the assurance that in future this practice will be discontinued and that Treasury Board approval will be sought in instances where the Post Office intends to go ahead after contracts have expired?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, regarding the presence or the absence of ministers, I think we have a very full attendance of ministers here this morning. They have departmental duties and duties in other parts of the country. If hon. members are really interested in getting information, as provided by the rules, a simple notice would be the way by which the minister could either provide the answer or make sure an acting minister would be present.

An hon. Member: Their offices will not even tell us whether they will be here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The Postmaster General's office did not know where he was.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that he was home all morning.

Mr. Beatty: When I phoned, his office did not even know where he was and did not know whether he would be here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Did you hear that, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: The Speaker cannot answer.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course he cannot. That is why I suggest these questions should not be asked of him in the form of conversation. Ministers have duties about the country—

An hon. Member: Where is Joe?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, where is the Leader of the Opposition?

An hon. Member: He is in your riding, in Mount Royal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who is on television now?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not at all sure that anybody phoned him this morning to find out where he was, but if—

Mr. Stevens: Did you want to question him?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Beatty.]

Mr. Beatty: Who is running the government?

• (1122)

Mr. Trudeau: I try to be helpful to the House. If the opposition wants the answer to a question—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This is the Gong show.

An hon. Member: Will somebody hit the gong?

Mr. Trudeau: I see the Speaker reaching for the hook, but he is looking in that direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have certainly been cast in many different roles over the years, but I think the relationship between television here and television elsewhere can be happily left alone.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY ON DOMESTICALLY CONSUMED WHEAT—ALLEGED BREACH OF FAITH WITH CONSUMERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since this is the Prime Minister's day for being helpful in the House, I would like to direct a question to him. Some five years ago the Prime Minister's government made a commitment to the Canadian people, as enshrined in the Two-Price Wheat Act, that wheat used for human consumption in Canada would be subsidized by the government paying the difference between the floor price and the world price. That legislation was to operate for seven years.

Today, on the order paper, there is a bill from the minister in charge of the Wheat Board which will remove that subsidy, thereby adding some $30 a year to the grocery bill of every family in Canada. Does the Prime Minister not consider that this is a breach of faith and that his government is breaking its word to the Canadian people by terminating this commitment two years before it was due to expire?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously this is an argument that the hon. member will want to put forward when the bill is debated in the House. We have presented this bill in the expectation that the results would be better, generally, for Canadian farmers and consumers in the long run.

I would remind the hon. member that during this period of seven years there have been many measures, including some adopted just last week, and currently before the House, which have transferred to Canadian consumers—particularly the less favoured ones in our nation—various forms of assistance including indexation of pensions, increased pensions, family allowances, and so on. One cannot discuss this subject in the abstract without looking at the total picture and the general assistance given to those consumers in Canada who need assistance. The government will be very happy to discuss this matter with the hon. member when the bill is called for second reading.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I understand the Scriptures to say that the Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away, but I did not know that it applied to the Prime Minister. He is telling us that the government has given us certain legislation to help the less fortunate people in Canada, and this piece of legislation takes it away. It seems to me that that is no argument at all.

Would the Prime Minister tell the House why it is that a subsidy which at the present time amounts to about 3.3 cents per loaf is to be removed, when it is estimated by the Bakery Council of Canada that as a result the increase in the price of bread will be seven cents, plus another five cents for increased energy, labour and transportation costs? It seems to me that for the government to save 3.3 cents per loaf, and for consumers to have to pay seven cents extra per loaf, is not very good economics: it is not carrying out the program to which the government claims it is committed, namely, to hold down inflation at this critical time.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is bringing forth figures of which I and, I believe, the government have no substantial knowledge. It is probably a hypothetical calculation. If the hon. member wants to give notice of that question, I will draw it to the attention of our statisticians, who will find out whether it has any foundation.

• (1127)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the figures were produced by the Bakery Council of Canada and they have been drawn to the attention of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board already by my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville; so the government are fully aware of the facts, if they would take the trouble to look into the matter.

I have a final supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Every time there is an increase in price at the source of a commodity, every person who handles that commodity adds their mark-up, with the result that a 3.3 cent increase in the price of the wheat that goes into a loaf of bread winds up as at least seven cents to the consumer, and perhaps much more.

Would the Prime Minister commit himself to seeing to it personally that the minister responsible sets up the machinery to properly monitor this matter as it has not been monitored in the past and see that the Canadian people are not gouged as a result of the removal of this subsidy on domestically-consumed wheat?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as with the very substantial reduction in sales tax announced in the budget, and as with this particular measure, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did his best to make sure the system works and that savings or non-savings are adequately accounted for.

Once again, after the third question from the hon. member, it becomes obvious there is a difference of approach between the two parties on this particular matter. It is a basic difference. The hon. member would like the Canadian government to subsidize everybody who consumes bread: him, me, the poor, the rich, and everybody else. Our approach is that we should help those who are really needy in Canada. That is why we are increasing the old age pension following our August announcement and subsequent legislation: parliament will increase old age pensions by $240 per year. That is why families with children who are in the medium or lower income classes will receive an additional $140 per child, per year.

This is our approach to help those in Canada who are in need of help, rather than subsidizing all Canadians everywhere, all the time, for everything. It is a different approach between the parties.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

DEFINITION OF "RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT"

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister aware of a report of the Toronto Star to the effect that in 1977 the General Motors Corporation spent $1.4 billion worldwide for research and development and that the company has stated it cannot say how much has been invested in Canada because the federal government has yet to explain what it means by research and development?

Could the minister tell the House right now what he means by research and development?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I believe a long discussion about the definition of "research and development" is too general to be dealt with in question period.

Perhaps I could respond to the substance of the hon. member's question by saying that, while I have not seen the article in the Toronto Star, I can assure him the government is most interested in persuading automobile manufacturers, through incentives or other methods, to do more research and development in this country. That was very much the line my predecessor took with the automobile companies. We have not yet succeeded, but I can assure the hon. member we are going to redouble our efforts.

GENERAL MOTORS—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTMENT IN CANADA FOR RESEARCH

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While waiting for the minister to read that article, I would ask him whether he or any official in his department has contacted General Motors to determine what amount the company has invested in Canada in 1977 in the field of research.

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to make inquiries either through my officials or directly myself to senior officials of General Motors to find out the numbers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PART PLAYED BY GOVERNMENT IN RETURN TO CANADA OF FORMER FLQ MEMBERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question: it deals with questions that were asked yesterday and the day before with reference to the FLQ and particularly national security.

As the original deal made between the federal government and Jacques Cossette-Trudel and his wife Louise Lanctot, whereby they agreed to go into exile in return for the safe release of Mr. Cross, the British diplomat who was kidnapped, all took place in an atmosphere where civil rights were set aside and the War Measures Act was in full force—there were 497 arrested, 62 charged and only 2 convicted—has the Prime Minister, any member of the Trudeau government, any federal agency, the Department of External Affairs, or any embassy, had a discussion with any members of the Quebec government of late with reference to this matter, inparticular with the minister of justice for the province of Quebec, as to the return of these two people so they can enjoy Christmas at home, rather than away; and if not, why not? Why has the government shirked its responsibility?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has given a bit of the background, I might remind him that in the days and years preceding the special measures of October there had been a succession of more than 100 kidnappings, murders, derailing of trains, raiding of arsenals, bombings, blowings-up and everything else.

An hon. Member: Will you answer the question?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member gave some background and I would like him to be reminded of these facts. Since the government responded with firm action to prevent any parallel power from exercising authority of a political nature in this country and getting the release of prisoners as was asked, with great ransoms, none of these things happened. As a matter of fact—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

Mr. Trudeau: —most countries which had accepted other ways of dealing with violence either before or after 1970, and tried to deal more leniently with outbreaks of violence, have since learned that the Canadian way is the proper way of doing it. They have followed our approach.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In so far as the question is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand, for the life of me, why this hon. member is interested in the government doing something to get these people back for Christmas.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure about getting them back for Christmas: I hope they are over there at New Year's. I am asking questions in reference to this government's responsibility, because yesterday the Prime Minister—who wanted to make a speech today, and he accomplished that—said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: —in answer to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition:

They were to the effect that if ever they returned, they would be prosecuted with the full force of the law.

I ask this question: was the deal in writing? Did the Quebec government at the time agree with the deal? How can the Prime Minister say they will be subject to due process of the law, if he has refused to talk to any ministers of Quebec, although the headlines in the paper say that they will be home for Christmas? He has refused to discuss it with the minister of justice of Quebec, or the Premier of Quebec, and he has no information for the House. It was his government that made a deal to put these people in exile, and he is making fun about the situation as to Christmas. I ask him, how can he assure this country that if they return they will be subject to due process of the law, if he leaves it to the provincial government without having any conservation or discussion with them? It is beyond anyone's imagination or comprehension.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member uses the words that we have refused to discuss this with the legitimate authorities of Quebec. We have not refused; we have not been asked. I just say that it is passing strange to me that the hon. member suggests it is our duty to approach the Quebec government and initiate discussions on this matter. We have no knowledge that the Cossette-Trudels want to come back. They have not informed us. We have taken no initiatives. I repeat, it is strange to me that a member of the Tory opposition would suggest it is our responsibility to take the initiative to ensure that they do come back.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, quoting from a newspaper, it says "The Canadian embassy"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: —"in Paris"—

An hon. Member: Do you have to read the press?

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know why members are so excited, if they have nothing to hide.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: The article says that the Canadian embassy in Paris told the Journal that the Cossette-Trudels had not applied for renewal of their passports, but the officials of that embassy will give them travelling permits to come back to Canada. That is the Prime Minister's own embassy. I thought the ambassador from France, who is now with us, was probably advising the Prime Minister on his dangerous domestic affairs and might have discussed this matter.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot be responsible for what is written in the press. I hope the hon. member will discuss it with these people and find out what questions were asked and what answers were given. I cannot really answer for what the press writes and what the hon. member chooses to believe.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELEVISING OF HOUSE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications: in her absence I will address it to the parliamentary secretary.

The hon. member for Eglinton was ruled out of order a day or so ago after posing a rather ham-handed question to the minister on a very important issue to some 200,000 Toronto households and this House of Commons. Would the parliamentary secretary ask the minister to intercede with the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to see if the regulation wise, common sense foolish CRTC attitude which has led to the removal of the question period live daily from the community channel of Rogers Cable TV in Toronto can be changed and this service re-established pending more long-term decisions on the broadcasting of proceedings of this House?

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that I have seen the editorial referred to by him, but I would advise him that it is not totally accurate. Rogers Telecommunications in Toronto have been providing coverage of the question period, via a community channel, on a temporary basis only in compliance with the CRTC public ruling announced in February, 1978. That announcement stipulated that the cable company should do so on a special programming channel, but if alternate channel space was not available they would allow them to broadcast the proceedings of the House via the community channel, on a temporary basis.

There has been no new ruling by the CRTC on the subject since that time. The Toronto firm is simply complying with the ruling made by the CRTC in February of this year. I will certainly pass on the representation to the minister so that she may answer it more fully at a later time.

PUBLIC WORKS

DESTRUCTION OF USABLE LIGHT BULBS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works I would like to ask the acting minister if he could tell the House what happened in that department to cause an employee to smash $8,000 worth of usable light bulbs, as reported in the Globe and Mail this morning? It seems to me rather strange that a picture would be taken if there was not some motive behind this incident.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will report the incident to my colleague and I am sure he will order an inquiry to find out the reasons for it.

[English]

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, while that investigation is going on, if it is undertaken, will the department try to discover whether or not this damage was done in retaliation for the minister's recent announcement that 100 positions in his department will become surplus, in light of the fact that the department continues to hire many outside consultants at considerable cost?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure my colleague will want that investigation to encompass all aspects of the question.

FISHERIES

REQUESTED REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF LICENCES ISSUED TO FOREIGN TRAWLERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. The minister has announced a six months' freeze as of November 7, 1978, on new entries to the inshore ground fishery for all of Atlantic Canada except Labrador, giving as an explanation for his action the need for a better form of control because of the tremendous increase in effort in the inshore fishery in the past few years.

Since Canada is still licensing hundreds of large foreign trawlers within our 200-mile economic zone, whose operations are still depleting offshore and inshore fishery resources, has the minister considered decreasing the number of foreign fishing permits to be issued next year, rather than imposing further restrictions on Canadian fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised that the hon. member, who is familiar with the fishery, would put this type of question seriously. He knows very well that the alternative to a greater fishing effort by the inshore fishermen for traditional species is not to reduce the effort of foreign nations for non-utilized and non-traditional species. It really does not make sense.

I may say to the hon. member that the arithmetic is very simple: inside and outside the 200-mile zone we catch 76 per cent of the traditional species for which we have markets and in which our industry is interested. If the hon. member advocates a policy of moving all the foreign fishing effort outside the 200-mile zone, I have to ask him three questions. First, how would he guarantee Canadian interests outside 200 miles? Second, what currency would he use for access to foreign markets? Third, how would he protect Canadian salmon on the west coast and the east coast which is away offshore on the high seas?

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to give the Minister of Fisheries a private briefing when we have more time, so that he will be aware of the true facts. We have restricted entry into our deep sea scallop fishery, restricted entry into our lobster fishery, and now restricted entry into the inshore groundfish fishery, which makes the minister the czar or comptroller general of all fishing in Canada.

Since the declaration of a 200-mile limit was supposed to provide new opportunities for Canadian fishermen, both inshore and offshore and I remind the minister of that—when can we expect an announcement from him which will indicate that Canadians can plan to take advantage of our fisheries resources and expand their fisheries operations, rather than restrict them, which appears to be the only program this government has to offer?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would read the statement that I made to the first ministers' conference, especially the appendix attached to it, he would see that the opportunities are very much in the pockets of Canadian fishermen, whose income has risen 50 per cent since 1974 and whose return in the present year is really quite dramatic. That is one issue.

The issue of development for under-utilized species—under-utilized indicates that our industry has had no interest in those species in the past—is another issue. On this matter, I repeat what I have said many times in this House and in newspaper articles that have been published. If Canadians want to apply for licences for under-utilized species only—that is, if they do not want to compete with the existing fleet that is now finally getting a decent return—I am willing to look at their applications. I might add, however, that I am not going to mortgage the benefits of a 200-mile zone for only three or four large companies on the east coast.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MILITARY AIRCRAFT CAUSING DAMAGE TO RESIDENTIAL PROPERTIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. I have here a copy of a transcript of the November 17 hearing of the People's Food Commission in Alberta which points out that farmers in the Cold Lake, Alberta, area have been troubled with bombs falling from Canadian military aircraft at the nearby base, damaging fields and some farm buildings. There is one incident of a military jet crashing within 500 feet of a farmer's home.

In view of the obvious concern about safety which these farmers have for themselves and their farmsteads, can the minister assure us that planes with bombs from this base will not fly near or over residential property, thus threatening the lives and safety of the farmers involved?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, certainly all safety precautions are taken. The only accident I am aware of was one practice bomb going through a grain silo, I believe it was, where compensation was offered. It was not a bomb that exploded. In 1974, I believe, there was a crash in a farmer's field. There is aviation training there that is obviously a hazard. But every possible precaution is taken to minimize those dangers.

Mr. Nystrom: At the same commission hearing, a military officer from the base said:

> Mufflers fall off cars—you can't expect perfection when you're attaching bombs to a plane.

Surely the minister and his department can do better than that. Since these planes fly at about 650 miles an hour, at some 250 feet, over farm buildings and farmsteads, can the minister assure the farmers there will be safety precautions taken and that adequate compensation will be paid, as there are some cases where farmers have not been compensated at all for damage caused by bombs or aircraft that crash within 500 feet of a farmer's house?

Mr. Danson: Certainly I can give the assurance that every possible safety precaution has been taken. If there has not been compensation, it is because there probably has not been a compensation claim. Whenever damage is done, compensation is offered. I know of cases where the compensation has not even been accepted, and other cases where it has not been questioned at all.

ENERGY

AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA ON DISCOUNTING PRICE OF NATURAL GAS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. There have been widespread reports that the Government of Canada has reached agreement with the government of Alberta—or agreement in principle, in any event—to discount the price of Alberta natural gas to be paid by new customers east of Alberta.

Can the minister confirm that agreement has been reached in principle? If so, what are the main outlines of the agreement? Alternatively, if agreement has not yet been reached in principle, is the Government of Canada seeking such agreement? If so, why? What are the policy reasons for it? What details are there in respect of the agreement that the minister can tell the House this morning?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that an agreement was reached with the government of Alberta with respect to discount pricing or incentive pricing of natural gas. That was made clear by my statement and the response of the Premier of Alberta at the first ministers' conference earlier this week. The elements of it were to provide an incentive or discount with regard to natural gas going into new markets in eastern Canada, for a fixed duration.

There were other provisions in terms of principles with respect to rolling in at the Alberta border. That would apply to all markets east of the Alberta border. The reason, of course, is to maximize in Canada the market for a Canadian resource and, in the process, to displace foreign crude oil; in other words, to pursue as aggressively as we can our objective of self-reliance for Canada.

Mr. Lawrence: Will the minister tell us if this agreement is linked in any way to the over-all question of the export of natural gas? What sort of term is involved with regard to this agreement? Is there a phase-out? When the minister speaks of new markets east of Alberta, is he talking about the residential as well as the industrial market?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there was no linking of this set of principles in the decision to set up a joint task force between the Government of Canada and the government of Alberta with regard to exports of natural gas. At no time did we trade or negotiate on the basis of additional exports of natural gas. The agreement was addressing itself exclusively to the maximization of the Canadian market for natural gas.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—STATE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the government coming close to an agreement in principle with the Inuit Tapirisat? If so, when does he expect he might be completing that agreement in principle?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I take it the hon. member is referring to land claims with respect to the eastern Arctic. No, I do not believe I can say, today, that we are close to an agreement in principle.

Mr. Nielsen: Can the minister assure the people of the Northwest Territories that he will not perpetuate the bad example he set in coming to an agreement with COPE by not consulting the elected representatives of the people before reaching that agreement? Will he assure us that he will consult the elected members of the Northwest Territories Council before coming to that agreement in principle with the Inuit Tapirisat?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, there were consultations with the council. I think it is fair to say—the hon. member is making this point—the levels of consultation were not adequate from the point of view of some members of the council. I think I can give the hon. member a history of the levels of consultation and when they had the documents prior to a decision being taken.

● (1152)

Allowing for that, I can say that in principle we are involving the government of the Northwest Territories in the land claims discussion. A member of the council has been designated to be a claims person, and I am working very closely with those who are involved to ensure that when we get to the point of an agreement in principle, all parties to the agreement in principle in the Northwest Territories, are supportive. I think it is important to note that with respect to the settlement with the Inuvialuit, the mayor of Inuvik recently said he thought it was a very good settlement. I am sure his decision and judgment are respected by the hon. member.

ENERGY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF CRUDE OIL—EFFECT ON EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the questions asked by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham: it is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

My question concerns the continuing controversy surrounding the price of domestic crude oil. Will the minister tell the House what effect a $1 a barrel increase in the price of oil would have on equalization payments to the Atlantic provinces, and what collective effect such an increase would have on consumers in those provinces? In other words, are some premiers supporting an increase in the price in order to increase their equalization grants, at the expense of consumers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the question suffers from two distinct disabilities. First, it would require a very long exposé by the minister. The second matter about the provincial premiers introduces an element of argument. The minister may be able to make a brief answer; I do not know.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I think I can deal with the question very quickly. As I understand the question, there are three points. Yes, there would be an effect on equalization payments, the transfer from the federal government to the provincial governments, if the increase did not go forward. The provincial governments would receive less, just as the federal government would receive less.

The second point is that there would be about four times as much benefit to consumers in the provinces. The third point I would like to make is that this affects more than just consumers; there is the whole question of a region, and that involves workers as well as consumers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, as neither the minister nor the parliamentary secretary are in the House today, and after the fatuous remarks of the Prime Minister, I would like to reserve my question until some time when the minister is present, at which time I would like to raise a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East.

NARCOTICS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO REDUCE HEROIN ABUSE

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This past summer the British Columbia government submitted a proposal for cost-sharing in the health entry plan for heroin users. I would like to ask the minister if the federal government has decided on the level of support for that British Columbia program.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the B.C. health entry plan has been discussed for months between the B.C. provincial government and the federal government. There have been numerous meetings of various federal ministers and the B.C. government. If B.C. wants to isolate one health problem and identify it as a special problem in that province, in order to get more money for health services, we cannot accept that because every other province could then identify special problems. Such problems might be with regard to industrial health factors, and so forth. I do not have with me the exact amount, but B.C. is receiving in this current fiscal year about $586 million under the established finance plan—EFP—which pays for health services.

[Mr. Speaker.]

British Columbia also receives a large sum of money for cost-sharing in social services. All that together should cover every need for assistance with regard to facilities that B.C. wants to develop for the treatment of drug addicts. I have given the B.C. government a commitment regarding my demonstration program called "Alternatives", which is a great success although carried on a small scale. We have funded that program for three years and an additional $100,000 will be allocated to it.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SIZE OF RCMP DRUG SQUAD

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Given the fact that 60 per cent of drug-related crime in Canada is committed in British Columbia, and that only 25 per cent of the RCMP's drug squad manpower is assigned to British Columbia, does the minister intend to increase the RCMP commitment in British Columbia so that drug offences can be dealt with more effectively in the future?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, a demand has been made by provincial authorities that there be an increase in the complement of the RCMP, and that matter is under consideration.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DREE PROGRAM FOR CENTRAL ONTARIO

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion: it is in relation to my continuing efforts to have his department take a realistic look at applying the DREE formula to central Ontario.

Has the minister looked into this matter, and when will his department start applying the DREE formula on the basis of need, rather than on the basis of other considerations?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are indeed looking into the economic situation of all the regions within the provinces. As to the many representations made by the hon. member that his region be declared a designated area and as such become entitled to direct assistance to industries, I do not think that I am ready to do that yet. At the same time, we are looking into possible ways to implement a new program. Just now, we are having discussions with the Ontario government, with a view to assisting with the economic development of a number of peripheral regions in that province. We have signed an agreement recently and we hope that, within the next few months, we can conclude the current discussions and hopefully provide solutions to some of the problems the hon. member has mentioned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO OBTAIN RELEASE OF DANYLO SHUMUK FROM U.S.S.R.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

As the matter of the ailing Soviet dissident, Danylo Shumuk, has been raised in this House many times in recent months, and recognizing that an official plea was made to Soviet authorities some four weeks ago today at the unanimous request of this House, will the Prime Minister inform this House whether a reply has been received from the Soviet government and what further action he will take to pursue the prompt release of Danylo Shumuk?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for providing me with my first opportunity to reply in the House. Early in October, we were advised that Mr. Shumuk's health had greatly deteriorated. On the strength of that report, the government expressed to the Soviet authorities its deep concern and asked that Mr. Shumuk's case be reconsidered on humanitarian grounds, in order to allow him to leave Russia and come to Canada. The External Affairs department was then informed by the Soviet authorities that Mr. Shumuk's state of health, although poor, was not as critical as it had been reported, something of which his parents here in Canada have now been informed. While it is true that we have no way of verifying this information, it is of some comfort to know that Mr. Shumuk's state of health is improving and we hope that the Soviet authorities will eventually allow him to join his relatives in Canada.

FINANCE

REQUEST BANK PROFITS BE REDUCED

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. I know he wants to get away, but I want to ask him this question. It arises out of the announcement yesterday that bank profits are up 33 per cent to a whopping $1 billion. The minister is asking Canadian workers to keep their wage demands to increases of 6 per cent and 7 per cent. Can the minister tell us what action he plans to take to see that bank profits are controlled and even reduced?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the law applies to banks as it does to any other institution. Banks pay taxes like any other corporation. In the budget I decided to change some of the rules because I felt that in some cases there was too much income and that taxes were not being paid on that income. I hope the hon. member will help me to speed up passage of legislation in this regard.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, the difference between what banks charge and the prime rate has gone up from 1.49 per cent last year to 1.8 per cent this year as a direct result of the increases in the interest rate which the government has brought about.

● (1202)

Could the minister tell us whether he does not think it is time to introduce measures to see that these excess bank profits are used in such a way that we can guarantee low interest rates for mortgages and small businesses?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think we will have an occasion to debate that matter in committee, because the Bank Act is in front of the committee at this moment. Of course, one way to make sure that there is a better rate of return, or more competition in the system, is to pass the Bank Act amendments under which we will be providing more competition to the banking system in this land.

Mr. Gillies: Through foreign banks.

Mr. Chrétien: I am not doctrinaire about foreign banks or our banks. I think the hon. member should talk to his seatmate and to other members of his party who are in favour of having more competition, even from foreign banks. If you are in agreement, you should discuss that amongst yourselves, since your party supports our proposition.

Mr. Gillies: Why do you downgrade Canadians?

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. SMITH—STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, most probably I would not have had to rise on this point of order had the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) been in his seat at the proper time this morning. I did not have a chance to put another supplementary question to him, so in response to the minister's reply to the question I feel I should rise at this time on a point of order.

In my question I dealt with the Auditor General's report. I will read one short passage—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have to persuade me first that he has a procedural point.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): My procedural point is that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development actually insulted this side of the House and misrepresented facts when he said we were more in favour of taking contractors from outside the Indian communities to construct schools than we were of employing local Indian people in the community. This is false, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has had the occasion to put that on the record, which is a small benefit he gained by way of a point of order. However, I am sure he will recognize, there is no surprise here, that his side of the House disagrees with the minister's assessment, and essentially it remains a disagreement, which I am sure will be pursued vigorously through the other vehicles available. I do not think I could begin to consider that, on a procedural basis, as a point of order.

MR. JOHNSTON (OKANAGAN-KOOTENAY)—RECOGNITION BY CHAIR DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I would refer to my point of order in terms of the right to reserve a question and also as the dilemma of a member who, almost without exception, has to wait three days before gaining recognition. Since this is the second day of rising, I did not really expect to be recognized by you, Mr. Speaker, today. I know, for example, that the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines) has risen on many more days than I have and has not been recognized either. I was not anticipating being recognized today and I was laying the groundwork for recognition early next week.

The question I have raised in the House before is one on which I have sent a written notice to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) some months ago. It has to do with the urban transportation assistance program and the signing of the master agreement on that program. I have asked about it repeatedly, and was caught in this position previously on a Friday when I was recognized but only the parliamentary secretary was here, and he said he would bring it to the minister's attention. That did not work. Today the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated again that all he could do with that sort of question was to bring it to the minister's attention. I would like very much to be recognized on a day when the minister is here, but I know of no way to assure myself of that possibility save by trying to be recognized this day, in the hope you would ignore me, Mr. Speaker, until Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

An hon. Member: Now he will.

Mr. Johnston: That is the danger one runs, as has been pointed out very clearly by somebody on the other side. For me, as a backbencher who represents a constituency with a most serious problem because the entire community lives in dread of repeated accidents on a level crossing, which is the only access to and egress from that community, it is an extremely important matter. I hear that the treaty is sitting on the minister's desk. People in my riding wonder why it has not been signed. I would like to hear from the minister on it, and I request, in all sincerity, the right to reserve this question and to be recognized next week.

[Mr. Smith (Churchill).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member really feel he is being fair to the House? Today, his colleagues, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson), the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott), and particularly the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon), as he has seen, have all been attempting to seek the floor on earlier days.

There are obvious constraints under which we operate. I do not know if the hon. member is seriously suggesting that he should be able to put in a request to be recognized on a specific day. If he would, I am sure all of his colleagues would want to join him in that and make reservations to be recognized during the question period. It would be a wonderful idea and would certainly take a great deal of strain from my position, but if he thinks he can make a feasible arrangement of custom-made invitations to members to be recognized in specific circumstances in the question period, I would invite him to organize that with his caucus and see how far it would get.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—ANSWERS GIVEN BY PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is still in the House and I am pleased about that because the question of privilege I want to raise involves him and the answers he gave today to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). The question of privilege relates to those questions and to an intervention by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) the other day with respect to Cossette-Trudel and Lanctot, and whether or not there had been any contact with the Canadian embassy. At that time there were stories in the newspapers, as the Prime Minister will recall.

Mr. Trudeau: Is that a point of order?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No, a question of privilege.

As the Prime Minister will recall, there were stories in the newspapers. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was asked specifically by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) whether there had been any contact by those two with the Canadian embassy with a view to their return to Canada.

I want to allay any suspicion the Prime Minister may have with respect to this party's position on it. We would be delighted if they would never come back to Canada and would stay away. In any event, the answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs was to the effect that there had been no such contact, and I recollect that the minister was quite emphatic with respect to that.

We are now faced with stories in the press, which might or might not be true—I do not know. The purport of the question put by the hon. member for Calgary North today was with respect to the substance to the stories. Also there was a question to the Prime Minister of whether or not there had been any contact with the embassy, as reported in the newspapers only incidentally.

The Prime Minister, by skating around the question, trying to turn it, making it into some form of comic relief with respect to a matter that is quite serious to the Canadian public, has left the impression with the House that he really does not know. His ambassador in France is in town today, I do not know for what purpose, but I think it would be important, if there is a change from the answer given previously by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the House be advised of it.

The question really is—and I think the House and the country are entitled to know—whether Cossette-Trudel and Lanctot made contact with the Canadian embassy with respect to their return to Canada and, if so, when, and any other particulars asked by the hon. member, because the position may very well have changed. That was the purport of the question.

Second, and this is a thing that does concern me, I am worried that the Prime Minister—who had such great interest, understandably, at the time of the FLQ incidents in Quebec and the release of Mr. Cross, with respect to negotiating, discussing and perhaps initiating discussions with the provincial government at that time—should be so disinterested now in initiating those discussions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Whether or not the hon. member has an interest in that, it has no basis in procedure. I do not know if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wants to take this opportunity to respond, but this is not a procedural point in any way.

• (1212)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I agree with Your Honour. It is a complete abuse of procedure. There is no question of privilege involved, and you recognize it, except that the hon. member has now put on the record things which presumably should have come during the question period, since it is a repetition of a question. I can only but answer that question again, lest the impression be gained that the answer has not been given.

A question was asked of me by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) yesterday. I believe it was asked of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) a few days before that. We gave a very clear, unequivocal and unambiguous answer: no, there had been no contact between the Canadian government and the Cossette-Trudels, or the embassy and the Cossette-Trudels. There had been no contact with the Quebec government, which was the question asked this morning by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). The answer was very clear; there have been none.

I do not know why the hon. member is getting up and saying that somehow we were ambiguous, and that he is puzzled because we had been interested in Mr. Cross' fate in 1970 and we were not following up the goings-on of the Cossette-Trudels, or any of the others who are abroad and who might have been involved in the FLQ. I do not know why the suggestion was made.

In so far as turning the question, I made very clear to the hon. member for Calgary North, saying that it was the government's responsibility to contact the Quebec government in the whole matter of getting the Cossette-Trudels back to Canada before Christmas—

Some hon. Members: He did not say that.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not say that it is our responsibility. We went over that. The question was very clear.

An hon. Member: Don't mislead the House.

Mr. Trudeau: It was very clear. Perhaps he did not ask it the way he intended to ask, but there is no duty on the part of the government to contact either the Quebec authorities or the Cossette-Trudels. We have not done that, and we say that there is no responsibility on our part to do that. The hon. member for Calgary North suggested that there was a responsibility on our part.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is leaving. At no time—I am glad to see the Prime Minister returning. At no time did I make any suggestion, either in the preamble or the question, that my party or myself wanted any of these FLQ people back to Canada.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that he is hiding the facts. He made a deal, sir.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: He made a deal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a point which began without a basis in procedure and, as always, whenever the House permits itself to drift along on bad procedural grounds, it gets into greater and greater problems.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) was entitled to the opportunity he just had to straighten the record, because some reference was made to his own intent in the language which he used in his questions. I should like him to take a brief opportunity to straighten the record, and that will be the end of this procedural matter.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much for your graciousness. At no time did I suggest, either in my question or my preamble—and the record will show that—that I wanted, or my party wanted them home at any time, whether it was Christmas, New Year's or Thanksgiving. I suggested that it was in the newspaper they were going to be home for Christmas, that there had been discussions with the Canadian embassy in Paris, and that members of the Quebec government made that suggestion, from the newspaper article. I wanted to find out from the Prime Minister if that was correct.

An hon. Member: And he said, no.

Mr. Woolliams: He made the deal, his government, to send these people out of the country. Was it in writing or was it verbally? What were the ramifications of that agreement? That is what I want to know, and the onus and responsibility are on the Prime Minister and the government in the manner in which they have handled the case.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just stated very clearly that I was hiding the facts. I should like him to withdraw that accusation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boulanger: Shame, shame!

Mr. Speaker: The exact language used in terms of hiding facts is one which comes very close to an unparliamentary expression. It is not an expression of deceiving or misleading the House, lying, or anything of that nature, but it comes very close. Again it points out the difficulty that once beginning on a point which is not in fact based on procedure, the subsequent contributions to it become more and more dangerous in terms of the procedures of the House. This is the risk which has arisen.

I wonder if the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) at this time would reconsider the force of the expression he used, or whether he would prefer to reflect on it and examine the record to see himself how it conforms with precedents. It is acceptable to me either way. I simply point out to the House the danger we get into the minute we embark upon a point which, in the first place, did not have a proper basis in procedure.

A question has been raised respecting the propriety of that language. As usual, I think the hon. member ought to have an opportunity, as the Chair will, to examine the record to see whether, on precedent, it is the kind of remark that I must insist upon him withdrawing. The hon. member may want to have the same reflection over the weekend.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) to have the courage to say if he intends to follow your instructions or to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I have dealt with that point, and I think it should stay that way.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 163, 167, 217, 245, 273 and 277.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

ROGER LEBLANC AVIATION LTD.

Question No. 163—Mr. Roche:

Is CIDA purchasing a Cessna 310 11 Turbo Aircraft from Roger LeBlanc Aviation Ltd., St. Jean, Québec, at a total contract value of $236,800 and, if so, for what purpose?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, CIDA purchased such an aircraft from Roger LeBlanc Ltd., St-Jean, Québec, to replace the one employed in a civil aviation project in Madagascar and which crashed three years ago.

EVACUATION OF SOUTHERN LEBANON—UNIFIL

Question No. 167—Mr. Roche:

Is it the position of the Government that Israel acted in accordance with the spirit of UN Security Council Resolution 425 in turning over the areas of southernmost Lebanon which it evacuated on June 13, 1978 to Christian militia units rather than to UNIFIL?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): UNIFIL was established under UN Security Council Resolution 425 to confirm the withdrawal of Israeli forces, restore international peace and security and assist the government of Lebanon in ensuring the return of its effective authority in southern Lebanon. The first of UNIFIL's tasks was accomplished June 13, 1978 when Israeli forces withdrew from Lebanon. UNIFIL confirmed this to the secretary-general who thereupon informed the security council. Nevertheless, the inability of the force to deploy fully within its active area of operations due to the reluctance of some local armed groups to co-operate with it is a continuing source of difficulty. The full co-operation and influence of all the parties concerned is essential in creating the conditions under which that deployment can take place.

REVOLVING CREDIT FACILITY—NEW YORK

Question No. 217—Mr. Jones:

1. What was the dollar value of the revolving credit facility which was signed in New York by Canada's Minister of Finance on June 23, 1978? How long is this credit available? Is it available in descending amounts as the term of the loan expires?

2. What is the interest rate being charged? Is there a charge made even if the credit is not used and if so, what is it?

3. What is the total amount of money which Canada has available as international credit currently? What is the daily rate of interest which is being paid on this money?

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. U.S. $3 billion; eight years; yes.

2. The average of the three lowest Prime Rates of a group of reference banks on the first day of each interest period; yes; a standby fee of one-quarter of one per cent per annum on the daily unused portion.

3. Canada has a standby credit with the Canadian banks for U.S. $2.5 billion and a similar credit with Citicorp and other international banks for U.S. $3 billion. Canada has drawn down U.S. $1.4 billion from the Canadian banks and U.S. $1 billion from the Citicorp Syndicate. Therefore the amount of money available as international credit, from these two sources, is U.S. $3.1 billion. The daily rate of interest being paid on this amount is one-quarter of one per cent.

TORNADO DAMAGE

Question No. 245—Mr. Epp:

Did the government provide aid to offset tornado damage to any place in Canada and, if so, in what form and in what amount?

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Yes, in respect of tornado damage in the Sarnia-London area occurring on May 21 and May 23, 1953.

Payments were made to the following counties in the amounts as shown:

County of Huron	$18,186.21
County of Lambton	$10,722.04
County of Middlesex	$77,927.21
County of Oxford	$16,756.62
County of Perth	$13,869.92
Total	$137,462.00

PUBLIC WORKS—LAWYERS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 273—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Department of Public Works and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: None.

Economic Policy

FINANCE—DEPUTY MINISTERS

Question No. 277—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Who were the Deputy Ministers of the Department of Finance between June 25, 1968 and October 10, 1978?

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance):

Name	Date
Mr. R. B. Bryce	July 1, 1963 to March 31, 1970
Mr. S. S. Reisman	April 1, 1970 to March 31, 1975
Mr. T. K. Shoyama	April 1, 1975 to present

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58(11)—ALLEGED DOUBLE STANDARD IN GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC POLICY

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval) moved:

That this House deplores the double standard applied by the government in deliberately reducing the buying power of Canadian workers and families while allowing an increase in the interest rates which will result in higher revenues for financial institutions, an increase in the inflation rate, as well as a heavier public debt.

Mr. Speaker: The House should note that proceedings on this motion expire pursuant to Standing Order 58(11).

• (1222)

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to move a motion which will be of great interest, I am sure, to the House and to all hon. members, and which reads as follows:

That this House deplores the double standard applied by the government in deliberately reducing the buying power of Canadian workers and families while allowing an increase in the interest rates which will result in higher revenues for financial institutions, an increase in the inflation rate, as well as a heavier public debt.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity not to criticize the government in particular but to denounce once again our vicious and antisocial fiscal system which gives priority to money capital over human capital. That system runs counter to the philosophy of the Social Credit Party of Canada according to which the wealth of Canada should be put at the service of all the people in Canada and not in the hands of a few profiteers who thus central the life of every citizen by ever widening the gap between the poor and the rich. In a logical system, in a word, money must serve mankind rather than mankind be at the service of money, as we find today. In the face of such an aberration, Mr. Speaker, how could we possibly remain silent and passive? Yet, many others have denounced before us this situation where a few men at the head of large financial monopolies enslave 98 per cent of a working population which is running more and more into debt, poorer and poorer, while this monetary power is getting stronger and stronger.

The government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in particular could cry out every day that we must get more into debt, that we must borrow more and more to get richer, they will not convince us, Mr. Speaker, that today debts are beneficial. I do not believe that everybody has become that mad. The one who takes the cake this week is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien): I heard him challenge personally the Quebec representatives saying they should increase their deficit. Your deficit is not high enough, he said, it should be increased. That is the ultimate in stupidity, Mr. Speaker. Still, there is wisdom in his madness, for he knows that the more one goes into debt, the more of one's freedom is given up to one's creditor; and that is probably how he hopes that some day Quebec will be dependent on the central government, by reducing constantly its obligations towards the provinces while hanging on jealously to its right of taxation. The government keeps on increasing its revenue while stripping the provinces more and more, of their wealth. The government therefore does the same dirty work as the big financial monopolies do with the population.

Some may say that in the last few years we have made progress socially and even economically, Mr. Speaker. As far as we are concerned, there is only a semblance of progress since in fact we are taking away from those who could lead a comfortable life to help the neighbours who have nothing, either because they can no longer work or because they have been robbed, literally, of everything by loan institutions whose rates of interest are exorbitant.

Today the government tries to apply a few of the reforms we have been advocating for 30 years, but by taxing the workers even more, while overlooking big business, monopolies, those who really have the power in this country since the governments are only their lackeys. As I said a few weeks ago, the national budget is paid for by 75 per cent by the workers while the big financial trusts, including the chartered banks, finance barely 25 per cent of it though they rake in the wealth of the country.

If the country's wealth were distributed equitably in Canada, that is if the revenue were distributed fairly among all Canadians instead of going to about a dozen profiteers, we would be able to pay old age pensions, family allowances and the guaranteed annual income to all those who are entitled to them without having to tax the other workers for the money to pay those benefits since the country makes over $40 billion in additional new production each year.

The Prime Minister tells us, Mr. Speaker, that there are only two ways to run a country: taxes and borrowings. But what about the $40 billion surpluses we have every year and the people's savings? He lets the big financiers take the largest part of the pie, while the government taxes the taxpayers and borrows money.

Let us have a look at the statistics for July. Those who want information need only to examine the statistics for July 1978. As for the amount I referred to earlier of a $40 billion surplus on new production, we find in the statistics an amount of $207.63 billion for the gross national product in Canada, whereas our gross national income, that is our expenses, amounts to only $163.663 billion, that is a $43.4 billion surplus over the country's total spending. Is it not true that with $40 billion we could easily undertake the social reforms proposed by our party, the Social Credit Party of Canada? We cannot under the present system because these $40 billion are monetized by the private banks which siphon everything right out of the financial monopoly, to the detriment of Canadian workers who are responsible for this new production. They are the ones who create these new products, yet only about ten multimillionaires profit from this production, while the people are clamouring, unemployed, and up to their neck in debt.

That is why this crazy system will only lead to one thing, a worsening of the workers' condition, because the more they work the more they increase the financial power of the large monopolies.

This double standard maintained by the government will help large corporations fatten their profits. Someone asked me the other day: But how are we going to stop our debts from increasing? The answer was: The only thing to do in this crazy system is to stop working because the more you produce, the more you get into debt, because you are forced to borrow for your own production. The impact of this attitude is felt not only at the individual level, Mr. Speaker, but also at the family level.

Since 1965, the unevenness of income distribution among Canadian families has been getting worse. This gap is generally said to be due to the very structure of the system. It is true that several behaviour changes in people have increased the number of women in the working place and the number of double income families. The ratio of single people has gone up significantly from 21 per cent in 1965 to 28 per cent in 1975. That of childless couples rose from 21 per cent up to 25 per cent whereas the percentage of families including more than six persons dropped dramatically from 15 per cent down to 7 per cent.

When relating that phenomenon to the gradual deterioration of the purchasing power of Canadian consumers, we can easily understand why people alter their social habits. Also we can presume that women who are not the breadwinner in the family are interested in working because they want to earn an additional income and thus improve the standard of living of the family. Women decide to work not because they are attracted by the labour market as such, especially since it is often pointed out that there is discrimination between men and women as far as income is concerned.

At present, females earn annually an average of $5,884 against $12,611 for males. Thus the difference amounts to $6,727 and this scandalous injustice alone should encourage women to stay at home. Generally speaking and for the reasons I mentioned earlier, it appears that most married women who join the labour force do not do so because they choose to but rather out of necessity. They wish and need to increase the family income which in 1978 was not sufficient to provide for a decent life. That is why we keep on fighting and we will keep on fighting for a salary to the mother who wants to stay home. We must make it possible for her to stay with her family.

Mr. Speaker, I have already given this example in the House before, if we accept to pay generously the members of our armed forces, all their expenses, their uniforms, for the protection of our country, are we going to shrink from the obligation to support those women populating our country, giving life to those service men? That is something I cannot understand when we reject the concept of a mother's salary. If anyone is working for the country, I believe they are. Ironically, while single people are facing increasing financial problems forcing them to change their old way of life, the commercial and financial community is thriving on workers' misfortune. In one year, from 1976 to 1977, while the average family income rose by less than 3 per cent, the real purchasing power of Canadian consumers was considerably reduced by a real drop of approximately 5 per cent.

The Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity recently criticized the inability of this government to efficiently control soaring prices while managing on the other hand to efficiently curb salary increases. In fact, this new agency of the Economic Council of Canada blames both the government and the food processing industry for the inflationary situation prevailing in Canada. The profit margin of this industrial sector is 63 per cent per production unit for the first, second, third and fourth quarter of this year. These profits have resulted in an excessive and unwarranted increase of food prices. In their report, those same analysts from the study centre pointed out that such irresponsibility on the part of employers prompted employees of the brewing, packing and processing companies to demand higher wages when bargaining for new collective agreements. Workers consider that their purchasing power has been seriously eroded.

The competitive positions of Canadian businesses on international markets was materially improved by the fall of our dollar. We were, of course, in a better position on foreign markets. However, some companies are said to continue raising their prices on products which are now competitive in order to counteract the support prices on foreign products. This petty attitude of the established industry in Canada is not sensible because in spite of temporarily larger profits, its mid-term consequence will be to jeopardize considerably the competitive advantage gained at such a cost, at the expense of consumers. In fact the spiralling inflation which has been created by the industrial selfishness of corporate leaders will inevitably reduce our favourable position on world markets, achieved as it was through unconditional exploitation of small wage earners. The Prime Minister of Canada has even expressed his intention of going back to mandatory wage and price controls should that ever become necessary in the next few months.

But on a short and mid-term basis, the policy of the government will not be changed. It still aims at making the small earner pay for the consistent ineptitude of the government in economic matters. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing new here and this attitude has been demonstrated clearly during the ten years of political domination by the Prime Minister in opposition to the prevailing attitude of industrial and economic circles. The research centre warns the industry against any position likely to affect the national interest. According to them the industry must prove its good faith and show some social conscience by voluntarily reducing its prices on Canadian products. If the present trend continues, we could see a new surge of prices, particularly food prices. This shows a double standard which has been used by the government in the following manner: on the one hand the purchasing power of the workers has been deliberately reduced through a series of social and economic discriminatory measures, including the Anti-Inflation Act which controlled rising salaries, several amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in a few years, and changes in old age security and family allowances which have been made to reallocate the funds saved on these programs and taken off old people's pensions and family allowances payments to be transferred to industry.

Have we not done enough for big business without providing them with further incentives at the expense of our children and old people? Even in the last budget, the Minister of Finance made several concessions and granted several advantages to big Canadian and foreign entrepreneurs, and that despite the egotistic and at times anti-social behaviour of those same companies towards the average taxpayer. We have reached a point where in the future companies must assume their responsibilities towards Canadians, or least must not hamper the productive efforts of the workers. In order to do so they will have to reduce their profit margin and tighten their belts, in their turn, for the same reasons as salaried Canadians. The report of the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity illustrates perfectly the questionable objectives of big business which exploits our resources and our work, and reaps the greater of part of the benefits at our expense. The experience of the last ten years shows full well where the interests of our governments be when they have to choose between guaranteeing the interests of the workers or those of the industry.

Repeatedly, the government has chosen to listen to the recommendations of industry and big business, instead or showing concern for the fears and claims expressed by groups of citizens and consumers. Besides, when it made cuts in the budget last August the government proved clearly that it intends to reduce to a great extent the help it has been granting various consumer groups. The government took away hundreds of millions of dollars from family allowances, depriving thousands of children of their cheques, just as it slashed into unemployment insurance benefits. Why did the government not cut interest rates, which are the primary cause of inflation and the troubles befalling the workers? Double standard always, Mr. Speaker.

Let us now consider the constant increases in interest rates and their impact on the Canadian economy. The 1967 revision of the Bank Act gave rise to several controversies in the House. The Social Credit Party of Canada had necessarily taken part in that important debate which was quite lively. I know something about it, as I was personally involved. One of the provisions of the bill which had then caught my attention was the removal of the ceiling on interest rates. Such a step, it was suggested, would make chartered banks more competitive with one another and with other financial institutions. Dealing with this matter, I had suggested that the ceiling should be maintained at 6 per cent and if some assistance was to be provided to contractors, small businessmen, consumers and small industrialists, a ceiling on interests was essential. Well, I should add that my suggestion was to no avail. It was overlooked along with many others by the Department of Finance. Today with a rate fluctuating around 11.5 per cent, my suggestion seems more than ever appropriate.

Before proceeding further on the subject of interest rates, let us dwell a little longer on the banking reform. I was not the only one who participated in that debate, even the Minister of Finance did. The minister, who at that time was the parliamentary secretary to the then minister of finance, made a speech on July 6, 1966, in which he said, and I quote:

> This decennial revision will certainly be welcomed by the newspapers and the public as the most radical measure since the institution of the Bank of Canada about 30 years ago. It will likely increase the confidence of the public in our banking institutions and in any future decisions of the government concerning the monetary policy of our country.

A few moments ago, I heard the Prime Minister say almost the same thing about foreign banks which will come to Canada to compete with our banks. But there never was and never will be any competition in banking; it is a perfect monopoly, and the government makes fun of us saying: competition is good indeed. Oh, come on. The least one can say is that in those days the minister was overly optimistic. He had no doubt decided to ignore the old saying that no one is a prophet in his own country. The predictions that he made some twelve years ago never came close to come true. After a succession of increases in the interest rate, we may well wonder whether Canadians should trust this government's monetary decisions. As a matter of fact, at the time of that review, I had warned the government in committee that if it removed the ceiling on interest rates, Canada would be faced with its highest rate of inflation ever. Well, we are faced with this inflation rate right now and we will be stuck with it as long as the Canadian dollar keeps floating and there is no ceiling on interest rates.

I intend therefore to consider briefly the impact on the Canadian economy of these constant increases in the interest rate. We shall see that such a monetary policy is undermining any confidence Canadians may have in their economy and, what is more, is detrimental to our economy. As to the minister's prediction that the Canadian people have more confidence in their banking institutions, other members who will speak after me will deal with it.

I shall deal now with the effect of regular increases in the interest rates. Up until 1967, the interest rates officially charged by chartered banks would not exceed 6 per cent. I say officially, for banks always found a way to charge more. They always came up with unsuspected tricks. But let's not go into it. When later on that ceiling was removed and the over-all bank reform took place, greater competition was to follow as was already mentioned. Moreover, they were intended to avoid further increases in the interest rates and to stimulate banking activities. There was therefore an attempt to strike a balance between banks and other financial institutions. Ten years later we find that we have gone from an extreme to another. From a ceiling rate of 6 per cent which, at the time had apparently a restraining effect on the banks, interest rates today have reached 11 per cent and even 12 per cent in certain banks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I also thank my colleagues. I will not take long.

Mr. Boulanger: Take all the time you need.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Somebody on the other side said that there is no hurry. We, on this side, are in no hurry either. While successive increases in the interest rate have allowed the banks to make tremendous profits, their impact has been a totally different nature on the economy. Let us examine step by step the various effects of rising interest rates on our economy. Generally speaking, they have resulted in an economic slowdown. How has it come about?

When the cost of loans climbs, it follows that the cost of investment increases accordingly. In fact all businesses, large and small alike, get their money supply from the banks to support their expansion. Large businesses can choose to borrow at higher rates to meet their financial needs and to pass the cost on to consumers through their products, thus creating an inflationary pressure. As for small and medium businesses, they will probably decide to postpone their expansion plans, thus depriving many persons from jobs that are so vital to our economy and increasing unemployment. The Conference Board in Canada had predicted for the year 1979 a 5 per cent increase in the investment at the level of business and equipment. However, such an increase was dependent upon stationary interest rates. These figures are outdated and hope for economic revival is vanishing.

And what about the housing sector? In the building, office and apartment construction industry the excessively high interest rates makes this kind of investment less attractive to contractors. But for an individual the purchase of a house, because of higher mortgage rates, becomes more often than otherwise a dream. As a result, there is stagnation in that area of the economy. Jobs that could have been created are not. It is worth noting that for the three-month period ending September 30, the number of anticipated housing starts in Canada stood at 217,000 compared with 249,000 last year, and according again to the Conference Board in Canada, an improvement in this area is not about to happen, at least for the moment.

We have been asking for many years that owners of single family homes be given the same justice as owners of apartment buildings. That seems to me easy to understand. An owner who builds houses for rental does not even use his money. His money is lent at 10 per cent or 10.5 per cent and he leaves it there because he would suffer a loss. He borrows the money and he is sure of being able to deduct from his income tax two-thirds of the interest on that borrowed money. Whether he borrows the money at 9 per cent, basically the money is costing him 3 per cent because he can deduct 6 per cent from his income tax. The same thing goes for somebody who builds—yes, it is true, I know something about it because I have built houses. He can write off two-thirds of the interest on his mortgage. He can deduct two-thirds of his municipal taxes, two-thirds of his school taxes. He can deduct the maintenance of that house. He can deduct the depreciation, 10 per cent or 15 per cent, on that same house.

An hon. Member: Ten per cent.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I am told a 10 per cent depreciation every year. But that is fantastic. I made inquiries. I know people who build projects worth millions of dollars since they do not have to use a single cent of their money—they are right. Taxes pay all the expenses of their houses. They only have to collect the rents. You do not have to be a millionaire to build a one million dollar apartment building today, you have to be a financier. They call them financiers. I am not against the advantages they get—no, we need them—but I want the head of a family to get the same advantages for his single family home. It has been suggested that the owner of multiple unit dwellings builds for other people. I would like to tell something to the House. The head of the household also builds for others. He builds for his wife, he builds for his children, and he must therefore be entitled to the same deductions; he must be entitled to deduct the interest on his mortgage on his income tax return.

Recently I heard a member of the Progressive Conservative party talk about this, and I was pleased to hear him because it means that a party will finally take a position on this issue. The Liberal party has never done so. For the last 20 years, we have been asking for justice for the owners of single-unit dwellings so that the head of the household can be entitled to deduct the interest on his mortgage, as well as municipal taxes, school taxes, maintenance and devaluation. It is very simple. This is quite fair. What we ask is not so fantastic; simply that the head of the household be treated the same way as the financier who had the money to build large rental projects. It is very simple, but the strong have always been favoured while the weak have been left to fend for themselves. If they cannot pay their taxes, their house will be sold to make up the money of their taxes. Let us look at what happens. A big developer builds rental housing and the government endorses him so that the loan company will not lose one cent. The government stays behind him and says: Go ahead and lend money, we will protect you. The government would never do this for the head of a household. This is why our laws are anti-social.

When we start looking at our statutes, as I have already said in this House, we can see that 75 per cent of them are anti-social, and I can prove this any time. Everything we do is based on financial resources, but there is never any mention about what should be our main consideration, that is human resources. However, the main objective of the Social Credit party of Canada is to see human resources triumph over financial resources. As long as we cannot do this, Mr. Speaker, we cannot tell ourselves that we have a healthy economy or that there is peace in Canada and that Canadians are happy. You could say that today everyone is committed to finance and has to produce for the benefit of finance. If someone is not useful to financial interest, he is left behind.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in this area as in all others, there is need for reform, and I hope that the government, that is the Liberal party, will include in its next electoral program what the Progressive Conservatives have already started to introduce in their policy, even though they have not gone far enough yet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the motion placed before the House today by the Social Credit party refers to interest rates, inflation, and the burden of the public debt of Canada. I would like to deal in the opening part of my remarks with the subject of the net public debt.

Critics of the government, in fact of any government, are always quick to criticize the size of the public debt and the annual charges arising from that debt as an example, in their minds usually, of poor financial management. It is important to keep the extent of the public debt in its proper perspective.

If we look at net debt, which is arrived at by deducting from gross public debt the return on the interest component of government revenues, the amount in our case is in the area of $40 billion.

Taken as a percentage of gross national expenditure, commonly referred to as g.n.e., the net debt works out to about 19.3 per cent. It is interesting to note that in 1962, and I hope members opposite are listening, when we last had a Conservative government, Canada's net debt was equal at the time to 33.4 per cent of g.n.e. As I mentioned, the figure today under a Liberal administration is 19.3 per cent.

The percentage of g.n.e. required to meet public debt charges this year is estimated at 1.3, the same level as in 1962. The figures also show that public debt on both the net and gross basis has escalated sharply in the last four years. This has been the result, in substantial part, of the economy operating at below average levels of activity, something that has been an international phenomenon. The government has been compelled to incur larger deficits to offset in part this slowdown.

Moving next to the subject of inflation, there is, quite understandably, continuing concern in Canada and in other industrialized countries of the world about inflation. It is clear that, no matter what kind of figures are used, Canada has had striking success in turning the inflationary trend around during these past few years.

In his budget speech two weeks ago, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said that he expects the consumer price index next year will average 6½ per cent above the level of this year, and that year over year increases between the current fourth quarter and the fourth quarter of 1979 will indeed be under 6 per cent. That was highly encouraging news for our Canadian economy.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

It is worth while reviewing the factors that have contributed most significantly to Canada's most recent high rates of inflation. In the long run, inflation is primarily a monetary phenomenon. Increases in the rate of growth in the money supply will eventually lead to corresponding increases in the rate of inflation. In the short and medium term, however, increases in the money supply do not translate into proportional increases in the rate of inflation. Nor do decreases in the money supply necessarily imply proportional reductions in the rate of inflation. Because of this, trade-offs between inflation and unemployment will exist in both the short and medium terms.

● (1412)

The short-term relationship between the unemployment rate and changes in wages depends fundamentally on the flexibility of real and money wages. There appears to be a fairly high degree of inflexibility of wage change to changes in unemployment.

For many goods and services labour costs make up the largest part of total production costs and are the primary determinate of prices. Even in these cases, however, the relationship between labour costs and prices may be unstable and may change in response to other factors. There are, as well, many markets in which prices may be determined independently of wage behaviour. For example, in the case of agricultural products, demand factors and supply constraints may be more important than wage costs in determining ultimate prices. Government charges are also not closely related to underlying labour costs. Increases in the prices of internationally traded commodities or changes in the exchange rate can also lead directly to higher rates of inflation. Price increases stemming from these sources contributed significantly to the higher inflation rates of the 1970s. It is thus possible to have rising rates of inflation for a period of time despite a deceleration in wage increases.

The response of the rate of wage change to changes in the unemployment rate will depend not only on the degree of wage flexibility but also on the speed of adjustment of inflationary expectations to changes in the rate of inflation. It is not possible to state precisely how price expectations are formed. There seems little doubt, however, that they are influenced by past price behaviour. Further, inflation expectations may be influenced by government policy initiatives. In other words, if individuals believe government policies will reduce price increases, they may act as if the rate of inflation were going to fall.

In the period up to 1973 there were a number of domestic factors working toward worsening inflation. These included strong aggregate demand growth, which was partly the result of strongly expansive aggregate demand policies, increasing inflationary expectations, and rising public sector wages. Important changes were also occurring in the labour market. The increasing participation rates of women and youth, the growth in multi-earner families, and the 1971 Unemployment Insurance Act revisions raised the level of the unemployment rate at which inflationary pressures were likely to emerge. These factors combined to generate a momentum leading to inflation rates in the 3 per cent to 5 per cent range. In the absence of the external price shocks of 1973 to 1975, however, the inflation rate would not likely have reached double-digit levels, and most likely could have been contained by less expansive aggregate demand policies.

The major increases in food and energy prices which occurred after 1972 had an immediate and direct impact on the rate of inflation. This led subsequently to higher wage and salary demands, partly because of attempts to maintain real wages and salaries and partly because of expectations of future high rates of inflation. The result was a secondary wage-price spiral and further support for the inflation momentum.

The rate of change of wages and salaries has been declining steadily since 1975, partly because of the anti-inflation program and partly because of high levels of unemployment. Consequently the rate of increase of prices of goods for which domestic wage costs comprise the most important part of total costs has been declining, and significant gains have been made toward restoring Canada's international competitive position.

Figures indicating our position internationally have been put on the record here in this current session on a number of occasions to show that in terms of the seven major countries with which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the financial critic of the official opposition were comparing us, we were indeed in first and second place by many important economic indicators. We were not in seventh or eighth place where those hon. members were attempting to place us. In this regard it is very important that those price increases in 1978 which were essentially temporary in nature not be built into Canada's cost structure through fully offsetting wage and salary settlements.

I would like to move on to the subject of interest rates. An attempt to achieve a short-run reduction in interest rates through highly expansionary monetary policy would likely be of limited effectiveness in the short run and self-defeating in the long run. This is especially true given the importance of international flows of capital into the Canadian market.

It is questionable how far Canadian interest rates could be made to diverge from international tendencies in the short run. In the longer run, as higher money supply growth is reflected in high inflation, the outlook would be for still higher interest rates. We would generally accept the view that the high interest rates are primarily an effect rather than a cause of inflation.

The root of the troubles that the Canadian economy has been experiencing in recent years can be traced back to the problem of inflation, and in particular to the period of intense inflation Canada suffered in the early 1970s. Inflation in Canada peaked in 1975 with prices and wages rising very high in absolute terms, but also rising in a significant way above wages and prices in the United States which was then, and remains today, our main trading partner. This led to a serious impairment of our international competitive position, a large deficit in the current account of the balance of payments and a falling off of foreign capital inflows into direct investment in Canada. Such developments inevitably led in turn to a large downward adjustment in the external value of the Canadian dollar.

Canadians have worked hard to extricate themselves from the grip of inflation, but at the same time we want to maintain a moderate rate of growth in the economy. There is no easy way to achieve this. It can only be done over a long period.

We must also focus on monetary policy, which is playing an important role in slowing inflation in Canada. The Bank of Canada for the past three years has been operating within publicly announced guidelines of declining targets for monetary growth. There have been three successive downward revisions in the bank's target range to a current level of 6 per cent to 10 per cent a year. This policy has been acclaimed as what is needed for ensuring a continual gradual reduction in our rate of inflation.

As we are now very close to ending the decontrol period, it is important to set rigid monetary growth rates. In the event that the inflation rate should not decline, monetary policy will come into play to dampen any renewed acceleration of inflation. In such circumstances there is no alternative but to set interest rates high enough to prevent undue monetary expansion, which in turn could only feed still higher rates of inflation. Of course higher rates of inflation cancel out the benefits of the recent exchange rate adjustment on the Canadian dollar and our improved competitive position which is providing fresh stimulus to economic activity in Canada.

The major objectives of our monetary policy are clear and, indeed, impose a financial discipline on the economy and on all Canadians.

On the subject of monetary policy and interest rates I would like to draw attention to a recent speech given in Vancouver by the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Gerald Bouey. Some of the observations he made in that speech were included in an excellent presentation made by the governor early last month in testimony before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

• (1422)

In my remarks today I would like to include one or two excerpts from the speech of governor Bouey because I think it is important, as we discuss an opposition motion such as the one put forward today and as we react to the kinds of comments that are being directed to us and to the Canadian public by the Leader of the Opposition and by his chief financial critic, that we place on the record, whenever there is an opportunity, the positive kind of news that is coming over and over again, not only from Canadians but from international figures of repute.

One of the things that has been of particular interest to me in the month or two that I have been Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, has been attending sessions at which international bankers and industrialists who have come to Canada for those meetings are praising us for the kinds of policies we have been implementing to cope with the problems with which we have been faced in recent years. I think that kind of news does not get out of this chamber unless we on this side say it. It will certainly not be said by hon. members opposite who are attempting to convince the Canadian public of the philosophy of gloom and doom which they think might help them and might have been of some small assistance to them in the few by-elections conducted in this country a month or two ago. They feel that kind of thing will be bought by the Canadian public at a major general election. This is indeed not the case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Martin: I would like to come back to my earlier point and read into the record some of the comments made by governor Bouey in his speech earlier this month, made in Vancouver to the Men's Canadian Club of Vancouver. He said in part, the following:

> Monetary policy has had an important role to play in the slowing of inflation in Canada. For more than three years the bank has been operating within a framework of publicly announced and gradually declining targets for monetary growth. These targets specify the upper and lower limits of a range within which the bank will endeavour to keep the trend rate of increase of the money supply. The bank's initial target range for monetary growth back in 1975 was from 10 per cent a year to something less than 15 per cent a year. As monetary growth and inflation have slowed over the intervening period, there have been three successive downward successions of the bank's target range to its current level of 6 to 10 per cent a year. The bank had made it clear on numerous occasions that further gradual reductions in its monetary growth targets will be required over future years if monetary policy is to be consistent with the longer-run objective of ensuring a continuing gradual decline in Canada's rate of inflation.

He went on to say:

> In setting its targets the bank's objective is to choose a range for the near-term growth of the money supply capable of accommodating a reasonable rate of economic expansion provided that this is accompanied by some continuing decline in the rate of inflation. The fact that we have been successful in meeting our targets for three consecutive years now provides, I hope, convincing evidence that we are serious about them. If as we come out of the decontrol period the rate of inflation should not decline, or worse still, if there should be a renewed acceleration of the rate of increase of wages and prices, the bank will not for that reason allow its monetary growth targets to be exceeded. In such circumstances interest rates would have to be high enough to prevent undue monetary expansion, and that in turn could lead to slower economic growth until inflation subsided again. That risk cannot be avoided unless monetary policy is simply to underwrite whatever rate of inflation turns up. Given more responsible wage and price behaviour, of course, economic growth need not suffer in this way. Indeed, if we do not let inflation cancel out the benefits of the recent exchange rate adjustment, our improved competitive position will itself provide fresh stimulus to economic activity in Canada.

Because of the importance of this major speech by the governor of the Bank of Canada, I would like to quote a little further from some of his comments. Later in his speech he went on to say:

> The downward adjustment of the Canadian dollar from November 1976 to the early part of this year was reasonably orderly and was not a cause for particular concern. At the beginning of this year it seemed to me that Canada's underlying balance of payments situation was better than it had been for some time. A large downward adjustment in the Canadian dollar had taken place about as smoothly as could be expected, and this had much improved our competitive position in international trade.

Again we hear over and over again about the benefits that are accruing to the Canadian economy and to industry generally as a result of a lower exchange dollar. I go on to quote Governor Bouey's comments as follows:

> Our costs of production were no longer rising significantly faster than those of our main trading partner, as rates of increase in money wages had come back down to about the same range as in the United States. The expenditures of governments in this country had slowed considerably and the money supply was under good control.

I might say that the federal government had been very much in the lead in this current endeavour to control expenditures under its management.

Governor Bouey went on to say:

> The merchandise trade surplus was increasing and prospects for a decline in our over-all current account deficit seemed reasonably good. Although rising U.S. interest rates in conjunction with a lowering of Canadian rates had reduced the incentive to borrow abroad and there had been a lull at times in the pace of foreign borrowings by provinces and corporations, it looked as though these forms of net capital inflow would come close to financing the current account deficit.

I could go on to quote a number of sections of this speech that I think are pertinent, but perhaps I may just conclude these remarks by quoting an additional excerpt from governor Bouey's speech. Again I emphasize that it is extremely important at this time that Canadians understand the positive features of our economy, and that we on this side of the House do all we can to place on the record here, in our ridings and wherever possible, the fact that Canada's position, particularly as compared to other western industrialized nations, is second to none.

I will quote an additional section from Governor Bouey's speech wherein he says:

> I have heard a certain amount of unhappiness expressed because of a feeling that our interest rates are tied to those of the United States. My reply to this is that to the extent they are so tied it is at our own choice. After all, we have had the choice of not following U.S. rates up and thus allowing the Canadian dollar to fall faster and further, with the risks that I have just referred to. We always have the choice of ignoring movements in U.S. interest rates if we think we can live with the consequences; in some circumstances it may be wise to do so, but in others it is not. In a situation where we are heavily dependent on inflows of foreign capital and when confidence in the Canadian dollar is still rather fragile in foreign exchange markets, opportunities to be able to ignore movements in U.S. interest rates are likely to be limited.

I would like to conclude my comments today by referring once again to the motion put forward by the Social Credit party, and to say that when we talk about the average Canadian and his situation ten or 15 years ago, or during the period of Conservative government—which seems to have been so many years ago that people have forgotten all about it—in some instances we find the situation much improved. When I go to my constituency in Scarborough on a Friday evening, as I will be doing tonight, I find it is not easy to get into a restaurant for a meal because of the large line-ups of people waiting to go in, often with their families.

The fact is that many Canadians today, the majority of them, are enjoying a standard of living that is substantially better than the standard which was in existence prior to the time that this government came to power. We realize and understand that indeed there are continuing pockets of serious unemployment across the country. In my remarks today I have made that clear, as I have done on many occasions. The government is doing all it can with its measures and leadership to come to grips with those pockets of unemployment. The recent budget addressed itself to regional disparities by providing increased incentives for companies to establish and invest in areas where unemployment is the highest, and by providing tax credits of up to 20 per cent for investment in those particular areas.

● (1432)

We are hearing more and more irresponsible policies from members of the official opposition, such as two or three platform positions recently taken in terms of providing tax reductions. They would add a conservative estimate of $5 billion to $6 billion in total to the deficit. We on this side know that a substantial deficit exists at the present time. We are attempting to come to grips with it, but members on the other side would see it enlarged if they had their way. Yet the financial critic, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), has the nerve to rise and continually criticize the government for not doing more to bring that deficit down. He knows full well that the hon. Leader of the Opposition and other Conservative members are travelling across the country recommending the immediate implementation of policies, if they were to become the government in power. Those policies would increase the deficit by as much as 50 per cent. They cannot have it both ways. Canadians will never accept the completely opposite positions they are taking: one day they say one thing, and the next day they say another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take this opportunity to discuss with the House a couple of matters of particular concern raised by the motion of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier). The first issue is the question of interest rates. I have debated this matter with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) on the late show, and I am glad to have an opportunity to follow him and deal with some of these important questions today.

Often my party is accused of living in the 1930s. Often it has been said that my party looks to the past too much, is too concerned with welfare, is preoccupied with the problems of unemployment and how bad things are, and is not sufficiently optimistic or aware of the fact that we are living in an affluent society. These are misconceptions. The parties which seem to be living in the 1930s are the Conservatives and the Liberals.

The parliamentary secretary indicated this afternoon that because so many restaurants in Toronto were full, we were living in a time of unprecedented affluence. The existence of a bread line, instead of a waiting line for a restaurant, does not demonstrate economic hard times. A great many people in major cities are unemployed, not simply a few pockets of the population. These people are facing extreme financial difficulties, and I should like to refer to two aspects of these difficulties this afternoon.

The first matter is the question of the interest rate, and related to that is the question of the housing situation. Housing is an important aspect of our cost of living and is a fundamental part of the financial obligations which Canadians have. At the present time the prime rate is 10.75 per cent, and there is a spread of 1.8 per cent between the prime rate charged by the Bank of Canada and the rate charged by banks. The government has engaged in a policy of high interest rates. The parliamentary secretary quoted the words of the governor of the Bank of Canada, that it is a matter of choice. Thus, we can only assume that the government has chosen to go that route, or the government has been forced to go that route, because it is determined to keep the dollar at 85 cents, regardless of the cost in terms of interest rates.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: It is true. In the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, the Governor of the Bank of Canada made it perfectly clear that the government and the bank are not prepared to see the dollar go below 85 cents. That is why the interest rate has been kept at its present rate and will continue to rise in response to developments in the United States. At that time the governor created a spectre by referring to the horrors of the dollar going below 85 cents American. Also he said that we had succumbed to something terrible, the British disease. As I understand it from listening to the governor, the British disease is that we would depreciate our currency and import inflation, thereby setting off a spiral of wage demands and so on, which would exceed what we are experiencing at the present time.

It is a very old debating trick, not unknown to some lawyers, to parade a spectre of horrors before a jury so that it will come up with another alternative. In accepting the reality of that spectre—it is a spectre; it is not a reality—the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada succumbed to a disease which is much worse than a potential and unreal fantasy alternative, the Canadian disease. They have succumbed to the Canadian disease. The interst rate is at 10.75 per cent, and there are tens of thousands of houses on the markets of major cities which cannot be bought because people cannot afford them, and there is no market.

The United States has a different and lower unemployment rate of between 5 per cent and 6 per cent. Its industrial capacity is different at the present time, as well as its history respecting the economic problems which that country faces. The United States has increased its interest rate in response to internal developments. We have simply followed along in lock step with the economy of the United States in adopting a high interest rate policy. The government appears to be carrying out a financial policy, but if one looks at its internal implications they are dramatic, social and economic implications for Canadian consumers.

The high interest rate policy also provides for windfall profits for banks. Let there be no illusions about that. I addressed questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) today concerning the figures published yesterday which revealed that bank profits were approaching $1 billion and had risen 33 per cent from last year. The president of one of the major banks said that the main reason for increased profits is that the margin between the prime rate and the rate charged by banks has been increased, and that spread accounts for a large portion of the increased profits. That spread is at the expense of the ordinary person, the one who wants to borrow money or buy a house. The banks are taking advantage of those people.

• (1442)

If I may say, with respect to my friend, you do not have to be a Social Crediter to recognize that our large financial institutions are taking terrible advantage of our people. The amendments to the Bank Act which the government has proposed do not deal with that problem. They do not even address the problem.

An hon. Member: Be specific.

Mr. Rae: An hon. member has asked me to be specific. All right, I will be quite specific. Let us accept the government's position that for external economic reasons, financial reasons, or for reasons of protecting the currency, we need an interest rate that is locked into the interest rates of the United States so that if American rates go up ours goes up. Let us accept that for the purposes of argument. If that is the case, it is the responsibility of the government to address itself to legislation in respect of banks which does two things: legislation which guarantees that banks will not make excess profits as a result of the fact that interest rates fluctuate and go up; and, second, that banks set aside a portion of their profits to be used to create what I would call subsidized interest rates for specific purposes. In other words, we should have legislation which provides for lower mortgage rates for first-time home buyers, to be subsidized by excess profits from the banks.

Alternatively, the legislation should address itself to another economic necessity relating to the concerns of small businessmen, particularly those in the Atlantic provinces, or even in downtown Toronto. Those concerns relate to their credit needs which cannot be met or cannot be satisfied if the government persists in following a policy of high interest rates because of external requirements.

That is the Canadian disease and the Canadian dilemma. We have high interest rates allegedly because of external constraints which have an impact on the internal economy, what I call the social economy of the country, which is quite out of line with requirements or external demands.

The classic example, as I said today, is that bank profits, which some people are able to take advantage of through high interest rates, are not available to the working people of Canada, but rather to the people who own shares in banks and who work in the banks. The Bank Act does not address itself to this problem. The Minister of Finance said he hoped we would propose amendments to the Bank Act, and I can assure him that we will.

I hope the government will address itself to that aspect of the interest problem. As the interest rate goes up because of external demands, there is a dramatic effect on the internal market, but there is no direct, intelligent or sensible relationship between those two things.

The second thing I want to deal with in the few minutes left to me is the matter of housing, particularly housing in our large urban centres. I represent a riding in downtown Toronto, so obviously I am speaking from that perspective.

An hon. Member: A rotten place.

Mr. Rae: It is not a rotten place. It is a very nice place and I invite you to come there.

An hon. Member: Population-wise.

Mr. Rae: The fact of the matter is, according to the government's own statistics, that about one-fifth of all metropolitan householders pay more than 25 per cent of their income on shelter, and, of those, about 180,000 pay more than 40 per cent of their income to secure and maintain their dwellings.

The important point to remember out of this is that renters have an even greater affordability problem than do the owners of houses. When the time comes for the next election and for the people of Canada to take a very hard look at the scheme which has been proposed by the Conservative party, I am sure they will recognize not only that it will not solve the financial problems of the Canadian people in regard to the size of our deficit, but that it is a fundamentally inequitable proposal from the point of view of our taxation system, and from the point of view of social justice.

It is important to remember that every time we give somebody a tax credit, somebody else is paying for it, and it is important to remember that the vast majority of the revenues of Canada come from the working people of Canada. It is the guy or the woman who is paying income tax every week and sees it knocked off the wage cheque who knows that this will be used to subsidize this scheme of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada.

An hon. Member: They would like to own homes too.

Mr. Rae: They would like to own homes, but we are also looking at a system which does not provide for their ability to own a home, but rather provides a subsidy to the people who own homes at the present time. You cannot sacrifice these wages for some future dream five years away. You are selling the people a Hollywood fantasy which is not going to work.

The reality of the fact is that there are a great many people living in our urban centres who are apartment dwellers and renters, and who will be renters and apartment dwellers until the day they die.

An hon. Member: We will look after them too.

Mr. Rae: I am sure you will when your time comes, but until that time comes we have to address ourselves to the inequities of the tax system and to the inactivity of the government in respect of the housing problem. I think the degree of concern this government has accepted in respect of housing has been demonstrated by two recent events. First of all, this government chopped $260 million from the CMHC budget and, secondly, it is abolishing the ministry of urban affairs. We know full well that when the urban dweller in Canada wants to look to a government for the solution to his problems he will not be looking to the government in Ottawa, and I suggest that is a very sad day for the people of Canada. When the day comes that the Government of Canada says, "Don't come to us with your problems, go back to the provinces from which you came," that is the day we no longer have a country of which we can really be proud.

It is an abdication of political and social responsibility for this government to say that problems of urban dwellers are no longer to be a major preoccupation of this government. This government had the opportunity in 1971 to set up a ministry of urban affairs which would genuinely co-ordinate government policy in respect of our cities. This government has not fulfilled one aspect of that policy in respect of urban planning, urban growth, and urban transportation. The government's answer now is to abolish the ministry of state for urban affairs. The hon. member is supposed to agree with me, but he will not. That is why this government has bought the entire Tory package of restraint, the effect of which has been to reduce the total amount spent by this government on social measures, and reduce the ability of the government to provide for the housing needs of urban Canadians.

In the few minutes left to me I simply want to say that if this government thinks that by stumbling from pillar to post in response to what it sees as the vagaries of public opinion, and that by reducing the level of socioeconomic spending on its part, it will endear itself to the working men and women of Canada, it is in for a shock at the next election, and certainly it should be in for a shock. The fact of the matter is that the level of social spending by this government in terms of housing, in terms of urban transportation, and in terms of the needs of our inter-city Canadians dictates the level of the standard of living of those people. Those are not people who can rely entirely on the market for their standard of living.

In a civilized and decent society we should not have private wealth and public squalor. What we must have is wealth distributed throughout our society, providing a satisfactory living in respect of housing and transportation. We must have public investment that guarantees a satisfactory standard of living for all Canadians. That is why the matter of the interest rates is directly tied to the question of the standard of living, and I am glad that our friend has brought it up. As long as you have a government which relies entirely on a private market and a standard of high interest rates for the provision of its housing, there will be a housing market that will be unfulfilled and depleted in the inner cities of this country. We know that there are not only affordability needs but physical needs in housing that are not being met by this government.

The abolishment of the ministry of urban affairs—and I see that we have a former minister of state for urban affairs in the House—is typical of the lack of concern that this government has shown for the housing situation in Canada.

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of items in this motion that have already been discussed by previous speakers, such as interest rates, inflation, fiscal and monetary policy, and so on. I intend to make reference to those subjects during my remarks, but there is a phrase in the motion to which reference has not been made. The phrase is "double standard" and I can understand the government not mentioning it because it reads, "this House deplores the double standard applied by the government . . .".

The parliamentary secretary gave some indication of that double standard when he talked about the striking success this government has had. I am sure a great many Canadians must view that statement as something of a double standard. He talked about how good things were for Canadians. Those who are out of work must regard that as something of a double standard. He referred to pockets of unemployment. I suppose that next the government will be telling us that there is no unemployment, that it is just a nasty rumour started by a lot of people who are out of work.

The parliamentary secretary also referred to the size of the government debt in relation to gross national expenditures. He seemed to draw enormous satisfaction from the fact that the debt was a higher percentage of g.n.e. during the last year of the last Conservative government than it is at the present time. That is a double standard, because if government g.n.e. doubled tomorrow he would then boast to us that the government managed to reduce the debt, when it is clear that one is simply expressed as a percentage of the other.

He also said that the opposition party has been attempting to convince Canadians of doom and gloom and how terrible things are in the country. We do not have to convince the Canadian people of anything. The results of the October 16 by-elections, when I and a number of my colleagues on this side had the honour to be elected, indicate that they already understand what things are like in this country. We are simply pointing out what a disastrous job this government has done managing the affairs of the country over the years it has been in office. If we preach doom and gloom we preach it to the government, and only in the sense that if its policies continue then we face disaster. We put sensible policy alternatives before the government, many of which it adopts, but as I pointed out before, it gets the words right and the music wrong. Ministers opposite did it in 1974 with wage and price controls, and they are likely to do it again with some of the things that are in the current budget.

It must also be a double standard to Canadians when this government talks about restraint. I believe the phrase the parliamentary secretary used was "leadership in restraint." I am sure that those same Canadians have noted that during the entire period of wage and price controls when wages, profits and prices were restricted, the spending increases of this government never fell below 10 per cent, never got down into the single digit figures, and soared as high as 16 per cent. That is a double standard of major proportions.

For the last three months this government has been talking about spending cutbacks and what a wonderful job it is doing in that area. Yet, even if you believe that the restraints it predicted for next year are actually going to take place—and based on the record of this government it is very difficult to believe anything it says—it will still have a 9 per cent spending increase next year. It will be the largest dollar spending increase it has had since 1974. And that is supposed to be some form of restraint? There are so many examples of double standards, playing with the figures, and misrepresentation on the part of this government that they are difficult to deal with adequately in the time we have today.

I would now like to comment on a document that appeared before this House in concert with the budget. It is a report on a study by the Department of Finance of the tax systems of Canada and the United States. The government in printing that study did not go into great detail about what precisely it was purporting to prove. The message seemed to be that things were pretty good here because this study purports to show conclusively, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), that the Canadian personal tax system compares favourably with the United States and, therefore, we are doing all right. I suppose we are to believe that the people of the United States are doing all right too, which is not the case.

This study does not show that the conclusion by the Minister of Finance is correct at all. For example, he says that "our business taxes are fully competitive." That is a highly arguable point and I intend to argue it later. The study itself is so highly qualified that it does not provide the conclusive demonstration he suggests. It notes five difficulties with the comparability of data, and two difficulties with the interpretation of tax burden, and it consistently confuses the differences between the tax burden and the tax rate. Finally, it concludes that the Canadian and U.S. tax systems are competitive but only in a general way. It makes no attempt to provide a conclusive demonstration.

Several of the conclusions in this study are misleading, particularly when they are used to claim that the Canadian tax system is competitive. I would like to point out five or six specific examples of the kinds of misleading information contained in it. For example, on page 57 of the study the second paragraph reads:

> The paper leads to the general conclusion that the Canadian tax system compares favourably with that in the U.S. In aggregate, while tax revenues of all levels of government were 1.8 percentage points of GDP higher in Canada than in the U.S. in 1977, Canadians had the benefit of publicly provided health care services and demogrant transfer payments in the form of family allowances and old age security pensions.

There are two points here. In the first place, the study clearly concedes that the aggregate tax burden as a proportion of the total economic activity is higher in Canada than in the United States. That concession alone is enough to make the findings of this study less than conclusive.

Secondly, it argues that if you exclude the cost of certain services provided by the government without cost—health care, family allowances, etc.—then the Canadian tax burden is lower. That argument is ridiculous. It does not hold water because the study deals with the tax burdens of the two countries, which is conceptually different from the study of the services provided by the two governments. Also, if one subtracts the cost of social services provided by the government, why should you not subtract other services? For example, why do they not include the higher spending on defence in the United States, which is a much greater portion of their national budget, in the comparison?

The common theme of the two reasons for disputing the study's argument is that the issue is tax burden and not spending habits. No one doubts that U.S. government agencies spent tax dollars on different items than Canadian government agencies. Surely the issue is the tax burden that is required to finance those activities, not what the activities are. That is part of a different argument that takes place in this chamber also, but at a different time.

● (1502)

Another item in this study concludes that non-income taxes form the same proportion of total revenues in both countries. In the United States there is greater emphasis on social security taxes than in Canada, and Canadian non-income taxes have their primary impact through indirect taxation, specifically the manufacturers' sales tax. The study maintains that this tax has little effect on international competitiveness as these taxes apply only to goods produced or imported and not to exports. It is probably true that it has little effect on international competitiveness but it is also a fair conclusion, although it is not mentioned in the study, that United States social security taxes probably have little effect on international competitiveness either.

On page 57, the study notes:

> (iii) Aggregate personal taxes (personal income taxes, social security taxes levied on persons and estate and gift taxes) are lower in Canada, as a percentage of personal income, than in the U.S.

On the next page it states—and this is the important part—as follows:

> In Canada, personal income taxes are a higher percentage of personal income than in the U.S. but this is more than offset by lower levels of social security and estate and gift taxes.

Even if we assume that these facts are correct, although there are a number of reasons to question the study, not only for the conclusions which seem to be used for political purposes, but in the way—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Parker: We only use facts and figures for statesmanship on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You should listen to some of your colleagues.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. gentleman opposite realizes, we are not responsible for members of the New Democratic Party or for members of the Social Credit party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: Even if we assume that these facts are correct, what is of interest is that Canadian unemployment insurance contributions are treated as a tax in this study. According to this document, the Department of Finance considers UIC contributions to be a tax. Surely, then, the government should cease referring to them as insurance premiums, as they do consistently. There is quite a difference between tax and insurance.

Another point in the study is that total exemptions and deductions are higher in Canada than in the United States. That may be true but it is irrelevant. The study has already conceded that personal income taxes are a higher percentage of personal income in Canada than in the United States. That being true, exemptions and deductions should also be higher.

On page 58 the study makes comparisons of disposable incomes as follows:

(v) Comparisons of disposable incomes (gross income plus family allowances where applicable, less income tax and employee social security contributions) of typical taxpayers in Canada and the U.S., indicate that most lower and middle-income taxpayers in Canada have higher disposable incomes than their American counterparts.

That is an extremely misleading statement for at least four reasons, Mr. Speaker. First of all, it includes family allowances. While family allowances are fairly included in disposable income, the spending of the government should not enter into calculations of the tax burden of the government. To do so creates a distortion which would allow industrial subsidies to be deducted from the tax burden of industry.

Second, the comparison deals with disposable incomes, not real disposable incomes. Several of the comparisons in the study deal with the period from 1972 to 1977. Over that period, while consumer prices in the United States increased by 44.9 per cent, in Canada consumer prices increased by 53.4 per cent. The 1972 United States consumer dollar was worth 69 cents in 1977, while the Canadian consumer dollar was worth 65 cents. A comparison of real disposable incomes might therefore tell quite a different story.

Third, unless the comparison is made over the period of a business cycle, it will be misleading. This government has been very cute over the last several months in carefully picking periods when restraint or accomplishment on economic fronts or on government spending fronts seems to have been present, but in fact has not been present in many of those cases, and certainly not over a full business cycle.

Fourth, the fact that Canadian incomes are higher should come as no surprise to anyone, especially the government. The parliamentary secretary referred to this already this afternoon. It was the imbalance in incomes and wage rates that led this government to impose wage and price controls in the first place. That is a suggestion that was made by this party and rejected categorically by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the 1974 election campaign, when he said, "We will never . . . etc."

That same imbalance in wage rates led to the devaluation of our dollar. The government is speaking out of both sides of its mouth. Out of the one side they claim that because Canadian disposable incomes are higher than those in the United states, there is no problem with our tax system and everything is dandy. Out of the other side they claim that because Canadian disposable incomes are higher than those in the United States, there is a need for wage and price controls and a devalued dollar. Wage and price controls fortunately are coming to an end, but until this government comes to an end there is no end in sight for the devalued dollar. They cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker.

On page 59, in paragraph (vii), the study states:

—the over-all effective corporation tax rate in Canada was some six percentage points lower than the U.S.

That is nothing new but you cannot fairly proceed from that to conclude that the over-all corporate tax burden is lighter. What the comparison leaves out primarily is the federal manufacturers' sales tax payable in Canada which has been reduced in the last budget by 3 per cent. It still exists, however, and it has a major effect on economic activity.

The economic theory of pricing suggests that all taxes—not only direct corporate income tax but indirect taxes and sales taxes paid by business—have to be reflected and are reflected in the price of the product. The product is priced to provide an after tax return on investment. If that applies, then both income tax and sales tax enter into price calculations. That is one reason that automobile prices, for example, are higher in Canada than in the United States despite the auto pact. Canadians pay a federal sales tax indirectly that United States residents do not. While the federal sales tax does not affect export competitiveness, it does affect domestic prices and thereby affects corporate income. In assessing comparative corporate tax burdens as this does, it must be included. Statements about the corporate tax rate completely ignore this.

Mr. Speaker, this is but one study that compares the tax systems of Canada and the United States. I have already indicated that I think its timing is suspicious, its conclusions dubious and its logic arguable. I should therefore like to quote from some other studies, particularly one done in 1976 by the private sector. It was prepared by the senior tax partner of Price Waterhouse and Company for a conference sponsored by the The Conference Board in Canada. As everyone in this House knows, this is a very effective, very professional, highly proficient and certainly unbiased organization. The senior tax partner of that firm said in the first paragraph of this study:

Making any sort of comparison of tax burdens between countries is a very complicated matter. By an appropriate choice of figures, it is possible to arrive at virtually any answer that you might desire. It is therefore possible to draw only very general conclusions from most international tax comparisons: in one set of circumstances, one tax system may appear more favourable than the other, but a change in the assumed circumstances can readily change the conclusion.

The thing that is wrong with the kind of comparison or statement that our interest rate is good because the United States interest rate has done thus and so is that it does not deal with where Canada is and where Canada is going.

Do I sense by your motion, Mr. Speaker, that I am almost out of time?

An hon. Member: We will extend it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is it agreed that the hon. member should continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Parker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and, I thank hon. members for their indulgence.

• (1512)

Comparisons that dwell on how well we are doing in relation to the United States or any other nation are not ultimately useful. Over the past few months the government has made considerable reference to the fact that Canada is a healthy country in a difficult world. The government have said that all the problems we face—inflation, unemployment and son on—are essentially caused by factors outside our borders and outside our control. They have said that inflation comes from the Arab oil price increases, unemployment comes from Hong Kong and Taiwan, and presumably our weather comes from Alaska! Nothing can be done by this government.

We have done much by way of argument against that theory of the government. However, we are not doing well compared to other nations. The figures are there and they are clear. Given our favoured resource picture and a well distributed and educated population, we are not doing even equally as well as other nations in the world with which we are compared, we are doing worse. It is not how well or how poorly we are doing in comparison to some other nation, it is how well we are doing on our own that is important. It is how Canadians regard the management of the economy and the effects of the policy that this government puts into operation that counts.

One should not point to other nations in the world with an equally high unemployment rate and then say our rate is not our fault. Every time things go well this government takes credit for it, or tries to; but every time things go badly the government blames somebody else. We were told by the Prime Minister that we in the opposition are enemies, that the provinces are enemies, and certainly the media are enemies for reporting all of this. "It is someone else's fault" is what the government says; "we are doing what is right" I do not think that doing what is right, if that is the case, would lead to one million people out of work. It would not lead to a 9 per cent inflation rate, to a devalued dollar, or to the kind of messing with figures that we have seen in this particular study that I have indicated, throughout the speech of the parliamentary secretary, and indeed throughout the speeches of most members on the government side.

The motion presented by the Social Credit party this afternoon reads:

[Mr. Parker.]

That this House deplores the double standard applied by the government in deliberately reducing the buying power of Canadian workers and families while allowing an increase in the interest rates which will result in higher revenues for financial institutions, an increase in the inflation rate, as well as a heavier public debt.

Although I agree with some parts of this motion, I think that the motion is too long. It could come down to a very few words; for example, "That this House deplores this government."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): May I congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, for getting your tongue around my new and extended title. I am still having difficulty with it myself!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A rose by any other name—

Mr. Andras: I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

This motion before us has had some comments made about it, and I will continue by adding mine. It manages to combine a number of misconceptions, as the previous speaker has said, in a very long sentence. First, I would like to respond to the concern over interest rates which has been expressed in the motion. Then for a few moments I would like to turn to the question of how Canadians are faring in terms of real income, and finally I would like to make some observations on the profit picture of our corporations.

None of us welcome increases in interest rates, but sometimes higher interest rates are a bit like old age—they are not so bad when one considers the alternative. What is the alternative in our present circumstances which have led the Bank of Canada to raise interest rates, admittedly several times this year, to their current levels? The governor of the Bank of Canada has set out the considerations we face in a clear and forthright way in recent speeches. He has stressed that the bank is very much aware of the concern over high interest rates.

Canada is currently importing more goods and services than it is exporting. Therefore, an inflow of money must be attracted from abroad to cover this deficit. We are indeed making progress on a number of aspects of this balance of payments deficit. Looking at trade in goods alone, we are in a surplus position. The surplus in the first three quarters of this year is running more than $1 billion higher than it was in the corresponding period last year. As the positive effects on trade of our lower dollar continue to build and we maintain our much improved domestic cost performance, particularly relative to costs in the United States, I think we can look forward to further improvement in our trade surplus and to a further reduction in our over-all deficit on goods plus services. But for the present, as I have said, we have to face the fact of that deficit and the necessity of attracting inflows of funds to cover it. If financial conditions in Canada are not such as to attract sufficient funds from abroad, we can expect further depreciа-tion, quite possibly substantial further depreciation, of our exchange rate.

We all know and recognize that depreciation of the dollar is not always a bad thing. It was also recognized that Canadian costs had become significantly out of line with costs in our trading position, particularly with our major trading partner, namely the United States, over the years up to 1976. We have to acknowledge that there has been a downward adjustment of the dollar, which was bound to occur sooner or later and had to occur if the conditions for growth of employment, output and investment in our manufacturing industries and many of our other exporting industries was to be re-established.

We also know that the devaluation or depreciation of the dollar has increased our rate of inflation. Unfortunately, that price had to be paid. Instead of the pessimism that is around for whatever reason or motivation, there is reason to believe that we have re-established a reasonably favourable competitive position which, with time, will allow us to move into a more sustainable balance of payments position.

We are also in a very critical period as temporary price and income controls come to an end. If we can continue to bring down the underlying rate of inflation our prospects for growth in employment and real income in the 1980s are very promising. If domestic inflation starts to flare up again, those prospects will fade.

The critical nature of the period immediately ahead and the recent pressure on prices because of devaluation which has already occurred, together with food prices, has led the government to provide some offset to immediate pressures on prices through the sales tax reduction which my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) announced the other night, through the earlier gas excise tax reduction in a previous budget, and indeed in our hope for deferral, if it comes about, of the oil price increase on January 1, 1979. That has led the bank and the government to be a little concerned to moderate any further pressures on costs and prices that could occur through exchange rate fluctuations. Thus there has been action to moderate the pace and scale of further exchange rate adjustments and to moderate the danger of a serious overshoot in that adjustment.

Foreign borrowing to supplement our exchange reserves has been part of this action, as have the actions of the Bank of Canada. In the governor's words, "we must give priority for a time to the need to maintain confidence in the Canadian dollar in foreign exchange markets". Faced with rising interest rates in international capital markets, this has required increases in our domestic rates. Hopefully, the need to maintain rates at current levels will be of relatively short duration. With further progress in reducing inflation we should be able to look forward to one of the rewards of lower inflation: lower interest rates on average. The government supports the policies of the Bank of Canada, including the interest rate response to the current situation. The alternative for our exchange rate and for inflation would be still less desirable.

I would like to turn to the second part of the motion before us, which alleges that the government is deliberately reducing the purchasing power of workers and families. There is a short and very justified response. It is simply: Nonsense! In saying that, perhaps it would be wise to state for the hon. member who put forward the motion a little more detail.

First let us look at government actions this year. A special personal income tax cut took effect last January to give an extra boost to purchasing power. The federally-financed retail sales tax cut provided a further boost.

In August, at the same time that I was announcing severe cuts across a wide range of government expenditures, the government rearranged the family allowances and child benefit system so as to give more assistance to lower income families. The real purchasing power of older Canadians with modest incomes is already protected by the full indexation of the old age pension, the guaranteed income supplement, and the Canada pension plan. But as part of a general policy of reallocating our admittedly limited resources to where they were most needed, and in recognition of the above average share which food occupies in the expenditure of lower income retired individuals and couples, the government also provided an additional increase, over and above full indexation, in the guaranteed income supplement.

Two weeks ago my colleague the Minister of Finance introduced his budget which, through the sales tax cut and the increase in the employment expense deduction under the personal income tax, will further assist the purchasing power of Canadians, and in particular working Canadians, in 1979. These measures come on top of full indexation of our tax system which is a very important form of protection against one of the ways in which inflation can reduce real purchasing power. This is a type of purchasing power protection which citizens in most other countries do not enjoy.

We must recognize that the counterpart of the very rapid growth in our real incomes which took place from 1970 to 1976 was that our competitive position got rather badly out of line. A pause in real income growth was an inevitable part of bringing our competitive position back in line and re-establishing the conditions for employment growth. The government's actions have been designed to help ease this aspect of the adjustment. Our expenditure restraint has allowed us to make major cuts in taxes which have cushioned this adjustment in real incomes.

As we go through this difficult period of adjustment to income levels which are sustainable given our productivity and competitive position, it is important not to lose sight of the fact that Canadians are still faring very well in terms of increases and the improvement in their standard of living compared with a few years ago. As the Minister of Finance noted, real after-tax income per employee in Canada increased by 7 per cent in the last three years, whereas it decreased by 2 per cent in the United States. This is a difference of about 3 per cent per year in the annual rate of increase. I am talking about real income.

Some critics have responded that Canada has had higher real income growth for an extended period, and that no special significance should be attached to the result for the last three years. The fact is that during the preceding ten years, the amount by which the average annual increase in real after-tax income in Canada exceeded the increase in the United States was only about half as large as during the last three years. Therefore, those figures and the significance of them represent a very current and immediate period.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on criticism about profits. Corporate profits have shown substantial rates of increase over recent quarters. Of course, profits typically vary a good deal up and down. In 1975 total corporate profits actually decreased 1.8 per cent whereas total wages increased by close to 17 per cent. In 1976, profits increased by almost 3 per cent whereas wages increased by almost 16 per cent.

In this period, when our costs were becoming increasingly out of line and the exchange rate adjustment had not yet occurred, profits were experiencing much of the initial squeeze which these adverse developments implied for the economy. If the squeeze had continued, we could have expected even less employment and invesment growth than has occurred, and much poorer prospects, in terms of the platform from which we now go forward. Last year the rates of increase in total profits and total wages were very similar, but this year the increase in profits is running ahead of wages, in part because profits tend to receive much of the initial benefit of the exchange rate depreciation. The share of profits is now back up to something like normal levels, though well below levels reached in 1973 and 1974.

Concern has been expressed that profit increases may worsen price performance, and also that high profits may be a target for wage negotiations—contributing in this way as well to a new inflationary spiral. In its report to the First Ministers Conference at the beginning of this week, the Centre of the Study of Inflation and Productivity noted the improved profit position of corporations, the moderation in labour costs and the recent reduction in federal sales tax. It expressed the view that corporations should be exercising a substantial degree of price and profit restraint, and urged firms to use the depreciation of the exchange rate to expand their markets rather than just raise their prices. I would add that the reinvestment of the improved profits is also critical to our short and longer-term prospects. Indeed, the budget has increased the encouragement provided by the tax system to such reinvestment.

Mr. Speaker, I hope Canadians in business, in the labour movement and in this House will read the report of the Centre of the Study of Inflation and Productivity very carefully. I hope they will quote it in context and not out of context. They will find in that report the concern about profits and prices to which I referred and which has already been raised in this House. They will also find that recent developments regarding profits are treated by that report in what I call the proper perspective. The report notes, for example, that while it appears that profit increases may have contributed somewhat to the rapid increase in food prices over the last year, they were by no means the major cause.

Given the problems we face and the shifting international economic conditions under which we must operate—and there is no rhetoric which will convince Canadians that there is not reality to the recognition that we do not live as an isolated community and that conditions in other countries do affect us—policy decisions in that context are difficult. I do not care who has to make them; the responsibility for making policy decisions in economic matters these days is not a simple thing. I think the actions of the government and of the Bank of Canada are best suited to encouraging sustained non-inflationary growth in employment, output and incomes.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in the debate on the excellent motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), and show the House how the government applies the double standard policy with regard to Canadian financial institutions.

The government is responsible for the extraordinary increase in the the revenues of banks and financial institutions in two different ways. First, when the government allows the Bank of Canada to raise its interest rate, it indirectly allows the institutions affiliated to the central bank to pass the increases on to the consumer. Naturally, the new interest rates allow chartered banks and other financial institutions to extend their profit margins. However, the small wage earner must suffer from those new interest rates and carry a heavier debt load.

It is not rare these days to meet people paying 20 per cent interest on their loans. Since wages do not go up as often as interest rates do, the difficulties occurring at the time of the loan prove insurmountable. The consumer must generally pay the original amount of his loan several times over. Second, the federal government must be held directly responsible for the exhorbitant increase in the annual revenues of financial institutions because, in a sense, the government sets the rules. Indeed, the federal government is responsible for the amendments made every ten years to the Bank Act, loan companies, trust companies and co-operative credit associations. So, the government sets the broad rules of the game of financial markets. Unfortunately, the government and its Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) accept the expansionist aspirations of large Canadian banking institutions and draft the legislation with those big bankers in mind. In this way, since the Bank of Canada was set up as a regulatory body the government has been the agent of big financiers by increasing their powers which are normally reserved for banks. The ordinary man must control his frustrations as he watches the big banks get richer while his purchasing power gradually shrinks.

Let us look at a few facts concerning those big institutions. Chartered banks take the larger part of the revenues coming from the financial sector. It is not a surprising statistic as the ten major chartered banks have 7,000 branches. Furthermore, the five major chartered banks alone control approximately 90 per cent of the Canadian financial market. This centralization of the financial sector accounts for the excessive concentration of financial power in the hands of a small minority of individuals and the enormous share of revenues they draw every year from various sources. The total assets of the chartered banks have increased at a rate of 400 per cent during the last ten years, a period which coincides with the last bank reform. The present government was already in power at that time. Banking revenues have therefore increased by 400 per cent while the purchasing power of workers and Canadian families was being constantly eroded by an ever rising rate of inflation and not too surprisingly, since the banks were one of the prime factors behind the increasing costs of production.

The assets of chartered banks were $31.7 million in 1968 while their total assets went up to $162.4 million in May 1978. This means then a $130.7 million increase over a period of ten years. When one considers that these institutions get a sizable part of their rollover funds through the deposits of low and medium income workers, it is sad to note that the excessive profit margins were not reflected at all in the interests paid on deposits and savings accounts. The total assets of banks have increased from 1972 and 1975 at the same rate they had increased during the entire previous century. These were the results of the 1968 bank reform. The Liberal government allowed the ceiling on interest rates to be removed when that review took place. The Social Credit Party of Canada then predicted the dangers such a measure held in store for the Canadian economy.

The hon. member for Roberval who moved this motion today also mentioned those risks in the debate on the anti-inflation act, when he said on October 20, 1975, in the House of Commons, and I quote:

> What, in my opinion, is more fantastic yet, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that all through his long speech, the minister did not refer to today's inadmissibly high rates of interest. The true inflation spiralling started when this government removed the chartered banks interest ceiling.
> I said so the day after that decision and I said here that Canada would experience its worst years of inflation ever. The first serious step should have been to freeze the Bank of Canada's discount rate at 4 per cent.

And the hon. member for Roberval was perfectly right. We have proof of it today. After discussing the performance of banks by reviewing their liabilities and assets, we should look at the revenues and expenditures of those institutions which reflect more or less the same conditions. Between 1968 and 1977, total revenues of banks increased by some 424 per cent, from $2,209 billion to $11,569 billion in 1977. The major part of these revenues comes more and more from accrued interests on bank loans. In 1968, the percentage of total bank revenues from interests on loans represented 70 per cent. In 1973, that percentage reached 80 per cent, while in 1977 it reached 84 per cent. During the same period, from 1968 to 1977, bank revenues from stocks, shares and other operating revenues went down from 30 per cent to 16 per cent, which means that chartered banks are progressively earning a larger share of their income from the public while the people get more and more into debt.

I feel it is unfair for the federal government to support a bank system that takes openly advantage of the people, but it is also a fact that banks pay interest rates on deposits and mortgages bonds and that the percentage of money they pay back to the public in interests is rather low. In fact, the increase in expenditures paid in the form of interests on deposits or mortgage bonds has been significantly lower than the percentage of revenues earned by banks as interest on loans. In other words, the average citizen gets ever lower returns on his investment while the banks ever increasing profits on the back of the small investor. The Minister of Finance feels that we save too much; the banks use children in their publicity, telling us that we are helping to increase the capital of the country, when in fact they are trying mostly to serve their own interests.

Let us now look at another aspect of banking operations. The percentage of expenses paid out by the banks in salaries, retirement funds and various other contributions, has decreased over the last ten years compared with their over-all expenditures, moving progressively from 26 per cent of their total expenditures to 20 per cent, and finally 19 per cent. So, as bank revenues increased, the money spent in salaries decreased. That fact proves clearly the present trend towards reducing the purchasing power of the consumers who work in the banking sector. That tendency is becoming even more alarming when one considers that during the years under study, the number of male employees in banks increased by 26 per cent, while that of female employees more than doubled. It seems, therefore, that the latter category of employees paid the bill for the prosperity of the financial sector, since women usually work for lower salaries. All those facts would explain, once again, why the purchasing power of the average consumer has decreased since the present Prime Minister came to power. Thanks to the elimination of certain limits during the 1968 Bank Act review, banks were in a position to gain a firm hold over the mortgage market and consumer loans, leading in these two areas to an extraordinary increase between 1967 and 1977. The mortgage market is one of the most profitable assets for banks. In 1967 banks held only $840 million in mortgages while in 1977, due to the government weakness towards chartered banks, their assets soared to $11.6 billion. Now chartered banks are threatening to control the mortgage market and reduce considerably the activities of other financial institutions such as trust companies which rely particularly on their own profitability on the financial market to go on making profits.

By adopting its irresponsible banking legislation, the government triggered off a reduction of competition on the mortgage market. And when competition diminishes, it always has a negative impact on the people who are no longer free in their financial operations with banking institutions. Because of the banking policy of this same government, banks also captured an ever larger share of the consumer loans market. In 1967, banks had the equivalent of $3.6 billion in assets of this category while in 1977 they controlled $20.2 billion—a 461 per cent increase in ten years.

In recent years, other financial institutions have considerably added to their assets but with no obvious benefits to the general public. Compared to the chartered banks, trust and mortgage companies increased their assets by 310 per cent between 1968 and 1977. These companies had boosted their income on loans by 700 per cent between 1972 and 1977 while raising their assets in mortgage loans and sales contracts by 400 per cent. Finance or consumer loans companies and savings banks in Quebec increased their assets by 164 per cent and 150 per cent respectively between 1967 and 1977. Fortunately, during the last ten years the assets of financial institutions such as caisses populaires and credit unions also rose by 480 per cent. Since the assets of this type of institution increase even faster than those of powerful chartered banks, it is easy to see why the public sees in them a people-oriented organization which is more likely to meet the needs of average citizens. But because the five major banks control such a large share of the financial market—90 per cent—the public support given to the "caisses populaires" and the credit unions is not enough to compensate.

In any event, it is quite obvious that Canada's financial system, which was reviewed and regulated by the Liberal government, has allowed the chartered banks to keep the people under their control as far as consumer credit is concerned. Between 1967 and 1977, the total amount of credit granted by major lenders increased by 272 per cent. In 1967, the two major lenders were the chartered banks, with 44 per cent of the market, followed by finance or loan companies, with 41 per cent of the market. Ten years later, under the aegis of this government's fiscal policy, the banks held 76 per cent of the total amount of consumer credit. The government was not satisfied with allowing the interest rate increase steadily and the Canadian people run deeper and deeper into debt. No. Moreover the national executive, thanks to banking regulations that show no concern for the needs of ordinary people, has let an increasing share of credit to be controlled by the banks. Such federal incompetence contributed to a decrease in the purchasing power of the Canadian people while allowing financial institutions to fill their coffers at our expense.

But the Social Credit Party of Canada is not only concerned with the increased revenues going in the financial system. We are also concerned, Mr. Speaker, with the fact that financial institutions and particularly chartered banks are getting more and more control over the market. All financial organizations should base their operations on the needs of the population as a whole, and this includes small and medium businesses, rather than concentrating on the demands of the affluent and big corporations. The needs of the people must be filled, and to that end a healthy competitive climate is needed where fairness is the rule of the game. Hovewer in introducing certain pieces of legislation this government has shown that it had no intention whatsoever to give the average citizen a larger share in the financial wealth of the country. I am referring of course to the proposals which are found in the omnibus legislation, Bill C-15. We were really looking forward to see how the government, in introducing the ten-year review of the Bank Act, would implement their stated intention to increase competition within the banking system. Until control of that system is returned to the people, under the leadership of a Social Credit government, an even minimal decentralization of financial institutions would have been welcome. But we had been waiting in vain. When the Bill passed, we saw once more that the government had one law for the rich and another for the poor. Their speech changes according to whom they are speaking to.

Let me take a few moments to elaborate on this, because that part of the legislation in the long run will affect the financial well-being of every Canadian. This is relevant to our motion because financial market structures and the way their contents is regulated influence the growth and profitability of financial institutions. This is why financial operations should be shared on fair basis by all institutions accepting deposits, in order that consumers may reap the benefits of a free market system. However, the government has gone against its stated intention and has introduced legislation which grants more power to chartered banks and does not attempt to defend the interests of average Canadians. Moreover, these same banks have convinced the government to reduce other limitations on their business powers. In fact, they will be invited to corner an even greater part of the housing mortgage market, even though this authorization will threaten the existence of consumer trust and loan companies. It is tragic that this government has once again refused to listen to the Canadian consumers who have been requesting that a ceiling of 6 per cent be again placed on interest rates.

In the part of Bill C-15 which concerns the creation of a Canadian Payments Association, the government has shown once again its lack of concern for ordinary citizens. The Canadian Payments Association, which will be established under this legislation, will have a very great role to play in the development of an electronic payment system. However, our government experts have forgotten to include proposals to guarantee that consumers will be represented on the board of directors of this association. Since all monetary operations between financial institutions will be eventually controlled by the CPA, it is imperative that the public should be able to influence to a certain extent the policy of this association.

In Bill C-15, the government betrays its desire to create even more chartered banks by making it more easy for them to set into the market. The performance of these institutions must have a more direct application to the Canadian economy. It is up to the government to include in its review of bank legislation provisions which will force financial institutions to retain 15 per cent of their profits to create an investment fund. This money should be invested in the sectors of the Canadian economy which need to be stimulated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allowed to him has expired. However, he may continue with the consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle).

Mr. Janelle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I also thank the hon. members on both sides of the House. As I was saying, the funds earmarked by chartered banks for investment purposes should be invested in Canadian economic sectors which need stimulation. The development of such sectors should be designed to increase the general welfare of all Canadians. That kind of controlled investment would provide employment, increase production and support our external trade.

The lack of such a proposal is a great deficiency in Bill C-15. However, considering the past performance of this incompetent government, is it any wonder that it has always encouraged financial institutions instead of looking after the long-term welfare of Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this occasion is quite unique in that the motion of the Social Credit party raises the subject of interest rates. I was very concerned when I heard the budget speech and listened to the ensuing debate from both sides. At this time it is important to discuss the question of interest rates in our domestic monetary and fiscal policies, and we owe a debt to the Social Credit party for bringing this subject forward.

Earlier this afternoon the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) participated in this debate. It was a rare occasion to hear a member of the government actually discussing the theory of budgeting and domestic monetary policy. Since I have been interested in the subject of monetary theory over the last 20 years, I could do no less than reply in kind.

The President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) had recited a series of myths which have surrounded the government since the war. I will not go through the entire series but I should like to deal with just one, and that is interest rates. He suggested that interest rates were like old age: we must face up to them and accept them because of the alternative. That same attitude has been prevalent in the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance ever since I have been here.

I recall with great vividness the days of the Diefenbaker administration. At that time a new government, without a single person in cabinet who had previously been in government, attempted to face up to the realities of governing the country. The only advice it received was that which came from the Department of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Even though the inflation rate at that time was approximately 1 per cent or 2 per cent, the department's officials and the Bank of Canada were worried. They began to push the idea that it was necessary to have higher interest rates in order to hold down inflation. Their idea was accepted by the government. In fact, businessmen flocked in and indicated that the idea was wonderful. Their job was to convert the debt.

Approximately $6.25 billion was converted to the higher rate of interest. The people in the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance deliberately set about raising the interest rate step by step. In a year and a half it rose approximately 20 per cent. Thus, the value of the bonds purchased by Canadians dropped by 20 per cent. Until this year, it was the greatest theft in the history of western civilization. I say that because a new record has been set today by the same mythology: if one wants to hold down inflation, one must raise interest rates. The same view is held by advisers to the American government. As I said in my budget speech two weeks ago, Canadians should not become involved in the same mess simply because the Americans have made such a fatal blunder.

I am not attempting to defend everything the minister said today. I realize the type of material which the nitwits in the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance put before every minister of finance. In view of the quantitative evidence we have today and which we did not have 20 years ago, it is thoroughly insulting when a faceless group of people advise the minister to stand up in the House and recite such a mythology.

Canadians are not interested in discussing theory. They know Canada is a strong country. They ask why we have been in a stagnant position for the last five years—when there is ample material wealth in our mines, forests and land, as well as wealth of human resources. The answer is in the fact that for the last 30 years the government has been receiving the same type of advice as the government of the United States. As the evidence develops, it is apparent that what Canadians thought was the truth 30 years ago is no longer the truth. The people we pay to run the Bank of Canada and advise the Minister of Finance should think more along these lines.

A little over a year ago, the economists of this nation met in Montreal in order to look at this problem. These disciplined economists who have been running this country for 30 years in business and in government finally faced up to reality and admitted publicly that they do not know where we have been, do not know where we are and do not know where we are going. These economists have now said this publicly, but economists have been saying this for four or five years in the United States. Yet still those who advise the governments of Canada and the United States are pouring out the same pap to those who are elected to govern the United States and Canada as they have for the last 30 years.

Let me get down to some details. In my budget speech I referred to interest rates. I will not take too much time, but I want to quote four lines as follows:

—I am simply saying, as bluntly and as candidly as I can, that to move along the road of raising interest rates as a device to keep our dollar from dropping is going to be costly for the people of Canada over the next year or so.

I went on to make an exhortation. I was not the only one who attacked this mythology that if you raise interest rates you will check inflation. The new member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. de Cotret), who has risen to high places among economists in this country, in making his maiden speech used these words, and his language is much better than mine. I do not know how to use all these words correctly, but I think he does. Let me quote him as follows:

In an environment in which there is rampant excess demand, inflation, shortage of manpower, shortage of goods and in which we are facing bottlenecks, certainly a higher level of unemployment traditionally has led to a decrease in inflationary pressures. But in an environment in which no such pressures exist from the demand side, in an environment in which there is ample excess capacity, in which demand is weak, and in which unemployment is hovering between the 8 per cent and 9 per cent level, the economic and social costs of unemployment, far from decreasing inflation, are fed right through the line, add to the over-all cost pressures on the economy, and contribute to a higher rate of inflation. At that point the policy prescription is clear: we can fight both unemployment and inflation at the same time. I remain firmly convinced that that is an objective which we should set for ourselves.

Let me emphasize that phrase "cost pressures", because that is something I do understand. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre has put into the language of the intellectual the precise words I would like to be able to say. What we have been saying in these last 30 years, and what we have been doing in that time in Canada and the United States, has been wrong. In other words, that you can help the unemployment situation and decrease inflation at the same time. But these people who advise the government keep standing up and saying, as we have heard here today, that you must keep a balance, because if you try to slow down inflation you are going to make more unemployment, and if you try to reduce unemployment you are going to create more inflation.

The fancy name for that is the Phillips curve. Every economist of any reputation at all today has admitted publicly that the Phillips curve is a myth, a false truth. Yet we have this government coming out at this late hour saying it must continue that type of thing.

Theory is all right, but I should like to bring this theory down to the subject of this motion, which is interest rates. To be able to draft domestic monetary and fiscal policy today, the government basically must accept the fact that we are not in a demand-pull type of inflation, which is all those experts based on Keynes learned 30 years ago. What we are in today is not a demand-pull situation. As the hon. member for Ottawa Centre explained, what we are in is a cost-push situation, and these cost-pushes are well defined. Number one is the growing cost of government in all countries, not just in Canada; number two is the money supply; and number three is interest costs. There are three more of them.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

I accept what the parliamentary secretary said today in a well reasoned speech, that the Bank of Canada is beginning at long last to grapple with the problem of oversupply of money. It set up in the last three years these targets, although in the last two or three weeks it has got off target. Generally speaking, the Bank of Canada has done a good job in respect of what it calls the M1 money supply, but not so good a job in respect of M2 and M3. At least the bank is trying on that one point.

While trying to control the money supply, which adds up to a cost, the bank has deliberately raised our bank rate six times in the last year. This means in dollars and cents a fantastic amount of money in cost, particularly when you consider cost of business expanding in what is termed capital intensive areas. Most of our business falls into that category. When you get through all the guff of discounting cash flow which business uses, and after looking at all the things government and private industries are doing, buying farms and homes, you will find that in this enterprise which is capital-intensive approximately 75 per cent of the cost is interest cost. With such a big proportion of our costs being interest, and interest being one of the main cost-pushes in inflation, any government that will allow the Bank of Canada or the officials of the Department of Finance to push a policy of raising interest rates should have its head examined.

This government in all honesty and conviction came out strongly this last year in favour of a floating dollar. The big reason for having a floating dollar is that it makes you independent of other countries in respect of handling your domestic monetary and fiscal policy. It is only when you have a pegged dollar or a dollar tied to the system of other countries that you take on the burdens of those other countries as well as the assets. When your dollar is floating, each country is able to get at its basic domestic problems of inflation and unemployment. As a matter of fact, it is by having a floating dollar that you allow the world system to come in and help. When we get into trouble domestically the results show up in the value of our dollar internationally, and that is when the world system provides an advantage so that we can recover from our troubles. When you try to fool around with a dirty float in order to control or protect the value of your dollar, either by borrowing big sums abroad as this government did, or by this horror of horrors of raising interest rates, you cut off these world forces from moving in to help.

I want to close my remarks with some figures relating to costs. Suppose we allow the dollar to float. There has been a great deal of discussion quantitatively about what this costs us. The minister said today that when our dollar goes down our inflation rate rises. But by how much? One statement from the bank through the Department of Finance was that every drop of one cent in the international value of our dollar costs us one-tenth of a point in inflation.

We have the quantitative analysis theory of Professor Mundell, a Canadian who moved to the United States and who says that over the long run a drop of one point on foreign exchange increases inflation one point in Canada. As far as I am concerned, the cost is somewhere in between that one-tenth of a point and one point. Nobody seems to be able to say for sure—I have talked to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and other people about it—but the figure is probably halfway between. In other words, if our dollar drops one point our inflation rate costs go up half a point.

Let us now take a look at this in big figures. Let us suppose that this is applied to our total gross national product of over $200 billion. One per cent would equal $2 billion and half of one per cent would equal $1 billion. Therefore, if our dollar drops one point we can expect approximately $1 billion in extra costs for that year.

What would be the cost in interest rates? Our bank rate has gone up by roughly 50 per cent, from just over 7 per cent to 10.75 per cent, which means that our prime rate has gone up at least 30 per cent, from somewhere around 8 per cent to 11 per cent. It would be fair to say that the ordinary individual who borrows has had an increase of 10 per cent in his interest costs. If we take 10 per cent of this figure of $200 billion, we get $20 billion. On that basis, if the dollar had been allowed to float the people of Canada would have paid in a year's time $1 billion in extra costs, but by this monkeying around with extra interest rates it will cost this country in 1979 at least $20 billion. That is a fantastic burden for the people of Canada to carry. Even if you cut that figure in half and make it $10 billion, it is still a large burden because there is a great difference between $10 billion and $1 billion.

In my speech I have tried to emphasize, at my level of language, that by choosing the route of raising interest rates as a means of controlling inflation is a costly procedure, ten to one over letting the dollar float. The country is struggling to get out of a period of stagnation, but it is loaded down with the cost of interest which ultimately stops us from going ahead.

What happens in the next few months is very important to the government. They are gambling that the few measures in the current budget will keep the country moving along fast enough so they can say that the country is improving. If this load of interest ever takes hold, as it will, it will send us down into the pits again, and the government will have only themselves to blame. Surely there must be someone over there who takes the time to read what the evidence is. They have all heard of Mundell and Laffer, and they have all heard the Republicans of the United States saying the same thing we are saying. Common sense would indicate that what this motion says is not, as the government would have us believe, that the rise in interest rates is not inflationary, but that the rise in interest rates is inflationary; and therefore it is essentially sound on that point.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to be able to participate in this debate today. I would like to look at some of the questions raised by this motion. I have listened with interest to all the speeches that have been made in this debate. Although there are conflicting philosophies, there is, I believe, on the part of all those who have participated, a sincere desire to contribute some worth-while suggestions to the economic problems which we face in the country in the dilemma which governments find themselves at this particular juncture in history. I refer to governments of all political stripes, because if we look at the different governments across the nation, where there are political labels different from that of the federal government, they are doing no better than we are, unless there are extraordinary circumstances such as is the case in Alberta or areas which are being substantially helped by the federal government.

One of the proposals in this motion is that the House deplores the double standard of the government. I have noticed that only one speaker referred to that today, and he did so facetiously. The motion also talks about reducing the buying power of Canadian workers. It can be proven that the buying power of Canadian workers is in fact not being diminished. Indeed, I know of few countries where it costs workers as little as it costs workers in Canada to buy food, shelter, fuel, and the activities of leisure. So, by whatever stand one wants to pursue the fact is that in Canada we are doing very well on a relative basis compared to the other industrialized countries.

I would like to put a few figures on the record to prove my case. If we take a look at the real disposable income per capita and per employee in Canada as compared to the United States over the period of time this government has been in power—excepting this year because the figures are not in yet—taking 1968 as the base year of 100 and going through to 1977 we find that real personal disposable income per capita in Canada has risen from 100 to 151.9, whereas in the United States it has risen from 100 to 133. If we look at the real disposable income per capita for employees in Canada, we see that it has risen from 100 to 124, whereas in the United States it has risen from 100 to 112.3.

In other words, between 1968 and 1977 real personal disposable income per capita in Canada rose by 51.9 per cent and only by 33 per cent in the United States. Real personal disposable income per employee rose 24 per cent in Canada and 12.3 per cent in the United States. The United States, of course, is the foremost of the industrialized nations and the standard by which all other nations are judged.

Using that standard, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that we have done quite well in Canada. We have made much progress in distributing wealth but, of course, there is always more progress to be made. We have not solved all our problems and no one would suggest that, except, perhaps, some rightwingers who do not believe in distribution of the nation's wealth.

We have programs of social services to help those who are unable to earn their own living, to help the ill, the maimed, the abandoned. We have old age security and the guaranteed income supplement as well as the spouse's allowance, all of which combine to make one of the best programs of any nation in the world. We look after senior citizens, those who have contributed to the growth and development of our country. No one should apologize that we make these transfer payments to our senior citizens, because if anyone had earned that kind of security for their twilight years, it is those who have built this country.

We have mothers' allowances and the youth allowances which are now being refined. In fact, for those in need they are being increased by something in the order of $160 per child per year. That additional sum will be paid as a lump sum payment from the federal treasury at the end of each fiscal year.

We are redistributing wealth through two of the most ambitious social programs ever undertaken by any government. I refer, of course, to hospitalization and medicare. I cannot stress enough the importance and value of those two programs. I would be the last to suggest that there have not been abuses of them or that the programs do not need some fine tuning. The fact is, however, that in Canada today we are raising a whole generation that has no idea what it means to pay a security-destroying medical or hospital bill. Those have been valuable social tools. I am sure there are senior citizens who are receiving first class medical treatment today who would have otherwise died long ago because they could not afford to go to a doctor or hospital. There are children growing up to be strong, useful and productive members of society who might have died because their parents could not afford to give them needed medical attention. Those are only two of the benefits of hospitalization and medicare.

Going back just thirty years, I think of my own family situation. My brother had to go to hospital for an appendectomy and my father had to borrow the money for that rather simple surgery from a bank. I am not about to go on any great political or emotional binge attacking the banks. Obviously, everything is not right with them or, indeed, with other things; but at least the banks serve a purpose and I think we should be responsible in our criticisms of them.

In the list of social programs, two others must be mentioned. The first is the Canada Pension Plan which is providing a source of security particularly for workers who are unorganized and do not have strong unions to negotiate a pension plan. All workers in Canada can look forward to a guaranteed source of income at retirement and will not have drastically to reduce their standard of living or beg from their families for shelter, food or any of the necessities of life.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we have unemployment insurance which has already been mentioned. This is also a social program which has been abused somewhat by workers but there have also been abuses by employers. I will not say any more about that today as I have already expressed my views on previous occasions.

A negative motion such as the one before the House is symptomatic of the negativism that is rampant in the country today. I wonder why.

Mr. Ellis: I wonder why!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): One of the reasons is sitting over there, Mr. Speaker. There are people who see advantage in poor-mouthing our country. There are people who have not said one positive thing about Canada in this House in the last two years, I am sure. That is their choice, but let us look at how Canadians live.

There are all sorts of amenities in Canada today that most Canadians did not dream of a quarter of a century ago or even fifteen years ago. By any standard we are better off than almost any other nation in the world. That is not to say there are no problems, but I suggest we will not solve our problems by failing to recognize our successes. A nation's successes are important to the nation just as an individual's successes are important to the individual. If there is no sense of accomplishment, of achievement, of pride, then the individual will wither and so will the nation.

I urge those who seem to enjoy going about wringing their hands and complaining about how awful things are and what a terrible state the nation is in to start thinking about how gifted this nation is, how gifted its citizens are to have the advantages that have been bestowed upon them through divine providence. I urge them to be more thankful and less inclined to poor-mouth our achievements.

In the debate today we heard many criticisms and not much of a positive nature. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae), for instance, suggested there were two things that the review of the Bank Act should do but is not doing. One was to guarantee that banks will not make excess profits. That is a very laudable objective and I do not think anyone would argue with it. I am not so sure that it is always the obligation of the government, however. I would expect the New Democratic Party to put forward that view, of course, but surely those great lip service proponents of free enterprise and the free enterprise system, the Tories, would not agree that government alone is responsible for that. Surely market forces must be responsible to some extent for making the banks competitive and for seeing that they do not make excess profits.

The second mandatory condition was that a certain percentage of excess profits be used to subsidize some types of borrowing. If there are to be no excess profits, then certain percentages of nothing is nothing. So there would be no money to set aside in subsidization of certain types of borrowings. His argument is in effect a self-defeating argument.

I listened to the argument of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). I must say I always enjoy his speeches; he delivers them with such power and force and such experience that they are a joy to listen to. But when he starts talking about a false truth, I become confused. One would only expect to hear that from the official opposition. Indeed, I did enjoy his explanation of the floating dollar but I do not agree with it. The floating dollar, as he said, is a way to align our economy with the other economies of the free world. But there is certainly more to it than that.

I want to return more specifically to the motion, which talks about a heavier public debt, and I want to spend just a few moments dealing with that. I will deal with it by going back over a period of 25 years. In 1952 the per capita debt in Canada as a percentage of the gross national product was 42.9 per cent. In 1968 when this government came to power the debt as a percentage of gross national product was 22.7 per cent, almost half the figure for 1952. But in 1977, Mr. Speaker, the debt as a percentage of the gross national product on a per capita basis was 14.1 per cent. In other words, it was one-third of what it was in 1952 in percentage terms. That indicates we have been doing pretty badly, doesn't it? It indicates the bottom has fallen out of our world and Canada will come tumbling down!

I know my time is up and I do not want to take extra time. The party who proposed this motion has another speaker and I do not want to deprive him of his time. I will conclude by saying that although we have problems in Canada, we are not on the verge of bankruptcy and we are not on the verge of destruction. We are a strong, healthy country and Canada is still the best country of any in which to live.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At the expense of not more than 30 seconds, could I ask the hon. member a brief question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): This can be done only with unanimous consent and with the agreement of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, in the hon. member's remarks he mentioned that a number of members in this House had been bad-mouthing the country. I know a lot of people who have criticized the government and its policies, but would he please name one member in this House who has bad-mouthed the country?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, he only wants to take up to 30 seconds—

Mr. Ellis: Name just one.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I will not get into the business of naming individual members. All one has to do is to listen to speeches made by some members in this House and outside the House and it will be clear that there are members of this House who are spreading doom and gloom across the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, our parliamentary system provides for allotted days, and they are useful, I think. It is a kind of closed retreat for participating members. It is the same as in other areas, the majority does not participate, but those who do so derive some benefits. In any event, the purpose of those allotted days is to bring the government to reflect on their administration, and also to blame them if necessary and to submit solutions to them. The hon. member who spoke before me seemed a little offended by the criticism made on this side of the House. I for one think that it is our responsibility to make positive criticism. However, I understand that hon. members on the government side want to demonstrate the achievements of this government.

● (1642)

I quite agree on this point. But to say that we propose motions which mean nothing is unacceptable in my opinion because this is an insult for this institution. I do not believe that a member of parliament could ever propose a motion on an allotted day simply for the pleasure of opposing the government. Mr. Speaker, today's motion proposed by the Social Credit Party, of which I am very proud, has created much interest in this House, and I have heard the comments of several members. I was struck by those made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose-Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) earlier. His statements really surprised me, and not because I do not agree with them as I believe that some of the things he said were quite logical and in line with the motion under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), who proposed the motion, made a very good speech. I believe that he talked most seriously about the problems and that he followed the purpose of the motion by showing that our public financing system has become outdated because of the time in which we live. There are attempts to change all sorts of things, but none to change the financial system, which is not totally bad in itself, but which should be corrected if we truly want our country to become richer and each Canadian to be ensured of the security which is a basic aspiration of every individual, as well as the means to make a good living.

If we want this, changes will have to be made. The motion sums up in a few words the present financial situation. Mr. Speaker, the debt and the interest rates are mentioned in the motion. Everyone is aware of these problems, but I would like to quote a few figures as this is the cancer which creates inflation and unemployment and erodes our economy.

We have an economy lacking the fresh, pure blood it needs in order to perform well and provide everybody with his minimum requirement.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that we have gone a long way in the past thirty years. It would be a pity if we had not progressed but something else has progressed over the last thirty years and that is our public debt wich has increased and is now growing more rapidly than ever before. The last budget shows it will increase tremendously. It is this type of public financing that we object to. We are not blaming the people who make up the government, definitely not. The sponsor of this motion made this point quite clear. We are not attacking persons but a government which is now running off track and allow some individuals in our country to make windfall profits at the expense of the majority. This is why in its wording our motion stated that this government has applied a double standard.

Economic Policy

Mr. Speaker, in 1867 the debt of Canada was then $75 million. Back in those days it was acceptable! In the following years and until 1914, it rose to about $545 million. It was not too bad yet. But in 1939, at the outset of the second world war, that debt had reached a level of $3,700 billion. When the present government took over, our national debt was close to $33 billion. Nine years later, in 1977, the federal debt had doubled to $67 billion. Well, these are figures of the past. Let us turn to the future and see what it has in store, in order to know what must be done to correct the situation. Well, Mr. Speaker, in this book I have here, the budget speech made in this House by the Minister of Finance on November 16, I find statistics and figures. Such is the minister's role. He puts the budget forward, so he must supply figures. And his figures are quite revealing. The motion now before us includes statements.

The budget deficit forecast for 1978-79 is roughly $11.5 billion. It may still increase, because there are a number of months to go till March 31. This, Mr. Speaker, includes interests to the tune of $6.5 billion. And this means we are sinking deeper into debt this very moment. This the people have to know, they are old enough to swallow it. It is easy to use lofty and make all sorts of suggestions, but our duty is to be specific and to go to the bottom of things. It is somewhat more difficult, but it is needed and it works in my view.

In 1978-79, according to the budget, we will have to pay $6,950 million interest on the public debt. This means $13 million a day. Capital indebtedness increases $31 million a day. The total is $44 million a day. My intention is not to make ministers mad at me, it is not to have them tell me next week: The hon. member blames our expenditures but he is asking us for more projects, more money in his constituency, he is asking for this and for that. That argument I understand perfectly. We are not against normal government expenditures. What we are against is giving away more and more each year to the people who control the majority of the money supply. This is what we are against.

I will quote figures. In the current budget, forecasts for 1979-80, the minister says there will be a $13 billion deficit. This means $35 million a day, and $8,250 million will have to be spent on interest. And what does that mean, $22 million a day? It means three totals a day. On the forecast side, $57 million. This means $100 more a day per capita on interest alone.

The hon. member who spoke before me pointed out that family allowances and others had been increased which is fine by me; but if they had been increased to the same extent as the gifts made to those who control the money supply in this country, I think our families would be happy. In any event, I very willingly accept with many thanks all that can be done to help our neediest families, those which do not have the income required to meet their needs.

Mr. Speaker, it is expected that by March 31 our national debt will amount to the pretty sum of $80 billion. How shall we ever be able to balance that budget? Well, taxes will be levied. And on whom? The government itself says so, on page 24 of the budget speech, under revenue: Direct taxes, persons: $20,620 million. For the current year, 1978-79, the amount was $18,360 million; and for the year prior to that, $17,245 million. We realize that personal income tax is progressively increasing and follows the same curve as our national debt and interest rates.

Now as concerns corporate income tax, whether for national or multinational corporations, in any event I take the figures as they are presented. In 1977-78, $5.229 billion, 1978-79, $5.730 billion and in 1979-80, $6.375 billion. So we can see that corporate income tax did not go up at the same rate as personal income tax. This is why the motion says: "double standard", and if I had the time to look objectively at the total revenues of private citizens in Canada and that of corporations, it would be interesting to realize that their revenues are generally higher than those of private citizens. This is why we consider that there should be an adjustment between personal income tax and corporate income tax. We might be told with some reason that we should give a chance to big corporations if we want them to create jobs and process our natural resources to manufacture the things our people need.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that such a significant difference is not needed between private citizens' income and corporate income to have corporations interested in investing in our country and making our natural resources available to the public. I urge the government to study seriously the situation and to make the necessary changes. I understand that it takes guts and determined men to face those powerful corporations that are accustomed to get almost the whole pie. They must be told: Take only half of it and leave the rest for others. I understand that it takes guts, but we have the power to do it in parliament as parliament is the highest authority and we are prepared to support the efforts of government members in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, I do not speak through my hat and the new minister, the former president of the Treasury Board is listening to me carefully, but I am not sure that I have convinced him but, in any case, I will try to convince him with an article published in Le Devoir on May 24, 1978, which reads as follows:

Bank of Montreal profits up by 50 per cent in first quarter

And who said that? The chairman of the board and chief executive of the Bank of Montreal. We are not against profits but while they ask people to tighten their belt and cooperate with the authorities to stimulate the economy, we should also look to that side to see what is going on, apply the brakes and try to do something.

I for one am not in a position to evade income tax because I have not enough income. If I had a higher income I might be tempted to do so but in any event the article says this: After a two year investigation the government last month found out a terrible situation in chartered banks. The results have been made public by Mr. William Kenneth, general bank inspector, who appeared before the parliamentary finance committee. When the investigation was completed Mr. Chrétien decided to plug a fiscal loophole in the budget he recently tabled in the House of Commons. He had announced that two well known methods of financing large Canadian companies by chartered banks would no longer be exempt from income tax. These are conditional interest bearing bonds and privileged shares. Investigators found out that the banks were reporting incomes from those sources as non-taxable dividends. That resulted in a loss for the federal and provincial treasuries of over $500 million with an anticipated loss for fiscal 1979-80 of some $150 million. That happened at the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. It is part of the lid that was lifted and under which it was discovered that there were irregular things going on. It is the duty and the function of government members to put some order in that area as well as in all others.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the cabinet itself is aware that there are improvements to be made. They could do something about it but they wait too long, they do not act fast enough. The situations get worse while the remedies are being prepared, and when the remedy is administered, the disease is already too advanced. You have to start over again. It is the weakness of our democracy which is somewhat slow in proceeding when it comes to applying remedies. Mr. Speaker, not so long ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) made a statement, and she is right. That is why I say that government members are aware of the situation. She said, and I quote from Le Droit of May 29, 1978:

> The poor families' share of income has hardly changed since the end of World War II—

Of course incomes have increased but because of inflation expenses have gone up as well so you remain at the same level. It is like two barrels connected by a pipe—if you put water in one barrel, automatically the water rises in the other one and always stays level. That is the situation of families. The minister went on to say, I quote:

> That leads to the conclusion that in spite of their good intentions, richer Canadians manage to get out of recessions on the backs of poor people.

I imagine she was referring to individuals, but you can apply the same reasoning to the economic structure which is in the hands of a small group of men who manage to get out of recessions on the backs of workers, on the backs of small people, who manage to do so because they are given certain privileges at the expense of workers, at the expense of the masses. It is up to the government to guarantee that there is as much justice as possible in a country, and that is the only way we are going to have harmony in this country, that we will be able to live together in harmony, despite our language, religions or social differences.

A federal-provincial conference was held here this week. It was a rehash of the same things that have been said over the last 50 years. The provinces want more income and the federal government tells them: Tax, if you want more, we hardly have enough for ourselves. Mr. Speaker, I think that the solution to all this is to do what Mackenzie King said 43 years ago, he stated at some point, and I quote:

> Once a nation loses control over its currency and its credit, it does not matter much who in that nation makes laws. Once in control, money lenders will ruin any country. As long as control over currency and credit has not been restored to the government and acknowledged as being its most obvious and most sacred responsibility, any talk of democracy and parliament supremacy is vain and futile.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House, according to Standing Order 58(11), that the proceedings on this motion have expired. The House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock, in accordance with Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

GRAIN

CALL FOR INDUSTRY MEETING TO IMPROVE GRAIN MOVEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Developments in several country elevator points reveal a complete breakdown in car allocation and co-ordination within the grain handling and transportation system. Last week in Alberta, the points of St. Paul, Fort Saskatchewan and Bonnyville were allocated several cars for which there were no orders. These cars remained on sidings for a week and subsequently were returned empty, in spite of the fact that the elevators were full of grain. Today this has been repeated again at the delivery point of St. Paul that received more cars for which there are no orders. Whether these developments are occurring by design or through sheer incompetence is not known. What is known is that this disorder and chaos must be resolved without further delay. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the Minister of Transport act immediately to convene an "emergency grain summit" which would draw together representatives of all components of the grain handling, marketing and transportation system to deal with this crisis and to arrive at solutions in the presence of all parties concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ALBERTA'S PRECONDITIONS FOR ACCEPTING VIETNAMESE REFUGEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House expresses its regret that Premier Lougheed of Alberta does not reflect the generosity of the people of his own province who want to do as much for refugees as people in other poorer provinces, and urges him to withdraw the unfortunate requirements which he has stipulated to be preconditions for accepting Vietnamese refugees to the province of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be introduced only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMMUNICATIONS

CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON TELECOMMUNICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the announcement of the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) of a consultative committee on the implications of telecommunications for Canadian sovereignty, which is supposed to produce specific recommendations on the restructuring of the Canadian telecommunications system by the first week of February, 1979, and that this monumental task involving the public domain is to be performed behind closed doors without public participation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the terms of reference of this committee be expanded to at least have representative public briefs from interested parties to give some validity to the exercise, otherwise the government acknowledge that this complex and fundamental issue should be the subject matter of a proper royal commission, so that the public will not have the impression that the just society of years ago has now become the closed society.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION OF SITUATION OF VIETNAMESE REFUGEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a question of urgent and pressing necessity, one for which I know I will have the full support of colleagues to my left in the New Democratic Party. It arises out of the growing loss of life amongst refugees fleeing Vietnam by any means possible and, from that, the recurring crises in placing substantial numbers of these people in the few countries willing to receive them.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That parliament urges the government to send, as it frequently did in earlier troubled times, an emissary to Hanoi to determine first-hand exactly what appalling conditions of discrimination and persecution exist within the United Socialist Vietnam which force so many people to flee at great risk to their lives.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM FOR INDIAN STUDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) take immediate action to reassure the House and the Indian community that the successful educational program of introducing Indian students to urban life, the ANA program, such as that at the Rideau High School in Ottawa, will be continued; and, further, that the minister immediately transmit this decision to the parties involved, in particular the Indian students who are concerned they will be forced to return to their homes in remote communities lacking the facilities to carry out adaptation, not assimilation, programs.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FUNCTIONS OF NEW MINISTRY

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the new President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. I see he has just arrived. There is a good deal of public confusion about the role and the responsibilities of this new minister. The original press release indicated that he had responsibility for reviewing and approving—and, therefore, presumably, disapproving—policies and legislation emanating from the constituent ministries.

On the CTV program Question Period, the minister said he had a co-ordinating role, which is something quite different. Perhaps this confusion could be cleared up if the minister would indicate to the House just what functions he will be performing in his new ministry which heretofore have not been performed. After all, there is a cabinet committee; there are responsibilities in the Privy Council office and the Prime Minister's office for co-ordinating. What is this minister going to be doing which the government has not been doing up until now?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I did not hear the beginning of the question but I think I know the gist of it. There will be a full opportunity for the House to involve itself in the functions of this new ministry in a formal way very shortly. It is just a matter of finding House time so that we can place before the House a proclamation emanating from the ministries and Ministers of State Act, which I think provides for two days' debate. That should be before the House without much further delay. At that time, all these questions can be dealt with in more detail.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that, but yesterday the minister indicated that this would be coming forward today. Now we learn it will be within the next couple of weeks. In the meantime, I think the House and the public would like to know just what the minister is doing and what he is going to do.

I would appreciate getting some answers now. In particular, I wonder if the minister can tell the House whether this new board over which he presides will have responsibility for approving all policy, spending programs and legislation emanating from the lesser ministries which make up his board, and will he be reviewing existing policies and legislative programs of these lesser ministries, or just new ones which will be coming forward? What, precisely, will the minister be doing?

Mr. Andras: Again, I think this would be dealt with better and in more detail by an examination of the order in council from which the mandate of the new ministry and the board develops; and I believe notice of that will be given today. This will be available to all hon. members within the next few hours.

Mr. Andre: During the CTV program Question Period, the minister stated that the government should, "get the devil out of the way and provide a stable set of ground rules for industry for a period of time". I will ask a simple and straightforward question which the minister can answer. Does this mean that this minister will no longer approve the nationalization of private sector companies, at least for a period of time?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, my comment about getting out of the way indicated that in some cases there are at the federal jurisdictional level, as there are at provincial jurisdictional levels, some duplications. There are even some among some departments of the federal government. We want to identify and rationalize those duplications. I did not go on to indicate precise project approaches or disapprovals to which the hon. member is now referring.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the president of the "eco-dev" board. The minister said, on November 25 in the Globe and Mail, that what is needed is an action board, not a talkfest. He went on to say there is just one hell of a lot to be done. Both those comments indicated that the government has not been taking action in the economic development field.

Is it a fact that this board was set up because the government felt there had been lack of action in the last few months and years in the economic development field, and that it is the job of the board to overcome this lack of action and talkfest and give the country some action? Is that what the minister meant?

Mr. Andras: Very much to the contrary, Mr. Speaker. This is intended to be an improvement of the already beneficial programs and policies of the federal government in support of industrial and economic growth. The suggestion that we should never make changes toward improvement is something with which I cannot agree.

One of the issues that came out of this, particularly in response to the very many positive recommendations of the sectoral studies and the two-tier report, is that they have asked us on many occasions to implement policies which are already in existence. This begs the question of a better understanding of just what this government has done over the last several years, and the indication that across the length and breadth of this country there can be a better information system from this government, to say nothing of the co-ordination of policies between us and the provincial governments.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has set himself an impossible task, if he thinks he is going to convince people that this government has done any economic development. The Prime Minister has said that the difference between this board and the ministry of finance is that the ministry of finance will retain macro-economic responsibility, while the president of the "eco-der" board takes on the micro-economic sphere. The Minister of Finance did not know what micro and macro meant: he said he had not studied that in school.

Could the president of the economic development board inform the House whether this is the body-line of jurisdiction, and could he tell us what is in this macro—and I do not mean a mackerel—in the macro area, and what is in the micro area, so that the public will understand the difference in jurisdiction between the ministers?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think it is interesting that the hon. member himself does not understand, having been around these systems for some time.

The responsibility for setting global economic policy, monetary and fiscal policies and taxation clearly remains, and should remain, with the Minister of Finance and the ministry of finance. The economic development board will be co-ordinating the more direct programs of assistance to industries through DREE, through Manpower and Immigration, through Trade and Commerce, Labour and a series of other direct programs of assistance to economic growth. There is a very clear association between them, and I think they are very compatible.

Mr. Crosbie: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe that the Minister of Finance knows any better now than he did before what the difference is, Mr. Speaker. How can the ministry of finance have a global responsibility? Is the UN to be displaced by the ministry of finance?

The minister said on Thursday, November 25, that the board will help industry cut through red tape in dealing with the federal government. This implies that there was too much red tape before. How is the board going to help industry cut through red tape, when setting up the board puts in another level in the decision-making process before anything goes to cabinet? How is this going to help cut the red tape? Would he please elucidate, so that the red tape cutters of the world will be able to applaud him? How is he going to do this?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I find this extremely interesting. The other day I saw a newspaper quotation of the hon. Leader of the Opposition complaining that this was another idea we had stolen from the Conservative party.

Mr. Fraser: The trouble is, you do not understand it.

Mr. Andras: If that be the case, the hon. member is indicating that they have not studied their suggestion at all.

Mr. Clark: We know what we would do.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think this will be an improvement. There is a wide range of policies and programs in the federal government which are designed to assist industries, not only through the departments to which I have referred but others. I think it lends itself to improvement by a one-stop information provision, a one-stop delivery system so that people do not have to go from one department to another to get a co-ordinated answer. I see great opportunities ahead to improve the operation of this government and this parliament by the success which I hope hon. members opposite would wish me in this new function.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACTION TO BRING DOWN PRICE OF FOOD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I say to the President of the Treasury Board that just because the Conservatives come up with a bad idea does not mean the government has to steal it.

I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister on another matter entirely, the change in food prices. Last June, the cabinet on at least two occasions discussed the possibility of the re-emergence of inflation during the summer and fall. Considering that the AIB report which came out on Friday revealed that food prices are up 15.2 per cent over prices a year ago, could the Prime Minister tell the House what the government has done to implement certain ideas discussed at those cabinet meetings last June specifically to bring down the price of food, not to deal with the cushioning effect but to bring down prices?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been dealt with several times by the Minister of Finance, again in his budget and, again, by the various ministers in dealing with the subject of inflation.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This is precisely why I asked the question. The statements that have emanated from the Minister of Finance and others in recent weeks and months have produced no new ideas and no new policy directives to bring down the price of food. More specifically, since at the June 20 meeting of the cabinet it was decided, and I quote, that "ministers review by the end of September, 1978, the performance of food prices", and also at that meeting it was decided that certain specific measures which could be implemented to bring down the price of food might be acted upon, I ask the Prime Minister, did this review take place in September and, related to that question, what specific measures have been taken to bring down the price of food, or what measures will be taken?

● (1422)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what document the hon. member is quoting from, but if it is a cabinet document you would understand that I do not wish to answer the question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been in the House longer than I have, and I would have thought he would know, quite apart from the source of the quotation—which is from his cabinet meetings—that the relevant question is, what has the government done about the escalation of food prices? Did the cabinet discuss it last June and, if so, does he now take it to be important that food prices are escalating at 15.2 per cent and what does this government intend to do about it?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the statistic is concerned, the hon. member can verify it as easily as I can. But I repeat, I have always refused to comment on questions based on cabinet documents or purported to be based on discussions in cabinet.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST GOVERNMENT RECONSIDER DECISION RESPECTING YUGOSLAVIAN REFUGEES

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Following an interview which I had in his office last September and the refusal by his department to grant political asylum to three Yugoslavian immigrants who are now living in the Val d'Or area I feel that the decision of his department is not only unfair but also very serious, because those three individuals who have been in Canada for six months have invested with other immigrants almost $400,000 in the forest industry. In addition they intend to invest $675,-000 within 12 months and we know that those investments would create several jobs the first year and at least 43 other jobs the following year. Would the minister explain to us why his department denies political asylum to those refugees?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat loth to go into the specifics dealing with the three individuals in this case. I did the hon. member the courtesy of meeting with him to go over the cases in some detail. I indicated, where these individuals had not been in compliance with the law, that it was hardly the basis on which to establish an immigration policy for someone who came into the country, came here illegally, overstayed illegally, worked illegally and then had to throw himself on the mercy of either the department, the media or the hon. member. I am quite prepared to give him a full explanation of the details of the case, but I thought I had done that with my interview and subsequent report.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. I am very happy with the answer of the minister, and would like to ask him if he would be willing to speed up the meeting he is willing to grant me before those three immigrants are expelled from the country.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, if he talks to any member of his party or of this House, that I have never failed to meet with an hon. member who had a legitimate cause to plead, and he will be no exception.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FURTHER DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON INFLATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who I am pleased to hear has at least been left with what the president of the new economic board calls global economic policy. My question happens to touch on global economic policy, namely, the state of our sagging dollar.

As another $600 million was lost in the month of November, causing the dollar to fall another half cent today, would the Minister of Finance, who presumably can still speak on this subject, tell us how he explains this sad phenomenon?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the month of November was an extraordinary month because of the move made by the American government in relation to their own dollar. In spite of that, we have maintained the Canadian dollar at a reasonable level. Of course, in the figure published this morning there was a large number inscribed. However, one has to deduct from that the fact that if the American dollar has improved substantially during the course of the month, what the Canadian government holds in reserves in the form of SDRs has been reduced by that much. In spite of the big movement in the money market last month, the change in the reserve of the Canadian government has been less than $500 million.

• (1427)

Mr. Stevens: The Minister of Finance, in simple terms, has said that the Americans are doing much better in defending their dollar than we in Canada in defending our dollar. Even if you allow for the figure the Minister of Finance has referred to, we have still lost half a billion dollars in that one month. Will the minister indicate if he continues to feel that the management of our dollar remains in capable hands?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I believe the fact that the Canadian dollar is fluctuating on international markets at this time is the consequence of a long established government policy whereby the level of the Canadian dollar, like most currencies of the western hemisphere, is determined by the market. I want to tell the hon. member that the fact that the Canadian dollar is much more competitive at this time gave many sectors of our economy the necessary stimulus to become competitive and increase our trade balance. In fact, the Canadian trade balance for 1978 will reach a record level.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: My final question to the Minister of Finance touches on his last answer in which he tried to glorify the cheap dollar as something of great benefit to Canada. Will the minister confirm the report, released by him to the first ministers, from the Economic Council of Canada which indicated that the cheap, 85-cent dollar is having disastrous effects on inflation in Canada, with certain corporate profits, for example, being as high as 97 per cent up, compared to last year, largely due to the minister's new, cheap 85-cent dollar?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for me to comprehend why the hon. member is complaining, because we have a more competitive currency in Canada, with the result that some Canadian sectors are in a good position to compete abroad. It should be welcome. Of course, a devalued currency does create some problems on the inflation front. However, I must tell the hon. member that most of the effect of this problem with a reduction in the value of the Canadian dollar was absorbed in the last year and a half in the market. We can now see some stabilization in the rate of inflation. In fact, for the last three-month period we have had the lowest rate of inflation in years.

COMMUNICATIONS

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF COMMITTEE STUDY—PUBLIC DEBATE BASED ON REPORTS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications: it has to do with her press statement last week creating the Clyne committee or commission, depending on what you want to call it.

Is the press statement of November 30, with the appendix, the only terms of reference of this committee? If so, will she arrange with the government House leader to table it or have it appended to Hansard in order to generate the constructive public debate mentioned in the press release? Also, since the rules of the committee state that this will be done behind closed doors, will she arrange to have the work of the Delta project and the report of the Communications Research Advisory Board made public so that in fact there can be that public debate?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference are as stated in the press communique. I can accommodate the hon. member by tabling those terms of reference if he wishes.

As for the two reports the hon. member has mentioned, they were prepared for internal use. As the hon. member knows, the objective of that committee is to consolidate and summarize all of these reports and studies which I have received for internal use. When the final report made by that committee is given to me at the end of February, that report will be made public; the hon. member will be able to have it and public debate will then ensue.

Mr. Speaker: One supplementary, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Nowlan: With one supplementary it is going to be difficult. I find it increasingly incomprehensible that in the minister's press release she talks about the desire to stimulate public debate, while in the appendix that she agreed to file she refers specifically to two reports which are the focus of attention on the issue. She tells this House that they are internal documents.

● (1432)

My supplementary is this: is the minister telling us in her answer that the House of Commons and/or any of its committees should have nothing whatsoever to do with the formulation or resolution of any of the policy issues surrounding this large question which affects broadcasting and telecommunications?

In particular, since Bill C-16 is on the order paper—it has already been given first reading—will she at least go so far as to refer the subject matter of this press release to the appropriate committee, so that discussion might take place there as to whether publication of these internal documents would help stimulate the public debate about which she talks in the press release but which she pre-empts and forecloses here in the House of Commons?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, on Thursday I explained at length to the hon. member the objective of that committee. The hon. member wishes me to give out, now, for public debate, studies which have not been sufficiently perused by those who are interested, namely, myself and people on my staff. The purpose of that committee, taking into account the fact that evolution in this area has been so rapid, is precisely to ask competent people in the field to consider all these studies and reports and then sort out the questions which could be brought forward for public debate.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

REDUCTION IN BUDGET

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week, the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence was informed that $100 million would be cut by the government from the funds available to the Canadian International Development Agency this year, in addition to the $133 million cut from next year's budget, all this being contrary to the Bonn declaration to which Canada subscribed last July.

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

Can the minister inform the House whether two CIDA cuts in a row amount to a deep freeze, and reverse the government's policy of reaching .7 per cent of the GNP in official development assistance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, the cuts to which the hon. member refers and about which evidence has been given do not represent a deep freeze on the part of the government with respect to its foreign commitments. To my recollection, the decisions which have been taken still provide for a very substantial rate of expansion of aid abroad but because of the current financial restraint, funding does not provide for the growth which we had expected might have been possible earlier.

Mr. Roche: My supplementary is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Has the minister, since assuming his new responsibilities, reviewed CIDA's spending program for this year, and has he reached the conclusion that the financial condition of the federal government is so serious that appropriated CIDA money must be recalled from the poor people of the world whom the government said it would help?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): I would have to examine the allegation made by the hon. member in the latter part of his question. My understanding is the same as that of the Deputy Prime Minister, that what we are doing is slowing down the rate of growth and that we are not, in fact, drawing back from the existing level of commitments.

FORESTRY

PROPOSED CHANGES WITHIN FORESTRY SERVICE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for the Environment. I understand he had an opportunity this morning to discuss the privatization scheme and the bridging formula with the Canadian Forestry Advisory Council.

Is the minister prepared to tell us, now, whether he still adheres to the April 1, 1979, deadline he made public when he first announced this scheme, and whether the other changes—the consolidations within the forestry service—are also geared to that April 1 deadline?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): I met this morning with Mr. Bob Rogers, who is the chairman of the Canadian Forestry Advisory Council, and we discussed a number of matters relative to the privatization of the two forestry laboratories. However, I am afraid I cannot give the hon. member many details until we have finalized them. They are still very much in the discussion stage.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is the minister able to put a dollar figure on the privatization scheme he is now considering in conjunction with the advisory council, the taking over of the laboratories and the equipment by the private sector?

Can he also tell us what will be done about the codes and standards' functions of the forestry laboratories, which have carried out this work so effectively and amid much international recognition, once they cease to be wholly under federal control?

Mr. Marchand: As soon as I have had an opportunity to finalize all the important points which the hon. member has raised, I will make an appropriate announcement.

IMMIGRATION

ACCEPTANCE INTO CANADA OF VIETNAMESE REFUGEES

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Can he tell the House whether the insensitive doctrine of selective compassion espoused by the Tory government of Alberta in relation to the Vietnamese refugees has been adopted by any other Canadian province? If that government lacks the competence to fit 50 boat people into their rich 255,000 square miles with a ratio of about one person—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The first part of the question appears to be in order.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as indicated to the media this morning, this is a tiff, not a dispute. The generosity of the people of Alberta is great. The response from the people has been magnificent. There are some 18 jobs available and some 14 homes are prepared to take in the Vietnamese. While discussions were going on with officials from the province of Alberta, we were even then in the process of sending refugees to that province because we knew they would receive them with their usual generosity—just as we let them have the Grey Cup this year.

VIETNAMESE REFUGEES—REUNIFICATION OF FAMILIES PROGRAM

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): My question is for the same minister. In view of the increasing number of refugees from Vietnam who are risking their lives in fleeing from that country in search of freedom, would the minister inform this House if the government of Vietnam is co-operating in concluding the agreement on reunification of families, or is it the minister's view that the government of Vietnam is not interested in that agreement at all but, rather, is more interested in expelling its own citizens, citizens who will not be re-educated or conform to their new political masters?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I do not wish to climb on the heads of the Vietnamese governmental officials. I will simply say they are aware of our concern that there should be reunification of families. I did meet one of their officials here some time ago to explain why I thought this was a positive thrust, something which needed to be done. I told the official we had issued exit visas just prior to the cessation of hostilities. Maybe the program is not moving as quickly as we would like, but that is a judgment call. I think it could be moving along a little faster and I expressed that view to the Vietnamese officials.

Mr. Epp: I think I speak for a lot of people when I say to the minister that many of us are gratified by the manner in which Canadians have opened their hearts and homes in accepting refugees from Vietnam. In recent days—during the last week especially—we have again been saddened by the fact that many Vietnamese have lost their lives. Approximately 200 lives have been lost in the past week during attempts to escape.

In view of the ever-increasing problem in Southeast Asia relative to the people, is the Government of Canada considering increasing the number of refugees it will accept above the number of 600 already accepted? Will Canada be taking that type of proposal to the UN meeting which is to convene in Geneva on this matter?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, as indications are at present, we will not be accepting more than the 600 from the ship, the Hai Hong. That has been pretty well underwritten by the Americans who, in addition, have undertaken to accept about 6,000 refugees from Malaysia, the country of first refuge. We have an ongoing program in process. We have taken some 7,000 people in and, in addition to that, we will be taking 50 boat refugee families per month and 20 overland.

• (1442)

We have representatives at the Geneva meetings at the present time to determine how best to deal with the massive numbers of people who are refugees; whether other countries, for example, should be considered countries of first refuge and would be prepared to take people, or maybe countries of second refuge but not necessarily one and the same country. It is a massive problem and it will have to be resolved on a world scale rather than a piecemeal basis, but unfortunately we have to deal with it at present.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RADIO PROGRAM "SUNDAY MORNING"—PAYMENTS TO PARTICIPANTS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): My question is addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Secretary of State: it concerns the radio broadcast of the CBC show Sunday Morning on Sunday, December 3, on the preliminary hearing of the British politician, Mr. Jeremy Thorpe.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister confirm or deny that one of the witnesses at the hearing, Mr. Andrew Newton, was paid a substantial sum of money by the CBC for his part in the program, and can he also inform the House whether any other payments were made by the CBC in connection with this program?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question on behalf of the Secretary of State. I would like to provide to the House the information that apparently the interviewees, both Mr. Scott and Mr. Newton, were paid for the performance which was aired yesterday on the CBC. I have not had an opportunity to examine this program, but I understand from the comment that has been made by a number of persons who did examine it that there is cause for concern at some of the devices that were used on the program.

Mr. Rae: I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for answering the question so quickly, and would like to state simply that the entire program—which the Deputy Prime Minister might not have heard—was based on the premise that three prosecution witnesses were telling the entire truth and that Mr. Thorpe was guilty as charged.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that a combination of cheque-book journalism and trial by radio on one side only is hardly a fulfilment of the CBC's mandate?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX LAWS APPLIED TO INDIAN BAND CORPORATIONS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister advise, through you, Mr. Speaker, now that he is in his new post, whether any decision has been made to clarify the position of Indian bands, especially those in British Columbia which for nearly three years have been requesting a ruling on whether or not revenue by Indian band corporations will continue to be treated under the tax laws as revenue from Canadian corporations?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I will have to take notice of that question and give an answer as soon as I can.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the minister why, in view of the fact that this question has been raised with at least two of his predecessors and was raised as recently as a few months ago with his immediate predecessor by a full delegation of Indian chiefs from the province of British Columbia, the minister has not been briefed? This problem must be resolved, and I would ask the minister to come back to the House or to approach me at his earliest convenience to let us know what the answer will be.

Mr. Abbott: I cannot advise the hon. member why I have not been briefed, but I will follow his last request.

GRAIN

MEASURES TO IMPROVE GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport.

Having regard to the fact that each passing day reveals more chaos and confusion in the grain handling and transportation system of Canada, particularly with reference to the boxcar allocation and co-ordination, with cars frequently being dispatched to country elevator points where no orders exist, and having regard to the fact that the president of UGG stated he was convinced that the major answer to the car shortage problem lies in the management of cars, may I ask the minister if he could outline to the House what specific action he is taking to putting an end to this disorder and, specifically, what action he is taking to ensure that in future much needed rolling stock will be dispatched to the points where orders are required to be filled, rather than to points where no orders exist?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The hon. member knows well that we have consultants in the field analysing, together with the participants in the grain handling and transportation system, exactly what needs to be done to make the system work more effectively with the equipment available, and to face the challenges of the future.

What is not very helpful is for him to recite one or two specific alleged instances—as he did under Standing Order 43 earlier today—ignoring the fact that a great number of cars are arriving being loaded and working well. If the hon. member has been willing to avoid confusion instead of adding to it, he would have at least given me notice so that I would have had the chance of looking into the specific allegation before he brought the matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. Mazankowski: Studies go on and damage continues as well, Mr. Speaker. Last Wednesday, I asked the minister whether he would consider the convening of an emergency grain summit, a request which he rejected categorically out of hand, suggesting it would be tantamount to organized finger-pointing. He went across the street and agreed to give it consideration, that is, to the three western premiers. His colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, indicated it would be a good idea.

In view of the continuing chaos and confusion, would he now reconsider the proposition which was advanced by this side of the House and convene an emergency grain summit so that all the facts might be laid on the table and we might be able to arrive at some co-operative solution?

Mr. Lang: What the hon. member keeps refusing to pay attention to is the fact that we are in the process this year of accomplishing a two-year, all-time record movement of grain to export, with perhaps 42 million tonnes of grain moving. The hon. member also insists on confusing one meeting with another. He had suggested, I think, a kind of public show in terms of a meeting of the various participants in order to speak about what they think is wrong with the system, and that is what I said would lead to organized finger-pointing.

A meeting of the people involved is something which I always contemplate and, indeed, agree to assist; but particularly now, with consultants available to analyse in an expert way what should be done and what can be done, instead of guessing. That is the kind of meeting which would be useful. Of course, the kind of meeting to which I agreed when speaking with the premiers was a meeting where at least one of the prairie premiers suggested that the three prairie premiers might like to meet with me, with the railways and with the Wheat Board to learn more about the system. I think that would be valuable, because the more knowledge they have about its complexities and about how well it is performing in all the challenges it is facing, the more it would be useful in the long run.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRESENCE IN CUBA OF RUSSIAN FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he inform the House whether the new Russian Mig fighters in Cuba represent an escalation of international tensions at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ritchie: Can the Prime Minister say whether they represent a threat to the security of this continent and, if they do, as they are reported to have the most advanced design with nuclear capabilities, has the government any information as to whether or not there are nuclear weapons in Cuba?

Mr. Trudeau: I will be glad to refer the question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and will try to provide the House with his opinion on it, Mr. Speaker.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT MINISTERS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him about the possibility of membership on the new Board of Economic Development Ministers being extended to include the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which it does not at present. I ask this since the government has often said in recent months that it expects Canadians to achieve their economic objectives primarily through the private sector, which means the market system, and that department's mandate is to help ensure a properly operating market system in the interest of consumers, producers, manufacturers and all who come together in the marketplace.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The way in which the board is set up will permit the president of the board and myself to invite from time to time various ministers to attend board meetings when subjects relevant to their portfolios are being discussed. Certainly, this would apply to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs from time to time, or to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and so on.

DEBATE ON ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT MINISTERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the government House leader. In view of the fact that, as it stands at the moment, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers may well have been sworn to a ministry of state that does not exist, and in view of the fact it is the government's intention to proceed under the act and to table the order in council in order to remedy this, could the government House leader tell us when he would be doing that—will it be later today—and can he tell us what he has in mind for scheduling the seven hours of debate, on the assumption it would be the wish of the government to get on with this ministry, for whatever it is worth, as quickly as possible?

● (1452)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to give notice of the proclamation or resolution which will form the basis of the order in council and to seek the approval of the House for that step. I should like to move as quickly as possible with the debate on this particular measure, but I must take into account the fact that presently we are dealing with a very important piece of legislation, namely, the measure to establish the child tax credit.

If the hon. member can give me the assurance that his colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, will co-operate in the passage of that bill, then I would be able to give him a stronger assurance that the resolution establishing the Board of Economic Development Ministers would be brought on possibly this week. Until I have some indication as to what the House will do with the important measure for low income families in Canada, I cannot deal with his question accurately.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, we will be dealing with that matter expeditiously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am sorry, but I am having some difficulty with the noise from the other side. Can the minister confirm that it is his objective to deal with that matter before Christmas, bearing in mind that under the Government Organization Act of 1970 there is provision for that minister of state to report to the House at the end of January, 1979? Is it his intention to deal with that matter, so the House can be favoured with a report on the progress of that department by the end of January, 1979?

Miss Bégin: What about Canadian children?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his assurance that the child tax credit measure will be dealt with expeditiously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: As it has been. We just do not receive answers.

Mr. MacEachen: That leads me to give the hon. member the assurance that if it is passed early this week, I will attempt to bring on the measure dealing with the Board of Economic Development Ministers later this week. We must bear in mind that there are two allotted days which are not available for government business. Certainly, it is my intention to bring on this measure well before the Christmas break.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the minister being paid?

RAILWAYS

CNR FREIGHT SERVICE IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It relates to the meeting which occurred some days ago with the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and a committee of concerned residents from North Sydney and Port aux Basques regarding the transportation of freight to Newfoundland, the lack of employment opportunities, expeditious transportation, etc. I considered it to be a very good meeting.

I gave the minister's office notice of my question, albeit very short. It has been alleged that there are 23 cars of coastal freight on a siding at North Sydney. Of those cars, four contain perishables for coastal areas in Newfoundland. Some of them have been there since November 10 and November 18.

An hon. Member: This year?

Mr. Muir: Yes, this year. Would the minister be good enough to approach Canadian National Railways in an attempt to get the idea across to them that this is not the way to encourage shippers to ship goods to Newfoundland, with cars remaining on sidings and never reaching their destinations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as soon as notice of that question was received in my office, I am sure my officials pursued the matter. As soon as I have any information I will report back to the hon. member.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

REQUEST FARMER'S IRRIGATION LINE BE LAID UNDER CPR TRACKS

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It relates to a constituent of mine who finds that his access to irrigation water has been stopped by the CPR although he has grown enough grape plants in his nursery to plant 63 acres. Will the minister, through the Canadian Transport Commission, order CPR to allow this farmer to put his irrigation line under its tracks?

An hon. Member: Let us have a yes or no answer.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, I have not been given any notice of that particular incident. I would have to reflect upon whether I have any power, as distinct from the CTC and its powers, before I could answer the question.

PUBLIC WORKS

CLOVERDALE HOUSING COMPLEX IN PIERREFONDS, QUEBEC—POSITION OF CMHC

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works, and now that I see his parliamentary secretary has left, I should like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council.

Would the minister confirm that the offer from Grado Development Ltd. to purchase the Cloverdale housing complex in Pierrefonds has expired, and that the principals have lost $180,000? I am certain the Minister of Finance will be delighted that his treasury has now been increased by $180,000. Will the minister confirm that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will now consult with the tenants on future plans for this housing complex?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would be as surprised as I would be if I knew the answer to that question. I will take it as notice for the minister.

AGRICULTURE

PROGRAM OF FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he inform the House what changes can be expected to the Farm Credit Corporation in the immediate future? For example, will the changes be in the area of private institutions being encouraged to play a larger lending role in terms of farm lending, or are changes being considered in terms of a mortgage insurance program for the Farm Credit Corporation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, many different propositions are being considered at the present time. I think it is too early to say. In the first of the year I hope to be able to announce what the program will be for refinancing and for restructuring the lending organization, that is, the raising of the money partly from the private sector for the Farm Credit Corporation rather than depending solely on financing from the Department of Finance or the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, if there are to be new changes, legislation will be brought before the House at that time. The minister said that he will bring in a program some time in the new year. There are approximately three weeks left before the new year. Can he give the House an indication of the areas in the Farm Credit Corporation which his officials are considering in terms of changes to the corporation? Surely he can tell us that.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, it seems the hon. member knows some of the things we are looking at because he already mentioned them. I am sure he knows that the fiscal year-end for the Farm Credit Corporation is March 31. So it is necessary to have a new program by that time. We are guiding ourselves toward that time. Legislation must be presented to the House which can be passed by that time.

FINANCE

LOANS BY CANADIAN CHARTERED BANKS TO SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. It appears that Canadian chartered banks, including the so-called Big Five banks, made loans of $700 million between 1972 and 1976 to South Africa and, in particular, to some of the important elements in the South African military industrial complex, such as the Pretoria government's iron and steel corporation.

In view of the fact these loans strengthen the apartheid regime and systematic racial discrimination, frequently condemned by Canada and the United Nations, will the minister refer to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which now is considering the terms of the new Bank Act, an amendment which will prohibit such loans?

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall draw this matter to the attention of the minister. However, in the normal course of business relations with countries such as South Africa, perhaps it makes better sense to permit some loan business than completely shutting it out.

TRANSPORT

SIGNING OF MASTER AGREEMENT WITH B.C. ON URBAN TRANSPORTATION ASSISTANCE

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport: it is one of which I gave him notice some time ago. Is he in a position to announce to the House the signing of the master agreement with British Columbia on the urban transportation assistance program?

● (1502)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, after long delays in getting the necessary agreement from British Columbia as to the final form of the agreement, that has now been achieved. I have personally signed it and I will be forwarding it immediately to B.C. for signature.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—ANSWERS GIVEN BY PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On Friday, just after the oral question period, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) raised by way of a point of order a complaint or two about the quality of the responses given by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the question period. As I indicated at that time, the matter was not well founded procedurally and, as often happens, that led to a response by the Prime Minister, which in turn implicated the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who, in rushing to his own defence, said something which made a further contribution to the procedural complexity of the moment. That caused the Prime Minister to take exception to an accusation by the hon. member for Calgary North that the Prime Minister had been "hiding the facts".

I indicated at the time that I would research that matter, which I did over the weekend, and I can tell the House, as it probably already knows, as will those who have examined the phrase "hiding the facts", that it falls in the same category as misleading the House, and that therefore in order to be unparliamentary it cannot just simply be a suggestion on its own. It would have to carry with it an element of deliberate concealing of the facts, a deliberate misleading or something of a falsification. In the context in which it was used by the hon. member at the time I did not find that in the language, and therefore I find myself not in a position to compel the hon. member to withdraw the remark on the basis of its being unparliamentary.

However, I think this does point out the difficulties we get into in situations of this kind. Furthermore, I think it points out that, while a disagreement does exist between the parties in these particular circumstances, I must again remind the House that although debate and disagreement are very much a part of the every day life of the House, the word of an hon.

member at all times, in this case the word of the right hon. Prime Minister, must be accepted as part of our ordinary practice, and therefore when the Prime Minister objects to the accusation that he was hiding the facts, that seems to me to amount to a statement that he was not in fact hiding the facts, and his word must be accepted on that account.

NATIONAL SPORT ACT

MEASURE TO RECOGNIZE HOCKEY AS CANADA'S NATIONAL SPORT

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-445, to recognize hockey as a national sport.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, as all hon. members in the House realize, this topic has involved raging debates from time to time as to whether indeed hockey is the national sport in this country. All too often we hear conflicting reports about the WHA, the NHL, and other organizations, relating to the question of hockey being Canada's national sport. I think the question has been outstanding long enough. It should be settled once and for all.

I want to be clear that this bill is not intended to fly in the face of any other sport or to be in conflict with any other sport. I want only to have the House consider, through a private member's bill, adopting hockey as Canada's national sport.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 221, 321, 341 and 342.

CABLE TELEVISION—POLITICAL PROGRAMMING

Question No. 221—Mr. Jones:

1. What are the regulations, duties and responsibilities of the cable television operators with respect to political programming on the community channel?

2. Are these regulations, duties and responsibilities applied equally to all candidates, regardless of party or non-party affiliation?

3. What measures are available to regulate the political programming? What means are available to apprehend offenders of these regulations?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows:

1. The CRTC Cable Television Regulations (1976) state:

13. (1) Where a licensee provides time on its community channel for the distribution of programming of a partisan political character, it shall allocate such time on an equitable basis to all political parties and rival candidates.

(2) Where a licensee and the political parties and candidates are unable to reach agreement as to what, in any particular circumstances, constitutes an equitable allocation of time by the licensee, the licensee may refer the dispute to the commission and the commission shall allocate the time as it considers appropriate in the circumstances.

14. Where a licensee provides opportunity on its community channel for the expression of views on matters of public concern, it shall provide reasonable, balanced opportunity for the expression of differing views on such matters.

2. As regulation 13. (1) states, the licensee shall allocate time "on an equitable basis to all political parties and rival candidates".

3. Under the same regulations (section 12) each licensee is required for a period of four weeks after distribution to keep a written program log and to maintain the audio reproduction of all programming distributed on its community channel. This permits the commission the means to apprehend offenders of these regulations. These regulations constitute the basic minimum standards to which cable television licensees must adhere. Every licensee who violates the provisions of any applicable regulation is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction of a fine not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars for a first offence and not exceeding fifty thousand dollars for each subsequent offence.

MR. RAY CHRÉTIEN

Question No. 321—Mr. Jones:

1. Who has been appointed Ambassador to Zaire? What are his qualifications for this posting?

2. What previous appointments has this individual had and in what other departments?

3. By whom was this current and all previous appointments made?

4. Was he recommended by a member of the Cabinet? If so, by whom?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Mr. Raymond Chrétien was appointed Ambassador to the Republic of Zaire. Mr. Chrétien joined the Department of External Affairs in 1966 after having participated in the foreign service officer competition and has served in the department both in Ottawa and abroad.

2. Mr. Chrétien was in 1967 first assigned to the department's legal division, then to the United Nations' General Assembly. He was then seconded to the Privy Council office, and subsequently obtained a period of leave without pay during which he worked first in the secretariat of the Treasury Board, and then with the Canadian International Development Agency. Following this Mr. Chrétien served at the Canadian Embassy in Beirut as first secretary, in Paris as first secretary and consul and then as economic counsellor, and was subsequently posted to his present post in Kinshasa.

3 and 4. As are all ambassadorial appointments, Mr. Chrétien's nomination as Ambassador to the Republic of Zaire was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and was approved by the prime minister and cabinet. Mr. Chrétien's previous assignments had been made by the personnel bureau of the Department of External Affairs.

SOVIET DIPLOMATS

Question No. 341—Mr. Cossitt:

Has the government at any time since April 20, 1968, refused to admit to Canada Soviet Diplomats and, if so, in each case (a) what was the name of the individual (b) what was the function that he/she would have performed (c) what were all the reasons for refusal?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Although the government has refused to admit certain Soviet diplomats to Canada since April 20, 1968 it is not the government's practice to make either the names or reasons public.

Question No. 342—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Since the expulsion of a number of Soviet Diplomats from Canada earlier this year, have any new Diplomats been accredited to the Soviet Embassy by agreement with the Department of External Affairs and, if so (a) how many (b) what are their names and job designations (c) on what date did he/she enter Canada (d) what were the details of security checks made on each individual by the Department of External Affairs before agreeing to admission?

2. Who performs security checks on Soviet or other foreign Diplomats posted to Canada?

3. Are there pending applications, requests etc. from the Soviet Union for the accreditation of Diplomats to Canada and, if so, what are their (a) names (b) job designations?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. (a) Eight.

Insert table

(b) Name	Designation	(c) Date entered
Sergei V. Kruglov (Temporary Duty)	First Secretary	March 9, 1978
Valentin M. Fomitchev	First Secretary	June 5, 1978

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 30, consideration in committee of Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose on Thursday, November 30, 1978, clause 4 of the bill was under consideration.

On clause 4—

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, when we left off last time I gave the minister notice that I would be presenting an amendment to clause 4. I have several copies of my amendment, and I will seek to get it over to the parliamentary secretary. The purpose of the amendment is quite simple.

In our view the proposed section 122.2(1)(a) on page 4 of the bill is discriminatory. It does not take into account changing living patterns and what may be the real incomes of the families involved. My amendment proposes:

That section 122.2(1)(a) be deleted and that the following words be inserted in its place:

"(a) jointly by the individual and his or her spouse, or his or her common-law partner where the individual was married or living in a common-law relationship and resided with his or her spouse or common-law partner at the end of December of the year, and"

I do not think I need to go on at any length concerning this amendment. It relates to the example which I gave last week. Under the wording of the bill as it now stands, and unless the minister can give me another interpretation, it would be quite possible for there to be a situation in which two couples living in the same economic circumstances would stand to gain quite differently, depending upon whether they were married. The intention of my amendment is simply to ensure that people who live in common-law relationships and who are jointly responsible for the upbringing of their children are covered just the same as people who are married. I have already put forward my arguments in favour of this amendment on other occasions. I do not see any need to repeat them. I simply ask for the minister's comments.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, we have referred to this matter a number of times. It was referred to at the second reading stage. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the hon. member for St. John's East and I have raised this matter repeatedly. The proposed amendment would remove the anomaly which exists between those who are legally married and those who have entered into common-law relationships. It would do one thing in addition to that, which should have been picked up much earlier than at the committee stage. It would remove the offensive, and sexist references which are in this clause of the bill.

I do not see how the minister can keep telling us day after day that this bill was closely studied. We were given the weak explanation last Thursday that the only reason this language exists is that there was a translation problem. That is an unacceptable excuse, considering the number of officials in the minister's department.

● (1512)

I hope the minister would have the good sense to accept this recommendation. It removes the sexist designation in the English version of the bill which I and some other members find offensive, and it removes the anomaly which exists and which would, in effect, encourage people, for the purposes of this particular credit, to have common-law rather than legal relationships. I do not think there is any need to speak further on this matter, but when the occasion permits I want to speak generally on this particular provision.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair will reserve judgment on the acceptability of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Broadview.

[Mr. Rae.]

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Broadview has raised an important issue regarding the child tax credit bill that is now before us, and clause 4 specifically. The point he is raising is that, under the proposed legislation, married couples with children may be penalized in comparison to common-law couples who are in otherwise identical circumstances. I might say that this general issue did receive a fair degree of discussion at the time we were considering clause 1 and clause 2, and I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has spoken to it specifically as well. Both spouses in a legal marriage would have to report their incomes to apply for a credit, but in a common-law union only the income of one spouse would have to be reported.

At the outset, let me say that I am sympathetic to the view that, in principle, the tax treatment of persons in a common-law marriage should be no different from that of legally married persons. While the Income Tax Act does not now recognize common-law spouses, this does not reflect any moral judgment on the part of the government. Rather, it is a consequence of the difficulties of identifying and verifying who is a common-law spouse, for the purposes of many provisions of the Income Tax Act for which this is relevant.

The issue of tax treatment of common-law spouses is not something new that has just been created by our proposed child tax credit program. The proposed legislation is only following existing provisions elsewhere in the Income Tax Act. These provisions do raise complex issues in the case of common-law spouses and there are issues with which we have been grappling for some time. For example, in several provinces significant reforms in family law have been adopted or are under study. These family law reforms clearly have implications for the income tax system, and are continuing to be discussed by federal and provincial officials. The main point here is that the issues surrounding the tax treatment of common-law spouses are much broader that those raised by the proposed child tax credit.

On grounds of equity and fairness, it seems clear that common-law spouses should not be allowed to derive any special advantage from the child tax credit. However, from the broader perspective of the entire income tax system, it is not possible to say whether or not in general common-law spouses are better or worse off than legally married couples. Any such calculation would depend on many specific details of the couple's circumstances. For example, common-law spouses can use the equivalent to married exemption. On the other hand, the marital exemption cannot be claimed in respect of a common-law spouse, nor can the unused portions of the age exemption or the interest and pension deductions be transferred between common-law spouses.

While some of the family law reform legislation provides for support payments on marriage breakdown for both legally married and common-law spouses, periodic support payments are only tax deductible in the case of legal marriages. The impact of these kinds of provisions is a very complex set of financial advantages and disadvantages to being common law. In any case, I am quite sure that the net financial effect of these provisions does not have any significant impact on the institution of marriage in this country.

It is true that a number of federal statutes do make some provisions for common-law spouses, for example, the Canada Pension Plan and the War Veterans Allowance Act. But let me point out that these two statutes have different definitions of who it is that qualifies as a common-law spouse. Furthermore, in these other federal statutes it is typically in the couple's interest to establish that they are common-law spouses. As we are all aware, it is the opposite situation with the proposed child tax credit. Thus, common-law couples will not want to come forward to prove that they are in fact living as if they were legally married.

Let us suppose, however, that we did want to treat common-law and legally married taxpayers identically for purposes of the child tax credit. How could this be done? First, some definition of common law would have to be chosen. This definition could require one year of cohabitation, though it may be preferable to require three or seven years, particularly if the children are from a previous marriage. We would then have to determine the precise date when cohabitation began. In many situations some degree of ministerial discretion would be necessary. But then how are we to determine when couples are actually cohabiting, if they spend at least three nights a week together? Finally, since common-law couples will, in most cases, not want to come forward with the required information, we face the question of enforcement. While there are no firm data on the number of common-law couples in Canada today, there are about one-half million single mothers, most of whom would be eligible to claim the credit. The government would clearly be in a difficult position if it had to verify that none of these women were actually living common-law. Thus, any definition based on a period of cohabitation would involve certain difficult and unpopular administrative procedures.

These problems, I hope and expect, will not be insurmountable; but they are difficult. Work is already under way on the issues raised by common-law marriages, particularly in the context of provincial family law reform. Federal finance officials are meeting their provincial counterparts next week to discuss precisely this issue. I think we would be well advised to proceed in a reasoned and cautious manner to deal with these complex issues. The new child tax credit, which will be of immediate benefit to millions of families, should not have to await their resolution.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, would it be permissible for me to add information on other government programs which I think is relevant?

Under the Canada Pension Plan the survivor's benefit is awarded to the surviving common-law spouse and we use documentary evidence proving residence and public representation. As to the split of pension credits, we recognize legal marriages only because of the practical problems of defining the beginning and the end of the relationship, and numerous possible subsequent relationships.

Under the Old Age Pension Act, more precisely under the Guaranteed Income Supplement, we do recognize common-law marriages on the simple basis of a statutory declaration of the relationship.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan other than under provincial welfare programs, common-law relationships are recognized.

Basically what I heard the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance say is that marriage brings a lot of fiscal privileges, and Canadians living in a common-law situation do not benefit from them. For the first time it is the reverse situation that confronts us whereby what the Department of Finance estimates to be an insignificant number of women living in a common-law situation would benefit from the child tax credit, while the "husband", in terms of a common-law relationship, would be making too large a salary for the program. The Department of Finance estimates this number of Canadian mothers to be insignificant.

I guess the ideal is to study the common-law situations which we can recognize in order to find an operational definition. I understand a study is taking place at the present with the Department of Finance.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the imaginative reply of the parliamentary secretary in describing the importance of policing this kind of measure. I can assure the House, the parliamentary secretary and the minister, that it is not with the enforcing aspect I was primarily concerned. I appreciate this might cause some administrative difficulties, but on this side of the House we want to be sure the redistributive effect of the proposal takes cognizance of the reality of the child's circumstances rather than the fiction of the child's circumstances.

● (1522)

I appreciate there are fiscal and physical advantages and disadvantages to common law and legal marriages. I would have thought it might have been possible for the government, rather than waiting for a wholesale reform of the Income Tax Act—which we are not prepared to do on this side of the House—to start with this particular measure. It affects so many families across Canada. There is now a growing recognition by provincial governments that common-law relationships do exist and do create certain rights and certain obligations on the part of parents in a common-law marriage. Taking into account these changes in family law reform which are taking place right across the country from Newfoundland to British Columbia, I would have thought that it might have been possible to incorporate this amendment, or if you like, to have a definition of a common-law marriage for the purposes of this clause only. I would think that cohabitation for one year is all that is required.

We are not interested in proving whether it is a relationship of one night, three nights or seven nights. That is not the concern. The concern is to see whether or not there is an economic unit which is not being recognized by this law. It is not a question of sexual cohabitation; that is irrelevant. What is relevant is whether there is an economic unit. Any definition will be arbitrary, but perhaps if we said there was cohabitation for a year that would be sufficient to establish that there was an element of support.

Personally I do not see any problem. Perhaps I could be enlightened further. I do not see any problem in saying that "for the purposes of this section and this act, a common-law relationship is as follows." Frankly, I do not know whether the redistributive problem is a minuscule or a serious problem. On this side we want to make sure that the redistributive effects of the act are held as an integrity. Maybe the law should continue to keep pace with the times by taking cognizance of the fact that there are relationships which perhaps are not suitably defined by the legislation as has been put forward by the government.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could answer my colleague from Broadview so as to convince him to withdraw his amendment. I will explain why. Such an amendment has to be tied in with a reform of the complete income tax system, otherwise it will not work. The idea of the New Democratic Party, rightly so, it seems to me, is to ensure that redistribution ends up in the right place. They say a few cases of common-law situations will permit mothers, in good economic circumstances to receive moneys which do not belong to them, because they are not recognized by the income tax system, to the detriment of other Canadian mothers. We think there is a case in that regard, but for only a very few mothers.

If we were to correct this bill right away, and through this bill recognize common-law situations, but without a change in the general Income Tax Act, it will result in trying to implement something that will not work. How would common-law couples establish the two sources of income, or the husband's source of income, when it plays against their own interest? All people are greedy, and function around money and economic advantages. While the whole income tax system does not give the fiscal privileges to common-law couples that it does to legal marriages, suddenly we would be asking a few mothers, most likely single mothers, to be more catholic than the Pope! One would be asking them to declare either the husband's income, or the two sources of income, and yet they would not get the tax privileges of the income tax system that are applicable to a legal marriage. These people will not do that, and we have no policing mechanism. That is the reason why the amendment will not work.

I have never understood why the Income Tax Act does not recognize common-law situations, and while I was minister of national revenue I asked that particular question many times. I was always told that it was a question of potential abuse. When I became Minister of National Health and Welfare I discovered almost all social programs do recognize the common-law situations. I wondered why we did not have abuses in the case of older people. I wondered if that was the mentality of Canadians, that we trust older people not to cheat the system through the GIS, and yet we do not trust young couples, for example, those students who enter into a trial marriage for whatever reasons. I do know that consistency should be introduced into all of our programs. It is probable that the amount of abuse would be a small percentage of the total government programs, but I am not sure of that. That is an assumption.

I firmly believe a correction to this bill, C-10, that we are studying right now, will never be enforceable because the rest of the income tax system does not give couples in common-law relationships the same privileges that married people get. If they received the privileges of the whole of the income tax system then they must be ready to acknowledge the common-law situations when it comes to the child tax credit. This is the reason why I think this amendment suggested by the hon. member for Broadview is unenforceable. Because of that I think we should wait for an amendment to the whole Income Tax Act. I do not mean wait to pass Bill C-10. It should be put on the record that this is a problem we want to see dealt with and looked into quite seriously. It should not be tied to this particular bill because it will not work.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and particularly to the last part of her remarks which I thought were the most worth-while, lucid comments that she has made in this whole matter, that is to say, that we should wait for some amendments to the whole of the Income Tax Act before we start tinkering with what is a very basic proposal.

I am quite fascinated by the twists and turns of the minister's response in this whole issue. She said at one point that almost all programs of National Health and Welfare recognize the common-law situation. Then she backed off and said that we cannot do it in this instance because it is not known yet how it could be administered. The first person to respond was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. Quite rightly he realizes the implications of what we are about would affect the Income Tax Act. That is what we are dealing with in this particular bill.

The minister told the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on Thursday night that the administration of this program does not affect the principle of how the Income Tax Act presently operates with regard to family income. Of course the argument we are getting this afternoon from the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the parliamentary secretary is that we cannot do the very thing the hon. member for Broadview suggests because we are not ready to make those kinds of changes to the Income Tax Act. It is quite interesting that the minister wants to have it both ways in this instance.

The hon. member for Broadview is proposing, supported by members on this side, the notion that if you make this change at least it should deal with people equally, whether they are married on a legal basis or have entered into some common-law relationship. On the other hand the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the parliamentary secretary say this cannot be done because it would have a serious impact on the Income Tax Act which they are not quite ready to amend.

I find the minister's logic highly inconsistent. She is trying to explain away a bad provision, one that is becoming more and more unacceptable to groups. I want the minister to know, if she has not already learned from her office, that the National Action Committee, a large umbrella organization representing some 140 various women's organizations across the country, wired the minister's office and others who are concerned with this. I want to put this on record so that the minister is not under any further illusions with regard to where the National Action Committee stands on this bill. I quote from their telegram of December 3:

Hansard November 30 cites NAC support for Bill C-10, but we have serious reservations as expressed in our letter of October 16.

We support the principle of redistribution through refundable tax credits but do not support it in family allowance because of the consequences for low income families. An annual lump sum refund is of doubtful help.

We oppose joint taxation and share the reservations of Gordon Fairweather re the possible discrimination against women.

The minister might want to amend her remarks of last Thursday when she has an opportunity to deal with this. The minister has introduced a concept of family income that would operate under the Income Tax Act which has not been clearly thought through. As the parliamentary secretary stated very clearly today, it does not relate to the other provisions of the Income Tax Act. He put that on the record.

The parliamentary secretary supported the opinion stated last Thursday by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. He made the case more effectively than anybody could make it, that the problem of making this kind of change, and setting into law a principle which can now be extended indefinitely across a host of income tax policies, would have very serious repercussions for women.

If anything needed to be stated more clearly, I do not know what it would be than the language of a bill which simply assumes that forever and a day the dependent spouse in this situation would be a woman. Her income is going to be lumped in with that of the man for purposes of deciding what amount of tax credit will be available.

What we have here and what the minister is now recommending is that even though this is a provision which has not been very clearly thought through, we are going to make it worse. We are going to discriminate for those who have entered into a common-law relationship and against those who are married under the normal legal requirements. The minister has put herself and the parliamentary secretary in a very difficult situation in arguing today entirely opposite to what they argued last Thursday evening when defending the very principle at stake in this clause.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, since the hon. member has been given responsibility for the status of women and cultural affairs in the Tory shadow cabinet, he has practised demagoguery more every day. That does not help the interests of women which he is supposed to represent. He either does not understand or deliberately misled the House this afternoon by putting together two completely separate problems. One is the common-law marriage.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I am not overly sensitive, but the minister should not be allowed to get away with suggesting that I or any other member has deliberately misled the House. I do not think she will want that to stand on the record. She was getting carried away. Perhaps she will withdraw that remark so that we may get on with the debate in some orderly fashion.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, it is misleading to whoever is listening to put together two completely separate problems. I would like to finish my sentence. The hon. member may recognize what he is doing. He is totally mixed up.

On Thursday night the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands spoke of one thing only, eventual discrimination due to joint filing, which I say does not exist in this bill. The hon. member should learn what joint taxation is. It means one income tax form for a family unit. The two parents are that family unit.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I know what this bill says. You do not.

Miss Bégin: I am talking of the Carter commission report of 1970. The hon. member just does not know his stuff. I am very proud of the support of the National Action Committee. I did say that all women's groups oppose the reduction in family allowances, which I myself regret.

As to their reservation with regard to joint taxation, since there is no joint taxation, therefore that reservation was dropped. I explained that. There is no joint taxation. I wish the hon. member would informa the Canadian public accurately. It is very important that he not feed cliches and erroneous statements to the public.

I repeat, although the hon. member can read Hansard for last Thursday night, there is still no joint taxation for past, present or future years. There are separate individual tax forms which each partner must file. That is extremely clear. The common-law situation and its status in the Income Tax Act are a totally different question.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands read the letter of Mr. Gordon Fairweather as meaning that there is joint taxation and, therefore, there is a terrible evil in the making against women. That was a mistake. The hon. member for Egmont read that same letter thinking that it is absolutely terrible to be against the common-law marriage. I wonder when the church will recognize that. It would help all of us. The hon. member should realize that.

That being said, we are today talking of an issue called common-law marriage and its relationship to the Income Tax Act. The Income Tax Act does not recognize it. Of course, we are not going to wait for that act to be changed. We are going to pass Bill C-10 which will help a lot of children in Canada. What it will do is probably help a few more mothers than should be helped. That is what it means.

Is the hon. member in favour of helping women, or against that? He is supposed to look after their interests. The worst thing this bill could possibly do is give the child tax credit to a few mothers who in their common-law relationship live with someone who makes good money and, therefore, they should not receive it. That is the worst it could do.

Let us pass this bill. It is urgent. Let us study separately what a common-law relationship means in terms of the Income Tax Act, with a view to having it defined and recognized.

I do not find the demagoguery of the hon. member helpful when he states that I say "on the one hand" and "on the other hand." We have been very consistent. I do not think he realizes what this House has voted over the years. In all the programs that we voted on for older people, we decided to recognize the common-law situation. This time we are talking of another group involving the younger segment of the population.

The Income Tax Act does not recognize these potential abuses. The sociological reality is what is of importance and interest. Anyone with common sense would not reject the possibility of abuses. I admit that. How would you verify what goes on? Would you just accept a declaration? Trial marriages are a way of life in Canada today like in all western society and, to me, a good way of life. So this is an area which calls for study and exploration.

The hon. member laughs and talks, instead of listening. He will stand up again soon, I imagine, and give us another grand speech. That won't help. He has not contributed to this debate on any point whatsoever. If he wants to change the common-law relationship, he should say so. We have a study going on in conjunction with the provinces to change it in the fiscal system as a whole. By recognizing the common-law situation in all areas of the fiscal system we grant to those couples the fiscal privileges married people enjoy—and then they will comply under the child tax credit arrangements where it works against them, not in favour of them. Joint taxation does not exist in this bill at all and common-law relationships are not recognized under the Income Tax Act.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair is in some doubt whether the amendment is acceptable since it creates a new group of people who would be eligible for certain tax reductions, and seems to go beyond the scope of the ways and means motion on which the bill is based. The ways and means motion refers to "spouse". The explanatory notes, part A, say that where an individual is married, his spouse is liable for overpayment of tax credit. Specifically, on page 4, in 122.2(1)(a) we read:

Jointly by the individual and his spouse where the individual was married—

The reference is to "spouse" and not to common-law partnerships and I cannot, therefore, accept the amendment.

Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With reference to what you have just said, Mr. Chairman, should you not have entertained argument on this point before you ruled so abruptly?

[Miss Bégin.]

Mr. Boulanger: The ruling is made now. The Chair has listened while a number of speakers have dealt with this matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall not press the matter but I want to state, Mr. Chairman, that you heard no argument at all on the procedural acceptability of the motion.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on the same point of order. I shall not bother to deal with the rather foolish remarks the minister was making earlier. I want to deal with the amendment in the context of the bill before us. It does seem to me that the argument put forward by the minister was to the effect that if this amendment were allowed, the payment by the public treasury would be reduced. I believe the minister said clearly that there would not be an increase but rather that there would be a reduction in expenditures, and on that basis I find it difficult to understand Your Honour's ruling that the amendment is inadmissible. I hope there will be an opportunity for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and others who are better versed in these matters than I am, to examine this aspect more closely. My understanding of the rules is that members are allowed to put forward amendments as long as they do not increase public expenditure and, if that is the case, I would think the amendment should be allowed and should be voted upon.

Mr. Boulanger: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that you have ruled the amendment out of order. The hon. member for Egmont is raising a familiar argument. He thinks you might be wrong, or that the grounds for it are not clear. The way I heard hon. members speaking, many explanations were put forward on this question, and I believe it was easy for you to rule as you did. I do not understand why hon. members should rise on points of order and say they do not agree with your ruling.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have had a good deal of debate on the substance of the matter and I do not propose that there should be a procedural discussion now, but I do feel I should register my objection against the Chair getting into a debate on substance and telling us an amendment is out of order without permitting a word of discussion with regard to its acceptability.

I want to say, also, that you may have created some trouble for the minister by your reference to "his spouse" as though you take the same line as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands took. As I read the phrase "his spouse", I read it as "his or her". Under the Interpretation Act it is clear that a word which is masculine includes the feminine. I think it is unfortunate that Your Honour has made a ruling against the kind of amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview on the ground that there is talk about a spouse. I do not intend to ask that the matter be reviewed, but I feel this protest should be on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair still believes the amendment goes beyond the ways and means motion. I have made my ruling and I am not prepared to change it.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I shall not take much longer, but I want to mention one or two further points with respect to this matter. The minister has certainly put her foot in cement with respect to this provision. She has again argued that this in no way constitutes any amendment with respect to the Income Tax Act and the computation of family income. She is doing that on very narrow grounds. Obviously, these are amendments to the Income Tax Act. Clause 122.2 does refer specifically to the joint income of spouses and to the amount by which an individual's family income exceeds $18,000. There is no question about that. The minister can argue that black is white if she likes, but this is clearly a measure to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Boulanger: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, did the hon. member use an English expression—I did not quite catch the French translation—along the lines "she has put her feet in cement"?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes.

Mr. Boulanger: Well, you had better check the translation because it sounded very funny to me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): The minister has a very concrete position, all mixed up and permanently embedded in cement. That is all I will say. Apart from this little difference with the hon. lady, let me say I am really sorry she has moved so far away from what I believe to be her basic concern, that is, equality and equal rights for all people. It is fair enough for the minister to argue, as she has done in her demagogic way, if I may say so, about the advantage of this measure to low income people in terms of tax credits, but it is quite another thing for her to try to gloss over what is obviously a major precedent.

Maybe the minister was beguiled into thinking this was not, after all, a big issue. Maybe she thought it would not have very much impact if a few people were to argue with her about pressure being placed on women to earn a little less or to move into the job market less frequently. After all, as some people have been asking, is it not really fair, in the final analysis, that we put the whole family income together, particularly if we are going to enter into this quite startling departure of the tax credit which has been argued for many years by a host of organizations, by many organizations concerned with social welfare benefits, and particularly by those who were primarily concerned with the situation of women and their family responsibilities? But even taking that into account, it has been very clear—and this has been said long before the minister came forward with her proposal—that anything that would begin to recognize, for purposes of the Income Tax Act, family income, based, as it is on the situation that women are secondary wage earners or in some way economic appendages of their husbands, would be a great disservice to the growing recognition that women have as much right to be economically responsible and active in our society today as do men.

• (1552)

Mr. McGrath: The minister is not listening to you.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is all right. The minister may not want to listen to me, she may want to carry on her own conversation.

Mr. McGrath: She insists that you listen to her, but she will not listen to you.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If there are other members on the opposite side who wish to speak, I hope we will have a chance to hear them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont has the floor.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I hope that all hon. members, as well as some of them on the other side who are cat-calling, will have a chance to give this some serious thought. Perhaps some people think it is funny. I do not think it is funny. It is quite serious, because it is a question that is setting into law a principle, as has been admitted clearly in this afternoon's debate, of changing the way in which the Income Tax Act will operate in terms of family income. Nothing can be clearer than that. Nothing can be clearer than the fact that we will have a situation where women will be dependent upon their husbands making provision for them through their own income, which we have no assurance—I am sure the minister would agree with this—will take place.

It does not only involve those in the higher income bracket—the minister has used this as a red herring—but, in many instances, people in the lower income bracket about whom we hear all too many tragic tales, such as the the woman who has no opportunities and no assurance that the income which her spouse is receiving is in any way commensurate with the responsibilities she has in that family's situation.

To make the kind of assumption on which the minister has made her proposals here, and still be defending the argument that they cannot even make it equitable in the case of common-law marriages because it has not been seriously examined under the Income Tax Act, seems to me to skate perilously close to irresponsibility, particularly because of the fact—I will not repeat my arguments again because the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands put it on the record last Thursday—that the Minister of Finance himself put forward papers, when he introduced the budget a few weeks ago, which pointed out the real problems in moving into the family income concept.

It is well and good for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take a very legalistic position, as she has tried to do in this matter, and say that they are dealing with the filing of income tax returns, they are using a separate form, a separate slip, as if somehow or other that justified the approach she has taken. She may be fooling some of the people, and I believe she has had some success in fooling some of the people on this earlier on, but I think that as people begin to look at the implications of this particular proposal and wonder about that principle being extended to unemployment insurance, they will ask themselves, "is that what we are going to see next?" Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare argue that this business of family income should be introduced as one of the next provisions for amending the Unemployment Insurance Act? I would like to know that, because it is very clear that she has given her colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, an effective handle in making that argument.

If that is not her intention, if she is stating very clearly that this is to be some kind of aberration from the norm, I hope she will put on the record in this debate that this is not to be used as a precedent by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Perhaps she would want to put it on the record as well that the Minister of Finance should not jump to bring in his next budget including this provision, because obviously we do not know the full implications of it. But we do know, given the great and continuing imbalance which exists between the incomes of men and women today, both married and single, given the jobs structure which exists in our economy today, and given the serious reverses that have taken place for women in recent years, many of them at the behest of this government, that to introduce this kind of amendment without giving it forethought is to be quite irresponsible.

The minister can defend, if she likes, with her own particularly circuitous arguments, this particular measure, but many of us want to say to the minister that she has entered into a precedent here and she has dealt with the substance of the income tax in a way which is not helpful to women in our society today. If she does not realize that, then I think she should give serious reflection to it, by herself, and with those who perhaps can put her on the straight path.

I will not add any more to the length of this debate on this issue because I do not think it is really required. I think that most people who have followed this discussion closely, understand what it is all about. Too bad the minister is not able to recognize this now, maybe for her own particular purposes, but I hope that at some point in the future she will make a very clear statement distinguishing between this measure, which she says is not an amendment to the Income Tax Act for family income purposes, and the measures that some of her colleagues might like to introduce. They might not even be as understanding as this minister with respect to the problems that will be created for women when family income begins to be computed for other amendments to the Income Tax Act, to the Unemployment Insurance Act, or to another act. That is the issue, and I would appreciate it if the minister would recognize that.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the minister and the parliamentary secretary that I am not putting forward amendments in order to slow down the passage of the bill but rather to try to produce some substantive improvements. With respect to clause 5, the concern which has been expressed not only by myself—if I recollect reading through the debates and listening in the House—but also by the hon. member for St. John's East, as well as the hon. member for Egmont, and certainly by members on this side, including my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, arises from the fact that the lump sum payment does not provide for what we think is the most just form of distribution. I have expressed concern with respect to income tax discounters, and I am sure the minister would not want to hear from me again in that regard.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

My essential concern has to do with the fact that if we are moving into a new era with respect to the concept of the tax credit, the government must think through very carefully now how it wants to distribute this credit. From the point of view of the financial planning of the individual family, we are dealing here principally and first of all with people who are in need. They are not people who have a lot of money; they are people who are looking forward to the payment of moneys from the government even more, because of the fact that the family allowance has been dropped from $26 to $20.

Miss Bégin: I would like to submit, Mr. Chairman, that this may be better dealt with under clause 8, unless I did not understand the hon. member's representation. Clause 5 deals only with defining the amount, whatever way it will be refunded.

Mr. Rae: Clause 8 refers to overpayment.

Miss Bégin: That is it. Our officials tell me that the credit itself is defined as an overpayment. The hon. member's point is with regard to several instalments versus one payment. I am told that that should be dealt with under clause 8.

• (1602)

Mr. Rae: I was not clear from reading the bill. Along with my colleagues, I thought clause 5 required amendment. If that is not the case, I will wait until clause 8 is being considered.

Mr. McGrath: Has the minister had any further communications with the provinces, especially the five which have yet to indicate whether they will permit the payment of child tax credit in addition to the amount of welfare a particular family may be receiving at the time of receipt?

Miss Bégin: Is that related to clause 5?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, it is. It concerns the assessment and the payment of tax, as well as the business of provinces taxing back the provisions of the child tax credit. Has the minister received assurance from the five provinces which have yet to indicate their positions on this matter? If so, will she relay it to the committee?

Miss Bégin: My biggest problem would be to relate it to clause 5. The hon. member, who is quite concerned about the behaviour of the provinces, is using clause 5 like any other clause. I accept that because Mr. Chairman did not rule it out of order.

As of today, I have not received any further information from the provinces. At lunch time I was on an open line program on CFRA. A member of the Ottawa Citizens on Welfare Council informed us that Mr. Norton, the Ontario minister, told him Wednesday that definitely it will be passed on fully to welfare mothers. But I have not received official word from the provinces.

Mr. McGrath: Can the minister bring the committee up to date on what we consider to be some of the administrative problems respecting people who do not now file income tax returns? By and large, those people would not necessarily have social insurance numbers. In addition to dealing with a totally new and foreign procedure, they will have to apply for and receive social insurance numbers. Does the minister have the support of the provinces in administering this? The provinces administer welfare and will have to counsel welfare recipients on filling out income tax forms and applying for social insurance numbers. My concern stems largely from the fact that many of these people are semi-literate, or in many cases illiterate, which compounds the problem. How does she intend to deal with that?

Miss Bégin: Clause 5 deals with the examination of a taxpayer's return of income. Legitimately it raises the question of forms and procedures. As I have indicated before, it was my hope that the program would request mothers to fill out only one short and simple form. The program was to be introduced toward the end of the year, and the tax system was in place. Recently we learned that the computer system, the program, the training manuals and training seminars, have started in Revenue Canada. These were built around a master file which exists for each mother who will benefit from the child tax credit.

Therefore, for the first year of operation, all mothers qualifying for the child tax credit must fill out a one-page special form. That form will be sent to them along with their family allowance cheques for January and basic income tax forms. They must fill out the top part of the form, which is the identification portion where the social insurance number is requested. They must report on the main tax form the amount of the child tax credit which they arrived at by completing Schedule 10. This will be reported on the last page of the tax form, and signed. This is the proof that individual taxation is the basis of Canadian taxation. Perhaps the hon. member can pass the word on to his colleague from Edmonton.

Unfortunately it is a paper burden. We anticipate a single, simple, shorter tax form for next year, but not this year. To make it less difficult for mothers, we will mail to them basic tax forms. In other words, we have identified the 1.5 million mothers who are non-filers at the present time. They will receive a mailing in early February. It will consist of income tax forms and papers explaining the portions which should be filled out.

Social insurance numbers will be requested. Approximately 600,000 mothers do not use their SIN numbers at the present time. Most of them have such numbers, but they use the social insurance numbers of their husbands. The exact number of mothers, therefore, who do not have social insurance numbers of their own is limited. All mothers will be invited to go to post offices in order to get the necessary form to apply for social insurance numbers. I do not know if this satisfies the hon. member.

Perhaps I should rapidly describe schedule 10, which will accompany the family allowance cheques in January. It is a one-page document, composed of three parts. The first part deals with the identification of the person. It is identical to the identification portion of the basic income tax form which Canadians complete. The second part is the arithmetic portion. It deals with the number of children in the family, the benefit the mother is entitled to, and the take home pay of both parents. The third part is a certification which must be signed by both parents, or by a single parent if that is the case. It certifies that the information provided by them on the document is the truth.

[Translation]

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure my question is relevant at this point in the debate. Since the Department of National Revenue is involved, I want to ask a question which perhaps I should have raised when we were discussing clause 1, but the situation has changed since then. If my memory serves me right, according to newspaper articles I read over the weekend the Quebec minister of social affairs has decided to proceed with what I would describe as a substantial cut in family allowances. I fear—and this is where my question relates to income tax and to the Department of National Revenue—that the sums to be paid to mothers might well be used to pay accounting fees, because it will become so difficult to fill in income tax returns that the operation will require the services of experts. Given the fact that the proposed purpose of helping mothers will be completely forgotten, I have a funny feeling that what will be left of these $200 will be used to pay for the services of accountants because filling in income tax forms will become a very complicated operation. Am I being irrelevant or would the minister like to say something about this?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, since you accepted the hon. member's question, I will try to answer it. Without being cynical, I will tell him that nothing is free these days and anybody applying for the new tax credit will have to fill a form. I too am sorry that the form uses taxation terms which we all find difficult to understand, but we are going to have an information campaign for all those mothers who are eligible for that new allowance for their children in order to help them apply and complete the form as it should be. It will be a simple form including only one page which will be sent with all family allowance cheques for January 1979.

The hon. member for Hull referred to the bill that the Quebec government has just tabled in the National Assembly,

Bill 117 which establishes the family allowances rates that Quebec is going to ask us to send children in the province. In other words, starting next January we are going to lower family allowances to $20 a month per child. Quebec opted for a formula whereby the fourth, fifth and other children in a family receive an enormous amount, while the first children of a family receive a smaller amount than in the rest of Canada. The total amount in Quebec must be the equivalent of $20 per child, and they are indicating which amounts they want us to send. So that will not complicate things for mothers. On January 20 and 21, mothers in Quebec will receive a cheque slightly smaller than what it was before, which will be as follows: $12 for the first child, that is the federal cheque. The big cheque comes from Ottawa and the small cheque from Quebec city, so we are talking about the big one: $12 a month for the first child, $15 for the second, $36.95 for the third and $46.05 for the fourth child and for each subsequent child. As soon as the legislation is passed by the National Assembly, Mr. Lazure will present me with this official request from Quebec, which will be contained in a legislation passed by their parliament; then we, in the federal government will immediately apply that legislation and send the cheques as requested by Quebec. It will be the only province, with Alberta, not to follow the $20 per child rate.

So this will not complicate the mechanism, we will merely have to reduce the amount of our own federal cheques to the level Quebec wants to allocate. However it is true that every mother entitled to the new cheque will have to file a basic income tax return even if she has never paid any income tax in her life and does not have to pay any. Mothers will fill in the top part of the form: name, address, social insurance number—it does not cost anything to get one and I urge those who do not already have a SIN to apply for it at the nearest post office—and then they will go directly to page four and simply indicate the amount of the income tax credit they claim for their children, the amount they are entitled to. Then they will sign and attest the accuracy of their income tax return. They will mail this return or give it to their husband who will send it along with his own, as they prefer, along with the single page which will be sent with the family allowance cheque for January. Then beginning at the end of March the tax department will send them a cheque in the name of the mother.

[English]

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Chairman, I want to refer briefly to a matter which has been pursued by my colleague, the hon. member for Churchill, regarding Indians and, specifically, status Indians. I do not intend to review all the detailed information, but with respect to the problem of forms I want to read into the record an article which appeared in the Walpole Island News. Walpole Island happens to be a reserve in my riding. The article states the following:

Attention: Family Allowance Recipients.

This would have gone out to the majority of Indians on that island. Indeed, it would have gone beyond the confines of the reserve.

A bonus of up to $200 per child will be provided to all Canadian families.

All families with annual incomes of less than $18,000 will receive a cheque of $200 for each child up to 18 years of age.

The $200 per child will be gradually reduced as family earnings rise above $18,000.

How to Apply

A one page form will be included with your January's family allowance cheque. Complete this and attach it to your 1978 income tax return.

I will come back to that in a moment.

N.B.

Please note that all persons qualifying for this bonus must have a social insurance number for each child.

If you do not have a number, please pick up applications or bring in—

1. Birth certificate or Indian status card (primary document).

2. Any other piece of identification such as baptism card, hospital card, school report card, etc. (secondary document) —to your local Canada Manpower Centre in Wallaceburg and they will help you complete the form.

It takes two to three weeks to receive your number back in the mail so the sooner your application is completed and mailed off the better.

If you have any questions, please contact:

Canada Manpower Centre

602 Wellington Street,

Wallaceburg.

As I indicated, I do not intend to go into detail regarding the arguments which have been raised by the hon. member for Churchill. However, I think it was evident from his argument—and I am sure the minister is aware of this—that there is a substantial number of status Indians across this country who will not have access to this type of information and will not be able to take advantage of it. I think it was the hon. member for Churchill who read from a document which indicated that, even with regard to the guaranteed income supplement, a substantial number of individuals are really not aware of the program and will not take advantage of it.

Several other arguments were raised. The National Indian Brotherhood suggested, for the reasons which I have indicated, as well as for others which have been covered, that perhaps a special form not related to the Income Tax Act could be devised for the use of status Indian mothers and that that form could be considered complete if band numbers were used rather than social insurance numbers. The article I read was distributed to only one band, and I am deeply concerned that the minister might not have at her disposal a method by which she can reach status Indians in Canada regarding the Income Tax Act proposals.

Has the minister considered the proposal put forward by the National Indian Brotherhood regarding a special form which would be more identifiable by status Indians? What method does the minister have at her disposal by which she can reach this significant segment of the population? I suspect that a substantial number of status Indians, particularly in remote areas, will have no knowledge of this bill and no knowledge of the applications and forms which will be involved. Would the minister comment on that and bring the House up to date as to what she and her department plan with regard to this very important issue?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, before the Minister of State (Environment) leaves the House I would like to quote his words for hon. members opposite. I wish they had heard my colleague the other day. He was becoming quite impatient as he listened to remarks about the supposed limitations of Indian mothers. He said, "Gee, Monique, do they not know that Indian women on reserves almost completely handle the affairs of their families?" We should not have bleeding hearts when there are no problems.

● (1622)

Mr. McGrath: This is an absolutely shameful intervention. He is talking about the National Indian Brotherhood.

Miss Bégin: We should address ourselves to improving the situation. I think this newsletter is very well done, and I appreciate the work of those who presented it. There is one small mistake, however. The social insurance number is not requested for the children but only for the mother who will receive the cheque.

The newsletter is well done and it is what I anticipate receiving from many other quarters. We are implementing a new social program and, because the economic situation is tight right now, and the mentality in Canada is toward control of potential abusers, we have to ask people to fill in forms. I regret that it is a complicated form, although they just have to fill in the top part, which is identification.

I am positive that the more than 560 chiefs of the band councils will be helpful. I am writing to them about this. The hon. member represents a riding that has Indian communities so he knows how tightly knit is the fabric of those communities, and how well organized they are. We do not anticipate major problems, because we will surely have the help of many of the councillors and administrators of the various communities. I already have information about the help of all the nurses and staff of my own department posted in various Indian communities in the country. The 150 offices of my department, including the health offices, have all developed a sort of training course for the officers in order that they may help women of the communities fill in the forms. I am preparing an information strategy that will also make use of voluntary associations.

The problem of using the tax form is very real for the first year of operation, but the taxation computer program is so far advanced that there was no way we could have the master computer program use data from a source other than the basic income tax form. The suggestion made in the House by the hon. member for Churchill the other day is what I recommended to the National Indian Brotherhood not for the first year of operation but for the year after that.

I regret that in the first year of operation mothers who are not used to doing it will have to fill in an income tax form. The system for the first year must make use of that form, however, as the only source of data suitable for entry onto the master form by mothers now qualifying for the program. That will mean filling out the top of the first page, and the last part of the fourth page, but none of the rest of the first page or pages 2 and 3. It does not mean paying taxes. It means being registered in the tax system with a file in the name of the mother, in order to make sure that she gets a cheque.

I am asking the co-operation of all concerned. I have the assurance that for the 1980 year of operation a single, shorter, and simpler form will be devised for the 1.5 million mothers who are not regular filers.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. minister's comments. I was hoping they would be constructive but, unfortunately, the minister has not seen fit to allay my fears and apprehensions about two very serious matters.

In the last four years I have had the opportunity to travel extensively into Indian and native communities. I may have been skeptical, but I still suspect that a large number of status mothers in my area will not have knowledge of this form. The minister has not allayed my suspicions that the problem has not been recognized and that there will be proper assistance available to them to fill out the form.

In the more remote areas, whether the northern part of Saskatchewan, Churchill, or northern Ontario, I can tell the minister, from my experience, that forms which seem simple to us are very alien to significant numbers of status Indians. From what the minister has related to the House I do not think a significant number of Indian mothers will be reached.

When we were examining the supplementary estimates in the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, it became obvious that when this legislation was being prepared there had been no consultation between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. That testimony is on the record. We are here to assist the minister, but it seems that what both departments are trying to do is find a solution to a problem they should have recognized before the bill was introduced. It should have been solved when the bill was being drafted. The minister has not convinced me that a solution has been found.

The minister talks about the income tax return, and I am sure she is well aware of the continuing dialogue in this matter between status Indians, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Department of National Revenue, and others. Because of the probable consequences in this particular area, I should like to ask the minister why she insists on proceeding with the income tax form. Why does she not accept the very simple suggestion put forward by the National Indian Brotherhood for a separate form until the problem is resolved? Surely discussions with the departments I have mentioned would show how sensitive, how complex and difficult is the problem. I just cannot comprehend why she proceeds with this, knowing the hornet's nest that will be created if status mothers have to use the income tax form at the beginning of the year.

I must emphasize that I am not convinced from what the minister indicated that we are going to reach the status Indian, particularly those in remote areas.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member forgets one element in his presentation. This may be a new program but it is tied into the family allowance program. All Indian mothers with children under the age of 18 receive the family allowance and are familiar with it. It is true that an explanation of the form is being sent to mothers with the monthly cheque, taking them by the hand, if I may use that expression, into the new program for which they may qualify.

● (1632)

There is already an attachment to a particular program which we are using and exploiting to implement the thirteenth cheque. I am familiar with the hon. member's good work so I will take his words as sincere representation in favour of less paper burden.

I can assure the hon. member that I am not pleased at all that we have to use an income tax form for the 1.5 million mothers who are non-filers of tax claims and who will now have to fill in the beginning and the end of the form. The only explanation I can provide to the House is the realities of the tax system. The program was adopted toward the end of August. We started working immediately on both the legislative drafting and the technical implementation of the program.

By nature the program is that of a tax credit instead of tax exemptions. That in itself is a major fiscal reform. Many of us hoped for a single, unified, short form.

At the same time the tax machinery was already in motion, as it always is at that period of the year, the computer program had been drafted which handles the usual tax forms of individuals as well as the new child tax credit system. We asked the tax specialists whether it was possible to use schedule 10; that is a new one page form and will accompany all family allowance cheques. We asked them if that form could not be used instead and to have the staff fill in a mock form for each mother and feed it into the tax system. The answer was negative. The manuals and the trainees, who will become employees, have already learned to do the specific job of taking information from line 78 and line 62 and so on of the main tax form and feeding it into the computer. I accept that, and I understand their technical problem.

It is too late now to change completely the computer program as well as the manuals for this year, or to retrain future employees. If we did so it would delay the process of reimbursing Canadians by several months. The best we can do for this year is to mail a copy of the basic tax form, with explanations, to all mothers. Along with that we intend to have the best possible information strategy. This will include requesting the help of members of parliament who could have one or two clinics or sessions in their riding offices on Saturday mornings to explain to mothers how to complete these forms.

In addition to that, the staff in all my own 150 or so branch offices across Canada are learning the new program so as to be able to offer additional help. All provincial departments of social services will be referring mothers to these offices. I regret that we must have recourse to the main tax form. It is the first year, and we are implementing a new program. Because of this each mother is requested to have a file in her own name similar to individual taxation. That is the basis of the problem.

I suggested to the National Indian Brotherhood, who, I see, passed it on to the hon. member for Churchill last week, that for the next year, that is, the year after, we will have a single form solely for the child tax credit. I think it is easy to understand that for this particular year it is too late for Revenue Canada to readjust completely to a new tax form especially for this measure.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to inform the hon. member for Lambton-Kent that his time has expired. Is there any other member who wishes to speak on this particular clause?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Chairman, I have one brief question for the minister. In her remarks the minister indicated that 1.5 million mothers who are not now filing income tax forms would receive, early in February, a copy of the income tax return, together with schedule 10, and an invitation to apply for a social insurance number, if they do not already have one. My question is this: why not include the application for the social insurance number with the other papers sent to these people? In many places, especially isolated communities, it will be difficult for people to get those forms and this would increase the length of time they will have to wait for the tax rebate. I would suggest, therefore, that the form be included and that an invitation go along with it to suggest, if they do not already have a social insurance number, to use that form to apply for a social insurance number for one of their children.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, the House will burst out laughing when I give the answer to this question. The size of the envelope may not be big enough to permit even one more sheet of paper inside it. We have studied that suggestion, which I think is an excellent one.

I could undertake to check with Revenue Canada to see if, in their mailing of the basic tax form to the 1.5 million non-filing mothers, they could add an application form for a social insurance number. However, I would like to remind my hon. colleague that the majority of mothers do have a social insurance number. Six hundred thousand out of 3.6 million mothers who receive family allowance do not use their social insurance number, and the majority of these 600,000 mothers do have one but use their husbands' numbers instead. I could provide members with copies of the application form. We will investigate that request with Revenue Canada, but I am not sure we will be able to accommodate the hon. member. It will be impossible to add this form in my mailing for the month of January; every millimetre of space is already used.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Chairman, I was not suggesting that the form should accompany cheques sent out in January for the family allowance. Rather, I was suggesting it should go with the tax return form and schedule 10 that is being sent. I am sure that an envelope which will include those forms could also include an application form for a social insurance number.

I would hope, even though there may be only a small proportion of women without a social insurance number, that that could be done, and these mothers could be urged to apply for a social insurance number for one of their children, if they themselves already have such a number. This would at least be a start toward having their children receive social insurance numbers.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief, but there is one other important matter that I would like to bring to the attention of the minister. I want to be as sympathetic as I can with the minister in terms of the computerized system and the difficulty it will create for her department. But I must again emphasize to the minister the importance of the form that is going out. The minister knows perfectly well that if an income tax form reaches virtually every reserve across Canada, she is violating what is considered to be a most important issue in terms of status Indians. In light of that knowledge, the knowledge that the minister and the government have in terms of how status Indians, the National Indian Brotherhood, and virtually all organizations across the country feel relative to this particular issue, why does she have to come forward with an income tax form at this particular time?

If we can put a man on the moon and split the atom, I have no doubt that, with a little bit of imagination, initiative, and incentive on the part of the government, a separate form could be utilized for the year 1979. The government must sense that this issue is fundamental to status Indians across this country.

I take no assurance from the minister that we might see another form in the distant future. I have no confidence in that. If the minister were conscious of and sensitive to the problem, she could find a very easy way to avoid this, by having a very simple form, as suggested by the National Indian Brotherhood.

I do not want to take any more of the minister's time. However, having had experience with other social programs, I am still not satisfied that the minister has provided information to show that the overwhelming proportion of status Indians are going to receive the benefits which we hope they will receive in terms of the method she has suggested.

Specifically, will the minister consider withdrawing the suggestion of the income tax form for the coming year and have a separate form for status Indians? That is the crux of the problem. Will the minister assure us that it will not be the income tax form but a separate form, as suggested by the National Indian Brotherhood and other organizations? That would go a long way toward relieving some of the suspicions, skepticisms, and apprehensions as to the direction this government is going in this regard.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I will not be very long, as I have answered this question very often. I have satisfied myself that we are not prejudicing any claims settlements. When the program was first designed, the only mistake that could have been made by myself and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was to make sure that Indian mothers would not be involved in the program. By definition we are talking of a tax credit instead of a tax exemption.

What the hon. member is saying is very simple. The essence of the program is that it is a tax credit instead of a tax exemption. Either the Indian mothers are included in the program or they are not. We decided to include them.

You cannot have it both ways. If the hon. member wants a special tax form, then we are not talking of a tax credit. I do not think the hon. member understands the nature of the program. It is through the tax system that it is processed.

The choice was whether we would include Indians mothers in the program or leave them out. I asked my officials to provide me with an estimate of what the program would mean to Indian mothers. It would mean an additional $19 million net for Indian mothers, $14 million for Indian mothers living on reserves. I thought that was very important.

In the development of a new program, none of us knew exactly what form would be required by the system. The ideal was a simple, unified form. I have often explained to the hon. member there is no way that can be designed in time for this year.

The hon. member does not understand that this bill, by its very nature, is a tax bill. There is no precedent being created in any way, asking Indians living on reserves to file taxation forms.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to prolong this, but I want to emphasize to the minister that I understand perfectly well the intent of the bill. The issue she attempted to interpret for the House is not whether Indians and their children should be in or out of the program. Everyone in this House agrees that they should be in the program. The issue is a very fundamental one. However, the minister has refused to address herself to it. I therefore come back to it. The minister knows perfectly well that status Indians have rejected the notion of an income tax form being utilized as the vehicle they must use.

It is not beyond my imagination or comprehension that there must be some way by which these people can receive these benefits other than through the use of the income tax form. The minister knows that is the issue. It is not a question of whether these people should be in or out of the program. They should be in the program.

Utilizing the income tax form is not the end-all and be-all for all problems. Why not utilize another form for at least this coming fiscal year? Parliament could resolve it in a manner that would seem more equitable to the Indians of this country.

The minister has not really identified the problem. We recognize that status Indians should be involved in this program, that they will benefit from it. However, I would like the minister to address herself to this specific issue of the income tax form. As I indicated before, if we can put a man on the moon, split the atom and do many other things, surely we can devise another method for the interim period and use something other than the income tax form so that status Indian mothers and children can receive the funds without having to use the income tax form. It is that simple. I do not believe it is an impossible task.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

On clause 8—

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, having boobed on my first attempt to get this point across, I now have an amendment to clause 8 which deals with the question of quarterly instalments. I just had a discussion with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. He pointed out that clause 8 does not in fact provide for any form of payment as opposed to another. It states that the minister may or may not, and I quote:

—on or after mailing the notice of assessment for the year, refund, without application therefor, any overpayment made on account of the tax;

The amendment I propose would add after the word "tax" the following words;

"the amount of such overpayment to be paid in quarterly instalments".

The approach of the government has been made clear. It has been indicated to us that for this year, at any rate, it is the intention of the government to pay the credit in one lump sum. We are sufficiently concerned about it that I would like to get this on the record, because the method of payment for this year, and indeed for all time, should be governed by law rather than left to the administrative discretion of the minister.

The arguments in favour of it have been put not only by members of my party and my colleagues in the Conservative party, but by such outside organizations as the National Anti-Poverty Organization and other groups which are concerned about the fact that if it is made in a lump sum payment to people who have previously not been in receipt of such benefits, it leaves people prey to income tax discounters with regard to the amount of money they will be receiving, and is liable to other forms of abuse.

We are looking at a situation where the need has been increased by the fact that the government has decided to reduce the amount of payment as per clause 10. I would like the amendment to be considered and responded to by the government in order that we can have on record that we are sufficiently concerned with the method of payment that we want to have this issue debated.

● (1652)

Miss Bégin: I will vote against the amendment and I will explain why. I may convince the hon member; I am not sure. Right now, clause 8 does not prescribe the manner in which payment must be made to mothers. It does not say there is to be an annual payment, as against several instalments, for example. This leaves the decision to the minister—to cabinet, basically. Right now, it is an annual payment because the tax system has to go through a number of readjustments and we did not want to take the risk that the system would collapse or fail to work. We did not want to introduce too many new elements into the tax system this year. The tax machinery has never been used in Canada for the delivery of benefits other than tax refunds, and that is once a year only. We wanted a brand new program to be implemented and then monitored for a period during which we could determine what mothers would prefer.

The annual payment does offer certain advantages; it would make possible savings which a family might not normally be able to make, or it could be used to buy a large item of equipment for the home, or for paying off debts. On the other hand, a family receiving several instalments a year would find it easier to integrate them into the family budget. Then there is the problem of tax discounters.

As I have said, we shall monitor the situation and eventually recommend to cabinet that payments be made in several instalments. Nevertheless, I do not want to put a commitment into law for, say, quarterly instalments; mothers may tell us that they prefer some different arrangements, monthly payments, for instance. I prefer the neutral tone of the bill before the House which allows complete flexibility to the ministry when it comes to fixing the number of payments per year. It is inappropriate that in the case of a simple technical decision of that nature one should have to introduce an amendment to the bill. Next year, if we decide to make the payment in several instalments, as we think will be the case, I would prefer that the act provide the necessary flexibility.

There are a number of ways in which members can call attention to the desirability of making several payments instead of one, if they wish. There is the question period, there are opportunities to raise the matter in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs and there are, of course, opportunities when the estimates and supplementary estimates are before us. The government would then be free to proceed immediately without having to bring forward a legislative amendment. For these reasons, I would oppose the amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Martin: Before the hon. member for St. John's East addresses the committee perhaps we might consider another matter. The House leader for the official opposition—he is not here for the moment—did indicate earlier this afternoon that he wished to see this bill dealt with expeditiously, and I was wondering whether there might not be a disposition at this point to reach some agreement in that regard, bearing in mind that we have already spent eight days in committee of the whole on this measure. Is there a disposition that we shall conclude our proceedings this evening?

Mr. McGrath: I am surprised to hear the parliamentary secretary make that intervention, having regard to the tremendous headway we have made today. It is obvious we are making progress. Why try to get that kind of assurance now? There may be members who will wish to participate in discussion on clauses 8 and 9. There will certainly be questions raised on clause 10, and I have no doubt we shall continue to make considerable progress. We should make even better progress if the minister would mellow a little. The minister is always very accommodating outside this chamber, but once inside it she becomes inflexible. It is a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde situation. The hon. lady never fails to amaze me.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Grain—Movement to export positions; the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis)—National Revenue—Reorganization of department—Delay in solving taxpayers' problems; the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—Immigration—Asylum in Canada for Southeast Asian refugees.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

● (1702)

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) stood by unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): We will now proceed to notice of motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones).

The Monarchy

THE MONARCHY

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN STATUS

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should not proceed with proposed changes in respect of the status of Her Majesty the Queen as Queen of Canada or in respect of the status of the position of Governor General of Canada as set out in Bill C-60 of the third session, or otherwise.

He said: I realize that many hon. members will feel that this motion is entirely unnecessary and maybe unwanted. However, in meeting and speaking with a number of persons across Canada this summer, I was made aware of the fact that Canadians for the most part want the Queen retained as Queen of Canada.

There has been considerable alarm in this country as a result of Bill C-60 over whether or not the government really intends to keep the Queen and her successors as monarchs of Canada. The government has replied, by stating in so many words, that it has no intention of getting rid of the Queen of Canada. However under this famous bill, Bill C-60 of the last session, most of the powers of the Queen were given to the Governor General. The Governor General was in fact to become an all powerful head of state. Surely this can mean nothing else but that the true intention was to phase out the Queen as Queen of Canada. The fact that there is an election in the offing should be no reason for an instantaneous but not necessarily lasting, change of intent.

It is my belief that, if we are to prove to all Canadians that they have responsible representation in Ottawa, we must not be afraid to allow this motion to come to a vote and to show publicly our individual feelings on the monarchy. Canadians have a right to know.

If this motion is talked out or defeated, like so many private members' motions, it will be clear evidence to all Canadians that members of parliament strongly oppose the Queen of Canada.

Let me point out to you the major reasons why Canadians feel the Queen of Canada should be retained as an integral part of our federal democratic system. First, the Queen as an hereditary figure provides Canada with a continuous, constant, stable head of state. No matter what kind of confusion takes place at the political level, in a constitutional monarchy, which we now have, we are assured of the continuous presence of a most able ruler. In an electoral system there is always a chance that the system will be stalemated. The presence of a constitutional monarch rules out the threat of a possible lack of government. Citizens in a democracy must be able to criticize and remove their leaders without fear that there will be no one to take over.

Second, the presence of a constitutional monarch takes away the struggle for power which occurs in so many countries and often leads to dictatorship. The Queen ensures freedom in Canada. After all, the system of a constitutional monarchy is certainly better than absolute leadership.

Third, elevation of rulers and the formation of courts and cliques is inevitable in governments of all kinds. A constitutional monarchy is not only less dangerous and less costly than most of them, it also limits, although it does not prevent, this tendency to form potentates and courts which neither democratic theory nor electoral practice have been able to diminish. The presence of the Queen of Canada ensures that first ministers are in second place and are not the sole authority.

Fourth, the Queen presents to Canadians an aura of humanity amidst the vast realms of governmental bureaucracy. She is above partisan politics in government. When a Canadian sees Her Majesty in our country, he or she does not have to wonder if she is visiting that certain portion of the country to get votes. The Canadian cannot lend political overtones to her phrases. The Queen is truly a head of state to be respected.

Fifth, since we in Canada are at present blessed with a constitutional monarchy, we are safeguarded by the fact that the Queen is head of the armed forces. Since the relationship with the Queen also gives us the privilege of belonging to the Commonwealth, we are assisted in many aspects of world affairs.

Sixth, the Queen is a symbol of unity in most parts of our country. Some Canadians from certain portions of the country are upset at the fact that the Queen is indeed a symbol. These persons are not impressed by the fact that we should have a head of state whom we share with other countries. However, there are many persons in our country who owe allegiance in some form to various outside heads of state. I am thinking here specifically of those who owe allegiance to churches with heads outside this country, or to businesses. May I also say that whether it is a Queen or not, heads of government, or the elected leaders, they will take to themselves, if they can, the prestige and power that is involved in a symbol. Elected leaders can just as easily assume the role of monarchs, but often in a less democratic manner. Part of the reason for Confederation and the union of this country was the common allegiance to the Queen and the common ties to the mother country. It is amazing, at this time of disunity in Canada, that certain persons would wish to be rid of a force which first united this country.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, there are indeed many reasons for retaining the present status of Her Majesty, the Queen of Canada. The Crown is like an iceberg—it displays only the tip of its size and importance to those in Canada. However, the Crown is a necessary factor in the preservation of our freedom. I maintain that the status of the Governor General should also be maintained as representative of the Queen, not acting as her right hand, though.

This is indeed a necessary and important motion in order that the present questioning attitude about the retention of the Queen of Canada—an uprising caused by the wording of Bill C-60—be answered. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is indeed a quandary over the fate of our monarchy in Canada, whether or not members of parliament prefer to recognize it. We as members of parliament owe it to the people of Canada to settle this controversy once and for all.

[Mr. Jones.]

Again I repeat that if this motion is defeated or talked out, it will be clear evidence to the people of this country that members of parliament strongly oppose the Queen of Canada. I hope sincerely that that is not the case.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to speak to this motion. I would like to say initially that I hope some of the things I will say will dispel any concern he has about the intentions of this government, or of members on this side of the House, or of parliament, for that matter. I would also like to dispel the thought he might have that this motion would have to come to a vote to prove anything like the oath of loyalty to the Queen which I myself have taken when I was one of her officers. I do not think any vote in the House would supersede that in any way, and I see no necessity for the motion to come to a vote.

Without getting into any detail or contradicting the hon. member, I would like to remind him that when he mentioned the Governor General being commander in chief as something new, it was in the early 1900s that the monarch, by letters patent, indicated to him that he was commander in chief. So we would not be doing anything new there.

The motion before us states:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should not proceed with the proposed changes in respect of the status of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada or in respect of the status of the position of the Governor General of Canada as set out in Bill C-60 of the third session, or otherwise.

I presume that the hon. member, in using the word "status", refers to the Oxford dictionary definition of that term, namely, social position or rank or a person's relation to others as fixed by law. His motion appears to be redundant since the bill neither interferes with the status of the Queen nor with that of the Governor General, but rather confirms the continuation of the monarchy, with the Queen occupying Canada's highest office as head of state, and it makes clear the stature, importance, and singularity of the office of Governor General.

When Bill C-60 was presented to the House we were told that it would die on the order paper. This technique was used to permit wide-ranging discussions, we were told, so that when the bill is presented again all Canadians will have the opportunity to make comment and effect changes in the bill. I can guarantee to the hon. member, as has the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), that the government has not proposed, nor does it intend, any change or diminution of the role of the monarchy in our system of government. In the proposed constitutional amendment bill, we have attempted to set out for all Canadians to see and know, the present roles of the sovereign and her representative.

As "A Time for Action" indicated, we believe that a new constitution of Canada should be a mordern document which would define the form of government and political structures chosen freely by all Canadians. Wherever possible, the written constitution should reflect current rather than past constitutional practice. Therefore, in the constitutional amendment bill the government has attempted to write into the constitution the present theory and practices regarding the monarchy. Because of the complexity and subtlety of this subject, this has not been an easy thing to do, and it was not possible or practical to attempt to cover all aspects of the subject. However, the constitutional amendment bill would confirm the continuation of the monarchy with the Queen occupying Canada's highest office as head of state, and would codify the reality of the Governor General's present powers as they have actually evolved, and make clear the stature, importance and singularity of his office.

All the essentials of our system of constitutional monarchy would remain. Indeed they would be clarified, and as a result, strengthened. As sovereign and head of state, the Queen would continue to appoint the Governor General. Also as constitutional monarch she could assume when visiting Canada any of the functions of the Governor General under the bill. The Government of Canada would continue to be carried on in the Queen's name.

The sovereign's representative, the Governor General, virtually would exercise all royal powers except the appointment of the holder of his office. He would exercise them on the basis of statutory constitutional provisions which have been derived from a variety of present sources of constitutional authority.

By consolidating and clarifying both the office of Governor General and the position of the sovereign, in accordance with existing practices, the bill would confirm the respective roles of the sovereign and the Governor General. Existing conventions protecting the Crown from political interference would not be weakened. On the contrary, the bill would secure in our constitution all the protection which now exists by convention for the maintenance and functioning of Canada's system of constitutional monarchy and responsible parliamentary democracy.

Surely the hon. member is aware that the Speech from the Throne delivered on October 11, 1978, indicated the following:

> The government's view was and remains that the new constitution should describe the situation as it exists today in Canada, and the government is pleased that the provincial premiers expressed the same view during their meeting in Regina. Discussions are already in progress with provincial governments to ensure that the legal drafting conforms to that intention. There is no intention to change or to reduce in any way the role Her Majesty plays.

The present Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid), from Kenora-Rainy River, is involved in those negotiations. He is very, very interested in and an advocate of the monarchy. Therefore, at this very moment he is dealing with the provinces in discussing how the wording can achieve the intention of the government.

In his speech in the House on October 12, 1978, the Prime Minister said the following:

> We have indicated many times that our intention was not to change the role of the monarchy. We indicated that as far back as 1968 when we published the white paper on the constitution. We have repeated it constantly since then that that was our intention.

The former minister of state for federal-provincial relations, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), said that whatever may be the difficulties in giving legal expression to the government's intention, that intention was and still is that there should be no change or diminution of the role of the monarchy in our system of government.

When the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Basford) was minister of justice, the intention was explained to Her Majesty at Buckingham Palace, and she saw it that way too. A letter from the Queen's private secretary indicates that Her Majesty was satisfied the proposals would not alter the essential relationship of the Crown to Canada. That letter was unsolicited.

On September 6, 1978, the then minister of transport and minister of justice, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), speaking in London, England, gave a group of senior British businessmen the assurance that changes in the Canadian constitution would in no way change the sovereign role of the monarch in Canada.

An hon. Member: In Canada?

Mr. MacFarlane: Well, we would not want to change it in England. That is not our job.

There is an overwhelming weight of evidence to the effect that the Prime Minister, the government, ministers of the Crown and individual members of parliament, have spoken out in a laudatory fashion as to the role of Her Majesty the Queen as head of state of Canada. Her Majesty the Queen plays an active role in Canada today, as she has done in the past and will continue to do in the future. In fact during the 1970s, royal visits have been more frequent than ever before. It is clear that she has widespread respect and love among Canadians.

The Crown, in the persons of Her Majesty and her representative, the Governor General, serve as a living link with our history and traditions. Our constitutional proposals would ensure that this continues. For instance, section 30 guarantees the role of Her Majesty in the Canadian federation. It reads as follows:

> The sovereign head of Canada is Her Majesty the Queen, who shall be styled the Queen of Canada and whose sovereignty as such shall pass to her heirs and successors in accordance with law.

It cannot be clearer than that. In fact I could spend hours in rebuttal of criticism of the wording and clauses of the bill presented by certain self-styled and self-proclaimed constitutional experts. Since we are assured all efforts will be made by the government to have recourse to the best legal experts in order that the bill will present the intentions of Canadian people correctly, I will not indulge in that kind of polemic argument.

Members of parliament of all political parties legally recognize the bilingual nature of the country. Long before we did, as head of state the Queen spoke in two languages in her messages to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: She spoke in both English and French, perfect English and perfect French, which came from her heart. Above all others, she has contributed to the unity of the country. The royal house of Windsor has roots in the ethnic peoples of Europe. She herself chose a man to share her throne who traces his family to Greece. She is well qualified to recognize the diversity of our country. By inheritance, by word and by deed, our Queen stands as an example of understanding to all Canadians, her loyal subjects.

When I was 14 years old and in public school in Quebec, I was proud to receive the Jubilee Medal of King George V and his Queen. I was proud to receive my commission as an officer in the Royal Canadian Air Force under the seal of George VI. Just last year, as a member of a parliament for Hamilton Mountain, I was proud to receive the Jubilee Medal of Queen Elizabeth II. The royal family always has been a part of my life. Gertrude Stein once said, "A rose is a rose is a rose." On Hamilton Mountain we say, "The Queen is the Queen is the Queen."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, as seconder of this important motion moved by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones), I want to start out by saying that I personally know a great many Canadians, not only in the west but right across the country, who want the Queen to remain recognized as the Queen of Canada and the rightful head of the state of this nation.

I found the comments of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) very interesting. They were stirring, and I appreciated them. But I wonder whether hon. members opposite will have the ability to restrain their comments in favour of the monarchy in order that we might have a recorded vote on the subject. I rather doubt they will.

I cannot understand the thinking of anyone who would entertain the idea of removing the Queen as head of our state, or in any way downgrading her position as leader of our people. As a matter of fact Bill C-60 did that, as has been recognized by certain authorities. The hon. member cast aspersions on the hon. Senator Forsey and the right hon. Roland Michener, a former Speaker of this House, who gave testimony before the Senate committee to the effect that Bill C-60 had an effect of downgrading the role of the monarchy and increasing the purpose of the Governor General at the Queen's expense. I do not think Senator Forsey and Mr. Michener should be classified as self-styled experts. I think they are recognized experts in the field of constitutional law. Certainly the former governor general has a good background for stating what the practical effects of Bill C-60 would have been.

● (1722)

The reaction of people across the country is not merely a sentimental reaction to an honoured and long standing tradition. Nor is it simply a love of symbolism or a standing in awe of all the pomp and ceremony which accompany any crowned head. There is a fear and a suspicion on the part of the people that the government is doing something it should not be doing in this area. Some people in this country are actually afraid that if the Queen is shoved aside the way will be open for dictatorship or, at the least, republicanism of the kind we have seen fail time and time again in other countries. Since this government has already reflected dictatorial tendencies on occasion, that fear is very real in the minds of Canadians who have been observing this government for the past ten years.

Hundreds of thousands of people in Canada are rightfully suspicious of this government for ever suggesting any degree of tampering with the mònarch's Canadian connection, and there has been an effort to tamper with it. I cannot believe that the drafters of Bill C-60 could be so inept and incompetent as to attempt to do what they did if that was the basis of what they were doing. I think there was more than ineptness and incompetence in the drafting of that bill.

The monarchy today is much more than a symbol of authority. As my hon. friend across the way and the mover of this motion have stated, it represents unity among peoples, brotherhood among nations and, therefore, it is a form of leadership. The monarchy stands as a form of popular leadership and the Queen is the physical personification of that leadership. She shows the kind of leadership everyone in Canada can look up to, regardless of political ideology. In other words, she unifies us. If ever this country needed that kind of leadership, it is now, because at this time there is certainly no leadership being provided by the present government. Canadians today need and want strong, popular leadership untainted by political ambitions toward dictatorship, and immune to the chance results of election campaigns based on promises which may never be kept.

Canada needs the kind of leadership that serves as a strong unifying force, and as the years roll by and as elections come and go, it is becoming more and more apparent that we are not getting that kind of leadership from currently practising politicians.

The monarchy provides us with continuous popular leadership and the continuous presence of an able and understanding leader. The monarch is always there, no matter how often our zealous politicians talk themselves out of office. We cannot be totally without government as long as the Queen remains the Queen of Canada. Nor are we left at the mercy of poorly managed government as long as she is there. She is our final appeal for true leadership.

As my hon. colleague has mentioned, the Queen ensures freedom in Canada: freedom to think, speak and act as we please within the letter of the law; freedom to worship as we see fit; freedom to live our lives usefully and with some hope of reward and satisfaction; and freedom to move about as we wish in our own country and to seek out greater opportunities for ourselves and for our families. Without the long shadow of the monarchy standing over it, no Canadian government can be held for very long to the responsibility for and the protection of all these freedoms which our people now enjoy.

Without the monarchy, sooner or later some ambitious oaf will show up and grind us under his dictatorial heel. It has happened in other countries, and it can happen here.

Indeed, the presence of the Queen in Canada serves as a very real reminder that first ministers are in second place, as my colleague has pointed out, and not in sole authority. We all know that some first ministers need to be reminded of that fact.

There is today an uprising in Canada, a surge of both emotional and rational reaction to this government's efforts at unseating the Queen of Canada. If we do not listen to the people now and heed their wishes in this respect, the day when we will wish we had will not be far off.

We must maintain the Queen's Canadian connection because she represents the only true leadership and the only unifying force available to us at this time. I again urge hon. members not to let their enthusiasm for the monarchy use up the remainder of our time. Let there be a real indication of where members of this House stand on this issue, because it is an important issue. I think the people of Canada are entitled to know where we stand. We should not cop out by letting our time expire as a means of denying the people of Canada the right to know where their members of parliament stand on this issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to quote part of motion No. 4, as follows:

—should not proceed with proposed changes in respect of the status of Her Majesty the Queen as Queen of Canada or in respect of the status of the position of Governor General of Canada as set out in Bill C-60—

Mr. Speaker, after hearing the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) speak to us on his motion, when a French-Canadian hon. member from Quebec rises, one must surely wonder what he will say about motion like that one, especially as a French-Canadian from Quebec.

● (1732)

I might be well advised to say first of all why an hon. member from Quebec should want to participate in the debate on such a motion. First he does so to point out to the hon. member for Moncton that we Quebeckers are first of all French-speaking Canadians and, like Her Majesty the Queen, we have the advantage of being perfectly bilingual. My colleague across the way, the mover of this motion, has not had it seems, I shall not say the courage but the advantage of learning the two languages; we all know why he sits as an independent.

But we also know full well that his motion is but an excuse to hold a debate, for he is aware that we have a bill and white papers on the subject, and that the subject of his motion is already the topic of discussions across Canada. So he comes to us with some form of threat, saying that if we talk out the bill by discussing it until six o'clock, or if the vote is not taken before six, it will mean that we are against not only the motion, not to speak of the Queen, but also against the office of Governor General. Mr. Speaker, that in the vernacular is known as blackmail, and I will have none of it. About that motion proposed by the hon. member for Moncton known for his limping courage and supported by another independent member who unfortunately is one of my good friends, I do not know if he only intended to provide moral support so as to make it possible to debate the motion. The hon. member for Moncton knows very well that we share his belief although we come from Quebec or from other parts of the country. I would tell him what my grandfather said: Stop standing in front of the Queen, Mr. hon. member for Moncton, so that she might see us too, other Canadians. Some people out-Herod-Herod. The hon. member for Moncton reminds me of those.

If the hon. member for Moncton had taken time to read the statements by the Prime Minister—although I do not question his good faith—I begin to wonder if the hon. member has actually read the statement the Prime Minister made on the occasion of his visit to the Queen, he would know that the Prime Minister had had personal discussions with her when she came to Canada in October 1977. He then told her that he contemplated a study—I am using his own words—on the whole constitutional matter in 1978-79. It was not an obligation but a comprehensive study. We must never forget the difference between the consideration of a plan and compelling someone to take a decision which is beyond his judgment, his belief or his competence.

He also pointed out the importance of a renewed federal system. He did not say that is was essential to abolish a system or change the status of the Queen or that of the Governor General, but he merely emphasized the importance of a renewed federal system to counterbalance the campaign. I agree with the comments of the Prime Minister to counterbalance the campaign of the Quebec government trying to convince the people of that province to vote in favour of separation from Canada. Mr. Trudeau said to the Queen that in his opinion within a few years it would be essential to consider the constitution as a whole. It seems to me reasonable to ask such a thing, that is to consider the constitution as a whole with the provinces, to review some parts of it and to redraft an entirely Canadian document. Would it be a sin today to be Canadian? One can be Canadian today while clinging to some traditions, for example, the House of Commons, the democratic system, the English parliamentary system, which is the greatest democratic system in the world.

One may remain attached to the system, one may remain attached to the Queen of Canada without for that be deemed anti this or that. I have never read anywhere in the statements that anyone wanted to deprive the Queen of any powers, on the contrary if the process keeps on everyone will see— The hon. member stated that inevitably in the course of that debate certain questions would be asked about the relationship between the Crown and Canada and about the functions of the Governor General. But that is what is being done tonight with the motion moved by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones). Moreover, the Prime Minister added that he and his government would do their utmost to make very sure that any debate or discussion not be a source of division in Canada. He does not prompt the participants in that debate to ask themselves whether it would be advisable to modify in depth the present status of the Crown in Canada.

We could go on like this for long but ultimately we will have to come back to the white paper called "A Time for Action" which mentioned various propositions contained in this motion. The Prime Minister also said at the time that he would table a letter addressed to the Queen and which she answered. Later the Prime Minister received from the Queen's private secretary a letter dated June 20—precisely the one my hon. colleague and the author of the motion was talking about a moment ago—which indicated that Her Majesty approved of the proposed changes in the royal titles and that she was convinced that these propositions would not change the basic nature of the relations between the Crown and Canada. Moreover, the Queen reiterated these remarks to the Prime Minister during audiences she granted him in Moncton last August 5.

But it seems to me that if we compare Bill C-60, which has been presented, and the study made in collaboration with the joint committee of the Senate and the House, the white paper "A Time for Action", as well as all the discussions and debates that have been going on since then between the premiers, there is no cause for alarm, even if we do not vote on this motion before six o'clock. It seems to me that we can rely on the sense of responsibility of the Prime Minister and the premiers as well as on the committee that was established to study the constitution.

I think that regardless of their political allegiance, the premiers are men elected by the Canadian people in each province. They are responsible men and, I repeat, despite their political allegiance, they are as Canadian and as responsible as the hon. member for Moncton can be. We ought to have confidence in these people, in the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada, who are studying and discussing the constitutional system to arrive at some kind of approach which will be more modern and more responsive to the needs of 1978-1979 and future years. But I do not see any scandal or concern about the hon. member's motion if the vote should be made after six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker, I do not see at all what the hon. member for Moncton wants, and this is why he irritated me at the beginning of his speech when he threatened us immediately, saying that if we talked until six it would mean—I do not want to repeat his words because they make me a little too angry. I shall let him repeat his own words on other occasions. But this is not how the government acts, it does not talk out bills for the sake of it. However, with this kind of meaningless motion, when you know what is presently happening, I will not be disturbed if we reach six o'clock without having voted, I will not feel guilty and concerned about the result of his remarks after six o'clock either on television or on radio or whatever.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to read again a quote from the right hon. Prime Minister on the adaptation, the renewal or the changes which will have to be made. He said, and I quote:

> It is time to respond to this wish for renewal of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Moncton does not want to say or does not seem to be willing to say what the Prime Minister said at that time, at least he will believe a little what the people of Canada seem to be willing to say or what they have been saying up to now. The Prime Minister said: It is time to respond to this wish for renewal of the Canadian people. It is therefore up to parliament, the federal government, the provincial governments, as I said earlier, and all those in authority in our society to proceed so that this renewal will come about promptly, without mishap and in complete accordance with our democratic traditions. This could not be any clearer. There is no threat implied.

It is not a matter of passing legislation with a majority of votes to prevent the opposition—I do not even know if a Progressive Conservative member will rise later on to speak about this issue. I can see that two or three are here. In any case, there is no threat involved; the only thing that is involved is the action that we want to take because we believe that the Canadian population is ready to accept changes to our constitution. I believe that the Canadian people are not only ready for this, but that they have already waited too long. I believe that the people in this country are ready now to receive the changes that a courageous government will soon bring about. We are about to do so, and I hope that this problem will be solved long before the next election so that someone like me, who will probably not be in politics at that time, will be able to say: We have finally done something that the Canadian people have wanted for a long time.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Moncton cannot shame me into thinking that if there is no vote at six o'clock, everyone will regret it, not to repeat the words that he used. Certain formulas and the white paper were mentioned. People have often said that Canada cannot tolerate another decade of uncertainty. As I said earlier, in my opinion the Canadian people—and I say this as a French-speaking Canadian from Quebec—all the Canadian people, whether they are English-speaking or from another cultural background, are ready to accept the changes that we want to make. I do not have the impression that these changes will offend anyone as we want to maintain the authority of the monarch. Indeed, the bill never said that there was any desire to remove her powers. I do not know where the experts found this idea of a so-called change in power. Names were mentioned earlier. But I am starting to have some doubts as to whether these people were really well known experts or whether they misread or read too rapidly the paper or the bill.

The government is adding to the legislation, which serves as a working document in the public, parliament and intergovernment debates. The coming months will improve the tone of the debate and accelerate the reaching of a consensus. It is apparent the Prime Minister at that time was far from desiring to remove any status from the Queen or the Governor General.

If we go back further, if we refer to the white paper in which were put forward the four main proposals for a renewed federation, and you probably know them better than myself, we find a re-statement of Canadian identity. There is nothing we could be more proud of. We want a re-statement of Canadian identity. I want to be called a French Canadian, a bilingual one. Call me anything, but call me a "Canadian". I will take pride in that. At the same time I am a Canadian citizen from the province of Quebec, and I feel I am as much a Canadian as my western colleagues who do not speak both languages, who at least did not have an opportunity to learn them, but who do not have the privilege to speak them, or who do not even make the effort to learn them.

Anyway this does not bother me at all. It does not shock me because there is as act on bilingualism, which affords us rather good protection as far as the public service and other services connected with justice and Canadian government are concerned. Therefore, those who are not bilingual do not shock me. But at least let them not act as though with their unilingual English language gave them a monopoly, not on "Canadianity" but almost, a monopoly on illustrations and famous Canadians, for the sole reason they are from the west or the east or the maritimes and they speak but one language. A Canadian is a fellow like myself who stands up and says what he thinks in the language he wants to use.

● (1742)

[English]

If they do not think I am saying it the right way, I can say it in English as well. To be a Canadian is not to be an English-speaking Canadian; it is to be a guy like me who learned the language during the war, not with the aid of books because I did not have that chance, but I made an effort and learned my English during the war. Maybe my English is not the best, but of course those English Canadians who taught me are to blame for that. However, I learned, I tried and I am very proud of that. It is not always from the grammar that you learn a language; it comes from the heart.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boulanger: When you want to speak and you have it in your heart to do so, you succeed. Do not worry, Mr. Speaker, I do not care if the English I speak is broken or not, but there is one thing that is not broken inside me and that is my pride in being a Canadian. And that I shall remain.

The Monarchy

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of being able to speak on this motion presented this afternoon by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones). This is private members' hour and I wish to advise hon. members that I do speak as a private member for Fundy-Royal, although I have no problem in my identification of the party that I represent in this House because, like myself, they agree there should be no dilution of the role of the monarchy or the Queen as head of state of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Corbett: Nevertheless I did become somewhat concerned when I heard the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) protest in a rather loud and inordinate way about the proposals introduced in Bill C-60. My feeling is that he is protesting too much. For what reason? I am concerned when members opposite and the government of this country begin to dabble in what we refer to as constitutional tinkering. I am concerned that if there is no intention on the part of the government to dilute the authority of the monarchy in this country, why is it necessary to include any reference to this in Bill C-60? Bill C-60 very definitely states that the powers of the Queen are not to be diminished or diluted—words to that effect—while she is in Canada. That is absolutely contrary to my understanding of the constitution and the role of the monarchy in this country.

I intend to move along with my remarks and I will not take up the entire time allotted to me.

Canada has recently entered a period of reappraisal. Canadians feel that the time has come to reconsider what we are and to determine what we want to become. From the Atlantic to the Pacific we have been discussing our history and our future. We made a country out of a continent. It has been a great adventure. We built with our own hands a country stretching from Newfoundland to Vancouver Island, from Point Pelee to the northernmost reaches of the Arctic Islands. It took scarcely longer than a span of a man's life to do it. Many Canadians still remember the era of new settlements, the clearing of the lands, the great beginnings, the time when there were only five million of us, when our major cities—there were a dozen or so—had populations of barely more than 20,000, and when the railway and a handful of newspapers were the only means of linking region with region.

In order to adapt to the new continent, discover its spirit and learn to survive in its environment, our ancestors had to borrow the ways and customs of many peoples. But no custom and tradition has had more influence on the peaceful and orderly development of our great nation than the Crown. The Crown and the concept of constitutional monarchy have never been easy matters to explain. And because there is a tendency among all people to dismiss what they cannot easily explain, the monarchy in Canada has frequently been tossed off as either an historical anachronism that should long ago have gone the way of knights and round tables, or a stale leftover of colonialism, the fact being that we are a sovereign, independent nation with a foreign—that is, British—head of state.

I submit that such a description of the Queen of Canada is a highly simplistic explanation of her function which is used to advantage by those who wish to erode the functions and traditions of the parliamentary system of government in Canada. Elizabeth II is the personal expression of the Crown of Canada, not the Crown of England. She is the Queen of Canada as well as the Queen of England and is the constitutional monarch of Canada. It is this combination that explains her role as head of state and as an institution of the Canadian government.

We note immediately that the Queen plays the same role in many other parts of the Commonwealth, and we face the question of a shared Crown and head of state. What is the advantage in modern times of this arrangement? Does it limit or compromise the sovereignty of Canada as an independent nation? This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I wish to examine these questions with you.

The Commonwealth serves 850 million people and includes huge nations and tiny states. Of its 33 members, all recognize the Queen as head of the Commonwealth. Sixteen new states plus India are republics with their own heads of state distinct from the Queen; 11, including Canada, are monarchies with the Queen as head of state; and five, all new states, are monarchies with monarchs other than the Queen as head of state.

Much has been written and said about the Commonwealth and I feel one particular attribute is worthy of mention this evening. That particular attribute is the ability of the Commonwealth to allow its member nations to participate in the orderly transition from colony to nation, the one singular force allowing such peaceful transition being the Crown.

Over the centuries many nations have conquered many other nations and developed lands into colonies. But they have rarely been inclined either to give easily the fruits of their conquests in development, or to admit to accusations of exploitation. The gaining of nationhood by dependencies has usually required a long process of negotiation, perhaps rebellion, and the aftermath may be bitter. As far as Britain's original dependencies were concerned, there were struggles but in the separation of the control of the mother country there was a stage which permitted a gradual, peaceful and face-saving change to independence under the Crown.

The British learned their lesson when the American colonies broke away, and since then they have followed a natural process comparable to the experience of any child who grows beyond dependence upon his parents, becomes able to support himself and handle his own affairs, and maintains an independent family relationship. Other empires disintegrated leaving little friendship either among the parts or between them and the original mother country. Such was not the case with the British Empire.

Canada, being a member of that British Empire, was able to weaken and then sever all governmental connections with Britain until she had complete control of her own affairs. Colonial status changed to dominion status and then to independent status when conditions in Canada justified the change.

The existence of the Crown permitted face-saving on both sides. The provinces got all the trappings, symbols and ceremonies early to make them appear more grown up, even when there was little else to justify their identities. The government of the mother country saved face every time it gave up some power because the old links appeared at first to remain. But the old links did not remain and when everyone on both sides of the Atlantic realized it the Crown became a symbol, not of colonialism but of nationhood.

The Queen and the Crown therefore represent, among other things, the origin and growth of government. It was the Crown that gave out the original letters patent which gave the colonies their official status and served as a mark of sovereignty when they desperately needed to provide legitimacy, and this remained as a constitutional umbrella under which they grew to maturity. This shared heritage of the Crown was very important for it was in the midst of this tradition, even before colonies were politically stable, that the Crown helped to bring three of them together as four provinces in 1867 when they had little else in common besides their allegiance to a common sovereign. On their own initiative and terms they set up another central system with the same structure they had known for so long.

Then the new structure developed further on a national scale and this system was continued or set up in six new provinces. Meanwhile the constitution remains stable in a century when constitutions elsewhere were created and destroyed in reckless fashion, until now Canada's government is one of the oldest in the world and, as we have noted, her people have enjoyed, by global standards, a remarkable freedom from real political trouble.

All this did not take place because Canadians were superior people. They have a system that transplanted well in their environment and then worked. The question which we must now ask is what attributes of constitutional monarchy have made it work so well once it was transplanted in Canada. I suggest that a prime minister in Canada or a provincial premier is made to know from the start of his administration that he is advising on the use of the Queen's power, not wielding power that he actually possesses. There is an enormous practical difference between these two concepts. However much the Prime Minister can do on advising on the use of power, and even though he is among the most powerful, responsible heads of government in the world, he is always in the democratic position of being merely a trustee; and he knows it because of frequent and colourful reminders. He is a trustee to whom much responsibility can be entrusted but also readily taken away. It clearly puts the Prime Minister and his cabinet on the defensive at election time in an era when several heads of government elsewhere possess so much power that they are able to control elections or abolish them altogether.

The Crown has therefore a means of meeting a difficulty—so evident in history and contemporary politics throughout the world—that of preventing officials at the summit of government from becoming too powerful, irresponsible and perhaps immovable.

This brings us to a definition of what the Canadian constitutional monarchy is all about. After centuries of political evolution we have arrived at the stage where all the powers of the state are vested, not in the state—that is, the formal governing structure—but in the community, with the person chosen to symbolize or personify those powers having no or scant powers to wield at all. That is, we separate the possession of power from the wielding of power. One institution, the monarchy, possesses the power without wielding it; the other institution, government, wields the power without possessing it.

● (1752)

Even though we may associate executive power with certain officials under our present constitution, we do not in law or in fact make it the personal possession of any of them. We put it outside the government structure, not in someone's hands but in an abstraction, and we call that abstraction the Crown.

The Crown, therefore, is not the monarch. The Crown is the people, and the monarch symbolizes the people, with all the dignity, stature, mystique and aura of her office. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) once told her at a state dinner, "I always like being seen in public with you; it's the only time I never get booed"!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Corbett: Those are the Prime Minister's words, not mine. If hon. members get complaints, take it up with the Prime Minister. Some of those opposite who are interested in retaining the monarchy have an awful lot to say when someone on this side is interested.

Mr. MacFarlane: Talk it out.

Mr. Corbett: You will have your chance in three minutes. To begin modifying the system risks destroying it. To begin shifting the focus away from the Queen to some government appointee, of whatever "suitable stature", risks destroying it.

"God save the Queen" really means "God help us to govern ourselves". "God save the Governor General" does not sound so convincing. I urge that this motion not be talked out but that the question be put forthwith.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to oppose this motion. There is not an ounce of truth in the sentiments expressed in it. The motion of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) says that the government should not proceed with proposed changes with respect to the status of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada or with respect to the status of the Governor General as set out in Bill C-60.

I am not aware of where the hon. member for Moncton was for the summer months. He obviously was not in Ottawa attending meetings of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee. If he had been, he would have found out, as reiterated in this House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others on this side, that this government has no intention whatsoever of changing the role of the Queen or Governor General. In Bill C-60 the government was trying to codify the role of the monarchy and Governor General as it now exists.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) raced through his words as if he was ashamed to have this House ponder them for a moment. He stated that Bill C-60 should not have mentioned the Queen and her role, that it should have been silent. As the Prime Minister told the House, if the government had omitted any reference to the Queen in Bill C-60 it would have been charged with being anti-monarchist.

The role of the monarchy has changed over the years. In 1947 there were letters patent which changed the role of the monarch with regard to the signing of treaties. There have been other changes over the years.

I might point out that the Queen acquiesced to the sentiments of the government in Bill C-60. She was fully in agreement; she was not alarmed like the Tories.

I find it ironic that it is the hon. member for Moncton who has had the intestinal fortitude, otherwise known as guts, to bring this motion before this House of Commons. We know where he stands on the monarchy. I respect his views.

It is the Tory members who should have introduced this motion. They should have been leading the argument. However, the Tories like to have it both ways. They have done this country irreparable harm in the way they have dragged the honourable name of Her Majesty the Queen and the institution of the monarchy through the mud of Canadian politics over the last six months. It is not the government that is mucking around with the monarchy; it is the Conservative party which is trying to make political hay out of this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: I represent a constituency in metropolitan Toronto. I am proud to say that it is perhaps the last bastion of monarchial strength in that area.

I was born in Great Britain under the flag of Great Britain and the shadow of the Queen. Like the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), my father fought in the war. He fought for those things in which we believe. He fought for the monarchy, its institution and the parliamentary system of government. I take umbrage at the Conservatives, especially those from metropolitan Toronto, but also the hon. member for Fundy-Royal and members from the west coast, who dare to say the Liberal party is anti-monarchist. That is not true.

It has often been said there is little support for the monarchy in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Mercier underscored the fact there is great support in that province.

Mr. Corbett: Who said that?

Mr. Collenette: That is what the Tories say. Perhaps the hon. member for Fundy-Royal has not been here long enough to know what his colleagues have been saying day in and day out for the past four years. I object to the Conservative party spreading this across the country. Even though this motion was brought forward by the hon. member for Moncton, it is Tory trickery at its worst.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to point out there was no collusion between myself and other parties in this House. I would like the hon. member to correct that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Collenette: We know what happened to the hon. member for Moncton in 1974. He wanted to join the Tory party but was unable to do so. I suppose that is a bit irrelevant to the debate. I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Perhaps the House will permit our going back into committee of the whole before the Chair calls it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. At five o'clock we were discussing the amendment to clause 8.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in connection with the amendment and in so doing review briefly our attitude toward it. My hon. friend from Lambton-Kent has already referred to the position taken by the National Indian Brotherhood and the concern it has expressed with respect to the lump sum payment. My hon. friend from Churchill could not be here today because of the weather but he has had a great deal to say about this provision and its sociological impact on native people living on the reserves.

The National Anti-Poverty Organization has already made its feelings known to the minister. I quote from its release of November 7:

> The method of paying the refundable tax credit in one lump sum could adversely affect welfare recipients cheques depending how individual provinces view this tax credit.

This is an ongoing concern to us, especially in light of the fact that we have received assurances from only five of the provinces that they will not discount the payment. I continue to quote:

> Welfare recipients are also restricted as to the amount of money they may have in the bank so it may prevent them from saving the money. Also, we do not know what effect it will have on provincial programs such as GAIN in B.C., or GIS payments to the elderly. Many senior citizens receive family allowances.

Other groups have expressed concern about this provision and its probable sociological consequences. The Consumers Association of Canada, for example, recommends that payments be spread out, not only because of welfare considerations but because some people will find great difficulty in coping with one large payment. The minister should consider that a great many of those who will be helped by this bill—some 1.5 million are involved—do not file income tax returns.

We have seen marked increases in food prices over the past year. The price of bread is going up. The Anti-Inflation Board has lately produced a report showing that food prices have risen in the past year by 15 per cent. We have seen the effect of the removal of the subsidy on skim milk powder. The government likes to say that all these problems will be addressed by the child tax credit it is introducing. I have no doubt they will, but the fact remains that it would be more orderly and more humane if these payments were spread out.

The minister herself told us today she would be considering this suggestion and monitoring the experience of the first year of the program. What the minister does not take into account sufficiently is the fact that, as a consequence of this bill, there will be a reduction in the universal family allowance program; and if we take into account the effect of indexing, there will be a substantial reduction as of January which will amount to $8. So the low income earners who will be able to reap the benefits of this bill at the end of the tax year will have to cope also with the decrease in the amount of the family allowance payments until that time.

Of course, there is also the question of the discounters, one that is causing us a great deal of concern notwithstanding the fact that a measure has been put through the House putting a ceiling on the rates of tax discounters. There is no question about the fact that in the first year of the operation of this bill, at any rate, there will be a real bonanza for the tax rebaters. They will be swooping down on low income families like vultures in order to reap the 15 per cent that they are now able to claim as a result of the tax rebate.

For all these reasons—and we have expressed our concern throughout the debate on the bill, through second reading and in the very full discussion we had on clause 1—we feel that the amendment should commend itself to the House. Certainly it should commend itself to the minister and to the government because I believe it is a reasonable amendment. We could argue all night on its merits, but I think we have gone over it sufficiently and I commend it now to the committee.

Mr. Chrétien: I just want to say on that that the clause does not necessarily need to be amended in order to achieve what the hon. member for Broadview and hon. member for St. John's East wish to see achieved. We can do that under the present law. If, after one year of experiment with this new program, we find it would be advisable to have three or four payments, or whatever it is, we will be happy to make the administrative change. We do not necessarily need the amendment to achieve the goal proposed by the hon. member for Broadview and supported by the hon. member for St. John's East. Those points have been taken into account by the government and in due course we will take the necessary decision. We have the necessary power to accommodate the view of the House.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps then the minister could tell us why the government will not go ahead with some kind of a quarterly system of payments, commencing with the first quarter of next year and spreading it out over the year. Must we have the first year's experience in light of the concerns already expressed by the various organizations involved and the concerns expressed in the House? Surely the election next year would have nothing to do with it?

Mr. Chrétien: I am informed that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has taken a long time in the House to explain the reason or the administrative purpose for not changing it. She said it was not possible and advisable to do so this year, and I do not wish to repeat her argument; I think hon. members have been well advised of it. If the system is found not to be working after the first year's experience, a change can be considered, but in terms of administration it is obvious that only one payment is much simpler.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, there are two points to be made with respect to this amendment. First of all, the Minister of Finance has referred to the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has taken a good deal of time to explain to us why it is not necessary or desirable in the first year to make these payments on a quarterly rather than on a one per year lump sum basis.

The impression I have gained from listening to the minister is that she and others know that it will not work. That being the case, why do we have to go through a year's unhappy experience? Why not make the decision now? I see the parliamentary secretary shaking his head as if saying she did not say that. She did not say it in so many words, but certainly that is the impression I have gained from what has been said.

The other point I should like to make arises out of what has been said today on the two amendments proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview. When it was proposed that there be a special treatment for income tax purposes in the case of common-law relationships, the argument from the other side was that there was no provision for that elsewhere in the Income Tax Act. It was said that what we are amending is the Income Tax Act and in this respect we have to run parallel with what is being done under the Income Tax Act generally. Now when we get this proposal to write in a provision for quarterly payments, we are told that is not necessary because it is already permitted under the Income Tax Act.

I point out that these payments are being identified as an overpayment, a tax credit that people get after they have filed their income tax return. So far as I know, the practice under the Income Tax Act is that once a department has decided that you have a payment coming back to you, you get that payment in one cheque, you do not get it spread out monthly or quarterly. If, on the one hand, the government is going to argue that in relation to this we have to stay with the practices under the Income Tax Act, how can it say on the other hand that with respect to this we can do something different from what we would do with respect to overpayments generally?

It seems to me that it is not good enough just to say that the government can do this if it wants to, if it is clear from all the evidence that has been put in, that these payments should be at least on a quarterly basis and that the government should be willing to allow the House to write that provision into the act. That is why I believe we should accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief in my intervention. I presented the major arguments this afternoon, but I do want to say a few words in support of this amendment, particularly as it relates to status Indians.

My colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, has advanced arguments in favour of dividing this lump sum payment into quarterly payments, or indeed perhaps into monthly payments. I want to put on the record the concerns expressed by the National Indian Brotherhood. I should like to read from their statement as follows:

> A further concern is that the payment of the child tax credit in one lump sum annually will very likely lead to unwise spending of this money by families unused to handling such large amounts at one time. The resultant potential for damaging effects to Indian famiiies from this bill should be fully considered.

I think that is the important element with respect to the lump sum payment. We must remember that we are talking about this segment of our society, status Indians, most of whom are disadvantaged and need this money on a monthly basis, on a day to day basis, because they are concerned about the very essentials that are necessary in terms of food and clothing. I suggest that it would be very awkward for them in some instances to provide for their essential needs with a lump sum payment.

With respect to that, they did make a proposal which is consistent with the amendment put forward by the hon. member. I wish to read it into the record as follows:

That payment of the child tax credit in quarterly instalments, rather than in a single annual payment, be allowed at the option of the mother and that this option be allowed for the year 1979.

For all those reasons, for those indicated by my good friend the hon. member for St. John's East, and for other reasons put forward throughout this debate, I commend the amendment to the minister in the hope that it will meet with a favourable response.

● (2022)

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, the minister will return in a moment to answer the hon. member's question more fully. As has been indicated previously, we feel there is adequate flexibility in clause 8 as it stands for any refinements to be made in subsequent years as to the frequency and the method of paying this credit.

Without going over all the same arguments, the representations by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, the hon. member for St. John's East, the hon. member for Broadview, and perhaps others certainly will be taken into account. Clause 8 contains the type of flexibility which will enable the government to move away from a one-shot payment basis, if it was felt advisable in subsequent years.

Mr. Holmes: There has been a great deal of comment and discussion regarding the monitoring system. What sort of monitoring system do the government anticipate putting in place? I would appreciate the parliamentary secretary commenting or elucidating a little further on that. If that has been done in the past, I apologize. What do they envisage in the monitoring system to ensure the lump sum payment is preferable to a quarterly payment, which I think quite frankly would be desirable?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, perhaps we need some further elaboration by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent as to what he has heard or has in mind. As regards determining the effectiveness of a lump sum payment as against periodic payments, I am not sure any particular measures are being designed at this time as to how this will be done. I am sure we will hear from various groups and individuals.

The present plan of the government is to wait and hear what representations are made as a result of the lump sum payment method. I am not clear as to any other monitoring schemes. I do not believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated any specific plans during the course of this debate. Perhaps the hon. member can elaborate either on what he has heard or on what he has in mind.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Chairman, that is precisely the problem. I have defined in very clear terms what I believe to be a positive alternative to that suggested by the government. It is my understanding the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated that a monitoring process will be in place. If such a monitoring process will be in place, it would provide us with some indication, at the end of a fiscal year, as to how positive the response has been. I want some elaboration on that monitoring process as it is perceived by the government.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps there will be two methods. One will be to listen to representations which may be made by various groups and individuals. As I have indicated before, it is quite a new program. It is a departure from what has happened in the many years the family allowance system has been in vogue. Perhaps Revenue Canada, through its own experience with refunds, will be able to give some indication as to the reactions it receives through its various offices across Canada. Also we will have the benefit of the reactions received in the offices of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the provincial welfare offices. I am sure there will be no lack of input when the payments actually go out in the spring. As I have said, the government will take note of the reactions, in addition to the comments made during the course of this debate.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise in summary form the concerns which we have respecting the lump sum payment. I should like to deal with the most recent arguments put forward by the Minister of Finance, his parliamentary secretary, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As I understand their comments, it is better to leave the discretion in the hands of the minister to decide how and when the payment will be made.

I am sorry the minister is not here to listen to my words, but one thought which crosses the back of my mind is that we are looking at a situation where it is possible to abuse the method of payment to individuals who are entitled to the credit. For example, the payment of the credit can be manipulated so that it is given at a politically opportune time. It is no secret that a large sum of money ranging from $200 to $1,200 will be going to recipients right across the country in the spring of 1979. It is of no surprise that the government is reluctant to put into the law a system which would regularize the payment.

According to the evidence given by the National Indian Brotherhood and the national anti-poverty organization, the payment would tie the hands of the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance and tell them that they cannot manipulate the system in that manner. We on this side of the House are very aware of what we are receiving: a large bundle of goodies which will go out to the people of Canada in April. Perhaps they will not be distributed in the most beneficial manner from the points of view of those people, and perhaps they will not be doing the most good in the long run.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, there is no provision in the Income Tax Act for an overpayment to be made over time. There is a firmly established practice in the Income Tax Act that when the government owes an overpayment to an individual, that payment is owing in total when it is due. There is no provision in the Income Tax Act for the delay of an overpayment over time. The only way to ensure that this benefit will be paid in a regular quarterly sum and not be subject to administrative or political abuse is that it be written in the law that this payment will be made on a quarterly basis, rather than making a lump sum payment.

If we are looking for a socially responsible tax credit scheme which will allow low income families to budget for an increase in their payments over time, then I suggest very strongly we must move to a quarterly system rather than a lump sum system. Why must we wait for a year or two for the minister to see the political or social repercussions of this matter? Why can we not move to the other system? The answer is very simple: it is because the election is coming up.

My second point relating to the lump sum payment deals with tax discounters. As far as my party is concerned, we see the lump sum payment as a windfall benefit to income tax discounters. It was never anticipated, at the time the income tax discount bill was passed last year, that there would be 1.5 million new low income filers waiting for a large cheque from the government in April. The income tax discount bill was passed at a time when the only moneys to be received were overpayments on one year's wages which would be rebated to individuals. It was never anticipated that the overpayments to be paid out would be in the range of $200, $400, $600, $800 or $1,000. Therefore, the passage of the lump sum payment guarantees a subsidy of a very sizeable nature. We are talking about millions of dollars of benefit to the income tax discounters of Canada. That windfall benefit was never anticipated at the time the income tax discount bill was passed. All of us who represent people in low income districts know this is the case.

As friendly and open as the government has been to our suggestions, the lack of response to this very real problem is a disgrace. Quite honestly, I say to the minister that none of the explanations provided have been satisfactory.

● (2032)

We are looking for a system that provides legal guarantees to people that there will be regular quarterly payments on which they can budget and in respect of which they can see their incomes growing over time. We are talking about people living on welfare, or close to living on welfare, making a minimum wage, and suddenly receiving $1,000 or $1,200 from the government. The government is putting this forward as a socially responsible tax scheme. It is not that; it is an irresponsible scheme because it guarantees that much of this money will be wasted, that much of it will get into the hands of people on the outskirts or the fringes of the financial community in this country who do not deserve it and should not be getting the money. This money should be going to the people who are in need on a regular quarterly basis. This is what is wrong with the scheme, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I have explained the situation over a long period of time. We have been advised by the Department of National Revenue and the Department of National Health and Welfare that in introducing this system, because of the nature of refunds under the tax system, for the first year we should go with one payment.

We have been advised that if we do not adopt the one payment suggestion in this time of restraint we will probably bog down very substantially in the tax system. I am not a financial technician in this regard and I must rely on the advice of these expert people. My colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare has handled this bill during this debate and has answered many of these points in the House. We want to have this program in place and we think we should follow the advice regarding one payment at one time.

The hon. member has referred to the problem of loan sharks and so on who will try to take advantage of the situation. I think there will be some, and we cannot deny that. This House of Commons was called upon not long ago to pass legislation to make sure that people on low incomes who receive income tax refunds do not fall into the hands of these people. We passed legislation to protect them as well as possible. I am sure the problem will be similar if we adopt a system of three or four payments; perhaps these refunds or payments could be negotiated over a longer period of time so that by the end of the year there would be nothing left and all the money would fall into the hands of these people.

I just say in all honesty that the minister decided on one payment on the basis of the best advice she could receive from those people who have an enormous task in the Department of National Revenue in the context of budgetary restraint. The Minister of National Revenue, like other ministers, has to maintain a lower level of manpower. Of course, the number of civil servants and so on is not a preoccupation of the hon. member for Broadview. He does not give a damm about the size of the deficit.

Mr. Rae: That's not true.

Mr. Chrétien: That is a feeling I do not share with him. We have to make sure this program is administered as efficiently and as well as possible, and that is why I must report to this House that we had no choice but to go with the one payment scheme.

Having regard to representations made in respect of the Indian population, this program will be well advertised. All Indian families with children who live on reserves, or who live off the reserves but with Indian background, will receive information at the time the cheques go out. They will have forms mailed to them.

I do not underestimate the intelligence of the Indians. I know a little bit about them having had the pleasure of being their minister for six years, one month, three days and two hours. I am sure that they can handle their affairs pretty smartly, and I am not too preoccupied about that. I have a different type of Indian sitting in front of me, one who I am sure is capable of looking after his own affairs. I do not see a big problem in this regard. The Indian people are better organized on the reservations. They have good administrations made up of very capable Indian people, many who are quite young and who assist in their endeavours. I am quite sure that the money available to these families will find its way to them.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I do not think we require an amendment. I do not think we can do otherwise for the first year. If we find difficulties occurring we can correct the situation, but according to our experts there should be no problem.

If we were following the suggestion of the hon. member for the first year, making payments according to tax returns, the same procedure would have to be followed in respect of payments for family allowances, welfare and other things, on an instalment basis. Some people may not claim the benefits for children and would end up receiving the payments on an instalment basis. That would be very cumbersome and very unfair to those people.

It is my feeling that we should stay with clause 8 as it now is. If the hon. member is back next year he can make another representation and we will listen to him then as attentively as we have listened at this time.

Mr. McGrath: No, we will be listening to him. You will make a good financial critic.

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad that the hon. member attributes qualities to me that I might use on the other side. One problem with that party he represents is that they are too keen and anxious.

[Translation]

Do not count the chickens before they are hatched.

[English]

Hon. members opposite give the impression that they know they will be over here on this side. I have seen some members of the opposition measuring the size of the rug in my office. I think that is a bit premature at this time. Some have said they do not like the colour, and I think that too is a bit premature. One of the problems with the loyal opposition is that they win all the elections before the election and by the night of the election they lose. I would not be surprised if the same thing happens again as happened in 1965, 1968, 1972 and 1974. Six months before those elections we were supposed to be in pretty bad shape and it was suggested that we could sit back and lead a more relaxed life. That never materialized, so I want to say to hon. members opposite that I do not expect too much in this way. But I should like hon. members opposite to live with their illusions at least until spring.

An hon. Member: Let's get back to the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Dawson: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us whether he has carefully considered the possibility of deferring in some way the implementation of the bill in order that we might find a system whereby the $200 would be distributed over a few months because families with six or seven children could receive cheques for $1,200, $1,500 or $1,800?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is repeating what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) said a few minutes ago. Since the debate is seen on television, perhaps I might repeat my explanation in French so that French-speaking viewers can have their own version. Here is the problem: this bill was presented in the fall of 1978 and we want it to be the payments to be made in the spring of 1979. This implies that millions of forms will have to be filled in by ordinary taxpayers who have children and also by those who never had to pay income tax before. The Department of National Revenue has informed us that if we pass now an act under which people would receive cheques every three or four months, this could create very difficult problems in the administration of the program because that program is not only for taxpayers who can benefit from family allowances in the form of a tax credit, but also for a large number of new recipients.

• (2042)

[English]

Mr. McGrath: It's all right, Jean, the whip has enough members to carry it.

Mr. Chrétien: I want to give the same explanation in French.

[Translation]

Here is one of the most serious problems: All individuals who will file income tax returns early in the year will send them in, even though their wives may not be eligible for a reimbursement, or even though they were eligible for one and received the tax credit every three months, the greatest reimbursement the person would come every three months, whether eligible or not under the act. This would result in a considerable development of bureaucracy to solve all the problems which could not be solved automatically and which would probably necessitate the hiring of a very large number of civil servants, at a time when public opinion is greatly preoccupied with the number of civil servants. I am surprised to see that the official opposition which always complains about the considerable number of civil servants, the huge deficit of the government, is willing to agree with all the proposals which are likely to be even more expensive for taxpayers.

Mr. Chairman, I had a striking example this afternoon at a meeting of the committee, when it was suggested to grant manufacturers reimbursements on the sales tax which we have reduced by 3 per cent. The opposition was already asking me to increase my deficit—would you believe it?—by $300 million for this year alone so as to accommodate this tax cut on inventories which have increased not only in the area of automobile, but also with respect to all the other activities which have been affected by the sales tax reduction, a proposal which was unanimously adopted by the House. This was part of the NDP platform, part of the Progressive Conservative party platform, as it has always been part of the Liberal party platform.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I do not think we can find an administrative solution which would meet the requirements of the hon. member for Broadview. We have taken note of his representations as well as those of the hon. member for St. John's East and other members, but only if the system of an annual lump sum payment becomes questionable and ineffective will we be prepared to amend it next year. Clause 8, as described, allows us to do so at will and we will have to find during the year the mechanisms which will enable the Department of National Revenue to set a more elaborate system. However, if indeed we want to proceed through this bill which has received the unanimous support of the House, I think that we can proceed only as described in clause 8, that is with the payment of a lump sum when the income tax forms will be filed. This could be done from March to—some income tax refunds are sometimes paid in July, August and even in September. Now I would have hoped that the hon. member for Broadview, whom I know quite well, would have risen above political considerations. He has already taken the bad habits of his colleagues of the New Democratic Party, but I hope that he will improve as he grows older.

[English]

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Chairman, I would like to urge the minister to spread this payment out ultimately, but right now we must recognize the fact that until we have equal opportunity with respect to jobs and with respect to earning a living for women so that they can support their children, children will suffer by default. Everyone here knows that delinquency arises out of poverty. For the next few years it will be good that women will get lump sum payments because most single parents are women who do not have the capacity to earn large amounts of money.

Ultimately I hope these payments can be spread out, and I hope that can be done on the basis of the needs of children. Our society must recognize that children should have equal rights. No child should be penalized because his parents are poor. I hope ultimately there will be a spread and that the amounts will be larger, but this is a time of hardship. We must move toward equal opportunity. The proposed lump sum will help mothers get through this period of hardship. I would appreciate hearing from the minister if he thinks there is a way to bring about equality for children through these tax allowances and if he thinks there is a way to prevent the delinquency which comes with poverty.

Hopefully our human rights legislation will ultimately provide for equal pay for work of equal value, which does not seem to e the case yet. Hopefully that legislation will help solve the problems of children, and hopefully they will get the money they need. I would prefer that for a while women get lump sums to help them solve problems which face them now.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, when the minister replies, would he tell the committee how much time he and his colleague, the government whip, need on this clause? Because we are ready for the question. How much time do hon. members opposite want to spend on this clause?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I share the view of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. We have much confidence in the mothers of this land. We put confidence in them. We put so much confidence in them that we are ready to vote right away.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Rae) negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 25.

Clause 8 agreed to.

• (2052)

On clause 9—

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, there are certain phrases in clause 9 that I think the minister should at least try to explain to us. As members familiar with the bill will realize, this is one of the clauses that, perhaps for the first time as far as the Income Tax Act is concerned, reverses the general secrecy privilege that has always been assumed with regard to filing income tax returns.

The minister is asking for authority in the following words:

"(d) communicate or allow to be communicated to a taxpayer, such information obtained under this act regarding the income of his spouse or of any other person as is necessary for the purposes of an assessment or reassessment of tax, interest, penalty or other amount payable by the taxpayer or of the determination of any refund to which he is entitled for the year."

I have three separate questions concerning this provision and I hope the minister will be more forthcoming than his parliamentary secretary was the other day. First of all, what did the minister have in mind with the words "communicate or allow to be communicated to a taxpayer"? Whom did he have in mind would be given the privilege of communicating with a taxpayer?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, National Revenue officials will be allowed, under the authority of the Minister of National Revenue, to consult the spouse's file for the purpose of this program only because it is based on the family income and if an individual does not want to give information to the department—obviously his file will be examined only to establish if the family income is sufficient or insufficient to qualify the spouse for that child tax credit.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I, like the minister, can read the clause. I understand what the thrust of the clause is but my question was very specific. Clause 9 states that information can be communicated concerning the income of any other person. The preceding passage states that not only will it be communicated but it will be allowed to be communicated to a taxpayer. Why are those words used instead of simply the words "communicate it"? What did the minister mean in this clause by saying he would allow it to be communicated to a taxpayer? To me that conveys the impression that a third party is somehow involved here.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, it is the standard clause allowing National Revenue officials to consult a file and get the necessary information about the family income for tax credit purposes. So it is the standard clause as traditionally drafted by the Department of Justice for that purpose.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, when ministers are stuck for an answer they like to say it is a standard clause. Would the minister simply tell us if the words "communicate or allow to be communicated to a taxpayer" indicate that it will be communicated by a civil servant in the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. Chrétien: The answer is yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stevens: My second question deals with this very odd phrase "regarding the income of his spouse or of any other person". Who did the minister have in mind? Why is it not sufficient simply to get the tax information, if it is necessary, with respect to the spouse as opposed to "any other person"?

Mr. Chrétien: The "other person" means they can look into the revenue of a child.

Mr. Stevens: If that is what the minister is trying to accomplish, why did he not say that? Why cannot it be worded, "the income of a spouse or of any dependant", or whatever wording he wants to use? The proposed wording appears to be wide enough to include income of a spouse or any other person. I cannot understand why the minister would use that wording if he was simply trying to look at the income of a child in addition to that of the spouse.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this clause was inserted to obtain the information needed to authorize or refuse the payment of a child tax credit. It is its only purpose. I mentioned children. In assessing the income of an individual we might also raise the issue of other dependants to establish if there is a dependent relationship with a child not legally adopted. There is also the child who has no legal relationship with the taxpayer but is his dependant. I think for instance of a child not legally adopted but who is treated as a member of the family. I think that in those circumstances we might consider some children as dependants even if legally they are not children of the taxpayer.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Would the minister agree that the "other person" could be somebody not even living in the household of the recipient of the tax credit?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, there are also the words "as is necessary", so I do not know exactly what the hon. member has in mind as not being part of the household. If he can describe the situation he has in mind, I will probably be in a position to say that a third person of that nature could be investigated. I think that is the answer I would give; but if he has a case to put to me, I would be in a position to say yes or no.

Mr. Stevens: What we are dealing with here, Mr. Chairman, under the Income Tax Act is something that has always been looked upon as necessary to the proper working of the income tax system, and that is secrecy. One taxpayer is not supposed to have the right to learn the amount of tax payable by another. The clause the minister is asking us to approve seems to expand that. I can understand his concern somewhat.

When a spouse is entitled to a tax credit, they want to know if the other spouse, presumably the mother, has some income, or vice versa, which would mean that the tax credit might either not be available or at least have some taxed back element. Why does the minister feel it is necessary not only to reveal the income of a spouse, but also the income of any other person? That would presumably give the Department of National Revenue the right to disclose, for whatever reason they thought fit, the income of any other person irrespective of whether it had any relevance to the tax credit program itself.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I tried to give as good an explanation as I could. I explained that if you tried to describe a child or children, then because of the legal situation or relationship between two persons it could be classified as family income, and we have classified income as family income. I can read more elaborate information on to the record.

Hon. members will note that the language in clause 9 is very restrictive. Only information regarding the income of his spouse can be communicated to the taxpayer. This does not necessarily mean that the exact amount of the spouse's income must be communicated. Revenue Canada will provide only the explanations that are absolutely necessary for a taxpayer to understand why the amount of the credit he is allowed does not correspond to the amount he has claimed. I understand that the explanation to be provided by Revenue Canada will be along the following lines:

Your spouse has been reassessed and his net income exceeds the sum of X dollars; hence you may not claim any credit.

I think that is the intention of the Department of National Revenue. It will be very restrictive and just for that purpose. If the hon. member is afraid that the Department of National Revenue will use that provision to look at the books of his wealthy friends, he should not be worried about it. In fact, a woman would not apply for the credit. If she applies for the credit to find out how much her wealthy husband is earning on the side, she will not find out. As soon as the Department of National Revenue is able to determine how much the wealthy husband has made, it will be impossible for her to apply for the credit. We will not say how much; we will say, "Your husband has enough income, and you, madam, do not qualify." I can read a long explanation in more technical terms, but the purpose of the law is clear; we would not disclose anything just for the pleasure of doing so.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, in giving his explanation I know hon. members noticed that the minister referred to communicating the income of his spouse. But in his explanation he specifically did not refer to the words, "or of any other person". His explanation has not covered the fundamental point that I am raising. Why do you have to include the income of any other person when in fact it is simply the children or the dependants that you are concerned about? Or it is the so-called "spouse's income" that you are concerned about?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this provision also allows information to be communicated in cases where a taxpayer is reassessed because the income of his spouse or of a dependant differs from the amount originally reported in his tax return. This measure is also necessary to permit Revenue Canada to explain to a taxpayer the reasons why he has been reassessed. This provision will apply in cases where the taxpayer claims a deduction for personal exemptions in respect of his spouse or in respect of a dependant, or in cases contemplated by section 110.3, that is, involving transfers between spouses of unused deductions. In all these cases the amount that a taxpayer can deduct depends on the income of his spouse or of a dependant. The language used in section 241 created some uncertainty as to whether Revenue Canada had the necessary authority, in the cases listed, to provide a taxpayer with the explanations required to justify the assessment or the reassessment.

In either case this power conferred upon Revenue Canada does not constitute a breach of the principle of the confidentiality of tax returns and is necessary to allow taxpayers to obtain the necessary explanations from Revenue Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, again we have gone one small step ahead. We are now getting an explanation as to why his spouse's income gets shown to use the words of this clause. All of the explanation which the minister has read into the record deals with his spouse's income or that of a dependant. I now come back to the basic question that I am asking. If it is only the dependants you are trying to get at, why do you use the wider phrase "or of any other person"?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, it could be anybody in that context. That is the legislation and I have explained the purpose. I have said that a dependant and the nature of a dependant can vary from one situation to another. We have used a more general term. The power is restricted for a very obvious reason, and that is to make sure the family income is well assessed before the credit is given. I cannot add any more to the explanation than I have given in the last 15 minutes.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the minister refers to 15 minutes. He must be including his own time because I have not been talking for more than about seven minutes.

I would like to ask the minister this simple question. If he is not trying to cover anything but a dependant, would he accept an amendment to the clause which says "or of any dependant"?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think I have given enough explanation. This is the legal terminology which has been developed by the experts to cover all possible situations. I am sure that Revenue Canada will not abuse that. I think we should have a little confidence in the bureaucracy, especially when they have taken care to avoid any abuse. It is in fact just to cope with general situations. This credit will not go to the wealthy people so the hon. member should not be worried on behalf of his friends.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, at least the minister admits I have friends; that is maybe more than he can say.

Mr. Nystrom: Bay Street Tories.

Mr. Stevens: If I could come back to the wording, the more I hear the minister's explanation the more puzzled I get. Is it not possible to have a procedure where it will be required, if there is some suspicion, to have all family income disclosed as opposed to taking the other approach where people are apparently going to be entitled to communicate information of a tax nature respecting not just a spouse but any other person concerning a certain income tax return? I am still puzzled as to why, if it is dependants that the minister is after, he has to use this wider wording "of any other person."

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, my old friend from Welland says this is repetition, which means he realizes that the minister has not answered the question. The clause we are on was reached about ten minutes ago, and if questions were answered concerning clause 9 this afternoon, it is rather remarkable that somebody was allowed to put questions regarding clause 9 before we reached that point.

If I cannot get an answer to that point from the minister, my next question is: To what extent does the minister anticipate that the working out of this negative income tax position, if you like, is going to encourage people living in what is generally looked upon as a kind of cash society to try to show as little income as possible in order to qualify for tax credits? One of the greatest downsides to a so-called guaranteed annual income will be that it would encourage people actively to minimize whatever income they eventually disclose to the government. Has the minister considered that, and to what extent does he feel that the provision he is now providing for here is simply a device on the part of the government to counteract that type of evasion?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, traditionally in Canada we have had a system of tax collection that relies on the good will of Canadians who behave, generally speaking, responsibly in relation to the payment of their obligations to the government. I do not think that wording will induce anyone to cheat the government. Perhaps the hon. member knows more cheaters than I do.

• (2112)

Mr. Stanfield: Come on.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon member should be in the chamber for weeks at a time to see what we have to go through. He would be more scandalized than at this moment. I do not have to withdraw anything. I just say I do not know. I said that probably I know fewer cheaters and I have more confidence in the people of Canada than the hon. member for York-Simcoe. That is my view. The hon. member is entitled to a different opinion. It would not be the first time. I just say we have a system of tax collection in Canada which presumes that Canadians are honest.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting here this evening hearing the Minister of Finance repeatedly making innuendos about the hon. member for York-Simcoe instead of answering questions. It gets a bit thick after a while. The Minister of Finance should bear in mind that his responsibility in this connection is to give answers, not to try and insult those asking questions.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to comment on that. I have said what I have to say. The tax system in Canada is based on the presumption that Canadians are honest and want to pay their taxes. The hon. member says that this system whereby we are trying to divert money to the poor people of this country will induce people to cheat. I do not think Canadians tend to cheat. They pay their share like anybody else. If someone was reflecting on Canadians in a cheating way, it was the hon. member for York-Simcoe. It is always like that. The hon. member should stay in the chamber a bit more; he would have a lot of occasions to be scandalized. It is too bad he is not here more often.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I am constantly scandalized by the lack of information this minister gives both in the House and in committee.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the minister loses his cool when questions are being put to him. Perhaps I can sum up my question in this way. I agree that the taxpayers in Canada are generally of a very honest breed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I will just wait until hon. members quieten down. If that is so, I ask the minister why in this peculiar way does he want this provision inserted. It is obviously designed to communicate tax information that heretofore has never been available with regard to anything in the Income Tax Act. If the minister believes in the honesty of taxpayers, why is he asking for this special way of communicating tax information such as is contemplated in this clause?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I explained at great length a few moments ago when answering other questions that in the present system the only communication will be to advise the spouse who has applied for the refundable tax credit that, unfortunately, he or she does not qualify because the spouse has an income which is high enough to prevent him or her from being eligible for this program. It's as simple as that. There will be nothing above the amount of the refundable credit.

If the inspector from Revenue Canada studies a file and finds out, for instance, that the income is $10,000 above the limit, we will not tell the spouse: Your partner earns $10,000 more than necessary. The spouse will simply be told: You cannot quality for this program because your spouse earns more than permitted, without giving any more detail. That will be limited to the total amount of the refundable tax credit. Nothing more.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, do I understand the minister correctly that the communication the department has in mind here is simply the bald statement that they will get in touch with the spouse and say, "Unfortunately your spouse's income is of such a nature that you are disqualified"? There will be no revelation as to the amount of the income or the tax being paid by the spouse, or any such information?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I read for the record some minutes ago what Revenue Canada will inform the other partner. I quote:

> Your spouse has been reassessed and his net income exceeds the sum of X dollars; hence, you may not claim any credit.

That is very clear. If there is a lot more income, they will not know. They will simply say "The income of your spouse is more than what is allowed". They will state what is the requirement. If there is one child, it will be so much. If there are two, it will be more, and if there are three, still more. There will be told what they would have qualified for if the spouse had no income. If it is more, they do not qualify; it is as simple as that.

Mr. Stevens: For greater clarification of the statement which Revenue Canada will be making to the other spouse, included in the spouse's income the minister is referring to will be the income of any dependant or, to use the minister's general wording, "or of any other person".

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, they will look at the revenue of the children. The "other person" could be a divorced wife. In that case, she would no longer be a spouse.

Mr. Jones: I would like to ask the minister what provision or regulation there will be when during the taxation year spouses separate or begin to live separately with or without a separation agreement. That is a practical example of what could take place during a taxation year. The spouses could begin to live separate and apart, with or without a separation agreement or with or without an order of the court.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, in that case the mother will file herself. If they are not living together, the family income will not be looked at.

Mr. Jones: That is what I want to know. What time is the "D-Day" in such a situation? A year is 365 days. They may separate on December 25.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the hon. member's question. I wonder if he would repeat it.

Mr. Jones: What happens if during the taxation year—at the beginning, the middle or the end—the parties begin to live separate and apart, with or without a court order or with or without a separation agreement, and during that year the spouse, the husband, made income in excess of the minimum amount? How would Revenue Canada handle such a situation? What regulation would be followed, or have they anticipated this type of difficulty? I anticipate it.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, if they are not living together on December 31 of the year for which they are filing, they can file separate forms and they can qualify.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask just one question of the Minister of Finance. I do so for the purpose of emphasizing a point I was trying to make earlier today about the ambiguity of the English language, although if I understand the French, I believe the same ambiguity is there as well.

Every time words in the legislation state "his spouse," there seems to be a tendency in this place, especially among my friends to the right, to think that the reference is to a woman or wife since it is "his spouse." It was my contention in an earlier discussion, relying on section 26(6) of the Interpretation Act, that a word that is masculine imports the feminine as well. I think clause 9 helps us to understand this. At the beginning of the paragraph there is a reference to a communication to a taxpayer and, later, a reference to his spouse. If that taxpayer is a woman, "his spouse" is really "her spouse."

● (2122)

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So wherever we have the words "his spouse" we can read them as "his or her spouse"?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes. In French, the problem does not exist.

Mrs. Holt: I would just like to continue the argument and statement of the hon. member. I would ask the minister, as other members have done, to eliminate the discriminatory contemptible Interpretation Act. I think it is absolutely unforgivable that we cannot add five more letters to a bill to say "his and her" or "his and/or her" spouse. I think the Interpretation Act, and every bill on the codes today, discriminates against women and certainly most have inscribed inhibitors to equality in our society. I notice that there are a few bills, such as the human rights bill, that say "his or her." I do not see any reason why every time they refer to "his" we have to look up the Interpretation Act to find it refers to "him, her or it." I am tired of being thought of as equal with "it."

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Family Allowance for 1979.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, after prolonged questioning on Thursday the parliamentary secretary was finally persuaded to put certain figures on the record concerning the likely increase in the cost of family allowances in aggregate terms from the 1979 base year onward. As we know, the government claims it has, in effect, saved $690 million as a result of the de-indexing of the family allowance payments. That is the thrust of this clause.

My question to the Minister of Finance arises out of his budget of November 16. As we know, this bill was brought in before that budget. Is the $690 million expenditure reduction for fiscal 1980 reflected in the 1980 fiscal figures as shown in the budget of November 16?

Mr. Martin: I believe a higher amount is actually shown because of the indexing factor, but as the hon. member is aware the indexing factor will be less expensive under the provisions of Bill C-10 than would have been the case under the provisions of the act prior to the passage of Bill C-10.

Mr. Stevens: I am sorry that the parliamentary secretary did not answer the question I had in mind. He will recall that on Thursday he told us that the whole family allowance expenditure for fiscal 1980 would have been $2.4 billion, and he stated that as a result of the passage of this bill the new expenditure would be $1,710 million. That leaves a smaller expenditure for fiscal 1980 amounting to $690 million. I am asking whether in the budget which was delivered on November 16 that reduction in family allowance expenditures is reflected for the year 1980?

Mr. Martin: The answer to that question is yes, it is reflected in those figures. I am assuming the hon. member is referring to the year 1979-80.

Mr. Stevens: The parliamentary secretary is correct. So that there may be no doubt, then, in the budgetary figures the expenditure shown for fiscal 1980 of $51,100 million would in fact be $51,790 million if the family allowance was not reduced as contemplated by Bill C-10.

Mr. Martin: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is correct.

Mr. Stevens: Again to make sure there is no confusion, in the national accounts presentation the expenditure we see there of $53,400 million would in fact have been $54,090 million if this reduction had not been anticipated?

Mr. Martin: That provision has been included in all the figures for 1979-80.

Mr. Stevens: And again for greater clarification, the figures that were shown by the parliamentary secretary and earlier, I think, by the minister with respect to the financial requirement as a result of the passage of Bill C-10 are also reflected in the budget, I take it. In short, the financial requirement was reduced by $170 million as far as 1979 in concerned, and by $35 million for fiscal 1980?

Mr. Martin: The answer is yes.

Mr. Halliday: I wonder if I could convince the parliamentary secretary to make a slight change in the wording of line six for the sake of clarification. The French text says "par mois" which, if I understand it correctly, means "per month". But on the English side it merely says "a month". If it said that the payments would be made "each month" or "per month" the meaning would be much clearer.

Mr. Martin: I can only say that the wording of this clause has been very carefully considered by the legal advisers and my understanding is that the wording as it stands is quite clear. It relates to the amount of new payment per month, and my understanding is that the wording as it stands is quite sufficient.

Mr. Halliday: It could be interpreted as being for one month only, but if we were to say "per month" or "each month" there would be no doubt about it. I know the minister's intent but the wording does not express it.

Mr. Martin: All I can say is that the information I have is that the wording presently in the bill conveys the intent adequately—that the payment will be $20 per month.

● (2132)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, on the point just raised by the hon. member for Oxford, perhaps I might point out that since 1976 at any rate, and I suspect for a lot longer, the wording of the section has been as it now is in both languages. In other words, at the present time the act reads:

—the amount of family allowance to be paid for a month in 1976 shall be $22.08.

That was the figure for 1976. That has been the wording in the act for a long time and I believe that family allowances have been paid every year every month, not just in one month of the year.

However, I rise at this point because I want to register our objection to clause 10 being in this bill at all. I feel very strongly that it was a good idea to bring in the tax credit for families where the incomes are not above a certain figure, and even though there have been debates and arguments about some of the provisions in clauses 1 to 9, we support the provisions in those clauses. But the effect of clause 10 is to reduce the amount of family allowance from its present figure of $25 and some cents to $20, and if one looks at what the family allowance would have been in January, 1979, it is a reduction from about $28 back to $20.

I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare—and the Prime Minister got into the act the other day as well—makes a lot out of the fact that even though there is this reduction in the amount of the family allowance cheque, there is a net increase when you put together the reduction in the family allowance and the amount gained by the child tax credit. I point out, however, that other changes have been made by this bill, notably with respect to the tax exemptions in certain brackets. These tax exemptions, as was brought out during many hours of discussion between the government and the hon. member for York-Simcoe, do effect savings for the government. In other words, persons who are receiving family allowance, if they are in upper brackets, pay more in income tax than was the case before. I believe that is perfectly proper and a good idea, but I think that idea should be carried forward, that we should continue to pay the family allowance as its present rate and indexed in 1979, as it should have been indexed, leaving it to the income tax, both the present arrangements and the new ones that are brought into effect, to do some of the levelling that is obviously desirable. But I feel very strongly—in this I speak for my party—that we should not be taking away these several dollars a month from the mothers of this country who receive these family allowance cheques. When the point comes that you ask if clause 10 carries, we want a vote to be called, because we wish to vote against clause 10.

May I point out that if there are those who think that their side of the argument is stronger because of the net gain, taking into account the reduction in the family allowance and the child tax credit, may I emphasize the fact that for three months in 1979, January, February and March, all the families of this country will be receiving a lesser amount in their family allowance cheques. There are those in the upper income brackets to whom that will not matter at all, but there are thousands, perhaps millions, of homes in which it will make a difference.

I enjoyed the very forceful speech which the Minister of National Health and Welfare made at the close of the proceedings on Thursday night in which she talked about middle income and low income families in realistic terms. I think she used the phrase "there is never enough money". That was her description of the hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of low income families in this country who never have enough money. Yet these same families will experience in January a reduction in the amount that they receive of $5 or $6 per child. Where there are families with four or five children, that is a pretty sizeable reduction. I say that this House should not be supporting clause 10, which has that effect.

There is something else which I want to say about it, Mr. Chairman, and I know I will not receive the plaudits of all members of the House for mentioning it but I feel it should be said, and that is that members of the House are being asked to vote for a reduction in the family allowance cheques which go out to the mothers of Canada in January. Yet in that same month members of this House will receive a sizeable pay increase.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is nothing that members of the House have to do about it. They do not have to say a word, they can keep quiet, and even though the news media are reporting that some legislatures are taking steps to increase their members' pay, nothing needs to be done here. It will just happen, because it is in the law.

Mrs. Holt: How many do you support?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I did not expect this to be a basis for popularity; but the fact is that it is already in the act and every member of the House will have an increase in January amounting to $2,400 a year. Cabinet ministers and the Leader of the Opposition will have an increase of $4,000 a year, and the Prime Minister an increase of almost $5,000. Whether these increases are right or not, it seems to me that this House is in a very awkward position to be voting for a reduction in the family allowance in January when in that very same month all the members of the House will be getting an increase.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Members know where I have stood on this issue for a long time—indeed, every time it has come up. I believe the House has gone too far.

An hon. Member: And yet you take it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not quite hear what the members over there are saying, but if they are concerned about what I do to back up my stand on this issue, I should be glad to tell them at any time. From the beginning when I first started taking a stand against these pay increases, I knew that in my conscience I could not take such a stand unless I was prepared to take the necessary steps to make sure that I did not gain by what I was opposed to. So let there be no argument or worry about that.

At the moment the complaint I am making is that the government is calling upon the House to vote at this time for a reduction in the amount of the family allowance that goes into the homes of this country in January when in that same month, without members having to say a word, they will be receiving these fancy increases to which I have referred.

Mr. Nystrom: I want to say a word as well, Mr. Chairman, in support of what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said about the fact that clause 10 reduces family allowances from some $25 down to $20 in January. I had more questions about this particular clause in the family allowance bill than about anything else in the bill. Many people will resent the fact that the monthly cheque will be going down by a fairly sharp amount starting in January. A lot of low income people in my constituency depend on their family allowance cheques to a large degree in order to purchase groceries or clothing for their children. Particularly larger families with five or six children depend on that approximately $25 every month in order to meet expenses, such as light bills or heat bills in the winter time. Those people will miss the few extra bucks.

Some cabinet members and members of the Conservative party have indicated that money does not grow on trees, and that the deficit is already large enough. I believe ordinary Canadians, particularly low income earners, deserve a larger piece of the pie or more money.

As was pointed out by John Gray in an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on Saturday, in the last ten years the bottom 20 per cent of the population received less than the national income. Now they receive less of the national income than they received ten years ago.

I know this bill is a progressive one. It is doing the right thing. It will put more money in the hands of low income Canadians via the tax credit. But I cannot see why the basic amount of family allowance has to be reduced at the same time. Canada can afford the tax credit and the current rate of family allowance quite easily. All members are concerned about stimulating the economy and creating more jobs. If money is put in the hands of ordinary people, they will spend it purchasing consumer goods such as food, clothing and the like. Most of these goods are labour intensive in nature. It would provide jobs and assist in stimulating the economy. It would prime the pump at the bottom. It would not be the old trickle down theory where a few big carrots are offered to a company in the hope that a few more jobs will be created. It would provide ordinary people with money. I am referring to the people on the street, in the neighbourhoods, and on the farms.

An hon. Member: Who is paying?

Mr. Nystrom: I hear the question which a Conservative member is asking me. The ordinary people, the taxpayers of the country, are paying. The ordinary people, the taxpayers of the country, will receive the benefits in return.

Mr. Stevens: The taxpayers are not paying.

Mr. Nystrom: Who pays the taxes, if taxpayers are not paying? Who pays the taxes? Who finances the government?

Mr. Stevens: It can be done only with borrowed money.

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member can argue that it will be borrowed money because of the deficit, but the same argument can be made in terms of any government spending, whether it be the salaries of members of parliament, the expenses of running this place, or tax concessions to oil companies. I realize that we have a deficit. I am sure the hon. member for York-Simcoe realizes that the Conservative party is the greatest one for deficit financing in the country. The deficit in Ontario is over $2,000 per capita, whereas in my province of Saskatchewan it is approximately $985 per capita. The hon. member for York-Simcoe should think twice when it comes to deficit financing.

Perhaps the hon. member for York-Simcoe will resent what I say, but ordinary Canadians have asked why family allowance payments are being cut from $25 to $20. It is incumbent upon us to voice their concern in the House. There are people who are concerned about it and do not want to see their family allowance cheques reduced. They have asked me to express their concern. Perhaps a few other members of the Liberal and Conservative parties could express the concerns of their constituents, and then this reduction would not take place.

Mr. Daudlin: I do not want to take the time of the committee, but I must say that I am motivated by reasons of the statements made by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville. A number of us have heard the same comments, but some of us have accepted our responsibilities, returned to those people and said, "Even though we have a reduction from $25 to $20, you will have to agree that when the thirteenth cheque comes along, the end result is that you receive more." Those same simple people said, "You know, that is so," and their fears are quashed. If the hon. member wishes to do the same thing in his constituency, I suggest there will be far less difficulty in the country. We should put it like it is, rather than attempting to feed on fears.

Clause 10 agreed to: Yeas, 47; nays, 3.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chrétien moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, after the days it has taken for us to reach this point, certainly I do not want to detain the House any longer respecting this bill. As far as I am concerned there is enough time for it to be given third reading tonight. However, I feel that as part of third reading proceedings there is something which needs to be said, even if it is a repetition of what I said in committee of the whole on clause 10.

● (2152)

The bill as a whole, sir, is a good one. The institution of the income tax credit is something of which we approve. We tried to win certain changes, and, even though we did not win those changes, the general principle of that part of the bill is good. But we still feel very strongly that there should not be a reduction in the amount of the family allowance itself. We feel it should go on as it has been, that the indexing which has taken place should continue, and any levelling out that is necessary with regard to that aspect of the bill should be left to the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

I have already said, and I repeat it in a sentence or two, that it is a poor night for the House of Commons to be passing a measure that reduces in January the amount that will go to the families of this country as family allowance, when in that same month members of this House will receive this sizeable increase in pay and allowances to which I referred a few minutes ago.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That Bill C-10 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole House for the purpose of reconsidering clause 10 thereof.

My amendment is seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). The purpose of asking for a reconsideration of clause 10 is so that back in the committee of the whole members could delete the clause that reduces the family allowance from a bill which is otherwise good.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment defeated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre) negatived.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question in respect of third reading of the bill?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was some discussion earlier in the day with respect to a government proposal dealing with the order in council concerning the new Ministry of State. Could the government House leader indicate now whether we will be proceeding on Wednesday with Bill C-12, or will we be commencing the seven-hour debate on the motion, as provided for under the statute?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I gave notice today of the motion to which the hon. member refers and it is my intention to call it on Wednesday. I do not think there will be any change in that intention, but if there is I will let the hon. member and members of other parties know early tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GRAIN—MOVEMENT TO EXPORT POSITIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the question I should like to deal with tonight arises from questions I posed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on November 10 as they appear at page 1007 of Hansard for that date. They related to the movement of grain to export positions. They arose also from the statement of officials of the Canadian Wheat Board that some 2.3 million tonnes in grain sales had been deferred this year, meaning ultimately a loss of income to the farmers of something of the order of $350 million. It was also stated that some four million tonnes of additional export sales could have been realized in the last crop year if sufficient transportation capacity had been made available, and this amounted to a loss of $500 million.

The Minister of Agriculture in his response to me at that time suggested I was engaged in sweeping accusations, that the situation was being watched closely, and he implied that it was easy to make sweeping accusations but difficult to deal with the problem.

At that time I went on and tried to elicit from him whether the government had any action or plan to increase grain-handling capabilities in order to meet the challenges of the 1980s and, specifically, the challenges which will presented on the west coast, resulting in demand for an increased capacity of something of the order of 70 per cent. There was the usual waffling answer from the Minister of Agriculture indicating that new programs were being worked on, etc.

These questions and this kind of answer are not new in this House. What is becoming increasingly disturbing is the fact that conditions are deteriorating day by day. What we on this side find difficult to comprehend is why the minister and the government are so touchy and so much on the defensive when we raise these issues. They attempt to disregard the magnitude and importance of the matter of grain handling and the transportation system, and engage primarily in rhetoric rather than dealing specifically with answers to the questions.

Again today in the House I brought up a situation which clearly demonstrates a failure on the part of someone—and I am not going to point any finger here—engaged in the grain handling and transportation business regarding a total lack of co-ordination in respect of the allocation of railway rolling stock. There has been a complete breakdown. We now have the situation of empty cars being despatched to country elevator points for which there are no orders. Because there are no orders these railway cars eventually end up in the hands of the railways, empty. There is a complete breakdown in utilization. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) was disturbed and irate, and attempted to twist and distort the question I posed to him this afternoon. He attempted furthermore to try to subvert a reasonable solution which we on this side of the House had proposed.

The fact is that Canada continues to lose sales every day; and the fact that the situation deteriorates day by day is why this matter should be raised in the House every day and why we should be demanding action. Last week the Canadian Wheat Board had to withdraw from the monthly market of the Japanese food agency. The fact is that the United States has now captured a good percentage of our traditional Chinese market and is vigorously pursuing other markets.

It is an additional fact that the Alberta Wheat Pool and other grain companies are now engaged in the movement of grain, particularly oilseeds, to the west coast because there is inadequacy of grain transportation, specifically railway cars. This is a very expensive proposition. The fact that these things are taking place would indicate there is a very serious problem. It is a fact that the barley producers are suffering because markets have literally come to an end, not because there are no possibilities of sales but because there is an inadequate transportation system in place to move that grain. As of this date some 2.3 million tonnes of grain sales have been deferred, and more sales are being deferred every day. I am sure that the total must now amount to at least half a billion dollars.

We have demurrage charges. Our reputation as a reliable supplier of grain continues to deteriorate. We are told that the rapeseed industry is threatened by the fact that there is a billion dollars' worth of export sales which cannot be delivered at this time. These are some of the reasons we are demanding action from this government.

I submit that the reason the ministers responsible find our questions offensive is failure on the part of their government to deliver the goods which they promised, specifically the promises of the 1974 election. There is a failure on the part of the government to act even at this late date on what I refer to as an emergency situation. The Minister of Transport talks of more studies. He talks of the necessity for technical analysis. The system has been studied to death. Surely we do not require technical analysts to come here from the United States to try to figure out what is wrong, when railway cars are being despatched to country elevator points where there are no orders. Surely we do not require that kind of expertise.

As far as we are concerned, there is only one way to resolve this matter today, and that is to bring together representatives of the components which are involved in the grain handling, transportation and marketing systems. Surely the combined expertise of these individuals, with proper leadership and a desire on the part of government, can serve as a catalyst for current planning and for the future. We must stop this political rhetoric and get on with some action, because if the problems are not resolved soon, the tragedy of the 1970s will be the loss of Canada's prominence in the world export grain trade picture.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this question was thoroughly debated in the House on November 13, but I will repeat the minister's position for the hon. member's benefit.

This government has been concerned for a great number of years about the problems facing the grain transportation and handling system, and we have numerous programs in place to alleviate these problems in the years ahead. These programs are aimed at achieving precisely the same target as that outlined recently by the commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister has for several years spoken about "building for a billion" in our programs in support of the grain transportation system. He has more recently spoken about exports in excess of a billion bushels as achieved by the mid-1980s.

But this minister has also done much more than merely talk about the problem. He has instituted solid programs to rescue the transportation system from the rapid deterioration it was subject to following half a century of neglect. Some hard decisions have had to be made, and he has had the courage to make them.

The network of rail lines has been trimmed down to a supportable size, and we are in the process of rehabilitating these lines. Some $100 million has already been spent on this program, and it will have cost in excess of $700 million when it is completed in the mid-1980s. These improvements cannot be made overnight, but we have moved to implement them as quickly as possible.

The fleet of rolling stock for the movement of grain has been gradually aging and taken out of service. This minister recognized this early and started purchasing new, modern hopper cars in 1973. The government has now purchased 8,000 hopper cars at a cost of $256 million.

Canada's grain terminal capacity is also being increased. Under the Canadian Wheat Board's storage incentive scheme, storage capacity at Vancouver is to be increased by 40 per cent. Half of this increased storage, 5.8 million tonnes, is to be completed in time to provide increased capacity in Vancouver this winter. The remainder will come on stream by the end of next year.

There are significant improvements that are being made today to increase our export potential now and in the future. We are also investigating every possible means available to move the maximum amount of grain through the St. Lawrence system prior to the closing of that system, including increasing the hours of operation wherever possible.

But we are not concerned just about the immediate problems we are facing. We are also concerned about the long-term problems facing the grain handling and transportation systems. We have had the Hall commission inquire into the complex social and economic relationships involved in this system. We are now very near to having in place a complete basic network of prairie branch lines that are guaranteed operation until the year 2000. This provides the grain companies with the necessary certainty of service so that they can confidently proceed with the replacement and upgrading of facilities so necessary to provide farmers with the facilities they require.

• (2207)

The federal government is also proceeding with a program of rehabilitating those branch lines that are designated as part of the basic network. This program has seen the commitment of $170 million for the first three years and will see the expenditure of $700 million before it is completed. Improvements to various rail lines in the pairies are already available for all to see.

Once this program is completed, all the basic network lines will be capable of carrying hopper cars that will travel at speeds far in excess of those permitted today. These improvements will provide the capacity necessary to carry the increased volumes of grain necessary in the future.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we are moving to provide the necessary capacity. We are building a system capable of moving in excess of a billion bushels by the middle of the 1980s. It is not a process that can be expected to occur overnight but all the necessary programs are in place now.

NATIONAL REVENUE—REORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT—DELAY IN SOLVING TAXPAYERS' PROBLEMS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, on November 28 I asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) whether it was a correct interpretation of an article that appeared in the Globe and Mail on November 22 that, as a result of the decentralization of operations of the Department of National Revenue, the service to the public in a number of cases would be less efficient and not more efficient.

The report in the business section of the newspaper stated that the director general of the compliance division of the Department of National Revenue, Mr. J. L. Gourlay, had said in a speech to a group of tax accountants in Montreal that the result of decentralization would be to provide a better service for a larger number of accounts than could be handled in the local office; and where there was a problem, reference would have to be made to the centralized records kept at head office in Ottawa and there would be delay in providing the service.

The minister's reply to my question in the House, as reported at page 1565 of Hansard, seemed to admit that in perhaps 75 per cent to 80 per cent of cases there would be good service but in the remaining cases there might be further delays.

This raises the whole question of the objectives of the government in the decentralization program that is being implemented and the results of the program. I cannot help but refer to a speech made during the budget debate by my colleague on this side of the House, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) in which he dwelt at considerable length on the need to go ahead with decentralization. He pointed out that when the policy was announced by the then president of the treasury board, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), in May 1975, the objectives were, first, to bring the administration of federal programs closer to those directly concerned; second, to help slow growth and high unemployment areas; third, to make the federal administration more conspicuous in communities where it was not much felt and where activities related to the country as a whole can contribute to national unity; and, finally, to reduce the undue concentration of civil servants in the national capital area. In the national capital region there are fewer than 25 per cent of the entire public service of this country. How this figure can be construed as an "undue concentration" in the national capital is something I fail to understand.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke went on to say that the total capital expenditures required by government for the decentralization program will amount to some $200 million. He said that this will not require additional expenditures since most are charged against the normal construction budget of the Department of Public Works. I offer that as an interesting example of double talk. Without question the program is more expensive. New buildings have to be built and they are costly. The hon. member for Sherbrooke referred to man-years and said this was a great thing. He pointed out that 24 Canadian cities had been selected to receive the transfer of federal employees. As reported at page 1447 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

> For the sake of political decency, we cannot let the hopes of a whole population hang in midair without knowing what will happen.

I agree, Mr. Speaker. He went on to say as follows:

> The federal government is determined to relocate that service in Sherbrooke, in accordance with the commitment given to the public servants and all the provinces in the house in 1974. Let us think about it: it concerns 750 employees, plus their spouses and children, a total of about 2,000 people. It means creation of at least 1,500 direct and indirect jobs, total annual wage of over $15 million, and capital investments in the range of $40 million. In brief, a project with absolutely tremendous economic repercussions.

I cannot help but observe that in days past when an army attacked a city, they circled it, pillaged it and took the booty home. Nowadays some members of a political party think they can pillage and take booty away from the national capital and treat it in about the same way invading armies did centuries ago.

My colleague from Sherbrooke referred to the costs. We now have restraint in government expenditures. Surely these costs to which he refers cannot be justified. I say to my colleague from Sherbrooke that the decentralization program was conceived at a time when there was an average federal growth of 3 per cent in the public service. Now we do not have zero growth but negative growth. In the national capital region are 65 per cent of those 5,000 positions that are to be declared redundant, and we have one-quarter of the federal public service in the national capital region.

I stress to my colleagues and friends on all sides of the House the impact of decentralization and relocation on the city of Ottawa. In the central business core of the city, 6 million square feet of office space will be vacated by the federal government as a result of this shift in its operations. Two million square feet of temporary structures will be destroyed. Four million square feet of privately-owned accommodation will be vacated. Vacancy rates are approaching 15 per cent to 20 per cent in the central core, and will approach 30 per cent before very long. The national capital itself, as a result of the diminution of the federal grant and the removal of federal activities, will probably suffer the highest real estate taxes of any metropolitan community in Canada.

I simply point out that the policy of decentralization was conceived in other circumstances and cannot be applied in the way the announcement indicated it would in 1975. The policy is costly, it is wasteful and it is inefficient. It has an undue impact on one region, the capital city. I ask that this policy be reconsidered.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the reorganization, or more properly the decentralization, of the operations of the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, was initiated as part of the government's decentralization program. Hon. members will be aware of a number of other instances in which the government has moved or is in the course of moving operations from Ottawa to other locations in Canada to create greater opportunities for employment and to increase the federal presence.

In the particular case of taxation, some decentralization is necessary for operational reasons. Every year during the period in which the mass filing and initial processing of tax returns takes place, the department has had to hire several thousand temporary employees who could be expected to achieve a high degree of efficiency in data conversion and associated clerical work at its single processing centre in Ottawa. With the growth in the volume of tax returns it was becoming very difficult to find enough temporary workers of the kind needed in Ottawa. As an interim measure a second and temporary centre was set up in Winnipeg.

Longer term plans to spread the work more evenly were approved which called for the construction of six permanent centres. They are to be called taxation centres. One is to be located in Surrey, B.C., one in Shawinigan-Sud, Quebec—both of which have recently been opened—and four more to be located in Winnipeg, Manitoba, St. John's, Newfoundland, Jonquière, Quebec, and Sudbury, Ontario. As a last stage the Ottawa processing centre would be converted to the new mode, making seven taxation centres in all.

At the same time, it was seen that to have almost entirely temporary work at these centres would not be a satisfactory answer to employment creation as would a good mixture of temporary and permanent work. Therefore it was decided to move not only the initial processing from Ottawa to the centres but also certain work from the 28 district offices which did not require direct contact with the public. In so doing we would provide more permanent jobs at the taxation centres and have opportunities for efficiency through economies of scale.

The taxpayer should experience no decrease in the level of service. Most taxpayers' contact with the department of taxation is by mail. In general the centres, when spread geographically, should be more responsive than was possible with one centre in Ottawa. The district offices will remain where they are to answer the inquiries of those who seek information by phone or by personal visit.

It is true that the individual taxpayer's files now in the district offices will be held in the centres. However, less than 10 per cent of inquiries require reference to an individual file and measures will be taken for quick transportation of the files from the centres to the district offices when they are needed.

IMMIGRATION—ASYLUM IN CANADA FOR SOUTHEAST ASIAN REFUGEES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, on November 14 I asked a question of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) concerning Vietnamese refugees. I asked the minister whether contacts had been made with the United Nations commissioner for refugee matters and what the status was regarding the acceptance by Canada of some of these refugees on the Hai Hong.

I think all Canadians have been concerned about what has been happening in that part of the world to those who have been forced to flee from their country. I suggest it is a desperate situation, and not only in Southeast Asia. I do not have time to do this tonight, but one could identify at least five or six areas in the world today where there is conflict and where refugees could be called forward or would want to come to Canada.

While we might say we have peace in the world, we have to keep in mind the fact that there are trouble spots. We have to respond as members of the international community. In fact, the United Nations commissioner for refugees estimates that the world's refugee problem could be in the order of ten million. Whatever the exact figures, the fact remains that at this point in the world's history we have the highest number of refugees and humanitarian cases since the last days of World War II. We all know the tremendous displacement of humanity which was the result of that human conflict, yet somehow today we have not felt the impact of similar numbers who can no longer live in their country.

Statistics and people who have studied this question show that the problem is not likely to decrease, numerically at least, in the foreseeable future. In Thailand today there are 130,000 to 150,000 persons who are either refugees or are what are sometimes termed displaced persons. The small country of Malaysia has between 30,000 and 40,000 refugees. That is the situation. Daily people are leaving in unseaworthy craft or small fishing vessels. They are embarking on a search for freedom in a country which at that point in time they simply do not know but which might accept them.

Who is a refugee? We must first keep in mind that he or she is a person, a human being who has lost his home and ability to make a living. Very often it is a human being who has lost his or her family, or at least some members of that family.

In 1976 we passed the Immigration Act which was proclaimed this year. For the first time we placed into an Immigration Act in Canada the provision that we would accept refugees. This is part of Canada's immigration policy at the present time. We said we would accept as refugees those who were defined as conventional refugees. We would also accept humanitarian cases, people who might not be classed as conventional refugees but who are displaced by emergency situations of war, social upheaval or natural disaster.

There are those who say that refugees take jobs. They say they are not people such as we are. I want to say that these are people who are doers. They are builders. I had a teacher who often said to me that in life it is a risk to meet people, but a risk well worth taking. No better can we use that argument than with these refugees.

The natural flow for the next year has been defined by the minister as in the order of 100,000, of which 6,000 are to be refugees. Who is taking these refugees? The United States, France, Belgium, Australia and Canada. How about Sweden? According to statistics, they are not taking refugees from Southeast Asia yet that much maligned country, the United States, is taking a minimum of 25,000. Where are those who protested during the war? Where are they today? Is the suffering of humanity at the hands of a government, be it of the right or of the left, no longer important? Where, for instance, are the clips on television of people protesting the war that we saw in the sixties?

If all that was valid, how is it that the carnage in Southeast Asia today is not something we should protest? Where are the Berrigans today, where are the Fondas? Where are those who actively resisted the government? The genocide in Cambodia at the present time defies imagination. What about Vietnam? We do not hear reports of genocide in Vietnam as in Cambodia, but what about the people who are forced to leave Ho Chi Minh city and go into the countryside where they can find nothing to live on? What about the displacement of families? Is Vietnam setting up a gulag such as was described so well by the Russian writer Solzhenitsyn?

I am not protesting to the government, but surely in the name of humanity, as members of the international community we should look seriously at the responsibility we have as Canadians. We have taken 600 refugees from the Hai Hong.

That is commendable. I recognize we cannot solve the refugee problems of the world. What I am saying, hopefully with the support of a great many Canadians, is: let us be sensitive to the needs of these people and, having analysed the situation, recognize from a humanitarian point of view what our obligations should be in terms of settling people here, not only giving them the benefit of freedom but, as Canadians, ourselves getting the benefit of their drive and loyalty to this country.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it would be remiss of me if I did not, first of all, compliment the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) on his erudite commentary concerning the situation of these refugees in the world today. I agree wholeheartedly with his comments and I, too, look to Canada to show the way by adopting a humanitarian approach to this whole difficult question.

Canada and other concerned countries have for some time been in consultation with representatives of the U.N. high commission for refugees on the plight of the Hai Hong refugees. As a result of these discussions, the minister announced on November 18, 1978, that Canada was prepared to accept 600 of these people.

At the time of the announcement, the minister called upon church groups, service clubs, other groups and concerned Canadians in general for such as welcoming committees, accommodation, clothing, and other personal assistance in integrating these people into community life. The minister also indicated at that time that Canadian groups of five or more could sponsor Southeast Asian refugees. These would be in addition to the 600 announced, and the monthly commitment of 50 "small-boat escapee" and 20 Thailand "camp" refugee families.

I am confident that, as in the past, the Canadian people will demonstrate their charity in assisting and welcoming these refugees to their new home country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CRITICISM OF PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS BY BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move:

That the government immediately make a declaration that it does not view with approval the purchase by the Wheat Board of thousands of freight cars, the responsibility for which should rest on the railway companies, as the cost thereof will ultimately reduce the returns that the farmers will be entitled to and thereby unjustly penalize the farm producers.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LOTO CANADA

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORTED WASTE IN CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the shocking reports on national television that Loto Canada may end up with bills of up to $37 million because of, in the words of our national television network, "a gamble that did not pay off", and in view of the fact that the minister was urged by the provinces and by members of the House of Commons as far back as early June not to proceed with this gamble, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the minister make an immediate statement on motions setting out in complete detail the background of this fiasco, the reasons which motivated her, and a complete picture of the losses involved to the Canadian taxpayers so that members of the House of Commons can better understand the enormity of the blunder and ascertain, by questions after her statement, ways to prevent her from doing it again, assuming she remains in her portfolio until the spring.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the introduction of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR INVESTIGATION BY AUDITOR GENERAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be a more responsive reaction to my Standing Order 43 motion on the same subject.

In view of last night's news report which presented a horror story of waste, incompetence and mismanagement related to Loto Canada, involving the possible waste of some $37 million of the taxpayers' money, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls upon the Auditor General of Canada to undertake immediately a specific investigation of Loto Canada and, if these reports are confirmed, that the minister responsible for Loto Canada hand in her running shoes and resign.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the introduction of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RESTRAINT ON SPENDING OF LOTO CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same grave and serious matter, under Standing Order 43, dealing with the government's mismanagement of Loto Canada with respect to an apparent $37 million blunder with the on-again, off-again Loto Select computer system.

In view of the government's commitment to restraint, and keeping in mind the millions of dollars wasted which could have been allocated to research and development and other casualties of this government's priorities for restraint, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the Prime Minister make a meaningful commitment to saving taxpayers' money by moving to restrain his Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), hereby to be known as the $37 million woman.

FINANCE

PROPOSAL THAT 3 PER CENT REBATE ON AUTOMOBILE INVENTORIES BE APPLIED TO DEALERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I wish to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

On November 16 last the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) suggested in his budget a reduction of the federal tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. That reduction does not apply to everybody since automobile dealers who have cars in stock or in transit will not benefit from it. That kind of step would surely help small businessmen and give some cash to consumers, and it would be appropriate for the government once for all to take its responsibilities. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House urge the Minister of Finance to introduce a bill providing for a reduction of the federal tax on cars in stock or in transit to do justice to automobile dealers.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FEDERAL FUNDING OF WATER QUALITY RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

The current issue of Critical List Magazine outlines growing evidence that the quality of water for human consumption in our country is deteriorating to the point where scientists are concerned about the danger of water as a transmitter of major contaminants. It is increasingly evident that bacteria, viruses, chemicals and metals in our water supply constitute a basic health hazard. Since this issue affects all Canadians and is one over which we, as consumers, have little individual control, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Minister of State (Environment) to resume federal funding of water quality research in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MARKETING BOARD FOR POULTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the urgent necessity of setting up a national marketing board for broilers, the fact that the Department of Agriculture obtained long ago the provinces' agreement to this project, as well as the warranted concern which is rising among producers about the postponed announcement by the ministry of the setting up of this board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare):

That the House unanimously urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to announce before the adjournment of the current session the setting up of the national marketing board for broilers and that April 1, 1978, be considered as the final date for the calculation of the import base.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin):

KITIMAT OIL PIPELINE PROPOSAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in view of the report today that the Kitimat pipeline proposal is "still alive and well", in view of United States legislation which sets December 9, 1978, as the deadline for proposals, and in view of the meeting of the Kitimat consortium with the cabinet of the British Columbia government in October this year to seek approval of this project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That this government, on motions today, reaffirms its position that the Kitimat oil pipeline proposal is dead.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

REQUEST CORPORATION CEASE SELLING SUPPLIES TO FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation was originally set up to market fish from inland waters. Currently, the FFMC is also in the business of selling supplies such as nets, fuel, clothing, etc., at cost to fishermen from whom they purchase fish. In view of the fact that private companies are involved in selling supplies to fishermen, this action of the corporation is an intervention by the government into the private sector and is contrary to the marketing objectives of the FFMC.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That the government take steps immediately to discontinue sales of supplies to freshwater fishermen.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ADVERSE EFFECT OF BUDGET AND BANK RATE ON EMPLOYMENT SITUATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is based on the labour force survey for last month which showed 850,000 Canadians unemployed, an increase of 50,000 and the startling and alarming increase in the number of young people unemployed in this country, officially standing at 14.5 per cent. It seems that the only growth factor in this economy is unemployment.

I ask the minister what steps the government intends to take to offset this very serious trend in the growth of youth unemployment and the lack of jobs generally, given the restrictive measures of his budget and the restrictive measures of the bank rate which is slowing growth in this country.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this month there is a slight increase in unemployment. It is 8.3 per cent, which is in fact one-tenth of a point less than it was a year ago. During the year we have created 371,000 new jobs. Of course, it is always a problem: unemployment is too high in Canada, but the capacity of the Canadian economy to create new jobs is unprecedented.

EMPLOYMENT

ACTION TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Given the fact that the employment growth was 370,000, while the growth in the labour force was 380,000 which means a lag of 10,000 jobs—which is a very serious trend, and notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance had to say, what recommendations is the Minister of Employment and Immigration prepared to make to his colleagues in government, given the very serious situation in this country today where there are only 46,000 jobs and 850,000 Canadians looking for them?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not what recommendations I will make, but what recommendations have already been made and accepted whereby we are pumping something like $50 million into the job experience training program and expect to create jobs for about 58,000 young people over this winter. Through the job creation program I announced in September, $250 million has been made available which will impact on youth and youth unemployment. There is the co-operative education program, in concert with the provinces, and the year-round youth corps program. All of these programs are in place to meet a very important need.

I think the hon. member neglected one statistic, namely, the employment to population ratio, which is now 57.6 per cent for the second consecutive month. I think that is a better measure of the strength of the economy than the histrionics of the hon. member.

Mr. McGrath: The young people of this country, especially, want jobs, not the minister's programmed, empty rhetoric. In light of the importance of the labour force survey, not only in measuring the impact of the disastrous policies of this government on the economy but in terms of the minister's responsibility as minister of immigration and his responsibility for manpower training, I ask him if the government intends to do away with the job vacancy survey as of the end of this year, as they have planned, even though it will probably be more embarrassing to the government as we get into next year. If he intends to do away with it, can he tell the House what he intends to replace it with and will these new figures be made available every month?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if we had all the money in the world we could probably meet all the requests and suggestions of members of the opposition. We just do not have that kind of money available.

● (1417)

I am as concerned as the hon. member about the level of unemployment. I have indicated a whole series of programs that we have in place to deal with this particular problem, with very heavy emphasis on the youth component of the unemployment figures. I think that is a legitimate response from the government. The fact that 370,000 more people are working this year than last year, that 2.3 million more people are working today than were working ten years ago, is some indication of a move in the right direction.

Mr. Clark: Desperation.

[Translation]

INQUIRY AS TO SUCCESS OF JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister is always very keen to speak about his training and job-creation programs. Last September, he announced the implementation of several job-creation programs. However, Statistics Canada declared this morning that 265,000 persons had been looking for a job for more than 14 weeks, including 107,000 unemployed people between 15 and 24. Given the circumstances, I would like to ask the minister if he would be in a position to prove the efficiency of his programs that have been implemented for three months and should help improve the situation. Instead of that Statistics Canada announced this morning that the unemployment rate was rising sharply. Also, I would like to point out that the Minister of Finance proved in his budget that he will be unable—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. La Salle: The minister of Finance has proved that he will be unable to meet the demand. Under the circumstances, to guard against a situation which seems not only alarming but dangerous, will the minister introduce programs other than those which have until now proved totally inefficient?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, inevitably hon. members opposite say, notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance has said, but we cannot be notwithstanding in this respect. The Minister of Finance has indicated that 370,000 more people are working this year than last. That is a record rate of creation of jobs in this country. I think to ignore the employment to population ratio of 57.6 per cent does a disservice and a discredit to the kind of statistics the hon. member is quoting. Every three months in Canada, 1.4 million jobs change hands, so there is hope for the people notwithstanding what the opposition would have us believe.

[Mr. McGrath.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CERTAIN PROGRAMS FOR QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the minister pointing out that more people are entering the labour market in large numbers but to my mind the government should have foreseen that. My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I shall not speak of my riding but of the Saguenay-Lac Saint-Jean, Gaspé and Abitibi regions where the level of unemployment has hovered between 16 per cent and 18 per cent. Seeing those programs were a complete fiasco and taking into account the new super-department, does the Minister of Finance now intend to ask the minister responsible for economic development to create programs that could meet the needs of such vital sectors of the Quebec economy as I mentioned a while ago: does the Minister of Finance intend to ask help from his new boss?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I brought down a budget a month ago the main thrust of which encouraged investments in Canada, because the demand in many sectors is increasing. Take, for instance, the use of the capacity for production of Canada which now stands at 87 per cent, that is much higher than the average over the last 15 years. We provided for special stimulants to slow growth areas, accelerated rates of investment credits, higher credit rates to research and development. We feel that because of the much improved competitive situation of Canada, the economy in the private sector will pick up. And we do not believe that injecting new government funds at this point would solve the problem, all the more so that every time we speak of spending money, the opposition complains about our having deficits that are much too high.

LOTO CANADA

REPORTED WASTE IN CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT KNOWLEDGE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is strange to hear the Conservatives huff and puff when they see the consequences of the government implementing their own economic policy.

Mr. Woolliams: Keep it clean.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Get your target straight, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to ask the Prime Minister, given the report last night that Loto Canada has conceivably wasted up to some $37 million of taxpayers' money through a series of mismanagement decisions, was the government aware that people were actually being hired and expensive equipment was being put into place by Loto Canada precisely at the time the federal minister was negotiating with the provinces alternative arrangements for lotteries in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what report the hon. member refers, but I will gladly take notice of the question.

• (1422)

Mr. Broadbent: For the Prime Minister's information, there was a report on the news last night to the effect that there has been substantial waste. The Prime Minister can shrug his shoulders; however, most Canadians are concerned about a $37 million waste even if he is not. The allegations made in the news report were extremely serious if they turn out to be accurate.

Will the Prime Minister take to the Auditor General a specific request from the government that he investigate these allegations of serious waste in the operations of Loto Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if I was shrugging my shoulders, it was only because of the fact the hon. member referred to a newscast as the source of his allegations. I said I had not heard it. I am not aware of it. I will try and get a report on that newscast and see if it is more accurate than another one of last night.

Mr. Broadbent: I hope the Prime Minister is informed about something. I will go to the minister directly responsible. Can the minister inform the House whether she has had a chance to investigate the allegations that were made in the newscast last night? If not, does she intend to do so? Specifically, will she recommend that the Auditor General, as an impartial servant of this House, investigate these serious allegations?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. gentleman finally got around to asking me the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: I think the CBC has taken stories from a possibly disgruntled ex-employee and given them the virtue of fact. There is no fact to this $37 million figure. I have to refute my value to this House, but far from being a $37 million woman at the moment, I am only an $800,000 woman. So we put a price on it. In this connection I would like to give some detail, if I may, because the figures given were totally incorrect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, they cannot bear to hear the facts: I will wait until they are ready.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

REQUESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MARKETING BOARD FOR POULTRY

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Richmond.

Mr. Beaudoin: My question has to do with the motion moved in the last few days by my colleague the hon. member for Bellechasse, asking the Minister of Agriculture to establish without delay, considering the approval of the provinces, a poultry marketing board. Can the Minister of Agriculture tell us whether he considered that matter and, if so, when he will take action?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into the matter. The answer is "Soon."

[Translation]

REQUESTED BAN ON IMPORTATION OF CUT-UP POULTRY FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): I would like to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Considering that some producers complain about the fact that poultry from the United States enters the country as we find it in our supermarkets, unidentified, in quarters or cut-up, can the minister tell us whether he is aware of that situation and whether he will inquire or take steps to end it.

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether poultry is coming into Canada that is listed as anything other than poultry. I will certainly look into the question raised by the hon. member and report to him directly.

LOTO CANADA

REPORTED WASTE IN CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT KNOWLEDGE

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). I regret her histrionics of a few minutes ago, saying she would have to wait to answer questions, when she has an opportunity on the motion under Standing Order 43 to make a statement.

• (1427)

In view of the fact that the CBC has recognized what the opposition has been talking about since last June regarding Loto Canada, and in view of the fact that the president of Loto Canada made a statement on June 26 that the contract with General Instruments had been "carefully and prudently managed", can the minister tell the House whether the story appearing in last night's national news entitled "A gamble that didn't pay off" is true and, if it will not cost up to $37 million, what figure does the hon. lady estimate it will cost? The figure I gave in the debate on October 25, as reported at page 469 of Hansard, was between $23 million and $28 million.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I have informed the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton on a number of occasions that when the contracts were terminated I would consider tabling a full disclosure of those terminations in the House. I do think some of the principles behind this issue should be made known to the House. The federal and provincial governments together now have a gross intake of close to $900 million a year from lotteries. Of that amount, only $200 million a year is assigned to Loto Canada; the rest remains with the provinces. We have given $100 million per year by transferring the $1 lottery to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

As to the hon. member's question with respect to the CBC report, that is completely erroneous. I was asked what the termination cost would be. I can tell the hon. member only one part of the termination cost, because the assignment of the contract is not completed. In the area of software and attendant equipment, we originally expected the cost to be $14 million. The resolved cost will be between $2 million and $3 million, of which Ontario and Quebec will pay $1 million.

As to the other contracts, as I have said in the House repeatedly, I will consider tabling the data as soon as I have it. I do not have it at this time because it is not completed. As for the hon. gentleman's statement of June 26, I have here his notes of that day: he asked that the House instruct the Crown corporation, Loto Canada, to withdraw from any agreement with General Instruments Canada. I would say we have fulfilled his request.

[Mr. Horner.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: It would have been pleasant, Mr. Speaker, if this had been done at the time and saved the $23 million to $28 million they will end up losing on this deal. However, this has cost the Canadian taxpayer a great deal of money.

In view of the fact that at the meeting with the provincial ministers in Toronto at the end of September or early October, at which the minister responsible for Loto Canada was accompanied by the Minister of Justice, who was then minister in charge of federal-provincial relations, she stated she was using this only as a bargaining tool to preserve a portion of the lottery business for the government, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider that a person who only uses as a bargaining tool some $23 million to $28 million should be considered as a person who should be replaced as a minister, one who shows such inept and wasteful habits, poor management ability—

An hon. Member: Shameful.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member realizes the argumentative nature of his question. The hon. member for Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

Mr. Dick: Privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

• (1432)

COMPENSATION PAID TO CORPORATION EMPLOYEES LAID OFF

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) arising out of the CBC report last night.

The minister will be aware that the CBC reported that several dozen employees of Loto Select were fired after the decision was made to terminate the program, many of whom were hired only days or weeks before the decision was made. One man allegedly has been given some $10,000 under a termination agreement, despite the fact that he never even showed up for work.

Can the minister indicate how much money will be paid in compensation to employees who were laid off after the plan collapsed, and can she indicate how many employees are involved in this?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, there are 71 such employees, 49 of whom have already found alternate employment or taken their severance pay. As the House knows, we felt that these people should be treated humanely because some of them had come from other jobs.

This is another matter in which the opposition wants to have it both ways. I clearly recall hon. members opposite on many occasions saying that there were no jobs at all for Canada in this Loto Canada promotion.

With regard to the reference made earlier by the other hon. gentleman, I want it to be clearly—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If I cannot permit the question, I cannot permit the answer.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, in the minister's speech she neglected to tell the House what the cost would be for paying benefits to people who were laid off. The CBC report also stated that over $300,000 worth of fittings and furniture are mothballed in Loto Select's Vancouver headquarters, which are leased at the present time at a cost of $160,000 a year for five years.

Can the minister tell the House how much has been committed for the leasing and furnishing of unused facilities in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal, and how much of this cost can be recovered?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, the leases were set out originally at $1 million, and the amount we feel we necessarily will have to pay is $185,000. We will be vacating the Vancouver office in 90 days. Two lessees that we think are very suitable are looking at the property and at some of the fixtures now.

INVOLVEMENT OF TREASURY BOARD—NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the President of the Treasury Board with respect to this matter. Can he shed any light on the rationale of Treasury Board approving this rather substantial negotiating ploy for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) without tenders, since it obviously was not to help Canadian business or to promote a depressed area of the country, as is the case with other undertakings?

Can the President of the Treasury Board tell us if he now knows on what basis this rather foolish transaction or ploy was permitted?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that Treasury Board was not involved in this. Loto Canada acted as a Crown agency and did so on its own behalf.

ROLE OF PROVINCES UNDER AGREEMENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the President of the Treasury Board is very happy that he can give the answer today that Treasury Board was not involved.

Perhaps I can ask the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) to give us a little more information about the role of the provinces, which protested so bitterly when these negotiations were going on over what the Financial Times of Canada called a hushed-up, rushed-up deal. Can the minister tell us exactly what benefit or equity she expects from the provinces to help her extricate herself from this situation?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question of the provinces helping me to extricate myself from this particular proposal, since it is an agreement between both provinces and the federal government. This is the cost to rationalize the lottery market in this country. It is a fraction of the cost which was mentioned by the CBC, which it conjured up from its own facts: the CBC did not bother to come to Loto Canada to get any facts.

As an aside, the CTV began this story three weeks ago and the CBC has just started on it. The federal government lottery and the lotteries of Ontario and Quebec are working together and, depending on the buy-out cost, that will be how much will be shared by the provinces. I have already told hon. members that in one section of the phase-out there is a $1 million input from the provinces. In the other, I cannot give the details. It is not that I do not want to tell the House; it is that I cannot without pushing up the price. If hon. members opposite think they are performing a favour by doing this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oxford.

INVOLVEMENT OF DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and it is with respect to the Loto Select debacle. Prior to the signing of the agreement with General Instruments Corporation, was the minister or his department consulted by any of his cabinet colleagues or their officials regarding the letting of a contract, without bids, to an American firm when it was known that no part of the work would go to Canadians, and when 14 Canadian firms were capable of bidding; and, if so, did he agree?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, actually the Crown corporation acted without the advice of the government, but I would be glad to take a look at this matter.

Oral Questions

INVOLVEMENT OF MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations.

With respect to the ill-fated Loto Select scheme envisaged by the government last spring, can the minister indicate whether his predecessor and his departmental officials were in agreement with the Minister of State and the government forging ahead for their own glory and self-aggrandizement without consulting the provinces prior to negotiating a contract with General Instruments Corporation, in view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in June, 1976—now the Secretary of State for External Affairs—said in committee: "We could decide to carry on or withdraw completely if there is an understanding between the provincial governments and the federal government."?

Hon. John M. Reid (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: I want to thank hon. members for their expression of confidence. I say to the hon. member that I do not know the answer to his question, but I will make inquiries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SAFETY OF CANADIANS IN IRAN

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the representations which I, and no doubt other members, have received with respect to Canadians presently in Iran, and in view of proposals which the Secretary of State for External Affairs apparently now has under consideration to assist citizens of Canada who may be in some difficulty in the tragic events now unfolding in Iran, can the Prime Minister indicate more specifically what contingency plans are being prepared to ensure the safety of Canadians caught in this conflict and, particularly, what steps their relatives and friends in Canada should take to ascertain their whereabouts and their circumstances?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he is preparing such contingency plans, but that at the time being there is no cause for alarm. The embassy is in touch with the some 1,200 Canadians who are in Iran. About one-third of them are in Tehran. The others are either on the Caspian or in the south where there is no immediate danger. Because of the fact that the embassy does know their whereabouts, we are convinced that the government will be able to act, if action is necessary. However, at the present time there is no cause for alarm.

REQUEST POLICY ON CUTBACKS BE RECONSIDERED—WORSENING UNEMPLOYMENT PICTURE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance: it is in connection with the worsening unemployment figures which were released today.

Since the minister does not seem to have any concrete proposals to put forward to reduce the level of unemployment in Canada, and since unemployment in the Ottawa-Hull area has increased almost 30 per cent in one month as a result of government cutbacks, would the government reconsider its policy and put off the cutbacks in order to ensure that we do not reach double-digit unemployment in the winter months?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in our budget policy last month we announced that we were hoping for economic recovery through higher investments in Canada and that, to our mind, was the best policy to adopt at this time. I think that because of a major improvement in our competitive position on world markets, our economy should pick up in the next few months. As for our cutbacks, that policy was announced last August. We thought it was essential to lessen the government deficit, and in so doing we have tried to minimize staff cuts. That, of course, may be too much for the hon. member, but it is still four times less than what the Progressive Conservative party proposes at this time.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that whatever the intentions of the government were, its policies are not working, unemployment is increasing and it looks as if it will continue to increase. Just to give the minister another figure from the labour force statistics which were released today—rather startling statistics—the service sector lost 22,000 jobs in November.

● (1442)

As this is unquestionably a result of the reduction in consumer spending, at the very least will the government reconsider its position to withdraw the $250 million in purchasing power from the economy in the first months of 1979 as a result of the reduction in family allowance payments from $28 to $20? Will the government at least defer that proposal in order to ensure purchasing power is maintained at a high level?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, parliament was called upon last night to vote on that proposition. Almost every member of the House voted in favour of the bill. A clause was proposed by the New Democratic Party and three members voted in favour of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REASON FOR INCREASE IN WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX—VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance: it deals with the wholesale price index.

Mr. Nystrom: The three good guys voted in favour of the clause the minister referred to.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: I will wait until the Liberals and their socialist cousins calm down.

Today, the wholesale price index indicated that in October prices rose 2.1 per cent, or at the rate of 25 per cent per year. Would the minister explain to the House why this rapid increase should be occurring? Would he agree that this is another example of the disastrous effects on prices of the cheap dollar encouraged by the minister?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we receive the total picture every month when the consumer price index is produced in order to reveal the real reason for it. In the last three months, inflation in Canada increased at the rate of 1.1 per cent, which was the lowest three-month period of inflation we have known for many years.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. So far this month the government has lost $200 million in attempting to defend the dollar, on top of the $500 million which was lost last month.

Would the Minister of Finance indicate if the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs was stating government policy at the Skyline hotel when he was reported as calling for the pegging of the dollar at approximately today's value?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the figures given by the hon. member concerning what happened to the reserve this month. It is not known. It will be known by the public at the end of the month. It is not very useful to throw around figures like that just to create more speculation concerning the dollar.

In terms of the policy of the government, the hon. member made a speech at noon. He is entitled to his opinion. The policy of the government is a floating currency and we have no intention of pegging the Canadian dollar.

Oral Questions

STATUS OF WOMEN

REPORT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL CONCERNING ADVANCEMENT IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as the minister responsible for the status of women. The minister may recall that last Monday I asked him about the unusual procedure of the advisory council in sending to the Public Service Commission its annual assessment on the progression of women in the public service. The minister saw no problem with that if it only dealt with statistics.

Has he determined whether this further delay has resulted in any amendments to that report? How much longer will the report be delayed before it is made public in parliament and to the people of the country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, last week I told the hon. member that the advisory council was an autonomous agency and that I did not intend to interfere with its operations. I do not intend to start interfering this week any more than I intended to last week. However, I would be very happy to relay to the council the question raised by the hon. member. I am sure the council will be quite pleased to communicate directly with the hon. member if there is anything to communicate.

As far as the report itself is concerned, as I have said, I do not have any information. I do not intend to interfere with the operations of the council. The hon. member would be the first one to blame me if I were to attempt that. I will relay the question, and if I receive an answer I will be very happy to pass it on to the hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, while the minister is making that inquiry and keeping his pristine purity respecting the operations of the advisory council, perhaps he could also investigate why a further report which was produced some time ago, entitled "Problems of Immigrant Women in the Canadian Labour Force", was referred to the Department of Employment and Immigration for its assessment and criticism, instead of being published in the normal manner? Why, in particular, did an official of the department recommend a deletion from that report with specific reference to the new Immigration Act because of its critical nature toward the department?

Has the minister had discussions about what seems to be a new operating procedure respecting the advisory council, taking what were formerly independent reports, without the consent or the knowledge of the authors, and referring them to the appropriate departments and commissions for some possible amendment or censorship before they are finally published?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I find the allegation of the hon. member rather preposterous, to say the least. I am not aware of this other case. Again, I do not intend to ask the council why they are doing it, and I certainly will not ask them to stop doing it. The only explanation I can find is that the council wants to act in a very knowledgeable and competent manner.

Rather than doing as hon. members of the opposition do so often, I want to be sure their facts are correct before broadcasting various things publicly. I cannot but applaud the sense of responsibility and objectivity on the part of an advisory council which operates independently of the government. I see nothing wrong with that, and I am amazed the hon. member should scandalize himself about this.

BILINGUALISM

REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

Hon. James Richardson (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of widespread reports that the task force on Canadian unity has concluded that the government's policy on national bilingualism is divisive and unworkable, will the Prime Minister now agree to delay the rewriting and redrafting of the constitutional amendment bill, former Bill C-60, at least until the Pepin-Robarts task force has reported to the public and to the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the so-called reports are unfounded rumours. One of the co-chairmen of the task force said that he could not comment in any way on it and that the report would speak for itself. We are happy with that situation. We are confident the report, on the contrary, will be favourable to the government: I have no guarantee of that, of course. But I believe it is irresponsible journalism to take a rumour such as that, which has no foundation, and give it the prominence it has been given.

As far as the government is concerned, linguistic equality in Canada is the basis of unity in this country. We have fought three elections on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is a policy which had the support of every party in the House. It would be very surprising if a task force were to go against the policy accepted by all parties in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What about Horner?

Mr. Trudeau: Unless the Tories are telling us now that they do not support this policy, in which case we are prepared to fight a fourth election on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: We should like to.

Mr. Lawrence: We will do everything to get you to the polls.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister seems to say that he does not have the evidence, and that these reports are unfounded. I have in my office the evidence that I am talking about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Richardson: I receive in my office 400 or 500 letters a day, from all provinces of Canada, which indicate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must ask the hon. member to put his supplementary question.

Mr. Richardson: In brief, my question is: in light of this evidence, will the Prime Minister listen to the Canadian public? Will he modify and reconsider his plans to entrench language rights and his concept of language equality into the Constitution of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat, I know and admit that a certain number of Canadians do not favour this policy, and I believe the hon. member is one of them. I can only say that it was our policy in 1968, 1972 and 1974, and it will be our policy in the next election. I do not think any party will fight against the concept of linguistic equality in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: What about Horner?

Mr. Hees: Jack says he is going to.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION OF GREAT LAKES

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Environment) concerning the problem of phosphorus waste pollution in the Great Lakes and the production of excess algae and plant growth.

Last week the technical adviser for the Ontario environment ministry, Mr. William Steggles, stated, "some states and U.S. cities continue to pollute the lakes because no legislation controlling phosphorus levels has been passed, particularly two or three big, populous states—Ohio, Pennsylvania and Illinois—while apparently controls are being applied well on the Canadian side."

Will the minister take any measures to persuade our American neighbours to institute much more effective controls for this problem?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, since the signing of the Great Lakes water quality agreement, 99 per cent of the population on the Canadian side of the Great Lakes has been serviced by adequate sewage treatment facilities. On the American side of the Great Lakes, 65 per cent of the population is now serviced by adequate sewage treatment facilities, compared to 5 per cent when the agreement first began. So real strides are being made in this area.

Under the 1978 agreement, new final deadlines have been set by which industrial and municipal pollution control programs are to be completed and operating by December 31, 1982, and December 31, 1983, respectively. We expect to make great strides in all aspects of pollution control in the Great Lakes under this new agreement.

POST OFFICE

STEPS TO AVOID INTERRUPTION OF MAIL SERVICE AT CHRISTMAS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker my question is for the Postmaster General. I presume that the Postmaster General is aware of the growing tension in major plants across the country in the wake of the recent work stoppage.

In view of this situation, would the minister inform the House as to the action he is taking to ensure that there will be no interruption of mail service during the Christmas season by either illegal strikes or work slow-downs?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, many media reports have indicated that we are taking our responsibility seriously. Disciplinary action has been taken against the workers who acted illegally or defied parliament. Had we not taken this action, I think it would have indicated complicity on our part to such actions. Everything is being done to see that the workers are treated justly and fairly. We are concerned that things be done fairly, particularly for those workers who abided by the law.

I can assure the hon. member that if there is an illegal strike during the Christmas season, we will take appropriate action to prevent it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's comments. Could the minister tell the House if he is aware of the particular circumstances, and whether they are indicative of the situation in other plants across the country, in the Calgary post office in which, once again, management has restricted access to the cafeteria for workers who are on weekend and late shifts? If this is the case, would the minister instruct managers in other post offices across the country not to engage in this sort of unnecessary confrontation?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, if a position such as the hon. member has described has been taken, it is for good reason. I am not aware of this decision because it is made at the local level.

Coming back to the danger of a strike during Christmas, I read an article in a newspaper this morning about a possible wildcat postal strike threatened by CUPW and just below the article was another one headed "Jobless rate up slightly." I am sure there are many people who are not employed and who would be glad to take the place of postal workers who do not wish to work.

LOTO CANADA

DISPOSAL OF ASSETS OF CORPORATION—COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the "minister of fitness and amateur purchasing". The minister has said frequently that she will not tell the Canadian people or this parliament the full cost of this transaction until it is completed. Would she give us some idea when she expects the transaction to be completed?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I do not admit to any amateur purchasing. It was done in conference with the provinces which the hon. Leader of the Opposition has been proposing take over the lottery. I expect the contract to be terminated within two or three months.

I mentioned today two separate items. One is the General Instruments contract—that is, the automated equipment—for which Loto Canada will be reimbursed a portion by Ontario and Quebec when it is completed. Part two, which I have already mentioned in the House today, concerns the peripheral equipment respecting which the provinces are providing $1 million of what we expect to be somewhere between $2 million and $3 million in pay-out costs.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister. He will know that since there has been federal-provincial co-operation forced upon the government in this matter, the price attached by the provinces—I gather, agreed to by the federal government—for disposal of these assets is about half of the $23 million that the federal government in fact paid.

In the interests of having the Canadian public and parliament know about the quality of the decisions that went on within this Crown corporation—ministers have been very careful to blame Crown corporations and avoid responsibility themselves—and in order to ensure that this kind of waste of money does not occur again, would the Prime Minister be prepared to refer this matter to the appropriate committee of this House and allow a committee of parliament to begin work, this week, in examining what went on and what went wrong in this waste of millions of dollars on behalf of Canadian taxpayers either by the minister or by the Crown corporation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not admit the premises of the question or even the way the question is posed. The Leader of the Opposition suggests that there is a waste of money. The minister has told us that when the contracts are completed, she will table them if they are requested. Then the question can be debated.

In the meantime, I would remind the Leader of the Opposition that he and his party are the ones who wanted to give all the product of the lottery to the provinces; they did not want the federal government to keep anything. Now, as a result of the negotiations by the minister there is an equitable division, one which is accepted by the provinces—which hon. members opposite continue to scoff at—and which will permit the federal government to gain something substantial from the $900 million which is the annual product of the lottery. I understand that the opposition is not interested in having the central government preserve any of its attributes, but that is not the view of this government.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it becomes more and more evident that the Prime Minister does not, in fact, know the facts in this situation. I am sure that he will want to brief himself and that after briefing himself he will agree that there has been a considerable waste of Canadian taxpayers' money the details of which should be known to this House.

I would ask the Prime Minister to acquaint himself with all the facts in this transaction, assuming the minister will tell him, then come back to the House of Commons tomorrow and tell us the minimum loss which will be sustained by the people and the treasury of Canada, and that he then make a decision to refer the subject matter involved here—this wastage of millions of dollars—to the appropriate standing committee of this House.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat, when the contracts are completed, I would certainly be willing to look at the exact figures; but as of now I think that I can answer the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, based on the minister's answer.

If the minister says that out of the $900 million, which is the total product of the lotteries to the Canadian provinces and federal government, $200 million of that comes to us, we are $200 million ahead of the position which was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FUTURE AVAILABILITY OF LEADED GASOLINE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I am sure he is aware that most of the service stations in our country are now in the process of replacing leaded, super or premium gasoline with super, unleaded gasoline, which will affect approximately 5 per cent of Canadian car owners. That is approximately 500,000 cars.

• (1502)

The problem is that there has been virtually no warning. There was something of a conspiracy of silence by the gas companies, the car companies and the government that this was about to take place. Can the minister confirm that new cars are still being sold which require leaded gasoline, and can he tell us whether fuel will be available for the lifetime of such vehicles?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my preliminary information is that cars are still being sold which require that type of gasoline, but that has been changed for the latter part of this year and next year. There will be a greater demand, especially in Quebec where these complaints came from, for leaded gasoline for high-test type vehicles. We expect a change to take place, and I will be watching the situation closely and will get more information.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure us that adequate gasoline will be available for people whose cars require leaded fuel? Can he also tell us whether he has checked into the possibility of there being misleading advertising by Imperial Oil and other companies who have said that people who use leaded gasoline should switch to unleaded gasoline? I think he knows the dangers this might pose to some engines. Has he checked to see whether this is misleading advertising and, if he has, what action does he plan to take?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, in the first place, we would recommend to the oil companies that they let consumers know where they can find leaded gasoline for high-test vehicles, just as they let people know where they can find diesel fuel.

Mr. Nystrom: How?

Mr. Allmand: They can put out a list of stations which supply that kind of fuel. They do it already for diesel. I will look into the other matter to see whether there is any false advertising involved.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DICK—ARGUMENTATIVE QUESTION ASKED DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is with some reluctance that I rise to bring up what I feel is a question of privilege.

Today I was ruled out of order for allegedly asking a question which was argumentative or political in nature. I know, of course, that we would not want to have any questions which are argumentative or political in nature in this political debating chamber. The fact is, however, that the question which I put had a part which was directly on point, and is on point, regarding the matter we have been dealing with today and what has been revealed about it, that is, that there has been waste of money, that there has been poor manageability and ineptitude in carrying out something they should not have got into last June, and on which I have a motion to put—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not need to argue that point. The first part of his question was perfectly in order, but the last part was argumentative in nature. He must surely recognize that. If he suggests that we should permit argumentative questions he is asking me to go against the precedents of the House. Surely he could not argue at this point that his question was not argumentative in nature in light of the language he used at the end of it.

The first part of his question was perfectly in order. I have to exercise my discretion in respect of questions and supplementaries, however, on the basis of precedents. He finished his question with a clearly argumentative aspect. I have no choice. That is a discretion that I have to exercise and, having exercised it, it seems to me the matter is finalized.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could continue for a brief moment. Of course, the last part of my question is something which we have heard before, and I suspect that we will hear it again. I was asking the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if he would dismiss a minister who showed wasteful tendencies, inability and ineptitude in managing his department. I think that fully 50 per cent or maybe 100 per cent of the questions asked in this House have some political colouring or some argumentative character. Be that as it may, however, I would like to move at this time, on my question of privilege:

That the matter of questions or answers being argumentative or political in nature be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in order that new guidelines of clearness in questioning and answering can be decided upon as argumentative political questions and answers should be forbidden in this political debating chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know why the hon. member insists upon using the word "political". I never said anything about the political nature of his question, and I have never ruled a question out of order on the grounds of it being political. Never! I do not know why he uses that argument. It has no bearing on the situation that we face.

The hon. member spoiled a perfectly good question on a very important subject by an argumentative conclusion. If I am to be consistent with him as I have been with his colleagues, I could not permit his question. Order, please.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) on a point of order.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Dick: Privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) has been heard on his question of privilege and I have indicated to him that it is not a question of privilege. I am sure I have not said anything to him that was not in keeping with the practices of the House. He has had his day in court to raise his question of privilege and has not been successful. I should like to move on to another member. The hon. member for Calgary Centre.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to an item in the supplementary estimates of which I gave Your Honour notice and about which I have communicated with the hon. member for Winnipeg—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) might wait until we call orders of the day, which is supply today, in order that I may take this in accordance with practices which I have indicated to the House and which he is now following very carefully.

PRIVILEGE

MR. OBERLE—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF STATE (FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT) DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege in regard to questions put to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) and particularly her answer to my leader toward the end of the question period. She left the impression that purchases of Loto Canada gadgetery were only made after consultations with the provinces. I am sure Your Honour would want to give the minister the opportunity to correct her statement as it is clearly misleading. Consultations were not held with the provinces before the decision was made to extend the service of Loto Canada, but consultations with the provinces resulted in the cancellation of the contracts.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to refer to Hansard to see the exact words, but I think it should be placed on the record that the abandonment of the Loto Canada game is consistent with Loto Canada's marketing philosophy.

The game was introduced in the first place to give balance and stability to a one-product line. We had a one-product line and we needed to have more strength in order to meet the head on competition coming from the provinces on a continuing basis. In those circumstances the one-product line was simply too fragile. That decision was made by the Crown corporation, and I believe it is one that is often taken in the market place. When you are dealing with a Crown corporation you are dealing with a business, and these kinds of affairs take place in business all the time.

When we had the agreement with the provinces some six months later, and when we had secured the federal-provincial memorandum of agreement on October 5, it was based on market sharing of the revenue which was originally planned.

In order to define this question properly for the hon. member opposite, I would tell him that when we went to the federal-provincial conference in Regina we offered the provinces a 50-50 share of the federal portion of the revenue of Loto Canada. Subsequently, when we came to an agreement with the provinces on October 5, we felt that we no longer had the previous highly competitive situation, that the market situation has changed markedly, and that exclusive access to the $10 and up section of the market would give Loto Canada reasonable scope to develop products which would continue to yield roughly the same current revenues.

What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that originally, in June of the previous year, we faced heavy competition with the provinces and we determined to go ahead with the $1 lottery. Subsequently, when we came to an agreement, we determined that we did not need the $1 lottery because the competitive issue was being resolved. We therefore moved into the $10 and up sector, where we remain.

I will be placing legislation before the House some time next spring so that we will continue to have the $10 lottery. Many of these facts may be clarified at that time.

One point I should like to add, Mr. Speaker, is that when I mentioned $800,000 today, that is close to the amount of money that I know has been settled. It is for three areas, that is, for the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we have gone a little far afield from the original point, which was whether there was an agreement with the provinces and the circumstances. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay).

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, if I may take the time of the House for just a moment, since there has been some background given about policy in this matter, about the federal government and the provinces vis-à-vis the lottery, I want to put on the record that in 1973 Mr. C. M. Drury, then president of the treasury board, as quoted in the Financial Times, as he moved to set up the lottery to help finance the Olympic Games, said:

● (1512)

The federal government is not in the least interested in operating a national lottery.

I think that ought to be brought to the attention of hon. members as part of the background of this whole affair.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) has raised what I think hon. members will realize is a disagreement. On the basis of the remarks made I do not see that there is more than that. However, if there is, upon examining the record I will return to it tomorrow. My impression is that the matter is a disagreement and not a procedural question.

MR. CAOUETTE (VILLENEUVE)—REQUEST FOR CORRECTION IN HANSARD

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to a question I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration yesterday afternoon, December 4, 1978. The second line of my supplementary question, which appears on page 1736 of Hansard reads, and I quote:

I am very happy with the answer of the minister—

It should read:

I am very unhappy with the answer of the minister's—

Since the minister says that the three Yugoslavian immigrants are now working illegally in the Val-d'Or area, I must say that this is absolutely false because those three immigrants obtained a permit from the immigration department in Canada to work in that area.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) directed a question to the government House leader regarding Bill C-12. I understand that tomorrow, as he stated, we will be dealing with the order in council concerning the new Ministry of State. The government House leader said he would let us know if there was anything different in mind, because we would like to know where Bill C-12 is in terms of second reading debate. Further, could he indicate to the House, because there is some rumour that perhaps bills that may becoming out of committee stage will be dealt with in terms of precedence prior to Bill C-12, which is the indexation bill. Could the government House leader just set us straight? There are a number of us who would like to know what has happened to Bill C-12 and whether there is any bill that would take precedence over that particular bill.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member invites me to set him straight. That would require more time than I have in this brief moment.

Tomorrow it is the intention to call the resolution establishing the new President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. Then I think it fair to tell my hon. friend that on Friday, because of the absence of the Prime Minister and of the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, I would not return to that resolution but would probably call Bill C-12 on Friday. I hope that it will be possible for hon. members to deal with that bill expeditiously and send it to committee, with the intention of having the committee study completed and the bill given third reading before we rise for the Christmas adjournment.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to know that the government House leader is now prepared to give us some direction. But let me tell him this: do not start dictating terms to us. After all, Mr. Speaker, on March 9 there was a statement made with respect to indexation. I do not know whether the President of Privy Council is aware of that, so if there is any food dragging I blame the government side. It is not fair to indicate that we should rush ahead with this particular bill, because as the government House leader is very much aware, we have to hear from—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Alexander: Order? I think we are getting the game plan here. We have to hear from the Public Service Alliance, PIPS, members of Tomenson-Alexander, and from those who were involved with the air traffic controllers, the servicemen, and the RCMP.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HUMAN RIGHTS

FREE POLITICAL EXPRESSION FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-446, respecting political partisanship.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this private members' bill is to amend two acts, the Human Rights Act and the Public Service Employment Act. At the present time some 500,000 public servants in Canada are denied the right to participate in the political process as a direct result of section 32(1) of that latter act. The effect of my bill would be to amend those clauses to deny only the deputy heads the right to participate in this process, and to allow those generally employed by the civil service to participate, as we all have a right to do.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT TO B.C.

Question No. 21—Mr. Cossitt:

During the Prime Minister's visit to British Columbia in the first quarter of 1978, did he make the statement "Do you think we are out to screw the Canadian People?" or anything similar and, if so (a) what is a full explanation of what the Prime Minister meant by this remark (b) is the Prime Minister prepared to immediately produce evidence to parliament showing that he is not out to "screw" the Canadian people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No. (a) and (b) Not applicable.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—SPEEDING VESSELS

Question No. 28—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware that residents in the area of Brockville, Ontario, living on the banks of the St. Lawrence River, are again expressing concern over the matter of ships, particularly ocean-going vessels, exceeding speed limits set for the area and causing property damage and, if so, will steps be taken by the government to make such vessels conform to the law and, if so (a) what are they (b) what methods of enforcement will be used and who will be in charge?

2. What are the speed limits for the area from Johnstown, Ontario to the end of the Brockville Narrows?

3. How many ships in each of the past two years have been (a) warned (b) charged (c) fined and, in each case, what was the name of the vessel, the country of origin and the penalty applied?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows:

1. The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority has received two complaints about alleged speeding in the Brockville area. These are the first complaints in the last two years.

(a) Since 1970, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority has established vessel speed limits in various sections of the St. Lawrence River including the Brockville area. Speed enforcement is carried out on a spot check basis, very similar to the approach used by law enforcement officers on the highway. Vessels' speeds are checked by means of a radar unit.

(b) Speed limits are enforced by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority in the section from Lake St. Louis to Brockville, as well as in the Thousand Islands area from 15 observation sites. The specific sites at Brockville are: McDonald Point, Hillcrest Point and Brockville Dock. For actual observations, a system of rotating shifts is used so as to have 24-hour per day coverage. Enforcement is not limited to week days; weekends are included as well. Masters of vessels who are found to exceed the speed limits are contacted by radio and instructed to reduce speed immediately. In addition they are charged with a violation. In general, a speeding violation is assessed $200 per knot over the limit. On August 17 the authority issued a Seaway notice drawing attention to this problem and requesting masters to maintain uniform speeds through the area until well clear of it.

2. Speed limits from Johnstown, Ontario, to the end of the Brockville Narrows: 13 knots (15 mph).

3. Ships warned in Brockville area:

NON-CANADIAN VESSELS—CANADIAN WATERS

Question No. 150—Mr. Forrestall:

With regard to non-Canadian registered vessels operating in Canadian waters north of the 60th parallel, how does the government ensure that such vessels meet safety and environmental standards?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Non-Canadian registered ships operating in any of the 16 shipping safety control zones into which the waters of the Canadian Arctic are divided pursuant to the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act are required to comply with the arctic shipping pollution prevention regulations and the arctic waters pollution prevention regulations made pursuant to that act. The former contains detailed provisions with respect to the construction, equipment, manning and navigation. To show compliance a steamship inspector may issue an arctic waters pollution prevention certificate; however, the certificate may be issued by an exclusive surveyor to a classification society if the ship is in non-Canadian waters before entry into the Arctic. A pollution prevention officer may board any ship to ensure compliance while it is in any zone. Ships report to the Arctic Canada traffic system (NORDREG Canada) which is based at Frobisher Bay. This system is at present voluntary but serious consideration is being given to make reporting compulsory.

The Arctic waters pollution prevention regulations stipulate the maximum liability of all ships entering the Arctic. In cases where a ship will be carrying more than 2,000 tons of oil, evidence of financial responsibility must be sent to the Department of Transport prior to the proposed voyage in Arctic waters, so that third party claims for clean-up costs or damage may be met.

B.C.—AIRCRAFT/HELICOPTERS

Question No. 198—Mr. Friesen:

1. How many aircraft/helicopters in the Province of British Columbia are (a) owned and operated (b) leased and (i) for whom are they leased (ii) from whom are they leased and at what cost, by the Flight Services Division of DOT?

2. (a) What are the base locations of each Flight Services Division in the Province (b) how many aircraft/helicopters are located at each (c) how many personnel does each have?

3. Is there a central repair base in British Columbia for such aircraft/helicopters?

4. (a) How many planes/helicopters are stationed in Prince Rupert, British Columbia (b) what is a description of them and what are their capabilities?

5. (a) How many times in (i) 1970 (ii) 1971 (iii) 1972 (iv) 1973 (v) 1974 (vi) 1975 (vii) 1976 (viii) 1977 was each helicopter, normally operating out of Prince Rupert, out of service for overhauling (b) in each case, how long was it out of service?

6. (a) What is the average length of service in the air before overhauls are completed on each type of aircraft/helicopter at Prince Rupert (b) what is the recommended time for overhaul outlined by the manufacturer of each type?

7. Does the Canadian Coast Guard use Flight Services Division transport and, if so (a) how often (b) for what purpose (c) is it under a lease or a loan contract?

8. How many hours of overtime was logged by (a) permanent staff (b) contract personnel, in the position of (i) maintenance (ii) engineering (iii) pilots (iv) managers in 1973, 1974, 1975, 1976 and 1977 on the Prince Rupert Base?

9. What was the cost of overtime payments for each position, category and for each year listed in Part 8?

10. What amount was paid to cover claims for meals for flight crews and passengers flying out of the Prince Rupert Base in (a) 1973 (b) 1974 (c) 1975 (d) 1976 (e) 1977?

11. Does the Flight Services Division operate any Sikorski 61 Helicopters out of its Prince Rupert operation and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the date of purchase/lease in each case (c) how many times since the date of purchase/lease have they been overhauled or have received major alterations up to December 1977 and what was the (i) date of each inspection/overhaul (ii) number of hours in the air of each helicopter prior to each service (iii) duration on each occasion that the aircraft was out of use due to servicing (iv) cost of each overhaul up to December 1977?

12. Did any overhaul charges on Sikorski equipment at Prince Rupert exceed $5,000 and, if so, on how many occasions and for what reason?

13. Was all of the work, alterations, maintenance, etc., on the equipment mentioned in Part 12, carried out in the Province of British Columbia and, if not (a) how many times was it done outside the Province (b) for what reason (c) where was it done in each case (d) what was the cost of ferrying the aircraft back and forth and the cost for the use of the crew (e) how long did it take to ferry the aircraft outside the province, in each case?

14. (a) Who has the contract to overhaul the equipment mentioned in Part 12 (b) does the contract holder, in turn, contract out any of the work and, if so, to whom and for what service?

15. (a) How many qualified helicopter maintenance engineers are employed by the Flight Services Division in British Columbia and where are they located (b) does each operation have certified engineers for maintenance purposes and, if not (i) for what reason (ii) which cases have been without this facility, either temporarily or on a permanent basis, in 1973, 1974, 1975, 1976 and 1977?

16. In each of British Columbia's Flight Services Division operations, how many times in (a) 1973 (b) 1974 (c) 1975 (d) 1976 (e) 1977, was there a change in the Chief Manager position and, in each case, for what reason?

17. (a) How many pilots were employed in the Prince Rupert station in (i) 1973 (ii) 1974 (iii) 1975 (iv) 1976 (v) 1977 (b) how many resigned, were transferred or left for other reasons?

18. What is the pilot/engineer ratio in the province at each of the Flight Services Division operations?

19. Is each pilot fully qualified to operate the Sikorski helicopter equipment to the fullest extent of its capabilities, from the date of purchase of the equipment or after any major alteration of the equipment located at Prince Rupert and, if not, how many are (a) qualified (b) not qualified?

20. What is the primary role of the Sikorski equipment?

21. Was such equipment used by Cabinet Ministers while travelling in British Columbia in 1974, 1975, 1976, 1977 and, if so (a) on how many occasions (b) what was the duration of each flight (c) who was the minister (d) what was the reason for each flight (e) where did each flight (i) originate (ii) terminate (f) was any other means of transportation available (g) what are the names of all the passengers in addition to the minister, in each case?

VIA RAIL—BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Question No. 210—Mr. Jones:

1. Have there been any appointments made to the Board of Directors of VIA Rail since June 1, 1978 and if so, who were they?

2. What qualifications do each of these appointees have for their respective positions? What will be the salary of each appointee?

3. Do any of these individuals sit on any other Board of Directors of any other companies and if so, delineate each.

4. Do any of the appointees have shares in VIA Rail Canada, CN Rail or CP Rail and if so, list how many shares and their value for each appointee. Do any of the appointees have shares in any other companies and if so, list how many, what company, and their value for each appointee.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): VIA Rail Canada Inc. advises as follows: 1. No appointments have been made to the Board of Directors of VIA Rail since June 1, 1978.

2, 3 and 4. Not applicable.

BARRIE—AIR CRASH

Question No. 230—Mr. Mazankowski:

Does Transport Canada's Aviation Safety Inspection Division Report No. 70102 concerning the Beechcraft B55 (Baron) air crash near Barrie, Ontario on September 7, 1977, state that all tall structures, similar to the CKVR television antenna of the Barrie crash, erected after August 1977 are to have white flashing strobe lights and, if so, what action has the government taken, or will take, to update the lighting on towers constructed before 1977?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Transport Canada's Aviation Safety Investigation Division Report No. 70102 concerning Beechcraft B55 (Baron) air crash near Barrie, Ontario on September 7, 1977 does not state that all tall structures, similar to the CKVR television antenna at Barrie erected after August, 1977, are to have white flashing strobe lights. It simply paraphrases statements made in Transport Canada Publication TP 382, Recommended Standards for Marking Obstructions.

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—LAWYERS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 250—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: None.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Question No. 480—Mr. McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria who performed services for the National Energy Board during 1977 and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): National Energy Board reports as follows: None.

*RAILINE RELOCATION STUDY FOR MONCTON

Question No. 69—Mr. Jones:

1. In regard to the Railine Relocation Study for Moncton, New Brunswick, were alternate proposals for relocation routes considered and, if so, what are the details of each proposal, including cost, name of landowner, for each respective parcel of land involved and the total land acquisition costs for each proposed relocation site?

2. (a) Which route was chosen (b) on what basis was it chosen (c) what are the names of the landowners involved and the estimated value of each parcel of land?

3. Were any of the lands acquired or to be acquired owned by Members of the Moncton City Council, Members of the Legislature of New Brunswick, public servants, any company, corporation, firm or partnership with which such persons are or were directly or indirectly related, involved or associated and, if so, what are the details and particulars of such relationships, associations or involvements?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, because of the length of the answer to starred question No. 69, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to have the answer printed in Hansard as if it had been read.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The aforementioned answer reads as follows:]

The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows:

There have been two such studies; one completed; one still in progress.

The first study, completed in 1974-75, was funded by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the New Brunswick Department of Economic Growth. Its report focussed attention on three routes that can be conveniently described as:

—the Riverside route on the north bank of the Petitcodiac River;

—the Trans-Canada north route;

—the Trans-Canada south route.

This initial study took place contemporaneously with the passing of the Railway Relocation & Crossing Act, in May, 1974. This act requires that certain transportation plans, urban development plans and financial plans be prepared by a municipality in support of any application for relocation of a railway line or facility. The original study, although of value for planning purposes, did not meet all the requirements of the new act. Therefore, the city of Moncton applied for a grant under part I of the Railway Relocation & Crossing Act, for the purpose of carrying out another railway relocation study which, this second time, would have terms of reference in harmony with the new legislation. The application was granted in September, 1977, and the study is in progress. As yet, we do not have a date for the report of this study.

The further details asked by the questioner in the latter half of paragraph 1 and in paragraphs 2 and 3 are not relevant since the study is still in progress and such questions are premature.

*SUBSIDY TO FEDERAL COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION LIMITED

[Text]

Question No. 352—Mr. Muir:

Was an application made to the government by Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited, Montreal, for a subsidy to transport goods to Newfoundland and, if so (a) what was the date of the application (b) what was the amount per ton of the subsidy (c) what was the total amount of the subsidy (d) for what period of time was the subsidy negotiated?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): In so far as Transport Canada is concerned, no such application has been received.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order respecting an item in the supplementary estimates, in accordance with procedures that have been agreed to previously. I have given notice to the Chair as well as to the House leader of the New Democratic Party and the government House leader.

My point of order is with respect to vote 30a in the External Affairs Department under the Canadian International Development Agency. It is a $1 item, something about which we have had a great deal of discussion in the past. My concern in regard to this $1 item is highlighted by the last phrase in that particular vote which authorizes to pay:

—amounts in the currency or unit of account indicated, notwithstanding that the total of such payments may exceed the equivalent in Canadian dollars estimated as of October, 1977,—

That amount is $667 million some. But this vote 30(a) is for $1, and one can see by that phrase this $1 vote grants authority to the government to exceed the amount appropriated by the main estimates of $667 million in the spring, and to exceed it by an unknown amount. One could surmise the intent of this $1 vote is that CIDA, probably for reasons of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, has exceeded the amount appropriated for it in Bill C-61 this spring and requires additional funding.

We have established procedures and practices for handling a circumstance where spending authority has been exceeded.

If there had been anticipation of that, a contingency fund could have been appropriated, or alternatively, through supplementary estimates specific amounts could be appropriated to cover the fact that sometimes spending exceeds original estimates. In this case, for reasons that I am not clear, the government chose not to appropriate the extra amount that CIDA needs, but rather has taken the route of this $1 item to grant CIDA an unlimited authority to spend, subject to Treasury Board approval. Basically they are asking parliament to grant CIDA unlimited authority.

● (1522)

This is contrary to our procedures. The procedure for raising money for government operations utilizes the estimates where full disclosure as to the details and the amounts of government spending is supposed to be declared, followed by an appropriation act which appropriates a specific amount requested by Her Majesty to fulfil the responsibilities that she has. As Your Honour has ruled in the past, an appropriation act should not be used to accomplish, for example, some other legislative purpose. I submit that it should also not be used to grant open-ended authority to spend which, in a sense, is related to legislation.

If $1 votes can be used to grant open-ended authority to spend, we can easily extrapolate to a situation where the whole procedure becomes rather farcical. Rather than lay out in detail the specific amounts that are required, the government need only put down a $1 item and use that authority to spend whatever it wants to spend. That is certainly contrary to our practices and, I might add, contrary to the very strong opinion of the Auditor General in terms of the purposes of the estimates and the intent they are supposed to achieve.

If CIDA requires more funds, and we are not aware if it does or not, the procedure for the government to follow is to request by way of supplementary estimates B, C, D or E, authority to appropriate additional funds to cover those. It is inappropriate, and I submit out of order, to ask parliament for authority to spend whatever it chooses. The government should not ask parliament for open-ended authority to spend for CIDA or any other department. It is on that basis I raise this point of order.

I have been unable to establish any precedents, in the sense that it has never occurred. I have done a fair amount of research. We have never had a situation where parliament has been asked to grant an open-ended authority to government by way of estimates and appropriations acts. It is certainly my understanding and I think that of everybody else, that an appropriation act should ask for a specific amount of money. It should not be open-ended. Vote 30a of the supplementary estimates of External Affairs asks for an open-ended authority to spend. I submit that should be ruled out of order.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on the question raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), I would like to assure him that there is no effort to seek open-ended authority, nor will the approval of this $1 item in the supplementary estimates provide any such open-ended authority. If my hon. friend will refer to the wording of supplementary estimates vote 30a, he will find it is precisely the same wording that is to be found in vote 30 in the main estimates. It is precisely the same amount of money that is provided in the main estimates.

There is a $1 item. In fact the estimate is increased from $667,049,909 to $667,049,910. The global amount is not increased. The ability of CIDA to spend a global amount is not increased. The $1 item provides within that global amount authority to make the expenditures that are listed in the explanation of requirement below vote 30a.

If the hon. member will look at the main estimates he will find there is a grant provided in the main estimates to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. This particular $1 vote will provide an increased grant to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in the amount of $750,000, but within the global amount that is contained in votes 30 and 30a.

The purpose of the $1 item is to seek the authority of parliament to make these grants to various international organizations within the global amount that is sought in the main estimates, and that is carried forward in the global amount plus $1 in the supplementary estimates.

I do not believe that in any way the wording of the vote which the hon. member quoted leads to an open-ended authority. He dealt in particular with the phrase, and I quote:

—notwithstanding that the total of such payments may exceed the equivalent in Canadian dollars estimates as of October, 1977—

That is precisely the same authority that is in the main estimates. The authority sought in that expression is to convert into other currencies, with the fluctuations in the Canadian dollar. I believe that the spending authority globally is not increased. What the $1 item does is authorize within the global amount these items that are listed. I hope it will be possible for the House to deal with these commendable items in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the minister sits down I wonder if he would answer a question. Is he telling us that in no case will the amount spent under this item, including the supplementary, exceed $667,049,910?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is what I am saying.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister then explain what is meant by the phrase in either the main estimate or the supplementary estimate "notwithstanding that the total of such payments may exceed the equivalent in Canadian dollars." Does that total of such payments mean the total of all payments, which is what I thought it meant, or does it mean the total of certain payments inside the conglomeration?

Mr. MacEachen: It means the payments within the conglomeration. As I understand it, if we made a commitment with respect to a particular program in an underdeveloped country, we would be able to implement that commitment regardless of the change in the currency in which the commitment was made.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As Your Honour will realize, I am not arguing. I am trying to get this clear. Is it in effect the right to transfer some of the money from one item for which it was estimated to another item as long as it is inside the total figure? To put my over-all question again, how does the minister square the statement, whether in the main item or in the supplementary item, that there is to be no more spent than the total that has been indicated two or three times, with the statement "notwithstanding that the total of such payments may exceed the equivalent in Canadian dollars" by that much money?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am puzzled over the very wording that the hon. member has raised for the second time. In the very short time I have had available to study the matter, and to get information, I find that expression is merely a device that has been used in the main estimates, I understand, for a long time in order to permit the government to make arrangements in foreign currencies.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps this matter ought to stand over. The difficulty the Chair has is that, on the face of it, it would appear that no greater authority is being sought by the $1 item than was in fact contained in the main estimates, and that no new legislative authority is being sought by the $1 item. Therefore, in accordance with the precedents in which I have interfered with $1 items in the past, I would say I would not interfere with this one, because it is the proper use of a $1 item to signal the reallocation of funds that are already authorized under the estimates.

Up to that point I would be prepared to accept it. However, I think we ought to satisfy ourselves currently on the meaning of the phrase about whether or not a payment under this particular authorization, either in the main estimate or the supplementary estimate, can in fact exceed the amount. That is the language which seems to trouble everybody at this point. Perhaps we might set this over until tomorrow for further clarification.

● (1532)

The complaint of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) is that the item contains an open-ended power. If the meaning of the words in the item is not to confer an open-ended power, there is evidently no problem. The minister has said that is not the intention. As long as we can clarify this, I think the matter can be closed very quickly tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL OF PUBLIC EXPENDITURES

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will note that not later than 9.45 o'clock p.m. every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings shall be put forthwith, in accordance with Standing Order 58(9).

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon) moved:

That this House lacks confidence in a government which for more than 15 years has deliberately and steadily undermined the fundamental function of the House of Commons and its standing committees by imposing rules and procedures of this House and its standing committees calculated and designed to stifle or eliminate parliamentary examination and control of public expenditures resulting in the steady destruction of the parliamentary process, and which has refused to undertake a serious review of House procedures or consider the numerous worth-while proposals for reform.

He said: Mr. Speaker, while you were reading the motion the parliamentary secretary interrupted and suggested you dispense with it. I am sure they would like to dispense totally with the opposition. It would save them a lot of trouble. We are a nuisance over on this side. They have done that in Ghana. The government there decided that the opposition was a little too vigorous, too assertive, too inquiring, so they abolished the opposition. I am sure that would be a delightful solution to all the government's critics.

This subject matter deals with the complete runaway of expenditures and the complete lack of control parliament has over those expenditures. If the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) would speak up, I will gladly entertain his questions as I go along.

Mr. Pinard: I will be speaking later. Please stay.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Nielsen: I will stay, though I doubt very much if I will learn much.

The Auditor General's Report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1976, has this to say, at page 9, paragraph 2.1.

I am deeply concerned that parliament and indeed the government has lost or is close to losing effective control of the public purse. I expressed that concern a year ago in my annual report.

At page 111, paragraph 2.8, he says:

Control over public funds would appear to have been deteriorating for at least the last 15 years.

Whatever else the Auditor General has to say in his various reports over the years, the ultimate responsibility for the gross negligence and mismanagement of this country's financial affairs must lie with the ministers on the treasury benches, one of whom we are fortunate to have with us today.

An hon. Member: Two!

Mr. Nielsen: They, and only they, are responsible, and they are to blame for embarking on a deliberate course of action which has resulted in so weakening the effectiveness of the parliamentary process as to render this place useless. I see another minister down the way. I am sorry I overlooked him, but the rate of change in the last ten years has been one and a half new ministers a month.

The same thing that has happened with respect to the effectiveness of this chamber has happened in the committees. I have been saying this, now, for some years. These changes have not happened overnight. They began with the Liberal government of the late Lester Pearson. A special committee was set up in March of 1964. It presented some 20 reports, the procedural aspects of which resulted in new provisional standing orders in 1965. One of the most important of these was that for the first time a limitation was placed on the proceedings dealing with financial resolutions. They were restricted to debate for one sitting day only and speeches were limited to 20 minutes, a far cry from the days when the opposition, then led by the late Mr. Pearson, held up estimates in the committee of the whole for 49 days.

Rule changes now began to appear which severely limited time for the discussion of supply. These were all provisional orders to be enforced to the end of the following session. At the time, of course, it was a minority government situation—there was no way those provisional orders would have been adopted had the government tried to force them.

Just before the election of 1968, which for the first time in a number of years returned a majority government, the one we are stuck with now, another series of reports was presented by the committee containing recommendations for changes in the rules which, for the most part, were imposed upon the House by this government with its comfortable majority. Procedure on supply was drastically changed. The year was now divided into three parts and the opposition was confined to a limited number of so-called allotted, or supply days, in each part. At the end of each of these three parts of the year, any supply business before the House must be voted upon—the guillotine.

Thus the standing committees which, by the change in the rules, now have all the estimates sent directly to them, are operating with a gun to their heads.

One of the more interesting provisions in these changes was that the operation of the standing committees, particularly in so far as the new procedures for examining estimates was concerned, was to be reviewed after they had dealt with the estimates for a time. That review has never taken place and under this government it is not likely to take place because it is far too inconvenient for the government in that it suffers no embarrassment simply because the opposition members on the committees examining the estimates are muzzled in their efforts to conduct a meaningful inquiry. I will come back to this in a moment.

We have, then, in this historical development, a situation where the new Liberal majority, by design, completely abolished the committee of supply. Along with that they abolished the right of the opposition to debate motions "that the Speaker leave the chair for consideration of supply." With their majority, they regiment the opposition to a restricted procedure of allotted or supply days. We must give notice of those motions, and only some of them may have a non-confidence motion attached to them.

I might digress here for a moment. They further weakened Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition by giving the right to other political parties to move motions of non-confidence, which is not in the parliamentary tradition. And, over all, there was the application of rigid time limits on debate. These developments, coupled with the abolition of appeals from Speakers' rulings, set the stage for the gradual but inevitable deterioration of the parliamentary process in controlling the public purse. The opposition is now in a straitjacket where its effectiveness in examining supply is simply non-existent.

● (1542)

That is what the Auditor General means when he says he is deeply concerned that parliament has lost, or is close to losing, effective control of the public purse. That is what he means when he says that control over public funds has been deteriorating for 15 years. These changes to our rules and procedures have, for all practical purposes, robbed us of the ability, procedurally, to reduce estimates. No wonder the Auditor General is deeply concerned. The control of the executive is now absolute. But then the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has always thought parliament to be a nuisance and that, when they leave the Hill, its members to be nobodies. The government has absolute control over time.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Tut, tut, tut!

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) says "tut, tut, tut," but I am sure he does not doubt the accuracy of these quotations. I just happen to have one with me here. I will just refresh his memory.

On July 25, 1969, the Prime Minister said:

> I think we should encourage members of the opposition to leave. Every time they do, the IQ of this House rises considerably.

That is the general attitude opposite. "Get rid of the opposition. We do not need it. It is just a nuisance." The government wants to have full control so that it can travel along untrammelled in the expenditure of taxpayers' dollars.

The Prime Minister said:

> —they are no longer honourable members—they are just nobodies, Mr. Speaker.

The government decides when we in the opposition will be permitted allotted days. The government really has been magnanimous in allowing six non-confidence motions in a year. In my view, the very life of this institution is threatened by that kind of attitude.

I said I would get back to the committees. What a farce they are in examining estimates! Any time the government members wish to do so—which is most of the time—they can stonewall in the committees. They are complete masters on those committees because of the government's majority.

The practice in standing committees has developed to the point where ministers—and, I am sorry to say, in many cases their officials—deliberately frame lengthy answers to questions put to them. This tactic, of course, consumes the time allotted to a member in a committee.

A question may take ten or 20 seconds to ask, and the answer of the minister takes the remainder of the five minutes allotted to a member. The chairman informs that member that his time has expired because the minister or his official has consumed the member's time in answering questions. The result is that we are stonewalled. No real examination of estimates is possible. No real explanations for expenditures are given. This single tactic of the government has done more to destroy any hope of success of standing committees in the examination of estimates than any other single factor. I am strongly suspicious that the chairmen of these committees actually go to clinics or meetings at which they are all instructed on how to handle themselves and us in the opposition in the conduct of committee affairs.

There are other factors which have contributed to the destruction of the committee system, which I say is now a farce. All committees are simply places where members can be kept occupied. Government members can be kept busy and out of the hair of ministers. With one or two exceptions, most government members do not even realize what has been done in this process of destruction. They are not able to compare the system with the system as it operated prior to 1963 or 1965 because they were not here then. They have nothing with which to compare the present system.

Prior to the changes, members were not cut off by committee chairmen—who are backed up by the government majority, which is the situation in all standing committees—because their five minutes had expired. A questioner was allowed to continue his or her line of questioning and thus was able to extract the necessary answers to his questions on the estimates. Now, as soon as government members sense that a line of questioning is getting close to embarrassing the government, the stonewalling begins, aided and abetted by chairmen who are, for the most part, highly partisan and just as eager to protect the backside of the government as any other government member.

For the most part these chairmen are absolute martinets in their conduct of committee affairs. There is one notable exception. I hasten to make it, and I recommend strongly to all committee chairmen, all of whom are government members, that they would do well to model their conduct as chairmen of committees after that of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), who chairs the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The tactic of the government is to control embarrassing committee disclosures by having its committee chairmen rule with iron fists.

The Auditor General has observed the lack of any effective examination of estimates by committees in several ways. I am not alone in these views. I will put on the record just a few of the observations of the Auditor General. At page 12, paragraph 2.18 of his report of March 31, 1977, he said there was no visible action to date on recommendation that the form of the estimates be revamped so information they contain would be more meaningful and useful to parliament and would be the cornerstone for a fully effective government expenditure control system.

At page 105, paragraph 6.1 of his report of March 31, 1978, the Auditor General stressed the need to improve financial information parliament receives by improving quality of information in public accounts and estimates.

At page 105, paragraph 6.3 of his report of March 31, 1978, the Auditor General said that the information parliament receives on actual expenditures must be improved: public accounts mirror the estimates, providing little additional information.

At page 106, paragraph 6.9 of his report of March 31, 1978, the Auditor General said there was a need for improved accountability. More effective monitoring of government departments by parliament would involve: greater disclosure to parliament by department of objectives; greater emphasis on realiability of information in estimates and public accounts; identification by Comptroller General of information to be provided and action to ensure its integrity and comparability; greater clarity re nature of expenditure appropriations are intended to cover.

The reports of the Auditor General are full of observations like these. At page 108, paragraph 6.18 of his March 31, 1978 report, the Auditor General said that the 1969 implementation of 15 standing committees created the need for significantly better information, which was not recognized.

With respect to expenditures, what a sad history of broken promises and deception! The Prime Minister thinks that the opposition is a nuisance. In answering a question on May 8, 1969, as recorded in Hansard at pages, 8465 and 8466, the Prime Minister said:

> Apart from the continuing steps we have taken to curtail expenditure . . . we on this side hope that in the budgetary debate, which I take it will take place in a few weeks time, . . . when we announce to the country our further expenditure cuts—

Does that sound familiar? Further expenditure cuts?

> —we will have the support not only of the opposition but also of the various sectors of the community. There will be a need for the government to introduce some very severe expenditure cuts which will hurt different vested interests in the country.

In the year in which the Prime Minister said that, 1969, total expenditures were $13 billion. Now total expenditures are over $52 billion. On February 18, 1970, as recorded at page 3728 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> I need not enlarge now on our determination to restrain federal expenditure, on which our intentions were put to the House when the estimates were tabled last week.

In that year, 1970, expenditures rose by another $2 billion, to $15 billion. Now, eight years later, expenditures are $52 billion.

On December 10, 1975—we are now getting more up to date—as recorded at page 9889 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> It is certain that in the meantime the government is very anxious to draw inspiration from the Auditor General's report and make sure that the government does improve the efficiency of its accounting procedures.

By the time the Prime Minister said that, expenditures had risen to $34 billion. They are now, only three years later, over $52 billion. On March 22, 1976, as recorded at page 11991 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

● (1552)

> —the President of the Treasury Board announced two or three months ago that the federal government would seriously try to cut its expenditures, and so we have reduced the rate of growth of the Department of Public Works and of several other departments. We have also put an end to some voluntary assistance programs, like LIP.

We might add FLIP, LEAP and a few others. He continued:

> We have reduced expenditures.

When he made that statement in 1976, total expenditures had risen to $41 billion, and two short years later, they are over $52 billion. It is little wonder that we and the people of Canada are rather sceptical of recently announced, so-called cuts in expenditures by the Prime Minister, and the setting up of a super ministry to co-ordinate programs of the brain children of the government which are running away with the tax dollars of Canadians.

At one time this House and its committees were a very real challenge, but no longer, not since the Liberals took office in 1963, and particularly not since the Prime Minister assumed power in 1968. At that time he immediately set about the erosion of the parliamentary process so that this place and its committees would not be a nuisance to him.

An hon. Member: A one-party democracy.

Mr. Nielsen: Right on. His idea of leadership is a cabinet of puppets, manipulated by him as the master puppeteer, all the strings being pulled by him. His idea is not acceptable. Eric Kierans found that out early, in 1971. He was the first to leave, and has since been followed by a long train of those who could stomach no more of it. In his decade of power, no less than 33 of his ministers have left or were booted out. In the same period, he has had a total of 64 ministers, and has changed ministers no less than 134 times. The life of the newly-appointed minister from Kenora-Rainy River may well be a very short one, terminating even before the next election.

Mr. Reid: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dawson: Do not believe him.

Mr. Nielsen: I wish him well. That averages out to 1.5 ministers per month over the period of office of the Prime Minister.

This chamber has even been rigged so that opposition is less effective. Members are turned on or off by electronic technicians up there—no offence to them—who take their cue from the Speaker. That is not my conception of free speech. That is not my conception of what this place is supposed to be all about. That is not the way it used to be here. That is the main reason for the rowdiness in this place now. We have to shout to be heard, because we cannot be heard unless the technicians turn us on.

Mr. Reid: Do you have to be turned on by somebody?

Mr. Nielsen: The new minister is interjecting, but I cannot hear him from here. But he was not here before. He does not understand how this place functioned before.

Mr. Dawson: Indeed he was here before.

Mr. Nielsen: There were no restrictions on freedom of speech in this place before.

Mr. Reid: I have been here for 14 years.

Mr. Nielsen: He was not here before the changes were made. I am speaking of the period when microphones were hanging from the ceiling, and a whole line of them had to be turned on in order to convey the sound. There was a free exchange then. Members did not have to shout to be heard. The debates were lively; there were great debates in the House. They were not controlled by the simple turn of an electronic knob up there. As a result, I say there was more freedom of speech, more lively debate, and members were attracted to the chamber to hear those debates. Now, apart from the first hour of each day, we are lucky if we have a quorum at any given time in this chamber. Looking around now, there is a bare quorum.

Mr. Dawson: There are 39.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, a bare quorum; 39 out of 282, is it?

Mr. Dawson: It is 264.

Mr. Nielsen: Approximately 264—282 the next time. Even if that is the conception of how this chamber should operate, held by members opposite, certainly it is not mine. This new system is much more conducive to the puppet syndrome of the Prime Minister.

These subtle changes have altered entirely the character and function of this place. The people of Canada are the real losers, because it is in this chamber where their freedoms ultimately will survive or perish. The restrictions and limitations on us as members—particularly opposition members because theirs is the watchdog role—which have been gradually but inexorably imposed under this government, already have deeply eroded the freedoms of Canadians who elected us to come here to do a job. We are being prevented from doing that job by an autocratic Prime Minister who is interested in power only for the sake of power, and by a weak-kneed bunch of puppets on the treasury benches, each of whom has only one thought at the beginning of each day: "My survival as a minister will depend today on how well I respond to the puppet master's string-pulling."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John M. Reid (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, when I read the motion for the first time yesterday, I was surprised at it because whoever drafted it obviously knows nothing of the procedural history of this place for the last two years. When I saw that it was the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who was responsible for it, then it was clear how it had been drafted in such a way. The hon. member shows no knowledge of what has gone on in the last two and a half years in procedural terms in this parliament.

Mr. Dawson: He is never here.

Mr. Reid: I am prepared to give him a short lesson in parliamentary procedural history over the last two years. But first I should like to look at the terms of the motion because it is one of the most totally misleading and nonsensical pieces of work which we have seen from the opposition for a long time.

In the dying days of this particular parliament I would have thought the Conservative party would have the nerve to put forward some of their policy proposals for debate. I would have expected them to put forward a motion to debate the status of Petro-Canada. I would have expected a motion to debate their mortgage proposals, to take money from the poor and give it to the rich.

Miss MacDonald: That has been decided by Toronto.

Mr. Reid: What do we receive instead? As most hon. members realize, procedure is one of the most interesting things in the House of Commons. I have never turned down an opportunity to debate procedure before, but it seems to me that this is not an appropriate time to do so. I gather the Conservative party is finding the flak a little tough as they make proposals and find them batted down.

There are a number of untruths in this particular motion. First of all, when we look at the committee system, it should be clear that there are problems with that system. Those problems apply both to members on this side and those on the other side. I should like to refer to two examples which disturb me and, I believe, the government. The first example is the fact that there was $125 million in supplementary estimates before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. That committee has not yet met.

Mr. Paproski: Shame! It is because of Otto Lang.

Mr. Reid: Last Thursday the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates attempted to meet to consider over $56 million in Treasury Board supplementary estimates. But they could not meet. Why could they not meet? It was because there was not one member of the opposition party present to fill their places.

Mr. Paproski: It was because there was a snowstorm.

Mr. Reid: Then, how did members on this side manage to get there?

Mr. Paproski: They must have slept there all night.

Mr. Reid: Not all members go home for supper at night.

The point I should like to make is that there are problems with the estimates procedure, but the problems do not necessarily emanate from the front benches of either side of this House. A lot of problems emanate from the back benches on both sides of this House. It is something which the government and opposition parties must look after, for this is not something which was imposed upon backbenchers by the government. It is something which has developed over a period of time. We should pay more attention to these things, rather than blabber on about useless motions such as the one before us today.

I am concerned about the manner in which we have proceeded with our procedural debates. The hon. member for Yukon made a totally absurd statement when he said that there has been no review of procedural changes. This is an absolute falsehood. Anybody who has been around the House of Commons for the last two and one half years and who has paid attention to what has been going on in the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, who has taken the trouble to pull out those volumes and to read them, would know what absolute bafflegab that is.

I have in my hand the proceedings of those committees. I had the honour to be the chairman of the subcommittee on the use of time. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was the chairman of the subcommittee on committees, and my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), was the chairman of the subcommittee on private members' hour. We met for a period of one year. We went to England to study their system, we had hearings, and we even met when the House was not sitting, in order to consider the reports which were worked on by these bodies.

It was no surprise to me that the members in the Conservative party, members who have paid a great deal of attention to this kind of problem, such as the hon. member for Edmonton West, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath)—none of whom are in the House at the present time—had the common sense and courtesy not to sign such a ridiculous motion.

I would like to deal with some of the charges made by the hon. member for Yukon. I am concerned about the way in which he has distorted the historical facts. I think it is clear that these reforms, when they began, did not immediately appear out of the blue. The process started with Mr. Pearson's government in 1963. It was started in 1963 because the Conservative backbenchers, under the leadership of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), were totally dissatisfied with the way in which parliament was carried on and with their particular role, and so were members on this side. When the latter became the government they decided to do something about it.

A series of committees was set up and a series of experiments was carried out, culminating in the changes of 1968 to 1969. How are those changes accepted? They were accepted unanimously, without a dissenting vote, and there was not even an "on division." Those rules were not rammed down the throats of the opposition. For those members who may not wish to accept that statement at face value, I would advise them to look at the Debates and Journals of the House of Commons for December 20, 1968. They were adopted without opposition. I will not bore the House by repeating the substance of those rules, but perhaps I should remind hon. members of the result of those rules with respect to supply.

The several standing committees in the House now spend over 500 hours a year studying main and supplementary estimates, more than twice as long as was spent under the old rules in the committee of suppy on the floor of the House. That time, even though it is not spent as well as I would like to see, is surely spent far more effectively than it was on the floor of the House. If anybody doubts that, all they need do is to go back and take a look at the debates in the good old days and contrast them with even the worst committee hearings to find that there is more substance in committees today than there was in committees of the whole in the good old days.

There has been a significant improvement. It has opened up changes which allow hon. members to be more effective, and furthermore it has given them opportunities to get away from the leader syndrome which this House has always had, and has given ordinary members on both sides a greater role to play. I think we should be grateful for that.

Nobody claims that the system is perfect. Certainly I am one of those who claims that the system is in dire need of a good shakeup. As a result, after the 1974 election, the then president of the privy council and House leader, Mitchell Sharp, took on the chairmanship of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. We undertook a number of experiments, co-operatively, with members opposite, to find out how we could change the rules to make the situation more equitable and meet some of the criticisms that had been launched by members opposite. The most important of these was to permit members opposite to call for examination selected items in the estimates to the committee of the whole—in other words, to go back to the good old days and to permit a vote on those items, to withdraw those items from the committee of supply and to bring them to the floor of the House of Commons and, if necessary, to have a vote.

By this experimental return to a part of the old procedures, we hoped to create a better focus on the business of supply and to give members a wider forum in which to bring forward to the House those items which they found to be wrong and about which they were concerned in the estimates.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), who did exactly that today. I think that it is an appropriate use of the standing committee and an appropriate use of the way in which the system ought to operate.

To return to the experiment, it was first tried in October, 1974, and was extended to the end of the second session of this parliament in 1976. The experiment was not continued because of the reluctance of hon. members opposite. There are still some bugs in the supply system, but to suggest that it is less effective than the old one is to ignore the facts.

I was not here at the time the hon. member for Yukon came into the House of Commons in 1957, but I have been here since 1963, and I am aware of how the good old days were and how the good old system operated. Having been here and having had an opportunity to absorb the old system, there was as much frustration to the other side then as there is today. I suspect that the frustration has nothing to do with what system we use to handle supply, but rather with the fact there are some members on this side of the House and some members on that side of the House, and by their performance today it is clear that the members opposite will stay opposite.

Mr. Paproski: That is what you think.

Mr. Reid: The present system provides an orderly timetable for consideration of supply, and gives ample time. However, members must prepare and organize themselves. If they go to committees unprepared, they will come away with nothing. If they do not go to committees, they will get nothing. It seems to me that they should not complain about the system under those terms. What I think we really have to deal with is the question of attitude that members bring to this place and to their work.

I am not sympathetic to members who complain that they cannot prepare themselves adequately because of the lack of staff or facilities. I would like to run through a few changes that have taken place since I came here in 1963. Nobody would call me an old man, and that illustrates the great step forward in staff and facilities that have been provided by the Liberal governments since 1963. The list I am about to give is by no means exhaustive. I first came to Ottawa in 1963 as an assistant to a minister. I was elected to the House two years after that. In those days two members shared an office, with one telephone. They had one secretary, who had a separate office, and a pool.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A typewriter in a pool, not an office.

Mr. Reid: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quite right when he says it was one typewriter for two girls.

In those days members had to pay for their long distance telephone calls, they had no weekly air tickets, they had no free passes home as they have today, the Library of Parliament had not yet begun to develop a research facility, and there was no money for caucus research, and no money for leaders' research staff. That was the good old days, and if members opposite want to go back to them, maybe we should give them some consideration. It seems to me that they would find it an extremely embarrassing situation to be in because they would not be able to carry on their functions as well as they are able to carry them on today.

Miss Bégin: Total darkness.

Mr. Reid: The minister says total darkness. Perhaps there is a faint moon in the sky as a result of these improvements.

Today most members have two offices in Ottawa staffed by three aides. Under new regulations which have just come down from the committee on members' services and approved by the Committee of Internal Economy, they can now begin to hire research staff, and members now have control over their staff in terms of what functions they will perform. Members now have a fixed budget, which was the idea that some of us were talking about back in 1966.

The library provides, in my judgment, very good to excellent research material. The caucus research offices provide very good material from a partisan point of view. If we add to this the vastly improved transportation, communication, and constituency facilities—all provided by Liberal governments over the past 15 years—there is little excuse for members to be unable to attend meetings unprepared. It is again a question of attitude. Providing vehicles for scrutinizing government extends well beyond supply procedures.

As I said earlier in response to a point made by the hon. member for Yukon, hon. members rediscover the Auditor General's report once a year, when it comes down. Hon. members realize of course, that it was the present government that introduced the Auditor General Act which greatly increased that official's powers. We also introduced the act dealing with the Comptroller General in order to bring more scrutiny to government activities.

● (1612)

These things have been done basically because the government despairs of the ability of hon. members opposite to take a significant interest in controlling the purse strings. What we have done in effect is opt for a bureaucratic solution to what should really have been part of the political process.

I regret that the government has taken this particular route, but under the circumstances I see no other choice. Hon. members opposite and hon. members on this side, I think have not paid as much attention as they ought to the question of government spending and the allocation of resources.

The other thing that I should point out is that a very important part of the function of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is its ability to control its own reference at the beginning of the session. It is one of the few committees which has the staff and which is able to probe the spending of the government. It can go to work at the beginning of the session. In my judgment, it was this government that opened those windows for members of parliament.

Let us remember as well that it was this government that made the first provision for parliament to scrutinize the exercise of delegated legislative authority. We brought forward the Statutory Instruments Act, created the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and gave it authority to engage the professional staff needed to perform its important duties. This government opened those windows.

When we speak of opening windows let us speak about the greatest window opening this government has undertaken, the radio and television broadcasting of proceedings in this chamber.

For years legislative bodies toyed with the idea of broadcasting their proceedings. Most shied away from it, after considerable study. This House, at the government's request, permitted radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings on the same basis as the written Hansard. Of all possible parliamentary reforms, this certainly must be construed as the most far-reaching. It is one thing for us to meet in public and publish a printed record, but it was a different thing when we opened the House of Commons to the television cameras and to radio. Our constituents can hear us, and we know that they watch.

I want to return now to my opening remarks on the operations of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, Mr. Speaker. It is my recollection that the first question I asked in this House after my election, was whether we could have a procedure and organization committee made up of members with less than five years' service.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You got over that.

Mr. Reid: I am now in the embarrassing position, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) points out, of having been in the House for 13 years and on those committees for 13 years, and finally of having ascended to the exalted status of chairman. I therefore want to speak with some warmth of the work done by that committee under the chairmanship of the Hon. Mitchell Sharp in the last two years.

The committee spent a great deal of its time and effort trying to come to grips with some of the points raised by the hon. member for Yukon. A series of subcommittee reports have been published in the proceedings of that committee of September 27, 1976. These are available, and if members read them they will find a large number of problems dealt with in detail.

I think I should give particular credit to hon. members opposite who worked hard on that committee. The hon. member for Edmonton West was chairman of the subcommittee on committees. The hon. member for St. John's East and I were participants in the work of the subcommittee on the use of time, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was an ex officio member of all our committees, and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlone) was chairman of the subcommittee on private members' hour.

We produced three reports, but I think we made a fundamental mistake because we took them back to our caucuses. At that point the subcommittee reports disappeared and nothing happened. I believe that members on the backbenches became very nervous when they saw the reforms on which the committee had worked. The reforms were far-reaching. They dealt with a matter that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has promoted for a number of years, that is, a regular schedule for the House so that hon. members would work a certain length of time here, and have a certain amount of time in their constituencies. We dealt with the question of finding out the legislative burden that the government wanted to put through and of giving some guarantees to the government that, if we took extra time to work in our constituencies, the legislative program would be dealt with in full. There was a whole series of reforms along these lines that would have gone a long way toward achieving the point that the hon. member for Yukon was trying to make.

I want to point out again, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Yukon was not a member of that committee and, from the content of his speech, it is apparent that the did not read the reports and certainly did not read the record of debates of that committee. I think it is a tragedy that he made the speech he did without reviewing the basic material readily available to him and to the research group of his caucus.

I want to make a number of suggestions in the closing moments of my remarks, Mr. Speaker. Specifically I want to deal with the use of time. We do not use our time very well in the House of Commons, and I do not think we use it very well in committees either. The hon. member for Yukon complained about the ten-minute rule in committee—

Mr. Nielsen: The five-minute rule.

Mr. Reid: The five-minute rule is not in the Standing Orders but is a rule which members imposed upon themselves.

Mr. Nielsen: By a government majority.

Mr. Reid: It is a rule imposed by members themselves at the request of members opposite. There is a great desire on the part of members on all sides of the House to see themselves as equal, and therefore they proceeded to make sure they had equal access to the floor of the committee. Hon. members have big egos, Mr. Speaker, but some members will have to decide to give way to other members of their party. It is clear that with the five-minute rule there cannot be an efficient, functioning committee. That means that backbenchers who make up the committee system will have to make some difficult decisions. Again, it is a question of attitude.

I have been in this House almost as long as the hon. member for Yukon, Mr. Speaker, and can recall when the House of Commons used to keep more regular hours. I can also recall when parliament basically sat part-time. A session began in February, we took a break for Easter, and returned until June. If the House sat in the autumn, that was an unusual event.

In recent years we have gone to the opposite extreme. In over 13 years in the House I have seen us adjourn for the summer on the planned date only three times—in 1967, 1971, and 1978. The leader of the House held the same post on those three occasions, but I have to temper my congratulations to him. I recall that he also held that position in 1971 when the Christmas adjournment began on New Year's Eve and there was no Easter adjournment.

If parliament is to be a year-round institution, then its members will have to organize their lives in a reasonable manner. In my judgment, this means that we will have to adopt regular sitting periods that would be extended only in cases of genuine emergency.

Let us look at the implications of this. It would put the government of the day, of whatever party, in a most awkward position. The present rules would give it no guarantee that it would be able to have a decision on its legislative program. We cannot establish a system where, on the other hand, however, the government would be able to ram a huge legislative program through without parliament giving it the proper attention. That would be unwise, and I certainly would not recommend it to the House.

In the last 15 years, experience has shown that between 50 and 70 bills must be passed and are passed each year. As a veteran member, and a minister with perhaps what is a small and controllable department, I believe that proper planning and control, from cabinet level down through the public service, could easily reduce this number to 40 or 50 bills per year. I would remind the House that the government has shown some signs of improving this in the last few years.

If a legislative program of a reasonable size is to be dealt with in a limited period of time, then planning is obviously required on both sides of the House. After all, we are all human, and if we do not have incentives to make us plan, then obviously we will not do it.

I should like to propose some things that we might consider. First of all, the rules regarding management of the time of the House should require the government to produce the great bulk of its legislative program early in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. This would enable the opposition to evaluate the bills and establish its position. This, it seems to me, would be a considerable reform. I am not talking about a list of bills—I mean the actual legislation as drafted.

Second, representatives of all parties should be able to discuss the amount of time needed for measures and agree on packaging groups of bills, or batching, if you will. We could put them into categories, for instance, major, minor, controversial, and dull, for consideration within set period of time at specified stages.

Third, some device for the government to proceed unilaterally in cases where agreement is impossible must be retained. However, my judgment, and the recommendation made by our committee on the use of time, was to head toward the British system of giving the Speaker greater authority in accepting or rejecting unilateral time limitation proposals. I am prepared to admit that we may have to seek another way because of the nature of this particular House.

Finally, I would not apply the packaging proposals to the third reading stage of major bills. It seems to me that in cases of great controversy, at the final stage the government should be willing, ready and able to take its responsibilities fully and openly. Old-fashioned closure would be the only medicine in these cases, and the government would have to take that decision along with the kudos and the problems that that brings.

The motion before us today is really an admission of failure on the part of the hon. member for Yukon who had not done his homework, had not read his debates, had not read his committee reports, and had not participated in the committee reports. The opposition is saying, through the hon. member for Yukon, that we cannot do our job, that it is the system that is to blame. Quite frankly, if I had been a minister of longer standing than I am now, I think the government could say that too from time to time. I am prepared to say that the truth lies somewhere in between. It is neither black nor white; it is probably gray. After 13 years of being enmeshed in the committee system as it has developed, I am not prepared to say it is perfect. As one of the participants in the design of some of these aspects of it, I find there is a great deal that ought to be changed, but a lot of that could be changed by the members themselves if they wish to change.

However, what I do insist upon is that we deal with the question of attitude of hon. members. There is no shortage of good ideas for reform in this place, but what there is, Mr. Speaker, is a shortage of determination on the other side to grasp the opportunities that are available to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I deal with the motion put forward by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and perhaps for a moment or two with his speech, I should like to say a few words to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid), who has just addressed the House for the first time in that capacity. I suppose it is significant in some way that a member from Manitoba should follow right after we have heard a speech given by the minister who is sometimes referred to as the minister from Manitoba.

Mr. Reid: I will look after you, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is not my identification of the minister, but it is something to be enjoyed in any case. I offer him my congratulations on his elevation to the cabinet after these 13 years, and I wish him well in the important job that has been assigned to him.

Having said a nice word or two to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, I should like to correct one impression that he gave when he talked about the package of rules that was adopted in 1968 and 1969. He went on at great length and used his finest oratory to stress the point that the package that was passed in December, 1968, was passed without a dissenting vote. May I remind him, sir, that there was a lot in that package that was very objectionable and very offensive. It was because the government withdrew portions of what had been put before the House in 1968 that the House accepted the rest of it without a dissenting vote. But one has to look at the package as a whole.

The portion that was withdrawn in December, 1968, came back in June of 1969, I believe, in the form of rules 75A, 75B and 75C, and one of those summers that my friend did not like staying here was that summer of 1969 when that remaining part of the 1968 package was debated and put through under closure. So I say to my hon. friend, do not give us the impression that the package offered in 1968 was that happily received. Part, as I say, had to be put under the closure rule which the Tories brought in back in 1913. One of the troubles around this place is that too often the Liberals take their cue from the Tories, and that was one of the times when they used that old Tory closure rule.

Having said that about the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, may I say a word about the motion and the speech made on it by the mover. I am not particularly happy with the wording of the motion. There are some things in it with which I could argue. But the heart of the motion is a complaint that this government has done nothing to cope with one particular problem, namely, the control by parliament of the finances of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That point has to be underlined and agreed with, and we certainly do agree. It is because the motion makes that criticism of the government and calls for a vote of non-confidence in the government over that point that we shall be voting for this motion when the vote is called at 9.45 tonight. As I say, some parts of the motion do not interest me that much and I can leave them for another occasion. I can also say that I do not agree with all of the things which the hon. member for Yukon has said in his speech. In particular, I find it difficult to go along with his notion that the good old days were so wonderful and it is only the Liberals that have done damage to this institution. I want to say, and perhaps I shall come to this in a little more detail in a moment or two, that I think it is a better place today than it was in the so-called good old days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My two friends who have spoken ahead of me have vied with each other as to which one of them was in a position to talk about the good old days. But they are only talking of 13, 15 or 20 years of being around here. I first visited this place as a teen-age student, 54 years ago and first came here as a member 36 years ago.

Mr. Reid: I bow to you, sir.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So I do know a bit about the good old days. Mind you, I am going to divide what I have to say about the good old days into two parts. I am going to assert that things are better now than they were then, but there is one respect in which they were better many years ago. Perhaps I might indicate some of the things I think have made this place a better institution than it used to be.

● (1632)

My friend from Yukon told the hon. member across the way that he did not remember the days before the microphones hung from the ceiling. He said in those days there was more freedom of debate. Well, I can go back to the days when there were no microphones at all in this place.

Mr. Broadbent: There were no lights.

Mr. Reid: Those are the good old days I want to go back to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You had to be heard by the sound of your own voice. Many members tried it once and did not try again. I notice now that if the electricity goes off this place comes to a standstill.

When I first came here, I sat in the back row. There was no electronic equipment of any kind. I had to be heard by the sound of my own voice. It was nicer for some of us. In our party we all seemed to have good voices. At least we had lots of nerve, or whatever it took, and we were all participants. However, the two old parties seemed to have 25 or 50 mil-quetoasts. They would make one speech in the session and find it so difficult to be heard that they gave up. That was fine for us.

We did not get caught in these quotas as to time. We were able to make all the speeches we wanted to make. But I think this is a better parliament because there is more participation. It is better not just because of television but because of the microphones that were brought in here. That innovation made more of a change in parliament than anything I have seen since I have been here, even more than television. Once the microphones were brought in, they produced an equality in terms of being heard. From that day on, the participation by all members has increased greatly. In that sense, it is a better place than it used to be.

In terms of the rules, we have made a number of changes which make this a better place. I like what we did with regard to statements by ministers which we used to call statements on motions. That is not the correct term now. It is statements on statements.

In the old days, every time a minister made a statement there had to be an argument as to whether anybody had a right to reply and, if so, how many. There were no questions. We resolved that. We provided, by rule, that when a minister makes a statement one spokesman from each party can reply and there can be a question period. It may have reduced the number of statements that are made, but the handling of those statements is much better under the present rule than it was under the old.

The institution of "the late show" was beneficial to the operation of this place. Under the old system, members got put down when their questions were out of order. They had to wait for months for some grievance spot to raise something. With the institution of "the late show," if a member is not satisfied with an answer in the question period, it is possible to get on one of nine spots during the week after ten o'clock. I have noticed in changes in the rules that have been made since "the late show" was introduced that it has not been abolished. I think the Chair likes it as well. Mr. Speaker knows that if he puts a member down, that member has a right to get on "the late show".

We have improved our handling of legislation by the method of sending bills, with the exception of tax bills, to a standing committee, then establishing as we did the report stage. Back in the so-called good old days, all bills were dealt with here in committee of the whole. On occasion we would send a bill to a committee. If we did that, when it came back to committee of the whole, we went over it again. Usually members on the standing committee learned something about the bill while it was in progress. When it came back to committee of the whole, they could talk longer than if it had not been to the standing committee. I can give you chapter and verse. It happened quite often.

We now send bills to a standing committee, but we have the report stage here. At the report stage we do not have every clause called as we did in the old committee of the whole set-up. Instead members have to put down their amendments to specific clauses in the bill. In other words, the rights of hon. members who are not on the standing committee are reserved. They can deal with the parts of the bill they are concerned with here on the floor of the House.

In many of these respects, this place has improved. The introduction of television and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of this House is good. We get a lot of complaints. One of the biggest complaints last year was that people did not like the desk thumping. The Tories have tried to correct that by applauding, using their hands. We will have to wait a while to see what the Gallup poll says as to which people like, thumping desks or clapping hands.

The odd thing is that even though people criticize parliament from what they see over television, they seem to want more of it. The broadcasting people tell us there is more and more demand for the question period and other parts of this show to appear over television. I am told it even upstages some of the soap operas during the day. That did not happen in the good old days. I think this is good.

I could go on. I welcome the points that the hon. member across the way made about the opportunities of the facilities that are made available to members to do their job. When I came here, we were given a railway pass which we could use as often as we wanted. We still get it. We got our berth and meals, our expenses for making trips home by train. How often? Twice a year. Now we get 52 air trips a year. Don't tell me about the good old days.

Mr. Broadbent: They were the good old days.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In one sense they were. We were not expected to be travelling all over the country all the time.

The free printing, the free telephone, constituency offices, and all the other things that members have had provided to them in order to do their job are a hundredfold better than they were in the so-called good old days.

I must not spend all my time in this way. As I say, in most instances, it is a better parliament now than it was 36 years ago. I look forward to its being a still better parliament in 36 years from now for any of us who may still be here. There is one respect, and I come to this because it is at the heart of this motion, in which I think we did do a better job, not in what my two predecessors referred to as the olden days, but in the olden days to me, back in the forties and fifties. That is with regard to estimates.

Those were the days when all estimates were dealt with in committee of supply. There were no time limits. We used to have long debates, even to get the Speaker out of the chair to get into committee of supply. Those were grievance occasions. However, every estimate had to be dealt with in committee of supply.

Some members who go back a few years may recall an interim period when we dealt with estimates here. However, there was a time limit. The result was a minister stood or sat over there and heard his estimates discussed. He did not worry about them. He knew they went to the bottom of the list and, when the last day came, they were called without further discussion.

Back in the old days when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) sat in the gallery and watched the show, young boy that he was in those days, there was no time limit. Members could deal with estimates as they wanted. Sometimes when you got to a time when it looked as though they were going to go through and you started to slide down the estimates, and calling them one by one and passing them, all of a sudden John Blackmore would get up and we would spend a couple more hours on them. Maybe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would do the same. The result was we could hold ministers at bay, saying they could not get their estimates until they gave us some satisfaction on some point. I think it was better.

Some members may ask why we changed it. We changed it because we had to do so. The amount of money that parliament had to deal with had multiplied manyfold. The amount of things in which parliament got involved was extended considerably, everything in the social security field, the science field, and international affairs.

There are all kinds of things that parliament is in today that we did not have in the old days. If I may speak from my own experience as one interested in a field all members know about, there was no Department of National Health and Welfare. Before the days of my good friend across the way, and thank God we have it and have her—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was just to embarrass her. In those days, old age pensions were an item in the estimates of the Minister of Finance. When did we get to that item? Usually in the last two or three days of the session.

There were no family allowances. Earlier than that, there was no unemployment insurance, no guaranteed supplement, no Canada Pension Plan, and no health estimates of any kind. The point I am making is that things which are now the responsibility of a very large department, the Department of National Health and Welfare, just weren't there.

Because the number of things we were involved in became so extensive, we reached the point at which we realized we could not go on giving unlimited time to every item in the book. So parliament experimented. For a while we experimented with the idea of a certain number of days, something in the order of 30 or 35 days. Well, that seemed sensible. It was not many fewer days than we had been taking previously. But once we had started it we found it didn't work because the minister would sit there and let his estimates be discussed for a day or two days at the most, and that would be all. He didn't have to satisfy anybody. He knew that on the thirty-fifth day or whenever it was, his estimates would be called and would be passed. So that did not suit.

There was also a period when we had a committee on estimates. We tried that for two or three sessions. It didn't work very well either. In 1968 we came up with this idea of sending the estimates each to an appropriate committee and getting them off the floor of the House altogether. I do not think it is working. My friend across the way doesn't defend it either. We just haven't found a solution to the problem of parliamentary control over the spending of moneys in this place. I think we have to stay with it until we do, and I think it is perfectly proper that the House should vote non-confidence in the government for not having come up with a solution to this problem. Don't tell me it was in the package that was produced a year or so ago, because it wasn't.

I do not presume, after all this, to say I have the answer, but I know there are some things that should happen. The estimates should be given to us in much greater detail. The block global figures we get do not mean a thing to us. In those good old days there was more detail. You could find the matter you wanted to talk about by going through the book. The book was a lot thinner then than it is now, but there was a lot more in it.

The other thing we should try, bearing in mind that even in this modern age there are still only 12 months in a year and that there is not time to deal with everything in detail, is a selective arrangement whereby in each year during which parliament sits we could deal with four or five departments only. The government should not know in advance what those departments are; it should be the right of the opposition each year to say which departments will be called. And if we had to reduce the number from five to four, to three or what have you, so that we can deal with those departments on the floor of the House, without time limit, I would say we should make that decision. The part of the old system which did work was that the House could hold the minister at bay until he either corrected an estimate, dropped it, or gave a satisfactory answer.

I think the reason the Auditor General is in a position to say the kind of things he said in his recent report is because the way we handle our estimates today is really a farce. I have said this in the context of having been frank enough to say that I think many of our rules have been improved. But on this score we are so far from reality that we might almost as well drop the consideration of estimates altogether.

It is on that basis my colleagues and I are prepared to vote for this motion, as an expression of non-confidence in the government for not having found a way to cope with the estimates. I do not want to be viewed as one who is criticizing what has been done without having an alternative to offer. I would be happy to listen to other suggestions, but most of those who have thought about this subject think more or less along this line—I believe the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations does. As a matter of fact, he may have been cribbing a bit from some of my ideas when he proposed the same general approach to legislation.

I have suggested many times that the government should be required at the start of a session to list all the bills it proposes to bring in, that there should be a conference among the representatives of the parties, that the bills should be categorized as important, semi-important, unimportant or unnecessary, or dull, as the minister called them. Then we should reach agreement as to time limit on the bills that are unimportant and so on.

I see that you are looking at me, Mr. Speaker. Would you pardon me for a moment. I had forgotten we were limited to 20 minutes; I was thinking of 30. I shall wind up right away.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is strange around here, the things to which you can get agreement.

An hon. Member: Turn off the lights and mikes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the mikes are turned off, Mr. Speaker, I still know how to speak up. I think things that are important and serious should be debated without time limit, but the unimportant should be got through, and in the same vein I come back to estimates and say we should find a means whereby we deal each year with three or four or five departments picked by the opposition, and give them the works.

I must sit down, Mr. Speaker. I should just like to say that, important as I believe procedure to be, it is not the whole problem around here. A large part of the problem has to do with attitudes, with confrontation; another problem is lack of substance in the legislation the government brings forward. We could have the best rules in the world, but with a government which will not cope with unemployment or inflation, well, where are you? Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me this extra minute or two.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this motion. My remarks will be brief because the cold I caught prevents me from speaking for too long.

At the outset, I wish to congratulate the Progressive Conservative party for having moved this motion, not because I support it in every respect but because it gives us an occasion to address ourselves to certain issues and draw the government's attention to some questions which are of an immediate interest to us. Of course, the motion blames the government for having "undermined the fundamental function of the House of Commons and its standing committees by imposing changes in the rules and procedures of this House and its standing committees calculated and designed to stifle or eliminate parliamentary examination and control of public expenditures resulting in the steady destruction of the parliamentary process." Naturally, like any motion, it is put in a rather strong way, but it gives us an opportunity to deal with matters which we cannot consider in other circumstances. It goes without saying that it is difficult for this government as it was for any previous government to give satisfaction to everybody, politically speaking. We must realize that ours are political formations which are generally more concerned with making political gains than with administering the country properly. I feel this is the first area for which we can heap reproaches on one another, and that we should make a concerted effort to think more of the people we are here to serve, rather than of those who are likely to cast their votes in our favour.

● (1652)

I should like to deal first with the inadequate time planning and distribution in the House. The government seems to operate in a haphazard way, especially in the planning of the legislation which is to come before the House. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) remarked a while ago, it would be very useful—I do not think I am asking for the impossible—if at an early stage of a new session we could obtain the list of the main bills, leaving out all secondary bills, in their order of introduction in the House, which would make it possible for us to really get ready to debate them. I suggest that this would reduce time spent in discussions. What procedure are we using today? Early in the session, the government appears to be somewhat at a loss as to the bills it wants to introduce. For the first months that went on to such an extent that some days, quite frankly, the government would find it impossible to keep hon. members, busy so unpredictable was the businss of the House, not only for this year but I am referring to the 16 years I have been here. So much so that the government would be embarrassed after we had discussed a bill so rapidly that they had nothing left for us to do the day after.

I think that with perfect planning for every day of the session, those minor, unimportant bills—since among the 30 to 40 bills we might pass during a session there are always 20 to 25 which are rather unimportant and that is why we call them minor—could be deferred till the end of the session. But it is the contrary that happens. Indeed it is at the beginning of the session that all those minor bills are put before us whereas major pieces of legislation are reserved for later on, those precisely we would like to discuss a little longer. But no, they are introduced when we are in a hurry, ten days before the end of the session and particularly before holiday breaks. Yes, just before holidays they would push four, five or six bills and sometimes even some which had never been presented during the session.

They would be presented to us four or five days before the end of the session and we had to adopt them unless we wanted to be deprived of vacations. We were like schoolchildren threatened by the teacher to forgo holidays if they did not do their homework. Well, I think this is not a very serious attitude for any government. The government should think more, give more precise direction to its efforts and be convinced that it is dealing with mature people who come here to do their work, but who must do it as well and as fast as possible in order to give more time to their riding. This question has been raised on numerous occasions. In the 16 years I have sat here, Mr. Speaker, I think we never had enough time to work in our constituency. At Christmas and Easter, we only have a few days—barely enough to get things going—and then we have to get back here. Moreover, summer periods have often been shortened. I have always maintained in this House that an hon. member should at least spend three months in his riding because his work in this regard is not only here but also in his riding. He must meet his constituents to explain to them the government policy.

When the House sits 11 months out of the year, how can one be expected to spend two or three months in his riding? That point should be studied and improvements should be made. Here is the second point, namely the way in which the government introduces bills, and here I am thinking of omnibus bills. One never heard of omnibus bills when I first came here. They came along with the election of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). What is an omnibus bill? Everyone knows it is a bill which deals with a little of just about everything, in which abortion, firearms and hanging can all be mixed up. I say that type of bill should never have existed. It is used to force the opposition into passing bills, parts of which it objects to, but which it cannot refuse to pass because in so doing it would also deny passage of provisions it agrees with. Those are premeditated bills, but they are unfair to the people in the sense that when abortion is being discussed, abortion alone should be dealt with; when firearms are being discussed, they alone should be the topic of discussion. Let us vote on firearms, let us discuss firearms, but let us not mix firearms with abortion. Come on! They do not concern the same type of guns at all! That is why I say a clear distinction must be made between topics, each one of which should be dealt with in a separate bill. That question has often been brought up in the House, but nothing ever changed, and with every new session, we are being faced with new omnibus bills. Packages are made which contain things we do not want; but we have to accept the works, if we want to pass what we agree with in the package. I think it is unfair both for hon. members and the people.

I should like to bring up a third topic. I said I would be brief but I should like to say one word about the sittings of the standing committees. For a long time now, requests have been made—and for a while I believe those requests were met—to the effect that standing committees never sit during the sittings of the House for the simple reason that, in the case of a party like ours, with only eight members, when two are sick, of the six left, if three or four standing committees meet while the House sits, no one is left to attend the sitting of the House. We have to stay here. The others are in committee. I find it unfair. The major parties can manage all right, but a small party cannot, Mr. Speaker. Even in the major parties, some members would like to sit on committees, or at least listen to the discussions, but they cannot go. If these committees sat when the House is not sitting, everything would be fine. That went on for a few years, but we have gone back to our old habits, and it is still with us today that habit of sitting at the same time as the House. The number of sittings is also stepped up, probably because the fewer members there are, the quicker it goes. I do not know, but if those standing committees are unwanted, why are they not simply abolished. I find that standing committees are a good thing. That is where we can seriously study the legislation, ask the questions we want, but at least give us the chance to attend the discussions.

Finally, there is the matter of uncontrolled expenditures. I sit on the public accounts committee and I have heard some pretty good ones on that topic. And this has been going on for years, it did not start this year. Some people feel that what is going on there this year is scandalous. I have been seeing things like that for 16 years. The government seems to remain speechless, unconcerned in front of this. At first, they listen to the criticisms made by the Auditor General, then they lose interest. I would even go further, when the Auditor General does too much, they replace him.

It seems to me that since we do have an Auditor General, we should listen to the advice he gives to the government. Officers can make mistakes, that is understandable, but errors costing $1 billion, $1½ billion or $2 billion must be looked into. Take this year, for example, they are introducing budget after budget, however budgets are becoming a practical joke. They present a budget for $47 billion with a $14 billion deficit, then they borrow $17 billion: $7 billion to reimburse old debts and $10 billion to pay for what is coming. What? We do not know. It becomes a childish game. I think we shall have to take action to try to improve our control over the expenditures of the country if we cannot stop that flow of expenditures, unauthorized expenditures, expenditures which are such that even people in the department have the surprise of their lives. Even the minister in his own department had the surprise of his life. We should ask the House to try to do something, not simply receive the report of the Auditor General and criticize it. We are there in committee, and we criticize the report of the Auditor General; we do not listen to the Auditor General's criticism, we do not take any action afterwards. I am sure that no action will be taken afterwards. If it goes on like that, it is useless for the Auditor General to come and table his report. It is useless to try to examine new methods to control expenditures.

Finally, it is said that in the past the Speaker's decisions used to be appealed. Today no appeal can be lodged. They say that it is an amendment. There has been a development, since we are no longer in a position to appeal. It is unfortunate, but I think that no appeal against the ruling of the Speaker should be allowed, because some time ago, when appeals against the rulings of the Speaker were authorized, I do not know how many useless votes were taken to harass the Speaker. I think the Speaker's task is difficult enough as it is. I think it was advisable to pass that regulation. We must acknowledge it and as long as we have some means to observe the proprieties it will be a good thing, because the people are watching us in the House and we hear criticisms every day. Do you know the people feel that the most striking feature of the House is the decorum. Well, I wish to keep that image before the public, that image of respectability given by the members who appear as responsible individuals who, in the interest of the people, want regulations to act freely as true administrators.

[English]

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I listened with attention to the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), and the reply of the hon. Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid). I must say that nothing indicates the problem facing parliament and Canadians today more than the motion of my colleague, which perhaps can be termed a brutal motion, and nothing illustrates one of the attitudinal causes of the problem we are struggling with today more than the reply of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. I hope the view he has through his rose-coloured glasses of this problem works with the extreme responsibility recently given to him by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

The minister mentioned that the government had taken very positive steps toward correcting the situation faced by Canadian taxpayers today, through the introduction of the Auditor General Act and the introduction of legislation to establish the office of Comptroller General. If it were not for one of the most political apolitical Auditors General we have ever had, with his tremendous abilities to identify issues, and to visualize and put in place corrective measures, I doubt very much if the Auditor General Act would be in place today.

A key complaint which the Auditor General has had since he took office is the fact that there was not a chief financial officer in charge of systems and control. It was his persistence which forced the government to bring in legislation establishing the office of Comptroller General. It would be most unfair of me not to recognize the debt all of us owe the former president of the Treasury Board for his effort on behalf of Canadian taxpayers in getting that chief financial officer into place. I respect the efforts he put forth.

Turning to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), there was nothing as nostalgic as his remarks. The mover of the motion has been here 21 years, and he spoke of the old days. The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations has been here approximately 13 years, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been here for 36 years. Now the House will hear from a member who has been here only 4.5 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: It might be of some good to understand why I am here. I am from the small business community, and I am here because I was outraged at the lack of care and attention given the tax resource, to which I was making a donation, by the federal government.

As mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the issue is parliamentary control over the tax resource. Parliament has lost control over the tax resource. The remarks of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations in no way hide that basic issue.

I should like to refer to a statement contained in section 1.29 of the 1978 Auditor General report where it is asked why serious managerial weaknesses continue to persist, even after years of conscientious effort to overcome them. That is an indictment of the system, and very little can be said in defence of it. That is the challenge which faces all members sitting in the chamber today. Approximately $50 million is being spent on internal audits within the system, and we are getting absolutely nowhere. Internal audits have had no status and have not had access to senior managers or deputy ministers of departments. This was pointed out in 1975, and it was agreed to by Treasury Board and the government at that time. Again the 1978 Auditor General report indicated that nothing has happened in this essential element of management within the system.

Over the past 15 years since the Glassco commission, government expenditures have risen from $7.3 billion to $42.8 billion, which is an increase of 487 per cent on an adjusted basis. In 1962 the Glassco report made two important and key recommendations. First, it recommended a decentralization to departments of responsibility for financial management and control. The second recommendation was putting in place a counterbalancing of controls in the Treasury Board. This was recommended also in the 1975 and 1976 reports of the Auditor General. The latter recommendation of the Glassco commission was never implemented. In fairness, as the 1978 Auditor General report pointed out, even if a Treasury Board counterbalance of controls had been implemented, it is somewhat doubtful that better organization and procedures would have been able to cope adequately with the rapid rise in the level of government expenditures.

Section 1.29 of the Auditor General's report, to which I have already referred, draws to our attention the continuing problem which we face, but nothing seems to be happening in spite of the best efforts we can put forward. I need not remind hon. members that the Auditor General is an office of parliament. Attitudes of senior departmental officials have not been conducive to wise and prudent use of taxpayers' money.

The following are some quotes from the 1978 Auditor General's report:

> Departments generally assume that it is their money . . . A set of values has been developed where the emphasis is on conceiving and developing new programs . . . Management of human and financial resources has been significantly less important to them—

As value for money considerations in management faded, personal accountability for the Canadian taxpayers' dollar seemed to expire. As a result we now have an attitude where nobody within the system seems to care about the net waste of resources.

Here is another quotation from the Auditor General's report:

> During the period of rapid expansion in the government, it appears that the public purse was gradually deemed virtually bottomless and that access to it was not unduly restricted for the ingenious.

That is a terrible indictment of the system. The system puts more emphasis on developing policy initiatives and new programs than on the principles of well established practices of economic efficiency and effectual resource management. That is what the report is saying and why the need was created. Thanks to the former president of the Treasury Board the position of Comptroller General has been established, whereby we can perhaps bring about some corrective measures to a very seriously ill system.

During these 15 years the government has become the principal supplier of a growing number of services such as health care, education, and pensions. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has mentioned this. It has assumed major responsibilities in the area of direct income transfer payments. In addition, we have found this government increasingly intruding into the private sector, with more and more of the means of producing goods and services being controlled by the state. This expansion of programs and services has caused a massive increase in public sector expenditure.

During this period of rapid expansion and development of new programs, the federal government has failed to implement acceptable standards of control and accountability within the system. Taxpayers in the private sector, who are accountable at all times to the tax collector, quite naturally assumed that some degree of accountability would exist over the tax spenders. In the thirtieth parliament the examination of the Auditor General's report by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts has shown that the financial management and control of the tax resource by the federal government, its departments, agencies and Crown corporations, has been significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

In addition of the failure of the government to implement the second key recommendation of the Glassco commission, other fundamental causes for the present conditions can be identified. The cash base method of appropriating funds and accounting for them has encouraged a degree of gamesmanship to develop within the system which works against good resource management and accountability. One merely has to work diligently on the committees to watch the gamesmanship that is exercised against the members of this House. An increasing reliance on post audit procedures for control and performance measurement has emerged and can be largely attributed to parliament's failure to put in place a system of satisfactory examination of the estimates and a meaningful control over supply votes. A further condition which can be identified is that the isolated work experience of the public servants has separated its processes and values from those found in the private sector.

One might ask how does one get their arms around $50 billion, or how does one tackle this huge problem? I think that within the answer to the question lies the challenge of the public accounts committee. In the thirtieth parliament the public accounts committee has gained a grasp of the problem and is in the process of adjusting its approach to meet the challenge ahead. The public accounts committee is doing a moderately good job with regard to the Auditor General's report, but it has failed completely in its responsibility to undertake proper examination of the public accounts of Canada. Unfortunately, it has neither the time nor the staff to meet this mandate.

It is essential to the parliamentary system that the performance of the Auditor General be continuously appraised by the public accounts committee. It is also essential that government departments, agencies and Crown corporations, continue to have the public accounts committee forum in which they either defend their positions, gain publicity for their needs, or report that corrective measures are in place. Only with this type of public examination can the faults within the system be corrected and the interests of the already overburdened taxpayer be protected.

In his 1978 annual report at paragraph 1.43, the Auditor General describes three of the important pillars supporting economical, efficient and effective management. These are essential to the process ahead of us, and I would recommend that all hon. members read that section. It is the foundation upon which progress from this point on has to be made. Unfortunately time does not allow me to expand on that particular section of the report.

As we mature from the horror-story approach to assuring the implementation of the three pillars in section 1.43 of the Auditor General's report, I would like to say a few words on the challenge facing the public accounts committee. Members who have examined the last four reports of the committee should be aware of the challenge facing the committee of the change that is taking place and the quality of their work. The government-wide issue approach of the Auditor General demands a new approach and a new quality of performance, or we risk losing all potential benefits from the tremendous energy and talent that is behind the Auditor General's report. Parliament must examine, must understand the issues, and must create a pressure cooker for those elements in the system that resist coming to heel and being accountable.

The public accounts committee is the only window through which parliament can examine the economic, the efficiency, and the systems ability to deliver effectiveness. Within this area, the public accounts committee will have its hands full on government-wide issues alone. There is a new standard demanded of its members, who even now must attend briefing sessions before going to the meetings. The detailed examination of departments, agencies and Crown corporations, and the cyclical comprehensive audits that are ahead, will have to be undertaken by other committees of the House.

There is just no time for the public accounts committee to handle that aspect of the Auditor General's report. It will require a new type of research which, I believe, will have to be provided by a fortified research arm of the public accounts committee, and as we come to it, by the research arm which will study the estimates. A new strong committee, similar and parallel to the public accounts committee, will be necessary to study the pre-expenditure end of the continuum.

With pressure of examination on at the beginning of the spending process and with the pressure of a strong, well-armed post expenditure audit committee, at the end, I believe that the attitudes, behaviour and the management within the system can be turned around. I have been honoured to be sitting as the chairman of the public accounts committee through the third session of this thirtieth parliament, and now into the fourth session. I have become sensitive to some of the weaknesses which exist within that committee. It is an essential arm of this body and is needed to bring about some of the changes in attitudes and accountability which we face. We have to face the fact that the committee is controlled by the government, with membership based on the seats held by parties in the House of Commons. There are 11 government members, seven members of the official opposition, one member of the New Democratic party, and one member of the Social Credit party.

● (1722)

The steering committee has become a very important arm in the effective operation of the main committee as it deals with planning, study, and report writing.

The committee has a tremendous load with which to cope. It handles the Auditor General's report and has only been able to get to the public accounts of Canada on one occasion. It has to fight for its blocs within the bloc system of this House. That is an annoyance that the committee could do without, particularly when dealing with matters of the magnitude outlined in the 1978 report.

There are ways in which the committee should be strengthened, and I hope I will have time to put some suggestions on the record, Mr. Speaker.

A permanent research staff should be assigned to this committee under the direction of the chairman, free and clear of redirection by the director of research of the Library of Parliament. Recently I was trying to get research material ready for a meeting and found that our staff had been given assignments by the Library of Parliament. This was unknown to me when I was trying to get ready for the meeting.

Professional people should be assigned to the committee from time to time from the Auditor General's office on the basis of need. I think this is essential if we are to handle the subject in which the committee is now involved.

The committee should have a budget to cover investigational needs which occur from time to time. I offer the example of the AECL report and the committee's inability to complete its investigation into that important matter.

The official opposition should assign a research officer to serve the specific needs of members of the opposition who really carry the initiative within the committee.

Members of the public accounts committee have a tremendous burden of low-profile work. This causes some attendance problems and these must be dealt with. A high degree of dedication is required of the members who serve on that committee. I think we should find ways of improving the prestige of those hard-working members either through more public exposure, television coverage of the proceedings, or pay for the work.

The alternative would be for members to sit as a jury and allow experts, such as counsel and other highly qualified people, to examine the professional witnesses from the various departments who appear at the committee. Members of the jury should have the right to ask supplementary questions posed by counsel.

There are basically two approaches, Mr. Speaker. First, increase the research facilities for members participating in the committee and give them the incentive to serve, or second, put in place highly professional counsel to handle the detailed subject matter and allow hon. members to sit as a jury responsible for writing or approving the report prepared by staff.

I have said before, in the presence of the Auditor General, the Comptroller General, and to the Niagara Institute, that if we cannot turn around this "don't give a damn" attitude to the nation's tax resource, and impose accountability on the system, then I believe this form of government will become unstuck. This is too great a threat to our freedom for us to allow it to happen. That is why I implore parliament to make an all-out effort to strengthen the resources of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and put in place a committee equally well-armed to examine the expenditure part of the process.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay tribute to my colleagues who have worked so many hours in the performance of their duties on the steering committee. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) has been a stalwart member from the government side, the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre) has been a very strong member, the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) brought her abilities, and there were my colleagues, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). I think the House should note the long hours of work they contributed to that committee.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on the motion of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), I appreciate that the order of speaking gives me the opportunity to follow the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), who has been a very credible chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lefebvre: I agree with a lot of the things he said. I believe that this debate has taken a vein which is rather surprising. Members who have spoken have avoided going after or for scare headlines. We all know the importance of this motion, and we must congratulate the hon. member for Yukon for bringing it to the attention of parliament. I shall limit my remarks to those aspects of the motion which relate to parliamentary examination and control of public expenditures.

There is no doubt that we, as parliamentarians, have a duty to examine the expenditures of the federal government on behalf of our constituents, but we sometimes question how a private member can accomplish this awesome task. Some of the members who have already spoken have touched on the points that I shall address, but I believe they are worth repeating.

In the time that I have been a member of this House—that is not 54 years as indicated by a member of the NDP but a mere 13 years—there is no doubt that major changes have occurred in government expenditures, legislation and programs. An even heavier burden has been placed on members of the House, as a result. The duties of a member are becoming more complicated all the time. Priorities must be set on the matters to be dealt with within the time available in order for a member to participate fully. It must be remembered that a member also has to be available within his constituency.

Even though members now have a minimum of three assistants in their parliamentary office and one in the constituency, I have yet to meet a member who feels there is more time available now than there was 13 years ago when I came here and had only one assistant. In the parliament before that there was just one assistant for each two members of parliament. I have not yet encountered anyone with a solution to this problem.

The hon. member for Capilano has recognized that this government has brought in many new programs and budgets which enable us to have more help in all aspects of our work, including committees. All parties now have their own research staff. Perhaps better use could be made of these very highly qualified people. The government has also brought in legislation giving new and wider powers to the Auditor General to pursue subjects which he thinks important to parliament, and to bring them to the attention of parliament. An increased budget enables the Auditor General to hire additional competent and qualified personnel, as well as consultants on a contract basis.

On more than one occasion the Auditor General has stated that the changes introduced by this government have put this country in the forefront of the western world in many fields. Legislation introduced by this government established for the first time the office of Comptroller General. A very highly qualified person was appointed to the position, one who was successful in the private sector and who has been universally accepted. His presence has already been felt, and major reorganizations are taking place within departments and agencies of government. Plans are under way to have staff available in each department to act in a similar capacity. Senior financial officials within each agency or department will report directly to him on problems which arise because accounting principles have not been adhered to faithfully.

How has the Auditor General reacted to these changes? I would like to refer to his statement to the public accounts committee the day he tabled his latest report, November 23, 1978, where at page 3 he speaks about comprehensive audits comprising items 1 to 5, being financial controls, reporting, attesting and authority, management controls and EDP controls. At page 4 he says:

> Comprehensive auditing does not imply five different audits, each dealing with one of the components reflected in the FRAME concept. To be effective there can be only one audit of each entity. Although the criteria established for each component must be different, a uniform and integrated approach to audit planning, execution and reporting is necessary.
> Comprehensive audits for governments and other publicly funded organizations should possess certain characteristics. They should be: Constructive—Reporting findings both negative (with recommendations to remedy deficiencies) and positive (where the situation so warrants).

> Co-ordinated—dovetailed with the work of internal audit groups and other external auditors where reliance on their work is relevant and warranted.

His report goes on to say:

> The new comprehensive audit approach has been adopted for the 1978 Annual Report—the Centennial Report of the Audit Office. Five years have been devoted to its development. Several government-wide special studies (Financial Management and Control Study . . . Computer and Information Systems Evaluation . . . Study of Procedures in Cost Effectiveness (SPICE)—

SPICE is a word that all of us will be familiar with within the next few months, if we are not already. The Auditor General goes on to say concerning SPICE:

> —have contributed significantly to its concept and to its underlining methodology. More—much more—needs to be done. But a good start has been made to produce a manual of comprehensive auditing procedures for the use of our professional staff and to develop an advanced course of instruction for all levels of professional practitioners.

I have quoted the words of the Auditor General because I think it is important in the debate today to demonstrate that there are some positive developments and that the horror stories make up a very small part of his book. It is important that we take a higher plane than that and I am happy that most speakers who have entered this debate so far have done this.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to read a few passages from the evidence given by the Auditor General of Canada at the November 23 sitting of the public accounts committee. Here are a few paragraphs taken from issue no. 5 on page 5.13:

> MR. LEFEBVRE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My question is directed to Mr. Macdonnell. On page 6 of your statement to the committee, second paragraph, you say:
>
> In my view, this new approach to auditing, especially the value-for-money component, has great significance for the taxpayers and their representatives in parliament.
>
> You are referring there to the SPICE study.
>
> The study is very complex. I suppose we will be holding numerous meetings simply to examine the effects of your SPICE study. For our information, could you tell us if you obtained the co-operation of Treasury Board and of all the other departments involved in this study? Did they all offer their help and co-operation for this study which you call the most important in the history of your office?

[English]

> MR. MACDONELL: Mr. Chairman, I should say immediately that we have had great co-operation with Treasury Board because, of course, they participated in drafting this legislation for our new Auditor General Act. Once the departments overcame their initial shock at our new mandate we had wonderful co-operation.

[Translation]

> MR. LEFEBVRE: So you did not meet up with any departments who resisted after the initial shock, as you call it?
>
> MR. MACDONELL: In some departments, Mr. Chairman, initial shock did persist for a short period but eventually we managed to overcome it.
>
> MR. LEFEBVRE: Okay, fine. I understand also that Treasury Board officers regularly study with you and within the government departments which have been involved in the SPICE study. Have they made the results of its work available to you? Is there some communication between your office and Treasury Board on this particular subject?
> MR. MACDONELL: Mr. Chairman, very close co-operation from day one. In July 1976 I met with the then secretary of the Treasury Board in his office when I had been informed that the government would indeed be bringing down legislation that fall, and we discussed the beginning of this study. From that day right up to today, we worked closely with Mr. Tim Reid, a deputy secretary and assistant secretary of the Treasury Board who is responsible for this and who is in the audience. We have worked closely with them in every possible way.

We subscribe—and so does the Treasury Board secretariat—to the comment made in the Wilson committee report and that is that the Treasury Board and we are natural allies. I am not referring as much there, although it is true, to the ministers as I am talking about the secretariat, and now, of course, to the office of the Comptroller General. We have a cordial although not cosy relationship in trying to get better financial administration. So we have received excellent co-operation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important to note that the Auditor General of Canada said so many times. I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to read a few quotes—

[English]

I would also like to take a brief moment to mention the Auditor General's remarks concerning a possible improvement in the financial information that parliament receives. I refer specifically to chapter 6 of his 1978 report, and in particular paragraphs 6.29 and 6.30 at page 111, which I think point out a fundamental and complicated problem which parliamentarians will have to study once and for all and make up their minds as to priorities. At paragraph 6.29 the Auditor General says:

One or several volumes? Changes have progressively increased the size of the blue book as the Treasury Board has added to the information previously provided.

I emphasize the words "added to the information".

Paragraph 6.29 continues:

The 1978-79 estimates has 1,271 pages. If implemented, the suggestions we are advancing will further increase the document's size.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker? Paragraph 6.30 states:

This illustrates a basic dilemma confronting modern governments. The size and variety of their activities require presentation in a generalized, summary manner if the information is to be contained in a single volume. Such summary data, however, limit meaningful analysis. The processes, operations and projects being performed must be disclosed, costed and related to the results expected before the data become precise enough to be useful. As a result, there may be a need for the estimates to be split into two components: a volume on government-wide spending, concentrating on the proposed global amounts and a second volume or volumes on departments and agencies, showing how they plan to manage the funds.

● (1742)

I am sure the public accounts committee will be studying this particular chapter in great detail along with many others.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that today members do not lack information but rather the time to examine the information made available to them and the reports delivered to their offices on a daily basis by all departments, agencies and, of course, other media. I am not convinced that one or two additional books or a volume going from 1,271 pages to 2,000 pages are necessarily going to help members. It is rather the decisions that each and every one of us will make to limit himself to one or two subjects and being well prepared in specific areas that are important. I also think that the public accounts committee will deal seriously, as it always does, with the last report tabled by the Auditor General, and we hear very different opinions I believe from the people around that table and we are going in all likelihood to spend weeks and weeks considering that last report.

I would like to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by quoting the last paragraph of the letter of the Auditor General of Canada contained in his latest report. It is addressed to the former president of Treasury Board, and I believe that too is very important. It reads:

Following the established practice of the past several years and in response to the stated request of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, I shall continue to follow closely the various aspects of the programs to implement recommended changes which have been agreed on and will be reporting on their progress in future reports to the House of Commons. In this connection, your letter of October 13 setting out the government's position and plans with regard to the more significant recommendations will be particularly helpful. I appreciate very much your precedent-setting action in making it available to me for inclusion in the Centennial Annual Report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons.

[English]

I could go on and read into the record almost every page of the Auditor General's report. However, I conclude now by saying there is no doubt that enough evidence has been put forward today and at other times during the session to show that this government realizes it has a very responsible duty to the taxpayers of Canada. Each one of us should take his responsibility as well.

A lot of the criticism levelled at the government has been from sources that are ill informed. I doubt whether a member of this House, no matter whether he has been here 15 or 54 years, could make a very objective criticism of Treasury Board or the administration of the government accounts without taking a very serious attitude. I suggest that if a member does not have the time to become a full member of the public accounts committee, he should at least take some interest in that committee. I have had a lot of experience with it. There is no other committee that provides the training and experience of that committee.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, just a few minutes ago I heard the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre), say that there is nothing wrong with the government or Treasury Board with respect to the administration of Canada's expenditures.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. That is not true and the hon. member knows it. This debate so far has been on a high level. With the hon. member's intervention, that will now change.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am concerned about what the Auditor General said. He made very clear the lack of expertise as to the government's control over departments and senior management levels and the results that flow therefrom. That is very clear, and it is the whole purpose of having the Auditor General.

The Auditor General should be commended not only for this year's report but for last year's report, which dealt in a new way with a change in the system. That is a fact we have to live with in this country. The Auditor General suggested some dramatic changes. If they are to be dealt with in a sane and reasonable way, we have to admit the bottom line, admit that certain things have gone wrong. The government has moved to the right with the Comptroller General.

The Auditor General has increased his prestige by increasing the depth of his report. However, the great gap in all of this is not the work of the Auditor General. It is not the fact that the government has moved off from the bottomless pit attitude of the sixties which grew out of the period of expansion of World War II. What happened is that we have reached the bottom of the pit.

The government has started to cure some things internally. This government will not have much chance to complete that cure. In any event, that is not the whole cure. The former president of the Treasury Board who is in the chamber, knows that. The great gap in the process of turning parliament back to the people and the country in terms of its expenditure process is in this parliament and its procedures. That is where the effort must be made.

I congratulate the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid) on his ascendancy to office. I hope his disposition improves as he advances in the ministry in these last days. He talked about where the fault lay for the operation and the failure to amend our rules. The committee last dealt with them in 1976. By the way, the committee has not met since then except to organize itself.

When the minister talked about the failure with regard to that, he forgot to say one thing. It is not just a matter of shortening speeches, although that is part of the difficulty. One of the reasons that the three major reports on reform could not go forward was that the government House leader would not tolerate the idea that the Speaker could intervene with regard to determining the length of debates and whether closure or limitation on the right to speak in the House of Commons would be instituted. That was his position. All parties in the House of Commons had some objections to the package. As a result, this latest opportunity of reform foundered.

I am going to say as a new member of parliament—

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but at this point in his speech I have a question. I would like to ask whether he will answer it now or wait until he completes his speech.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to answer any question at the end of my speech. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) put his finger on the central and focal point of the motion. Its purpose is to express a lack of confidence in this government for its failure to take any leadership with regard to parliamentary reform. The last time that committee sat in any substantive way was in September, 1976, a long time ago. That is when these things were dealt with. We have had two reports from the Auditor General since that time. The first one alluded to parliamentary reform. The latest one dealt with it directly.

I am quite prepared to experiment. I acknowledge the work of experimenting in the way the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested. I believe the comments with respect to the way in which the old committee of supply functioned are valid. I saw it operate. I would be prepared for us to experiment in a limited way in returning that kind of thing to the House of Commons.

I am not prepared, however, to initiate any procedure which would put in the way of any government an insurmountable roadblock to its doing business. I want to see a balance between the tremendous power of the executive which has grown up over the years, and the right of this body to bring it to account. That is the direction in which parliamentary reform must move. Make no bones about it, I do not believe the stumbling block is the length of speeches made in the House of Commons. I think that in many ways, as the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations has suggested, it involves the attitude of members on both sides with respect to changes.

The speeches made so far have looked to a certain extent to the past. We should begin to look to the future of this institution. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) observed that if this institution does not change, regardless of which party is in office, what we shall see is an ever greater degree of power concentrated in the executive and in the bureaucracy. This concentration of power will be increasingly unchallenged. This is a very unhealthy thing. As the hon. member for Capilano said, the parliamentary system to which we pay lip service will fall into greater disrepute than it does now in terms of its ability to bring the government to account. I believe it is the duty of members on both sides to look at the whole question of the manner in which we deal with the control of government expenditures, the way in which we deal with the estimates.

Committees have their role to play. They should be seeking to determine whether amounts proposed in the estimates are reasonable, that no unacceptable cost escalations are built in, that reasonable planning and foresight have been exercised with regard to every executive decision. That is the role of the committees. It should also be possible to use the estimates to discuss policy objectives. When has that happened in the memory of most members? When has parliament been involved in the development of policy?

Hon. members should be able to match policy instruments with policy intentions. They should be able to ask this question: Is the manner of policy implementation consistent with the objectives of policy? At the present time we cannot do that except in a foreshortened way because of the guillotine. Functions of this sort should stress the importance of members of parliament as spokesmen for the sweating taxpayer who pays the bills and, incidentally, pays us. In this sense we cannot do justice to the Canadian taxpayer. Members of parliament should not be regarded as intruders into the bureaucratic process, though I am afraid they are now, to such degree has our system fallen in esteem. Members have a constitutional responsibility which predates and is imposed upon the existence of any bureaucracy. We have tended to forget this.

I make that observation without disrespect to the public service. There has been a vacuum; we have allowed that vacuum to develop and the public service has naturally moved in. Members of this chamber who do not hold office have a duty to bring those who do hold office in the executive to account.

The Auditor General realizes that the final link in the process of financial review is that which involves responsibility to parliament. He suggests that form of estimates should be improved and that more information should be given. That is a good start, Mr. Speaker, but it might be a false gain. Notwithstanding the staff presently available to members of parliament, or the opportunities afforded by the committee system or the bureaucrats behind that system, devoted as they are, if the parliamentary research system is not augmented, if the committee secretariat system is not augmented, all that information will mean nothing at all.

The Auditor General also suggests that relevant sections of his report should go before standing committees. This is one point of disagreement between myself and the Auditor General; I do not know how the committees could handle estimates, legislation and the audit function as well. The proposal might involve a conflict of interest in any event because most of the members of committees who deal with specific items are particularly interested in them, but I do not think there is any proper audit function done by those who are interested in those programs. That is one disagreement I have with the Auditor General, though I think we are moving in the right direction. We need something new. We want a whole new committee system. My hon. friend for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) suggested we needed a new government—everyone will admit that.

It is now six o'clock and in the few minutes which are left to me after the dinner recess I would like to make a proposal I have put to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization in the hope that it will meet with the approval of members in all quarters and make parliament more relevant and more functional.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I had said that we might just talk about what is wrong with our system—and indeed there is a great deal wrong with it—but that I had a proposal to put to the House as to how we might begin the process of returning this parliament to the people. I said that, bearing in mind what the leader of my party said when he was made leader in 1976. He said that the people of Canada are interested not only in those things which we are against but also in the things which we intend to propose.

This parliament needs more information with respect to estimates. It needs more time to consider the estimates. We need a completely different approach. Our present process for dealing with expenditures has no focal point or direction. The only acknowledged aim of parliament thus far is to pass each vote in the estimates. Instead of detailed examination and a report, we have a series of disjointed local questions which lead to no conclusion and no recommendations.

Committees studying estimates do not issue reports. It is possible that some members may end up knowing a bit more about departmental policies than they did before, but those members have no impact on departments or on policies. Estimates emerge from this process virtually unchanged, which is the best indication of how behind the times and how irrelevant our process is. I believe we have to reverse this emphasis in our financial procedures. Instead of trying to discuss all the estimates every year, we should work our way through them in a four or five-year cycle. Instead of concentrating on masses of vague generalities, we should investigate in depth specific departments, agencies or functions. Such investigations should not result merely in a decision to pass or not pass estimates. They should result in comprehensive reports comparing agency goals with results, and costs with benefits.

In the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization in 1976 I outlined a plan for a standing committee on policy, expenditure and programs. This proposed committee would have two purposes. First, it would study the over-all pattern of government expenditure, hearing evidence in the process from the Department of Finance, from the Treasury Board and from outside economists. I hope such a study would make it clear where, at any given time, we are heading and on what assumptions about our future economic development our course is being charted by the government of the day. We do not have that opportunity today.

Second, that committee, through subcommittees if necessary, could undertake the kind of long-term intensive study I think we need if we are to represent the people who send us here. If we were to follow the lead of the Senate finance committee, which has undertaken a number of extremely useful studies—most recently on government office accommodation policies—we would do something for the process in this parliament. The only trouble with the present arrangement is that while the Senate has the time and the expertise for this type of work, we in this House of Commons have constitutional responsibility but not the necessary machinery, even though we may have the will to carry out that responsibility.

I would like to conclude with some general observations about government spending. First, if we are to have a tight financial system, we must subject the entire process to the closest possible scrutiny by agencies outside the administrative process. Parliament is outside the administrative process. In business, the ultimate consequence of waste and inefficiency is bankruptcy. In government it is just more waste and inefficiency. There are no automatic checks. They must be built in carefully and deliberately. That is the reason I made this suggestion.

Second, there must be a spirit of economy which pervades the approach of everyone connected with government. It is easy to waste $4,000 or $5,000. It is much easier to waste that $4,000 or $5,000 than it is for some taxpayer to earn it.

● (2012)

Finally, here and elsewhere we must develop an awareness of how much government spending and activity is appropriate. We do not have the machinery to examine that conflict. The role of government in our society has been growing steadily for over a century. Serious problems have arisen only in the last two decades. Recently governments have assumed that only they can alleviate inequities of opportunity, redistribute wealth, prime the economy, and offer incentives and direct support for all kinds of ancillary activity; that they can do all of this by not balancing the budget year after year, by rolling up a tidal wave of debt to engulf future generations, and by debasing the currency. We should begin to ask ourselves if that is relevant and proper. I say it is not, and we must examine that in parliament.

Recently governments have attempted to direct a complex modern economy by jettisoning all accepted principles of financial prudence. It will be the job of this parliament, if it does its job, to bring governments back to the lessons of financial prudence.

The basic lesson we have learned from all this is that men are not nearly as smart as they imagine themselves to be, and that much of what has been called planning is simply tragic over-confidence. I do not pin this government with all of the blame. Governments everywhere are to blame. The problem with the process in which Your Honour and I work is that it provides neither the opportunity, machinery nor attitude to say that parliament is the place where governments should be called to account for those things which they do that are good and also those things which are bad, wasteful and irrelevant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: During his speech I interrupted the hon. member on a point of order, asking for leave to put a question, and he suggested I should wait till after his speech. Do I have leave to put that question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There must be consent not only from the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) but also from the House, because the hon. member's time has expired. Is there consent for the parliamentary secretary to put a question?

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pinard: I thank hon. members and I will be brief. In his speech, the hon. member referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, which in 1976 examined three subcommittee reports. I would like to know whether the hon. member is in a position to indicate at this point that his caucus support the recommendations of each of the subcommittee reports, or whether he is ready to commit his caucus to acceptance of those three subcommittee reports that were tabled before the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization on September 30, 1976?

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would not be telling tales out of school to say that we did not agree completely with them, but there was substantial agreement with substantial portions of the report.

Speaking for my party, we would be quite prepared to see two things happen respecting the House of Commons: the reconvening of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization where that matter and others, and particularly the matter I raised, could be considered in depth; and we would be prepared to see the televising of the work of committees so that their work could be enhanced even in the situation in which they find themselves. I would be very pleased if the hon. member would carry that message back to the government House leader.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is a non-confidence one condemning the government for imposing changes in the rules and procedure of the House and its standing committees, calculated and designed to stifle or eliminate parliamentary examination and control of public expenditures, etc. In other words, the attack is upon the government through its failure to bring about parliamentary reform for better performance of the committees.

I cannot but observe in the beginning that I would agree with what the House leader of the opposition just said, that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization would be a most appropriate committee to consider the suggestions made by my colleague on this side of the House. Surely there is no suggestion that the work of that committee, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, or many other committees, has in any way been impeded by what the government has done.

Tonight I should like to talk simply about the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and its contribution toward the study of public expenditures, and how this has evolved recently in the House of Commons. Some hon. members opposite subscribe to what I call the golden age theory—that somewhere back in the distant past there was a time when parliament controlled expenditures, voted in an admirable fashion, rationally allocated resources, and performed the job which somehow has not been performed in a more recent period. I was pleased the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made it clear that he did not subscribe to that point of view.

When I was first elected to this House in 1963, at which time the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was here, there was just a dreadful way of dealing with estimates in supply and committee of the whole. The opposition would attack one particular estimate, government members would rally, there would be votes, the majority was called to defend the government's position, and there would not be a dollar or a line changed. Then the decision of the Speaker would be appealed, and it was just an interminable succession of delays. In the end, nothing was changed. It was a desire to get away from that kind of thing which brought about the reference of estimates to the committees and the procedures with which we now deal.

It is interesting to see how other parliaments have dealt with the question of estimates during this period. The parliament of the United Kingdom simply tables the estimates. It does not attempt to deal with them all in a comprehensive, logical manner. By selection, certain departments or ministries appear by rotation on call. But a comprehensive examination, in the sense of looking at the total sum of government expenditures in detail, is not undertaken by that parliament on an annual basis.

In the late 1950s, the government of the day, headed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), named the Glassco commission to look into the organizational structure of government activities. The recomendations of the Glassco commission, according to the present Auditor General, have led to a distortion of the pattern of controls. It is only now that this is being corrected.

To summarize very briefly what was recommended by the Glassco commission, it was a philosophy of letting managers manage, giving deputy ministers the responsibility to spend, abolishing a post then known as comptroller general of the treasury, and allowing delegated authority in hiring. This was in the name of decentralized administration which was alleged to be more efficient.

During the late 1960s and the early 1970s, we saw tremendous expansion in government activity and expenditures. The latest report of the Auditor General shows the very great expansion which took place in the federal sphere at the beginning of 1973. In a naive manner, I was prepared to say that might have been due to the minority government which was in power at the time. But within the last week the Standing Committee on Public Accounts has met with the public accounts committee of the province of Ontario on an informal basis, and the auditor general for the province of Ontario assured us that a very similar parallel expansion took place with the majority government of the province of Ontario during the same period, with roughly the same consequences.

Now we are dealing with a series of corrections being put in place through the new Auditor General, whom I submit is the most distinguished occupant of that office in its 100-year old history. This is a time when we see a major transition in the scope and function of the Auditor General.

The 1975 report of the Auditor General was a bit of a shocker. He reported that expenditures were out of control. He documented in chapter and verse a familiar liturgy of horror stories, widespread across broad lines. The government reacted to the criticism in two ways: first, by naming a special investigating commission under Mr. Lambert; and, secondly, it accepted the recommendation of the Auditor General than an office called "Comptroller General" be established.

● (2022)

There are a number of differences between the present office of the Comptroller General and the one which previously existed. Perhaps the easiest way to summarize the differences is to say that the present position is a staff position, advisory to the departments. The previous position was a line position with actual direct control over expenditures.

There is now in place in the person of Mr. Rogers a very competent, highly respected man who I am sure will be eminently successful in the performance of his duties.

It is also part of the package to strengthen the internal audit procedures and to have within every government department a comparable position to that of Comptroller General. This is now a process under way.

The control of expenditures itself is only part of the story. The Auditor General and his predecessor had been seeking for some time their own statute which would govern their activities and give them a mandate for a much more broad and fundamental type of examination of expenditures. That mandate took the form of the Auditor General Act which this House was pleased to recommend and pass. Under the Auditor General Act the Auditor General is given much deeper responsibility to look, not just after the event at horror stories, money misspent, resources not properly allocated and waste, but into the fundamental question of value for money spent.

It is interesting that the province of Ontario, when it came to examining the functions of its auditor general, took whole sections out of the federal act and incorporated them word for word in the statute to govern the provincial auditor general of that province.

Now we see in the latest report of the Auditor General a different kind of document, and a challenge to members of this House to participate in the public accounts committee which is chaired by the very distinguished hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) on the other side of the House, who is present this evening.

An hon. Member: Flattery will get you everywhere.

Mr. Francis: Thank you. I am quite capable of speaking my mind forthrightly whether in complimentary or uncomplimentary terms, as the situation dictates.

To those members of this House who say that the government has stifled committees, that parliament can no longer be meaningful, and that there is no way we can control estimates and the expenditure of $50 billion a year, I say, why do they not just show up occasionally at the public accounts committee and try to do a job? Because that is a committee which is begging for participation from members. Those who say they do not have the opportunity to control expenditures have the obligation to show up and do the day to day, week to week work of a committee that sits many hours a week with a heavy schedule, because it is making an effort to try to understand and control how the money is spent, if that is humanly possible within an elected, democratic, parliamentary institution.

The document which was tabled just a matter of two weeks ago or less is only about one quarter of the document with the traditional horror stories. They are there: the money that was spent on an icebreaker that should not have been spent; the escalation of the costs of a building; and the failure to pursue commitments. All of those stories are still there. In an operation as large as that of the Government of Canada with $50 billion a year in expenditures, there are bound to be some places where things are not well handled, and there are bound to be some mistakes.

However, three-quarters of the Auditor General's report deals with something else. It deals with the attempt to ascertain what is value for money. I think I would summarize the new concept of his role by saying that the Auditor General has become something of a super management consultant. He is concerned with putting the systems in place and seeing that they are put in place, in order that the right information is fed to the managers at the right time and that there is a maximum possibility of making the right decisions.

It is not just a matter of saying the money was spent for a harbour here, a wharf there or a public building somewhere else, but it was misspent. The question is: how do you make sure you are getting value for your money? One thing members on the other side have not complained about is that they have not said there is any effort to stifle the Auditor General; and when one looks at the 1600 per cent increase in his budget in the last three or four years, no one could suggest he has been denied the resources he requested to do the job. He has been given the resources with the unanimous consent of members of this House, who know that an investment in that function is money well spent, a function which we are proud to support.

The Auditor General is going to be caught in the period ahead in a wide-ranging series of investigations. As a member of this House I found it interesting when he told me that the estimates are not in a form in which we can really get much information from them, that he thinks they should be presented in a different way. Then we heard the Treasury Board response regarding the difficulties in complying with the request. Maybe it can be done and maybe it cannot be done, but it is the members of the committee who listened to the testimony from both sides, the members of the committee who joined in the report of that committee and made recommendations to this House, who act as a guide to the Auditor General in the carrying out of his job.

There was no golden age and there is no golden age in the handling of such immense sums of money. There is, however, a disposition on the part of the government and on the part of all hon. members to make sure we resolve these problems with the very best resources at our disposal.

The Auditor General is making a study of special procedures in cost effectiveness. The acronym is "SPICE". The special procedures in cost effectiveness are the beginning of a series of extensive examinations, of breaking new ground, and there is no doubt that some of the decisions the Auditor General is going to take will really push and stretch his mandate.

In the informal discussions we had with the province of Ontario public accounts committee someone put the problem this way. If someone in the province decided to build a road costing $200,000, the Auditor General would look at the road and say the province got good value for the $200,000 as the road was built to the specifications in the contract and there was full use of resources. Someone then has to ask whether the road should have been built in that place originally. Maybe the road was not built where it should have been built. When you ask that question you are bordering on the limits of the potential responsibility of the government of the day. There will be many instances and situations in which, in search for the procedures and systems to put in place, the Auditor General is bound to push the limits of the mandate given to him under the new legislation.

If hon. members of this House do nothing more than show up on opposition days to lambaste the government for not controlling expenditures, for letting everything get out of hand, and complain that they do not have the chance to do anything, they are ignoring the opportunity to do a job by participating in committees such as the public accounts committee. I do not say that that is the only committee, but it is the one which I personally have followed. Our problem is getting members out to do their jobs.

I cannot support this motion. I have my reasons when I am dissatisfied with various aspects of government policy, and I am sure that hon. members here have no difficulty counting the odd examples; but the current accusation that the government is attempting to stifle the committee system is a very false, shallow and wrong accusation. I will not vote for the motion.

● (2032)

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I would like to indicate at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that I intend to support this motion when it comes to a vote later this evening. I would like to commend my colleague for Yukon

(Mr. Nielsen) for moving this motion because I think that in parliament now is the time when we should be turning our attention to how we can ensure that the Canadian taxpayer gets value for his money.

Over the course of the afternoon and the early part of this evening I listened to the various participants in this debate. I was particularly pleased to find that the first speaker for the government side was the new Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid). He is a minister for whom I have a very high regard and to whom I sent a congratulatory letter at the time of his appointment to cabinet. I indicated that I was pleased to see that a person with his perspective, having sat on the back benches, having been concerned about the role of the backbencher in parliament and ensuring that parliament was functional and doing its job, should be elevated to a post of high responsibility.

I always thought that it was axiomatic that when you raised a person to a high elevation he could see far, that his view would be much better. Instead it now appears that upon the elevation of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River to the cabinet his view is obscured in the clouds and he has lost sight of the issues which concerned him when he was down toiling in the vineyards with the rest of us.

In listening to the government speakers today, the general consensus seems to be that really the problems are not that bad and that controls by parliament on the executive are better now than they ever were. Anyone who has spent time in this institution, who has spoken to members of parliament from all sides of the House, however, will be aware of the frustrations, the discontent and the general feeling that this institution is not discharging its responsibility when it comes to ensuring that the taxpayers' money is well spent.

In the six years I have been here I have detected a growing sense of frustration on the part of members of parliament who feel that there must be fundamental changes made in terms of structure and in terms of the attitude of those who determine how we conduct our business in this House. The minister for federal-provincial relations made the point this afternoon that at the time the reforms were brought in in 1968 they were passed by unanimous consent and there was no dissenting voice. I was not here at that time and the minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I am told by my colleagues who were here that they were presented with an ultimatum by the majority government of the day that either we agree to a watered down package or else the government would use their majority to put the whole package through.

I would like to indicate my strong feeling, after six years here, that the rules have not worked well for parliament, that we do not have the information we need to do our jobs, and that the mechanisms are not in place to ensure that the taxpayers of Canada can rest confident that their money is being well spent.

My colleagues who have spoken before me dealt with a number of aspects of this particular problem as, for example, the way in which rule changes have affected parliament's ability to discharge its obligations. My colleague for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) put his case very eloquently, and anyone listening to his presentation would be impressed with the sincerity with which he made his case and the veracity of the arguments he put forth.

My purpose this evening is twofold. I want to talk about what the Auditor General had to say about parliament's ability to control expenditures and, secondly, to indicate what some of his investigations have shown in terms of the ability of parliament to keep an eye on how the taxpayers' money is being spent.

Government members have stressed the fact that there is not the former abundance of horror stories in the current Auditor General's report and that he is not illustrating as many individual cases in which there has been striking waste of the taxpayers' money as in previous auditor general reports. The point that these members do not make, and for some reason they overlook it, is that the Auditor General's 1978 report consists of 750 pages of condemnations of systematic problems. The Auditor General has conducted isolated audits on selected parts of government activities and has found in virtually every case that the government's control mechanisms or evaluation procedures have been found wanting. He has sounded the very clear alarm that unless government gains control over expenditures, unless we ensure that those responsible for directing the government today have the mechanisms in place which are necessary to evaluate the way the taxpayers' money is being spent, to determine whether it is being spent wisely and whether programs are being run efficiently and effectively, then the taxpayer should be concerned about how his money is being used by the government.

This report is the one hundredth report by an auditor general. As I have said, it contains 750 pages in which the Auditor General chronicles ways in which millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money is being wasted. He mentions individual examples of waste and also, even more importantly, systemic problems where the system conspires towards waste, encourages it and discourages the government from showing due concern in spending the taxpayers' money. He also makes recommendations on how we in parliament and those on the treasury benches can act in an attempt to get control of the public purse.

During my six years here there has been a common thread running through auditor generals' reports, and that is that Canadians have no reason to be confident, with the budget being the size that it is today, that their money is being wisely spent. Since this is the one hundredth Auditor General's report, I thought that it would be interesting to refer to the first auditor general's report which was released to parliament in 1879, and I was able to find a copy of it in the library. I thought it would be useful to see whether or not there was a common thread running from the 1978 report back to the report of 1879, or whether the problems dealt with by that auditor general were very different from the ones the Auditor General faces today. I was intrigued to see at the beginning of the report that there was one problem which seems to be a perpetual one, and that is the debate between the Auditor

General's department and the government as to what exactly is the role of the Auditor General.

The supporters of the government today argue that this government has been particularly generous with the Auditor General, that they have provided him with the resources that he needs to do his job and that they have provided every assistance necessary to him. All hon. members know that many auditor generals have complained about being hamstrung. It was not because the government volunteered to establish that office or because they thought that it was a great idea that we have an Auditor General today. It was because of public pressure and because feelings in parliament itself ran so high that the government was forced to bow and to make those very fundamental reforms.

● (2042)

I was intrigued to find that in the first auditor general's report in 1879 there was a major debate over whether he should be allowed to report to parliament on whether the government has spent money without authorization. Included in that report is a letter from the then deputy minister of justice with a concurring opinion from the then minister of justice, saying that the auditor general should recognize his role was very limited and that perhaps he did not have authority to look into this aspect. It concludes by saying that he may hitherto have been under the impression that his duties and responsibilities were greater and that he would be glad to find that they were defined within the limits the letter explained. It noted that he would be grateful to discover that the government would not allow him to do the job that he felt he had to do on behalf of parliament.

That auditor general made his response in exactly the same way that successive auditors general have. He said he felt that the auditor general had the responsibility to parliament to point out instances where money was not wisely spent, where it was spent illegally, improperly, or where value was not received. This is a common thread running through 100 years of parliament dealing with the question of how to ensure proper control of expenditures.

There are other areas that are very different in the present report compared with the situation in 1879. Looking over the accounts listed in the first auditor general's report, I was interested to find that he pointed out in one department after another not that more money was spent than had been appropriated, but that departments were handing back money they had not spent. This is very different from the situation today when it appears there is a law to the effect that governments can consume all their revenue. Someone once said that we should all live within our means even if we have to borrow in order to do so. If that is so, the federal government has certainly recognized the truth of that saying.

It is worth noting that in 100 years the federal budget has increased about one thousand times and the intrusion of government into the everyday lives of Canadians has shown a concomitant increase. In Canada today expenditure at all three levels of government comprises about 40 per cent of the gross national product. The average Canadian finds he has to work from January to mid-May approximately in order to pay the taxes he owes to various levels of government. Only after that is he working to support himself and his family.

If Canadians are to be asked to carry this heavy burden, surely they have the right to expect us as their representatives to do everything we can to make sure that their money is spent wisely. I do not think it is being spent wisely. Every member of parliament and many members of the public are aware of the statement made by the auditor general in 1976 in his annual report. At that time he said:

I am deeply concerned that parliament—and indeed the government—has lost, or is close to losing, effective control of the public purse.

The auditor general was saying that not only we in this chamber but the government—Treasury Board and the treasury benches—had come close to losing control over public expenditures. There can be no more scathing condemnation of the way the system works than for the auditor general, after studying the situation, to say that parliament and the government are no longer in control. The taxpayer has no basis for confidence that his money is being wisely cared for by those who hold public trust.

Members of all parties have detailed their concern for the rules of the House of Commons and its committees which make it difficult for us to ensure that requests for funds by the government and spending by the government are properly scrutinized. Consideration of the estimates by the various standing committees is a mockery. None of us can honestly say that parliament does an adequate job of scrutinizing the expenditure of tens of billions of dollars every year. We know that estimates in the hundreds of millions of dollars are often approved by the standing committees without intensive scrutiny. They are approved because of a rule that provides that if they have not been voted on by a certain date they will automatically be reported back to the House as if every single item had been closely checked and approved by the committee. Who can study the way in which parliamentary committees discharge their responsibilities and be confident that parliament is doing its job as guardian of its public purse?

During question period today I tried to get information from the government about the cost of the abortive Lotto Select program. There was a report—

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to point out to the hon. member opposite—I know he would not want to put a mistake on the record—while he is addressing himself to tax issues and the spending of tax dollars, that no tax dollars are in any way involved in Loto Select or in Loto Canada.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the Minister's intervention. She is much more forthcoming this evening than in question period. Of course, the minister did not indicate that I had said tax money was spent in the case of Loto Select. One thing that is clear, however, is that Loto Select was a government program run by a Crown corporation. It was a program for which this minister was responsible to parliament.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Not a single tax dollar was spent.

Mr. Beatty: The minister says that not a single tax dollar was spent. It is fine if the money of Canadians is squandered by the government so long as it is not raised through the tax system! Mr. Speaker, that is not fine. When a Crown corporation is responsible for spending money, then parliament has a responsibility to make sure the money is handled wisely.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The hon. member opposite is fully aware that all Crown corporations are audited by the Auditor General as a regular course of events, so there is nothing new in what he is saying.

Mr. Beatty: I am delighted to see that the minister accepts my argument, Mr. Speaker. That is the point we were trying to make today during question period. The minister has not been forthcoming with information about how the money is being spent. Whether the money is raised through the tax system or not, Canadians have a right to expect that government organizations will handle it wisely and well. To suggest that because money raised by issuing lottery tickets as opposed to the tax system justifies waste would be ridiculous. I am sure the minister would not attempt to justify it that way either.

The minister says there is no waste. Today during question period she explained—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not think we should get into that debate. A motion is in front of us. We are not here to debate what took place in the question period or to examine the estimates of the hon. minister.

Mr. Beatty: Thank you for your intervention, Mr. Speaker. I should like to explain why I cited that particular example. It was to prove a point that I think runs throughout the Auditor General's report—that parliament does not have proper control over the activities of the government. This is the gist of the motion before the House and this is the argument I was making before the minister interrupted.

The theme that I want to return to is that we are charged with the responsibility to ensure that the money of Canadian taxpayers is property spent, and we have not been discharging this responsibility. Everywhere we turn we find that impediments to the rules or structures, as mentioned in the motion, or intransigence on the part of the government, make it difficult for parliament to do that job.

Since the Auditor General's report was tabled a couple of weeks ago, I have attempted within the confines of the question period to raise questions about its findings. Obviously, this is one of the forums in which parliamentarians can ask questions about how the money is being spent. Anyone who has been present here knows that it has not been a happy experience. Parliament has had a hard time getting information from the government and basic changes will have to be made to ensure that we do get the information we need.

Let us consider what the Auditor General has to say about some of the areas he studied. He selected for a special audit 13 capital works projects, which were worth some $700 million of a total capital works budget of $10 billion. He found that 11 of the projects lacked proper control of the way the money was being spent. In instance after instance he found that the taxpayers' money was being spent unwisely and that value for money was not received.

He noted that at the time these 13 capital works projects were approved by parliament their estimated value was going to be $281,600,000, but by the time these 13 projects were finished the cost to the taxpayer was some $699,700,000. The cost had more than doubled. The Auditor General concluded in this part of the study that the absence of appropriate controls calls in question not only the $10 billion capital cost of current projects, but also operating and maintenance commitments that stretch decades into the future.

Surely this is a concern of parliament, and surely we have a responsibility to look into this. Let members on the other side say that the Auditor General was looking specifically for areas and flaws to complain about, but I put that question to the Auditor General. He responded that this was not the case. In the areas he audited he was looking at typical projects, not the extraordinary ones. He was not looking for horror stories. He knew that there were areas where he could find stories that would curl the taxpayers' hair, but this is not what he was looking for. He was looking for a selective group of examples which would give him an indication of how the government conducts its business. What did he find? He found in the case of the C. D. Howe building, the glass palace across the way in which the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is located, that the Canadian taxpayer lost $12 million because of one simple decision. This loss was caused by the government deciding to ask the developer, who built the building, to finance the project instead of the government financing it itself. That is a cost of $12 million at the stroke of a pen. Surely the Auditor General has pointed out something that should be of concern to us.

In another part of his report the Auditor General conducted a study to determine whether the government programs were achieving the purpose for which they were designed. Surely this is a measurement we must make of whether tax money is being well used. The Auditor General in his conclusion of this study said:

A review of 23 programs in 18 departments has disclosed few successful attempts to evaluate the effectiveness of programs. The scope and quality of effectiveness evaluation will have to be increased significantly before management, the government and parliament, each with its respective interests, can be reasonably informed on the achievements of public programs.

It is clear from what the Auditor General pointed out that within the system of spending in Canada there are major flaws, and that major reforms must be made before we can be satisfied that we have done our job.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are rising to indicate that I have used my allotted 20 minutes. Let me conclude by saying that when we were elected to parliament we were charged with perhaps the most important responsibility that can be given to any citizen of Canada, and that is to act as a proxy on behalf of our constituents to ensure that their interests and the national interest are properly served. We have not done that job in parliament in recent years, and unless there are fundamental changes made in the rules of parliament, in the way in which we conduct our activities, I do not think that Canadian taxpayers are being properly served. I hope that members in the House tonight will support the motion that has been moved by my colleague the hon. member for Yukon. I believe it deserves the support of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I was greatly disappointed when I read the motion introduced by the Progressive Conservative party. I was disappointed because not only is it patently frivolous, so frivolous it is the perfect example of a motion that could be moved under Standing Order 43, as the Progressive Conservative party usually does between two o'clock and 2.15 every day, not only, as I was saying, because it seems to me to be patently frivolous but I was also disappointed because it mentions three items and all three are erroneous statements.

Mr. Speaker, what we have seen today is a sad exhibition of negativism on the part of the Progressive Conservative party; today is one of 25 days allotted to the opposition parties to raise issues of public interest. These are days allowing opposition parties to discuss, if they so wish, government expenditures, the use of public moneys or any other subject such as unemployment, inflation or the fundamental rights of individuals. I note that today the Progressive Conservative party has chosen to talk about parliamentary procedure and to charge the government with wrongdoing in this regard. All we have heard from opposition members is complaints, all we have heard from speakers of the Progressive Conservative party is references to the Auditor General's report. They are fortunate, Mr. Speaker, those Progressive Conservative members to have the Auditor General on their side, this man who is exemplary in the way he does his work; they would do well to try and emulate him, and to attend more frequently the committee sittings where estimates and supplementary estimates are examined.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian public would be better served and the government would rejoice if the Progressive Conservative opposition would really exercise its role in this parliament. The point that I am trying to get across tonight it is that the Progressive Conservative party creates problems for itself. It refuses to apply correctly the existing rules to play its role as opposition. I readily recognize and agree that the present rules of procedure leave room for improvement. Mr. Speaker, I am among those who since being elected to the House in 1974 have most vociferously demanded an in-depth parliamentary reform, yet I am still able to recognize what has been done. I can also give credit where credit is due, and I can be grateful to those who since 1963—that is in the past 15 years, to the Liberals, because it has been a Liberal government since then—have made valid changes in our procedure; yet I want to carry that further. But notwithstanding that desired and desirable reform to which I will come back, Mr. Speaker, I think that the present rules could be used by members of the Progressive Conservative party in a much more efficient and much more rational way so that if they truly played their role, if they were truly responsible, they would not have to complain today about a procedure they do not use because they do not know it well or because they do not want to know it.

Mr. Speaker, the motion falsely states that for 15 years this government has been trying to impede parliamentary control over public expenditures. Such a statement is unacceptable when one knows that in 1968 a very serious reform was made in this respect with the unanimous consent of all members of the House. So, Mr. Speaker, I will be referring in my remarks to that reform of 1968 and the one which has occurred since I became a member of parliament in 1974 and which is a major event in the history of this parliament, namely the advent of television to bring parliament closer to the people and, finally, I want to make a few positive suggestions for improving parliamentary procedures to enhance the role of members of parliament, modernize this parliament and make it more efficient.

[English]

First I want to look at the innovations of 1968 in the committee system and in supply since these are directly connected to the misrepresentations in the motion before us today.

Prior to the reforms of 1968, when the new rules were adopted unanimously, legislation was not automatically referred to standing committees. Also, the committees did not play a central role in the consideration of estimates. The reforms of 1968 gave the committees a greatly expanded role by providing that all bills, other than appropriation bills and bills based on ways and means motions, are referred to standing committees. Similarly, all estimates are referred to the standing committees.

● (2102)

These changes were brought about for sound reasons which remain valid today. First, the committees generally provide a better forum than the committee of the whole or the old committee of supply for detailed examination of legislation and estimates; the procedures provide for more flexible discussion, witnesses can be heard, and far more time can be taken for discussion. Second, the regular consideration of estimates and the committee stages of bills in committee of the whole House or the committee of supply meant a more superficial treatment of the subject matter because very little time could be made available for each item. Third, committee members can make a more direct and effective contribution to the consideration of legislation and estimates in areas that particularly interest them.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, having said that, it appears obvious to me that if Progressive Conservative members did show up more regularly at committees where detailed examination can be made of the expenditures of the government through its various departments, then their complaints today would not be necessary. Today, we could have talked about unemployment, inflation or positive remedies but we only get destructive criticism.

Mr. Speaker, another major reform in the last 15 years—and we all know about this one because it took place during this parliament—was the introduction of television in the House. That was the result, Mr. Speaker, of a motion introduced in January, 1977, by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) whom I have the honour to serve as parliamentary secretary, and we know how the broadcasting of the debates of the House brought parliament closer to the people of Canada, and that major reform was made by a Liberal government, by this government, Mr. Speaker.

Earlier the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) talked about the broadcasting of the debates of the House. But let me recall his attitude in the debate on the motion to approve broadcasting of the House proceedings.

[English]

Broadcasting of the House proceedings is another unquestionable proof of the government's support for the fundamental functions of parliament. Broadcasting has allowed Canadians across the country to see what is being done here on their behalf.

If opposition members want to call this a steady destruction of the parliamentary process, they must at the same time admit a contempt for the Canadian public and a fear of having their ineptitude exposed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My friend is quoting from someone, but certainly not me. He was about to attribute certain remarks to me. Those were not my remarks. If my friend will recall, it was as a result of an amendment originally placed by me and, firstly, ruled out of order but agreed to by the government House leader at a later stage in the one day debate. The government supported the proposals I put forward and our party supported the proposals the government put forward, and this matter was dealt with.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has had ample time.

Mr. Pinard: If the hon. member will be patient, I am coming to his remarks. Let me refer hom. members to the speech made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on the motion to approve broadcasting. He said grudgingly:

> Indeed, it is difficult to counter the weight of the argument that the people have a right to see and hear what is happening in parliament. But there are some deep reservations felt in this place and elsewhere—

He then went on to express concern that the cameras would not give an accurate picture of the proceedings, that the public would not be able to understand the rules, that the media would misuse the broadcasting clips, and that anyway the public just would not be interested. He summarized his nervous attitude about the openness of broadcasting in these words:

> In short, Mr. Speaker, we must hope that good television and good parliamentary democracy are natural companions. We will have to wait and see, though, because no one in this chamber can predict that.

Deep reservations and deep suspicions. That, Mr. Speaker, is how the hon. member and many of his colleagues felt about bringing parliament closer to the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, may I add that this welcomed initiative to further democratize this institution by allowing broadcasting of the House proceedings will lead us to propose new amendments to the rules of procedure which we must follow. Earlier I have had the opportunity to suggest that from the point of view of government spending and budget estimates review, the 1968 reform which had been proposed with unanimous consent—including that of Conservative members—had very much improved the situation and that if these members had been up to their obligations, if they had co-operated and regularly attended committee meetings, they would have had every opportunity to study carefully these expenditures. I can hear the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who moved the motion—and who is seldom in the House and does not even sit on the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization—I can hear him say that it is not true. He knows very well that last Thursday, the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates had to cancel its meeting because there was not even one Progressive Conservative member to study the estimates. Under the circumstances, I am surprised that it was the hon. member who moved the motion now under consideration because he is well aware that his party was not represented on this committee and that the committee had to cancel its meeting last Thursday evening. I had the honour of appearing before this committee on Friday morning and I was able to provide all the explanations asked by the two Progressive Conservative members who were present about the expenditures of the office of the Privy Council.

I come now to the third point I wanted to make which concerns positive suggestions for changes in the procedure of this House. Mr. Speaker, I would have liked very much to hear something constructive on the part of Progressive Conservative members this evening. For a number of months, the Canadian people have been able to see our proceedings on television. They realize that there are certain anomalies in our rules and they would like to see some improvements made to allow members of parliament to play a more human and more effective role in this institution and be more representative of those that we represent throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, the first thing that comes to my mind is the length of the speeches. I am not surprised at the silence of the Progressive Conservative members on this subject because they are the ones who most abuse our present rules, which allow members to speak for 40 minutes on the principle of a bill on second reading. Mr. Speaker, this is totally unacceptable. There are 265 members in the House, and after the next election, there will be more than 284 or 285. What should be considered at the second reading of a bill is the principle of the bill, and the Progressive Conservative members quite often use up 40 minutes each to talk systematically about the principle of the bill so as to delay referral to a committee and prevent the government from proceeding effectively with the implementation of its legislative program for the year. Mr. Speaker, there have been numerous and obvious examples of this in the last few sessions which should urge us to change promptly our procedure for the consideration of bills at the second reading stage. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, without muzzling the opposition, while allowing everyone to express his view freely and democratically since we are discussing only the principle of the bill, I believe it would be perfectly fair and so simple to limit the debate on second reading to a maximum of two or three speakers from each party, whose speeches should not exceed 15 minutes each.

We know that subsequently, in committee, we can hear several witnesses. We also realize that we can amend the bill and that after a comprehensive study in committee, it will come back before the House where we will study it at the report stage and, subsequently, at the third reading stage. During the last sessions and the last years, Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative party has made an unacceptable and abusive use of the standing order which allows a member to take the floor for a maximum of 40 minutes. I think that for the sake of common decency and civism we should give to the highest possible number of hon. members the opportunity to express their views and use a much shorter time to comment on bills on second reading.

In that respect, I deplore the attitude of the Progressive Conservative party which has literally wasted the time of parliament and despised this institution.

Another change is also needed, Mr. Speaker, and as it is something constructive, it is not surprising if the Progressive Conservative party avoided saying anything on that subject. We should allow members to have more frequent contacts with their electors and, consequently, to reflect here a more complete picture of the people's need. For a long time, Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House, we have been asking for a more compressed, I do not say reduced, but compressed work week, with the same total number of working hours but compressed into four days to allow members to spend Mondays or Fridays with their constituents.

On various occasions I myself raised the issue in my speeches here. We have asked for the co-operation of all members in changing to a four-day weekly schedule that would allow every member to go back to his riding, to meet with his constituents and also to have a much more regular family life. This has not yet come about but is nonetheless desirable. I am proposing it once more, most strongly and most respectfully.

Whatever the changes suggested, Mr. Speaker, two principles must be followed. First, truth must be respected. When I read a motion such as the one put forward today by the Progressive Conservative party, I feel it is odious. There is absolutely no truth in the three points made in that motion. It is absolutely not true that for more than 15 years the government has deliberately and steadily undermined the fundamental function of the House of Commons. It is absolutely not true that the government has refused to undertake a serious review of House procedures, and it is absolutely not true that the government has refused to consider the numerous worth-while proposals for reform. In 1976, I was sitting on the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I co-operated in the development of the reports submitted by the three subcommittees, and I attended the last meeting of that committee in September, 1976, when the three reports were tabled and it was decided, as appears from the minutes I have here, and I quote:

● (2112)

[English]

It was agreed that the revised subcommittee report as printed would be referred to the various caucuses.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when did we hear from the Progressive Conservative caucus, and when did we read their report on the worth-while parliamentary reform proposal the government submitted for study to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization? Never, Mr. Speaker. They prevented—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the essence of the parliamentary system is control by the representatives of the people over the power of the purse so that the policies and activities of the state may be directed.

At the core of the situation we are facing, as was well stated by my hon. friend for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), is the necessity for a meaningful system of estimates. It applies to all public expenditures and a fortiori to large controllable expenditures including, for reasons I will go into later, military expenditures. The present system is at best meaningless and at worst a farce. It is, I think, a serious danger to our parliamentary system. It is possible to defeat any meaningful control of estimates if those estimates are so vague and general that no individual, whether in committee or in the House, can grasp or deal with them. Parliamentary control, as I have said, is essential to our system. But inadequate parliamentary control is a snare and an illusion, and that is what I fear we have at the present moment.

I am not putting blame on any particular party. Many industrial societies are experiencing the same difficulty. We must have estimates with sufficient particulars. If I may borrow some judicial language from Chief Justice Duff and use it in a different context, he said there must be intelligibility of allegation; if people are asking for money from taxpayers they must allege with intelligibility, with understandability, what it is they propose to do with the money.

I want to take as an illustration of this general proposition the discussion of the national defence estimates—I am looking at the 1977-78 estimates. Under the heading "Defence" is contained a large and vague reference on the basis of which we are asked to vote away millions—in fact we get close to billions eventually—for such a thing as air defence forces. The program description is: "The maintenance of air defence military capability to safeguard Canadian sovereignty and independence". And so on. Well, Mr. Speaker, we are all in favour of safeguarding Canadian sovereignty and independence, but when we are asked for substantial sums of money we want to know how the plans proposed will in fact defend our sovereignty and independence, and that is what is lacking at the present time.

We all know there is plenty of discussion going on now about the proposed purchase of 130 to 150 fighter planes at a cost of $2.34 billion in 1977 dollars. It is generally thought that taking into account inflation and the changing value of the Canadian dollar, that sum will probably be inflated to around $4 billion. At this stage, of course, I am not discussing the merits of the proposal. I am asking whether there has been adequate scrutiny, and I say there has not.

We are in danger of being asked at some time in the future to approve this huge expenditure which some of us, including myself, consider to be a waste. It will be a fait accompli. We will not be asked to approve in advance. Estimates which come after the money has been committed and spent do not allow parliament an adequate opportunity to approve or disapprove. Approval after the fact is coerced, especially since there is a parliamentary majority.

There has been no accountability to parliament with respect to this matter. The original announcement—and I intend to go into this—came from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson), and I will just summarize it. It was made on March 18, 1977. The minister said that the cabinet had authorized a commission, which came to be known as the Manson commission, to inquire into which of several purchases of up to over $2 billion should be made. What did the Department of National Defence say? They said that the money had been spent. The Manson commission brought forward a short list, and that is presently being discussed. That has been done only at considerable expense, and naturally so.

At no time has this item appeared in the estimates. At no time has there been any adequate statement about the strategic thinking behind this, or about its purpose, or about the reality, if any, of a threat. Indeed, General Dextraze, then the chief of staff, referred to the threat of manned bombers as a remote possibility. There were no reasoned, intelligible reports on the matter.

So the matter has gone on. Time and again the minister has said in very general terms that we have to do this because of our obligations to our allies. He never tells us what our obligations are. Most of us who have looked into NORAD and NATO know that there is nothing which calls for us to do this. This is our own choice, but that choice is not being made by the Parliament of Canada. It is not being made for the people of Canada. A choice may be made at some stage in the future, but it will be made by the cabinet.

To bring this matter up to date, I asked my office to phone the Department of National Defence today. My office was told that these expenditures which have been made do not appear to be in any estimate. If they are in any estimate, they are so well buried that no one can find them.

That is the situation we are in. In the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence I tried to get a statement regarding capital expenditures. We were shown a graph covering 1978 to 1993 showing how this $2 billion is proposed to be spent. We were also shown other commitments dealing with such matters as our patrol frigates. We were told that we would have to get capital equipment to police our waters. Parliament has never been given a choice as to which of these two roles is more important.

Other countries have managed to get away from this kind of thing. Just this year, 1978, the Senate of the United States called for amendment of the arms control and disarmament act. This would require certain action on the part of the director of the agency involved. When anybody prepares a legislative or budgetary proposal requiring estimates concerning nuclear weapons to be acquired or requiring any estimates for total programs in excess of $250 million or any annual program costing more than $50 million—since the United States is a much larger country than ours the figures involved would be larger as well—reports must be made and details set out. The director involved must state the impact of proposed requests, and that is part of the law.

I want to read what Senator Clark said in dealing with a proposal for what was known as an enhanced radiation warhead, which is known colloquially by a different name. Senator Clark said this:

> —arms impact statement is fully justified, for it demands of the Executive a thoughtful and reasoned analysis of the over-all significance of the weapon under consideration.
> Mr. President, the requirements of the law are clear. Before we appropriate money for a system, we must know what that system will do. We must have this impact statement. The lack of this alone, it seems to me, justifies withholding Senate approval at this time.
> Mr. President, beyond these procedural questions are fundamental questions involving our commitment and interest in arms limitations—

The United States is a country which has much wider military obligations than we have, but Congress has striven to acquire some control over this spending. As I have pointed out, we seem to have no control whatsoever in that respect.

What is true with regard to defence is true with regard to many other fields. I want to emphasize that it is true with regard to military matters. I spoke to a well-known Conservative, who shall be nameless, a day or two ago. Since he and other members of the Conservative party had been saying that they want to scrutinize all expenditures with great care and cut out what we do not need, I asked him why he did not look at this program for acquiring fighter aircraft. "Oh," he said, "the military has decided that. I take its advice".

I think the same tendency exists within the government. That is an abdication from the principle of parliamentary authority. The military does not have sole control over matters of this kind. If there is any doubt about that, I would like to read something the Minister of National Defence said when Colonel Painchaud was fired, if that is what happens in the army when one loses his job.

Mr. Broadbent: Sacked.

Mr. Brewin: He was sacked. He was fired. He was the commander of the crack Canadian Airborne Regiment. He dared to criticize the Minister of National Defence, something I do on occasion. The minister at that time said this:

> —essential point which we must never, ever forget—that in a democracy it is civilian control of the military.
> We owe a lot to the military . . . but it is fundamental in our type of society that the policy and direction is in civil hands, those of the elected representatives.

That has been said by many others. It is the basis of our system. Therefore, I say that the general rule which I have propounded of adequate scrutiny applies as much to military matters as it does to anything else.

I will conclude by saying that we are not dealing with an unimportant matter. It is very important. It goes to the root of the parliamentary system of which we are part. I think most of us are proud to be part of it. We want to see this parliament function, and we want to see it exercise the authority given to it by the people and by the Constitution of Canada.

The present manner in which estimates are being handled is a failure. I do not join in any wholesale condemnation of the government. I do not think the present government is much worse or better than others we have had. Parliament should attempt to clarify and strengthen the means of control over public expenditures. That is the essence of this motion, and that is why we support it.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to rise for a moment or two to speak on the motion before the House. It is one of the most important motions which have been put before the House of Commons in a long, long time. Every member of parliament, if he is serious about this institution and about representing his constituents, must look at this motion with a gread deal of care.

Canada has a very unique form of government. The British parliamentary system operates without internal checks and balances. The fundamental manner in which the British parliamentary system operates allows the opposition to hold the government in check by not accepting its supply. The only manner in which that can be done effectively is for the opposition to have complete control over the examination of estimates.

For at least a decade, opposition members of parliament have not had such an opportunity. Every single member should know that the reputations of members of parliament and this institution perhaps have never been lower in the estimation of Canadians than it is at the present time.

Why is that true? It is because the government has emasculated a fundamental operation of parliament, that of control of the estimates. When a member of parliament is elected, his constituents think that he will take care of the taxpayers' dollar. We are here in a trustee relationship; we are trustees of taxpayers' money. Any government which refuses to permit members to perform that function attacks the fundamental institution of democracy, not a political party or individuals. Democracy is a very, very fragile form of government. It depends upon the rule of law and respect for our institutions.

In the last 15 years, the government has refused to change and modify the manner in which parliament operates. Its failure to bring in rules respecting estimates has done more to destroy respect for parliament, and therefore democracy, than anything else which has happended since confederation. All we have going for us in this critical period of time is the institution of parliament. Any government that attacks the manner in which we are permitted to operate is affecting the heart and soul of this country.

The motion before us is not a trivial one. Every member of parliament has a responsibility to look at it. He should examine his conscience as to the manner in which he will vote. Over the last decade there has been a decline in the entire institution of parliament. I do not say this entirely pejoratively. If one asks the majority of Canadians today if there is the same high standard of responsibility on the part of ministers of the Crown as traditionally expected in the British parliamentary system, they would say no. If they were asked whether the principle of candid solidarity as the framework in which to operate is working they would say no.

Most Canadians would not know why there is so little respect for this institution, but they know something has gone wrong. Perhaps Canadians think that no one in the House really cares about the manner in which their money is spent, or really protects their money from being wasted. Perhaps they were appalled that estimates in the amount of approximately $48 billion were passed in a half hour or so, yet no one really knows what is contained in the estimates. There is no system in place so that taxpayers will receive anything like a fair break regarding the manner in which their dollars are spent.

No member who has sat on the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates feels that he could do a decent job. Recently a very distinguished Canadian said, "Do you know what was the most demeaning circumstances I have experienced in my life? It was appearing before a parliamentary committee." I said, "Do you know what is more demeaning? Being a member of the committee".

The manner in which our estimates operate is a disgrace. It is not that members are not trying hard, but the only committee which is working well is the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, because it has the benefit of the staff of the Auditor General. If that had not happended by random, because the Auditor General was looking at the Atomic Energy Commission, we would never have known the scandalous manner in which that Crown corporation was operating.

We ask Canadians to vote, pay their taxes and accept the proposition that $50 billion will be spent. We are asking Canadians to do that, yet we do not have a system to examine how that money is spent. It is disgraceful. Any government which would allow that to happen for 15 years deserves to be thrown out.

I ask hon. members opposite to examine their consciences before saying that they have appeared on a committee on estimates or an expenditure committee and are able to say honestly that they were capable of doing their jobs under the present system. The committee system cannot function adequately until it has staff and is rid of the hangman, guillotine idea. Until we restore the idea that the estimates of some departments should be brought to the floor of the House of Commons, with unlimited time for examination, we will never be able to do what we are supposed to.

Why were we elected? Why are we here? We are reasonably well paid. We are here to perform a legislative function. We are the trustees of Canadians regarding the manner which their dollars are spent. We require reform in the operation of the House of Commons, and a fundamental commencement of that reform must be in the committee system and the examination of estimates. That is why I feel the motion before us is an important one, and that everyone should look at their consciences regarding the manner in which they vote.

The Auditor General reported that the finances of the Government of Canada are out of control. Ordinary people do not realize what is happening in this nation. How could this have happened? Why is there a deficit of approximately $11 billion or $12 billion? If we compare our deficit relating to budgetary expenses to that of the United States, we will find that it is four times higher. Our deficit is so large that the time for economic policy-making is almost gone. How was it possible to be so extravagant and unrealistic as to end up with an $11 billion deficit in the country? Anyone who pretends that the system is operating, and therefore votes against this motion, is blind. The evidence is in front of us. The system is not operating. It is important and necessary that we change it.

The Auditor General said that the financial accounts are out of control. When he appeared before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, he asked a question concerning the number of Crown corporations. He asked how many Crown corporations there were. He did not even know how many there were. The Government of Canada does not know how many Crown corporations there are, and does not know what they are.

• (2142)

An hon. Member: When was the last time you were at the public accounts committee?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Here we go again.

An hon. Member: We have to wait for an hour before your members show up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Shout, shout; that's all they can do.

Mr. Gillies: That is a real indication of the capability of those members over there. An hon. member asks how many committees I attend, and how many times I am there. Let me tell hon. members why attendance at committees is so poor. If anyone wants to know why committees are attended so poorly, let me tell him it is because committees do not work, because they are no good and because they are ineffective. That is why they are attended so poorly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: If committees did what they were supposed to do, people would be there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: I am interested in saying to those people over there—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Gillies: The only thing I can say to the members over there is that they will not be there very much longer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would suggest that hon. members extend the usual courtesy to the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear this sort of observation, and I say this in all seriousness, because hopefully those people will take the time to look at committees and will decide—

An hon. Member: Hopefully you will attend the public accounts committee.

Mr. Gillies: An hon. member says that hopefully I will come to the public accounts committee. Let me tell him that the amination of the estimates by the committee is a waste of ne. How can hon. members over there continue to kid emselves when the reputation of parliament is the way it is id when their party is going down the drain? How can they there and say the Canadian people think this is okay? stitutions are very difficult to reform internally, and certain- difficult to reform with that group over there.

The last point I want to make, and I want to make it very early, is that we are here as trustees of the money of the ople of Canada. We have a fiduciary obligation which is not ing fulfilled and which cannot be fulfilled with the rules as ey are and the way that committees operate in Canada. This an indictment of this government over the last 15 years. It is indictment hon. members over there will have to live with. et me tell hon. members again that what we have here is a atter of principle, that when we destroy our institutions, as ey have been trying to do, we are in great trouble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my ity, pursuant to Standing Order 58(9), to interrupt the oceedings at this time and put the question on the motion. he question is on the motion of the hon. member for Yukon Mr. Nielsen). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the otion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour will ease say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will ease say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays ave it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Nielsen) which was egatived on the following division:

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF EXTENT OF UNNECESSARY REGULATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and in circumstances of urgent and pressing necessity, I would move, if permission is granted, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

Given the estimate that excessive regulation in the United States will probably cost that country $100 billion next year, that the Canadian equivalent, on a comparable basis, will be even higher, and that the efforts by the Ottawa federal government in response to agreement reached by the first ministers' conference in February, 1978, do not begin to cope with this serious problem which is adding to inflation and strangling small business, this House urges the Prime Minister to assign special responsibility to a cabinet minister to deal with the issue immediately at the government level and proposes that the joint parliamentary committee on regulations and other statutory instruments be requested to examine and report the extent to which there is unnecessary regulation and its effect on the national economy.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

URBAN AFFAIRS

AHOP MORTGAGE DEFAULTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the fact that as of September this year there were 826 AHOP defaults—53 per cent of all mortgage defaults—and in light of the fact that almost 10 per cent of all AHOP mortgages are in a default position, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That the minister of urban affairs make a full statement on motions today outlining the appropriate policies in an attempt to avert this disaster.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can only be done with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CALL FOR STATEMENT ON SITUATION IN NAMIBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be requested to make to the House, upon his return here, a statement on motions with regard to the situation in Namibia, dealing with allegations that the present vote in that country has been accompanied by fraud and intimidation, as to Canada's possible participation in a peacekeeping force and, generally, as to the whole situation, background and prospects in that country of securing a peaceful transition to full independence.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for discussion at this time only with the unanimous agreement of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE INCREASE IN INDUSTRIAL MILK SUBSIDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the agreement which was signed in 1975-76 by industrial milk producers and the government through its Canadian Dairy Commission to cover the future costs of producing industrial milk, and in view of the fact that these costs have increased in 1978 by 52 cents a hundredweight, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House consider this problem so that the Minister of Agriculture may agree to this increase of 52 cents a hundredweight and its becoming effective as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of this motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

RECIPROCAL PENSIONS AGREEMENT WITH UNITED KINGDOM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of pressing necessity, the urgency of which has been prompted by the imminent departure of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for the United Kingdom.

Because of the number of elderly, retired immigrants from the United Kingdom living in Canada without the benefit of indexed pensions as accorded to those who remained in the United Kingdom, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House charge the Prime Minister to place on his agenda for discussion with the United Kingdom Prime Minister the matter of a Canada-United Kingdom reciprocal pensions agreement and to report to this House upon his return the results of those discussions.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT

REQUESTED RELOCATION OF OFFICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the deplorable fact that the Ministry of the Environment, in the year 1978, moved into a building in the new complex in Hull while admitting it is dumping raw sewage into the Ottawa River—though they are responsible for the well-being of the environment—and that contracts have not been awarded for a reported $120 million sewage plant of which the National Capital Commission is supposed to fund $40 million, whilst there are many vacant offices in Ottawa, I move, seconded by the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

• (1412)

That this government requests the Department of the Environment to immediately move out of this building in protest of this deplorable situation.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent and important matter.

In view of speculations regarding the contents of the report of the task force on Canadian unity which suggest that the federal government should abandon its efforts to implement its language policies in the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert):

That the House reaffirm its support of the Official Languages Act and call upon the Prime Minister to ask the co-chairmen of this task force to put an end to these speculations, which are both dangerous and detrimental to their work, by publishing the report forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion introduced by the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES NOT BE REDUCED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my motion expresses a hope which I believe is shared by every member of the House. I trust, therefore, that it will be accepted.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House express the hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs will soon be in a position to announce that war veterans allowance recipients will not lose any portion of their allowance because of increases they receive in the guaranteed income supplement or in family allowance payments arising out of Bill C-5 or Bill C-10, but that such veterans will receive the full benefit provided by parliament in Bill C-5 and Bill C-10, and that this assurance will be given as soon as possible, certainly before Christmas.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Introduction of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROCEDURE AND ORGANIZATION

PROCEDURE ADOPTED IN DEALING WITH STARRED QUESTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion concerns the failure of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to meet and deal satisfactorily with the problems before it, one of which is the status of starred questions. This matter was drawn to the attention of the committee both by Your Honour and by myself.

The starred question procedure was first used under the government of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must ask the hon. member to put his motion.

Mr. Rynard: The motion is that at the present time starred questions are not answered the next day, or even within a week or within a month. You, Mr. Speaker, have drawn this matter to the attention of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I have drawn it to the attention of the House leader on three occasions.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I have to lay this groundwork so that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot extend to the hon. member any different treatment than I extend to anyone else. If the hon. member has a motion, he will have to put it.

Mr. Rynard: Then I will state that after asking the former House leader on three occasions and the present House leader to call a meeting—and the understanding was that it was to be held—on the status quo of starred questions—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will have to proceed with the question period.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I move that my question be sent to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and that the committee meet immediately to deal with the status of starred questions. This motion is seconded by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

URBAN AFFAIRS

AHOP MORTGAGE DEFAULTS—SEVERITY OF PROBLEM

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs: it concerns the daily reports coming from accross the country about AHOP defaults and walkaways. Could the minister outline to the House the scope and severity of this problem? Just how serious is it in respect of the AHOP program?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): It is a very popular program, Mr. Speaker.

● (1417)

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Perhaps with the information I shall give the minister, he will not take the question so lightly. His department and CMHC have confirmed that in Ontario alone in the first quarter of next year there will be in excess of 8,000 notifications of foreclosures in respect of AHOP?

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Whiteway: Imagine the result if one multiplies that figure to cover the rest of Canada. Would the minister tell the House now, or make a statement on motions today, fully outlining this severe problem surrounding AHOP?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, last week I testified before a committee of the House and I explained the government's performance with regard to subsidies for the construction of homes in Canada. There is no doubt that there is an increase in the number of foreclosures. That depends on the economic conditions we are facing; but in his question, the hon. member refuses to acknowledge the fact that whatever transactions are done by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or by the banks, there is always a risk. As far as we in the government are concerned, we prefer to take the chance of allowing a potential home owner to own a house even though we may possibly end up being obliged to take that house back later, rather than denying him right from the start the opportunity to become a home owner.

[English]

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, last Monday, CMHC sent a telex to all CMHC offices across the country directing them to send to CMHC in Ottawa a list of all AHOP mortgages which were in a state of default. The number that has been reported, which the minister has, is massive.

Without getting into all the rhetoric, could the minister tell the House of Commons, now, if he will consider convening the appropriate standing committee, and will he outline there the scope and severity of this serious problem?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything serious about this matter. I think there is a fundamental difference between the Liberal party and the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Vive la différence.

An hon. Member: Horner is blushing.

Mr. Ouellet: We Liberals on this side are ready to give a break to low income and middle income people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: In so doing, we are running the risk of there being some defaults. It is quite clear that the Conservative party will never give a break to the low and middle income people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Shame. You are even stealing that one now.

QUALITY CONTROL UNDER AHOP

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. He is a bit testy today, but that is all right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

● (1422)

Mrs. Pigott: I would like to ask the same minister a question with regard to the quality control program for AHOP houses. There seems to be a great deal of concern by many owners that the quality control mechanisms have not been put in place. Will the minister inform the House what measures are being taken by his ministry and by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to ensure that quality control steps are taken for these owners?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government, through the efforts of my predecessor and myself, has put in place, in co-operation with HUDAC—the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada—guarantee programs. We have indicated that from now on, any mortgage that is guaranteed by CMHC will have to be under a plan that gives full protection to the new buyer.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has perhaps been misinformed a little by his department. That is after the fact. I am talking about the past.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Pigott: My goodness, the Gallup poll seems to have upset those boys.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: In light of the announcements by his ministry that he is bringing in the new guaranteed payment mortgage, will the minister please assure this House that the government will hold up that program until they review what is wrong with AHOP, in order that we do not compound the confusion for the poor people who have been put out on the street, with their credit ratings ruined—8,000 in Ontario alone? Will the minister please assure the House that he will rethink the guaranteed payment mortgage program?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, a few things are wrong in the allegations of the hon. member. First, it is a graduated payment mortgage, not a guaranteed payment mortgage, as she calls it. I assure the hon. member that this program allows other options for those seeking money in the market in order to buy a new home. It is quite clear that any time you allow someone to buy a new home and put forward a proper financial program to do it, you are running a risk.

The hon. member objects and appears scandalized because there have been some defaults. Obviously, the ideal position is to take no risk. However, that would substantially reduce the number of people who could become home owners. We do not think that is a sound way of doing it. We believe we have to take risks and give some breaks to those at the lower end of the income scale, hoping that their incomes will improve and they can keep their homes. Obviously, we do not succeed 100 per cent. However, the figures show that we have a success rate of over 95 per cent, which I think is pretty good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

ALLEGED KICKBACKS TO CMHC BUILDING INSPECTOR

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works, whom I congratulate on finding a difference between the Liberals and the Tories—something I have not been able to do. I have given the minister notice of my question.

Serious allegations have been made regarding kickbacks to a CMHC building inspector relating to the construction of 116 townhouses at Virginia Park, St. John's, with financial assistance provided through AHOP. Is the minister aware of these allegations? If so, has he called for an investigation by the RCMP?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of the question. I had a chance to check this allegation with CMHC officials who are looking into the matter. I expect to have a report tomorrow or early next week. I will then advise the hon. member and the House of the outcome of this investigation.

● (1427)

As far as the condition of the brick exteriors is concerned, we have been working for some time to find agreement among those concerned as to how the cost of repair could be financed. That is one of the problems involved. We are trying to find ways to help those who are experiencing these difficulties to find the appropriate financial resources.

Mr. Faour: I am glad the minister is aware of the inadequate quality of the houses: there have been horror stories related to bricks crumbling, inadequate foundations, cracked tiles, and sagging floors. However, I should like him to give a more positive assurance to people in the housing development concerned that CMHC will ensure that they will not suffer, and will guarantee any necessary repairs to their homes.

Mr. Ouellet: I cannot give such an assurance before being fully aware of the file. I can assure the hon. member that CMHC will take its full responsibility. We cannot go beyond, to the responsibility of the contractors, and we cannot assume the responsibility of the municipal authorities if, indeed, they were the prime ones who approved the construction and gave the go-ahead. But we are looking at the situation and we shall do our utmost to help the people affected by these deficiencies.

COMPENSATION FOR HOUSES DAMAGED THROUGH FAULTY WORKMANSHIP

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I brought this matter to the attention of the minister over a year ago. At that time I identified faulty inspection and the use of faulty materials, yet the minister refused to act and forced these low income earners to take their case to court.

If the minister is as interested in low income earners as he professes to be, will he tell the House that he is prepared to make compensation to these people who are the victims of what are alleged to be very corrupt practices? There are allegations of pay-offs to CMHC inspectors, a matter clearly within the jurisdiction of the minister, not of the city of St. John's.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I have indicated that the corporation is reviewing the various allegations and the documents.

An hon. Member: You've had a year to do that.

Mr. Ouellet: As soon as I have a report, I will bring it to the attention of the House.

Mr. McGrath: The situation which has surfaced in St. John's and which was aired on national television last night is, in my view, only the tip of the iceberg. We would identify other AHOP programs across the country where there is evidence of inadequate inspection and of substandard material being used. In the light of this, and of the evidence produced on national television last night, will the minister ask his colleague, the Attorney General, to order a full-scale investigation into the construction of AHOP housing?

Mr. Ouellet: The answer is, clearly, no. The opposition is systematically, on the basis of an isolated case, trying to build up a large general situation. There are thousands of builders in Canada who are performing well, who are using government programs and putting up top quality housing. I totally refute the type of allegation made by the hon. member who tries to use one isolated case to convey a message that all the builders in Canada are crooks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

USE OF AIR PASSES BY CERTAIN MEMBERS

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Further to an article published in one of this morning's newspapers in which it is stated that some federal minister put their air passes to personal use, does the right hon. Prime Minister intend to issue orders for putting an end to that practice?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the details of that article, but I do know, if I am correctly informed, that Air Canada gives passes to the ministers of this government because their duties demand that they travel throughout Canada. I point out to the hon. member from the New Democratic party that, at my request some five, six or seven years ago the leader of his party, the leader of the Progressive Conservative party and the leader of the Social Credit party of Canada were also given passes, which I suppose they use.

Mr. Janelle: Mr. Speaker, my question is again directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. I am speaking here of air passes given to the federal cabinet ministers which are being used for personal trips, for holidays. Is that use of thoses passes not contradictory to the code of ethics edicted by the right hon. Prime Minister some time ago?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member is speaking of special passes. May I repeat that I have not read the article. But I say again that ministers are provided with permanent passes, valid for a year but renewable from year to year; they are the same type of passes as those which, thanks to my intervention, the leader of the Social Credit party, the leader of the New Democratic Party and the leader of the Progressive Conservative party also received.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Since every member of the cabinet, as well as each party leader, has been issued these passes, and in view of considerable concern about their possible abuse, has the Prime Minister or have any of his ministers issued any guidelines, or have any guidelines ever been considered, so that Canadians can fully appreciate the fact that these passes are really for the purpose of fulfilling ministerial responsibilities and are not to be abused in any way? I think such abuse would be against the interest of the availability of these passes.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think it goes without saying that ministers, like other members of this House, would take free rides on Department of National Defence planes going to Europe. I know there are many Tories who do that. I assume they do it for the purpose of fulfilling their duties as parliamentarians.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister did not hear me. We are talking specifically about the passes which are given to cabinet ministers and party leaders with respect to two commercial airlines which operate both inside and outside Canada.

In view of the fact that this practice has been in existence for many years, can the Prime Minister indicate whether any guidelines have been issued or whether there is any understanding about the proper or improper use of these passes?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have issued no precise guidelines on this matter to ministers nor, indeed, to the Leader of the Opposition, who receives the same kind of pass.

I understood the hon. member's question perfectly. The use to which these passes are put is to be decided by ministers, just as it is to be decided by members of the opposition when they take free rides on DND planes. I hope they do it according to their conscience.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in somewhat of a "ready, aye ready" statement in London, said that the government has reached an advanced state of planning for sending a battalion of combat troops of 600 to 700 men to Namibia.

Would the Prime Minister tell the House if such reports are true and, if so, will the government now undertake to bring a resolution before the House for debate before a final decision is made to send troops on a new and major UN commitment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure why, in the preface to his question, the hon. member mocked the minister by suggesting that the minister's position is a "ready, aye ready" position. The House knows—and I thought we had the support of the opposition—that in peacekeeping operations Canada is indeed in the forefront of all countries which are members of the United Nations. I believe we have the greatest number of troops involved in such operations.

We happen to think this is a useful way to employ our military people. We want to make sure that our military people serve peace as well as war, and I believe there is full support for that. I hope the hon. member supports that policy.

As far as Namibia is concerned, the hon. member knows that Canada was one of the Group of Five trying to find a peaceful solution to the problem in Namibia. All the Secretary of State for External Affairs said was that if the United Nations asked us for further troops, we would naturally consider the request.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not answer the basic question of whether he would bring this matter back to the House in the form of a resolution so that the Parliament of Canada could know what kind of commitment we are getting into. At the present time, all the Canadian people and parliament know is that we are getting into a new and major commitment which is being made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding a very dicey situation in Africa. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that we will have an opportunity to debate a resolution in this House on this important matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member knows that, he certainly knows more than I do in this particular case. To my knowledge, there is no commitment. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made no commitment. The parliamentary secretary tells me that no request has been made to us as yet. I do not know why the hon. member says that all Canadians know we are into a major commitment.

LOTO CANADA

CONDITIONS OF CONTRACT WITH GENERAL INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) relating to the ill-fated Loto Select program.

This morning I attempted to get, through the minister's office and through Loto Canada, copies of the government's $23 million contract with General Instruments, but I was refused. Can the minister at least tell the House today whether contained in that contract there is a clause which provides for the breaking of the contract or the cancellation of the contract with General Instruments? If so, what is the nature of that clause?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman could not have been in the House when I answered a similar question asked by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton.

There are provisions in the contract which would prohibit its circulation or tabling in the House at this time. However, once the contract is cancelled, I have given my undertaking to consider tabling it along with the dispensation documents.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the minister one very straightforward question. Can the minister tell the House, yes or no, whether contained within that contract there is a cancellation clause which would allow the government to escape from its commitments?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and I am not.

An hon. Member: No, he isn't.

Mrs. Campagnolo: However, in the contract there is a confidentiality clause which precludes me from answering his question.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PROTECTION AGAINST UNSAFE WORKING CONDITIONS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the passage, several months ago of Bill C-8 which provides under part IV of the Canada Labour Code the right of workers to refuse to work in unsafe working conditions, and for the establishment of safety committees, and in view of continuing uncertainty as to whether this legislation applies to uranium mine workers—who have experienced special problems in this regard in the past—what action is being taken to clarify this matter so that we might see that workers are covered by the safety and health provisions of Bill C-8?

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have been giving attention to the serious matter raised by the hon. member for Algoma. Just a week or so ago, my department received a legal opinion from the Department of Justice to the effect that part IV of the Canada Labour Code does, contrary to former belief, apply to health and safety matters in uranium mines. I have, therefore, asked my department to notify unions and companies in the industry to this effect, and I will be meeting with people in the industry to plan an orderly rearrangement of responsibilities.

The protection provided in Bill C-8 which we passed last session has not, thus far, been afforded to uranium miners because the licences issued by the Atomic Energy Control Board require companies to comply with provincial law. As a result of the legal opinion to which I referred, it is now clear that the federal law applies, and we will be making efforts toward a rearrangement of responsibilities.

ENERGY

KITIMAT OIL PIPELINE PROPOSAL

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: it concerns the report in yesterday's Globe and Mail that the Kitimat proposal is being actively revived by that consortium. Previously, the minister has been somewhat ambiguous on the matter, but the Minister of State for the Environment was very clear that this government was completely opposed to the Kitimat oil proposal on environmental grounds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: My question to the minister is, can he confirm that it is still this government's position that the Kitimat oil proposal is dead and will not proceed?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that at my request the National Energy Board addressed itself to the question of whether or not a western port of entry would be essential or needed to support Canada's objective of self-reliance. The National Energy Board has since reported to me and it is quite clear that such a port of entry is not essential to Canada's objective of self-reliance.

Mr. Leggatt: The minister has not answered the question, because the National Energy Board did not state, in relation to U.S. needs, whether the port would be a viable one in supplying the United States; so he is clearly skirting the question.

The Kitimat oil consortium recently lobbied the cabinet in British Columbia and I understand they received a favourable response. Their proposal is before the U.S. government now, and a decision will be made by the U.S. government very shortly concerning that proposal. My question is: has the government now received additional representations from either B.C., the U.S. government or the Kitimat consortium to proceed with a west coast oil port to supply U.S. oil needs?

Mr. Gillespie: To the best of my knowledge, we have not received any additional representations on behalf of the U.S. government, on behalf of any of the producers or on behalf of the B.C. government with respect to the Kitimat port of entry. The point I want to make—I will restate it—is that the port of entry has not been found by the National Energy Board to be, so far as the foreseeable future is concerned, essential to the energy self-reliance of Canada.

I hope the hon. member will understand that the National Energy Board has to concern itself with the energy self-reliance of Canada and benefits for Canadians; it is not concerned with benefits that might accrue to third parties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

CONTRACTUAL LINK BETWEEN CANADA AND EEC

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister as he takes off for Europe. I have just returned from a NATO conference, where I talked with a great many members of parliament from all the countries in the European Economic Community. I found that none of them had any knowledge of the operation of a contractual link between Canada and their countries. I wonder if the Prime Minister, when he arrives in Europe, would set in motion a search for this missing link which he announced with such fanfare a couple of years ago and which, if it actually does exist, is the best kept secret in Europe today.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think there is a very simple answer to that question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member, who is a member of the opposition, must have been talking to opposition members over there who know nothing about their countries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: We in the opposition, when we go on visits of that kind, are democratic and speak to people in all parties, both government and opposition. We are not like the Prime Minister, who says that members of parliament are nothing when they are 50 yards from Parliament Hill.

I ask him this question: as it is now obvious that the contractual link has been stillborn, does the government not think it is entitled to a decent burial, along with that other figment of the Prime Minister's imagination, namely, wrestling inflation to the ground?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member is actually looking for a link, he has not understood the nature of our policy. But if ever he wants to wrestle to the ground, we can give it a try, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: I have driven him out of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LOTO CANADA

REPORTED WASTE IN CORPORATION—MINISTER'S ANSWERS OF YESTERDAY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the gambling minister responsible for our federal lotteries. Yesterday, when I called the minister the $37 million woman so far as Loto Select costs were concerned, she replied she was only an $800,000 woman, only to increase that figure later to undisclosed millions. She thereby confused, if not misled, the House as to the actual costs.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Jelinek: Would the minister take the opportunity now to correct her statements of yesterday including, what is more important, the false impression she left that the provinces were consulted prior to these expenditures regarding Loto Select; and at the same time can she tell the House whether or not Loto Canada acted with the advice of the government on this matter?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): I thank the hon. member for his question regarding the figures. Those are the exact figures up to this time. The $2 million to $3 million that I mentioned as the resolution of the $14 million original commitment is not an exact figure as yet. When it is, I will present it to the House. The hon. member will also recall that, as I said, the $14 million figure given by the CBC was really a $2 million to $3 million figure.

As to the other question which the hon. gentleman asked me regarding consultation with the provinces, I want to make particularly clear what the exact history of this matter is, because shortly after I was given the responsibility for Loto Canada my first action was to set up communications with the provinces preparatory to a federal-provincial meeting to discuss just this matter. Such a meeting was convened in the late fall of 1977. Two days before the meeting, the B.C. government representative for lotteries refused to attend; thus, all the other provinces refused to attend as well. I spent the next several months trying to set up another meeting. It was at the initiative of the federal government that the meeting was held at Regina in June of this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LETTING OF CONTRACT WITH GENERAL INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Obviously, the minister is talking about meetings after expenditures for Loto Select were made.

I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Yesterday, the minister said that the Crown corporation, meaning Loto Canada, acted without the advice of the government. In view of the fact that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport has just stated that she wanted to have a meeting with the provinces in that regard and Loto Canada was involved, can he confirm or deny what he said yesterday? Also, can the minister advise the House whether he has been able to find out, as he promised yesterday, anything regarding the letting of the contract with General Instruments Corporation, without tender?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that the Crown corporation acted independently, and I think that is what I still say today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PURCHASE OF EQUIPMENT—ADVICE OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Can we have an answer to the question put by my colleague? Did Loto Canada, in the matter of the purchase of equipment, act with, or without, the advice of the Government of Canada?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said, we are a Crown corporation and we took our responsibility. That is not to say that we are in any way different from any other representative Crown corporation in the lottery business for, indeed, as the hon. member opposite knows, in the case of Ontario for instance they did precisely the same thing and dealt with the U.S. corporation as well, one which we have never heard of in the House.

Mr. Clark: In her enthusiasm today—and I am pleased to see she is now refraining from advertising the superior virtues of CTV over CBC—the minister has declined to answer the question put by myself and my colleague.

What, precisely, was the role of the minister involved in the decision by Loto Canada to purchase this equipment? Was there advice, or was there not advice? Was there consultation by Loto Canada, or was there no consultation? Is Loto Canada, or are officials of that corporation, being hung up to dry by the Government of Canada, or is the government going to take responsibility either for the advice it gave, or for the failure to scrutinize the activities of the Crown corporation responsible to it, which resulted in a significant error costing Canadians millions of dollars?

Mrs. Campagnolo: As the Leader of the Opposition knows, or should know, we are a Crown corporation subject to the fiscal restraints of a Crown corporation, subject to the Financial Administration Act and subject, as well, to the Auditor General. I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition would be quite interested to know that I feel the only people who are being hung out to dry are the people of Canada, by virtue of his continued references to the provinces in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1452)

Mrs. Campagnolo: The hon. Leader of the Opposition has made it perfectly clear that should he—heaven forbid—ever be on this side of the House, he would cancel Loto Canada. In doing so he would deny the athletes and the broad cultural dimension of this country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the minister's colleagues were shouting to give the minister some time to cool down. My question is a simple one: was the minister or any other minister of the Government of Canada involved in the decision, or contacted with regard to the decision, before it was made in respect of Loto Canada to purchase this equipment? Yes, or no?

An hon. Member: Yes, or no yourself, Joe.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has said that I require time to cool down. I might say that is very interesting, in the context of this morning's CBC report which said I sat at my desk yesterday, long after question period, in order to cool down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it plain that I was still sitting here at ten o'clock last night because it was my duty day in the House. That is the kind of reporting we have had over this issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: And that is the kind of attitude that the hon. Leader of the Opposition has taken. I am saying that the hon. Leader of the Opposition has been invited by the sports people of Canada to come and explain his position on Loto Canada and why he wants to cancel it, but he has refused to talk to them.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

An hon. Member: Just answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PUBLIC WORKS

INQUIRY WHETHER DATA PROCESSING CENTRE WILL BE ESTABLISHED IN JONQUIÈRE, QUEBEC

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister tell the House whether, after his recent appointment to this portfolio, he intends to pursue the excellent job made by his predecessor regarding policy of the dencentralization of federal departments, and particularly the construction of a tax data processing centre in Jonquière, which is essential for the economy of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area especially because of the number of jobs it could create?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are certainly going to go ahead with our project to provide the town of Jonquière with a tax data processing centre.

[English]

At the same time, I would like to reiterate our unequivocal commitment to a data centre in Sudbury, Shawinigan and Surrey.

POST OFFICE

ACTION TAKEN AGAINST ILLEGAL STRIKERS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General, the Evel Knievel of the Post Office.

In view of the fact there is already low morale among workers in the Post Office, a fact of which I am sure the Postmaster General is aware, that this low morale is contributing to low productivity in the handling of mail, and in view of the fact that in the Ottawa area alone hundreds of suspensions and hundreds of discriminatory letters of warning have been sent out to CUPW members, will the Postmaster General tell the House if it is his intention that, instead of attacking CUPW, he is now prepared to rescind the suspensions and dismissals to date?

An hon. Member: No way.

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, again, I have no intention of rescinding any disciplinary action that has been taken by the Post Office. I should like to tell the hon. member that if there is low morale or low productivity in the Post Office, I would invite him to help us boost the morale and give them a better reputation, instead of directing all this attention to people who do not want to work properly, and giving more attention to that co-operative body of workers in the Post Office who want to work and do not want to be prevented by some militant workers.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Postmaster General is now taking an ostrich position, and in view of the fact that yesterday in this House he went even further to provoke Post Office workers by threatening to fire them on an even larger scale, perhaps the Postmaster General will tell the House whether he really believes that such retaliation and harassment will result in bringing labour peace to the Post Office; or is it his intention to provoke a strike to cover up the fact that the Post Office is not operating well but is still being mismanaged, going into the Christmas rush?

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PROTECTION AGAINST UNSAFE WORKING CONDITIONS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question supplementary to the one posed by the hon. member for Algoma to the Minister of Labour.

We in Saskatchewan are, of course, extremely interested in the whole matter of uranium mining, health and environmental considerations. Would the minister tell the House, in respect of his legal opinion, whether he intends to have his department move in unilaterally or whether he has, in fact, consulted with provincial authorities concerning this whole matter relating to health and environmental considerations?

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we just learned of this decision a few days ago. I am discussing the federal-provincial aspects of it with my colleague, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. It is, indeed, my intention to discuss the matter with the provinces, particularly Saskatchewan and Ontario, for I well know their interest in mining health and safety. Perhaps we can work out a satisfactory arrangement in respect of the legal aspect which appears to be federal, and the inspection and enforcement aspects which traditionally have been provincial.

We do not intend to move unilaterally, but I must say—and I think the House would expect me to say this—that we cannot leave the uranium miners in the invidious position in which they have been because of these legal decisions. We will be moving as quickly as we can.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, could we get the assurance of the minister that the jurisdiction extends also to uranium refineries and subsidiary uranium pursuits? One of the main concerns of Saskatchewan people, particularly, relates to the lack of available information from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. regarding the contents of the environmental and health studies that have been carried out.

Could we get a commitment from the minister that he will, in fact, bring into public light the results of his studies in terms of health and environmental consequences of uranium mining and refining?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that my department has done such studies. I will inquire. The question might more properly be directed to the minister responsible for the Atomic Energy Control Board. I will inquire as to whether in fact we have any such studies.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY RESPECTING EMPLOYEES FOR NEXT THREE YEARS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. I will give him an opportunity to get back to his seat. This is the third time I have stood in an effort to determine the position of the overclassification audit, or the classification audit which has been undertaken by this government.

On November 22, the former president of the treasury board stated, as appears at page 1372 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I will be making the results of that classification audit, inside and outside the national capital region, public within the matter of a few days. Also, I will deal with the response of the government to the findings of that audit at the same time.

My question is a simple one. Is it a fact that the findings are so embarrassing that the government is attempting to sweep them under the rug? If that is not the case, would the minister indicate why he is so slow in giving us this evidence which is sorely required by the Canadian people in terms of trying to find out how many million dollars we have lost?

An hon. Member: That's a humble, simple little question.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): The answer to the first part of the question is no; and I will be tabling it the latter part of this week or the beginning of next.

● (1502)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, would the minister give us the opportunity of hearing his voice on motions? In this regard, would he assure the House that when he tables that document he will also deliver a statement as to the government's solution following the classification study, thereby giving members of parliament an opportunity to question him? Will he give us that assurance?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to consider the representations of the hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have two outstanding procedural matters with which I would like to deal as directly as possible. However, if I could have some assurance that we might get through routine proceedings fairly quickly, perhaps we could deal with it first. I refer to points raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) yesterday, and by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) some time ago on a question of privilege.

MERCHANT MARINE

Question No. 79—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. Did Canada have a merchant marine, and, if so (a) during which years (b) how many ships did it consist of, and in each case, what was its tonnage?

2. In the 1977-78 fiscal year, did the government own any ships and, if so (a) how many (b) what was their total value (c) how many were in service?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as Transport Canada is concerned:

1. Canada has had a merchant marine since the early part of the eighteenth century. The following table lists the number of vessels and the gross registered tonnage for selected years from 1920 to 1977 for the foreign trade and from 1950 to 1977 for the inland waters trade. Statistics on the inland waters trade are not readily available prior to 1950. While an accurate trend is shown by this table some inaccuracies may exist due to the different methods of collecting statistics over the long time frame involved.

1000 Gross Tons and Over

	Inland Water Trade		Foreign Trade Excluding the Great Lakes
Year	Number	Gross Registered Tons	Number	Gross Registered Tons
1920			82	334,430
1925			79	422,201
1930			66	397,527
1935			42	295,951
1939			38	241,684
1945			173	1,075,903
1950	255	724,174	88	582,651
1955	252	875,395	25	183,336
1960	252	927,273	18	150,459
1965	199	1,356,833	3	43,715
1970	163	1,507,827	3	57,757
1971	156	1,486,236	4	27,685

1976	146	1,546,201	3	56,479
1977	150	1,674,405	3	56,479

2. (a) 79 government-owned ships operated by the Canadian coast guard of Transport Canada.

(b) $222,373,833.

(c) all 79 ships were in service.

In so far as fisheries and oceans is concerned:

[Mr. Speaker.]

1. See Transport Canada.

2. (a) 258 vessels over 20 feet in length;

(b) In 1978 dollars replacement value is $350,000,000;

(c) 245 vessels over 20 feet in length.

In so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned:

1. See Transport Canada.

2. (a) 132.

(b) *$3,274,621,000 (Fiscal year 1977/78).

(c) 119.

* The value was obtained using the original acquisition cost of the vessels multiplied by the inflation factor from a DND economic model. This does not represent the actual cost of replacement as the true cost of acquisition of new vessels would be much greater.

VFR SUPPLEMENT

Question No. 153—Mr. Brisco:

1. Regarding the November 2, 1978 editions of the VFR Supplement published by the Surveys and Mapping Branch, Department of Energy, Mines and Resources (a) what is the best estimate of the per unit cost of the edition which will provide coverage of Quebec south of 60 degrees north and the National Capital Region in French and English and will contain coverage of the rest of Canada south of 60 degrees north in English only (b) what is the best estimate for the cost of the total number of the partially bilingual edition (c) what is the best estimate of the per unit cost of the English only edition which will provide coverage of Canada south of 60 degrees north (d) what is the best estimate of cost for the total number of English only publications?

2. Does all the information appear in English in the partially bilingual edition and, if so, what is the justification for publishing both editions?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows:

1. (a) The VFR Supplement is produced under contract and the unit cost estimate for the November 2, 1978 edition which provides coverage of Quebec south of 60 degrees north and the national capital region in French and English and the remainder of Canada south of 60 degrees north in English only is $1.59.

(b) Production cost for the 7,651 partially bilingual supplements is $12,165. For this issue subscribers were given the option of receiving either the partially bilingual edition or an English only edition. At this time, however, not all returns have been received, and for these subscribers it was decided that they will continue to receive the partially bilingual edition until the Canada map office is in receipt of subscriber direction to convert to the English edition. It is anticipated that the eventual bilingual production quantity will be approximately 3,000.

(c) $0.96.

(d) $15,183.

2. Yes. In addition, a section has been included which provides coverage of the province of Quebec (south of 60 degrees north) and the national capital region in French. The two editions are published in order to meet operational requirements as specified by the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence.

HILLTOP MOBILE HOME SALES LTD.—LONDON, ONT.

Question No. 162—Mr. Roche:

Is CIDA purchasing mobile homes from Hilltop Mobile Home Sales Ltd., London, Ontario, at a total contract value of $235,444 and, if so (a) how many (b) for what purpose?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes. (a) 4. (b) The mobile homes will be used to lodge Canadian advisers working on a CIDA-financed fisheries training project in Colombia. When the advisers depart for Canada the homes will be used to house the Colombian teachers who will continue work on the project.

ASSOCIATE CHIEF LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL—GENERAL COUNSEL

Question No. 214—Mr. Jones:

1. Who has been appointed Associate Chief Legislative Counsel, Legislative Programming Section? What are his qualifications for this position? What will be the duties of this position?

2. Who has been appointed General Counsel, Legislation and Regulations (French version)? What are his qualifications for this position? What will be the duties of this position?

3. For what purpose were these two positions created? Do the responsibilities covered by these two new positions eliminate the need for other, already existing positions, and if so, delineate which ones.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): 1. Mr. Gérard Bertrand, QC; qualifications: LL.L. 1952 Laval; admitted to the Bar of Quebec in 1952; 1972 to 1976 assistant secretary to the cabinet (Legislation and House planning); Registrar, Supreme Court of Canada 1976 to 1978; duties: in association with the Chief Legislative Counsel advises the government on matters of legislative policy and acts to ensure that legislation drafted for the government meets the high standards required; in the absence of or on behalf of the chief legislative counsel, approves the final version of items of legislation for presentation to cabinet.

2. Mr. Rémi Geoffrion, QC; qualifications: LL.L. 1957, Montreal; admitted to the Bar of Quebec in 1957; 1957 to 1967 private practice in Montreal; 1967 to 1978 legislation section, Department of Justice, responsible for the French version of legislation; duties: acts as special consultant to drafters of the French version of legislation and regulations; has supervision of work of re-writing French version of statutes for next revision.

3. The two positions were established as part of an over-all plan that responds to recommendations made by the Commissioner of Official Languages with respect to the Department of Justice legislative group. The responsibilities of the positions are new and were not covered by previous existing positions.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—LAWYERS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 251—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Department of Supply and Services and what amount was each paid per year?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the legal agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: None.

ARK PROJECT—P.E.I.

Question No. 416—Mr. Brisco:

1. Were efforts made to find Canadians of equal competence to those of Americans working on the Ark Project in Prince Edward Island and, if so, what were they?

2. Has an application been made to license in Canada the design components for the Ark Project which were manufactured in the United States?

3. Were plastics for the Ark Project greenhouse imported from the United States and, if so, has any effort been made to manufacture the same types of plastics here in Canada and, if so, by whom?

4. Is the Ark Project report to the government approximately three feet long and available in limited quantities at a price ranging from $200 to $250 per copy?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. Yes. The director of the Ark Project is a Canadian and six members of the New Alchemy Institute associated with the Ark Project are Canadians. The other two members are landed immigrants. Construction of the Ark was contracted to companies on Prince Edward Island, some of which employed a minority of citizens of the United States of America.

2. No.

3. All plastics used in the Ark were purchased from Chemacryl Plastic Company, Toronto, Ontario. With one exception, they were manufactured in Canada.

4. No. Environment Canada published a free booklet entitled "A Most Prudent Ark" in 1977. The New Alchemy Institute published a book on the Ark in 1976 at a price of $200.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Question No. 517—Mr. Mazankowski:

How many orders in council were passed in 1977 and up to October 31, 1978 and how many were published in the Canada Gazette?

Motions for Papers

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council):

Year	Passed	Published in Canada Gazette
1977	3,746	860
1978 (to Oct. 31, 1978)	3,311	686

NOTE: —Some statutes require publication of certain orders in council in the Canada Gazette—the remainder are not published however all orders in council are public documents and lists of them are tabled regularly in the House of Commons. Concerning inspection and obtaining copies of orders in council, see part 21 of regulations made pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Act (Canada Gazette part II, vol. 105, No. 22)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 18 is acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents.

CTC—ANGUS STONEHOUSE AND CO. LTD.

Motion No. 18—Mr. Whittaker:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all contracts between Angus Stonehouse and Co., Ltd. and the Canadian Transport Commission having to do with the reporting of public hearings by the said commission.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 2, 3, 10, 11 and 15?

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Motion No. 2—Mr. McKenzie:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all government contracts, excluding Crown corporations and agencies, with Canadian firms and individuals for the years 1976 and 1977.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the number of documents requested is high and the number of contracts is in the range of thousands. The expenses in terms of time and labour necessary for the reproduction of those documents would be considerable or prohibitive. I would thus ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Mr. Paproski: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

[English]

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

Motion No. 3—Mr. Towers:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the file or files in the possession of the Department of the Solicitor General and/or in the possession of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police relating to the investigation concerning Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding that the investigation in this connection was with respect to a federal statute, the alleged offence was criminal in nature and came under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of Saskatchewan. Production of the files is being denied because, as stated above, they relate to a matter in which the province of Saskatchewan was concerned, and the concurrence of the provincial authorities to the release has not been forthcoming.

In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I hereby ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Towers: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

QUEEN MARY VETERANS HOSPITAL IN MONTREAL

Motion No. 10—Mr. Herbert:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings, agreements and other communications between the government and the province of Quebec concerning the transfer of the Queen Mary Veterans Hospital in Montreal.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion since there is a rather large number of papers requested and a substantial amount would have to be earmarked as well as much time would have to be devoted to their preparation.

An hon. Member: Motion to stand. Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

V.A.—DECENTRALIZATION TO P.E.I.

Motion No. 11—Mr. Herbert:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications relating to the decentralization of the Department of Veterans Affairs to the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the documents requested deal with negotiations under way which could lead to agreements between municipal, provincial and federal governments and cannot be disclosed. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

An hon. Member: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Allowed to stand. Transferred for debate.

BRITISH COLUMBIA HYDRO AND POWER AUTHORITY

Motion No. 15—Mr. Brisco:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all papers and documents, studies, reports and correspondence between the government and the Province of British Columbia and/or British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, relating to the duties and functions to be carried out by British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority in its capacity as the designated entity under the Columbia River Treaty and subsequent protocol endorsed by the Governments of Canada and the United States, specifically under Article XIV of the Treaty, including any and all exchanges of notes between the Governments of Canada and the United States exchanged under Article XIV and any other material, documents, papers, studies and correspondence in the possession of the government concerning the possibility of designating another entity than British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority as the agent of Canada under the Treaty, or the appointment of a second Canadian entity under the Treaty to share responsibility with British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, or the empowering or charging of British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority with the responsibility of ensuring the greater stability of the Arrow Lakes and the suspension of all progress on the Kootenay River Diversion project.

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the production of those papers would require lengthy and detailed research in the archives, but the main facts, including the duties and functions of the Canadian group concerned, as well as supporting documents, can be found in the following publication: The Columbia River Treaty and Protocol—A Presentation—February 1964. It is available at the parliament library as well as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

There have been no other discussions and therefore no other correspondence or documents on the possibility of designating another or a second group, or in connection with the responsibilities of the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority with regard to the stability of the shores of the Arrow Lakes or the Kootenay River Diversion project.

In view of the above, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Brisco: I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of documents be allowed to stand?

Point of Order—Mr. Andre

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there is, under the production of papers, No. 18. Did the hon. member say it would be allowed to stand?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I have already said that the motion for the production of papers No. 18 is acceptable to the government.

Mr. Paproski: I am sorry. That is the first time that anything has been acceptable.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, in accordance with practices which we have been following over the last short while, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) raised by way of a point of order his concern with a $1 item in the estimates. I thank the hon. member for having taken the occasion yesterday, the second last allotted day in this part of the session, to raise the matter. I would like to reiterate to the House that, having done that and thereby giving opportunity yesterday for a brief argument on both sides, it has given the Chair an opportunity to adjudicate on the matter in advance of the last allotted day and, therefore, in advance of the time pressures that are already too heavy upon the supply procedure on the last day.

I believe I gave the hon. member yesterday a preliminary indication of the procedural difficulty which I face. That was that the $1 item to which he had taken objection had simply extended the authority which was already placed in the original and main estimate, and was in precisely the same language in the main estimate item. It is therefore clear that the item does not seek any authority which was not sought in the main estimate and already dealt with at an earlier date by this House.

On the strength of precedents that I have already recited over the last one or two supply arguments of this sort, I am not able to intervene procedurally because the $1 item is not there for the purpose, obviously, of seeking any new authority. I cannot deal with it at this time.

The language which appears in the last line of vote 30a is remarkable. The hon. member has brought this to the attention of the House, and it was dealt with in a brief way by the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). It reads:

—notwithstanding that the total of such payments may exceed the equivalent in Canadian dollars estimated as of October, 1977—

That language led the hon. member to fear that that appeared to be some sort of authority to go beyond the amount of the item. If so, it would seem to be at cross purposes with our whole supply process to use language which might extend to any organization or agency authority to spend more money than they were getting through the vote.

Again, this is precisely what was arranged in the original item, and the President of Privy Council also assured the House that that was not the intention. I did some further investigating into this matter, and it appears that the origin of that phrase had to do with the previous practice of listing grants and contributions under this vote of CIDA in foreign currency. Therefore, it was felt necessary to put in this language to protect against fluctuations when the grants were listed for the purposes of the estimates in the foreign currency. I think the hon. member can understand that some step like that might have had to be taken. That is no longer done. The breakdown of votes under this paragraph is now done in Canadian currency. It therefore seems to me that the language was not only inoperative but unnecessary.

I would, therefore, take up the hon. member's point by simply signalling that to those who are responsible for the preparation of future items, because I think the House would express surprise if that phrase were to recur unless there were some clear need for it, which does not seem to be apparent at the present time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—MINISTERIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) some time ago raised, by way of a very interesting question of privilege, a matter to which there were extensive contributions from all sides of the House. After carefully considering all of the arguments I attempted to adjudicate on the matter in a preliminary way on November 9.

On that day I listed a number of ancillary concerns that I thought perhaps stood in the way of a final decision, and I dealt with most of them. I left until a later date, however, three of the concerns that I had. One related to the form of the motion. In that respect I can say to the House at this time that the hon. member, who is the sponsor of the motion, at my request has sought some advice and assistance from the Table. In co-operation with them, he has drafted a motion which I think is less likely to damage our series of precedents in respect to these kinds of motions.

I use that language carefully, because I think I indicated to the hon. member at that time that I was not even sure whether I would have to find the motion out of order. I think I should make it clear that we were therefore not attempting to extend to the hon. member some relief against a motion which might have been out of order. I think he could probably have convinced me that I would have to accept the motion on procedural grounds. I would just be a little more comfortable with the kind of motion he has consulted about, and that we will be considering in a few moments.

I also left with the House two areas of concern that I thought the House might want to take up if it in any way differed with my preliminary opinion. Those were the doctrine of subjudice and the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. I indicated at that time that I had some concern about both matters but that I did not think they had procedural significance.

In respect of the doctrine of subjudice, I was prepared to set it aside in a preliminary way—I said subject to further argument—because the parallel inquiry that would be involved was not in any way a trial and there was no verdict which I felt could be prejudiced by a parallel inquiry. I, therefore did not think the doctrine has an application in that sense. I did say, and I repeat, that we nevertheless had to face the danger of parallel inquiries. Whether this is an appropriate time for that is something for the House to decide. What I said then, and repeat now, is that I am simply finding there is no procedural basis on which I could take that into account. If the House wishes to take it into account in debate or an amendment of the motion, or a vote, that is the business of the House. It is not of procedural significance, in my view, unless I were to be persuaded now by interventions to the contrary.

Similarly, on the relationship to our practices in the past in respect of ministerial responsibility, I think it is noteworthy that the letter which is the subject matter of this question of privilege is a letter from a minister to a member.

The complaint which is the subject matter of the question of privilege is not directly a complaint about the minister. Indeed, it is founded on the fact that it is one of the minister's officials who has calculated to contrive this deliberate deception of the House. In fact I have indicated some concern about the fact that this may perhaps be looked upon as a new departure in our practice—that we are going around the minister to get directly at the official by way of this question of privilege. Even if that is so, I have come to the conclusion that it is not a procedural basis upon which I can intervene. Once again, it is a matter to which the House can address itself in debate, and in amendment if necessary, or in a vote. These are not the matters that finally become my responsibility from a procedural point of view, however.

Failing any argument to the contrary, therefore, I would consider that I had dealt with the ancillary matters completely that I listed on November 9. That leaves us with the complaint of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham respecting the testimony of former commissioner Higgitt—and I assume there is no further argument to be addressed to this matter at this time—to the circumstances in which the Solicitor General's letter dated September 4, 1973, was drafted. Does that lead us to the conclusion that, by virtue of an act or omission, the House, or a member, has directly or indirectly been impeded in the performance of its functions or his duty, or that there has been a tendency to produce such result? If I so find, then I really have no choice but to find, prima facie, that a contempt has been committed.

Having considered the whole question with extreme care, I come back to the simple testimony of former commissioner Higgitt when he said:

That is not, that is not an assurance the RCMP is giving to the minister at all, and as matter of fact, the practice was in matters of this kind—

—the practice was very often ministers' letters were not exactly drafted on precise statements of fact.

I can interpret that testimony in no other way than meaning that a deliberate attempt was made to obstruct the member in the performance of his duties and, consequently, to obstruct the House itself.

Even beyond the precedents and the complex law of privilege, I cannot conceive that there is any one of us who would accept the argument that this House of Commons has no recourse in the face of such an attempt to obstruct by offering admittedly misleading information.

I, therefore, find a prima facie case of contempt against the House of Commons.

May I, once again, reiterate the consequences of that decision. The job that I have in matters of privilege is a preliminary, procedural review of the matter to determine whether in fact it touches the privileges of members of the House of Commons or of the House itself. Having done so, I concluded that the motion put forward by the hon. member must therefore be given immediate priority and taken into consideration by the House at once. The House itself makes the decision on whether the motion shall carry, whether it shall be amended, or in any way altered and, in fact, whether there is a contempt. I do not make that decision; the House does.

I simply want to leave these matters with the House in the way that I am doing, and indicate that having reviewed all the matters very carefully and considered all the precedents and arguments very thoroughly, I have come to the conclusion that the hon. member does in fact have a prima facie case of privilege involving a deliberate attempt to impede the House in its work, and perhaps the minister and, in turn, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Having done so, and having collaborated with the hon. member to a certain extent on the form of the motion, the motion which the hon. member hands to me at this time follows. It is moved by Mr. Lawrence, and seconded by Mr. Nielsen:

That the letter sent by the Solicitor General of the day to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham on December 4, 1973, and the testimony of former RCMP Commissioner Higgitt on October 24 and November 1, 1978, before the royal commission of inquiry (McDonald commission) concerning the practice of the RCMP in preparing letters for the signature of the Solicitor General, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation and report.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Mr. Lawrence: Thank you, sir—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Inasmuch as there has been a prior examination by yourself and the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) of the motion, would it be possible for the rest of us to have it so that we can examine it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I think in your own modest way, if I may say so, you are perhaps underestimating what I conceive to be the importance of the decision you have made. There is no question that in this House it is not too often the Chair finds there has been a prima facie case of contempt of this House. That in turn relates to our only mechanism to grieve and to rectify that contempt.

A contempt against the House is a contempt against every member of the House, individually and collectively. It is not too often, if I may say so, that the Chair has found a prima facie case in the time that I have been here, since 1972. I appreciate why you have indicated what you have. I know it is presumptuous of me, but I must say I congratulate you for it. This is a very, very important matter touching not only on the rights of members of the House, but because we represent the people of this country it represents a fundamental and basic right of the people of this country to find the truth, to have the truth presented to them.

I attended a college in this province, Mr. Speaker, and I know there are several graduates of that same institution in the House. The slogan of that university is emblazoned above the front door. The words are, "The truth shall make you free."

I feel strongly enough about this matter or I would not have raised it in the manner I did. I am quite gratified that you have found there is a prima facie case. To get right down to the specific and detailed examination of the matter before us, it is not only of fundamental importance in respect of the rights of members of the House and the alleged contempt committed against the House itself and the members thereof, but I think this particular matter raises a question that should be debated here today by individual members. Basically it is the first opportunity that members of the House have had to engage in a rather free running and widespread debate on some very basic and fundamental matters.

● (1522)

First of all, whether there was ministerial knowledge of illegal activities by the security service of Canada as they were taking place—that is a basic and fundamental matter we can discuss today, and I hope that we will be able to discuss it in the committee. Also, for the first time in this House and in committee, we can engage in a discussion on the actual allegations that have been made about illegal activities of a branch of one of the most important law enforcement agencies of this country. We can also engage in a basic discussion about the conditions in which a minister of the Crown may be negligent, incompetent, or maybe overworked. But certainly the whole question of ministers, if that is the alibi or plea that is to be presented to us, merely acting as a rubber stamp for officials who shove things in front of them which are immediately signed, ought to be discussed. I am not saying that that occurred in this instance, I do not know. But it is one of the purposes of what I hope will be a discussion today in the House and a discussion before the committee.

Certainly, sir, in speaking to the question of whether or not it should go to the committee, I emphasize again with logic and emotion, and I do not think those two things are contradictory at all, to my colleagues in this House that certainly it would be a travesty, and a great injustice presented to the collective members of this House if this matter now fails to go to a committee, or should indeed fail to go to the committee set up to hear and make an adjudication of matters such as this.

We are dealing with a contempt of each and every member of this House. I think it would be unforgivable if the House did not decide unanimously that this matter should go to a committee.

As I have mentioned to you, sir, it is not too often that the Chair, in its wisdom, finds that there has been a prima facie case. In this case you have reached that conclusion and I know you did so after a great deal of soul searching and book searching. It would be inconceivable, now that that decision has been made, because of the importance of this matter and how it touches some of these basic freedoms in this country and of this House, that this matter should fail to go to a committee.

I would hope that when the question is eventually put no member would be rash enough to vote against it. That has not happened very often. Since 1965 my understanding is that there has only been one occasion, and that occurred in the last few months. There has only been one occasion, when the Speaker has found a prima facie case, that the House has not then voted to have the matter go to committee. I think that all sorts of conclusions can be reached and statements could be made in the event that the matter did not go to a committee for adjudication. I believe that is of great importance to the freedoms and responsibilities of this House, and is a matter only this House or a committee of this House can properly investigate and adjudicate.

First, if I may just refresh hon. members of the House in respect of the facts, I would like to give a quick rundown of the history, as I know it, of mail interference and mail openings by security forces and law enforcement agencies in this country. If members are honest with themselves they will remember there has been a suspicion for many years in the minds of many members, quite frequently openly stated in this House and elsewhere, that there has been a history of interference and openings of mail by law enforcement agencies or security forces, and perhaps by the military as well.

In particular I will refresh your memory, sir, by referring to a constituent of mine who made serious allegations to me of just such an incident. In my opinion, he had ample proof that his mail had been interfered with, read, and an investigation started by one of the law enforcement agencies of Canada. In fact the enforcing officers, when they came to the door of the addressee of that particular piece of mail, had a photocopy of it in their hands. Obviously the mail had been interfered with. There is no question about that.

[Mr. Lawrence.]

These allegations were made to me. The matter was serious enough for me to be concerned about it. The facts as indicated were such that I thought I should, in all fairness and courtesy, write a letter to the solicitor general asking him in a non-public way if the allegations made by this constituent were true. I must admit to you that I had a suspicion that everything the constituent said to me was perfectly true. Nevertheless, I received a reply from the solicitor general, referred to in the question, and no matter how you want to quibble about the wording in the letter, it left me with the impression—it was designed obviously to leave me with the impression—that no such interference with the mail or any opening of the mail took place by the particular law enforcement agency involved. There is no question about that.

At the time this matter was being discussed in the House, in the reply given by the then minister of justice, that admission was made that it was a totally incorrect answer given to me by the solicitor general. Since then, sir, to confirm the suspicion of some members of the House, there has been ample evidence given in other places that mail openings, by the security services especially of the RCMP, have indeed been taking place. As a matter of fact there are now very reliable estimates placed on the public record of this country, in other places, that this has been a decided and continuous policy of at least one branch of the main law enforcement agency of this country. This procedure has been going on in this country for 40 years. For 40 years the allegation has been made, by officers and others who are in a position to know, that mail openings and mail interference have been taking place.

I have a letter from the solicitor general indicating that no such interference was taking place. How do I know that? It is simple. In other ways and other places the then solicitor general has indicated, since the publication of this contradictory evidence in other places, that if such mail interference and mail openings have in fact taken place, that that particular solicitor general knew nothing about it. I believe that particular solicitor general even said that in this House. Under the rules of this House, if a member says a thing like that we, of course, have to accept it. I do accept it. However, this practice has been going on for 40 years. The minister responsible says he knew nothing about it. He signed the letter to me, and perhaps to others, indicating that no such practice was taking place.

If the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) says he did not know that these matters were taking place I, of course, accept what he is saying. However, contradictory statements have been made elsewhere. Contradictory evidence has emerged elsewhere. There has been contradictory testimony lately. This testimony, these statements and these inferences are by officers and officials in positions of authority at the same time that this minister who signed that letter to me held the position of Solicitor General of Canada. In actual fact he was the political person who was in charge and had jurisdiction over these people.

What has this evidence said? It said there has been interference with the mails as a legitimate vehicle and a legitimate weapon to enforce the laws against the criminal element of this country, and also to enforce national security in this country. Personally, I have no great argument with that. If it is necessary, it should be done. However, it should be done legally. If there is not the vehicle to have it done legally, then the government of the day is negligent in its duty by not making sure what is done by the law enforcement agency is in fact legal.

Law enforcement agencies in every country today, but in particular in this country today, should not have to reach to the bottom level of integrity and morality where they attempt to fight fire with fire. Who else is going to enforce the law if the law enforcement agencies themselves break the law? That is a fundamental question to this matter that should obviously be considered by this House and by a committee of this House.

Number one, the contradictory testimony, the statements and inferences of these officers and officials, indicate there has been interference with the mail. Number two, the inference has been, if not already clearly stated in closed testimony before a royal commission, that the minister knew, or should have known about it, one or the other, because it is clearly taking place. Finally, we have the evidence in this House of the minister who says that he did not know that these events were taking place.

I wish to put on record a few quotations, if I may. According to Victor Marchetti, a former CIA employee and author of the book "The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence," among material that the United States government succeeded in suppressing from the book which has been published in the United States, at the request of the Government of Canada, was information detailing, and I quote:

—very close ties between the CIA and the RCMP.

Mr. Marchetti is an acknowledged expert and has appeared before congressional committees in the United States. Again quoting:

Your people are in very tight with us. We trained them.

The allegation has been made that the CIA in the United States, and this has not yet been denied, trained officers of Canada's security service of the RCMP in the techniques of interference with and openings of Her Majesty's mail in Canada. They actually trained them. When this information was to be published in the United States, the Government of Canada brought pressure to bear on the United States to suppress that information.

We are dealing with the question of governmental and ministerial knowledge. Somebody in the government must have known what was going on, otherwise that type of government pressure at the ministerial level would not have been brought to bear. It is as simple as that. However, we have the minister standing up in the House and saying he did not know what was going on. Under the rules, we must accept his version of the truth.

Assistant Commissioner Thomas Venner indicated in testimony, and I quote:

Cabinet ministers are not anxious to be overly informed in details of names and cases.

When we relate that specifically to the case of mail openings, we may be led down the tortuous path that, if it was not misfeasance as far as knowledge on behalf of the minister was concerned, perhaps it was intentional malfeasance on behalf of the minister. I need not point out that one is as bad as the other in respect of criminal activity or in respect of knowledge.

We still do not know whether the minister did not know as he says he did not know. We still do not know whether he did not want to know. If he did not want to know, then he is as guilty as if he did know, and he himself actively committed that contempt against every member of this House. That is the type of thing we have to inquire about in a committee of this House. Only a committee can properly adjudicate and inquire into that.

Assistant Commissioner Murray Sexsmith has stated that mail opening was terminated in 1976, largely because in the wake of American intelligence revelations, and I quote Mr. Sexsmith:

—you could already see the storm clouds on the horizon.

It was also because the Canadian news media, and I again quote:

—were convinced there was a Watergate and were desperately looking for one.

That is an Assistant RCMP Commissioner. If an Assistant RCMP Commissioner would make statements such as that, it is pretty hard for an unbiased, unprejudiced individual to believe that the person at the top of the ladder did not know about it.

Only a committee of this House can properly look into matters such as that, discuss such matters, and make conclusions. We cannot do it in this House. It would not even be possible for a royal commission to do that as well. Why? When a minister of the Crown stands up in this House and makes the statement he did not know about it, we have to accept that as the truth of the matter.

I have one other quote. RCMP Superintendent Patrick Banning made a very memorable quotation with regard to the illegal activities of the security service, and that is what we are talking about when we talk of mail opening and mail interference. He said, and I quote:

We are the second oldest profession. Delilah used a bit of disruptive tactic against Samson.

● (1542)

There is no question in my mind that RCMP Superintendent Patrick Banning knew about mail opening. There is no question in my mind that Assistant RCMP Commissioner Murray Sexsmith knew about mail opening. There is no question in my mind that RCMP Superintendent Donald Cobb knew about mail opening, or that assistant RCMP Commissioner Thomas Venner knew about mail opening—he has admitted it. There is no question in my mind that the commissioner of the day knew about mail opening. I suggest that someone at the ministerial level, at the governmental level, also knew about mail opening.

Mail openings have been discussed at provincial meetings of attorneys general for over a decade, and representations have been made by provincial attorneys general from time to time in favour of having the law changed to legalize what may or may not have been a practice but was certainly a fact if the demand was there. I suggest it is stretching the truth too far for any one in this House, including members of the government or any preceding government, for that matter, to indicate that the question of mail opening by the law enforcement agencies of this country has not been discussed in the executive councils of this nation. It had to be discussed, because the subject has been with us 40 years. Yet we find the solicitor general of the day saying he knew nothing about it and, of course, we must accept his word. But do not take my word that someone had to know about it, Mr. Speaker.

Go back to the abridged report of the royal commission on security of June, 1969, the Mackenzie report—of course, we have seen only the abridged report; we have never been permitted to see the full report of that royal commission. In the abridged report there is a whole paragraph on mail opening by law enforcement agencies. The message there is loud and clear: it is being done, and if it is being done you had better legalize it. That was in June of 1969 in the abridged report, which was published only after the government of the day had sat on it for six months.

I suggest that if the solicitor general did not know about it there were certainly others at ministerial level, perhaps even at prime ministerial level, who did. My understanding of the British parliamentary system in a matter such as this is that if there is no admission by an individual minister of the Crown, then collectively the whole ministry is guilty as that particular individual. This is the question I should like to see discussed in committee. I believe it should be discussed in the committee, and I do not believe there is any member of the House who, if he were permitted to vote on the motion which is to be put forward this afternoon in an unbiased way, unhindered by the arm-twisting of any party whip, would vote in any other way but to permit a matter of such importance as this to go to the committee.

Now, as to the committee itself, I have had some experience in trying to run an investigative committee of this House. It is not a pretty picture because it is not a very efficient or productive process. I would agree that a standing committee of this House is not particularly designed to carry out a worthwhile investigation or to have it conducted in such a way as to present an unbiased and unvarnished version of the truth such as one would expect. If you think I am criticizing our committee procedures, you are perfectly right, Mr. Speaker. I am. I believe that in a matter such as this which touches the fundamentals of the knowledge of the truth, or the seeking of the truth, there should be some changes in that committee when it takes hold of this matter, as I trust it will.

First of all, I should like to see a worth-while counsel appointed by the committee, an impartial counsel completely independent of the staff of the House and, if you will permit me, sir, solely on grounds of lack of experience, from the staff of Your Honour as well. In saying this I am not seeking to detract by any means from the ability of those officers who have been of immense help to all of us in the past.

Nevertheless, I believe that in an investigation such as I contemplate, the committee should have the services of an independent counsel, if only to regulate the chronological order in which witnesses are called. This would not detract in any way from the rights of members of the committee. Members of the committee would still have all the rights presently enjoyed to ask questions in the way they think best. But I think it is most important to the logical reasoning inherent in a step by step exposure of the truth, that in the course of a hearing by an investigative committee, as the committee on privileges should be, we have every right to expect that the truth will be brought out in an independent and impartial way, and I suggest one of the best ways in which this could be done—and all of us know of examples in other jurisdictions—is through the appointment of an independent counsel.

I think the committee should be given, off the right bat, to subpoena witnesses. This is important, and it is one thing we do not have at the moment. Committees have to come back to the House to get that right, and there is a great deal of delay involved. My understanding is that the House can give the committee power to subpoena witnesses right off the mark, and I believe that in these circumstances such a right should be given. Moreover, when the committee takes evidence, witnesses should be under oath.

There is something else which is fundamental to this discussion. So far, in the press and in the media, only one side of the question has been given. It is true we have heard the solicitor general say he did not know, but he has only said this once, to my knowledge, and these allegations, inferences and innuendos have been made time and time again and repeated time and time again, not only in this House and in the media but before royal commissions and in testimony elsewhere. I believe the solicitor general of the day deserves an opportunity to give his side of the question before things deteriorate any further and certain evidence which has been taken in closed session before a royal commission is exposed to the public gaze—I hope it will be shortly. The solicitor general deserves the consideration of every member of the House and he should be given this opportunity. I see the hon. gentleman is unavoidably absent from the House this afternoon even though he knew this matter was coming up. If he is not here today to take part in the discussion, he should be given an opportunity in the committee to tell us his side of the question.

An hon. Member: He did!

Mr. Lawrence: I am talking of the then solicitor general. He should be given the opportunity to make known his side of the question in the House, if we are genuinely seeking the truth with regard to this matter without partisan consideration. On that ground alone members who support the government should examine their consciences as they vote on this motion this afternoon.

How shall we proceed when we get this question before the committee? The first person who should be called should be the then solicitor general. It would be very worthwhile not only that he be given an opportunity to give his side of the story but, if he continues with his argument that he did not know what he was signing or that he did not know that certain activities were taking place, which activities he was denying in his letter to me, that we also find out who put the letter in front of him. I think it would be a worthy exercise of the jurisdiction of the committee to call that particular individual, and to learn of his knowledge of the facts in question.

● (1552)

Was he attempting to mislead the then solicitor general, or is his alibi also going to be that he did not honestly know that the security service was interfering by opening mail? I think that is the next step. That would be the witness who logically should be called next. He was the person who put the letter in front of the then solicitor general, which the then solicitor general signed.

I think the third witness should then be the person who drafted the letter which was given to the individual who gave it to the then solicitor general. I know this sounds humorous, but this is the kind of situation in which there should be a logical progression of witnesses so that we can come to the truth. I suggest that it would be in the interest of the government to get this kind of information before a parliamentary committee as much as it would be in the interest of anyone else. The government should be seeking the truth as well.

We should then get to the stage where we could find out who gave orders and who, at a responsible level in the law and security agencies of this country, actually did have knowledge as to what was taking place and how often it was taking place. These are matters which perhaps should be discussed in another forum such as a royal commission, but because they deal very pertinently and very directly with the matter of contempt of this House and the misleading of a member and perhaps of members of this House, they should also be discussed in a parliamentary committee, if for no other reason than that members of parliament themselves should be quite incensed and quite indignant that this type of fraud was actually perpetrated on members of the House of Commons, because it was. There is no question about that. The evidence is there.

We certainly owe it to ourselves, to those who have gone before us and to those who will come after us, to make sure that such a situation does not arise again. That is not the job of a royal commission. That is the job of the Parliament of Canada or of a committee of the Parliament of Canada.

In short—

An hon. Member: In short?

Mr. Lawrence: —I think the committee will have to make every attempt, impartially and independently, to hear the evidence of everyone else who knew or should have known that this type of thing was taking place.

The importance of the matter's going to a committee is obvious. There is absolute evidence now on the record—and obviously more will come—that this matter has in the past been referred to the executive council of the Government of Canada. One example—and there are others—was the example of June, 1969.

Another matter which has never been clear and about which perhaps the committee should make inquiries, is a matter which very directly touches the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). The Prime Minister admits that he gave directives to the RCMP, and the security service in particular, in 1970 which obviously resulted in stepped up intelligence activities in this country and perhaps elsewhere. These clearly were followed by some of the worst abuses we have heard about in the history of law enforcement agencies in this country. Those directives were given on your behalf, Mr. Speaker, on my behalf, and on behalf of the people of this country.

I raise no question with respect to the motivation or the intention of the Prime Minister regarding the directives he gave in 1970. It cannot just be a coincidence that these matters followed those directives. Those directives have never been made public by the Government of Canada or by the Prime Minister. They should be. We have every right to know what has been going on in our name in respect of some of these security force activities, and in respect of the guidelines and directives which were issued in 1970 by this government. That again is a realm of activity and authority which must be looked at by a committee of this House.

If some hon. members of this House honestly and impartially believe that this matter should not go to a committee of the House, I can only say that that would be a tragedy for the traditions and the responsibilities of this House. It would be more than that. It would be further evidence of an intention and a direct attempt by the government of the day to cover from public gaze matters which should be uncovered, should come under full sunlight and should be exposed to the people of this country.

I am not necessarily talking about activities relating to foreign agents in the country. I am not talking about detailed activities. I am talking about the over-all guidelines which we have not yet seen, and attempts to shove under the mat activities which almost everyone connected with the security industry—and it is an industry—knew about. For the government to continue its sorry record and history of covering these matters up, I think would be a further travesty of justice and the seeking of justice in this country. When I said "its sorry record and history of covering these matters up", I fully expected to hear some yelp of complaint from the ministerial benches, and I would have been fully prepared to document some of these things. However, I heard nothing.

I think the history has been a sorry one. First, we have the Mackenzie report of 1969 which has never yet been acted upon. We have the 1970 directives from the present Prime Minister. We have the setting up of the McDonald commission. The McDonald commission has been sitting in camera. We do not yet know what has been going on. We may never know. As I understand it, that royal commission will report to the government and not to parliament or the people of this country. It will be a fairly easy matter, as was the case with the MacKenzie report, to abridge the report of the McDonald commission and perhaps not to expose the whole matter.

We have the question of the deliberate shutting down of the Keable inquiry in Quebec. I know that was done on constitutional grounds. I know it was done on jurisdictional grounds, but there is no question that it was at the instigation of this government that the Keable inquiry was shut down. A bill was presented in the last session with respect to this matter. That bill would have generated debate, but it was not proceeded with. To my knowledge there is no sign of its reintroduction in this session, but I stand to be corrected by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen).

I suggest that it would be a travesty of the traditions, the history, and the responsibility of this House if the government does not proceed with this motion and permit the referral of this terribly important matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in addressing ourselves to this question it is important that we do not spend too much time on its merits because Your Honour's ruling clearly indicates that a prima facie case has been made. Clearly the only place to determine whether there is a case of privilege is before a committee.

● (1602)

My purpose in rising is to urge government members in the House to give serious consideration before they again oppose a ruling of Mr. Speaker that a prima facie case of privilege has been made. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) pointed out that since 1965 it has only occurred in the House once that a government majority has rolled over the ruling of Mr. Speaker and denied the opportunity to a member, whose privileges have been violated on the surface in a prima facia way, of making any further inquiry into that case. You may remember that case because it was a sworn affidavit of one Mr. Warren Hart who stated, under oath, that he was working for and employed by the RCMP, and that in that capacity he was ordered to tape record at that time the previous solicitor general, at present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), and also ordered to tape record, which he did, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). The circumstances, as outlined in that case by the then solicitor general, contradicted the evidence given by Mr. Warren Hart.

Your Honour ruled at that time there was a prima facie case. In order to avoid the embarrassment of having Mr. Warren Hart come here and testify before a committee, this government took the expedient route that said, "We will not bother being embarrassed. It is so important that we do not lose any political brownie points on this matter that we will therefore simply act against the ruling of Mr. Speaker."

If this House is to maintain any kind of credibility, it will have to honour those kinds of rulings and also make the inquiry into an effective inquiry. We have a committee system in this House which is a disaster area. If there is one thing of which the people of this country are sick and tired, it is watching the amateurishness of our committee system. You can go to the United States, for example, and watch how their committee system works. You will find it works effectively, their committees deal with subjects and provide counsel.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham spoke about how we could improve this inquiry, and I want to say how much I agree with him. We have all had considerable experience before these committees. First of all, the use of counsel is absolutely essential. It is embarrassing—and I must say I am as guilty as any other—to watch some members of the House perform in front of committees. It is unfortunate from time to time that the public is invited to these meetings, because we waste the public's money over and over because we do not organize our time and we do not use counsel to direct reasonable and pointed questions to the subject we are questioning.

I hope this House will decide today that the matter will be referred to committee. If, by some chance, we find that the government members decide that again they cannot support the ruling of Mr. Speaker, I hope they will reflect on the position in which they have placed Mr. Speaker, because it will now be routine for Mr. Speaker's ruling, on a matter as important as the privileges of the constituents of members of the House—it is not really the member's privilege that is at stake but his constituents' privilege—to be overturned, if the government decides again to run roughshod over Mr. Speaker. In such a case Your Honour will have no job.

Serious consideration would have to be given by Mr. Speaker to resign his position because his credibility would continue to be attacked by the government at every turn. The numbers are there, and therefore the possibility of objectivity in this place will be gone.

The reason I rise is the suspicion that not merely the government might seek to vote against this motion to chalk up some brownie points, but the credibility of this place will start to crumble even further if this government decides again to roll over this ruling. I would like to quote from Hansard of March 9. In ruling on the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt I think Your Honour set the case very well. You said this:

> —It is not the function of the Chair to prevent the House from attempting to deliberate on matters which come reasonably close to being questions of substance.

The difficulty is that it is now the position of this government to stop those kinds of inquiries. I say that the position this government took in the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt was a disgrace to this House, a disgrace to the traditions of parliament, and it certainly confirms a great many of the suspicions out there that there is no real respect for this institution from the present government.

I would plead with members on the other side that you, Mr. Speaker, have a chance to recover a little credibility in this case and to say, "No, we are not afraid of any inquiry, even if it could be slightly embarrassing to a minister." Imagine the benefits of this kind of inquiry. First of all, we will find at last that ministers will check their correspondence, will check who is providing them with the information, and some civil servants' heads will roll, and should roll, if they continue to provide misinformation to ministers who continue to mislead members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: We will not deal with that kind of incompetence if the government continues to roll over these kinds of motions and to think of Mr. Speaker as simply a tool of the government rather than a tool of the House. If Mr. Speaker is to maintain credibility, I submit it is absolutely vital that this motion pass. As I said, I think it places Mr. Speaker in a position of seriously considering resigning from that position if his rulings continue to be thwarted by a government majority.

Incidentally, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham suggested counsel with regard to this inquiry and I indicated I supported that completely. I notice the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), who is sitting in the House today, is most interested in this debate. I might say he would be remarkably objective and fair, and I understand his fees have been remarkably modest in his legal career. I hope that members of the committee will give serious consideration to calling for counsel and will not rule out some competent members of the legal profession who happen to sit in this place.

An hon. Member: That's a commercial.

Mr. Woolliams: Best advertising I've had for a week.

Mr. Leggatt: The other aspect of this motion is the whole question of direct involvement with the McDonald commission inquiry. As has been pointed out, we will not receive a report for a long time. In the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, it is also not coincidental that his point of privilege was involved with that same inquiry, an inquiry, by the way, before which a key witness, Mr. Warren Hart, has somehow not yet been asked to testify. I suggest he would be a vital witness before that inquiry. So it is not coincidental that both these important matters of privilege arise directly from what has clearly been a Canadian scandal in the operation of our police forces.

• (1612)

I would urge that government members look at their moral duty in this place. They have a moral duty in respect of this issue, and that is to stand up and be counted before parliament. It is time we all did.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a motion that obviously was well prepared beforehand and which obviously was in the hands of the official opposition for some time, having prepared it in consultation with the Chair. I regret that on a matter of this importance the motion itself was suddenly sprung upon us, and that we were not given any opportunity to consider the terms of the motion prior to its being put before us, obviously on a prearranged basis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I am not drawing any conclusion except that it would have been more appropriate for an orderly debate if this particular motion had been put before all members of the House, so we would have had the opportunity of considering it before the debate itself began.

However, the motion in its first part refers to the letter sent by the then solicitor general to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), and to the testimony of Commissioner Higgitt before the McDonald commission.

Let me refer to the debates of November 3, in which the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham put together the testimony of Commissioner Higgitt in one sentence, and this appears in Hansard of November 3. He put together at least the relevant one sentence of Commissioner Higgitt's evidence with that last sentence of the letter he had received from the solicitor general, and upon that juxtaposition the question of privilege was alleged, namely, that a deliberate deceit or deception had been perpetrated against the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Before dealing with the motion itself, I believe it would be useful if the letter from the solicitor general to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham were tabled in the House of Commons. With permission I would like to table it later. Before doing so, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the facts related in the main body of the letter.

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) would be thoughtful enough to table it now, following his own earlier recommendation. If he is now going to debate the letter he should table it so we can all get copies. That would prove useful to members on both sides.

Mr. MacEachen: I will be happy to table it when I have finished reading from it, because I have only one copy and that is the copy I intend to table.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham made it very clear in his speech on November 3 that he had inquired about the alleged interception of one of his constituent's letters by the RCM Police, and the reply of the solicitor general contained a complete description of all the facts in that particular case.

Of course, the item of mail he had referred to, which all of us assumed had been a letter, was not a letter in an envelope at all. It was an unstamped, plasticized computer card, with an incomplete address. Typed on the card was the following message, and I think it is rather interesting to put this on the record:

Commission term report concerning security leaks of top secret data indicates unauthorized personnel have been scanning sensitive information and recording same for unknown reasons. When informed of this matter thru an unambered double agent, SECMIN 436-202-212 indicated that a series of dated codes be released thru this leak and then traced to source. This procedure was followed, and LANGTEK 422-902-510 was informed of the matter. Results are now pending. Data 436.

That is the end of the quotation that appeared not in a letter, covered by an envelope, but on an unstamped, plasticized computer card with an incomplete address.

We have been talking about the interception of mail by the RCM Police. In this case the unstamped, plasticized computer card with an incomplete address was not intercepted by the RCM Police. It was found loose in the mail stream at the Alta Vista postal terminal in Ottawa. Post Office officials who noted the suggestive message about "top secret leaks" forwarded the card to the Department of National Defence, and then the department passed it on to the RCM Police.

The police, whom we have been led to believe were intercepting mail, were the third-hand recipients of a plasticized, unstamped computer card, with an incomplete address, sent to the RCM Police. All this was explained to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. The RCM Police had no file on this case. The investigation was concluded, no breach of security was involved, and the card was sent back to the Post Office.

Mr. Broadbent: A lawyer's red herring argument so far.

Mr. MacEachen: That is the substance of the letter. I thought it would be interesting for the public to know that nothing was opened and the RCM Police were not intercepting a letter in this case, but were the third-hand recipients of an unstamped, plasticized computer card, with an incomplete address.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us the story about the house that Jack built.

An hon. Member: It sounds like a recorded message.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham was given a complete explanation of the matter about which he had inquired. Of course, in the last sentence of the letter there appeared this particular expression:

I have been assured by the RCMP that it is not their practice to intercept the private mail of anyone and I trust that the above explanation will set your constituent's mind at ease.

We come to that particular sentence which was related by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and to the evidence that was given by Commissioner Higgitt, from volume 88, at page 145, of the proceedings before the McDonald commission. He quotes this one sentence:

That is not, that is not an assurance the RCMP is giving to the minister at all, and as a matter of fact, the practice was in matters of this kind—the practice was very often ministers' letters were not exactly drafted on precise statements of fact.

● (1622)

Those two sentences together form the basis of a question of privilege that there has been a deliberate deception by an unnamed culprit, who is still unnamed. These sentences are important, because in the argument on whether this constituted a prima facie case of privilege there were no references to all these facts. Mr. Speaker made a ruling, and his definitive comment was that it was before the McDonald commission that Commissioner Higgitt acknowledged for the first time that the letter in question was not exactly drafted on a precise statement of fact.

I would like to refer now to the testimony by Commissioner Higgitt, because I think that it will be clear that Commissioner Higgitt in precise terms did not acknowledge at any point in his testimony that the letter in question was not exactly drafted on a precise statement of fact. If hon. members refer to the evidence on page 14555 of the transcript, the relevant sentence is quoted as follows:

That is not, that is not an assurance the RCMP is giving to the minister at all, and as a matter of fact, the practice was in matters of this kind—the practice was very often ministers' letters were not exactly drafted on precise statements of fact.

Commissioner Higgitt is saying that "the practice was very often minister's letters—". Counsel at that time might have asked—and they probably will when he returns—what his particular view was on this letter.

If the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham had wanted to be complete in providing evidence to the House, he would have referred to the preceding and following comments to the statement, which is the basis for this question of privilege, made by Commissioner Higgitt. I am not resting my case upon the words which clothe that particular sentence. I would like to make a more substantive quotation of Mr. Higgitt.

Mr. Baldwin: Why don't you table all of the evidence? You have quoted from it.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Peace River has asked me to table the evidence. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has quoted from the evidence, perhaps my friend should ask him to table it.

Mr. Lawrence: I do not have the authority to table it.

Mr. MacEachen: Commissioner Higgitt was asked this question:

Is it, therefore, correct to conclude, sir, that the last paragraph constitutes an assurance by the RCMP to Mr. Allmand, the Solicitor General, that it is not their practice to intercept the private mail of anyone?

MR. HIGGITT: No, that is not correct, sir, and that is not the purpose of that letter and, in fact, to start with that is part of my answer—

I would like the hon. member for Calgary North to listen to this.

—and the second part is that the statement is true, if we want to think of the words being used, it was not the practice and it is not—I can't say today, because I'm not there—was not the practice of the RCMP to intercept the mail of private citizens or citizens, and I have explained why I make that statement, because of the facts that have been adduced before this commission, showing it was not in fact the practice.

If hon. members refer to the evidence they will find that this is in fact what Commissioner Higgitt said in the same sitting as the sentence which has been picked out and forms the basis of the question of privilege. If Mr. Higgitt is to be believed in this circumstance, he confirms totally the accuracy of the last sentence of Mr. Allmand's letter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: It is not my fault that the evidence of Commissioner Higgitt is contradictory. The hon. member is asking the House to find a question of substance, of privilege, on contradictory evidence before the McDonald commission.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) has said that if the government voted down this motion it would be rolling over on the Speaker. That is a very inaccurate description of the proceeding which is before the House. The Speaker is obliged, under our rules, to find whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. Prima facie means on the first impression, on the surface, or at first blush. Beauchesne goes on to say that it is the responsibility of the House of Commons to find in substance whether there is in fact a breach of privilege.

So today, when the government is saying that it does not propose to support this motion, it is not saying to the Speaker that we have no confidence in his finding. It is saying that Mr. Speaker having done his duty, we have probed beneath the surface and found that there is contradictory evidence, and that you can find Commissioner Higgitt saying, under oath, that the last sentence of Mr. Allmand's letter to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, "the second part is that the statement is true." What statement? The last paragraph of Mr. Allmand's letter to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. That is Commissioner Higgitt's testimony. It is clear there, if you look at the fragment of evidence plucked out by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, that it does not have the unequivocal conclusion which this particular sentence has.

I ask you, sir, and hon. members, is it responsible for this House of Commons to find a question of privilege upon one sentence by a witness, that is totally contradicted by evidence given earlier by a witness who has not completed his testimony, and who has not been cross-examined before the McDonald commission?

● (1632)

I believe it would be a travesty for this House to vote that there is in fact a question of privilege based upon one sentence that is contradicted by the same witness and whose testimony has not yet been completed before the commission.

Mr. Lawrence: What are you afraid of?

Mr. MacEachen: When the facts come out I do not know which side of the argument will be found to be the factual one by the royal commission. I know it would be interesting to get the evidence from the man who drafted the letter and from other people. All that is before the royal commission. Why do we want a parallel inquiry? All of this is before the royal commission.

We set up the McDonald royal commission at the request of the official opposition. Today, when you strip away all the rhetoric and all the innuendo put forward by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, all you find is a plea to close down the royal commission, to set up a committee so that all of this sensitive matter relating to the security of Canada can be made the basis of political attack and that what ought to be the subject matter of a serious inquiry will become a political forum. We resisted that from the very beginning. We have no intention of agreeing to a parallel inquiry, particularly on what I consider to be one sentence of evidence before that commission.

I would say also that it would take a lot of persuasion to get me to vote for this motion. It is alleged that a deceit and deception have been perpetrated. Who has perpetrated the deception? Who has perpetrated the deceit?

An hon. Member: That is the issue before the committee.

Mr. MacEachen: Who has perpetrated the deception? Mr. Speaker Michener, when he was called upon to rule in a similar case, said that in his view simple justice required that no hon. member should have to submit to investigation of his conduct by the House or a committee unless he had been charged with an offence.

In simple justice, it seems to me that if the Canadian House of Commons is to say there has been any substance of breach of privilege, of deceit and deception, then it is the obligation of the House of Commons to know who the culprit is. The hon. member says it is not the minister. He does not say it is the RCMP. No, no, he would not go that far. He would not have the courage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: It was on this very basis—

Mr. Trudeau: What are you afraid of?

An hon. Member: What are you afraid of?

Mr. MacEachen: —that Mr. Speaker Michener said there is no accused. It is a very important point because it seems to me it relates to what the legal profession calls "the principles of natural justice"—that you say there has been a contempt, a deceit, and that is what the House is asked to find today, and the person or persons alleged to have brought about the deceit are left unnamed.

Mr. Speaker Michener said:

If there is some doubt in the matter, I am clear that the benefit of the doubt should be given to the unaccused.

In this case, we neither have an accused nor an unaccused. I just say we should wait for the commissioner to complete his evidence. Let us get all the evidence from all the other witnesses, and when the facts are in, if the hon. member will hold off on his motion, we will consider it at a later date.

To ask the House to form an opinion on the basis of one sentence—a scintilla, a fragment of evidence that is not yet completed, by one witness who has not yet been cross-examined, is too much to swallow. We do not intend to swallow it on this side.

You have raised, Mr. Speaker, the question of ministerial responsibility. You have said it is not a matter of procedure, it is a matter of constitutional doctrine. On that point I agree 100 per cent. We have exercised ministerial responsibility in this particular instance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: We were asked, we were pleaded with, every day, by the official opposition, to establish the McDonald royal commission. First of all we said no, but then as more evidence came in we said yes, we would establish the McDonald royal commission. We were applauded by members of the official opposition, members of the New Democratic Party, and all members of the House.

Mr. Andre: Only because Quebec set up the Keable Commission.

Mr. MacEachen: We have a royal commission in progress. It is examining all the evidence. That is the way the government is discharging its responsibility. When the commission report comes in, whatever responsibility will lie on the government at that time will be discharged by the government. Certainly it is not the exercise of either the ministerial responsibility or parliamentary responsibility to find a question of privilege on one sentence by one witness contradicted by other witnesses, in testimony that is not yet complete, that has not been tested by other witnesses and that has not been the subject of cross-examination.

Mr. Lawrence: You are gagging the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I recognize that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is the next member to be heard, but I am not speaking to the motion. I raise a point of order which I regard as a serious one.

In the opening remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) he referred to the fact that a copy of the motion had not been made available to all members. There is nothing out of the way about that. He went on to complain, however, about what he called collaboration—

Mr. MacEachen: I never used the word.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —with the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) in drafting the new motion. The implication was that the Speaker had been unfair to the government by working with the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham in drafting the revised motion. I suggest that what was said was a slur on the Chair which this House should not tolerate.

I would refer the House to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 199(1), which reads as follows:

> When a member hands a motion to the Speaker after having spoken in support of it, the Speaker may, before putting the question to the House, make such corrections as are necessary or advisable in order that it should conform with the usages of the House.

I point out that when you spoke to the House on this matter—

[Editor's Note: At this point the lights in the chamber were extinguished momentarily.]

An hon. Member: You blew it, Stanley.

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I indicated yesterday in another debate that in the days when there were no microphones we had to make ourselves heard by the sound of our own voices. I could have carried on in the dark, but I am sure hon. members would want to see me as well as hear me.

When Your Honour spoke on this matter on Thursday, November 9, you dealt with four or five subjects and then said, as reported in Hansard at page 966:

> The final concern I want to leave with the House—and I freely say that it would not be looked upon by me in any case as a fatal concern—is the form of the motion. The customary form of a motion on a question of privilege is very precise and explicit, in that the matter is referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

There follows a rather long paragraph which I need not read in its entirety. The final sentence of that paragraph reads as follows:

> However, if the motion is found to be procedurally irregular or a departure from our regular procedure, I would be sympathetic to an amendment or an alteration to the motion, if we were to carry the matter forward.

● (1642)

I submit, sir, that you made it quite clear on November 9 that some alteration to the motion might be necessary, or at least desirable. I submit that under the terms of citation 199(1) you had every right to suggest an alteration in the motion to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, and that it was not like the President of Privy Council to cast the slur on the Chair that he did at the beginning of his speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order which has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as an obvious red herring in order to obscure the force of the argument I had made on the substantive motion—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He has laid a charge against you.

Mr. MacEachen: —I just want to say there was no slur whatsoever cast upon His Honour. I will look at the words tomorrow, and if there is any suggestion of any such slur I will be happy to withdraw them. I will withdraw them in advance, in fact, because I do not think there is any such slur. I was drawing attention to the fact that while His Honour had indicated there would be amendments to the motion, it has been my understanding that when such amendments are made to a motion before the House, the amendments are made visibly with all of us present. It would have been helpful if the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), after having made those changes, had given us the motion in advance so that we could have considered it instead of having it sprung upon us at the last moment. That is an indication of the seriousness with which we ought to deal with his suggestions in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may be useful to lay two points to rest in order that they might be set aside for all time in respect to the balance of the discussion on this motion.

The first has to do with the remarks that I made earlier today about the change in the text of the motion moved by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). Indeed, I did telegraph that, I thought, when I made the preliminary part of this decision on November 9 and indicated there might be some desire to change the text of the motion, although I did not think I would find it out of order. In fact I invited the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham to collaborate with the officers at the Table to get some advice on an amended text. He collaborated not only with them but with the parliamentary counsel which, of course, is his perfect right in the circumstances.

If I gave the impression earlier today that he collaborated with me, then I gave a mistaken impression, because he did not. He took advice and came up with an amended text, which I put to the House today. He had some assistance and advice from counsel and from the officers of the Table in order that the motion might be brought in greater line with our precedents. I did not in any way know of the firm text of the motion until today when it was moved by the hon. member, and seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I may have compounded the difficulty by inadvertently giving an indication when I said "the officers of the Table". I may have said the Chair and, if I did, I did that incorrectly. There was no collaboration with the Chair.

I did not think I had the right to release any motion to anybody until it was moved by a member in the House itself.

There have been some comments on the second question already, and I cannot stop anyone from making these comments, but there has been some preliminary comment on the role of the Chair in respect to questions of privilege. On two occasions recently I have found questions of privilege, one in respect of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). A vote in the House did not support that.

This was another question of privilege in which I found a prima facie case. There has already been an indication that government members will vote against it. I do not think I am saying anything inaccurately in view of the presentation just made. I think we ought to keep clear that we each have a respective role to play in this matter. If I want to be guaranteed that no adverse result will take place on the floor in respect to a prima facie case of privilege, I can quite easily guarantee that by never finding one. In respect of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, I think the House will know that I reached some, and extended the benefit of the doubt to the hon. member for Nickel Belt. I did not think I was reaching to the same extent here. Nevertheless, if I am to be encouraged to reach in some of these new areas, to extend the judgment of the Chair in favour of an hon. member being able to have the opportunity of putting his question of privilege to the House, then I have to take the risk that on some occasions the House is not going to accept it.

If I have to be guaranteed that the House is going to support that very decision, then I think the sensible course for me to follow is never to accept one and then I cannot be in any jeopardy. If the House expects me to extend privilege more to members of the House, we must expect that the decision which I make and the decision which the House takes are never one and the same decisions, but separate decisions by separate people in different roles. Therefore, I would invite the House, to this extent at least, to co-operate and lay that point to rest in this discussion for all time. I think it would be better to concentrate simply on the merits of the question before us.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to raise the same point as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, but in view of what Your Honour has said I will not touch it until I hear what the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) may have to say tomorrow.

I think his synthetic and simulated indignation about the terms of this motion is a clear indication of the weakness of his case. I would like the hon. gentleman to reflect on the position of members of the opposition from time to time, who are faced with a supply bill with no notice at all. We are expected to debate a matter sometimes involving hundreds of millions of dollars, and billions of dollars at times. I ask the hon. gentleman to reflect on situations where sometimes legislation dealing with strikes are brought in to this House and presented to members of the opposition who are asked to debate them almost instantaneously. There are many situations where the opposition is greeted with the necessity of having to participate on a very important matter with virtually no notice at all.

The hon. gentleman talked about the McDonald royal commission set up at our instance. Were we consulted about the terms of the order in council which was enacted in order to found the operations and the activities of that royal commission? I suggest that the attitude of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Dick: He is sneaking out of the House now.

Mr. Baldwin: He may not be a lawyer but he has learned one of the earlier tricks of some lawyers, that if you have a case which is weak in the facts you try to emphasize the law. If the law is bad you emphasize the facts. But when you have neither facts nor law on your side, you scream and beat the desk, which is just what the President of Privy Council did in his intervention today. He probably acquired it by some form of intellectual osmosis from his seatmate, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who often operates in this way.

I want to deal with something brought up by the President of Privy Council. He quoted very selectively from some of the proceedings of the royal commission. It runs in my mind that, having done so, he might well be in a position of having to table that evidence in its entirety. The President of Privy Council said something about let us wait until former commissioner Higgitt gets back in the witness stand. I think he has forgotten that former commissioner Higgitt has been on the witness stand, I understand, in camera, that is, in secret, at the instance obviously of this government. The decision, of course, is entirely that of the commission. But certainly we have had some fair indication in the House that when proceedings of the royal commission get into a very delicate and difficult stage for the government, its members are quite happy to make application, through counsel, that the commission consider holding its proceedings in camera. This is precisely what has transpired.

If the government wants to know what the facts are, if the question is going to arise as to what the practice was and what was it that was said by the commissioner, what his views are and what his comments will be with regard to the question of opening of mail, let us have an opportunity to find out. Let us have a committee of this House, the ultimate and final court in the country, acting for and on behalf of members of the House, to study, to examine, and to challenge. Let us find out.

The President of Privy Council sought to draw a red herring before us, as he admitted himself, by quoting with some humour what was in the letter. That is not the issue, Mr. Speaker. What was in that letter was not the issue. What this House and hon. members are faced with is a simple question. Was there a deliberate deception by the authorities of a senior member of parliament? I must treat that very seriously.

I am amazed that the President of Privy Council, one of the great parliamentarians of this House, is obviously so alarmed at what is liable to come out in a committee meeting that he uses his undoubted talents to confuse the issue and evade his responsibility. He has indicated he intends to vote against the motion. Apparently he does not want the facts to come out.

• (1652)

Mr. Pinard: We have the McDonald commission.

Mr. Baldwin: The parliamentary secretary, who takes his cue from the President of Privy Council, must realize the government will use its best endeavours to try to persuade the McDonald Commission to sit in secret whenever there might be dangerous and embarrassing facts about this government to be introduced. In any event, the report of the royal commission will be made to the government. Only those parts of the proceedings of the royal commission as may be seen proper to be made public in the opinion of the royal commission, will be made public.

This House is interested in the truth. The government may not be. Members on this side, certainly the members of this party, want the truth to come out.

Mr. Pinard: It will come out.

Mr. Baldwin: I am just amazed at what are the possible consequences of the evidence and facts we have heard. If the authorities are perfectly willing to attempt to deceive a senior member of this House, what about the public? What about the people whom I represent and those represented by my friends? What about the people who are represented by members on the government side? What manner of deception is being practised on them?

We have some facts which are an indication of what is going on. It is a shocking illustration of the fact that the government of this country faces a crisis in confidence. This is not a matter of inflation or unemployment. It is a lack of credibility and confidence. It flows from the kinds of actions we have seen carried on by the authorities, and today condoned and approved by the President of Privy Council. That is the situation which has to be of great alarm and concern to all of us.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) made a very moving and eloquent address, studded with illustrations. I thought it would have been accepted. I did not intend to get into the debate until it became apparent that the government was not going to accept it. That address was supported by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). I thought the President of Privy Council would have got up and said that, although they do not accept all the facts, they are prepared to let the matter go to a committee of this House in order to find out where the truth lies. Obviously the government fears the truth as the devil does holy water. Is is a fact the government should recognize and the people of Canada must recognize.

This case is bringing us into the jungle of misinformation, the Byzantine ways of secrecy and deception practised by the authorities. We have been aware of this for some time. It explains a lot of things. It has been established as prima facie in the minds of a lot of people. I say prima facie, because if government members are willing to accept their own independent and objective judgment and allow a committee of this House to examine this issue, we may get the facts out. In that case, what will be a prima facie case, as now established by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, may be an opportunity for the House, through its agents on the committee, to find out where the truth lies.

Mr. Pinard: You have the McDonald commission.

Mr. Baldwin: The parrots opposite insist on speaking about the McDonald royal commission. Something the members of the government do not realize is that the privileges of this House are the responsibility of members of this House and not of the McDonald royal commission. It is time members opposite learned that lesson. It explains why, when there is embarrassing or potentially damaging information, the authorities go to almost any length to conceal it. It explains why the government fears to proceed with an open information law which would be effective in providing members of this party, members of this House, and members of the public, with an opportunity to find out what is the truth.

Let me use another illustration. I mentioned the public. What about the case involving the Toronto Sun? The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) told us how he toiled, sweated, and strove mightily for 17 hours to examine 17,000 documents. Out of those 17,000 documents he extracted 580 odd and said those documents must be covered by section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. He swore an affidavit that he had personally examined them and that, in his opinion as an officer of the Crown and as Solicitor General, those documents should not be made public.

What we have seen demonstrated by the facts established by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is that we cannot rely on statements such as that made by the Solicitor General. I am not saying that he personally may not have believed that, but the information upon which he swore that affidavit resulted in 500 odd documents not being produced in the trial of the Toronto Sun and Peter Worthington. Reputable counsel in that case said those documents were essential in order to conduct an adequate defence. The Solicitor General said no, they were not. How can the court in that case, and the accused, rely on that affidavit which unfortunately, as the law now exists, cannot be appealed? It is binding. It is mandatory. Under those conditions, surely any reasonable, rational, intelligent person must have great doubts about the quality of that affidavit sworn by the Solicitor General and filed with the court in the Official Secrets Act case against Peter Worthington and the Toronto Sun.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have followed carefully what the hon. member is saying. If I am not mistaken, he is implying that the affidavit given by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), should not be believed, and what he said in this House, that he had personally examined over 500 documents in question here, is not believed by the hon. member. If that is what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is implying, I suggest it is contrary to the rules of this House and very unparliamentary. He should withdraw those remarks, or at least clarify what he has said.

Mr. Pinard: Resign.

Mr. Baldwin: I will wait four months to resign. It will be a good time then. I made it quite plain in my remarks, and I will examine them carefully when I get the chance to read them tomorrow, that I was not suggesting that the Solicitor General was deliberately trying to mislead this House. I said to relate that case to the present case. The Solicitor General said that in 17 hours he examined all of these documents, selected 584, and filed an affidavit. The letter received by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, which was apparently prepared by people involved in the law enforcement agencies in this country, contained inaccuracies, and therefore must give grave concern to the court in the Peter Worthington case. It must also give great concern to the accused in that case. Unfortunately, unlike this case, there is no appeal. It is a binding affidavit. That is an indication it is a bad law. I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) that if he will look at that situation, that is what he will find.

• (1702)

What concerns me, and I believe all people in this country, is a government which does not hesitate when it is trouble to make use of the invidious provisions of Section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, or of the Official Secrets Act, whenever it finds its position is endangered.

Mr. Lalonde: Rather than make a specific statement, the hon. member prefers to go around by way of innuendo. But I understand what he said, and I presume the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) reserves his right to intervene on this issue. I would like to put it on record that he does reserve his right to intervene.

Mr. Baldwin: I have listened to the Minister of Justice, who is a master of innuendo, and who has made great use of that particular talent.

An hon. Member: Cheap! Resign!

Mr. Baldwin: I will resign if you will come up and run against me. It explains precisely why, in the unfortunate case of Bernard Maguire under the provisions of the Human Rights Act, an act by which theoretically we were supposed to have the right to examine our own files but which has proved to be an utter farce, Mr. Maguire, deeply injured by actions of the authorities, was allowed to look at some of his file, from which had been rifled some of the most important aspects, and was then told that under no condition would he be allowed to publish or use what was on the file and, in effect, that if he did so he would be prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act. The attitude of the government in this case explains these things, Mr. Speaker.

I am not going to delay the House unnecessarily but I think it is a shocking thing that a government, in this stage of its life, faced with an obvious illustration of deliberate deception, has a senior member of this House refuse to allow the facts to come to the public through a committee, refuses to allow witnesses who are involved to appear before that committee, refuses to allow witnesses to be sworn, examined and cross-examined, a process which under our system for hundreds of years has proved to be the most effective way of getting at the truth. I am just amazed if what the President of Privy Council said a little while ago is the policy of the government. If that is their attitude and their point of view then, in the words of Cromwell, for God's sake, go, we have had enough of you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief because we have already heard extensive argument with reference to this matter.

But very succinctly, the facts as I understand them, after listening to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), are that the solicitor general wrote the distinguished member with reference to information he was seeking for one of his constituents, to determine whether "Operation Cathedral" by the RCMP was being used with reference to the opening of mail. It is that simple. In the letter it was denied and then, of course, it came out in the evidence—under examination—that they are not always precise in their facts.

Mr. Speaker has found, after hearing argument presented previously and today, that there was a prima facie case of privilege, a breach of the rules. I was rather shocked by the argument presented by one of the most able debaters in this House, the President of Privy Council, (Mr. MacEachen), to the effect there was nothing to this because when Mr. Speaker finds a prima facie case it is merely a first impression on the surface, it is nothing. In the light of that definition, he used all the strength and argument of a red herring to show why the government does not want this matter to go before a committee so that the facts can be determined.

I agree with other members of this House that our committees, because of the way they function, are very inadequate to determine facts. But at the moment they are the only instrument we have under rules which have been forced on the House by closure. We cannot change those committees at the present time at this moment, when a reference to one of them is, hopefully, imminent.

But I want to come back to the hon. gentleman's argument. I was rather shocked that a man as intelligent as the President of Privy Council would give—he probably did it off the top of his head, as a lot of people do—a definition of what constitutes a prima facie case along the lines that it is the first impression on the surface—you make a decision and there is nothing to it. Now, what is the definition of a prima facie case? Let us put that on the record. This is from "Black's Dictionary" and I am sure Wigmore, too, after the volumes he has written in reference to evidence and prima facie would roll over in his grave if he knew the definition given on behalf of the government this afternoon in the highest court in the land. Look at some of these definitions of what prima facie means. "At first sight, on the first appearance". There is nothing wrong with that. "On the face of it, as far as can be judged from the first disclosure, presumably a fact, presumed to be true unless there is some evidence to the contrary." The definition goes on:

Such as will suffice until contradicted and overcome by other evidence.

Let me pause there. This government does not want any other evidence. It does not want the chain of events disclosed before a committee. Where there has been something deliberate in the sense of deceiving a distinguished member in reference to mail written by the solicitor general, one of the highest legal officers in this House, we are told, "Well, there's nothing to that on the surface."

When the Speaker finds there is a breach of the privileges of this House, when he finds that, Mr. Speaker—and you have found that—the only way the case can be met is not by political bluff this afternoon; the only way that case can be met is to take that case before the committee. Let the committee of members from all parties listen to the evidence, listen to the witnesses who drew up the letter, obtain the facts, listen to the witnesses who gave the letter to the minister to sign and who drafted that letter—something which apparently appears from what has been said, and submitted now in evidence, to be untrue. When that evidence is met, the prima facie case will be met, and not before.

The definition continues:

A case which has proceeded upon sufficient proof to that stage where it will support finding if evidence to contrary is disregarded.

There follows a reference to certain cases, and these may be found at page 1353 in "Black's Dictionary." It continues:

A litigating party is said to have a prima facie case when the evidence in his favour is sufficiently strong for his opponent to be called on to answer it.

That is all we are asking. We are asking that a committee hear the evidence and, if the government and their witnesses say one thing and other witnesses say another, that committee makes a decision.

The evidence which is now before the House, a prima facie case of privilege having been found, must be met and can only be met by a hearing. The only way we have of doing that is by way of a standing committee. So much for the argument that just because it is a prima facie case it is something on the surface—"somebody's made a quick decision and the decision may be wrong."

● (1712)

I will tell the House what the problem is, and I will put it in a political nutshell. I am glad to see that the Deputy Prime Minister is here. Hon. members opposite do not want this matter to go to a committee. They say that it is before the McDonald commission.

Mr. Pinard: Right on.

Mr. Woolliams: I am right on, and the hon. member will have to agree with my next sentence. The government has forced itself into such a position that it must call a federal election within a few weeks or months, according to the constitution. The government hopes that this thing will drag on before the McDonald commission so that everything will be covered up and swept under the table. That is what the government is hoping this afternoon. That is why the Deputy Prime Minister presented such an able argument. He knows in his conscience, and he knew when he was making his speech, that if this matter goes to a committee, that committee will get down to work either before Christmas or after Christmas, that it will hear evidence, that it will come to some conclusions, that the matter will go before the Canadian people, the jury of this land, and that the Canadian people will turn this government out of office, when it has the courage to call an election.

In the whole argument of the Deputy Prime Minister there was nothing said about Mr. Speaker finding a prima facie case of privilege. If the Deputy Prime Minister did not like what I said about calling an election, why does he not have a change of heart, a change of mind, a change of conscience, and a little political morality, and say that the government is not afraid of anything? Why does he not want this matter to go before a committee? Why does he not want hon. members to examine the evidence and to cross-examine witnesses without being stopped and stymied? The chairmen of our committees set up rules. There is nothing in the rule books which says I only have ten minutes to cross-examine a witness. When I ask one question, most ministers talk for 20 minutes.

I said I would not take very long. I have given the House the definition of a prima facie case. This is a serious matter indeed. A serious charge has been made. Mr. Speaker has found that there is a prima facie question of privilege. The privilege of an hon. member has been abused. The question of privilege is based on the fact that an hon. member has been deliberately deceived. Surely that is important enough to put before a committee.

This week I used the words "hiding the facts." The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, "Fancy the hon. member for Calgary North using such terminology!" If ever there was evidence of hiding the facts which could be called before the bar of justice today, there is evidence today. Facts are being hidden this afternoon because the government will not let them go before a committee so that they can be bared and so that the committee can report to this institution.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I want, in a fairly short period of time, to clarify the issue because I think it has been seriously confused by the remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). This issue relates to a series of facts which can be set forth in perhaps one paragraph. In November of 1973 the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) was sent a letter by a constituent of his who was concerned that his mail might have been tampered with by the RCMP. Also in November of 1973 the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham wrote a letter about that matter to the then solicitor general. On December 4, 1973, the hon. member received a reply, of which the following sentence was the conclusion:

> I have been assured by the RCMP that it is not their practice to intercept the private mail of anyone and I trust the above explanation will set your constituent's mind at ease.

That sentence was quoted before, but I felt it to be of sufficient importance to quote it again. In November of 1977 the present Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) stated that in fact mail openings had occurred. Finally, we heard about the evidence given before the McDonald inquiry by former RCMP Commissioner Higgitt.

I admit that that evidence does not lead to one simple conclusion but to two or three possible conclusions. However, that evidence no doubt can lead to the inference that ministers of the Crown were in fact aware that mail openings were occurring, and that in responses to members of parliament the strict truth was not always adhered to. Mr. Speaker referred to this matter on November 3 of this year. He has subsequently decided that there is a prima facie case of privilege which should be referred to the standing committee.

This matter is not a question regarding the McDonald inquiry, a question relating to security, or a question regarding the substance of the letter concerned. It is not a question of whether a plastic card, a letter, or anything else was involved. Those are completely irrelevant matters. They have nothing to do with the substance of the procedural motion which is before us today. The substance of this matter is the simple question of the privileges of members of the House of Commons.

There has been much reference to the question of deliberate deceit and to whether the minister deliberately deceived anybody, as if the categories of privilege were ever closed. I refer the House to page 136 of Erskine May regarding breaches of privilege and contempt. This was quoted by Mr. Speaker in his remarks on November 9. Erskine May says the following:

> It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

In other words, the categories of privilege and the categories of contempt are not closed. Therefore, Mr. Speaker was quite correct, in our view, in finding that there is at least a prima facie case of obstruction of a member of the House of Commons in seeking to get an answer to a question, that is, the question of whether his constituent's mail was opened. The answer the hon. member got in 1973 was not, on the admission of a minister of the Crown, the full truth.

This has nothing to do with security. This has nothing to do with the McDonald inquiry. It has to do with the process by which and through which a member of the House of Commons receives an answer from a minister of the Crown to whom the member directed a letter, the answer being unsatisfactory and misleading, whether deliberately, or simply because of the fact that the minister's civil servant, or in this case the RCMP, had been systematically giving incorrect information. If that is not a question which relates to the obstruction of a member of the House of Commons in the conduct of his duties, I do not know what is.

A member of the House of Commons should be entitled to find out how it is that we get replies from ministers which are false, which in substance are misleading, and which obstruct us in the performance of our duties. If a member of parliament is not entitled to that, I do not know what amounts to a question of privilege or contempt of this House.

● (1722)

Mr. Speaker found, on the basis of the evidence which was before him—which evidence I have just described—of sworn testimony given at the McDonald inquiry on the one hand, and admissions made to the House of Commons by the then solicitor general in November of 1977 on the other hand, and finally the letter in December of 1973—those are three pieces of evidence which were before Mr. Speaker—Mr. Speaker found this amounted to what he called a prima facie case.
