Having said that I still most earnestly ask other members from our province to reconsider their position, in the light of the fact that the Prime Minister said on May 5 that he personally favours an all-Canadian route for this pipe line, if it is feasible to build it. That is an important statement, and I suggest to those other members from British Columbia who have not yet taken a stand in favour, some of whom in fact have taken a stand against the principle which we are trying to write into this bill, that if they revise their opinion there is a good chance that we can succeed in having inserted in the bill a provision that the pipe line from Alberta to the Pacific coast shall be built first through British Columbia to Vancouver before it leaves Canada. If the other members from British Columbia would take a strong stand in favour of having that provision written into the act, enormous benefits would accrue not only to British Columbia but to the country as a whole, because it would be a victory for the principle of Canada first.

An important new aspect of this matter and of discussion of this bill is a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce during the course of his visit to the west coast. I am not referring to the perhaps involuntary statement which he made when he referred reporters and others to an unusual source of information. I am referring to a much more deliberate statement reported in the Vancouver Sun for Wednesday, May 10, and which appears in an article bearing this headline, "Oil pipe line may follow gas to B.C." I wonder if I might be permitted to say, Mr. Chairman, that the headline of the article appears immediately below a newspaper photograph of the minister, who strangely enough, appears to be smoking. I do not know whether it was as a result of his familiarity with that hot place to which he referred the newspaper reporters, or whether it was a matter of fulfilling his own pleasure. In any event there is the photograph, and underneath it, as I say, the headline "Oil pipe line may follow gas to B.C." The detail of the article reads in part as follows:

An oil pipe line may follow the construction of the contentious natural gas line from Alberta to the Pacific coast.

Then a subsequent paragraph states:

In an interview in his suite in the Hotel Vancouver today,—

This paper is under date of Wednesday, May 10.

—Canada's trade minister, Hon. C. D. Howe, said there is talk in the east now of building on oil pipe line from Alberta fields to the coast.

"In fact, I have heard two or three oil companies say they are interested in this project," he added.

Like the route of a natural gas pipe line, location of a pipe carrying oil would have to be decided by the board of transport commissioners, and Mr. Howe didn't know where it would go.

Now, that is the main portion of the article referring to the statement that an oil pipe line will probably follow the construction of the gas pipe line. Immediately it comes to one's mind that we in this house have been asking repeatedly and at length for the fullest possible information in the possession of the government as to all the aspects involved in the construction of this gas pipe line. This, Mr. Chairman, is the first intimation we have had that there is any definite intention to construct an oil pipe line along the route of the gas pipe line.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, did I say anything about a proposal to construct an oil pipe line along the route of the gas pipe line? I certainly said just the opposite. I said the two projects would not be related.

Mr. Fulton: I do not wish to misquote the minister. I intended to say a moment ago that this is the first intimation we have had that the construction of an oil pipe line, following the construction of the gas pipe line, is being seriously considered; that is what I intended to say, and that is what I believe I said. In any event I do not find anywhere in the article any statement from the minister that the two routes will be entirely separate. I did not intend to impute to him any statement as to the route. What I am saying is that he has informed us an oil pipe line will be constructed, following closely upon the time of the construction of a gas pipe line. If it is so, then—at any rate it was assumed by myself and by others who have taken part in this debate, and I can see no reason for assuming the opposite—that the route of the oil pipe line will follow the route of the gas pipe line, it becomes more important than ever for us to insist that the gas pipe line be built in Canada, so that the route of any pipe line serving the Pacific coast will be built through British Columbia to Vancouver first, before that line enters the United States.

In my opinion the proper place for that information to have been given as to the construction of an oil pipe line, information which appears to be peculiarly in the possession of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, was in this house, and as soon as it came to the attention of the minister, so that it might be before the members of the house during the discussion of this most important matter.

The statement as to the possible construction of an oil pipe line and the possibility of having oil refineries in Canada, which gives a new implication to this whole question, should, if nothing else does, cause us to insist that this pipe line be located in Canada. More particularly, we should refuse to pass any bill for the incorporation of companies to construct pipe lines until either the sponsors or the government have given assurance that the lines will be built over an all-Canadian route.

While I was home recently, Mr. Chairman —and I mention this because the minister has recently been in British Columbia, and I am sure he could not fail to be impressed by the attitude of the people there toward these pipe lines—I found that the people in both the coastal and the interior area of British Columbia were solid in their support of the principle of an all-Canadian route for this pipe line. They were unanimous, too, in their belief that such assurance should be obtained before we allow these bills to pass. Time and time again people said they could not understand why the government seems to favour the line going through the United States; why does the government not say out and out: We will insist in this line being built through Canada? I must confess that I cannot understand it either.

That being so, I was able to offer them no explanation of the matter except possibly this, that so far as the government is concerned it is being looked at from cold, and I submit, unrealistic so-called business points of view: How can we get the quickest return, the most dollars, for the least expenditure; if that involves sending the pipe line down through the United States, let us send it down through the United States. National policy, they say; what is that to us? Don't talk about national policy to us; we are businessmen. We want to get these natural resources down to the United States and get paid for them in the quickest possible way. This attitude on the part of the government I submit is directly contrary to the best tradition of national development, of national policy, on which this country is being built. That is the only explanation that I could offer to the people at home as to why the government seems to favour building this line straight down into the United States, instead of through Canada first.

While I was there I told my constituents that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would shortly be out in Vancouver to receive, among other things, an honorary degree from the university, and that I felt they should let him know their views. I received word Saturday and today that no fewer than 115 separate telegrams had been sent to the minister from the Kamloops and north Thompson area while he was in Vancouver. I hope the minister got them. If he did, I am sure that those telegrams, as well as the other communications he received on the subject from British Columbia and here, have left him in no doubt about the way our people feel in this matter.

Particularly since an oil pipe line is now no longer a possibility but a probability, it becomes, as I say, doubly important to get the assurance that the route will be an all-Canadian route. Therefore I want to return to what I said at the outset. I do hope that other hon. members from British Columbia will reconsider their stand. I hope that the member for Vancouver South, the member for Vancouver Centre, the member for Cariboo, and the member for Skeena—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): On that score, may I say—

Mr. Fulton: —and all other hon. members from British Columbia on the government side will reconsider their attitude and see the importance of insisting that such a provision be written into this legislation. I refer particularly to the hon. member for Cariboo, because his riding is the one riding, if any riding in British Columbia stands to be benefited, which will stand to benefit most from the—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): We are not supporting the Yellowhead route as the hon. member is.

Mr. Fulton: —will stand to benefit most from the construction of an oil pipe line through British Columbia and Canada first. All the indications at the moment are that the main oil resources in Alberta are in the northern half of the province, in the Edmonton vicinity and north of there; and the main oil resources in British Columbia, on which exploration is now proceeding, are in the Peace river district in the northern half of the province in the hon. gentleman's constituency.

Since, as I say, it is virtually certain that the route of the oil pipe line will follow that of the gas pipe line, I submit it will be a tragedy both to the hon. gentleman's riding of Cariboo and to the province as a whole if this gas pipe line, which is now under consideration, is built down through Alberta just across the southeast corner of the province of British Columbia and then straight into the United States. It would be—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It will likely be built through Cariboo.

Mr. Fulton: It would be a detriment to the future development of our province as a whole. As I say, while the hon. member is entitled to his own opinion and his own attitude, I do hope that these factors will cause him to reconsider his attitude and to join us in the fight for an all-Canadian route for this pipe line, for a route through British Columbia first to Vancouver before the line leaves Canadian soil and goes into the United States.

On the question where we should get the assurance that an all-Canadian route will be followed, there are two considerations which have emerged from the past discussion. Perhaps I might repeat briefly the general position which is taken—that is, when we are considering the request for the assurance which we have not yet received, namely, that this line will be built through Canada first.

The company whose bill is now before the committee, the Alberta Natural Gas Company, has not said it will build it on an all-Canadian route, and apparently will not commit itself to building it on an all-Canadian route. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, how we were asked in the earlier debate on second reading in this house to let the bill go to committee. We were told that that was the proper place to get the assurance. We were told: Let it go to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; there you will be given an opportunity to call all the experts before you, to call the officials of the company and to get the assurance, if assurance there will be, that the route will be built through Canada. What happened? It went to the committee. After three meetings, in fact during the course of the third meeting of that committee, a motion was made that no further evidence be heard; that at a subsequent meeting, the meeting immediately following that one, no further evidence be taken, and particularly no further evidence be taken as to the route of the line, but that the committee proceed to a clause by clause consideration of the bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: In that committee did we not hear what a great man Mr. Dixon was, the promoter?

Mr. Fulton: Unfortunately I was not a member of that committee. I have read the proceedings.

Mr. Cruickshank: All we heard for two days was what a great man Mr. Dixon was.

Mr. Fulton: I have read the evidence fairly closely, and it may well have been that the committee was told what a great man Mr. Dixon was, although I submit—

Mr. Cruickshank: Forty minutes of the debate was taken up here in telling what a great man he was.

Mr. Fulton: —I submit that not much concrete evidence on that particular point was submitted. Be that as it may, the committee was denied the very opportunity which the sponsor of the bill said it should have, of getting evidence on the question of the route. The motion to which I have referred, denying the committee the right to that evidence, was moved by the sponsor of the bill, who, as I read the minutes and proceedings of the committee, adopted an attitude which was completely contemptuous of the whole committee and of the question whether or not the route was a matter with which the committee should concern itself. This being so, there having been no assurance given to the committee, and the committee having been denied by the motion of the sponsor of the bill the opportunity to obtain information—there was a vote taken on the resolution which was supported unanimously by the Liberal members of the committee—we are left again in the position that the only place in which that assurance can be obtained is in this house, either, as I have said, in committee of the whole, or subsequently on third reading of the bill. And it does to my mind, at any rate, cast great doubt upon the sincerity of those who say that they too are in favour of the principle of Canada first in connection with this bill, but who so far have refrained, in their votes and in their speeches on the bill, from taking any position which would further the cause of Canada first.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that to my mind, in view of the completely equivocal position which has now been taken on this bill, there is only one way in which any hon. member can now show whether he is in favour of Canada first or not, and that is by standing up and being counted when the vote is taken on the principle of Canada first. I think it will be found that that opportunity will be given to all members of the House of Commons. I do say again that I hope particularly those members from British Columbia on the government side of the house will bear in mind these facts in subsequent discussion.

The second feature in connection with the question of the assurance as to where the pipe line will go lies in the fact that the Prime Minister said the other day, and it has been stated frequently in the house, that the board of transport commissioners is the body to decide where the pipe line shall go, and that he as Prime Minister, and the government itself, cannot and should not give any assurance or indicate any policy with respect to the location of the route.

In that connection I need only remind the committee of the magnificent speech made on Friday night by the leader of the opposition when he dealt with this question, and showed conclusively that the government does decide the route of the pipe line. He showed, by a review of the procedure in connection with the application of Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, an exactly parallel case, that before the board of transport commissioners would make their decision as to the route they required and had an assurance from an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce that that department had considered it and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had indicated that he would give his licence for the export of oil over that particular route.

So that, as I say, in that magnificent exposition of the principle which applies in this whole question, the leader of the opposition has proven conclusively that in effect the government does have the final say as to where the route of a pipe line shall go. The leader of the opposition went on further to sum up in a manner which places on record squarely the principles this party is following, the principles of Canada first, the necessity of preserving Canada's resources for the development of Canadian industry and the development of the Canadian economy, and the necessity of following conscious policies in this and in every other connection to build up the Canadian economy on the basis of the resources we have.

There was certainly no suggestion that we should deny the export of our surplus; but it was a statement, clear and unequivocal, of the principle which we say should be followed, that before we export our raw materials in toto we must take the steps necessary to build up Canadian industry and the Canadian economy, and to preserve those resources for the ultimate, foreseeable requirements of the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister went on to say that the board could decide on the route of this pipe line, that the board was the only body which could decide on the route, and that in fact the board could refuse to grant its permission or approval if the national interest were not preserved and if the line were going to be built through the United States. I shall read that passage of the Prime Minister's speech, because it is important not only because of the principle he laid down but as indicating that he personally is in favour of the all-Canadian route.

> It has aroused public opinion—

And he was referring to the debate which had taken place in connection with these bills:

> —as to the desirability of doing that if it is possible.

That is, building through Canada first.

> I would expect that that would not be lost from the point of view of the members of the board of transport commissioners and that they would not lightly disregard the unanimous desire of Canadians that their own territory be used to the greatest possible advantage. I would expect that when they got an application and before they approved anything, they would want to be shown that there is or there is not a practicable way of doing it without going out of Canada.

And then at page 2230:

> I suggest that unless and until we come to the conclusion that the board of transport commissioners cannot be entrusted with that kind of responsibility, because we do not feel that they are either competent enough to do it properly or sufficiently imbued with the spirit of the Canadian people to want to do it properly, the thing for us to do is to amend the Pipe Lines Act in a manner that will apply to every company that secures a charter for a pipe line and not in a manner that will discriminate in favour of one against another.

I can say with the utmost sincerity that I certainly will not question the Prime Minister's opinion as a lawyer. But I would ask him and other members of the government to consider another suggestion which I shall put forward. I have given a great deal of thought to the matter, I believe my suggestion has merit, and I would ask the government to consider it from that point of view.

The Prime Minister said that the board of transport commissioners is the only body which can decide the route, and he implied —he almost said it directly, but certainly implied and I believe meant to imply—that the board of transport commissioners could and probably should reject any application for a route, if that route did not go through Canada for a maximum total length possible before going to the United States.

I believe a reading of the Pipe Lines Act will suggest that for the board of transport commissioners to reject an application for the approval of a route solely on the ground that that route crosses the border and goes into the United States before it needs to would be an improper exercise of the authority of the board, and in fact the board in so acting would be exceeding its power, and such action would be ultra vires of the powers of the board as laid down in the Pipe Lines Act.

A reading of the provisions of that act will disclose that a consideration of the question as to whether a pipe line crosses into the United States or not is not made a factor the board must consider when either approving or rejecting an application. The Prime Minister read the section which sets out the matters the board shall have before them when considering an application. That is not one of the matters they are empowered to consider.

However, in section 9 of the Pipe Lines Act it is clearly contemplated that a pipe line route may in fact cross the border and go into the United States. That section reads in part as follows:

> A company operating a company pipe line from a place in Canada to a place on the international boundary line may exercise, beyond such boundary, in so far as permitted by the laws there in force, the powers that it may exercise in Canada.

So that by this section it is shown that the Pipe Lines Act clearly contemplates the possibility of, and thus empowers the board of transport commissioners to authorize, the construction of a pipe line from Canada into the United States. If the main Pipe Lines Act does that, and it therefore could be taken that that was done with the consent of parliament, and that parliament envisaged the construction of gas and oil pipe lines into the United States when the main act was passed, then as I have said it would be ultra vires of the board of transport commissioners to refuse to authorize any route merely on the ground that that route crosses into the United States earlier than it needs to. This would be an entirely improper exercise of their powers, because it is not made one of the factors which they shall take into consideration in approving or rejecting an application.

Following up that argument I put it forward that the board of transport commissioners has not the power to reject an application on those grounds alone. The only body with authority to say that a pipe line must be built in Canada before it crosses the boundary is, first, this parliament and, second, the government. We are asking this parliament to say that the bills now before us shall not pass until they are amended to provide that the pipe line shall be built through Canada for the maximum length before it enters the United States. If that is not done, we are content to let them pass if the government will give us assurance that they will authorize nothing but an all-Canadian route.

There are two ways in which that principle can be maintained. As I have said, the first is by the government giving us assurance here and now that they will not approve any route except an all-Canadian route. That is, the line must be built in Canada for the maximum length to serve Canadians before it enters the United States. As the leader of the opposition pointed out last Friday, the government has that authority because it must approve the route before the board of transport commissioners in turn can approve it. The government must approve the route eventually, so why not now? Why not tell us now that they will require this line to follow an all-Canadian route? Why not give us that assurance following the remarks of the Prime Minister that he personally favours an all-Canadian route? Why not tell us that the government will see to it that that policy is carried out?

Following the statement made by the Prime Minister, if that simple assurance were given to this committee the debate would end immediately. I ask the government while this bill is in committee to give us that assurance. It would simply be in keeping with the personal views expressed by the Prime Minister on the 5th of May. But there is another way of arriving at the same result, an amendment to the main Pipe Lines Act to provide that any company seeking a charter must agree to build the line through Canada before the necessary permit is granted. Such an amendment would provide authority to the board of transport commissioners to reject an application on those grounds. It would expressly empower the board of transport commissioners to say, "We believe that the pipe line should follow an all-Canadian route and because you do not follow that national policy we reject your application."

Speaking for myself, and I am confident that I speak for all other members, if the government will give us assurance that they will amend the Pipe Lines Act to that effect this debate will end immediately. Here again I refer to the remarks of the Prime Minister when he indicated that that might be the proper course to follow. The Prime Minister said that the thing to do if we are not confident that the board of transport commissioners can or will do it is to amend the Pipe Lines Act which would apply to every company asking for a charter.

I should like to refer to one other statement made by the Prime Minister on May 5. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was speaking and he pointed out that when he and other hon. members who had adopted the policy of Canada first sought in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to amend these bills so that a provision might be inserted in the charters that the lines must be built through Canada, the government supporters voted against the amendment. I quote the remarks of the Prime Minister as reported on page 2231 of Hansard of May 5, 1950:

Mr. St. Laurent: I think they did right.

Mr. Green: It was a straight party vote and they voted us down.

Mr. St. Laurent: If I had been there I would have voted with them because I think the way to do it is not to amend private charters but to amend the Pipe Lines Act in a manner that will apply to all companies.

I think the Prime Minister was stating something which would be acceptable to every hon. member. If the government is not willing to have amendments made to private bills asking for charters, then by all means let us amend the Pipe Lines Act so that that parent legislation will provide for the preservation to the people of Canada of these oil resources, and will provide that any company wishing to build a pipe line to tap Canadian resources of gas and oil must build it through Canada.

The Chairman: I must inform the hon. member that he has been speaking for more than fifty minutes.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry I mistimed myself; I thought I had spoken for only forty minutes.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of speaking this afternoon but since my name has been brought into the discussion, perhaps I might give a report on my trip to British Columbia. I think I can supply a few facts that those who have spoken for British Columbia in this debate have perhaps omitted to give to this house.

As my hon. friend has said, I made a few statements out there. I made as few as I could. As soon as I got off the plane I was met by a reporter who demanded a statement. I explained to him that I had made statements in the House of Commons, that the matter had been debated in the house and I did not wish to discuss it again. He got rather insistent, and I believe the leader of the opposition took the matter up in the house. It is one of my proudest possessions that I have the right to tell any man just what I told that reporter when he steps over the line.

However, I did a good deal of listening and I heard from a good many people. My hon. friend has referred to telegrams. Yes, I got telegrams. I got 476 telegrams.

An hon. Member: You are not going to read them all.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Howe: I can read 350 of them in fifteen seconds, because they are identical. They read:

I endorse pipe line resolution unanimously passed by the British Columbia legislature.

That one was signed by H. Best. Another was signed by C. W. Mackenzie. Another by Tom Palmer. I have 96 more where the "I" is changed to "we". They are identical except for that. Then I have 24 where the individuals used their own wording. What happened was just as clear as could be. A man working out of Vancouver would stop at such and such a place, and I would get wires from there. He would stop at the next place, and I got 37 from there. He would stop at Kamloops and how many would my hon. friend say that I got from there?— 115.

Mr. Fulton: But it was not the result of anyone coming up from Vancouver, I can assure you.

Mr. Howe: Yes, it was. If he did not visit a locality I did not receive any wires from that locality. What happened was this. Someone would arrive in a town and would open a credit with the telegraph company and then tell the people to go and send me a wire. I got a wire from Mrs. H. Best and one from Mr. H. Best. Perhaps my hon. friend can assure me that the people in Kamloops have so much money that a man and his wife would pay for identical wires just to make sure that I knew how they felt.

Mr. Fulton: Those were not all from Kamloops.

Mr. Howe: One hundred and fifteen of them were. You could follow the man as he went along. You could almost forecast where the wires would come from next day.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad the minister got them.

Mr. Howe: I was glad I got them too. The flood of wires induced me to ask one or two questions. I listened a good deal in Vancouver and I asked one or two questions. This is not a Canadian stunt. No Canadian would believe that I would be impressed by 476 duplicate wires. I may say that this filibuster is not a Canadian stunt. A filibuster running through two sessions is unique in the history of this Canadian parliament. Where does the technique come from? It comes from the United States.

Mr. Fulton: Where is the pipe line going?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I immediately demand a retraction of any statement that I have acted, or that any other member of this house has acted, under instructions from the United States. We represent Canadian citizens, and I demand an immediate retraction.

Mr. Howe: I made no such statement. I made a suggestion as to where the technique of filibuster came from. If my hon. friend says there was no suggestion of a filibuster he could not have been in the house. The question I asked was this. "What American pipe line company is interested in the Westcoast Transmission Company?" I got the answer and I checked it. I got it from people who know and I checked it with people who know. The answer is it is the Sunray Oil Company of Delaware. Then I looked up Standard and Poore to see how the Sunray Oil Company of Delaware is constituted. I found that Sunray is a company which builds and operates pipe lines. The company has working capital amounting to $26 million. The Standard and Poore report shows that in 1948 Sunray made a heavy investment in Canada, including purchase of something over 20 per cent of Pacific Petroleum Company. I had always understood that Pacific Petroleum Company owned the pipe line, and I believe this company still has a substantial interest in Westcoast Transmission Company. I looked up Pacific Petroleum Company and I found that control of that company has moved to the United States, and that within the next month the stock will be listed on the New York curb exchange. That is interesting information. I do not think anyone has ever told this house that the battle being fought here is the battle on behalf of a United States pipe line company.

I may say that the report indicates that Sunray Oil Company is a very reliable company. They are good operators, but I did not read anywhere in the report that Sunray follows the principle of Canada first. I looked for it but it was not there. There is nothing in their charter that says they are going to build along any particular route. As a matter of fact it is not a charter; it is simply an incorporation. The matter of routes has been brought in as a red herring to cover up the effort to shut off competition for this United States pipe line company.

Mr. Green: That is rubbish.

Mr. Howe: Statements have been made in this house—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Totally untrue and you know it better than anyone.

Mr. Howe: —that this company is going to build through the Yellowhead pass. I have asked one or two speakers what their authority was for that statement and they have never given it. They all deny any association with the company. They are not solicitors for the company. They do not say on what authority they speak for the company. They simply say this company is going to build through the Yellowhead pass. No proper survey has been made of the Yellowhead pass.

Mr. Green: Yes, there has. They have made an application to go through the Yellowhead pass and there has been a great deal of evidence.

Mr. Howe: They made applications at the same time for two other routes.

Mr. Green: They have been withdrawn.

Mr. Howe: That is true, but suppose they decide later after a detailed survey that it is not feasible to build through the Yellowhead pass. What are they going to do then? Are they going to quit and fold up?

Mr. Green: You can stop them by not giving them a permit.

Mr. Howe: Certainly I can stop them. I can stop them all.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, you cannot. You are not running Canada yet.

Mr. Howe: I know, but I am running the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, and that is a pretty effective piece of legislation. Anyway, I suggest that this house might have a little more accurate information about the Westcoast Transmission Company and the battle that is being fought on their behalf.

Mr. Green: It is not. That is a falsehood.

Mr. Graydon: It is a slander on Jimmy Sinclair.

Mr. Green: This battle is being waged because we are trying to look after the interests of Canada and you are not.

Mr. Howe: Who put up the $500 to sponsor these telegrams?

Mr. Cruichshank: On a point of order

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Cruickshank: Even the minister cannot overrule me on a point of order. I and my people belonged to the Liberal party long before the minister ever saw Canada, and I am not going to have anybody tell me that I am being dictated to by the Westcoast Transmission Company. To the best of my ability I am working in the interests of my province.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister permit me to ask a question? He asked if we could tell him where the telegrams came from. So far as my district is concerned, I can tell him where they came from. They came in large part as a result of my suggestion, when I was out there before the minister arrived, that every individual and every organization send a telegram to the minister. Boards of trade and junior chambers of commerce accepted my suggestion and they have been working on it for a week or ten days. That is the main reason for the 115 telegrams.

Mr. Goode: On the point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops will remember saying in the house that he discussed this whole problem with certain executives of this gas line company.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Green: What are you trying to insinuate now?

Mr. Cruickshank: If the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond can sit in the front row I am coming down there too.

Mr. Howe: I am trying to expose this Canada first proposition.

Mr. Green: You should tell why you are America first.

Mr. Cruickshank: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. I think that is unfair—

Mr. Howe: Sit down. I am talking. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is an extraordinary citizen. He goes around the parliament buildings with a smirk on his face, a bible in his hand and a stiletto up his sleeve. He is ready to pat a man on the head or stab him in the back as it suits his political purpose at the moment.

Mr. Green: Are you going to challenge me to a duel too?

Mr. Howe: He referred to the fact that I was an American.

Mr. Green: I did not. I said why are you for America first.

Mr. Howe: If I have not demonstrated my Canadianism over the past forty years that I have been a Canadian then perhaps I am not for Canada first. I think some people know what they are doing about this filibuster, and I am afraid that some others do not.

Mr. Drew: We know what you are doing.

Mr. Howe: I was disturbed by what the hon. member for Vancouver East had to say. I have known him for fifteen years, and I have never heard him advocate a policy that he did not believe in thoroughly. I believe that he thinks the question of Canada first is a great issue, but I will give you an exact parallel of what it is. Suppose that the parliament of Canada passed a law that no contractor could build a public building in the city of Ottawa unless he had a dominion incorporation. The bill is passed and a company comes forward and secures its dominion incorporation. Then another contractor comes forward, and by this time of course the first man is in a wonderful position. He has a monopoly on the work in the city of Ottawa, and he gets a few friends in parliament to block the bill. They would not block it by saying that they thought the first man should have the sole rights to construct public buildings in the city of Ottawa. If they consulted the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I think they would probably use the Canada first issue.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege, there is an innuendo there that I am acting because of representations of the Westcoast Transmission Company. That is an absolute lie, and I ask the minister to withdraw his statement.

Mr. Howe: If I have said anything unparliamentary I will be very glad to withdraw it if you will quote the statement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: I ask for a withdrawal. No hon. member can make statements—

The Chairman: I do not think the minister intended to reflect upon the hon. member.

Mr. Howe: As I say, the issue would probably appear in this house as a representation that the first contractor would use Quebec granite whereas the other contractors would be likely to use Indiana limestone. Therefore the other contractors should not be given permission to construct public buildings in Ottawa. That is an exact parallel to saying that one man is likely to build his pipe line through Canada while the other two are likely to build theirs through the United States. One statement has just as much to do with the issue before us as the other. The incorporation of these pipe line companies settles no route. Parliament gave that exclusive privilege to the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Green: Oh, no, it didn't.

Mr. Howe: Yes, it did. The board of transport commissioners can refuse any pipe line application. It has already refused to hear an application from Westcoast Transmission Company.

Mr. Green: Will you refuse permits to these two companies to build through the United States?

Mr. Howe: When I have to make that decision I will have before me the proceedings at a public hearing before the board of transport commissioners dealing with the route in question.

Mr. Green: That was not the case with the Interprovincial company.

Mr. Howe: Oh, yes, it was. A public hearing was held and all the evidence was put in. After the evidence was in the Department of Trade and Commerce were asked if they were prepared to issue a permit under that act. The matter was considered and presented to council, and the board of transport commissioners were advised that a permit would issue if the decision of the board was as they then proposed.

My hon. friends are asking me to prejudge the issue on the evidence they have given. We have been told that the Yellowhead route is a wonderful route, the best route, the all-Canadian route. Certain facts were brought out in committee, at least so it has been reported to me. No detailed survey of any route has been made. All speakers rely on ex parte statements, and not on the sort of evidence on which a decision should be based. I ask hon. members to suppose this, though I do not say there is any possibility of its coming to pass. Suppose I made a commitment to the house that a pipe line would not be built unless it went through Canada exclusively, and then it was found that it could not be so built without tunnelling through the Rocky mountains. Should I be bound by a statement of that kind? I will advise the government at the proper time, after the evidence has been brought out before the board of transport commissioners at public hearings, and after that board has given its opinion as to the proper route. That is the situation.

I could perhaps give a good deal more of the information that I gathered in Vancouver, which might be new to hon. members, but I hope I have cleared the minds of some on the point at issue. This dispute is over the question of whether two pipe line companies shall be incorporated by act of parliament in order that there may be competition for building the service. I read in the Vancouver newspapers that a company had been incorporated in the state of Washington for the purpose of building branch lines from the pipe line coming from Canada. I do not suppose those branch lines would be built in the Yellowhead pass; I would assume they would be built somewhere down in the state of Washington, or further south. I was also interested in the statement that Canadians had better understand now that the people in the state of Washington were not going to pay any more for their gas than is paid by those who are getting gas from Texas. I thought it very interesting that already they are trading in Canadian gas down in the state of Washington.

There is another interest that has not been mentioned in this house; that is the interest of the consumer. He is the man who will pay for the pipe line this House of Commons is building in conversation here. He is going to pay what it costs to build the pipe line and what it costs to operate it. The man at the other end of the line is going to get what the consumer can afford to pay, less what it costs to build and operate the pipe line. In other words there is both a producer interest and a consumer interest, and both interests are greatly affected by the cost of the pipe line.

I can tell hon. members right now that I would not like to function as Minister of Trade and Commerce and make a recommendation to the government as to the export of gas on the strength of only one proposal. If there are not going to be any competitive proposals we may have to consider that position. If that is the situation, however, and it continues, I am afraid it will be a long time before the consumers in Vancouver get their natural gas from Alberta.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I say a word on this? I have not taken up much time in this connection.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no?

Mr. Cruickshank: I just moved down to the front row because my opposition moved down, and I see no reason why he should have a front seat and I should not have one as well. I do not see why we should get into a heated argument on this subject. I believe those who advocate the United States route are sincere in their belief, while those of us, particularly from the province of British Columbia, who believe in the all-Canadian route are equally sincere. I give them credit for their sincerity, and I do not see why they should not give us the same credit. An hon. member from Manitoba, whose district is flooded today, keeps advising me from the rear. When my district was flooded I was home in my riding.

Mr. Goode: To bad you didn't stay there.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond says it is too bad I did not stay there. After his attitude toward these pipe lines I can assure him that as far as the people of British Columbia are concerned he will not be back in this house for another parliament. I just came from Windsor, where I had a very enjoyable visit.

Mr. Goode: After you walked over the Yellowhead pass route?

Mr. Cruickshank: Well, there is one thing about it, Mr. Chairman, the more unintelligent interruptions there are the more time will be taken up. I was hoping for a vote on this question this afternoon, and as far as I am concerned we can have that vote. While I was in Windsor I had the privilege of meeting some very prominent businessmen who belong to the chamber of commerce.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: Go home and fill a sandbag. That is all you are good for.

Mr. Sinnott: Tell us something intelligent about the pipe line.

Mr. Cruickshank: If I were to tell you anything intelligent you would not understand it.

Mr. Sinnott: We have listened to you talking in circles for a month.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am going in squares now. As I say, while I was in Windsor I spoke to several members of the chamber of commerce. They did not know who I was, but I asked them about their gas pipe line under the Detroit river. I heard of an old widow who was seriously ill, and who had a crippled daughter. They had a gas furnace in their house, but they could not get gas; it had been shut off in Texas. All those people I spoke to, who did not know I had any connection with gas pipe lines in this house at all, told me, "Whatever you do, make very sure you have a big valve on the line where it enters the United States, so you can turn it off if you have to." Perhaps the minister did not know that gas going to Windsor was cut off in Texas. Those members of the chamber of commerce told me that certain people from the United States, and I am only taking their word for it, were in the Dominion of Canada, even in the city of Ottawa, endeavouring to make a deal by which gas would come from the Texas Panhandle through to Ontario, in return for gas through Spokane from western Alberta. I do not know whether or not that is correct, but these prominent businessmen from Windsor made that statement, and I believe it is true. I do know the name of two American businessmen from the city of New York who have been in the city of Ottawa, but I do not know whom they saw. I am here to protect the interests of my own riding to the best of my ability, and I frankly admit it; next, the interests of my own province, and then the interests of Canada.

The member for Skeena made a very reasoned speech, as he always does, and one which was well delivered. I do not agree with his arguments, but I agree with the logical way in which he presented them. The member for Cariboo made a speech which I did not understand, and I do not think anyone else in the house did. I am sure the hon. member did not understand it himself. Then, the member for Yorkton made a speech, and all I can say about that is that he believes—that would not be parliamentary, so I shall say merely that I do not agree with him.

An hon. Member: You are afraid of having your ears pinned back.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am not afraid of having my ears pinned back, because as the leader of the opposition said we are trying to build a gas line to the province of British Columbia by an all-Canadian route, and not a high pressure grease route.

I want to point this out, Mr. Chairman, that not one telegram, not one letter, has come from the province of British Columbia opposing our stand in this house. If we wanted to take up the time, Mr. Chairman, we could produce articles favouring our stand. I hope the vote is taken tonight or this afternoon. As I say, there has not been a solitary letter, a solitary telegram, or a solitary organization that has endorsed the route through the United States.

Mr. Howe: If you want some telegrams, here are hundreds of them.

Mr. Cruickshank: The minister has given me four hundred and seventy-six letters and telegrams endorsing my stand. To the best of my knowledge, there have been only three members in the house who have spoken about pipe lines who know anything about them. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a well known engineer, and he knows something about building a pipe line. The member for Coast-Capilano is, I understand, a mining engineer, and knows something about the terrain. The member for Calgary West knows the financial end of the oil business, and has acted as solicitor for various companies, as well as a speculator in the oil business of Alberta, for many years.

An hon. Member: What do you know about it?

Mr. Cruickshank: I know nothing about it, but I can tell you this, that I am the only member of the House of Commons who has a practical knowledge of pipe lines. I happen to be the only member of the House of Commons who owns one. It was presented to me by the most representative body in the Dominion of Canada, the parliamentary press gallery, at their annual dinner. I happen to have a pipe line of my own.

The member for Cariboo told us about Christopher Columbus, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and the building of a route through Lillooet.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): What about the associated boards of trade, and their resolution?

Mr. Cruickshank: I happened to be at the meeting—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It was a resolution of the associated boards of trade of the Fraser valley.

Mr. Cruickshank: If the hon. member has not the courage to make a speech on this issue, I have. The associated boards of trade brought in a resolution favouring the all-Canadian route. I happened to be at the meeting.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): But by way of Prince George. The resolution came from Mission City in the hon. gentleman's own riding.

Mr. Cruickshank: I did not understand the speech the hon. member delivered the other day, nor did anyone else. If he keeps on interrupting, I may get a little enlightenment on it. Many members have stated that the pipe line must go down through the Fraser valley. It has been stated that the Yellowhead route is the one route which has been surveyed by the most competent engineers on the North American continent, Ford, Bacon and Davis. A man from Vancouver by the name of "Jerry" Wood went over every foot of that territory. In the committee I listened with a great deal of interest to the member for Skeena tell me what a great man Mr. Dixon is. I have no doubt Mr. Dixon is a great man, and I am not disputing that fact at all. We heard all about this man, who admitted in the committee that he is a promoter.

Then there is another company, and I may as well mention that company, because I do not want to speak on pipe lines again. One representative of that company said he did not know what route the pipe line would follow; he did not know where the company was going to get the money; he did not know where they would get the gas, but he hoped they would secure a charter and hold up the other two companies. I am willing to admit that the Alberta Natural Gas Company is a legitimate company. I think it is backed by sound financial people. As for the other company, I might as well pick up two people from amongst the funny money group, and along with myself form a company and attempt to get a charter.

Mr. Fair: You should see how funny you look.

Mr. Cruickshank: That may be true. While I may disagree with my minister, and while I may disagree with some of the members of my own party, some of my colleagues from my own province, no Liberal has been told he has to keep quiet, as your little group were told.

Mr. Fair: That is absolutely false.

Mr. Low: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the member for Fraser Valley has just made a statement which I can imagine was made out of great emotion. It certainly was not made on the basis of any knowledge. If he will just carry on with his argument, I shall show him soon enough that no one has told us to keep our mouths shut. We have done so out of common decency, in the hope that someone would come to his senses and we would get this bill through.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, if my language was unparliamentary when I said they were instructed to keep quiet, I shall withdraw it. I shall put it this way: Two of their most brilliant members made excellent forty-minute speeches—

Mr. Herridge: In favour of it.

Mr. Cruickshank: —in favour of the Canadian route, and all of a sudden there was not another peep out of them. Do not tell me that no instructions were given.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I must say once again that I am telling the hon. member there were no instructions given. I am telling him before the house that any of the members in this group can speak as he wants to speak on this subject. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I shall assure the member for Fraser Valley, before my members, that they may vote as they desire to vote; no one is going to tell them how to vote.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am sorry that I have been interrupted again, because it is taking up my time. I presume I shall be given a little extra time.

Mr. Low: That is exactly what the hon. member would do, take extra time, and that is the reason why I have kept my mouth shut up to now, because he would go right round and round; he is that kind.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is there any question of privilege about that?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Fraser Valley has the floor.

Mr. Cruickshank: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question I shall be delighted to answer him, because I am sure that anyone coming from Alberta or from the Peace River riding is entitled to enlightenment.

Mr. Blackmore: Stick to the facts.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am getting help from Lethbridge now. If the hon. member for Peace River did not issue any instructions I accept that, and I accept his apology.

Mr. Low: I must say there is no apology, Mr. Chairman. It was a statement of fact.

Mr. Cruickshank: If the information given to me as to where the instructions came from was wrong or incorrect I apologize to the hon. member for having associated his name with them, but I do not think I did.

The Chairman: Order. I think it would be much better to come back to the clause under consideration.

Mr. Low: Yes; let us get back to pipe lines.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry if I transgressed the rules. I very seldom break the rules of the house. I try to follow strictly in line at all times. If I have broken the rules I am sorry. I withdraw any of the suggestions that I made that the hon. members had orders. I do not think they did. They just fell in line.

To get back to the pipe lines, Mr. Chairman, what we from the province of British Columbia are particularly interested in is the development of small industries within our province.

I think I am in order in bringing this up, Mr. Chairman. You will notice that I did not come down to the chamber this afternoon with four or five hundred telegrams or five hundred letters which I have received, nor with a speech all typewritten out for me by someone in the Morgan Stanley Company. I am speaking without notes and without telegrams or letters, although I could produce them from every riding in the province of British Columbia, and from almost every board of trade in that province, favouring an all-Canadian route.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I respect the sincerity of my colleagues from British Columbia who believe in the United States route. I believe they are sincere in their belief that it should go through the United States, but we are asking the same appreciation of our sincerity. I now refer to those of us who believe in an all-Canadian route.

In my own particular district I realize that gas will never go into the individual homes and farms; that is obvious. But it could bring small industries to our towns, such industries as were mentioned in a letter to one of the most prominent businessmen and a constituent of mine. I will just mention two towns, the town of Kamloops and the town of Chilliwack. It is the cheapest form of power—

Mr. Fulton: One is the best and the other is the second best town in British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is the cheapest form of power in the world. It could bring small industries, decentralized industries, to our towns.

The hon. member for Nanaimo mentioned the national defence point of view. I heard a little scoffing at that. But at the same time we hear our minister of external affairs, whose seat I am occupying at the present time while he is occupying one that I should like to occupy in Geneva or London, tell us how serious the international situation is. Is there any better way to prepare than to have power on our great Pacific coast? According to all the experts, we have only one possible enemy, and the most likely avenue of attack will be on the Pacific. Should we not have the power transferred to the province of British Columbia by the quickest, cheapest and the safest possible route?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned the consumer's angle a short time ago. It is quite true that the consumer should be protected and cared for; but the only figure that was given to the committee indicated that the additional cost of an all-Canadian route would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $17 million. That figure was picked out of the air by this great expert, Mr. Dixon. No reason was given for the $17 million. He just picked the $17 million out of the air. Not one iota of evidence was given to that committee, so far as I could hear, to show that the gas would cost one cent more if it went through an all-Canadian route, as opposed to an all-United States route.

We hear some amateur experts in this committee talk about slides and tunnelling. We were accused of supporting one company. So far as I know every hon. member from British Columbia who has spoken in opposition to the United States route has said that he did not care a hoot which company built it so long as it is an all-Canadian route. I know I am accused of being for the Westcoast Transmission Company because I happened to sponsor their bill last year. We made a mistake last year in approving their charter without having written into it an all-Canadian route. We made that mistake, but two wrongs do not make a right. I went so far as to say—and I was speaking with authority—that the Westcoast Transmission Company was willing to have it written into its charter, provided it is written into the charters of the two other companies, that it should be an all-Canadian route. Can anything be fairer than that?

I am not a legal expert because I do not know anything about law. You know, Mr.

Chairman, one of the privileges I had at Windsor yesterday was an escort of mounted police down the street. My only experience with policemen on motorcycles before has been chasing them. That is about as much as I know about law. But I heard the leader of the opposition give an explanation of an act that was passed in 1907. I would ask a lawyer, not some amateur lawyer but say one from Lake Centre or one from Kenora-Rainy River—and I am going to be fair about this; I will see if I can find one down in the corner; no, I cannot see one there—to give us his interpretation of the act that was passed in 1907. I should like to know whether or not the leader of the opposition was correct. I had never heard of it before, but if my understanding of the matter is correct the government of Canada and the government of Canada only has the say in the export of gas and oil. That was my understanding of the act as outlined to us the other evening. I would like to be corrected by some legal expert if I am wrong.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the hope that we will have a vote before six o'clock I am not going to take up any more of the committee's time. I am sorry that the argument has got heated at times. If I have been at all unfair to the hon. member for Cariboo or to anybody else I apologize. I feel very keenly on the matter, as I am sure they do. I think I have every justification for feeling keenly about it because 99 per cent of the people of my riding feel as I do. I understood the minister to say that it will not be a government vote, but a free vote. It is a private bill. I sincerely hope that when the vote is taken each and every one of my colleagues from British Columbia will repent, will see the evil of their ways, and vote with us. Particularly do I hope that many of those from the maritimes and eastern Canada, who will look to us from the west for assistance in the future, will vote with us against these bills.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am going to speak for just a moment or two. I had no intention of doing so until the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke, but he did attack some friends of mine and I intend to reply in kind. He tried to draw the inference that the Westcoast Transmission Company was a blind for the Sunray Oil Company of California, even though he did say, "Delaware", or wherever it was. The Sunray Oil Company did buy some two years ago —it was in all the newspapers—into the Pacific Petroleum Company. The president of that company was a gentleman named Frank McMahon, a personal friend of mine. They bought into that company and put a tremendous amount of money into development work, with the result that today they are one of the leading producing oil and gas companies in Alberta. In fact, if you eliminate Imperial, Royalite and Home, I think they will rank just below them. These are the people behind the Westcoast Transmission Company.

For the minister to imply, as he did, that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and other members in this house are stooging for the Sunray Oil Company is just as true as if I were to say that he is stooging here for Morgan, Stanley and Company. I have in my hand the exhibits filed by this same man Dixon before the board in Alberta—and I am referring to the gas and oil conservation board.

But before I go on, the minister told us that no one had indicated to him where they were going to build. Well, his scouting system must have gone to pieces. In Calgary for well over a month—they have now adjourned until the fall—the Westcoast Transmission Company has been applying for a route. This is the Yellowhead route, down the Thompson, into Kamloops, on to Princeton, Princeton to Hope and Hope to Vancouver. The evidence is all sworn to. I heard some of it myself. If the minister is interested, there are twenty volumes of evidence which I have in my office, and he may borrow them at any time he wishes. The survey they conducted is on the basis of one-tenth of a mile. So it is utter rot and nonsense to say that these people have not done a job, and a good job. They had eight engineers in Calgary from Ford, Bacon and Davis, including the senior vice-president, Mr. Whittlesey; I met them there. It was there I also met Mr. Dixon and Mr. Logan. We are a hospitable people out there. This company, Pacific Petroleum Company, must have at least forty producing wells, and their exploration program is one of the biggest we know—not in the United States, but in Alberta.

I asked the minister's friend, Mr. Dixon, this question in committee. He does not own a gallon of oil or a foot of gas; he frankly admitted he was a promoter who hoped to control the policy of the company whose charter we are now considering.

The Alberta Natural Gas Company filed a printed application, and also filed with the application exhibits A to E inclusive. One of these exhibits—and it is the most remarkable thing of its kind I have seen—is a list of the financing done by Morgan, Stanley and Company, and the other two persons they named in the application. It consists of at least sixteen pages, closely typewritten, showing figures such as $40 million, $157 million, $18 million, $156 million, $80 million, $125 million, $85 million—and it goes on for sixteen pages.

This is the sort of thing the promoters of this company filed with the board in an effort to get permission to export this gas from Alberta—and when I say "export" I mean even to another province.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am going to close with this, that having regard to other debates this one has been conducted on a reasonably high plane. But I think it is no credit to the House of Commons or to the minister that at least for the first time in this session he should project himself into the debate and start riding companies the officials of which are just as honourable men as he now is, ever was, or ever will be. That sort of nonsense I simply will not put up with. I ask your pardon, Mr. Chairman, for speaking again, even for a short time, on this matter.

Mr. Coldwell: I really did not intend to say anything this afternoon, but when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking he referred to a speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver East, who is attending a committee meeting this afternoon. I was glad the minister said that he knew the hon. member would not advocate anything in the house if he felt there was something shady behind it. Those are not the words he used, but that is the implication of what he said.

I was glad indeed to hear the minister say that. But I wish to add this, that having listened to this debate—and when I say "listened" I mean exactly that, because I have participated in it only briefly on one or two occasions before—I have come to the conclusion that what we really lack in this country is a proper national policy for the development, conservation and use of our resources primarily for the Canadian people.

That can be attained in my opinion only through agreement between the federal and provincial authorities; because, after all, the resources of the provinces are under the control of the provincial governments. It seems to me this debate has illustrated how badly we need to do something comprehensive in the way of planning the use of such resources for the good of the country as a whole. If we are going to do that, then I believe further that that can be undertaken only by means of a publicly-owned plan and operation of resources of this sort. Because, after all, when we allow a pipe line to be built to convey oil or gas from one area to another it is obvious that that must, because of its nature, become a monopoly for the company granted that right. That is true of electricity; but certainly in connection with gas and oil it is also true.

No one who has listened to the debate believes for one moment that more than one pipe line will convey the gas from Alberta to the Pacific coast, whether it goes by a Canadian or an American route. Indeed it would be economic waste to have two or three pipe lines or two or three companies competing for the business in gas in a city like Vancouver. Where we have had gas made from coal in days gone by, and where there have been two or three companies in cities, we have found that invariably they have been consolidated into one company usually publicly owned. The experience in this city of Ottawa in regard to electricity confirms that point of view. Where you had various companies, today they are consolidated into one organization. It seems to me that the only way in which you can deal intelligently with the use of a resource of this description is by public ownership.

In the last parliament we moved for public ownership of the lines concerned with this great utility. I regret exceedingly that that amendment was not adopted as I think it might have obviated a great deal of discussion and removed many of the fears that are felt quite naturally by some hon. members from British Columbia, and particularly by their constituents. In the utilization of these great gas and oil resources, not only are the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta interested; the rest of the country as well has an interest. I do not know where and when another gas and oil field will be found, but I believe there are in Alberta huge supplies of gas which should be utilized for the benefit of the prairie provinces as well as of British Columbia. We should not be contemplating supplying gas to the Pacific coast of the United States before the needs of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and British Columbia have been considered.

I go further and say that with the distances that gas and oil are now being piped in North America it might be found economical to pipe this great natural resource to Ontario, or at least to the western part of the province should supplies be found to be adequate. This debate has indicated the need of utilizing this great resource on a national basis rather than on the basis of the needs of British Columbia and Alberta only. The only way we can plan the use of a resource of this description is to determine that it will be utilized through some form of public ownership and public control.

This afternoon the minister made the point that the consumer should be considered in connection with the use of this gas. I agree. He also made another statement with which I agree, that the consumer after all will pay for these pipe lines. Of course the consumer will pay for the pipe lines in the charges that will be levied.

Mr. Goode: A million dollars a year extra.

Mr. Coldwell: That is not the point I am trying to make. The consumers will pay for it, but the promoters will own it after the consumers have paid for it. I would rather see the people of Canada own it even if we have to pay a few million more for the privilege of utilizing it in our own country.

I was not able to attend the meetings of the committee where this matter was gone into. I spent part of the evening there when it was decided that no further representations would be heard on the question of the route. A motion was carried to go ahead the next morning with the discussion of the bill clause by clause, after one hour of general discussion. Having looked at some of the evidence since I have come to the conclusion that no hon. member should vote for the passage of this bill until it has been returned to the committee.

The committee should sit again and go into the matter more thoroughly. It could hear all the evidence that is available. When that is done the proposal that I have suggested should be considered. In view of the squabble that has occurred between the promoters of these companies, consideration should be given to the utilization of this resource by means of a publicly-owned pipe line. The matter could be discussed by Alberta, British Columbia and the federal authorities and, if we are thinking of a national policy, with other provinces that are likely to be involved in such an undertaking.

As far as the Sunray Company is concerned, I know nothing about it. The suggestion has been made that there has been some lobbying in this regard, but I have been paid the compliment of not having been lobbied by any company. I suppose they know where we stand on this kind of proposal and no one has seen me at any time in regard to this matter, either an agent of Sunray or any other company interested in the building of a pipe line.

Whether this is to be built under public or private ownership, we should have knowledge of the route that will be followed. Before this committee agrees to the passage of this bill we should instruct the executive of this parliament, which is the government. As the leader of the opposition so well said the other evening, in the final analysis it is the government that will decide whether this line will pass through the United States or whether it will pass through Canada. This parliament has an obligation, not only to the people of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, but to the people of all Canada to see that the executive of this parliament carries out the considered—I use the word "considered" advisedly—opinion of this house. But I submit that that considered opinion cannot be given until more inquiry is made than was made by the committee before it rose and made its report to this house.

I do not propose to continue the debate. I wanted merely to express my point of view. This discussion has gone on now for two sessions and every facility has been granted by the government to get through these pipe line bills. I submit that after this full discussion and consideration the whole matter should be voted down and considered anew. When we consider the matter anew it should be on the basis of a national policy, thinking first of the interests of Canada as a whole. If we do that, I believe we shall come to the conclusion that in co-operation with the provinces concerned we should build this line or any other line—in the very nature of things they must be monopolistic in character—through a publicly owned and controlled organization, just as Ontario has built its great system of hydroelectric lines.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, coming from Saskatchewan as I do I feel I should express the views of the people there before this matter comes to a vote. For many months now we have been debating these pipe line bills. I must say that not very much information has been given us upon which to form an intelligent opinion as to whether the line should be built through British Columbia or through the United States. Very little engineering data has been presented to us to support any claim. We have not had conclusive engineering data supplied to us this year to assist us in determining that any route is the correct one. I am not so much interested in the route used to export gas. I favour it going through Canada first if it is at all possible, and if such a route is feasible. What I am particularly interested in is the reserves of gas. I believe Dr. Hume made his last report on Canadian gas reserves in 1948, and at that time he said there were four trillion cubic feet. I have inquired from various people who are supporting the different pipe lines as to what volume of gas would be exported if a line were to be built. None of them seemed to have a very clear idea.

One thing they all seem to forget is that our reserves of gas are exhaustible. As soon as you instal a pipe line and start to withdraw gas your reserves are being depleted. That was clearly demonstrated in the Medicine Hat field. Years ago it was the boast in Medicine Hat that they had such a tremendous supply of gas they did not bother to turn off the street lights in the daytime. Nevertheless the day came when the field was depleted, and today they are having to put gas from the Turner valley into the Medicine Hat field. We are carrying on exploration in Saskatchewan but we have not found any gas although we hope to do so. We have found a little oil in the Lloydminster field. Manitoba may not find any gas or oil. I am one of those who feel that the needs of the prairies should be looked after before we allow any gas to be exported from those provinces. I have heard hon. members state here that we have reserves which will last for fifty years. Imagine that! Would any hon. member think it was a wise policy to sell our forests on a basis of depleting them in fifty years? Forests grow again but gas and oil reserves cannot be replenished.

We talk about new pipe lines in western Canada. We have room there for thirty million people. We are constructing irrigation systems. At the present time we have a small population and we cannot use the gas but if we put thirty million more people in the prairie provinces I believe we will have a market for all our gas there. I should like to see hon. members of the house directing their energies as ardently towards bringing industries to western Canada where the gas is, rather than toward the construction of a pipe line to take our resources out of Canada for the benefit of people elsewhere.

Some people wonder why these pipe line companies are so interested in getting a franchise to take gas out of Canada. We are told their interests are purely altruistic, but I have noticed that the stock of the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company has risen to $300 a share whereas it originally sold for $100. Are the consumers going to pay a dividend on the basis of $300 or is it going to be held down to the basis of $100 a share? That is what I should like to know before the matter is settled. I think the board of transport commissioners can do something in that regard. I understand they have the power to fix rates. I for one am going to do my best to see that a return will be paid only on the basis of $100, the money that was really put into the company, and not on the price of $300 that is being paid for the stock today. I am sure the same thing would happen with other pipe lines.

While I am interested in the export of gas and oil if we have sufficient to look after ourselves for hundreds of years, I do not believe in exporting it before we have an opportunity to find out what we really have at home and if we can use it. I was undecided how to vote on this matter until I heard the leader of the opposition make an eloquent speech the other night. In it he stated that the government has power to say where a line will go. He also said that under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act the government has power to say whether it will allow anything to be exported, and that the province of Alberta has power to say whether or not they will export any of their gas. The government was elected by an overwhelming majority of the people. They judged it on its conduct of the war and on its record in the re-establishment of industries after the war. I think the people have faith that the government will make the proper decision when the time comes. Therefore I think the only thing to do is to pass these measures and thereby give Alberta what it wants, more competition should she decide to export any gas. Nevertheless I am certainly against exporting any until we ascertain whether or not we can use it at home.

On section 6—Powers of company.

Mr. Green: There is one thing I should like to point out about section 6. The powers given under this section can be exercised within or without Canada. Statements have been made by several members that the company which received a charter last year has an advantage. I simply point out that this provision is wider than in the Westcoast Transmission Company bill or in the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited measure. In both of those cases there is a restriction to Alberta and British Columbia or outside Canada whereas under the present measure incorporating the Alberta Natural Gas Company power is given covering any part of Canada. Therefore the company has power to pipe gas not only to the west coast but also to the east. The main point I wish to make is that a special favour is being given to this particular company.

Bill reported.

Mr. Benidickson moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks on third reading of the bill I express regret that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is not in his seat because I propose to say a few words about the stand he has taken. The fact that he is not here, however, is not my fault. This afternoon we saw him come into the chamber and, when he rose to speak, lose his temper and make quite a few rather violent remarks which I think clearly showed his attitude on the whole question. It is a very touchy subject not only for the Minister of Trade and Commerce but also for the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who has lost his temper twice during the debate on these measures.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce made certain remarks as to what he would do and how he would deal with this question at the proper time.

Hon. members should remember that less than a year ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who sits for the riding of Port Arthur, brushed aside the representations of the people of that riding and allowed the main oil pipe line to by-pass the Canadian lakehead cities of Port Arthur and Fort William and go instead across the United States boundary to Superior, Wisconsin, where tankage and docks are to be installed, so that Americans will get the jobs that should have been available to Canadians. Having done that last year, I do not expect him to give any special consideration to the wishes of the people of British Columbia in connection with this natural gas pipe line to the west coast.

The issue is now abundantly clear; it is whether or not there is to be an all-Canadian route for this natural gas to the west coast. In other words, are the requirements of the Canadian people to be met before the requirements of those Americans living in the northwest United States? All the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to do at any time during this debate was announce that this main pipe line would be routed to the west coast in Canadian soil. Had that been done there would have been no further debate. However, they have been very careful not to give any such assurance.

This afternoon, by way of summing up, I propose to set out some of the reasons why this question of an all-Canadian route is of importance to the people of British Columbia, and I hope to conclude my remarks with a few reasons as to why the issue is also of great importance to all Canadians, no matter in which province they happen to live. In the first place this proposed development is not of a minor nature. I have here a dispatch which appeared in the Vancouver Province of April 22 summing up very clearly just what this development means to the west coast. This is the report of a meeting of purchasing agents of public utility companies in British Columbia and also the states of Washington and Oregon, and the first paragraph reads:

> Purchasing agents from three of the largest public utility corporations on the west coast agreed today that the proposed natural gas pipe line from Alberta would be the major economic development of the decade for the Pacific northwest.

One speaker, who came from the United States, said:

> With the introduction of natural gas, the amount of potential energy that will come through this pipe line will be the practical equivalent of the power energy now coming from Coulee and Bonneville.

Those are two immense power dams in the states of Washington and Oregon. Then the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Vancouver five days ago clearly showed the great importance of the development. He said it looked as though an oil pipe line would follow the gas line to Vancouver. That may very well be of greater importance than the gas pipe line itself. The Vancouver Sun, which has the largest circulation of any newspaper west of Toronto and which has been a staunch supporter of this government ever since I can remember, had an editorial dealing with that statement by the minister, headed "It must be all-Canadian." It is dated May 12, and the first paragraph says:

> Mr. Howe's revelation that an oil pipe line from the Alberta oil fields to the Pacific coast may follow the gas pipe line makes it all the more necessary that the gas pipe line should follow an all-Canadian route.

Then it goes on:

> Think what it would mean if the suggested oil pipe line followed an American route.
> The oil from Alberta would be pumped to tidewater at Seattle or Tacoma and there refined for shipment or shipped crude. There would be jobs for Americans—but what of Canadians?
> Canadians should demand that a policy of "Canada first" be adopted. If refineries are to be built and shipping development to take place as a result of the exploitation of Canada's resources, the ports and workers of Canada must have preference.

That is really the essence of our argument, that Canadians must have first call on Canadian resources. That was the main ground on which a few weeks ago the legislature of British Columbia unanimously adopted a resolution advocating a route through the Yellowhead pass. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce seem to have paid no attention at all to that resolution; yet there it is, setting out the reasons and supported by all parties in that legislature. I think perhaps that is the most significant development to come out of this whole discussion. The British Columbia legislature were particularly concerned with the development of northern British Columbia. They felt that if the route went through the Yellowhead there would be an outlet for gas and oil from the Peace river district, where the British Columbia reserves are located. And just two or three weeks ago, when the bills were in committee and there was publicity in the Vancouver newspapers, the attorney general of that province again confirmed the stand of the legislature. Here is what he said, on April 27:

> The government of British Columbia supports the northern route because it will provide an outlet for gas in the British Columbia section of the Peace river block. We also believe it is the logical route to ensure maximum development and benefit to both provinces.

Then look what it means by way of jobs. Mr. Dixon, who appeared before the committee on behalf of the applicants for incorporation, spoke only of routes through the Crowsnest pass in southern British Columbia. He knew nothing about the Yellowhead route and had not even bothered to have it checked. But on his figures for his own all-Canadian route through the Crowsnest pass we find that there would be spent in Canada practically $66 million; that is on the route from Pincher Creek to the coast. On the other hand if his second route were followed, going mainly through the United States, only $22 million would be spent in British Columbia. So there is a difference of $44 million in the amount to be spent in British Columbia, depending on whether this line goes through Canada or through the United States. That could mean an additional $44 million to provide jobs for Canadians, and to buy materials manufactured in Canadian plants all over the country. The difference in mileage in these two routes was, by an all-Canadian route, 626 miles in Canada from Pincher Creek, Alberta, to the coast, and 385 miles in the United States, made up of course of the branch lines in the United States; by the route through the United States, there would be only 210 miles in Canada and 720 miles in the United States, which included practically all the main pipe line.

Something has been said in the debate about the price of gas at the coast. The Westcoast Transmission Company, which is proposing to pipe this gas through the Yellowhead pass, gave figures before the Alberta conservation board showing that the price of gas in Vancouver would be 29·2 cents per thousand cubic feet. Mr. Dixon was unable to meet those figures, even by the route which went through the United States. The inference has been left here that it would be cheaper to pipe this gas through the United States, but there has been no contradiction of those figures given by the Westcoast Transmission Company.

One other reason why this question is of such importance to the people of British Columbia is this. If the main line goes through Canada, then control remains with Canada until our requirements have been met. Whatever gas is surplus can go to the United States; we are not concerned about how that will be controlled. If this main line is kept in Canada, there can never be any question about the gas being shut off to Canadian users. If the main line were through the United States, we would always face that possibility. I think it was the member for Fraser Valley who mentioned the fact that the people of western Ontario have already had that experience. They had their supply cut off a year or so ago because there was not enough gas to serve the requirements of the United States, so Canada was cut off.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it would be intolerable to have British Columbia placed in a position where the gas supply could be cut off because extra gas was needed in the northwest states of the union. It would be an intolerable situation. The government of Canada, at the instigation of the Department of Trade and Commerce, co-operating with other departments, actually had the minister at Washington appear before the United States power commission on April 18 to make representations on behalf of the Canadian government to have that commission grant the Panhandle Eastern Company authority to export gas to western Ontario. The minister, in making his representations, was quoted as saying he was sure it would be without detriment to United States customers. If the government show that concern for the users of gas in western Ontario, then they certainly should show an equal concern for the potential users in British Columbia, and make sure this main line is built in Canada.

The Alberta Natural Gas Company does not, unfortunately, meet the requirements. Their representatives showed only too clearly in the committee that the company is determined to build by the United States route. I asked Mr. Dixon whether he would give any pledge about building in Canada. This evidence is found at page 114 of the proceedings:

> Q. Will you give any pledge to this committee that your company, if it is incorporated, will build the Canada-first line, build a main line through Canada to the west coast?
> A. No.

Q. Mr. Dixon, that is clear cut and we are glad to have that statement but I ask you if in your talks with the Right Hon. Mr. Howe, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that is the stand you have taken?

A. Just exactly. I have not said anything to Mr. Howe I have not said to you.

There, Mr. Speaker, was the difference between the attitude of the applicants for incorporation of the Alberta Natural Gas Company and the Westcoast Transmission Company. Last year the Westcoast Transmission Company did give a pledge in committee that they would build by the all-Canadian route. The application that company has made to the Alberta board is on that basis, and so far they have shown good faith in carrying out that pledge.

Mr. Dixon himself brought out a fact which showed clearly that his company intends to build through the United States. He produced a letter from the Dominion Bridge Company, stating he had been negotiating with them for steel pipe. The letter was signed by the sales development manager, and it ended with this paragraph, after setting out what that company could do in the way of supplying pipe:

It is further based on our understanding that the Canadian portion of the Alberta Natural Gas Company line would require approximately four hundred miles of pipe of twenty-inch diameter or over.

In other words, Mr. Dixon only asked the company for sufficient pipe to meet the requirements of a line, the main route of which lay through the United States.

There is no question but that the Alberta Natural Gas Company is to be controlled by people in the United States. We asked about where the stock control would be, and Mr. Dixon refused to contradict the statement that it would be in the United States. One of the partners of the firm of Morgan Stanley is an applicant for incorporation, and Mr. Dixon showed in his evidence that Morgan Stanley were taking charge of the financing of this whole project. He also admitted that the Alberta Natural Gas Company would be either a subsidiary of the Northwest Natural Gas Company or that the latter would be a subsidiary of the Canadian company. All of the evidence indicated that the company preferred to build by the route through the United States. They want the route through the United States because it will be more profitable for them. The line gets into the large market quicker by that route, and the promoters think it is in their interest to have the line go to the south at the first convenient point.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Green: When the house rose for the supper recess I was pointing out that the Alberta Natural Gas people are obviously determined to build via the United States route. In that connection a very significant event happened in Vancouver on the first day of the month during a meeting of what is called the Pacific northwest trade association. That is an association made up of businessmen from British Columbia, Washington and Oregon. In reporting what happened at that meeting the Vancouver papers say:

But the northwestern U.S. states prefer the line that runs south out of Alberta through their territory first. This point was made almost rudely clear at recent meetings of the Pacific northwest trade association here. In meetings at hotel Vancouver delegates from Washington and Oregon hardly gave a thought to the British Columbia line, and even cheered lustily when it was mistakenly announced that Northwest Natural Gas Company——had received its charter and "would be able to build through our states."

Which of course is the parent of the Alberta Natural Gas Company.

That gives you the attitude of the people in Washington and also the aims of these Alberta Natural Gas promoters.

In addition to that, they ignore the north country completely. I need to quote only one question and answer from the proceedings of the committee to be found at page 99: I asked Mr. Dixon:

Your pipe line comes across southern British Columbia and is absolutely of no use to the Peace river or northern Alberta and north British Columbia.

A. Our line would be of no use to the Peace river.

As a matter of fact, these people are not interested in developing Canada at all. If they are allowed to build their pipe line by this United States first route it will not only mean British Columbia losing a chance for great development, but it will also mean that British Columbia will be in bondage for all time to the Northwest Natural Gas Company and to the United States federal power commission.

Unfortunately for British Columbia, the Alberta Natural Gas Company seems to have the support of the present Canadian government. The way the procedure of this house has been directed by the government to give this company the priority, right from the start of the present session, is a very clear indication that the government stands behind this company.

Then, a parliamentary assistant sponsored the bill. It should be pointed out that not only is he a parliamentary assistant but he is actually in charge of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys at the present time, and that is the department which would have to do with all these oil and gas developments.

When the vote was called the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) jumped up to vote first, although this is supposed to be a private bill. Then we had him reprimanding the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) the other night by referring to him as "one of my erstwhile supporters on other issues." The Prime Minister's whole speech was in effect an appeal to his supporters to do as he—

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, may I correct the hon. member. Much as I agree with his speech, I should like to keep my record clear. The Prime Minister said he was not referring to me. I want to keep as much in clear water as I possibly can.

Mr. Green: The point I am making is that the Prime Minister appealed to the Liberals in the house. That was the purport of his speech.

It will be noticed that one of the applicants for incorporation is Austin Cottrell Taylor of Vancouver, who is a director of the Bank of Canada, and another applicant is Cortelyou Ladd Simonson of the city of New York, who is a partner in the firm of Morgan Stanley, and the firm of Morgan Stanley have been in charge of the government's financing in the United States.

Then we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) writing a phony letter, may I say, to the city council of Vancouver, the terms of which he himself has since contradicted. In this letter he referred to his talks with the Alberta Natural Gas Company, but not a word about a talk with the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited. It is quite clear that these people are the friends of the government and that bodes ill for the people of British Columbia because, as I say, an attempt is to be made by them to build this line through the United States.

In any event, we find evasion by the government on this question of an all-Canadian route. Oh, lip service is given by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the policy of serving Canada first. Here is a headline from a Vancouver paper dated May 10: "Canada 'First' on Gas Pipe Line" in reporting a statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce; but —and there is a very big "but" in their Canada first attitude—they say: "Oh, the board of transport commissioners must decide." In his speech the Prime Minister said not one word about the government's responsibility under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. Yet we find in section 5 of that act that in the first place the governor in council, which means the cabinet, must issue a permit before gas can be exported; but we find further this provision:

> No person shall, without a licence, construct or place in position any line or wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or any pipe line or any other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

That is a provision that the cabinet must give a permit before a pipe line can be built for the exportation of gas or oil; yet we have had no offer from the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce to restrict these permits to an all-Canadian route; and each of the three companies has an all-Canadian route. The Westcoast Transmission Company has the Yellowhead route. The Alberta Natural Gas and the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited have, through the Crowsnest, an all-Canadian route, and these latter two say that in addition they will now investigate the Yellowhead route; so it is not as though there were no all-Canadian routes available in each of the three cases.

Both the Prime Minister of this country and his senior minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, are now hiding behind the board of transport commissioners. They both know that last year before the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company could get any order from the board of transport commissioners a permit had to be issued by the authority of the government. That was proved the other night by the leader of the opposition and I have a copy of the order in council and the permit here tonight. During the debate last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself said, as reported at page 1560 of Hansard:

> The board of transport commissioners will, I assume, as they have in the past, require that the company produce a licence under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act which is administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

No matter how they twist and turn, the responsibility for giving a permit for building a pipe line outside Canada rests with the cabinet. I thought it was neatly put on May 6 by Elmore Philpott, a columnist writing in the Vancouver Sun. He said this:

> It is a downright insult to the intelligence of the people of Canada for M.P.'s, and even cabinet ministers, to wriggle and quibble when it comes to answering a straight question like this:

And here is the question Mr. Philpott put forward:

> Are you for an all-Canadian pipe line to the Pacific coast, or are you for mainline-via-U.S.A.? If you are for Canada, why the hesitation about writing into the law of the land a clause saying that the pipe shall go via Canada, and serve Canada first and foremost?

This evening I had meant to say something about tolls and rates. There is no provision in the present Pipe Lines Act for the regulation of the rates that may be charged for transmitting this gas, although there is provision for regulating rates on oil. I have not, however, the necessary time tonight to go into that point further.

I promised when I opened my remarks this afternoon that I would try to point out why this issue is of importance not only to the people of British Columbia but to all Canadians; I refer to the question as to whether this route shall be an all-Canadian route and shall first serve the requirements of the Canadian people. We have exactly the same situation arising in Quebec and in Labrador with respect to the iron ore. Is that iron ore to be smelted in Canada to the greatest possible extent or is it to go to the United States? We have not one word from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that would lead us to believe that there is to be any increase in the smelting of iron ore in Canada or that any new smelters are to be established. We have a lead given by the premier of Quebec, Hon. Mr. Duplessis. I have here a press dispatch of May 2, under the heading "Quebec May Manufacture Own Steel", which reads in part as follows:

> Montreal, May 2.—A development which might have a big effect on Quebec's economy was made public when Premier Duplessis told of a plan for making steel from Ungava iron ore and graphitic shale.

What are the Americans doing? Within the last month three of the American secretaries—the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Chapman—have appeared before the public works committee of the House of Representatives, urging upon that body that they recommend the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway; and in each case when the secretary pleaded for such action by that committee, one of the main grounds given was that American iron ores were becoming depleted, that the Mesabi range was being dug out, and that it was essential to get the Canadian iron ores down to the American steel plants. Mr. Chapman appeared just last week or a few days ago, May 4, and he actually is reported to have said this:

> Chapman said the United States would not have reached economic pre-eminence had it not been able to produce steel at a rate equivalent to its industrial growth . . .
> Moreover, movement of the Labrador ores would conserve the remaining high-grade, open-pit ores of the Mesabi range for emergency use.

The Americans are taking the right stand. They want to use these Canadian iron ores to manufacture their steel. If a policy such as this government is following at the present time is continued for long, there is a grave danger that Canada will be nothing more or less than a satellite of the United States.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Green: It is all right for the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to sneer at the satellite nations in Europe; that is, the satellites of the Soviet. But Canada does not want to be a satellite on the North American continent, and the Americans do not want us to be one. They want us to be a great strong nation in our own right; and that is what we could be if we used our resources such as these finds of iron, oil and gas primarily for the development of our own country.

It is perfectly obvious, Mr. Speaker, from the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon, that he does not intend to make any commitment in favour of an all-Canadian route; but I am going to try to put the members of the house on record on this question. This is a private bill. Private members have a right to vote as they see fit. It will not look well if they all flock behind the government as they have done up to the present time on this issue, with the exception of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair).

An hon. Member: And the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson).

Mr. Green: I would not call the hon. member for Comox-Alberni a supporter of the government. There is some doubt about it, but he is supposed to be independent.

Mr. Gibson: That is right.

Mr. Fraser: In spots.

Mr. Green: If this amendment is defeated, I can only warn the people of British Columbia and the people of Canada that in this fight we have done our best to protect them. The responsibility for any failure to make this pipe line an all-Canadian line, and to have it serve Canadians first, from now on rests squarely on the shoulders of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the members of this government.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith):

> That Bill No. 7 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for the purpose of reconsidering the amending of the bill so as to provide that any pipe line built by the proposed company from Alberta to the Pacific coast must be by an all-Canadian route.

Alberta Natural Gas Company

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support this amendment. I have not spoken a great deal in this debate; but in its concluding stages I just wish to make a brief review of the situation from our point of view. The amendment is:

That Bill No. 7 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for the purpose of reconsidering the amending of the bill so as to provide that any pipe line built by the proposed company from Alberta to the Pacific coast must be by an all-Canadian route.

That contains the germ and meat of this whole debate. I trust that when the amendment is voted on we will find a good number of hon. members who have learned sufficient from the debate and who think enough of Canadian rights to support it.

In the early stages of this debate, when I think only one member of the group to which I belong had spoken, and that briefly, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) accused us of filibustering. That indicated that the minister was annoyed with even a few members of the house making speeches in opposition to these bills. Although we have been accused repeatedly of filibustering, there is no question about it that the debate has since become thoroughly respectable. Why has it become thoroughly respectable? It has become thoroughly respectable because this government and a good number of the members who support the government realize that we are saying what the people of British Columbia want us to say.

A very interesting aspect of the debate has been that it is on a non-partisan basis. Members of all parties have expressed opposition to the bills. A good number of members of the party to which I belong, a large number of members of the Progressive Conservative party, as well as members of the Liberal party, including the well known hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), who as it were represents a position between the opposition and the government, and also the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie), who represents the Social Credit party and who said that he and his group would refuse to vote for the bills until they knew where the pipe lines were going, have all indicated opposition to these bills.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has termed this a protracted debate, but I am sure that the debate has been of value. What has this debate accomplished? In the first place, a large number of members of this house from provinces other than British Columbia have been informed of the real situation and the facts surrounding the incorporation of these companies, the routes proposed and so on. Secondly, without doubt it has informed the people of British Columbia and the people of Canada that if there had not been a minority in this house willing to continue the debate, against the opposition of ministers and other supporters of this government, the people of this country would not be as alert as they are at the present time to the seriousness of this situation. That is indicated by the support we have received and which has increased as the debate has continued. Neither the right hon. minister nor any member on the government side of the house has disputed the statement that the great majority of the people of British Columbia support the views we have been placing before this house.

There is another thing this debate has done. It has indicated to all members of the house, whether on the government or opposition side, that we require an entirely new approach when we come to deal in the future with disposal of our great natural resources. The present federal and provincial legislation has proved to be totally inadequate and obsolete and unable to deal with the proper distribution of these valuable natural resources. This debate has proved also to the people of Canada that there are men elected to the House of Commons who are willing to express an unpopular point of view, unpopular in the house but not unpopular in the country, when they believe it to be in the interests of the Canadian people.

Protracted as this debate has been, it has caused the people of British Columbia to express their opinion in no uncertain terms. I think this debate has proved the value of our parliamentary system and institutions. It has proved the right of a minority to talk as well as the right of a majority to vote them down. In having done that, I think a valuable public service has been performed.

When the motion for second reading of this bill was under discussion we were told repeatedly by members on the government side that we should discontinue the debate and let the bill go before a committee, that once it got into committee we could ask all the questions we wished and obtain all the facts. I was one member of this house who did not swallow that argument because I have seen bills go to committees before. I realized that when you get into a committee you are not quite as able to defend yourself as when you are in the house. That is exactly what happened when this bill went to the committee.

I think any fair-minded person reading the evidence, even though he was not present at the committee meetings, will realize that in effect a closure was placed upon the proceedings. We were allowed to examine only two or three witnesses from one company and there were several members of the committee who had a number of questions to ask of those witnesses but who were not allowed to do so because of the closure placed upon them by way of a motion by the sponsor of the bill that the questioning should be discontinued at a certain time. All hon. members of the house know what happened and I think a good number of government supporters realize that the minority in that committee were treated most unfairly by the majority. The result is that we will have to vote on the third reading of this bill without all the facts. In my opinion if we had been spending the time in the committee that we have been spending in this house since the committee made its report the members of the house would be in a much better position to judge the merits of the case.

I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I shall not attempt to repeat the arguments so ably presented by the hon. member. This amendment is designed to protect Canadian interests, to protect Canadian natural resources, to protect the Canadian people by making certain that Canadian needs are taken care of first before these natural resources are exported from Canada. That is done in the amendment by insisting on the building of an all-Canadian route.

While I am in favour of an all-Canadian route I am one of those who think that the most suitable route is through the Crowsnest pass. However, I am not going to attempt to deal with this or that route at this time. What we are concerned with now and what we have been fighting for for some months is whether this pipe line should be built along an all-Canadian route.

This amendment would not be necessary if the Prime Minister would assure the house that he would guarantee the building of an all-Canadian route. The other day he mentioned if it were practical and feasible. I am sure that the members opposing these bills would be satisfied if the Prime Minister were to say that if it was at all possible and reasonable to build an all-Canadian route, it would be done. This amendment would not be necessary if the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce would propose an amendment to the Pipe Lines Act to provide for the building of gas and oil pipe lines on all-Canadian routes before leaving Canada.

If the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) could give us an assurance on one or both of these proposals this debate would terminate immediately. I have expressed my views briefly as to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green).

I want to deal with another aspect of the situation which has not been touched upon this evening. I refer to the question of tolls and tariffs to be paid by consumers for gas or oil. During the meetings of the standing committee Mr. Dixon of the Alberta Natural Gas Company presented certain evidence which indicated that it would cost Canadian consumers more if an all-Canadian route were built. I was not convinced by his evidence. We had no opportunity to secure evidence from other companies or even from experts in the employ of the government who I understand are very well informed and would have been of great assistance to the committee.

On that point I should like to say that fundamentally I support the views presented to the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). This debate and the circumstances surrounding the incorporation of these pipe line companies have convinced me more than ever that the only final solution to the building of gas and oil lines, and the distribution of natural resources of that type in Canada at this time, is public ownership. I am quite sure that under such a system we would not run into the difficulties we have encountered in this debate. We would not run into a variety of conflicting interests. The pipe lines would be built, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested, as a result of co-operation between federal and provincial governments, and would be built primarily to serve the interests of Canadian consumers. If we had public ownership of pipe lines, and there was a slightly higher cost for some time to Canadian consumers in Vancouver or elsewhere on the Pacific coast as a result of following an all-Canadian route, I am quite sure that cost would be readily borne by such consumers because the Canadian people would know that any profits derived from the pipe line would go towards the social services of the country or to the exchequers of the federal and provincial governments.

This government, however, does not see fit to support public ownership of the transportation of oil and gas at this time. Therefore I think it is necessary for us to consider the interests of the consumers. That point was raised by Mr. Dixon, and how quickly it was seized upon by members supporting the bill. Strangely enough not one of them had thought of it up to that time. Then because Mr. Dixon said that it might cost a few cents more some of my good friends opposite clasped it to their bosoms and have expounded it ever since. It is the only argument they have had since the debate started. We know that these pipe lines, whether they be gas or oil, will be under the control of companies with dominion charters, and therefore will not come under the control of the public utilities commission of the province of British Columbia so far as tolls and tariffs are concerned. The debate has also brought to the attention of members of the house and the people of the country generally the necessity for some legislation in that respect to protect consumers. While we are first of all anxious for a Canadian route, members on this side of the house, and I am sure some hon. members on the other side, are anxious to see the Canadian consumer protected. In view of the rather loose evidence presented by Mr. Dixon on behalf of the Alberta Natural Gas Company, we consider that we must, while insisting on an all-Canadian route, protect the Canadian consumer. Therefore I am going to propose an amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I move:

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto, immediately after the last word thereof, the following words:

"and also so as to provide for the regulation of the tolls and tariffs of the proposed company for the protection of Canadian consumers."

In conclusion I trust, Mr. Speaker, that when the vote is taken on the amendment to the amendment, and on the amendment, members of the house will accept their responsibility and protect the interests of the Canadian people so far as route and tolls and tariffs are concerned.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, but also for another purpose, to answer the contemptible and entirely unwarranted suggestions advanced this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) with respect to certain of the matters that have been brought to his attention. I refer particularly to his suggestions with regard to some of the telegrams which reached him from the ordinary consumer, the ordinary man in the communities of British Columbia which are so vitally concerned in this matter.

It will have been noted that in his remarks this afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not refer to our suggestion that the main Pipe Lines Act be amended to make the same provision for all companies, namely, that any company incorporated should be required to build its route to the Pacific coast through Canadian territory. He obviously and deliberately avoided referring to that contention but he did deliberately, and from the outset, suggest that the efforts to provide a Canadian route were made as a result of approaches to members of the house and to the individuals from whom he received telegrams by agents of one company in particular. I can only conclude from the totally unwarranted suggestions put forward by the minister this afternoon, and the malevolence of the motives he imputed to members of the house as well as to the individuals who had sent him telegrams, that he is so steeped in the methods of big business that he cannot conceive of any small man acting independently. It seems to me that the conclusion to be drawn from his remarks is that he is so accustomed to the power plays of power politics that he cannot credit that the small man would rise up and act, although independently nevertheless in unison, to protect the interests that he conceives to be vital to himself and his community.

Because I had some part—and I am proud of it—in the suggestion that these telegrams be forwarded to the minister I believe that I must rise in defence and explanation of the motives of those who sent him at least some of the telegrams to which he has referred. I have no hesitation in saying again what I said to the minister this afternoon, that during the week immediately preceding last week I was home in my constituency, and I suggested to as many as I could reach personally and over the radio that they should wire individually and collectively to the Minister of Trade and Commerce while he was in Vancouver. I have here a letter from the president of the Blue River board of trade of my constituency which indicates the spirit in which these telegrams were sent. It is a complete answer to the suggestion of the minister that they were sent as a result of approaches, and in fact as a result of some sort of payment by an official of one or other of the companies concerned in this matter. The letter is dated at Blue River, British Columbia, on May 8, 1950, and is addressed to myself. It reads:

I have been going to write you for some time to thank you and some of the other members, who have been putting up such a valiant fight for our all-Canadian pipe line route.

The next paragraph has a complimentary word for me and one or two other hon. members, and then the letter goes on:

As you may know, the Kamloops board of trade and junior chamber of commerce have called a joint meeting for tonight in Clearwater, with another meeting in Kamloops tomorrow night.

The object of these meetings is to stir up interest and to have the individuals and organizations flood Hon. C. D. Howe with hundreds of telegrams, while he is in Vancouver. Our committee handling this canvass have met with great success, and have handed me fifty-five telegrams already, with still more to come. These will be dispatched to Mr. Howe, spread over the three days, namely 9th and 10th and 11th of this week. While they may not have the result we expect, it will at least show him where we stand, and with the issue seeming to swing our way, it may do a lot of good.

By the same token, I feel that our success here in gaining so much support will have a bearing on the meeting tonight, in that it may encourage the members of the other three boards to also get right behind the idea, and get their own telegrams going.

I have also wired the McBride board of trade, chamber of commerce, Jasper, board of trade, Edson, and the chamber of commerce, Edmonton, advising them of our action, and asking for their active support. Have just received a reply from McBride, saying they were right behind us.

I should point out that McBride is in the constituency of Cariboo.

Mr. Goode: Would the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Fulton: If I may just conclude these letters, I shall be glad to answer any question later. The other letter is dated May 10, 1950, and is from the same source. It encloses a copy of the resolution sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and this postscript is added:

This copy sent to you for your information, in case there should be a chance to bring the matter up during debate.

Our meeting in Clearwater Monday was most successful, over 150 people there, from which fifty telegrams were dispatched to Hon. C. D. Howe at Vancouver. May say we did even better here—

That is, at Blue River.

—some sixty-five individual telegrams being dispatched to the hon. gentleman. I haven't yet received a report of the Kamloops meeting, but it will be in the newspaper tomorrow morning.

Mr. Howe: May I ask my hon. friend who paid for the telegrams?

Mr. Fulton: I will tell my right hon. friend who paid for the telegrams. The people who sent them paid for them. If the right hon. gentleman thinks the president of the Blue River board of trade, who is what I might call one of the small men of a small community in British Columbia, who is vitally affected by this whole issue, is the paid agent of one of these pipe line companies, as he deliberately suggested this afternoon, I say the suggestion is entirely unwarranted and utterly contemptible.

Mr. Howe: I made no such suggestion.

Mr. Fulton: That was the suggestion the right hon. gentleman deliberately made this afternoon.

Mr. Goode: Would the hon. gentleman answer my question now, as a matter of information? How many people live in Blue River, and how many in Clearwater?

Mr. Fulton: That is a very interesting question, Mr. Speaker. It is typical of the attitude we are fighting here. This is big interests against little interests. There are only some five hundred people living in Blue River, and only some 180 or so in Clearwater. There are only some twelve or fifteen thousand people in Kamloops and North Kamloops. There are far fewer people living in Canada than in the United States, but by the argument the hon. member has just suggested we should sell out our interests because not as many people are concerned here as in the United States.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question? Has he any idea how many employees Kelly-Douglas have in the province of British Columbia?

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, I have not.

Mr. Goode: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is a personal matter which I do not think the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) should bring up in this house. I think it was a contemptible question. He is referring to a firm with which I am associated, and he has no right to do that.

Mr. Cruickshank: There is no point of order about it. I had a perfect right to ask that question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There can be only one point of order at a time, and I do not know which point the hon. member for Fraser Valley is referring to. Perhaps we had better hear the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: I regret that I have no information as to the number of people employed by the company to which reference has been made. Without in any way trying to minimize the importance of the point I must simply say I do not have the information. If I may I should like to conclude my remarks, and in doing so I repeat what I said a moment ago, that we are fighting the battle of the smaller communities; in fact we are fighting the battle of the less populated provinces. British Columbia has a smaller population than the aggregate of the population of the areas of the United States which the bill before us is primarily designed to serve. But we say steps must be taken by this House of Commons and this government to see to it that the resources of Canada, the power resources and the material resources, are preserved for this country so that our economy may be built up to a point of equality with that of the United States. But if we are to be continually condemned and betrayed by the principle that because they are bigger than we are, that because they have a bigger market than we have, therefore that market must be served first, we will never build up the Canadian economy; we will never build this nation into what you, Mr. Speaker, and I and most members of this house want to see it become, a great nation in our own time.

In conclusion I can only say that the attitude revealed this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in keeping with his attitude throughout when this question of Canada first is brought up in connection with oil and gas pipe lines. We heard a reference the other day to what the minister said in Vancouver when reporters asked what his attitude was toward the route of this pipe line; he told them to go to hell. That is just a carry-over from what he told the people of Port Arthur and Fort William last year when the oil pipe line was being considered. When a delegation waited upon the minister he told them this talk of Canada first and the national interest was all nonsense. He went further. I am reading now from a report which appeared in the Fort William Times-Journal of October 18, 1949, which reads in part:

> Verbal battle in P.A. council over pipe line.
> The oil pipe line issue erupted in sudden and violent explosion at last night's finance meeting of Port Arthur city council.

Then it details pros and cons of that dispute, and continues:

> The outburst was touched off by a report given by Alderman R. A. Robinson of last Saturday's meeting of the joint industrial committee with Mr. Howe. Alderman Robinson, who unsuccessfully contested the last federal election against Mr. Howe for the Progressive Conservative party, gave the report "since I was the subject of most of the abuse when we interviewed Mr. Howe."

I should say this was a joint delegation from the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William to try and persuade the minister to route the oil pipe line to the Canadian lakehead ports instead of to Superior in the United States. The report continues:

> Alderman Robinson continued, "We both used barroom language—which Mr. Howe seems most familiar with."
> "I think he (Mr. Howe) neglected the interests of Canada and especially of the lakehead people."

Mr. Howe: The lakehead people neglected Mr. Robinson.

Mr. Fulton: They will not do it again, I am sure. I notice he is still an alderman. Admittedly he does not move in such exalted circles as the minister, but he is still an alderman of his city.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should read from a dispatch stating that an hon. member of this house is accustomed to using barroom language. He would not be allowed to use that language if the hon. member were speaking in the house, and he therefore should not read a document containing that expression.

Mr. Fulton: Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall not read those remarks describing the type of language which the minister is supposed to have used. I shall read a portion quoting directly what the minister said:

> Alderman Humby (a member of the Progressive Conservative executive) co-chairman of the joint industrial committee, who was also at the conference with Mr. Howe, followed. He said he was "disappointed" at the reception they received "and he (Mr. Howe) asked us if we were a bunch of damn fools . . ."

I read that, Mr. Speaker, because it is a report of an interview dealing with the same sort of subject we are dealing with tonight, when a delegation waited upon the minister and asked him if he would preserve the policy of Canada first. Those are the words which the minister used to that delegation to describe his opinion of the efforts they were making. I conclude by saying that, in view of the minister's attitude expressed this afternoon, and his reaction to the telegrams which were addressed to him by the ordinary people of the interior of British Columbia seeking to preserve their interests and to promote the interests of the province and the country—when he uses here the same type of description to us as to what he thinks of their approach as he used in Port Arthur, I can only conclude that if we in this house do not write into the bills a provision to protect the Canadian route, we cannot expect Canada's national interests to have any more protection at the hands of the government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is the minister most vitally concerned, than the national and local interests received in the case of the oil pipe line which the Port Arthur delegation discussed with him.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I shall not keep the house long; I intend to confine my remarks to one aspect of this matter. From the beginning I have taken the position that the only thing that lies between us is a statement from someone that this line should be built on Canadian soil. This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce went far afield with respect to that argument. I have in my hand an exhibit filed by this Dixon outfit in connection with an application before the Alberta gas conservation board. The application is dated in August, and it was presented last October.

Among the exhibits which were filed at that time, there was a map showing their grid system, which is a gathering system. The grid system, of course, runs from Pincher Creek north, and then in black is shown the projected transmission line of the Alberta Natural Gas Company. We find it runs from Pincher Creek to—where? To Kingsgate on the international boundary; and it goes no further in the Dominion of Canada. Let us have an end of this nonsense about some transport board being given five or even six lines, and then saying, "Pappy, where do we build the line?" Things are not done in that way. They never have been done that way by the transport board, or any other responsible board.

Then, it was implied by the minister this afternoon that he had discovered some kind of racket in connection with the Sunray Oil Company. Mr. Dixon, who frankly admits that he does not own a barrel of oil or a foot of gas, filed this document which I have as an exhibit to his application, which is in printed form. I shall not bother about it, but in his exhibit at least half or three-quarters of it is taken up by a recitation of issues handled by these companies. I shall read it:

A list of issues managed by either Morgan Stanley and Company, Moore, Leonard and Lynch, W. C. Langley and Company or Dominick and Dominick, since the end of world war II (V-J day, August 14, 1945).

Then, the minister had the effrontery to tell this House of Commons this afternoon that this was a racket being engineered by the Sunray Oil Company. These people, his friends, go to the Alberta board and what do they say? They financed the Celanese Corporation, $40 million and $7,800,000; the Boston and Maine Railroad; Alexander Smith and Sons—I am glad I am in that—$5 million; Peninsular Telephone Company; Shell Union Corporation; Standard Oil, $85 million; Socony-Vacuum Oil Company, $100 million; Commonwealth of Australia, $20 million; Columbia Gas and Electric Corporation, $77 million; the Heinz people were in for $10 million and $8,200,000; Commonwealth of Australia, $25 million; Northwestern Utilities Company, $4 million—I am just skipping along —the Commonwealth of Australia; Union Bag and Paper Corporation; Tidewater Power Company, that is only $580,000; the Dayton Power and Light Company; Philadelphia Electric Company; Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, $150 million; Canadian Pacific Railway Company, $19,500,000; Indianapolis Water Company; Johnson and Johnson; Peninsular Telephone Company; Standard Oil of Indiana, another $50 million; Onondaga Pottery Company, a half million; Government of Canada, $150 million; Shell Caribbean Petroleum Company, $250 million; Standard Oil, another $75 million; the Heinz Company, that is where you get your ketchup, $15 million; Western Fruit Express Company, and so on. There are twelve more pages headed:

List of issues managed by others in which either Morgan Stanley and Company, W. C. Langley and Company, Moore, Leonard and Lynch or Dominick and Dominick participated since the end of world war II (V-J day, August 14, 1945).

Those are the people named by Dixon as the people who are going to finance it; yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce accuses the Sunray Oil Company of California of putting up a lot of money to Pacific Petroleum, a Calgary and Vancouver crowd, who own at least fifty oil and gas wells and who are spending large sums of money in Alberta—he has the nerve to say that these people, friends of mine, are being operated by one small American oil company, the Sunray company, when that same outfit which he is backing—I use the word deliberately—in their application take over half of it to show that Morgan, Stanley and Company have got more money than anybody else in the world. For shame; of all things to find a minister of this government trying to pull off a "sandy" like that on people who are even half intelligent.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member had better get his friends to tell him the story about that situation.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You can tell it now, and I will match you. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. There is a man by the name of Kilbourne, who is now retired, but who for a great many years was the chief engineer of the board of transport commissioners, to whose engineering staff everybody tells us we will just leave the matter. He gave evidence in Calgary and I heard him. He, sir, knows more about the mountain country in western Canada than any other engineer. He says a pipe line by the northern route can be built, and that there would be no trouble with it at all. I am not going to any United States crowd; I am using the name of the man I mentioned, namely, Kilbourne. I have talked to him myself. He says on oath that this is not only feasible but quite practicable from its beginning in Edmonton west to—I do not know how to pronounce the name—

Mr. MacDougall: Tete Jaune Cache.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am very happy, but I cannot say it even now; but from Tete Jaune Cache down the north Thompson, to Kamloops, then down to Princeton, from Princeton to Hope and into Vancouver. I promised you, sir, that I would be brief, and I intend to be that. I am trying to make this simple and plain. I seconded the amendment with my full approval because, in spite of what the minister said this afternoon, this line must be approved as government policy before the board of transport commissioners will or can issue any order. That being so, and it being a matter of government policy at that time, why in the name of conscience cannot the House of Commons be taken into the confidence of the government instead of having the board of transport commissioners taken into that confidence?

Many people have asked: Why do we do this? Everybody overlooks one thing. Are we just supposed to sit here and put the stamp of approval on it? The government said—and this is so true—the real reason why we passed the Pipe Lines Act making it necessary for people trying to carry gas to be incorporated by the House of Commons is this. They have the right to expropriate property. Are we men in this house going to issue to anybody a right carrying with it the power of expropriation without having some idea where that expropriation is going to be done? Remember, sir, that by incorporating a company with these powers we cast aside, we tear to pieces, the right of any individual where these people wish to cross his property with their pipe line. That is the reason we brought this to the House of Commons. That is the reason why we are not rubber stamps. The reason is that we are giving to any company a most extraordinary power, the right to go up on your land and take it away from you. It is true that things will be settled by boards of arbitration and so on; but the minute we pass these bills here we give the right to these people to expropriate. It is true they have to get over their hurdles, but we give them the basic right of expropriation of property. That is the real reason and we knew it when the pipe lines bill was passed. That is the real reason we required them to come to the House of Commons.

I will say no more than this. Is it reasonable to suppose that we are sitting here unconcerned? Let us credit all of us with the idea that we are seeking to do the best we can for our country. Let us permit the difficulties that we have had with one another to resolve themselves into the great fact that we are here to do good for Canada. That being so I stand firmly behind the amendment which I have seconded, and simply say to this company, build your pipe line where you will, but you will build it in Canada. That is the issue. There is no issue other than that before us at the present time.

Mr. Dixon said that he had five routes, and if the suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham) is correct, he is now going to explore a sixth. Let him do so; that is fine; he has lots of time. But let us say to him and to everybody else, including the company which got the charter last fall: Go ahead and compete with one another. Go before the two boards, the one in Alberta and the one here. Prove to these boards that you are able to do it. Prove to these boards that you have the money to do it. I think I have read a list of names which will convince you about one company. But prove to them in competition that your claim is better than the other fellow's. I will go with that one hundred per cent. I said that when I began. I have said nothing to the contrary. I say it now. But I do say, having been born in that western country, the only place and the only life that I know well, that I have watched it struggle from the days when my grandparents hauled wheat by horse 14 miles into Regina and sold it for 50 cents a bushel, and incidentally retired in some comfort on that basis. I have watched it grow, and here today what are we doing? We are passing a bill. I do not say that the board of transport commissioners will not stop this, and I will not say that they will not stop that; but I do say that unless this line goes by a Canadian route you can kiss the Peace river and the interior of British Columbia good-bye, so far as your life and mine are concerned, sir. So I simply put it on this basis. Even I may be wrong in the things I have said today. I think the minister was wrong. I do not think we should drag—what is the expression?—red herrings across the trail.

Mr. MacDougall: Dead cats.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Did the hon. member say "nightcaps?" I don't drag those, I swallow them. I do not think we should be disturbed by little complexities, by devious stories and devious arguments that are introduced. To my mind it amounts to this. Are we now in favour of a Canadian route? Do not let us worry about engineering niceties. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) got a figure from Mr. Dixon which indicated that it was going to cost the people of Vancouver $700,000 more for their gas. Mr. Dixon talked a good, shall I say, pussy. I think he would be good at playing darts or something of that kind. There is no evidence before the house that anything like that will follow. On the other hand, if you want to go to the sworn testimony given in the city of Calgary in the province of Alberta lasting over a matter of a month, given before three experts, the deputy minister of mines, Mr. McKinnon, Professor Gauvreau and an engineer by the name of Goodall, you will find that this other company put all their cards on the table. They were cross-examined by Mr. Dixon's lawyer, a great friend of mine, Mr. H. G. Nolan, K.C., who conducted prosecutions in Tokyo on behalf of this government. These men are not without assistance. They are not without help. In this committee no one was allowed to call evidence. But I pass that over. That was just a bit of steam rollering done by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), ably assisted by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney). They worked it; I mean, they got by. Let us forget all that. Let us come back to this point. Irrespective of all the difficulties we have had with one another, this amendment has been so drafted that we can at least in this house stand up and be counted as we vote on this question: Do we say this pipe line must be built on an all-Canadian route or do we not? Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude by saying that I hope that soon we shall be counted.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, after an extended debate a vote is going to be taken on this bill. With the moving of the third reading of the bill, it would have been quite possible to extend the debate for some considerable time by amendment and by subamendment; but the purpose for which this debate has been carried on has been fulfilled. The people of this country, particularly in those areas that are directly affected, have had an opportunity to find out what is actually behind the bills that are before the house and what the real considerations are. To an extent that should be encouraging to everyone in this house, we have seen some evidence of democracy actually working. In what has taken place there may be a suggestion that could be followed in other cases. Because of the very fact that the bills have been before the public, the public have had an opportunity to express their opinion; and that opinion has had some effect, even if not the full effect that we might have wished.

Certain things, however, now emerge clearly. I for one welcome the fact that the vote will be taken soon. The facts are all out in the open and, when third reading came, all that remained to be done, in addition to the actual wording of the amendment and subamendment, was to deal with the completely misleading statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) this afternoon. Because of the statement he has made, it is necessary to point out that neither the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) nor the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has admitted to this house what the actual fact is, namely that the government must decide where the pipe line is going to go in every case where any question of export is involved. That is a responsibility that the government cannot escape. It is a responsibility the government must assume before the board of transport commissioners even have it within their power to deal with this matter.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this suggestion that those who were urging a clearly-stated policy of "Canada first" in the development of these resources were being prompted by some particular interest in the United States, he made a suggestion that was utterly unworthy of any minister of the crown or of any member of this house. But what is more, he went on to give a completely erroneous impression of what the situation actually is. With his usual modesty, he informed the house that he was responsible for the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. That being so, he should be a little better informed as to what that act means and what it contemplates. I have no intention of repeating what I said to the house a few nights ago, except to read once again sections 5 and 6 of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act of 1907, which is still the law that governs the permission to place pipe lines where exportation is involved. Even if the government at this late hour would give the assurance requested and would follow the course which has been suggested—which would protect Canadian interests—the government know perfectly well that in any event they must assume the decision in relation to a company that intends to export. We all know that. What we have been emphasizing is the fact that while legitimate export should be permitted, the first consideration is to make sure that Canadian interests, not for today but for the years to come indefinitely, will be protected.

The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) this afternoon placed his finger on a point that I believe should be in the mind of every hon. member. He pointed out that there were certain estimates that, with the contemplated use of this gas, the supplies would provide gas for fifty years to come. Fifty years may seem a fairly long time in the years ahead; but fifty years is short in the life of a nation. We want to make sure that these great reserves of power are available for Canadians for fifty years, for a hundred years, for a hundred and fifty years, during the period of growth long past the time that any one of us here will be directly concerned with what happens. Any present estimate of fifty years' supply is probably an overestimate, when one recognizes the fact that, with every type of power that has been used in the past, the use of that power during the years has always increased more rapidly than was anticipated. The main concern here is to make sure what our maximum possible requirements would be and then to make certain that nothing will be done that will limit our own development in the future.

The hon. member for Regina City made remarks with which I for one could agree completely, until his very last words, when he said that because of his complete confidence in the government, while recognizing this danger, he is prepared to entrust this whole matter to them. One reason why the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) and other hon. members should ask for greater assurances than they have is that they have not been taken into the confidence of the government. The law still stands and the statement of law is to be found in sections 5 and 6 of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act of 1907. I ask those members who have so loudly applauded the statement of the minister that the board of transport commissioners will decide and that they are competent to decide to listen to what the law really is. It is stated in clear and simple terms which demand no legal training for easy understanding. Section 5 reads:

> No person shall export any power or fluid without a licence, or any power or fluid in excess of the quantity permitted by his licence, or otherwise than as permitted by such licence.
> 2. No person shall, without a licence, construct or place in position any line or wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

That section deals with the granting of licences, but that is not a licence issued by the board of transport commissioners. The licence and the way you get it are described in section 6, which reads:

> Subject to any regulations of the governor in council in that behalf, the governor in council may grant licences, upon such conditions as he thinks proper, for the exportation of power or fluid where a right to export exists by lawful authority.
> 2. Such licence shall be revocable upon such notice to the licensee as the governor in council deems reasonable in each case.

The moment that export is involved the law states that a licence must be obtained from the government. Already there have been two judgments by the board of transport commissioners which have stated definitely that they cannot and will not deal with an application by a pipe line company until a licence has been issued by the government. The first and effective decision as to where a pipe line is to go must be made by the government before the board of transport commissioners can deal with the matter at all.

That being the situation the government is charged with full responsibility. If the government is going to accept that responsibility, as it must, then it is the government which must decide whether a Canada first policy is to be adopted. If it is the intention of the government to adopt such a policy, then that policy becomes automatically binding upon the board of transport commissioners because the government can state that as a condition of the licence which must be obtained before the board can even deal with it.

When the minister suggests that this is an attempt to give special advantage to the company which obtained a charter last year simply because this house was not fully informed of the circumstances—that was the situation—he is completely ignoring the fact that from the very beginning we have been insisting that this be the over-all policy and that the government has it within its powers to deal with this in a very simple way.

Every hon. member who has listened to the debate knows that we have stated on a number of occasions that this can be dealt with very easily by introducing an amendment to the Pipe Lines Act, the act under which an applicant company must obtain its charter. All that is necessary is for the government to introduce an amendment to the Pipe Lines Act stating definitely in simple terms that every charter granted under the act will be subject to the condition that Canadian interests must be served first before there will be any export of gas or oil from this country.

Surely nothing could be simpler. I hope no member opposite or any hon. member will suggest that this is an impractical proposition because the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had this in his mind when he spoke on this subject on May 5, as reported on page 2230 of Hansard. The Prime Minister said:

> I suggest that unless and until we come to the conclusion that the board of transport commissioners cannot be entrusted with that kind of responsibility, because we do not feel that they are either competent enough to do it properly or sufficiently imbued with the spirit of the Canadian people to want to do it properly, the thing for us to do is to amend the Pipe Lines Act in a manner that will apply to every company that secures a charter for a pipe line and not in a manner that will discriminate in favour of one against another. Perhaps one has to say in words what one wants to have regarded as plain. I am speaking as one of the members of the government, and I want to make it plain that I have sufficient confidence in the board of transport commissioners to vote for the passage of these bills. I am not asking anyone to follow my example, but I am suggesting that my reason for doing so is not because I am determining where the pipe lines are going to be built but because I feel that the board which parliament selected only a year ago to discharge that responsibility is competent to do so, and will discharge it in a manner that will do justice to all Canadian citizens.

That statement was applauded by those who thought that the Prime Minister was explaining how the procedure actually works. In fact he was not explaining what the procedure is. The Prime Minister said that his reason for doing so was not because he was determining where the pipe lines are going to be built but because he felt that the board which parliament had selected only a year ago to discharge that responsibility was competent to do so. There is the law, and the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the government must decide where the pipe line is going to be built before the board of transport commissioners can deal with the matter.

It is not a case of having confidence in that board. Even at this late hour all the bitterness of debate, all the suggestions that one motive or another was guiding any argument, could be completely removed by the government by the simple and effective device of introducing an amendment to the act which would state as a principle applying to every company the proposition that we are going to assure to our own people the use of these resources which Providence has given us before they can be exported to a neighbour which, friendly though it may be, would be the very last to expect us to do something that they themselves have never done when their own primary interests were concerned.

The suggestion has been made that this would create a monopoly. The suggestion has been made that if members vote against these bills there will be a monopoly in favour of the company which has already received a charter. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that the Westcoast Transmission Company or any other company cannot get authority to proceed until the government has approved. He knows, as every other minister knows, that they can remove any question of that kind by adopting the simple proposal that I have been making, the one contemplated by the Prime Minister in the statement he made as recently as May 5. There is, however, danger of a very great monopoly. There is danger of a monopoly which would not serve Canadian interests. We want United States funds to be invested here for the development of Canada. We want risk capital to come into this country to advance the legitimate development of Canada in every way. This country, however, now possesses the initiative and the capital to assume the responsibility for some of these developments ourselves. Even now, forgetting what was said this afternoon, I urge the government to do what they can to meet the situation, and I urge those hon. members who have been so ready to applaud statements which were inaccurate to look at the simple law and to understand it.

As I said, we have seen democracy working in the house. We have seen democracy working in another way. Members of the house on the other side have been very comfortably brushing aside all arguments with the statement, "You saw what the people did on June 27." The government has a substantial majority, but the people are afforded opportunities from time to time to express their opinions and they expressed them today in no uncertain way. In both by-elections today Progressive Conservative candidates were elected with satisfactory majorities. It is certainly a matter of real satisfaction to see a young veteran of the last war succeeding the late Tommy Church, and with a majority increased to close to 5,000. It is also most satisfactory for a number of reasons to see that the majority against our candidate of over 3,000 was overcome in the other election in Hamilton, and that the house is to have a lady member because of the results today. These very substantial gains, approximately 4,000 in one case and 3,500 in the other, are evidence of the fact that the people of this country are not satisfied with the cavalier attitude adopted by the government to their interests since June 27 last. I hope, just as we have seen certain members here whose views on this subject were greatly influenced by what they heard when they went back to their constituencies over the Easter holidays, that others will realize this is the voice of democracy speaking, and that they have been given reasons to examine what has taken place.

The remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) which I shall not repeat, and his assertion today that he proposes to retain the privilege of advising anyone to take a trip in the particular direction which he did a few days ago, do not meet the desires of the people, and should not meet the sense of responsibility of members of this house. We have before the house an amendment and an amendment to the amendment. The amendment to the amendment raises a point which every hon. member should take into consideration. Speaking for myself I propose to support the amendment to the amendment. It touches on a point which has already been mentioned but which it will be well to have dealt with by a vote. That is the fact that obviously, contrary to the opinion of many hon. members, the Pipe Lines Act does not give the board of transport commissioners any authority whatever to control tolls so far as gas pipe lines are concerned. Once the charter is granted and the licence approved a pipe line which is not competitive with any other line is not subject to an order of the board of transport commissioners in regard to tolls, as is the case with an oil pipe line. I think every hon. member, and particularly those on the government side, should ask why there is that omission, why it is that gas pipe line companies are going to be able to charge whatever the traffic will bear, why it is that there is no authority given to the board of transport commissioners to say that tariffs on gas pipe lines will be dictated by the best interests of the people of Canada.

As to the main amendment it proposes that the whole bill, which obviously has not been understood as is evidenced by some of the remarks that have been made, should go back to the committee for further examination. This debate, Mr. Speaker, has been a long one. It has been regarded by many as an attempt simply to block the granting of charters. That has not been the purpose. There is still an opportunity to deal with this matter in the way that has been suggested, namely, by amending the Pipe Lines Act, and amending it in simple understandable words so that the interests of the Canadian people will come first, and every licence granted by the government upon which the board of transport commissioners can act—and they can only act then—will have that basic consideration as the very first requirement of the permission they obtain.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to take part in the debate but simply to ask you to consider whether either the amendment or the amendment to the amendment is in order. I would point out that the purpose of each seems to be to amend the Pipe Lines Act. The bills which now concern the house are simply measures to incorporate companies. I suggest it is quite out of order to tack on to the incorporation of a company terms that should, if they are applicable, be in the Pipe Lines Act itself. I also suggest that the debate, as it has developed this evening, is out of order in that the discussion has been on the Pipe Lines Act, which is not before the house at this time.

Mr. Green: On the point of order raised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), I should like to point out that the amendment refers only to Bill No. 7. The amendment reads:

> That Bill No. 7 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for the purpose of reconsidering the amending of the bill—

That is Bill No. 7.

> —so as to provide that any pipe line built by the proposed company—

That is of course the Alberta Natural Gas Company.

> —from Alberta to the Pacific coast must be by an all-Canadian route.

Obviously the amendment refers only to the bill now under consideration and does not refer to the Pipe Lines Act. I admit that during the debate there has been some reference to the Pipe Lines Act but the amendment obviously refers only to Bill No. 7, and the subamendment, of course, does exactly the same thing. The subamendment reads:

> —and also so as to provide for the regulation of the tolls and tariffs of the proposed company for the protection of Canadian consumers.

Then I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that these amendments are covered by citation 811, to be found at page 306 of Beauchesne's third edition. That citation refers to standing order 113, which has to do with private bills. The standing order itself reads:

> No important amendment may be proposed to any private bill, in a committee of the whole house, or at the third reading of the bill, unless one day's notice of the same has been given.

Then the citation says:

> It is the correct course, in all cases where it is necessary to make material amendments, to refer the bill back to the select committee, to which it had been previously sent, instead of considering the proposed changes in committee of the whole.

That is exactly what is sought to be done by this amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I have been giving some consideration to the amendment and subamendment. At first I was under the same impression as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that it was a general amendment; and if that were so, of course it would not be in order. Citation 710 reads:

> The question for the third reading is put immediately after the report from the committee of the whole. All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

If this were a general amendment or referred to the Pipe Lines Act, or to the provisions of that act, I would take the position that was taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Citation 708 reads:

> When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular. The motion for third reading is debatable under standing order 38. Or the bill may then be ordered to be reprinted or committed to a select committee.

The motion in this case is to refer it to a select committee. Then citation 806 is as follows:

> Bills may be referred back for reconsideration. The same rule applies for private as for public bills. When the reference for reconsideration is made any instruction which the house deems necessary may be given to the standing or special committee which has reported the bill.

There is also the reference in citation 811, which has been read to the house. As I have said, it occurred to me at first that this was an amendment in general terms, or that it referred to the Pipe Lines Act. The amendment reads:

That Bill No. 7 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for the purpose of reconsidering the amending of the bill—

That, of course, is the bill now before the house, not the general act. That is the only interpretation I can place upon it, after reading the amendment the second time and giving it consideration. Then it goes on:

—so as to provide that any pipe line built by the proposed company—

That does not refer to pipe lines built by any other company. As I say, I have been giving this matter some consideration; and while it might be called a borderline case I would hesitate to withdraw it from the house. I think it would be better if the house were permitted to vote on the amendment.

The question is on the subamendment.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is on third reading. Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Graydon: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house resumed, from Friday, May 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 9, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited—Mr. Benidickson—Mr. Dion in the chair.

[Mr. Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie).]

Sections 1 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Benidickson moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the remarks which have been made on the Alberta Natural Gas Company bill apply in many respects also to the present bill. In order to be consistent, I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), the same amendment to this bill:

That Bill No. 9 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for the purpose of reconsidering the amending of the bill so as to provide that any pipe lines built by the proposed company from Alberta to the Pacific coast must be by an all-Canadian route.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As the remarks I made on the previous bill, Mr. Speaker, apply to this bill also, and as I do not wish to take up the time of the house further, I wish to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones):

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto, immediately after the last word thereof, the following words:

"and also so as to provide for the regulation of the tolls and tariffs of the proposed company for the protection of Canadian consumers."

In conclusion, I might say that once again we offer to members of this House of Commons the opportunity to protect Canadian interests, Canadian rights and Canadian consumers.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Does the amendment to the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say "yea."

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say "nay."

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the main motion.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Before the motion for third reading is carried I wish to say a few words, though not with any desire to prolong what I consider to be a rather discreditable incident in Canadian parliamentary history. I was not in the house this afternoon when the debate was going on, but since coming in I have been informed that my name was brought into the debate by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I want to thank the minister for what he said about me; but I want to make it quite clear to this house that during the five or six months this question has been before parliament, no outside individual representing either of the companies has approached me.

Mr. Howe: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend is answering anything I said I made no such suggestion; quite the reverse. I said I had never known the hon. member to vote in any other way but according to his convictions, and I was convinced that he thought this filibuster was—

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

Mr. MacInnis: That is what I am told; I am not finding fault with the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Howe: I would not like a misunderstanding there.

Mr. MacInnis: I only want to make it clear that the whole time this question has been before parliament, while I have been told that lobbyists were very busy around this building, no outside interest has approached me in regard to either of the companies concerned. I imagine that if they were advised by representatives or people from British Columbia they would know better. I am not interested in either company. I have been told by the proponents of the bill that the other side were a bunch of crooks. I have been told by those opposing the bill that the two companies were a bunch of crooks. I have no doubt both parties are right.

I do believe, however, that in putting itself behind these private bills in the way it has done, the government has performed a disservice to parliament. If it does not turn out to be worse than that it will be by the grace of God; because today, by passing these bills, we have left the people of British Columbia without any protection whatever except what the governor in council may find it possible in its judgment to give us. I am convinced also that this parliament could and should have given an expression of opinion as to the route these pipe lines should follow. However, parliament has failed to do that. I have done what I could by voting against the bills, and I can only hope that the interests of British Columbia still will be served, though I am not so sure they will.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DILLON-BULL'S HOUSE, SASK., TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What was the amount of the lowest combined total of the tenders as originally submitted for the construction of a telegraph and/or telephone line between Dillon and Bull's House in Saskatchewan?

2. What are the names of those who placed these tenders, and what were the amounts of their separate tenders?

3. Did parliament vote $14,000 for the construction of this line?

4. If so, on what date?

5. Has the government approved a rate of $270 per mile for this thirty- to thirty-five-mile line?

6. If so, on what date?

7. Did the government inform the House of Commons of this approved rate?

8. If so, when?

9. Did the government inform the house that this line had been built without authorization?
10. If so, when?
11. Has Mr. L. M. Marion been paid for the work done?
12. If not, has the government decided to withhold payment, and for how long?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. $270 per mile.

2. This information already given in return to order of the house—see sessional paper No. 119C.

3. Yes.

4. Portion provided by interim supply April 3, 1949, and balance on December 13, 1949.

5. (a) Yes; (b) Length of line by actual measurement is 28 miles.

6. November 15, 1949.

7. A return to an order of the house concerning this matter was tabled on March 2, 1950.

8, 9 and 10. Answered by No. 7.

11. Payment now being effected.

12. Answered by No. 11.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SPECIAL RETIREMENT ALLOWANCES

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many former employees or officials of the Canadian National Railways who, upon retirement, did not qualify for any pension under any established plan, are in receipt of retirement allowances?
2. How many of these retirement allowances are $100 a month or over, how many are less than $100 a month, and what is the lowest amount of any such allowance?
3. What is the reason or basis for the granting of any such special retirement allowances?
4. Is it open to any employee, not on pension, to apply for such a retirement allowance?

Mr. Chevrier:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. 18.

2. $100 a month or over, 8; less than $100 a month, 10; lowest amount of any such allowance, $25.

3. Very exceptional circumstances approved by board of directors, on recommendation of management.

4. Yes; that is to say, any employee may make such representations as he sees fit, to his employing officer.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LUMP SUM RETIREMENT ALLOWANCES

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many employees or officials of the Canadian National Railways, upon retirement, have been given lump sum retirement allowances (a) of $5,000 or less; (b) more than $5,000 but not more than $25,000, since January 1, 1930?
2. In what years were such lump sum retirement allowances made?

Mr. Chevrier:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. (a) None; (b) None.

2. See answer to No. 1.

NEWFOUNDLAND—NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

Mr. Higgins:

1. Has any request been made by the province of Newfoundland for the establishment of one or more national harbours under the national harbours board?
2. If so, what areas have been designated by the province for this purpose?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

LETHBRIDGE, ALTA., AIRPORT—EXPROPRIATION OF LANDS FOR EXTENSION

Mr. Blackmore:

1. During 1946, how many acres of land were added to the extension of the Lethbridge airport?
2. What is the name and address of each farmer from whom such lands were purchased, and how many acres from each of them?
3. On what date was it made known to each of these farmers that certain acres of his land were to be required by the federal government?
4. On what date did the federal government definitely assume possession of each of the parcels of land from such farmers?
5. Prior to his acceptance of the government's offer, was the farmer in each case given definitely to understand that he must surrender to the Canadian government the parcels of land required?
6. At what price or prices per acre was possession of the land assumed by Canada in the case of each farmer?
7. During the period from the time of expropriation down to April 30, 1950, what is the total amount of taxes that have accrued upon the lands expropriated from each of the farmers in question?
8. Have these taxes been paid? If so, by whom?
9. What steps have been taken by the federal government to reimburse these farmers for the losses they have sustained through being deprived of crops that could have been raised on the expropriated lands during the years 1947, 1948 and 1949?
10. What are the reasons for the long delay in settlement with each of these farmers?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Approximately one hundred and seventy (170) acres.

2. Hugh K. Thompson, Lethbridge, 19·93 acres, Frederick A. Russell, Lethbridge, 89·70 acres, Claud A. Duncan, Lethbridge, 60 acres.

3. Following negotiations options were obtained dated September 4, 1946.

4. About the end of September, 1946.

5. There is no information as to what representations were made during the verbal negotiations which took place with the land agents of the department. However, the options obtained state that possession was to be given to the crown upon acceptance of the options.

6. Hugh K. Thompson, 19·93 acres for $1,170, or $58.20 per acre, Frederick A. Russell, 89·70 acres for $5,400, or $60.20 per acre, Claud A. Duncan, 60 acres for $3,750, or $62.50 per acre.

7. As the lands were expropriated on February 5, 1949, no taxes have accrued after the year 1949.

8. Authority has been obtained to pay the taxes from the time possession was taken on behalf of the crown until the end of 1949.

9. Authority has been obtained to pay interest at 5 per cent per annum on the compensation moneys from the time possession was taken on behalf of the crown until payment.

10. The difficulty experienced in obtaining a clear title in each case on account of numerous encumbrances and reservations affecting the lands in question. It was finally deemed advisable to expropriate in order to vest title in the crown, free from all encumbrances, and thereby permit the transaction to be completed in so far as the owners mentioned in answer to No. 2 are concerned.

DUMPING DUTIES ON MOTOR VEHICLES FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. Are automobiles from the United Kingdom being sold for import into Canada at a lower price than they are being sold in England?
2. Is dumping duty being applied in Canada?
3. If not, what are the reasons therefor?

Mr. Winters:

1. Yes, in some instances.

2. No.

3. Exemption from dumping duty was extended to automobiles under authority of subsection 2(ii) of section 6 of the Customs Tariff.

PRAIRIE FARM MORTGAGES

Mr. Dechene:

1. Are records available as to the amount of farm mortgages in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta as at (a) 1939; (b) 1949?
2. If so, what are these figures for each of the above provinces?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No records available as to the amount of farm mortgages in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta as at (a) 1939, (b) 1949.

2. The following table gives data available for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta for (a) 1936, (b) 1946 census.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Amount of indebtedness covered by mortgages and/or agreement for sale on buildings and land farmed by owner operators, reported in census 1936, 1946 (1).

	1936	1946(1)
Manitoba	$ 51,322,800	$28,732,900
Saskatchewan ...	188,118,300	77,495,400
Alberta	108,402,600	53,445,200

(1) Enumerated as indebtedness on buildings and land owned by farm operators.

BURRIDGE, ONT., POST OFFICE

Mr. Aylesworth:

1. Is there a post office at Burridge, Ontario?
2. Is this post office on a commission basis?
3. If so, does this post office cost the Post Office Department anything?
4. What has been the revenue from this post office for each of the last three years?
5. Has notice been given that this post office will be closed, and was a request received asking this action?
6. If so, from whom did the request come?
7. What method of delivering the mail will now be used?
8. What will be the cost of this method per year?
9. In each direction, how far from Burridge are other post offices?
10. What provision will be made for the tourists and residents in this district to buy stamps?

Mr. Lapointe:

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. Yes.

1947-48	$219.30
1948-49	239.95
1949-50	330.57

5. (a) No.
(b) No.

6, 7 and 8. Answered by No. 5.

9. Westport, 9·4 miles to the east; Godfrey, 13·4 miles to the south; Tichborne, 20 miles to the west; Maberly, 20 miles to the north.

10. Answered by No. 5.

ENEMY PROPERTY—CANADIAN CLAIMS FOR WAR DAMAGE

Mr. Fulton:

1. What is the total value of enemy assets in the hands of the custodian of enemy property as a result of the 1939-1945 war?
2. Of this, how much is German or other former European enemy property, and how much is Japanese and other far eastern enemy property?
3. How many claims have been received from Canadians for compensation for damage suffered in the European and far eastern theatres of war respectively?
4. What is the total amount of these claims?
5. How many of these claims in each theatre respectively have been paid?

Mr. Bradley:

1. Total assets in the hands of the custodian as at March 31, 1950, $51,124,833.25.

The above total includes "belligerent" enemy owned assets as well as "technical" enemy owned assets controlled by the custodian, as reported in the annual report covering the operations of the custodian's office to the end of December 1949, which report was tabled in the house.

2. German property, $8,906,249.39; other former European enemy property, $4,074,-626.63; Japanese and other far eastern enemy property, $3,613,127.12.

3. European theatres of war, 2,110 claims; far eastern theatres of war, 400 claims.

4. Approximately, $65,000,000.

5. None by Canada.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT—CONVICTIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many persons, by provinces, have been convicted under the provisions of the Foreign Exchange Control Act, since the first of April, 1949, to date?

2. What were the penalties imposed in each case?

3. In how many cases, by provinces, were the moneys seized returned (a) in whole; (b) in part, to such persons?

PUBLIC BUILDINGS—PURCHASE AND CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many contracts have been entered into in the three years ending December 31, 1949, for the construction of buildings, without formally advertising or calling for tenders?

2. How many buildings have been purchased in the three years ending December 31, 1949?

3. In the case of each contract for construction of buildings included in the answer to question 1, what is (a) the date of the contract; (b) the location (city or town and street number); (c) the name of the building; (d) the department, departments or crown company, etc., to be accommodated; (e) the name and address of the builder or contractor; (f) the total or agreed cost of construction; (g) the builder's or contractor's fee?

4. In the case of each building purchased, included in the answer to question 2, what is (a) the date of the purchase; (b) the location (city or town and street number); (c) the name of the building; (d) the department, departments or crown company, etc., to be accommodated; (e) the name and address of the owner or vendor; (f) the agreed purchase price?

CHARTERED BANKS—PROFITS, TAXES, ETC.

Mr. Quelch:

1. What were the net profits of each of the chartered banks after published provision for dominion and provincial taxes, in each of the years 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949?

2. What was the amount of dominion and provincial taxes of each bank for these years?

3. What percentage of paid-up capital are the profits shown in the answer to question 1, in each case?

4. What was the total of the transfers made to contingent reserve fund from the earnings of each of the chartered banks during above years?

5. What was the total amount that each bank was called upon to pay in additional taxation as a result of excess transfers in each of these years?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DILLON-BULL'S HOUSE, SASK., TELEPHONE LINE

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, documents and other papers passing between any person other than Mr. L. M. Marion, and the government, from January 1, 1947, to date, with respect to the construction of a telegraph and/or telephone line between Dillon and Bull's House in Saskatchewan.

RIVIERE-AU-RENARD, QUE., RIVER IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a return showing a copy of payrolls and lists of materials used in connection with the work performed at the mouth of the river at Riviere-au-Renard, county of Gaspe, during the summer of 1949.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will move to go into supply and call the Departments of Fisheries and Justice.

Mr. Fleming: What about the post office?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought we would take up the item of post office and discuss the use of the mail service, but I was told that some member who wishes to take part in that debate would not be present in the house tomorrow. If you wish to have that discussed tomorrow, I am ready to put it down, but I was told that someone who wants to take part in the debate would not be here, so through courtesy I thought I would not put it down. I shall ask the member for Eglinton if he wants it put down.

Mr. Fleming: I am afraid I cannot make any comment, in view of what the minister has said.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am afraid I cannot call it, because this is an hon. member of the opposition for whom I have much respect and who would like to take part in the debate. We will take up Bill No. 133, an act respecting national defence; Bill No. 134, an act to amend the Militia Pension Act and change the title thereof; then the resolution concerning the distribution of prize money; then the resolution to set up a special committee to consider the defence bill or bills. If we are fortunate enough to complete those matters, we would like to take up also Bill No. 180, an act to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act, 1946.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 16, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF SUMMARY APRIL 1, 1950 TO APRIL 30, 1950

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table a summary of orders in council passed during the period April 1 to April 30, 1950. It will be remembered that the summary for the period March 1 to March 31 was tabled on April 17.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

International convention for northwest Atlantic fisheries, and Final Act signed on February 8, 1949.—Mr. Claxton.

Report of the operations under the Bretton Woods Agreements Act during the fiscal year 1949-50.—Mr. Sinclair.

Bill No. 217, for the relief of Georges Emile Bernier.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 218, for the relief of Margaret Veronica Quinn Davies.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 219, for the relief of Max Gurevitch. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 220, for the relief of Romuald Joseph Jean Lamoureux.—Mr. Winkler.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—QUESTION AS TO VISIT TO WINNIPEG BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder if I may direct a question to the Prime Minister, which he may wish to think over before he answers? I do so most earnestly and respectfully. Would the Prime Minister consider going to Winnipeg this week so that he may see with his own eyes the destruction and disaster being suffered by our people?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry, but it will not be possible for me to go to Winnipeg this week. I think the announcements that will be made shortly as to what is to be done in connection with the whole situation will satisfy those who wish their sympathy expressed as vigorously as possible to the population that is so distressed in that area.

EFFECT OF DISASTER UPON RURAL AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Following the observations that have been made with regard to the situation in Manitoba, and having regard to the statements that were made yesterday, may I suggest to the government that, in considering the things that must be done, full recognition be given to the extent of the disaster to the rural areas? While the tragedy and the destruction in Winnipeg is attracting attention through the necessity of protecting buildings there, there is also a heavy loss in the rural areas, in a considerable part of which crops will not be planted this year. I suggest that the government, in announcing its plans in regard to Winnipeg, also announce what is to be done for the rural areas that are affected.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The plans under consideration do not apply exclusively to Winnipeg; they apply to the whole area that has been affected by these disastrous floods.

APPLICATION OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development? Could the minister, either today or quite soon, give the house some details as to the use which the government intends to make of the National Housing Act in connection with the disaster in Winnipeg, and also as to the proposed amendments to that act which were referred to in a dispatch appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): The act is available for use to the fullest extent by any individual or province wanting to use it. With respect to the proposed amendments mentioned in the dispatch, I do not know of any.

Mr. Knowles: Was the Globe and Mail report completely wrong?

NATIONAL PARKS

NEW BRUNSWICK—OFFICIAL OPENING OF FUNDY PARK, JULY 29

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Can the Minister of Resources and Development inform the house whether a definite date has been set for the official and formal opening of Fundy national park in Albert county, New Brunswick?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question, and to thank him, too, for the constructive interest he has taken in the great amount of work which has been put into the development of this splendid park area. After discussing the matter with Premier McNair and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg), it has been decided that the official opening date will be July 29.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REPRESENTATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND ON SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I gave notice of the following question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue: On March 31, after the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) had spoken on his resolution regarding the appointment of a special committee to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I rose to protest—this will be found on page 1456 of Hansard—against the discrimination against my province. My question to the minister was whether he would add a representative from the province of Prince Edward Island, and to that question I have had no reply.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of National Revenue): I received notice of the hon. member's question, and I have also examined Hansard and I find there is little I can add to the reply made at that time by the Minister of National Revenue. I think the question is one that could just as properly be asked of the whip of the hon. member's own party. As I understand it, once the size of a committee and the representation of the various parties on it are determined, the composition of the committee is a matter for the respective whips.

Mr. McLure: The whip of our party would have nothing to do with the appointment of a Liberal from Prince Edward Island on that committee.

ENEMY PROPERTY

CANADIAN CLAIMS FOR WAR DAMAGE—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON MAY 15

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): The Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) is not in the house at the moment, and perhaps my question may be taken as notice. Yesterday, as recorded at page 2518 of Hansard, the minister answered a question I had asked with regard to the assets of former enemies in the hands of the custodian of enemy property. I notice that the answer to the first part of the question indicates a total of $51 million odd, whereas the break-down in the answer to the second part totals only $16 million odd. Will the Secretary of State have the figures checked, or offer some explanation for the discrepancy? Perhaps he would be kind enough to give a supplementary answer to the question.

PRIVILEGE

OPPORTUNITIES IN CANADA FOR CANADIAN UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): On a question of privilege, I should like to deflate a bubble that has been blown up in various parts of this country in the form of a statement that the best students in Canada go to the United States. One of the finest students in Canada has come back from Baltimore, where he took a post-graduate course to settle down in the national research council, and he comes from Fort William.

TOBACCO

QUESTION AS TO ASSISTANCE TO ONTARIO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): The tobacco farmers of Ontario constitute one of the greatest tax sources in this country, and in this connection I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the banks have the tobacco farmers of Ontario in the palms of their hands and are putting the old squeeze on them, will the Department of Agriculture in order to prevent some tobacco farmers from being ruined, look into the conditions facing these men this season, and, if possible, grant loans so that they may plant crops and reap a harvest this year?

Mr. Abbott: Free enterprise.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I do not know what answer I can give at the moment. I shall look into the matter and answer later.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

FLOOD CONDITIONS—SOUTHERN MANITOBA

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before Your Honour leaves the chair there are a few words I should like to say. I wish to do so because I have just come back from spending a few days in my home city and province, where our people are undergoing a serious disaster and suffering grievous losses—even more serious than some of us were forecasting a couple of weeks ago. I have read the reports that were made yesterday by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and I know that the house is familiar with the bare facts of the situation. I shall not repeat anything that either of those ministers said.

I was called upon repeatedly during the days that I was home to bring back certain messages—one in particular—and I felt that I should waste no time in bringing those messages to the attention of this house and of the government. The message in particular was this: Next to the concern for the immediate emergency, about which I shall say something in a moment, the people affected, and those who are not affected but who are concerned for their fellow citizens, are hoping that there will soon be the assurance that the financial aid offered will take the form of direct assistance to the individuals who need it, direct compensation for losses suffered. I want to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in saying that the individuals affected are not just those in the urban and suburban areas who are losing their homes, furniture and personal belongings, but also the farmers of the whole Red river valley from Winnipeg to Emerson.

I realize that the assurance of federal financial assistance has already been given in the house. It was so stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a week ago yesterday, and I was one of those who immediately expressed thanks on behalf of the people back home that the assurance had been given. I must confess that when I got home I discovered that the general terms in which that assurance was given somehow or other did not give the people who are having their homes destroyed and who are losing their furniture the assurance that they personally would be compensated for their losses and enabled to get back on their feet.

I am sorry that the personal arrangements of the Prime Minister are such that he cannot accede to the suggestion I made when we were on orders of the day. I felt it would be worth while for him to make a trip to Winnipeg while the flood waters are still high, if he possibly could. I still feel he should go. If I may say so, the purpose of his going there would not be for sightseeing or making a speech but rather that he might see with his own eyes what our people are suffering. I am sure if he would travel through or over the Red river valley from Emerson to Winnipeg, and get as close as he could to the areas under water, if he could see hundreds and hundreds of homes half-submerged, it would save a great deal of argument when the time comes to decide whether or not financial assistance is to take the form of compensation directly to the people who need it.

I could, like all members from the area affected—and we have all been home since the tragedy has been upon us—tell story after story of young people, people newly married and just setting up their homes, people in middle age, old people who have retired, people at all stages and in all classes and walks of life who have lost heavily or lost all. The spirit of the Winnipeg people is the spirit of all Canadians in time of disaster or tragedy. A great deal has been said about their heroism and the way in which everyone is pitching in to do the things that have to be done. That is all true, but I must confess there is also a considerable feeling of resentment and bitterness at what has overtaken the people, and at the terrible slowness with which some authorities acted in the situation.

There is now being organized a voluntary Manitoba flood relief fund, and the indications are that Canadians from coast to coast will subscribe to it heavily and voluntarily. There are indications that there will be subscriptions from the United States and other countries as well. The fact that Canadians from coast to coast will be subscribing to the fund surely makes it clear that we would be more than justified in taking out of the federal treasury whatever it may be necessary to take to compensate those people who have suffered heavy losses.

In this instance, Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking so much, as I sometimes do and as we all do, for the people of my own constituency, because it so happens that the working people of Winnipeg North Centre, who frequently are hit by disasters of one kind and another, although there is flooding in Point Douglas and water in many basements, have not been hit as heavily in this instance as the people of the other Winnipeg and surrounding constituencies—Winnipeg North; Winnipeg South Centre; Winnipeg South, which has suffered very heavily; Selkirk, St. Boniface, Provencher, Springfield, and so on.

When a tragedy like this occurs some of the differences between us melt away, and we are all anxious that those who have suffered should receive the kind of assistance they need. So it is that all of us from the affected area are speaking for all who have sustained losses. It is utterly impossible for a family that has lost everything to try to get back on its feet. A loss of $2,000, $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000, in some cases even more, such as many people have sustained, is more than one family can stand. Nevertheless the total loss is such that the amount required to meet this need would not greatly upset the national budget. In fact I would hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) might also accept my suggestion about going to Winnipeg, because I imagine he will have to be called in when there is a discussion about the amount of money involved.

I know there are frequent calls for economy from the floor of the house, and the Minister of Finance will say that we must be careful now. I think if the Minister of Finance, who is not noted for his soft heart, were to take a trip this week to Winnipeg and see what our people are suffering, it would make a difference when the time comes to discuss the amount to be voted to compensate for the losses involved.

The main plea I make to the government at this time is that they make it clear, just as soon as they possibly can, that the financial assistance to be made available, in keeping with the assurance given by the Prime Minister on Monday, May 8, will take the form of compensation directly to individuals who have suffered losses, directly to those who need it.

I was sorry that the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) had to give a negative answer to the question I asked on the orders of the day. I had in mind a front page story in this morning's Globe and Mail under the by-line of Warren Baldwin. The heading of the article is:

> Housing Act will assist Winnipeg rehabilitation, federal minister implies.

It is a lengthy story about various things Mr. Winters had said would be done, and it contains this paragraph:

> Resources minister Winters said today that legislation such as the National Housing Act would be used to the limit of its scope. Consideration is also being given, he disclosed, to the possibility of special arrangements under the act and of changes in the legislation, if necessary.

It was the point about changes in the legislation if necessary that appealed to me most. To tell people who already have heavy mortgages on their homes, and whose homes are now flooded, that they can secure a further loan under the National Housing Act is of no help whatsoever, because a further loan will simply mean that they will then owe more on their homes than they are worth. The suggestion that there might be changes in the act to cope with this particular situation was the one that held out a bit of hope. I am sorry that the minister had to give a negative answer today. I hope that, having had a chance to read Warren Baldwin's story in this morning's Globe and Mail, he will think the matter over, come to the conclusion that it was a good idea anyway, and perchance give a more favourable answer later.

Mr. Fraser: It was also on the air.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) says that it was also on the air. That is true. I heard it this morning. It was on the air that the Minister of Resources and Development had disclosed that assistance would be forthcoming, and possible changes in the act.

There are a great many steps that the government can take. Something can be done by making changes in the National Housing Act. Something can be done by way of stockpiling necessary materials. Surely we should see to it that there is no unemployment in the greater Winnipeg area for some time to come, having regard to the reconstruction and rehabilitation work that will have to be done there.

All that lies in the future. The immediate concern, next to the emergency itself, is that there be an assurance that the financial aid offered will take the form of direct compensation to those individuals, both in rural and in urban and suburban areas, who need it.

While I am on my feet may I say it strikes me that, although it has meant a great deal to the people of Winnipeg and the Red river valley to have the interest, sympathy and attention of all Canada and of other countries during this time of crisis—and that interest and sympathy have taken many tangible forms which have meant a great deal—it is to be noted that the siege is one that will last for some considerable time. Even if news comes in two or three days that the waters have started to recede, it will not mean that the danger is over. Hon. members must realize, as they will from the reports that have been received, that large residential areas are being protected by the tremendous dikes that have been built. Even though the water should drop three, four or five feet there is still danger of flooding in those areas if those dikes should go.

I want to add my word of appreciation of the assistance rendered by those who have done so much hard work in the city these past few weeks, both civilians and service personnel. It has been a magnificent job indeed. One hesitates to select any particular group to which to pay tribute, but I do want to say a special word about the young people of the greater Winnipeg area. These are the younger people whom we sometimes think of as the modern generation, whom we sometimes consider not quite as responsible citizens as we think we were, who sometimes make a little more noise than we think they should. During the few days I was at home I discovered that they are all in work clothes, all in rubber boots, spattered with mud from the work they are doing—young men and young women, yes boys and girls. When you see them riding on the streetcars they are not singing or talking or cracking jokes; they are dead tired from the work they have done. I feel that special tribute should be paid to the young people who have done so much.

The other concern that will be with our people for some considerable time after the waters start to recede is the danger to the health of our community. That, I believe, is one of the reasons why efforts have been made, with considerable success, to get a great many of our people out of the city. The estimates vary all the way from 80,000 up to 100,000 as to the number of people who have left Winnipeg, many of them under compulsion because their homes have been flooded or they have been ordered to evacuate, but many of them voluntarily in order to relieve the strain on public utilities, the health authorities and the hospitals. For many weeks the health of our city will have to be watched, and we will need all the help we can get from any source.

After all that is done; after the dirt and refuse have been cleaned away and we are reassured as to the health of our people; after the rehabilitation has started, then our people will want action, definite and responsible, that will lead to steps being taken to ensure that a disaster of this kind will never recur. I am not an engineer, and I cannot propose the exact details of a solution; but I am satisfied that if there is the will to do it, and if the money is made available, engineers can find a way to make sure that this tragedy will not be repeated in future years.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—AGREEMENT WITH NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have noted with considerable regret that as yet no agreement has been entered into between the federal government and the government of New Brunswick with respect to that portion of the trans-Canada highway project which will cross my province. Since the season for road construction is rapidly approaching, I would urge the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) and the officers of his department to do everything possible to bring about such an agreement with respect to the trans-Canada highway in the province of New Brunswick.

I am not clear as to the points of difference between the negotiating parties, but I am wondering if it is the question of route. If that matter is of concern to the parties and keeps them at variance, I would strongly urge that every assurance be given the people of the city of Saint John and the surrounding area that the trans-Canada highway will pass through that city. I hear of the possibility of the highway coming down the river to Fredericton from the northern part of the province, crossing the bridge there and proceeding via Jemseg on route No. 9 to the town of Sussex. If this route were followed it would completely by-pass Saint John, the commercial centre of the province, and the centre of the area within which the most interesting and most important tourist attractions are located. On the other hand if the highway were brought through Saint John it would mean that this important artery would be forty miles closer to the town of St. Stephen in Charlotte county, which has been the port of entry for the bulk of the tourists coming to the maritime provinces from the United States.

This, of course, is a matter of real concern to us in Saint John and vicinity. Recently we learned that the federal government was making a large grant toward the construction of a car ferry which would transport tourists from the coast of Maine to a port in a neighbouring province. We in New Brunswick were happy to learn of this assistance, because we are always glad when the federal government decides to give any help whatever to any of the maritime provinces; but we feel that our province will suffer so far as the tourist industry is concerned, in that many tourists who normally would come through New Brunswick may be diverted directly to Nova Scotia as a result of the operation of this ferry. So we feel that if the trans-Canada highway were to follow route No. 2 from Edmundston to Fredericton, thence to Saint John via routes 2 and 2A, and from there to the town of Sussex, it would at least partly make up for what may be a considerable reduction in the flow of tourists who normally would come through our province.

On behalf of my own constituency, and on behalf of those living in the particular section of New Brunswick whence I come, I would again urge that the federal government do everything possible to ensure that the trans-Canada highway be brought down the Saint John river, or by the shortest practical route to the city of Saint John and from there on to Sussex and Moncton.

POST OFFICE—DENIAL OF THE USE OF MAILS

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on May 9 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) made statements in regard to the exercise by the Postmaster General of the powers conferred upon him under regulations 204 and 205. This subject had been under discussion before, and I would remind the house of the unusual way in which it was dealt with at that time. Questions had been asked on different occasions as to the procedure being followed in denying the use of the mails in certain cases. It had been said that a clear statement would be given to the house as to what the situation was. We were told that the subject would be discussed. When the first item of the Post Office Department was called on May 9, the Minister of Justice took advantage of the occasion to make a statement, and he was followed by the Acting Postmaster General. Then the discussion was stopped by the device of presenting a motion that the committee rise and report progress; the use of that unusual device should not be overlooked. The house had been assured there would be a discussion of this subject. Two ministers of the crown presented statements which called for discussion, but the discussion was stopped by a device that can be employed at any time by a government that makes use of its majority, without regard to its undertakings and without regard to the right of the house to have a discussion on a subject of this kind.

I am mentioning this matter again, because one of the departments to be called when the Speaker leaves the chair is that of the Minister of Justice. It therefore seems appropriate that I should make certain remarks about this subject on the first occasion which presents itself. The matter we are considering is not whether the authority of the Postmaster General is to be exercised in relation to certain brokers in this country; it is how the authority and powers of the Postmaster General under the postal regulations are to be exercised in any case. Often it is only when certain publicity attaches to a particular act of some department that we learn what the situation is. I certainly was unaware of the number of orders that have been issued denying the use of the mails, and the orders which have been issued against brokers are only a small percentage of the outstanding orders of this nature. There are at the present time approximately 1,100 outstanding orders denying the use of the mails. They are issued against many organizations, and many individuals in different activities. The very nature of some of the organizations suggests that it would be wise for the members of the house to give careful consideration to the way in which this power is being exercised. Amongst the organizations which have been denied the use of the mails are branches of the Legion in different parts of Canada; service clubs; religious orders; athletic organizations; social organizations of various kinds. I find in one case there is a teachers organization, and similar action has been taken with respect to a large number of individuals from one end of the country to the other.

What we should consider, therefore, is the exercise of this authority in relation to many types of organizations throughout Canada, and whether it is in keeping with our traditional practices, and our belief that every man and every woman is presumed to be innocent until he or she is proven guilty.

The explanation given by the Minister of Justice and the Postmaster General as to what had taken place was not satisfactory. The explanation of the Minister of Justice was devoted to the limitation of the use of the mails to certain brokers. At page 2333 of Hansard he is reported at the outset of his remarks as saying:

> Mr. Chairman, the matter of the protection of the mails from being used for schemes devised or intended to deceive the public is one of considerable importance. From one standpoint it affects certain rights of individual brokers, and of course no government wishes to deal unfairly with them. From another standpoint it affects the efficient workings of a free society; for I submit, sir, it is important to a free society that the integrity of its methods in raising risk capital for the development of its natural resources should be protected from any corruption by fraud.

I do not think there is any hon. member in this house who is not convinced that society should be protected from the raising of money by fraud. But one of the basic principles of our society is that it shall be protected under the law, and not by arbitrary decisions of any official acting on his own discretion. We pride ourselves that we rely on laws enforced by the courts, and we should seek to protect society by clearly stated laws, and by charges laid under those laws, so that the rights of the individual can be determined by judicial consideration.

Again I would point out that we are not dealing with the exercise of this right only in regard to brokers. We are dealing with the exercise of this right in regard to a great many organizations and people. Nevertheless it is appropriate to consider what was said about the orders that had been placed against certain brokerage firms and individuals as a result of some of their activities. The Acting Postmaster General gave a few quotations from statements which were alleged to have been contained in circulars sent out by some unnamed broker. He then informed the house that steps had been taken by the Postmaster General to obtain some information from officials of the government of the province of Alberta about those properties. We, of course, did not hear the whole story, and the Acting Postmaster General would be the last person to suggest that we did. This thought should be borne in mind. After being thus informed by the minister of the type of fraud that was suggested by the statements made, every hon. member in this house may wonder why no prosecutions were laid under the section of the Criminal Code provided in cases of that kind.

I hope the Minister of Justice will not on this occasion say that he would remind us that this is a responsibility of the provincial attorneys general. This information has been obtained by the Postmaster General by methods that are not available to any provincial attorney general, except where an individual wishes to lay a charge, which he can do in any case. This information has been obtained from special sources available to the Post Office Department. If they have that information, then those officials could lay a charge. If the fraud is there, surely section 414 of the Criminal Code would be wide enough to deal with the case, if it is a clear-cut example of fraud. Section 414 of the Criminal Code reads as follows:

414. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who, being a promoter, director, officer or manager of any body corporate or company, either existing or intended to be formed, makes, circulates, or publishes, or concurs in making, circulating or publishing any prospectus, statement or account which he knows to be false in any material particular, with intent to induce persons whether ascertained or not to become shareholders or partners, or with intent to deceive or defraud the members, shareholders or creditors, or any of them, whether ascertained or not, of such body corporate or company, or with intent to induce any person to entrust or advance any property to such body corporate or company, or to enter into any security for the benefit thereof.

If there is clear-cut fraud, there is the section under which a charge can be laid. If the Minister of Justice thinks that this section is not wide enough, the appropriate course is for him to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code which will widen the application of the code to those cases where the mail is used in a manner which he suggests is fraudulent. It was noticeable that the Acting Postmaster General used the term "fraud orders". If there are fraud orders based upon knowledge of fraud, then either action should be taken under existing laws, or, if those existing laws are not wide enough, procedure should be provided by appropriate amendments to the Criminal Code.

It is easy for the Minister of Justice to surround himself with a cloak of virtue and seek to divert people's attention from the measure of arbitrary authority that is being exercised by saying: We do not want any cases of fraud where money is being raised for development. No, we do not. But we want that fraud prevented under the law, and not under the whim of some official or of the Minister of Justice himself. After all, we have not had too convincing evidence of the exercise of discretion by the Minister of Justice under existing laws. We recall that the Minister of Justice, under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), broke one law of this parliament and has never apologized for it. We also remember that, not so long ago, the same Minister of Justice told us that our laws in regard to communism are adequate. Yet we are informed that there is to be an amendment to the Official Secrets Act, apparently for the very purpose of strengthening laws which, according to the Minister of Justice, are now adequate.

The very fact that fraud of all kinds should be prevented is no reason for attempting to prevent that fraud by improper methods. The worse the methods are, the more desirable it is that we should deal with fraud or conduct of that kind under a system which we have asked our people to respect. The way in which we can most effectively protect our society is to be sure that when there is wrongdoing, no part of our community will be in a position to complain that they have not been dealt with under the law but rather have been dealt with by the extension of some power that was not intended for the particular purpose for which it was employed.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what has happened raises a wider issue. Steps should be taken to protect the people of this country from racketeers. Steps should be taken to provide a more effective method for preventing the appeal to people, by any fraudulent device, for money for speculative purposes. At a time when great developments are taking place, people naturally become interested in those developments. Every one of us knows that at the present time, from many parts of this country, circulars are issued appealing to the speculative instincts of the people in regard to some of the great developments. The public should of course be warned that anything of this kind is a speculation in any event; that they should not put money in risk ventures of the kind unless they recognize the fact that it is a risk, and that they should only put in anything of that kind such money as they can afford to lose. But having said that, I submit that the time to strengthen our laws, so that those who seek to obtain money by improper devices may be brought before our courts and dealt with effectively, is when the opportunities which are presenting themselves naturally encourage people to venture in some of those speculative enterprises.

To a great extent this country has been developed by speculative activities. Many of the important activities of this country, such as the large producing mines, were at one time, in their early stages, highly speculative. There is no suggestion by the government—and I am not imputing any such suggestion—that speculative activity of that kind should be prevented. On the contrary, it was clearly stated that we wished to invite risk capital; and it was suggested that it would be an encouragement to risk capital to make sure that, in speculative activities of this kind, fraud should be prevented. The way to deal with that properly is either to prosecute under the law as it stands, or, if the law is not wide enough to deal with fraud of this kind, to amend the Criminal Code. But we are taking great risks with our traditional system of trial by the courts if, in our desire to prevent activities of this kind, we give to officials of any department the power of a court, of a jury and of a sheriff as well, and deny the people the opportunity to carry on their business simply on the decision of that official. In this case regulation 204 provides:

> If it be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General that any persons are using or endeavouring to use the post office for any fraudulent or illegal purpose, then in any such case, it is hereby declared that no letters, packet, parcel, newspaper, book, or other thing sent or sought to be sent through the post office by or on behalf of or to or on behalf of such person, shall be deemed mailable matter.

It is under that provision that these orders have from time to time been made; and from time to time under these monthly supplements of the Canada official postal guide we see the names of the organizations and individuals against whom these orders have been made. I have before me the supplement for March, 1950, which does not include those issued against the brokers here under discussion, but does include a number of other names of organizations and individuals. I do not propose to read those names into the record, because I think it would be most unfair that they should be mentioned in Hansard. That, after all, is one of the reasons why such great care should be used in connection with a matter of this kind, because set out here are the names of organizations which would ordinarily be regarded as very reliable. It cannot fail to do them harm that a formal order of this kind has gone out declaring that the mails shall not be available to them.

I see just on these two pages in front of me in this single supplement the names of branches of the Legion, of a religious order, of a teachers' organization, of an insurance company, of a labour organization, of a curling club and of an athletic committee—and the names of a number of individuals. Then under these orders are these words:

> Registered letters are not to be accepted addressed to the above, and all mail addressed to or coming from the above is to be intercepted and sent specially by first mail to the administration branch (for the dead letter office).

I cannot find anything in regulation 204 which provides authority for a procedure of that kind. This is more than a refusal to individuals of the use of the mails; it is very clearly stated that the mail of these individuals and organizations is to be intercepted and sent to the dead letter office. What happens then is not stated, and what happens then needs to be clearly understood by members of the House of Commons if we are to know exactly what is taking place.

Let me point out another feature in connection with this situation. The orders referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) are related to certain brokers denied the use of the mails. They were denied the right to send out and denied the right to receive. At another time when the estimates of the Post Office Department are before us it is my purpose to do what cannot now be done, and that is to inquire in regard to a number of the details as to the procedure which has been followed.

One of the things that have taken place is that a number of these people have come to Ottawa and have called on officials of the Post Office Department. In certain cases where these individuals or companies were prepared to comply with the terms laid down by the Post Office Department the orders, which the Acting Postmaster General has described as fraud orders, have according to my information been withdrawn. It would be interesting to know what representations were made and what conditions were attached; and when the estimates of the Post Office Department are before us it will be possible to ask those questions and to obtain that information.

Dealing again with the denial of the use of the mails to certain brokers: this did bring the whole matter to the attention of the public, and for the first time brought home the fact that there are 1,100 of these orders outstanding, of which only a small proportion apply to the brokers. It was done in a way that suggested something more than the ordinary procedure contemplated by that regulation, which has been in force for a very long time.

This order is one of long standing. It has been administered by different governments and has been regarded as a means of denying the use of the mails for obviously improper purposes. But what cannot be overlooked in this case is that a device was employed which had the effect of giving to the Postmaster General the authority of a securities commissioner, no matter whether that was the intention or not. The Postmaster General denied the use of the mails; by doing so he effectively denied the possibility of these people carrying on business. In that way he was achieving a result which, according to the Minister of Justice, had the commendable purpose of preventing fraud.

But the thing we should always bear in mind in considering the action of officials under regulations of this kind is that never at any time have we been prepared to accept the proposition that any minister or any official is infallible. The moment we are prepared to concede infallibility in any minister —and we most certainly will not concede it to the Minister of Justice—we shall be then accepting a basic proposition in the totalitarian state, where we take from the courts decision as to the rights of individuals, and leave it to some official to say whether a person may carry on his means to earn a livelihood or not.

The principle is there; the principle is clear. The more desirable the purpose, the more important it is that we carry out that purpose under the rule of law. In this case the Minister of Justice has informed us there is to be an amendment that will permit appeals. That is an empty concession.

Mr. Garson: I think for the sake of accuracy I should offer a slight correction. I said that we have under consideration the advisability of an amendment.

Mr. Drew: Oh; then, we may take it that that was only a gesture which may or may not have any value, depending upon whether it has complete acceptance at a later date.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend would permit me to state my position correctly, I have not stated it as he has just stated it. I am saying that we have under consideration the advisability of introducing an amendment along the lines set out in my speech to which he referred, and that in that connection we are seeking representations from the broker dealers association represented by Mr. McTague before we make up our minds.

Mr. Drew: One of the reasons I say that this may or may not have any meaning is that we remember it was a year ago in March that we were informed that the government had under consideration an amendment to the Criminal Code to deal with communism. We have not got any further ahead with that. The government is dismissing from its service those with communist tendencies without having any law to state that that is an offence. It is doing that in somewhat the same way that it is dealing in this case with companies and individuals under the 1,100 fraud orders that are active and outstanding at the present time.

We are told that consideration is to be given to the right to appeal, but I would point out that such right of appeal may be an empty right in the case of any business organization which is committed to a substantial overhead and is denied by an arbitrary order of this kind the opportunity to carry on its business during the time the appeal process is being carried forward and the court has the opportunity to determine if that decision should be made by the Minister of Justice. The whole business of a company might be wiped out and the real opportunity to take an effective appeal denied simply because of the delay as much as the actual cost of the appeal. It may be that the cost of the appeal would not be nearly so important as the cost of carrying unproductive overhead during that period when the rights of a company or individual are being determined.

I do want to come back again to this proposition, and in this I speak in no spirit of criticism of what has passed but rather to suggest something which I believe might be given due consideration as a means of dealing with what is a real danger at this time. I am not in position to say whether any one of these people against whom orders have been made has committed fraud. In fact I do not think the Minister of Justice is in position to say that. It is not part of our tradition that the Minister of Justice should assume that authority. Nevertheless I do say that at a time when such vast opportunities for development of a speculative nature are open to the people of this country we should try to protect the risk capital that is sought for that purpose by effective laws against fraud in every case where it is found. Experience has shown that the most effective deterrent to fraud is prosecution and jail where there is real fraud.

In this country we have a division of responsibility. Under the jurisdiction over property and civil rights the provinces have set up organizations to deal with the issuing of securities. Under the exclusive jurisdiction over criminal law it is for the dominion to propose from time to time such further legislation as may be required to bring within the scope of the Criminal Code conduct of a criminal nature related to any activities where the money of the people is being sought by any device.

Undoubtedly this is a case where the combined judgment of the Department of Justice and of the securities commissioners or the corresponding officials of the provincial governments should be brought together. A great deal of useful experience has been gained over the past two decades. I feel sure that there can be a strengthening of the criminal law, on the one hand, to make it possible for the dominion government to take into consideration any cases where real fraud is found by the post office or any other department of government, and also that the Criminal Code should be strengthened in a way that would give to the securities commissioners of the provinces and their officials a greater opportunity for dealing with certain cases that now are outside provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Garson: I presume my hon. friend is aware that the provincial securities commissions have no jurisdiction over interprovincial or international trade in securities?

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: That is exactly the reason why they cannot deal with the use of mails across provincial boundaries and over international borders. That is exactly what I am pointing out, that this is a field of regulation where the dominion government has a certain opportunity for investigation and the obtaining of information and that they can then deal with it under the Criminal Code, or if there is not authority now the government can amend the code to make it wide enough to deal with cases of that kind.

I have put that suggestion forward pointing out the very thing that the Minister of Justice has mentioned, that the securities commissions can only carry out their duty under laws which are limited to the local provincial area, and it is not possible for the provincial legislature to pass laws which will deal effectively with interprovincial or international transactions. It is in that field that the Criminal Code can be strengthened by amendments and the dominion government, through information it obtains, can take the appropriate action.

One thing that raises a question is the fact that for some time officials of the securities exchange commission in the United States have been trying to have provisions included in our law to make the procedure in the United States effective in certain cases where they follow a practice not in accordance with our own. They have a device, entirely unknown to our legal system, of filing what they describe as show cause orders. Those orders are not based upon any prima facie evidence of crime; they are orders made simply upon the presentation of statements which would not be recognized under our legal system. I do not believe that a practice so out of keeping with our system should at any time become the basis of proceedings here. Succeeding ministers of justice in this country have resisted any suggestion that this should be done by amendments to our law. That is the reason why I do not want to see any indirect device used which would have the effect of doing what it has been decided should not be done. In this particular case there is no attempt to hide the fact that Mr. Callaghan of the securities exchange commission came here from Washington and made certain representations. I do not want to see an indirect procedure in Canada that will carry out a procedure followed in the United States which I hope will never be adopted here. I want to see our own Criminal Code strengthened in every way that it can be, so that we can establish the highest possible measure of confidence not only in the minds of our own people but also in the minds of possible investors in the United States, to the end that the risk capital we require for future development may be encouraged by the assurance that there will be as little fraud as possible in the obtaining of it.

Again, however, I urge that we review most carefully procedure of this kind, and that full information should be given to the house when the estimates of the Post Office Department are before us as to the procedure taken in all these many cases, the vast majority of them not related to brokers but affecting the organizations that I have mentioned. I certainly hope that every effective device will be adopted. I not only want to make sure that no broker or other individual is improperly penalized until found guilty, but also that our laws will be such that fraud can be brought before the courts in every case where it is found.

Mr. A. H. Jeffery (London): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion because I find that I am somewhat in sympathy with the constructive suggestions of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). In our democracy I think we should be most careful that the discretion exercised by officials should in some way be subject to review by the courts. I think an excellent step in this direction has been taken under the income tax law where discretionary powers are to a large extent reviewable by an appeal tribunal. I spoke once before in the house about the encouragement of risk capital. I agree with the leader of the opposition that we should do everything to encourage the use of risk capital for the development of Canada.

I noted that the leader of the opposition was worried about our democratic processes. I should like to point out that one of the things he suggested was restrictive criminal laws against what might be called a political party in Canada, the communists. On another occasion I said that I agree that anybody who threatens our state by force of arms or otherwise should be restricted and prosecuted but the leader of the opposition went on to make a suggestion about an undemocratic process with regard to communism.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt but I do not want the record to be left in error. Every statement I made about communism was particularly directed towards the necessity of laws which would deal with communism before our courts. The point I was raising was that we should not deal with communism without laws, that we should have laws defining the offences and that these people should be brought before the courts.

Mr. Jeffery: Possibly I did not word very well what I had to say. What I intended to say was that we should not have laws against communism as such. We should have laws against anybody who attempts to overcome our democratic processes by force. I should like to point out that when the leader of the opposition was premier of Ontario there were laws on the statute books of the province which broke the very rule he is talking about. I should like to refer to the liquor control act whereby the official in charge can walk into a person's home, pick up his liquor permit and take it away without giving any reason or any review being made by the courts. I should also like to refer to another law of the province of Ontario whereby the minister of highways can take away my licence without my being convicted of any offence, without my having been through an examination. In other words, he can take my licence away because I am a Liberal or because I am white-headed, and it is not subject to review by the courts. I say again that I am in some slight agreement with the leader of the opposition but I want to point out that when he was premier of the province of Ontario he was guilty of having such laws.

There is one difficulty existing, of which I know the leader of the opposition is aware, and that is proving legally who mailed certain documents, and who is responsible for the printing thereof. Therefore prosecutions can be difficult where prospectuses are mailed. We run into difficulties of many types, and the only way they could be overcome would be by passing express legislation to the effect that such letters must be registered, that the person mailing them must sign, and other laws which will pin it down to the person mailing the documents.

In conclusion I want to say that I have considerable sympathy with the views of the leader of the opposition. I think his speech was constructive and had a good deal to offer. I want to make it clear that I have no sympathy for the Bay street mining interests. I feel that the government which I have the honour to support, in view of the action they took as to the income tax law, will do something to straighten out this difficult problem.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this matter because I think it is of interest to all of us. When steps are taken by a department of government, as was done in this case, without any immediate recourse to the courts to prove whether a person is innocent or guilty, I think it endangers democratic freedoms. I hold no brief for persons who use the mails or any other facility to defraud either the public of Canada or citizens of the United States. So long as speculation is legitimate, people who speculate, and particularly the smaller investor, should be protected as far as possible from victimization. If our federal and provincial laws are not sufficiently strong to deal with people who have the intent to defraud, and against whom a legitimate case can be made, then I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the laws of Canada should be strengthened. It is perfectly true, as was said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that under provincial and federal administrations there are a good many ways in which an individual can be penalized. It seems to me that in recent years, particularly since a number of licences and so on of different kinds have been granted, we have given to our officials a good deal of leeway in dealing with individuals.

The point was made a few moments ago that in the province of Ontario, for instance, the driver of an automobile may have his operator's licence taken away under certain circumstances without recourse to the courts. Of course Ontario is not alone in this respect, by any means; I believe the same thing can be done in all the provinces, because legislation in regard to these matters is more or less similar throughout Canada.

It seems to me that over long periods of years we have built up the right of the individual under the law to a hearing when accused, to be adjudged innocent or guilty, and to suffer the imposition of a penalty if guilt is shown. I know, because I have been long enough in this house to remember, that some people in the United States, including the government of that country, are anxious that mails from Canada to that country shall not be used to invite investment in companies or projects more or less fraudulent in their nature. I was on the external affairs committee, for example, when we had before us an extradition treaty. I remember the long inquiry into that matter, and the forceful reasons given at that time as to why a treaty of that kind should be entered into between our two countries. At that time there were people in Canada who were using the mails in order to defraud citizens of our neighbouring country. None the less I think the committee at that time was loath indeed to do anything that might unduly restrict the right of a Canadian citizen to be protected under our own laws.

In the matter that has been brought to the attention of the house this afternoon I believe the minister would be well advised not only to give consideration to some amendments that might strengthen the law, but to introduce amendments in the house this session in order that the law might be strengthened and the sort of criticism that has been levelled recently against the Post Office Department might not have any validity in future. I am perfectly sure that members of the house would welcome such legislation if it is necessary and desirable, but I do think we must beware lest we grant to officials of government a power over the citizens of this country which they should not possess.

The point I am trying to make is that if we are going to deal with matters of this kind, there should be a satisfactory law under which the authorities can act. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said a few moments ago, a statute with fairly severe penalties for contravention of the law would be a better deterrent than merely picking up the mail or forbidding the use of the mail to an individual. The minister shakes his head; I may be wrong. Let me point out to him, however, that in denying the use of the mails there is a possibility that innocent people may have their legitimate rights restricted and be punished without any real cause.

I do not know these people whose activities are under discussion at the present time, nor am I particularly anxious to learn who they are, because here again we may find that among them are people innocent of any wrong-doing, and I would not want any name brought into the house which would be unjust to any individual who had no wrongful intent. But even some of the employees of these organizations have found it very difficult to obtain mail that perhaps they should have been able to obtain, and which may have had very little if any connection with the operations of the companies concerned. I understand that an attempt has been made to protect innocent employees, and I am glad to learn that. I do not believe the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) would do knowingly anything unjust to an individual. Nor do I think the deputy postmaster general would do anything of the kind. I happen to know that gentleman, who was connected with this parliament for a long time in another capacity. But being human we are all liable to make mistakes.

I suppose the minister will have something to say on this matter before we leave it, and in all probability will reply to some of the statements and suggestions that have been made by the leader of the opposition. At the moment I must confess I do feel some apprehension lest without a statute, without a charge laid against an individual, we may do some innocent persons an injustice. I am interested in punishing anyone who may defraud or intend to defraud, but I do believe this parliament must take cognizance of the risk involved when the sort of thing is done that is complained of here.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In view of the statement just made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), perhaps I should say a few words on this matter. With all deference I do not think a single argument has been developed this afternoon that is not fully covered by the statements made the other day by my colleague the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) and myself; so that in replying I am a little afraid I may offend the rule of the house which prohibits tedious repetition.

Mr. Coldwell: We will excuse that this afternoon.

Mr. Garson: There are one or two points which deserve to be clarified, I think. One is the statement that any action against offending stockbrokers, to take the present case, should be taken under the law. I want to make it as clear as I possibly can that the action taken in the present instance came squarely under a law passed by this parliament. It is not a new law, an innovation, but a law which has been upon the statute books of this country since 1889, and which has been invoked in case after case with beneficial results in preventing the mails from being used for the distribution of obscene literature, lottery tickets and fraudulent material. The suggestion that in what has been done there is anything outside the law, or contrary to British tradition, is quite incorrect.

The suggestion has been made this afternoon that when the Postmaster General invokes this section 7, subsection (d), of the Post Office Act, he can act arbitrarily, and if he does so he is immune from any process of the courts. Such a suggestion flows from an inaccurate conception of the law. The law, as I apprehend it, is that when a statute clothes an official with certain powers conditional upon there being a set of circumstances in relation to which those powers are to be exercised, he cannot give himself power which he does not have under the statute by arbitrarily or capriciously deciding that the set of circumstances exists, when in fact it does not. In relation to this case, therefore, and in relation to every one of those orders which have been issued, if there had been any arbitrary action on the part of the Postmaster General under which he issued an order without reasonable ground for suspecting that there was fraud, that action on his part, which in a true and a legal sense would be arbitrary, could be challenged in the courts and his order successfully attacked.

The member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) shakes his head, but I would refer him to a decision of the British Columbia court of appeal that was cited to us by Mr. McTague when he made representations on behalf of the broker dealers association. It was pointed out in the letter to me that he—the deputy postmaster general——does not seem to realize that the court in that case simply held that there was a right to exercise a discretion under the statute and the discretion having been duly and properly exercised, the courts would not review it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the case?

Mr. Garson: It is the Literary Recreations case, which is to be found in 58 Canadian Criminal Cases, 385.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the nature of the application?

Mr. Garson: The nature of the application was that an order had been made upon grounds which the person offended contended to be arbitrary. An action for damages was brought against the official who made the order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the nature of the order, if I might ask the minister?

Mr. Garson: I think it was an order of the same character as the one made here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Under the postal act?

Mr. Garson: I think it was, but at any rate it was an order of the same statutory character, an order made by an official under statutory powers which he could exercise only if a certain set of facts existed. He found that that set of facts existed, and made the order. The persons who were affected by it brought an action against him for damages, alleging that he had acted arbitrarily and that there were no real grounds in fact for the exercise of his statutory jurisdiction.

In that case the court of appeal of British Columbia held, first of all, that where a proper set of circumstances could be shown in a case of that sort the person offended would have an action for damages, but on the facts of that case the court thought the official had exercised a reasonable discretion, and the claim was not allowed. If the Postmaster General had acted arbitrarily in any one of these cases that are under discussion, and had presumed to make an order under section 7, subsection (d), when there were no reasonable grounds for suspecting the mails were being used for fraudulent purposes, then his action, in the true sense arbitrary because it would be beyond the jurisdiction which parliament purported to invest in him, could be made the subject of a case in the courts. In that way, it could be reviewed by the courts. It is not correct to say his action could not be reviewed by the court, or that it is beyond review by the court.

I do admit, Mr. Speaker, that the remedy presently available to challenge an action, if it happens to be arbitrary, is a little difficult from the legal standpoint. What is more important from the standpoint of the broker —this was clearly established in the excellent presentation the leader of the opposition made this afternoon—is that while this case was proceeding, some of the broker's business might be lost. I believe we would be presuming a great deal in this house if we were to suggest that these provisions in the Post Office Act which have been invoked with great benefit to society many times over a long period of years should be eliminated. We have been quite frank with this house in saying that the present remedy is not very satisfactory. It may cause a legal delay, and it may in that way create secondary effects upon the offending person which are out of all proportion to his deserts. The move which we have under consideration, therefore, is that of providing an appeal from the order, and not an obscure appeal or an appeal which will take a long period of time, but a summary appeal. Once an order had been made, the citizen offended could make a quick application to the courts and get the whole matter before a judge, with the power to bring in any relevant evidence which he could adduce in addition to that which the Postmaster General considered. Then the whole matter could come before the courts in such a way as to completely minimize the harm that would be done to an innocent person.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister tell me whether the case to which he referred is Caldwell v. Reilly?

Mr. Garson: No, it is Literary Recreations v. Sauve. We believe that if that is done, the wise course is to retain the provision in the law, the value of which has been demonstrated in a large number of cases. As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition said, there are eleven hundred current cases in which this law has been invoked. If there had been that number of instances of arbitrary decisions, does one suppose for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that this house would not have heard about the matter long since? In the present case, involving operations on a large scale financially, does one suppose that if those brokerage firms were very badly treated some application along the lines of this B.C. case would not have been made to the courts before now? Instead of that we have an excellent statement from Mr. McTague on behalf of the broker dealers association. We have sent back to him what we think is a constructive reply. Since then I have received a letter from Mr. McTague to the effect that, while he does not concur in much of the material in my reply because it was in rebuttal to what he had said, he is going to submit to the government in due course the brief which we suggested he might submit. When that brief is received, we certainly intend to consider it, and unless we change the conclusions which we have tentatively reached, we will in due course bring down an amendment to provide a summary appeal from these orders.

I should like to close with one further statement. We talk about encouraging the investment of risk capital for the development of our resources, particularly our mining or oil resources. As a result of nearly thirty years' experience in the practice of law—that is, including my public life—some part of which was in connection with mining law, I do not know of a single more constructive action that this house could take than to make sure that an investor would know, no matter in what country he lives or in what part of Canada he lives, that when he put in any sum of money that he wanted to risk in the development of our resources, he was going to be treated honestly and that he was going to get a good honest run for his money. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing that will deter the investment of risk capital in the development of our resources more quickly, more effectively and more permanently than the fear of investors that they are being treated fraudulently or are being cheated when they invest money in Canadian securities.

REPRINTING OF MEMBERS' SPEECHES

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to air a grievance which affects not only me but a great many other members of the house as well. I refer to the regulations affecting the reprinting of members' speeches during the sessions of parliament. On July 14, 1947, the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on printing presented its second report. Concurrence in that report was moved, and the report was adopted by the house on July 15. The report contained regulations affecting the reprinting of members' speeches. As the regulations are short and to the point, I shall read them. They are as follows:

(1) That the official printing of parliament take precedence over the reprinting of such speeches as are ordered by the members individually.

(2) That in the reprinting of members' speeches the following rules be strictly adhered to:

(a) Each reprint of a speech or speeches ordered by a member shall be an exact replica in context of the report as printed in the debates of the Senate, or the House of Commons debates, without any deletions therefrom or additions thereto;

(b) Each reprint shall contain the speech or speeches of one member only in the same pamphlet;

(c) Such reprints shall contain no subheadings, photographs, or illustrations, and only such subject-matter or main headings as appear in the official reports;

(d) No special cover shall be used and no covering letters shall be added to or included in the speeches so reprinted.

The regulations in regard to the printing of speeches are clear and concise. I have not paid any attention to what other members have been doing with regard to their speeches; but any of my speeches that I have had reprinted I have sent to the king's printer with these regulations in mind.

In order to make doubly sure that the members would know what the regulations were, each member, I believe, received from the king's printer a card having the schedule of the printing costs on one side and the regulations that I have read on the other.

Despite this fact, it has come to my attention that the king's printer is printing speeches of members of parliament which do not adhere to these regulations. My grievance or complaint is that I am quite ready to adhere to the regulations laid down by this House of Commons, but I want every other member of the House of Commons to have to do the same thing. I object to any other member having a privilege in this house that I have not.

I have in my hand here a copy of a reprint of a speech that was made in this house by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) on March 10, when he introduced the motion for the appointment of a joint committee of both houses of parliament on old age security. It may be said that this reprint is issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare. But on the face of it it is clear that such is not the case. There is on the cover—a white cover of much better quality paper than the ordinary Hansard paper—a heading: "Canada Reviews Old Age Security, by Hon. Paul Martin, Minister of National Health and Welfare." I do not know whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare reviewing old age security is the same thing as Canada reviewing old age security. At the bottom of the cover appear these words: "Address delivered in the House of Commons, Ottawa, Friday, March 10, 1950." This is clearly a speech by a member of parliament and reprinted for circulation in his constituency or wherever else he may wish to circulate it. This reprint contravenes the regulations in a number of instances. Let us take, for instance, 2 (c) which reads:

Such reprints shall contain no subheadings, photographs, or illustrations, and only such subject-matter or main headings as appear in the official report.

I have counted the number of subheadings in this reprint and they amount to ten.

I also made a speech in that debate, and I think it was a fairly good speech. That, however, is only a personal opinion and I may be biased. However, the reprint appears just as it appears on Hansard, in the daily copy, without any breakings of subheadings at all.

Mr. Coldwell: And the printing is different.

Mr. MacInnis: Oh yes, the printing is different, of course. I am not complaining particularly about that, although I should like to have the same large print and the same good quality paper that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or whoever paid for this, can afford. I always pay for my own; and I am willing to pay for what I ask for and for what I get. The point I wish to make is this. When this reprint of the Minister of National Health and Welfare's speech reaches his constituents, they have a fairly presentable piece of literature which is fairly easy to read. When my speech reaches the people of Vancouver East it is an altogether different looking piece of literature. I maintain that not only is this a discrimination against me as a member of parliament and against other members of parliament who adhere to the regulations; it is also a discrimination against our constituents as well.

The next time I decide to get reprints of a speech I make in the house I am going to put in subheadings; I am going to take it to the king's printer and then, if I am refused permission to have it printed in that way, both the king's printer and the House of Commons are going to hear more about it—unless in the meantime these regulations are rescinded or each member of the house is treated on the same basis.

There is nothing so undesirable and dangerous to a democracy as that the leaders in government and other leaders in public life should ask for and receive special concessions that the ordinary rank and file do not receive. In so far as that sort of thing obtains in our society, just so far is our society not democratic. Equality of rights and equality of privileges are essential in any democracy. I would ask some member of the government to give the assurance that each member of the House of Commons, from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the most humble backbencher—if there is one more humble than the other—will be assured that in all matters pertaining to the house and to the regulations made for our conduct in the house and in relation to matters connected with the house, shall have the same privileges as any other.

I would ask some member of the government to indicate, if he knows, how far the king's printer has been allowing or conniving in contravention of the regulations made here some three years ago in regard to the reprints of members' speeches.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said that speeches by different ministers of the crown have been—

Mr. MacInnis: I mentioned only one.

Mr. Fraser: Just one, yes—reprinted and distributed. I have here statements and speeches from the information division of the Department of External Affairs. The publication I have before me is dated April 29, 1950; how many more there are, I do not know. This one is six pages in length, and purports to contain a speech delivered before the Reform Club of Montreal.

My view is that if speeches of the different ministers given before political clubs throughout the country are going to be mimeographed or printed and sent out, other people should have the same privilege. However, my personal view is that the taxpayers' money was not taken from them for that purpose, and I strongly object to speeches of ministers being printed in full, or almost in full, and then being sent out in that way.

Here is another issue containing a speech delivered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in Hamilton.

Mr. Casselman: Before the by-election.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, April 24, before the by-election. This speech, eight pages in length, was delivered before the Hamilton chamber of commerce. Here is another one eight pages long delivered on March 27 in Toronto by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Casselman: Another by-election.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, another by-election.

Mr. James: Did you read it?

Mr. Fraser: Yes, I read it.

Mr. James: Did you learn anything.

Mr. Fraser: Even if we did learn something from it, I do not think that is the kind of political stuff that should be handed out. It is paid for by the taxpayers, despite the fact that taxes are sky-high at the present time. No wonder we cannot get them down.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. James: And the opposition is asking that more be spent.

Mr. Fraser: The opposition has never at any time asked that any more be spent on publicity of this kind. We have never suggested wasting the taxpayers' money. We have always tried to see that the taxpayer was given a fair deal—and he certainly is not getting a fair deal with the government in office at the present time.

The last weekly review issued by the Department of External Affairs quotes a speech by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and also some smaller items concerning the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Then on the very back sheet in a small square we find this: "Mr. Drew's motion defeated." It praises all the others, and then in one small item it tries to belittle somebody else.

All this is uncalled for. I do not think these publications are necessary, even if they are sent out to embassies in other parts of the world. I do not think that is what the taxpayer wants. It is not helping the country in any way, and all it is doing is to build up a big Liberal political machine at the expense of the taxpayer. I certainly object, and I know many taxpayers across this country who object with me. I have on file many letters dealing with the subject.

Not only these, but many other items and speeches by ministers of the crown are printed at the expense of the taxpayers, or sent out in mimeographed form. It is high time things of that kind were stopped.

SUBSIDIES—COST OF LIVING—DISCOURAGEMENT OF PRODUCTION

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice the grievance that His Majesty's government is neglecting to employ adequately the device of subsidies in Canada's economy. There are four major evils the effects of which are placing an onerous weight upon the people in the federal riding of Lethbridge and the other people of Alberta.

In the first place we have the evil of the excessively high cost of living. I do not know when something is going to be done to stop this upward trend in the cost of living. It is beginning to be a very serious matter, and people are wondering how they are going to live. Then we have strikes which bring prices up still more. Great numbers of people are completely helpless in the grip of this situation. The wise use of subsidies in 1946 would have prevented that sort of thing. If there is going to be any remedy provided today it must take the form of some measure of subsidy.

The second evil which is resulting from this government policy is the discouragement of producers because of the uncertainty of prices and markets. Within the last two years we have seen the discouragement of the production of such commodities as hogs, poultry, dairy products and beef. Someone will say that surely there should be no discouragement of the production of beef with prices so high at the present time; but the fact is that many people in my constituency are fearful of going into the production of beef because they fear that prices will collapse. There is only one way whereby we can guarantee stability of prices and stability of cost of production so as to assure the producer that he will have a chance of making good in production, and that is by the wise use of subsidies.

The third evil which is weighing upon my constituents and upon my province is the result of strikes which come from these high costs of living. These strikes force up prices. Nowadays strikes are never allowed to materialize when they can possibly be prevented, but prices are raised nevertheless. The consumer is paying for these strikes. Prices are rising and thereby indirectly affecting the welfare of the producer. Something must be done and done soon.

The fourth evil is of such a nature that by reason of that evil, in the first place, the ordinary consumers are penalized for living in Alberta; in the second place, Alberta's primary producers are inequitably handicapped as compared with the producers in other provinces in the dominion; in the third place, the ordinary economic development within Alberta is impeded more than is the case in any other province; in the fourth place, interprovincial trade between Alberta and British Columbia is hampered most inequitably as compared with what obtains throughout the rest of Canada; and, in the fifth place, a tariff wall in effect has been erected against Alberta in reference to the other provinces of Canada.

Those five ills may appear difficult to prove, but if I had the opportunity and time, which probably I have not today, I could support each of those charges to the complete satisfaction of everyone in the house and in the country.

Let all discrimination as between the central provinces and the maritimes and the western provinces be removed in respect of this fourth evil which results from the failure to use subsidies. Then let subsidies be employed to bring about an equitable and stable freight rate structure throughout Canada. The fourth evil which I have been discussing results from the failure to use subsidies to overcome inequitable freight rates.

These freight rates have already been the cause of the most grievous disadvantage to people in the west and the maritimes. We have seen three increases in freight rates and we are now faced with a tremendous effort to raise freight rates again. All of these raises are in addition to the inequitable structure which obtained in the first place. We are threatened with strikes for increased wages which the railroads tell us will increase their costs to such an extent that freight rates will have to be raised again. Where on earth is this thing going to end?

The time has come when something should be done about this matter. It may possibly be that the railroads are not getting enough revenue. If that is the case there is no reason why more than a fair share should be taken out of the four western provinces. The time has come when something should be done to arrive at an equitable and reasonable freight rate structure to be charged all over the Dominion of Canada on a similar per ton mile basis. As matters are now, we are continuing in a chaotic manner and it would appear that nothing the provinces are able to do will change this.

I suggest that if the railroads simply must have additional revenue then they should be given that revenue by means of subsidies toward which everyone in Canada would contribute. As matters are at the present time the inequalities which make up the fourth evil I have been discussing, freight rates, now bear heavily upon the province of Alberta, and that province is not the only province in the west that is suffering.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSOLIDATION AND REVISION OF EXISTING LEGISLATION—ORGANIZATION FOR DEFENCE—CODE OF SERVICE, DISCIPLINE, ETC.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 133, respecting national defence.

National Defence

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the resolution preceding this bill was before the house on April 18 and when the bill was given first reading I stated the objectives of the bill, as reported on page 1681 of Hansard. I stated at that time that the bill had been dealt with in the other place where it was introduced at the last session of parliament and where it received third reading on December 8 of last year. However, the prorogation of parliament prevented our proceeding with the measure in this place and consequently it was necessary to introduce it here. That was done by a resolution which was put on the order paper on February 21, and, as I have said, first reading of the bill was given on April 18.

When the measure was before the Senate and during the debate on the defence estimates last session I indicated that it was the intention of the government, if the bill received second reading, to refer the bill to a special committee of the house to be set up, if that was the wish of the house. Accordingly notice has been given in Votes and Proceedings of May 12 of the intention to set up such a special committee. If this bill receives second reading it will be the intention of the government to send it to that committee.

It is also our hope that Bill No. 134, to amend the Militia Pension Act and change the title thereof, will receive second reading when it will be referred to the same committee. Finally there is a third measure in the form of a resolution which deals with prize money. If that resolution is adopted and the bill to be based on it given second reading it will be our intention likewise to refer that bill to the proposed committee for consideration. Therefore the committee, if the motion is adopted, will have to deal with all three bills relative to defence.

I do not wish to delay the house further in its consideration of this measure beyond making a few remarks to outline the history of this type of legislation. The first Militia Act of Canada was passed in 1868, the year after confederation, as chapter 40 of the statutes of that year. The act has been revised on a number of occasions but there has been very little substantial change. The present Militia Act is chapter 132 of the revised statutes of 1927. The antiquity of the measure may be appreciated when I recall that, until the passage of an amendment that I introduced in 1947, the Militia Act referred to pack animals but made no mention of aircraft. The Militia Act in its present form does not contain a code of discipline for the Canadian army but by reference incorporates into Canadian law the Army Act of the United Kingdom.

Turning to the legislation relative to the navy, the first Naval Service Act was passed in 1910 as chapter 43 of the statutes of that year. It remained in substantially the same form in which it was passed until 1944 when, by chapter 23 of the statutes of that year, a completely new act was passed. That statute introduced a Canadian naval disciplinary code. This was the first Canadian code to apply to one of the three armed services, and it has been used as the basis for drafting many of the provisions of the present bill.

The first legislation dealing specifically with the air force was the Air Board Act of 1919, later known as the Aeronautics Act. This act dealt with both civil and military aviation. The expanded activities of the Royal Canadian Air Force in the late war resulted in the enactment of the Royal Canadian Air Force Act in 1940. Unlike the Naval Service Act, but following the precedent of the Militia Act, this act contained no disciplinary code. As in the case of the Canadian army, discipline in the air force is governed by the Air Force Act of the United Kingdom which was made a part of air force law by incorporation.

Under the Militia Act, the Naval Service Act and the Air Board Act each of the Canadian forces was administered separately. The department of militia and defence dealt with the army, the department of naval service with the navy, and the air board with the air force. In 1922 the Department of National Defence Act was passed creating a new department to deal with the three services. This act was chapter 34 of the statutes of 1922, and came into force by proclamation on January 1, 1923. The Department of National Defence Act has been amended on four different occasions. The principal amendment, made in 1940, provided for the appointment of additional ministers of national defence.

Experience gained during the last war showed clearly the need for more unified control and greater uniformity in the three services. Further, the present position and status of Canada make it undesirable to depend for the discipline of our army and air force upon legislation enacted by a legislative body not responsible to the people of Canada. Accordingly, soon after becoming minister I directed that work be commenced on the preparation of a single all-embracing Canadian statute to include a common disciplinary code applicable to all three services.

I have previously partially explained to hon. members the course we followed in drafting the measure. It has been in the course of preparation now for some three years, and it is the product of the work in the first instance of officers representing the three services working under the judge advocate general. In this connection I should like to pay tribute to the judge advocate general, Brigadier R. J. Orde, for his service which was completed with his retirement from the armed forces this very week after thirty-two years in the judge advocate general's branch and thirty-seven years' service in all. During his service he has had an unusual series of responsibilities in connection with legal matters relative to the acts to which I have referred, the Militia Pension Act, the bringing about of a state of war in Canada, the mobilization of the Canadian armed forces, the demobilization of the forces, and many other measures of great importance and complexity. In all these duties he has rendered the most loyal service, and in a very real sense the bill now before us is a lasting monument to his own achievement and work.

It will be found that the bill has 251 sections. It incorporates in its terms legislation which comprised over 600 different sections. Therefore it is not only a consolidation of existing legislation but also a considerable simplification thereof. It is intended in the bill to give effect to the experience of the Canadian armed forces during the two world wars. We have also taken into account the experience of the United Kingdom where a committee was set up under Mr. Justice Lewis which has made a most important report to the government. We have also taken into account the experience of the United States where a committee appointed by my friend, the late Hon. James Forrestal, reported to the secretary of defence and as a result led to legislation which in many ways is parallel to that now before this house.

The importance of the legislation can hardly be overemphasized. Not only will it provide for the administration of the Department of National Defence, the discipline of the armed forces, the work of the defence research board and many other matters but in view of the increased and increasing importance of defence, as I believe hon. members will recognize, there is a real urgency that we should have streamlined legislation to regulate these important matters. Of course at the present time the legislation affects the 48,000 odd officers and men in the active forces, the 49,000 in the reserves, and to a considerable degree the 24,000 civilians working in the Department of National Defence, a total population of something like 120,000. In the event of war its importance can be appreciated when hon. members recall that we had in the armed forces of Canada in the last war no less than 1,200,000 men and women who, during their periods of service, were all governed by the provisions of legislation which the bill will now replace.

As I said to hon. members, the legislation received the most serious and painstaking consideration by a committee in the other place. In consequence a considerable number of amendments, largely of a technical character or affecting the wording, were made. The bill now before the house includes all these amendments without any alterations, but in addition it contains certain sections which were not considered in the other place because we were advised they dealt with money matters. They are sections 10; 11; 12(4); 36; 53(3), (4) and (5); 54(a) and (d); 55; 190(9); 208 and 227. We were advised that those clauses dealt with money matters, with which the other place did not deal, so they are coming before this house for the first time. The bill also has a number of minor technical changes made on the advice of the law officers of the Department of National Defence and of the Department of Justice since the measure passed the other place.

The result of all this work is now before the house. As I believe I indicated previously, this is the eleventh complete draft. I have been through the drafts five times myself, and it has received the consideration of senior officers of the armed forces, of the chiefs of staff committee, of a special committee of the cabinet, the cabinet defence committee, and of the cabinet itself on a number of occasions. It has also been subjected to critical examination by officers who had previous experience in the armed forces of Canada. Despite all the work that has gone into it, however, we do not suggest for a moment that the bill is perfect. It is an exceedingly difficult, complex and comprehensive piece of legislation. We have made it as simple and plain as we can, but certainly it can be improved. We hope the house will adopt the suggestion I have made and refer it to a committee consisting largely of men having service experience in one or other or both wars, who will then receive the views of the legal advisers and any relevant service personnel; and I have no doubt they will be able to make a number of improvements. We want the best possible act, and we invite the co-operation of every hon. member of this house, as well as those in the other place, in the interests of greater justice for the services, greater efficiency for the department, and more security for Canada.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated when this legislation was in the resolution stage on April 18, members on this side will be pleased to co-operate with the government in facilitating its passage.

I repeat now that we will give our most wholehearted co-operation in trying to help the minister produce the very best possible legislation to meet the circumstances. When we were at the resolution stage I did suggest that since the hour was late when that discussion took place, we should be given the opportunity to have a full discussion, if that were required, on the motion for second reading, and to that suggestion the minister gave his consent.

Before making some reference to the bill itself I should like to join the minister in extending my congratulations, and perhaps to a certain extent my sympathy, to the judge advocate general who is retiring this week after so many years of service. I know that when one has spent the greater part of a lifetime in the service it comes as a bit of a wrench to enter different fields in civilian life. I do not know whether the judge advocate general has any intention of following in my footsteps and perhaps entering public life in any sphere, but I am sure all hon. members will wish him every success and all happiness.

As the minister said, to a large extent this legislation is a consolidation of various existing acts. It is designed to bring about unification between the services, unification in the administration of the services, and also to establish a distinctly Canadian code of discipline which as far as practical may be uniform in the different services. As the minister has pointed out, at the present time the three services are administered under separate acts, the Militia Act of 1927, the Naval Service Act of 1944, and the Royal Canadian Air Force Act of 1940. I do appreciate the tremendous task with which those who drew up this bill were faced in order to bring together all that legislation into one measure.

This bill has been divided into thirteen parts, but generally speaking it consists of three divisions. The first deals with organization, the second with the code of service discipline, and the third with general provisions such as aid to the civil power. A few moments ago the minister indicated that the bill contains some 251 clauses, which replace more than 600 clauses in these other acts. When this bill is sent to committee I do hope it will be appreciated that there may be sins of omission as well as sins of commission, and that after compressing so many sections into a comparatively limited number of clauses it is possible that something may have been left out. So I hope the committee will be permitted to consider the sections of the previous acts that have been left out, and not have its activity and discussion confined to the limited number of clauses in this bill. Before this bill is sent to committee I hope the minister will give us that assurance.

In dealing with the first part, covering organization, in the very beginning one comes across a clause which was in the old Militia Act but which, as far as I can see, is not in this new bill. I refer to section 4 of the Militia Act, which provides that the command in chief of the Canadian army is declared to continue and be vested in the king and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the governor general as his representative. I must confess to some surprise at finding this clause left out of the present bill. Oh, I know no one would expect His Majesty to take command of a cruiser, or to appear on parade and give an order to a troop of cavalry, but all soldiers, sailors and airmen are king's men, and they have valued the fact that His Majesty is their commander in chief.

Mr. Claxton: I quite agree. It was omitted because it is in section 15 of the British North America Act already, and we did not think we should repeat the same provision in this act.

Mr. Pearkes: Those things could be explained no doubt in committee, and that is why I am requesting that where these sections have been omitted we might have an opportunity of asking about them, and not be confined rigidly to the sections in this bill. I give that as a example of a section which has been omitted, and the reason for omitting it is not readily apparent to everybody.

There may also be a good reason for omitting section 8 of the old Militia Act, under which there was a definition of the obligation of service of the citizens of Canada. I know it is out of date because it refers to levy en masse, to enrolment by ballot, and so forth, but I am not sure it is wise to remove from this new act the obligation of service on the part of Canadians. It is quite obvious the obligation is recognized, because when the Secretary of State sends out letters of congratulation to new Canadians who have taken out their naturalization papers, he mentions the fact that one of the obligations is that of service in time of necessity. I shall quote from a letter which he sent to a Chinese resident of British Columbia, and I think it is a form letter. After extending congratulations upon receiving Canadian citizenship he says:

> Your citizenship carries with it the obligation of defending your adopted country in time of need.

Perhaps that is another example of a place where an opportunity should be given to the committee to ascertain the reasons for the elimination of clauses pointing out to the citizens of Canada that they do have some obligations towards the defence of their country.

In the division dealing with the organization of the army, I think there is a distinct change in the definition of the responsibilities placed on the chief of the general staff. In the past it was the responsibility of the chief of the general staff to co-ordinate the other branches of the staff, the adjutant general's branch, the quartermaster general's branch, and the master general of ordnance branch, but from what study I have given to this Bill No. 133 it would seem that the chief of the general staff is now to assume more the role of a chief of staff than of the co-ordinator of all branches of the staff.

Coming to the second division, the code of discipline has been made to apply to the servicemen of the three services. It is unnecessary to point out that a man in the service is also subject to civil law. Apparently the framers of Bill No. 133 have had considerable difficulty in adjusting the various codes of discipline of the three services, and unification of this division has not been as easy as perhaps it was hoped it would be. One notices that there are several sections which are applicable to naval personnel only. There is a general trend throughout this division to increase the powers of a commanding officer in summary trials. I imagine that has been done in order to conform with the disciplinary powers of a captain on a ship. I am not sure that on land it is either necessary or desirable to increase the summary powers of the commanding officer. It may be argued, however, that that will reduce the number of courts martial which have been held in the past.

I know quite well that during the early part of the last war a large number of courts martial were held. I am inclined to think that was more because the commanding officers did not apply the powers that they had, and I doubt very much whether it is necessary to increase those powers. I hope there will be no trend to increase the severity of military punishments, because over a number of years, 150 years and more, there has been a gradual tendency towards reducing the severity of military punishments which, first of all, were administered under the Mutiny Act, and then under the articles of war. It is less than 150 years ago that corporal punishment was abolished. Since then, step by step, the severity of military punishments has been reduced. One step was the introduction of detention as a substitute for imprisonment in the case of a purely military offence. Then there was a reduction in the number of military offences which were punishable by death, and there was also a modification of field punishment.

One group of clauses in this act which I think will be welcomed are those which provide an opportunity of appeal from the ruling of courts martial. I am not sure that we could not have gone much further in that respect than has been done in Bill No. 133. The appeals from decisions of courts martial will be referred to a special board composed of judges and non-service personnel. Many crimes which are of a military nature are also crimes which are dealt with in civilian life by the ordinary courts of law. I am not certain that it might not have been desirable to have restricted the number of military crimes, so that there would have been only those crimes which are essentially of a military nature to be dealt with by courts martial. Service personnel could be sent to the civilian courts during peacetime in preference to courts martial. The members of a court martial are not always well versed in the law. They are not twelve good men and true drawn from the same status of life as the serviceman who appears as the prisoner.

Mr. Stick: They are usually fair-minded, though.

Mr. Pearkes: That is a debatable point, as to whether they are usually fair-minded, because they are always appointed by a senior authority. I have known cases in which instructions have been sent out to officers who might be sitting on courts martial in the near future, that their opportunities for promotion would be judged largely by their manner in insisting upon discipline and not showing any weakness in awarding punishment. I know it is a legend that a court martial is the fairest court of all; but there is grave doubt in my mind as to whether that is actually the case.

We now come to the last and final division, that of general provisions dealing with aid to the civil power and so forth. During the last few weeks we have been faced with an emergency in which the armed forces of the country have been playing a splendid part in helping the civilian authorities. A few years ago there were the floods in the Fraser valley. Today there are the floods in the Red river valley. Last week there were serious fires at Rimouski and other places. I wonder whether the sections dealing with aid to the civilian power should not now be made more all-embracing so that instead of dealing only with questions of riot, they might also deal with the allocation of authority in cases of fire and flood.

As the minister has said, there are not a great many of the provisions in this bill which are of a highly controversial nature. I should like to offer my congratulations to the framers of the bill. As I said previously, there will be every desire on the part of members from this party who will be serving on the committee to help facilitate the work. We appreciate the statement made by the minister that he will welcome our suggestions and our co-operation to try to improve the existing bill. Because of the fact that a number of sections of the previous bill have been eliminated, and also because of the financial implications to which the minister has already referred, I hope that reasonably wide latitude will be given to the committee to make a thorough investigation into all the ramifications of this bill.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

UNITED SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax) moved the second reading of Bill No. 205, to incorporate United Security Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

APOSTOLIC TRUSTEES OF THE FRIARS MINOR OR FRANCISCANS

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Verdun-La Salle) moved the second reading of Bill No. 206, to incorporate the Apostolic Trustees of the Friars Minor or Franciscans.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the sponsor give an explanation of the bill?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Speaker, as may be read in the preamble to the bill, the Franciscan order is a religious order under the constitution and rules whereof the members collectively and individually have precluded themselves from owning and administering any real or personal properties. It has been in their tradition during the seven hundred years of their existence to have the administration of any of their material interests made by bodies of trustees appointed under their apostolic rules and constitutions. Since being established in Canada they have been regulated in their temporal administrations by an act of the legislature of the province of Quebec in 1893, which was amended in 1899 and again, I believe, in 1936. However, as the order developed and established other institutions in other provinces this incorporation became inadequate.

The purpose of the bill is to raise on the national level the powers which the petitioners herein have enjoyed under the provincial statute of Quebec to which I have just referred. The powers sought are the usual powers accorded by parliament in incorporations of a similar nature.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

THE CANADIAN COMMERCE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. W. A. Robinson (Simcoe East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 207, to incorporate the Canadian Commerce Insurance Company.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Robinson: This is the usual type of application for incorporation of an insurance company intending to engage in fire, automobile and other types of insurance as indicated in section 6 of the bill which, I believe, has already been distributed. I believe the bill is in the usual form followed in such bills and contains only those sections pertinent to bills of this kind.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SASKATCHEWAN MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City) moved the second reading of Bill No. 208, to incorporate Saskatchewan Mutual Insurance Company.

Mr. Graydon: I understand the sponsor of the bill is very anxious to give a full explanation, and I suggest he should be given the opportunity.

Mr. McCusker: I can assure hon. members I am not anxious to speak in the house more often than is necessary. However, if the house wishes an explanation I might say that this is the usual type of bill to incorporate companies of this kind. If hon. members would like to have a more detailed explanation, I shall be pleased to give it. Otherwise I would ask them to accept it as the usual bill of its kind.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1947-48—REINSTATEMENT AND COMPENSATION

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (reinstatement and compensation).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment proposes to add a new section to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act in the following words:

> The board shall have power to make an order requiring an employer to reinstate any employee discharged contrary to the provisions of this act and to pay such employee the monetary loss suffered by reason of such discharge.

The purpose of the amendment, as indicated, is to give power to the board to make an order requiring an employer to reinstate any employee discharged contrary to the provisions of the act, and to pay such employee or employees the monetary loss sustained.

The reason for introducing this amendment with the approval and at the request of the trade union movement, and with the approval of the heads of the two labour congresses, has arisen from certain cases which have developed in Ontario, where their industrial disputes investigation legislation was modelled along the lines of the federal act.

Let me give one example to illustrate the cases which have arisen and have been brought before the courts in Ontario. On July 29, 1948, the consent of the Ontario labour relations board was obtained in respect of a prosecution for the offence of refusing or failing to comply with an order of the minister of labour, by refusing to reinstate the named employees in the employment of the firm. The charge was brought to the court and heard before a magistrate. The magistrate found that the men had been fired and referred to the order that they were to be taken back and said that the company had done nothing to take them back. The magistrate went on to point out that under the act he could do nothing but pronounce a conviction and impose a penalty, and in that case the penalty was fixed at $3,120. The company appealed to the county court and the county court judge upheld the conviction and the fine, but found himself unable to give an order reinstating the men who had been fired or granting compensation. The county court judgment was given on September 7, 1949, and up to this day the company has refused to take back the employees or to compensate them. Apparently there is no authority under the act whereby a court or the board can make such an order. It is to give the board the authority to order the reinstatement of men fired under those circumstances and to compensate them that this amendment is introduced.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Was an action taken to obtain compensation for the wrong that has been done?

Mr. Noseworthy: The case was brought before the Ontario labour relations board in the first instance, which board issued an order that the men should be taken back. The company refused to take back the men and the case went to the magistrate's court where a conviction was given and a fine imposed. The magistrate declared that there was no authority under the act to issue an order for the reinstatement of the men. The case was then appealed to the county court.

Mr. Mitchell: Can my hon. friend give me the name of the company?

Mr. Noseworthy: The case was brought by the International Woodworkers of America against Canada Cabinets and Furniture Limited of Kitchener.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I can quite understand the magistrate saying that he had no right to award damages although the company was liable to a fine under some punitive section, but has any action been taken by these men for wrongful dismissal? Surely a dismissal against the provisions of the act must be wrongful.

Mr. Noseworthy: The only suggestion made to the employees was that they should bring a civil action against the company but apparently there were difficulties that rendered that practically impossible. While that is under consideration, the action has not been taken as yet.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should speak now but there are one or two fundamentals in connection with this legislation that perhaps should be referred to. We are now dealing with legislation which was passed by this parliament, not by any province. I have always taken the position that the labour relations board is not a judicial body. In a court action there would be a judge with some knowledge of the law and perhaps a jury composed of people like my hon. friend.

My experience in the administration of this legislation has been that it should be based on conciliation instead of having recourse to the courts. That is why in the dominion field the minister is given authority to appoint industrial disputes inquiry commissioners to look into breaches of the act. As I say, my approach to labour problems in the federal field has been based on conciliation rather than the courts. During the war I had jurisdiction in labour relations in all the provinces and I found that conciliation was much more effective in establishing the rights of employees, and employers as well, in connection with labour relations.

As I have said before in committee and in this house, if it is thought that someone other than the minister should make the decision whether action should be taken by the employer, or the employee, I am quite prepared to accept that decision. I have been an industrial disputes inquiry commissioner and I have been up against difficult situations which were brought about, sometimes by one side, sometimes by the other, and sometimes by both sides. At times these matters are difficult to adjudicate upon.

Let me say that the angels are not all on one side. Even among the twelve apostles there were a couple of deadbeats. Without wanting to criticize this bill, may I say to my hon. friend that it hinges upon the bill introduced by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) being passed. If that bill does not pass, this bill falls by the wayside because of the very nature of things. I have not read the judgment referred to by the hon. member, but I should like to read it. I should like to read to the house subsection 2 of section 40 of the act, which reads as follows:

> Where an employer is convicted for violation of paragraph (a) of subsection two of section four of this act by reason of his having suspended, transferred, laid off or discharged an employee contrary to this act, the convicting court, judge or magistrate, in addition to any other penalty authorized by this act, may order the employer to pay compensation for loss of employment to the employee not exceeding such sum as in the opinion of the court, judge or magistrate, as the case may be, is equivalent to the wages, salary or other remuneration that would have accrued to the employee up to the date of conviction but for such suspension, transfer, lay-off or discharge, and may order the employer to reinstate the employee in his employ at such date as in the opinion of the court, judge or magistrate is just and proper in the circumstances in the position which the employee would have held but for such suspension, transfer, lay-off or discharge.

Then it continues with the penalties which I am not going to read. I do not know whether they recently made some amendments to the Ontario act. Because I have been away for a short time I am not as well versed as perhaps I should be in what took place while that act was under discussion. To me there is sufficient weight of language in the section I read from the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, an act not passed by the government but passed by parliament and unanimously agreed to by all parties in the house. As I say, in my experience in the administration of this legislation I have not run across any difficulty of the kind that my hon. friend has mentioned this evening.

I say in all sincerity that I have very fixed opinions on bureaucracy and the rights of individuals under the rule of law and habeas corpus, and it will take more than a member of the House of Commons to change my opinion. I do not think there is any substitute for the rule of law or habeas corpus. They are guarantees to my hon. friend, myself and every other hon. member of the house of the freedom that we have enjoyed since the days of Magna Carta. In these troublesome times that means something to me. There are countries behind the iron curtain where that is not the case.

Mr. Graydon: Another Blackstone.

Mr. Mitchell: I may tell the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that I am not a lawyer. I am just an ordinary workingman.

Mr. Graydon: I was paying you a compliment.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree with you as to the compliment. You do not need to be a lawyer to have a measure of common sense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mitchell: I say that to my good medical friends, my good farmer friends, my good working-class friends and my good school teacher friend who introduced the bill, and who was born in the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Graydon: You do not have to be a cabinet minister though.

Mr. Mitchell: Well, you will find out. I hope you will not do so in my lifetime but you may find out that this is a pretty lonely place to sit in. It is the end of the road, the place where you have to say yes or no.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am glad you know it.

Mr. Mitchell: I think I should know it. In my place you cannot preach economy on the hustings and then ask the House of Commons to spend $7 billion a year in additional expenses. I hope my hon. friend from Peel will never live to see the day when he has that responsibility because we are going to be in power for a long time yet notwithstanding the by-election in Hamilton yesterday. Some years ago I read a book which I think is a classic. It is easy to read because it is written in ordinary common language. It was written by Lord Hewart and is called "The New Despotism". I should like to read an excerpt which I think is fundamental and elementary. At pages 21 to 24 he deals with the rule of law and he says:

> But the supremacy of law, as we know it, means something more than the exclusion of arbitrary power, and something more also than the equality of all citizens before the ordinary law of the land administered by the ordinary courts. It means that in this country—

He is speaking of Great Britain and I speak of Canada.

> —unlike some foreign countries,—

There are very few people in this country who would like to ape them, I am glad to say. Recently we had a minister of my faith here. If he wants to start a revolution my advice to him is to go back to Canterbury from where he comes and start a revolution there. I want to say to this ecclesiastical gentleman, if you can place him in that category, that he has not done any credit to the land of his birth because, irrespective of what government has been in power there, they have always had a deeper regard for freedom in its truest sense than his conception of freedom. I know something about these Cook's tours to Russia where they do not get any farther than the Kremlin and eat off the gold plates that the czars had in the old days. They think they have seen the country.

An hon. Member: Were you there?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend asks whether I was there. Yes, I was there. I think a man's duty is to the institutions under which he lives; and, if I may say so to my Conservative friends, there are fewer communists in Canada today than at any time since I have been in the country. I should like to give some very simple advice. Let the communists advertise themselves. Do not advertise their cause for them. I grew up with one of their leaders in this country. I never mention the names of these people in public. Until he was put in the penitentiary he was unknown. My good friend the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) knows the gentleman I am talking about, and I use the term advisedly. Let the sun shine in. The best cure for communism in this or any other country is the right to express an opinion notwithstanding the fact that ninety-nine and nine-tenths of the people disagree with your opinion. I think the British people have proven that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am sure you never got that bad.

Mr. Mitchell: I may say to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) that I believe this sincerely and I have had some experience with these individuals. We used to handle them in a different way in Hamilton when I was younger.

Mr. Graydon: They are still handling them there.

Mr. Mitchell: We handled them in a different way.

An hon. Member: They took care of you there yesterday.

Mr. Mitchell: They took care of my hon. friend in that city.

Mr. Graydon: Your friend, too.

Mr. Mitchell: Hewart's book continues:

> Under the contrasted system, where the constitution is written out in declarations or definitions or rights, the rights of the individual may be said to be deductions drawn from the principles of the constitution. The contrast is vital and is to be traced to profound differences of history, of temperament, and of outlook. This is not the place for any comparison of the respective merits and advantages of the two systems. But it may at least be observed that, under the system which we know, it is far more difficult for constitutional rights to be suspended or taken away.
> To summarize the matter, it may be said that the "rule of law" comprehends and denotes the following principles:
> 1. No one can lawfully be restrained or punished, or condemned in damages except for a violation of the law established to the satisfaction of a judge or jury or magistrate in proceedings regularly instituted in one of the ordinary courts of justice. The rights of personal liberty and of freedom of speech, the liberty of the press—

While I am referring to the liberty of the press, I heard a great deal said about the press the other evening. The press has said some hard things about me but I have never objected. I am still a member of the House of Commons.

> The rights of personal liberty and of freedom of speech, the liberty of the press, and the right of public meeting, are all a result of the application of this fundamental principle.
> 2. Everyone, whatever his position, minister of state or government official, soldier or policeman, is governed by the ordinary law of the land and personally liable for anything done by him contrary to that law, and is subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of justice, civil and criminal.
> The plea of "act of state" is not permissible as a defence to an action in respect of anything done within the realm, or to any action by a British subject. It is confined to proceedings commenced by foreigners in respect of duly authorized acts done by officers or servants of the crown abroad.
> The crown—that is to say, the government—cannot itself be proceeded against, either by petition of right or otherwise, for any alleged wrong on the part of its servants. The remedy for any such wrong is against the individual wrongdoer. But in practice the crown as a general rule pays any damages that may be recovered against its servants for wrongful acts committed in the course of their public employment.

3. No one who is charged with a violation of the law can effectively plead, either in a civil or in a criminal court, that his act was done in obedience to the command of a superior, even the command of the king himself. The maxim "The king can do no wrong" imports not only that the king cannot be proceeded against for any alleged wrong, but also that he cannot authorize any wrongful act so as to justify the wrongdoer.

The right of personal liberty is the right not to be arrested or detained or otherwise subjected to physical restraint except in accordance with the law. And to speak generally, that is to say, except in the case of persons who are not sui juris, or persons subject to military law, the law recognizes an arrest or any sort of physical restraint as justifiable only where the person restrained is suspected of having committed a crime and is arrested in order that he may be brought before the court for trial, or where he has been convicted of a crime and sentenced to imprisonment.

The law affords three remedies by means of which this right of personal liberty may be vindicated: (1) by the writ of habeas corpus; (2) by an action of damages for false imprisonment, and (3) by a prosecution of the person inflicting the illegal restraint—that is, a prosecution for assault.

I believe that should be an article of faith of every man in public life in this nation. I do not question the sincerity of my hon. friend. I do not question the sincerity of those who think the state should be all-powerful, though I might question their good common sense.

Mr. Noseworthy: No one does.

Mr. Mitchell: You have changed your tune just in the last few minutes. You get my point. I do not question your sincerity; I might question your wisdom, if any. But I want to say this, if I may—

Mr. Knowles: Stick to habeas corpus.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend is smiling about habeas corpus. He is the nearest approach to a habeas corpus I have ever seen. The legislation we have is working reasonably well, I think. As I said before, it has been in existence for only a couple of years. I know some people sit up and burn the midnight oil figuring out how much better things would be if we just changed this and just changed that. This legislation was supported by all parties in this house; I am not taking credit for it on behalf of any political party, but I think it should be given a fair trial. During the war we established these war labour boards in an effort to get a broad crystallization of the experience of men who should know the implications of negotiation between employer and employees. We did experiment with a three-man board, but I think my hon. friends will agree that it was not as successful as the board we have at the moment or the board we had during the war. On these boards we have a judge as chairman; we have representatives of the construction industry, the railways, commerce and manufacturing generally on one side. On the other we have the trades and labour congress of Canada, the oldest labour organization in this country; the running trades, among the most responsible labour organizations in Canada; the newer organizations such as the Canadian congress of labour, that sprung into prominence and power largely through the establishment of the committee for industrial organization in the United States, and the national syndicates in Quebec, all of which in my judgment played a great part in the stabilization of labour conditions in Canada, which has been unexcelled by any other democratic country in the world.

That has been our experience. There may be some members of this house who have had more experience than these gentlemen to whom I have referred, but let us remember this. Once you set up this board as a judicial body by the very nature of things you must change its complexion. We have seen the difficulties they have experienced in the United States. I do not mean what I am going to say as a criticism of lawyers, because goodness knows when we get into trouble the first man we fly to is a member of the legal profession; but in the United States their first move is often to the courts. That is not my understanding of what you might call a practical approach to the differences which by the very nature of things exist between employers and employees in any free country.

Let us remember that if we did not have freedom we would not have a House of Commons. If we did not have freedom we would not have a Liberal party, a Conservative party, a C.C.F. party or a Social Credit party. If we did not have freedom we would not need trade unions, as we understand them; we would be, as they are behind the iron curtain, made to do as we were told, or else. No one knows this better than those who have been closely associated with this great movement down through the years. As I have said before, if you are an active trade unionist when you wake up in the morning and hear a knock on the door it is rather nice to know it is the milkman and not a policeman. That is something I have to say to my dictator friends. My hon. friend has been behind the iron curtain, though he does not say much about it; and I do not say that in any spirit of criticism. I say we should let the sunshine in. I meant to bring with me this evening the figures on the cost of living in Soviet Russia today. I do not know whether I should say this during the discussion of this bill, but it is not the money you have in your pocket that counts, or what you get in your pay envelope; it is what that money will purchase.

Mr. Noseworthy: You cannot get anything if you have not got some.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend does not look as if he did not have any.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): According to the song, the best things in life are free.

Mr. Mitchell: We have to learn from the trade union movement in Great Britain. I have no criticism to offer of Great Britain. I was born there, but I do not live there now. I think the message of discipline and industrial statesmanship should be learned from the British trade union movement and the employers. It could well be emulated by the people of Canada. We have to learn that these concessions bring responsibility.

Turning now to the economy in general, I say that by the very nature of things every increase in profit, every increase in wages, must go into the price structure. That is one of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why at this moment one sees so many British cars on the Canadian market. Price is the determining factor. When my wife or your wife goes out to buy a hat, she does not care who made the hat or what it looks like.

Mr. Graydon: You are in trouble tonight.

Mr. Mitchell: I just want to say this to the member for Peel; I notice he is laughing and I thank him for being in good company. It is the consumer who calls the tune. I have stated this problem in simple language that I think every man and woman in this nation can understand. This moment in our lifetime calls for a degree of industrial statesmanship in order to check the present inflationary tendency. We hear a good deal about old age pensions, and pensions supplied by industry. What is the use of promising to pay a man $100 per month at the age of 65, if by the time he reaches 65 the $100 is only worth $1 or 50 cents? I think we have learned our lesson from the inflationary movement in other countries. I have said these things in sincere language, and I hope I will be given credit for being just as sincere as the others who have spoken, and who would advocate old age pensions at 21 years of age.

Briefly, this labour relations board, if it were turned into a court, must necessarily change its complexion. I would be the last one to deny any person in this country the right to be tried by a jury of his peers, presided over by a man who understood the rule of law.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to say a few words in support of this bill. I was not in the house when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) began his remarks on it, but from what I have heard of his speech, if he does not mind my saying so, I would say a great deal of it does not refer to this bill at all. He has taken us all over the world, behind the iron curtain and back. This bill is all on this side of the curtain, if you understand what I mean. Let us consider what this bill proposes to do. It asks that a new section be added to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, providing that the board have the power to make an employer reinstate an employee discharged contrary to the provisions of this act, and pay to such employee the monetary loss suffered by reason of such discharge.

There is nothing in that amendment that interferes in any way with the rule of law. It is law. It is not contrary to the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. As a matter of fact, it is no more arbitrary that the board should make a decision such as is provided in this amendment, than that it should make any of the other decisions that the board may make. The decisions of the board are not subject to any appeal or any review by any court. The board's rulings are final, except in so far as they may be reviewed by the board itself. Let me read to you subsection 2 of section 61 which outlines the powers of the board. It reads as follows:

> A decision or order of the board is final and conclusive and not open to question or review, but the board may, if it considers it advisable so to do, reconsider any decisions or order made by it under this act, and may vary or revoke any decision or order made by it under this act.

Surely a board with such wide powers as those is not going beyond the realm of what is necessary, if it undertakes to make a decision in such circumstances as are mentioned in the proposed amendment. If a trade union—and when I say "trade union" I also mean an industrial union; I am using the word in an all-inclusive sense—is strong enough, it does not require a provision such as this. The trade union of which I am a member has had such a provision in its agreement with the company, as a result of collective bargaining, for over forty years. As I say, if any trade union is strong enough it does not require to have legislation of this kind to protect its members in their relation with their employers. It is able to insist that the provision be inserted in any collective agreement that may be entered into. But all unions are not strong, and all employers are not reasonable, any more than all unions are reasonable.

The Minister of Labour referred, and I think rightly so, to the statesmanlike policies and actions of the British trade unions during the last ten or twelve years. I agree with him. Their restraint is an object lesson to trade unionists all the world over. But you must remember that along with that statesmanship and really giving birth to it was the responsibility that was put on the shoulders of these trade unionists, particularly during the last five or six years.

I do not want to talk this measure out, Mr. Speaker, and although there is much more that I should like to say, I will conclude by saying that it would be much better to deal with the amendment purely on its merits rather than to take us on a merry-go-round all over the globe. You may not agree with it. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) may not agree with it. The members of the house may not agree with it. Nevertheless, it is a simple amendment; and it is not contrary to the principles or procedure that at present exist in this country between employers and employees. I suggest that no harm could be done; and I am sure it would serve some good purpose if this amendment were made to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a word or two following the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). In his own language, this bill would be simple in its nature and in its effect on the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I strongly disagree with him on that point. As was pointed out by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) a few moments ago, if this bill were carried, it would transform the Canada labour relations board into a court of justice. All through the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, the emphasis has been placed on the conciliation character of the board and of the services provided by the department in case of negotiation of agreements and settlement of disputes.

If this bill were to carry, I submit that the purport of the act would be changed in a radical way. On account of that fact, there are several amendments that it would be necessary to make in order that the bill now before the house become really effective and applicable. One of the first changes would be to amend, if not to strike out, the existing section 40, subsection 2, which has been quoted by the Minister of Labour and which relates precisely to the offence of discharging an employee contrary to the provisions of this act, and in which hon. gentlemen will find that adequate penalties are provided in case of a conviction. If the bill before the house were to carry without this amendment to section 40 being made at the same time, one would find that there would be in the act two sections in direct conflict one with the other. This would surely not make for the better administration of the act.

Another point which has been referred to by the minister himself is that the amendment before the house does not provide for the summoning of the parties before the board and for the holding of the hearing which is surely necessary if the board is to issue an order such as is provided for in the amending bill. In order to give the board the necessary powers Bill No. 6, which is on the order paper, would have to be carried in the first instance. In Bill No. 6 the first provision is as follows, and I just wish to quote these few words in order to make my thought clear on that point:

> (2) Upon receipt of such an application, the board shall by notice in writing, direct the party making the complaint and the party against whom the complaint has been made to appear before it and shall hear and receive such evidence as may be presented to it.
> (3) After hearing the evidence, as aforesaid, the board may, if it is of the opinion that there has been a violation of the provisions of this act, issue an order indicating the precise nature of the violation.

I submit that a provision such as this would be essential for the carrying out of the provision embodied in the bill which is now under discussion.

Another point, Mr. Speaker, is this. If the labour relations board were to be turned into a judicial body, as is the direct aim of this amending bill, one would have to give thought to changing the provisions of section 58, subsection 6, of the act, which reads as follows:

> The board may receive and accept such evidence and information on oath, affidavit or otherwise as in its discretion it may deem fit and proper whether admissible as evidence in a court of law or not.

There are several other provisions in the act which clearly indicate that the labour relations board is not a judicial body; it may be considered as a semi-judicial body, an agency for the conciliation of disputes and for the administration of the act generally, and nothing more.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Some hon. Members: Nine o'clock.

Mr. MacInnis: It has the power to make an order now, has it not?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Yes; of course it has the power to make an order.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, and the hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSOLIDATION AND REVISION OF EXISTING LEGISLATION—ORGANIZATION FOR DEFENCE —CODE OF SERVICE, DISCIPLINE, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Claxton for the second reading of Bill No. 133, respecting national defence.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, resuming the debate on the motion to set up a committee on national defence, I should like to place before you briefly the point of view of this group.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The house is considering the motion for second reading of Bill No. 133, not the resolution to set up a committee.

Mr. Jones: I stand corrected. It was my mistake, Mr. Speaker. We definitely welcome the efforts made to consolidate the five acts into one. As one who, in both the first war and the last war, had some experience in administrating some of the acts, I can assure you that I personally welcome this effort to remove the contradictions and confusions that were caused under the old legislation. With the conglomeration of sections and acts that we had to work with—I forget the number now; I think there were some six hundred to seven hundred sections—it was almost impossible, in the short time available during war, to train young officers to be efficient administrators of any of these acts, with the result that this confusion continued.

For instance, section 69 of the Militia Act made the Army Act from time to time in force in Great Britain, and the King's Regulations, applicable to Canada, as though they had been enacted by the parliament of Canada. So in the maintenance of discipline a man had to be charged with offences, not against the Militia Act of Canada, but against the appropriate section of the British Army Act. We have several glaring examples of confusion which have arisen from that complicated condition. For instance, certain offences are punishable more severely while the troops are on active service. The definition of "active service" as laid down in the British act applied during world war I when troops in Great Britain were not considered to be on active service; but when they went to France they became classified as being on active service. That conflicted with the requirements of the Canadian forces, especially at the time of world war II, when anyone who enlisted in Canada for overseas service was on active service. Yet that confusion remained and has remained until this day, and will remain until it is changed.

Troops called out under the National Resources Mobilization Act were not on active service. Then again, men were convicted and sentenced incorrectly because commanding officers did not understand the definition of "active service" as related to discipline. Hence hundreds of cases which had been tried incorrectly were later reviewed, and the sentences quashed. However, I feel that this new bill does clean up that difficulty.

Section 16 of the bill authorizes the governor in council to establish armed forces of whatever strength the governor in council pleases, and without limits. May I point out that the Militia Act of 1927 contained a limit of 10,000 officers and men for the permanent force. This was amended in 1947 to 30,000. Although that amendment at first did not include a limitation on the number of men, it was inserted at the request of parliament. This new bill has the same fault in that it does not include the number of men who can be enlisted in the permanent force. I feel this is one feature that has been fought bitterly, particularly in England, for generations, namely that the right of parliament to limit and to define the numbers in the forces should be maintained by parliament, and not by the minister or anyone else. That feature in my view should be reincluded in the bill.

I do not mind particularly what the numbers are. If the numbers now are not satisfactory I would be quite satisfied to have them doubled; but parliament must know the limit to which it is committed in the enlistment of men, particularly in peacetime. Otherwise we do not know to what expense we shall be subjected, with the minister having control without parliament. I do feel that if the figure now available, 30,000, is inadequate, it could be increased to 75,000.

Then subsection 4 of section 16 contains a limitation on the reserve force. I would suggest that a fair limit would be 120,000 or 150,000, whereas, as I understand it, the reserve force in February of this year, as reported in Hansard of March 29, stood at 48,912. So that with the reinsertion of the limitation that can be recruited, I think parliament could maintain the position for which it has fought and which it has held to the present time.

There is no provision in the new section 20 for the command of the armed forces to be vested in the king. Up to now the armed forces have been vested in the king, and through the usual channel of the governor general. I suggest this should be considered carefully, as to whether we should not again have that provision inserted, that the armed forces be vested in the king, as usual, with administration through the governor general and the king's privy councillors in Canada. I think that would be far better than giving complete control to the Minister of National Defence.

I notice that right through the changes which have been made there has been a gradual inclination to change the control formerly vested in the king and council to the minister and the departmental heads. I do not know whether that change is good or not, but I feel that with the complete control in the king and parliament we are on safer ground than to delegate this authority to the paid administrators in our defence system.

Then, the Militia Act provided for an age limit of eighteen for anyone joining the services. In the new bill there is no age limit. I believe an age limit of eighteen years is fair enough and acts as a safeguard against youth under that age tying up their lives in the army and later regretting it. I feel that if the age of eighteen were re-inserted it would protect them. Of course, in a case of dire necessity or of war, or something of that kind, parliament could reconsider its decision. I feel however that the age limit of eighteen years should be re-inserted in the bill.

Then, section 34—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member not to refer in such detail to the clauses of the bill. At the present time the house should consider the principle of the bill and not the clauses.

Mr. Jones: I am sorry I referred to the sections, but I had them noted that way. The new bill eliminates provision for the time of service required for training each year. I feel again that that is a provision which should be considered, because the principle there involved is that young men are called up annually to serve in the reserve forces, in the past for thirty days and now for an unlimited time. To place upon this period of service a limitation of thirty days or, if necessary, forty-five days and two or three weeks in camp as well as two or three weeks training at night, gives the employer of labour or of young men in those forces an opportunity to map out his program for the year with the knowledge as to how many weeks or days the young man he employs will be away from his place of business, or from the industry or farm where he works.

At the present time the employer has no means of knowing how long the young man he employs will be absent from his work. For the protection of the industrial owner, farmers and others, and also for the good of the department itself, I believe it would be best to come out flatly and say, "We need these young men for a certain period of days each year", and thus help to bring better feeling between industry and the department.

For many years regulations have been made in the army, both reserve and regular forces, to the effect that officers must wear certain dress on certain occasions. The rules are there; they are definite, and the officers have to follow them; but the unfortunate part of it to my mind is that these officers have to purchase the dress to which I have referred. While this was all right in the old days when people accepting commands in the army had plenty of money and could afford to pay, and when it was regarded as a privilege to buy their own clothes, today with our democratic army it is not fair to ask a young man who may be promoted from the ranks because of his ability to hold a commission to accept the penalty of having to buy his own clothes. It is not fair to say to him, "You must wear certain clothes, certain uniforms, and from your own pocket provide the wherewithal to purchase them." When dress is prescribed by this or any other act for wear by officers or men it should automatically be provided by the government. Otherwise I think it is unfair to have such a provision.

There should be considerable modification with regard to courts of inquiry, courts martial and so on. I have always felt that the sentences imposed were sometimes harsh and that the administration was often by inexperienced officers. I suggest that special schools be set up to train officers for work in these courts and before any man is entrusted with the trial of another man for a misdemeanour he should be properly trained, especially in the humanities, so that he can approach the problem with a sensible point of view.

I have known of officers who were not capable of sitting in judgment on their fellow men because they had not that happy faculty of seeing both sides of a situation. Where a charge is serious a man should have access to proper legal assistance, as was the case under the old act. The rights of soldiers should be properly protected. Many fine men were ruined in both wars by the imposition of unjust punishment. Resentment boiled up with the result that they made poor soldiers. In order to have a good soldier you must have an understanding commanding officer and an understanding officer in charge of any court dealing with misdemeanours or other crimes. I hope that provision will be made for the proper training in legal matters and human behaviour of such officers as may be in charge of the administration of these courts.

I think the minister has taken the proper step by referring this bill to a committee. I hope that the ultimate result of this consolidation will be to see many sections deleted. I understand there are about 250 sections at the present time and I should like to see them cut down to about 100 sections so that every soldier and officer in the army would have time to go through the act and understand it. It is impossible for any man to understand thoroughly the present act with its numerous sections. It should be simplified, so that every soldier could understand it and would know what punishment he faces when he breaks the regulations. I suggest to the minister that he simplify the act in every possible way.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed the discussion up to the present time. I think the hon. member who has just taken his seat indicated a wide and thorough knowledge of what he was talking about. In approaching the matter of defence it is extremely important that we rid ourselves of the impressions gained from wars in the past. We must realize that from the word "go", or even before the word "go," in the wars of the future it will be a case of total war. It will be an instantaneous war. It will be what the Germans called a blitzkrieg. It will be a global war. We shall be fighting all over the world.

If we keep those three facts in mind we shall be helped in attempting to assess the adequacy or inadequacy of the act before us. In a general way I have the impression that the act has been drafted with those three general principles in mind, but I am not so sure that we could not improve it in respect of some of these matters.

The fact that we shall be in a total war means that the citizens in every area ought to be trained for citizen defence. I have not gained the impression that provision has been made for that kind of training on the North American continent. I hope that provision is being made in this act or in the regulations based upon the act. I hope something is done before too long because there is no telling how soon we may be called upon to start to use such training.

The fact that it is going to be an instantaneous war means that we are not going to have time to build war plants, to stimulate the production of food and clothing and shelter, to train precision toolmakers and all that sort of thing as we were in the previous war. We shall be faced with the necessity of having all these things in full running order to permit us to make a running start. I trust that provisions are being made by our Department of National Defence to meet the exigencies of that situation.

I am not so easy in my mind concerning this matter. One of our difficulties is that we cannot probe too deeply into the affairs of the department without calling on the minister to divulge information which it might not be in the public interest to divulge. But somehow or other the ordinary member of parliament like myself ought to have some special assurance that we are not going to have anything like the ghastly thing which confronted Great Britain in the last war when men were called upon to meet possible invasion armed only with pitchforks, and in some cases pitchforks without the tines. A thing like that must not be permitted to recur.

There is another serious danger by reason of the fact that the next war will be a global war. We shall not be able to keep the enemy concentrated anywhere. Before the last war we were ready to confine the enemy behind the Maginot line, but it turned out that he was anywhere except behind the Maginot line. No one today is unrealistic enough to hope to keep the enemy behind a Maginot line. But I wonder if we are taking all the precautions which ought to be taken against the possible isolation of considerable areas of our country which would render them completely helpless because of their being separated from all the means of sustenance which they ought to have.

On a previous occasion when we were discussing the matter of defence I took the opportunity of reminding the house that Great Britain divided that country into twelve divisions during the last war. The idea was to have each of those twelve divisions rather self-supporting so that, in case the other eleven divisions were occupied by the enemy, the one remaining division would be able to carry on and put up a good fight until assistance came. Up to the present time there has been, I believe, no attempt whatsoever to organize Canada into any such divisions. I am anxious lest three or four well directed blows paralyse the whole of Canada's war effort. I think that does not need to be the case, and we should take steps to see that it will not be the case. Of course I recognize that in the coming war we expect to be more or less under the wing of the United States, and consequently we can afford to leave her to do a lot of the protecting of our affairs, but that great nation may be so occupied in several other areas of the globe that she may not be able to give us the attention that we may wish to have her give. I really have a feeling that we ought to attempt to be ready to stand on our own feet pretty well in case of an emergency.

So much having been said in a general way, I should like to draw attention to four or five things that have been in my mind since I have had the responsibility of giving defence matters attention for my group. I feel that our production of food, clothing and shelter has not been kept up to the standard which we would wish in case we became suddenly engaged in a war. We are allowing our production to run down. The scarcity-minded men whose fallacies control government policy seem to be terrified at the thought of having any more wheat than we can sell in a given year, or the capacity to produce any more dairy products than we can use in a given year, and so on right through the various types of production of which we are capable.

Suppose it became necessary for us to put a million men into the field in a short time and find food, clothing and shelter with which to support such an army, together with another army engaged in war production. I think we should find that we were running into scarcities in a way that would confound us if war came. I hope the minister is fully cognizant of the potentialities of such a situation. I do not find any comfort in the scarcity which is being artificially induced in this country by a government that does not know how to deal with abundance. I hope the minister will not take anything I say as being in any way unkind or adverse criticism. I am merely endeavouring to warn the country before it is too late.

The situation does not look good to me so far as Canadian production is concerned. When a country like Canada cannot supply enough bacon to fulfil the contract with Great Britain it is not a very good sign that our house is being well managed. That is just one illustration of many.

I do not know whether or not we have a civilian defence organization throughout Canada. When I was in Great Britain in 1941 I was greatly impressed with the efficiency which they had developed by that time in the matter of taking care of fires, gas attacks, and that sort of thing. They had citizens defence committees in superabundance, well trained and ready to go. I have not heard any rumours concerning citizens defence committees being ready to go in Canada at all. Even if we depend upon the United States for the major portion of our protection I think we should still have some sort of provision for citizens defence committees. I will not go into further detail in that regard but I hope that my general words will impress those who need to be impressed in Canada.

In line with the general necessity for guarding against the possibility of being completely put out of business by two or three well directed blows, I think we ought to have decentralization of Canadian industries to a far greater extent than at the present time. All the talking that we from western Canada and the maritimes have been able to do does not seem to have percolated into the heads of the responsible men in Ontario and Quebec to the extent that they are impressed that they really ought to put some industries in other parts of Canada from the standpoint of sheer common-sense self-defence. I hope it will not be necessary to sound that warning any more.

All our great munitions factories are located in Ontario and Quebec. An attacking force only needs to concentrate on those two provinces and the rest of us will simply be overcome as the result thereof. That does not seem like wise planning for a great nation such as Canada. Of course it will be said there are a lot of objections, but there will be a whole lot of wishes that things had been different if a serious disaster should befall us, and it were found that disaster had occurred because of our inability to have a little foresight instead of nothing but hindsight.

I think regional defence units have been completely neglected in Canada. I may be too far out of touch with the facts but I have an idea I am going to confide to those members who are indulgent enough to be paying attention to me. I believe that one day when Canada is organized in the most efficient way she will endeavour to lay out the whole country in certain more or less self-sufficient units. I think we spend far too much of our time and effort in hauling pretty nearly everything in Canada over two great rocky barren wastes. We take everything from Ontario and Quebec across a thousand miles of rocky wilderness; which is a dead loss to the railroads making the trip, and we make the western provinces pay the whole cost. Then we haul everything back over that same dead barren waste, making the east pay all the costs, or the west if possible, and usually the east is able to make the west do it. All this is a dead loss to the economy of Canada.

In my judgment it is a matter that ought to be overcome. If we had in the three prairie provinces a more or less self-sufficient unit in which we had the major industries for producing textiles, for example, and the various manufactured goods which we ordinarily need, we should not be under the necessity of transporting manufactured products over that vast rocky wilderness, and the nation would be ever so much stronger by reason of that fact. The same thing should be true of the west coast. I think it is a dead loss for the people of British Columbia to have to haul so large a percentage of the manufactured products they need across not only one barren wilderness in Ontario but another barren wilderness in the Rocky mountains and pay the shot both ways. That certainly does not look like a good national economy.

While we are considering the matter of defence we could have in mind some such desirable objective as that of creating several rather more or less self-sufficient economic units in our country. I think it would be all to the good from the standpoint of defence as well as economics. Therefore I should like to see the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) persuade his colleagues, and if he cannot persuade them let us know about it and we will help him—I should like to see the Minister of National Defence persuade these men that they ought to take definite steps to industrialize the region west of the Rocky mountains, the prairie region, and the maritimes so that those areas will have great industries and will have a strong pulsating economy which will enable them to live independently of the rest of Canada. That does not mean that Canada is not going to work together as a unit. It means there will be less need in times to come for assistance such as is now given to the rather undeveloped areas of Canada, shall I say. I do not know whether we have enough machine tools; I am not in a position to be able to find out. I do not know whether we have all the factories necessary to manufacture the ships and guns and tanks and planes and other necessities of war soon enough to be able to successfully conduct a major operation. I trust that things of that kind are being looked after.

There is another matter I think has been impressed upon all hon. members of the house and perhaps many people throughout the country by what has occurred in Canada during the last few years in the way of emergencies. Out in the Fraser valley two years ago we had a disastrous flood. After the horse was out of the stable we did our best to put it back and repair the stable, but it would have been a great deal better if we had repaired the stable and kept the horse in before the thing happened, in other words if we had been ready for it. Now we have the Winnipeg disaster. I am told that it was made known to a committee of the house today that early in the spring a certain United States engineer went to the town of Emerson, after having taken cognizance of the heavy snow lying in the upper reaches of the Red river and after having computed the probable rate at which that snow would melt; that he went into a drug store in that town and put a little mark on the door post, saying, "That is the point at which the waters will stand when they are going out of the Red river." If that fact had been conveyed with sufficient emphasis to all the people down the Red river who would be affected, think of the millions of bags of sand that could have been accumulated during the long weeks before the sudden onset of this flood, and look at the tremendous losses that could have been avoided, just being prepared.

Since it is quite obvious that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is going to be called upon to contribute liberally in dealing with these disasters, as they occur one after another, I do not see any particular reason why he should not say, "Very well. Since we are going to be called in on these big emergencies, we had better be trained so we can go at them effectively. We had better have plans all made so that we shall be ready to fight the battle with some hope of success and some measure of efficiency before it is lost."

That brings to attention several thoughts. Perhaps the minister has already taken this step, but in case he has not I trust that the defence research board will be advised that it would be well for them to be examining into these matters and giving advice on how the boys should be trained and equipped, and drilled to deal with various kinds of emergencies such as floods, fires, forest fires and the like, which are always liable to occur suddenly in Canada, judging by our experiences of the last few years. That is something which the minister might keep in mind in the days to come.

I have just been rambling around in my remarks this evening, but I think I have suggested a good many things that the defence research board, which is dealt with in part III of the act, can be instructed to give very careful attention to, and I would be glad if the minister, the next time he has occasion to speak, could tell us that he has envisaged all these possibilities and has made all these preparations so that we shall not be caught off guard in case there should be a major disaster.

The minister may say we have not the money to do these things. Well, my general reaction, which I am not going to discuss at any length tonight, is that the financial capacity of Canada ought to be gauged by the physical capacity of Canada. If Canada can produce the goods and services necessary to attain the high standard of military preparedness which my remarks have envisaged, then Canada should certainly be able to get the money with which to employ this physical capacity to achieve the objective we have in mind.

If the government and its present financial advisers are unable to tell how this can be done, it is high time they sought advice from people who know more about modern finance than apparently they have been able to learn up to the present time. So if the minister is being deprived of the money he considers it necessary to have in order to give Canada the kind of defence mechanism Canada should have as a producing unit, considering her resources of men and materials and machines and factories; if he is unable to get the money to accomplish the objective which Canada is capable of accomplishing, then we want him to make that known to us so that we can all do something about it. I think he will find a good many members of his own party who will be ready to help him out, too, and who will not be quite so ready to listen to some of the outworn ideas of finance with which they have been indoctrinated up to the present time.

So I do not know that we would be prepared to accept from the minister the plea that he did not have the money with which to do anything which is physically possible in Canada. Let us bear in mind that not until the recent war broke out, and even then not until the war began to look terribly dangerous, after eight months or so, did it become evident that we could make whatever was physically possible in Canada financially possible. But then when we did make it financially possible, we did so by the accumulation of colossal debts which now we have to pass on to future generations to repay. The time to take care of this problem for the next war is before the war occurs. Let us find some means whereby what is physically possible in this dominion can be made financially possible without the accumulation of taxes and debts.

Having made this contribution, I shall defer any further remarks until some future time.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, my remarks on this matter will be brief and will concern themselves with one subject only; that is, the matter of courts martial. Everyone realizes that in a military organization discipline is a must, but I am opposed to the whole principle of courts martial as we know them. By that I am not for one moment suggesting that commanding officers should not exercise the discretion that is given them in dealing with breaches of discipline and minor matters of various kinds. I think it absolutely wrong in principle, however, that courts martial as they are now and as they have been should deal with offences when there is an opportunity of having those offences tried in the normal way in a civilian court.

In saying what I do I speak perhaps not with authority but certainly with some considerable experience in defending people before courts martial. The thing that is wrong is that each and every one of the five men you have making up a general court martial is in some way, unconsciously if you will, anxious to do nothing that would displease the senior officer who has set up that court. We know that before any court martial is ordered in a district, for example, the district officer commanding may do a number of things. He may take certain steps of his own, from a reprimand up. He may take the ultimate and final step, after his investigation and after he has read the written statements presented by the persons who have investigated, and order a court martial composed of officers junior to himself. In other words, they may take those officers from the various districts who have the authority to set it up, be it the minister—I do not mean the present minister, but the minister of national defence—who has on occasion set up these courts martial in which I have personally had a part, over and above the men who usually deal with such matters. No one will think for a moment that the persons sitting there as judges are not influenced by the fact that the man above them, be it the minister or be it an officer commanding a district, who read the evidence, has said, "This is beyond my powers: the offence is too grave, so I am going to set up this court martial." No one can tell me that the persons sitting as judges are likely to make a finding in favour of the accused person when their superior officer has, in setting up the court after investigation, virtually told them that the man is guilty. In other words, lest anyone think that I am criticizing the individuals who sit as judges, I may say that were I in that position I would no doubt be equally influenced. It is not human nature for any person to tell a superior, who has power of preferment over him, that he is wrong and this man is not guilty.

That is the situation as we have it today. I am not suggesting it was started by anyone in the house. It is an old court which has outlived its usefulness. Someone will say: Since you object to this what do you suggest by way of an alternative? I say, Mr. Speaker, that while it is not my business to suggest alternatives, I do say that when servicemen are charged with crimes under the Criminal Code, such as theft, and I was once engaged in defending a man charged with theft and another man charged with rape—the only crime other than murder and treason for which the Criminal Code prescribes hanging as one of the penalties—it does seem to me utterly wrong in principle that a man so charged should be tried by officers in the army. He should simply be turned over to the civil authorities, so that he will get what everyone else gets, a fair trial in the courts of our land.

I know in one case, in which the charge was not a severe one, the officer so charged had been reprimanded by the commanding officer of the district. I speak of the time when we had districts and not the commands into which our army is divided today. To try that man we had three men of the rank of brigadier, two of the rank of colonel and an alternate, I think that is the word, of the rank of colonel. They all came from outside the district. It was a trial ordered by the then minister of national defence. We had a judge advocate who came from Vancouver; a prosecutor who came from Toronto, and I may say I was there for eight days. I came from Calgary, and I received a delightful thank you at the end of the show. All that was accomplished was that this man received a mild reprimand. The expense which was entailed in gathering all those people together was so far out of line with anything that was accomplished, or that might be accomplished, that to me the thing was ridiculous. It was then that I finally made up my mind this outmoded method should be eliminated.

I do not intend to mention any names, but I will say that on this court we had elderly men, men who were anxious to go to England or to Europe. They were anxious to go to fight as a matter of fact for their country, but they were of an age where they were not first-line men at all. In discussions with them I learned that they knew their only opportunity of getting a command overseas—they were veterans of the first war as well—was by the favour, and I do not use that word in a harsh way at all, of those persons above them who would have the right to say whether or not they were entitled to preferment. I know it is a difficult thing to make any change in something which has been a custom for so long, but I do think, Mr. Speaker, that the minister might well review this whole picture to see if we cannot find a more sensible means of meting out justice to servicemen who are accused of crime. I am not talking about taking a toothbrush from another fellow's kit, or anything of that sort. I was going to say that is a thing, particularly where many men are grouped together in quarters, which always happens. I am talking about these more serious offences. I did defend a man in a court martial in the air force who was charged with rape. At the end of the road he was found guilty, and he was dishonourably discharged or "cashiered" as they put it. Remember, he was my client; but I say that had he been in a civil court he would have been sent to jail for five or ten years, and that is where he deserved to be. In that way, justice was cheated because of the method which was used in connection with the trial.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I would take only a few minutes, and I shall keep my word. I am not blaming anybody for anything, but I am trying to make a suggestion which will eliminate any thought on behalf of an accused person or those who act for him that he is being judged by persons who may be seeking favours from other persons above them in rank and who put them there in that particular spot. I therefore ask for the careful consideration by the minister of the suggestions that I have made.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): It is most interesting, Mr. Speaker, to listen to some of those who have spoken this evening. As a veteran of the first war, having served as a private and committed almost all the minor offences a private soldier could commit, and enjoyed them all and having served as an officer and continued to commit many minor offences for which I was brought to task, I listened with interest to that eminent lawyer, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), making suggestions with regard to courts martial. The matter could be studied thoroughly, because there is no doubt about the red tape, the squandering of the taxpayers' money and the fact that officers were appointed to courts martial who had very little legal experience.

But to suggest that all enlisted men should take the time to study, not the king's rules and regulations but the House of Commons of Canada rules and regulations, when the war is almost over before we ever start fighting, and that you are going to have these rules and regulations so simplified, as suggested by some of the speakers here this evening, that every private soldier is going to take time off and neglect his rifle or his anti-aircraft gun or his military training in order to become a first-class barrack-room lawyer, is absolutely ridiculous. You will not find many of the colonels taking much time on the rules and regulations. For the sake of the Canadian public, let me say this. Few men who committed crimes in the first great war received sentences which were not correct. They were charged with drunkenness and overstaying leave, which I had the honour of doing, and offered every excuse in the world. I think I got five days confined to barracks, and then did it again. That will continue. You can tell any soldier that he is going to get confined to barracks if he overstays his leave two days in London, and he is going to overstay four because he does not care about fifteen days confined to barracks. For instance, suppose a man were on leave in London or in Paris. Can you imagine a man walking along the Champs Elysées in Paris suddenly saying to his pal, "We had better get home in time or we are going to be confined to barracks for five days"? How utterly ridiculous!

It is suggested that these rules should be so simplified that every soldier is going to have time to read them. If they were half as thick as this pamphlet I have in my hand, they would not read them. If they did, they would not train to become the men we need during a war. Even with regard to courts martial, let the public of Canada remember this. It was seldom that any man did not receive his just deserts from his fellow soldiers, officers who had served. A man who becomes an officer does not lose his human instincts and the human kindness that runs through any man's body. They feel for the common soldier when he comes before them, just as any civilian would. No man becomes hardened towards his fellow man because he serves his king and country. I will say this, and I think every man in this house who served in the first war will agree: The percentage would be one-tenth of one per cent where there was a miscarriage of justice dealt out by active service officers. Fortunately I did not spend much time with courts martial in Canada during the first war. I say "fortunately" because from what I heard about some of the courts with elderly gentlemen who wanted to get overseas, there might have been grave infractions of the law and miscarriage of justice. But overseas men were not sentenced who did not deserve sentences, except in the most remote cases. I have talked to men whom I have defended in courts martial and the courts have said, after they have heard me or heard my plea as the defending officer of these men: "What do you think we should really give this man?" I have suggested five months first field punishment No. 1. I have had these men say, "I deserve every bit of it; I struck that officer. I got drunk. It is not the first occasion, it is my third. I am lucky I am not going to be shot." One man I have in mind turned out to win the D.C.M. and rose to the rank of sergeant. The last time I saw that man, he was proceeding with a bayonet into a machine gun nest and I believe he received a bar to his D.C.M. for his actions on that occasion. Men who went to Wandsworth, sentenced by the military courts of England—I believe the most severe military prison in the British empire—came out of there and admitted that they were better men than when they went in. Do not let it ever be forgotten that amongst the soldiers defending Canada were men who came out of the penitentiary and joined the armed forces, and who had committed the most atrocious crimes apart from murder that it is humanly possible for a man to commit. Many of these men who were convicted by fair and just courts did not receive any sentence while fighting overseas with the first Canadian army. I say this to the minister. Do not let him try to prepare a pamphlet that he believes will ever be read by two per cent of the Canadian army. If there is ever a war on, a real soldier will never even read the first page, and yet he will serve well and most of them without crime of any kind.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I should like very much, Mr. Speaker, to express the great pleasure I think it is to all of us to have heard this bill debated in the co-operative way in which it has been debated. As another "other ranker" of the first war, I should like to say that I particularly agree with a good deal of the gusto and also of the sentiment of the last speaker, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson).

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would you give us some personalities too?

Mr. Claxton: I could also give some personalities, both on the giving and on the receiving end. During the second world war I was one of those people whom the hon. member defied really in his last remarks, for I wrote a little pamphlet on military law. I do not know how many people read it, but at least it was printed to the extent of some 25,000 copies. Up to that time, that was perhaps one of the greatest distributions of a book in Canada apart from the Bible. I do not think it got many people into much trouble, but it helped quite a few younger officers to pass their examinations. I do not think it got down to the rank of the hon. member and myself during the first world war, so that we did not cause any more trouble because of that publication.

I should like to say that the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) seemed to answer fairly effectively the remarks of the hon. member from Calgary West (Mr. Smith); but I thought that the most surprising thing about the speech of the hon. member for Calgary West was the fact that he kept on talking about the supreme kind of injustice that was being done by courts martial, yet he succeeded in getting the accused persons off with a sentence which he thought was inadequate, which certainly reflects his skill as counsel.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could you have had a better witness?

Mr. Claxton: You are right, but not as to the severity or the unfairness of the courts. That is a question, of course, of great difficulty; and I am sure the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), because of his wide experience, will bring some part of that experience before the committee when it is set up, as we hope it will be. I may say that all the countries of which we have any knowledge have been equally concerned with us in this question as to how to administer service justice. Approaches have seen similar, and I believe conclusions have been somewhat similar.

However, if there is any way in which we can do the job better than it has been done in the past, or better than contemplated in this bill, then let us bring it before the committee and have it threshed out there so that we can get the best kind of bill and the best kind of disciplinary code to be found anywhere.

With regard to some of the observations made by some hon. members, I would remind the house that the difficulty about this kind of legislation is that we must deal with things under conditions of peace but always anticipating a possible condition of war. Consequently while many of us would like to see many of the sections in the disciplinary code eliminated and left to the criminal law, we are still face to face with the possible necessity of having to administer service law during a time of emergency in a foreign country where there is no criminal law and no civil court. We have to have some kind of court in which to do it.

I think the most amazing feature of this debate is that during the course of the discussion not a genuine case of grievance has been brought forward. I think if that is true, having had some million and a quarter men and women serving throughout the most dreadful war in history, many of them brought before courts martial and many of them sentenced—and all of them having members of parliament to represent them—it is amazing to find that we have had no cases of grievance brought forward here.

Mr. Pearkes: But surely when we are discussing the principle of the bill is not the time to bring forward cases of grievance.

Mr. Claxton: I agree. That would be completely in accordance with the rules. But the rules have not always been completely observed, and some hon. members have brought forward instances which they have suggested illustrated some defect or another. It is an excellent record, I suggest, and one greatly to the credit of this country and its soldier citizens, its armed forces, that so far in this discussion there has not been much by way of complaint.

So far hon. members have spoken in terms of co-operation. That, I can assure them, is most warmly welcomed. I would hasten to give the hon. member for Nanaimo all the assurance he asked. For instance, he referred to one section, namely section 4 of the old Militia Act as having been left out. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) referred to the same thing. As I said this afternoon, that section was left out because it was to be found, in different terms, in section 15 of the British North America Act; and it was thought desirable to leave the British North America Act standing as it was, in its own language, without repeating it in different terms in this bill.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interrupt, but I would point out for the minister's consideration the fact that section 15 of the British North America Act refers only to naval and armed forces and that consideration should be given to the limiting effect of those words.

Mr. Claxton: I am sure they have no limiting effect. However, that is a question which can be placed before the committee for consideration.

The hon. member for Nanaimo said that not only should we see what is contained in the 251 sections of the bill, but we should also look into what has been left out of the 598 sections of the act which it replaces. I hold in my hand one of several volumes which contain all the old statutes. On the opposite page we find what has happened to them, and where they can be located in the bill. This book has been prepared by the judge advocate general's office, and it is available for the members of the committee. That information will be completely available. Then, on the other hand, we are reversing the process we have in the bill itself, and opposite each section are references showing its origin and the reference to the sections of the various statutes it replaces.

Therefore I can give the hon. member the assurance he wishes that all the resources of the department and all the work that has been done will be put before the committee. Every effort will be made to co-operate with the committee in seeing that we have the best possible statute to accomplish the job we want to do, and that is to look to the discipline of the armed forces and the regulations of the department in the interests of greater efficiency, greater security for Canada, and greater justice for the services.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

DEFENCE SERVICES PENSIONS

METHOD OF COMPUTATION—CREATION OF SERVICE PENSION BOARD

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 134, to amend the Militia Pension Act and change the title thereof.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is based on a resolution which was adopted by the house without any preliminary statement from me. I believe I gave some assurance that such a statement would be made.

The Militia Pension Act which this bill would amend provides for pensions and gratuities for members of the regular forces of Canada on their retirement, and for their dependents on their death. Amendments proposed in this bill would simplify administration, expedite payment and correct certain anomalies. All the proposed amendments will, I believe, be found to be in the interest of the officers and men of the forces.

The Militia Pension Act enacted in 1901 applied only to the army. This is part I of the present Militia Pension Act. In 1928 parts II and III were added to extend the act to the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force. In 1937 part IV provided that pensions granted in accordance with parts I, II, and III would be paid in monthly instalments.

In 1945 a committee under the chairmanship of Mr. G. D. Finlayson, C.M.G., then superintendent of insurance, was set up to recommend amendments which would make provision for members of the armed forces similar in principle to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The status of members of the regular forces to whom parts I to IV applied was not to be disturbed but they were given the right to elect to come under part V. This new part came into operation on the 31st August 1946 and applied to members of the regular forces enrolled after 31st March 1946 and to those who prior to 31st March 1948 elected to become contributors under this part.

Part V will become the only part of the act in effect when the 3,234 servicemen to whom parts I to IV apply will have died or have been retired from the forces. It is expected that this number will be reduced if the option to come under part V is extended as proposed by this bill.

Under parts I to IV of the act, members of the regular forces who serve for 20 years or more and are retired for reasons other than their own misconduct are granted a pension for each year of service of one-fiftieth of their pay and allowances at the time of their retirement if they were appointed to the forces prior to May 1, 1929, or if appointed after May 1, 1929, on the average annual rate of pay and allowances for the three years preceding retirement.

Officers and warrant officers pay a contribution of five per cent per annum of their pay and provision is made for a pension or other benefits for widows and dependents. In the case of ranks below warrant officer no contribution is paid and no provision is made for widows and dependents. All members of the regular forces to whom part V applies contribute to the pension fund and the benefits on retirement or to their dependents upon their death are similar to those granted to members of the civil service.

The first clause of the bill would change the title of the act from the Militia Pension Act to the Defence Services Pension Act. This, I believe, is more appropriate for an act which applies to all three services.

Persons to whom parts I to IV applied who wished to come under part V had to elect to do so before March 31, 1948. It has been found that a number of persons who wished to come under part V did not make application before that date and the amendment to paragraph (b) of section 43 would extend to December 31, 1950, the time within which election may be made to come under part V.

Under the present part V, a contributor who wishes to reckon for pension purposes his service prior to his becoming a contributor has to elect to do so within one year after becoming a contributor. The purpose of the amendment to subsection 1 of section 45 is to extend the time within which such an election can be made to a period of six months after the coming into force of the amendment.

The amendments to subsections 12 and 13 of section 4, as set out in clause 4 of the bill, and to paragraph (h) of section 53, as set out

Defence to such a committee. If that committee can appropriately deal with this limited in clause 12 of the bill, would place on the same footing officer pensioners under parts I to IV or part V who, subsequent to retirement, accept employment in the public service of Canada.

I have attempted to indicate very briefly to the house the major points involved in the proposed amendments. Any further explanation which hon. members require will be given when this bill is discussed in committee. It is proposed that the bill would be referred to the committee to be set up to deal with the national defence bill, and the prize money bill which will be introduced following the resolution.

I should like to give some illustrations of the pay and pension of married men with 35 years service to indicate to hon. members the pensions that are payable under the existing provisions. These are as follows:

	Pay	Pension
Sergeant	$2,532.00	$1,772.40
Warrant officer, class 1
Tradesman class group 4...	3,468.00	2,427.60
Major	5,232.00	3,662.40

I believe that those provisions will be found to be more liberal than those in force in the armed forces of any other country. The main purpose of these amendments is to make still more liberal, not in the rates of payment but in the provisions under which men may qualify. The bill also aims to bring about a more efficient and simplified working of the act.

The act as amended in 1946 has been in operation for some four years and the anomalies to which I have referred and the improvements which are thought to be necessary have come to light during that time. Our hope is that it will be possible to enact before too long a much more simplified pension act along the lines of the provisions existing in part V and providing for the residual group in parts I to IV in much more simple terms. Until we have taken this interim step that would be a difficult thing to bring about because of the different categories of officers and men affected.

If the house adopts the proposals that are now made it will enable us, say within a period of a year or two, to reintroduce a completely new Defence Services Pension Act providing substantially the same provisions but making the administration and application much more simple. I regard this interim step as essential in order to extend to some men who have been excluded by cut-off dates from some of the conditions that they would like to have under part V. For all these reasons I commend the bill to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in addition to the change in the title of the act, which obviously is desirable, it is also necessary that service personnel pensions should be revised. Changing conditions of the service have made such a review necessary and therefore we shall agree to the amendments which are being recommended in this bill.

Changing conditions of service have placed the emphasis upon youth. The services today are young. As these young men are serving in peacetime they must be given the opportunity to gain experience in command so that they would be able to meet the requirements of service should war break out in the future. In order to enable them to gain that experience in command, there must be retirement at the top so that there can be a general movement up through the various ranks of the forces.

The retirement of a great many of the permanent force personnel will be necessary before they have completed the full term in order to draw their maximum pension. That presents complications because you cannot have a lot of young men retiring and being able to draw substantial pensions for many years to come without placing a heavy drain on the treasury, nor can you turn these young men loose without giving them adequate means to maintain themselves. One has to have in mind the increased cost of living. Therefore it is not easy to find the medium by which pensions should be paid. I note that in the bill emphasis is placed upon the fact that henceforth men who retire will receive their pensions as a matter of right instead of as an act of grace on decision of the minister. I am not sure that the policy of accepting the pension as a matter of right is carried all through the bill because there are obstacles placed in the way of the ex-serviceman, be he officer or other rank, in accepting a position in other branches of the government service than the armed forces. I cannot help feeling that it might be advisable to make some further modifications in the bill in order to permit greater facilities for ex-servicemen to take appointments in other branches of the government service.

There are a number of small details such as the cut-off date, to which the minister referred, which may need some discussion and adjustment in the committee. I am not quite certain that in all cases we have taken the correct cut-off date but those matters will be better discussed in the committee than at this stage. I do not intend to take up any more time of the house. I merely wish to say that when the bill is sent to the committee I trust every opportunity will be given for a thorough examination of all branches in connection with service pensions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER BILL NO. 133

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to consider Bill No. 133, an act respecting national defence; with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time; and that the said committee consist of Messrs. Adamson, Balcer, Bennett, Blackmore, Blanchette, Campney, Cavers, Claxton, Dickey, George, Gillis, Harkness, Henderson, Higgins, Langlois (Gaspe), Lapointe, Larson, McLean (Huron-Perth), Pearkes, Roberge, Stick, Thomson, Viau, Welbourn and Wright; and that standing order 65 (1) be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, on the 14th day of March I moved that a special committee be set up to deal with the question of national defence. In support of my motion I gave two examples of the type of investigation that such a committee could deal with. One was to examine the national defence bill which the minister has suggested this evening should be referred to the special committee. The other was to examine the question of the estimates. The house decided not to accept my motion and it was defeated. A few days later the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was speaking on the defence estimates and he was called to order because he again suggested that the estimates be referred to a special committee. He was told that he was out of order because the house had decided on the matter of the broader principle of the committee examining not only the estimates but the bills in question, and the ruling of the Speaker was upheld by a vote.

Therefore I am very doubtful whether the motion can be considered to be in order because what is sauce for the goose should also be sauce for the gander. Nevertheless perhaps half a committee is better than no committee at all, and I am not going to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to give a ruling on the point I have raised. I only repeat what I said earlier today, that I hope the committee will be given the widest possible scope to examine into all the ramifications of the various bills. The minister has already given assurance that that can be done. There are cases, as he mentioned when discussing Bill No. 133, where the financial aspects of the bill are brought out in various sections thereof. It will therefore be necessary to examine the effect of some of the financial recommendations which are being made.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

For instance, we are to consider the effect of unification of the various services. It is to be hoped that unification will bring about a lessening of the amount of money which might be required for each of the services if they were to continue to operate separately. Emphasis has also been placed on giving a strictly Canadian appearance to our forces. To attempt to Canadianize the navy particularly will undoubtedly require an additional expenditure of money. That is quite obvious. Therefore the committee should be given the opportunity to inquire into the financial effect of the various sections in the different bills. Provided assurances can be given that there is full scope for the committee to inquire into any branch of the services which may be affected by any of the bills, I do not wish to press what may be considered to be a point of order as to whether or not the motion is in order.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I want to remove any suggestion that may have been conveyed by the minister's remarks on the bill itself that the subject has been comprehensively covered at this point. I believe in a great many cases it was thought by hon. members, including myself, that detailed discussion could best take place when the bill was before the committee and then brought back to the house for further consideration.

There is one point I should like to raise, however, before the minister speaks on this motion to set up a committee. Certainly I am not suggesting for a moment that the minister must assume responsibility for interpretation placed by the press upon his words or actions, unless he himself has been responsible for those interpretations; but I believe hon. members will have read statements in the press during the past few days that it is the intention of the minister to widen the scope of this inquiry beyond what was originally contemplated and, at least to some extent, comply with the requests which have been made that a general discussion be permitted of the organization of the Department of National Defence and its affairs generally. If there is nothing in those statements the minister can remove any doubt about it. If on the other hand it is intended to widen the scope of the inquiry before this committee I think it would be well for the minister to clarify that point now and indicate to what extent that is so. I remind the house that the bill is being sent to a committee on the motion of the minister himself, and I suggest that this invalidates the argument he has made from time to time that it would not be a desirable thing to refer the whole organization of the Department of National Defence to such a committee. If that committee can appropriately deal with this limited aspect of the affairs of the department, then it could have dealt with the wider organization and its work would have been of greater value to this house and to the people of Canada.

I rise now simply to indicate that it is my intention, as I know it is the intention of other hon. members, to defer any detailed examination of the bill until later; but I hope the minister will clarify the situation in the light of the press reports to which I have referred.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I should like to say again how appreciative I am of the very helpful remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). I venture to say he is one of the few people who really know how the Militia Pension Act works. It is a complicated matter dealing with servicemen who have come in at different periods and under different arrangements all the way back to the great war of 1914-19. As I have said, our hope is that this bill will be an interim step which will permit us to deal with the difficulties that have been revealed by experience, and enable us to progress toward that measure we would like to see adopted, a much simpler and more streamlined bill along the lines of part V. So I hope the house will take that into consideration just as soon as it may be possible.

As to what the hon. gentleman said about the origin of the committee, or the proposal for a committee, may I say at once that as far as I know the first suggestion that this and other measures should come before a committee of this house was made during the discussion of this and other defence measures last November. At that time I indicated to the house my hope that the defence bill itself would go to a committee. That was on November 18, at page 1946 of Hansard. A little later the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) asked again:

> Did I understand the minister to say that, with respect to the forthcoming bill—

That is, the defence bill.

> —he was disposed to recommend that it be referred to a committee?
> Mr. Claxton: Yes.

That answer has stood from then until now. So I was astonished, if I may meet the invitation of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), to read in the Montreal Gazette of Monday, May 15, 1950, this statement:

> In a totally unexpected move, the government will make provision very soon for the establishment of a special parliamentary defence committee.

The indication of the possible scope of this committee was made very clear at the point in Hansard to which I have referred, and also during the discussion in this house on April 18 of this year, when the resolutions preceding both the defence bill and the pension act were brought before the house. What the Gazette resident correspondent was doing in the meantime I do not know, but apparently he was not following the proceedings of the house. Equally unfortunate is the heading over this report: "Group to study defence costs." I have not decided who will discuss defence costs, and it is not within my power to make any such decision. That is a matter for the house; and the house will discuss defence costs in accordance with its decision when it resumes consideration of the defence estimates, which will be as soon as possible. Therefore as to the scope of this committee I can assure the hon. member for Nanaimo that it will have full scope to discuss Bill No. 133 within the terms of this motion, if it is adopted, in accordance with the rules of the house; and I am not going to give him any assurance that those rules will be extended. In fact I would think, to the contrary, that the house itself would wish the rules to be observed and that this bill, and the other two, should be considered as I believe such legislation should be considered, by a committee of the house. There will be no assurance from me that the proper and parliamentary scope of what is decided by this house this evening will be extended in any way, other than that the resources of the department and certainly my own support will be given to everything the committee does in accordance with the rules as they are determined by the house.

So let there be no misunderstanding. The assurance I give with respect to the scope of this committee's operations extends only to the fullest consideration of a piece of legislation of the utmost importance; and whatever is proper to that consideration no doubt will be considered by the committee in accordance with the rules.

With regard to the suggestion by the leader of the opposition that my attitude on this invalidates some argument I have advanced in the past against the setting up of a committee to deal with the whole subject of defence, of course that again is contrary to the decision of the house, and I would not like to follow the hon. gentleman on that point because it has been decided already this session. It is, I suggest, fundamental that we recognize that in between consideration of legislation which is in accordance with the British parliamentary practice which is usually done by one of the committees of the house lettered from A to E, and the kind of suggestion that has been made in the past for something quite different, along the American lines, there is a world of difference. That difference is of fundamental importance to the conduct of our business.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would just remind the minister that the suggestion was made in the exact words of an article written by the minister and recommending that procedure, as well as that there should be a wide open review of the affairs of the department.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, the leader of the opposition cannot possibly get any more satisfaction out of repeating references to that article, and bringing it before this house—

Mr. Drew: It is a very good one.

Mr. Claxton: A very good one, but unfortunately I am one of those people, I am glad to say, who admit when they were wrong, and that is one of the occasions on which I was wrong. Perhaps the leader of the opposition never admits he is wrong; I do not know. I am very glad to do it when I am wrong, and I was wrong there. I said so before anyone else mentioned it and, when seven years later the leader of the opposition brings this before the house, I think he is threshing old straw. I do accept in the most complete terms the suggestion made by the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) with regard to the broad scope that should be given on the discussion of Bill No. 133 when it comes before the committee. But with regard to his remarks on this motion, I say that the rules of the house cannot be extended by anything I say. Let there be no misunderstanding of that point whatever. A decision of the house has been taken on that matter, and I do not expect it to be reversed. Should it be reversed, of course, I shall be glad to comply with the rules of the house.

Motion agreed to.

REFERENCE OF BILLS NOS. 133 AND 134 TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved:

That Bill No. 133, an act respecting national defence, and Bill No. 134, an act to amend the Militia Pension Act and change the title thereof, be referred to the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 133, an act respecting national defence, and that the committee be empowered to consider the said bills.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have had excellent co-operation from hon. members, but I would hope that we might have the unanimous consent of the house to refer these bills to the committee which has been set up. I think that is the wish of all hon. members.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA PRIZE ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZE MONEY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 18, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Claxton—Mr. Dion in the chair:

That it is expedient to present a bill to provide for the payment and distribution of prize money out of prize moneys presently and prospectively in the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, if hon. members would permit I think it would be desirable that we get first reading of this bill today, so that it can be distributed and perhaps dealt with tomorrow. If it were given second reading, then it could be referred to the same committee, and that would be our intention. I can make a brief statement if hon. members wish, but I think in view of the lateness of the hour it may be better if hon. members would agree to adopt the course I have suggested.

Mr. Pearkes: There is no objection to the distribution of this prize money, but there are objections I think to the method by which it is being distributed. Will the minister say whether the same objectionable methods that were followed a couple of years ago will be adopted again?

Mr. Claxton: I would not make that admission, Mr. Chairman, but the method proposed is intended to be similar to that indicated a year ago. The purpose of the bill is, of course, to provide for the distribution of money which is either in the consolidated revenue fund, or which will come to it from the United Kingdom as prize money, payable in accordance with an agreement worked out between the various countries of the commonwealth.

This institution of prize money is a very old one as the member for Nanaimo has pointed out before. Indeed it dates back as far as the thirteenth century. At that time there were no organized naval forces, and prize money was paid to encourage adventurous privateers to join in the defence of the country in time of war. When the royal navy came to be organized, the possibility of prize money was one of the inducements which led men to join up. It has now been found, certainly in the United Kingdom, that prize money today is an anachronism; it is out of date. The United Kingdom has decided to pay prize money for the last time in respect of the second world war to personnel of the navy, and to pay a proportion of the prize money earned into the benevolent fund of the Royal Air Force. In Canada we have made no decision yet.

The bill which will be introduced if the present resolution is adopted will propose a method of payment, and I would suggest to hon. members that we could discuss the whole matter better if we had the bill before us. I might just say this, that the amount involved for Canada is of the order of $2,500,000. There has never been prize money paid in Canada as a decision of the Canadian government. The prize money that was paid after world war I was paid under an imperial statute by royal proclamation. It included personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy, as well as the personnel of the other navies of the commonwealth. There never has been any undertaking to pay prize money in Canada. The reason why prize money was instituted as an adjunct to pay has long ceased to be in existence because the pay of the personnel of members of the Royal Canadian Navy is on terms corresponding to that of the army and the air force. The suggestion that prize money was necessary as a kind of compensation for the loss of possible earnings has ceased to exist, particularly in Canada, where our benefits to veterans are on a more favourable basis than in any other country. Moreover, the payment of prize money to individuals of the navy would discriminate against members of the army and the air force who had similar conditions of service, similar rates of pay, similar pensions and who, in every respect, had about the same sort of conditions.

I would hope, Mr. Chairman, if it is possible, to have the resolution carried and the bill given first reading so that we could consider it tomorrow.

Mr. Pearkes: There is just one question I should like to ask arising out of what the minister has said. Is there any intention to give a portion of this to the army benevolent fund?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Pearkes: You referred to distribution.

Mr. Claxton: No.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Claxton thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 221, to provide for the payment and distribution of prize money.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

PROVISION FOR BENEFITS FOR CERTAIN FORMER MEMBERS OF FORCES OTHER THAN CANADIANS

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 180, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I think there is likely to be some discussion on this bill, and some desire on the part of at least some of the members that it should be referred to a committee. It being now five minutes to eleven, I would ask you to call it eleven o'clock and that I be permitted to adjourn the debate.

Mr. Gregg: I do not want to enter into the discussion at this late hour, Mr. Speaker, but we had a full discussion on the resolution. I am sure there were nearly twenty-five speeches, although it is true that some of them were quite short. The two items contained in the bill are extremely simple. There is nothing complicated about either of them. If there had been, I would certainly have asked that a committee be created to study them. But these two points are so simple that I am sure that at another sitting the committee of the whole could deal with them quite adequately; and if the house would agree tonight, I should like to see the bill pass second reading, if possible.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Wright: No, Mr. Speaker. I should like to comply with the minister's wish but I think there was a matter which was not decided finally when we were discussing the bill in the first place, especially with respect to the pensions for widows of veterans of the imperial army who had served less than twenty years in Canada but who, under the act as it stands at the present time, will not receive a pension. I think that this matter requires further discussion. As a matter of fact, I think there should be some amendments. If the minister is not prepared to discuss them in a committee, I feel that probably we would have to move some amendment on second reading, in committee, or on third reading of the bill. I therefore feel that I could not consent to have the bill given second reading at this time. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow the first item will be this bill on prize money which has just passed first reading; then Bill No. 210, to amend the Customs Tariff; Bill No. 82, to amend the Criminal Code; and if there is time left, Bill No. 180, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

Mr. Pearkes: We shall have that bill with regard to prize money, shall we?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I understand so.

Mr. Pearkes: We have not received it yet.

Mr. Abbott: It will be distributed in the morning.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 17, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

SIXTH AND SEVENTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN SEVENTH REPORT

Mr. L. O. Breithaupt (Waterloo North) presented the sixth and seventh reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the seventh report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

INFORMATION SERVICES

REFERENCE TO "CANADIAN WEEKLY BULLETIN" OF MAY 12, 1950

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I wish to draw the attention of the house to the "Canadian Weekly Bulletin," of May 12, issued by the information division of the Department of External Affairs. On the last page there is a small item which reads:

> Mr. Drew's motion defeated: Accepting the government's previously expressed view that Canada's anti-subversive laws are adequate, the House of Commons, on May 8, rejected the motion of Mr. George Drew, Progressive Conservative leader, for amendment to the Criminal Code to make communism and "other similar activities" a criminal offence.

I would point out that the motion before the house dealt with communist and other similar activities. If this was regarded as a matter to be commented on by this weekly bulletin issued by a department of the government, then it would have been appropriate that the quotation marks be in the right place and that the words of the motion itself be used. There is a distinct difference between a proposal to make communism a criminal offence and appropriate legislation to deal with communist and similar activities. I have stated on numerous occasions that an attempt to deal in an act with communism under the name of communism is not effective because it is possible to change the name from time to time. That is the reason why the resolution was drawn as it was, and asked for appropriate legislation to deal with communist and similar activities.

At the appropriate time I will raise strong objection to public money being spent on a propaganda sheet of this kind. I object to such a sheet misrepresenting what has been stated in the house.

FIRE AND FLOOD DAMAGE

MANITOBA AND QUEBEC—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONS OF INQUIRY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to communicate to the house a message I have just received, through the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. It is as follows:

> On behalf of my colleagues and myself I should like to convey to you the deep concern with which we have learned of the serious floods in Winnipeg. Please express our heartfelt sympathy with those who have suffered in the catastrophe.

I should also like to make the following announcement in connection with the Manitoba disaster.

The government of Canada has reached agreement with the government of Manitoba to appoint a fact-finding commission, consisting of Mr. D. Bruce Shaw of the city of Winnipeg, investment banker, and Mr. J. B. Carswell of the city of Vancouver, engineer, "to inquire into the nature and extent of the damage caused by the 1950 flood in the Red river valley in Manitoba, the cost of fighting the flood and the providing of emergency relief required because of the flood, and of emergency precautions to guard against the recurrence of such flood conditions, in order to make available at the earliest possible date a complete statement of all the essential facts necessary to determine the amount of the grant which the federal government should make to the government of Manitoba in order to assist that government in discharging its responsibilities in respect of the said flood."

Mr. D. Bruce Shaw is one of the leading investment bankers in the city of Winnipeg, where he has lived for a number of years. He will represent the government of Manitoba on the commission. The dominion's appointee is Mr. John B. Carswell, a prominent engineer of the city of Vancouver, who acted as chairman of the Fraser valley diking board set up by the joint action of the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia to supervise the reconstruction of the Fraser river valley dikes which were destroyed in the flood of 1948.

Fire and Flood Damage

I understand that my colleague, the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Claxton), also has a statement to make as to the proceedings of the international joint commission in that connection.

I should also like to inform the house that a similar arrangement has been made with the government of the province of Quebec, and is evidenced by an exchange of telegrams which I ask permission to read and table.

(Translation):

The first is dated as follows:

(Text):

Québec, Qué., 16 mai 1950

Hon. Louis-S. St-Laurent,
Premier ministre du Canada,
Ottawa.

Faisant suite aux conversations par téléphone longue distance hier et aujourd'hui concernant incendies désastreux à Rimouski et Cabano il est entendu qu'un Comité chargé d'obtenir les renseignements nécessaires sera constitué immédiatement afin de faire rapport sans retard aux autorités fédérales et provinciales de Québec en vue de décider de l'aide financière à apporter à ce sujet. Je comprends que le représentant fédéral sera monsieur le brigadier P. Thériault de Québec. Le représentant du gouvernement de Québec sera monsieur Édouard Laurent secrétaire du ministère du Trésor à Québec. Sincères salutations.

Maurice-L. Duplessis

(Translation):

The reply I sent him this morning, after a talk with my cabinet colleagues, is as follows:

(Text):

L'honorable Maurice-L. Duplessis, M.A.L.,
Premier ministre de la province de Québec,
Hôtel du Gouvernement,
Québec, Qué.

Faisant suite à votre télégramme du 16 mai concernant incendies désastreux à Rimouski et Cabano je vous confirme l'entente entre nous telle qu'exprimée dans ce télégramme. Je comprends que le gouvernement de Québec a nommé monsieur Édouard Laurent pour le représenter au Comité dont il s'agit. Le gouvernement fédéral a nommé le brigadier A. Thériault comme son représentant et le Comité étant ainsi constitué il peut commencer son enquête immédiatement.

Louis-S. St-Laurent

Possibly hon. members would like to hear a translation of the telegrams so that they may see that the arrangement is in substance the same as that arrived at with the government of Manitoba. The telegram from Premier Duplessis, dated the 16th of May, 1950, reads as follows:

Following our long distance telephone conversations of yesterday and today concerning the disastrous fires at Rimouski and Cabano, it is understood that a commission charged with obtaining the necessary information will be set up at once to report without delay to the federal and the Quebec provincial authorities with a view to deciding about the financial aid to be extended. I understand that the federal representative will be Brigadier P. Theriault of Quebec. The representative of the Quebec government will be Mr. Edouard Laurent, secretary of the Quebec treasury department. Sincere greetings.

Maurice L. Duplessis

My answer, dated today, reads as follows:

Replying to your telegram of May 16 concerning the disastrous fires at Rimouski and Cabano, I confirm the understanding between us as set out in that telegram. I understand the government of Quebec has named Mr. Edouard Laurent to represent it on the proposed commission. The federal government has named Brigadier A. Theriault as its representative, and the commission being thus established, it can commence its inquiry at once.

Louis S. St. Laurent

It may have been noticed that Brigadier Theriault is named in one telegram as Brigadier P. Theriault, and in my answer as Brigadier A. Theriault. He is familiarly known to all of us as Pete Theriault. His first name is Antonin and that explains why the initials may appear to be at variance.

I may also say I have received from the premier of Manitoba and the mayor of Winnipeg an invitation to visit the region affected by the flood. It has also been suggested that I should visit Rimouski and Cabano. I have not yet had an opportunity to see what arrangements it may be possible to make, but I can give the assurance that the government does not intend to neglect any action that will assist in securing the required information to help in arriving at proper concrete decisions as to what aid should be extended in connection with these disasters.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know that all hon. members of the house will welcome every step that can be taken to deal as expeditiously as possible with the great disasters that have occurred at Rimouski and Cabano, and, over a much larger area, in Manitoba.

I offer one suggestion to the Prime Minister arising out of the announcement he has made. There is this distinction between the problem which must be considered at Rimouski and Cabano on the one hand, and in Manitoba on the other. Rimouski and Cabano are urban communities; in Manitoba there is a serious urban problem and a tremendous rural problem. Along with the very competent engineer who has been chosen I would suggest to the Prime Minister that consideration be given to appointing to the commission having to do with the situation in Manitoba an outstanding farmer who could deal with that particular aspect of the problem.

Mr. St. Laurent: I thank the leader of the opposition for his suggestion. There were only two members of the Fraser river valley commission, and it was felt that, so far as it might be possible to do so, it would be desirable to follow the same pattern. However, in both cases the commissioners will certainly require expert assistance, and it is not intended to deprive them of any such assistance that can be of value to them in preparing proper reports.

RED RIVER VALLEY—REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): If I may be permitted I should like to make a brief statement supplementing that of the Prime Minister, dealing particularly with the international aspect of the flood situation.

As hon. members know, the fact that the Red river rises in the United States, many miles south of the international boundary, and that consequently the floods in Manitoba are contributed to by waters flowing north into Canada from the United States, means that the problem of flood control is international, and can be solved only by joint action of the United States and Canada. For this reason on January 12, 1948, both governments agreed to request the international joint commission to make recommendations to prevent the recurrence of floods in the area of the Red river valley. The commission was required——to conduct necessary investigations and to prepare a comprehensive plan or plans of mutual advantage to the two countries for the conservation, control and utilization of the waters under reference in accordance with the recommended apportionment thereof.

One of the principal objectives of this reference is the maximum possible control of flood conditions in the Red river valley. This presents an exceedingly difficult engineering problem, in the solution of which engineering investigations are being conducted for the commission by an international board of engineers which the commission has established, and which works in close association with provincial and state engineering authorities. The government of Canada has requested the Canadian section to expedite in every way possible the completion of the engineering investigation now in progress, and the recommendations that will be based on this investigation.

In this connection the government was assured of the full co-operation of the United States. On May 12 the United States government extended to the government of Canada the sympathy of the government of the United States of America for those suffering from the ravages of the Red river flood in Canada. They also informed us that the United States section of the international joint commission had been requested urgently to report, at the earliest date practicable, the best flood control measures to prevent the repetition of such disasters.

The government is grateful for this expression of sympathy, and is most gratified to have the assurance of the full co-operation of the United States government in this urgent and important matter.

Mr. Graydon: When did the international joint commission set up this board of engineers to make a report with respect to that project? I ask this question because there is a feeling that the international joint commission has been pretty leisurely about this matter, since it has been two years between floods and nothing has been done.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to obtain the date for the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not a fact that from January 12, 1948, to May 1 of this year the international joint commission made no report with respect to the submission made to it two years ago?

Mr. Knowles: During which time we have had two floods.

Mr. Claxton: My understanding is that the facts on which the report necessarily must be based can be adduced only by the engineers who have been appointed by the commission to make the investigation, and it is the report of the engineers on which the international joint commission is waiting.

MESSAGE FROM BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker: A few moments ago I received a cablegram which I think I should read to the house. It bears today's date and comes from the House of Commons, London, England, having been sent at 5.21 this afternoon, British time. It reads:

Speaker,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

The whole House of Commons is grieved at the sufferings of the city of Winnipeg caused by the present disastrous floods. The generosity and brave friendship of your country have warmed our hearts on many occasions not far distant, and to you, Mr. Speaker, to the afflicted citizens of Winnipeg, and to the whole Canadian people we send our heartfelt sympathy.

Douglas Clifton Brown,
Speaker

QUESTION AS TO DESIRABILITY OF BOMBING OPERATIONS ON LAKE WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? Can the minister say whether any consideration has been given to the possibility of blasting the ice in the Nelson river, or perhaps even a bombing operation in lake Winnipeg, to help get the water away? I do not know whether the idea is feasible, but it has been suggested to me and I put it to the minister.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): When I was in Winnipeg on Saturday that question was referred to, and I understand from the representatives of the provincial departments concerned, as well as of the armed forces that it is not considered that the course suggested would have any beneficial effect. While I saw ice in lake Winnipeg, I was informed that the presence of it did not cause the Red river to back up in a way which interfered with the flow of the river.

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF SHAW-CARSWELL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it will be possible to have the terms of the Shaw-Carswell commission tabled or made public in some way?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have just read them to the house, and I assume they will be in Hansard. If the hon. member wishes to see a copy of the statement I read to the house, I shall send it over to him.

Mr. Knowles: That is the complete document?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is the complete document.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—REQUEST FOR WAIVING OF WAITING PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Labour a question, based on a telegram a copy of which has been sent to me? Can the minister say whether he or his department have had a request from the trade union people in Winnipeg to waive the waiting period in connection with unemployment insurance for workers who have been put out of remunerative work by the flood conditions?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): May I ask the hon member the name of the person who sent that telegram?

Mr. Knowles: It is Mr. C. F. Schubert, international representative, retail, wholesale and department store union.

Mr. Mitchell: I may say to my hon. friend that the waiting period is statutory. It is a provision enacted by this parliament, and an amendment to the act would be required to change it.

Mr. Fulton: Bring it in, then.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DEHYDRATED POTATO POWDER

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth):

1. Has the Department of Agriculture carried out any research work in connection with the (a) development; (b) marketing of dehydrated potato powder?
2. If so (a) at what places was such research carried out; (b) under whose supervision?
3. Will the results of such research be made public, and the potato growers of Nova Scotia and other provinces notified?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. No. However, during the war investigations were conducted on dehydrated potato strips by the division of horticulture, central experimental farm, Ottawa, in co-operation with the division of chemistry, science service, and the fruit and vegetable division, marketing service.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Results of investigations on dehydrated potato strips were made available to processors.

CRIMINAL CODE—NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

When is it expected to bring the Criminal Code into force in Newfoundland?

Mr. Garson: A draft bill bringing the Criminal Code into force in Newfoundland was sent to the attorney general of Newfoundland with the request that he comment thereon and furnish a list of the Newfoundland criminal statutes to be repealed. A reply was received on May 9, and the final draft of the bill is now being prepared.

WARTIME HOUSING—LANDSCAPING

Mr. Knight:

1. Is landscaping of wartime housing property let by contract?
2. If so, what size units do these contracts cover?
3. What amount of money has been spent by the government for this purpose in (a) Saskatoon; (b) Edmonton?
4. Considering only the lots where such improvements have been carried out, what is the average expenditure per lot across Canada for such landscaping?

Mr. Prudham:

With respect to war workers and veterans rental housing, built by Wartime Housing Limited and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation:

1. Yes.

2. The number of house lots covered by these contracts varies from 25 to 500.

3. (a) $57,228.60; (b) $64,643.34. Contracts for the landscaping of projects initiated under the 1948 and 1949 programs have not yet been awarded.

4. $65 per lot.

CHALK RIVER ATOMIC ENERGY PLANT—SALARIES

Mr. Hodgson:

How many officials or employees of the atomic energy plant at Chalk River, Ontario, receive $6,000 or more per year, and what are their names and official positions?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

Name— Official Position—

Keys, Dr. D. A., Vice-president (scientific) and project manager.

Lewis, Dr. W. B., Director, research division.

Taylor, Dr. R. M., Chief, medical services.

Skelly, Dr. W. R., Senior works doctor.

Hatfield, G. W., Manager, industrial operations.

Cipriani, Dr. A. J., Assistant director, biology and health radiation subdivision.

Watson, Dr. W. H., Assistant director, physics subdivision.

Williamson, Dr. N. L., Senior works doctor.

Laurence, Dr. G. C., Assistant director, chemical and engineering subdivision.

Gray, J. L., Chief, administrative services.

Renton, Dr. E. M., Works doctor.

Sargent, Dr. B. W., Head of nuclear physics branch.

Dobush, P., General superintendent, architectural service.

Cook, Dr. L. G., Head, chemical branch.

Gilbert, F. W., General superintendent, industrial operations.

Wright, R. F., Assistant manager, industrial operations.

Hansen, Dr. E. B., Dentist.

Morison, T. W., General superintendent, administrative services.

ILE A LA CROSSE, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. Coldwell:

1. For how long was Mr. A. Ahenakew the postmaster at Ile a la Crosse, Saskatchewan?
2. Were there any irregularities in the post office prior to November, 1949?
3. If so, what was the nature of these irregularities?
4. What action, if any, was taken in each case?
5. Have any specific charges been brought against Mr. Ahenakew as a result of the shortage in accounts which occurred in November, 1949?
6. If so, what are these charges?
7. If not, why was he relieved of office?
8. Has Mr. Ahenakew offered any explanation of the shortage in accounts?
9. If so, what is this explanation?
10. How did this shortage in accounts first come to the attention of the authorities?
11. What is Mr. Ahenakew's present address and occupation?
12. What is his age?

Mr. Lapointe:

1. From August 5, 1948 to November 24, 1949.

2. Yes.

3. (a) Failure to promptly send in money order returns in July and August, 1949; (b) failure to remit relative money orders for c.o.d. parcels during October, 1949.

4. Inquiry made by district post office inspector, Saskatoon.

5. Yes.

6. The district post office inspector has been instructed to lay charges under section 98 of the Post Office Act and to consult the crown attorney as regards laying charges under section 94 of the Post Office Act.

7. Because of a shortage of about $2,000 in accounts in November, 1949.

8. Yes.

9. Mr. Ahenakew has stated that accounts of the store and charges on c.o.d. parcels were settled by money order without the relative money to cover the money orders being placed in the post office till.

10. As a result of the inspection of the office by the post office inspector.

11. Not known.

12. Sixty-three years.

CANCER—TUMOUR REGISTRY

Mr. Macnaughton:

1. Has a tumour registry been established in the Department of National Health and Welfare?
2. If so, what are its functions?
3. May any Canadian physician or surgeon send material to the registry?
4. Is the registry organized to obtain information regarding the likelihood of recurrence following treatment of various types of cancer?
5. Are tumour registries of this type maintained by other countries?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes. The Department of National Health and Welfare has collaborated with the National Cancer Institute of Canada in the establishment at the laboratory of hygiene of the Canadian tumour registry.

2. From across Canada tissues from the rare as well as the commoner tumours are being sent to the registry, together with pertinent clinical data. Microscopic preparations are made and the tumours are catalogued and indexed for further study. Sets of preparations are made which will be available for study to those doctors in Canada concerned with cancer diagnosis.

3. No. The Canadian tumour registry is for the use of pathologists since pathologists only are concerned with the microscopic diagnosis of cancer.

4. The registry is in constant communication with contributing pathologists regarding this matter by means of a follow-up system which has been organized. At intervals cards are sent to contributing pathologists requesting information as to the condition of the patient from which the tumour was removed.

5. Yes. In the United States, located at the American Institute of Pathology, Washington, and in London, England.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—INFORMATION SERVICES

Mr. Cleaver:

1. How many employees of the information services division of the Department of National Health and Welfare are engaged as editors or writers of periodicals, booklets, etc., and/or in connection with the production of radio features, films or film strips on health or welfare education subjects?

2. What additional staff is there in the division, and what is the nature of their duties?

Mr. Martin:

1. Eight.

2. Nine stenographers and typists; 6 clerical duties; 2 shippers and packers; 1 biological photographer; 2 darkroom technicians.

FREIGHT RATES—GRAIN SHIPMENTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Hatfield:

1. How many cars of grain were shipped under the subsidized freight payments to Newfoundland since confederation to date?

2. How many bushels of each kind of grain did each car contain?

3. What price was the above grain invoiced at?

4. Who made the request for the subsidy freight payment?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. Information not available. Feed grain is not always shipped in car lots.

2. Answered by No. 1. Statement shows total weight of each kind of grain shipped during period April 1, 1949, to April 30, 1950.

Kind of grain	Tons	Bushels
Wheat	609·90	20,330–00
Oats	8,145·90	479,170–20
Barley	1,665·95	69,414–28
Rye	14·00	500–00
Screenings	489·15	Nil
Millfeeds	2,354·10	Nil
Total	13,279·00

3. Examination of the invoices shows that grain shipped to Newfoundland was invoiced at various prices dependent on date and conditions of purchase.

4. Payments made on claims submitted by wholesale handlers of feeds and feed grain on submission of proof that (1) the grain has been shipped and the freight paid, (2) that the grain has been sold to a consumer, retail dealer or co-operative, and (3) that the consumer or retail buyer has been allowed the freight assistance claimed by the wholesaler.

Statement of amount paid to each dealer during period April 1, 1949, to April 30, 1950:

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

RELIEF PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Mr. Hansell:

1. Did the dominion government advance any moneys to any of the provinces during 1949 for the purpose of relief?

2. If so, how much was advanced to each province, and on what agreement?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ILE-À-LA CROSSE, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between any person or persons and the post office and transport departments since January 1, 1949, with respect to the post office at Ile-à-la-Crosse, Saskatchewan.

ILE-À-LA CROSSE, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between Mr. A. Ahenakew, of Ile-à-la-Crosse, Saskatchewan, and the government, since January 1, 1948.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN C.P.R. AND CUSTODIAN OF ENEMY PROPERTY

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East):

For a copy of a certain agreement entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the custodian of enemy property in Canada in 1931 and referred to in order in council P.C. 458, dated the 6th day of March, 1937.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which happens to come under my jurisdiction, and concerns an agreement which was entered into some years ago between the custodian and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company relating to certain shares which were transferred, I believe during the first world war. We regard this as a privileged document. The question as between the parties is now before the courts, and for that reason I must object to the production of the document.

Motion dropped.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND COD FISHERY—QUESTION AS TO PRICE SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, of which I have given notice. In view of the serious situation which has developed in many parts of Newfoundland, due to the determination of fishermen not to prosecute the cod fishery this year until they are given a definite assurance that they will receive a fair price for fish caught, is the government prepared to give such assurance? If not, will the government make a statement as to what it is prepared to do in regard to price support for the 1950 catch of (a) shore fish, and (b) Labrador fish?

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I believe that little can be added to the answer made to the member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) in reply to a similar question a few days ago. A meeting of persons interested in the salt codfish industry of the Atlantic provinces is being convened in Ottawa next week by the Department of Fisheries, for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts in connection with this complex problem. Notices of this meeting are going forward to the industry today. When government policy has been formulated, it will be announced.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC SERVICE—TRAVELLING AND LIVING EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that two questions standing in my name were passed as orders for returns on April 24. The first one dealt with travelling and living expense accounts of all departments of government since April 1, 1949, and the second with travelling expenses and living allowances of government officials who have travelled beyond the borders of Canada since April 1, 1949. Can this information not be provided now? The public accounts committee is sitting, and it is necessary to have it.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the question to which the hon. member refers involves a considerable amount of research, and the gathering in of a lot of items. In addition several departments are involved. We have been endeavouring, particularly during the last couple of days, to speed the obtaining of this information, but it will still take a few days before we can bring it all together.

I suppose it often happens that questions are asked which cover a wider field than the member asking the question actually intended to cover. If the hon. member could restrict his question somewhat, we might produce at an earlier date the information he wants.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think it should be necessary to restrict the question. All I ask for is the travelling and other expenses incurred by persons travelling for the government of Canada outside of Canada. That should be readily available.

Mr. Graydon: The books must be mixed up.

Mr. Bradley: I do not keep the books.

MINISTERS AND PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS—TRAVELLING EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): When the Secretary of State is getting the information requested by the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), will he get the answer to my question which was made an order for return on March 16? It concerns the travelling expenses of cabinet ministers and parliamentary assistants. I do not think it should need any research.

DOUKHOBORS

DAMAGING OF C.P.R. BRIDGE AT GRAND FORKS, B.C. —REQUEST FOR MOUNTED POLICE ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, in view of the worsening situation in the Grand Forks area of British Columbia, where the Doukhobor atrocities culminated in the blowing up of the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge at Grand Forks on Sunday night, and in view of the suggestions forwarded to the Minister of Justice by the Grand Forks council and board of trade, is the minister prepared to make a statement on this serious situation which has aroused the citizens of this area?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. The only information we have, other than that which has appeared in the press, is that on Monday morning, May 15, we received a telephone message from Mr. Mead, a former Royal Canadian Mounted Police officer who is advising the British Columbia government in this connection, to the effect that both ends of the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge at Grand Forks had been blown up with dynamite. It was believed that Doukhobors were responsible, and that it was an indication of defiance following the arrest of a number of Doukhobors a few days previously by the British Columbia police.

We received a telegram from the attorney general of British Columbia, Hon. Gordon Wismer, requesting that an officer and twenty men of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police be lent to the British Columbia police, because of the continued threat of violence in Doukhobor communities. The commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police instructed that members of the force from Alberta, to the numbers requested, should report to Nelson, British Columbia, where they will act under the direction of the commissioner of the British Columbia police, and Mr. Wismer was advised accordingly.

CANADA PRIZE ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZE MONEY

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 221, to provide for the payment and distribution of prize money.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out yesterday, prize money dates from the thirteenth century. A reference to its antiquity was made in the London Times of December 20, 1945, where it was said:

> For centuries the hope of prize was largely responsible for keeping the navy adequately manned. The reward of a successful engagement was the distribution among the crew of the value of the capture.

The arrangements for payment varied from time to time. Up to the great war of 1914-19, one-third of the value of ship and cargo taken as prize was kept by the crown; two-thirds were paid to the crew which actually made the capture. After the great war, however, the prize fund, consisting of two-thirds of the value of all prizes, was distributed not to the crew making the capture but among personnel of all His Majesty's navy on a graduated per capita basis. An admiral received two hundred and eighty-three times as much as an ordinary seaman. The minimum qualification was one month's service at sea. Shares were distributed according to rank and sea service. Thirty months at sea was required for the maximum share. But the administration of the fund proved costly and difficult, and it was not until twelve years after the war that the final payment was made. It should be emphasized that even in the United Kingdom no one had a right to prize money but that payment was made as an act of grace by exercise of the royal prerogative.

In Canada, prize money has never been distributed at the instance of the Canadian government. After world war I, personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy participated in the distribution of the fund not as a result of Canadian legislation but as a result of the enactment by the parliament of the United Kingdom of the Naval Prize Act, 1918, and of the royal proclamation that followed. When it came to the question of prize money in the second world war, the situation had changed. Shortly after the war the nations of the commonwealth reached an agreement as to the method of division between the various countries.

Four main points were agreed to. First, since personnel of all the navies were spread throughout many theatres of war, the actual location of the capture and the ultimate disposal of the vessel taken should not be the test for determining who should benefit. It was therefore agreed that all nations would contribute to a common pool the proceeds of prize, wherever captured, and the pool should eventually be distributed among the nations on the basis of comparative strengths of their respective naval forces.

Second, it was agreed that personnel of the air forces should participate. In previous wars, only naval personnel had benefited. This was agreed to in recognition of the arduous work undertaken by air force units, and particularly by coastal commands whose efforts in search and shadowing contributed substantially to the building up of the fund.

Third, it was agreed that, for the purpose of allocating the fund between the naval and air forces, it would be assumed that the fund was built up as to seventy-five per cent by naval action, and as to twenty-five per cent by air force action. The sum due to naval action would then be divided in proportion to the peak naval strength of each nation participating, and the same approach would be adopted for the sum to air force action.

Fourth, and finally, it was agreed that each nation would determine the manner in which its share of the total proceeds would be dealt with.

The United Kingdom Prize Act, 1948, deals with the proceeds of prizes taken during the second world war, but of course makes no reference as to how Canada's share will be disposed of in Canada. As the explanatory memorandum to the United Kingdom Prize Act, 1948, states:

> Any grant of prize money which may be made under the prerogative for the benefit of forces raised by a dominion within the meaning of the Statute of Westminster . . . being outside the purview of the parliament of the United Kingdom, is not the subject of any provision in the bill.

It is estimated that the approximate net amount that will be realized by Canada in respect of prize money will be $2,500,000. If we apply the formula agreed upon, the share payable in respect of the navy would be approximately $1,700,000, or sixty-eight per cent, and the air force share would be about $800,000, or thirty-two per cent.

We have considered two alternative methods of distribution. The first was distribution to individuals. The second was to apportion the Canadian share to the naval and air force benevolent funds respectively. In considering methods of distribution, it may be convenient to see what the situation is in other nations.

In the United States of America, prize money has not been distributed since the Spanish-American war. The proceeds of sale of captured enemy vessels are paid into the treasury. The only comparable position is found in the nations of the commonwealth. Under the method of distribution adopted in the United Kingdom, the air force share will not be distributed to individuals. Instead, it will be paid to charitable and welfare organizations serving past and present members of the Royal Air Force. In the United Kingdom the naval share is being distributed to personnel who have rendered at least 180 days' service at sea, and have not, for any reason of misconduct, forfeited their entitlement. Payments will vary with rank, with one person getting as much as ten times the share of another. It is quite apparent that the only reason the naval share is being distributed to individuals in the United Kingdom is that it was felt that in view of the long tradition of prize money in the Royal Navy, it would be unfair to discontinue in respect of the second world war the practice followed for many years.

It is, however, interesting to note that in the United Kingdom section 8 of the prize act of 1948 has ensured that prize money will never again be paid. His Majesty consented that his prerogative to do so shall not be exercised in respect of any future wars. This is done because the practice of paying prize money is regarded as an anachronism. To quote again from the Times of December 20, 1945:

> There is a widespread feeling that it would suit modern conditions of service better for this historical relic to be assimilated into the normal grant of gratuities on future occasions.

Hon. members will observe from clause 4 of the bill that the proposal is to pay the naval share to the naval benevolent fund and the air force share to the R.C.A.F. benevolent fund. No difficulty is encountered in connection with the air force share; there is no precedent for payment of individual shares in the case of the air force.

I think I should clear up one or two points. There was no undertaking, express or implied, that prize money would be paid on a share basis to personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy. We were therefore free to choose the method of distribution most appropriate to Canadian conditions, and best calculated to benefit naval personnel generally.

The various possible methods of individual distribution were carefully considered, and one by one they were eliminated as unfair and inappropriate to modern conditions of service.

The solution of paying a share to all who served in the navy without regard to rank or sea service was obviously impracticable. The proposal that only persons who had service at sea should benefit is also open to serious objections, because some of those who served on land might have contributed as materially to the taking of a prize as many of those who served at sea. Indeed only two prizes were taken by the Royal Canadian Navy throughout the course of the war. Moreover, if a period of sea service was laid down as a prerequisite, how long a period should it be? One day, one year, or the British qualifying period of 180 days? But what about men who were killed in action after a period of less than 180 days at sea? It became apparent that any arbitrary minimum period would make for unfair discrimination and would be quite unrealistic.

Then of course the question whether or not rank should be taken into account gave rise to difficulty. After the first great war an admiral received 283 times as much as a seaman, and in the United Kingdom on this occasion the differential is reduced to ten times; but still what is the proper differential?

I suggest too that the reason for prize money has long since disappeared. Today officers and men of the navy are paid on exactly the same basis as officers and men of the army and air force. The conditions of service are similar. The sacrifices involved are similar. It was our aim to treat everyone alike. On these accounts we could not see any justification for continuing what everyone regards as something that is utterly out of date. Therefore rather than wait until the next war—if there is to be a next war—to abolish this, or to refrain from making the payment, the naval board recommended to the government that we should adopt this course as in the interests of the great body of sailors, and as a disposition of the matter which would please the greatest possible number.

It has been suggested that we should have adopted another approach to this matter, and consulted the men who might have benefited. Well, before we could consult them we would have had to ascertain who they were, and that was exactly one of the matters which gave rise to the greatest difficulty and one of the chief objections to the whole matter. Of course, the naval officers on the naval board themselves would have benefited from prize money, and they themselves unofficially consulted many of their comrades.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the manner in which it is proposed to dispose of the fund is one which best meets the circumstances. The proceeds of prize money are very similar in their nature and origin to the proceeds from canteen sales and sales of commodities made through the savings of ships' companies themselves, and should therefore be disposed of in the same way as proceeds of canteen funds, and the like, which are paid over to the naval benevolent fund.

That was the course decided upon by this parliament before with respect to canteen funds, and we believe that it is the right course to follow in this case. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the house will agree with the proposals put forward in this bill.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. gentleman permit one question? He has told us about the anachronism of prize money, and how it was paid in the past. How does it originate? On what basis?—on the basis of the number of ships captured and sunk, the number of men in those ships who are captured or killed, or how?

Mr. Claxton: It has varied through the centuries; but substantially the prize money is the actual value of the ship and cargo that is taken in prize from the enemy.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How measured?

Mr. Claxton: By the disposal value of the ship.

Mr. Coldwell: Have they abandoned the old idea of paying on the value of the men captured or killed?

Mr. Claxton: No, men are not valued; only the ship.

Mr. Pearkes: That was blood money.

Mr. Claxton: As the hon. member for Nanaimo points out, that fell into a different category, though frequently lumped together for purposes of consideration. But in this instance the two vessels taken in prize by Canada were the German vessel Weser and the Italian vessel Capo Noli. These would have been condemned at prize by the Canadian prize court, which would have fixed a value on them, and it would have been that value, or the proceeds of their sale, which would have been paid into the prize fund. However, in this case both ships were sunk before they were condemned at prize, and the proceeds of the insurance on the ships now represents the value of the ships and constitutes the Canadian contribution toward the pool.

Under the old arrangement which was in effect until the first world war, the crown would have kept one-third—because all this goes to the crown and forms part of the royal prerogative—and two-thirds would have been paid to the officers and men of the ship which made the capture. At the end of the first world war it was decided that apportionment should be made among all those who served at sea for a certain time. The proposed method of distribution in the United Kingdom is that distribution would be made to all those men who served 180 days, with senior officers receiving ten times as much as the seamen.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to go into the historical background of the distribution to the sailors of that portion of the funds which was obtained from prizes. It has been discussed in this house before. The fact that conditions of service have changed, rates of pay have been augmented and the benefits to sailors after their service have increased tremendously in comparison with the conditions obtaining a hundred years and more ago, bears out the contention that the distribution of prize money grants to sailors is an out-of-date method.

Naval traditions, however, die hard. After the first world war considerable sums of money were distributed by the admiralty to men of the Royal Canadian Navy. Many of these same men served during world war II and they had a reasonable anticipation of obtaining some prize money grants at the end of that war.

The minister has called attention to the fact that the admiralty has decided that in any future war no prize money will be distributed to the men of the fleet. He said that the admiralty had recognized that it would be unfair not to distribute prize money after this war to men who had been expecting it. If it is unfair not to distribute money to men of the Royal Navy who were expecting some small grants from prize money, it is equally unfair not to distribute some small amount of money to the men of the Royal Canadian Navy.

It is no use saying that there was no undertaking. Of course there was no undertaking, but there was no undertaking as far as the men of the Royal Navy were concerned. These grants have always been acts of grace and the men of the Royal Canadian Navy know perfectly well that there was no undertaking to pay these grants. But they expect that the same act of grace would apply to them as was applied to the sailors of the Royal Canadian Navy after the last war. They feel that it is an ungracious act that there should be denied to them the small amount of money which would be coming to them as a result of prizes which were captured.

The amount is quite immaterial. The fact remains that there is an old naval tradition which is being broken. That is hurting the morale of the navy and it is hurting the men who served in the navy and are now retired into civilian life. I regret very much that the minister has arrived at this decision.

If the men are not going to receive the grants there is no better place for them to go to than the naval benevolent fund. But I am still firmly of the opinion, which opinion is supported by a number of letters I have received recently—I received one only yesterday and another one from Esquimalt only a week ago—that the men feel this very keenly and resent what they consider to be a high-handed and arbitrary decision to refuse them the small amount of money they thought was coming to them.

If the money is not going to be distributed among the crews of the ships, then these men would like to see it go to the naval benevolent fund rather than anywhere else. Yesterday the minister said, as reported on page 2563 of Hansard:

> The suggestion that prize money was necessary as a kind of compensation for the loss of possible earnings has ceased to exist, particularly in Canada, where our benefits to veterans are on a more favourable basis than in any other country.

That may be true, but the purpose of the naval benevolent fund is to augment those very benefits which the minister points out are so generous. The explanatory note to section 4 of the bill states that the naval service benevolent trust fund is used to relieve distress and promote the well-being of members or ex-members of the naval forces of Canada or their dependents.

One of the objections raised is that many of the men in the service today would not have contributed anything toward the actions which produced these prizes because they are new recruits who came into the navy since the cessation of hostilities. It is little use to continue this argument which has been continued at some length. The minister and the government have made up their minds to distribute this money in the manner indicated. I repeat that I regret that they have reached that decision as I consider it unfair and breaking an ancient tradition which might well be preserved. I submit it would have been much better to have taken a little time and distributed the amounts accruing to the individual men. Therefore I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate that I am also opposed to this bill for the reasons outlined by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). However, one thing strikes me particularly about this matter and that is that whereas the minister has pointed out that in the United Kingdom it has been decided not to continue the distribution of prize money in any wars which may subsequently take place, they are going on to distribute all prize moneys which accrued as a result of the war just concluded. We in Canada have gone a step beyond that and have decided not only not to distribute prize money in any subsequent war in which we may be involved but not to distribute prize money of the war of 1939-45.

That being the case I would have expected to find in the bill some concrete provision that hereafter no prize money would be payable, that notwithstanding whatever source it might come from in the future no prize money would be distributed to Canadian sailors or members of the air force. There is no such provision in the bill. It seems to me that that should have been made clear in the legislation so that men who join the forces in the future will know exactly where they stand. To me that makes the bill twice as objectionable as it otherwise would be.

We are legislating to lay down a principle to be applied now and in the future and are also denying to a group of men what would otherwise have been theirs. It seems to me that the bill is so utterly devoid of principle that it becomes nothing more or less than—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Theft.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Fulton: I was going to use that word but the hon. member for Greenwood has supplied it for me. The minister has said that it is difficult to get in touch with these men to find out how they feel about it and so the government decided to take the law into their own hands and pass legislation which has a retroactive effect, which is always objectionable. It is particularly objectionable in this case because it denies to men who served through the war money, small though it may have been, which they felt they were entitled to by virtue of their service and the vessels which they captured. I think this is a most objectionable and fraudulent piece of legislation, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word in protest against the bill. As the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) said, I feel that no organization is more deserving of this prize money than the benevolent funds if it is not going to be distributed individually. The amount of money involved for each individual would probably be very small indeed. Nevertheless it is the principle involved. In future wars it will not be distributed individually, and possibly it should not have been during the past war as the minister has said that no assurance was given that it would be. On the other hand, no statement was made to the men that it would not be distributed, and they expected it and looked forward to it as a matter of tradition and right. After they have waited for some word about this matter for the past five years, the government has now decided that it will not give it to them. I honestly believe that the whole matter of awarding prize money is out of date, but nevertheless during the period of the past war every sailor in the Canadian navy had a right to expect the payment of prize money in line with the traditions of the navy. If he was not going to get it he should have been told prior to his enlistment. If the bill dealt only with future wars I might be in agreement with it, but I do not believe in taking their prize money away five years after they have earned it—something that has been traditionally theirs.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks of the last two speakers I think I should present the opposite point of view. I do not pretend to speak for the air force but I know the feelings of my colleagues with whom I served in that force. Their general feeling is that the method proposed by the bill is the only sensible way to distribute this prize money. The practice of distributing prize money goes back to the days of the privateers when crews were enlisted forcibly by letters of mark. These men were sent abroad and they believed they were going to get a good thing out of whatever they captured. Such a practice really has no connection with our modern navy, army or air force. If it is a question of awarding it to the navy because of what they captured, then may I suggest that if there is one service which should be getting the prize money it is the Canadian army. Infantry and tanks captured a thousand times more real property than the navy.

There is a second point which I think is important today. It is the matter of trying to get consistent terms of service in the three branches of our armed forces. This is not a new thing with me. I remember at the time of the conscription debate in 1944 one of the reasons why the army had such trouble in getting recruits at the very time that the air force was turning them away was the fact that conditions of service in the air force had been made so attractive, mainly owing to the great interest taken by the former minister for air, the present member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). As a Canadian and a veteran I am glad to see the steps that have been taken since the war to provide the same conditions of service and the same rewards for service in each of the three branches. Without any authority from the air force association or anybody else I can say that no airman joined at the beginning of the war with the expectation of receiving prize money. I further say that not one Canadian in a thousand who joined the Canadian navy ever thought or expected to receive prize money. I would also say that the great rank and file of veterans who served either in the navy or in the air force think that the best place to put the money is in the benevolent funds in order to help those of our colleagues who may need assistance from that source. When I hear the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) making a suggestion of fraud I think he is getting very far from the feeling of the average man who was in the services with regard to this prize money.

The point I want to make is a little different. If the money is going to be turned over to the navy and air force benevolent funds for the use of naval and air force veterans who may need help, I think there is a direct obligation on the government and on parliament to exercise a little more scrutiny of the funds than is the case today. In the last two or three days I was a little shocked to read in a newspaper—I just cannot put my finger on it at the moment—a report of the R.C.A.F. benevolent fund. As I recall, in round figures the fund amounts to around $2 million. Last year they paid out about $50,000 in grants and loans to deserving air force veterans. The astounding thing, however, is that the cost of administration was $53,000. It may have been an error in the paper but if it cost $53,000 to administer loans amounting to $50,000 then the government had better take an active interest in the proceedings of this benevolent association before turning over this prize money.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to try to make a mountain of this matter but I cannot help expressing a word of regret because it seems to me, as has already been said, that we are dealing ex post facto with a situation which existed. I very much doubt that the minister will be able to assure us that no reference to prize money was made in the recruiting of navy personnel. I doubt very much that he could give such an assurance, and even if he did it is quite possible that a good many men, knowing the history of the navy, may have been induced to join by that as well as by other reasons.

Mr. Sinclair: That is putting a pretty low price on naval enlistment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, I disagree with that entirely. I do not agree that there should not be a sort of element of sportsmanship in a thing which had a great element of risk in it anyway. As the hon. member pointed out so well, the army, about which as a former member of the air force he spoke so generously, had considerable opportunity as a matter of fact by private initiative to do a little collecting on its own, whereas those who were on the sea and in the air did not have much chance to do that. Speaking seriously again, I will not labour the point but I cannot help but say that I do not believe this is the proper way to handle it.

Mr. Coldwell: Did the hon. member say "private enterprise" or "private initiative"?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Private initiative. I cannot forbear expressing some regret that we did not see fit to deal with this matter as they did in Great Britain where it seems, as so often is the case, they found a useful compromise.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to inject myself into the debate but there have been certain remarks in connection with the bill about which I should like to say something. While I cannot speak for members of the Canadian navy I feel—and it is my experience that this is the view of those who were in that service—that few looked forward to prize money on enlistment. I feel that those who enlisted did so for a much higher purpose than obtaining prize money which might be theirs as the result of moneys in this fund. It seems to me also that many of those who served in the army, navy and air force have now rehabilitated themselves in civilian life, and that they are quite prepared to have the money turned over to those less fortunate who may need it for some benevolent purpose.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have only one or two words to say. In the first place I should like to assure the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that I made most careful inquiries of the navy and at national defence headquarters, and it was not possible to find that in any recruiting publicity the holding out of the possibility of prize money was used as an inducement to men to enlist. Therefore, so far as we have been able to ascertain, there was no holding out of such an inducement. I should like to suggest to the hon. member with all respect that the nature of his own comment on this subject indicates how little seriousness there is in the opposition to the move we are now making when it is put in terms, even facetiously, that payment to individuals would be justified because in a sense it might equalize the possibility in the army of obtaining some loot. I hope the hon. member was not very serious about that. If I may say so, it indicates the level of the arguments put forward by those who have opposed this measure. I venture to say I have seen more of the officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy during the last three years than most hon. members, and I have taken every possible opportunity to discuss with them what was their own desire with regard to this measure. I can assure hon. members that I have not as yet come face to face with an officer or man who felt that the right way to deal with this was a way which everyone in this house admits is out of date. The resolutions and letters that have been sent to us are very largely limited to one locality in Canada.

I do not believe for a moment that any principle whatever is involved in this. There has been no holding out, no inducement; the question is how this money, which is a windfall, may be best disposed of in the interests of the officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy. In adopting this course we have not satisfied everyone, but we have proceeded as the great majority of the men who served at sea would like us to proceed; that is, for the benefit of those of their comrades who are less well off than some of the others.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

[Mr. Cavers.]

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the second time.

Mr. Claxton: If I have consent I move:

That Bill No. 221, an act to provide for the payment and distribution of prize money, be referred to the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 133, an act respecting national defence, and that the committee be empowered to consider the said Bill No. 221.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 210, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Where duty does not exceed 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I might say just a few words of explanation in the beginning. If hon. members will refer back to the ways and means resolutions, they will find that the ways and means resolution on the customs tariff is almost exactly identical with this bill. While a resolution usually sets out the general intent of the bill only, that is not possible in the customs tariff resolution, because there has to be specific reference to the items that are to be changed; and if you compare the ways and means resolution with the important sections of this bill you will find them exactly the same, with the exception of section 2. In the resolution there were three subclauses, which here have been consolidated into two; I shall deal with that when we come to the section.

In view of the fact that we had a very long discussion on each clause in the resolution stage, and the fact that this bill is identical with the resolution, I do not see that anything is to be gained by repeating what I said at that time. However, since this is the second of the tax bills, perhaps at this time I should answer the one question which was unanswered at the time we discussed the excise tax bill. The hon. member for Peterborough West and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox asked at that time whether this prepared whipping cream which was being exempt from sales tax was just 30 per cent cream. I have made inquiries and find that it is cream of 30 per cent butterfat, so it is all cream. The hon. member for Danforth asked whether steps were being taken to ensure that this concession was extended only to real dairy products, and not to products which were either adulterated with vegetable oils or composed entirely of vegetable oils. I have made inquiries and find that the pure food act covers that, so this sales tax exemption applies only to pure dairy products.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand the change here is the insertion of the words "under the British preferential tariff" and so on, and that this is an outcome of the Geneva treaties.

Mr. Sinclair: That is true.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the parliamentary assistant say a further word about that?

Mr. Sinclair: Before Geneva there was a special 10 per cent discount to the duty on imports from British countries where the duty was in excess of 15 per cent. It was argued at Geneva, however, that in those instances where the rate of duty on British goods and the most-favoured-nation rate of duty were the same this 10 per cent discount constituted a hidden advantage for the British, an advantage not contemplated under those agreements. That was threshed out, and it was agreed that this 10 per cent will not apply on items where the British tariff and the most-favoured-nation tariff are the same. In order that hon. members could see the effect of it I put on Hansard a list of those items on which the British tariff and the most-favoured-nation tariff are the same. That is at page 2176, and it shows that these items amount in all to about $3 million, in a total British import of over $500 million.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if I might take this opportunity to ask the parliamentary assistant whether he can tell me anything concerning representations which have been made to the minister regarding the tariff on irrigation sprinkler heads. It has been represented that these articles are not readily available in Canada and that western producers particularly, who have to irrigate their orchards, are penalized by the very considerable tariff that is charged when these sprinkler heads are imported. I believe the Minister of Finance has been giving consideration to the matter over the past couple of weeks, and I wonder if the parliamentary assistant can tell us the present position.

Mr. Sinclair: The question was raised a year ago by the hon. member for Kamloops and, I think, the hon. member for Calgary East, with respect to the complete portable irrigation equipment. That situation has been adjusted; there is an ample supply available in Canada today. I am told, however, that there is a temporary shortage of the sprinkler heads. This has been brought to the attention of the department and they are trying now to see that a satisfactory supply is made available; or if that cannot be done an adjustment in regard to the tariff will be carefully considered. There is no adjustment in this tariff.

Mr. Fulton: Then do I understand that if an adequate supply of sprinkler heads cannot be made available domestically the department will consider an adjustment in the tariff for future years?

Mr. Sinclair: That is one of the items for discussion at Torquay this summer.

Mr. Thatcher: I am still not clear on section 1. Do I understand the parliamentary assistant to say that on these items he mentions, cotton goods and the like, the concession which the British formerly enjoyed is being taken away? Does that mean in effect that they are going to have to pay a tariff of 10 per cent more on those goods?

Mr. Sinclair: The problem stems back to the fact that over and above the British preferential tariff the British had been given another discount of 10 per cent on those tariffs which were in excess of 15 per cent. At Geneva we gave other countries the same tariff rate as the British on some items in return for concessions made to the United Kingdom. We were told that was not good enough. They said that they were supposed to be on the same rate as the British, and while the tariff schedule shows that they were, we were still giving a 10 per cent discount to the British. This is discrimination which we agreed not to impose under the Geneva trade agreement. Our country agreed and the British agreed that Canada should discontinue this discriminatory practice, and as a consequence in all those items on which the British preferential tariff and the most-favoured-nation tariff are the same, the discount is no longer allowed. The discount still applies on a great range of items on which the British have a tariff preference even over the most-favoured-nation.

Mr. Thatcher: In effect, this clause 1 takes away a 10 per cent preference, a tariff preference or a discount preference, whatever you want to call it, on these particular British goods. Is that correct?

Mr. Sinclair: A 10 per cent discount, not a duty.

Mr. Thatcher: In dollars and cents, whether you call it a discount or a tariff, it is the same.

Mr. Sinclair: A 10 per cent tariff is different from a 10 per cent discount on a tariff.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The parliamentary assistant used the word "discount". Will he make it clear by giving an illustration, because there is a confusion in terms here.

Mr. Sinclair: I shall give an example. Take an item on which there is a twenty per cent tariff if the goods are of British origin, and twenty per cent under the most-favoured-nation treatment. Actually, if we had not had this arrangement in our tariff law both would pay twenty per cent, but because of this provision in our law we were giving a ten per cent discount on that twenty per cent tariff. In effect, therefore, as the goods were of British origin they would receive a ten per cent discount, yet in our tariff we would have both the British and most-favoured-nation rates of duty listed as twenty per cent. It was claimed that this was a hidden discount which we agreed at Geneva to eliminate as soon as the necessary legislation could be enacted.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But if there was a one per cent difference, you would still be able to give the discount?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right. It applies to such a small range of goods, only about $3 million out of a total of $520 million.

Mr. Thatcher: But it all boils down to one thing, that it is an increase in the tariff against British goods; at least the net effect is that. In a few months we are going to Torquay to negotiate these agreements, and it seems to me that the government is not coming to parliament very often about these things. When the delegation is there perhaps they will whittle away any British preference we may have left. I think this is a matter for concern in this parliament, and I wish the minister would state this afternoon what the policy of the Canadian delegation is going to be so far as the British preferential tariffs are concerned. He must have some idea. I think we should have freer trade, but I think at the moment this British preference, in view of our trading position, should be approached with some care.

Mr. Sinclair: I think the member for Greenwood has grasped the point of this, but I shall explain it again. The difficulty which the British and we have, as well as many other nations, in trying to get goods into the United States is that the United States has a tariff schedule, and then they have so many other restrictions. Despite the fact that the tariff is open, there are these other difficulties in the way of getting goods into that country. This problem has been brought up again and again by both the British and Canadian exporters and manufacturers.

At Geneva a real attempt was made to do away with all these hidden concessions, discounts and so on which actually vitiate the effect of the published tariff. The only example we had of that was this very thing. We told the most favoured nations they were getting the same tariff on certain goods as the British. These countries had to make concessions to us to get it, only to find out that, while that appeared to be true in the tariff schedule, by this other agreement we were giving the British a ten per cent discount, actually a two per cent tariff reduction in cases where the rate was twenty per cent. These countries of course said, "You are no better than the United States so far as that is concerned; all of these things have to go." Our great hope, and that of all the countries, of getting into the American market as freely as we would like is the removal of these concessions from the British preferential tariff. We have taken our step towards doing that.

Getting rid of these hidden concessions, so far as we are concerned, actually affects $3 million worth of goods in a total importation of $520 million. I do not think that is too great a concession to be given by the British or by ourselves in order to achieve uniformity. If all the countries who signed the Geneva agreement can get away from these extra concessions and hidden discounts which actually destroy the open tariff picture, then uniformity will be achieved.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we are constantly doing this sort of thing without any assurance from the United States that we are getting similar treatment. Our government agreed to the Geneva agreement, and for a time I think it adversely affected our trade with Britain. We have never approved of that agreement in this house, but bit by bit we find ourselves giving more concessions, allegedly because of the methods adopted by the United States. I have not been able to find out that we have been able, to any great extent, to iron out these difficulties with the United States that have bothered Canadian exporters for a great many years.

For example, I was informed that the exporters of apples from the Annapolis valley into the United States had their apples stopped at the border. Although the boxes were marked "product of Canada" the wrappers in which the apples were wrapped were not marked "product of Canada", and because there is some regulation that each package must contain the name of the country of origin, there was great difficulty in getting those apples into the United States. Another example, which is better authentically from my point of view, concerns the manufacture of some bricks in the maritime provinces. A couple of carloads of bricks were ordered for a town in the state of Maine. The car was marked "product of Canada", but the customs authorities of the United States insisted that every brick should be marked "product of Canada". The young men told me that they had to unload the carload of bricks and rubber stamp each brick, "product of Canada."

Now, it seems to me—

Mr. Graydon: That is the brick for brick tariff wall.

Mr. Coldwell: There is no question about that. It seems to me that if we are going to make concessions, if it is only two per cent or a fraction of one per cent against the customer who has in past years been our best customer, we should pause before we agree to a provision of this sort. Because of the Geneva agreement and the non-discriminatory features of this agreement, we have made some quite valuable concessions to the United States, and have placed some considerable barriers against our trade with the United Kingdom. While I think we must do whatever we can to improve our trade relationship with the United States as well as with Britain, I do not think these arrangements should be one-sided, and they should make a greater effort than they have been making to remove these rigid regulations which they used from time to time to prevent the importation into their country of goods from Canada and from other countries. I believe that is the important point.

Mr. Sinclair: I am glad the hon. member has raised this matter. In the resolution stage I said that although we have not introduced formal legislation so far as the Geneva trade agreement is concerned, we have given statutory effect to about 465 out of almost 1,000 items considered at either Geneva or Annecy. One of the few advantages I can think of, in so far as these continuing conferences are concerned, is that at Geneva certain agreements were reached. We came back to the various countries at the next conference and were able to show that we had done a great deal towards implementing that agreement. It is for that reason I want to see this bill passed. Then none of the signatories to these agreements will be in a better position than Canada. We shall be able to say, "We have done this; what have you done?" The other countries which have not made measurable advances in carrying out the spirit of Geneva are not going to be able to ask for further concessions.

When this bill is in effect, we can say we have gone still further in carrying out the provisions we agreed to at Geneva. I am very glad the hon. member raised the question of the marking of products because it is another example of a technique which has been used, quite aside from the provisions in the tariff to block the entry of goods from Canada into the United States. We are doing our part in this connection and I am told there is legislation before congress now. The Americans apparently are also anxious to have their house in order before they take the next step. In section 3, when I come to it—I mentioned it in the resolution stage—we had an extra penalty. If the goods were not marked in accordance with our regulations we had, as well as a penalty, an extra 10 per cent ad valorem duty which we imposed. It was agreed that that sort of thing was actually in restraint of trade and the signatory countries should do away with this extra penalty. To hold goods and mark them at public expense was all right; but then to put on a penalty duty as well was not right. Here we are taking our action to correct the situation which the hon. member aptly described with regard to Annapolis valley apples and with regard to bricks.

Mr. Fulton: The answers given by the parliamentary assistant make the government's position clear; but I wonder if he can just give us some facts which will complete the picture. As I understood him, he said that we shall be in a position to say to these other nations, "We have gone very far to fulfil our part of the obligation." In fact, as I understand him, he said we had gone further than other nations had gone, so we shall be in a good bargaining position at Torquay. That may be a sound position to get into from the point of view of bargaining, but I do not think it is a sound position to get into unless we be sure that the other nations are going to agree. When we point out to them that we have gone this far and they have not, if we are not sure of that and if we go on taking the lead, we are definitely harming our trading prospects and particularly we are hurting the country which in the past has been our best customer. I should like to know, though not in any detail, how far the United States has gone. I suggest that the parliamentary assistant tell us generally whether in fact these tactics of ours have succeeded in bringing the United States as far along the road as we would like to see them go.

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that, of the 23 countries that signed at Geneva and the 9 more that came in at Annecy, satisfactory action has been taken by all the countries of which we have record. It is difficult to check accurately, especially since there has not been much time since Annecy and most of these governments have had only one sitting of their parliaments; but at Torquay we shall know how far they have gone. If we have gone farther than any of them, then we will be in a position to mark time. But I am informed that we ourselves and Britain, the people who are of course most interested in export trade, are the countries that have done the most in trying to live up to the things that we said we would do at both Geneva and Annecy.

As to the question of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I should like to make one little point about his suggestion that we have hurt Britain's trade. As you will recall, last month for the first time—

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, yes, I know.

Mr. Sinclair: Just as an indication that we are moving in the right direction, for the first time last month we have a British balance of about $2,500,000.

Mr. Coldwell: I think I qualified it by saying that when it came into effect we hurt Britain.

Mr. Thatcher: I am still not satisfied with the explanation given by the parliamentary assistant. As I understood it, in effect he says this clause introduces another step which the government is taking to remove trade barriers. Yet in the next breath he says that the effect will be to increase the tariff against these British goods to the extent of about 2 per cent. I do not see how, time and again when these restrictions are coming off, it always means an increase in the Canadian tariff against British goods. I do not see how that is easing trade restrictions. I should like the minister or the parliamentary assistant to tell me this. When we made this concession, if that is what it was, to certain countries, was there any specific condition that we get any return for it?

Mr. Sinclair: The general problem was to make the printed tariff schedule the actual tariff schedule. As long as countries said, for example, as we said about the British and most-favoured-nation rates on certain items, that the tariff rates are the same, and then with regard to the British, we gave the British a discount, we were in effect not telling the truth in our tariff schedule. We were not alone in doing that. I think perhaps it is not the right thing for me to say here, but the general feeling at least in this country is that the Americans are perhaps the worst offenders in having other hidden blocks than tariffs. The whole object of Geneva was to tear away all these other hidden blocks and devices used in restraint of free trade across international boundaries. The only one which we had at that date, except in the marking provision, which I will mention, in section 3, was this special discount which we gave where the British preferential and most-favoured-nation rates were the same. We still give the British a special discount on all their other tariff rates above 15 per cent. But in this case where we have ostensibly in our tariff schedule said that the British rate and the most-favoured-nation rate are the same, we are in reality afterwards giving the British this discount of 10 per cent of the duty paid. I cannot explain it any more clearly than that. If the other hon. members understand it, perhaps we can go on to the next item.

Mr. Thatcher: We have no alternative but to accept that explanation, but we still do not have to like it. This thing in effect means an increase in the tariff on these British goods.

Mr. Quelch: There is one question I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant. In view of the fact that the United States is the nation today that needs to expand its imports more than any other nation, in consequence of which we are having a great deal of trouble with regard to the scarcity of dollars in the world today, can the parliamentary assistant give us a general idea how far the United States has gone since the Geneva meeting in reducing these tariffs? I am not asking for an itemized report, but for a general idea how far they have actually gone to date. There has been a great deal of talk about reducing tariffs in the United States, but apparently the United States tariff wall is still a fairly high one.

Mr. Sinclair: I am certainly not in a position, in discussing our own Canadian tariff bill, to give you an explanation of what the Americans have done. In our department we have our economic policy counsellors who are willing to provide that information because they make a point of following the results in other countries so that they will be in a position at these various trade conferences at Geneva and Annecy, and now at Torquay, to stack up what we have done against what other countries have done. But there has been a marked improvement, not so much through changes in tariff. This is an example not of a change in the effective tariff rate but of the removal of a hidden discount which was an unfairness and which did give rise to complaint by countries which we were saying were getting the same tariff treatment as the British rate when actually in effect they were not. I myself feel that the best way that we can do our part in any of these international conventions and conferences to clear away these things which are affecting us much more than they are affecting our customers is to put our own house in order, as we are trying to do under this amendment and a little later under the amendment on the marking of goods.

Mr. Johnston: Can the minister tell us what items are being affected by this reduction or this increase?

Mr. Sinclair: I put the entire list on Hansard at page 2176, at the request of the hon. member for York West, so that hon. members would have a chance to study it. The entire list is there. This is the list of goods in which the British have the same rate as the most-favoured-nation rate. Of course in the great majority of cases the British rate is substantially lower than the most-favoured-nation rate. But in these particular items through various trade negotiations between ourselves and Britain, and between ourselves and other countries—because, after all, Britain is not our only market—we have established this list of goods on which the British rate and the most-favoured-nation rate is the same. The total value, when you add them all up, is about $3 million. The total value of the imports from the British countries last year was around $520 million. That does not mean to say that, because we are now abolishing this special discount in this $3 million range, that entire market is actually going to go over to the Americans. Actually, I doubt whether there will be any loss in it. This list still will be sold in Canada. But at least we have done our part in removing one of these hidden discounts which has acted so much in restraint of trade in the past.

Mr. Coldwell: This question was raised at Annecy, was it?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, but at Geneva, not Annecy.

Mr. Coldwell: Who raised the question of this discount?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that the United States themselves were the ones who raised it at Geneva.

Mr. Coldwell: As we look at this list it appears to be relatively small, $3 million. When you look through the list you find that is one in which the United States is primarily interested. It contains such things as milk foods, prepared cereal foods. I do not know about kippered herring.

Mr. Sinclair: Milk, for example, $166.

Mr. Coldwell: If you look at the goods manufactured and come down to cotton clothing you find: shirts, not knitted; cotton clothing, women's and children's dresses; men's smocks and overalls; tray cloths, table cloths; quilts and counterpanes; sheets; towels; wash cloths and bath mats, pillow cases, typewriter ribbons. These are products in which the United States are particularly interested. By this they can now come into our market and compete a little more favourably with the British manufacturers or the commonwealth manufacturers.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, the United States have submitted a list of 2,500 items on which they are reducing duties. Has the parliamentary assistant that list?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Fraser: That would help us to some extent, would it? Is the duty entirely removed or only partially removed?

Mr. Sinclair: The list is available if the hon. member wants it.

Mr. Fraser: I would like to see it.

Mr. Fulton: Before the clause carries I think the parliamentary assistant might answer the direct question. He has said that we have taken the lead in matters of this kind in eliminating what he called hidden discriminations in the hope that the country which is the key one in world trade today, namely, the United States, would do the same and permit those countries so concerned with export to export to her freely. I think the parliamentary assistant should answer the direct question: Are our officials satisfied—since we have taken the lead, and since we have made what I understand amounts to quite substantial concessions at Geneva and Annecy—with the response to those gestures so far made by the United States in a reciprocal manner?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that they are very pleased, and that is one of the reasons for this conference, namely, to check on the detail of what actually has been done. But I am informed that the economic policy advisers in our department, the Department of Finance, are very pleased with the action taken so far.

Mr. Graydon: Are they easily satisfied?

Mr. Sinclair: The Department of Finance is never very easily satisfied. The hon. member knows that.

Mr. Graydon: The country is not always satisfied with them.

Mr. Johnston: Will the action taken here not increase the cost of goods in Canada by the amount of the tariff? That means another increase in the cost of living. If our cost of living index keeps going up you will need a ladder to get to the top of it.

Mr. Sinclair: I point out to the hon. member that if he looks over this list he will find that almost every item is produced in great quantities today in Canada. The British and the United States manufacturers must meet the Canadian prices. That is especially true of the textile group. The great bulk of textiles used in Canada today is made in Canada. If this were the sole market for these goods, if this were the only source of these goods, then there would perhaps be a noticeable increase—I doubt whether it would be noticeable: an increase of 10 per cent discount on the tariff might not be noticeable in the case of small goods. But here the governing factor is the cost of the Canadian goods which are the great majority of the products here.

Mr. Coldwell: Would it not constitute a slight increase in tariff protection for the Canadian manufacturer of these goods?

Mr. Sinclair: It could in these cases where the British are the competitors. In these cases where the most favoured nation is the competitor there is no change in the position.

Mr. Johnston: What chance is there of getting a lowering of prices of the goods which go into every home, if we are going to keep raising the tariff? Certainly there is no incentive here to bring down prices. We stop the British from bringing in cheaper goods and we permit the United States people to increase their prices by an increased tariff, which seems to me to indicate that we are just pushing the prices up instead of trying to get them down.

Mr. Sinclair: The primary purpose of the whole pattern here is of course a provision to get rid of these hidden concessions. If you are thinking in terms of the British goods which have a monopoly today, and none of these appear on this list, then the effect of this discount would be to increase the cost of such goods by the amount of 10 per cent discount on the duty. If, however, as is the actual case in the great bulk of these goods, the Canadian production is the governing factor, then the British will have to shave their prices to meet the Canadian prices.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want a little further enlightenment on this. I take it that the situation is this. One of the nations we are negotiating with brings down its tariff to the point where it is on the same level as the British—I think the parliamentary assistant said that in most cases the British have been lower.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I assume that to be a good thing from our point of view. Could we get some indications as to just what improved trade we have had with those countries which have done that? I am excluding the United States. As a matter of fact, I think the parliamentary assistant could have made a stronger statement as to what had happened in the United States after the Geneva treaty of two or three years ago. My understanding is that in cattle alone the reduction was very beneficial to us, but it is not for me to state the government's case. However, I do come back to this point. I am very anxious to be satisfied that this is desirable. Could we have instances showing where we are deriving definite benefit in respect of lowered tariffs by other countries?

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I have misinformed the committee concerning the purpose. The purpose was not to encourage other countries to drop their tariff rates. It would be easy to drop the most-favoured-nation down to the British level. It was just applying our present tariff schedule on the goods where the British rate and the most-favoured-nation rate were the same, removing the hidden discounts.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It would cut both ways.

Mr. Sinclair: Well, if we could agree, in return for some trade concession from some other country reducing their tariff on an item down to the British level, then of course it would cut both ways.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether that is not actually happening in certain cases? Is that not a feature of it?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed it has been very seldom done in recent years, lowering the most-favoured-nation rate down to the British rate. I do not think this will serve as any impetus to do that. All this amendment does is that in those cases today where the British rate and the most-favoured-nation rate are the same we can no longer give this extra discount on the British tariff.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Application of ad valorem rate in tariff item.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The section which this one replaces is a section apparently dealing with something entirely different. Will the parliamentary assistant explain the reference to the limitation to certain ports of entry?

Mr. Sinclair: This is the section which, as I said, does differ in detail from the budget resolutions. The rest of the bill is identical with the budget. We had three clauses in the budget resolutions, which we have consolidated into two here. This section relates to the tariff provision regarding fresh fruits and vegetables and the season of the year in which a country like ours does not produce. On fresh fruits and vegetables we have certain ad valorem tariffs on their entry from Florida and California for example. Then comes the first period of the year when our hothouses begin the production of Canadian vegetables, and fruits too for that matter.

Then we give our agriculture a further protection now that we can produce it. In the old days there were provisions for ad valorem duties. At Geneva it was agreed to replace those ad valorem duties by specific rates of duty during certain periods of the year, and those periods are detailed in the schedule. We agreed at Geneva on the various periods.

Then the second time comes when our own full production comes in. Under the Geneva agreements there is authority to impose an additional specific duty during the period when the Canadian field production of these vegetables and fruits is available.

The reference to the ports of entry is a new one. Previously these added duties were applied nationally and now the minister is given the right to apply them regionally. Obviously the Fraser valley would require protection against the importation of strawberries, tomatoes, carrots, beets and so on from California at a different time than Ontario would need protection. Under the section mentioned by the hon. member for Greenwood where reference is made to ports of entry the minister is given authority to specify the various regions where the increased duty to protect Canadian produce will be imposed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is this a new power?

Mr. Sinclair: It is a new power to specify regions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that covered by any of the sections?

Mr. Sinclair: The first section of the budget resolution gave the power to impose specific duties in the case of some vegetables only once. I suppose potatoes would be an example of that since there are no hothouse potatoes to my knowledge. The second clause provides for a split period. Then in the third clause authority is given to the minister to withdraw that national application from certain regions. That was a negative way of doing what we are now doing positively. Instead of applying it nationally and then withdrawing it, what we are doing in the bill is to give him the power to apply these specific duties to protect the Canadian farmer during his production period on a split period basis.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the parliamentary assistant read the resolution?

Mr. Sinclair: It will be found on page 2175 of Hansard, or in the ways and means resolutions if the hon. member has those.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to say one or two things on this section. I hope the device of naming the ports of entry will have the desired effect. The problem which faces the vegetable and market gardeners in my county, in the county of Peel and in other adjacent counties is that the Canadian crop is a late-maturing crop which comes onto the market weeks or even months later than the United States crop. Our growers have no objection to United States produce being imported before Canadian produce is on the market, but what actually happens in many cases is that just as the Canadian crop is coming onto the market a surplus has been built up in the United States which it is difficult to market or which because of its age commands a lower price, and that surplus is to all intents and purposes dumped on the Canadian market.

As the parliamentary assistant knows, it is during the first few days or weeks of a crop that you get your maximum price. When the Canadian crop is ready for marketing we find that the warehouses and even the refrigerator cars are filled with the undigested—I am speaking marketwise—United States surplus. Until that surplus is off the market the Canadian crop, which should command a premium price because of its freshness, actually commands a depressed price. In many cases I have seen fresh Canadian produce taken off the market when no purchaser could be found and dumped or destroyed.

My first suggestion is that the date of the imposition of the Canadian tariff against United States fruits and vegetables should be put forward sufficiently in the growing season to permit the surplus being used up before the Canadian vegetables and fruits come onto the market.

At the end of the season Canadian produce is available when the United States growing season is over. In the northern United States the growing season on certain types of vegetables is comparatively short. When vegetables from the Leamington area or other areas along the north shore of lake Erie are available the United States tariff is still imposed against them. At the end of our growing season we would normally expect to find a market in the United States but we find our products are still shut out. The result is that at the end of our season we have a great surplus of vegetables which in many cases have to be destroyed.

When the parliamentary assistant goes to Torquay I hope he will bring this matter to the attention of the United States authorities so that our growers may have the market they are entitled to when their fresh produce ripens and is ready for sale. It is a most important thing because there is nothing more hazardous than the growing of vegetables or fruits. You have to depend on the weather and expenses are very great in growing and cultivating these intense crops. Unless you can get the cream of the market in the first couple of weeks in which your crop is marketable, you are likely to suffer a great loss on the year's operations. I want to bring that to the attention of the minister so that when these matters are discussed the point of view of the Canadian growers will be adequately safeguarded.

Mr. Graydon: I think the hon. member for York West should receive high marks for his clear and forceful enunciation of the position of the growers in his riding and others such as my own which are similarly affected. I should like to make one or two minor additions to what he said. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant may not know this. Not only is the question of timing important, but in the past the regulations have been so loosely applied in certain instances that when dumping duties have been imposed on fruit and vegetable importations from the United States their transportation has also constituted a problem. When dumping duties are put into force here somehow or other they do not always apply to the many carloads of vegetables which are then in transit. In other words, so long as the freight cars are moving from some place in the southern United States they can still move on and come in under the wire, if I may use that term, placed there by the regulations so far as timing is concerned.

For a long time the government has needed no extra powers; rather, it has failed to use at the proper time the powers it has. One point that should be particularly impressed upon the government it that they had better stick close to the recommendations of the organized growers. They know when these dumping duties ought to be applied. In some instances I am afraid it has been a matter of compromise. The growers have made certain recommendations, those in the trade have made other recommendations from their point of view, and too often the government has come in between the two and made compromises which, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for York West, have made it impossible for the growers to market at the most important and vital period of the marketing season.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Therefore I want to add my words to those so forcefully uttered by my colleague and neighbour, the hon. member for York West, who understands the problem just as we all do in that section of Ontario. After all, our fruit and vegetable growers, our gardeners and orchard men in that part of the province are engaged in a most important national business which, because the commodities they grow are perishable, requires special treatment. In the light of the representations that have been made both in and out of the house I hope that the government will see to it that in the imposition of dumping duties growers get a better and squarer deal than they have had on many occasions in the past.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to point out to the parliamentary assistant that hundreds of cars of United States new potatoes are coming into Canada every week. They are being sold at $7 to $8 a hundred at a time when there is a surplus of good old potatoes in the maritime provinces and eastern Canada generally. Does this section allow the ad valorem duty to be placed on vegetables or any other commodity at any time?

Mr. Sinclair: It is fresh fruits and vegetables and they are all listed in the schedules starting at page 9. The fruits and vegetables are listed, the tariff rates are listed, and the periods in which the extra specific duty can be levied to protect Canadian producers are listed.

Mr. Hatfield: Potatoes have a duty from the 15th June to the 31st July of 37½ cents. I should like to point out that potatoes are coming into Canada free of duty today. When we ship potatoes to the United States the duty is 75 cents a hundred. Why should we not have an ad valorem duty on potatoes at all times?

Mr. Sinclair: As the hon. member has said, during most of the year potatoes are imported free, and for the remaining period there is a tariff of 37½ cents. The United States imposes a tariff the year round. It is one of those things which can be discussed at Torquay. I suppose if they will not lower their tariff we could follow the old method of retaliation and raise our tariff.

Mr. Hatfield: You are not asking them to lower theirs. Why should we not have an ad valorem tariff against their potatoes? Why should we have to pay 75 cents on our potatoes entering the United States when their potatoes can come in here free except for a month and a half? Why should we not have the same duty as they have the year round?

Mr. Sinclair: The change in tariff from an ad valorem to a specific duty on most vegetables has met with the approval of the growers across Canada. The problem of timing is a most important one. The hon. member for York West raised it. The matter of timing as to the period, if it is a split period, a hothouse period and a field period, or if it is only a field period, cannot be spelled out in the statutes because it depends entirely on the weather. I am informed that the growers and the Department of Agriculture work very closely together. There are other people who have to be considered, however, and I refer to consumers. It obviously would be very much in the interest of the growers to have a higher specific tariff imposed at a very early period, at a time perhaps when they could not supply Canadian demand. There is that factor, and it is probably responsible for the compromise which the hon. member mentioned.

As for the application of the dumping duty, this legislation in no way changes the authority of the government to apply such duties on these fruits and vegetables if it is established that the produce is being dumped in Canada. This is a tariff arrangement for the ordinary everyday trade where there is an ad valorem duty for the period outside the designated weeks and then a specific duty spelled out in the schedule for the restricted period. Before this amendment we had a split period authorized for only cabbage, carrots and beets. That is now extended to cover green beans, cabbage, carrots, beets, cauliflower, celery and lettuce.

Mr. Coldwell: I am glad the parliamentary assistant spoke of the interest of the consumer. This indicates very clearly what a difficult country Canada is for which to provide arrangements of this sort, and I think it is a good thing that this can apply to various ports across the country, which of course minimizes the difficulty for many consumers. Those of us who come from the prairie provinces, for example, where we have not these early supplies of vegetables and fruits, cannot get supplies from any source except Utah, Texas and other places south of the line, and we would be penalized if this were applied generally. I just rose to say that in listening to the moderate and well-stated representations of hon. gentlemen who come from districts where these things can be obtained, the interests of the people of the prairie provinces, who might be adversely affected if this were applied too generally across the country, should not be forgotten. I just wanted to remind the parliamentary assistant—from what he said I thought probably he might have had it in mind, but I felt it should be put on the record—that the interests of people in other parts of Canada have to be considered when this matter is being dealt with.

Mr. Hatfield: The parliamentary assistant has not answered my question as to why we have to pay a duty of 75 cents per hundred pounds on potatoes going into the United States while their potatoes come in here free of duty. Why should that be?

Mr. Sinclair: There are many of these tariff problems between nations, where the tariff is not the same going both ways. I am told that we have permitted free entry of potatoes into Canada for many years, except for the production period.

Mr. Hatfield: We used to have an ad valorem duty, in which I believe. We should have the same duty they have on all goods.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to refer to the question of ports of entry. There is a difference, which may not be important, between the wording of the resolution and the wording of the bill. The resolution speaks of goods imported through ports in a specified region or part of Canada, and so on; the reference is to a region. In the section itself the wording is different. It says:

> Provided that where, before the coming into operation of such an order, a person purchased goods for importation through a port specified in the order—

Can we have a word as to what these regions are, or what the ports are? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has pointed out how important that is.

Mr. Sinclair: As far as the administration of this act is concerned, of course that is done at the border through these border ports; that is why the word "ports" is used to spell out the regions. Those regions are generally the maritimes, Quebec and Ontario, the prairies and British Columbia; and the ports in those areas are the ports in the regions. The actual instruction in the end will have to apply to ports, because the customs and excise officials at those ports are the people who actually have to enforce the law.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then does it really mean that there are just four groups of ports, in other words that the minister just deals with the maritimes, Quebec and Ontario, the prairies and British Columbia? I take it that under this he has authority to fix different times at different places, or to leave one out altogether?

Mr. Sinclair: That is quite right. He has that authority, but he exercises that as a taxation authority only in consultation with the Department of Agriculture and the growers' organizations, as to at what time or in what regions these permissive periods shall extend. They are also in the schedule, and range from six or seven weeks to twenty-six weeks. The minister decides when they shall be applied, whether they shall be split, to what regions they shall apply, or whether they shall apply at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then what is the significance of the phrase at the end of the section:

—the number of weeks in the two periods shall not exceed the number specified in that sub-item.

In other words, once he makes a decision are his hands tied? From what has been said by the hon. member for York West it would seem there should be a great deal of flexibility.

Mr. Sinclair: There is that flexibility. For example, the longest period is twenty-six weeks. That can be divided into four weeks for the hothouse period and twenty-two weeks for the field period, but the total of the two must not exceed the period specified in the schedule.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that by reason of international agreement?

Mr. Sinclair: That is by reason of the Geneva agreement.

Mr. Adamson: Do the Americans grant us that same countervailing clause? Have they a flexible tariff, too?

Mr. Sinclair: The Americans have no periods, I am told, because their nation is in production the year round. They are turning to the same type of specific duties that we now have, in place of the ad valorem duties. If it is of any interest I can put on Hansard a table showing United States rates of duty. It is not very long.

Mr. Adamson: I think that would be helpful, because I have had many complaints that our produce has to hurdle a very considerable tariff barrier going into the United States, whereas we try to be flexible and protect both the producer and the consumer.

Mr. Sinclair: This table will serve two purposes. It will show what substantial reductions the Americans have made in the last two years as well. With the consent of the committee I would ask that this table of United States tariffs on similar fruits and vegetables might appear in the record.

The Chairman: Has the hon. gentleman leave of the committee to have this table appear in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: The table is as follows:

United States Tariff

Mr. Stanfield: Could the parliamentary assistant tell us the total value of fruits and vegetables imported into Canada from the United States last year, and the total value of our exports to the United States?

Mr. Sinclair: I can give the figures for imports, but I cannot give the exports. Those come under trade and commerce and my officials do not have the figures, but they can be obtained. I can give that information under this or the next section.

Mr. Stanfield: I can get the information later.

Mr. Drew: I wonder if we could have a positive assurance that the measure of protection suggested by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton will be given.

Mr. Sinclair: I am not in a position to give an assurance as far as potatoes are concerned. Hon. members will realize that the question of potatoes is a very difficult matter in the United States today because of their potato policy. All I can do is to say I will draw to the attention of the minister and government the expression of opinion that the Canadian duty should be the same as that in the United States.

Mr. Coldwell: In that connection, did we not grant the request of the United States last year to restrict our exports to that country; or what happened?

Mr. Sinclair: In reply to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I may say that is a matter of export trade and does not come within this item, but I am informed we had an agreement with the United States that if their potato production fell below 335 million bushels, then we would export potatoes under the tariff item at 37½ cents. Quite shortly it was obvious to us that their production would never fall below that. It is over 400 million bushels now, so we have rescinded that agreement, and do export potatoes when we can, where we can, into the United States.

Mr. Coldwell: Potatoes have difficulty getting into the United States because of the tariff?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the tariff?

Mr. Sinclair: It is 75 cents a hundred pounds on ordinary potatoes and 37½ cents on seed potatoes.

Mr. Coldwell: Seventy-five cents on edible potatoes is almost a prohibitive tariff.

Mr. Stanfield: Does not the United States grant us a quota on potatoes under which so many can go in free?

Mr. Sinclair: We are getting a little out of the field on which we have the data here. Most of this is an export matter under the Department of Trade and Commerce. So far as vegetables are concerned, it is going to be a matter of adding the vegetable imports for the various categories of vegetables, and it may take a little time.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want that figure now, but does not the United States give us an export quota for potatoes in return for the fact that we take fruits and vegetables from the United States?

Mr. Sinclair: I will have to make an inquiry of the Department of Trade and Commerce and give that information to the hon. member.

Mr. Coldwell: Is this not one of the things that should be straightened out? We are giving concessions all the time to the United States. Today in the maritime provinces potatoes are selling for about 40 cents a bushel, owing to the fact they cannot find an export market. The maritimes have grown potatoes, to some degree at least, for export to the United States. It seems to me that the tariff mentioned by the parliamentary assistant is, in effect, a prohibitive tariff. It is something, I think, that should be pressed upon the United States when the time comes, because a large percentage of our population in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick depend upon the potato crop and the export of potatoes.

Mr. Sinclair: I quite agree with what the hon. member says. On the other hand any congressman could make exactly the same argument as has been made by the member for York West on behalf of the potato growers of his area. If we remember that potatoes have been given away in the United States, and that farmers have been paid to allow potatoes to rot in their fields, it is not the easiest background in which to ask for a concession for our potatoes.

Mr. Coldwell: I am thinking of the time when the United States raises this question of discount on the British tariff. They are constantly pressing us for concessions. In the Geneva agreement we did agree to a considerable number of concessions under the non-discrimination clauses, which I think at the outset, whatever the situation may be now, did injure our trade relationship with Britain. It seems to me that if we are going to have the kind of arrangement that is visualized by this bill and by other bills that have been introduced, it should be reciprocal and not one-sided; that is the point I am making.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to correct something the parliamentary assistant said. I do not believe a congressman in the United States could make the same sort of argument as I have made, because there is a difference in climatic conditions. If perishable foodstuffs go to waste in the United States it is not because of a glut of imports from Canada, it is due to a lack of markets; it is entirely an internal condition. On the other hand if, as happens year after year, at the beginning of the marketing season, our goods go to waste it is because of the glut of American goods that has come in and filled up the pipe line of storage and freight cars.

As a matter of fact, several growers have complained to me that a hundred or so freight cars are waiting on the Toronto market. With this surplus United States produce overhanging the market just as the Canadian grower is trying to market fresh vegetables, a difficult problem presents itself. It is not one of protecting the consumers, because the consumer is protected. It is the problem of preventing this surplus United States produce from overhanging our market just at a time when our crop is coming on the market to be sold.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to apologize to the hon. gentleman. I inferred that, were he going to speak on the same problem, the American congressman who had potato growers as his constituents could speak on their behalf just as the hon. member spoke on behalf of the growers in his district. The congressman could point to the fact that the United States would be giving a tariff concession on potatoes when they had these millions of bushels that were given away in the United States.

Mr. Blackmore: I believe the parliamentary assistant has struck a note which should be expanded just a little. It is well for us to bear in mind that the United States is able to produce a large percentage of her requirements. The result is that hardly any export from Canada seeking admission to the United States will fail to find plenty of people in the United States with the same commodity to sell. Unless Canada watches her moves with care, then we are going to get the worst of the deal with the United States on every commodity every year.

I should like to support the member for York West in the most unequivocal terms. I should like to see the principle applied most rigidly all across Canada. At the same time, I should like to support the idea advanced by the member for Rosetown-Biggar. I do not see any reason why the consumer in Canada should be penalized for the privilege of using Canadian goods. In a general way, I think we in Canada can produce goods just about as cheaply as the United States, in so far as garden products are concerned. There will be exceptions, of course, but I do not think the Canadian consumer should be penalized. I know I would like to see our government officials have that in mind.

While I am on my feet, I think I should say a word about the reduction of imperial preferences which have been going on under steady pressure from the United States for about a quarter of a century. I believe the Canadian people are weak-kneed and ill-advised and lacking in vision when they yield to this pressure. By and large we are never going to compete successfully with the United States in the bargaining concerning our products, because of the tremendous productive potential of the United States, plus their vast home market which would be such an advantage in helping her to produce and sell.

On the other hand we are going to be able to co-operate with the other members of the British commonwealth in establishing a commonwealth economy which will have some chance of being able to look the United States in the face on equal terms if we help to develop that commonwealth economy by wisely devised and wisely applied imperial preferences. I wish to raise my voice definitely against any further reduction of imperial preferences. Just as soon as we can manage it I would say we ought to begin to increase those imperial preferences in order to encourage the development of a great empire or commonwealth economy which will have some chance of successfully competing in a world in which such giants as the United States and Russia are playing around.

Mr. Clark: I am sorry I was not in the chamber earlier, but I was with a group of other farmers. I should like to mention a few things that I believe have been mentioned this afternoon. One is the method of protecting the vegetable growers. The method that is at present used is not perhaps 100 per cent efficient. The method that was used in wartime and which was recommended, I believe, by the tariff board many years ago, was a permit system which allowed the United States products in when we were short, but it embargoed them when we had a quantity sufficient to supply the market. I think every fruit and vegetable grower in Canada would like to see that particular system implemented in a deal with the United States. The fact of turning to it under the rigours of war I think should be to the government proof that it is the most efficient way of handling that particular problem.

In the time that I have been in the chamber this afternoon, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned the consumer and also the protection of the grower. The key to the protection of the grower is the time when these duties are applied. There is one question I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant, and I hope he will answer it when I finish. It is this: Are these duties at the disposal of the grower when requested? That is a matter of importance to the industry.

I should like to point out to the members of the committee that when an application is made for these duties to be applied, there is one loophole which hon. members perhaps do not know about. It is that all cars that are rolling are allowed in free of that duty. Let us say that the duty was put on on April 1. Any cars that have been bought by the produce dealers in this country—perhaps from California, Arizona or Texas—are allowed in without payment of that duty. To get them here sometimes takes a period of ten days. Then to dispose of this produce, or certain products, perhaps takes ten days; as to other products, it perhaps takes a shorter period of time. All these things must be considered having regard to the proper time of application. If the Department of National Revenue, which has the administration of these duties, will accept the recommendation of the growers—and I hope the parliamentary assistant will agree to this—who most of the time know what cars are rolling and how long it will take to dispose of those products before the Canadian product comes on the market, I think the difficulty will be taken care of.

The hon. member for York West said that the growers are in serious difficulty. I will admit that under the embargoes by the Minister of Finance during the shortage of United States dollars, they certainly were in fine shape; but during the last ten years the fruit and vegetable grower of this country has made wonderful progress; and financially, I think he is in as good shape as any other particular group of farmers in this country.

I might also mention the fact that in that last Geneva agreement—which was made some time ago, of course, and is just being implemented now—we received many cuts in the United States tariff. Some of their duties are now much lower than the duties on United States produce coming to Canada. Many of these duties have been cut. I might mention some of them. For instance, asparagus was cut from 50 per cent to 25 per cent; brussels sprouts, from 50 per cent to 25 per cent; cabbage, from one and a half cents to three-quarters of a cent; carrots, from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent; cauliflower from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent. All along the line we have received substantial cuts which have been helpful to the fruit and vegetable industry. The reason why the fruit and vegetable grower fought to maintain an extremely high tariff in this country was the fact that the United States tariff was so high that he was unable to get into those markets.

I live within 25 miles of the city of Detroit. Detroit, with its surrounding suburbs, has a population of perhaps two million people. There are perhaps more people in that particular city than there are in all the cities of the province of Ontario put together. That market has been denied to us. But through this last Geneva agreement and the one previously negotiated we have received concessions which have been helpful to the grower not only in the district which I represent but in many other districts in Canada.

The fruit and vegetable industry is a tremendous one, returning a large amount of revenue to the Canadian farmers, perhaps to the extent of $150 million or $160 million. I know that there are concentrated areas like southwestern Ontario, the Niagara peninsula and the Okanagan valley; but fruit and vegetables are grown clean across Canada. It is therefore difficult to prepare an estimate of the revenue to the farmers from that particular industry.

I believe the Canadian officials here have asked for further cuts on many other products. One of those mentioned has been potatoes. That matter is on the list, I believe, for discussion at Torquay. In the agreement which we hope will be made there, I trust that we shall receive more concessions which will result in more benefits to the Canadian grower. With the proper application of the duties we have, I think the growers will receive reasonable protection; but that protection hinges on the automatic application of the duties when applied for by the grower. I hope that the parliamentary assistant will rise in his place and say that if the growers are reasonable in their application, to protect the consumers, it should go on automatically for the protection of the grower. I might say that I was with a group of other farmers this afternoon and I did not hear all of the discussion.

Another point that was mentioned by the hon. member for Greenwood was regional applications. To protect the consumer in different areas like the western provinces, the maritimes, Ontario and Quebec, that regional application was put into effect quite some years ago. I know that when I first came into the house in 1935 there were no regional applications, and many hon. members from western Canada did object to the maritimes having an application that applied to all of Canada. Therefore it was broken up, and quite often the growers asked for Ontario and Quebec, and then perhaps the maritimes; and the British Columbia growers might ask for the western provinces. That was done to protect the consumer. Because these methods are used to take care of his interest, he should be willing to help the producers of fruits and vegetables in this country, because it is a tremendous industry.

I will say that since these changes have been made in the United States tariff we from our district have been shipping many more products across the line. There are other problems. I believe the hon. member for Middlesex East mentioned two problems some time ago, one onions and the other celery. He said that a certain number of carloads were left after the 42 weeks period had elapsed. I may be wrong in this, but on reading his statement I thought he gave the impression that we had very little duty. We do have only the 10 per cent I believe for the short 12 weeks in the year, but we have a cent a pound, which is a dollar a bag, during the other weeks of the year. I might point out to the hon. member that in January in my district alone we had 600 cars of onions. When the tariff was taken off there were only about 25 left.

The hon. member also mentioned celery. I talked to him personally about this. He had purchased some United States celery and the price was very high, around $5 or $6 a case, and the quality was not too good. At that same time Canadian growers were unable to sell their celery at $2.25 a case. That was storage celery which had been in storage for many months. We have some excellent storage warehouses in this country to take care of products like celery, but we have many other storage houses which are not so good. I think the difference in the price must indicate a difference in quality rather than that a Canadian would buy United States celery at $5 a case in preference to Canadian celery at $2.25 a case if it were of the same quality.

Perhaps I have taken too long on this subject, but I do hope that the parliamentary assistant will tell the committee that on the recommendations of the organization the tariff, which they have, and which does not apply in many weeks of the year, will go on automatically at their request.

Mr. Sinclair: I think I should make answer to the hon. member. He has been very helpful to the committee in giving a practical illustration of the benefit of those reductions in United States tariffs which were put on the record a little earlier.

As far as the recommendation of the growers is concerned, we discussed that a little earlier. There will be the fear that if it were left entirely to the growers they might set a date too early when there would still be a shortage in the country and the consumer would be injured. The actual discretion is in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue, who consults with the Department of Agriculture and the growers, and who is also aware of the actual supply condition in the country. It is a date which is acceptable to both the growers and the consumers which is formally decided on.

I thank the hon. member very much for bringing forward as he has done the very helpful effect of the Geneva agreement so far as the vegetable growers of his district are concerned.

On section 7—Construction of act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to know the need for section 7.

Mr. Sinclair: As a consequence of the detailed classes in clause 5 we have some 435 items in which there has been a slight difference in numbering and a slight difference in designation. However, both the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act and the Customs Tariff Amendment Act which refer to these items refer to them by the old designation and the old numbering; and since we are not amending these two acts at this time, we are making the provisions of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act and the Customs Tariff Act apply to the old numbering, not to the numbering which will be changed in some items by this act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is what I thought you meant.

Mr. Sinclair: I have a slight amendment to make which I shall ask the Minister of Public Works to move.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I move that tariff items 206a (1) as contained in resolution 2 of March 28, 1950, be amended to read as follows:

206a (1) Sera and antisera, toxoids, viruses, toxins and antitoxins; virus and bacterial vaccines; bacteriophage and bacterial lysates; blood plasma or serum of human origin or fractions thereof; allergenics, liver extracts, pituitary extracts, epinephrine and its solutions, insulin, with or without zinc, globin or protamine; all of the foregoing when imported for parenteral administration in the diagnosis or treatment of diseases of men.

Mr. Sinclair: May I explain this amendment. We had a discussion on penicillin some time ago. To make quite sure that there is no doubt as to the items which do come in free the Department of National Health and Welfare have asked us to spell out very clearly every possible one of this group of drugs which are used for injection under the skin. There is no change in this item, except that it has been expanded to cover every one of these unpronounceable names which the Minister of Public Works has moved.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 177, to amend the Income Tax Act; Bill No. 180, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act; Bill No. 209, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939. Then we will take up the estimates of agriculture.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 18, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

First report of special committee on the operations of the national research council.—Mr. McIlraith.

FIRE AND FLOOD DAMAGE

ORDERS IN COUNCIL APPOINTING COMMISSIONS OF INQUIRY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table copies of two orders in council, dated yesterday, appointing commissions to investigate the nature and extent of the damage resulting from the flooding of the Red river valley and the fires at Rimouski and Cabano.

LOAN OF $745,000,000

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO OVER-SUBSCRIPTION ON OPENING DAY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the house will be happy to learn of the successful result of our 1950 refunding loan offering. Hon. members will recall that the loan was offered for the purpose of paying off two Government of Canada issues which had been called for payment on June 1 and June 15 respectively, and was for a total amount of $745 million. The loan was offered in two maturities, an eighteen year 2¾ per cent bond and a four and a half year 2 per cent bond, and I reserved the right to close the books at any time and to determine the amount of bonds to be allotted in each maturity.

The books of the loan were opened at 9 a.m. this morning and were closed at 9.01 a.m. At that time the loan was very heavily over-subscribed, and allotments of both long term and short term bonds have to be substantially less than the subscriptions. The Bank of Canada will be advising primary distributors by overnight telegram tonight as to the portion of their orders which will be filled. As between the long term and short term issues, the loan has been allotted as follows; $350 million in the 2¾ per cent eighteen year bonds and $395 million in the 2 per cent four and a half year bonds.

This issue represents the largest offering the government has ever made under ordinary peacetime conditions. Its long term portion represents the first offering of ordinary market bonds we have made to the general public since the ninth victory loan bonds were offered in the fall of 1945. Therefore I think we may all take pride in the remarkable success of this loan flotation. The enthusiastic and general response of investors throughout the country provides substantial evidence of prosperous conditions and of confidence in the future of the country. In conclusion I wish to thank the investment dealers and banks whose efforts contributed to the successful placing of the bonds with investors in all parts of the country.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

REPORT OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER ON TWENTY-FIRST GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table of the house the report of the chief electoral officer on the twenty-first general election, 1949.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

COST OF STONE WALL ON PROPERTY IN POINTE DU LAC, QUE.

Mr. Balcer:

What sums were spent by the federal government in 1947, 1948 and 1949, for the erection of a stone or concrete wall on the property of Jean Marie Bureau, in the municipality of Pointe du Lac, county of Trois Rivieres?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Fiscal year 1946-47, nil; 1947-48, nil; 1948-49: A 400-foot wall was built at Pointe du Lac to protect the shore from erosion. Part of this wall fronts Mr. Bureau's property. This section is estimated at $3,942.40.

GRAND RIVER, QUE.—PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Has any work been carried out on the Grand river (Grande riviere), county of Gaspe south, during the summer of 1949?

2. If so, what was the cost of same?

3. Who was the foreman, and what daily rate did he receive?

Questions

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. $37,372.31.

3. (a) Marcel Cauvier; (b) $8 a day.

DOMINION ARSENALS—PERSONNEL

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many officers, officials or managers are there at the dominion arsenal at Lindsay, Ontario?
2. How many officers, officials or managers are there at the other dominion arsenals in Canada?
3. What are the names of such persons and their respective positions and salaries?
4. Are they allowed expenses?

Mr. McIlraith: The terms "dominion arsenal" and "dominion arsenals" in questions 1 and 2 have been construed to mean the operating divisions of Canadian Arsenals Limited.

1. Two.

2. Twelve.

3. Small arms ammunition division, Quebec city; Brigadier A. Theriault, C.B.E., chief superintendent; Mr. D. Busque, accountant.

Gun ammunition division, Lindsay, Ontario: Lieutenant Colonel E. M. Shields, O.B.E., E.D., manager; Mr. C. W. Walden, accountant.

Small arms division, Long Branch, Ontario: Lieutenant Colonel J. W. Leavens, manager; Mr. T. H. Marshall, accountant.

Gun division, Longueuil, P.Q.: Mr. E. A. Sprenger, manager; Mr. J. C. Mill, accountant.

Filling division, St. Paul l'Ermite, P.Q.: Mr. J. D. Chisholm, manager; Mr. G. R. Jackson.

Explosives division, Valleyfield, P.Q.: Captain T. E. Heron, manager; Mr. P. Reynolds, accountant.

Instrument and radar division, Leaside, Ontario: Mr. A. W. Ballantine, manager; Mr. J. R. Prazak, accountant.

4. Limited out-of-pocket travelling expenses when on company business.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

LEGAL SERVICES—NORMAN L. MATHEWS

Mr. Conacher:

1. What amounts of money has Norman L. Mathews received for legal fees from the present government (a) per year; (b) per case?
2. What was the result of the case of Gordon Davidson, convicted November 3, 1947, appealed in February, 1948, and the decision?
3. What were the amounts Mr. Mathews received for legal services in this case for each appearance?

[Mr. Courtemanche.]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF ARRANGEMENTS—FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to make any further report to the house concerning arrangements for the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference; and in particular, would he tell the house whether any date has been set and whether any further correspondence has been exchanged between the governments which might be tabled?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No date has yet been set for the conference. Since I tabled the correspondence I believe two further letters have been received; I shall make inquiries and bring down any that have not been tabled. I do not think there is anything I can report as to arrangements. The correspondence has been dealing with suggestions as to the agenda, but nothing has been determined yet in that regard.

DOUKHOBORS

USE OF COMOX NAVAL BARRACKS FOR DETENTION OF PRISONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): In view of the telegrams of protest which have been sent, will the Minister of Justice state whether or not arrangements have been entered into with the Department of National Defence to take over the naval barracks at Comox for the detention of Doukhobor prisoners?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer to my hon. friend's question is yes. The arrangements are not completed, but they are in course of negotiation and we expect to complete them shortly.

Mr. Gibson: If I may ask a supplementary question, I take it there is no intention of using the R.C.A.F. station at Comox for this purpose?

Mr. Garson: No, sir.

Mr. Gibson: Has the attorney general of British Columbia been consulted, and has he concurred in this decision?

Mr. Garson: We have been in contact with the attorney general of British Columbia with respect to all matters connected with Doukhobors and their detention, and I think it might be said that he has at least agreed to accept this as the least undesirable of all alternatives from his standpoint.

FISHERIES

GREAT LAKES—INSPECTION OF WHITEFISH FOR EXPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries. The inspection of whitefish from the great lakes is now on a voluntary basis. Is it the intention of the government to put into effect compulsory inspection regulations covering all whitefish for export?

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): It is the intention of the Department of Fisheries to have a meeting this fall with representatives of the provincial governments and of the industry, to determine the proper time at which inspection of whitefish will be changed from a voluntary to a compulsory basis.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

QUESTION AS TO AGREEMENT AT LONDON CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Does the Prime Minister intend to give to the house today any information about the agreement that has been announced at the meeting in London?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am not aware that it has been announced. I am expecting word momentarily as to the hour at which it is to be released. I have the statement here, but I did not feel that I could communicate it to the house until such time as we knew it was being released in London.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 177, to amend the Income Tax Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say in connection with this bill. I regret that it was found necessary to have it run to such length, but there are two or three reasons for that. There are relatively few changes involving important questions of principle, such as the new provisions with respect to surpluses of closely held companies, some provisions respecting charitable corporations, and the like. However, as the house will appreciate, when changes of that kind are introduced it is necessary to make a number of consequential amendments in other sections of the act.

Income Tax Act

As the house will recall, in 1948 we passed a completely new Income Tax Act, and as a result of experience over the last year it has been found desirable to make some changes and improvements in various sections of it. Moreover, because of the virtual elimination of ministerial discretion in the Income Tax Act it has become necessary to spell out in a great deal more detail a number of its provisions. It is for these reasons that the amending act runs to such length.

The house will recall that I introduced it a week or ten days ago, and it has been allowed to stand during that period in order that hon. members might have an opportunity of examining its provisions, and also in order that we might receive criticism and suggestions from those outside the house who may be interested in its provisions. I am glad to say that we have received a number of very helpful and constructive suggestions from the Canadian Tax Foundation, and others; and when we are in committee I shall have some amendments to offer to the sections as they now stand which I think will further improve the act. I hope we may be able to proceed to consideration of the bill in committee at a reasonably early hour.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I believe one can be thankful for certain forward steps indicated in this bill amending the Income Tax Act. I think there has been a definite attempt to deal with the question of surpluses. I welcome one thing in that connection, that instead of the old-fashioned remedy of pains and penalties, the new clauses turn to the much more helpful area of incentive. In other words, companies are given an incentive to come in and pay the taxes which are indicated. Without labouring the point at the moment I think it is permissible to ask—and it will be asked in committee—why this is limited only to private companies; but on that I shall say no more at the moment.

The other thing one welcomes—and perhaps we on this side may try to arrogate to ourselves a little credit for this—is that the provisions for assisting small companies, which last autumn we felt had been so much tied up by the then legislation, have been relaxed, and I hope in a constructive way.

Having said those things, of course, one must not forget to remind the house that we still have the heavy burden of double taxation. A beginning was made to lighten it; nevertheless it has been lightened very little. One thing of which we shall all be glad is that section 6 disappears—that is, the section which enabled government officials to step in and tell companies what they were to do with their surplus.

Mr. Abbott: Section 9, subsection 6.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Section 9. The legislation before us encourages one to hope that the time may come when even section 126, I think it is, may be eliminated. Under this section a discretion is still reserved in the department to tell a man he must pay more taxes, even when he has complied with the law in every way and has paid his full taxes. We feel that this is a scandalous provision.

I was glad to hear the minister say that ministerial discretions were being eliminated. We shall all rejoice when that is done. After all, we do exist as a civilization probably mainly because of the rule of law. This section 126 seems to be a contravention of that basic principle in our lives.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the other points I might mention are details which could be dealt with in committee.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): There are one or two things I should like to say before the bill goes to the committee. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has referred to the fact that there was a complete revision of the act in 1948. The members who were in the house at that time will recall that only two days, or parts of two days, were spent in the banking and commerce committee in a detailed review of that long and important measure. I believe it will be a matter of general regret, Mr. Speaker, that it has been found necessary now to undertake two quite substantial revisions of that important legislation within the last two years. After all, the bill itself was a bill extending to eighty-eight pages. In Bill No. 176, at the second session of this parliament in 1949, we had a measure extending to forty-one pages. In Bill No. 177, now before the house, we have further amendments extending to twenty-nine pages.

While the house will always be glad of an opportunity to remedy weaknesses or injustices in the act, I think this experience does point to the fact that we must take greater care in this house in connection with our taxing legislation. If I may suggest it, when major measures of this kind come before the house, such as the one in 1948, more time should be spent on them in the proper committee.

There is a second regret that I am quite certain will be shared by all members of the house who have made any effort to read and digest the terms of this bill. The regret was expressed last November and December, sir, during the debate on Bill No. 176 of that session. It is that our taxing statutes, particularly the Income Tax Act, are constantly becoming couched in more and more abstruse language. If there is one feature of taxing legislation that is more objectionable than another, it is when its provisions defy clear understanding and relatively simple reading. I grant you that if we are to deal with situations in great detail in our taxing acts we are going to have long acts with very detailed provisions, but I submit that we should follow that good axiom that taxing legislation should be written in as clear, simple and understandable terms as possible. Departures from the observance of that axiom ought not to be tolerated by the house if they can possibly be prevented.

Attention was drawn last fall to the very complicated and involved terms of Bill No. 176. I am certain, sir, that those members of the house who have taken the trouble to read the bill before us, and have tried to understand its provisions, will share the regret that it has not been found possible by the draftsmen to couch the terms of the bill in simple, understandable language. It is an extremely abstruse and complicated bill.

In conclusion, sir—because I appreciate there will need to be some time spent in the committee on the detailed clauses of the bill—I mention my disappointment that there are not certain provisions to be found in the bill which some of us had hoped to see in it. In the first place, notwithstanding what the minister had to say on the subject in his budget speech, some of us still hoped that the minister would see fit to introduce some provisions which would dispel the fear that does exist on a substantial scale today that capital gains are in danger of taxation. In his budget speech the minister indicated that he did not think it was possible to go any further in defining income under the act, in order to make it quite clear it is not intended to tax capital gains. The language used in certain recent court decisions, it seems to me, makes it desirable, if not imperative, to clarify the legislation, and a provision of that kind ought to be introduced. I express my regret that such a clarifying provision is not to be found in this bill.

One further matter—and this is not new on my part, because I have raised the point in several previous sessions—I regret that the minister has not seen fit to introduce amendments to section 26 of the act. This section defines the "extraordinary medical expenses" which the taxpayer may deduct to the extent that those expenses exceed four per cent of his income. The minister has not seen fit to propose the elimination of two obvious anomalies and discriminations. In the first place, while the section permits the inclusion within the definition of "extraordinary medical expenses" of aids to hearing or aids to cripples, no inclusion is offered of aids to sight. I submit, Mr. Speaker, there is no principle which at the one time justifies the inclusion within this definition of aids to hearing or aids to walking, and at the same time excludes aids to seeing. I urge that the expenditure on eyeglasses ought to be included within the definition of extraordinary medical expenses.

The other anomaly that continues to exist, and which this bill makes no effort to remove, has to do with expenditures by taxpayers on drugs. I am sure hon. members are well aware of the fact that the anomaly arises out of the difference in practice in relation to dispensing which is found in urban centres on the one hand, and rural areas on the other. In most cases it is the practice of the physician in the rural areas to dispense his own drugs and medicines. Consequently, the bill which the taxpayer receives from his physician includes the expenditure made on drugs and medicine, and those expenses are allowed by the Department of National Revenue as "extraordinary medical expenses." In the case of the urban dweller, he suffers what I feel is a discrimination. It is not the practice of physicians in urban areas to do their own dispensing. They simply issue a prescription which the patient or taxpayer takes to the dispensing druggist to be filled. The Department of National Revenue rejects expenditures made in that way for medicines and drugs.

Let us acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that there are some administrative problems to be reckoned with in removing this anomaly and discrimination. I submit that these anomalies and discriminations should have been removed long ago, and I regret that no attempt is made in the present bill to remove them. I urge upon the Minister of Finance once more that between now and the next session of parliament he give further, and this time favourable, consideration to these matters.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—"Death benefit."

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a question with regard to clause 1, subsection 1, which adds, in the category of income, death benefit.

Mr. Abbott: These death benefits have been treated as taxable; and as my hon. friend will see, "death benefit" is defined in a later section of the bill. The amendment here is by way of a relieving measure, and in essence it is this—and I am summarizing it shortly: if the death benefit does not exceed three months' salary, then it will not be considered as taxable income. Otherwise, of course, the old rule will apply.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What does the minister mean by saying "the old rule"?

Mr. Abbott: Under the general rules with respect to income, these so-called death benefits, which were payments made by the employer to the widow or other survivor of the deceased, were income within the definition as contained in the act. This will constitute an exemption. In the section they will be specifically defined as income, and then the exemption will be granted under the other section.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Stock dividends and stock rights.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I fully agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton about the complicated nature of these provisions. As a matter of fact, as somebody pointed out, you almost go at this like a crab, backwards. If you turn to page 22, you really find the operative section. Then if you come back to page 16, you are helped a little on your way, and finally you come back to some of the other operative sections, one of which is subsection 2. I suppose that the order is partly dictated by the order of the sections in the existing act.

Mr. Abbott: It is dictated by that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It makes it difficult for one to follow until you get a key to the labyrinth. Would it not be convenient at this point for the minister to give us a statement as to the situation?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And as to what are the things included and what are the things excluded.

Mr. Abbott: I should be happy to do that. My hon. friend is quite right when he says that the order is dictated by the arrangement of the sections in the act. As he and others who have had legal training will appreciate, it is always more difficult to read an amending bill and explain it unless you have beside it the act which is being amended. In other words, you have to take the section which is being amended, look at the original section, and look at the amendment. Under section 71A we are making provision with respect to what are commonly known as profit sharing plans, and we are in effect here confirming what has been the practice with respect to those plans. Under the so-called profit sharing plans, the employer has been entitled to deduct from his gross income the amount of profits which he contributes to the plan. The employee who is in receipt of a credit for those profits takes his proportion into his own personal income as well as any earnings from the fund. When he receives out at the end his share of the funds accumulated in the plan, then that is free of tax. The committee will appreciate the fact that that is exactly the reverse of the rule in a pension plan, where the pension payments are deductible by the employee and the pension when received out is taxed. These profit sharing plans operate on the exact reverse of the principle which is applied with respect to pensions. Under section 71A we give statutory form to that type of employee savings plan. This subsection 2 is a necessary and consequential amendment to section 6 as a result of section 71A.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, Mr. Chairman. I am afraid I have not made myself clear to the minister. Section 2 refers, among other things, to the payment of stock dividends, and so on.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, I am sorry, I thought we were talking about subsection 2 of section 1.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 3.

Mr. Fraser: No. We are on clause 2, Mr. Chairman, because the minister has said that it was the second part of clause 1 that he was talking about. Now we are on clause 2.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I can explain the section in much better terms than those that are set out in the explanatory note, which says:

> The effect of the amendment is to add the payment of stock dividends and the issuance of stock rights to the exclusions under the section. A new provision governing the taxation of stock dividends is contained in section 73.

My hon. friend and others who have studied the bill will see that we are making a completely new arrangement with respect to these so-called capital distributions. In part that rearrangement is necessary as a result of our new sections authorizing the capitalization of undistributed earnings upon payment of fifteen per cent tax in the case of a private company. Section 9(6), to which my hon. friend has referred, has been eliminated, and the other provisions of section 9 have been put over into section 73, which contains in one section all the rules with respect to the capitalization of earnings and their distribution. If it would be helpful, we could perhaps consider section 73 at this stage.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is whatever the minister wishes.

Mr. Abbott: It is the inevitable inconvenience that results from having to move from one section into another.

Mr. Fraser: I noticed in the New York Tribune of yesterday a report that the United States government either have put in or are contemplating putting in a withholding tax on all stock dividends, owing to the fact that they have not been able to collect as we do here in Canada. They have been losing some money. I wondered how much that would affect the convention that you have with the United States on the withholding tax of fifteen per cent on Canadian investors.

Mr. Abbott: My information is that the withholding tax is being considered in the United States, but it relates only to ordinary dividends payable to residents of the United States. It would have no effect on our reciprocal tax agreement.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—War savings certificates.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to say a word on paragraph (j) of subsection 2 of section 4, and I certainly shall have something to say when we get to 73A. It seems to me a simplification of this language might be considered. Paragraph (j) reads:

> . . . an amount received as a result of prospecting that section 73B provides is not to be included.

I suggest to the minister that that seems an extraordinarily complicated way of saying what the intent of 73B(1) is. It is complicated enough as it is.

Mr. Abbott: It is a matter of opinion as to whether the language may or may not be improved. The draftsman put it in this form because section 10, to which this subsection is added, starts off:

> There shall not be included in computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year—

And then follow paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and so on, which apply to the amount received. There shall not be included the amount received as the result of prospecting that section 73B provides is not to be included. You may say there is a double negative there, but I think the form of the governing sentence at the beginning of the section makes it necessary to put it in those terms.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Interest.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister make a statement clarifying the relationship between this clause and assumed legal obligations? I do not propose to reiterate what I said in the house on the resolution stage on May 4. The matter was discussed at some length and arose out of decisions in the McCool case and the Rhinehorne case with reference to interest on assumed legal obligations.

The budget resolution seemed to indicate quite clearly that it was the intention of the ensuing legislation to place assumed legal obligations on precisely the same footing as those created directly by the taxpayer in the course of earning his income. I am not sure, however, even after carefully reading and rereading section 5, particularly the language of line 33, whether this does in fact include assumed legal obligations. If my understanding of the purpose of the section is correct, that it was intended to eliminate the decisions in the McCool and Rhinehorne cases and to place assumed legal obligations on precisely the same footing as primary obligations on the part of the taxpayer, then it remains a question whether the committee is satisfied that this language does actually carry out that intent. If we are in agreement on the principle, then it becomes a matter of clarifying the terms of the legislation. Personally I do not think it is sufficiently clear.

Mr. Abbott: Of course that is a matter of legal interpretation. As my hon. friend has indicated, and as he is aware, this amendment is intended to cure what seemed to us to be an injustice arising out of the decision in the McCool case, with which my hon. friend is familiar. It was felt that money which was borrowed directly for the purpose of a business, and on which interest being legally payable could be deducted as an expense, was really in no different position from interest on the balance of the price of a property acquired for carrying on the business, or interest on a mortgage existing on a property for the purpose of carrying on a business; and paragraph (c), subparagraph (ii), is intended to cover the case. The Department of Justice have assured me that it accomplishes that purpose. My own personal opinion would be that it does, that the language is sufficient to meet the point which my hon. friend has raised.

Mr. Fleming: It will suffice to answer my fears if the minister will give assurance that the Department of National Revenue, in applying this section, will interpret the expression "legal obligation" as including assumed legal obligations as well as those that are primarily created by the taxpayer himself.

Mr. Abbott: Well, legal obligation refers to a legal obligation to pay interest. My hon. friend appreciates that. If the person who assumes the obligation assumes first an obligation to pay capital, and second an obligation to pay interest on it, I can assure him that the Department of National Revenue will interpret it in the way he suggests.

Mr. Ferrie: I have one question. Suppose a farmer buys a quarter-section of land which is covered with bush. He goes to work on this quarter-section. He borrows the money to clear off the bush. Can he deduct, for income tax purposes under this amendment, the interest on that borrowed money?

Mr. Abbott: It is an interesting point that my hon. friend has made. As I have said before, I am always reluctant to give a legal opinion as to a specific case, but it seems to me to be the type of case that would qualify. My hon. friend has cited the case of a farmer who makes an investment in his farm and may have to borrow money either to clear it or to buy it. Under these circumstances he is entitled to deduct his expenses. It would seem to me, on the facts that the hon. member for Mackenzie has put, that he would be entitled to deduct the interest on the money he borrowed. I am not charging for that opinion, so do not hold me to it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us take farmers who are clearing land west of the Calgary and Edmonton line in Alberta. In that area we have a lot of good land which is covered with bush. In order to work that farm a man gets the money somehow to clear the bush land so that it may be made productive. By "bush" I do not mean great trees, lumber containing trees, as they have them in British Columbia. At the present time he cannot charge off as an expense in his operation the money he has spent in clearing that land.

Mr. Abbott: That is a capital expense.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is regarded as a capital expense. I do not think that that is justified either. As a matter of fact, I do not know on what basis it is regarded as an expense, because in a practical way, as the hon. member well knows, there are large portions of the country which will prove productive if cleared. When I speak of bush I mean this scrub stuff that we have all over the place, and which is of no value. It gets in your way; you have to burn it, and possibly that is the only thing you can do with it. I have never understood why that man is not permitted to charge something as an expense in clearing that farm so that it shall be valuable as a productive unit in agriculture. I do know that the present ruling is that he cannot charge one cent of that against his operations. That is something which deserves more consideration at the hands of those in authority. I put it down definitely so that if anybody wants to inquire I am referring at the moment to the district lying west of Cremona in my own constituency. I know that there we have that exact situation. I also know that at no place in the whole of the west, once it is cleared, is there a better place for growing coarse grains than on the very type of land that I am speaking about. I am not joking when I say that I know of lands which are growing a hundred bushels of oats to the acre. Surely it is that kind of production we want, because that happens to be a fairly wet area. I do think some consideration might be given to an alleviation of the situation of the man who has put in all his capital, and who gets no return for a couple of years in any event. Surely that should be considered.

Mr. Wright: I agree with the minister that in some cases the procedure of investing additional capital in clearing land was abused in the early days. I remember that in 1941 or 1942 it was allowed as a deduction, and there were a number of people in western Canada who, while not farmers, went out and invested a considerable amount of money in clearing lands, and then used it as a deduction.

As a result of that the department changed the regulation to provide that no deduction could be made for the clearing of land. Yet we know that in large areas of the west, including those referred to by the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Mackenzie, as well as in my own constituency, many young chaps have started out on their own on half-section farms. The money they have to reinvest each year to clear land should be deducted, so far as their income tax is concerned. I suggest some regulation should be made under which the half-section farmer at least will have this deduction. Perhaps it would be necessary to provide that those on larger farms, or those operating larger units, would not be permitted to make the deduction. As a matter of fact the large operator today with equipment of his own is allowed, I believe, $300 worth of clearing—often it is more than that—as a deduction. The small operator has not equipment of his own, but must go out and hire it. Every cent he pays is from his capital, and he is not allowed a deduction on it.

Mr. Abbott: The question whether money expended for the improvement of land should be a capital item or an operating cost item does not arise under this section. The hon. member for Mackenzie asked whether the interest on money borrowed for purposes of clearing land would be deductible. I said I thought it would be, because it would be a capital expenditure. The farmer would have borrowed it, and, as in respect of any other interest on capital investment, by way of mortgage or anything else, he would be entitled to deduct the interest. But the actual cost of improving the land has always been considered as a capital investment and not as a current operating expense.

Mr. Ferrie: One man has gone so far as to cut down the bush, break up the land and put it into condition so that he could get a crop off it. He did get a good crop, but in getting it he was not able to make a payment on his loan because he had to pay interest to the bank, and then pay income tax. The municipality had to wait another year because he had to pay income tax. In my view that is most unfair, because income tax is bound to be paid in respect of the wheat or grain taken off that land. Therefore why should he not be allowed, as a deduction from income tax, the expense of clearing the land?

Mr. Knowles: This is the section in the bill which amends that section of the act which has reference to pension plans of one kind or another. Part of the amending section refers to that general question.

A few moments ago the minister made a general statement as to the rule now in effect, namely, that contributions to an approved pension plan are allowed as income tax deductions, but that payments to pensioners out of such plans are taxable.

Mr. Abbott: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I must point out that the section under consideration has nothing to do with pensions. It is true that it does relate to the general section which states that certain items will be deductible from gross income. But I doubt whether it would be in order to engage in a full-fledged discussion of pension plans under this section. There may be some sections later in the bill under which that could be done. My reference to the matter was simply by way of illustration in contrasting the profit-sharing plan with the pension plan.

Mr. Knowles: I have no intention of discussing pension plans as such, or old age pensions in general, although I do not blame the minister for thinking that I might have so intended.

Mr. Abbott: I was somewhat apprehensive.

Mr. Knowles: That was not my intention. However, I draw his attention to the fact that section 5 (3), which we are now discussing, does refer to employees' contributions to pension funds.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: What happens where payments out of a pension fund are being received by persons who, when they made their payments into the fund, were not allowed a deduction for those payments for income tax purposes?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that payments out in that case are apportioned.

Mr. Knowles: Is it correct to say that by "apportioned" the minister means that the portion contributed prior to a certain date is allowed?

Mr. Abbott: It is tax exempt, yes, so I am informed. I must confess I am not personally familiar with all the details of the administration of it, but I am told it is apportioned.

Mr. Knowles: It is precisely that kind of case which I feel I must draw to the attention of the minister as a grievance, because it seems to me the act calls for the practice he has just indicated. I believe he is right in that. However, in the case I have in mind it is not being—

Mr. Abbott: If the hon. member would look at section 26, with which we have not yet dealt, he will see that there is a specific provision for that apportionment.

Mr. Knowles: Then I shall wait until we reach that section to discuss this phase of the matter.

Mr. Abbott: The section we are now considering covers the period 1946 or a subsequent taxation year, while section 26, to which I have just referred, covers the period from 1944 to December 31, 1945. Perhaps we could have a full discussion on section 26.

Mr. Knowles: That would meet with my convenience in relation to the discussion of the cases of persons receiving pensions out of a pension fund. However, I wish now to discuss another aspect of the matter, namely that relating to payments into a pension fund, which does come under this section.

The section we are amending states that the portion of trade union dues paid into a pension fund is allowed as an income tax deduction. I am not going to launch into an argument about trade union dues generally, because the minister knows my thoughts on that matter. But may I point to certain facts, which I believe I can do most effectively by giving the details of a specific case.

The international typographical union has a pension plan. Under the laws of the union every active member thereof must pay dues that include a portion for pension purposes. Under the terms of this section of the act the income tax authorities have allowed that portion of the dues paid by members of the international typographical union which goes into the pension fund to be deducted for income tax purposes. I can speak from experience. I belong to this union and I get that small deduction at the end of the year.

It so happens that local No. 91, the Toronto local of the international typographical union, which has some 1,400 members in the greater Toronto area, has passed a local law which says that every member of the Toronto local must pay an additional one per cent in addition to the amount levied by head office. The plan has been approved by head office. So far as a member of the Toronto local is concerned, it is just as compulsory that he pay the extra one per cent as it is compulsory upon me as a member of the Winnipeg local to pay the basic pension assessment of two and one-half per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: As savings or as pension?

Mr. Knowles: As pension. If I die before I reach pensionable age it is gone. If I reach pensionable age it will come to me, unless I am still a member of this house.

Mr. Abbott: Are there any unemployment benefits attached to the plan?

Mr. Knowles: No. The only other benefit attached to it is a mortuary benefit. If a person dies before he reaches pensionable age there is a mortuary benefit. The point I wish to make is that the extra one per cent I referred to is not voluntary. It is just as compulsory for a member of the Toronto local to pay the extra one per cent as it is for members of other branches of the union to pay the basic amount. Officials of the union have been in touch with the department in Ottawa to try to get them to agree to allow that extra amount. I have seen the correspondence, and I must say that I do not think the point has been recognized by the officials here. There has been some suggestion by officials here that one has to think of these plans in terms of amounts being deducted by the employer and paid into the fund. The act does not say that, and certainly it does not apply in the case of the basic amount we pay into our union pension fund.

That amount is not deducted by the employer. I pay it to the union and the union pays it into the pension fund. The same thing is done with regard to the extra one per cent at Toronto. In turn if a member of the Toronto union reaches pensionable age he will get an extra $5 a week in addition to the basic pension paid by the union which is now $16 a week. The extra $5 will be taxable income if the recipient is in a high enough bracket, but the one per cent that he is called upon to pay, in the same way that members of the other branches across Canada pay the basic amount, has not yet been allowed as an income tax deduction. It seems to me that the wording of the act is clear. I cannot see that there is any necessity for departmental approval of this; it should be automatic. I hope, despite the fact that the correspondence that has taken place thus far has not produced a favourable result, that such will now be the case. I am sure the minister will agree with me on that, if I have stated the case correctly, and I am satisfied that I have. I have the correspondence, the laws of the international typographical union and the laws concerning the Toronto local plan before me. If there is any doubt as to the wording of the act I suggest it should be changed to cover such a case. In the meantime I would be glad to have the minister's comment on it.

Mr. Abbott: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member. I am not familiar with the particular plan to which he refers. From what he said I understand he has had some discussion about it with the Department of National Revenue. I do not think I can say more now than that I will follow it up myself and see what the situation is. I will ascertain from the Department of National Revenue what their views are and then I will see what mine are.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Fiscal period for individual member of partnership wound up.

Mr. Abbott: I have an amendment to section 6, subsection 2. Subsection 2 reads:

This section is applicable to the 1950 and subsequent taxation years.

I would ask my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to move:

That subclause 2 of clause 6 be amended by substituting 1949 for 1950 in line 35.

As the committee will appreciate, this is a relieving section.

Mr. Martin: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Knowles.]

On section 7—Lease-option, hire-purchase, etc.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand it, section 7 has the effect that in these lease-option agreements, or in fact agreements for sale, where the purchase price is to be paid over a period of years by instalments, the amounts of the annual payments will no longer be deductible as rent or an expense but will be included as a part of the purchase price and not deductible from income. I notice that no exception is made in the section, or so far as I can see any discretion given to the taxing authorities, to take account of what is almost a universal feature of such instalment payments, namely, that there is provision for interest on the unpaid balance of the purchase price. In other words, if you sell under an agreement for sale at $5,000 to be paid at the rate of $1,000 a year, almost invariably there is a provision that interest at the rate of five per cent, let us say, will be payable on the unpaid balance together with the instalments of purchase price. I cannot see that anywhere in the section there is provision for that interest charge to be deducted from income. It is a genuine expense. It is not a part of the purchase price. It is merely interest on the unpaid balance, and I feel provision should be made for its deduction.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might say a word in explanation of the amendment. Last year section 18, as contained in the act, applied to movable property. The essence of it was that if you agreed to rent machinery or equipment at $5,000 a year, and it was provided that at the end of five years—I am using that figure as an example—if you had paid the rent of $5,000 a year regularly the machinery would belong to you on payment of a further $100, that was looked upon as a capital expenditure. For purposes of depreciation the total rental payments would be aggregated together with the final payment on the option to purchase, and depreciation taken on that figure.

That only extended to movable property. As probably members of the committee are aware, it was found that this type of contract was being extended to real estate. In a good many cases, for instance, an insurance company will take over chain store properties at a figure. They will be leased by the store operator for so much a year, and the contract will provide that at the expiration of a certain period, upon payment of perhaps a fairly nominal sum, the so-called lessee will own the property. If that so-called lease extended over a reasonable period of time there would be no discrimination but if, as is sometimes the case, it was for a very short period, let us say for five years, and the depreciation which could be taken on that type of property would normally take twenty-five years to write down, then obviously the effect of such an arrangement would be to enable the so-called lessee to obtain accelerated depreciation at a rate which would not be available to the ordinary owner of a property.

It was felt that should be prevented. Mind you, I think I should say at once these arrangements are not entered into for the purpose of obtaining accelerated depreciation. They are entered into in order to enable the so-called lessee to improve his working capital position and not have too much money tied up in real estate. That is the purpose of the section. The general interest rule of course would apply with respect to moneys borrowed for legitimate purposes in connection with the business. That might cover the point raised by the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: Take a conditional sale agreement. Would it cover an ordinary conditional sale agreement of movable or immovable property? Would that come under the provisions of this amending section?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that a conditional sale agreement would come under this section, and that the aggregate of the so-called rental and interest would be taken for the purpose of arriving at the capital cost against which depreciation could be taken as an expense.

Mr. Fulton: I can see that, but what about the effect of the amendment?

Mr. Abbott: The only effect of the amendment is to extend the operation of the clause to real property, that is, immovable property. Previously it only related to movables. Now it extends to immovable property, except that used by farmers.

Mr. Fulton: Subsection 2 of the proposed section 18 provides:

> Where a person is deemed under subsection (1) to have acquired property under a contract or arrangement and the contract or arrangement is subsequently rescinded or determined, he shall, for the purpose of section 20, be deemed to have disposed of the property for the price fixed by the contract or arrangement minus the aggregate of all amounts paid by him under the contract or arrangement on account of the rent or other consideration.

From reading the section I take it he would then be penalized by having to pay tax on the amount of the payment already made?

Mr. Abbott: No, I am told that is not the case. He has been taking depreciation on the total sum, and this is to provide for the recapture principle in this type of contract.

Mr. Fulton: It does not have the effect of penalizing him on the payment made, then?

Mr. Abbott: I am told not. I am told he is deemed to have sold it at the unpaid price, so that would wipe that out.

Mr. Fulton: Then there is one small point further. The next subsection is numbered 2. Should that not be 3? You appear to have two subsections 2.

Mr. Abbott: This is section 18, subsections 1 and 2; then there is subsection 2 of clause 7 of this bill.

Mr. Fleming: In connection with the new section 18 (1), as the minister has pointed out the old section applied only to personal property. Now the scope of the section is enlarged to apply to all property except immovable property used in carrying on the business of farming. Would the minister enlarge upon his answer to the hon. member for Kamloops and indicate why the exception is made in that case? Does it arise out of the difference in the basis of depreciation with respect to farming?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: Does the minister anticipate any difficulty in the interpretation of the expression "property used in carrying on the business of farming"?

Mr. Abbott: Well, there may be some difficulty in the interpretation, but my hon. friend is right when he says the different treatment here is a result of the exclusion of those engaged in farming from the operation of the diminishing balance principle of depreciation.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Excess of proceeds over undepreciated capital cost.

Mr. Abbott: I have an amendment to this section, which I will ask my colleague the Minister of Agriculture to move.

Mr. Gardiner: I move:

> That clause 8 be amended by renumbering subclauses (2) and (3) thereof as subclauses (3) and (4) and inserting the following as subclause (2):
> (2) Paragraph (e) of subsection three of the said section twenty is amended by deleting the word "and" at the end of subparagraph (i) thereof, by inserting the word "and" at the end of subparagraph (ii) thereof and by adding the following subparagraph thereto:
> "(iii) each amount by which the undepreciated capital cost to the taxpayer of depreciable property of that class as of the end of a previous year was reduced by virtue of subsection (1A)."

Mr. Abbott: This is a point which was overlooked in the new provisions.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am quite content with it as long as you understand it, because I do not.

Mr. Abbott: I am giving no explicit assurance as to that.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I wanted to speak about this broad matter of the change we have made in our depreciation allowance. It will be remembered that when the minister spoke about it a year ago he was not too clear on just how it operated, but he did make the statement that it was a good thing for business. While far from being an expert, I have made some endeavour to understand this; and the opinions I have had from here and there are in pretty general agreement that this is a retrograde step in connection with depreciation. I realize that I should not say a thing like that without having some authority to support me, so I intend to read some short extracts from an article that appears in the February, 1950, issue of The Canadian Chartered Accountant. The heading is, "A long step backward. Diminishing balance depreciation." The writer is Kenneth F. Byrd, B.Sc. in economics, A.C.A., professor of accountancy at McGill university. He is a man who has had to look at these matters in various countries. On page 65 we find that he was born at Durban, South Africa, and his degrees and experience are given. He was dean of the faculty of commerce and administration at Natal university college, and was appointed professor of accountancy at McGill in 1947. He is a member of the Natal society of accountants and of the institute of chartered accountants in England and Wales. In this article this man, who obviously holds a very responsible position, does not pull any punches in what he has to say about what he calls this retrograde step we have taken. The article begins:

> For many decades North America has been recognized as the home of the straight-line method of depreciation, and Britain, just as definitely, has been regarded as favouring the reducing instalment or diminishing balance method. Here, as in so many other fields of accounting practice, the division between the two countries has been clearly marked. It does not seem, however, to have been equally clearly noted that, five years ago, Britain came to the conclusion—

I am anxious that the minister should listen to this part.

> —that her long clinging to the diminishing balance method was ill-advised and definitely harmful to the interests of good accounting.

He goes on as follows:

> The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales published on January 12, 1945, the ninth of its "Recommendations on Accounting Principles," dealing with the subject of depreciation. The recommendations included the statement that the straight-line method "is used almost universally in the United States of America and Canada and to a large extent in this country. Though other methods may be appropriate in the case of some classes of assets the balance of informed opinion now favours the straight-line method as being the most suitable for general application." As regards the reducing balance method, "also largely used in this country," it warns that the percentage applied needs to be from two to three times that applied under the straight-line method. This is a fact not generally realized, the consequence being that rates of depreciation fixed on this basis may tend to be inadequate.

Then the author mentions our lapse, as he calls it. He says:

> At last, therefore, it might be said that Britain and North America were of the same mind in regard to an important accounting method. Britain had come over to America's point of view. How definitely this was so may be seen in the following extract from a brilliant editorial on the subject, which appeared that time in The Accountant.

I need read only a short part of that editorial.

> The outstanding point that will at once catch the attention of every reader is that the time-honoured reducing balance system is now so thoroughly deposed from its former popularity that it is not admitted even to be a second-rate alternative.

The rest of the quotation from The Accountant is interesting, but I go on to quote the author again:

> Scarcely, however, has this happy unanimity become a fact, outstanding among the other accounting principles and practices about which the two countries still disagree, when Canada decides that, for income tax purposes, the diminishing balance method is not such a bad idea after all. Her Minister of Finance, seeking ways of taking into account for income tax calculation the losses through obsolescence—

I do not have to read any further, but I go on to another portion of the article:

> If, for income tax purposes, adoption of the diminishing balance method is the only means by which the income tax authorities can be induced to make any allowance for losses due to obsolescence, then, for these purposes only, the old, outdated method must be accepted. But surely this is not necessary. Normal obsolescence can be provided for by allowing a sufficiently generous annual depreciation rate on the straight-line basis, and it should be possible to allow for any abnormal loss at the time the asset is discarded.

The author then shows that South Africa did it by methods of that kind. Then, he comes back to the British experience. I am jumping a good deal of this, Mr. Chairman, but he says this:

> Now, why, oh, why does one country not show more awareness of what has been learned by long and bitter experience in another? It is a very clearly established fact that Britain has proved, by decades of use, that the diminishing balance method is wholly unsatisfactory.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, that is the method which we, in the face of the experience in other countries, are adopting in our country. I should like to read just two short extracts from the last of the article:

> The serious thing about the proposed change for Canada is that it is a permanent shift from "straight-line" to "diminishing balance" depreciation.

The author goes on to call it a wolf in sheep's clothing, but I shall not bother about that. He concludes with this sentence:

> The immediate danger is that Canada may, in an ill-advised moment, lose the benefits which she has thus far gained from her long adherence to straight-line depreciation. Let her give heed to the experience of those who have learned that the "lazy accountant's friend"—

That is the name given to this method.

> —that the "lazy accountant's friend" is a wolf in sheep's clothing.

As I indicated at the beginning, I have not sufficient knowledge of this matter to discuss it intelligently, but I have brought as a witness a man who I think is outstanding, and who completely condemns the retrograde step we took last year. I have one other question to ask, and then I am going to sit down. I have not yet heard, it may be through my inattention, any reason why farmers and fishermen should have been granted the option of using the straight-line method or the diminishing balance method. I think it was covered by the Minister of National Revenue the last time the subject was discussed in the house, but speaking from memory, I have not heard why, in this instance, farmers and fishermen should be treated any differently from the man who has a little machine shop in the same town, where the farmer comes to get his work done.

Then I believe the farmer or fisherman had to make his choice within a given time. I suppose that time has now expired or is near expiration. I should like to hear from the minister, first as to what he thinks about this step we have taken, the retrograde step as I call it, or the long step backwards as this author calls it. I should like to hear about that, and then I should like to hear him answer this question. If it was a fair thing for the fishermen and the farmers, why was it not a fair thing to the small businessman?

Mr. Abbott: I read the article by Professor Byrd in the magazine to which my hon. friend referred. He is a professor of accountancy at my own university, and consequently, if for no other reason, a highly competent member of the staff. I am sure it represents his considered and genuine opinion as to the diminishing balance method of depreciation as against the straight-line method, but I am sure that Professor Byrd would be the first to recognize that there can be other opinions on this point. We would not assert for a moment that his opinion was necessarily conclusive. I can tell my hon. friend that there are a great many other persons, in whose judgment and technical capacity I have equal confidence, who have expressed exactly the opposite opinion to me. I may say that includes the chartered accountants association. As I say, it is a matter of opinion, and I am not going to attempt to impose my own opinion on the committee. I came to the conclusion that the provision set out last year was the preferable method in Canada, and the house adopted it. It is now law.

As to the reason why farmers and fishermen were exempted from the operation of the new principle, if the hon. member was in the house he will recall that almost all the farmer members rose and said that this was a terrible thing for the farmers; that they did not keep their books in such a way, or most of them did not keep their books in such a way, that they could readily calculate from year to year on this diminishing balance principle. Being a good-natured sort of a fellow, I did not want to impose on them something which seemed to be objectionable, so I excluded them from the operation of the act. I did make a statement at the time that I thought after they had studied it some of them might feel the diminishing balance principle might be advantageous. I just expressed that opinion. This year some of them seem to have changed their mind. Evidently some of them think that I was right because I have had representations since to the effect that they ought to be allowed to use this new method. So again, being good natured and always willing to listen to suggestions of this kind, I have put in a provision for that. The committee will see there is a provision in here which makes it optional. Once having exercised the option, of course you must stay with it. You cannot switch back and forth from one kind of depreciation to the other; but the option is there. Any small farmer who may find it difficult to keep records in such a way that he can operate on this principle, which apparently requires the keeping of slightly more detailed records, can continue on the straight-line basis. That was the reason for making the exception for farmers and fishermen.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I follow up with some supplementary questions? I want to find out how far the minister will go with me. Do you agree with the professor that it has been in vogue in England for a great many years and has now been discarded, and that it is not used in the United States? In fact, Canada is now the only place using it that I know of. Would that be right?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that that is not correct. They may have partially discontinued it in England. I cannot speak for certain as to that. That however does not prove anything.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If the professor says that—this man who guides your children and your children's children in your universities, and having the reputation you gave him—we would not suspect him of telling us an absolute untruth.

Mr. Abbott: No. But of course he might be mistaken.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister says he may be mistaken. He quotes the accountant in England in the article which he quoted from, where they say identically the same thing that he says. We may be bright enough to rake over some old bones and find some phosphorus or sulphur in them, if we work hard enough. But after all, is it not a fact—whether we are right or wrong; leave that out of the consideration—that we have launched out all by ourselves on something which other countries have discarded?

Mr. Abbott: That is not correct. Other countries have not discarded it, I am informed.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What other countries have not discarded it? South Africa has, Britain has, and the United States has. Who are they?

Mr. Abbott: I shall make inquiries and be glad to give my hon. friend a reply at an early date.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I shall be delighted to have it. I am sure the information will do me the world of good. But the thing will go on as it is now.

Mr. Fulton: I am interested in this matter also. One of the strongest arguments, it seems to me, in favour of abandoning this reducing balance method of depreciation is the extreme complication of it and the unintelligible legislation which it becomes necessary to place on the statute books in order to apply it. I am going to ask the indulgence of the committee to allow me to read paragraph (a) of subsection 1A of this section, so that it will be on Hansard and so that the people in the country will have an opportunity to see if they can understand this or not. It reads as follows:

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Abbott: Had you not better read the whole context? It is very hard to understand anything taken apart from its context, you know.

Mr. Fulton: All right. I will read subsection 1A.

Mr. Abbott: Good.

Mr. Fulton: It reads as follows:

(1A) Where one or more amounts are by subsection (1) required to be included in computing a taxpayer's income for a taxation year in respect of the disposition of depreciable property of a prescribed class and the taxpayer has, during the year but following the dispositions, acquired further depreciable property of that class, notwithstanding subsection (1) and paragraph (e) of subsection (3), the following rules are applicable:

(a) if the aggregate of the amounts that would, according to the terms of subsection (1), be included thereunder in computing his income is equal to or exceeds the amount that would, according to the terms of paragraph (e) of subsection (3), be the undepreciated capital cost to him of depreciable property of that class at the end of the year before any deduction is made under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 11 for that year,

(i) the amount to be included in computing his income for the year under subsection (1) in respect of dispositions of depreciable property of that class is that aggregate minus the amount that would be that undepreciated capital cost, and

(ii) the undepreciated capital cost to him of depreciable property of that class at the end of the year is nothing;

An hon. Member: It does not mean anything.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friends to the right and left are remarking that it adds up to nothing, as far as their understanding is concerned. There is more, but I shall not read it all. It is all equally incomprehensible.

Mr. Sinclair: Except to clever lawyers.

Mr. Fulton: I would not care to make any distinction as to that. I recall, however, that last year the Minister of Finance, whom we all regard as a clever lawyer, was quite candid in confessing that he was not able to explain it and he would not venture to undertake an explanation.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no. Wait a minute. I have been waiting for a long time to say something about that one. I never said that I could not explain the section in the act. What I did say was that I was not an accountant and that no one should expect me to explain the technical operation of any method of depreciation; although I think perhaps I could do it if I had to.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister will agree that he went very far. As I recall it, he said that he felt it was not clear or that he was unable to make it clear—

Mr. Sinclair: To laymen.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, to laymen.

Mr. Fulton: That he was unable to make it plain.

Mr. Abbott: To laymen.

Mr. Fulton: It is not very clear to many people. As I say, I am not going to try to draw any distinction between who may be clever and who may not be. I will leave that to the parliamentary assistant. But there are many accountants throughout the country, as well as lawyers, who have suggested that this is not only a difficult section or provision to interpret but in fact, as the hon. member for Calgary West has pointed out, is a retrograde step.

Referring again to this magazine The Canadian Chartered Accountant, it is true that the minister pointed out that Professor Byrd's opinion expressed in that article in the February issue is his opinion; but in the same issue there is a letter from the committee on accounting and auditing research of the Dominion Association of Chartered Accountants, which does surely refer to the official opinion of the chartered accountants' organization in Canada.

Mr. Abbott: They come to see me. The association send their delegates each year, and I know that my hon. friend will accept my assurance that they not only tell me they have no objection to these measures but they have approved them.

Mr. Knowles: Do they understand them?

Mr. Abbott: I think they understand them very well indeed, if I may say so.

Mr. Fulton: They certainly have objection to the regulations.

Mr. Abbott: They are paid to understand them.

Mr. Fulton: I enjoy these interchanges but perhaps I might be allowed to continue what I have to say. They certainly have objection to the regulations which have so far been worked out or applied in the enforcement of this system, because this is a copy of a letter dated Toronto, February 9, 1950, addressed to the Minister of Finance objecting to certain of the regulations applying this diminishing balance principle. What I want to do particularly is to reinforce what the hon. member for Calgary West has said to the effect that this diminishing balance system of depreciation has been abandoned in the United Kingdom. In that connection I would rely on the authority of an article in an earlier copy of The Canadian Chartered Accountant, the October issue, which the library of the Department of Finance has just been kind enough to lend me.

Mr. Sinclair: Good.

Mr. Fulton: This is an article by Mr. B. H. Binder, immediate past president of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. At pages 150 and 151 of this magazine Mr. Binder points out that with respect to buildings or structures, with respect to machinery and plant, and with respect to farm buildings, the British government under their latest finance and income tax act have abandoned the diminishing balance principle and have gone on the straight-line depreciation principle.

Here is what it says at page 150 with regard to machinery and plant category:

> As regards the annual allowances, rates of wear and tear on a percentage basis have been agreed with the inland revenue in respect of most classes of machinery or plant.

To show the method of computing he says at page 151:

> The usual method of computing annual wear and tear is what is termed the reducing balance method. In other words in ascertaining the wear and tear for any year the agreed percentage is calculated on original cost progressively reduced by each allowance. In some cases, particularly ships and commercial aircraft, the straight-line method is adopted, that is the annual allowance is calculated at a percentage of the original cost. This latter method can now, by arrangement with the inland revenue, in accordance with the terms of the Finance Act 1949, be extended to any machinery or plant, but the percentages are subject to negotiation.

So that in the United Kingdom all machinery and plant can now be placed on the straight-line depreciation basis, although formerly the diminishing balance applied to all that type of equipment. With respect to new farm buildings we find the following:

> Where the owner or tenant of any agricultural or forestry land incurs capital expenditure after the 6th April, 1944, on the construction of farm houses, farm or forestry buildings, cottages, fences or other works for the purposes of husbandry or forestry, an annual allowance is granted at one-tenth of the expenditure, thus writing off the expenditure in ten years.

In other words, straight-line depreciation. Then, as I pointed out in connection with ordinary industrial buildings or structures, the same principle now applies in the United Kingdom. In other words, the diminishing balance principle has been replaced by the straight-line depreciation.

Mr. Sinclair: Has the hon. member studied Mr. Gavsie's article in the same issue?

Mr. Fulton: I have read it.

Mr. Sinclair: That gives the Canadian position pretty clearly.

Mr. Fulton: The Canadian position, I think we agree, is that the diminishing balance system is now applied.

Mr. Fleming: The government's.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, the government's position, for reasons which are given. Mr. Gavsie, who is an official of the Department of National Revenue—

Mr. Abbott: A very able official.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friends on both sides of the house would permit me they would find that I was prepared to pay him a compliment, but they rush in ahead of me. He is, as I was going to say, an extremely able and competent official. I say that although he is sitting in front of the minister at the present time. But Mr. Gavsie would hardly be expected to give a view different from that view which is being implemented in the legislation brought down by his minister.

Mr. Fleming: He probably wrote the section.

Mr. Fulton: The only thing we would expect Mr. Gavsie to do would be to explain in precise terms, which he has done, the reasons why they worked out this system and why they are applying it in Canada. As I understand it, that is all he is doing. You would not expect him to do anything else.

The point, Mr. Chairman, is this. The United Kingdom has abandoned this method. Accountants of repute have stated it to be an outmoded method, and it is a retrograde step. The association of chartered accountants of Canada have written to the minister protesting the regulations under which this new method is being applied, and some of the practical applications of this reducing-balance method that need to be modified.

I have an illustration given here, and having dealt with the general situation I should like to ask the minister whether he can explain to me how such an example can fail to result in hardship to the taxpayer. Take the case of a taxpayer who purchases a building for use as a place of business in 1949 for $2,500 and sells it in 1959 for $10,000, which, with the current upward movement of prices of buildings and sites, generally, is not an out of the way proposition. From 1949 to 1959 he will have claimed and been allowed depreciation on a presently unknown rate for ten years—this was written before the regulations were published. The rate is now known —totalling say, $1,500. What is that $1,500, excess depreciation? It is submitted that it is not excess depreciation, but a legitimate charge to profit and loss; but the $7,500 which he sells the building for over and above its original cost is in fact a measure of the increased purchasing power of the taxpayer's original $2,500 and the additional value that he has effected by increasing the location value of the building as a site for that particular type of business. But, Mr. Chairman, under the recovery provisions of this diminishing balances principle the taxpayer will be taxed not only on the recaptured depreciation of $1,500 which has been allowed, but on the capital gain of $7,500.

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Fulton: The minister shakes his head. The shake of his head will not appear on Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: I will answer my hon. friend in a moment. He is completely wrong. The only amount that can be recaptured under the conditions he has given would be the capital cost allowance he has taken of $1,500; and in virtue of the amendment we have to this act that would be spread over five years.

Mr. Fulton: When the minister was questioned on this matter last year, he answered, as I recall, that the capital appreciation would be taxed under this new system.

Mr. Abbott: No, Mr. Chairman. I am positive I never made any such statement. I could not.

Mr. Fulton: Then I take it that the increase of $7,500 over the capital cost will be tax free?

Mr. Abbott: May I answer my hon. friend on that point now? The hypothetical case which he has made is this. A man buys a property for $2,500 at a given time. He sells it x years later for $10,000. In the meantime he has written off as a capital cost $1,500. Now, in fact he has not lost the $1,500; he has got that $1,500 and he has got a capital profit on top; but he will be obliged to bring back into income the $1,500 that he has written off for capital cost, but which in fact he has not lost; and under an amendment which I am introducing to this act he would spread that $1,500 over five years, if he were an individual.

Mr. Fulton: I can see that I was wrong about the $7,500 aspect of it. I can see that clearly now. With regard to the $1,500, is it to be taken that this taxpayer has suffered no possible depreciation?

Mr. Abbott: It has suffered no capital depreciation, because the only justification enabling a taxpayer to take depreciation from current income is on the assumption that in fact the value of his property has gone down; but if on the contrary it has gone up, he is not entitled to depreciation. The building would unquestionably be ten years older, and the bricks may have a slightly more mellow colour, but if he is able to sell it for $10,000 it is quite clear that he has not taken any capital loss, and the depreciation which a man charges to income for depreciable assets is in fact a capital charge, and it is intended to reimburse him for his capital outlay. If in fact he has not lost any capital then he should not have charged it to income, and that is the basis of the recapture principle.

Mr. Fulton: That seems to me to do what in fact this other article to which reference has been made said the department was doing, namely, setting up an entirely new basis for depreciation, not merely changing the method of calculating depreciation, but changing it from the straight line basis, to a diminishing balance basis, but in fact setting up a totally new concept of depreciation. Is not that so?

Mr. Abbott: Well, I concede to my hon. friend that it is undoubtedly a very complicated subject; but whether it is straight line depreciation, or whether it is on the diminishing balances principle, what you are doing is amortizing the capital cost. That is the fundamental principle of depreciation. The only difference in the act now is a difference in method, and the difference in method is that instead of a straight line method of applying five per cent, ten per cent or fifteen per cent, or whatever it is, over the period of years in which depreciation is exhausted, you start off with the same capital cost. You depreciate at a higher figure in the early years, and then you work down until it arrives, theoretically, at nothing. Of course, if you are on a percentage basis you get down to a fraction of a dollar; but, in effect, it will be nothing.

However, there is no difference in the principle of taking depreciation under either system. It is a process of amortization of a capital expenditure, a recognition of the principle that you should not pay tax on something which is going to disappear. That underlies the whole basis of depreciation.

On the other point I readily recognize that the provisions of this section are extremely complicated and extremely difficult for the average layman to understand, and even for the lawyer to understand. As I said at the outset of my remarks, one reason why they have to be lies in the fact that we have eliminated discretions here. Of course it would be very simple to make a short and easily understood section by saying, "in such amount as the minister may determine,"—and that was the system we used to have.

This amendment is a relieving measure. If you purchase additional assets of the same class you can group them and, instead of having to pay tax on the excess portion of depreciation which, in fact, has not been needed, you are getting accelerated depreciation on your new assets. And the second group, group B, covers the case where there has been less.

It is long and complicated but, in defence of the draftsmen, chief of whom was the assistant deputy minister of justice, for whom I have high regard as a draftsman, I do think that it fully and clearly and accurately sets out the contingencies which have to be met. I cannot say anything further about the drafting.

I freely confess I had to study it pretty carefully before I realized how it operated; but I did finally come to the conclusion that it would cover the case to which I have been referring. It is, as I say, a relieving measure which has been requested by outsiders as being an appropriate amendment to make to the act.

Mr. Fulton: What does the minister say in answer to the specific question raised by those who disagree with this method, that it distorts altogether the actual rate of depreciation, making it much too high in the earlier years and too low in the later years?

Mr. Abbott: In my view it comes much closer to the actual facts. Take the case of the ordinary motorcar. Everyone knows that in the initial year the car depreciates more than it does on the straight line basis. It depreciates up to 30 per cent right away. That is why I believe—and I may believe it wrongly—that the diminishing plan principle, where you have a higher percentage in the earlier years, is a fair principle.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has picked out one particular category to illustrate his proposition, and his illustration is not sound. For instance, let us consider industrial plant machinery, where it is generally agreed that new equipment and machinery installed in a plant in fact does not reach maximum output and a level of peak efficiency for perhaps two years after the machinery has been brought into use; whereas, under this reducing plan method the depreciation in the first year is very great, and in the second, third and fourth years it is considerably less. The fact is that the machinery is more valuable to the industry after the second year's operations, when the kinks have been ironed out, and the new product has found its market.

It seems to me that there is a good case, an almost unanswerable case, for those who say that if you take a straight line method of depreciation it will give you a picture while not exactly parallel, nevertheless much closer to the actual rate of depreciation or obsolescence of the machine than this new diminishing plan would.

Mr. Abbott: Well, it is a matter of opinion. I have expressed the view that in my opinion, and in the opinion of the government, this is the better and fairer system. There was a good deal of pressure during the war for us to give accelerated depreciation in respect of various businesses. In a sense this is a form of accelerated depreciation, because you get the depreciation more quickly in the earlier years than in the later years.

Mr. Fulton: I will make one final comment. What the minister has said seems to me to prove that here we have a case where a few particular circumstances will be suited by this method, but that it will be unsuitable to the great majority of cases. It is true that under special circumstances it was thought necessary to give accelerated depreciation, but that was a special procedure worked out to fit special cases in wartime. In the same way that accelerated depreciation is not necessary in the normal run of cases I submit that the diminishing balance method is not suitable now. I say this is a wrong principle which will fit only a few special cases, but that the straight-line method is still of much more general application throughout the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take the time of the committee to discuss the merits of these two types of depreciation. But I do wish to say a word really by way of repeating what I said last autumn, that we are here in this second session, confronted with regulations, and no one has had an opportunity to say a word about them. We get a detail here or there; but it all comes to us as something over and done. We have had it pointed out this afternoon that we are in what seems like an invulnerable position. We are talking about a type of depreciation which has been abandoned in Great Britain.

Mr. Abbott: Only in part. It was only on a certain class of assets.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I accept the correction. Last autumn I pointed out that we were left in an absurd position, and we were told we had to pass the legislation before the regulations could be made. When I say that I am looking at page 2729 of Hansard for last year.

Here we are again, in another session, and again we have no chance, as a parliament, to consider this matter except in this haphazard fashion. As a matter of fact, it would look as though the institute of chartered accountants, who are no doubt very worthy people, are making the law, and not parliament. I would be the last one to deny that they have much more technical knowledge about this sort of thing than we have. But I say again that we are here, not as technicians, but as people who are supposed to have common sense. Often it takes the mind of the layman to decide these matters.

That is my complaint. We never have had an opportunity. We may have something to say about it, but we have not yet; and, so far as I can see, we shall have no opportunity now. That is wrong. I think that opportunity should be afforded, and I am voicing my complaint again.

Mr. Fleming: This matter has been discussed fully, and I do not propose to extend the discussion in respect of the two theories, except to make a brief comment on the approach to the question. The minister has referred to representations he received from the Dominion Association of Chartered Accountants, in which he intimated that approval had been given by that association to the diminishing balance method.

I have before me a copy of The Canadian Chartered Accountant for April of this year in which, at page 175 and following, there appears the text of recommendations in relation to the income tax legislation which were submitted to the minister by the taxation section of the Canadian Bar Association, and the legislative committee of the Dominion Association of Chartered Accountants.

I shall not read at length from these recommendations, except so far as may be necessary to illustrate what seems to be something very important. This relates directly to the last remarks by the hon. member for Greenwood. The subject of a better method of calculating depreciation cannot be dealt with on the basis of legislation alone. The regulations are just as important as the terms of the Income Tax Act itself in debating whether we have now a better or worse method than we had before. In the opening paragraph of this submission those submitting the recommendations draw attention to the fact that while for purposes of taxation the new diminishing balance method appears to have been well designed to provide fair treatment for taxpayers with some exceptions, nevertheless they go on to point out that for accounting purposes this method in comparatively few instances is considered to be appropriate. Then they proceed to say:

> . . . if the introduction of that method for taxation purposes has the effect of causing taxpayers to abandon proven methods of depreciation accounting hitherto adopted consistently for purposes of determining profits for the information of shareholders and proprietors, then the law and the regulations issued thereunder are objectionable and should be repealed.

Then the submissions which follow attack some of the regulations issued under the section of the act passed last year. It is true there are some sections of the act which are under attack in this submission but it is the regulations that, from the point of view of accounting purposes, are at this point under the attack of these people who have knowledge both of the law and of the best accounting practices. The minister has not made reference in detail to any of the regulations. I shall mention regulation 1100(4), which is under strong attack by the taxation section of the Canadian Bar Association and the legislative committee of the Dominion Association of Chartered Accountants. I shall read one or two observations on page 175. One comment reads:

In operation, subsection 4 will force one group of taxpayers, namely limited companies, to make a choice between either violating sound accounting procedures or depriving themselves of the right to allowances which the regulations are designed to give to them. It is no misstatement of fact to say that only a company that adopts unsound accounting practices will be in a position to take full advantage of the allowances granted under the regulations.

One could read further similar expressions which follow. Again speaking of regulation 1100(4) the submission reads:

For years the accounting profession throughout the world has been striving to develop sound accounting practices which will present business operations in the fairest manner possible. That a tax regulation should be the instrument whereby much of the progress already made in Canada should be nullified is surely contrary to the public interest. Yet, if subsection 4 is to remain in the regulations, such will inevitably be the result.

It is paradoxical that a measure which was supposed to "mean a great improvement over the old system and . . . a further step towards greater simplicity in our system of taxing business profits," and which would "likewise be more equitable to the taxpayer and to the treasury" should in fact, because of the inclusion of section 1100(4) produce precisely the opposite results for all incorporated taxpayers.

Then the submission recommends that subsection 4 of regulation 1100 be deleted.

In the second place, in regard to the provision for recapture, section 20, subsection 1, their recommendation is that the section be reworded to relate the calculation of the amount recaptured to the undepreciated capital stock at the end of the year in which disposition takes place.

Mr. Abbott: That is covered by this amendment. My hon. friend will appreciate that that recommendation is dealt with in this amendment.

Mr. Fleming: Then they go on to deal with a number of other regulations. It comes down to this, Mr. Chairman, that actually there are very few members of the house who have had the technical experience to arrive on their own account at a final conclusion with respect to the advantages of one method over the other. Nevertheless members of the house are capable of forming opinions, because they are doing so all the time, based upon submissions made to them by those who have had experience and have made a detailed study that will so qualify them. I urge upon the minister that at some stage, and I hope relatively soon, an opportunity be given through the medium of a committee—possibly the banking and commerce committee would be the most appropriate one—to review this question and to receive representations and the assistance of considered views from such well qualified bodies as those whose submissions I have just been reading.

Mr. Abbott: I thank my hon. friend for his comments. The amendment suggested by the accountants and the bar association to section 20 (1) is incorporated in the bill. Discussions with respect to regulation 1100 (4), as indicated by the Minister of National Revenue in a statement in the house on the 28th of March, have been proceeding with the department for some time. I am informed that an amendment to the regulation has been pretty nearly completed, and will probably be announced within the course of the next week or ten days. I merely add that the representations to which my hon. friend has referred have been followed up with the Department of National Revenue, and I think that appropriate amendments to the regulation are now being drafted.

Mr. Fleming: I do not wish to press the minister on the subject of regulations before they have been promulgated. May the committee infer that the amendments intended to be made in regulation 1100 (4) will meet the criticisms contained in this submission?

Mr. Abbott: I would hope so, yes. That is what they are intended to do.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Charitable donations.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister a question about section 10, the charitable donations clause. The explanatory note merely states:

The new paragraph (aa) allows for the deduction of gifts to His Majesty in the right of Canada without limit.

Is that the sole intention of the new section?

Mr. Abbott: This amendment is intended to tie in with a substantive amendment to the law relating to gifts to charitable organizations and charitable foundations which will be found in section 21 of the bill. I have a proposed amendment to section 21 somewhat enlarging the language thereof which I shall explain when we reach that section. There is a consequential amendment which will be needed to section 10 in order to conform with my proposed amendment to section 21, the main section dealing with the new arrangements concerning charitable organizations. I will ask one of my colleagues to move:

That subclause (1) of clause 10 be amended by inserting immediately before the words "His Majesty" in paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 26 of the act the following words:
"corporations resident in Canada and exempt from tax under this part by paragraph (eb) of subsection (1) of section 57."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Mr. Abbott: I may say there are two classes of charitable organizations under the section to which I refer, and they come under the headings "(ea)" and "(eb)". I have no doubt they will be known as "ea" charitable organizations and "eb" charitable organizations.

Mr. Fleming: We shall have a full discussion on that?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I want to go into that quite fully because I think we are proposing some very interesting amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Dividends from controlled resident corporation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask the minister what the reasons are for the strict limitation in this section. You will observe that the section applies to cases where control of one company is acquired by another after May 4, and provides in effect that dividends paid by company A are tax free in the hands of company B only to the extent that they are paid out of income earned by company A after the date when control was acquired by company B. I have one or two suggestions to make. Perhaps first of all the minister might explain why there is this apparently strict limitation as to time and also as to company relationship.

Mr. Abbott: I will have an amendment moved making the date May 10 rather than May 4, because May 10 was the date the bill was actually available to hon. members, though it was given formal first reading on May 4. As the committee will appreciate, this is a new section inserted in the act in order to prevent the transfer of control of one company to another, thereby obtaining the surplus of the first company by a tax-free dividend to the second company and in that way avoiding the tax. As lawyer members of the house may be aware, there are a number of ways to legally avoid the payment of income tax with respect to that accumulated surplus. We are not going to interfere, of course, with any arrangements or contracts that may have been made in the past, but for the future it will not be possible to acquire control of a company which has a large undistributed surplus and then, by various legal means, distribute that surplus to the shareholders of the new company without personal income tax being paid on it.

The corresponding provision, of course, which makes that a fair arrangement is that under the other section we will in future permit the shareholders of a corporation which has a large undistributed surplus, which would be subject to personal income tax if distributed, to capitalize that surplus by paying a flat rate of 15 per cent as indicated in the resolution, and thereafter distribute it without the payment of tax. But this is a blocking provision, to prevent in future the reorganization of companies in such a way that accumulated surpluses of this kind can be obtained free of tax. The amendment to which I referred is as follows:

That subclause (1) of clause 11 be amended by inserting at the end of both subparagraphs (ii) and (iii) of paragraph (b) of subsection (1D) of section 27 of the act the following:
"to the extent that they are not, for the purpose of subsection (1A), deemed to have been paid out of designated surplus."
and that subclause (2) of clause 11 be amended by substituting May 10 for May 4 in line 43.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would refer to the suggestion I made to the minister when we were looking at section 2, and I suggest now that he might deal further with the provisions with regard to the undistributed incomes, dealing with the distinction between the way individuals are treated and the way in which, to some extent at any rate, corporations are treated. I want to come back to the limitations of section 11, but if the minister would care to make a statement covering the difference in treatment as outlined in this section I think it would be helpful.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister is going to accede to the suggestion of my hon. friend may I suggest that it would contribute greatly to the understanding of the committee if the minister would take it in various stages, as it seems to me no one can hope to appreciate the full implications of section 11 unless at the same time he has regard to those very lengthy new provisions in sections 73, 73A, 73B and 95A, to be found in clauses 25 and 32 of the bill. I think the simpler the approach the better, and perhaps in order to assist the committee the minister would deal with the position created by these amendments first of all—

Mr. Abbott: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit me to interrupt him. As he was speaking it occurred to me that consideration of this question might be facilitated if we allowed this section to stand until we reach section 73 and possibly section 95A, to which he has referred. If my hon. friend and the committee think that would be helpful I should be glad to follow that course. I think it might be helpful; with this reservation, that we might pass the amendment, and then we can consider the section as amended after we have discussed the other sections mentioned.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lesage): The amendment has been carried. Shall the section stand as amended?

Section stands.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Two fiscal periods end in same taxation year.

Mr. Abbott: I have an amendment to this section the purpose of which I might explain before asking one of my colleagues to move it. It adds section 34B following section 34A. As I mentioned in discussing this matter in reply to some questions asked by the hon. member for Kamloops, in the case of the sale of real estate by an individual with the recapture clause coming into operation, it might well prove inequitable if the entire recapture had to be taken into the individual's income tax return in the one year, because of the graduated scale. So I am proposing in section 34B that this amount, whatever it may be, can be spread over a five-year period. It is pointed out to me, of course, that the recapture clause applies only for 1949 and subsequent periods. That is the principle of the new section, and I think the committee will agree that this is a desirable provision to put in the act.

Mr. Gibson: It does not go backward and forward; just the one way?

Mr. Abbott: No. This is a relief provision, and it just goes backwards. The amendment reads:

That subclause (1) of clause 13 be amended by substituting the word "sections" for the word "section" in line 12 and by adding the following section within the quotation marks:

"34B. Where an amount is included in computing an individual's income for a taxation year by virtue of section 20, he may elect to pay, as tax for the year under this part, in lieu of the amount that would otherwise be payable, an amount equal to the aggregate of

(a) the tax that would be payable by him for the year under this part if no amount were included in computing his income for the year by virtue of section 20, and

(b) the aggregate of the amounts by which his taxes under this part would have been increased if $\frac{1}{5}$ of the amount so included by virtue of section 20 had been included in computing his income for each of the 5 immediately preceding taxation years."

and that subclause (2) of clause 13 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) Section 34A of the said act as enacted by subsection one is applicable to the 1950 and subsequent taxation years.

(3) Section 34B of the said act as amended by subsection one is applicable to the 1954 and subsequent taxation years.

(4) The said section 34B is applicable to the taxation years 1951 to 1953 inclusive but

(a) when so applied for the year 1951 shall be read as though the fraction "$\frac{1}{2}$" were substituted for the fraction "$\frac{1}{5}$" where it appears therein and the number "2" were substituted for the number "5" where it appears therein;

(b) when so applied for the year 1952 shall be read as though the fraction "$\frac{1}{3}$" were substituted for the fraction "$\frac{1}{5}$" where it appears therein and the number "3" were substituted for the number "5" where it appears therein; and

(c) when so applied for the year 1953 shall be read as though the fraction "$\frac{1}{4}$" were substituted for the fraction "$\frac{1}{5}$" where it appears therein and the number "4" were substituted for the number "5" where it appears therein."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

On section 14—Dividends.

Mr. Abbott: I have a little amendment here, to add a few words, as follows:

That clause 14 be amended by adding the following words to subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 35 of the act:

"to the extent that the dividends so received or so deemed to have been received, as the case may be, were included in computing his income for the year,".

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 15, 16 and 17 agreed to.

On section 18—Income of resident from a foreign country in blocked currency.

Mr. Abbott: There is a small amendment to this section, as follows:

That clause 18 be amended by inserting after the word "whatsoever" in line 17 but before the comma the following words:

"other than payment of income tax to the government of that other country on income from sources therein."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Mr. Abbott: That was a point we overlooked.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has beaten me to it on that point, but I suggest another point still remains. I think the section is far too harsh or negative in saying that the minister's discretion does not exist if any of the income for the year, from sources in that country, has been transferred to Canada or used by the taxpayer for any purpose whatever. The minister has covered that. But why, if a man has, let us say, an income of $50,000 from Britain and is able to transfer $1,000 or $10,000 to Canada, should this provision then fall to the ground? It is not apparent to me at all.

Mr. Abbott: We have been eliminating the ministerial discretion here, and I am informed that the minister does not want to exercise a discretion as to the portion of the taxpayer's income. If by reason of restrictions in the other country he has to leave it there, or part of it there, then any tax is postponed, and there is no interest penalty. But if he brings in a large part he has to use what he brings back for the payment of tax, pro tanto, and if it is not enough he will have to find the rest elsewhere.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not satisfied that is the whole answer. I am not advocating a wide open discretion for the minister, but the minister has not always been of such a shrinking nature. He does not need to have this discretion limited to the extent that (a) now limits it. It says that if any income is transferred at all, then the minister's discretion is taken away. Surely that is making it nugatory.

Mr. Abbott: I must say that I do not know that I would agree with my hon. friend there. Conditions in other parts of the world are such that it is difficult, sometimes impossible, to transfer money to Canada. This is a new subsection in the act to provide relief which has never existed before. It seems that this is as far as we can properly go. You cannot split the income up into two or three different sections if he brings some of it in, because his tax liability is determined on his total income, and his rates are determined on that basis. The policy we have followed here is that the income is included for the purpose of arriving at the rates, and the tax liability with respect to the foreign income which cannot be brought into Canada is postponed. There is no interest on it. The taxpayer has a valuable option there, and it seems to me that is fair enough.

[Mr. Abbott.]

It has been pointed out to me that if cases of real hardship arise, they will have to be dealt with as special cases, which can only be done by the use of section 33 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

Mr. Fleming: With the objective of the section as stated by the minister, I am sure there should be general agreement. The problem arises, however, with the case stated by the member for Greenwood. My submission to the committee, and to the minister, is that in that case the effect of this section is harsh and restrictive. If the stated objective is sound, and I do not think there can be any question about that, then the detailed requirements that follow at the end of the new subsection 7 are unduly harsh and restrictive. The minister says such a case would be a special case for remission under section 33 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. The cases that will be remitted under that procedure I am sure will be quite rare; but the cases of the nature stated by the member for Greenwood may be numerous. I would respectfully urge, Mr. Chairman, that the minister retain this section a while longer. Perhaps we could pass over it in the meantime, and come back to it later to give the minister an opportunity of considering the matter. It seems to me there is much merit in the suggestion put forward. We are in agreement upon the objective of the section as stated by the minister, but we do urge that, if the section is passed in its present form, there will arise under it many hard cases that will be denied the remedial intent of the section. I suggest that the minister give the matter consideration.

Mr. Abbott: This is a new section, and we gave it a good deal of consideration. We feel that this is as far as we should go at the start. We will try it this year. We would like to see how it works, and to see some of the cases that would come up under it. If the hardship my hon. friend fears exists, we could amend it next year. If the house had no objection, although to do so is bad in some ways, we might do it retroactively.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister might let us have a crumb from the table. We have not had any concession of any kind so far. He is putting the taxpayer in a difficult position. A man using some of that income, or bringing some of it into Canada, loses this exemption. If the minister had given some other reason, I do not think I should have had the courage to stand up again. The reason was so very much less convincing than it might have been that I am encouraged to ask the minister to reconsider.

Mr. Abbott: I can only assure my hon. friend that I shall look at the section again next year.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 19—Evasion of tax.

Mr. Campney: I should like to suggest to the minister that the word "wilfully" be changed to "fraudulently". As I understand the state of the law, tax evasion is not necessarily illegal. If a man has been able to take advantage of a tax concession granted by law, then it may be an evasion but not an illegal evasion. For instance, if a taxpayer owns a company which does not enjoy the tax concession in respect to its first $10,000 of earnings and sells part of his shareholdings to bring himself within the tax concession, that is legal. I do not see how any tax can be evaded unless it is wilful, in the sense of being intentional. It has to be intentional. But it is not therefore necessarily wrong or illegal. I do not think the word wilful is a word that has been clearly determined in law, but I think "fraudulent" has. No one objects to the intent of the clause under consideration, but I think a real intent to evade the tax must be proven, and the wording should so indicate. I would suggest that "fraudulently evaded" is the phrase that should be used. In law "fraudulent" has long had a clear and well known interpretation. In a section of such serious import I question the advisability therefore of using new words which might be interpreted in a way that would not agree with what I believe the minister intends, namely, that the section should deal with fraudulent evasion of tax payments.

Mr. Abbott: I thank my hon. friend for his suggestion. I asked about this myself, and the Department of Justice used this language. They asserted that it should be done because the word "wilful" is the word used in section 120, subsection (3), which reads:

> Where a person has been convicted under this section of wilfully, in any manner, evading or attempting to evade, payment of taxes imposed by part I, he is not liable to pay a penalty imposed...

It was felt by the Department of Justice in drafting this bill that the same language should be used in this section as had been used in section 120, subsection (3). It was felt that "wilfully" in this case could be interpreted in no other way than "fraudulently".

Mr. Adamson: I hope the minister will consult with the Minister of Transport, because I tried to get this word "wilful" inserted into the Aeronautics Act, in connection with a regulation concerning the printing of regulations. The member for Vancouver-Quadra and I had quite a battle in the committee trying to get this word "wilful" inserted in that section. I am afraid we were unsuccessful. Our point was about the same as the one here, that in order to break the law a man must know he is doing it, and he must do it intentionally.

Mr. Gibson: Is not the governing word actually "evade"?

Mr. Abbott: I would think so, yes.

Mr. Adamson: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is a dangerous word.

Mr. Ferrie: This word "wilfully" has to be decided by the courts.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, quite. It is a matter for determination by the courts.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Renumbering.

Mr. Abbott: I have a minor amendment here. This is the section which provides that an appeal may be taken straight to the exchequer court. The reason for that of course is that in important cases the taxpayer may feel that he is going to the exchequer court anyway, no matter what the decision of the income tax appeal board may be, and it is desirable to save time. It was thought that it would be well to give the taxpayers who have now pending before the income tax appeal board appeals which have not been heard a similar privilege. The amendment is to accomplish that purpose, and I would ask my colleague if he would so move.

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved:

> That clause 20 be amended by adding thereto the following:
> "(2) Where a taxpayer has, before the time this Act came into force, appealed to the income tax appeal board, if, within 90 days of that time and before that appeal has been heard,
> (a) he has served on the Minister of National Revenue a notice that he is discontinuing the appeal and has forwarded a copy thereof to the board, and
> (b) he has served upon the minister a notice of appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada that complies with all requirements of division J of The Income Tax Act,
> he shall be deemed to have appealed to the exchequer court under subsection (2) of section 55 of The Income Tax Act as enacted by subsection (1) and shall be deemed not to have appealed to the income tax appeal board."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 21—Certain organizations.

Mr. Abbott: This is a section which I am sure will be of interest to all hon. members. Before we discuss it perhaps I might say just a word about it. There is an amendment to be made, but before I indicate what that amendment is I would point out the general purpose of the section. The present section in the act which exempts from tax the income of certain charitable organizations —and it is section 57 which exempts from tax various types of organizations—reads as follows:

(e) an organization operated exclusively for charitable purposes or an agricultural organization, a board of trade or a chamber of commerce, no part of the income of which was payable to, or was otherwise available for the personal benefit of, any proprietor, member or shareholder thereof.

The committee will appreciate the fact that over the years there have been built up various types of charitable organizations including those known as the so-called charitable foundations—the Massey foundation, the Canadian foundation and so on—where capital gifts are made to the foundation, where sometimes income is paid in and where the moneys appropriated are used for charitable objectives, given to hospitals and the like to be expended. In the past it is questionable whether those organizations have been clearly entitled to the exemption. I am sorry to say that in addition there has been an opportunity for abuse in the case of these charitable foundations; that is to say, moneys could be accumulated in them and not actually paid over to charities. Then the charitable foundation could be wound up and the owners or proprietors get the money back, although in the meantime tax exemption privileges would have been obtained. It was felt both necessary and desirable to plug that loophole. Let me hasten to say that this does not apply by any means to the really bona fide, genuine charitable foundation. Without going into detail, one particular case was drawn to our attention which made me feel that an amendment to the act was called for.

Mr. Fleming: Was that case in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Abbott: No, it was a case in the province of Quebec, actually; in my own province. The section now provides for dividing these charitable foundations or organizations into two groups. One is:

(ea) a charitable organization, whether or not incorporated, all the resources of which were devoted to charitable activities carried on by the organization itself and no part of the income of which was payable to, or was otherwise available for the personal benefit of, any proprietor, member or shareholder thereof.

Then there is the (eb) section which covers the so-called charitable foundation. On examining the section the committee will notice that there are laid down certain conditions which would permit this type of corporation to qualify as a charitable foundation and to obtain the exemption from income tax which would flow from that quality. As the sections appear in the bill, there is a clear line of demarcation between the charitable organization which carries on charitable activities itself and the foundation which turns over all its assets or 90 per cent of its receipts to charitable objectives. In the first case under the defining section which we passed earlier, the donor to the organization could claim an exemption within the 5 per cent limit in the case of a corporation and the 10 per cent limit in the case of individuals for gifts made to the charitable organization. But as drafted, the charitable foundation would not qualify such a donor for exemption. It was pointed out to us that there were some cases in which these groups performed both these functions. They not only conducted charitable activities themselves but they also turned over moneys out of their revenues to charitable objectives like hospitals, universities or whatever it may be. We therefore studied whether it would not be possible, while retaining the protective provisions to which I have referred, to give this second class of charitable organization a similar quality which would enable people who made gifts of income to that so-called charitable foundation to deduct this for income tax purposes. The effect of the amendment which I am going to move is this. Perhaps I had better read the amendment. It is as follows:

There shall be included in computing a corporation's income all gifts received by the corporation other than gifts received subject to a trust or direction that the property given, or property substituted therefor, is to be held by the corporation for the purpose of gaining or producing income therefrom.

In other words, the onus will be put upon the donor to say when he gives to the charitable foundation that his gift is a gift of income or of capital; but from the point of view of the tax department, all receipts by the foundation will be considered as income unless the foundation shows that they have been paid over on the advice that they are a gift of capital and that the capital is to be invested and the income only used for charitable purposes. That explanation may not be as clear as it should be, but I have tried to summarize the provisions of the section. I will welcome any discussion by members of the committee.

Mr. Fleming: In the first place, do I understand that this provision applies to charitable foundations in existence at the present time?

Mr. Abbott: From June 1, 1950. The section so provides.

Mr. Fleming: Only those coming into existence on or after June 1, 1950. Is that what the minister means?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Fleming: I am referring to the date of the creation of the charitable foundation.

Mr. Abbott: The charitable foundation can be created before or after; but the particular requirements with respect to the distribution of 90 per cent of its income and so on apply as and from June 1, 1950.

Mr. Fleming: Quite so.

Mr. Abbott: It would apply to the 1950 taxation year.

Mr. Fleming: I think that is quite clear, but I wanted the minister's confirmation of it. It is quite clear then that this provision may deprive some charitable foundations of an exemption which they hitherto enjoyed.

Mr. Abbott: No. I do not think it is going to deprive them of anything.

Mr. Fleming: I am sorry, but I do not read the amendment in the same way as the minister does.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps it would be better to have the amendment read before we debate it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved:

That clause 21 be amended by renumbering subclause (3) as subclause (4) and inserting the following immediately after subclause (2):

(3) The said section fifty-seven is further amended by adding the following subsection thereto:

"(3) For the purpose of paragraph (eb) of subsection (1)

(a) a corporation shall be deemed not to have acquired control of another corporation if it has not purchased (or otherwise acquired for a consideration) any of the shares in the capital stock of that corporation, and

(b) there shall be included in computing a corporation's income all gifts received by the corporation other than gifts received subject to a trust or direction that the property given, or property substituted therefor, is to be held by the corporation for the purpose of gaining or producing income therefrom."

Mr. Fleming: My observations, Mr. Chairman, are not affected particularly by the amendment. I should like some information as to the extent to which section 21 of the bill applies. I think the minister's answer has made it quite clear that this amendment —whatever the effect of it might be—does apply to all so-called charitable foundations in existence. It does not apply only to those that may come into existence after the date of the enactment of this bill.

Mr. Abbott: Quite right.

Mr. Fleming: Therefore if there is anything to be said for or against retroactivity as applied to legislation affecting charitable foundations, then those who object to application of such legislation to charitable foundations in existence had better speak now or forever hereafter hold their peace.

The other point on which I should like to have some confirmation from the minister is this. I take it that the underlying purpose of the proposed amendment is to compel charitable foundations, so called, to disburse the income that they receive.

Mr. Abbott: If they want to claim the taxation exemption.

Mr. Fleming: Quite. If they wish to enjoy the benefit of exemption from income tax then they must disburse their income as they go along to the extent of 90 per cent of that income.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: Back of that must be the view that it is unhealthy to permit charitable foundations to set up businesses and to claim immunity from taxing statutes, and simply to accumulate funds or accumulate control of corporations or businesses. I may say, sir, that with that intent I am in full accord, and I hope that this committee of the whole will be in complete accord with it.

I would have been interested to hear from the hon. member for Leeds, had he been in the house, and perhaps any other hon. members who may have spoken against similar Ontario legislation on the hustings in the by-election campaign several months ago in the Ontario constituency of Leeds.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister one question on paragraph (eb), subparagraph (i) which reads:

Did not carry on any business.

If a charitable organization is established, the creature of a revenue-producing business already in existence, it cannot now carry on any commercial activities. Is that the intent?

Mr. Abbott: No. It is quite possible that some of these charitable foundations which have been created prior to this time may in fact control certain businesses through stock ownership. This does not interfere with that at all. There is no retroactivity effect to this legislation. They may have accumulated their income right up to this time and not paid a bit of it out, but in future in order to continue to qualify they must pay out 90 per cent of their current income. We are not interfering with any practices that may have been followed in the past, but in future they must qualify, and in future it will not be possible for any charitable foundation to acquire control by purchase of shares of a business.

Mr. Coldwell: Can the minister give us an estimate of the revenue that the government has lost on account of these so-called charitable foundations that have been established in Canada?

Mr. Abbott: It is almost impossible to ascertain. I do not want it understood for a moment that I think there has been any widespread abuse of the possibilities which perhaps the charitable foundations would afford in the hands of someone who wanted to use it for that purpose. But the rules which we are setting up here seem to provide a fairly good test for the bona fide charitable institution, which I think is very desirable. I do not want to discourage them for a moment, but I think certain safeguards are needed in order to see that the provisions are not abused. I want to reiterate, that there is no retroactive effect to this whatever.

Mr. Coldwell: The purpose of my question was to find out whether the government has any knowledge as to the extent of loss of revenue to the country, on account of the establishment of charitable foundations. That is something the house should know about, because the more of these we get and the more they multiply the more burden is placed upon the remainder of the taxpayers of the country. That is the point.

Mr. Abbott: The point of course is there is no burden so long as 90 per cent of the revenues of these foundations is paid out for genuinely charitable purposes. The donations to them can only be made out of income to the extent of the 10 per cent or 5 per cent limits, and gifts of course would be exempt from gift tax; but with these reservations—we have given this a good deal of thought—the protective measures which we are putting in here are adequate; but at the same time I think they are fair.

Mr. Adamson: Then a revenue-producing corporation must disperse 90 per cent of its revenue? Assume it is a profit-producing corporation. I can think of a number; I can think of some of the drug trusts in the United States. In that country some universities have the right to manufacture certain drugs that one of their professors has discovered. I think the university of Wisconsin is one of them. There may be cases like that in Canada where there are revenue-producing corporations. Under this act the corporation to be classed as a charitable organization must distribute 90 per cent of its profits.

Mr. Abbott: Not the way my hon. friend put it. We must be careful not to confuse the situation in the United States with the situation in Canada. In the United States they have a law whereby the taxability of a corporation depends upon the quality of the person who owns it. I am told that Columbia university is operating spaghetti factories, and all kinds of industrial corporations, and these industrial corporations are exempt from the ordinary corporation taxes because they are owned by Columbia university. I hope that we shall never have that principle in Canada. But let us take the case of a charitable foundation that owns 5 per cent of the shares of a profitable spaghetti company.

Mr. Fleming: Or a newspaper?

Mr. Abbott: Or a newspaper, or anything else you like. The newspaper is not obliged to distribute in dividends any more than the board of directors feels is proper; but all dividends received by the charitable foundation which owns the shares of the spaghetti factory, or the newspaper or anything else, must be distributed for charitable purposes to the extent of 90 per cent in the year received. It does not affect the commercial company which is operating a profitable business, because under this section a corporation to qualify as a charitable foundation must be one in which no part of the income was payable to or otherwise available for the personal benefit of any proprietor, member or shareholder thereof. I think the section is pretty tight.

Mr. Adamson: The minister brought out the Columbia university. That was the case I was trying to dig out.

Mr. Abbott: That is owing to the difference in the law.

Mr. Adamson: I hope we never get to that stage in Canada. I agree with the minister on that. A corporation may then continue to make a profit so long as it does not pay it over to the charitable foundation?

Mr. Abbott: It is to be hoped the corporation would continue to make profit as long as possible. That is what it is in business for. The dividend policy of the corporation will be determined by its board of directors, but as I say if a profitable corporation is controlled by a charitable foundation the earnings of the corporation as available in dividends to the charitable foundation can now be distributed to a charitable foundation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand that if a charitable trust is carrying on any business, it would be disqualified under this section; is that correct?

Mr. Abbott: I do not say it would be disqualified under the section. It would be disqualified only if any of the profits of the business it was carrying on inured to the personal benefit of any proprietor, member or shareholder. If it is a charitable foundation it cannot carry on commercial business. It could do it of course through a corporation, if it had the shares of a corporation in a fashion other than by purchase, or if they had been acquired before the coming into force of this act.

Section stands.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

TEXT OF ANNOUNCEMENT MADE IN LONDON THIS DAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the house to revert to motions for the purpose of communicating to the house a statement about which the leader of the opposition inquired when the orders of the day were called earlier this afternoon?

I would like to read to the house the full text of an announcement made in London today, with which our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was associated. The following statement was issued today (Thursday) in London:

During their talks last week, the foreign ministers of France, the United Kingdom and the United States considered how the countries of western Europe and North America might improve their co-operation on economic problems which require adjustments by them in the period immediately ahead. The emphasis in their discussions was on the positive courses of action which need to be taken.

The Secretary of State of the United States emphasized the great value of the existing relationship between the organization for European economic co-operation and the United States and believed that it would be helpful to broaden this relationship to provide for regular discussion and consideration of the problems requiring co-operative action in the coming period. He pointed out that, while the European recovery program terminates in 1952, the interest of the United States in Europe will necessarily continue and that study of the problems is now going forward actively in the United States on the highest governmental level. During conversations this week, the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated a similar interest on the part of his country to participate in the study of these problems. The four ministers believe that this relationship would permit a close co-ordination of the work now going forward in the United States and Canada on these problems with the parallel efforts of the OEEC.

The foreign ministers of France and the United Kingdom, after consultation with the chairman of the OEEC, stated their hope that the OEEC would invite Canada and the United States to establish, on an informal basis, a working relationship with the OEEC whereby the two countries could join with the OEEC in the discussion and consideration of the action to be taken on these problems.

It was agreed that the proposed working relationship between Canada, the United States, and the OEEC would not interfere with the present functions of the OEEC as an organization devoted primarily to European economic problems as provided in the convention for European economic co-operation.

The four ministers were in agreement that the economic and financial problems arising from the defence effort fell primarily within the competence of the North Atlantic treaty organization. They recognized also the concern of the North Atlantic treaty with broader questions of economic relations among the signatory countries and welcomed the decision of the council to have the deputies consider what further action should be taken under article 2 of the treaty.

The four ministers were further agreed that it was their hope, through a new working relationship, to proceed promptly toward finding solutions of the general economic problems which lie immediately ahead along lines which would eliminate conflict in their international economic policies. They recognize that Canada, the United States and the western European countries have a continuing interest in developing and strengthening economic collaboration between them in order that they can make together their full contribution to the building of a peaceful and prosperous world order. They further recognize that the development and strengthening of the economic ties of this community of nations may in the future require formal organizational expression, but they believe it is unnecessary at this time to attempt to suggest precisely what form of arrangement will prove to be best suited to assist the taking of common action by the community.

The Canadian government welcomes this statement. If the organization for European economic co-operation invites us to establish an informal working relationship with them we shall be glad to accept.

It may be helpful to members of the house if I say a few words about the OEEC. This organization was set up after General Marshall's famous speech of June 5, 1947. In that speech he called on the European countries to draw together. Sixteen countries, including the United Kingdom and Ireland and almost all the continental countries free from Russian domination, responded. As their organization developed, much of its work related to Marshall aid; the members considered together their needs for special assistance and presented programs and reports to the economic co-operation administration, headed by Mr. Paul Hoffman, in Washington. But the OEEC was never intended merely as a channel to facilitate the provision of Marshall aid. Its purposes were wider and longer than that. It was designed, as its name indicates, to promote co-operation among European countries in all matters of common economic interest and on a permanent basis. It has already reduced many of the trade restrictions between European countries. It has fostered trade by means of currency arrangements designed to make strict bilateral balance and barter unnecessary as between members. In these and other ways it is strengthening Europe economically and therefore politically.

This, then, is the organization with which we may be invited to associate. The European organization might thus be extended to establish an informal relationship with Canada and the United States in the discussion and consideration of economic problems of common interest. Thus it may become an organization for North American-Western European co-operation.

I am sure the house will be pleased to know that at the same time as such arrangements for informal economic co-operation in the immediate future are going forward the deputies to the North Atlantic council are to consider further the question of longer-term collaboration under article 2 of the treaty.

In conclusion I should perhaps stress that our new association would be informal. It would involve a recognition that the economic problems faced by OEEC countries, the United States and ourselves are common problems, not isolated individual problems. In the last analysis solutions must depend on action by individual countries, but they should be sought and discussed jointly around a common table.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself and, in doing so, I am sure all members of the party to which I belong, with the expression of approval of every forward step which will bring together in closer and more effective co-operation the nations of the European community on the Atlantic and in North America. What has been given to us now as the official statement coming from the meeting in London does not report conclusions of such a broad nature as had been suggested in the press. I merely mention that because there was certain speculation earlier about something of a more positive nature. Nevertheless I feel there will be great encouragement in the fact that the very presentation of this statement indicates that the nations of the Atlantic community are extending their consideration beyond the military aspects of the North Atlantic charter, and are recognizing the necessity of implementing the general provisions of article 2 as complementary to the purposes of article 1.

Undoubtedly economic and military strength go hand in hand. Without economic strength and economic co-operation the military strength upon which our hopes of peace depend could not possibly be maintained as a reality. If through military co-operation based upon economic co-operation the stability and peace which we all desire result, then it will be possible to carry this association still further to the fulfilment of the purpose of article 2 and to the strengthening of those very institutions, and the understanding thereof which is in itself an essential part of the whole purpose of the treaty. While the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has made it clear that what is contemplated at present is simply an informal arrangement, nevertheless I hope there will be a sufficient measure of formality and of clarity of defined association to give us hope that the termination of these discussions, with continuing and effective association for military purposes, will be carried into the economic and social sphere as well, that this may in truth be the beginning of a far closer collaboration of the nations of the Atlantic community, and that we may in fact be seeing the beginning of a really workable world association for peace and stability in the years ahead.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I noted that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) stated that he was speaking for his party as well as for himself. May I say we are pleased to associate ourselves with the remarks he has made. We have always emphasized the importance of article 2 of the Atlantic agreement. I am very glad indeed to learn that the conference has come to some informal arrangement regarding the implementation of that part of the agreement. I believe that economic understanding among the north Atlantic nations is at least as important as military arrangements. If we can bring about reasonable and decent economic conditions among the nations of the world I feel that in time we shall manage, as the leader of the opposition said in his closing remarks, to eliminate the prospect of future war.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 177, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 21—Certain organizations.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 22 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—Application.

Mr. Fleming: Here we come to this group of sections that were referred to earlier, embodying these important new sections 73, 73A, 73B and 95A; and if it meets with the approval of the minister I suggest that these be considered together.

Mr. Abbott: I was just going to make the same suggestion.

Mr. Fleming: Earlier in the day the hon. member for Greenwood had something to say on this in asking for a detailed elucidation of these provisions, and also those in section 11 of this bill, which was allowed to stand for consideration together with this group of related sections. Just before we left that I was outlining to the minister what I hoped might be a helpful breakdown in the approach to this question. If the minister would make that approach as detailed as possible I believe it would be of assistance to hon. members in trying to understand these difficult sections. There are five points on which I am asking the minister for elucidation. First, if he would trace through the position of the individual shareholder in corporations of the kind dealt with in these sections.

Mr. Abbott: You are referring to section 73?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, the group we are taking together; 73, 73A, 73B, 95A and section 11 of the bill.

Mr. Abbott: Is my hon. friend suggesting that for the sake of convenience we might consider together section 73, section 95A, and the section that was allowed to stand a short time ago, all of which relate to the same subject matter? It seems to me that might be very useful.

Mr. Fleming: That is what I was suggesting.

Mr. Abbott: Then could we carry on with the other sections, until we reach 95A?

Mr. Adamson: Had we finished section 21?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. I am in the hands of the committee, but I would be quite prepared to have section 73 stand until we get to 95A, and then deal with these together. Section 95A is in effect the substantive section.

Mr. Fleming: Then does the minister propose that section 28 should stand?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Section stands.

On section 29—Hearing and determination by any number.

Mr. Fleming: Apparently it is intended by this section that one member of the income tax appeal board may hear appeals. I should like to know if it is intended that the legislation should go that far. It is one thing for a board of three to have a panel of two, but it is another thing for the board to break itself up into panels of one. That seems to be the effect of the section.

Mr. Abbott: Here is the position. It was felt that a good many of these appeals could be heard by one member of the board. There is, of course, an appeal to the exchequer court; but apart from that the member appointed to hear an appeal may at any stage of the appeal refer it to the whole board. After some experience in the administration of the appeal board, the chairman of that board and the officers of the Department of National Revenue felt that the hearing of what I might describe as rather minor appeals could be readily undertaken by one member. It is always open to the single member hearing the appeal, under the amendment as proposed, to refer it to the whole board. It is to be assumed that he would do so at the request of the appellant, let us say; and in any case there is the protection of an appeal from the board to the exchequer court. That was the thinking behind the proposed amendment.

Mr. Fleming: What will be the practice followed by the board in the assignment of this work? Is it the intention of the board to make a practice of having appeals heard by only one member, or of sorting out the appeals and assigning some to a panel of two or three members and some to a panel of only one?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that is the practice that will be tried out; that the appeals will be sorted, and what appear to be the simpler ones dealt with by one member, and others dealt with by two or more members of the board. It is believed that this will quite appreciably speed up the work of the board.

Mr. Fleming: Can the minister tell the committee how the board stands now in relation to its backlog of work?

Mr. Abbott: I would not want to be too definite about this, because we have not checked recently, but I am told they are about two months behind now, having regard to the fact that the procedure of assessment has been speeded up greatly in the Department of National Revenue.

Section agreed to.

Sections 30 and 31 agreed to.

On section 32—Private company election.

Mr. Fleming: Here we are back on this group of sections again. I think this is the third time I have started to offer a suggestion to the minister in the hope of simplifying and clarifying these very difficult sections. I am suggesting that the minister take this in five stages. The first would be to trace through this new legislation the position of the individual shareholder, that is, the non-corporate shareholder; second, the position of the corporate minority shareholder under these sections and in relation to section 27 of the act; third, the position of the corporate controlling shareholder before May 10; fourth, the position of the corporate controlling shareholder after May 10; fifth, the position of the corporate controlling shareholder in reference to subsidiaries of subsidiaries.

Mr. Chairman, those are suggestions to the minister. I think if the minister can clarify the position, or the effect of those amendments at those five stages, he will have helped the committee to understand these provisions.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend appreciates that these sections apply only to private companies as defined in the terms of the section, and that was the principle that was applied to similar measures following the recommendation of the Ives commission. Take the case which he puts up first, of the individual shareholder of a private corporation which has accumulated a surplus.

Mr. Adamson: This is a corporation with less than seventy-five shareholders?

Mr. Abbott: According to the definition of the act, that is right. A corporation may elect to pay fifteen per cent tax on that accumulated surplus, which thereupon becomes capitalized and then becomes a tax-paid surplus. It may not pay on any part of it; it must pay a tax on the whole thing, so far as the arrears are concerned. Now, when that has been done, it becomes a tax-paid capital surplus. The corporation may capitalize it, and it then becomes a capital surplus which can be distributed in accordance with the law governing corporations in so far as the distribution of capital is concerned. It could take the form of a stock dividend; it could take the form of a distribution for the reduction of capital. My hon. friend is a lawyer, and he will appreciate that when one is effecting a distribution of capital under the company law relating to the particular company, whatever the requirements of the particular company law for the reduction of capital are must be observed; that is the case of an individual shareholder.

In the case of a corporate minority shareholder, he would be in exactly the same position as an individual shareholder. The corporation would have capitalized this undistributed surplus, and it could then be capitalized and distributed to corporate minority shareholders and would not be taxable in the hands of that shareholder.

Mr. Fleming: Will that be so after we have adopted section 11 of the bill which amends section 27 of the act?

Mr. Abbott: Yes; section 11 will not interfere with that situation. Section 11 only applies to the future acquisition of control, so the ordinary rules apply, and the dividends from corporation to corporation are free as between one Canadian taxpayer and another where control was previously acquired.

I think I have answered the third question as a result of my hon. friend's interjection.

I think I have answered both three and four. I have dealt with both prior to, and subsequent to, May 10. The fifth question concerns the position of the corporate controlling shareholder of a subsidiary of a subsidiary. I must confess that I get a little lost there. I think the same rules apply though, no matter how far you carry it through. What is referred to in the section as a designated surplus, that is the surplus any particular company has which exists on May 10, can be dealt with in the way I have indicated; that is, it could be capitalized upon the payment of the fifteen per cent tax, and the earnings subsequent to May 10 will follow the ordinary rule and can be paid to another company tax free as between those companies, if the other company is a Canadian tax paying company; or the matching principle can be applied on future dividends when earned, and an individual corporation may capitalize, upon payment of the fifteen per cent tax, an amount equivalent to the part which it pays out in cash dividends.

Mr. Fleming: And that can be carried right through, one degree after another, from subsidiary to subsidiary?

Mr. Abbott: I think I am right on that. I confess I have not given any thought to that particular condition. I see no reason why it should not be so.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did the minister say that the privilege of paying the fifteen per cent had to be exercised in respect of the whole amount?

Mr. Abbott: That is right, all the existing surplus up to the end of 1949.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Where does the minister find that in the legislation?

Mr. Abbott: It is in section 95A (1) which reads as follows:

> A private company may elect, in prescribed manner and in prescribed form, to be assessed and to pay a tax of fifteen per cent on an amount equal to its undistributed income on hand at the end of the 1949 taxation year minus its tax paid undistributed income as of that time.

Then subsection (2) covers the accumulation of earnings for the future, or what I refer to as the matching principle.

Mr. Adamson: Has not the minister amended that?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to go back to the provisions of section 11 of the bill, to be sure I understand that the provisions of subsection 1 are applicable where the receiving corporation acquired control of the payer corporation after May 4, which is now May 10. I am not clear on how far that limitation goes. It seems to me that is going to cut out two classes of cases, and the reason for cutting them out I do not see. One is when a company acquiring the shares already controls, through ownership of shares, another company, the company whose shares are transferred; second, a case where a company acquired shares, and the company whose shares are acquired is controlled directly or indirectly by the same company. The narrow wording that is used in section 11 seems to exclude that and yet I cannot see why, in principle, those cases should be excluded.

Mr. Abbott: I am not quite clear that I see what my hon. friend's difficulty is. The purpose of section 11 is to put a cut-off date with respect to the acquisition of control and provide that those surpluses can only be disposed of by capitalizing them under the provisions of section 95A so far as arrears are concerned. So far as the future is concerned, in disposing of their earnings, they may accumulate to the extent that they distribute in cash; and that applies whether it is a company which is now controlling a company which has a large accumulated surplus, or which acquires control in the future. My remarks relate entirely to private companies. The committee will appreciate that we are not talking about public companies at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am coming to that.

Mr. Abbott: When we say "private companies", those are the relatively closely held companies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I still come back to the wording of subsection 2 of section 11, which seems to say that the provisions of subsection 1 are applicable where the receiving corporation acquired control of the payer corporation after May 10. That is really what is meant, that it only becomes effective where that receiver corporation acquired control of a payer corporation after May 10?

Mr. Abbott: Yes; we are not interfering with arrangements that have been made prior to May 10.

Mr. Hatfield: Why does it only apply to private companies?

Mr. Abbott: The answer to that is this. This method of providing a means whereby accumulated surpluses of closely held companies could be distributed without too great penalty arose following the investigations made by the Ives commission. Part XVIII of the old act provided that surpluses of private companies could be capitalized and distributed upon payment of a tax which was something of the order of 20 per cent. We decided to extend that provision to companies which had accumulated surpluses beyond that time. It is a new move. One might say that in logic there is no reason why it should not be applied to public companies; but the Ives commission report did not recommend that it should be. We thought that for the time being we would proceed fairly slowly here and make it apply to the same class of companies that were dealt with under part XVIII of the old act. After we have seen how this works for a year, it may be possible to extend it to public companies. But this sort of legislation could have quite significant effects on the market quotations of publicly held companies, and I really did not feel that I wanted to go that far in this initial step. I am proceeding a bit cautiously here. Frankly, that is the reason why we have restricted it to the same class of company to which the old part XVIII applied.

Mr. Adamson: There is a question I should like to raise, and I should like to get clarification—although I think I know what the answer is—for the sake of the record. Under this bill there is no intention to deal in any way with a public company which has shares listed on the stock exchange and which may have a large surplus. There is no intention under this act to force that surplus into dividends or distribution or to force a public company to distribute its surplus. I ask that question, although I think I know the answer, in order to get the situation adequately cleared up.

Mr. Abbott: No. Neither is there the intention of doing so nor does the proposed legislation do so. It does not affect public companies. It relates only to private companies as defined.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to say that I think the use of the term "private company" is unfortunate. If the legislation had retained the expression used by the minister in his budget speech, namely, "closely held corporation," I think it would be much better. When we came to the budget resolution we found this expression "private company" instead of the earlier and better expression "closely held corporation".

Mr. Abbott: I am sorry, but I was consulting my officials and did not catch that.

Mr. Fleming: I just said that I regretted that when the budget resolution was introduced it used the expression "private company" rather than the clearer expression "closely held corporation" which the minister used in his budget speech. The expression "private company", of course, under the Companies Act has a definite statutory significance. In this bill this expression "private company" has no relation whatsoever to "private company" as that expression is used in the Companies Act. In other words, the kind of company that is contemplated here may be either a private or a non-private company, provided it has not more than 75 shareholders on its share record. In order to avoid confusion on the part of people reading this legislation hereafter, will the minister not consider dropping this expression "private company"? I am sure many people who will read this legislation are going to treat it as the equivalent of the expression "private company" as used in the Companies Act, and that will be misleading. Will the minister not give consideration to using that earlier expression "closely held corporation"?

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to give consideration to it. But may I say that the reason we used it was that in part XVIII, which has been in the law for some time, the phrase "private company" was used, and we have been using it here again. I think in the trade it has come to be fairly well known among lawyers and accountants who are advising with respect to these things. I think it is fairly clearly known what it was, and that is why I retained it. The phrase "closely held corporation" is an excellent colloquial expression, but I do not know that it is much more accurate than "private company". I realize my hon. friend's point that "private company" under the Companies Act has a certain specific meaning with certain conditions attached to it; the number of shareholders is somewhat smaller than is provided under this section.

Mr. Fleming: It has a statutory meaning.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to give consideration to the matter; but I think perhaps we had better let it stand for the moment. I would not want to make that decision this evening.

Mr. Fleming: There is another point I should like to raise. On page 23—and it might be simpler to refer to the page and line number rather than the clause because of the fact that we are dealing with a group of them together—line 3 in subclause 4, we have a definition of "shareholder" for the purpose of these so-called private companies; and he is defined as "a person who is recorded on the books of the corporation as a shareholder". Has the minister given consideration to the position of the holders of bearer share warrants? It is obvious at once, of course, that if you are going to include holders of bearer share warrants you would have to have some provision for the proof of the fact that the number of holders of bearer share warrants and registered shareholders combined does not exceed 75. But under this clause the minister reserves the right to make regulations and to set up the kind of proof that is required in determining the number of shareholders, and it does not seem to me to present too great a problem to define methods of proof in the case of holders of bearer share warrants.

Lest some hon. members be concerned about what might appear to be opening the door a little bit wider here, and lest they also be concerned perhaps as to the position of holders of bearer share warrants, for instance, under the succession duty act I should like to point out that there is no danger whatever in that respect. So far as this act is concerned, as I say, I think it should not be difficult to prove to the satisfaction of the department the number of holders of bearer share warrants. The number of shares is determined on the books of the company. The only point left to be determined would be the number of the holders. As long as proof is adduced to establish that the number of holders of bearer share warrants plus the number of registered shareholders does not exceed 75 in all, then it seems to me we should not be enacting legislation which is so restrictive in its terms as to exclude the holders of bearer share warrants.

On the succession duty angle may I point out that there is no possibility whatever of difficulty arising here. The shares of companies organized under the laws of this parliament or of any of the provinces have a situs or location in Canada for duty purposes, under section 6 (2) of the succession duty act. That section applies where the deceased died on or after January 1, 1948. Then under paragraph 2 of article III of the tax convention existing between Canada and the United States, for the avoidance of double taxation, we have a provision that the shares of Canadian companies shall be deemed to have situs in Canada; and it has been laid down that the fact that the shares are represented by bearer share warrants does not affect the position in the least. Under the succession duty act they are still deemed to have situs in Canada. Under the practice that exists, as I understand it, where the holder of bearer share warrants in a Canadian company dies in the United States, it is the practice of the United States government to report that fact to the Canadian government, and succession duty is levied in Canada in that case. A similar practice prevails in the converse case where the holder in Canada of bearer shares in a United States corporation dies here. I ask the minister's consideration of that point because bearer share warrants are a useful means of evidencing ownership of the shares of a corporation. I submit that this provision is unduly restrictive in its present form; that it could be widened without risk.

Mr. Abbott: I will give some consideration to that. As my hon. friend knows, the use of bearer share warrants is extremely rare, certainly in the case of private companies. I had a reasonably extensive practice in matters of this kind and I can think of only three or four companies that use them. The Canadian Pacific issue share warrants, the Imperial Oil and the International Petroleum used to; but they are very rare in the case of private companies. I knew of no case of less than seventy-five; but if there is any hardship I shall certainly look into it. We are going to proceed a little cautiously with this section. It is not a section of general application to companies which are widely held, but I shall take note of my hon. friend's suggestion, and perhaps if we are reviewing the section next year, to extend it to give it somewhat wider scope, we will bring in the question of share warrants.

Mr. Fleming: Do I take it that in the regulations that the minister proposes to lay down under this section determining the terms of proof it is proposed to include the holders of bearer share warrants?

Mr. Abbott: If we can do it legally it could be considered. It would seem to me that perhaps it would be the sort of thing one should spell out in the act. I will think it over.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to go back to section 11, because I still want to persuade the minister that the point I am raising there is a point that, purely by reason of wording, a narrow construction may be given which quite possibly is never intended. I want to go back and repeat what I said before. At the present time, under section 11 it applies only to the simple case apparently of where one company is acquired by another. It would operate unfairly, I suggest, in the case of a company having several subsidiaries or even sub-subsidiaries. I want to suggest to the minister again that it would be entirely in accordance with the spirit of this legislation if a broader interpretation were given. I am suggesting that the section be amended to provide that it is not to apply (1) to the case where the company acquiring the shares already controls through the ownership of shares of another company the company whose shares are transferred. The minister will appreciate that that is a method of acquiring control, not in the simple way indicated in the section but in a more complicated way, but nevertheless the relationship is the same, I submit; (2) to a case where the company acquiring the shares and the company whose shares are acquired are controlled directly or indirectly by the same company. I suggest to the minister these two cases are entirely within the four corners of the section but owing to the narrow wording of the section they might be shut out. The section says simply and exclusively that it applies to cases where control of one company first of all is acquired —that is not the wording of the section— where one company is acquired by another. That is the effect of it. Will the minister not give consideration to that right now and say whether what I am suggesting is reasonable?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know whether I have been able to think through exactly what my hon. friend is suggesting. He appreciates that this section does not apply to any acquisition of control, by subsidiary or further subsidiary or anything else, entered into prior to the 10th of May, 1950. It is only for the future. Offhand I must say that the evil that we are attempting to correct here could be achieved by going through two or three transfers just as readily as it could by making one.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am suggesting that this is substantially the same as what the minister has in mind. Will the minister let this section stand until he has time to consider it? Surely that is a reasonable request?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that the case to which my hon. friend is referring has been considered, and we felt that the evil which we are trying to prevent could be avoided in that way; that one company which controls another and which has a surplus could sell these shares to another subsidiary at the book value, and in that way get the surplus out tax free without paying the tax which we think should be imposed.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the expression "resident" and the expression "non-resident" as applied to corporations and as used here in various places are not defined. There is no definition to determine residence in the section. What basis does the department propose to follow to determine residence in the case of a corporation? Are they going by head office?

Mr. Abbott: I understand that the rule which is followed is laid down in the British Columbia Electric case. Stated rather briefly, where the seat of management and control of the corporation rests constitutes the residence for the purposes of the act.

Mr. Fleming: In the administration of the act will a corporation be treated as having only one residence? After all, there are many cases where a corporation may have its head office, its management offices, in one country and still be carrying on very substantial operations in the other country. There are a good many of these cases on either side of the international boundary.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will recognize that they can have only one residence for purposes of our tax. There are a good many Canadian companies that do business in the United States, and a good many United States companies that do business here through either branches or subsidiaries. If they do business through branches then the reciprocal arrangements both of the tax treaty and the act apply, and there are appropriate provisions for credits of taxes paid in the other country. I do not think any difficulty has arisen in practice under the act so far as I am aware.

Mr. Chairman, I have a technical amendment to section 28 which I am told is merely to correct a drafting error. Perhaps my colleague the Minister of Agriculture would move it.

Mr. Gardiner: I move:

That clause 28 be amended by substituting the word "Part" for the word "Act" in subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (a) of section 73A of the Act, by substituting "1949" for "1950" in subparagraph (iv) of the same paragraph, by substituting the words "reduced previous to the specified year" for the words "previously reduced" in subparagraph (v) of the same paragraph, and by substituting the words "subsection (4) of section 73" for the words "section 73" in subparagraph (i) of paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 73A.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Abbott: I have a second amendment to the section which includes section 73B, relating to mining, which I would ask my colleague to move.

Mr. Gardiner: I move:

That clause 28 be amended by substituting the following subsection for subsection (4) of section 73B:

"(4) Paragraph (b) of subsection (2) and paragraph (b) of subsection (3) do not apply:

(a) in the case of a person who disposes of the shares after carrying on a campaign to sell shares of the corporation to the public, or

(b) to shares acquired by the exercise of an option to purchase shares received as consideration for property described in paragraph (a) of subsection (2) or paragraph (a) of subsection (3)."

Mr. Adamson: I do not know whether the minister wants to make a statement.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I should make a brief statement. I assumed that some hon. members would wish to discuss this section. The amendment which is proposed here is to give statutory recognition to a practice which has prevailed since 1941 in the income tax administration with respect to persons who invest or put moneys into the location and development of mining properties. I am informed that in 1941 a directive was issued by the then deputy minister of income tax in which he provided, in substance, what is set out in this section, namely, that if I alone or in conjunction with others put $10,000 or $15,000 into locating a mining claim, and had done a certain amount of preliminary work in proving up the property, locating it and so on, and then sell that claim for a substantial profit, either in cash or in shares, that profit will not be taxable—even though I may make a business of doing that, day after day, month after month, or year after year.

It was felt it was desirable to give statutory recognition to an administrative practice which, frankly, I thought the terms of the law scarcely justified. In this section, as it originally appeared in the bill, we had provided that a person would not be eligible for that special consideration if he were engaged in carrying on a business of dealing with the public in shares and securities. On reconsideration it did not seem fair to me that because a man was a stock broker or a bond dealer, or even if he was a mining stock broker, he should be precluded from making this type of investment, or doing this type of promotional work, just because of the fact that he might make his livelihood out of underwriting shares and selling them.

That is the purpose of the amendment which has just been read and, briefly, the purpose of the section. There is no change whatever in the law as it has been administered since 1941. However, the section I am proposing gives statutory recognition to this special extent in favour of those people who back the promotion of development by the location and the development of mining properties.

Mr. Adamson: I am glad to have the minister's statement in this matter because, as he knows, there has been some considerable worry about this section. As the minister knows, the financing, discovery and development of a mine is an extremely hazardous and speculative business. Unless every encouragement is given both to individuals and to companies engaged in this extremely hazardous and speculative business we will not find that this type of capital, this speculative capital, so essential for the development of mines, will continue but that it will tend to dry up.

The minister would be infernally lucky if he were on the ground floor in respect of even one producing mine. If he took a number of speculative chances he would find that the number of times he does win or that he does get in on the ground floor would be extremely rare. Over the past quarter century I believe the chances are less than one per cent.

I mention this merely to show how necessary it is to encourage risk capital in the development of mines. I understand the reason for this amendment. In many ways I have some sympathy for the purpose indicated by the minister. But there is grave danger in any attempt to restrict individuals who, to put it colloquially, make a practice of taking bets in the development of mines.

Some of us do it, to our sorrow, in an amateurish sort of way. But the net result is frequently, and more or less generally, unsuccessful. Some of us who perhaps have more time and more knowledge consider that it is part of a necessary development of the Canadian economy. Even so, despite the knowledge we have, and the trouble and exploration involved, we also find that the secrets of nature are very, very elusive. Even though a mine or an ore body is discovered—and this is not a common thing—and reasonably delimited by diamond drilling, trenching or shaft sinking, then we have the great difficulty of raising capital to develop what is considered, from engineering judgment, to be a worth-while ore body.

There is no easier way to kill the mining industry than to restrict speculation. By its very nature mining is an extremely speculative business. Even though you have what you consider to be a rich ore body, as indicated by surface drilling, until that rich ore body is developed, cross-cuts put through it, stopes developed, and shafts and mills erected, you have not got a mine; and all the work, all the effort and all the capital put into this may go for naught.

May I emphasize to the minister that to restrict in any way the flow of speculative capital into mining in its early stages is going to do the greatest disservice to the development of this country that could be done by anyone. Mining is entirely different from ordinary business. In ordinary business procedure, particularly manufacturing, a prospectus is issued, on which there is a reasonable estimate as to the probable profit that can be made. In mining no such thing occurs. All one can do is to say, "We have such-and-such a property; the geology is such-and-such; we have diamond-drilled it and found that we have such-and-such an intersection carrying such-and-such a value." On that bet, and only on that bet, does the initial speculator put money into the property.

That is an extremely hazardous and extremely speculative bet. But that is where mines are made. It is that type of speculation, that type of gambling, if we wish so to describe it colloquially, that gives the prospector and the initial developer and the man who puts up the money for the diamond drilling and the man who puts up the money for the initial trenching or the geophysical work or for the initial shaft-sinking, the money to go ahead with the development of the mine. As I have said, the betting against such capital is about a hundred to one but it is still a hundred to one. If by any regulation you make the one per cent who are a success subject to taxation for income purposes you are going to kill the goose that laid the golden egg more surely than by anything else that could be done to destroy the development of our country. I hope what the minister has said is correct, and that the section in fact does what he has said it does, namely, encourages the investment of capital in the mining business.

There are two or three cases which I think should be brought to the attention of the committee. In mining there are groups of prospectors who form themselves into syndicates. Then there are companies whose principal business is concerned with the prospecting and developing of mining properties. The act merely deals with prospectors as individuals. As a matter of fact most prospecting is done by syndicates at the present time. The old-fashioned individual prospector is very nearly a thing of the past. A great deal of prospecting is done by companies making a specialty of such work. I should like a statement from the minister to the effect that the capital gains, which may occasionally accrue to syndicates and prospecting companies that are fortunate enough to discover a property and develop it to the stage where its stock can be sold publicly, will not be taxed. I should like an assurance that the profit of the original prospector, whether it be an individual, syndicate or company, will be considered as a capital gain and not taxable even though the prospecting syndicate is principally engaged in the business of prospecting and carrying on the early development of mining properties.

Mr. Dumas: Will the minister give the committee the assurance that the intent and meaning of subsection 3 of section 73B is the same as that in the departmental ruling of 1941?

Mr. Abbott: I am told the departmental ruling of 1941 took the form of a directive from the then deputy minister of taxation. I am also told that the section as drafted sets out exactly the practice that the department has been following since that time. I cannot make that statement from my own personal knowledge because I do not administer that department. As I said at the outset, there is no intention in this section to change in any way the practice which has prevailed since 1941.

The hon. member for York West raised the question as to what the position would be with respect to a syndicate. If the syndicate is unincorporated it obviously comes straight within the specific language of the section. If the development work was done by means of the purchase of shares in what was loosely referred to as a syndicate, then the ordinary rules with respect to the purchase of shares would apply, and the question whether or not there would be tax liability would depend on the quality of the investor.

Mr. Adamson: That is just the question. Frequently a syndicate or individual will invest money in a prospect by taking down shares either in a syndicate or in an incorporated company. Many companies today have been incorporated and then several other development companies have purchased stock in the incorporated company—I am thinking of one particularly—in order to advance development. Let us take a mine which is one of the most active presently in the Canadian economy, and which may develop into a major copper producer. I will not mention its name but many members probably know it. It requires several million dollars to bring it into production. Several companies have invested large sums of money in this one company by the purchase of treasury stock. That money went immediately, without any deduction, into the development of the property which as yet is unproven.

It will take probably a year or so and possibly three or four million dollars more to decide definitely whether it is a major commercial operation. At the present time several prospecting companies whose business it is to develop mines have purchased stock in company X, shall we say, in order to put money in the treasury to enable company X to be developed. There is a strong possibility that a mine will be developed on the property. If that happens it may be that the individual companies which have invested money to bring company X into production will wish to sell a part or all of their equity in the producing mine a year or two years from now. I want to ask the minister whether the money so received is going to be considered as income of these companies or as capital gain.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend has put it, I would say it would not be subject to tax. If one or two companies then proceeded to make a market for the stock, underwrite the stock and increase the capital of the company after it had been proven there was a producing mine, then of course they would be engaged in another operation. On the facts as set out, however, if two or three of them invested in a prospect, brought it to the point where it got to be a real mine and then sold their stock to somebody else, they would come within the operation of this section and in my opinion would not be subject to tax.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is a fine distinction.

Mr. Abbott: There are fine distinctions in all these cases; it cannot be helped. There are always cases in which it is very hard to tell whether a man is making an ordinary investment or speculation, or whether he is engaging in a regular course of dealing which constitutes a business.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The size of the chancellor's boot, as you and I used to say.

Mr. Abbott: That is about it.

Mr. Simmons: If this section is not clarified to the satisfaction of those interested in mining development, I am afraid it will seriously affect the development of new properties.

Mr. Abbott: I would hope that the explanation I have given this evening would go a long way toward reassuring those people, and toward clearing up what I think has been some misunderstanding of the real situation. I repeat, there is no change whatever in the existing law. Rather there is a change in the existing law, because I think a practice has been prevailing since 1945 which was not justified by law, and we are now making legal what I think was of questionable validity under the ruling to which I have referred.

Mr. Simmons: That is the ruling of 1941?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: I realize what the minister is trying to do in this section, and I appreciate his intentions; but there has been a very considerable amount of worry in the legitimate mining business over this section, and I know the minister has received representations from people who are interested in prospecting and developing. That is why I want it abundantly clear that there is no intention to tax as income any profit made from the development by a mining company or a mining syndicate of a worth-while prospect which is subsequently sold to the public and becomes a public company. That is so?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I did not follow my hon. friend very closely, but I answered him previously. On the facts he set up before, if an individual, a corporation or anybody else backs a new development, brings it to the mining stage and sells it, the profit on that transaction, even if he makes a habit of doing that sort of thing, is not taxable.

Mr. Adamson: Even if it was an incorporated company before he did it?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Adamson: Many companies are up against it for capital today—

Mr. Abbott: In the case of shares it would have to qualify as a speculation or investment, not as a marketing operation. But there would not be any objection to a mining company buying shares in an incorporated prospect, thereby providing the prospect with the cash to go ahead and do the development. Then if the prospect turned out to be a mine it could sell the shares and take that profit. That would be a capital profit. Of course, in the case I have cited, if they engaged in a marketing operation, took up options on additional stock and made a market for it, then what I have said would have no application.

Mr. Adamson: Thank you very much; I think that is clear.

Mr. Fleming: There is another place where an amendment will be required. That is at the top of page 23, in the third line. Will not "May 4" need to be changed to "May 10"?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct, and I thank my hon. friend for calling it to my attention. I thought we had provided an amendment in each case where May 4 appeared and made it May 10, but I am afraid we have overlooked this one. I shall ask one of my colleagues to move that section 32, subsection 1, be amended by striking out the words May 4, 1950, in subsection 3 of section 95A and replacing them by the words May 10, 1950.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Now that the minister has taken us back to some of these earlier sections I wonder if he would be willing to spend a moment or two on section 26.

Mr. Abbott: I am quite ready to do that. I told my hon. friend this afternoon that we would go back to section 26 to take up a point with which he wanted to deal. However, I have two minor amendments to sections 22 and 24, so perhaps we could proceed with the rest of these sections and then go back to section 26 and move the two amendments to which I have referred. I do not think there is anything very controversial in the remainder of the bill.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lesage): Shall section 11 as amended, section 28 as amended, and section 32 as amended carry?

Sections 11, 28 and 32 as amended agreed to.

Sections 33 to 36 inclusive agreed to.

On section 37—Interest.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to mention a matter in connection with the imposition of interest. This is not by way of quarrelling with this section, because I am sure it will commend itself to the house since it involves a reduction in the rate of interest in this particular case from 7 per cent to 6 per cent. However, this gives me an opportunity to say that I think the Department of National Revenue is going unwarrantably far in imposing interest in the case of taxpayers who pay their current income tax on a quarterly basis, which means they estimate their income. I have seen one or two cases lately in which it seems to me the department has taken an attitude that is simply indefensible in insisting on charging interest on the balance required to be paid by a taxpayer who has made an estimate and who, after making his four quarterly payments, finds that his estimate was too low and so has a substantial payment to make on April 30 following. It seems to me that in the case of persons coming within that classification, people who make an estimate of their income and their tax and on that estimate make quarterly payments on their tax, the department has no business to expect them to do almost superhuman things in refining the estimate of their income. There are many people in that category who by March 31 cannot even come close to estimating their income for the year, and I submit as strongly as I can that in cases of that kind the department has no business at all imposing interest charges.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will appreciate that this only applies to 1948 and previous years. The law in that respect has now been changed, but that was the law that applied in those years. The obligation was upon the taxpayer to estimate, and if he underestimated the interest penalty ensued.

Mr. Fleming: Quite so, but I am taking advantage of this opportunity to complain about the way that provision is being administered at the present time. While I appreciate that it is the Department of National Revenue and not that of finance, I do register a very strong protest against what I consider to be harsh administration.

Section agreed to.

Sections 38 to 43 inclusive agreed to.

On section 44—Application.

Mr. Abbott: I have a minor amendment here, Mr. Chairman, that provides for the insertion of section 115A. It is one of the new sections enacted by this bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved:

That clause 44 be amended by substituting the words "sections 115 and 115A" for the words "section 115" in lines 39 and 40.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 45 agreed to.

On section 46—Deductions from income of corporation in petroleum or natural gas business.

Mr. Harkness: I have a few remarks I should like to make on this section, and a few questions I should like to ask. I am glad to see there has been a remarkable increase in interest in, and knowledge of, oil and gas development, particularly by people in eastern Canada, during the last two or three years. I have noticed it particularly, because in travelling across the country, when I tell people I come from Alberta they immediately start talking about the oil business; that was not the case a few short years ago. I think by now we all recognize the advantages to Canada of extensive oil and gas exploration and drilling programs. During the past two or three years we have had fairly extensive programs of that kind.

I should like to make the point that the taxation structure should be such as to encourage oil and gas men to further extend that program. I do not think there is any need to go into the advantages of that. If Canada becomes self sufficient in oil it means that the tremendous saving of United States dollars would go a long way towards righting our generally adverse balance of trade with that nation. There are a number of misconceptions which are common about the oil and gas business. A large number of people have the idea that all you have to do in Alberta is dig a hole any place, and you immediately get a gusher and are wealthy for the rest of your life. When some of the people I meet find I am from Alberta they say, "Do you own an oil well?" I have to admit with sorrow that I do not own an oil well. They seem to be surprised that anyone who comes from Alberta does not own one. The general idea seems to be that everyone in Alberta is wealthy and owns an oil or gas well, and there is no trouble about getting one. That is so far from the truth, it should not be necessary to say much about it, but I should like to put on the record a few figures to show what an extremely hazardous industry the oil industry is, and covering the profits which have accrued to people in that industry.

I have a compilation of the expenditures of twelve of the largest oil companies now operating in Alberta, and who have been operating there for a year or more. This shows what their returns have been up to date. These twelve companies have expended in exploration work, acquiring acreage for drilling and general operating costs—this excludes completely all costs of refining and relates to the expenditures incurred in the search for oil—$287,912,000. During that same period their gross return, which they received for the oil, amounted to $156,188,000, after they had subtracted from that the payment of royalties. In other words, they have spent the sum of $130 million more in the search for oil than they received for the oil which they found. I believe that is a good indication of the fact that this oil business has not been all gravy. It is not the easiest thing in the world to get oil. On the contrary, it is a very difficult thing. In the United States the general average of productive wells drilled is about one in five. There are four dry holes to one well which produces. Up to date in Canada it has been closer to twenty-three or twenty-four dry holes to one producing well.

A lot of people answer this by saying that a number of these companies have only been operating in the exploration and drilling business in Canada for a comparatively short time, and therefore you cannot take figures such as I have been giving as being indicative of the profit. I should like, therefore, to separate from the figures I have given the figures for the two companies which have been in operation there for the longest period of time, Imperial Oil Limited and its former subsidiary, Royalite Oil Company. During their entire period of operation these two companies, which were formerly one, have expended nearly $160 million, and they have received in return for that just over $111 million. These two companies, which have been in business the longest and have had producing wells for a long time in the Turner valley, have spent up to date roughly $48 million more than they received. Now, that gives an indication of the risky nature of this business, and the fact that large sums have to be expended on exploration work before any returns are secured.

In view of that fact, I should like to make the point that during what is really the exploration period, so far as the development of the oil fields in Canada is concerned, and that is the period in which we are now, that exploration work should be burdened as little as possible by taxation costs which hamper operations. These costs prevent the companies from drilling as many wells as they might drill otherwise.

Coming to specific points in connection with this particular section, I should like the minister to clarify these bonus payments and other acquisition costs. In a brief submitted to the minister on February 21, 1950, the western Canada petroleum association asked that those bonus payments, and other acquisition costs in connection with securing leases, be allowed as expenses when the property had to be abandoned as unproductive. These expenses did not result in anything of capital value accruing to the company. As such they should be included as exploration expenses, the same as the costs of the geophysical survey. In so far as I can interpret this amendment, there is nothing in it to take care of costs of this kind. What is the situation in connection with these costs? Are they going to be allowed under these amendments?

Mr. Abbott: The answer to that is that this amendment excludes those costs. They cannot be amortized, but the depletion is permitted against it. My hon. friend is referring to the bonus payments, those payments that you bid for?

Mr. Harkness: Yes. I should like to suggest to the minister that costs of that kind, where no producing well has been brought in and where they do not represent any gain to the company whatever, should be allowed as an exploration cost or development cost, the same as other costs are.

My next question is this. In the explanatory note I see the following:

> Subclause (1). The new subsection (1) corrects a technical error in the existing subsection.

What is the technical error that is corrected?

Mr. Abbott: The words "the lesser of" were inadvertently omitted in the section as it now appears.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us what difference that makes? In other words, what is the effect of this change going to be?

Mr. Abbott: The amendment is to section 53 (1), and that section as it now stands reads as follows:

> A corporation whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum, petroleum products or natural gas or exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas may deduct in computing its income, for the purposes of The Income Tax Act, the lesser of.

Those words "the lesser of" were left out by accidental means; it was perhaps not quite a typographical error but about as close to that as possible. And then it goes on:

> (a) the aggregate of the drilling and exploration costs . . .

And so on. On reading the section it becomes quite clear that you need such words as "the lesser of" in order to make it comprehensible.

Mr. Harkness: Do I take it that the putting in of those words is going to make things less favourable for the oil companies?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no. It is just to give the section meaning, which it did not have before.

Mr. Harkness: The explanatory note also states:

> Subclause (2). The new subsection (2A) provides a deduction for so-called "lease rentals" up to $1 per acre for 1949 and later years.

Mr. Abbott: It is the clause that excludes the bonus payments that my hon. friend was referring to.

Mr. Harkness: Yes. As I understand it the lease rentals expenditure, as it is called, of $1 an acre is allowed as an income tax deduction.

Mr. Abbott: It would not be without this section, but it is with this section.

Mr. Harkness: No, but with this section it will allow it. If the lease rental is $5 an acre, as I understand it, $1 of this would be allowed as a deductible expense but the other $4 per acre would not be allowed as a deductible expense. Is that correct? I understand that it does not matter really what the amount of that lease rental is per acre, that allowance will be made only up to $1. It might be $10 per acre.

Mr. Abbott: If it were an annual rental and exceeded $1 per year, only $1 would be allowed.

Mr. Harkness: Yes. It does not matter whether it is $5, $6 or what it is; the $1 is still allowed. That is the point I was getting at.

Next I should like to ask what the situation is in a case in which prepayment of this lease rental has taken place. For example, there are many individual freehold owners of mineral rights, and they will give a rental only for a period of years, say for ten years or something of that kind. If, for example, the rental was only $1 a year, they would give a lease rental on a basis of a 10-year lease, at $1 a year; but they would give it only if they were paid the entire amount when the lease was entered into. In other words, they would have to get the $10 per acre at the start.

The reason for that is quite simple. There are many people who go into the oil business, and they would enter into contracts of this kind. They might have bad luck and put down a number of dry holes. The result is that the company would go broke. Then the man who had given this 10-year lease would of course have no means of collecting the money. In order therefore to ensure that he does collect the money, in many cases—and I think in the majority of cases—he wants to get the money when the lease is entered into. When that situation exists, when there is a prepayment of this lease rental will the deduction be allowed at the rate of $1 for say the ten years in this case that we instanced that the lease lasts?

Mr. Abbott: I would hesitate to answer that question on a hypothetical basis. I think you would have to look at the agreement. Under certain conditions, if it were a genuine prepayment and so on, it could perhaps be allowed or spread over the period. But I would have to see the agreement before I would feel free to give a definite answer.

Mr. Harkness: By that does the minister mean that what you might call discretion will have to be exercised in each individual case?

Mr. Abbott: No. It would depend on the facts. There is the law. The law says:

> (2A) In computing a deduction under subsection (1) or (2) no amount shall be included in respect of a payment for or in respect of a right, licence or privilege to explore for, drill for or take petroleum or natural gas other than an annual payment not exceeding $1 per acre.

That is clear enough. There is nothing obscure about that language. That would have to be applied to the particular contract which was entered into.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I think it is very obscure. Suppose it is a 10-year job and they paid for that all at once. Why do you not say they are allowed to deduct that?

Mr. Harkness: I think that the case I gave was quite clear. If prepayment had been made for ten years, shall the $1 an acre which had been paid all at once to cover the 10-year period be deducted year by year at the rate of $1 per acre?

Mr. Abbott: I would have to look at it when the circumstances came up.

Mr. Harkness: I do not know, but it would seem to me that as this will actually operate in practice, the interpretation which is going to be placed upon it is perhaps the most important thing. I should think that the minister could make that a little bit clearer for the benefit of the oil people involved.

Mr. Abbott: As I have had to say in this chamber before, Mr. Chairman, I used to charge for opinions of that kind, but I cannot do so now. I will therefore leave it to my other colleagues at the bar who earn their living in that way.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister this question. Is a payment such as that in the hands of the recipient, say the farmer who gets it, considered as income in his hands, or is it not?

Mr. Abbott: That would depend on the circumstances of the case. I would think if it is an annual payment of so much an acre, it would be income. That is only a personal opinion, offhand; and free.

Mr. Harkness: It is considered as income. I would make the proposition that it should certainly be allowed on the $1 an acre basis over the ten years or fifteen years or whatever period the lease might last for.

I should like to go on to another point now, and that is the question of reservation and extension fees for these reservations. In the province of Alberta when an oil company applies to the Alberta government it secures what is known as an oil reservation which gives them the right to prospect for oil or to survey it and explore for oil on it. The normal payment for that I think is $250. That covers the reservation for the first year. Then the second year the company holds this reservation they get an extension as it is called; and the second year they pay 30 cents an acre for the right to explore on that land. If they wish to continue to explore on it a third year, they pay 70 cents an acre during the third year. I should like to ask if payments of that kind are included under this subsection 2A. In other words, are these reservation fees and extension fees allowable as part of the $1 per acre which is provided for in this amendment?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that if they are annual payments, they would come under this section. I cannot speak from personal knowledge.

Mr. Harkness: I think these reservation and extension fees, as I have indicated, are annual payments. I think that your adviser, Dr. Eaton, could advise you in connection with that. I think he knows much more about that than anybody else here. He knows much more about this than anybody else. I would take it then that companies of that kind are included. Can the minister say definitely whether they are included or not?

Mr. Abbott: I am basing my statement on information which I have received from officials that if they are on annual payment they would come under the section which we are discussing.

Mr. Harkness: Then there are certain other fees.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister is not charging for that opinion.

Mr. Abbott: No; these are all free opinions.

Mr. Harkness: I must say that in some of these opinions the minister is not committing himself very firmly.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to infringe the prerogatives of the legal profession.

Mr. Harkness: I do not like to see so many loopholes left or opened up. The next question I should like to ask is in connection with lease agents' fees and legal expenses. When an oil company starts looking for leases it very frequently gets them from a lease agent whose business it is to pick up leases and to handle them as an agent might handle real estate or anything else. The ordinary fee paid to a lease agent runs anywhere from 10 cents an acre to a dollar an acre. And of course there are certain legal expenses in connection with securing leases. Unfortunately these legal expenses always seem to creep up, and in some instances they come to a considerable amount. Are these lease agents' fees and legal expenses incurred in connection with securing a lease applicable to this dollar an acre business?

Mr. Abbott: I am not familiar with that business, Mr. Chairman, but they sound like capital expenditures to me.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Lawyers' fees?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): When did you find that out?

Mr. Harkness: I should like to point out that lease agents' fees or legal fees are as much of an expense to the company which is in the oil exploring and drilling business as any other sort of expense; and if they cannot be applied under this dollar an acre clause, then I would contend that they should be applicable under section 4, I think it is, which provides for exploration and other expenses being deducted. Will the minister tell me whether any of these things are deductible under what you might call general exploration expenses?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I cannot give any general opinion, but legal fees are a capital expense. If they are legal fees, for instance, incurred in acquiring a piece of immovable property, or if you hire a lawyer to examine title to a factory that you wish to purchase, it is a part of the capital cost of the factory. I suppose if you incurred some legal fees for the purpose of getting a lease it may be part of your leasing cost. I am speaking with a great deal of diffidence here because I know nothing about the way in which the oil business is conducted or how the lawyers who advise the oil companies or the lessees charge. I know that I am in the presence of experts here in that line, so I am speaking with a great deal of caution.

Mr. Harkness: Section 4 provides that all expenses incurred directly or indirectly in searching for minerals in Canada are deductible. My contention is that this type of expense is one which is not indirectly, it is really directly, incurred in order to be able to search for oil, and to take part in the search for oil, and as such it should be deductible. Under the regulations I think it comes down to departmental rulings. If the present departmental ruling does not include expenses of this sort I would urge upon the minister that it be changed so that they are included either in subsection 2A or subsection 4. It does not matter under which section it is put except that I think it would be better under section 4.

The next matter that I should like to deal with is surface rental costs. I do not see anything in either of these sections covering surface rental expenses. I understand in the past it has been ruled by the department that these surface rental expenses are not deductible as operating expenses. Why that should be I quite fail to understand. The situation is this, Mr. Chairman. In Alberta when an oil company goes on a man's land, what is known as an arbitration board sits on the case and determines what compensation that man, the owner of the surface rights, shall be paid for the inconvenience caused him by the oil drilling company going on his land and taking some of it out of production and, I suppose, for the right of entry and things along that line.

In Alberta the ordinary amount which has been awarded by the arbitration board has been between $1,200 and $1,500 per well site. In other words every time a company drills a well it has to pay the surface owner $1,200 to $1,500 for the right to drill. It has nothing to do with the minerals underneath. In addition to that the arbitration board fixes the rental a year for the area around the well. The area taken is usually four acres, and for that four acres the usual arbitration award has run from $65 to $100 an acre. In other words, up to $400 a year is paid as surface rental for the four acres that surround the well site. This of course could not possibly apply under the dollar an acre business because the cost per acre is so much greater that it would have no effect, really.

Has consideration been given to looking at these expenses as normal exploration or drilling expenses? It is certainly an ordinary drilling expense, in my opinion. The minister said a while ago that anything that went on from year to year could be included in the dollar an acre provision, and so forth. This is a thing that goes on from year to year as long as the well is producing, and it seems to me it should be included as a legitimate expense for the production of oil. Can the minister make a statement on that?

Mr. Abbott: That particular point about rental for surface rights has not been brought to my attention so far as I am aware. I have listened to my hon. friend's remarks, and I shall ask the Department of National Revenue to see how they are dealing with it. I presume it must have been brought to their attention, but it was not included in the brief that the western petroleum—

Mr. Harkness: Yes, it was included in their brief—in fact I am quite sure it was.

Mr. Abbott: Not in the brief submitted to me. However, I will look into the question.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has mentioned the brief which was submitted by the western Canada petroleum association. In the past he has given favourable consideration to many of the recommendations which have been made by that association, which takes in all of the oil men engaged in exploring and drilling for oil in western Canada. What reception was given to or what decision was made on the recommendations that they submitted to him this year? We have already dealt with some of them, but in addition to that there is their recommendation that depletion be calculated on the basis of the income from each individual well or property instead of against all the wells of the company, after charging against such well or property only the cost directly attributed to it. What was done in connection with that, if anything?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Abbott: I had a very pleasant interview with representatives of the association. Careful consideration was given to their representations, and such of those representations as it was possible to implement will be found in the sections of the bill. It was not found possible to accept their request that depletion be calculated on individual well basis.

Mr. Harkness: Another matter which I have brought up here year after year, and which is contained as the third recommendation of this association, is that the deduction of drilling and exploration costs be put on a permanent basis. It was put on a three-year basis, and it has been extended for another year; or is it proposed to extend it by this act? I asked the parliamentary assistant about this when we were dealing with the resolution, and he said he understood considerable attention had been given to it but it had not been decided to make a change this year. I wonder if the minister can add anything to that?

Mr. Abbott: What the parliamentary assistant said is correct. We did not feel that we could yet put this very special provision on a permanent basis, but we have now put it on a three-year basis. They know three years ahead what the provision will be. At a later date it may be possible to carry out that recommendation which has been made, but I do not feel we can do it this year.

Mr. Harkness: I was glad when it was put on the three-year basis last year, and I am glad to find that that has been extended another year. I would hope further consideration would be given to it before the next budget is brought down, so that these various special deductions for oil and gas drilling companies might be put on a permanent basis, so that they would know where they stand and so that as a result of that provision they could lay out a ten-year program, or whatever it seemed wisest to do, always knowing their exact position.

Mr. Abbott: Further consideration will be given before the next budget.

Mr. Harkness: I can assure the minister that every oilman in Alberta is quite sure that this would assist them in raising capital and in extending their drilling program, which certainly would redound to the general benefit of the country as a whole.

There was a recommendation with respect to the right to deduct drilling and exploration costs, and such right being extended to any taxpayer. Under the act as it is at the present time these special drilling and exploration costs deductions are applicable only to companies the main business of which is that of drilling for oil. It is considered out in that country that there are probably quite a number of mining companies with money available to them who, if these special deductions were extended to them, would go into the drilling business.

A request was made that the special gas and oil provisions be extended to any taxpayer so far as his operations in drilling for gas and oil are concerned. I wonder if the minister would make a statement on that question?

Mr. Abbott: I am sorry, but I did not catch the hon. member's question.

Mr. Harkness: I do not wish to repeat all I have said.

Mr. Abbott: I heard the first part of it.

Mr. Harkness: My question is this: What consideration has been given to placing all taxpayers who drill for gas and oil, even though that is not their main business, on the same basis as oil companies, so far as gas and oil operations are concerned?

Mr. Abbott: My recollection is that we began giving consideration to that back in 1943 or 1944, when I was parliamentary assistant to the then minister of finance, and we decided we should not do it. Our mind has not changed since then.

Mr. Harkness: Then, section 73 of the Income Tax Act—

Mr. Abbott: It has been repealed. We agreed to that recommendation. That is out.

Mr. Harkness: It has been repealed?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad that is so. I believe that will assist in the exploration program by making it possible to finance a considerable number of wells by means of royalty trusts, which otherwise could not have been financed. It is decidedly a step in the right direction, if that has been repealed. May I thank the minister for taking that action.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No. I shall keep the committee for less than five minutes. But in dealing with all these sections and subsections I believe it is apparent that the government has lost the idea in connection with the general policy with respect to the development of oil in the country from which I come. What it should be—and the minister may tell me that this is the policy—is that, first, the government should not be inclined to collect income tax, except from those people who have earned an income. That is a very gentle statement of the situation; but I think perhaps it is a proper basis upon which to consider the matter.

I agree with the details mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary East—and do not regard that lightly, because we have talked the matter over in our room. Here is what, it seems to me, should have been done: the history of the industry indicates, and it is admitted by all of us, that the development of oil in Canada is a very important development indeed. I must assume that any government in Canada will do all it can to assist in that development, having in mind the benefit which will be derived by the whole of the country.

One need mention only the dollar situation to realize the significance of this. I am sure the minister will appreciate what I have in mind. My objection to what is being done is that the government has lost sight of the general benefits the country should have from this industry, and it is stumbling over little bits of things which, in terms of revenue to the country, mean very little. Yet, to the individual or company confronted with these things, they constitute stumbling blocks greater in extent than might have been envisaged by those who prepared them.

Let us refer to one point mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary East—and perhaps to only one. We approach the man who owns his own oil rights, having secured those rights back in the nineties. He is in the position of being on a wildcat acreage, in possession of a half-section. He says to the leasehound—those are the fellows who are always wanting to be regarded as exceptions, but you do not worry much about them—"a dollar an acre?—yes. You will not be here for some years, will you?" They say No. I am being very practical about this, because there are not nearly enough drilling outfits in the world to permit those companies operating under permit to conform with the conditions set out by the Alberta government. That is the reason we hear about farm-outs. Imperial Oil will see this company and that company on a split basis of return—farm-outs—in order to carry out the program.

This man says, "I am not going to give you a lease on my property for ten years at one dollar an acre, payable year by year,"—which in wildcat country is probably the going rate. He says, "If you will give me ten times $320, then I will talk to you. I will give it to you on the dollar-a-year basis, but I want cash in my little hot hand right now."

Under the present legislation the company, which pays him not $320, but ten times that, may on that basis deduct only one dollar an acre, or $320. At the same time the Department of National Revenue takes from the man who gave the company the lease, with prepayment over a ten-year period, income tax in that one year for all the money he got. Let us have a little bit of consistency about this matter. It is income in the hands of the recipient, and what is the situation with respect to the man who pays it? I go a step further. I am merely making suggestions, and I am not being tough about the matter. If we were back on the question of depreciation I could be very tough. I notice that the minister and the man who invented this cock-eyed depreciation are having a little chat at the moment.

What I say is that we should promote the purpose which the government has, which it must have, and for which I honour them. They are seeking the development of oil, and we all want that to take place. It seems to me that when it comes down to a question of charging an expense to make that development the department might even adopt an attitude of generosity. You should talk to Dr. Hume about it. It involves so much and so many things. An attitude of generosity would not hurt at all the development which is going on out there. With great respect, may I say that is not your attitude. Your position is that you have allowed implements such as drilling equipment to enter Canada from the United States duty free. You thought you had given somebody a great Christmas present. All you did was to give Canada a chance to develop. In dollars you have got it back a thousandfold. I am sick and tired of being told that last year you gave so much and this year you will give a little more. Why not make one bite of the cherry and simply say that expenses incurred in exploration will be allowed, particularly if they result in dry wells or non-productive areas. Let us quit quibbling about the matter and put an end to it by adopting that view. I know that in several other departments of federal and provincial governments such as workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance instructions have gone out that if a question of doubt arises it should be resolved in favour of the individual.

That is not the position with respect to the oil business. The oil business is not begging. These people, if their ideas of development are correct, will come out all right at the end of the road. When they do they will not mind the government imposing income tax to whatever extent the government thinks reasonable, but they do object to taxes being imposed on them now. With the greatest respect in the world to Dr. Eaton, they are being imposed on companies searching for oil even when the results of their searches are fruitless. Let us take one of the instances referred to by the hon. member for Calgary East. In the great generosity of your big hearts you have allowed $1 an acre. Suppose you cannot get the land for $1 an acre. Suppose it costs you $10 an acre. You drill the land and you lose your money. You have paid $10 an acre, and it is not much satisfaction to know that you are allowed $1.

In saying that I come back to the point that your purpose must be to encourage the finding and development of oil in Canada. I have enunciated your broad policy for you perhaps too generously but it is what you are doing in these small picayune ways. It is the pinpricks. You are using $1 an acre against $2 an acre and all that sort of nonsense. When a man pays $10 for a ten-year period $1 an acre will be his but the $9 is not. That sort of thing will not develop the oil business in Canada. I am not going to use harsh language. Oil development is taking place in spite of restrictions. I want to thank Dr. Eaton and the other persons with whom the oil people have had to deal for fair treatment within the knowledge which Dr. Eaton had supported by the knowledge given to him by those persons who call on him. Let us stop worrying in this House of Commons about $2 here and there. By proper encouragement and not picking on these people we will get $2,000 for every dollar we have been bothering about.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is an attitude that I am talking about. I am not dealing with any of the details which have been touched upon. I wish Dr. Eaton would come to Alberta and I would drive him around to some of these places. There is oil in Alberta and in neighbouring provinces because it is not going to be confined to Alberta. Let us remember that within the past week the government sold two quarter-sections, only 160 acres each, for $3,188,000 by way of bonus allowance.

Mr. Low: Just the oil rights.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Only the rights and that by way of a bonus. They still have their $1 an acre, and perhaps it has put that figure into the minds of some people here. They still have 12½ per cent of the gross. That means that for every barrel of oil that comes out of the ground they will receive one-eighth. Let us get that idea into our minds. We are not dealing with little piddling things. I speak from a dominion standpoint. The minister is happy. He thought that some of the radio broadcasts he made straightened out the dollar situation.

With great respect, Alberta did more to straighten out the dollar situation than all the radio talks the minister ever made.

Mr. Abbott: A few other things helped besides Alberta.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Pardon?

Mr. Abbott: Alberta was very helpful but there were other things that helped besides, apart from the radio talks.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Rich Albertans stopped travelling. I think that was one of the things that happened, and those who were not rich never travelled anyway. Let us get down to cases and not talk a lot of nonsense about people going to Florida. Let us all grasp this vision. For all the dollars you are going to get by the few things mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary East, it will cost you more to collect them than you will have at the end of the year.

Let us think of this. We all agree on the development of industry within our country. We all say production is the only thing that can carry us, that production is the only thing that can carry a $2,400 million budget. I hope I am right in that figure. It not only staggered me; it staggered my imagination when I heard the minister mention it, but my memory was not staggered, so I think I am right in that. That budget can be carried and fulfilled if we are but generous to people who are doing big things, instead of inflicting little pinpricks in their sides or their backs or their bellies. That is all these refusals amount to with respect to these little things. But one of these little things to a man engaged on the job may become a big thing by the time he reaches the end of his road. The income you are saving by this—what is a nice word?

Mr. Abbott: Assistance to the oil industry.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Nonsense. I was going to use the word "puerile", but I thought that would be unkind; but what you are doing by this nonsense amounts to nothing in the economy of this country. When a man gets an oil well and an income, go after him; but for the love of all that is reasonable help him get that oil well producing. Do not hinder him, as you are doing by these refusals here, there, and elsewhere.

On section 48—Gift to His Majesty by wife or other dependent.

Mr. Fleming: It is to be observed that provision is made here only in the case of a gift to His Majesty in right of Canada. The reasons for this amendment I think are quite obvious, and I have no doubt we will all support the amendment, but I am questioning why we should stop at gifts to His Majesty in the right of Canada. If we refer back to section 36 of the bill we see that in the case of the gift tax provision is made for exempting gifts to His Majesty in the right of Canada, or in the right of a province, or gifts to a municipality. I do not know if there are any gifts to His Majesty in the right of a province or gifts to a municipality in issue here, but I cannot quite follow the logic of limiting the provisions of section 48 to gifts to His Majesty in right of Canada and stopping there, when in section 36 we make provision for gifts to His Majesty in right of Canada, gifts in right of a province and gifts to municipalities.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend will think back he will remember that this section and the corresponding section in the old act provide for special gifts to His Majesty in the right of Canada relating to income tax alone, in order to avoid a very heavy penalty or very heavy additional tax in the case, let us say, of a married man whose wife had a certain amount of separate income which would run him into a higher bracket. I am told this is simply to carry forward and take care of some special transition provision in connection with that tax. It does not relate to gifts in the ordinary sense at all. It is simply a special enabling provision which was in the old act and has been carried forward in this act, permitting taxpayers, by making a gift to His Majesty within a certain period of time, thereby to save themselves or their consorts a very substantial amount of income tax.

Mr. Fleming: I quite agree with the purpose of the section.

Mr. Abbott: There could be no purpose in making the gift to anybody else for that purpose. It is simply the gift of an amount to reduce the income below a certain taxable level.

Mr. Fleming: I expect that all hon. members are familiar with the way that type of gift has operated, because there have been many cases of that kind. But if we recognize in principle a broader kind of gift in the other section I am just wondering why this provision could not be broadened to include gifts to provinces or municipalities.

Mr. Abbott: The gift here is to be applied on account of the tax liability, for the reasons I have mentioned.

Income Tax Act

On section 22—Income of beneficiary.

Mr. Abbott: I am going to have to revert to this section in order to move a minor amendment. I have also a minor amendment to section 24. Then I assured the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that there would be an opportunity to discuss section 26, on which he has some points he wishes to raise. The amendment to this section reads:

That subclause (2) of clause 22 be amended by adding to subsection (6A) of section 58 the following words:
"but shall, for the purpose of section 20, be deemed to have been allowed to the trust or estate under those regulations in computing its income for the year."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Mr. Abbott: This is a purely technical amendment.

On section 24—Non-application of paragraph (a), ss. (2), sec. 73.

Mr. Abbott: The first amendment reads:

That subclause (2) of clause 24 be amended by substituting "1949" for "1950" therein.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Abbott: The second amendment adds a new clause, exempting for the purposes of income tax payments or grants made by provincial governments to those producer co-operatives organized under provincial legislation. The amendment reads:

That subclause (1) of clause 24 be amended by substituting the word "subsections" for the word "subsection" in line 24 and adding the following within the quotation marks:

"(3) Where a corporation that was incorporated under provincial legislation respecting the establishment of co-operative corporations for the purpose of marketing (including processing incident to or connected therewith) natural products belonging to or acquired from its members or customers, of purchasing supplies, equipment or household necessaries for or to be sold to its members or customers or of performing services for its members or customers has received a grant from the government of a province that was not fixed by reference to natural products marketed, supplies, equipment or household necessaries purchased or sold or services performed by it,

(a) no amount shall be included in respect of the grant in computing the corporation's income for any year, and

(b) paragraph (h) of subsection (4) of section 20 is not applicable in respect of any property in respect of or for the acquisition of which it was received."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

[Mr. Abbott.]

On section 26—Certain payments from pension funds.

Mr. Knowles: This afternoon I discussed with the minister a particular problem relating to the deductibility of payments into pension funds. As I understand the general rule now in force, it is that payments into approved pension or superannuation funds are deductible for income tax purposes, with the consequence that when a pensioner receives payment under a pension plan those payments are taxable. What is the situation with respect to persons receiving pension payments from a fund into which they made their contributions at a time when those contributions were not allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes?

Mr. Abbott: All the payments were made before the period when they became deductible?

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact I have in mind two kinds of cases, but I was trying to simplify it by taking first the case in which all the payments were made before those payments were allowed as a deduction.

Mr. Abbott: In that case it would be all exempt when it came out.

Mr. Knowles: What was the year when the change was made? Was it 1944?

Mr. Abbott: It was following the report of the Ives commission. I would be inclined to think it was 1945, but I would have to check on that.

Mr. Knowles: What about the case of a person who paid into a fund prior to 1944 or 1945 when no deductibility was allowed, but who continued to pay in for a year or two after that before going on pension? I am told that there are cases of persons who, because they continued to pay for a couple of years after the time when those payments in were allowed as deductions, they are not now permitted to receive their payments free of tax.

Mr. Abbott: I am told that if the payments in straddled the date on which the change was made, which would appear to be the case just outlined by my friend, there is an apportionment of the pension coming out as between the taxable portion and the non-taxable portion. If the payments had been made in for two years which were deductible for income tax purposes, under the new ruling then the appropriate part of that pension represented by those two payments would be taxable and the remainder would be exempt.

Mr. Knowles: I think I am prepared to let it go at that, for that seems the way it ought to be. It does not jibe with the statements made in a letter to me by the Acting Minister of National Revenue with respect to a particular case. I shall send the national revenue people a copy of today's Hansard, for the minister's statement will back up our case.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting of the house.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gregg for the second reading of Bill No. 180, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): This is one of those bills, Mr. Speaker, where one criticizes the government for their sins of omission rather than their sins of commission. The act does certain things which everyone in the house agrees with, but it fails to go far enough. It fails to take care of some inconsistencies and some needs which exist today. For instance the amount payable today under the War Veterans Allowance Act is just $40.41 per month. I do not think anyone will argue that is sufficient to meet the needs of an aged veteran. When this bill was passed in the first place, it was passed for the purpose of taking care of the prematurely aged war veterans who had served in the first war. The payments under it today certainly are not enough to do that. As a matter of fact, the government admitted that last year, by passing a special appropriation of $500,000, which was made available to take care of needy cases under this act. This year the minister has in the estimates an amount of $750,000 to take care of special cases of need.

It seems to me it would be far better if we were to increase the payments under the act rather than put on another means test, as we do under these special payments, and have the investigation which goes with it. If this bill had gone to a veterans affairs committee, it could have been discussed and we could have heard the submissions of the various veterans organizations in Canada with respect to this matter. There is another aspect of which we have not heard in connection with this matter. There is a lack of markets in Canada for certain products. As a matter of fact, there are two ministers of our government overseas today trying to find a market for surplus products which we have. I have no objection to seeking markets abroad providing we cannot find a market at home for those products. I think we are neglecting the market at home. If we provided an additional $10 per month to the prematurely aged veteran, I am sure that money would be spent in Canada to purchase many of the goods which are in surplus supply in this country today.

Instead of creating purchasing power at home, what are we doing? We are making loans or gifts to governments overseas so that they can purchase these products. It seems to me we would be much farther ahead if we first supplied these things to our own people. I am sure this is one way we could do it. There are many anomalies under the act. I know in my own constituency there are people who immigrated to this country from enemy countries after the first war, who are today receiving old age pensions. In the province of Saskatchewan they are getting more security under that old age pension than we are giving to our prematurely aged veterans of the first war under this act. It seems to me to be reasonable that the Department of Veterans Affairs should at least make the payments under the War Veterans Allowance Act equal to the best old age pension of any province in Canada; that is the least the government should do.

Then there is the matter of the widows of veterans who will be included under this amendment to the act. These will be the widows of veterans of the various wars which have been fought in the past. If the veteran lived in Canada for twenty years, his widow will be entitled to receive the war veterans allowance. If however the veteran died before completing his twenty years' residence in Canada, his widow will not receive the war veterans allowance. I feel sure there should be an amendment to the act to take care of these cases. There is also the matter of service in England to consider. For a number of years every veterans organization in Canada has been asking that service in England be considered for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act, that is service in England during the first war. As time goes on, we are going to find that the veterans of the second world war will be entitled to the war veterans allowance for service in England, while the older veterans will not be entitled to it. As a matter of fact, we have cases today of men who served in both the first and the second war, and who went to England. They are now entitled to the war veterans allowance. Their comrades who did not have the opportunity of serving in the second war are not entitled to that allowance. I feel that England should be declared a theatre of war for world war I. This would remove the anomaly under the act, and would place all veterans in the same position. These are just two or three things which I believe should be discussed further. That is one of the reasons why we in this group have insisted that we should have a permanent veterans affairs committee of the house before which we could take these different acts which have to do with veterans affairs, have them discussed, hear evidence from the various veterans organizations in the country, and come to some unanimous agreement as to the best treatment that we can give our veterans.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): There are just a few comments, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to make at this time. There is no doubt that the veterans organizations across Canada will be glad that at last we have granted entitlement to the war veterans allowance to former members of His Majesty's forces who fought prior to 1921 and who have been resident in Canada for twenty years or more. The act, however, goes beyond that and also includes former members of foreign powers who fought with us in the wars before 1921, but against us in the last war.

I am not opposing the proposal to make the war veterans allowance available to men of foreign powers, even though they may have fought against us in the last war. I feel, however, that before we bring in that group of men we should make more adequate provision for our own men who are receiving the war veterans allowance; and by that I mean that we should increase the amount of the war veterans allowance from $40 a month to $50 a month in order to put it on a level with what is paid under the Old Age Pensions Act in Alberta and British Columbia. But more especially I feel that the time has come when Britain should be declared a theatre of war in world war I.

We have made England a theatre of war in world war II, and I think the time has now come when England should be recognized as a theatre of war in the first war. After all, it is merely an arbitrary decision on the part of the government to declare that it was not a theatre of war. As a result of this amendment, it seems to me that we are going to have some undesirable situations in many communities. There will be veterans of Canada's armed forces who volunteered for overseas service in world war I, who may have actually served three or four years overseas and who today may be 100 per cent incapacitated but yet are refused any benefits from the Department of Veterans Affairs on the ground that their service did not extend beyond England. Yet at the same time, as a result of this amendment, there will be veterans of foreign powers who fought with us in world war I but whose country fought against us in world war II, who have resided in this country for twenty years, and will now be eligible for the war veterans allowance; and they may be men whose physical condition may be far better than that of our own Canadians who are refused any help at all. That situation of course can only be taken care of by declaring England a theatre of war in world war I.

I think many people in districts throughout Canada are going to be somewhat disturbed when they see veterans of foreign powers that fought against us in the last war receiving the war veterans allowance when our own men are refused it. Mind you, I am not saying that these men fought against us in the last war but the country of which they are nationals fought against us. I realize that the act states that if these men fought with us in the first war and then fought against us in the second war, they will not get the benefits. But if their country fought against us in the second war they are apparently eligible. For instance, Italians who fought with us in the first war and yet whose country fought against us in the last war, I take it will be eligible for the benefits of this act even though they were interned during the last war. I take it that under this act Japanese who fought with us in the first war and yet whose country fought against us in the second war will now be eligible for the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act. I think it will be a rather disturbing picture to many communities when they see our own men who volunteered for overseas service, who went overseas for three or four years, refused a pension merely because England was not declared a theatre of war. As I say, I am not opposing the idea of the bonus of the war veterans allowance being paid to these men but I think that before that is paid we should more adequately take care of our own veterans.

I now wish to say just a few words with regard to the widows of veterans of His Majesty's forces who died before completing twenty years' residence in this country and who are thereby declared ineligible for the benefits of the act. I find it extremely hard to see any sense or reason for that ruling. So long as a veteran came to this country over twenty years ago and did not leave the country, it seems to me that his death should not affect the granting of a pension to his widow, provided she has continued to live in this country since his death. Those are matters that I think should be given further consideration. I hope the minister can find it possible to refer this measure to a committee in order that these matters may be discussed, especially the matter to which I have referred with regard to nationals of foreign powers who fought with us in the first war and yet fought against us in the last war.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): This whole question, Mr. Speaker, was dealt with at some length when the resolution preceding the bill was under consideration. I therefore have comparatively little further ground to cover tonight. At the outset I should like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), that this bill be sent to a committee. Throughout the session I have regretted that a special committee was not set up to deal with the problems of the veterans. But at the very least this bill should be sent to a committee, and I think such committee should be made up of veterans who are members of the house, just as has been the case in other sessions when we have had a special committee.

The bill is divided into two parts. One deals with the benefits which are now to be given to those imperials who settled in Canada up to the year 1930 and to other groups who served in other allied forces during the first war. Personally, I am greatly pleased that the imperials are at last to be made eligible for the war veterans allowance; but I urge upon the minister once more that a wider provision be made for the widows of these men. As he knows, we pointed out to him during the earlier discussions that it was unfair that all the widows should not be covered. Now we find, from the way in which the legislation reads, that the widow will not qualify unless her husband had been alive in Canada for twenty years. The test should be just the other way around. In other words, if he came here twenty years ago the widow should be eligible. Many of the widows came from the old country. In addition I imagine there would be quite a few who were native-born Canadians and who married imperial veterans. Neither group will be eligible unless the husband was actually alive for twenty years in Canada. I hope it is not yet too late to amend the legislation to cover both of these groups.

The second part of the bill deals with administration, in that for the first time it provides that committees shall be set up in the districts called district authorities. These district authorities are to exercise practically all of the powers that from 1930 to the present time have been exercised by the war veterans allowance board. I think that is a wise move, but it is a very drastic change in the handling of the war veterans allowances. That fact alone would justify the setting up of a committee, because there are many points which arise by virtue of the fact we are now to have these district authorities.

I hope that they will have power to review any case which has been dealt with in the past by the war veterans allowance board. Suppose a person has applied for war veterans allowance and has had his application rejected; I hope that it will now be possible for that veteran to apply to the district authority. The minister did not make that clear when he spoke on the earlier occasions. I would ask him to let us know whether the intention is that any veteran who has been turned down will now be able to apply to his district authority.

It also seems to me that the time has come to write into the War Veterans Allowance Act a benefit of the doubt section. There is such a section in the Pension Act numbered 63, which reads in this way:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant shall be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which shall mean that it shall not be necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced, and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences and presumptions in favour of the applicant.

I suppose we have taken it for granted that the benefit of the doubt is being applied in the case of an application for war veterans allowance just as in the case of an application for pension. But it is not the law. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act there is no such benefit of the doubt clause. I have reached the conclusion personally that these ageing veterans will not get the kind of treatment to which the public believes they are entitled unless there is a benefit of the doubt clause written into the act.

When I spoke earlier I mentioned several types of cases, in which I thought there had been unfair decisions, and cases of that type would be covered if there were a benefit of the doubt clause. For example, the one that worries me the most is this question of the veteran who is under 60 years of age, or the widow who is under 55 years of age. In the War Veterans Allowance Act we find two provisions to cover them. In the first place if they are permanently unemployable because of physical or mental disability they can qualify, although they have not reached the age of 60 in the case of the veteran or 55 in the case of the widow. But then there is also this other provision:

is incapable and unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself or herself because of economic handicaps combined with mental or physical disability or insufficiency.

I have always been of the opinion that that would cover practically every other case where the veteran was unable to earn his living; but within the last few months I have had two such cases brought to my attention which were decided against the applicant; one the case of a woman who qualified herself as a veteran, and the other the case of a widow both of whom I believe are unable to earn a living and are about 50 years of age. They cannot get work, and I do not consider that they are physically fit to work even if they could find a job, and yet it has been decided by the board that they do not come under either of those clauses. It may be that the board is correct in the strict interpretation of the act, but I know that was not the intention of members of parliament who served on the various veterans affairs committees. I believe these cases would be covered if there were a benefit of the doubt clause written into the act.

Other cases have to do with casual earnings. We thought that we had that casual earning provision broadened out to such an extent that anybody who had earnings which the ordinary person would consider were just odd amounts would not have those amounts counted against him in his application for an allowance. I doubt whether the board has been interpreting the provision in just such a wide way.

Then there are other instances. Perhaps you might call them borderline cases. But I do suggest that these borderline cases should get the benefit of the doubt. I would ask the minister to give consideration to putting in a benefit of the doubt clause which would make it clear beyond any question that parliament intended that borderline cases would be covered.

This change in the administration of the act also brings up another question, and it is this. A year ago an assistance fund was set up. The minister will correct me if I am wrong. I believe it is called the assistance—

Mr. Gregg: The war veterans allowance assistance fund.

Mr. Green:—the war veterans allowance assistance fund, which, in effect, merely provided relief for war veterans allowance recipients who were drawing the full amount of allowance. It is of no use to a veteran who is not drawing the full allowance. For example, I believe if he gets a pension of 25 per cent he cannot then get the full war veterans allowance and therefore would be ineligible for help under this fund, although actually he would not be getting any more than $40.41 if a single man; but because of the fact that he does not get it all in the form of war veterans allowance he does not qualify for help under the assistance fund. Furthermore it is only a vote; there is no legislation behind it; it depends on a vote being brought in each year, and that of course is a very uncertain and unstable way to provide for this help. There should be a statute providing for that assistance so that the rights of the veterans will be very clearly defined and that the help will not be subject merely to a parliamentary vote being brought in each year.

This assistance fund at the present time, although called a war veterans allowance assistance fund, is not being administered by the war veterans allowance board. It is administered by the welfare branch of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I would suggest that when these amendments become law, and we have the district authorities set up, such authorities should be given power to administer the assistance fund. That would seem to be more reasonable than having one group dealing with war veterans allowances and another group dealing with the assistance fund.

But the very fact that it has been necessary to set up an assistance fund and, in this year's vote, to increase it from $500,000 to $750,000, proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that the war veterans allowance itself is not ample, and that there should be an increase in the amount of war veterans allowance. If that were done, once the veteran had established a right to the war veterans allowance he or she would get an adequate amount; whereas at the present time the veteran gets only the old figure, and then has to go through a second means test every year in order to get help from this assistance fund—and he cannot get very much, at that. It is limited in the case of a single man to $10 a month and in the case of a married veteran to $15 a month, and as I have pointed out, unless he is getting full war veterans allowance, he cannot get any help at all under the assistance fund. You see, the cost of living is higher than it has ever been. The old age pensioners are getting more, in at least two of the provinces they are getting $10 a month more than the veteran can get; in fact, it means a good deal more than that in the case of the married veteran. The single veteran in British Columbia gets $40 a month—to be exact it is $40.41—and the single old age pensioner gets $50.

Mr. Gregg: Not all your old age pensioners get that.

Mr. Green: The veteran without any other means gets $40.41, while the old age pensioner without any other means gets $50.

Mr. Gregg: Not all of them.

Mr. Green: In British Columbia.

Mr. Gregg: Not all your old age pensioners in British Columbia get $50.

Mr. Green: I think the minister is wrong; I believe they all do.

Mr. Gregg: No.

Mr. Green: If they are entitled to the dominion-provincial old age pension of $40, then the province adds $10 more. In fact, the province adds $10 even though they are not entitled to the full $40 under the dominion-provincial legislation. The province adds a bonus of $10, so that they are getting up to $50 a month. The veteran is properly a charge of the dominion government, just as the province has some responsibility in respect of the old age pensioner, and adds on $10 a month. It is an impossible situation when the veteran gets less than the old age pensioner in the province. I do suggest the time has long since passed when the war veterans allowance recipient should get the same amount as the old age pensioner.

I think the only way in which we will get this legislation made right is by referring it to a committee, allowing veterans organizations to make representations and giving the opportunity to members of the committee to question officers from the Department of Veterans Affairs and to go into this whole matter. If we do not do that it is very unlikely that there will be any legislation brought in at the next session in connection with the War Veterans Allowance Act. In fact, it might be quite impossible to get any further amendment to the act during the whole life of the present parliament. If we are to follow the course which has been followed by parliaments in Canada ever since the first war in dealing with veterans legislation as important as the bill before the house tonight, then we certainly should have a parliamentary committee. I hope the minister will agree to having such a committee set up, and to having this bill referred to that committee for study.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Green: Could we have an answer from the minister?

Mr. Gregg: I would prefer if the house would agree to my dealing with the points pertaining to the bill when we get into committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Gregg moves that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee on the bill.

Mr. Wright: At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move that—

Mr. Speaker: Order; this motion is not debatable.

Mr. Wright: I am moving an amendment to the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The motion itself not being debatable, it is not amendable.

Mr. Wright: I would refer Your Honour to Beauchesne, citations 699 and 406, where Your Honour will find that authority is given to move that a bill be referred to a select committee on the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole.

I therefore move—

Mr. Speaker: As I have mentioned previously, this motion is not debatable, and not being debatable, it is not amendable. The hon. member for Melfort has referred to Beauchesne, third edition, as his authority to move that a bill be referred to a select committee on the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole. May I point out that citation 699 in Beauchesne's third edition is taken from Bourinot at page 519 where it is stated:

> Any bill may be referred to a select committee in amendment to the motion for the house to go into committee of the whole, or on the reading of the order for committee.

That is taken from the debates of the House of Commons of Canada in connection with the marine electric telegraph bills, referred to in Canadian Commons Hansard for 1879.

I might point out to the hon. member that in 1879 a motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole was debatable. Since that time, however, the rules have been changed so that the motion is not debatable.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lesage in the chair.

War Veterans Allowance Act

On section 1—Newfoundland veterans.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I should like to touch briefly upon points made in earlier discussion both on the resolution and on the bill, but particularly those things affecting the bill itself. First may I refer to the observations of the hon. member for Kamloops as they are reported at page 1749 of Hansard, where he said:

> I have had cases where . . . it has . . . . taken months, in fact nearly a year, to complete a case . . . to the final disposition.
> It seems to me that no administration should take from six to nine months . . .

It may be that in cases requiring special investigation an inordinate length of time has been consumed but I am sure that hon. members know of their own personal knowledge that those are unusual cases. I will be the first to admit that in many cases it has taken too long to adjudge applications, and it is our sincere hope that the plan suggested here will help to shorten the time required.

At page 1752 of Hansard I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre shows a misapprehension about the payment of allowances when recipients of war veterans allowance are taken to hospital. He stated:

> . . . I think it is a reasonable request that the wife of a veteran . . . who has to go to hospital, should get not less than she will get if she becomes a widow.

She does not get less under any circumstances. If a veteran is receiving $70 per month for himself and his wife, and he is admitted to hospital, usually about $15 is suspended leaving her with $55 which is more than she would receive if she were a widow.

The hon. member for Kings referred to a veteran who applied for war veterans allowance and was told that the expiry date for receiving such applications was in the year 1936. Of course that is untrue. There is no expiry date so far as war veterans allowance is concerned at the present time.

The hon. member for Calgary East referred to the supplementary allowances, and I should like to quote his exact words as recorded at page 1754 of Hansard. He said:

> So far as I know, no one in that part of the country from which I come has received the benefit of that $10; no matter how desperate his circumstances may have been, he just did not get it.

In the Calgary district from which my friend comes supplementary allowance has been granted to 341 recipients out of 443 applicants. In short, more than 25 per cent of all those who receive war veterans allowance in the district have been receiving benefits from the assistance fund. I think those are the main points raised on the resolution and the bill. As to the point made by my hon. friend a few minutes ago about those who will become eligible if the bill is put into effect, I am free to confess to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that after all the discussions of this matter going back for ten, twelve or fifteen years it was not until recently that anybody, even the veterans organizations themselves, got down to cases and said to themselves, "Where are we going to draw the line?" My hon. friend and I, among others, applauded loudly when my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and others talked about the peace of the world and better understanding between nations, about those who have come to Canada from other countries, have lived here for many years, and have taken part in the development of the country, and how we should begin to forget what their background was, what country they came from, their race or their creed. We have all thumped our desks and rightly so.

I am not going to go into detail on this question except to say that I would feel most unwilling to stand in the house and defend any other course than is reflected in the bill. In the case of those from across the Pacific who served with us in the first war, have been twenty years in Canada, and have taken part in the life of Canada, even with all the bitterness of feeling that has existed in the last ten years, I think we would be breaking down something if we did not treat them here in the same way as those who have come from the United Kingdom. I am the first to admit that I saw the difficulties referred to by my hon. friend. I suppose those things do occur in the administration of any such legislation. After all, we can only go step by step in these matters, keeping in step, if you like, with nineteen other departments of government. I am quite certain in the knowledge that progress is being made in the protection against hardship of those ageing veterans who have fought in battle, and that our people will understand if anomalies turn up here and there.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to the benefit of the doubt. Frankly I had never thought of that in relation to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I think he will admit the Pension Act is a little different. Under that legislation doctors and lawyers have a go at it and there are certain very fine decisions to be made based upon opinions that are professional in nature. The factors surrounding the ageing veteran are not quite so professional. They are more rules of thumb. They are facts as to the living conditions under which the veteran is found, of trying to find out these factors without being too much of a policeman in doing so, of trying to size them up and add them together and see whether or not they come within the spirit of the act.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I hope the cases he referred to can be reviewed again, but by and large I feel safe in saying that the benefit of the doubt has been put into practice in dealing with applications in the past.

Mr. Green: Then there would be no objection to putting it into the law.

Mr. Gregg: Frankly I do not see any object in doing so. A question was asked whether a veteran who was in receipt of war veterans allowance in the past under the former method of administration will be able to have his case reviewed, or whether he can apply again if he was turned down in the past. Under the new plan the answer to that is yes. As my hon. friend knows, under war veterans allowance the man may apply as many times as he thinks he has a case.

The administration of the assistance fund has just passed through its first experimental year. So far as investigations are concerned they were conducted by those who had training in welfare work. They were not always employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs. Some of the investigations were conducted by trained social service workers within the community at the request of the department. It was done with the purpose of overcoming the charge that there is sometimes a second means test on top of a first. From my observation, in the main I think it has worked quite well.

As to referring the bill to a committee, in principle I can assure you at once that I have no objection. In practice, however, I cannot see the object. The points that have been made with respect to an increase in the basic rate at this time have been dealt with by myself this session, and I must repeat that I am not in a position to recommend an increase in the basic rate at this time. Consequently I can see no object in bringing that matter before a committee. I believe the points incorporated in this bill can be dealt with adequately in committee of the whole, which will give the board and those charged with the administration of the act an opportunity to put it into effect at the earliest possible moment.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up second reading of Bill No. 209, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939. Then we will take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. If we are fortunate enough to complete those we will take the estimates of veterans affairs.

Mr. Fleming: What about third reading of the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Abbott: We do not have to announce it; it is at the head of the order paper anyway.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 19, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—BENEFIT BARN DANCE FOR RELIEF FUND

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege. Following a lengthy telephone conversation last night with a group of my constituents, I wish to announce that a huge benefit barn dance will be held at my farm early in June, and that the total proceeds will be turned over to the Manitoba flood relief fund.

My point of privilege is this. We are flood-conscious, and wish to stress the need to help those people who were so unfortunate as to be forced from their homes by this disastrous flood.

EXCHANGE OF TELEGRAMS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTERS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM AND CANADA

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the following telegram has been received from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom through the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> On behalf of my colleagues and myself I should like to convey to you the deep concern with which we have learned of the serious floods in Winnipeg. Please express our heartfelt sympathy with those who have suffered in the catastrophe.

The following telegram was sent by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to Mr. Attlee:

> My colleagues and I deeply appreciate the United Kingdom government's message of sympathy for those who are suffering from the serious floods in Manitoba. Your message reached me just before I went into the House of Commons today and I made it public from my place in the house.

Subsequent to those messages we received from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and our high commissioner on the other side the report of an interview with Mr. Attlee, at which Mr. Attlee asked if there was any way in which the help of the United Kingdom government or its people could be extended to the people of Manitoba. That offer was very warmly received and has been communicated to the premier of Manitoba.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the statement made by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Claxton) as to the appreciation which I am sure is felt by every member here as a representative of his constituency, of the generous and sympathetic offer made by the government of the United Kingdom. Undoubtedly the way in which this offer was made will help to continue and to emphasize the warm and friendly association which exists, and I hope will always exist, between this country and the United Kingdom.

HANDICAPPED PERSONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POSTPONEMENT OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, for the information of hon. members and the interested public I feel I should announce that the dominion-provincial conference on rehabilitation of the handicapped, which was scheduled to be held in Ottawa May 25 to 27, has been postponed on account of the Manitoba flood. Upon the suggestion of the premier of Saskatchewan, and after consultation with the health authorities of Manitoba and Alberta, this action was found advisable. Many of the delegates from these three provinces who would like to attend the conference, are busily engaged in looking after sufferers and evacuees from the flood area. The interdepartmental committee, made up of representatives of the departments of labour, health and welfare, and veterans affairs studied the situation at a special meeting, but were unable to suggest another suitable time for the conference because of the difficulty of getting accommodation. However, it should be clearly understood that the conference will be held as soon as circumstances permit.

NAVAL SERVICE

REPLACEMENT OF "RULE BRITANNIA" BY "O CANADA" AS FORMAL SALUTE BY NAVY BANDS

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to call the attention of the house to an item which appeared in a daily paper a few days ago. It says that the strains of "O Canada" have been selected to replace "Rule Britannia" as the formal salute by navy bands to the chief of the Canadian naval staff, the naval board of Canada, admirals of the fleet, admirals and commanders in chief. I say to the house that there are many Canadians whose forefathers—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: —and the strains of "Rule Britannia" are very dear to a large number of Canadians.

Mr. Lesage: So is "O Canada".

Mr. Ferguson: When the German submarines were sailing up the St. Lawrence river during the last war, the people of Quebec and of Canada were glad to hear the strains of "Rule Britannia". The insidious propaganda that is constantly being put out by government civil servants and some French-Canadian members of parliament to take tradition from Canadians should be stopped now. "Rule Britannia" means as much to us as "La Marseillaise" means to Frenchmen. I have marched behind the strains of "La Marseillaise", and would be glad to do so again.

Mr. Abbott: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: But this has to be stopped—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It occurs to me that from time to time members rise on questions of privilege when there is no question of privilege involved. I am not referring particularly to any of the members who have risen today, but I would ask that, in the future, members make sure they are rising on questions of privilege before doing so.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Was he aware of the change in the martial air "Rule Britannia" in connection with the navy, and was the change carried out with his full sanction?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Entirely. I think the substitution of "O Canada" for "Rule Britannia" will be a change greatly to be desired by all Canadians.

Mr. Ferguson: Breathes there the man with soul so dead!

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

SUMMARY OF DECISIONS TAKEN BY THE COUNCIL IN LONDON

On the order for motions:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members will be aware, the North Atlantic council, which has been meeting in London since May 15, completed its sessions yesterday. The following is the text of the communiqué issued by the council summing up the decisions taken in London:

The North Atlantic council established in accordance with article 9 of the treaty has so far only met twice at the ministerial level and on two other occasions when members of the council have been represented by their governments' diplomatic representatives in Washington.

But under article 9 the council is the principal body of the North Atlantic treaty. It is therefore the paramount duty of the council to put itself in a position to exercise its full role as the central and most important of the various organs of the treaty by taking the most effective steps to keep itself informed of all matters which fall within its competence, by taking the necessary decisions and by ensuring the execution of such decisions.

A year's experience has shown that on the political side the meetings of the council have been too infrequent to permit a sufficient exchange of views on matters of common interest within the scope of the treaty. On the military side the strategic concept of the treaty has been adopted and a defence plan drawn up and the corresponding estimate of the necessary forces is being established. The next step is to put these plans into effect by taking further measures in the direction of common defence, the division of financial responsibilities and the adaptation and development of the necessary forces.

In view of this situation, the council will in particular undertake the following task:

(a) Study the interrelationship of the various programs to support the plans for the defence of the north Atlantic area and ensure co-ordination of the work of the defence committee, the defence financial and economic committee, and all other bodies established under the North Atlantic treaty organization.

(b) recommend to governments the steps necessary to ensure that effect is given to the co-ordinated plans prepared for the defence of the north Atlantic area.

(c) Exchange views on political matters of common interest within the scope of the treaty.

(d) Promote and co-ordinate public information in furtherance of the objectives of the treaty while leaving responsibility for national programs to each country.

(e) Consider what further action should be taken under article 2 of the treaty, taking into account the work of existing agencies in this field.

To enable the council effectively to carry out its responsibilities and to exercise them continuously, each government will appoint a deputy to its council representative. Each deputy will be in a position to give whatever time may be necessary to ensure that the responsibilities of the council are carried out effectively.

In the intervals between meetings of ministers, the deputies, duly authorized by their respective governments, will be responsible, on behalf of and in the name of the council, for carrying out its policies and for formulating issues requiring decisions by the member governments.

The council, having considered the reports of the defence committee and the defence financial and economic committee, issued directives to guide them in their future work. These directives emphasize that the problem of adequate military forces and the necessary financial costs should be examined as one and not as separate problems.

In formulating their directives the council proceeded on the basis that the combined resources of the members of the North Atlantic treaty are sufficient, if properly co-ordinated and applied, to ensure the progressive and speedy development of adequate military defence without impairing the social and economic progress of these countries.

The council, recognizing the indispensability of self-help and mutual aid among the treaty powers in making progress towards an integrated defence, and convinced that further mutual assistance is essential to rapid progress towards the strength required for the common security of the north Atlantic area, recommended that each party make its full contribution through mutual assistance in all practicable forms.

The council unanimously agreed that if adequate military defence of the member countries is to be achieved it must be along the lines of the most economical and effective utilization of the forces and material at the disposal of the north Atlantic countries. They accordingly urged their governments to concentrate on the creation of balanced collective forces in the progressive build-up of the defence of the north Atlantic area, taking at the same time fully into consideration the requirements for national forces which arise out of commitments external to the north Atlantic area.

In furtherance of article 9 of the treaty the council established a North Atlantic planning board for ocean shipping, to be composed of representatives of the participating countries concerned. This board will report directly to the council and will work in close co-operation with other bodies of the treaty organization in all matters relating to the factor of merchant shipping in defence planning.

The ministers believe that the decisions they have taken here in London represent a marked advance towards the practical realization of the objectives of the North Atlantic treaty.

It is evident that this has been the most important meeting of the North Atlantic council so far. Decisions have been taken which should ensure that the gathering strength of the North Atlantic treaty nations is organized in the most efficient fashion for the defensive purposes of the treaty and that progress will be made in the fields of political and economic co-operation. We have taken a long step forward, and I know that hon. members will fully realize the importance of these developments in building up a stable and prosperous north Atlantic community.

Mr. Pearkes: Will Canada appoint a deputy to that permanent committee?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): The announcement which we have just heard, Mr. Speaker, and which we read earlier in the press, as to the unanimous decision of the representatives of the twelve nations of the Atlantic community is an announcement of what is undoubtedly the most momentous decision that has been made since the summer of 1945. Until this decision was reached yesterday, the Atlantic treaty and the set-up of the council still left some uncertainties as to the full scope of their activities. Even yesterday in his announcement of the earlier report the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) emphasized the fact that the discussions had been informal. The announcement which has now been made carries this matter far beyond the stage of informality. I feel sure that hon. members will welcome the fact that this matter has passed the stage of informal discussion and that now there is in definite form a permanent executive committee of the Atlantic council to which there will be a Canadian delegate with appropriate secretarial and official assistants.

It cannot be emphasized too often that at this very time we are passing through the most critical stage of modern history. I feel sure that the hon. members of this house of all parties will wish that the Canadian representative on that committee, whoever he may be, will at all times act with the knowledge that in the joint efforts to preserve peace there is complete unanimity in this house.

While that meeting does not deal with anything except the organization of the nations of the Atlantic community, it has been noticeable that in the reports of those discussions, which by more than coincidence take place at the same time as the conference in Sydney, there has been reference to the problems of the Pacific. I do not think it would be appropriate to allow an occasion of this kind to pass without bringing forward the suggestion that the free nations of the world will not have completed their task of containing and restraining communist aggression until they have taken similarly effective steps amongst the free nations of the Pacific community.

This is a great step forward; but at the moment the most vigorous communist pressure is in southeast Asia. Those who live in the free nations of that area are emphasizing the need for recognition of immediate action. I would express the earnest hope that, with this very real achievement to the credit of the Atlantic community, steps will be taken without delay to bring similar results in that complementary area where communism is so active today.

All security depends upon security from aggression. The Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Claxton) has pointed out that this permanent body which will be set up will deal not only with the military but also with the financial questions as one problem. To a great extent it might be said at the same time that the problem of advancing the social security and general welfare of the people in these and other free nations is directly related also to military and economic concerns.

There is one point of great importance mentioned by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs which raises another consideration which I think should be brought forward immediately. The decisions yesterday have created a new North Atlantic planning board for ocean shipping, composed of representatives of the maritime nations within this group of Atlantic nations. It is to be the purpose of that permanent planning board to plan for the preparation of adequate shipping and for the mobilization of that shipping in the event of an emergency. This, I say, immediately raises a consideration of great importance to every Canadian. In view of the fact that Canada has now agreed to become a part of a permanent planning board for maritime shipping in relation to the general world problem, I hope that it will mean the immediate re-establishment of the Canadian flag fleet.

Mr. Abbott: What are we debating here, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Drew: We are not debating anything, Mr. Speaker. We are discussing an important occasion which does not call for trite remarks of the kind just made.

Mr. Abbott: I was just wondering what was before the house.

Mr. Speaker: The statement is of course not debatable; but I think it is customary to allow brief remarks to be made by the leader of the official opposition and by leaders of other parties immediately after an important statement has been made to the house.

Mr. Abbott: I just wondered what the Canadian flag fleet had to do with the statement that has just been made.

Mr. Fulton: You will see the connection if you just wait.

Mr. Drew: I regret to say that the minister who has just spoken is perhaps the one minister who would not understand but I think that most of the others do.

Mr. Abbott: Always the snappy comeback.

Mr. Drew: I am speaking to those who recognize the seriousness of the situation and who are not prepared to clown at a serious time like this.

The announcement that has been made definitely offers more hope and more reason for hope than we have had since the closing days of the war. I earnestly hope that in every respect members of the government who recognize their responsibility will go forward, carry out and fulfil in every way the agreement reached yesterday for the supreme purpose of restraining communist aggression and ultimately defeating it.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): As I listened to the statement read by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Claxton) a line or two of Tennyson came to my mind, namely:

The old order changeth, yielding place to new.

As I listened today and last evening to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) I thought of the extent to which the old order was giving way to the new; that a few years ago we thought it impossible that the nations of the Atlantic community, for example, could co-operate economically, socially and in our common defence. The statement made today and last night has impressed upon this house, as it must have impressed the countries of the Atlantic community, the fact that in all our domestic policies, whether they be economic or social, we have to consider their impact upon the rest of the members of that community. I said last night that I thought that perhaps more important than the military arrangements made among the ministers in London during the past few days were the arrangements for economic and social co-operation.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) mentioned southeast Asia. I firmly believe that there can be no defence against communism, or any other form of totalitarianism, in southeast Asia unless the nations of the world co-operate to improve the standards of living of the people of that part of the world. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we welcome this statement, and I can assure the government, the leader of the opposition and the members of the house that anything we can do to advance this great idea of co-operation first among the members of the Atlantic community, and then among the members, we hope, of the great world community, we shall be pleased to support and indeed to undertake.

Mr. Green: May I direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs? Perhaps it should be answered by the Minister of Transport. Does this statement mean that there will be any change in Canadian policy with regard to the Canadian merchant navy?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware, it will mean no change.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROCUREMENT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT BY UNITED STATES IN CANADA

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have one further announcement of very great importance to make; but before doing so may I say how much the government appreciates the expressions of support and unity on the part of the leaders of the various parties who have spoken. It indicates that so far as defence and external policy are concerned, Canada is united to a greater extent than ever before.

Hon. members will have seen press reports regarding the procurement by the United States of military equipment in Canada.

I am glad to be able to inform the house that it has been announced officially in Washington that the United States service departments and munitions board have been requested by the Secretary of Defence to develop a program for the purchase in Canada, during the year beginning next July 1, on a reciprocal basis, of military equipment to the value of between fifteen and twenty-five million dollars.

This announcement marks a major step in the integration of military production in the two countries. It is an extension into the peacetime period of the principles of the Hyde Park declaration of 1941, which proved so effective during wartime.

This announcement comes as a result of negotiations which I initiated with the late James Forrestal but which were carried through by Hon. Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defence, following a recommendation by the permanent joint board on defence. It is something for which we have all been working for some time.

It is still too early to indicate what this may mean in terms of specific items, but I can say with assurance that the benefits that may be realized under this arrangement will contribute not only to the defence potential of both countries and consequently the defence of our continent, but also to the over-all defence arrangements under the North Atlantic treaty.

COLD STORAGE ACT

REPEAL OF PART II WITH RESPECT TO COLD STORAGE WAREHOUSES

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the first reading of Bill No. 222 (from the Senate), to amend the Cold Storage Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—QUESTION AS TO REPORT OF RELIEF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he will cause to be tabled the interim report of the British Columbia flood relief commission, dated June 13, 1948?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I believe there was such a report, Mr. Speaker. I shall look at it, and if it is appropriate to do so I will see that it is tabled next week.

PRISONERS OF WAR

NUMBER OF CANADIANS HELD IN GERMANY, ITALY AND JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): On April 28 there appeared on the order paper a question by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) about the number of Canadians who were held as prisoners of war, and the number of days each prisoner had been held. A partial answer was given on May 4, when it was stated that the total number of prisoners was 9,552. But at that time it was pointed out that the number of days could not be given exactly without a complete examination of each file. Since then the hon. member has pressed for the information, and I have had inquiries made in the Department of Veterans Affairs, where the files are held. It would not be possible to give the information exactly without a very long and extensive examination of the files. However, we have been able to arrive at an estimate which I think is sufficiently correct for the hon. member's purpose. I have told him this, and he has expressed his satisfaction with it.

The estimated total man days is as follows:

	Germany and Italy	Japan
Navy	25,000	2,000
Army	2,658,000	2,082,000
Air	1,645,000	29,000
	4,328,000	2,113,000
Total	6,441,000

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRINTING BUREAU EMPLOYEES—OPPORTUNITY TO APPEAR BEFORE PRINTING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Secretary of State whether he is ready to answer the question I put to him in his absence on April 27? The question was:

Has the Secretary of State received a request from the Ottawa typographical union for an opportunity to appear before the committee of the house on printing to deal with matters of concern to employees of the printing bureau? If so, will the Secretary of State consider making arrangements for a meeting of that committee so that this request can be granted?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question. The answer is that the request from the Ottawa typographical union has been received, and I have suggested to them that they might get in touch with the chairman of the joint committee on printing. At the same time I would point out that requests concerning employment conditions are being currently considered by the treasury board, and a report is expected shortly. It is felt that the matter should be deferred until this report has been received.

Mr. Knowles: Will the Secretary of State table the report when he has received it, so that those concerned can govern themselves accordingly?

Mr. Bradley: What report?

Mr. Knowles: The report to which the minister has just referred.

Mr. Bradley: The report of treasury board?

Mr. Abbott: The answer is no. I understand that is not a document that is usually tabled.

Mr. Knowles: Then what is the point in asking those concerned to wait for the report?

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): On February 28 last the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) reported to the house on behalf of a special committee set up for the purpose of naming the members of the various standing committees. I should like to ask the leader of the house when we may expect that the committee on privileges and elections will be called together. It is nearly three months since that committee was set up, and it has not yet met.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I understand the procedure is that any member who wishes to have one of these committees set up communicates with the chairman of the committee. They hold meetings at the request of any member of the committee, or any member of the house.

Mr. Drew: Then I hope the leader of the house will take this as a notice from some of the members of that committee that it is their desire that the committee be convened immediately.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Abbott: It is not a government committee: it is a house committee.

[Mr. Bradley.]

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—QUESTION AS TO CONCURRENCE IN REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the leader of the house when it is the intention—or perhaps he would prefer that I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier)—to present the motion for the adoption of the report of the committee on railways and shipping.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): That is a matter which is in the hands of the chairman of the committee. I presume that when the chairman of the committee has the report in hand, and has it completed, he will present it to the house.

Mr. Drew: The report is complete and has been tabled. It is now essential that there be a motion for its adoption before it comes before the house for consideration. When there are recommendations in the report, there should be a motion for concurrence.

Mr. Chevrier: As the minister responsible for the Department of Transport I have no jurisdiction in the matter of the motion itself. I presume—I am not sure—that that will be a matter for the chairman to consider. I shall see that the remarks the leader of the opposition has made are noted.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

IMMIGRATION—COSTS OF TRANSPORT, ETC., SINCE 1945

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): I should like to ask when I may expect a reply to the following question, which was passed as an order for return on March 1:

1. How many refugees and immigrants have entered Canada from September 1, 1945, to December 31, 1949?

2. What was the cost to the government of recruiting, transporting and establishment of such refugees and immigrants to their place of destination?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): This question requires the breaking down of costs in the immigration branch. We have been working on it steadily from the time the order was passed. As soon as we have an answer, we will bring it to the house.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 177, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXCLUDE CERTAIN AREAS, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 209, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

He said: When the resolution preceding this bill was under discussion, I suggested to the committee that it would probably be advisable to have the measure referred to the committee on agriculture. The reason was that certain matters were referred to during the discussion, some of which had been considered before and others of which were more or less new to many members in the committee.

I had thought that probably by the time the bill was referred to the house again we might have a redrafting of it; but I was not thinking fast enough. The other evening I allowed the bill to go to first reading. Having gone to first reading it was given a number, and it was impossible to have it reprinted without bringing it back to the house.

The bill therefore is before the house now in the same form as that which I had in mind when it was first discussed in the resolution stage. But after listening to the discussion, and for some other reasons, I have concluded that it would be best to send this bill to the committee on agriculture and have it discussed there. I have had a wire from the minister concerned in Alberta, namely, the minister of municipal affairs and provincial secretary. I believe he might desire to appear before the committee, and I have wired him saying that it would be quite proper for him to do so if he so desires. I have also had a letter from the minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan setting forth some points of view in the matter.

I think it would be helpful to have the measure come before the committee, and have any amendments we desire to make to the bill as it was submitted, in printed form, proposed when it is before the committee.

The legislation as it now stands indicates that it is the desire of the government to avoid the payment of prairie farm assistance on lands which, over a long period of time, were open for homesteading, and were not considered of sufficient fertility or good enough to be taken up as homesteads; or if they were, by action of the federal government while the resources were under its control, such action being continued by the provincial governments after the lands were taken over by them, withheld from settlement under the homesteading plan, such lands should not now be permitted to come in under prairie farm assistance legislation. It would appear that the terms of the present act could be a consideration when taking up lands under the provisions which are set out in some of the provincial legislation. That legislation does make it possible for persons to go on some of those lands on cultivation leases.

I think it is most important that it be clearly demonstrated to all parties concerned that any lands which are going to be opened up for cultivation now are lands upon which there is some opportunity for persons who settle on them to make a living, without any assistance, from this government in particular. Whether the bill went to the committee or not we had expected to bring in amendments to make our view definite.

When I was speaking the other night I said that there was no doubt that lands which were under co-operatives as understood in Saskatchewan would not be excluded merely by the fact that they operated as co-operatives and the lands were still owned by the government. However, on rereading the act I find that when we were amending it before we took a short cut. Instead of definitely saying that that was the case, we amended the definition of "farmer" in order to have it cover a man who was on a co-operative farm and who would therefore be entitled to payment. When we definitely eliminated the land I think probably we eliminated the individual. The proposal was definitely to put into the section being amended a provision that those who are on co-operative farms in the sense I have just spoken of shall not be eliminated by this section.

Then it was hoped that we could devise some amendment to deal with the situation which has been created in connection with several areas in Alberta and which would be satisfactory to those who are settled in those areas and to the government here. Even if the bill had not gone to the committee it was proposed to introduce an amendment to make it clear that certain persons living in those special areas would not be debarred from receiving prairie farm assistance.

All I intend to do at this stage is to move the second reading of the bill in order to get it to the committee as soon as possible, and also to make it known to the governments and others who may be concerned that it will be possible for them to place their cases before the committee and have the matter considered at as early a date as possible. If that meets with the approval of the house, I would suggest that we might satisfy ourselves with giving the bill second reading and permit it to go to the committee where the whole matter could be fully discussed. The bill could then be brought back to the house, where a full discussion could take place, and when hon. members would be in possession of information on which to base a decision.

Since we were dealing with this legislation the other evening I have experienced great difficulty in getting up-to-date copies of the different provincial acts. We have wired for many of these and have received some, but not all. I think it would be well if we had all the legislation before the committee when we were discussing this matter.

I may say that one of the matters I was concerned with, and with which the government was concerned, is the fact that there has been a much greater growth recently in the payments than perhaps anyone expected. Apart altogether from the fact that we have not increased the amount per acre, there has been a considerable increase in the total amount which has been paid. Last year the payments exceeded $20 million. I would hope that we could put this legislation on such a basis that it will not eventually be criticized because the payments are out of proportion to what ought to be paid or because payments are being made on land on which we should not make payments.

In the communications I have had from the provincial governments they have expressed views along similar lines, namely, that it is their intention not to insist upon lands being taken in, but rather to try to get a decision which will be satisfactory to all without bringing in land which should not be included.

If the house is prepared to give the bill second reading, I shall then move that it be referred to the committee on agriculture, to be fully considered and returned to the house later.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think there will be full agreement by the members of this party with the suggestion that the bill be referred to the committee on agriculture. However, there are other phases of the matter which I suggest should be submitted to the committee. I can understand as suggested by the minister that with the rapidly accelerating amounts that are being paid out under this most beneficial legislation, the time may come when criticisms will seriously impair its operation.

As I understand it, the reason for the legislation was and is to keep farmers on lands where, as a result of drought and other causes, there may be crop failures. Everyone makes his contribution of one per cent, and everyone making that contribution within the limitations set by the legislation receives payment. That is the understanding and conception of the farmers with regard to this legislation—at least of those in my constituency and in other parts of Saskatchewan with whom I have spoken.

But legislation passed by parliament is subject to regulations which may be passed under the powers contained in the act, and in this instance, as I see it, many are being denied prairie farm assistance because of the regulations. The regulations have been amended from time to time to define the meaning of owner or tenant. "Farmer" means a person who is the owner or tenant and who operates a farm in the spring wheat area, or who as a member of a co-operative farm association is engaged in farming in the spring wheat area. That was the definition that parliament gave to "farmer".

I agree with the minister when he says that if land is to be removed from the operation of the act in the manner indicated by him, then the law as it now stands would deny payments under the act to co-operatives holding land in the areas referred to by him. In 1949 serious crop failures, covering a large area, occurred in Saskatchewan, and yet many farmers were denied prairie farm assistance who, as I see it, ought to have received it. They are denied that assistance in part by reason of the limitations created by the definition of owner or tenant in the regulations. Under the regulations owner or tenant is defined as follows:

> An owner or tenant is not a farmer for the purposes of this act:
> (a) unless he is the owner or tenant of a farm from the first day of May to the first day of November in the same year;
> (b) unless he lives in the spring wheat area and his primary occupation is farming from the first day of May to the conclusion of the crop season;
> (c) unless he is responsible for the farm operations and the disposal of the proceeds of the farm; and
> (d) if renting from a parent, unless he has a written lease executed prior to the first day of May of the year of award.

I am not going to concern myself with paragraphs (a) and (d). When they were first introduced, paragraph (d) in particular, they did have the result of denying many people their undoubted right to the payment of this bonus, for many were unaware of the existence of these regulations during the year they were brought in. I take objection to paragraph (b), however, which provides that an owner or tenant is not a farmer for the purposes of this act unless he lives in the spring wheat area and his primary occupation is farming from May 1 to the end of the crop season.

Many people are being denied the bonus under that paragraph. Many farmers in the drought areas of Saskatchewan—and I speak particularly of those areas though my argument applies as well in Manitoba and Alberta —know by June 15 or thereabouts whether there are any prospects of a crop that year. Many of them, finding themselves in the position of having to support wives and families, have to leave their farms at that time and accept work elsewhere.

Mr. Gardiner: If I might interrupt for a moment, I think my hon. friend is suggesting that this provision is contained only in the regulations. It is in the act as well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize that, but it is being interpreted in a way that parliament never intended. I could give example after example; and the regulations are not applied uniformly. Some farmers get the bonus though they have left their land because of the conditions with which they are faced, while others in the same position are denied it. There is no uniformity in the application of that section. Too many are being denied payment of the bonus, when fully qualified for it, by a too strict interpretation on the part of those administering the act. I feel that paragraph (b) should be administered in a generous manner. I am not arguing for the person who has a full-time occupation other than farming, who is in business and operates a farm as well. I am arguing for the right of the individual who operates a business as a side line, if you will, or takes work as a side line because of the fact that early in the year he is almost assured of a crop failure.

Many have been denied the bonus. The records reveal a situation that is challenging. The minister mentioned the fear that if the amount expended in this way continues to increase, objection will be raised to the continuation of this legislation. Indeed, reading between the lines of the speech he made a week ago today there would seem to be clear evidence that objection is now being raised in certain quarters to the continuance of this legislation in its present form. I placed a question on the order paper asking how many farmers in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba who had applied for payment of the bonus had been denied it, and that question was answered in a return on May 8. These are farmers who suffered failure and, in consequence of such crop failure last year, are having difficulty in financing their operations this year. The number who have been denied payment under the act is extraordinarily large. Because this record does not appear in Hansard I intend to read it, for it reveals a situation serious in its import and effect. Perhaps if the house would consent I could place this return on Hansard, and then I would not need to read it in detail.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to place the return upon Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The return states:

Question:

1. How many (a) individual (b) township applications, for payment of P.F.A. were refused or denied in each of the prairie provinces between the first day of July, 1949, and the first day of February, 1950?

2. (a) How many cases, in each province, was the refusal or denial of payment under the P.F.A.A. submitted to the board of review? (b) What is the total number of cases in each province in which the said board reversed the decision appealed from?

The attached information has been received by the Secretary of State of Canada from the Department of Agriculture.

Answer of Department of Agriculture

1. (a) Saskatchewan—1320; Manitoba—84; Alberta —249.

(b) Applications are made by the municipalities, and the provinces for unorganized areas, who give an estimate only of the average yield of wheat in the township applied for. No records are kept of ineligible townships except those that are contiguous to eligible areas, this being for the purpose of determining eligible blocks of sections therein.

2. (a) Saskatchewan—136; Manitoba—3; Alberta— 19.

(b) Saskatchewan—19; Manitoba—nil; Alberta—3.

That return indicates that in 1949 some 1,320 farmers in Saskatchewan were refused payment of the bonus between July 1, 1949, and February 1, 1950. In Manitoba the number was 84, and in Alberta 249. Some of these applications were submitted to the board of review. In Saskatchewan only 19 of the total number of appeals were allowed. In Manitoba only three appealed and no appeal was allowed, while in Alberta out of 19 appeals three were allowed.

What do the figures for Saskatchewan indicate? Taking the average farm at 320 acres, which I think is a fair rule of thumb for Saskatchewan, it means that last year farmers of some 425,000 acres, who suffered drought and crop failure and felt qualified to obtain payment under this legislation, were in fact denied payment. It reveals that in the operation of this act, and in part at least particularly in its administration, the rules are too strictly interpreted. I have examples of farmers living side by side. One got the payment; the other, across the road, was denied it under identical circumstances, though both were within a qualified area, because of interpretations placed by the commission upon the meaning of "owner" or "occupant" under the definition I have read.

I feel it only fair in the exercise and discharge of its responsibilities and in the interpretation of these regulations that the board of review should act not in a restrictive manner but in a manner that will bring about to the greatest possible extent fairness, equality and uniformity in the operation of this act.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, farmers occupying at least 425,000 acres of land in the province of Saskatchewan, who believe themselves qualified for this bonus, were denied it last year. This reveals a serious situation, which demands the attention of this house. When the committee commences to sit on this matter, I should like the whole question of the regulations to be submitted to it, to the end that the opinions of the farmer members on the committee could be secured, and if necessary the opinions of those outside the house who believe that changes should be made in connection with the administration of this legislation.

I come now to a phase to which reference was made by the minister, and it is one that raises a great deal of difficulty. It is the fact that over the years in parts of the western provinces, for a period indeed of nine and ten years, bonus payments have been made in the same areas. It indicates that there are certain areas wherein the probability of crops being harvested is extremely remote. I am not going into the figures for the areas in which payments have been made over a successive period of three, four or five years but will restrict my argument to the areas, by townships, in which payments have been made from seven to ten times since 1939. Under this heading in the province of Saskatchewan 329 townships have received payments for seven years since 1939; 294 townships have received payments for eight years in the same period; 162 townships have received payments for nine years in that period, and finally in 44 townships there have been bonus payments for ten years since 1939. Those are striking figures and they warrant the admonition that was given by the minister in his opening remarks.

In parts of the province of Alberta the situation is fairly serious. Payment has been made for seven years out of the period of eleven years since 1939 in 71 townships; for eight years in 121 townships; for nine years in 177 townships, and for ten years since 1939 the bonus has been paid in 41 townships. From those figures one must realize that something must be done. It is because those areas have been so continuously denied a crop that we in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta are demanding that action be taken to provide irrigation by proceeding with the work as soon as possible on such projects as the south Saskatchewan river irrigation scheme. Those areas would be productive were it not for the lack of moisture. They could be made productive. After listening to the revelations made by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Claxton), wherein he stated that Canada intends, with the nations of the Atlantic community, to co-ordinate our economic development, I believe that one course Canada must take in order to meet the situation in southeast Asia, referred to by the leader of the opposition, is to expand our agricultural production and give assistance to the people in southeast Asia, and particularly in India, Pakistan and Ceylon. This would enable those areas, under the development of the plans of the North Atlantic pact, or if necessary a Pacific pact, to provide for the containment of communism where it now is. It would deny the extension of communism by reason of hunger into India, Pakistan, Ceylon and the other countries of that area.

We in this country have a responsibility in connection with our agricultural production that challenges the Minister of Agriculture, and all those charged with the extension and expansion of agricultural production, if we are to meet the commitments we accepted in London yesterday as a member of the community of north Atlantic countries.

Returning once more to the amendments that are before the house, I communicated with many rural municipalities in the area particularly subject to drought, with a view to securing from the municipalities their recommendations as to changes in the law that might be made. Some of their suggestions have been made previously in this house. Some of them were made two years ago when I spoke on this matter, and some are the result of recent experience. It seems that many of them have gone further than ever before in suggesting that, in order to maintain the prairie farm assistance payments, realizing the difficulties of establishing crop insurance, it might well be necessary to make some increase in the amount of contribution. The minister mentioned that in recent years there has been a considerable acceleration in the expenditure in this connection. An answer given on March 16 to the member for Souris (Mr. Ross) reveals that since the inception of this act the total contributions made amount to $45,008,887. The total amount expended during the same period has been $123,876,630; that amount may have increased somewhat since this return was brought in some two months ago.

Mr. Gardiner: It has increased by about a million dollars.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The return, then, is approximately correct. It indicates that a vast area in the western provinces has suffered from the destruction of crops last year as a result of drought, grasshoppers and the like. The area in Manitoba was 82 townships; in Alberta, 1,126 townships; and in Saskatchewan, 1,731 townships. These figures underline the necessity for something being done in order to improve productivity, by the assurance of moisture through irrigation in a large portion of the areas comprised within these townships.

A general summary of the recommendations made by the rural municipalities, and I communicated with seventy rural municipalities so that I would have a cross-section of their suggestions and recommendations, is as follows: (1) somewhat different from the attitude some years ago when many advocated an individual basis as the basis upon which payments should be made, the general suggestion now seems to be that the area itself, in certain portions of Saskatchewan, should be reduced to the half township area. I refer to those areas adjacent to the Qu'Appelle valley where veterans were settled after the first war. They were settled along the eastern side of the Qu'Appelle valley. Over the years these people have lived in hope but have suffered repeated failures and because of the fact that part of the townships in which they farm is situated on the west side of the valley, they have been denied payment over the years. There are about nine areas in Saskatchewan in that position. I feel that something should be done in this committee to recommend some change in the law to meet this localized situation. I do not like to ask for laws applicable to particular areas, but there are in Saskatchewan seven or nine areas that are in this position. The people want to live there. They do not want to leave. They believe they should be entitled to consideration on the part of parliament to the extent of their areas being made subject to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and qualified either under regulation or under amendment to the act.

The second is this: while every farmer who suffers failure within the qualified areas should be entitled to the payment of a bonus, provided his primary occupation is farming, nonetheless, in the definition of what "primary occupation" is, too many are being denied payment. Several of these municipalities have pointed out examples in their area where farmers who found it necessary to leave the farm temporarily because they were facing failure, and realized they were facing failure that year, have been denied payment. These municipal officers say that in the interpretation of "primary occupation" there is too strict an adherence to the letter of the law rather than to the spirit of it.

The third recommendation that is comprised in many of the suggestions is a request in connection with the amounts that are payable for crop failure bonus which were fixed on the basis of conditions in 1939, namely, $2.50 or $1.50 an acre, depending on the degree of failure. Having regard to the taxation that they pay these municipalities say that there is no reason whatsoever why there should not be an increase in the amount of assistance payable. The amount of P.F.A. that is payable today is insufficient to place a farmer in a position in which he can continue his farming operations; and after all, that was the purpose for which this legislation was passed.

I do not want to go into further detail. I believe, however, that these suggestions are worthy of consideration by the committee on agriculture that is to inquire into the matter of amendments to the law as it now stands. The bringing into effect of a few of these suggestions that I have placed before you, Mr. Speaker, would go far towards removing a feeling sometimes approaching resentment that one finds where farmers are denied payment because of the interpretation placed on the regulations or because of the narrowness of the qualification as provided by law.

The changes I recommend, if accepted, would have the result of removing almost every objection that is to be heard with regard to this legislation. It has worked out well. It is a monumental example of the nation's desire to accept responsibility for the failures of fellow Canadians who suffer failure by reason of circumstances beyond their control.

We in the province of Saskatchewan have received much more than we have ever paid. We recognize and appreciate that fact. In Saskatchewan, the contribution over the years under this legislation has been some $24,600,000. The amount paid to Saskatchewan farmers has amounted to some $95 million. We recognize that fact, and we appreciate what other parts of the country have done to show that, where what amounts to a national disaster happens to agriculture in the western provinces, the people of Canada as a whole are willing to help us in our difficulties.

In that spirit, realizing what has been done for us, we in Saskatchewan—and I impress this upon the government, though I speak as a member of the opposition—will join with them in anything they may do to assist the people of Winnipeg and the people of Manitoba in general in the disaster that has come to that province in recent weeks. We believe it is a national disaster. We believe that the people of Manitoba ought to be assured that Canadians as a whole will do everything they can to reimburse them financially, so that their losses will be borne as far as possible by the nation at large. After all, national disasters demand national consideration, and are no longer matters of provincial responsibility alone.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to make another speech; of course, I would not be permitted to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is all right.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that what has been suggested is that it should be possible to have these matters discussed before the committee; that is, the matters that have been referred to.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: The three sections that are being referred to the committee cover all the points that have been mentioned, and I do not think there is any problem about that at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. I appreciate that assurance very much. I know that the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater), who enjoys the confidence of the members of that committee, will see to it that the widest possible discussion is permitted in connection with this matter.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I welcome, Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that this bill be referred to the standing committee on agriculture. I think that a great deal of study needs to be made as to what will be the ramifications and implications of the first amendment. I believe it is wise that officials from the various departments of agriculture in the provincial governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba should have an opportunity to appear before that committee so that we can get exact information as to the land policy followed by the various provincial governments which will be affected by the first clause of the bill as it now stands.

I am glad the minister made it clear that "co-op." farms as such set up on crown land will be eligible for prairie farm assistance. I regret, however, that the minister did not state that it was the intention of the government to change the first clause of the bill to an even greater extent than that. I listened with interest to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I can say that I can agree with most parts of it. I have had the same experience in regard to cases brought to my attention and submitted to the department for a ruling. Without question the regulations and the interpretation of the regulations are being tightened up, and it is certainly much more difficult now to get what one might consider a borderline case passed by the department. While saying that, however, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in the past I have found the members of the board of review very co-operative; and after explaining certain new factors in regard to a particular case that may have been brought to my attention, on numerous occasions I have been successful in getting the application reconsidered and finally getting payment made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has been my experience, too, and I did not want to give any other impression.

Mr. Coldwell: Mine, too.

Mr. Argue: Perhaps certain directions were given to the board of review last year as to policy which must have permitted a great deal more leniency. For example, I find that because of the 1948 crop failure a great many wives, whose husbands were also farming, became eligible for separate payment; and while circumstances in regard to a number of these cases have not in any way changed during the past year, I find that the regulations are being tightened, and that separate payments are pretty hard to get through the board of review.

In the last few weeks I have often wondered whether the department here was not pretty lenient just before the election with some of these applications, but after the election decided to tighten the regulations.

I regret that in his statement a week ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) so often made the suggestion that if certain things were done in regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act a great deal of objection might be raised to the act in other parts of Canada. I have heard very little objection to the act in this house, and so far as I can recollect no member of parliament, irrespective of what part of Canada he came from, has voted against any improvement that might be made in the act. It seems to me that the Minister of Agriculture was just building up a straw man and then proceeding to knock him over.

Mr. Gardiner: It might be a compliment to his good judgment.

Mr. Argue: It might be a compliment to the minister's good judgment. I will not quarrel with the judgment of the Minister of Agriculture on a lot of things, but my opinion is that a government that has such an overwhelming majority should not have one of its cabinet ministers trying to plant ideas in the minds of various members of parliament to object to a piece of legislation which, in my opinion, is absolutely essential to a large section of the people of Canada, and a piece of legislation which is amply justified on the basis of history.

Mr. Gardiner: And which he himself originated.

Mr. Argue: In looking at the amounts that are paid from time to time I find that they are large, and they have been large over the last few years because there has been widespread crop failure. But the payment to any individual farmer is a very small one.

The Minister of Agriculture himself has said many times in the past that it is so small as to pay only the grocery and the clothing bills. The point is that thousands of farmers in western Canada, when they have a series of crop failures over a few successive years, must get assistance somewhere, and I think it is much better that they get assistance in the form of a cheque that they can use as they themselves see fit, than forcing them back on the relief rolls, as was our experience in the 1930's. The point is that if this act were withdrawn there would be no saving in money when we consider the amount that the various provincial governments and the federal government would have to pay in assisting people who have successive crop failures.

I do not want to leave the impression that all of this bill is not of value. Certainly the second clause is a good one. A week ago in respect to the second clause of the bill the Minister of Agriculture said that it was something that most hon. members thought a year ago should have been done when the legislation was before the house. I want to point out to him that last year in the committee on agriculture I moved a motion which was almost identical with the second section of the bill. My motion read as follows:

> Where a section of land lies within an ineligible township and has a side that lies alongside an eligible township or is a section which lies alongside an eligible section or a corner of which touches the corner of an eligible township or an eligible section, such section of land shall be eligible for award as though it were a complete township.

The section in the bill reads as follows:

> Where a block of contiguous sections of land within an ineligible township having an area of not less than one-sixth of the township and a side that lies along the boundary of an eligible township is determined by the board to have an average yield of eight bushels of wheat or less per acre, such block of sections of land shall be eligible for award as though it were a complete township.

I say that my motion and this clause are identical. But when my motion was moved in the agriculture committee last fall I found that all of the Liberal members voted against it. Therefore when the Minister of Agriculture says that last year most of the members of parliament supported this new clause I think he should say more specifically that members of the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties, who voted for the motion, are the people who supported this particular clause.

Last Friday the Minister of Agriculture stated, as he did again this afternoon, what might be considered his interpretation of the first clause of the present bill. He said, as appears on page 2430 of Hansard:

> The people who have title to their land or have it under agreement of sale, though they may not have clear title—that is, the people who own their land in the sense that land is owned all across the country—are entitled to payment under the terms of this act. But if such a person or some other person goes on a piece of submarginal land and takes a cultivation lease, with the land still belonging to the government, whether it be this government, a provincial government or a municipal government, the amount is not payable on that land.

If that is the intention of the first section, then why does it not read that way? Why does the first section say that any new cultivation leases let by provincial governments on submarginal land will no longer be eligible for payment? Instead of that the section says that provincial lands, with the exception of lands held by veterans under the Veterans Land Act, and held as co-operative farms, as the minister said this afternoon, will not be eligible for payment.

I hope it is the intention of the minister through this section to try to get only submarginal lands removed from the provisions of the act, and that that is the extent of his intention. I am afraid however that by leaving the section as it now stands we are more apt to get a greater amount of submarginal lands under cultivation and eligible for payment under the act.

I say that for this reason, that under the present lease policy of the Saskatchewan and Alberta governments, those two governments can determine whether or not a farmer shall cultivate his lease, or use it for grazing. But if pressure results from this bill—if it passes in its present form—and is exerted on various provincial governments, to the point where they may abandon their present lease policy, and do what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has suggested, namely, sell their provincial lands, then of course there will be no control over the type of use to which the land is put. A farmer, if he can buy provincial land, after having purchased it can break it up, even if it is a very light soil; and he will be eligible for prairie farm assistance under the bill as it now stands.

In other words this bill has absolutely nothing to do with submarginal lands, and the taking of such lands out of wheat production. It is directed only at the land policy and the lease policy followed by the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Should those governments decide to sell that land, and if in the future, as has happened in the past when crown land has been sold, the farmers buying such land should undertake a huge obligation in the way of debt, then those farmers can no longer afford to carry on proper cultural practices.

If a farmer gets a cultivation lease over a thirty-three year period he will say, "Now I have some security. I am going to farm this land for the next thirty-three years in a way which will permit me to get the greatest possible return over that period." But if the same farmer has the same piece of land, but with a heavy debt on it, he will say, "I will farm this land in the next two or three years and, by the grace of God and some rain, I may get a couple of bumper crops and pay off my mortgage." The chances are that he will put a great deal more into wheat production, and continuous wheat production, with the end result after a few years that he has a greater number of crop failures, and consequently would be eligible for the bonus.

From the information I have been able to obtain, the Saskatchewan government is most careful in its leasing policy not to allow a cultivation lease on a piece of submarginal land in grass. A provincial government has just as great a stake in proper methods of agricultural practice as has the Minister of Agriculture or the federal government. If a provincial government follows a policy which results in the misuse of land, then of course they are going to be called upon from time to time to advance seed and to advance relief to the people within that province.

I have figures here from the department of agriculture in Saskatchewan which show that in that province there is just a little more than 5,000,000 acres under grazing lease. The province has control of some 800,000 odd acres in addition to that, which is not under cultivation, making a total amount of provincial land not under cultivation of 5,800,000 acres.

Then, the provincial crown lands leased on the basis of cultivation lease amount to a little more than 640,000 acres. In other words, just 10 per cent of all the crown lands in Saskatchewan are under cultivation lease. Ninety per cent cannot be brought into wheat production. Of the 10 per cent that is under cultivation lease, 472,000 acres have been let for veteran settlement, with the approval of the Department of Veterans Affairs in Ottawa, and that 472,000 acres will be eligible for prairie farm assistance. So that this leaves a net of 169,000 acres in Saskatchewan under cultivation by civilian lease which will be denied payment of the bonus under this legislation.

In other words the lease policy of the Saskatchewan government has been so good that only two and one-half per cent of all crown lands can be affected by this amendment. The government of that province has been most careful to see that no cultivation lease is let on submarginal land, so that the amount of submarginal land in wheat production will be increased.

If the Minister of Agriculture wants the type of bill he has said on two or three occasions he would like to have, then he should say that in the future if any provincial government lets a new cultivation lease on submarginal land, then on such submarginal land prairie farm assistance payments will not be made.

Mr. Gardiner: That is already in the bill.

Mr. Argue: Oh yes; of course that is in the bill. And there are a lot of other things in the bill. But the point is that it is taking all crown lands, with certain exceptions, from under the act—and naturally this will take the poor land along with the good.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend does not understand what I am saying. The provision that submarginal land cannot recover is in the original act, and the only people who can declare land submarginal are the provincial governments. That is a matter of civil right. They can declare it submarginal, but we are not able to do so.

Mr. Argue: Then if that is so, I would like to know what the minister was doing when he was talking all last Friday afternoon. He kept on telling us that there were new leases on a lot of submarginal land and that the purpose of the amendment was to stop that being done.

Mr. Gardiner: They do not call it that in the act, though.

Mr. Argue: This is what the minister said, as reported at page 2434 of Hansard:

> But we do want to put this legislation in shape whereby no one can come into this House of Commons and say, "You are paying money out on submarginal lands which are owned by a government and should be under pasture"; this government is prepared to put it under pasture for the common good and someone deliberately goes on it and gets a lease, and makes it impossible to do that. I do not think the House of Commons wants us to pay to continue that.

The minister there said they are going on pasture land and putting it under cultivation, and then they are getting P.F.A.A. payments, and that is what he wants to stop. Yet if the government is going to treat, as I believe it is not justified in treating, all provincial lease land on this basis, why does not the government include mortgage company land? Why does not the government include Canadian Pacific land and Hudson's Bay Company land that is under lease? Instead this legislation is directed at the provincial governments. There is no incentive, and no public responsibility imposed on companies like the Canadian Pacific or the Hudson's Bay Company with regard to a proper land utilization program. They lease their lands in such a way as to get the greatest possible amount of revenue and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is doing nothing about their leases. But in Saskatchewan, where in my opinion the government has a sound agricultural policy and has not allowed submarginal land to go into wheat production, the minister is removing all crown land from the provisions of the act while at the same time forcing farmers on that land to continue to pay one per cent into the fund year in and year out.

If the Minister of Agriculture is anxious to take submarginal land out of cultivation, I should like to show him a map I have here put out by his own department showing where submarginal land is to be found. The Department of Agriculture has paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to find where the submarginal land is and all the minister needs to do in this part of Saskatchewan is to take this map and declare that the yellow areas will not be subject to prairie farm assistance. If he does that he will be taking submarginal land out of the provisions of this act and perhaps out of wheat production altogether.

We need a proper land utilization policy which can be brought about only by co-operation between the federal, provincial and municipal governments as well as the people in the local communities. That land utilization policy would have to include increased areas under irrigation as well as increased acreages under grass. If a policy like that were followed the submarginal land could be taken out of production. Under such a policy farmers who are now on submarginal land could be given an economic unit either in the area in which they now live or in some other part of the province.

I submit that by the present bill the Minister of Agriculture is making a political football out of the P.F.A.A. when he tries to force Alberta or Saskatchewan to abandon its land policy. I am glad that the bill is to be referred to the agriculture committee and I hope that that committee will call the minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan or the deputy minister. We can then find out whether the Saskatchewan government has been allowing cultivation leases on submarginal land.

I think it is time the federal government and the provincial government got together to work out a policy which would be in the interests of the people in that part of Canada, which would include a proper land utilization program as well as a proper soil conservation program. Even while that is being done we would have to continue the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. In my opinion it is a national disaster when large areas in western Canada have successive crop failures, just as the present disaster in Winnipeg and along the Red river is a national disaster.

I am happy that the federal government has seen fit to give assistance to those people in Manitoba who are facing such devastating loss. I believe that that is a national disaster and it calls for a national contribution. However, I believe that when a corp failure is experienced in large areas in Canada it should also be considered a national disaster. Because of that, not only should the Prairie Farm Assistance Act be continued; it should be expanded and improved.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this bill is to be referred to the agriculture committee and in view of the statements made this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that it is the intention of the government to amend the act to exclude the lands in certain special areas of Alberta from the operations of section 1, I shall be brief in my remarks. The bill deals with three different matters which I should like to refer to briefly in the reverse order.

Section 3 exempts feed mills from the necessity of collecting the one per cent levy. We believe that that will be a good thing. Section 2 removes the rectangular block limitations from paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 7 and replaces it with a provision for contiguous blocks. We believe that that will be a very definite improvement in the act as we have been advocating it for a number of years. I never could understand why in the past the minister seemed so taken with the idea of rectangular blocks because crop failures in the west never were in the form of rectangles; they have always come in irregular shapes. I am sure that that amendment will receive the hearty approval of the farmers in western Canada.

Section 1 of the bill is the contentious section and the Minister of Agriculture referred to it as containing bad news when he spoke a week ago. At that time he promised to make certain adjustments in order to remove the injustices that might occur as a result of the operation of that section. I was glad to hear him state today that amendments to remove certain lands from the operation of that section will be presented.

I agree that submarginal land should be taken out of cultivation, but I do not agree that the declaring of lands leased from governments as being ineligible for payments will accomplish that result. If leased land is sold to an individual there may well be a natural expansion in the cultivated acreage, and that would certainly have been the situation in the special areas of Alberta. Therefore I was glad to hear the minister state that it was the intention to exclude lands in those areas from the operation of this section.

I am wondering what will be done with regard to local improvement districts. There is none of those districts in Acadia so I am not familiar with the set-up, but I believe in some respects they are similar to the special areas. As I am not familiar with them I do not intend to discuss them. No doubt they will be discussed when the bill is before the agriculture committee.

As I said, in view of the fact that the bill is being referred to the committee, and as I am a member of that committee and shall have plenty of opportunity to put forward my views, I will say no more at this time.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this bill. It must be admitted that so far this session I have not said very much. I feel that our main problem in the drought areas is irrigation, and it was my intention to speak on the first item of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Since this bill has been brought in, however, I feel it necessary to say a few words, particularly in view of the statement by the minister this afternoon and in view of section 1 of the bill.

In his statement this afternoon the minister referred to the special areas. In the south-eastern part of my province, particularly in my constituency, only a very small portion of the land is in these special areas. No doubt the minister knows that district quite well; that is the area north of the British block and from Empress along to Iddesleigh and Buffalo. That is in the special area, but the larger part of my constituency is in local improvement districts. This afternoon the minister referred particularly to the special areas. If this bill goes through in its present form many farmers in local improvement districts are going to be disqualified from the bonus. It must be realized that in the local improvement districts many farmers are leasing land from the department of municipal affairs or the department of lands and mines.

I have had some experience along this line. The last municipality near Medicine Hat to go broke was M. D. 92, which was called Excelsior. It was turned over to the department of municipal affairs, and as an inspector of that department I held that area. So I feel I know a little about local improvement districts in my province. In that municipality, as in many other local improvement districts that I held, land went through tax sales. That land might have been homesteaded thirty or forty years ago, but through no fault of their own the farmers were forced into arrears of taxes, particularly in the thirties. Of course if a farmer was residing on land that went through tax sale he was protected to the extent that he could lease that land from the government. If crop conditions changed, or if his financial circumstances improved, he had the opportunity of consolidating the arrears of taxes that had accumulated on his land. He received the usual discount of up to 25 per cent, and paid the current taxes and arrears over a period of five years, after which that land was redeemed in his name. If he was not able to do that the department of municipal affairs leased that land to him on a crop share basis.

In those years the arrangement was that one-fourth of the crop went to the department, and that share was applied against the arrears of taxes on the land. If at the end of five years he was able to pay off all his arrears he got title to the land. If on the other hand crop conditions did not improve and he was not able to pay his consolidated taxes, he could lease that land. Title was taken by the government, and eventually the land was turned over to the department of lands and mines. When that happened the land was leased back to the farmer; and many of those leases are still in effect today. That is the position of a number of farmers east of the city of Medicine Hat. I know of one farmer in particular who homesteaded his land forty years ago. It is quite true that he does not have title to that land today, that he is still leasing it from the department of lands and mines; but many people who have been in this country for sixty and seventy years have no title to any property, whether urban or rural.

Under this act that man who is living on his homestead will be disqualified in respect to this assistance. There is to be an amendment to deal with these special areas, but what is to happen to the farmers residing in the local improvement districts? If the minister had mentioned particularly the special areas in Alberta it might have been entirely different, but he referred to the special areas in general.

Mr. Gardiner: If I may be permitted, in spite of what I did say, what I meant to say was that we were going to send the bill to a committee, before which the Alberta minister could appear. He is coming to see me on Monday anyway, and he can appear before the committee and give us the information about all these matters.

Mr. Wylie: I appreciate that the minister said this bill would be sent to committee. Last Friday the minister made a speech in the house. I read that statement very carefully, but I must admit that after reading his speech I was no better informed than when I started, so I felt it my duty to say a few words on behalf of the local improvement districts which I represent. I would certainly object if they were to be treated in any different manner than the special areas, because we have many districts in southeastern Alberta that are in exactly the same situation as the special areas. Parts of the local improvement districts were in the special areas. The minister knows that the area from the north side of township 12 up to Empress, on the east side of the Saskatchewan river, used to be in the Tilley east area. He also knows that the area north of the south Saskatchewan river up to the British block and west of Alderson was in a special area. Those are not special areas now; they are in local improvement districts. If what the minister said this afternoon is true, then those areas are not to be considered as the special areas; that is something we must keep in mind.

Mr. Gardiner: I hope I did not say that. I intended that the whole country be considered.

Mr. Wylie: I am glad to be corrected. I may have misunderstood what the minister said. After all, in Alberta we do have the special areas, and we have our local improvement districts, as the minister knows. There is no difference between those areas; he must agree to that. If an amendment is to be brought in to include those special areas, I believe it should include many local improvement districts as well, not only in Alberta but in Saskatchewan.

If the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are to be confined to lands that are owned, we are going to make a big mistake. As the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) mentioned, there are many quarter-sections, as well as sections, in that area that are owned by the Hudson's Bay Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Some of the lands are owned by speculators who have it rented. It seems to me that if the government intends to disqualify government owned lands, it would only be fair to disqualify anyone who owns land unless he lives on the land and farms it. It seems to me that is a fair proposition. I certainly agree with the statement made by the member for Assiniboia.

It must be realized also that the policy of the Alberta department of lands and mines is that no more land should be put under cultivation. After being an inspector and assessor with the department of municipal affairs for ten years, I feel that I know fairly well what is going on in the area. As I said, the department of lands and mines feels that no further land should be put under cultivation. Anyone leasing land from the department today, even under a grazing lease, can only get a permit to put small areas under cultivation for feed purposes. When I say "for feed purposes", I think the minister understands what I mean. In the drought area there may be what we call a slough, which may be flooded in the spring but perhaps dries up by the end of May. This enables the farmer to plant an area of ten or fifteen acres for feed purposes. The department of lands and mines will not allow a farmer to grow any wheat on that land for sale; it must be for feed for his stock.

We are discussing a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We in the southeastern corner of the province believe we have another solution for the problem. We believe that if we utilize the water in that area, we can certainly relieve the dominion government of many of the obligations about which they are complaining today. This afternoon the minister stated that there had been a big increase in the amount paid out under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act during the last few years. I am sure that no one knows better than the Minister of Agriculture why those moneys have to be paid out. I may say that none of the farmers enjoy receiving the prairie farm assistance payments; they do not like being what you might term relief recipients any more than any of us would like to be on relief. Many of the farmers in the area of which the minister spoke this afternoon believe that the solution lies in the utilization of the water running through that area. If that is done prairie farm assistance payments, so far as Alberta is concerned, will be eliminated.

The minister may not agree with that statement, but it has been proven in any area where you have irrigation, where you have trees or dams and you are distributing the water over the land, the atmosphere in that area is entirely different. All one has to do is to leave Medicine Hat on a day when it is about 110 in the shade and drive to Taber to notice the difference in the atmosphere. I am sure the minister has gone through that experience during the trips he has made through that country, unless he was too busily engaged to notice it at the time. It may be argued that it is not possible to bring water down to Medicine Hat or to the Saskatchewan boundary. To answer that question one only has to refer to the Meek report. If we consider that report of any value, we must agree that water can be brought to Medicine Hat.

I should like to tell the minister that I appreciate what the dominion government is doing in building the St. Mary's dam. A lot of good work is being carried on there, and it is work which I am sure will benefit a large area of southern Alberta. As I have said, after studying the Meek report one must agree that water can be brought to Medicine Hat. If we have that water I am sure the farmers in that area will know how to distribute it. Some officials may claim it is not possible to carry water from 150 to 175 miles without a great deal of evaporation; that it would not be economical to do so. According to the report I have just mentioned, if dams are constructed in that area, it is quite feasible. If it is not, I am sure that water can be pumped out of the south Saskatchewan river and that area can be made into a productive one. We realize, of course, that to pump water out of any river is perhaps more expensive than the canal system. But I would also remind the house that we have natural gas in the Bow island area, and natural gas could be used to work those engines required to pump water. We have heard a great deal about natural gas during the last two years; and natural gas can be used profitably in our irrigation systems. If it was not for natural gas in the vicinity of Medicine Hat we would not have many of the market gardens we have today. All along that river every market gardener has his own gas well.

Many hon. members in this house do not realize today that power is supplied by natural gas for the engines that are used for pumping water out of the south Saskatchewan river to irrigate these lands. That is why Medicine Hat is considered to be one of the best corn-growing areas in western Canada. I may have a few laughs from across the floor, but we do not mind that. I should like hon. members to come up and see what we have and what we have done with natural gas and irrigation. That is why I say that if the dominion government believes that we are unable to bring water down from the St. Mary river dam to Medicine Hat, we can certainly pump it from the south Saskatchewan river and irrigate thousands of acres.

There are many projects in the same position in western Canada. We all realize that. We have the St. Mary-Milk river project, the Bow river development project and the Red Deer diversion project. In Saskatchewan, you have the south Saskatchewan project. That of course may cost considerably more money than will our projects in Alberta. But when that is feasible, why should not every one of those projects be made financially possible? There is no excuse whatever, except for one thing; and that is what it is going to cost the government to put it in. We realize that we must have a larger population in our western provinces, particularly Saskatchewan and Alberta. That is one of our solutions. If we develop these irrigation projects, we are doing a great deal not only for Canada but for many other countries from which we can get immigrants.

I believe that the time has arrived when these irrigation projects must be given consideration. We should not only consider the bill before us but we should consider what can be done to eliminate the bill; I think that is more important than the bill itself. If we are going to develop our natural resources as we should, why should not the government of Canada and the provincial governments put in our irrigation systems?

I have refrained from saying anything about irrigation this session, as the minister knows. I have been waiting for him to make a statement in connection with two projects which affect my constituency particularly.

Mr. Gardiner: I would be out of order if I did so, just the same as you are.

Mr. Wylie: I am not out of order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh yes, you are.

Mr. Wylie: I am not out of order. I am showing how we can do away with this bill if we develop our natural resources in this country. I think that by doing so I am quite in order. I have been waiting for the Minister of Agriculture to make a statement as to the future development of our irrigation projects in southern Alberta. If the minister would prefer that I wait until his estimates are called, I shall be glad to do so. I will just do that. We have the solution or part of the solution, I perhaps should say, to this bill: the utilization of our natural resources to the greatest possible extent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon member is out of order. He should confine himself to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Wylie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will save any remarks I have to make on irrigation until the minister's estimates are before us. However, getting back to Bill No. 209, I feel that the Minister of Agriculture should give the house some information as to what he considers are the special areas in the province of Alberta. I do not live in special areas, but we have lands in that area that are in local improvement districts that are affected just the same as the special areas. I believe that the minister should tell us just what is his idea of special areas. I am going to wait until the minister's estimates are before us to make any further remarks on irrigation; I will not say anything further about that matter at this time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $293,670.

Mr. Wylie: I may have been called to order, Mr. Chairman, on the bill that we were discussing, but I feel that I am quite in order now.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Wylie: You will hear me before I am through, so don't worry. I feel that on the first item of the Department of Agriculture we can give a general review of agricultural conditions in the country. I have discussed irrigation on other occasions in the house, and I want to say a few words about that subject before I resume my seat. I do not want to say anything in the house that would in any way embarrass either the dominion government or the provincial government before the international joint commission meets, but I do think I should say a few words on irrigation, and what it would mean not only to Alberta but to Canada as a whole.

Before dealing with irrigation I want to read an editorial regarding agriculture which appeared in the Medicine Hat News. I presume, Mr. Chairman, I shall be in order when I read it. The editorial is entitled: "Pie-in-the-Sky Aggie Economics" and reads as follows:

> Federal government representatives, ten of them, are tramping about the country on a mission to induce housewives to buy more dairy products, particularly milk and butter.

I want my hon. friends across the way to be sure to listen to this. I continue:

> Medicine Hatters were given the treatment this week. We could think of other ways in which such time and money could be more profitably expended, even in a public service endeavour.
> The urging of greater consumption of food staples, without the medium of greater purchasing power, is the nonsense of pie-in-the-sky economics.

I am sure all hon. members know that. The editorial continues:

> No mother would have to be told to buy more dairy products if she had the money in her budget to do so. The sensible alternative to such hocum is a free Canadian market in basic products. We have little sympathy with grumbling over $1 beefsteak and 60-cent butter, or any other exorbitant price demand, when it is realized that consumers have the solution within their own grasp—boycott buying.

I presume the Medicine Hat News supports the Minister of Agriculture. I continue:

> As long as shoppers are willing to pay the piper, then the tune will be called by the producers.

As I said, this editorial appeared in our local paper. Apparently today the Department of Agriculture have men going around the country, and ten of them were in Medicine Hat trying to convince the housewives that they should buy more dairy products. I am sure that today the housewives are buying all the dairy products that their incomes will permit them to. Whether that statement is true I do not know. The Minister of Agriculture knows and will tell us about it.

When I was home during the Easter recess I talked to many farmers in that area, and I must say that the wheat-growing farmers were rather discouraged about the new price they were to receive for their wheat. These farmers feel that during the war they contributed perhaps more to the economy of this country than anyone else by selling their wheat at a loss of perhaps $500 million or $600 million. That is the loss that was suffered by the farmers of western Canada. These farmers realize, and especially those in the southern part of the province where we have a drought area and have to depend a lot on prairie farm assistance, that their income is not very high.

Some hon. members may argue that there is one solution, namely, to leave wheat growing alone and grow coarse grains. Everyone in the house should know that in these drought areas wheat will withstand more drought than any other grain. That is a well known fact. The farmer who may harvest six to eight bushels of wheat to an acre and has a field of oats and barley alongside it will not harvest any coarse grains. That is certainly well known in the area from which I come, and that is one reason why the farmers of that area are perturbed over the price of wheat for the coming crop year.

It is also realized that we need irrigation in that country. I want to refer to one small project to show what can be done in some small areas with the assistance of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the provincial government. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act men have done wonderful work. All of us must agree with that. It is true that it has cost a considerable amount of money. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has done very well in areas in which they have gone to build dams for small irrigation projects and dugouts for stock watering purposes.

There is one project that I want to refer to particularly, namely, the Ross creek irrigation scheme. It is a scheme within twenty miles of Medicine Hat, in which the water is diverted from a creek and put into what might be called a natural reservoir. During the run-off this year the reservoir was filled to a depth of about fifteen feet in an area that covered about four hundred acres. Any time you have an area of four hundred acres in western Canada covered to a depth of fifteen feet of water you have something that is really worth while. I may say that perhaps the farmers who are going to utilize this water may not get so much benefit out of it this year. They are storing the water for benefits that they will receive next year. The land I refer to has been eligible for drought bonus for the last seven years, since 1942. We are going to have an irrigated area of perhaps 2,500 acres where the farmers can raise feed for their stock and grain of any kind, as well as all kinds of vegetables. Through the instigation of a man who was with P.F.R.A. at one time, and who is well known to the Minister of Agriculture—I am referring to Mr. Henry Cavan of Dunmore—much has been done to promote that project. He, along with Frank McCleay, worked on the project for several years. Now they have something to show for their efforts.

That is something that can be done in many areas of southeastern Alberta. So far as a general policy of irrigation is concerned, I should be very happy to have the minister tell the committee just what has occurred by way of irrigation in the past year. I have been watching the press for announcements stating that the government has reached an agreement with the Canada Land and Irrigation Company and the Alberta government with respect to the St. Mary-Milk river project. Thus far I have been disappointed.

It will be recalled that when in the last session I referred to various statements appearing in the press the minister replied that he did not publish either paper. With that I certainly agree. However, I feel that after discussing Bill No. 209, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, we should be given some information as to what is going to be done to preserve our natural resources through the means of irrigation.

As I have said on many occasions, we have in the area of Medicine Hat the best land in Alberta, when it receives sufficient rainfall. I do not think anyone would contradict that statement. We are living in an area where our annual precipitation averages 12·70 inches and in some years is as low as 10 inches. In an area of that kind we are particularly interested in the promotion and development of our irrigation schemes.

I could speak at some length on this subject, dealing with what we could produce on those lands, the number of settlers we could care for and what it would mean to the economy of Canada. However, I do not think I should do that at the present time. On the other hand I feel consideration should be given by the federal and provincial governments to extending the existing projects in that area.

I appreciate what the Minister of Agriculture has done, and realize that he is up against some difficulties in promoting irrigation in southern Alberta. I know there are certain interests in eastern Canada that are opposed to the dominion government's spending large amounts of money in the development of irrigation on our western plains. May I say to those who would oppose such projects that the farmers and all others in western Canada have done their part in assisting to keep some of those who now criticize western Canada.

I have here many editorials which have appeared in some of the eastern newspapers in which easterners are critical of the development of our irrigation projects. I do not think it is necessary to read these to hon. members, because every hon. member must realize that when one part of Canada is helped, all of Canada is helped. That has been brought to our attention with great force in the last month when two areas in Manitoba have been flooded. Those farmers will not have an opportunity to sow a crop this year; if they do, it will produce only feed. We also have in mind the disastrous fires at Rimouski and Cabano in Quebec, and extend to those people our sincere sympathy.

Those of us in the dried-out areas of western Canada believe that the people of Canada generally have the same sympathy for us when we have a crop failure. And so it is in this spirit that I say to the Minister of Agriculture and other members of the federal government that everything should be done to bring about increased production on our great western plains.

One of the greatest mistakes we make is in our reference to the Palliser triangle. The time has long since passed when we should refer to western Canada in that way. As John Fisher said in a most able broadcast last fall from Lethbridge, it is time the people of Canada forgot about the Palliser triangle and got together to develop our land as one country.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I made the suggestion only because of the example set by other hon. members who have done the same thing. In rising to speak in connection with the first item in the agricultural estimates I realize that some hon. members may wonder why a member from a province with such a reputation for its fisheries should speak on agriculture. The fact is that agriculture is of great importance to Newfoundland. I hold in my hand a copy of the "Industrial Survey of the Resources of the Province of Newfoundland", prepared by Donald, Ross and Company, Montreal, for the Newfoundland industrial development board, and it was a great pleasure to me to find that in this report agriculture is stressed as being of great importance in the economy of the island. Dealing with that subject the writer says:

> Farming, while on a comparatively small scale, occupies an important place in the economy of the island as the produce is largely grown for home consumption; whereas the other basic industries, fishing, pulp and paper and mining, produce almost exclusively for export.

During the past nine years Newfoundland has been riding the crest of a wave caused by the coming of Americans and Canadians who built large military and naval establishments in the country, and also because of the fact that high prices were received for the products of our fisheries, mines and forests which were exported. I felt somewhat doubtful of the position which I had always maintained when I saw these industries going ahead so fast and our people finding such easy money in working therein. I felt that in neglecting agriculture to work in those industries some of our people were really neglecting their own best interests. In the past few months we have noticed that the fishing industry is not as reliable for a country's economy as a well-balanced agriculture. Next week a conference will be held in Ottawa attended by representatives of the salt cod fishing interests to discuss what can be done to market the balance of the 1949 catch and what they are going to do about fishermen who have refused to fish during the coming season.

It has been my belief that agriculture occupies the same place in Newfoundland as it does in other parts of Canada. In my opinion it is the most important industry, and I believe the early settlers realized that. When John Guy came to Newfoundland in 1610 he made an attempt to sustain his small colony by the produce taken from the soil. Unfortunately the attitude of the British government was to discourage both agriculture and colonization so that it was not until 1813 that land was first granted for agriculture.

Within a few short years after that date all the available land around St. John's was taken up. It must be remembered that at that time there were no roads in the country; there was no means of communication except by water. In a comparatively short time many fine farms were built up around St. John's, one by Governor Cochrane, the first governor after we were granted representative government in 1832. Roads followed as the result of the farm development policy. One farm was established in a place called Mount Pearl, called after the gentleman who established it, Sir William Pearl, I believe. Within the past ten or twelve years an experimental farm was set up on that very place which has now been taken over by the federal government. We expect that many experiments will be carried on there which will be of great benefit to the country.

Unfortunately the story of agriculture in Newfoundland has been in a minor key. The economy of the country has been largely controlled by the strong mercantile and fishing interests. For hundreds of years the fish merchants made millions of pounds out of the fisheries and then often retired with their accumulated profits to England and spent nothing upon the development of the country. It was not until 1904 that the first paper mill was established. Prior to that time the interior of the country had hardly been touched.

In 1908 the first attempt was made to establish an experimental farm when the prime minister of that day, Sir Robert Bond, who himself operated a profitable farm at a place called Whitbourne, established the first experimental farm near St. John's. Unfortunately he was defeated in the election of 1909 and the government that followed placed a lawyer in charge of the department of agriculture with the result that within a year the place was sold and the experiments abandoned. I trust the Minister of Agriculture will sympathize with the misfortunes of the people of Newfoundland when a policy such as that was carried out.

I believe he and his advisers should know that Professor Zavitz, who had quite a reputation in this country, advised Sir Robert Bond on the setting up of that model farm; to have that work jettisoned proved a great handicap to the progress of agriculture in Newfoundland.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 211, for the relief of Reuben Robert Shapiro.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 212, for the relief of Mary White Sheppard.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 213, for the relief of Ulderic Cadieux.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 214, for the relief of Helen Irene Barney Hutchinson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 215, for the relief of Alice Jean Young Gulliver.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 216, for the relief of Joseph Lucien Alphonse Martel.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 217, for the relief of Georges Emile Bernier.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 218, for the relief of Margaret Veronica Quinn Davies.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 219, for the relief of Max Gurevitch.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 220, for the relief of Romuald Joseph Jean Lamoureux.—Mr. Winkler.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: These bills are referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE THE ELIGIBLE AGE OF VOTERS FROM 21 TO 18

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938 (age of voters).

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this bill I shall be brief. I do not want to contribute to talking out the bill, and it is my hope that it may be dealt with during the one-hour period. My amendment would reduce the eligible voting age from 21 to 18 years. From time to time over the years various amendments to the Dominion Elections Act have been brought down. On various occasions parliament has decided that amendments were necessary in order to broaden the basis of the franchise and make each election as far as possible reflect the will of the people. Some provinces, notably Alberta and Saskatchewan, have already placed in their statutes a voting age lower than 21 years. In March, 1944, Alberta reduced the voting age from 21 to 19 years. In March of 1948 Saskatchewan reduced the eligible voting age for provincial elections from 21 to 18 years.

One of the main reasons that I feel parliament might well adopt this amendment is the fact that the standard of education is steadily improving. The present generation of young Canadians is better trained and better educated than any preceding generation. The 1941 census showed that the average education of Canadians 18 years of age was just over grade 10. In 1911 the census showed that the average education was just a little above grade 7. I believe the 1951 census will show a further improvement in educational standards and accomplishments.

It seems to me that with the present voting age of 21 years there is too great a gap between the time a student leaves high school and the time that student is likely to vote in an election. I think all political parties agree that for the proper functioning of a democratic system it is necessary and desirable that the youth of the country be interested in public affairs. So each political party represented in this house has its own youth organization. I am sure members of all parties will agree that it is most difficult now to get young people interested in Canadian affairs, and I think one of the reasons it is difficult is the fact that quite a number of years must elapse between the time a youth leaves high school and the time he is eligible to vote.

While anyone in Canada of the full age of 21 is eligible to vote in a federal election, that does not mean each person on reaching the age of 21 can vote at that time, because federal elections usually come only once every four or five years. This means that most young Canadians must wait until they are 23 or 24 years of age before getting an opportunity to vote. Speaking for myself—and in this perhaps I am different from other hon. members—I did not have the opportunity to vote until I was 24. In that election I probably used bad judgment, along with many other people, in that I voted for myself. If I had been given the opportunity to vote in the 1940 election, when I was 19 years of age, I no doubt would have voted for someone else. In any case, if this house should decide to reduce the voting age to 18 it would mean that the average age at which young Canadians would in fact have the opportunity to exercise their franchise would be 20 or 21 years.

I believe that if the voting age were reduced all political parties and associations across the country interested in public affairs would have much greater success in getting young people into their organizations and in having them take an active interest in the civic, provincial, national and international affairs of the day. I am sure most youths leaving high school ask themselves what is the advantage in being associated with a political party or of interesting themselves in public affairs if they must wait five, six or seven years before getting an opportunity to vote. I believe that Canadian youth in our high schools today are getting a valuable training in democratic processes, and I think they would be more likely to maintain a continuing interest if they knew that at an early date they would have the opportunity to vote.

Along with that reason, as I mentioned previously, there is the fact that our young people today are the best educated perhaps of the young people in any country in the world. The fact that they have great ability and great intelligence is proven by the magnificent and heroic part played in the war by Canadian youths eighteen, nineteen and twenty years of age. They showed during that time that they were capable of taking the most advanced and intricate training in the armed forces; that they were able to operate skilfully the modern and complicated instruments of war. Our nation felt, and rightly so, that it was wise to spend $25,000 in the education of a navigator or a pilot. Our enemy learned that the teen-aged Canadian youth was a formidable opponent on the field of battle.

I believe that since it was the right thing at that time to give all members of the armed forces a vote in the election, even though they were in their teens, it is certainly right and proper for the parliament of Canada to give youth who may be called to the colours a chance to exercise the vote in an election before that call might take place. While the effort achieved by young Canadians in the recent war left nothing to be desired, yet I believe young Canada has the right to a voice in public affairs when, at any time, it may be called upon to join the armed forces and be asked, in many cases, to make the supreme sacrifice in the defence of our democratic institutions. If our democratic institutions are worth the lives of young Canadians and I believe they are, then in peacetime those same young Canadians should have a voice in the affairs of our nation.

Because, Mr. Speaker, I believe Canadian youth is intelligent enough to cast a responsible ballot in an election, because Canadian youth has shown such great accomplishments in the armed forces during wartime, I would ask the house to support this bill.

Mr. Goode: Would the hon. member permit a question? How many young people in the dominion would this affect? Have you any idea?

Mr. Argue: I am sorry I cannot give my friend the exact figure but I would estimate between 600,000 and 700,000.

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested indeed in the presentation of the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). At the same time, I was rather disappointed that he did not go a little more fully into the argument as to why he thinks we should reduce the voting age from twenty-one to eighteen. I did appreciate his naïveté in suggesting that, had he been somewhat older the first time he voted, he would not have voted for himself. I wonder if he might carry that a little further and suggest, if he is not to be under a misapprehension as to what he should have done, that it may have been due, not to the fact that he voted for himself but to the platform for which he voted. Had he been more mature, he would have weighed the various platforms more carefully.

Before making any decision on a problem such as this a person must give it serious consideration, and look at the pros and cons of the argument. The bill is quite brief, but put in simple, non-legal language, it amounts to lowering the voting age from twenty-one to eighteen, or in other words permitting all those eighteen years of age or over to cast their ballot. It appears to me that, in approaching a question of this magnitude, we should consider its relative importance along with the other problems which come to mind when one is thinking of the franchise as we have it here in Canada.

Today I think of such tests as the test for literacy; I think of the problem of compulsory voting; I think of our present residence requirements; of the advance poll requirements, and those who lose the opportunity of casting their ballot on election day because they are thirty miles at sea, or not living in a certain urban area, or are living in some area that should be annexed to an urban area for voting purposes. I think of the problem and the discussions that have gone on throughout this country with reference to the single transferable vote. In addition to those questions, there are others that come to mind. One of the first things that come to my mind is this. Is there any great demand across this dominion for such a change in the voting age?

Another question that comes to my mind is, how many between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one are at all interested in government at any level? How many countries, how many states, or how many provinces permit those under twenty-one years to vote? I should like very briefly, Mr. Speaker, to mention a few of the countries which have different minimum voting ages. I have no intention of reading any table or asking that anything be put on Hansard, but I should like to call the attention of the house to the fact that in the United States there is one state, the state of Georgia, which permits voting at eighteen years of age. Then, as the member for Assiniboia mentioned, the province of Saskatchewan reduced the voting age to eighteen some four or five years ago. I believe the only province that permits voting at nineteen years of age is the province of Alberta. The other provinces have a minimum voting age of twenty-one, and of course, the same minimum voting age is required under our own Dominion Elections Act. The same is true of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and I should like to mention four or five other countries: Ireland, Australia, for both commonwealth and state elections; New Zealand; South Africa; Egypt, and so on. Then, of course, there is the United States. I am giving it the positive approach now, because I gave it the negative approach in referring to the state of Georgia in which voting was permitted at eighteen years of age. In all the other states a voter must be twenty-one years of age, and that is true of the federal elections.

There are certain countries that permit voting at eighteen years of age outside the North American continent, such as the Argentine, Brazil and Uruguay. I believe France has twenty years of age. Such countries as Belgium and Portugal have twenty-one years of age. It is twenty-three years of age in Norway and Sweden; twenty-four years of age in Finland and twenty-five years of age in Denmark and the Netherlands. In looking at that list of countries we should seriously consider the types of government that we find, and the stability of those governments. I believe that if you analyse them carefully you will find there is a direct relationship between a high minimum voting age and stability of government.

I have worked in the field of education for practically all of my adult life—as a teacher in rural and village schools, as a high school teacher in urban schools; as an inspector of rural, village and urban schools; and latterly in vocational education in my native province of Nova Scotia where we find those from the ages of sixteen to sixty-five or seventy attending night classes in the various vocational fields.

I look back over my years of experience, and I believe that I can look fairly honestly and objectively at those in that group of eighteen to twenty-one years of age. I look at that group and what do I find? I find that a large number are not self-supporting. I find that large numbers are still in high school, and that many of them are still in the universities. Of those three groups that I have mentioned, of course practically all of them are being looked after financially and are being given a home by their parents. Few of them have any home responsibilities. I am quite willing to admit, and I am proud to do so as a Canadian, that many of them are well developed—perhaps I should say mentally—and responsible. Few of them show much, if any, interest in government at any level.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), in introducing the bill, felt that because the average age of the pupils had increased greatly during the last few years, that was all the more reason why we should give them the vote at an earlier age. I feel that there may be a certain danger that those who have spent all of their life, prior to reaching voting age, in attendance at school may have been unduly influenced by various teachers. At that particular time of life, according to my experience as I look back on my own boyhood days, I think the teacher had a great deal more influence on my thinking than the home. I can say frankly that in my home many discussions were held with regard to the political situation not only in our own province, and in our own country, but also throughout the world. But still and all, as a schoolboy, I think that you are more apt to give weight to the opinions of your schoolteacher than to those of your parents. If that is valid—and I believe it is, basing it upon my experience in the field of education —it appears to me that is all the more reason why a person should be out of school for a few years, should have a chance to mix with those who hold different opinions, and a chance to study the platforms and proposals of the various political parties as given over the air, in the magazines and newspapers.

The hon. member for Assiniboia mentioned the number of people who would gain the vote if the age were to be reduced to eighteen. I am not going to attempt tonight to estimate this statistically, but I think it is a fair statement to make that a small percentage lose an opportunity to vote in more than one federal election. Probably, Mr. Speaker, I had better play safe and not make any estimate, because some of my friends may be mathematicians; I would say, however, that the percentage of those who lose a vote would be small.

I am not a lawyer, but I understand that persons attain their majority at the age of twenty-one, that they then have the full capacity to enter into a contract, and that they may sue or may take action in the courts under their own name. I believe that it is possible for a minor to transfer property but that when he becomes of age he may, if he wishes, repudiate the transaction. There are many limits to his responsibilities as a minor. Bearing in mind those limitations, it would appear to me that all of the various acts would have to be amended so that the age of majority became eighteen rather than twenty-one.

It appears to me that this proposal requires serious thought, deep study and a great deal of discussion. Not being a member of the special committee set up to study the elections act, I do not know whether this proposal will come before the committee or not. But I should think that in a committee studying various proposals with respect to the elections act, there would be a much better opportunity to study this problem and to bring before the house the considered opinion of a small group who had spent many hours in study and discussion than would be the case in trying to decide the matter in the hour or less which is available this evening.

Believing sincerely, as I do, that it is an important problem, and that it should be considered most seriously, I believe that it is not fair to try to arrive at a decision without thorough discussion. With that in mind, I should hate to see any decision arrived at on a problem of this momentous importance without a great deal of further discussion.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support this bill. I am rather disappointed to find a comparatively young and intelligent member of the Liberal party, and also a former schoolteacher, opposed to this bill. I would not be at all surprised to find some of the older members in the house opposed to it, but I had hoped that schoolteachers as a class were just a little bit more progressive in their thinking than ordinary citizens.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Perhaps some of them are.

An hon. Member: Not where I come from.

Mr. Noseworthy: The previous speaker advanced a few arguments which, in my opinion, have little bearing on the question. For instance, he pointed out that other countries, countries much older than Canada, have not yet granted their eighteen-year-olds the right to vote. To me that is no reason whatever why this vigorous young country should not give some leadership to the rest of the world and show the rest of the world that we are not afraid to trust with the ballot at election time that age group that we called into the armed forces. The hon. gentleman pointed out that there was no great public demand. Naturally, there is no great public demand apart from the eighteen to twenty-one-year-olds. It may be that those who make up the large body of party organization membership are just a little bit afraid of giving the eighteen to twenty-one-year-olds too much voice in the affairs of the country. The question was raised that there is a lack of stability in the eighteen to twenty-one-year-olds. I think you will find it difficult, Mr. Speaker, to defend that position which refuses to give that age group the right to vote, when we considered them to have sufficient stability to take their place in all branches of the armed forces and to be trusted with great responsibility. During the late war, we all saw boys and girls of the age of eighteen taken out of the classrooms of our schools across the country. We are all familiar with the sense of responsibility with which that particular age group carried on their work. As the hon. member who introduced this bill pointed out, so long as we insist on eighteen-year-olds wearing the king's uniform and playing their part in war we have very little argument for not giving them the right to vote at elections.

I have some knowledge of young people. Like the former speaker, I worked among young people for a great many years, and among the age group with which we are concerned in this bill. I would say that judged by any other standard except that of age they are as well qualified to vote as any other age group of citizens in this country. Judged on any other basis except that of age—you can judge them by their educational attainment —I think you will admit that the eighteen to twenty-one year olds today as a group are better educated than any other four year group of citizens.

In my opinion the eighteen year old today is much better qualified to vote than was the twenty-one year old ten years ago, by reason of the advance which education has had in this country. Judging by their interest in public affairs, you may go into any high school or collegiate across this country where you have a group of eighteen to twenty-one year olds, and you will find they are as keen and as interested in public affairs as any other group of citizens. It is only when they get out of school, when they come up against the hard facts of life, when they become disillusioned with the realities of life, that they begin to lose that keen interest in public affairs which they attained while at school.

Judged on the basis of ability to accept responsibility I think those who have had experience with placing responsibility into the hands of our young people of that age group will agree that they can measure up to the opportunities that are before them. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I support this bill most wholeheartedly. I am sure the mover of it did not expect the Liberal government to pass it tonight. I am quite sure he knew, as I know, that there are enough members sitting on the Liberal benches to talk it out to the end of the hour without bringing it to a vote.

Some hon. Members: What are you doing? You are doing it yourself.

Mr. Noseworthy: I doubt very much whether the mover of this bill did not introduce it for the very purpose about which the last speaker spoke, namely, that this question might be brought before the country, that it might receive consideration, and that in time it might get the consideration that it merits. I am quite sure that some of us will keep bringing this bill back to parliament until we have educated those who are opposed to it.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): As one of the older members in age and as one of the older members in experience in the house, I am not sure whether I am doing a very wise thing in standing up after the two schoolteachers have spoken. If we are to judge the teachings given to the students by some of the recommendations made in some of the speeches that are given in the house then I think we should give the students a chance to get out and come up against the realities of life before asking them to vote.

I know I am treading on dangerous ground because everywhere I look around me I find teachers. But regardless of that fact I am taking a chance, and I think a very sound chance, in opposing this legislation.

We have been told that eighteen year olds should be given the right to vote. In our experience I think we find that most of the eighteen year olds are still in school; and in school they are given many ideas that are not for their benefit or for the benefit of Canada. I am not saying that that is true in all cases; but when it comes to political and economic thinking, in some cases they are given many false ideas in our schools today. I do not say in all the schools, but at least in some of them.

Mr. Noseworthy: We need more Social Credit teachers.

Mr. Fair: I repeat, it is necessary to give them a little time to come up against the realities of life before charging them with the responsibility of voting.

We are told that the eighteen year olds were enlisted in the services. While the legislation was to that effect, the eighteen year olds were not called upon until they reached the age of eighteen and a half. And there are some arguments that have not been brought out so far. The eighteen year olds were not placed on their responsibility after they enlisted. They were given their uniforms, their food, their beds and they were told what to do from the time they got up in the morning until they finished their day's training.

Mr. Noseworthy: And so were the thirty year olds.

Mr. Fair: I feel that they were not given much chance to stand on their own feet. During all their training, and throughout their service they did what their officers told them to do. Therefore the argument that they were enlisted in the army is not sufficient ground to give the eighteen year olds the right to vote. As soon as they are of sufficient age and experience to get the vote, I would be one of the last to deny them that right; but I believe we should give them an opportunity to get experience and sufficient education to be able to discharge their obligations properly when it comes to voting. In addition, wartime is different from peacetime. We do many things in wartime that many of us would not wish to see done in peacetime.

Since I rose to speak I have been reminded of the nineteen year olds and have been asked, what about them? In my home province of Alberta the nineteen year olds have the right to vote, but in that case it must be remembered that they are dealing mainly with provincial matters. In the case of federal elections we are dealing with federal and international matters as well. I am very sorry that many of the older people do not take a much greater interest in the use of their ballots and the responsibility of their ballots than they are doing at the present time.

Many people are glad to enjoy the freedoms of our country and the privileges that have been granted to them, but many, many people refuse to accept and discharge the responsibilities that go with that freedom and that opportunity. I think something that is much more important than granting the vote to the eighteen year olds is giving the older people the proper enlightenment. As soon as an election rolls around it seems that many people, far too many, go out and tell stories of many kinds—false stories—for the purpose of getting votes. That is a wrong thing to do; people should be given the facts. Let them use their best judgment in casting their ballots.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, as the father of three children, two of whom have reached voting age, I take this opportunity of speaking in this debate. Incidentally, one of these children reached voting age just a few days after the election in June, and as a result could not vote for her father.

An hon. Member: Too bad.

Mr. Fulford: I do not know how she would have voted, either. My older boy, by the way, just received word this evening from McGill university that he has succeeded in obtaining his B.A. degree.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulford: He is now twenty-two years of age, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the attitude of that boy today is quite different from what it was when he was eighteen. Young men and young women of eighteen years are still at an impressionable age. Either they have just left school or have just begun work or entered college. As the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth (Mr. Kirk) has pointed out, they have been influenced by their teachers. They have also been influenced by their parents. All hon. members will agree that parental influence is one of the great virtues in this world; but on the other hand how many parents drill into the minds of their children the thought that they should vote just as their parents have always voted? That line of direction is not going to improve a country's voting.

Then, in the matter of influence exerted by schoolteachers, let me say at once that I have nothing but the highest regard and respect for the teaching profession. In fact, to my mind it is probably the most necessary profession to be found in any modern civilized country. The fact remains however that among teachers, as among other groups in society, there are a few radicals who compose a very noisy minority. As in other phases of life, this noisy minority makes itself loudly heard, and its influence is out of all proportion to what it should be.

Radical ideas can be taught more readily in schools than at any other time of life, simply because the boy or girl at the school is at the most impressionable age. I cannot help feeling that it takes at least three years after the young man or woman has left school to get, by means of the hard knocks in life, an appreciation of the realities of life.

I do not wish to repeat anything that has been said with respect to young men and young women. But as to young men and young women who have been enlisted or drafted into the armed services of Canada, we know that they are given the vote. As has been pointed out already, these young men and women, as they would be in schools, are under rigid discipline. They are accountable to their superior officers and in some instances are influenced so that they will vote as they are told to vote. It is unfortunate that this should be so, but I do not believe there is a member in the House of Commons who would deny the fact that an officer in the armed forces wields a tremendous amount of influence in respect of how the men under his command will cast their ballots.

I would doubt that permitting young men and women of eighteen to twenty-one years the right to vote would in any way prevent this country from entering another war. I should not think it likely that the influence of young people would so affect the policy of the government of Canada in respect of its external affairs that war would be avoided, so that those young people would never again be forced to fight in the armed services. I am afraid the argument used in that respect, where it is pointed out that young people could avoid armed service were they allowed to vote, is a weak one.

It was my good fortune at this session and the last one to have as my guests the students of no less than four schools from the county of Leeds. These were the students of two high schools and two continuation schools. In two of those schools mock parliaments have been organized. They have their own elected prime ministers and their own elected cabinets, and to a certain extent they have accepted the responsibility of maintaining student discipline. These young people are very keen about their parliament. One of their chief reasons for wishing to come to Ottawa has been to see how this House of Commons compared with their parliamentary attempts. Those students have been most interested spectators in the gallery, and they have left greatly impressed with the dignity of the house. The actual working of a democratic assembly has been brought home to them, and they have all agreed that they have learned something from having been here.

But, Mr. Speaker, of those two hundred students who visited here, some of whom were eighteen years of age, I have not heard one ask that the voting age be reduced from twenty-one to eighteen. I have not such a closed mind that I would not agree this matter should be given further study; but I do not think the time is ripe for passing a bill of this kind. I heartily agree with the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth that this is a matter having a degree of importance sufficient to merit its being referred to a committee for further study, and for recommendation to the house.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was overseas at the age of eighteen. But it strikes me forcibly that if I had been permitted to vote, and had not been overseas, at that age I might have even voted C.C.F. If I had been permitted to vote at nineteen years I might have voted Liberal. Fortunately, I got a few bumps in the war and when I was permitted to vote at the age of twenty-one years I voted Conservative, after my eyes had been opened.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, some of the remarks that have been made are rather revealing. There seems to be a fear on the part of some of the older members that these young people may have ideas that are different from ours. They have been referred to as false, as radical, but it is the same old story of people thinking that because young people think differently they must be wrong. I am reminded of a statement I heard a few months ago and which I believe was attributed to Dr. Brock Chisholm. He said something like this: There is a very real danger that our children may grow up to be like us.

Mr. Mitchell: I hope they don't.

Mr. Knowles: That is just the difference between those of us who think that young people should be given responsibility and some of the older members of this house. We recognize that another generation might do a better job with our nation and our civilization than our generation has done. It is just plain blindness on the part of an older generation not to give more responsibility to those who are younger.

[Mr. Fulford.]

The hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth (Mr. Kirk) suggested that those between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one were not interested in public affairs. I suggest that one of the reasons they are not interested may be that we are not inviting them to be interested by calling upon them to exercise the responsibility of voting. The hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth suggested that the higher the minimum age for voters, the more stable your government. I do not see why he does not carry that to its logical conclusion and raise the minimum voting age to seventy years. Then if only the old age pensioners were able to vote we might get a different kind of government than we have today. The fact of the matter is that we are hearing the same old argument that because somehow or another young people are different, they are not as responsible as we are.

I will confess that I am getting old enough that at times I have thought that about the younger generation, but I want to repeat what I said a few days ago, that any opinion I might have had along that line was dispelled for all time when I was home in Winnipeg last week. I say categorically, fully recognizing all the work that older people by the thousands have done, that if it were not for the boys and girls of twenty-one years and younger who are at work on the dikes in the Winnipeg area, Winnipeg would be under a lot more water than it is. These boys and girls of twenty-one years and under have shown a sense of real responsibility and I think we older people should give them the further responsibility of the right to vote.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I perhaps am inspired or stimulated to speak this evening by what the last speaker has said. I cannot claim to be one of the younger members in this house, but I would like to think that I am not one of those who believe that young people should be dragooned by older people into what they should think. I believe that in our own party we should have more of them at work with us, and I am glad to think that we will be able to do it. I really rose to my feet because I think there is a danger of sentimentality taking charge here. We must remember that there is such a thing as common sense. I echo almost every word said by the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth (Mr. Kirk). I was glad it was said by a schoolmaster because after all he should know young people better than we do.

I admire the heart of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), but I do not admire so much his head. It seems to me it is one thing to get young people interested, but the hon. member for York South really got to the position where he was saying that there is nothing in experience. Those of us who are older do not think that there is too much in experience because we have made too many mistakes to flatter ourselves, but I do suggest that there is something in experience. When we go to the length of practically saying that there is not, I think we are becoming sentimental.

There is just one other thing I want to say. I think to use the army as an analogy is one of the most misleading things that could be done. I take second place to no one in my admiration of what many young boys of eighteen years or under did during the war. They did things that no one else in the world could have done. They were able to fly aeroplanes in a way that an older man could not; in fact they said that a man of twenty-five who was still in the air was practically in his grave.

But to say that because they make such splendid soldiers between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one years we should give them and all others of their age the vote seems to me to be just letting our feelings run away with us. I think the sober views expressed by the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth based on the wide experience of other countries should be considered. Why should we ignore the experience of other countries? Is it just an accident that those countries which have shown stability, which is so lacking in this world, have not acceded to the suggestion of an extreme minimum age for voting?

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, there are two arguments in favour of reducing the age for voting from twenty-one years to eighteen, and one cannot be disproved. When you conscript men to fight then it is not as important that they should cast a vote, even for myself, on election day as it is to have to go to fight for their country. The other argument advanced is that, when we allow people of eighteen years to get married they should be allowed to vote, and, if that is admitted, we are considering it is not as important to cast a vote as it is to get married.

That argument does not hold water because I find on our order paper many bills for the relief of John Robert from Mary Anne and so on. I do not think people should get married at eighteen years of age. I did not have enough sense then and perhaps I have not yet.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will continue the business under discussion at six o'clock.

Supply—Agriculture

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $293,670.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, at the six o'clock recess I was referring to the first experimental or model farm which had been established near St. John's in 1908 by Sir Robert Bond, who was prime minister at the time. It was his idea to establish farming as a vocation in Newfoundland and it was for that purpose that he set up this experimental farm. However, it was his successor's idea that fishermen-farmers should be encouraged, but I have always thought that there was room for both. I may say that the minister of agriculture in the government returned in 1909 was a lawyer. As everyone who has been in Newfoundland realizes, while there are certain areas suitable for large-scale farming, there are many other places where people are crowded together, where the men carry on fishing but there is still room for little gardens to supplement their earnings from the sea.

The government that came into power in 1909 favoured the establishment of agricultural societies, and gave them grants on a fifty-fifty basis. These probably did some good, because they enabled the farmers or the fishermen-farmers to purchase seeds and equipment for their farms; but I think it is true to say that during the following ten years, up to 1919, not only did agriculture not progress in Newfoundland, it actually declined.

In that year a new government came into power, one member of which was a distinguished gentleman from Prince Edward Island who had a traditional knowledge of farming which he proposed to put into operation in Newfoundland. He set up another model farm. I shall not go into the history of the department of agriculture during those sad four years for Newfoundland. Suffice it to say that the government resigned in 1923, after having been re-elected that very year, and the succeeding government disposed of the model farm by auction, lock, stock and barrel, so there was no act on the statute books of Newfoundland dealing with agriculture except a sheep preservation act, and that was not carried out. That sheep preservation act, I may say, set up a fund to compensate the owners of sheep that had been destroyed by dogs. It has always been a big question, especially in certain areas of Newfoundland, whether it is preferable to have sheep or dogs, and I think the dogs have won out.

In 1926 Sir Robert Bond died and in his will, like Julius Caesar, left his property to the province. He had a fine farm consisting of some ten square miles of cleared land and fine woodland right on the railway and at a central point in the peninsula of Avalon. This was bequeathed to the people of Newfoundland to be used as a model farm forever; but what did the government of the day do? It declined to accept the bequest. I take pride now in the fact that I was one of the very few, if there were any others, who stood up in the House of Assembly and advocated that the government should accept that bequest and operate the property as a model farm. The government was afraid to do that, however, because between 1919 and 1923 the model farm had been such a hopeless failure. The real reason the government did not take that property and work it as a farm was that it did not have a proper appreciation of the value of agriculture in the economy of Newfoundland.

In 1932, when our country fell upon very difficult times and we were in the throes of a financial crisis, a land development association was formed under the promotion of the president of Memorial University college, a distinguished educationist; and that association did valuable work, without any outside assistance of any kind, in encouraging people who were unemployed to work on allotments. It assisted many people throughout Newfoundland to obtain seed and fertilizer. Especially was that so in Bell island, where the miners were working only two days a week. I was a member of that land development association, and with our assistance those miners purchased seed and fertilizer, and were able to produce fine crops from their gardens. I may add that there is very good soil on Bell island. They had an exhibition that year which I believe would have done credit to any place of the same size in Ontario or Quebec. That exhibition opened the eyes of many people who attended it.

Then when the commission government came in, in 1934, they investigated what should be done. They had before them the Amulree report setting out the history of agriculture, as well as that of other industries; and Mr. Lodge, who was commissioner for public works, took it upon himself to make a private investigation. I well remember hearing him say that of all the industries he had examined the one he felt would give the greatest results from the application of artificial stimuli was agriculture. Unfortunately, however, when he went to apply these artificial stimuli he went to the wrong place. Where did he go but to a boggy area in the rear of the very property of Sir Robert Bond which the government had refused back in 1926? As a result the commission government had an extremely difficult task in trying to bring about land settlement in that area, though they did take unemployed people from St. John's and put them on the land there.

That was a very expensive experiment. Nevertheless I believe the government learned a great deal from it, and as a result they went on to further experiments, and to establish settlements at such places as Markland, Midland, Vinland, Lourdes, where a combination of farming, logging and fishing made the experiment very successful, and Brown's Arm, where good guidance brought about the same result. Later the experience gained in these experiments was utilized in the settlement of veterans in the valley of the Upper Humber river. The commission government also brought to Newfoundland Mr. McCharles who was a splendid director of agriculture. Unfortunately for Newfoundland he enlisted as soon as war broke out and we lost the benefit of his services. We had another director of agriculture, Mr. Gillis, who studied at Truro agricultural college, but I am sorry to say he retired the other day and went back to farming. The commission government gave bonuses for clearing the land; it instituted a survey of soils in different parts of the country, and it assisted those interested in clearing land by the use of tractors.

Now a new era has begun with confederation; but though the director of agriculture resigned, as yet no one has taken his place. Nor was there any mention of agriculture in the budget presented by the premier the other day. I was sorry to see that, because I knew he had carried on experiments in farming himself. Last session the Minister of Agriculture, during the course of a debate on the rehabilitation of farms in western Canada, while dealing with the question of marshlands in New Brunswick said he would like to go to Newfoundland to see if he could do anything of that nature there. Well, I am very glad to learn that the minister hopes to go to Newfoundland. I trust he will come, but I hope he will not keep that subject uppermost in his mind. There are other things I believe would be of greater service and would bear fruit more quickly than the reclamation of marshlands. What I think we need in Newfoundland at the present time, if I may venture to say so, is an extension of the school of agriculture that was created by the commission government at its experimental farm which the federal government is now taking over. We also need illustration stations similar to the two hundred or more stations scattered across Canada. I believe there are ten in Prince Edward Island, and on that basis I think we should have at least thirty in Newfoundland. In any case I hope it will be possible to have a good many.

We want farming to be elevated. We want the public to realize that farming is a very important vocation and that those who pursue it should be honoured and not belittled. We want those who are interested in settling the land to be given assistance in clearing the land. I know that during the last couple of years it has been impossible for a man to get the use of a tractor. There were so many people looking for a tractor to clear land that a man was told he would probably have to wait until next year to get his turn. There were not enough tractors available to enable the land to be cleared. I think that is regrettable.

We want exhibitions to be encouraged. I am sure that the minister would agree that exhibitions are a most valuable adjunct to the promotion of agriculture. We have local exhibitions in Newfoundland, but for many years now we have had no provincial exhibition, and we need provincial exhibitions. Our people ought to be encouraged to take part in the Canadian national exhibition. I remember reading in Prouse's history that one hundred years ago oats and barley from Newfoundland had been sent over to Edinburgh, and won first prizes in an agricultural exhibition. I believe barley can be grown in Newfoundland as well as in Canada. I certainly hope to see the minister go to Newfoundland, so that he can see for himself what the conditions are. I think he can gain more knowledge by a trip around the province than he can by listening to reports from me or anyone else. I believe he will be able to ascertain what our problems are, and he will see that there are these areas suitable for large-scale farming, as well as those smaller areas in which people can be encouraged to grow the food that they need.

This report which I have is worth studying. It says that people can grow the essential foods in Newfoundland, and can grow them in greater quantity than they are doing today. A study I made a couple of years ago as to the production of potatoes and turnips in Newfoundland showed that forty years ago we were producing twice as much as we are today. Even a study of the figures in this book will illustrate that no progress has been made in the production of vegetables, beef or milk, and there is every reason for progress to be made. This study was made within the past year, and shows that there are about six suitable areas for large-scale farming operations. Principally, I want to see farming on a small scale, such as you have in the province of Quebec, encouraged. Whether or not the people are paying income taxes, they are producing food which they need, and they have a little left over that they can sell in the markets for cash, with which they can buy other things.

Handicrafts have been encouraged in Newfoundland. We have the equivalent of your women's institutes, as I believe they are called. I am not sure of the name, but they are societies for the encouragement of handicrafts. In Newfoundland there are the Jubilee Guilds. There are about 120 of these, and the people do a certain amount of knitting and weaving. From the cloth that is woven, garments are made. Fine cloth has been woven in Newfoundland. In my humble opinion, Mr. Chairman, there is no field of endeavour upon which the success or failure of confederation will be more marked than in the field of agriculture. You cannot teach us much about how to conduct our fisheries. You can give us assistance when we find difficulty in marketing our catch, just as you give assistance to the farmer in western Canada who has difficulty in marketing his products. You cannot teach our fishermen much. They are just as brave and as resourceful and as intelligent as the fishermen of the other maritime provinces. Our industries, such as pulp and paper, have the best brains available, and our mining is well conducted. In regard to agriculture, however, we must take off our hats to the Canadian people. Here is an opportunity for the federal government, and for a man like the present Minister of Agriculture, who is an experienced farmer and an experienced minister of agriculture, to put agriculture in Newfoundland in its proper relationship to the other industries.

Before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer once again to this industrial survey of the resources of the province of Newfoundland. It is, of course, recognized that many parts of our country are not at all suitable for agriculture. The report says:

> Nevertheless an expansion of agricultural production to supply a greater proportion of the home market should be possible. Any expansion in agriculture would materially improve the economic position of Newfoundland, reducing imports from the rest of Canada for which there are no offsetting exports.

Figures produced to me the other day show that Newfoundland exports $93 million worth of products, and it imports through its own ports, from places other than the provinces of Canada, $23 million worth of goods. This means that somewhere in the neighbourhood of $70 to $80 million is going to the other provinces of Canada, principally to buy foodstuffs, clothing, footwear and the other things we need, whereas the other provinces of Canada are only buying about $10 million worth of goods from us. So you see, there is an imbalance there that should be corrected by the province of Newfoundland producing more of the things it needs.

The report continues:

While climatic conditions do not favour the growth of cereal grains, the possibilities of expanding truck garden production, both in the outlying communities and adjacent to the larger centres of population, seem reasonably good.

The writer of this report is not exaggerating when he says that.

If agricultural production is to expand, marketing procedures will have to be organized and adequate facilities such as storages, provided.

We suffer a great deal from the lack of storage. I do not believe there are any refrigerator cars in use in the province.

The proximity of the maritime provinces, particularly Prince Edward Island, with their established agriculture and relatively easy transport by water to the larger markets offers serious competition for local produce.

That is a matter that certainly needs investigating, but I understand the government is going to do that.

Combined with this is the geographical difficulty that the better agricultural land lies in the west, and the large market of the Avalon peninsula is in the east. Despite the difficulties, we believe an expanded and more prosperous agricultural industry can be developed. Among the main objectives should be larger farms, more modern methods of production, an educational program to promote higher fertility and greater yields, and a progressive marketing policy with adequate marketing facilities.

There is only one other thing I have to say, sir, and that is, should the officials of the Department of Agriculture make a survey of the situation in Newfoundland now, and then in three, four or five years' time make another survey, it would be possible to see what progress has been made. I shall judge them on what progress has been made during that time, and I believe other people will do the same.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I take it that this is the correct place to raise with the Minister of Agriculture a question which has to do with the organization of his department. I no longer speak with any authority about agricultural matters in this house, but I should like to ask the minister one or two questions about organization.

As one would expect, one finds the Department of Agriculture fully organized. To my surprise however I find there is apparently an extraordinary amount of duplication of organization as between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. In case the minister has not noticed this, I should like to draw it to his attention and ask him to explain what, on the face of it, seems a most extraordinary duplication of effort. I have before me the government telephone directory for 1950, which I take it is accurate, and I will just read quickly the headings of the organizations of the Department of Agriculture as they appear.

First of all, there is livestock and poultry, that is in the Confederation building. Then, you have the plant products division, and from that one goes on to marketing services. There is a complete array of marketing services. Then, you turn over to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and you find what appears, on the face of it, as I said, a most extraordinary duplication. I shall just read a few instances of the various duplications and then the minister will no doubt explain to us how the duties are divided. I do not know whether one department takes one part of Canada and another takes another part of Canada, or whether one department deals with certain kinds of pigs and another department deals with another kind of pigs or how it is divided up; but at any rate, the minister will explain. I will just first of all point out the similarity in the general organization. Here we have livestock and poultry division under the Department of Agriculture; and there is quite an array there, by the way. There is sheep, cattle, swine, horses and so on. Then we turn over to the Department of Trade and Commerce and we find what they call the agricultural commodities branch, and under there we also find livestock and animal products; and going further under the Department of Agriculture we find the plant products division and we find somewhere poultry, of course. Then coming to the Department of Trade and Commerce we find the dairy and poultry products. Turning back to Agriculture we find plant products; and turning to Trade and Commerce we also find plant products there. There is an adequate array of officials in each department who, as I say, are dealing with this, and the minister will explain to us the division of duties between these parallel departments.

Then we go on and I think this is even more interesting. We go on to the marketing side of the organization and we find that the Department of Agriculture seems to be fully staffed over there in the Confederation building. It is not far away, I think, from the Department of Trade and Commerce. I think they are just next door and maybe they communicate with each other. One does not know. But under the Department of Agriculture there is first of all the marketing service with an array of officials there. We go on further to the markets information section. No doubt that will be in the publicity line. Then we come to the consumer section, then to the agricultural economics division.

Then we come on really to the marketing proper and we find a whole series of divisions. They are very well equipped in the Department of Agriculture to do marketing. First of all there is the dairy products division in which there is an assistant director of marketing; then there is a general office, and there is a head clerk. Then we come down to dairy products grading and inspection service; and then a little later there is an array of officers there. Then we come to the marketing and merchandising service, and then there is the refrigeration service. Then we come to the fruit and vegetable division, and again there is an associate director of marketing. Coming on down there is a marketing and merchandising service. Then we come down to the livestock and livestock products division. Oh yes, there is a chief of agricultural marketing services. Then in the poultry division there is an assistant director of poultry marketing and so on. But I need not worry the committee with that. I just come now to the Department of Trade and Commerce, to show what an excellent service the Minister of Trade and Commerce has here, because he does not like to be left out of things, as we know. He gets into the transport department and all kinds of things where he has no business to be but where he likes to be; and I am amazed, I must confess, that the Minister of Agriculture apparently lets him keep on playing about in his department. But no doubt he will explain about that when the time comes. Here is the offering which the Minister of Trade and Commerce makes to us under the head of marketing. First of all, I should point out that he has an agricultural division. Before I come to that, there is an agricultural commodities branch which I have mentioned. As I pointed out a few minutes ago it has a dairy and poultry products department, livestock and animal products, plants and products. Then we go on to the economic research and development branch. That I think is more general. I observe with interest there that they have a private and public investment department. I imagine that would interest the Minister of Finance. Then we go on to their marketing services. They have all kinds of marketing services, of course. They have an export division—

Mr. Fulton: Which department is this?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am now in the Department of Trade and Commerce. It has excellent services. Then I come on now to what they call the agriculture division. This is the Department of Trade and Commerce still, with the heading, "agriculture division." There is a director. Then there is a crop section, special crops, livestock and animal products section, research and compilation section. Then we come on more particularly to merchandising.

Mr. Fulton: Is there an insect pests division?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not find that in Trade and Commerce. That is in Agriculture. I could not find that in Trade and Commerce, but we may mention it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I have no doubt he would oblige us with that too.

I want to go on to this marketing to show what an excellent service there is in the Trade and Commerce department in marketing. There is a whole page of it. You come to industry and merchandising division, and that is apt to fool you because you may not think it is agriculture. But if you read carefully through it you find the second heading is animal products section. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is again helping the Minister of Agriculture with his merchandising. Then you go on through. Here and there you find references to the information services and publicity sections. That is what you would expect. Then you come to external trade division, and I think that is nearly all.

As I said, I read these two lists of services which seemed so parallel. The Department of Agriculture, when I read it, seemed quite adequate, and I was surprised to find what appeared to be so fully a duplicate of the services in the Department of Trade and Commerce. As I said a moment ago, I should like to have an explanation of that. Whether the minister wishes to give it now or later, I do not know. That is not perhaps a matter of great consequence. But on the face of it I think we have here something which needs an answer, because we were assured by the Minister of Finance that there was no duplication and no waste. It may be that the Minister of Agriculture—who, I must say, has a gift for explanations which all of us may envy even though we cannot emulate it—can explain this situation. But if he can explain it, all I can say is that he can explain anything. I should like to know about it, and I should like to give him an opportunity now or later to explain why all these officers are in these two departments which seem to be doing the same thing, how they get along and how they arrange their duties.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not nearly as difficult as it sounds when my hon. friend discusses it from the telephone book.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): First of all, I want to ask the minister this question, and I am sure he will allow me to do so. I want to ask if this is quite accurate, because I do not want it all blown away on the ground that it is inaccurate.

Mr. Gardiner: I suppose it is accurate; but people do not usually take the telephone book to explain what goes on in a department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will show it to the minister if he does not know about it.

Mr. Gardiner: The fact is a very simple one. The Department of Trade and Commerce promotes trade in all products that are produced in Canada, and promotes it outside Canada. That is what trade and commerce means. They are promoting the sale of all kinds of products in other countries. Naturally they have an organization which gathers information with regard to it and distributes that information in other countries. For example, they do not sell cars. They do not sell the products of our mines, particularly. They do not sell anything of that kind, except in the case of a product like wheat which they are now selling indirectly through the wheat board. They do not sell agricultural products either. But they do look over the whole world to find markets not only for agricultural products but for every other Canadian product; and in order to be able to look over the world for that purpose, they must of course have persons who are more or less experts in discussing the strong features of any product that we have to sell. We do not duplicate their service outside Canada. We have six men in Britain whom we call cargo inspectors, who are at the ports and whose chief job is to check the products that go from Canada to Britain to find out whether the gradings which are carried out in Canada are carried right through until the product is delivered on the other side. To that extent we have some men outside Canada, but they are very few.

The Department of Trade and Commerce has staffs that promote the marketing outside Canada. On the other hand the Department of Agriculture has charge of the marketing of farm products inside Canada. We mean by that the products which are delivered to the person who purchases inside Canada.

The reason why the Department of Agriculture handled the agreements that were made with Great Britain during the war was that the products were delivered for the first time since the previous war, and I am not absolutely certain that they were delivered in any different way in the first war. Prior to the last war, in between the wars, and certainly prior to the first war, the delivery of products was made to a large extent on the other side of the ocean. Quite often we paid the freight. When the last war started Britain undertook to take delivery because she had absolute control of the shipping on the seas. She took delivery of the products at the ports here, and so the Department of Agriculture took charge of the assembling of the products, having them delivered at Montreal, collecting the payment for them at Montreal, and from there on Canada had nothing more to do with them. Immediately the products were put on the ship, even if the ship was sunk in the middle of the Atlantic, Britain paid for them; we did not. It was that change in the manner of handling products which resulted in the Department of Agriculture assembling the products, selling them for delivery in that way, and then they went from there outside and we had nothing more to do with them. That is the real division as between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture, namely, that we handle the gradings of all of the products that are purchased in so far as they are handled by Ottawa, and we handle the gradings in co-operation with the provincial governments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How long has that division been in effect—since 1936?

Mr. Gardiner: It has been in effect for at least thirty years. It has been in effect ever since I knew anything about agriculture either provincially or federally, and it has always been in effect since I came here, which is fifteen years ago, and it was that way when I came. There is no question about that. The first dominion-provincial meeting that was held in Ottawa after I came here in 1936 had as one of its divisions an agricultural section. The whole task that was assigned to those who were gathered here was to remove any overlapping as between the dominion Department of Agriculture and the provincial departments. The general report at the end of the conference was that there was at least as little, and in most cases less overlapping in the Department of Agriculture than there was in any of the other departments. I am not talking now in the interests of the party to which I belong because that was within a few weeks after the present government took over from the Bennett government. The situation then was that there was no overlapping as between the provinces and the dominion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was asking about the division as between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Gardiner: The division as between trade and commerce and agriculture was announced in the House of Commons by the prime minister in January, 1938.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the question I asked.

Mr. Gardiner: But there was nothing new about that either. It was just a recitation by the Prime Minister of what the situation had always been considered to be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, no.

Mr. Gardiner: There was a very marked difference of opinion, which bears on something that the hon. member for Greenwood just said, namely, the long controversy that went on during the period that Mr. Bennett's government was in office between the then minister of trade and commerce, the late Mr. Stevens—

Mr. Gibson: Not the late.

Mr. Gardiner: I beg your pardon; Mr. Stevens, who was then minister of trade and commerce; and it did cause considerable hilarity not only in the house but outside it. They got out a blue book which was intended to cover agriculture; they distributed it throughout Canada and throughout the world. The agricultural critic on the opposition side of the house got up in the house and held the book up to indicate that the sow which had a litter of twelve pigs nosing around her turned out to be the male member of the species rather than the sow, and it was suggested that as a result of that probably trade and commerce was taking on too much of agriculture. As my hon. friend knows, that discussion went on in the period between 1930 and 1936, but in 1938 Mr. King finally made the division very plain as between the two. One had to do with trading outside Canada; the other had to do with merchandising inside Canada.

There is one part of the discussion that no one has ever been able to change or settle in the minds of people generally. Grain has always been under trade and commerce. Ever since we had a Canada Grain Act it has been under trade and commerce. It was not always called the Canada Grain Act. It had another name for a time, but what we know today as the Canada Grain Act was passed in 1900 or 1901. It was at the time when the production of grain on the prairies became an actuality. We had a farm organization in western Canada at that time headed largely by a gentleman who later became Senator Douglas. He along with the farm organization, the grain growers and others agitated for a grain act that would regulate the grading and handling of grain.

Just prior to that time the Laurier government had been formed, and as most hon. members know, Sir Richard Cartwright had been the financial critic in the house for a considerable period of time. It was thought by most people that when a new government was set up he would probably become minister of finance. He did not become minister of finance. Sir Wilfrid took a younger man in as minister of finance in the person of Mr. Fielding and he set up a department for Sir Richard Cartwright. That department had to do with matters of trade, customs and that kind of thing. Along with many other things that were put into it this new act having to do with the control of grain was put in when enacted. I think every minister of agriculture that we have ever had in Canada since about 1910 or 1912 has thought that it should be in the Department of Agriculture, but nobody else seems to think so, and so it remains the way it is. It is still in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and it is being carried on there partly because of the fact that most of our wheat is sold outside Canada. As the years went by there was a larger and larger percentage of it that had to be sold outside Canada. So that even the matter of grading, in so far as grain is concerned, is carried on in the Department of Trade and Commerce, as a result of the organization at that time; and it has continued that way to the present. The grading of every other farm product is looked after in the Department of Agriculture.

I have here the statement to which reference was made a moment ago. Perhaps I should read it, so that if it is required as a reference it will not be necessary to look it up in the Hansard of 1938. The question has been asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre as to when the announcement of policy was made, or the position taken. On January 31, 1938, Mr. King said this:

> With respect to the consolidation of the department, that has been a matter of internal organization in the department, the minister managing his own department and arranging its affairs within the terms of the law.
> So that there may be no mistake about the line of demarcation between the functions of the two departments, may I say what my understanding of it is—and I think it is correct. The marketing of agricultural produce in so far as it relates to Canada is a matter that belongs entirely to the Department of Agriculture. There can be no doubt about that. There are in Canada provincial departments of agriculture as well as the federal department, and it is necessary for the minister so far as the federal Department of Agriculture is concerned, to have supervision over the entire work of marketing throughout all parts of Canada. As Minister of Agriculture, he is equally interested in seeing that all agricultural commodities for sale in foreign countries are so processed, packed, classified, packaged, transported and inspected, that there can be no doubt regarding their quantity and quality when they reach the market. In other words, he has to see to the quality and acceptability of the commodities that are exported.

That, in general terms, is the division which was laid out at that time as being the actual position as relating to the Department of Agriculture. And then he went on to say this with regard to the Department of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Diefenbaker: But that commenced in 1936.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, it was in existence long before 1936; but I shall go into that matter later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Gardiner: The actual fact is that it did exist right back through the time the Hon. W. R. Motherwell was minister of agriculture in the government of Canada. That goes back to 1921. Then there was some question of whether it existed or not during the period of five years when Mr. Bennett was at the head of the government. But it was only a matter of discussion; it was not something which had actually been acted upon. Then, when we came in, just five years after we had gone out, this was the policy which was accepted and announced in 1938, as I have indicated here.

Then Mr. King went on to say:

"Acceptability" in this sense, that the effort of the Minister of Agriculture is to ascertain the particular form and the quality and the kind of commodities most desired in the markets of the world. The jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce begins with the matters of trade and of sale. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has to do with the business of sales, the business of trade in foreign countries. There need not necessarily be a conflict between the two. The line of margin where possible differences may arise, or at least have arisen in the past—they need not in the future if proper safeguards are observed—is with respect to the borderline I have described, where the Minister of Agriculture sees to it that products reach the old country and are there in a form for marketing that will be acceptable, and the part which the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his officials play in seeking to advertise these goods and to gain for them the widest possible sale.

That is the description of the activities of the two departments, and they have been carried on on that basis ever since. About the same time—I think it was 1936, when I took over the department—I had the estimates prepared in a manner different from what they had been prepared before. The estimates had been prepared by setting up each of the different divisions in the department upon commodities: that is, the dairy division was put by itself, the livestock division by itself, and so on, and each was listed as one item. Speaking from memory I think there were fourteen items in the estimates at that time. There are some people who advocate following that policy today, namely the policy of getting back to fewer items in the estimates. That is being discussed in places other than the House of Commons. It is a matter of judgment of course as to whether the matter can be determined successfully in committees, or whether it can even be successfully discussed there.

In any case, in 1936 we re-organized the Department of Agriculture and put it under these divisions: administration service; science service; experimental farms service; production service and marketing service. Those were the five divisions of the department, and those divisions have been maintained ever since. Under each division appears a number of items, and those headings are presumed to set out for members of the House of Commons the items under which they can get information and discuss what is really going on in the different branches of the department.

Largely as a result of our experience as we have gone along—some experiences gained during the war, and some from other sources—there have been added what we call specials. We started in with a few specials, but now the number has grown out of the general activities. The first one has to do with assistance in connection with cheese and cheese factories. We brought in an act which said that we should pay premiums on cheese under certain circumstances, and there was a special vote set up for it.

Then, we have another to provide assistance in the replacement of maple production equipment. There was a special act for that, and a special vote for it. It was expected that this last mentioned one would operate for only three or four years. However, the war came along, and it is still operating; and all payments have not yet been made under it.

The next one was the Agricultural Products Act, which was the act under which we made the agreements with Great Britain. We are still functioning in two or three of those. That is a special vote which was put in because we did not expect it would continue for all time as part of the activities of the department. When it did go out it would not interfere with the general divisions which are indicated here.

Then, item 38 in the estimates makes provision for assistance in the construction of potato warehouses under regulations to be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. Hatfield: How many have been constructed?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend knows that better than I do. I think there have been three constructed in Prince Edward Island, one that is being discussed in Ontario and another discussed in Saskatchewan. I am not sure that there is any discussion at the present time in New Brunswick.

Mr. Hatfield: Are there any on the island?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, three on the island. At least three are on the island. My officials think there are six, but I know that there are three at least.

Mr. Hatfield: You have just decided on the method of construction, have you not?

Mr. Gardiner: They are constructed; we are trying to agree on the method of paying for them. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, major irrigation and water conservation projects, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act; those are the activities and others are being carried on under the votes we are asking the house to pass. I think that is a hurried but rather complete outline of organization in this department.

I suppose strictly speaking I am not supposed to discuss a matter that is before a committee, but on the other hand I do not think the matter I am going to deal with was really before the committee yesterday at all. Another matter was before the committee and someone just said something and then I find that something set out in the Gazette in the centre column on the front page from the top to the bottom and running over to another page. Apparently it all grew out of a remark to which not much thought had been given.

The committee was dealing with the public accounts of my department and reference was made to the item appearing at page A31 of the Public Accounts of 1948-49 covering salaries and wages. The estimate was $475,000, and the item for allotments was $939,000, with actual expenditures of $936,000. Someone passed the remark that there was an election that year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister still answering me?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I am. The hon. member wanted to know something about the organization of this department and I am telling him. As I say, it was that a possible explanation might be that this was an election year. As a matter of fact it was not an election year, it was the year 1948-49.

Mr. Wright: It was in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gardiner: If that is what the hon. member and his friend behind him were talking about yesterday and this evening, then when I get through I think I shall have shown them that it did not have very much to do with elections. Under that same heading the following amounts were spent in other years:

1945-46	$646,000
1947-48	922,000

I suppose if there had been an election for a county council that year my friend would still argue that it was the election year which raised the amount. Usually when we talk about an election year down here we mean our own election year. Under this heading the amount spent before the provincial election and the amount spent in that year were within a few thousand dollars of each other. Let us look at what happened in the estimates for 1949-50, the year the federal election was held. In the explanation of the item in the back of the book, which is the place from which the other figure was taken, the amount shown is $92,446. Then the amount for 1950-51, which is the year after the election, is shown as $81,000. If you are going to follow the kind of argument that was going on the other day in the committee—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was transferred to another account.

Mr. Wright: There was no argument about it. We were not permitted to argue.

Mr. Gardiner: You had better read the newspaper.

Mr. Wright: You had better read the record of the committee and not the newspaper.

Mr. Drew: You are leaving the hon. member for Greenwood in a state of suspense.

Mr. Gardiner: He will catch up. If you were to follow that kind of logic through it will be seen that the figure for salaries and wages has been reduced from $922,000 to $92,000. One needs only to say that to realize it would be ridiculous. That is not the position.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gardiner: If the hon. member will just allow me to explain this.

Mr. Wright: On a question of privilege, the minister is making a speech about a newspaper account of what took place in the committee. There is a record of the proceedings of that committee and I suggest that the minister get that record before he starts to make comments on what took place. The minister is entirely out of order in making his present speech about something which is before a committee of this house without having the record of that committee to guide him in what he is saying.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of privilege—

Mr. Wright: The minister is talking about something that did not take place at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I rise on a question of privilege?

Mr. Gardiner: I am on my feet on a question of privilege and if the hon. member will wait until I am finished he can rise to his. I happen to be the Minister of Agriculture and I read that report in a newspaper of what had happened yesterday in the committee. I do not care very much about what happened in the committee, but I do care about what goes out to the public. What goes out to the public is not necessarily what happens in the committee. I heard this over the radio at ten o'clock last night, and what went out generally as what had happened in that committee was that in an election year we had spent twice as much money on salaries and wages as was actually voted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In what department was that?

Mr. Gardiner: That was for P.F.R.A. under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Harkness: Are you still on a question of privilege?

Mr. Gardiner: I am up to the moment. I think it is perfectly proper when the main estimates are under discussion that I should state the position as it is, more particularly when I have been asked to explain the organization of the department, why we have these salaries, why we have these people employed, who they are and what they are. I am asking this house to vote $3 million for P.F.R.A.

Mr. Fulton: Under this item?

Mr. Gardiner: Under the item that has been discussed most of the time by hon. members who have been speaking. I am asking in the estimates for $3,750,000 for P.F.R.A. The discussion in the committee yesterday was over an item of $3 million which was voted to be expended on P.F.R.A. No other vote was passed in the house. This house voted $3 million for P.F.R.A. It did not vote any particular amount for salaries. It did not vote any particular amount for digging dugouts or pastures. In the back of the book there is an explanation of how that money has been spent, and in that explanation they say $922,000 was spent on salaries and wages in 1947-48.

When I saw that figure put into the explanation that year I said to those responsible, "That is not an explanation of what goes on in that branch, and that is not the proper amount under any heading for any expenditure made in the department." Anyone reading that would take out of it exactly what the newspapers took out of it, and what was taken out of it by others before the committee yesterday. They would assume that it represented wages paid in the ordinary sense of the term, or salaries paid to persons employed directly by the department throughout the period. As a matter of fact it covers the building of a fence around a pasture, where you go out and hire the farmers in the neighbourhood and give them the job of building the fence. Or it would cover the digging of ditches here and there. It would cover digging dugouts by people whose names could be obtained through the public accounts but who are in no sense of the term employees of the department in that they come under the civil service, nor even temporary employees. These are the people actually doing the work.

So I indicated that I thought that explanation ought to be given in some other way. The first year they reduced the amount to $475,000, but in the public accounts they showed the expenditures that were made, just as they had shown them before. The amount was not changed materially; whether it was an election year or not, it was approximately the same as the $922,000 of the preceding year, but that still did not explain to this house or to anyone else what was actually going on in that branch of the department. So this year those who made up the tables showed that the amount that should really go for salaries and wages under the proper interpretation of those terms was $92,000, not $922,000; but the remainder of the $922,000 is to be found in the other items such as pastures, dugouts and so on. All the money is spent in that way, just as it has been spent in other years, and there was no change in the estimates because of an election year either provincially or federally. There might have been an increase of $10,000 in an item; when we increased the expenditure all the way from $2 million to $3 million of course all the expenditures would be increased. When we put in the amount for the St. Mary's dam, that will also result in an expenditure, not under P.F.R.A. but under one of the special items, which will bring in many more labourers, people of whom we may have no record at all.

Just in passing, in view of what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Medicine Hat I want to say that about an hour ago the signed copy of the agreement on the St. Mary's dam was delivered to my office, so that will answer the question of whether we have reached the point where we can sign it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister still on a point of privilege?

Mr. Gardiner: No. If you have a point of privilege you may raise it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If not I would like to raise a point of privilege.

Mr. Gardiner: Go ahead.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have only another hour, and I wonder if the minister is going to come back and answer my question?

Mr. Gardiner: I answered your question quite a long time ago, but four or five other hon. members have been asking questions and I think I have a perfect right to answer them.

Mr. Wylie: On a question of privilege, since the Minister of Agriculture is speaking on a question of privilege and since he has brought my name into it, may I ask if the agreement has been signed by both the Alberta government and the dominion government?

Mr. Gardiner: Since I came into the house this evening it has been reported to me here at the table that it was delivered at my office in the Confederation building just about the time I was coming into the chamber, so I have not had an opportunity to sign it. I can tell my hon. friend that the agreement was sent down to us from Edmonton some little time ago. They said they were not going to sign it because they presumed we would want to rewrite some of the clauses. We rewrote some of the clauses and sent it back. Now they have returned it to us, and I presume they have signed it as we rewrote it. I will read it in the morning, and as soon as I am satisfied that the clauses are the same and that the agreement is as we understood it some little time ago, I have authority from the government to sign the contract, so I hope it will be signed tomorrow.

I wanted to say these few things at this stage because I may not have an opportunity to do so later on. The discussion on this first item of my estimates usually goes on for hours, if not days, but when we get past it we sometimes go along fairly rapidly. I do not want to block my own estimates by stopping if we once get started, so I thought I had better get this in while we were still talking.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My question is not answered even yet. Surely I have a right to an answer.

Mr. Wright: The minister has given an explanation of item 39 in these estimates, which has to do with prairie farm rehabilitation and is for $3,750,000. I would suggest that if the minister does not want a recurrence of what happened in the committee he should have that item changed to read something like the items on marketing services, production services or experimental farms. Those items are broken down, and the house is given some idea of what the money is being spent for. If that had been done I do not believe any difficulty would have arisen with respect to this matter.

While I am on my feet I want to say a word about the earlier statement of the minister as to the division of authority between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce in regard to the marketing of agricultural products. Last year we passed the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, which in effect gives to boards set up under provincial marketing legislation the power in interprovincial and export trade that those boards have in the marketing of those particular agricultural products within the province. Immediately those boards start to export, however, they will come under the regulations of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which may be quite different from those of the Department of Agriculture. It seems to me that we are going to run into difficulties in the marketing of agricultural products in that the regulations set up by the Department of Agriculture concerning marketing in Canada may not be the same as those of the Department of Trade and Commerce with respect to export trade. I wonder if the minister would comment on that?

Mr. Gardiner: Under the natural products marketing act of Saskatchewan, which is similar to the legislation in British Columbia and elsewhere, they have authority to set up a board and to say that all of that product delivered to the market must be delivered to the order of that board. When the board gets the product it is in exactly the same position as the Ford Motor Company or anyone else. They have the product, and they want to sell it. The Department of Trade and Commerce does not make regulations telling them how they are going to sell it. The Department of Trade and Commerce simply does for them what they do for everybody else. They try to find a market for that particular product, and inform them that it can be sold in a certain market at a certain price.

In so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned we have said, under the act that was passed in 1949, that we will see that any board which is marketing farm products outside the province has the same rights and opportunity to do so, and all the safeguards, that are present in connection with interprovincial marketing or international marketing. They will not be denied any of those things, so long as they do not overstep the provisions of the provincial law. We have undertaken to do that, but that does not interfere with the marketing of goods outside.

Mr. Wright: I was speaking particularly of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which sets up the grades for wheat that goes into the export trade. There are certain regulations and certain standards for the marketing of pork or dairy products within Canada. Conceivably the Department of Trade and Commerce could set different standards for the marketing of those products outside Canada, so there might easily be a conflict between the grades to be marketed within Canada and those to be marketed outside Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: No; the Department of Trade and Commerce has no grading system for any farm product except grain, and that is handled under the Canada Grain Act. All the other farm products are graded under systems set up with the Department of Agriculture, co-operating with the provincial departments. For example we had a grading system for butter in Alberta and Saskatchewan long before there was a grading system set up on the same basis in Ontario. We had different regulations governing trading between Manitoba and some of the other provinces for a considerable time. Eventually we succeeded in getting all provinces to co-operate with the federal government in having those different products graded according to the same standards. Where it is required that our officials do the grading for a province, the province appoints our man as their grader, and he does the grading for them. Where we require a provincial man to do the grading, we appoint him as our grader, and he does the job for us. The grades are the same right through the picture.

As I said a moment ago, we have six cargo men over in Britain. When a cargo comes in they take samples of the products that are sent over to see whether or not the grades have been maintained, but the remainder of the work in connection with it is done by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to point out to the minister that the potato growers of the maritime provinces have been disregarded in regard to the prices support act which was put into effect in 1944. At that time the minister stated the act would apply to all agricultural products except wheat, and would prevent them from going below the cost of production. In 1946 a program was put into effect in New Brunswick which bolstered the price, and in 1948 the growers of potatoes were given support in the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. During the crop year of 1949-50 potatoes have been selling most of the time, at any rate since the first of the year, below the cost of production. The minister and the chairman of the agricultural prices support board have disregarded any request for relief under this support act.

Not more than two weeks ago the minister of agriculture in the province of New Brunswick telephoned the deputy minister of agriculture in Ottawa, and suggested that some support program be put into effect covering potatoes. It was felt it would only cost the department about $100,000 to stabilize the price of potatoes and to bring them up above the cost of production. This request was turned down. I wrote to Dr. A. M. Shaw, chairman of the agricultural prices support board, on May 5 as follows:

> I wish to call your board's attention to the fact that potatoes are now selling way below cost of production and it does not seem that your board is paying any attention to the terms of the Agricultural Prices Support Act of 1944, which was put into effect to keep the price of agricultural products above cost of production, and I wish to point out that your board has disregarded the greatest agricultural food product grown which is the potato.
> I further wish to point out that with an expenditure of $100,000 by your board, you could stabilize the price of potatoes on the Canadian market overnight. All you would have to do is put into effect a starch program for the balance of the season and the three factories, two in New Brunswick and one in Prince Edward Island, could not possibly use more than 100,000 barrels, and if you would guarantee the subsidy of $1 per barrel over the price that is being paid for starch potatoes in these two provinces it would have the effect of stabilizing the market throughout Canada for the balance of the season.
> This action would have to be taken quickly and, with three inspectors, the factories I believe would co-operate with you under this scheme. You could buy the potatoes under the same plan as you used for the 1946-47 crop; therefore, with little cost, your board could be a great aid to 3,000 or 4,000 cars of potatoes now left in the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

I also wrote to the minister on May 6, but I never received a reply from him. Dr. Shaw did reply to my letter on May 9, and here is what he says in the third paragraph of the letter:

> As you know, it is not unusual, except in years of short supply, for the potato growers to have some wastage at the end of the season.

He intends to say that it is not unusual for potatoes to be dumped at the end of the season. The Agricultural Prices Support Act went through parliament in 1944. At the time the minister was piloting the act through the house, he said that no agricultural products would be dumped as long as he was Minister of Agriculture. I say to him that potatoes were dumped last year, and potatoes will be dumped in the maritime provinces this year unless some support is given to the price. The idea of the chairman of the agricultural prices support board saying that we always dump potatoes in surplus years, when we have an act which the minister said was to stop the price of agricultural products falling below the cost of production! He was referring to all agricultural products, except wheat, and that includes potatoes.

On page 5622 of Hansard for July 29, 1944, we find that when the act was going through the house I asked the minister about this, and he said:

> It is intended to cover all agricultural products, except wheat.
> Mr. Martin: Including corn?
> Mr. Gardiner: Yes, including corn. "Agricultural products" means any product of agriculture, except wheat, designated by the governor in council, and includes processed meat, dairy and poultry products if so designated.

He stated, on a dozen different occasions when asked, that that included all agricultural products. Potatoes were the first agricultural product that he helped under this act in 1946. Although they have been selling in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island for three or four months now below the cost of production, not a thing has been done by the department, although the department of agriculture in Prince Edward Island and the department of agriculture in New Brunswick have requested that something be done by the agricultural prices support board. I would hope that it is not too late for them still to try to stabilize the market for the rest of the season. Otherwise in my opinion, two or three thousand cars of potatoes are going to be dumped. The growers in Madawaska, Victoria, Carleton and York counties have potatoes they are trying to sell and they are taking today less than the cost of production for those potatoes in spite of the fact that the Agricultural Prices Support Act of 1944 is supposed to support the price above the cost of production. When this act was going through the house in 1944 the minister said that neither potatoes nor any other agricultural product would be dumped while he was Minister of Agriculture and while this act was in effect. He answered the hon. member for Lethbridge on that occasion, as reported at page 5624 of Hansard, as follows:

> Mr. Blackmore: What we are concerned about is that the time may come when the board may force the farmer to take less than the cost of production.
> Mr. Gardiner: I would hope that that time will not come and I do not think it is likely to under this bill.

I request now that the Minister of Agriculture take some immediate action to help the potato growers who still have potatoes on hand and to stop the sale below the cost of production. A number of meetings have been held in my constituency. The Minister of Agriculture has come out and asked a lawyer down in my constituency to take over the organization of potato growers. I had a joint meeting with this Mr. Duffie a week ago tonight and he stated that the Minister of Agriculture felt that the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act of 1939 was the solution to all our problems, although Mr. Gardiner told the delegation that he never stated that to Mr. Duffie. I should like to ask him what he did state to Mr. Duffie, because Mr. Duffie is under the impression that the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act of 1939 is the solution to all our troubles. He read a letter from the Minister of Agriculture at that meeting the other night that stated that he would be glad to turn over to an organization the handling of potatoes.

I should like to ask the minister if he agrees with the letter of Dr. Shaw, the chairman of the board, that it is not an unusual thing for us to dump potatoes in a surplus year, something which this act of 1944 was supposed to remedy.

I wish to say something more about the Department of Agriculture. It is about the experimental farm. When I came to parliament in 1940 the estimates for the central experimental farm amounted to $400,000; that is for the central experimental farm. Today the estimates before us amount to $1,800,000. I was out there to look around. All I saw was a lot of pegs driven into the ground. I do not know how they spend $1,800,000, or $1,400,000 more than they spent ten years ago. They have only about 300 acres more land than they had in 1940. What in the world they are doing with the money, I do not know. They are even buying a separate threshing machine now for every plot of grain they have growing out there so that they thresh it separately.

It is amusing to go out there and look around that farm. What the farmers get from it, I do not know. We in the maritime provinces do not get any help from it. We get some help from our provincial farms or rather from the federal farms located in the provinces; that is, the branch farms. We get some help from them, but we do not get any help from this central experimental farm. It is a nice place out there. It is a nice park and flower garden for Ottawa; but I do not think the farmers get much good from it. I think the provincial farms owned by the federal government are of some good; they are located in the different zones in the different provinces, carrying on research work in different things grown in these provinces.

I should like to ask the minister this question. It was reported in the fall of 1944 that he asked the provinces to take over the support of agricultural products in different sections of Canada. I believe in that move. I should like to ask him to answer whether he did consult the provinces. I understand that he did. The provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island turned him down. I think they made a great mistake in turning him down. I should like to know whether that is correct or not. I hope that at this late hour he will take some interest in the potato growers in the maritime provinces. The potato industry in the maritime provinces is practically the only industry the farmer has as a cash crop. It means everything to him. When the tariff is revised between the United States and Canada, I hope we get some reduction of duty. We pay 75 cents a hundred going into the United States. They pay nothing coming into Canada except from June 15 to July 31. I think the duty in the United States should be lowered. I think we should have an ad valorem duty on potatoes. I cannot understand why two men would sit down across the table on tariffs and one would say, "You can go into our country with a certain commodity free"; and the United States representative says, "We are going to tax you 75 cents a hundred." It does not make common sense to me. I do not know why you would make an arrangement like that.

Mr. Gardiner: I wish to answer one or two direct questions. The last one that I was asked was as to whether at some time—I think in 1944 or around that time—I had suggested to the provinces that they should take over the marketing of potatoes, I suppose among other products. The facts are, in addition to that, that in 1938—which goes back further than 1944—the farm federation came to Ottawa and called to our attention the type of legislation in force in British Columbia. It was known as the natural products marketing act. It provided for the setting up of boards to market the products of that province, and particularly farm products. Prior to that they had taken the legislation to the privy council and had it declared intra vires. In their discussions they had concluded that they knew a kind of legislation which would be intra vires if it were passed here in order to supplement the proposal. We said at that time that we did not think that one province having acted was sufficient to warrant the dominion government passing complementary legislation.

The federation went back to the other provinces and asked them to pass similar legislation. My memory is that they succeeded in getting about six provinces to pass similar legislation within a year, or a year and a half's time. If that is what my hon. friend means by asking, did I suggest at any time that the provinces ought to do this, then I say we suggested, when they came and told us that one province had already done so, that if they desired the federal government to bring in complementary legislation there should be considerably more than one province acting upon it before they came and asked us to do it. As I say, when they did come back the next time they had five or six provinces that had passed the legislation. But it happened to be within a few weeks after the war had started in 1939, and we said to them that we were going to set up government boards to handle the products during the war. We told them that we were going to operate them under the War Measures Act, and therefore we expected that so long as we had a War Measures Act, or some legislation which succeeded it, any boards which did operate would be federal government boards. The farm organization accepted that position and said they agreed that under the circumstances that is what ought to be done and that is what was done, and so we handled the different products. The dairy products boards handled the dairy products; the meat board handled the meat products; and we had a special products board which handled the other products. Those boards operated right through the period of the war, and down to a period after the war; in fact some of them are operating yet.

The federation did not come back until the war was over. In 1946 they did come back and they asked the federal government to pass this complementary legislation. We said that we were still operating under our own boards; and we refused to bring the legislation before the house in spite of the fact that the opposition was urging us to do so from time to time until 1949. In 1949 we brought the legislation before the house. That legislation provided that we would assist the boards that had been set up provincially by making it possible for them to apply outside the province the same principles as they were applying inside. That legislation is now on the statute books; and to the extent that I suggested that, it can be said that I more or less promoted the idea. But I must say that at no time did the government here during that period advocate that this ought to be done. We simply said that if the federation went out and succeeded in getting a considerable number of the provinces to take that action we would consider the matter. We did consider it, brought it here, and it was passed.

Mr. Hatfield: I was asking about the support act.

Mr. Gardiner: The support act itself which came up in 1944 has nothing whatsoever to do with that matter.

Mr. Hatfield: Did you not ask the provinces to take over the support act; and did you not say that you would furnish the money if they would administer it?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I did not go that far. If my hon. friend will listen I will give him the whole story.

Mr. Hatfield: I think you did.

Mr. Gardiner: The position is, my hon. friend came to my office and advocated that, as he said a moment ago but I did not.

Mr. Hatfield: You advocated it.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that to the provinces. The position taken in 1944—and I think my hon. friend will find the wording that I used is correct—is this. We did bring down legislation in 1944 which we intimated would probably be required to deal with staple products as we were getting out from under the organizations that had been set up under these boards, and the agreements that had been entered into by them, and that it would probably be necessary for us to stabilize prices over a period, and stabilize them at a level which would maintain the relationship between the farmers generally and those who were supplying them with commodities, to maintain a price level as between them which would be as satisfactory as the conditions had been in the last few years of the war.

Mr. Hatfield: Above cost of production.

Mr. Gardiner: You made your speech; let me make mine.

Mr. Hatfield: You said that in your speech in 1944.

Mr. Gardiner: In 1944 the position taken was as I stated. If my hon. friend will go back and get the 1944 Hansard he will find that the one product we left doubt about was potatoes.

Mr. Hatfield: No.

Mr. Gardiner: We will get at that some other time when we are on the item that has to do with potatoes. The position taken at that time—and I made it very clear to the house—was that if you put a floor price under potatoes which was as high as we were being asked to put under them by the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island we would have so many potatoes produced in this country that we would be in the position in which the Americans finally got by doing a similar thing. The position in regard to the sale of potatoes would then be very difficult particularly in view of the fact that two of the provinces of Canada depend absolutely upon the selling of potatoes, or a very considerable number of the farmers depend absolutely upon the sale of their potatoes in order to live at all. We in other parts of Canada are living fairly well without selling potatoes, particularly outside Canada.

I said it would be a mistake for us to set a price level for potatoes which would induce people right across Canada to produce potatoes. If we did that then we would be in trouble.

Mr. Hatfield: You did not say that in 1944.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the position that has been taken consistently all the way through from 1944 until now.

In marketing the 1948 crop we got into the position in February, I believe, of 1949, where we were being approached almost daily by those who were interested in the marketing of potatoes from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Finally the agricultural prices support board entered into an arrangement whereby they would agree that any potatoes which were graded and in bins on a certain date would be taken over by the federal government at a certain price, I believe $1.15.

Mr. Hatfield: After the United States asked you to put on embargoes.

Mr. Gardiner: There are a lot of things that I cannot take up in the few minutes I have left. That story can be told pretty well when we come to the item itself in the estimates. But we said at that time that we would take them over. We finally did get just approximately what my friend says they may have to dump this year, and we paid $1,600,000 for them. That is a pretty high price to pay for what was obtained, and even for the results that were obtained.

Coming to this year, a little before January we were asked to do the same thing again. At that time I said to them that we thought they should go ahead and market their potatoes. We thought that if we took any such action as has been suggested again we would be in difficulties with the United States, which today finds itself with such an enormous supply of potatoes on hand that it is offering them at a cent a bag, and with that condition existing we could not afford to jeopardize the United States market for Canadian potatoes. And I must say that the Americans were buying potatoes, and are still buying potatoes. They were buying potatoes in greater quantities than they bought them last year. We said we were not going to take a chance on spoiling any market we had in the United States by starting to subsidize potatoes on this side of the line in order to make it possible for people to ship them into the United States.

Mr. Hatfield: They do subsidize.

Mr. Gardiner: We have carried on under that plan up to the present time. We never have yet said to the people of New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island that we will not do anything whatsoever in order to assist them with the marketing of their potato crop this year. We never have said that at any time up to now. We have however kept ourselves in a position where we can take that position if we find it advisable to do so.

Now, what is the present position with regard to potatoes? In 1948, we marketed 17,159 cars. From the 1949 crop we marketed 22,885 cars, or we have marketed more than 5,000 more cars this year than last year.

Mr. Hatfield: You embargoed them last year?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I know, and we did not embargo them this year, and this year we sold them. Potatoes were sold into the market in the United States, and they are still being sold. As my hon. friend says, there might be some potatoes left over at the end of the season. No one knows that there are going to be. We have said, "Go ahead and sell them."

In so far as the stabilization of prices is concerned, on January 3, they had the highest price of this year, which was $1.35 basis Montreal.

Mr. Hatfield: You hope—

Mr. Gardiner: Now, you can read this all tomorrow and you will understand it better than if you try to talk at the same time as I am talking. On January 3 was the highest price of $1.35. The lowest price that has been obtained was $1.15 on February 7. And that happens to be exactly the price that we paid for 100 pounds of the surplus last year at the farm. We paid $1.15 last year for 100 pounds and the price has not been lower than $1.15 on the Montreal market for 75 pounds this year.

Mr. Hatfield: This year?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, for a 75-pound bag this year.

Mr. Hatfield: Your support price was $1.15. That is what you are talking about?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not talking about that.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Hatfield: I know, but your support price last year—

Mr. Gardiner: The price on May 10 was $1.20 to $1.25. The highest price was $1.35, and the lowest, $1.15. I can hardly conceive of a product such as potatoes being more completely stabilized than apparently this product has been during that period of time. Whether it has been stabilized high enough might be another question. That is a question which can still be considered. No one has said here that we will not consider it.

But my learned friend makes the proposal that we should help out his starch company, and by doing what?

Mr. Hatfield: No, no.

Mr. Gardiner: By having these potatoes delivered at half the price which is being obtained for them on the market.

Mr. Hatfield: No, no.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, that is the suggestion, that we pay dollar for dollar, and put the potatoes into the starch plant. It would not all be in my hon. friend's starch plant, but it would be in somebody's starch plant.

Mr. Hatfield: On a point of privilege, the suggestion was made by the provincial government of New Brunswick that we pay 50 cents a barrel and the federal government pay a subsidy of one dollar a barrel. Fifty cents a barrel for starch potatoes today would not give the starch manufacturer one cent.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, that is even worse than I thought it was. We are going to be asked to pay $2 for every one they pay. But in any case the suggestion is that we get rid of these extra 2,000 cars by putting them through starch plants, and that we subsidize the putting of them through the starch plants.

Mr. Hatfield: No.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, that is the way I understand it; and I do not know how you can make starch from potatoes without putting them through a starch plant.

Mr. Hatfield: It was only the effect of having them on the market.

Mr. Gardiner: In any case, that is the position in regard to potatoes. We have sold 5,000 more cars of potatoes—at least, they have been sold; I should not say we sold them, because I would imagine my hon. friend sold as many as anybody else. There are five or six exporters of potatoes in New Brunswick, and they are very successful agents in marketing their product.

The only thing I have suggested is that a probable solution for their problem down there is for those five or six men to have themselves appointed a board by the provincial government, and then starting in and marketing those potatoes in the interests of all the producers, rather than just in the interest of the agent who happens to be marketing them. If any suggestion has been made, then it has been that one. As a matter of fact that is the plan that was followed in Ontario under my hon. friend's leader, while he was premier of that province, in connection with the marketing of beans.

Mr. Hatfield: There are 200 licensed shippers in New Brunswick.

Mr. Gardiner: But those 200 licensed shippers do just as a lot of shippers do elsewhere—they operate through a few exporters. Those exporters have done a very successful business down in that part of the country. As a result of doing that successful business they have very large plants to put the potatoes through.

I think that in connection with all these matters we should do just what we did last year in winding up our activities in connection with apples. The apple growers came to us at the beginning of the season and they said, "We want you to make an agreement with us, just the same as you did during the war. We want an agreement whereby you will guarantee a return through assisting us to export or put them in cans, dehydrate them, and eventually wind up the season so that we will have a certain amount of return for our producers."

Well, eventually we said to them that we thought the time had come when, so far as possible, we should get out of those transactions. The apple growers are very well organized in at least two areas, namely, Nova Scotia and British Columbia, and they market their apples through their own organization. We said, "Go ahead and see what kind of job you can do of it." Well, the British Columbia board marketed apples in thirty-two states in the United States, in spite of the fact that the Americans had one of the biggest apple crops they had ever grown. The British Columbia people went to the United States and merchandised their apples over there. They had them packed properly before they were shipped. Their apples were put on the market right alongside American apples, and under those conditions they sold in thirty-two states of the union.

Then, having done that, they found they could not sell all of their apples of certain varieties, and they gave those apples to Great Britain. My understanding is that the British government, in turn, did not sell them, but that they distributed at least a large part, if not all of them, to school children. That is they had been received as gifts, and those apples were distributed more or less by way of gifts to the children in Great Britain. In any case the British Columbia people did not get any return from them. I believe it cost them about twenty-five cents to have them packed and placed on the ships; and the British paid the freight across the ocean.

Those apples were delivered in Great Britain. I might say that Nova Scotia marketed its apples just about as well as they have ever been marketed. Then, after they got through with those transactions, they came back and said, "This is our position." We checked the position with other apple producers in Canada, and did give a final payment to them indicating to them that from now on we expected them to go on and market their own product from year to year.

Mr. Hatfield: There was a by-election.

Mr. Gardiner: There was not any by-election at the time. That was done when there was no by-election in sight. I cannot understand my hon. friend knowing the effect that could have if that were to go down to the constituency where his own candidate is running. He is the solicitor for this organization and sat in this house for a short time. When I put the question to him across the floor of the house whether there was any politics in connection with the handling of apples in the Annapolis valley, as every hon. member who was in the house then knows, his answer was that there had not been. If the story goes down from the opposition in this house that there was politics in the handling of apples in the Annapolis valley during the ten-year period in which assistance has been given from Ottawa I venture to say it will get us more votes than anything else we could do. I suggest to my hon. friend that he go right on doing that if he wishes to help us politically.

The people in the Annapolis valley know what assistance they got. They know why they got it. They know how they got it. They got all the assistance they did through their own organization. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre chips in I would remind him that he is becoming more and more a Tory every day. Every time someone in the official opposition wants to interfere with anything that is being said over here the hon. member gives them a little help and boosts them along.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe they need it.

Mr. Gardiner: I would like to suggest to the hon. member that the board they have in Nova Scotia—

Mr. Hatfield: What are you doing for Nova Scotia potatoes?

Mr. Gardiner: The position in Nova Scotia as well as in British Columbia is that they have commodity boards of the type that has always been advocated by my hon. friend's party. I challenge him to say that they have not. Their party has always advocated commodity boards. They have always said that boards such as they have in British Columbia are the kind of organization that should be set up to market farm products. There is one of those boards in Nova Scotia marketing farm products. That board was organized by the growers and it is operated by the growers and they sell their apples in the interests of the producers. They are not playing politics with anyone.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister has been quoting figures that have been paid for potatoes. I happen to have on my desk a letter dated May 2 from a young veteran who went into the potato business at the close of the war. This man tells me that the price to the producer today, that would be on May 2, for No. 1 table stock was 40 cents per bushel and 67 cents per 100 pound sack.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Coldwell: That is at a place called O'Leary Station in Prince Edward Island. He goes on to state that the floor price last year was 69 cents per bushel and $1.14 per 100 pound sack. The minister gave the price for a 75 pound bag, which would be at Montreal. That would mean that this young man would get 51 cents for a 75 pound sack. I agree with the minister that probably the solution is a commodity board, but these young fellows have invested their war savings in potato growing and they have their cellars full of potatoes and the prices are ruinous as far as they are concerned. I shall not go into the other side of the matter but I do intend to raise something else when the proper item is before us.

Mr. Gardiner: We have got away from potatoes, but only to say that what can be done in the case of apples can be done in the case of potatoes. No one can say at this moment that the door is closed in connection with the handling of potatoes. We are going to deal with potatoes at the end of the picture when we know what the situation is and what has been done. The hon. member has just raised the question of potatoes selling at a certain price. You have to consider the average price to the grower. You cannot talk about what happens at the end of the season when you are always dumping some potatoes as though the price received represented the return.

Mr. Coldwell: They were not able to sell them before.

Mr. Gardiner: They say that, but people who have been talking to me say that there has been proper distribution. The records show that to the producers from August to January in 1948-49 the average price for potatoes was 99 cents per 100 pounds. In the same period in 1949-50 the average price was 98 cents per 100 pounds. In other words, there has been a difference of only one cent in the two seasons. We did give some support in the one season, while in the other season we have not given any support. The farmers were paid more money for their potatoes partly because they had more to sell.

Mr. Coldwell: Not the small grower.

Mr. Gardiner: We can discuss that at some other time.

Mr. Coldwell: The large grower who is also a dealer can sell his potatoes first.

Mr. Gardiner: That brings us back to what my hon. friend mentioned a moment ago. Every time these potato growers have come asking for assistance I have told them that it can best be done by means of an organization in their own area. After the point is reached where the producer does not get the average price, where he gets only the minimum price, it is not fair to say that is the price. We are absolutely opposed to that kind of policy being followed. The average price for the year has been 98 cents, and it was 99 cents last year.

Mr. Charlton: Where is that?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the price to the grower, as I said at the beginning of my remarks. If my hon. friend had been listening he would have known that. I am sorry if the hon. member in front of him was talking so much that I can understand my hon. friend not hearing me.

Mr. Charlton: Would that be at the farm?

Mr. Gardiner: To the grower at the farm. That is the price the grower got for his potatoes. I suppose he would deliver them at the village or in town or probably at the railroad station, but in any case that is his price.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Gardiner: Monday will be private members' day.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 22, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Argue be substituted for that of Mr. Herridge on the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

INCURABLES

REFERENCE TO PETITION REQUESTING ASSISTANCE BY WAY OF PENSION

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a petition signed by over twenty thousand incurables, who are asking for assistance by way of pension. It was the intention to have this presented to parliament in the regular way, but on looking over the wording of the petition I doubt whether it is strictly in order. I am therefore advising the Canadian Association of Incurables and the Shut-in Friends' Association to present the petition directly to the government.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FEED GRAINS—SALES BY WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bushels of (a) feed oats; (b) feed barley, were sold by the wheat board to feed merchants, dealers or brokerage houses in each of the months beginning in December, 1949, and to date?
2. What was the average price received for each of said grains in each of said months?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to divulge its sales position within the crop year in which it is operating.

2. See answer to No. 1.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PARK AT BLOMIDON, N. S.

Mr. Stanfield:

1. Have representations been made to the federal government in connection with establishing a national park at Blomidon, Kings county, Nova Scotia?
2. Has the provincial government at Halifax made any such representations, and has it offered to acquire land for the purpose?
3. Has any survey been made of the presumed park site?
4. If so, when will the work be started?

Mr. Prudham:

1. Yes.

2. The provincial government has made representations. Since no area has been selected, the offer of land has not been a consideration.

3. Reconnaissance of the general area has been made jointly by a representative of the federal government and a provincial government officer.

4. See answer to No. 3.

CURRIE BARRACKS, CALGARY—TENDERS FOR CONSTRUCTION WORK

Mr. Smith (Calgary West):

1. What persons or corporations tendered on the construction of a 250-man barrack block at Currie barracks this year?
2. What were the amounts of such tenders?
3. When, to whom, and at what amount was the construction contract granted?
4. At what date were the marked cheques submitted with the tenders returned to each of those tendering?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. (a) Bennett and White (Calgary) Ltd., 1120 9th ave. W., Calgary, Alta.

(b) Bird Construction Co. Ltd., 1427 19th ave. E., Calgary, Alta.

(c) Shoquist Construction (Western) Ltd., 1826 10th ave. W., Calgary, Alta.

2. Tenderer (a): First alternative tender, $515,236; Second alternative tender, $501,236.

Tenderer (b): First alternative tender, $533,000; Second alternative tender, $499,200.

Tenderer (c): First alternative tender, $552,340; No alternative price.

Tenderer (d): First alternative tender, $556,648; Second alternative tender, $539,338.

3. Contract not awarded as yet.

4. Tenderer (a): May 12, 1950; Tenderer (b): Being retained; Tenderer (c): April 20, 1950; Tenderer (d): April 20, 1950.

IMPORTS OF COAL

Mr. Hansell:

1. How many tons of coal were imported into Canada during 1949?
2. From what countries was this coal imported?
3. What tonnage was imported from each of these countries?

Mr. McIlraith:

United Kingdom, 331,457 tons; Union of South Africa, 17 tons; United States, 21,863,736 tons; Total, 22,195,210 tons.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ALBERTA

Mr. Hansell:

How many registered unemployed were there as at May 1, 1950, in the districts covered by Edmonton, Calgary, Lethbridge, Drumheller and Blairmore?

Mr. Mitchell: The number of persons registered with the national employment service at May 4, 1950, in the local office areas named is as follows: Edmonton, 5,598; Calgary, 4,088; Lethbridge, 890; Drumheller, 326; Blairmore, 204.

CIVIC HOLIDAY—WINNIPEG POST OFFICE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has consideration been given to the matter of compensating employees of the Winnipeg post office who were not given civic holiday as a holiday with pay in August, 1949?
2. If so, what is the result of such consideration?
3. Will such compensation be paid?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Under the regulations then in force no compensation may properly be given.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WHEAT—EXPORTS UNDER INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Mr. Argue:

1. How many bushels of wheat were purchased by each importing country under the international wheat agreement from August 1, 1949, to May 1, 1950, or to the most recent date for which information is available?
2. What quantity was imported from Canada by each country, during the same period in (a) 1949-50 crop year; (b) 1948-49 crop year?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

SALE OF TIMBER LANDS OR LEASES

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many timber lands or leases were sold by the dominion government in each of the years 1947, 1948 and 1949?
2. To whom, and at what price?
3. How much other lands were sold by the dominion government in each of the years 1948 and 1949?
4. To whom, and at what price?
5. Were these sales by competition?
6. Were they advertised?

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. Dube:

What was the public debt of each province of Canada, except Newfoundland, at the end of (a) the year 1935; (b) the year 1949?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

[Mr. Hansell.]

GRAIN ELEVATORS

Mr. Low:

1. How many federal government grain elevators are there in Canada, and what is the location of each?
2. Which of these elevators are being operated by the government, and which are being operated under lease to private companies?
3. How many permanent employees are there in each of these elevators, and what is the yearly salary of each?
4. What was the total bushelage of grain handled by each of these elevators for each of the calendar years 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949?
5. What volume of grain was cleaned and/or conditioned in each elevator for each of the past five years?
6. How much feed was ground in each elevator during each of the past five years?
7. Which of the government elevators took in sufficient revenues to pay operating costs in each of the past five years?
8. How many hours per day does each government elevator remain open for business?
9. Is it possible for farmers and stockmen in the vicinity of any government elevator to buy wheat screenings directly from that elevator?
10. If not, how are such wheat screenings disposed of?

OFFENCES UNDER FEDERAL STATUTES—PROSECUTIONS AND CONVICTIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Have there been any convictions in Newfoundland since April 1, 1949, for offences under federal statutes?
2. If so, under what statutes were the prosecutions taken, how many convictions have been recorded, and what punishment was enforced in each case?

FLOOD CONDITIONS—MANITOBA

Mr. Blackmore:

1. What sections of Manitoba were flooded by the Red river in 1948?
2. What was the estimated dollar cost of the flood damage of 1948?
3. Did the federal government aid in rehabilitating flooded areas of the Red river valley after the 1948 flood?
4. If so, how much did the federal government contribute in tendering such aid?

GASPE COUNTY, QUEBEC, RETURNING OFFICER

Mr. Balcer:

1. In what year was C. E. Thibault appointed returning officer for the county of Gaspe?
2. On what date was he removed from office, and for what reasons?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE, SASKATCHEWAN—RONALD REYNOLDSON

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents in connection with the payment, under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, to Ronald Reynoldson of section 36, township 21, range 26, west of the second meridian, district of Chamberlain, Saskatchewan.

FRASER RIVER BASIN BOARD

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of the terms of reference or instructions on the basis of which the dominion-provincial Fraser river basin board was constituted, and also a copy of any further instructions issued to the board since its constitution, by the dominion government.

EDUCATION

EQUALIZING OF OPPORTUNITY—ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

He said: May I say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing political about this proposal—and when I say "political", I mean in any partisan sense—because on both sides of this house there are members who are in favour of this resolution. It is the same resolution that I introduced at the last session of the house, on Wednesday, October 19, 1949. What I had to say then may be found at page 932 of Hansard and following pages. Today I do not wish to repeat the arguments I advanced at that time, but I want to supplement them and add something to them.

The resolution I moved last session received in the house a good response, which was re-echoed in the country. At that time the resolution was spoken to, although the time was short, by the hon. members for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), Carleton (Mr. Drew), and one or two others. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself had a word or two to say about it. I hope he was enthusiastic about it, but, as in so many other cases, I presume that his enthusiasm was tempered, as it often is, by the consciousness of the responsibilities of power. I make this motion most sincerely, chiefly with the aim of winning over that small section of public opinion which remains opposed to it, and which I think is opposed largely on account of lack of information or wrong information.

The public opinion has changed greatly in this matter over the years.

At first, education was considered merely to be the responsibility of the parents. Later the parents were assisted by the churches; then we had compulsory education—and may I say in passing that that loss of freedom was followed by the opening of a good many wider freedoms. Then we had the imposition of general taxation for the purposes of education, and that has become as generally accepted as compulsory school attendance. Then we had the coming of the so-called free secondary education—a great step forward. I said "so-called free"; it is not really free. If it were, it would be participated in by everybody equally; but it is not so participated in. It is still true—and this is proven by statistics—that the economic status of the parents decides whether the children shall or shall not attend high school.

It might be of interest to consider for a moment who the children are who attend high school at the present time. I find that almost 100 per cent of the children of the professional classes attend high school; of business people, 85 per cent; of civil servants, about 65 per cent; of skilled labour, 59 per cent; of unskilled labour, 15 per cent. So that the statement that secondary education is in all cases free will hardly hold water.

I suggest that the support of education needs to be put on a sounder basis than exists at the present time. In times of great crisis, as in a war or in an economic depression, we find that education is one of the first casualties. We find too that the remedies that are prescribed are always short-time remedies. We find ourselves prepared to accept inferior teachers, or people who are not teachers at all, and that sort of thing.

Perhaps I shall say no more about that matter for the moment, and go on to the treatment that this resolution received at the last session when I gave my opinion in regard to federal aid.

I may say that I was supported in that resolution by many well-known educators in this country. I wrote a few of their names down. There was Dr. Althouse; Dr. Wallace, of Queens; Dr. Trueman, Mr. Lazerte, and in Ottawa Mr. P. J. Kennedy, from whom I quoted—he was speaking to the Knights of Columbus organization. I can cite many organizations which have endorsed the proposition; they include the Canadian Legion, the Canadian School Trustees Association, the Canadian Teachers Federation, and so on.

Following the debate last year, my desk was flooded with expressions of support from hundreds of individuals and organizations throughout this country, including professional organizations, labour organizations, farm organizations, co-operatives, and business organizations. I have no doubt that others received such expressions of opinion —in fact I know, because many members telephoned to me with regard to the matter, saying that they too had received letters asking for their support of the resolution.

What ideas must we put before the public in regard to this matter? First of all, I would say the necessity for and the importance of education. To this enlightened house I need not go into details about that. Then there are certain fears that we must get rid of. We must get rid of the fear in their minds that federal aid would involve federal control. I should like to quote from my own speech of last session in that regard; the sentence which I think covers it is to be found at page 935 of Hansard, as follows:

> There is only one control that would be necessary by the federal government, as far as I can see, in granting—and note the words that follow—assistance to the provinces to get on with their own type of education. That control would be to see that money voted for the purpose of education was spent for that purpose.

And for that purpose alone. I had intended, sir, to put on the record a long paragraph from the Canadian Bar Review, volume 37, No. 5, by F. R. Scott, McGill law faculty, who is an authority on constitutional law. I do not know whether I might be allowed by the house to put the paragraph on in full. I can read it.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Knight: I shall read the relevant part, and leave out the longer part. It reads as follows:

> Certainly no constitutional principle prevents the federal government from evolving and initiating educational plans of this type. For such plans do not mean federal legislation on the subject of education itself, but rather the formulation of methods of financial assistance to existing forms of provincial education. The control over the organization of schools and the choice of curricula remains provincial.

That, sir, is the meat of the matter. To those who are interested I recommend that they read the whole paragraph, which appears on page 526 of a reprint from the Canadian Bar Review, and is entitled: "The federal government and education." The article itself is entitled: "Dominion jurisdiction over human rights and fundamental freedoms."

The third thing that public opinion seems more prepared to accept now than it used to be is equality of educational opportunities. The birthright of every child is a minimum standard of education, based not upon the wealth of the parent, of the local school district, or even of the province, but on the wealth and the resources of the whole country. In short, the principle of equality of educational opportunity is an intrinsic part of democracy as we understand it and as we like to practise it.

There are of course many precedents for federal aid to education. I listed them last year in my speech. I can mention one or two of them from memory. There were the D.V.A. grants, which I think everybody admits were successful. There is the family allowance, which, I think it is fair to say, is a measure of aid to general education. There is vocational training, apprenticeship training, and so forth. Therefore we have precedents in the matter. I do not think anyone will say that our acceptance of these things involved federal control that had any general effect upon our freedom with respect to what we shall teach our children.

I said that there was a need for equality. Let me point out that at the present time there is great inequality in matters of education. There is first of all the difference in the extent to which people in different parts of the country are seized of the importance of education. I claim, of course, sir, that that is a sign at least of a lack of education on the part of those people. Some of the other implications are a difference in the professional standards of teachers, a difference in the standards required of those who go out and teach children who everywhere show no difference in the mass to begin with. I find, for example, that in one province the training of a teacher takes twenty times longer than it does in another. The degree of difference in the qualifications of teachers is greater than the degree of difference in the qualifications of the members of any other profession in this country. It is true to say that there is a difference in the economic wealth of the school districts themselves, and also of the provinces. The expression "the have and the have-not" which we have heard applied to provinces can be applied also to different types of communities on agricultural land, depending on whether the soil is productive or non-productive. Then there are differences among the provinces in the per capita expenditure on education. The last time I spoke on this matter I listed one province as spending $31 per head on the education of its children, while another province, in the same year, was spending $83 per head.

There is a considerable difference in teachers' salaries. While I think teachers are as faithful in their duty as those of any other group, I still think that the salary that a teacher is paid is a fair standard of his ability to teach. I shall get into a controversy in some quarters over that remark, but I believe it to be generally, though not always true. This difference in salaries occurs between province and province, and it occurs particularly as between rural and urban districts.

There are also differences in the economic position of the parents. This has a decided bearing upon the attendance, not in our public schools perhaps, but certainly in the high schools. As I pointed out earlier, there are tremendous differences in the amounts brought in by taxation on real estate. It is unfortunate that up to the present our educational funds have depended largely upon the value of the real estate in the district concerned. The granting of some basic federal aid to education would help to do away with this inequality of opportunity.

The other day the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) showed me the Forest Hill high school in the city of Toronto. I stood amazed at its efficiency, its magnificence, its equipment for every type of educational purpose. I thought of some little schools that I have seen where there were no books to read, and no equipment, and I said to myself: Surely there is a lack of educational equality in this country.

I have instanced these things at random. The figures are on record. I quoted some last year. The point is this. Some Canadian children are the innocent victims of a set of circumstances over which they have no control. Are we adults concerned about them? I know that education is a provincial matter. But members of this parliament are trustees charged with the well-being of the public and of the children of this country. Many of us are looking forward to the report of the Massey commission. Many briefs on this subject were presented to that body in various parts of the country. I have no doubt that when the report is received the government will have a comprehensive view of public opinion in this matter.

This brings me to a point which I think should be mentioned. There are certain preliminaries that are necessary to federal aid to education. The first one is investigation and research on the part of this dominion government to find out what the true condition of education is in this country. That work has already been initiated by various educational organizations. Some hold that this important matter should be a subject of conversation between the dominion and the provinces at the coming dominion-provincial conference. One of the great difficulties is that our right hand does not know what our left hand is doing in the matter of education. The provinces have so zealously considered education to be a matter totally and solely within their jurisdiction that the general public in one province have only a vague idea as to what their neighbours in the next province are doing. In education they have no knowledge of its status, its scope or its method so far as it relates to other provinces.

In passing may I ask this question of hon. members: Shall we ever have national unity as we should like to have it in this country as long as that remains true? Since we have little knowledge of the subject as between provinces, then I suggest that the first expenditure of federal public money should be made on a survey of conditions of education in each of our provinces, so that their needs may be determined. This would be only a small expenditure in relation to the general aid I recommend. It is my opinion that federal aid should not be a grant across the board, but rather a grant according to proven need.

There is preliminary work to be done. Surely there is machinery in the federal department to initiate that work. The education branch of the bureau of statistics is doing a good job now, and it could be broadened and expanded, or a similar branch could be set up under the auspices of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: We are doing quite a bit of that work now.

Mr. Knight: I know the minister is a busy man.

Mr. Martin: I said we are doing quite a bit of it already.

Mr. Knight: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Knowles: The principle has been established.

Mr. Knight: Such grants as I have suggested might be allocated to the compilation of necessary data and information so as to estimate (1) the ability of provinces to meet their educational requirements; (2) the amount per capita already being spent in that direction, and (3) the amount of federal aid necessary to bring about some reasonable amount of equalization in respect of educational facilities.

I have here a book headed "Teachers' Salaries and Qualifications in Eight Provinces," published by the dominion bureau of statistics. This publication apparently takes no account of Quebec, nor does it have any information about Newfoundland, because it is the report for 1948. It is a publication the study of which I would recommend to all hon. members. Perhaps the house would be interested in having on record some of the figures it sets out. It shows differences in salaries, in academic and professional standards, and in the length and quality of professional training. I referred to one case in which teachers in one province received twenty times as much training, in point of time, as teachers in other provinces. The differences are (a) as between province and province, and (b) as between urban and rural areas.

Education

I shall place on record some interesting tables as they are set out at page 3 of this red book. Table C shows the percentage of teachers with a university degree, by location, in 1948. These are the figures for the city schools:

Province	Percentage with university degree, city schools
Prince Edward Island	4
Nova Scotia	31
New Brunswick	23
Ontario	32
Manitoba	37
Saskatchewan	54
Alberta	34
British Columbia	42

I am proud of the figure shown for my native province of Saskatchewan. I shall not weary the house with the figures for schools in towns and villages, or large rural schools. However, let me draw the attention of hon. members to the figures for the one-room rural school, the basis of education in our country. These figures are as follows:

Province	Percentage with university degree, one-room rural schools
Prince Edward Island	·5
Nova Scotia	1·1
New Brunswick	·3
Ontario	·9
Manitoba	1·2
Saskatchewan	1·4
Alberta	1·7
British Columbia	2·9

The average figure for the eight provinces in city schools stands at 35 per cent, in town and village schools at 27 per cent, in rural schools with more than one room at 11 per cent, and in rural schools with only one room at 1·1 per cent. Perhaps the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) would think that that is why so many good men come from one-room rural schools. Unfortunately I cannot agree with him in that regard—even in a kindly way.

Another table appears in this book showing the percentage of substandard teachers in one-room rural schools. First of all, there should be no such thing as a substandard teacher; the two terms are almost contradictory. One may be substandard in his qualifications, but if he is, he should not be a teacher. From this table I shall read only one column of figures:

Province	Percentage of substandard teachers in one-room rural schools, 1948
Prince Edward Island	27
Nova Scotia	67
New Brunswick	41
Ontario	20
Manitoba	45
Saskatchewan	30
Alberta	18
British Columbia	33

While I believe I have already proved my point on this basis concerning the necessity for some federal assistance to the provinces, I shall place on record one more table dealing with salaries. While it is not always true that the size of the salary necessarily shows the qualifications or ability of the teacher, generally speaking I believe it is true. This table indicates the classification of teachers in all publicly controlled schools according to annual salary received in 1948:

Province	Average salary, male teachers
Prince Edward Island	$1,063
Nova Scotia	1,831
New Brunswick	1,550
Ontario	2,588
Manitoba	1,804
Saskatchewan	1,625
Alberta	2,406
British Columbia	2,787

I have not examined these figures closely, but my memory is that some of them are more than twice as large as some others.

Mr. Knowles: No statistics for Quebec?

Mr. Knight: There are no statistics for Quebec in this publication. I have no idea why. There are none for Newfoundland, either, for the reason I have already indicated. The complete figures appear in this book, and they make very interesting, but, so far as I am concerned, very sad, reading.

There is another interesting thing about teachers which those of Anglo-Saxon and French extraction should consider. What is the racial origin of the majority of teachers in our prairie schools? At the moment the greater number of the teachers in western Canada are of neither Anglo-Saxon nor French origin. Well, racial origin or language has nothing to do with one's ability as a teacher, but it is interesting to most of us in this house of those origins to know we are not doing our share in contributing recruits to the profession. Thirty per cent of those in the profession have expressed the intention of not continuing in it. In most cases the parents of the teachers—I am talking now about the western prairies and British Columbia—are farmers and skilled labourers who sent their children to the normal schools.

I have had some experience as a high school teacher in a city. We discovered that our better students were not going to the normal schools. These young people stated quite frankly that they did not expect to be able to maintain a good standard of living by following the teaching profession. This is a fact that must be faced. If we want good teachers for our children, we are going to have to pay for them. You cannot expect to get good men and women for nothing. You cannot expect a man to go out in Saskatchewan or any other province and raise a family and contribute to the welfare of the community on a salary of $800 a year. I do not want my children taught by that sort of person, that is if that salary is any true measure of his worth.

To come back to the matter in hand, aid to education has been given before, but only in the form of special grants which were paid because of emergency. As a matter of fact, most of these grants in aid of education have arisen out of short-term policies, some of which remained and some of which did not. We need a long-term policy on a permanent basis for this whole thing.

As I say, these grants emphasized some special phase of education, such as vocational training during the war. I could talk for a long time on the question whether or not things like that are education. What is education? It is a subject I will not tackle here.

Mr. Mitchell: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Knight: I see the Minister of Labour is trying to interject. I do not agree that education is something that you learn in a technical school, that it is a quick course given to teach a person how to fly an aeroplane or to be able to shoot straight with a machine gun. That is far removed from what I understand education to be.

Mr. Mitchell: If some of us did not work with our hands, what would happen? My hon. friend says that you do not obtain education at the vocational school. Let me tell him that I have done fairly well with my hands.

Mr. Knight: I think the minister is confusing training with education. I have heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) say many things, and I have quoted him on various occasions, but I think one of the best things he ever said was that the man who was best fitted to assimilate education and appreciate it was the man who had worked with his hands as a boy on a Saskatchewan farm. So far as I am concerned, I am prepared to back that up one hundred per cent. Even if the Minister of Labour had said it I would have supported it.

At the moment I am speaking of federal aid for general education—and I said "general" education. The whole future of this nation depends upon the quality of that education. Far be it from me to detract from technical or vocational training, or for that matter from the federal grants in aid of university education. I am in favour of all these things. I hope the universities will receive grants; they are certainly in need of them, and they should have support from federal funds. I am pleased to note that the Saskatchewan university has been provided with a grant of $1,125,000 by the Saskatchewan provincial government in the budget for 1950-51. I hope the universities will receive federal aid, but I want it made quite clear that such aid should not be permitted to delay or divert our minds from the greater field, which in my opinion is education in general.

In conclusion let me emphasize that federal aid should be granted so that every child in Canada, irrespective of where he lives or of the economic status of his parents, should be guaranteed a minimum of education as of right; consistent, of course, with his ability to take advantage of that education. The greatest need of our age and for the future is that our children have an interest not only in their own province and in their own country, but in the wide community of the world. So far as education can help to fill that need, it is worthy of support by all the resources of this nation.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have no thought of attempting to examine too strictly the exact wording of the motion now before the house. I believe its intention is clear. As I understand it, the purpose of the motion is to bring to the attention of the government, through a vote of this house, the desirability of equalizing educational opportunity across Canada. I concur in the aims and objects expressed by the mover of the resolution.

There is only one point in regard to which I suggest that some caution should be exercised. In supporting the motion the hon. member said that we have little knowledge of the situation in the different provinces. Without raising the point for the purpose of criticism, I wish to say emphatically that there is a great deal of knowledge available. For many years the Canadian Education Association, which is representative of every province—including Newfoundland, even before Newfoundland became a part of Canada—has been examining this whole field, not only from the point of view of abstract educational problems, but from the comparative point of view as well. I should be greatly concerned if the adoption of the resolution led to the creation of a further board or commission of inquiry. The Canadian Education Association is fully capable of dealing with the question of the comparative levels of education across Canada. It is composed of the technical experts in each province who understand exactly what the situation is today and what the desirable level would be in the years ahead. I mention this in the hope that the resolution will pass, that the government will act upon it, and that the government will then consult those who have been studying this very question for many years.

It has already been said that there is no idea that the adoption of the motion should be taken as suggesting any encroachment upon provincial jurisdiction. It is a good thing to keep that in mind. Undoubtedly the house should be most careful not to make any suggestion that would lead to any measure of encroachment upon the jurisdiction of the provincial departments of education over this field. This does not mean, however, that the provincial governments would not welcome a measure of support which would make it possible for them to carry out the general advancement of their educational programs.

I wish to support what has already been said, and to repeat that it is necessary to deal with this matter on the basis of the special requirements of the different provinces, because the aim should be not only to assist education but also to equalize opportunities for education in every part of Canada.

I think it is particularly appropriate that the resolution should come up at this time. Later this year there is to be a dominion-provincial conference. The problem of equalizing education in a satisfactory manner is one which requires effective co-operation between the dominion government and the provincial governments whose responsibility it is to direct educational programs in their respective jurisdictions. I hope that with the adoption of the resolution the government will then determine what can be done and will be in a position to deal with the subject when that conference meets later this year. I suggest, however, that no attempt be made to lay down any conditions as a qualification upon which financial assistance would be dependent. If that is done, the purpose which the resolution seeks to achieve will be defeated, because the provinces most certainly will not welcome an indirect measure of control which they would not accept directly.

In considering this subject I think there are ways in which the dominion government can assist without of necessity limiting their assistance to such arrangements as may be made for ordinary educational facilities. To a great extent the qualifications of our teachers will depend upon the number of young men and women who can take university courses, and particularly those branches of university courses which will qualify them for teaching. There is a great opportunity for the dominion to assist in that field by extending the number of scholarships which will make it possible for young men and women to take university training of that kind. Scholarships already are being granted. The number could be greatly extended with advantage to every part of the country.

There is another field in which the dominion government can act directly to assist the general cause of education. Today in this and every highly developed country, research in the field of education, in medicine, engineering, pure science and the broad general field, is the very basis of our progress. Grants might well be made to assist in research under each of these headings, and also to provide sustaining scholarships, in order that young men and women who demonstrate special qualifications in any field of research may be able to carry forward their advanced studies in Canada; thus we would reap the full benefit of the education they receive.

From time to time we speak with regret about the fact that intelligent young men and women, who have had the advantage of our educational system in the public schools, high schools and universities, have left Canada and availed themselves of opportunities open to them elsewhere. It is highly important to the advancement of Canada that we provide sustaining scholarships at a level which will encourage young men and women of the keenest intelligence to stay here in the field of research, whether it be in education, medicine, science, or anything else. I do not think we should be satisfied unless we can say without reservation that all our children, no matter where they may live, no matter what the circumstances of their parents may be, have open to them equality of educational opportunity to the utmost limit of human ability. That should be our purpose; and as I interpret the resolution, that is its intention.

The more we spend on education the less we will spend on reform and on prisons. When we ask where the money is to come from—and that is a very sensible question —I suggest that we could probably save some of the enormous expenditures we are now called upon to make on prisons and reformatories if we spent an additional amount in providing educational opportunities in all parts of this great land.

That does not apply only to moral status; it applies also to the health of our people. No greater measure of personal security can ever be given our citizens than to implant in their hearts and minds the highest possible character and the highest possible personal standards. Moreover, the best security we can give against avoidable ill health is to impress upon our people a sense of social discipline and training which will prepare them, to the very limit of their ability, to meet the physical as well as the mental tests of life.

Today education assumes greater importance than at any time in the past. It has been said in this house during the present session as in earlier sessions, and as it will be said again, that we are in the midst of a world-wide struggle for the minds of men and women. We are. We are not in a cold war. War is war; and we are engaged in a war between decency and slavery. Toward the winning of that war, to which we have already committed so much of our national strength, a very basic preparation may be made in our homes, our churches and our schools. The character of our people, which our children develop at their mother's knee, when they go with their parents to church, and later in the great public institutions of learning, will very largely determine our success or failure in that so-called cold war. Education is the very foundation of our civilization.

I propose to support this resolution, as I hope others will, without too precise an examination of its wording, with the simple thought and hope in mind that the government will take those preliminary steps as a result of which they will be ready to join with the provinces in expanding equality of educational opportunity to every part of Canada.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before us calls upon the government to take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada through the granting of financial assistance to the provinces for that purpose. Before proceeding further, may I commend the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) on having again brought this resolution before us. I say "again" because last fall the same resolution was considered by the house for a very brief period of time. I commend the hon. member also on the skill and sincerity with which he presented his case.

When the resolution was before us last fall the time factor operated in such a way as to prohibit many of us from expressing our views upon this extremely important subject. While prevented from doing so on that occasion, however, we have taken advantage of other opportunities to extend our support to the general proposition under consideration. In fact last February my leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), was so much concerned with the importance of this subject that he devoted a substantial portion of his speech during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne to the question of federal aid to education. As a former teacher and a former minister of education in the province of Alberta, the hon. member was admirably qualified to deal with this subject in a practical and realistic manner.

On that occasion the hon. member for Peace River made two extremely important assertions. I am not going to undertake to quote them verbatim because I realize that would not be in keeping with the rules of the house; however, he said something to this effect. First, nothing can contribute more to the internal security of Canada than a broad, general understanding on the part of her citizens; and second, if democracy is to function successfully and yield the results the people want from the management of their affairs, there must be a high general level of educational achievement among the people.

There is much to commend itself to us in those two statements. As hon. members will realize, owing to its size, its widely varying resources and the productive abilities within its boundaries, Canada has many areas in which incomes are much lower than in other areas. The degree of prosperity varies very definitely from province to province, and indeed from municipality to municipality within the province. As I think my leader also mentioned in February, the bulk of the revenues from which the school districts must pay their educational costs come from taxation upon real property. The inevitable result is a wide divergence in educational opportunity, because within certain areas there is substantially less real property for the authorities to tax. In those districts where production is unusually low and incomes therefore are very small, certainly there is less opportunity for our boys and girls to enjoy the educational opportunity and educational standards that are essential to their welfare and to the welfare of this country. I am told that many of our local school authorities are obliged to raise more than seventy per cent of their educational requirements through taxation imposed upon real property in the community. One appreciates how small must be the over-all receipts from the imposition of taxes where the amount of real property is limited.

In assessing current educational costs one cannot but give some consideration to several important factors which have resulted in an almost skyrocketing spiral of educational costs within this country. I have been told that anywhere from fifty to seventy per cent of the budgets of many local educational authorities goes to pay the salaries of the school teachers. I know, for example, that within my own province we have seen a greater increase in the salaries of teachers during the past five years than during any other five-year period in our history. Speaking of rural areas only, the salaries of teachers have increased by an average of eighty-five per cent.

I mention that only to indicate how in one field alone the burden of educational costs has climbed so rapidly within our country. I want to hasten at this point to say, Mr. Speaker, that certainly I know, from quite a number of years of personal experience, taking into consideration at the same time the nature of the work performed by teachers and also the present-day cost of living, that the teachers of Canada are today disastrously underpaid. The $1,500 or $1,600 averages in my province, for example, in our rural communities represent probably 85 per cent to 100 per cent increase since the thirties. But is there anyone here who would argue for one moment that even a $1,500 or $1,600 average for schoolteachers, even in the rural areas of any province in Canada, is fit, proper or adequate recognition of the outstanding services which they perform to the community and to Canada? Yet when I refer to those $1,500 or $1,600 averages, I am quoting averages which are substantially higher there than in a great many other parts of this great dominion. Considered in the light of the training which it is necessary and desirable for a teacher to have, taken into consideration along with the highly important nature of the services performed by a teacher, and taken in relationship to the incomes of other employee groups within the country, I would say that salaries generally are terribly low, disgracefully low.

[Mr. Shaw.]

One cannot but note the increased cost of construction and equipment of school buildings within the Dominion of Canada. I have no specific figures available; but in passing I might just mention the fact that in my own province, for example, in a period of three years, 1947-49, capital construction increased from $2·6 million in the year 1947 to $4·7 million in 1949. If one were to take the general capital cost of construction in the educational field, I think that those figures might easily represent not a 100 per cent overall increase in the number of units built in 1949, but an additional cost represented by an almost double cost of providing the same units which were being provided in 1947.

Speaking last February my leader suggested to the government that it might be advisable for them to set up a revolving fund out of which the educational authorities within the country might be able to borrow money at a low rate of interest for the purpose of constructing schools and equipping them. In my province a step in that direction has been taken. Only this year such a revolving fund was set up by the government of the province of Alberta. Any school district within that province is able to borrow up to 25 per cent of its authorized borrowing for the purpose of school construction; possibly I should have said "approved school construction". The local board is required to repay only one-half of the original loan and there is no interest payable on that sum. Payments are extended over a ten-year period of time. I mention that fact only as an indication of something that probably could be done by the dominion government in order to assist capital construction in many parts of this Dominion of Canada.

Only recently I was advised that the cost of school equipment, principally schoolbooks in libraries and the like, has advanced by approximately 40 per cent within the last five years. I realize that there are certain definite reasons for this, such as an increase in the costs of materials which go into these books, advances in wage rates, rising transportation costs, and the devaluation of the Canadian dollar in relation to the American dollar. This latter factor comes in there substantially because of the fact that a goodly part of the printed materials in book form which are used are printed in the United States; and the additional 10 per cent has to be paid because of the devaluation.

We may get another picture of what is occurring from another reference to my province, and I am making references to my own province because of the fact that naturally one would have more information about his own province than he would about the others, and because of the fact that for some years I occupied a position in the school-teaching profession in that province. Taking my own province, in 1947 the educational costs were $19·9 million; by 1949 those costs had increased to $26·6 million. The provincial authorities there have been endeavouring to relieve the burden which is imposed upon the local district by accepting increasing responsibility for meeting the over-all costs of education. I am, however, the first to admit that this action has not been reflected too greatly in the local field because of the continuing high costs of almost everything that goes into education. For example, within a period of three years, my province has increased the grants to the local school district by more than 6 per cent, from approximately 21·5 per cent to 27·2 per cent, while at the same time trying to assume ever greater costs such as contributions to a teacher retirement fund, which in itself has jumped from $6,600 in 1939 to over $587,000 in this year, 1950. I point that out, Mr. Speaker, as showing the increase in the cost of education and showing that, even though the province may go as far as it can having regard to its responsibilities in the over-all field, most of our provincial governments are experiencing a great deal of difficulty in meeting the over-all cost of education.

I may just refer to this matter of school grants for a moment, and once again using my own province largely because of the fact that it is with that province that I am familiar. School grants in the fiscal year 1935-36 amounted to $1·39 million. By 1949 those had increased to $7·78 million; and I am not taking into account of course this figure of $587,000 which is paid into the teacher retirement fund. As far as my province is concerned this represents an increase in cost of approximately 2 per cent. While 2 per cent does not sound like very much, it is 2 per cent of a budget which is probably five times what the budget was in 1935. In dollars it represents an increase of almost 700 per cent.

Again, Mr. Speaker, within that province expenditures on education from income account increased from $2·4 million in 1935-36 to over $10·71 million in 1948-49, and in 1950 it will likely go to $11·22 million. That represents an increase from 13·3 per cent to 23·5 per cent. I am going to say this before someone else does. I recognize that the province of Alberta has been extremely fortunate as far as industrial development is concerned. However, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to refrain from saying that that sort of thing has not come just as the result of the passage of time or by accident. We have been extremely fortunate in having within that province a government which I characterize as a wise government, and as a government which has pursued policies which have resulted in the rapid development of those great resources.

If a province like mine, Mr. Speaker, with its increased revenues resulting in part from the greatly expanded industrial development within the past two or three years, finds it difficult, how much more difficult must it be for so many of the provinces where a corresponding set of circumstances has not existed. If it is becoming a burden in a province like mine, what must the situation be in certain of our maritime provinces, for example? The mere fact that we have been able to do some of these things of course does not mean that other provinces should immediately undertake to do it too; but is there any reason why the children living in some of these other provinces should be deprived of that quality of educational opportunity which I think all hon. members agree they should have?

When my leader spoke in February he was criticized, not in this house, but by a publication which I have had to refer to before and am sometimes obliged to call a questionable publication, namely, the Farm and Ranch Review. I do not know why I should pay any attention to it; nobody else does. It is a publication which is the product of a politically ambitious, though hopelessly frustrated individual. In its March issue this publication states—I am going to read this first statement because it will reflect the mental turmoil of the editor.

Mr. Low: Who is he?

Mr. Shaw: A man by the name of Porter.

Mr. Low: Marsh Porter?

Mr. Shaw: Yes. Probably the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows him. He says:

> Offhand, we can imagine nothing of less consequence to this society than a speech by Mr. Solon Low, the leader of the Social Credit party in the House of Commons.

I think that proves what I said previously, Mr. Speaker. That expression is nothing but the irresponsible product of a politically ambitious but hopelessly frustrated mind. I continue:

> But when he asks the dominion government for aid for schools, we cannot resist calling his attention to the fact that he is talking to the wrong people.
> It should have been directed to his party-liners in Alberta. This year the Alberta government's income from oil lands royalties will far exceed $30 million. This income from wasting assets should go into permanent capital assets.

I am just going to digress at this point to remind you, Mr. Speaker, and the house, that not long ago when I spoke here I referred to this same publication and to the criticism of the government of Alberta contained in it for paying off a very substantial part of its provincial debt and saving the people of the province an additional $18 million a year which they would have had to pay in interest and carrying charges had not that portion of the debt been liquidated. This is the publication that criticized the Alberta government for having done that, and yet they come along with this, which they would like to think is a great display of wisdom. They begin by telling us that we should be giving consideration to the fact that our oil and gas are wasting assets, and that we should take the proceeds from them and put them into other permanent assets. We have always declared, as has the premier of my province, that we recognize these are diminishing assets; but had we listened to the editor of the Farm and Ranch Review we would never, even from the beginning, have looked upon the proceeds from this development as diminishing assets. They go on and say:

> No finer program for building up Alberta could be devised than a province-wide government financed school construction project.

When this publication came out the editor did not know, even though the papers were full of it, that the government of my province had set up a very substantial borrowing revolving fund for the construction of capital assets in the educational field within that province. I continue:

> The Alberta educational council has urged the Manning government to undertake just that. It, of course, will pay no attention to the A.E.C.

In view of what has been done already this spring I think you, Mr. Speaker, as well as I, could find the appropriate language with which we might describe that particular editorial. I realize, sir, it would not be parliamentary whether you thought of it or whether I thought of it. I continue:

> Maybe it would listen to Mr. Low.

The government of Alberta undoubtedly heard Mr. Low when he was speaking here, even though they were a couple of thousand miles away, but obviously the local government with its representatives in the same building did not hear him, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to remind the house that not only did the hon. member for Peace River point out that federal assistance should be made available for educational purposes, but he went on and mentioned several ways or methods by which this could be done. He referred to the old Municipal Improvements Assistance Act which, as I believe he said at the time, has been in mothballs for a long time. It was an act under which approved projects entered into by school districts and municipalities could be financed in part at least under this act on an interest rate approximating 2 per cent per year. Certainly that act, or something comparable with it, could be put into operation and we could assist materially in meeting the burden of heavy capital outlays by our school districts in the several provinces.

He also referred to the school trust moneys. This would affect Saskatchewan and Alberta particularly; but so far as Alberta is concerned they still have $12 million here which I say we could put up a very strong argument for as a province. We feel that it is ours even though in the stricter sense of the word it is not.

The interest from that money was to be made available to the province to assist in educational work. We believe that $12 million itself could be put into a revolving fund out of which money could be borrowed for capital construction. Repeating again what the hon. member for Peace River said, we cannot see any continuing justification for the heavy taxes at present imposed upon vans and school busses. In my own part of the country, as well as in other areas of Canada, we have endeavoured to improve the educational facilities by the centralization of service. For example, in a community we have found that we could provide certain advanced educational courses for our pupils, provided a number of pupils were brought in from certain areas, so that one school could be constructed and equipped, and the very finest of teachers available could be induced to teach. An ever-increasing number of vans and busses are being used to transport these children.

However, the federal government insists upon imposing heavy taxes on these vehicles. We have urged and continue to urge the removal of such taxes. Finally, we would favour a straight grant to the provinces. Personally, I would go so far as to say that special consideration should be given to the poorer districts, so far as those grants are concerned. We are not limiting the action of the federal government to those specific fields, but would be glad to approve any measure which in effect would have the result of granting assistance to each province for educational purposes, and thus have the result of improving the educational standards and granting greater equality of educational opportunity for our youngsters.

I should like to see a vote taken on this resolution. After all that is the best way to ascertain where we all stand in a matter of this kind. What I have said today has been said for my associates in the Social Credit group. Those are the things we have fought for; those are the things we shall continue to fight for. We realize the provinces should do all they reasonably can within this field of education, and we assert that Alberta, at least, has accepted its responsibility.

Before taking my seat let me say that we have always stressed the fact that the administration of education should remain within the provincial jurisdiction, where it is today. Moreover we cannot forget also that a number of precedents have been established for the type of assistance set out in the resolution.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length, because I join with the hon. member who has just taken his seat in my desire to see a vote taken on this resolution.

May I first thank the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) for what he has done in introducing the resolution and giving the house an opportunity to discuss a matter of particular interest and importance to all Canadians. I intend to support the motion, and I shall do so with no apologies for having on many occasions stressed the necessity for economy. Economy is parsimony when applied too strictly to education, because expenditures in education pay dividends by way of good citizenship which do not flow from many other expenditures parliament must necessarily make.

I join with those who have preceded me in stating that while at all times provincial rights must be preserved and maintained, and nothing must be done that in any way would appear to be control on the part of the federal authority over education, jurisdiction over which rests with the provinces, the carrying out of this motion would in no way constitute interference either directly or indirectly with provincial jurisdiction in the broad field of education.

Indeed, as the motion reads it can be accepted in principle by all, irrespective of the desire of each of us to support the constitution in its entirety. The mechanics for the carrying out of this motion must necessarily be left to those charged with the responsibility of carrying it out. I know of no better summary of the situation in general than that given in November, 1949, by the Canadian Teachers Federation, as set out in a booklet issued by them and entitled "Federal Aid to Education". As a foundation for the argument I intend to advance I should like to refer to one or two of the submissions made in this brief.

It states that the Canadian Teachers Federation represents a membership of some 60,000 and that, taken with La Corporation Générale of Quebec, makes up 99 per cent of the men and women who are in daily contact with boys and girls in Canadian schools. It points out that the federation is non-political, is not unduly affected by special interests, and is independent of governments, both dominion and provincial. It is only fair to say, and properly, that the Canadian Teachers Federation has lived up to its responsibilities and its desire to build the best Canadian citizenship.

In the course of this brief it quotes from its representations made to the government in February, 1949. On that occasion it said, in part:

> We believe that a straight per pupil capita grant would bring the greatest benefits compatible with the safeguards which certain provinces would require to guarantee that the federal government would not infringe upon their jurisdiction in the field of education. . . We do not overlook the possible additional assistance which the federal government may render generally through an extension of the research program of the education branch of the bureau of statistics or through grants earmarked for specific purposes.

Then it expresses the desire to work with any committee set up by the cabinet, and also with representatives of the provinces, to the end that a system may be arrived at mutually agreeable to the federal and provincial authorities. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) dealt with that phase of the matter and suggested—I believe properly—that the mechanics of the fulfilment of the motion might very well be left to the dominion-provincial conference which is to reconvene this fall.

It sums up in a general way the answer to the question so often raised, namely that federal help might be regarded as an invasion of provincial jurisdiction, in that it might imply control by the federal authority over education in the provinces. I believe the answer given in the brief is a conclusive answer to those who advance that argument, when it says:

> Federal aid for education is a need born of a shift in taxation. Meeting this need may involve fiscal control—safeguards in the spending of funds from the federal treasury—but not policy control.
> In any plan of federal assistance it would be understood and agreed that the expenditure of funds by the government of Canada would in no way be deemed to confer upon any minister or official of the government of Canada any right of supervision or control over any school or educational institution with respect to which federal government funds are expended.

I would go further and say that it should not imply either control of the plan or the use that is made of the moneys advanced. One often hears it said that private members' days are a waste of time, and sometimes the number of members in the chamber would indicate that there was ground for that belief. But I believe it is through the instrumentality of resolutions such as this that private members' days provide an opportunity to the private member to discharge responsibilities that might otherwise be denied him. When this matter came up last fall the minister spoke on October 19, as recorded on page 946 of Hansard. Before the Prime Minister had concluded, the debate was adjourned and as private members' days ceased to exist for that session the motion died the inevitable death that occurs when private members' days are done away with. The Prime Minister spoke quite shortly and tersely and used these words:

> I am sure all hon. members have welcomed this opportunity of focusing their attention upon this assertion, one which certainly appeals to each and every one of us, that there should be across Canada the greatest possible degree of equality of opportunity for the education of our young Canadians, the Canadians of the next generation.

That is an expression with which we are all in agreement. Then the Prime Minister went on to say:

> Whether or not the granting of financial assistance by the federal government to the various provinces could be arranged in such a manner as to avoid exercising any direct or indirect control over the field of education, which is essentially within provincial jurisdiction, is a question offering greater possibilities of controversy.

With all the respect that one must have for the opinion of the Prime Minister I find it difficult to follow him in those words. We have grants in aid in various departments of government, all without supervision or direction in any way as to the means of expenditure. If we accept the need, if we accept the desirability of equality of education in all provinces, if we believe that Canadian citizenship can be built up only upon the foundation of equal opportunity to all young Canadians irrespective of their geographical location, then surely there can be no objection to the acceptance of this motion. It does not state that there shall be control; it leaves the administration to the provincial authorities. It makes the declaration of agreement with the necessity of the government taking into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada. After the Prime Minister dealt with that phase of the matter, he took another means of postponing consideration of the motion when he said in effect that as the Massey royal commission was sitting parliament should wait until it had brought down its report. So that there will be no misunderstanding of what the Prime Minister said I read his words as follows:

> Hon. members know that, at the present time, there is a royal commission investigating the problem as to whether or not we are making the best possible use of the public moneys being expended for the promotion of the development of the aspect of national life in Canada which is not measured in statistical trade returns, or in dollars and cents, or pounds and shillings.

Then a little later:

> It will certainly be a matter of months before we can obtain a report from that commission, and I should think it would be wise not to attempt to determine with any degree of precision how the purposes can best be served until we have had that report.

It is not a question of how the purposes can best be served because this motion simply declares the desire of the house that the government should take into consideration means for expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose. In any event it is for the House of Commons and parliament to determine this question. The Prime Minister recognized the desirability of having equality of opportunity in education for the children of this country. That is all there is in this motion. I do not suggest that there was anything intentional in the termination of private members' days after October 19 last year, but whether there was or not it certainly was completely effective in the postponement of any action being taken on this motion.

I hope that this motion will be voted on today. I shall not speak for more than ten or twelve minutes, because I will not be a party to denying this house an opportunity to vote on this important matter.

There is one matter to which I think I should make reference. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) pointed out that in the prairie provinces the majority of teachers were of other than Anglo-Saxon or French origin. I do not know what he had in mind when he said that. I do not think it is racial origin that determines whether or not a Canadian is qualified to teach in our schools and inculcate principles of democracy in the children of the present or the next generation. I know the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will join with me when I say that many of these young men, whose parents came to this country forty or fifty years ago, are carrying out the principles of democracy which so many of them displayed on battlefields all over the world during the recent war.

Mr. Knight: I wonder if the hon. member would let me put myself right in that regard? I agree with everything the hon. member has said. What I really had in the back of my mind was to blame people of Anglo-Saxon and French origin for not taking on the job. I quite agree that racial origin has nothing to do with the making of a good teacher, but it is a point of interest to us in this house who are mostly of Anglo-Saxon and French origin that our own people are not doing this job.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the hon. member for indicating that he has the same view that others from the western provinces have in that regard. I am not going to say that I was much of a teacher myself because my career as one did not last very long.

Mr. Mitchell: I guess they found you out.

Mr. Hodgson: There wasn't enough money in it for you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, it was not that. I did not intend to mention this, but the fact was that my clock was fast. During the time I should have been in school I was out shooting gophers. The inspector, the late Dr. Magee, came along and indicated that gopher shooting was not a part of the curriculum and at the termination of the short term my permit was not renewed.

We hear a good deal today about the Doukhobor problem. The Doukhobors make good citizens; it is the Sons of Freedom who have not made good citizens and who show no signs of doing so. In the school where I taught there were five Doukhobor boys who constituted the majority of pupils in that school. Three of them became professional men. One became a leading artist and the fifth became a missionary. That is indicative of what happens under our public school system. Those Doukhobors were a good type and made good citizens. In the main those in the province of Saskatchewan do not belong to the Sons of Freedom who today hold the law in contempt and show no regard for the educational opportunities they have had. One hon. member has said that education of itself will produce good citizenship. I knew some of the Sons of Freedom whom we had in our province before they migrated to British Columbia. Some of them were well educated but nevertheless they did not become better citizens in spite of the educational advantages they had.

Every conceivable argument in support of the resolution has been advanced by the mover and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) today, as on October 19 last. Summarizing my remarks, and supporting the resolution as I do, I believe that the resolution will provide certain advantages. First it will provide an opportunity for greater equality among Canadians everywhere in the matter of education. Second, it will make possible the raising of teachers' salaries so that the best men and women will be mobilized for service in the great profession of teaching. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) explained the meaning of his words a while ago. I feel that the teaching profession is so notoriously underpaid today, even having regard to recent increases in the last few years, that however desirous most young Canadians with the necessary educational advantages may be to remain in the profession the rewards are too low. The level of reward is so low that it is no inducement to remain in the profession to those who wish to advance themselves and secure the material advantages of life. Everything should be done which will assure increase of their salaries. That would be possible under advances made by the federal authority, although not earmarked for that purpose.

In the third place, it would enable the extension of a system of scholarships, to which reference has already been made. Within the last few years there has been a wide extension in the granting of scholarships. To my knowledge the finest example in the world of the granting of scholarships is the Scottish system. Recently I was reading Lord Shaw's views on the subject. At the end of his life he was able to name many of the outstanding Scottish people of his generation whose contribution to their country had been made possible by a system of national scholarships.

I feel sure that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will be the first to support the resolution on this ground if for no other. On the 24th of February, 1937, a private members' day, he introduced a motion in the house reading:

> That, in the opinion of this house, following the practice already established in Great Britain and other industrial countries, the government should investigate the desirability of a system of national scholarships to be made available to outstanding students who are financially unable to continue their education, to enable them to secure undergraduate and (or) post-graduate training in our universities, university colleges, agricultural colleges and technical schools.

I should like to see the system of scholarships extended. I know something of the results in the province of Saskatchewan. Some twenty-eight years ago the Masonic order established a system of scholarships in that province available to all regardless of religious faith or racial origin. The purpose was to provide worthy Saskatchewan students with advanced education conditional on their undertaking to teach in the rural schools of the province where the population was of other than Anglo-Saxon or French origin. That system went a long way toward the improvement of educational opportunities. Several of these young men of various racial origins are making their contribution not only in the research council of Canada but also in the bureau of national standards at Washington, and their opportunities for that wider field of service were provided as a result of the establishment of these scholarships in our province.

Mr. Knight: I was one of them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I intended to mention that.

Mr. Knight: I did not know you knew.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I knew that. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) was one of those who received a scholarship and utilized it in such a way that two of his former pupils, the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison) and the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson), are now members of the House of Commons. The scholarship won by the hon. member for Saskatoon paid off in good citizenship in the house to which he and I have the honour to belong.

Having said that, I join in what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said in support of the resolution. I feel sure it is worthy of the support of members in all parts of the house. It is a resolution on which there should be a vote, and it should not be talked out.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is only by accident that I find myself in a position to speak on the resolution at this time. The discussion that has taken place up to the moment is one to which I can take very little exception. One might agree with most of the things that have been said. There was one suggestion, however, made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), which makes it necessary for someone in the government to say something at the moment. Since I happen to be the senior member of the government present at this time, it becomes my duty to make some remarks.

It has been suggested by the last speaker that because this resolution was considered on the last private members' day last session, and so near the end of that day that it was impossible to have a full discussion or to have a vote taken, the same thing might be intended on this occasion; and the last remarks of the hon. member were an appeal to us to see to it that the resolution was not talked out. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not the desire of the government to have it talked out. It is the desire of the government to have a vote taken; but I am not going to agree that it is the desire of the government to have a vote taken on the issues which have been presented to the house this afternoon.

Most of those issues did not have very much to do with the resolution; and most of us could agree with many of the things that have been said. But I think we should read the resolution, and should perhaps accept the interpretation that was placed upon it by the mover rather than the interpretation it has been given by others. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said he was not going to quarrel too much with the wording of the resolution. I can quite understand that, for if he had started to quarrel with it he would have had to oppose the resolution, on the arguments he presented before he resumed his seat. Therefore I suggest that, accepting the interpretation of the mover of the resolution, when we vote upon it we do not vote on the question of whether or not grants should be made by the federal government to promote research in education, for example. The federal government has been making grants to promote research in education under all governments for many years. I was going to say that has been done since the time of confederation, but I have not checked the records back that far. At any rate the government has been making these grants ever since I have had anything to do with education or with politics, and that takes me back at least thirty-six years.

Most of the types of research grants that were spoken of were given freely to institutions of higher education right across Canada, where that kind of research work is carried on. Grants for research purposes in connection with soil surveys, for example, are given to universities and colleges of agriculture right across the country, to promote examination of the qualities of soils and everything that goes with that in relation to agriculture. Grants have been made to assist in the development of ways and means to better safeguard the health of the people of Canada. Those grants have been made to universities and medical and nursing schools. Those are educational. Grants have been made to all provinces to encourage the setting up of technical schools, which the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) said he did not have in mind at all. Many others have had them in mind, and had educational grants of that kind in mind in discussing this resolution.

Mr. Knight: We already have that.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, we already have it, and my hon. friend said that was not what he was talking about. Eventually I am going to get down to what he was talking about. He was not talking of the kind of grant given to technical schools to promote the development of that kind of education; he was talking about something else. From what he said I am quite sure he was not talking about the kind of research grants we are making already to universities right across the country. I assume he was not talking of the kind of support we gave the universities during and after the war which made it possible for young men to come back from overseas and get an education which otherwise they probably would not have been able to get. All these things have been done; all these things are accepted, and we are going on with them.

Then I take for granted that he was not talking about those scholarships that were mentioned by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Scholarships can be set up to promote education in various ways, and are set up more particularly to encourage people to go into that kind of educational work associated with research, technical pursuits and all that sort of thing. Scholarships are set up to encourage people to go into that work and devote their lives to chemistry, for instance, in order to make some great contribution to the health of our people. All these things are good. They are being dealt with in one way or another now. They all have to do with the promotion of that aspect of education about which, as I have always understood it, there has never been any question of the federal government doing something.

So I think my hon. friend got himself down pretty well to the elementary schools of this country, or if he went beyond those he was talking about what we might call the secondary schools. He suggested that teachers should be better paid, and that education in the different provinces should be more the same. If I interpret that in what I would consider to be proper language in relation to education, it seems to me it has to do with the curricula in the different provinces. I agree with much of what has been said to the effect that the educational systems of the different provinces are not entirely the same; but I would point out that undoubtedly the people in those areas think they should not be much more alike than they are at the present time. That is their view.

Mr. Knight: I know the minister wants to be fair, and I did state today that it was not my suggestion that the curricula should be interfered with, or that they should be uniform. I did not mean any such thing, and I do not think I said it.

Mr. Gardiner: I was being fair to my hon. friend, because I was not just emphasizing the two things he did say.

Mr. Knight: If I might conclude what I was about to say, I also used the words "grants in order to allow the various provinces to carry on the type of education in which they are at present engaged". Those were my words.

Mr. Gardiner: I was trying to avoid saying what I will have to say now. When my hon. friend rose he pointed out that he did not want anything done that would interfere with the curricula or that would interfere with the control of each province over its teaching staff, and so on. He did not want interference in anything which under our constitution the federal government cannot interfere in now. But in stating why this resolution was necessary and why it should be adopted he called attention to the fact that there are great differences in the curricula across the country. He called attention to the fact that teachers are paid much better in some provinces than in others. Then, just before he sat down, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), called attention to the same thing and pointed out that the province with the greatest financial ability to take care of its requirements of any of the western provinces, and with ability to do so probably equal to that of any province of Canada, was finding it difficult now to continue paying the present salaries. If that is the case, then I should like to suggest to him that probably if he were to follow the meaning of this resolution, if it has any meaning applied to that, when you average the amount right across the country and take the poorer provinces along with those which are better off, it might not have the result of increasing the salaries beyond the salaries that are now paid in some of the provinces.

Mr. Shaw: May I just point out, Mr. Speaker, that I did not tie it to salaries; I tied it to the entire educational costs. I referred to salaries.

Mr. Gardiner: My friend dealt with the fact that their salaries were $1,200 to $1,500 and that they were higher than in other provinces.

Mr. Shaw: I did not say that either.

Mr. Gardiner: You had better read your speech tomorrow.

Mr. Shaw: I said the average was $1,500 to $1,600 in rural areas.

Mr. Gardiner: That is higher still; $1,500 to $1,600 in rural areas; and he says they are finding difficulty in paying salaries on those levels in Alberta now. The hope is, from his argument, that after they have received this grant from the federal government, they will be able to improve upon that. That was the suggestion of the argument. I am simply saying this, Mr. Speaker: If the second-best-off province in Canada— and I will put it there rather than the top of the list—is paying better schoolteachers' salaries now than they can afford to pay, how are we going to increase salaries right across Canada by getting a grant out of the federal treasury that must come out of the pockets of all the people in all the provinces of Canada? That is one thing that I think we have got to have a little further look at. It is all right to suggest that we are not at the moment talking about spending more money in Canada. But if there is anything to the argument, we are talking about nothing else but spending more money in Canada: spending it for purposes that might be all to the good, but nevertheless it is more money.

That having been said and other things having been said, I think that again we should have a little further look at the resolution before us. I read the resolution a few moments ago; and I indicated that, as far as I could make out, the mover of the resolution was talking about elementary schools and possibly secondary schools; he was not talking about higher education where these grants for research and all that kind of thing are made. He was talking about the very thing that the fathers of confederation were talking about when they were discussing this thing back at the time of confederation. He was talking about the very thing that we have all been talking about ever since. We have assumed that the provincial governments must have the control over the curricula, over the salaries paid, over the hiring of teachers, over the education and training of teachers and all that kind of thing, in a country so varied as Canada is. Then when they came to the conclusion that separately these provinces could not fully finance a system of education or any of the other systems that they had been asked to finance, they decided that the proper thing to do was to give them a per capita grant, grants to take care of their public debt and grants to take care of the other things. They handed them that money and said "Do what you like with it".

Everyone who has supported this resolution this afternoon has been putting forth the argument that we should not put any strings on the money that we give to the provinces.

Mr. Knight: Except for one thing. What I did say was that the only control that I saw necessary was one control that would ensure that the money was spent for the purpose for which it was voted.

Mr. Gardiner: And that purpose is education.

Mr. Knight: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: Then that is control.

Mr. Knight: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, that is exactly what this resolution does mean. This resolution means that the government is being asked to give all grants to the provinces with this one string on them, that they must be spent for education. Then my friend has given the best demonstration we could possibly get of what members of this house would do if we did that. They would be saying that the curriculum of this province is not as good as the curriculum in that province. They would be saying that the teachers are not paid as much in this province as they are paid in that province. They would be discussing all these questions which he was discussing this afternoon. And I venture to say again that it is the very thing which the fathers of confederation were trying to avoid our having to discuss and which everyone since has been trying to avoid our having to discuss.

Having said that, I am not going to say that the federal government should not do anything more to assist in education across Canada. There has been a way and there is a way; and that way no one has found reason for changing up to the present. When we laid down the basis for grants that were to be made by the federal government to the provinces at the time of confederation, we said they were to be on a certain basis. If I remember correctly—and I am only speaking from memory; I have not discussed this question for a long time—it was about 1907 before we changed that basis materially. They called an interprovincial conference and they changed the level of those grants. Why did they change it? It does not matter whether it was in 1907 or one of the other years in that neighbourhood, but there was the first time when they changed it. And on the occasion when they did change it, it was because costs of these certain things had gone up; and because they had gone up and because there was much more of it to be done than had to be done before, they raised the grant. They did not say, "We are going to pay a grant to education; we are going to pay a grant to promote mining in a certain area". They did not say, we are going to pay a grant in order to promote this or to promote that, but they said, "We will increase the grant to the provinces." They paid the whole grant to them and then they left it to the provinces to determine how much of it they were going to spend on education and how much they were going to spend in other directions.

I have not any objection—and I am quite sure that there is not any member in the government who would have any—to the suggestion that was made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that these are questions that are going to be discussed next September. In the interprovincial conference that is to be held next September the question will be discussed as to whether or not the government of Canada should provide the provinces, through some means or other, with more money than they are being provided with at the present time. One speaker after another has been saying that he used to teach school. I myself taught school for ten years.

An hon. Member: That is too long.

Mr. Gardiner: That is too long perhaps to teach school at the salaries that we had then; I agree with the people who have been arguing that point. But nevertheless I did teach school. I was minister of education in the province of Saskatchewan for a number of years just as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) was minister of education in the province of Alberta. I may say that I never was minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan, but I was minister of several other things, and one of them was education. This question has been argued right back through the years. But every time it was argued we asked the people down here for more money. When I was there, we were getting about $4 million for all purposes. I think we are still getting that $4 million, although I have not had occasion to examine the records carefully. On top of that we are getting from the federal government somewhere between $13 million and $15 million of money paid into the treasury of Saskatchewan. There has never been a string put on it to say that they could not spend the whole $15 million for education if they wanted to. They have had that extra money. I presume that when they go to the meeting in September there is going to be an argument to the effect that the amount of money that has been paid to the provinces ought to be increased. I do not know whether or not the federal government is going to agree that it ought to be. I do not suppose anyone knows or will know until the arguments are heard. I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to the extent that, in a thing like this, the question as to whether we are going to change the whole system, under which moneys are made available for all purposes, to one of turning over a certain lump sum of money to the provinces and saying, "That is for education and for education only", is a question which should be considered in September. To come out and say: There is a certain sum of money; now that you have it we expect you to equalize your teachers' salaries with the salaries in every other province; we expect you to teach the same subjects in this school as are being taught in that school; we expect you to turn out pupils that have the same qualifications as in other provinces—that can only lead to trouble.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister is drawing a red herring across the trail.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend reads his speech tomorrow he will find out himself that he criticized the conditions that we have in Canada under which our students and pupils from different provinces are not coming out from our school with the same kind of education. I would just ask him to take a look at the house we have here, which is the result of the teachings of the educational systems of all the provinces in Canada.

I venture to say that if you were to take two lawyers, one from one province and one from another, and compared them, you would not find a lot of difference in their ability to deal with the questions with which they have to deal. I think you would find that true even of the chaps who taught school.

Mr. Rowe: What about the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Gardiner: There is not so much difference in qualification between those who sit in one part of the house and those who sit in another, or those who attended school in one part of the country and those who attended in another.

Mr. Rowe: What about the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Gardiner: When I was minister of education I did not agree that any other curricula or any other system was exactly right excepting the one that I was administering; but I have gone across Canada since then, and I had before that, and I found that each one of the provinces turned out a pretty creditable group of pupils from its schools; and if they have the opportunity to go through secondary schools, one group is just about as creditable as the other. If they go through the universities, pupils are turned out of equal ability from the different universities. For example, the other night I was invited over to my own alma mater dinner at the university of Manitoba. I found that we could muster quite a group down here who the civil service commission seem to think are pretty good people.

Mr. Martin: They cannot compare with the university of Toronto.

Mr. Gardiner: On another occasion I noticed that the university of Alberta was doing the same thing, as was the university of British Columbia. On each occasion it was found that you could get just about the same number from one area as from another. In addition you found that one group was just about as competent as the other.

As I go around, the only thing I find in my experience is that quite a number have wandered from the maritime provinces to the other provinces, and they seem to get back here by some means or other. Quite a large group of them have graduated from our different universities, but they had their birth down in the maritime provinces. Everyone in this house knows why that is. Down in the maritime provinces they have had some difficulties in establishing industries and other things that are necessary, and large numbers of their population have shifted further west; but it does not make any difference where they started in the elementary schools or where they got their secondary school education or their university education, when they come into this house or into the civil service at Ottawa one group measures up just about as well as another.

For that reason I say there is no use discussing this question from the point of view of making us all alike. If we were all alike perhaps we would not agree as much as we do now. As a matter of fact we agree only because we understand the situation in the area of the country from which we come. We realize that because we have some difficulties there, other people will have difficulties in their areas, although they may be different from ours. But the men who have been trained in the secondary schools and the universities of the different areas are able to represent their point of view and what the difficulties are in their areas just about as well in one section as in another.

I say that for this reason. I agree with what the leader of the opposition said, namely, that the proper place to discuss this question and bring it to a finality as a matter of decision is at the September meeting. I do not see any reason why there should be any great change in the method by which an additional amount of money is handed on to the provinces to be expended. If they are to have control over the expenditure of that money they will surely use a sufficient portion of it to take care of education. Therefore I think that is the time to consider the whole question.

On the matter as to whether or not it is going to interfere with the constitutional relationship between the provinces and the dominion, my suggestion is that we keep this as far away from that discussion as we can. I know of only one way of keeping away from a discussion and at the same time doing the thing that ought to be done, and that is, to make these grants, whatever grants we are to make, to the provinces without tying a string on them and saying: "You must spend this on education; you must spend this on something else." But say: "Here is the money. You know your problems; you understand what ought to be done." When we are speaking from time to time in this house we may say that one province is not spending enough on education, but they will probably tell us that it is none of our business, and they will go right on spending the money as they think it ought to be spent.

If we are to keep our people agreeing with one another across the country and cooperating in doing the things that ought to be done, we had better leave that question pretty well where it is. Since that is the question that the mover of the resolution says we are really dealing with, namely, a discussion of the question as to whether we are going to provide a grant earmarked for education, and thus introduce a discussion every session of the expenditures—whether or not they are being properly spent in order to do this or to do that—I say we had better leave that alone. If we are to pay an extra amount of money let us pay it in a general grant as always and say to the provinces: "Go ahead as usual and spend it." I am going to oppose the resolution.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO WINNIPEG—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "EVENING CITIZEN" OF MAY 22

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): On a matter of privilege affecting not only myself but every hon. member in this House of Commons may I say, Mr. Speaker, that in this afternoon's Evening Citizen there is an article headed: "Death grip relaxed in Red river valley." I have just returned personally from Winnipeg this morning. This article points out:

One Winnipeg reporter asked Mr. St. Laurent what the "little man" could expect—the man who had lost everything—in way of relief from the federal government.

The Irish temper of the 68-year-old Prime Minister seemed to spark. He replied sharply: "Directly? Nothing."

Now, there is a lengthy article—

Mr. Gardiner: Read it all. He did not say "nothing".

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why not wait until he is here?

Mr. Speaker: I do not see how this is a question of privilege to be raised at this time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If you will allow me to read two or three lines further on—I will read it all if I am permitted to.

Mr Speaker: There was no question of privilege.

Mr. Gardiner: On a question of privilege, as long as my hon. friend does not stop where he stopped—I read the article in the paper this morning—

Mr. Ross (Souris): Not this article.

Mr. Gardiner: The paper said that the Prime Minister stated that they would not be paying the money to the small man or to the big man, but any money that they were paying would be paid to the provincial government, and the provincial government would deal with others through the municipalities. That is what he said.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think this is the time to debate this question. If the house wants to hear—

Mr. Martin: Wait until the Prime Minister is here.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It turns out that the Manitoba relief fund is being terribly handicapped by it.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow it to be brought up at this time.

Mr. Hodgson: Did you see the article in the Citizen?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture is apparently acting as leader of the government today and has made those comments, may I submit to you, sir, that there is a question of privilege affecting every hon. member. I think every hon. member here had the right to believe, as a result of statements that were made, that certain provisions were being made to meet the situation, and as the report in this afternoon's paper seems to contradict that, every hon. member has a right to know what the policy of the government really is.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why not wait until the Prime Minister is here to bring it up?

Mr. Lennard: When will he be here? That is the question.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is an article in a newspaper which has quoted the Prime Minister as making certain statements. The Minister of Agriculture has said that it is not a complete statement. In any event I do not think this is the time to state this matter.

Mr. Rowe: May I submit that the house is not familiar with the issue. Hon. members will not know whether it is a question of privilege until the article is read.

Mr. Martin: This is not the time to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not accepting the statement which has been read as a question of privilege.

EDUCATION

EXPANDING AND EQUALIZING OF OPPORTUNITY—ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Knight:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) leading the government today has made it clear that he is opposed to the resolution. I presume that is a summons to all members supporting the government to rally against federal aid to education.

Mr. Martin: He said just the opposite.

Mr. Fleming: By the time the right hon. gentleman had finished I had to read the resolution again and recall some of the speeches made this afternoon, because it seemed to me that the resolution itself had been changed beyond all recognition, and that after the description given them by the right hon. gentleman some of the speeches made this afternoon were scarcely capable of recognition.

However, I go by the terms of the resolution—and they are perfectly clear—and also by statements made by hon. members participating in the debate, and not upon the secondhand rehashing of them by the Minister of Agriculture to suit his own purposes in the debate.

This is not a new resolution. It was before the house on October 19, at the last session, and appeared in identically the same form as we have it today. It is unfortunate that at that time little opportunity was given for debate. It came on a Wednesday afternoon, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself rising at about ten minutes to six and speaking briefly. The matter was not permitted to come to a vote, nor was it permitted to come before the house again at that session.

For my part I welcome the opportunity afforded the house today to pursue debate on this important subject, and I am very happy indeed to hear the Minister of Agriculture, speaking for the government, claim that he hopes to see this resolution brought to a vote today. I cannot think of anything that would be a more healthy occurrence in respect of this resolution than that it should come to a vote. And because I want to do all I can toward contributing to bring this question to a vote today, I shall be brief in my contribution to the debate.

The situation has changed only in two respects since the resolution was last debated on October 19. First, there has been evident in all parts of Canada a greater measure of support for the idea inherent in the resolution than had been apparent even up until that time. The second fact is that, if the deliberations of the Massey commission have any relevance, then presumably we are six or seven months closer to receiving the report from that commission than we were when the house debated this resolution last October. I am not suggesting that the fact that the Massey commission is sitting is a circumstance relevant to the debate at all. I mention this only because the Prime Minister in his brief contribution to the debate on October 19 cited that as a reason why apparently he did not wish to see the subject brought to a vote at that time.

I followed the Minister of Agriculture today with no little interest, and I shall attempt now to do that which he sought to do with reference to speeches preceding his speech in the debate, when he proceeded to state the substance of those speeches. The substance of the speech of the Minister of Agriculture, it seems to me was this, that what is being done now by the federal government and what is being done by provincial administrations in support of education is in all respects good and in all respects sufficient, and that therefore there is no occasion for any change in the present arrangement. With that statement I am in complete disagreement.

Mr. Gardiner: It is your statement, not mine.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: The situation is not satisfactory at the present time. It is a misleading kind of artifice in a debate, and a resort to adroit strategem by the right hon. gentleman when he says, "Now, here are the products of the educational system of one place, and here are the products of the educational system of another place; they are just about equal when they get down here." Well, it is a very different thing to compare the qualifications of the graduates of various universities from comparing what is really a proper matter for comparison in this debate, namely the educational opportunities for young Canadians across Canada, from coast to coast.

If ever there was a fine example of drawing a red herring across the trail, then certainly the Minister of Agriculture today has drawn the biggest red herring across any trail that has been seen in this House of Commons for a long time.

Mr. Knowles: And that's saying something, too!

Mr. Gardiner: You are turning Tory, again.

Mr. Martin: The minister was referring to the hon. member sitting to the left of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Knowles: I can still tell a red herring when I see one; and that one really smells.

Mr. Fleming: When anybody sees the light, the Minister of Agriculture should have no objection to people coming out of darkness into light.

The minister sought to suggest that there was some veiled assault upon the autonomy of the provinces in this resolution. What could possibly be more absurd! Everyone who has spoken in the debate this afternoon has prefaced his remarks with the clearest intention to maintain the exclusive legislative jurisdiction in the provinces in respect of the field of education and the institutions connected therewith. No member of the house has proposed directly or indirectly, by statement or by inference, that there is any thought whatever in the resolution of subtracting one iota from the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces as it is set out in section 93 of the British North America Act.

Certainly it was not a situation calling for the kind of comment that fell from the lips of the Minister of Agriculture. Apparently when he has a weak case the minister, in attempting to buttress that case, comes along with the suggestion—he does not come right out and say so—that somebody is doing something or proposing something in the debate which is in fact the very antithesis of what they have said their intentions were.

Let there be no red herrings from the Minister of Agriculture or any other member of the government on this issue. There is nothing in the resolution that in the slightest degree tampers with the legislative and administrative autonomy of the provinces in relation to education. Jurisdiction in respect of that subject was placed in the provinces by the British North America Act. There it remains, and there it will continue to remain, even if this resolution is accepted today in the House of Commons—as I hope it will be. No one can seriously suggest that there is the slightest intimation in the resolution of any attempt to dictate to the provinces in matters falling within their legislative jurisdiction.

The Minister of Agriculture introduced one further proposal when he said, "This is not the time or the place for a discussion of the question of federal aid to the provinces in matters of education. Reference has been made to the fact that there will be a dominion-provincial conference this fall. That is the place and that is the time to discuss this matter".

Well, that is a new one, coming from the government benches. We did not hear that from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) who is taking such an animated interest in this debate this afternoon. It will be remembered that there was quite a debate earlier this session on a resolution introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to deal with the subject of old age pensions and the setting up of a committee. Mention was made of the fact that that was a subject that might well come before the dominion-provincial conference this fall, but that was not treated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare as a reason why that subject should not be discussed in parliament or in a parliamentary committee. On the contrary, the minister seemed to give considerable encouragement to the idea of the discussion of that subject in a parliamentary committee, if I correctly understood him.

Mr. Martin: You correctly understood me, but there is no point in what you are now saying.

Mr. Fleming: If there was a point in it the Minister of National Health and Welfare still would not see it.

Mr. Martin: I am not as intelligent as the hon. member; that is clear.

Mr. Fleming: I extend to the minister my condolences. Here we have these two apostles of an outworn political philosophy sitting side by side at the moment and looking reasonably friendly. But in their expositions of the content of that outworn political philosophy they seem to arrive at precisely opposite conclusions on similar propositions of fact. Here is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), if you please, who says that parliament is not the place and that this is not the time to discuss the subject of federal aid to education.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that at all. Discuss it all you like. I told you how I was going to vote.

Mr. Fleming: I am sorry if I misunderstood the right hon. gentleman. As I understand it now, he, speaking for the government and that vast phalanx over there, says he is going to vote against it and therefore there is no use parliament going on to discuss it. That is a new idea of the autocratic and totalitarian philosophy of the government opposite. Either the Minister of Agriculture is completely at variance with the Minister of National Health and Welfare and with common sense, or he has expounded and in fact is asking the house to subscribe to the simple authoritarian proposition that when the Acting Prime Minister or the leading member of the government of the day says that he is going to vote against a particular resolution then parliament ceases to be the place to discuss that question. Not being able to follow these authoritarian minds in their various processes I still believe that, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Agriculture considers that he has doomed this resolution to the limbo of defeated resolutions, this parliament still is the place and this is the time to discuss this matter because it is a matter of great importance to people in all parts of Canada.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that there should be an expression of opinion on the part of parliament on a subject in which he was interested and which certainly is bound to come before the dominion-provincial conference, but the Minister of Agriculture by way of contrast says that because he has spoken on this subject he has sounded the death knell of the resolution, and because this matter is coming before the dominion-provincial conference then this is not the place and this is not the time to discuss the subject. The Minister of Agriculture can have his authoritarian and totalitarian philosophy all to himself and let him get what comfort he can out of it before the democratic-minded people of this country catch up with him.

What is at issue in this debate? The aim of the resolution is the equalization of opportunity for all young Canadians across Canada as far as education can do it. It will profit the Minister of Agriculture very little to deny that that is inherent in this resolution.

If he does I can quote him an interpretation of a resolution in identical terms by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who spoke on October 19, 1949, as reported on page 946 of Hansard. At that time the Prime Minister said:

> I am sure all hon. members have welcomed this opportunity of focusing their attention upon this assertion, one which certainly appeals to each and every one of us, that there should be across Canada the greatest possible degree of equality of opportunity for the education of our young Canadians, the Canadians of the next generation.

The Prime Minister recognized what was inherent in that resolution. The Prime Minister saw quite clearly that which the Minister of Agriculture has so effectively sought to becloud. What is proposed here and what is the whole purpose and intent of this resolution is to achieve for young Canadians right across Canada equality of opportunity as far as education can equalize opportunity. Let us be quite candid and realize that equality of educational opportunity cannot achieve complete equality of opportunity for young Canadians. I suppose in only a theoretical sense will it ever be possible to have complete equality of opportunity in a world inhabited by humans, but educational opportunity, if it adheres to the principle of equalization, will do much to afford to young Canadians, regardless of the means of their parents and of the section of the country in which they happen to be born and raised, equality of opportunity with other young Canadians.

It is not simply a matter of equalizing opportunity as between the provinces, although that is involved in this resolution as far as it can go. But it does involve the seeking by proper and constitutional means to effect as between individuals that equalization of opportunity so far as it can be brought about by educational opportunity. Apparently the Minister of Agriculture is entirely satisfied. He looks around at the persons coming from the different provinces—he is careful to select those who have had the benefit of higher education—and he says, "All is well". I am sure the minister must have had experiences similar to those I have had, but I think he has forgotten about them.

He and I were born in places about ten miles apart. While I did not have much of my formal education in the county in which the minister and I were born, nevertheless he got quite a bit of his education there. Let us agree that he has made good use of it. When he was growing up he must have seen many youths, as I have seen in my shorter span, who by reason of lack of means on the part of their parents were denied the opportunity of higher education. They were denied not just university education, but in many cases even high school education. Many of those youths I knew might have made just as good use of that educational opportunity as I did, or perhaps even better.

Mr. Martin: You did very well with yours.

Mr. Fleming: Thank you. I tried to take advantage of what educational opportunity was afforded to me, but I should like to see every young Canadian given the same educational opportunity that I was. It was not done without considerable sacrifice on the part of my parents, and I want to make it perfectly clear that there will always be a place for young Canadians to make sacrifices in order to attain the advantages of education. But much can be done that has not been done to afford educational opportunity to young Canadians who are being deprived of such opportunity today, an opportunity of which they could make the most excellent use but an opportunity which they are denied by reason of lack of means on the part of their parents.

This problem has gone far beyond the means of local governments. There has been no little improvement in the scale of salaries paid to schoolteachers in recent years but much of it has been due to the greater assistance afforded by provincial governments. Many provincial governments are today in the position where they cannot go much further in affording assistance in the field of education. That is the reason why aid is required on a constitutional basis from the federal government to assist in providing educational opportunities.

We have made great strides in the field of education in Canada. There is no need for envy when comparing the educational systems existing in the provinces of Canada today with those in other parts of the world. Canada can boast of having given to the world men who are leaders in the field of education, and who can hold their places with teachers and educationists from any other country in the world. There are great benefits to be derived from education. We have good systems in Canada. It is necessary though that aid be given to extend the benefits of those systems to those who are not in a position today to take full advantage of the educational opportunities that our provincial systems are intended to afford.

I wish to express my profound regret that the acting leader of the government, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), has seen fit to expound so reactionary a point of view as he did this afternoon. In effect he says:

"Everything is all right. Don't do anything. Don't even discuss the problem because I, Sir Oracle, have pronounced upon it."

Mr. MacDougall: Oh, have a heart.

Mr. Fleming: That is precisely the tone of his speech this afternoon.

Mr. McIlraith: No, no.

Mr. Fleming: That is precisely the tone of his speech this afternoon. I gave the Minister of Agriculture the benefit of the doubt. When he said this afternoon that this was not the time and the place I interpreted that as meaning that he felt that this occasion was premature because the matter would be coming before the dominion-provincial conference. He enlightened me, however, on the proper interpretation. He said the reason he had said that was that he had spoken this afternoon. As he has undertaken, so far as he can, to doom the resolution to defeat, it is quite apparent that that was the reason he spoke as he did. I said and I repeat that the Minister of Agriculture meant, "I, Sir Oracle, have spoken, and that is the end of the matter."

Many educationists in this country, and many young Canadians will suffer today and in days to come for what the government has undertaken to say this afternoon through the Minister of Agriculture if government members opposite follow the reactionary lead given to them by the minister. Few more deplorable statements have fallen from the lips of ministers of the government in the house than that which fell from the lips of the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we were discussing the following resolution:

That in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

I doubt whether anyone in this house can speak with authority on whether or not education, from the eastern boundary of our country to the far west, needs financial assistance. It is because of that fact that I do not intend to speak on the educational facilities throughout Canada. I do know something about the local situation in British Columbia, having served on a school board there as late as June, 1949. Because I know of the conditions that prevailed at that time in my own riding, I intend to speak of that situation.

Education

During the latter part of 1949 and the early part of 1950, about 70 families per week entered the constituency of Burnaby-Richmond. This meant that approximately 135 children came into the riding every week of the year. With 30 to 35 children in every classroom, this meant that between 4 and 5 classrooms per week were filled. I know what financial stress that put on the riding, and because of that I am going to attempt to link up the financial situation in Burnaby-Richmond with federal aid for education.

Over a long period of time, and by process of bylaw, we were able to build some schools. In fact, the riding now has about a dozen more, but the result of that put my riding into the hands of the receivers. For some years the constituency was handled by one man until those debts were paid up. Today, through the grace of a good provincial government, we are able to run our own affairs, because that government is putting approximately $35 million per year into education. I believe that is more than the total amount the province of British Columbia should pay to educate our children. Our position on the west coast is perhaps a little different from that of other provinces, because of the increased migration into British Columbia from the prairies and Ontario. In the end, people realize that British Columbia is the ultimate so far as living in Canada is concerned.

During the next five or six years our schools will be overtaxed no matter how we try to keep up with construction. In educational circles it is felt that 30 pupils per classroom is about the number any teacher can possibly handle. In Burnaby-Richmond the average is something like 45 per classroom; at least that is what it was when I left. It has reached the point where no province or municipality can contribute further towards education. When we loaded the elementary schools there was a blank space at the top end. We loaded our high schools with pupils who should never have been there in the first place. Many of the teen-agers going through elementary and junior high schools should never be there, because almost 50 per cent of them do not intend to attend a university. Many of them will not have the financial means to do so. It has been found that most of those pupils should go to vocational schools; that is their proper future. The other 50 per cent—I think that figure is exaggerated—should have the opportunity of ascertaining whether they can get the required marks that will enable them to go to university. Of the 50 per cent who should go to high school, perhaps 10 per cent have parents who can afford to send them to university. What about the other 40 per cent? I think this is where federal aid for education comes into the picture. This 40 per cent of our young men and women attending high school have parents who are not financially able to send them to university. I believe it should be the ambition of the federal government to inaugurate a series of scholarships that would allow our teen-agers to go to university, should their marks come up to the required standards. I am going to support this resolution, because I believe it is aimed at assisting these teen-agers who are attending our high schools.

Many of the speeches this afternoon have gone far beyond the point the member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) intended when he introduced the resolution. I intend to support the resolution because I know that, from the practical standpoint, these young men and women in our high schools who deserve to get a university education are not getting it, because provincial and municipal finances will not allow further aid to education. This afternoon it was said that a lawyer from New Brunswick is just as good as a lawyer from British Columbia, and that a schoolteacher from Nova Scotia is just as good as a schoolteacher from Alberta. I do not see the point of such a statement. I do not think that is what the member for Saskatoon meant when he spoke of equalization of educational opportunity across Canada. I believe he meant an equal opportunity for education for everyone who desires it. Because I believe that, I still want to refer back to these young men and women who are attending high school. When hon. members are speaking tonight, or when they are voting, I wish they would remember that their vote will either help these young people or allow them to remain in high school until grade XIII, at which time they will go out into the world with nothing more than senior matriculation, and that does not mean very much in this day of specialization.

I want to put the cost of education in British Columbia on the record, Mr. Speaker. Within the last few days the provincial minister of education gave me the figures, and for the school year 1946-47 the cost was $20,100,000. In 1947-48 it rose to $25,750,000; in 1948-49, it was $35,500,000. The provincial share of those total costs was as follows: 1946-47, $9,500,000; 1947-48, $12,500,000; and in 1948-49, over $17 million, which is approximately 15 per cent of the total budget.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that no province can stand that strain on its financial resources without some help from the federal government. I believe too that without that federal help the municipality of Burnaby will again be in danger of going into receivership in the near future. Although we have a good municipal administration in that district, with the strain of the cost of education on Burnaby-Richmond at this time, I do not think it is humanly possible for the council to bring to fruition the educational ambitions of our people. I intend to support this resolution.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): When the history of this century comes to be written, Mr. Speaker, the one theme that will run through the story of the first half of it, and possibly through a large part of the second half, will be the struggle of the democratic world against dictatorship. History will record how, in the first half of this century, the democratic countries fought two world wars to preserve their way of life, to preserve democracy from being overthrown by dictators. It will record how at the present time, in these years, democratic countries including our own are spending up to half of their government revenue in order to maintain their defences against dictatorship. When that history comes to be written it will show that the one great ally on the side of democracy, the one ally that will in the long run help to preserve democracy, is education. Writing on the subject of education, Horace Mann, who is known through the world as one of our greatest and most progressive educationists, has this to say:

> If ever there was a cause worthy to be upheld by all of toil and sacrifice that the human hand or heart can endure, it is the cause of education. It holds the welfare of mankind in its embrace as the protecting arms of a mother hold her infant to her bosom. The very ignorance and selfishness which obstruct its path are the strongest arguments for its promotion, for it furnishes the only adequate means for their removal.

Those of us who believe in democracy and are concerned to see our way of life eventually succeed over dictatorships cannot but be concerned about the whole question of the education of our citizens. In the modern world, dictatorships today rely on terror methods, on a controlled press, on the denial of information to the people, and on the subordination of the thoughts and actions of the masses to the purposes of ruling cliques or individual despots. On the other hand, democracy rests on the emancipation of the human spirit, on individual freedom, on education for private living and for social participation. The character of our citizenship is determined to a great extent by the nature of the education which those citizens receive.

As has been said already in this debate, while education in and of itself does not make good citizens, nevertheless outside the home and the church there is no greater agency in this country for helping to build citizens than that of our schools. The character of Canadian citizenship is, apart from the home and the church, basically fashioned in the schools of the nation. When we speak of citizenship being fashioned in the schools of the nation, we think first in terms of the elementary school; second, in terms of our secondary or high schools; and only third, in terms of our centres of higher education or universities. The elementary school is basic; it is the first and most important of all. One reason for that is that there are still many thousands of our children who never get beyond the upper grades of the elementary school or who at best never get beyond the lower grades of the high or secondary schools. The elementary school is the one centre that our children who attend school at all have an opportunity of attending. In the second place, it is in the elementary school that the children are passing through their formative years. It is then and there that the foundation of socially approved attitudes and of good citizenship are firmly laid, if they are to be firmly laid at all.

It is because of the importance of education in a democratic country, because of its importance to the very survival of democracy in today's world, that education down to the level of the elementary school must become the concern of our federal parliament. No federal parliament that has any understanding or appreciation of the vital importance of education to the survival of our way of life can afford to let any question either of jurisdiction or of economy stand in their way in this vital matter.

Since the foundations of good citizenship are to be laid in our elementary schools and reinforced in our secondary or high schools and our universities, every province in Canada must be financially capable of providing teachers of high personal qualifications and extensive training. To the men and women who are to do this job which is so fundamentally vital they must be in a position to offer remuneration in line with that which is offered by commercial and industrial concerns. It is far more important to the well-being of this nation that we have capable and adequately-trained personnel in the classrooms of our schools than in our offices and factories. It is a national calamity that only second-rate and partially-trained personnel, paid third-rate salaries, is often all that can be secured to staff these classrooms in which such a vitally important job is to be done.

It is a national tragedy that that should be the situation in so far as our schools are concerned, whilst industry and commerce, where visible monetary profits prevail, can outbid school authorities at every level in securing at much more remunerative rates the best trained and most capable personnel. And even more deplorable than this is the fact that nowhere in Canada can educational authorities compete with industry and commerce in remunerating their personnel. More deplorable than that is the fact that such educational opportunities as are being offered to the children of this country vary, as has already been said, very widely from one municipality to another and from one province to another.

The disparities in ability of individual provinces to supply and equip suitable buildings, to train and pay suitable teachers, to provide suitable programs of diversified education are all too well known, too widely recognized to require elaboration. By and large in this country today the educational opportunities afforded to children of any province can be measured in the amount of money per pupil spent by that province on education. There are other factors, but as a rule the best measure we have today of the quality of education that our children are getting in the various provinces is the amount of money that these provinces are paying per pupil. What is also true is that expenditure in the Canadian provinces varies very directly with the individual or personal income of the people of that province. I will give figures for 1946, the last year for which I have them. In 1946 Prince Edward Island had an average personal income, based on the school population, of $3,000. In that year that same province, which had the lowest personal income per pupil of any province of Canada, also spent the least money per pupil on her schools. In that year she spent $45 per pupil on education. In the same year British Columbia spent $115 per pupil as against Prince Edward Island's $45, nearly three times as much. Notwithstanding the fact that Prince Edward Island spent only $45 and British Columbia spent $115, both provinces made practically the same effort on the basis of that income.

British Columbia spent on education $1 out of every $63 of personal income received. Prince Edward Island spent $1 out of every $68. Here were two provinces each putting forth practically the same effort, paying the same percentage of their income on education, one province able to provide $45 per pupil, the other with no more effort on their part able to pay $115 per pupil.

Education

In the same year, making another comparison, New Brunswick spent $1 out of $53 personal income, and Ontario spent $1 out of every $55. In that year and on that basis Ontario was able to pay $116 per year per pupil on education; while New Brunswick, making the same comparative effort, was able to pay only $60 per year per pupil. To give a still further illustration in the same year, Saskatchewan paid $1 out of every $34 personal income on education; Alberta $1 out of every $36. Their sacrifices or their efforts based on the personal income of their citizens were almost the same, yet these provinces were paying slightly less than either Ontario or British Columbia who were paying $1 out of every $55 and every $63. Here were two provinces paying $1 of their personal income out of every $34 and $36 and yet they were not able to spend on education on that basis as much as Ontario and British Columbia were spending, who were spending only $1 out of $55 and $63.

If as a nation we in Canada are to pay anything more than lip service to the democratic principle that is involved in the term "equality of educational opportunity", then we must find some means whereby educational facilities in the smaller and poorer provinces can be raised to a level that is suitable to the whole of Canada.

It is not necessary that the education should be uniform. No one who believes in federal aid for education has ever suggested that we should have a uniform system of education across Canada. All we have been maintaining for twenty years is that from federal resources there must come the means whereby those poorer and smaller provinces at least can bring their educational standards up to that which will be suitable for all of Canada.

Federal aid to education as implied in this resolution is the only means I know of whereby that thing can be achieved. This is important. The kind of education that boys and girls in one province get is of interest to every other province in Canada. The mobility of our people in Canada, where one out of every three moves from the province in which he is educated into some other province and becomes a citizen of that province, makes it essential that the nation as a whole should assume some responsibility for seeing that an adequate standard of education is maintained in all our provinces.

On this point the Rowell-Sirois report has this statement to make:

> The most economically distressed areas are the ones least capable of supporting these educational services, and yet are also the ones in which the needs are likely to be greatest. Not only national duty and decency, if Canada is to become a nation at all, but equity and national self-interest demand that the residents of those areas be given average services and equal opportunities.
> In the modern age contact and intermingling of the population between favoured and unfavoured regions is bound to occur. The more fortunate areas cannot escape the pressure on their standards and the effect on their people; in this case prevention, in both fiscal and human terms, is much cheaper than the cure.

I believe I should pause here to say that the teachers federation, home and school clubs, trustees associations from all across the country, and numerous other organizations, have for many years been pressing for government aid to education at the elementary as well as at the secondary and university levels. The government's reluctance, as indicated this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), to support elementary and secondary schools is usually ascribed to the alleged limitations imposed by section 93 of the British North America Act. That section states that in and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education. Those of us who support federal aid at the elementary and secondary school levels feel that there is no conflict whatever with that clause, which gives the provincial legislatures the exclusive right to make laws in relation to education. There is no conflict in the federal government giving financial support.

It is quite clear from the act that its intention was to place the administration of education under provincial jurisdiction. Most authorities on constitutional law and on education are agreed that financial assistance can be given in such a way that it need in no way whatever encroach upon provincial administration or provincial rights. The report of the Alberta royal commission on taxation in 1948 supports this position, because at page 65 of that report we read this:

> There are nine provinces in Canada, each with an educational standard which is within its ability to support. Some no doubt can establish a minimum standard of education beyond the reach of less favoured provinces. The most economically distressed areas are the ones least capable of supporting education and yet they are the ones in which the needs may be greatest. It appears to the commission that there is a place for interprovincial equalization of educational opportunity. This would mean the creation by the dominion government of an interprovincial equalization fund to be distributed among the provinces according to need for the purpose of providing equal educational opportunity to all the children of all the people of all the provinces.

Then the royal commission goes on to say:

> The commission if of the opinion that there is no legal hindrance to the dominion in establishing such a fund and further the commission believes that no infringement of the rights of the province need take place in the administration of such fund.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) appears to be of the same opinion—at least he was of that opinion in 1945, when he took part in a public debate in Montreal, held under the auspices of an educational association. On that occasion he was reported as having said:

> But the constitution does not prevent the federal government from giving substantial assistance to education. Direct assistance might be given in different ways.

I do not know whether he has changed his point of view on that matter since or not. In the brief submitted by the government of Saskatchewan to the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, they go much further and say:

> It is submitted that even if the British North America Act were inconsistent with federal financial participation in general education, the federal government should, in the interest of the national welfare, find means of making such participation possible.

The federal government has given valued assistance in many special aspects of education. In a speech in this house on November 5 of last year I reviewed the entire field and pointed out the extent to which the different departments of government and the various government agencies were already contributing to many specialized phases of education. For instance, the government is helping finance health education across the country. The government is helping finance physical fitness education. It is helping to provide scholarships at the university level. Health education and physical fitness education are subjects which are taught in the elementary schools of this country. Many of the scholarships given by the federal government are given to pupils who are pursuing arts courses in our universities. These arts courses do not specifically qualify students for particular professions such as medicine, law or engineering. In these courses the students receive a general education, and they are assisted in that by the federal government. As a matter of actual fact the federal government is today in the field of education at the elementary and secondary as well as at university levels. Regardless of any limitation which may be placed upon the government by reason of the British North America Act, this government has already entered that field.

There appears to be no constitutional barrier to prevent the same government from bearing a share of the financial responsibility for general elementary and secondary school education. In either of those fields the government can give much more effective help to future citizens of this country.

I submit that financial assistance to general elementary and secondary school education would not only be more effective but would be much more democratic than the aid being given in specialized fields by the present government, and on the dollar-matching basis. The dollar matching basis on which money grants for specialized educational services are given today is predicated on the proposition that to him who hath shall be given. It is most helpful to the wealthiest provinces while the provinces in most direct need of assistance find it difficult to match the federal grant dollar for dollar. In many instances the less fortunate provinces cannot take full advantage of these grants and at the same time maintain a maximum effort in the field of general education. There is always the danger that in attempting to avail themselves of federal money they may jeopardize the welfare of children in the field of general education.

When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) suggests that the only way in which the federal government can assist education is by making grants to the provinces to do with as they please he is just not being realistic. That is not the way in which this government is making and has in the past made grants in aid of education and in aid of many other services. The money given to the provinces for health services and hospitalization is not given to be spent as they please; that money is given to the provinces for a specific purpose, to be spent for a specific purpose. The money given to the provinces by this government as a contribution toward old age pensions is not given to be spent as the provinces please; that money is given with a string on it, and that string is that the money shall be spent for old age pensions.

The money that is given in the form of grants to technical schools and which has been of great importance across the country is not given to the provinces to do with as they please. These grants are given with a string attached, that the money must be used for specific purposes. When the Minister of Agriculture suggests that we are introducing a new principle, that there is to be a changed procedure, he is not being realistic, nor is he facing up to the situation that actually exists in connection with grants made to the provinces for these various purposes.

I suggest, as have other speakers, that this house should adopt this resolution as a starting point before the dominion-provincial conference meets in the fall. Educational authorities, both provincial and municipal, have asked that this subject be placed on the agenda of that conference. I suggest that we adopt the resolution, which is that the government be prepared to give consideration to this whole question, the details to be worked out at the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a minute or two, not because this subject is not important but because I am anxious to have the motion come to a vote. I hope the resolution will be passed tonight. I think the inequality of educational opportunity which exists in Canada is admitted by practically everyone. A great deal has been said today about inequality which exists as between provinces, and I shall say no more in regard to that, but in my opinion even greater inequality exists as between the urban and rural areas.

I think the provinces could do more than they have done to remove that type of inequality. It costs a considerable amount of money and a good deal of progress has been made in providing more opportunity for children in rural areas, particularly in the newer areas located long distances from towns and where the children are under serious disadvantage. We should do our utmost to remove that type of disadvantage.

Of course the attainment of complete equality of educational opportunity is just not possible. However, the ideal of complete equality of opportunity is one that we should always keep before us and constantly work toward. The desirability of some equalization of opportunity is almost universally admitted, although this afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) seemed to have some doubts about it. He appeared to try to give the house the impression that the people who were supporting this resolution, the people who were working toward federal aid for education wished to have the federal government control the curricula in the different provinces and make all of us alike. There is no thought of trying to make people in one part of Canada a carbon copy of the people in another part. The giving of federal grants to the provinces to help them with their educational problems need not and I do not think will work toward that end.

Let me give an example. The same amount of money might be spent on obtaining an education in a higher institution of learning but yet turn out totally different products. One man might want to specialize in history and spend five, six or more years attending university and taking post-graduate courses. Another man might go in for moral philosophy. Those two men get totally different kinds of education and it would be a brave man indeed who would say that the one was better educated than the other. You can have the same sort of thing on the provincial level where one province has a different curriculum from another, yet excellent results are produced in each province.

At the present time the main burden of providing for junior and secondary education falls on the property owner in the city or country. That burden has become constantly greater and has now reached the point where in a large number of municipalities it is not going to be possible to increase it very much. Some of the provinces have given a certain amount of help but the provinces have limited sources of revenue and in some cases, probably, not a great deal more help can be given.

Under those circumstances the only means by which a further equalization of educational opportunity can be accomplished is by federal grants to the provinces for that purpose. In my opinion there are three ways in which the federal government could aid in connection with the whole question of education. The first is by means of direct grants which the provinces could use to improve their educational set-ups. The second, which has been mentioned already, is by way of scholarships. This form of aid is being carried out to a certain extent at the present time by way of fellowships granted by the national research council. However, a great deal more could be done in that connection, particularly in the way of training nurses. Assistance in this connection could be provided by grants from the dominion government. At the present time there is a definite shortage of nurses in Canada, and from what I can learn the number of girls entering nursing schools is not nearly sufficient to meet future demands. Having in mind the national health schemes about which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been talking, that is one way in which some direct aid can be given immediately so far as training and education are concerned.

A third way in which the dominion can help in educational matters is by dominion operated and financed schools. This is not a new idea. We have had dominion operated schools in this country for a long time. I refer to the Royal Military College at Kingston, and its counterpart on Vancouver island, Royal Roads. These dominion schools give specialized training to people who hope to enter the permanent forces of Canada as officers. In addition to military training they provide an extremely good general education. In my opinion that principle should be more widely followed. There is just as much necessity in the national interest for certain other specialized types of schools as there is for the military schools which we now have. Certain types of education and training attract a very small number of people, and there is probably need in Canada for only one school of that type. Where that situation exists it seems to me that the proper body to operate such a school is the federal government, and it should then permit people from all parts of Canada to attend by means of scholarships.

Something has been said about the supply of teachers, and I should like to say a word on that matter. In the province of Alberta there are a considerable number of schools for which there are no teachers, and the same situation exists in other provinces. Children are taking courses by correspondence, and of course there are unqualified teachers in a large number of schools. The shortage of teachers will increase rather than diminish as long as the present scale of teachers' salaries continues. You cannot expect to attract to the teaching profession the type of men and women needed in that field when the scale of remuneration is considerably less than that of a good carpenter or bricklayer at the present time even for the higher paid members of the teaching profession, to say nothing of the lower paid members who of course receive a great deal less than a skilled workman of any kind. In order to secure for the teaching profession the type of people required and to keep them there after they have been secured, there is no doubt that teachers' salaries must be increased. The time has come when that increase can only take place through the use of federal funds to some extent in aid of education.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that members of the house will all agree that the discussion introduced by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) has given us an opportunity to focus our attention on a matter that is of great interest in the country. I think, however, that it would be well at this time to point out that, while most of the speakers have directed themselves to the general purposes which the hon. gentleman had in mind, not all of them have directed themselves specifically to the actual terms of the resolution before the house. For that reason, it may be useful to recall to hon. members what the actual terms are. It provides:

> That in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces—

These significant words should be noted:

> —for that purpose.

What do the systems of education in our ten provinces involve? They involve the teaching of our children in four categories of education, in some provinces the kindergarten, in all provinces the primary school, in all provinces the secondary schools, and in all provinces colleges and universities. The policies of education in those fields deal not only with curricula and salaries of teachers but with a whole series of questions which would have to be considered if any proper appraisal of the extent of the financial assistance proposed were to be taken into account.

I think it is important to bear these facts in mind. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) spoke of the assistance now being given by various departments of the federal government. I will come to that later. What I want to point out is that the kind of assistance which he has outlined is not the kind of assistance envisaged by the resolution. We are asked to provide ways and means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose. The grants that are made in various fields now by the federal government are not made for that particular purpose. They are made for specific purposes, and the resolution does not deal with specific purposes. It deals with the whole question of education in its generalized form.

Apart altogether from proceeding with the consideration of this matter in an orderly way, there has been appointed, as has already been mentioned in this debate, the Massey commission. In speaking about the Massey commission the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), expressing the view of the government on February 3, 1949, stated:

> We feel that survey—

He was referring to the survey to be undertaken by the Massey commission.

> —can be made most effectively by a group of Canadians who are independent of the government. That is why we are going to set up the royal commission I mentioned earlier.

Having in mind the character of the briefs that have been placed before the Massey commission from the universities' conference, the secondary school teachers association and other bodies interested in education, of what value and significance would it be for us, covering this wide field of education, to exercise at the present time a judgment in respect of a matter which certainly has not been finalized in the judgment of the Massey commission?

Mr. Noseworthy: That is stalling.

Mr. Martin: When my hon. friend spoke I listened to him with great attention. I know he is going to give me the same kind of attention because I propose to deal with the matter as seriously as I know how. Speaking on this question some time ago the Prime Minister said that we recognize the importance of this matter. He used these words at page 946 of Hansard of October 19, 1949:

> Personally I have no doubt that it will be necessary to find some way in which these institutions can continue to be supplied with that which is necessary to them to maintain that high standard in their educational activities.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What institutions?

Mr. Martin: The institutions of learning covered by the resolution then before the house, and which is again before the house today.

Now I mention that statement because the speech of the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) lends itself to the interpretation that, because the Minister of Agriculture speaking for the government today had indicated what we thought should be the way in which the resolution should now be treated, we on this side of the house were not interested in education. Those were practically his words. Surely, that cannot be substantiated by the statement which I have just read from the Prime Minister, from the speech which was made this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and from what I know must be accepted as the common view of every member in this house. We look upon education as one of the fundamental requirements of our Canadian society.

In his speech this afternoon, the leader of the opposition—if he would allow me to say so, I thought it was a good one—told us he preferred to give the resolution the interpretation which he wanted; that was his right. He went on to inform the house that we are to have a dominion-provincial conference in the autumn of this year, and this matter should be considered at that time. In that connection, I looked up the words the leader of the opposition uttered when this resolution was discussed last session. Those words deserve repetition tonight. At page 942 of Hansard for October 19, 1949, he said:

> For that reason I have stressed, both in this chamber and elsewhere, the urgent necessity of calling a dominion-provincial conference to consider the whole relationship between the dominion and provincial governments so the financial requirements of the provincial governments for all purposes may be fully considered and the amount required to provide adequate educational opportunities may therefore be determined with some knowledge of what is required by each province for that particular purpose.

Surely that is the underlying reason why the attitude taken by the government in this matter should be supported. There is to be a conference at which this matter may be discussed. No hon. member tonight has suggested a particular plan for giving financial assistance to the provinces, beyond the mere general declaration that, because of the high cost of education, some financial assistance should be given.

Then, in that same debate, the leader of the opposition made this statement at page 943 of Hansard:

> I can say most definitely from my own experience—

And he had experience as minister of education in the province of Ontario.

> —that the fact that the attempt was made in this case to exercise control by an indirect method is an indication that, in providing for grants of this kind, there must be a definite understanding that the independence and discretion of the provincial departments of education will be retained, no matter what the amount of the grants may be.

He was referring to the grants in aid of physical fitness. This raises the important question of jurisdiction.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You will have to vote for the resolution after what you have said.

Mr. Martin: That raises the important question of jurisdiction. Some hon. members say that a mere grant in aid, not given for a specific purpose, is not an interference with section 93 of the British North America Act, which assigns to the provinces exclusive competence in matters of education. Having in mind the very caution which the leader of the opposition asked us to note; knowing what was said in this house in the debate last fall when this subject was discussed; recalling the words of the premier of the province of Quebec; knowing how jealously, and properly so, the provinces regard the education field; if this resolution were passed in the form in which it is now before the house, we would create in the minds of the people in several provinces the definite judgment that matters, which at the conference last January were regarded as being included among those rights which were to be entrenched, were likely to be invaded by the central government. Under no circumstances should this parliament do anything which would give any section of our population the impression, rightly or wrongly, that we intended to adopt functions and policies that would violate one of those entrenched rights, education.

Mr. Gillis: Entrenched is right; dug in solid.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend may take that view, but the fathers of confederation laid down the dogma, if you will, that education was a matter for the provinces. Anyone who would interfere with that, after considering the character of this federal state today, would be doing a great disservice, not only to the cause of national unity but to the cause of education itself.

Let me give an example of the importance of this. All of our provinces have now entered into an agreement with the dominion government with respect to the National Physical Fitness Act, under which grants are made to the provinces to enable them to carry on the work of recreation, handicrafts, and so on. One province has withheld its decision about entering into such an accord. Why? On the ground that in its judgment it jeopardizes the position granted to the province by the B. N. A. Act, and even collaboration on this level is construed by them as an invasion of a field specifically given to them in the British North America Act.

An hon. Member: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Martin: I do not agree with that interpretation, and it is because I do not agree with that view that I have made a distinction between the grants in aid we are now making and the kind of financial assistance which is suggested in the terms of this all-embracing resolution.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Explain.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says "explain". Have I not make myself clear? This resolution as it now reads calls for financial assistance, but not for a specific purpose; it calls upon this parliament to take ways and means, without reference to the provinces, to do a perfectly laudable thing, to equalize educational opportunity in Canada. The resolution calls for just that. It does not request us to sit down with the provinces and discuss the desirability of giving them financial assistance in providing an opportunity for improved education, or to help them formulate a policy, or to discuss financial assistance in the whole field of education. Speaking personally, I am not saying that that might not, in some respects, after consultation with the provinces, be a good thing. What I am saying is that to do that merely by the present resolution would be injurious to the national unity of this country.

I know something of how jealously some provinces, and some groups within each province, look upon education as something that has a provincial character, and consequently one that must be so strong in its text as not to permit violation or intervention from a government outside of the province. It is because of that that I think a distinction must be noted between what is desired and how that desire may be realized.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister permit a question? Does the minister recall a statement made in a speech in Montreal several years ago by his colleague, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in which he said:

> The constitution does not prevent the federal government from giving substantial assistance to education. Direct assistance might be given in different ways.

Mr. Martin: I do not disagree with that statement at all, but that is not what this resolution calls for.

Mr. Fleming: It is, precisely.

Mr. Martin: I am going to deal with that. My hon. friend said there was a difference between the attitude taken by the Minister of Agriculture in this matter, and the attitude I took with regard to another matter now before a committee of this house. Surely, that is not an analogy at all. The matter which is before the other committee is one over which this parliament not only has the right to exercise jurisdiction, but actually does exercise jurisdiction in co-operation with the provinces. The terms of the resolution as it is now before the house do not call for specific grants within the meaning of the definition given by the Minister of National Defence in the speech he made in Montreal.

Mr. Knight: What would happen to this resolution if I had made a specific recommendation for the expenditure of money for federal aid?

Mr. Knowles: Answer that one.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps before I am through I might suggest to my hon. friend that the resolution, if it had been couched in different language, might have provoked a different reaction. My hon. friend laughs, but that is what I honestly believe to be the case.

An hon. Member: Not from you.

Mr. Martin: There is not anyone in this house who does not want to see the children of this country given the best of educational opportunity. There is no one in this country or in this house who does not want our children to receive, regardless of his or her financial status, the best education possible. In that connection, in spite of the limitations of our educational systems in this country, I think we have every reason for being proud of our achievements. The work that is carried on by the primary schools, by the secondary schools and by our colleges and universities deserves the commendation of every member of this house, as it is freely given. One recognizes the inadequacy perhaps of the income paid to certain teachers in certain sections of the country. Those are all problems that one recognizes; and the fact that one points out that under the constitution the responsibility for adjustment of those matters resides with the provinces should not and cannot fairly be taken as being opposed to what undoubtedly the hon. member had in mind but which, in actual terms—if I may say so with respect—he has failed to state. It should not be forgotten that for specific purposes we are now doing a great many things in aid of education in one form or another. But for specific purposes nothing that has heretofore been done has been done with the purpose of formulating policy or of dealing with the basic fundamentals of education in any province, but by way of supplemental assistance for specific purposes.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke of the need for research and in what he said I fully concur, as I am sure every other member of the house will. The work of the national research council in varied fields is a work that assists in a supplemental way the work carried on by our higher institutions of learning in this country. The work of individual departments of government; the encouragement of research in a particular field by the Department of Resources and Development and by the Department of Agriculture; grants given in aid of technical education in this country; the student scholarships under dominion-provincial agreement carried on under the operation of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell); the training opportunities given to veterans, some 133,000 of them, to improve their college and university training as well as to give them vocational training—those are all various steps that indicate the great contribution that is made by the federal government of Canada for the purposes of supplementary education for specific purposes, and I underline the words "specific purposes", to point out that there is a distinction between grants in aid for a specific purpose and a resolution so all-embracing as this particular one is.

Then there are the grants for social work by the Department of National Health and Welfare; the vocational training grant; the grant for physical fitness; the national research council grant for general purposes, not only for industry, not only for physics, not only for the pure sciences but for medicine and so on. These grants are indeed of a significant character. The national research council fellowships which enable hundreds of our best trained scientists to carry on their research projects in this country at our universities and colleges are a definite contribution in a supplementary way to the cause of education in this country.

I particularly have an opportunity of knowing something of the working of these grants or these fellowships under the medical division of the national research council. Under the national health program there has been tremendous assistance—in restricted fields, admittedly, and for specific purposes—to over 2,000 individuals in the past year and a quarter. The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) spoke a moment ago of the need of professional training for nurses. As we know, under the national health program one of the grants is for that very purpose, and under that grant a great number of individuals have received nursing training, and occupational therapy training; and a whole series of other training programs have been accorded to nurses and to persons in corollary positions under that grant. There is the grant under the national health program that is given to assist students who are studying psychiatry and who are taking a psychology course such as the one that is being carried on at the university of Toronto, and McMaster university. Those are all significant grants that are being made to the cause of education.

When one thinks of the provision that is made under that program for the purchase of teaching equipment, in thousands of dollars in every one of our provinces, one cannot ignore the fact that this is an important assistance to the cause of education. The amount of money that has been given to the provinces under this program for the purchase, for instance, of motion picture machines alone in order to carry on visual education, would run into many thousands of dollars, and must all be regarded as a significant contribution for a specific purpose to the cause of education. The fact that moneys have been given to assist teachers to carry on certain of these courses is not without its significance. The grants made for research under the public health grant, under the t.b. grant, are all grants made in aid of research and extremely important research. Two years ago, on the medical side, there was not more than about $5,000, apart from the national research council grants, given by the federal government in aid of medical scientific research. Today there is almost $2 million available, through this program or through the national research program, by which medical research is carried on. In the field of cancer—an important phase of the work carried on by our medical schools, and that is part of our job of education—two and a half years ago there were three fundamental cancer projects only under way. Today there are over eighty-one as a result of this program and of the assistance given to it by the provinces. Apart from the grants that are made under the specific grants, there is the research grant in this year in the amount of $300,000 which is allocated for the specific purpose of medical scientific research. All these things are not without the greatest value. Any hon. member can today go to McGill university, to the university of Montreal, to Western university or to the university of Manitoba, and he will find there that extremely important research is going on with regard to cortisone and ACTH, two of the most important drugs to appear within the last decade and a half. These are all significant contributions that are entailing tremendous expenditures on the part of the people of this country, all part of the program of assistance supplementarily given to the provinces in respect of matters of research which but for this assistance would in all probability in most instances not be carried out at all.

Then there is another important contribution made by the federal government with respect to education. I am sure the leader of the opposition will agree with me when I say—and he has had experience as minister of education—that after the introduction of family allowances in the province of Ontario, as in other provinces, the school attendance was in greater measure than at any time before in the history of this province. I have been told by the ministers of education in at least four provinces that as a result of the introduction of family allowances the statutory requirement has been lived up to to a greater extent—in one case the figure was 14 per cent higher—than before family allowances were introduced. One should not just accept these family allowances as having merely a social benefit. They have a great benefit in terms of giving the parents the opportunity of keeping their children at school until the statutory school age is reached, and that is a result of great importance.

This year we are spending over $300 million in family allowances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In what province was that?

Mr. Martin: In the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They both went to school.

Mr. Martin: That province has a very great educational achievement in spite of its small population.

The family allowance can be regarded as an assistance to education in a way that does not contravene the constitution of our country. The books, the clothing, the nutritional opportunities, all of which enable the child to continue at school, surely must be regarded by this house as a definite contribution towards buttressing the systems of education that we have in our country. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I express what might be regarded as the reconsidered views of even the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution when I say, in the language of the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. St. Laurent), speaking in this house on this same motion on October 19 last, as recorded at page 947 of Hansard:

> I should think it would be wise not to attempt to determine with any degree of precision how the purposes can best be served until we have——heard from the Massey commission, and I would add, using the direction given by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), until we have had an opportunity first of sitting down and discussing these matters in detail with those jurisdictions of government which, under the constitution, have the exclusive responsibility in matters of education.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this resolution, which I support. No fewer than five school boards in my constituency of York West have passed resolutions and written to me on this very matter. The costs and the problems of education in the densely populated and rapidly growing urban municipalities of Ontario require immediate and most urgent consideration from the federal administration.

To give the federal government some idea of their responsibilities, expressed on a cash basis, may I say that in the next few years the suburban municipalities around the city of Toronto will probably have around 10,000 new houses erected by the federal government agency of Central Mortgage and Housing alone. This depends on a number of factors which I will not go into at the moment; but that is the sort of problem and the size of the problem with which we are faced.

Let us look at what this means to the urban municipality and to the school boards. In the next four or five years 10,000 houses will be built in suburban Toronto under the auspices of the federal housing authority. That means that there will be in the neighbourhood of 20,000 children of school age who will require 400 school rooms. The cost today of an individual school room in central Ontario, or in Toronto, runs anywhere from $35,000 to $50,000, depending upon whether it is a primary school or a technical school. That will mean for the national housing project alone an expenditure of some $16 million for schools. The municipalities are in no shape financially to meet this capital cost. What will happen is simply this. You have your federal government assisted houses and you have another group of houses infinitely greater than the federal government assisted houses which in the next five or ten years will probably entail an expenditure approaching $50 million in the Toronto area alone for new schools. That is new capital for new schools.

The mayor of Toronto has said that today municipal taxation has reached the absolute bearable limit. I would say that if municipal taxation goes up you will begin to have a destruction of the value of real estate either in terms of value or in the security of tenure.

In my opinion the federal government has a direct responsibility for the results of its action in building these housing schemes. Today you cannot build houses without due recognition of the problems of servicing them. One of the most expensive problems of servicing houses is looking after the educational needs of the people who live in them. Today the cost of education is 60 per cent or 70 per cent of the total tax on real estate. If this goes higher two things will happen. First, municipal taxation will increase to a point where the ownership of real estate, home ownership itself, will become less desirable. Secondly, you will put on the municipality a burden of taxation which will seriously jeopardize its solvency. Those are the immediate problems we have to solve. It is not a problem we have to solve five years or ten years from now, but rather one we shall have to solve this year. Every new house that is going to be built this summer creates its own school problem. Every new house that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation builds creates a school liability which, in my opinion, is the responsibility of the federal administration.

I am not going to go into arguments about the wording of the resolution. Possibly it might have been worded somewhat differently so as to make it suitable to merit my absolute and unqualified support, because I feel that the mere expenditure of money without certain safeguards or qualifying conditions is unwise.

I should like to mention one condition which I think is an important one, and that is that if the federal government is to spend money on education, and I sincerely hope they do, the government must see—if the money goes into capital in the nature of schools which, I believe, is perhaps the most pressing need—that its investment is secure. One of the conditions I would urge upon the federal government, particularly in dealing with new school sections, is to see that the community in which a school is built is properly planned. Today one of the great problems in connection with education, and the cost of it, is that it has been found that the population in the centre of our major cities, and which supported the old schools, has moved out, with the result that those schools serve a diminishing number of pupils. Indeed, we have cases in Toronto where schools have actually been closed or put to other uses for that reason.

This is an uneconomical thing to have happen, and it can be prevented from now on by proper town planning and proper zoning. I make the point strongly to the government that all money expended in capital expenditures for schools should have attached to it the condition that such money should go only into those school sections or communities where there are adequate town plans, so that the value of the real estate, the value of the school and the type of the community will remain constant and of high value.

My other suggestion by which the government could give immediate aid to the schools in my constituency is one I have made before. Today the average householder in the Toronto metropolitan area is paying between $185 and $200 in taxation for municipal purposes. Of that amount between 60 and 70 per cent goes for education. I suggest that the government consider immediately allowing that taxation as an expenditure deductible from income for taxation purposes.

Today our municipal tax structure is increasing at an alarming rate. This is true all across Canada. What we have to do immediately is to relieve the burden of taxation on the people who today are paying for the education of our children, namely the property owners. I suggest the first thing to be done is to allow school taxes—as a matter of fact, all municipal taxation—as a deduction from income for tax purposes.

That falls into line with the principle of doing away with double taxation. I strongly suggest that the government consider that at once, and that it certainly be considered as one of the principal items to be taken up before the dominion-provincial conference. This is not an academic problem; it is not a problem that can wait for the report of the Massey commission. The commission may sit for years; we do not know. This is not something we can wait for a conference or a royal commission to decide upon. This is something that today in this very year every householder, every owner of real estate and every head of a family is finding right on his doorstep in the demand for taxation for municipal purposes.

Unless this constantly increasing cost of municipal taxation is arrested we are going to find ourselves in a position similar to that of the twenties and thirties when the value of real property was destroyed because of taxation, when municipalities became bankrupt and when the vital security of the whole of the Canadian people was jeopardized. I repeat that this is not an academic subject; it is not a subject which can wait. This is a subject which requires immediate attention.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is hardly necessary for me to repeat what I said on numerous occasions regarding the importance of education in Canada. Nevertheless, I consider it my duty to oppose the resolution now before the house for reasons, or rather for one reason I shall state very briefly.

Let us see first of all how the resolution before the house reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. members of this house to note the words "for that purpose". They are very important. The motion, as it reads, provides that the federal government will grant financial assistance to the provinces for educational purposes. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the words "for that purpose" for the motion does not ascribe a particular meaning to the word "education" and I must therefore conclude it refers to education in general. Besides, it is clearly implied by the context and I need not repeat the distinctions made just a few moments ago by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

If such subsidies were paid to the provinces by the federal government it would be duty bound to keep a constant check on the provinces in order to make sure that payments were being used exclusively for educational purposes. One can imagine, for instance, a central government at a given time made up of men with definite ideas on the meaning of the word "education" and who would demand that the same meaning be adopted by the provincial authority. The federal government could then claim that certain sums paid to a province for educational purposes are being spent by that province for purposes which, in the minds of the members of the federal government, are other than educational. This might be a source of endless difficulties.

You have only to consider what is happening at the present time in the province of Quebec under the leadership of l'Union Nationale to see how far that can go. As a matter of fact, under pretence of financial assistance to school boards, the government of that province has deprived them of their administrative and educational autonomy. In my opinion, the same thing could easily happen in the federal field if financial assistance were to be granted to the provinces by the federal government for general educational purposes, or in other words, for no specific educational purposes.

As far as I am concerned, my respect for the constitution of this country is such that I can surely not agree with the principle of federal grants to the provinces for general educational purposes. Moreover, I hold no brief from my constituents in this matter.

I do regret the absence from this house of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). I am convinced that he would agree with me on this principle, and that he would be forced to oppose the views expressed this afternoon by his leader (Mr. Drew) and by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), because the attitude taken by them today does not correspond in any way to the attitude they took during the last electoral campaign, when they claimed to be staunch supporters of provincial autonomy. They laugh because they do not understand.

(Text):

The leader of the opposition may laugh, but he who was such a ferocious defender of provincial autonomy proposed this afternoon that the federal government should enter the educational field which under section 93 is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since there is a Hansard record may I insist that there shall not be such a deliberate misstatement as that which has just been made. I made it perfectly clear, and in words that could not be misunderstood, that no step taken here should imply any intervention in the exclusive jurisdiction over education by the provincial governments. What the hon. member was trying to do was to place on Hansard an impression which was entirely contrary in every way to what I had said, and which he knew to be contrary.

Mr. Lesage: While I was speaking in French I said that any grants for general educational purposes made to the provinces would necessarily give the federal government the right to review the expenditures, and the right to review by the federal government the expenditures by the provinces for educational purposes means that the federal government would be entering the provincial field of education.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I should like to remind all hon. members, and in this case particularly the leader of the opposition, that when an hon. member has the floor he must not be interrupted unless it is to put a question. The leader of the opposition did not state that he was rising on a question of privilege. If he wishes to clarify a remark that he made, of course in these cases the house is always generous although it could be done after the hon. member who has the floor finished his speech. If the leader of the opposition merely stands up the Speaker cannot know his reason for rising unless he states he wishes to ask a question or is rising on a question of privilege. It is important that the Speaker should know.

Mr. Drew: I am rising on a question of privilege. I imagine that the hon. member who is speaking must have been out of the house when I was speaking because I find it difficult to believe that he could make the remark he has now made if he had been in the house. I pointed out clearly this afternoon that any arrangement that was made must be made in such a way that the granting of money would entail no indirect control or supervision over or intervention in the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces over education.

Mr. Lesage: Before I made my statement in English I had implied while speaking in French that a vote for the resolution as worded meant approval of the fact that the federal government would be entering the provincial field of education. If I understood correctly what the leader of the opposition said this afternoon, he stated definitely that he approved of the resolution. If he approves of the resolution then he is against provincial autonomy in the field of education. I believe that is logical and sensible, although it is a matter for argument.

Mr. Knight: On a question of privilege—

An hon. Member: Again.

Mr. Knight: Again. I think I should join the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in protesting the meaning the hon. gentleman gives to my resolution. I am accustomed of course to these charges of being a "centralisateur".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. The hon. member cannot control the interpretation placed on his resolution by other hon. members. After all, hon. members are at liberty to give their own interpretation to a resolution before the house. Their interpretation may be wrong in the view of the mover of the resolution but he cannot rise on a question of privilege and protest against the interpretation given to the resolution by other members. I should like to refer hon. members to citation 235 of Beauchesne, third edition, page 101, which reads:

> A member who, during a debate, has spoken to a question may again be heard to offer explanation of some material part of his speech which has been misunderstood; but he must not introduce new matter or endeavour to strengthen by new arguments, his former position which he alleges to have been misunderstood, or to reply to other members.

Therefore I should like all hon. members to respect the rules of the house, and I would ask the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) to carry on with his speech.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I must say that I did not at any time say that the resolution would in any way take away from the jurisdiction of the provinces. The hon. member said something else when he was speaking in French.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to tell the hon. member that I understand fairly well the French that is spoken in this house.

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: Maybe I spoke in such a low voice that the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) could not hear me.

(Translation):

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has endeavoured to convince us that he could support the resolution since the federal government would not have to earmark the grants for educational purposes. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) takes refuge behind the same argument.

To justify such views either the motion would have to be redrafted, as I pointed out a moment ago, or the member for Lake Centre or the leader of the opposition would have to bring in the necessary amendment.

As I understood the member for Lake Centre this afternoon, he simply requests that the general grants provided by the federal government to the provincial governments under the constitution be increased.

I shall use the argument put forward by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon to state that this is a matter for discussion at the federal-provincial conference to be held next fall.

In any case, if the provincial governments wish to get grants from the dominion government for educational purposes, they will certainly ask for them at the next conference, but it is up to them to mention the matter and not up to us because we have received no mandate from the Canadian people as regards education.

(Text):

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the hon. member reading from at the moment?

Mr. Lesage: I am following notes, as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) often does.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wondered what you were reading from.

Mr. Lesage: I am not reading; I am following notes. I do not believe I can be accused of having read when I was speaking in English or that I can be accused of reading now. I took notes when the hon. member for Lake Centre spoke this afternoon, and I was referring to them.

(Translation):

Personally, I should be amazed if the Quebec government, of whatever political hue, ever agreed to let the federal government look after education in general in the province. I am sure that the bosom friend of the leader of the opposition, the present premier of Quebec, will not be very pleased with him when he reads the speech he made this afternoon.

Had I received a provincial mandate, I would be duty bound to oppose the motion and I would never agree to let the federal government have a say in the whole matter of education in the province of Quebec.

However, ours is a federal mandate and in my opinion, educational matters are not within our jurisdiction. It was not without reason that the fathers of confederation specified in section 93 of the British North America Act that education was solely under provincial jurisdiction. That was done in order to protect the rights of minorities. Now as I belong to a minority, I should be remiss in my duty if, like others from this side of the house who are prepared to vote against the motion out of genuine regard for the Canadian constitution, I did not consider myself bound to express my unqualified opposition to a motion which would involve the loss of sacred rights upon which our very survival depends.

For that reason, I shall vote against the resolution.

(Text):

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, my main reason for rising at this time is that the resolution has been before the house and debated at considerable length on two occasions. To the best of my knowledge no member from the maritimes has taken part in the discussions. In order to disabuse the minds of members who may think that we have no educational problems in Nova Scotia, I feel it is my duty to rise and say something about the resolution. This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) displayed some very smart footwork. I admire him for it. He stated that the government was anxious to have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. Gardiner: Agreed.

Mr. Gillis: At the same time I notice that there are quite a few government members ready and willing to speak. I think the Minister of Agriculture was quite safe in making that assertion. I cannot understand how he can take the position that the wording of the resolution implies controls. It has been read to the house several times. It is plain and simple, and there is not a word in the resolution to suggest that, if it were passed by the house, the federal government would tell the provincial governments in any way how, when and where they should spend the money. The Minister of Agriculture rang the bell for government members in the event of a vote. He told them he was leading the house, and that in so far as he was concerned he would vote against the resolution. That means that it would be voted down. He did so on the ground that the resolution implied control. I like to be fair in these matters, and I do not think anyone reading the resolution can construe it as entering the provincial field of education.

At the same time the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) suggested that if the resolution had been introduced in some other form dealing with specific matters the chances are it might have received favourable consideration. I am sure the minister knows that if that resolution had been presented in any other form it would not have been discussed by this house. If it had been specific, and recommended that this or that should be done, that money should be spent, then it would have been considered that a private member was advocating government expenditure, and the motion would have been ruled out of order. The only form the resolution could take in order to have a discussion is the innocent form in which it is found. It merely asks the government to increase the grants to the provincial governments for the purpose of equalizing educational opportunity across the country.

I believe this afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was misleading his members with his interpretation of the resolution. Of course, he is entitled to do that, but as house leader I believe he was unfair in the attitude he took. I view this as an extremely serious matter. The teachers union of Nova Scotia has been urging the federal members to act on the matter of federal aid to education. I am going to put one of their telegrams on the record, in order to show why they think education in the maritimes cannot keep pace with the other provinces. They believe it is due to economic reasons, and I think that is correct. This telegram is signed by the general secretary of the Nova Scotia teachers union, and reads as follows:

The educational opportunities for the children of Canada depend in large measure on the wealth of the individual province. Nova Scotia as you know is one of several provinces which is not financially independent. The Nova Scotia teachers union has long favoured federal aid to education, and now this subject has come before the house, we urge that you, in the interest of the children of Nova Scotia, support federal aid to education wholeheartedly.

That is the position taken by the Nova Scotia teachers union, and it speaks for all teachers in that province.

To support the contention that you cannot have equal educational opportunities across the country on the basis upon which the federal grants to the provinces are made, I cite the remarks of the member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode); I believe he put his finger on the problem. Speaking in this debate this evening he told us that he taught in a rural section of British Columbia, and he believed that 50 per cent of the students that went to high schools had no right to be there. Their parents were not financially able to put these children through university if they did graduate from high school. In many cases the parents were not financially able to allow the children to complete high school training. He felt those children should go into vocational schools. He said that the reason for that was an economic one. I believe that is a rather serious statement, especially since it came from a teacher. That is true not only in rural British Columbia but in many of the rural districts right across Canada. It is true not only in the rural districts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick but in the industrial sections of those provinces.

If you look at the record of the men going into and coming out of the services you will find that thousands of young Canadians who fought throughout the war and returned to this country were not in a position to take advantage of the vocational training offered by the government because they had not completed the eighth grade. If a man had not completed the eighth grade he could not qualify for vocational training under the veterans legislation. Thousands of these men were not able to go through the eighth grade, because of the economic conditions that existed across this country in the years previous to the war.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was speaking, he painted a lovely picture of the assistance the federal government is rendering, not only in the field of education but also in health. I often wonder whether that information is trickling through to the people, and whether the people actually get it. I believe, as a result of my travels through my province, they are not getting it. For example, if there is money on hand in Nova Scotia for educational purposes or to assist a worthy student, how does it happen that several times during this session I have received letters and telegrams from student veterans who are within a couple of months of graduation from a university when their grant has run out? Those boys are not able to spend the next few months in university and graduate with a certificate because they are unable to pay the tuition. Where are the educational grants that go to the province of Nova Scotia? Several of these cases have been brought to my attention, and if there are funds on hand in the province they certainly should be used to assist that particular type of case.

Free school books are provided up to the eighth grade. Sometimes its appears to me as if many of the provinces want eighth-grade scholars. They seem to be afraid that if the student goes through university he may become smart enough to threaten them in the political field. There are too many eighth-grade scholars. In my opinion the books used up to the eighth grade are not very expensive and could perhaps be provided by the parents, but after the pupil leaves the eighth grade and goes to high school the books become expensive and the parents cannot buy them. In the final analysis it is the municipal government that takes the beating on this question of education. In my home town, a town of about 28,000, 60 per cent of the total income is spent on schools. This means that 60 cents of every dollar is spent on the upkeep of schools, and the payment of teachers' salaries. This means cutting into other essential services in that town, and I know that many other towns in the province of Nova Scotia are in a similar position.

I am strongly in favour of the federal government having some supervision of the money. When you look back at some of the dominion-provincial conferences you find the premiers of the provinces taking the position that they will not relinquish this field or that field. They want to keep the prerogatives laid down in the constitution of 1867, when the world was completely different from the one which now exists. What is it they want to keep? The supervision of the poor, the lame, the sick and the maimed. If the federal government makes a grant for health purposes, it is earmarked for cancer research or cripples.

Mr. Martin: As a result of the direct suggestion of the provinces in each case.

Mr. Gillis: I am not so sure of that.

Mr. Martin: I am sure that if I give my hon. friend that assurance he will accept it.

Mr. Gillis: I will take the minister's word for it, but I still think someone is fooling him. We remember how the federal government took the bull by the horns when it enacted the Old Age Pensions Act. It was said that any province desiring to take advantage of it could do so. It was not very long until they all did. I think it is completely unreasonable to expect the federal government to pour out millions of dollars to the provinces and then say the federal government should not have a voice in how the money is to be spent.

If the federal government sends money into Nova Scotia or into any other province I believe that they should be in a position to say that that money is to be used for educational purposes. In the case of the student veteran within two months of graduation but who, because he cannot pay that two months' tuition fee, must go out, I believe that funds should be available to assist him. Then with regard to entrance to high school, for economic reasons and because of differentials that exist in standards from province to province thousands of children cannot take advantage of high school. Where a child shows promise and is recommended by his last teacher, I believe that funds should be earmarked for the purpose of assisting that boy, or girl, to go through high school, and I believe that principle should be followed through university. What have we in this country today? We have professional men who should be digging ditches and we have ditch diggers who should be professional men. Education does not necessarily mean that you have brains. It means that you were fortunate in picking your parents and that they had the finances with which to put you through university.

Until you get around to that specific direction in this field of education, I believe you will always have the difficulties that you now have. On the other hand, the figures or the statistics put on record this afternoon by the member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) in my opinion were quite revealing. From province to province in this country the standards differ greatly. As to your educational set-up or social service set-up, everything the government has to spend money on to assist people, there will be a differentiation depending on the income of the province. British Columbia has a provincial income of $105 million a year; Alberta, $79 million; Saskatchewan, $74 million; and Ontario and Quebec are up proportionately. But when you go down to the maritimes, you find it is down to nothing through no fault of their own; they are victims of confederation. Until such time as you have ironed out the inequalities that exist in the whole economy across this country, there will be no possible chance of having equality in social services or educational facilities. These things have to be ironed out first.

I strongly suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) might consider this point, and I know that many representations have been made on it. He could assist education if the Family Allowances Act were amended to provide that, in cases in which a boy or girl had reached the age when he or she was coming off the family allowance, it could be continued while that boy or girl was continuing education. The greatest hardship suffered by the parent is in getting the child through high school. That is where the family allowance could be of great assistance. I know that the act does not provide for that assistance, and the administration are adamant that they are not going to make any changes in that direction. While the family allowance is of great benefit now up till the boy or girl reaches the age where he or she comes off it, I know that many cases have been brought to the attention of the minister asking for a continuation of that allowance while the child is continuing education. That is something the minister could do, and do quickly.

Then as to this business of waiting for the Massey commission to report, may I say that I do not think there is any necessity to delay this particular question until the Massey commission reports. What can the Massey commission report to this government that has not been reported by the Rowell-Sirois commission? I am sure that every member of this house who was here in 1940 and secured a copy of that report has read not all of it—because I do not think anyone would ever read it all—but the sections that apply to social security, revision of the constitution, education, and dominion-provincial rights. Most of us went through it. I think that was the most comprehensive report that was ever brought down in this country, covering the whole economy of the country and the field of dominion-provincial jurisdiction. It was a new constitution. It made recommendations. If they were carried out, there is no necessity for having any difficulties with the provinces; and there would be no necessity for appointing another commission to take evidence on arts, letters, music and so on and so forth. You have the whole thing in that Rowell-Sirois commission report. You spent millions of dollars on it, brought it into the house, and a few of the members read it. It was never publicized, and it was sent to the archives to gather dust. For anyone who wants the real picture of the whole economic set-up and the changes that are necessary in the economy to bring about some measure of equality as between province and province, the evidence is all contained there in that Rowell-Sirois commission report. I say that the minister should take a look at it and go back over it, because I do not think you will ever gather that kind of data again. I think it is one of the best reports ever written in this country.

I think it is time to take action. We still have a chance to vote on this resolution this evening. I should like to see a vote taken but I should like to see the minister or the cabinet and the members on the government side of the house take the position that the federal government will give assistance if the provinces cannot do anything for themselves, if they have not the money with which to promote education, if they cannot do an adequate job in the field of health. And they admit they cannot because they have not done so though they have been at it since 1867. As to any of the benefits where all this money is being spent, when I go back to my own province my impression is that it is much more difficult today to get service than ever before, either in the way of hospitalization, medical attention, education and all the other things that we are spending all that money on. I do not know what happens in the other provinces, but I certainly cannot see any local administrations that are getting their hands on any of that money to perform any services at all. The minister is building hospitals. He went into that matter at great length this afternoon, but I do not think it is germane to this resolution. But there is no use building hospitals if you cannot get into them. You just built a citadel there and put a lot of equipment into it; and unless you have the wherewithal to pay a lot of money, you do not get in, so you are just out in the cold. I know that the average member is in this position. He is plagued from week to week to have this, that and the other thing done. But there is one thing the Minister of National Health and Welfare could do. He could call his organization together tomorrow and say, "Let us just extend this family allowance to children who are continuing education." That is simple enough. That would be of considerable benefit to a great many widows particularly who badly need it.

Mr. Martin: I am accused now of doing too much.

Mr. Gillis: If that is the attitude, there is not much use in discussing the matter.

Mr. Martin: I said that I am accused now of doing too much.

Mr. Gillis: Don't you worry about that.

Mr. Martin: I am not.

Mr. Gillis: You will be accused anyway. Anyone who is not getting kicked around is not doing anything.

Mr. Martin: That is all I get.

Mr. Gillis: Just you go ahead and do the job, and 99 per cent of the people will back you up anyway. There are just a few who will kick you, and you will be able to take that. Am I to understand that the minister will take under consideration that matter of amending the Family Allowances Act to provide relief where children are continuing education?

Mr. Martin: We will all be studying these matters with great attention.

Mr. Gillis: I am glad to hear that the minister is paying special attention to that particular matter. In closing, I should just like to say this. I still cannot understand the Minister of Agriculture's interpretation of that resolution this afternoon, because I know he is a man—

Mr. Gardiner: You will talk the resolution out, if you keep on.

Mr. Gillis: No. There is plenty of time. The minister is a man who has a keen insight into these matters and he generally gets to the root of things. But on this particular resolution this afternoon I just could not make him out. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode), a teacher himself, interpreted the resolution and advanced some excellent reasons as to why it should be adopted.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I desire to offer a few remarks in support of the following proposed resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

I think the resolution is clear, despite the arguments that have been advanced against it as interfering with provincial rights. I do not think there is anything of that nature in it. Despite the fact that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) spoke against the resolution, I wish to endorse it wholeheartedly and also the remarks of the speakers in support of it.

This motion was discussed for an entire day last fall, namely on October 19, 1949, and arguments were set forth by my leader, which may be found on page 942, and following, of Hansard. Dealing with the splendid work of schoolteachers he, as minister of education in an Ontario government, rendered splendid service to education in that province which has been referred to by government speakers today. In that respect I might quote one paragraph of his speech last fall which is to be found at page 944 of Hansard. He said:

> There is, however, this important consideration which cannot be emphasized too often. Even if we built in Canada the finest schools that have ever been constructed anywhere, we would have done nothing to advance our educational standards unless those who are teaching in those schools are highly qualified to teach the children that come under their direction. For that reason, wherever the school may be and whatever type of school may be under consideration, the effort of all those concerned with the advancement of education in Canada should be to raise to a level that is in keeping with their responsibility the salaries of those to whom we are entrusting to a considerable extent the whole future of Canada.

There is a lot of meaning in that paragraph. I am sure there is no hon. member in the house who will not admit that at the present time there is great inequality in educational opportunities throughout this nation. In fact in a bulletin issued in 1945 it was shown that the average salary of teachers in one province was $633 while in another province in another part of the country the average was $1,552. Surely that is a tremendous difference in two provinces of this dominion. In 1941, the last year in which the census was taken, there were only 85,000 citizens in Canada with university degrees. At the same time there were in this country 360,000 people between the ages of 6 and 16, that is school age, who were not attending school at all. In my opinion, these figures are alarming.

I spoke on this matter on October 27, when we were discussing the amendment of the constitution, namely, the British North America Act. I think that is in keeping with the suggestion made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon; but in view of some of the statements made today I want to refer to the Manitoba teachers federation. Their brief has been endorsed by what is to me the greatest and most influential organization in Canada, namely, the Canadian Legion. I do not think anybody will dispute that statement either. They said:

> A new definition of education which involves the all-round development of the child, and an emphasis on citizenship, make the educational perspective of 1867 and a narrow interpretation of the provisions laid down in respect to education in the British North America Act untenable today.

At another point in their brief they said:

> In any plan of federal assistance it would be understood and agreed that the expenditure of funds by the government of Canada would in no way be deemed to confer upon any minister or official of the government of Canada any right of supervision or control over any school or educational institution with respect to which any federal government funds are expended.

That should clear up many of the arguments advanced by government speakers today. They have a very fine and lengthy article, but the point that I am most concerned about is the situation in the province of Manitoba from which I come. Cost of education has been a vital issue in the past two years at our annual Manitoba municipal convention, because the municipal officials must find the greater part of the money by a levy on real estate. In fact our municipal corporations in Manitoba find, by a levy on real estate, $3 for every $1 supplied by the provincial government. I am sure that is an antiquated system of financing education in the province. Notwithstanding that situation, the school trustees association of the province of Manitoba made it a vital issue at their last annual meeting. At their last convention, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 25, 1950, in an article headed, "Education minister says he feels Ottawa cannot give much more aid," the following appeared. First of all, what are we to expect from our provincial minister of education if he attends a conference next fall, when he publicly states that the province cannot expect any more aid from the federal government? According to the article he added:

> Doubt that the provincial government could go much further in the matter of financial aid to education was expressed Tuesday by Hon. C. Rhodes Smith, minister of education, in an address to 600 delegates attending the 41st annual convention of the Manitoba school trustees association.

I agree with all the remarks made by my colleague the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) on the great burden on real estate brought about by the cost of education. You cannot continue to have a levy on real estate, as we have in Manitoba, for over 75 per cent of the cost of education, and under that system have equality of education. It just cannot be done. I know that in my own municipality —I have referred to this on occasions, and there are many other examples throughout the entire province—a number of farmers along the Souris river have lost three crops in the last three years and they are now in the process of losing the fourth.

When this land does produce it is the most productive soil anywhere in that part of the country. Therefore it is the highest assessed property in the country. The majority of the taxes levied there are for the cost of education.

Some twenty miles down the river from me in another municipality there are a group of farmers who have lost the last seven crops in that river valley. They are in process of losing their eighth consecutive crop now. On another occasion I pointed out that they are attempting to get permission to sue this government for the faulty and improper construction of dams on the river, because prior to the construction of the dams those people had not lost a crop owing to flooding since the year 1916. Surely under a modern system today we must face up to the situation.

When I spoke last fall I suggested that municipal authorities should be invited to the dominion-provincial conference next fall. In view of what the Minister of Agriculture said this afternoon, I repeat that if this matter is to be discussed at that conference then the heads of the municipal unions should sit in, at least in an advisory capacity.

I have quoted the statement of the minister of education for the province of Manitoba, who does not think that we should even ask for federal aid. In the statement he said he does not think the province can go any further. What can we people in Manitoba expect when he attends this convention and speaks for the department of education in Manitoba? We do not have any municipal authority here. I am serious about the suggestion that they should be here.

There are further observations I should like to make at this time, but I dealt fully with the subject on October 27, and my remarks are to be found in detail at pages 1200 and following. The wish has been expressed by many hon. members that there should be an opportunity for a vote on this resolution tonight. In view of that, in view of the very full statement I made on the same resolution last fall, in view of the fact that my leader has spoken most effectively—and I have pointed out his record as minister of education in Ontario—and in view of the fact that I wish to endorse the resolution wholeheartedly, and will have more to say at another time, not wishing to be accused of standing in the way of the taking of a vote on this very important matter this evening, I will resume my seat at this time.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

(Translation):

Mr. Robert Cauchon (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, members on both sides of the house realize the importance of education. I need not draw the attention of the government to this matter, since it has already appointed a commission to inquire into the educational standards of the Canadian people, and the ways and means of improving them. This commission is known as the Massey commission. So far, the manner in which this commission has performed its duties has brought nothing but commendation.

In the meantime, the government has not remained inactive and after having heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) read a list of the grants made to various universities in this country, all will agree that they are endeavouring to promote education in Canada. The government has done everything that could possibly be done without encroaching upon the rights of the provinces.

Allow me to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the assistance afforded to our veterans with regard to education.

After the commission has submitted its report and has made known the shortcomings, if any, of our educational system, the government will undoubtedly carry out these recommendations, and thus be in a position to solve the problem of education after having agreed to increase its grants to the provinces, while, at the same time, safeguarding provincial autonomy.

I do not wish to speak at any length on this subject. I am opposed to this resolution in its present form because, first of all, it is premature and, second, because it infringes on the rights of the various provinces.

(Text):

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): May I assure hon. members that I did not call "question" when they spoke. I shall take only a few moments to speak on a subject concerning which I had prepared copious notes. However, it is not my intention tonight to repeat the arguments made earlier. I believe, as did those who spoke earlier, that this is a matter of great national importance.

In speaking tonight I do so without attempting either to support or to oppose the resolution, but rather to bring out certain points which have not been mentioned before. I do this without in any way trying to twist the words of any previous speakers or to paint any black pictures.

It has been mentioned by several speakers that education is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. There is no point in my discussing that matter further. It is only fair to say however that the national government has been most active in promoting certain phases of education. Our federal government has been most scrupulous in trying to meet its constitutional obligations in respect of the protection of the rights of the provinces and the rights of minorities.

In discussing this matter there are certain points which must be taken into consideration. It has been my hope not only to ask but to answer some of those questions. First, have those who are supporting or who have been opposing the resolution as worded taken into consideration our educational history, particularly with regard to finances, both in the past and at the present time? Have they considered the method by which technical and vocational education were introduced in Canada? Have they considered to any great extent the federal government's present participation in education? Have they thought of the difficulties that occurred in the United States when under W.P.A. they began issuing grants very freely for the building of school plants? Have they thought of the system of scholarships in effect in other countries? Most important, have they thought just what the expression "equal educational opportunity", which has become almost a cliché, really means? Have they thought at what level they would like to have federal educational aid? Is it to be at the primary level, the secondary level or the university level?

Several speakers have made the suggestion that if we were to spend twice or three times as much on education we would have a system twice or three times as good. However, not one of them carried his argument further; each was content to make only the bald statement. I do not see how we can assume that by spending twice or three times as much we shall of necessity have a much better system of education.

I feel I must reply to two or three statements made by members on both sides of the house regarding education in the maritime provinces. I believe I can speak with some little authority—certainly I can so far as education in Nova Scotia is concerned—because as I said a few days ago I spent practically all my adult life working in the field of education in that province.

When the suggestion is made, as it was by at least one speaker, that Nova Scotia does not have a good educational system, or a system not as good as that in some other provinces, I should like to know by what method we are going to measure the system? Earlier speakers suggested that whether or not a teacher was paid $1,150 in one area and $1,152.40 in another, it did not necessarily follow that the teacher would be any better or that the type of service given would be any better.

It has been said that certain provinces have spent a great deal more for their physical plant and equipment. This is true. But it does not necessarily follow that the education will be better in proportion to the additional amount of money spent. I do not believe it is generally realized—certainly it is not by some who spoke earlier today—that in Nova Scotia we have embarked within the last decade upon a system of improving considerably our physical plant and equipment, in securing better training for our teachers, and planning new types of school buildings we propose to build within the next few years. We plan for approximately seventy-five rural high schools and consolidated high schools, which will mean that practically every boy and girl in Nova Scotia will have rural high school and consolidated school facilities available to them.

We have under construction at the present time two regional vocational high schools. They are being financed partially by grants under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act of 1942. We propose during the next few years, if the municipalities in the areas concerned are as interested in the plan as the counties of Yarmouth and Halifax have been, to build at least three more regional vocational high schools. At the same time we are doing this we are spending much more money on education than we did before. I do not think that any hon. member should stand up in this house and suggest that, because we are not spending as much per capita, as much per pupil or as much in total as some of the other provinces, we have not as good an educational system.

There are several ways in which the dominion government takes part in education. Some have been mentioned and I should like to mention one or two. You may wonder why I go from a discussion of rural and vocational high schools to a discussion of the research council and other such matters, but as I mentioned earlier I do not want to repeat what previous speakers have said. I think the establishment of the research council represents one of the most constructive and forward steps ever taken in this country. I think we should look on it more as an institution for the promotion of the development of our natural and national resources than as an educational agency.

I wonder how many people realize that in the penitentiaries of Canada, which are under the jurisdiction of the national government, the federal government, in some cases with the assistance of the provincial government, is providing vocational and correspondence courses for the inmates so that when they come out they will be better fitted to earn their living and to lead a better life.

In Great Britain where the national government is responsible for education, as it has been for centuries, national scholarships have been set up. The same is true of the Union of South Africa where the national government is responsible for higher education. But in Canada, where the provinces have jurisdiction over education, as far as I know not one province has instituted a system of scholarships.

The words "equal educational opportunity" have been bandied about today and I venture to say that every single member in the house has a different interpretation of them. I sometimes think that we get a false impression. It is so easy to misinterpret the principle of equality as applied to education. There is a great diversity in the potentialities of children and I feel that the concept of equality is slightly improper. I would much prefer to use a term like equitable distribution of educational opportunity.

It must be remembered that in applying this principle the governments themselves have nothing with which to meet the obligation. Regardless of their geographical location or the areas under their jurisdiction they do not have any funds. The funds must come from the people themselves. Whether it be at the municipal, the provincial or the federal level, the funds must come from the individual taxpayer. There are those who feel that the national government could help both the municipal and the provincial governments to provide education by relieving them of certain other services. There are those who believe that education should be paid for by a threefold association at the municipal, the provincial and federal levels. There are those who think that the government should give assistance in the form of grants in aid. There are others who feel that there should be no federal assistance whatsoever.

Provincial autonomy is greatly cherished in all parts of Canada, and particularly so with reference to education. Those who feel that there should be federal aid say that that aid can be provided without there being federal control. Those who are opposed to federal aid say that if we do have such aid there will be federal control. In other words, he who pays the piper calls the tune.

I think it was the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) who said that this was more than an academic discussion, and I quite agree. This is a discussion in which one must consider carefully the effect upon the country's economy and at the same time consider the variety of educational facilities provided in the different parts of Canada. I feel that a discussion such as this has been worth while. It has given us and the people of the country an opportunity to consider the problem and to decide whether there should be federal aid for education.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, like the speaker who has just taken his seat, I submit that the cost of education, regardless of how it is raised or how it is administered, must come from the individual taxpayer. To say that the cost will be provided by a central organization does not indicate that that cost is going to be decreased. I firmly believe that it would tend toward increasing the cost of education.

Those who are responsible for the expenditure of money, whether it be for education or for any other purpose, will I think in great measure be more discriminating and more careful as to the ways in which they expend our money, if they also be responsible for the raising of money. There is no argument against that fact. By keeping the administration of education and schools in the smaller areas it will tend toward making available a greater measure of voluntary work and therefore to a great degree reduce the actual cost of administration and so on.

I think it was the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) who argued that because ten thousand new homes were being built in Toronto there would have to be large expenditures for school purposes in that particular area. That is quite true, but it must be remembered that new families will be moving into such areas and it does not follow that the people in some other area should take over the responsibility of educating those children. In an endeavour to bring the federal government into the picture the hon. member argued that this was a federal housing project. That is quite true, but it must be remembered that in most cases the federal government is paying 75 per cent of the cost, with the provincial government paying 25 per cent. New sources of taxation are brought into being by the federal government which will go into the general fund of the provincial government, who are thus responsible for any further assistance needed in connection with education. These areas will also bring in additional taxes to the municipality which is responsible for the basic administration of the schools. I certainly agree wholeheartedly with everyone who has spoken previously in this debate that the question of education is of the utmost importance. We must go just as far as we can in every respect, but I do not think it follows that by centralization and bringing the federal government into the matter we shall improve the picture a very great deal.

Mr. Knowles: Are you opposed to federal aid to education?

Mr. Ross (Souris): He is just talking it out.

Mr. McIlraith: You have had a chance to speak. Let others have a chance.

Mr. Byrne: The province of British Columbia set up a commission to investigate the cost of education. The result, the Cameron report which left the city of Kimberley in which I live in a most unfortunate position. The report really discriminated against that area, and I should like to explain in what way that came about. In the Cameron report there was a great deal of sympathy for the poorer or rural areas. This is merely an illustration to show that just because we have the larger authority giving instructions it does not always work out for the best of all concerned. I want to prove that is not the case. The recommendation in the Cameron report was that rural areas would not be charged in excess of 8 mills on their property, houses and so on. The Cameron report also recommended large municipal school areas where it would be necessary to bring school children in from rural areas by bus. The recommendation of 8 mills for rural areas overlooked the fact that a large number of people living in what might be called the suburbs of Kimberley were people who were working and enjoying the same privileges in every way as those living within the city. They were all working for the one large mining company. The people outside the municipality of Kimberley enjoyed a very low mill rate of 8 mills on the dollar for school purposes whereas in many instances people in poorer circumstances than those on the outskirts are paying in the neighbourhood of 40 mills on their assessments. Therefore it is easy to see that the people in the city are paying for the transportation to school of those in the outlying districts and providing them with the same facilities obtainable by those within the municipality. That is a question that has to be worked out, and I am sure that with further consideration it will be.

Mr. Noseworthy: Question.

Mr. Byrne: This illustration is merely by way of proving what can take place. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) indicated that the government had not done enough for veterans who were not able to carry on their school work by reason of entering the armed forces. He said that on their return to civil life the government had not done enough to assist them in obtaining an education. Personally I feel that the Department of Veterans Affairs has done by way of assistance to returned veterans more than any other country. I have in mind one particular case. This individual is closely related to me and that is why I know the case better than any other. I should like to use it as an example of how veterans were aided through educational benefits extended by the government. This man was discharged from the army and when he began university training he was married and the father of two children. Before completing his university training he had three children to support.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I think the house generally would like to have a vote on this most important resolution.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Sinclair: He has a right to speak.

Mr. Graydon: I have a right to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Byrne: Very few members on this side of the house have had an opportunity to speak on the question.

Mr. Sinclair: Just cheap Tory politics.

Mr. Cruickshank: We know nothing about filibustering over here.

Mr. Speaker: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: You have done it.

Mr. Fleming: Saved by the bell.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will move to go into supply and call one item of the labour department and one item of legislation, these items to stand. Then we will take up Bill No. 179, an act to amend the Research Council Act; Bill No. 222, an act to amend the Cold Storage Act; Bill No. 82, an act to amend the Criminal Code; Bill No. 180, an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946. If we have any time left we will take up Bill No. 153, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister mind repeating the first item?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We will move to go into supply and call one item of the labour department and one item of legislation, these items to stand.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 23, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON BILL NO. 133

Mr. R. O. Campney (Vancouver Centre) presented the first report of the special committee on Bill No. 133, respecting national defence, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

EMPIRE DAY

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP AND CANADA'S POSITION IN THE COMMONWEALTH

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the calendar indicates, this is the 23rd of May, and because it is the school day immediately preceding May 24th it is being celebrated in the schools of several provinces as Empire day.

Empire day, as hon. members know, originated some fifty years ago, the purpose being to provide the pupils with a special occasion to study the history of Canada and to take part in such exercises as might increase their interest in their own country and strengthen their attachment to the empire. In other provinces where Empire day has not been so celebrated, I am quite sure that special occasions have been provided for the telling of tales of heroism and self-sacrifice, of leadership in civic affairs and of other glorious pages in our history.

In the past fifty years there has been a great change in our status. What was then a colony in an empire is now an independent nation in a commonwealth. We have by act of parliament established our own citizenship. Consequently, as I announced in the house on April 28, I approached the provincial premiers with the result that they all agreed to have arrangements made to the end that some occasion might be found today in the schools for exercises having in mind, in respect of the position of Canada in the commonwealth, the rights, the privileges, the duties and the responsibilities of Canadian citizenship. Not only are these exercises being held in the schools, but public-spirited organizations of all kinds are making this a special day in that regard.

I think I speak for all hon. members when I express appreciation to the provincial premiers; to the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire, who have always been specially interested in the Empire day observances; to the various municipal officials and to officials of churches, service clubs, and other organizations, for their assistance and co-operation in this regard. Perhaps I may in particular express appreciation to the Canadian citizenship council, who have done so much to co-ordinate the activities of organizations promoting the study of Canadian citizenship.

In these past fifty years Canada has become a great nation. We have at all times discharged our national obligations promptly and honourably, and no country which does that needs to try by artificial means to create patriotism. On the other hand we should not ignore the desirability of providing an occasion for developing a sense of respect for the achievements of our people and for renewing our determination to exceed those achievements in the future.

Citizenship in Canada is founded on the faith that two of the proudest races of the world could each preserve their own language and their own creed and yet live together and develop a common nationality. To the partnership of the two races which held to that faith has been added the vigour and energy of thousands of others from most of the nations of the earth. These three streams in our national life have created a citizenship which with our endeavours will in the years to come give increasing reason for celebrating Canadian citizenship with sincerity and pride.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the Prime Minister in expressing pleasure that throughout this country celebrations are to take place today and tomorrow which will seek to emphasize in the minds of the youth of this country, as well as in members of the older generation, those sacrifices over many long years upon which our freedom, our development and our growth have been built.

Events may to some extent change the particular meaning of words, but any nation would be extremely unappreciative of that past which has given us our present if it did not recall in association with those names all that they have meant in making the country what it is today.

Empire Day

It is appropriate that as we celebrate the wider association of which Canada has formed a part for so many years, and of which we undoubtedly shall continue to form a part throughout the years ahead, we should emphasize the act of citizenship and all that has gone into the making of it.

I think it is a good thing on such occasions to remind our young people that all the tremendous advantages we have today have been bought for us at a very great price. Only a very short distance from us here in this chamber is one of the most beautiful memorials to be found anywhere in the world. Around that memorial chamber are these words:

They are too near to be great but our children shall understand when and how our fate was changed and by whose hand.

As we seek to impress upon our new citizens, as well as upon our older citizens, all the significance of this particular day, it would also be well for us to recall how much thousands of young men and women were prepared to give for the freedom they enjoy.

No nation has better reason to be proud of its past than we have; no nation has greater reason to feel confidence about the future, and we shall develop that confidence and we shall assure our own strength and the spirit of our people to the extent that we keep alive and fresh the memories of the great services in peace and war upon which our nation has been built.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, there are days, both in national and in religious calendars, on which we think of events in particular relationship to the community of which we form a part. Today our minds go beyond our own borders, and we think of the association we have with countries in all parts of the world having institutions similar to ours.

I hope and trust that the time will come when that wider association we have within the commonwealth will be extended to all the world; that we may indeed celebrate the world becoming one and the fear of aggression and of war being for ever banished from mankind.

A few moments ago I was thinking of the long heritage which, in common with other nations of this commonwealth association, we have inherited from the past. It is well that the students in our schools—particularly perhaps the new citizens who have come to help build this nation, the foundations of which were laid by two great peoples with many common institutions, though of different tongues—should have an opportunity once in a while of learning to appreciate the democratic freedoms which we have inherited from our forefathers and from the events of the past.

We join with others in this house in expressing our appreciation of the Prime Minister's approach to the governments of the provinces and of their response in making this day notable in the lives of the children attending our educational institutions.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there is something which always responds when a tribute is paid to our country, to its traditions, its history and its people, as is done on this day in each year.

When I was a mere boy at school it was impressed upon me that the 23rd of May was a day for special thanksgiving that we were born in Canada, or privileged to live in Canada, under the flag and under the traditions of the great empire of which we form a part.

I have always been proud of my Canadian birth and heritage, and proud also of our association with the British commonwealth. I believe that the British empire has not yet sung its swan song; it still has a very great task to perform. I look forward to the day when everyone will realize even more strongly that the society of nations making up the united commonwealth known as the commonwealth of the British countries will go forward unimpeded and with an eye single to the task which Divine Providence set for it many many centuries ago.

I am very happy, Mr. Speaker, that we live in a choice land. Canada is a choice land—choice above most lands of the earth; but it can remain choice only in so far as its citizens realize their responsibilities to their land, to their peoples, and to one another. I hope that our boys and girls, our men and women, as they receive their education in the schools, will be imbued with the spirit and responsibility that goes with and is a necessary part of the freedoms which they enjoy in this country.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT—REFERENCES TO PRESS REPORTS—EXTENT OF DAMAGE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope I may take a few moments to make a brief report to hon. members on the visit that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and I made to Manitoba on Sunday and yesterday. I had hoped to make it at eight o'clock last night. When I got here before eight I was told that before six o'clock some concern had been expressed about the matter. Coming into the house I found that there were very few members here, and I thought it would be better to wait until there was a somewhat larger attendance. I spoke to you, Mr. Speaker, about it later in the evening, and you informed me that you still had the names of several who had expressed a desire to speak on the motion then being debated. I felt it might not be proper to ask the Chair to interrupt again that interesting debate; consequently I have waited until this moment.

We left here at 10.30 Sunday morning, reaching the Red river valley above Grand Forks in North Dakota about half past three. We then flew downstream all the way to lake Winnipeg, and circled back to land at Stevenson field. The weather was very fine, and from Fort Frances onward we had flown at a relatively low altitude so as to be able to observe everything on the surface.

The extent to which the waters had receded, in comparison with what the Minister of Justice had seen two weeks earlier, was encouraging, though the area still covered with water, particularly north of the boundary, is still very considerable. So far as one can see, there seems to be more water visible than land around the Morris area, and it is obvious that, even under most favourable circumstances, weeks will pass before farm lands are dry, and restoration of order and normal life on the farms will certainly be a big task. Villages and towns in the valley from Emerson to Winnipeg are almost completely flooded, and the task of restoration in that area will be one of considerable magnitude.

In greater Winnipeg itself I got the impression that probably ten per cent of the houses were surrounded by water, and that estimate was later confirmed by a report given of an actual house-to-house count which indicated that something over 8,000 houses had been flooded to some substantial extent, and that almost 2,000 have water above the first floor. The count was taken by experienced employees of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and the figure they gave me was exactly 8,233 with basements more or less filled with water, and of these there were 1,968 with water to a greater or lesser depth above the first floor.

On landing we were met by the premier and Brigadier Morton, and we set out at once to visit the flooded areas and the dikes which are still holding. We went first to municipal headquarters at Fort Garry, and then by boat to the beet sugar factory, where from the roof we had a view of a large part of the flooded area in South Winnipeg, and of the dikes holding back what is called McGillivray lake.

Then we visited the Wildwood dikes and went through part of the flooded area of Wildwood. We went as far as we could with waders, but we could see farther down that in some cases the water was up to half the height of the houses, and quite a number of garages had been overturned and removed from their bases.

After that we drove through the downtown area of Winnipeg, along the causeway on Water street and over the Provencher bridge for a quick tour of the dikes of Norwood and St. Boniface, with a view of the flooded area of St. Vital and the swollen Seine river. In the St. Vital area there is a lake extending from the Red river to the Seine.

We called briefly at the Norwood headquarters, at St. Boniface hospital, which had been evacuated and was used as an adjunct to the headquarters which is fighting the flood, and at the canteen in the Cercle Ouvrier.

Our last visit on Sunday afternoon was to the Scotia street area of North Winnipeg and the Luxton school headquarters. This is almost a marine establishment. There boats are tied up for the convenience of those who wish to go across that area.

We got back to the hotel for dinner at about eight o'clock, and after dinner met quite a large and representative group of citizens and officials who have some of the responsibility for fighting the flood and providing relief. That meeting was followed by a meeting with the mayors and reeves—not of all the municipalities affected by the flood, because there are some which would have found it difficult to get there unless they had been provided with helicopters to take them out and bring them in.

When that meeting was over it was well past midnight Winnipeg time, and we had had a pretty strenuous day. Yesterday morning before leaving Winnipeg the Minister of Justice and I had a brief meeting with nearly all the members of the provincial cabinet, and we then visited the headquarters of the Manitoba flood relief fund and the Red Cross headquarters in the Winnipeg auditorium. What we saw there was very impressive. The Manitoba flood relief fund is being provided with very convenient quarters in one of the best buildings in the city, without rent. Everyone working there is doing so on a voluntary basis, and of the hundreds working at the Red Cross we were told that only ten were paid employees, and that all the rest of the work was done by voluntary helpers. It was impressive to see that there seemed to be no lack of clothing for immediate requirements. There were plentiful supplies, and we were told there were plentiful supplies of food and clothing.

The clothing department of the Red Cross there is much like a similar department in a large department store, with the sizes graded down or graded up, according to the end from which one starts.

I was greatly impressed by the organization that had been established for fighting the flood, for evacuating the people whose homes had been flooded, and for providing emergency relief and supplies. I was also impressed by the spirit of courage and determination with which everyone seemed to be facing the formidable problems of rehabilitation.

I heard since I came back to Ottawa that there has been some suggestion as to there being a bad odour. There was none noticeable anywhere. Even the water that was being pumped out into the street looked quite clean. I found nowhere any disagreeable odours, and nowhere any people who were not perfectly clean, eager, in good spirit, and confident of the future.

I think at this point I might read to the house the messages I left with the premier and with Brigadier Morton and Mr. H. W. Manning, chairman of the Manitoba flood relief fund. The letter to the premier is as follows:

Hon. Douglas L. Campbell,
Premier of Manitoba.

Before I leave Winnipeg, I should like to ask you to convey to the mayors and reeves and the municipal authorities in the flooded areas, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the province, the city and municipal police, the members of other governmental and municipal agencies, the Red Cross and hundreds of other voluntary organizations, and the citizens of the Red river valley generally the expression of my deep admiration of the splendid way the whole population has organized and carried on the fight against the flood.

The long hours of hard work and sheer endurance by thousands of voluntary workers on the dikes and behind the dikes have captured the imagination of our entire country. I know I speak for all Canadians when I ask you to say we are hoping for a speedy end to this time of trial, and that not only Canadians but the people of other friendly countries are translating their sympathy into practical terms to help, both in immediate flood relief and in the earliest possible restoration of normal home life to the families affected by the disaster.

To Brigadier Morton, with whom everyone I came in contact with seemed to be highly delighted, and concerning whom they expressed great admiration, I wrote as follows:

Having seen with my own eyes something of the magnificent and untiring effort being put forth by all three defence services under your direction in fighting the Red river flood and assisting in emergency relief, I feel the service you are rendering to all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal, merits the highest praise. I should be grateful if you would accept for yourself and convey to the officers and men under your command, this expression of my warm appreciation.

To Mr. H. W. Manning, chairman of the Manitoba flood relief fund, I wrote:

Before leaving Winnipeg I wish to express to you and all those from end to end of Canada who are working so hard to make a success of the campaign for the Manitoba flood relief fund, the satisfaction felt by millions of our fellow citizens that your fund provides a sure and effective way to give the practical help they would like to give to those families in the Red river valley whose homes have been devastated by the floods.

Once the waters recede, we all want to see the unfortunate victims of the disaster return to real homes as quickly as possible, and the Manitoba flood relief fund will be available to help, in ways no other agency is equipped to do, those driven from their houses to restore genuine family homes.

The need of the thousands of families in city and country who have lost so many of the prized personal possessions which make a home of a house has touched the hearts of all Canadians, and your fund gives all the opportunity to help which they will welcome.

As hon. members may have heard, I also met the press. I do not intend to enter into any controversy over the conflicting stories that have been published in the various newspapers about my interview. For instance, there are the reports that appeared in two Winnipeg newspapers, which have probably arrived in town by this time. In some reports things have been left out, and in other reports some things have been emphasized. Hon. members will also note that there are some inaccuracies that would appear to make necessary a clarification of the position of the federal government in relation to the disaster which has befallen the people of the Red river valley in Manitoba. As to our position I do not see how I can improve on what I said right here in this place on April 28, as reported in Hansard at page 1981. I refer to the following words:

We shall endeavour to ascertain what the situation is, and then determine what action, if any, should be taken. Hon. members can be assured that it is the desire of the government to treat every part of the country in the same way. Should there ever be in any part of the country the sort of disaster there was in the Fraser river district, the people of that section would be entitled to expect that they would be treated in the same way as the residents of the Fraser river valley were treated.

As a matter of fact I informed hon. members the other day that a commission had been set up to ascertain the nature and the extent of the disaster so that accurate data would be available to determine what grant should be made in that respect. The federal grant to Manitoba will be based on the facts and on the same principles and considerations which applied to the Fraser valley.

I should like to refer to the Ottawa Evening Citizen, which contains a report which seems to have caused some commotion here in the house. I was asked a question by one of the newspapermen at this press conference, and I shall quote from the article which was published yesterday, as follows:

> I asked him what I think was a fair question—after seeing the troubles of these Manitoba people in the Red river valley and here in the city. I said that the people in the flood areas were very, very concerned to know—in a general way—what federal aid might be expected.

I do not remember the words "in a general way". My recollection is that I was asked to indicate what amount the federal government would contribute toward the relief of the disaster. I said that I could not add anything to what I had said in the house, that a commission had been appointed and when the commission made its report we would then discuss with the government of Manitoba the amount of the grant that would be made available on the same principles and considerations as had been followed in the Fraser valley matter.

I was asked a direct question by one newspaperman—and I refer now to the Winnipeg Tribune—as to what direct federal aid was forthcoming for the "little man" whose possessions had been lost in the flood. I replied, "Directly, none." I said that our dealings were going to be with the Manitoba government, just as in the case of the Fraser river flood they were with the government of British Columbia.

It would seem that there are some who would rather deal with us than with the government of Manitoba, but that is a desire to which I cannot give effect. The position I took was that our dealings would be with the government of the province of Manitoba, and that they in turn would deal with the municipalities and individuals as they thought might befit their responsibilities in the premises. The federal government gave no direct aid to the people of the Fraser valley; our dealings were all with the government of British Columbia. In the Red river flood matters our dealings will be with the government of Manitoba.

It would be entirely wrong for me to say how the authorities of Manitoba, provincial or municipal, should discharge their responsibilities. I am advised that the government of Manitoba has indicated that it proposes to provide assistance for rehabilitation of families in cases of need. We can all understand and sympathize deeply with the anxiety of families whose homes have been devastated by the flood waters, particularly those who have few resources with which to restore their homes. But I am convinced that the co-operative efforts of governments at all levels with the voluntary agencies, and particularly the Manitoba flood relief fund, will ensure help to all those who need help and who in the true Canadian spirit are ready to help themselves.

I am sure that that is true of all the people I saw in the Manitoba area. I said to them that I was much impressed by the fact that this disaster had not dampened their western spirit of enterprise, and that I was convinced that, great as was this disaster, it was not going to mean any permanent set-back in the development of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba.

Hon. members will recall that this commission was to deal only with the extent and the nature of the damages, and the cost of the measures taken to fight the flood and the emergency precautions to guard against recurring floods. However, there will have to be some permanent measures taken. General McNaughton, who is a member of the international joint commission, accompanied me, along with two engineers, one from public works and one from the commission. We were joined in Winnipeg by Mr. George Spence. Perhaps I might conclude by reading to the house the statement General McNaughton read before we left Winnipeg, which was as follows:

> With my colleague on the international joint commission I have today flown over the Red river valley and the city of Winnipeg and have examined both the inroads of the water and the protective measures which have been taken. This watershed has been the subject of study by the engineering boards of the international joint commission for some time, and I am here to learn the details of what additional information will be required to prepare a definite plan of flood control. The minister of external affairs of Canada has directed that the work of preparing such a plan be expedited by all possible means, and authorities in the United States agree that this should be done, so there is now no obstacle to the immediate prosecution of the necessary study.
> Of the utmost significance is the fact that means exist, through the international joint commission, of co-ordinating plans over the entire river system from its source in the United States to its mouth at lake Winnipeg. Control of the river must be studied by a combination of measures co-ordinated with those in progress south of the border. Various means have been suggested from time to time by qualified engineers to suit local or regional conditions—a canal or floodway around Winnipeg, permanent dikes and pumping stations capable of being raised in case of need, and the diversion of certain rivers into other channels. Many of these projects are sound from an engineering standpoint, but no single solution will meet all the requirements.
> A comprehensive survey must be started at once. Before I left Ottawa, the Minister of National Defence had arranged for the Royal Canadian Air Force to take progressive aerial-photographic surveys of the area as the flood recedes, and I am gratified to learn that the Manitoba government has already taken photographs at the peak of the flood. Existing agencies in this area are adequate to supervise topographical surveys, hydrometric studies and soil drilling.

The work should move without delay into the planning stage. For this purpose a director or chief engineer must be provided with adequate staff to undertake the design and costing of the various engineering works. Such an office, on a full-time basis, would co-ordinate the plans already proposed by local authorities and ensure that they fit into an over-all plan that would be adequate for the whole river system.

I understand that some publicity has been given to the fact that certain control measures, such as the creation of reservoirs or water-storage basins, have been discarded as impractical.

I think from what I saw that it would be impractical. It is a great plain, and there is no place where water can be stored unless you are able to make a hole in the plain. The water cannot otherwise be stored in large volume. From the city of Winnipeg to lake Winnipeg the Red river seems to be capable of carrying in the channel all the water that comes through. There was some flooding there, but not to any alarming degree. From south of the border to Winnipeg the channel of the river is not capable of carrying all the water when all the affluents are discharging their flood streams simultaneously. Fortunately that does not happen very often, but it has happened now at least three times in the last century and a half. General McNaughton goes on to point out that the impracticability of large reservoirs does not mean that there is no solution to the problem. Then he says:

I have no doubt that a solution can be found based on a combination of measures. The nature of such measures must be determined by a thorough survey and study and must be co-ordinated with plans in the United States. The international joint commission is going ahead at once with its work on the broad plan.

I think I should add that I was able to say to the people I met in Winnipeg that there are always silver linings to these dark clouds, as demonstrated by the extent to which the feeling of common humanity exists not only throughout the length and breadth of our own country but also in many other countries.

I should like to table a message I have received, and my reply thereto, from the government of Greece. I should like to confirm the information published in the Ottawa Citizen this morning, that the international executive board of the A.F. of L. carpenters and joiners union has made a subscription of $50,000 to the Manitoba flood relief fund. The government of the United Kingdom has been most anxious to do something at once. I understand that the details are being arranged with the authorities in Winnipeg, and that an announcement tomorrow in that regard is expected to be made in the United Kingdom House of Commons.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know that every member of the house is most anxious that it should be known in Winnipeg, in the southern part of Manitoba affected, and in Rimouski and Cabano, which suffered disasters during the same period, that there is in the house no division of opinion on the question that their problems should be regarded as the problems of all Canadians. I am sure the government may count on the wholehearted support of all members in everything that can be done to meet the most unusual situations which have developed in these widely separated parts of the country.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has spoken of the situation in Manitoba, and I shall direct my remarks to it. The flood is the greatest disaster of its kind that has occurred in any settled community in Canada in the history of our country. It would be well for us to keep the problem in that perspective. It is not only the fact that there are so many homes in the city of Winnipeg and its suburbs affected by the flood, but also the fact that over a large area, from Winnipeg south to the border, there are farms which will certainly produce no crops this year, farms on which all the livestock have been lost, on which all the stored feed and a great part of the equipment have been destroyed; farms on which houses and other buildings are damaged to an extent that will be apparent only when the waters have receded and they can be examined; until then it will be difficult to assess the extent of the disaster. The damage to foundations and walls of buildings and furniture cannot be measured while the water is still there.

One thing which undoubtedly will be most helpful in maintaining the morale of all those affected is the knowledge that there have been such spontaneous expressions of sympathy and offers of practical assistance from every part of Canada in meeting the loss that has been incurred. One thing which undoubtedly emerges from what has taken place is the remarkable way in which personnel having to do with voluntary help has achieved so much without any preliminary training to undertake that particular task. The remarkable adaptability of our people is made evident by the fact that those who had no previous instruction were able to take their part in meeting such an unusual and unexpected threat.

There is also the heart-warming fact to which the Prime Minister has referred, the striking evidence that has been given of the extent to which we are one family community, and of the extent to which the difficulties that may be encountered by Canadians in any one part of the country are shared as the personal responsibility of Canadians in every other part. It is a source of deep satisfaction to every one of us, as well as to those who will benefit from the activities of the Manitoba flood relief fund, that this organization should be receiving such truly remarkable support. It is a reminder of the way in which people gave their time and their efforts during the years of the war to see people putting their efforts into so many different activities which may in some way help those who are not personally known, but with whom under circumstances of the kind there is a close and intimate bond. Every Canadian will hope that the weather will be advantageous to a continuing recession of the flood waters, and every Canadian will certainly want to see the government of Canada take its full part in assisting in whatever way it can.

Undoubtedly it will help to ease the concern of many people if an announcement is made, at as early a day as possible, as to what is actually going to be done. One can only attempt to put oneself in the position of those who have built their houses, created the intimate surroundings in which their families are being brought up, developed their farms or gardens, and have seen all that destroyed. As they look into the future they will of necessity ask themselves what resources they will have to enable them to rebuild what has been destroyed. Some will be in a more fortunate position than others. I recognize, as I know every hon. member in this house recognizes, the tremendous difficulties involved in dealing with a problem on this scale, a problem which has not yet taken its final form. I feel sure, however, that all the members of this house will wish that, as soon as possible and with as much certainty as possible, those who now have to plan for the future may know exactly how they will be able to do it.

There are many lessons to be learned from what has taken place. Those lessons can be discussed at another time. Today I simply join with all others in this house in expressing admiration of the magnificent example of the people of Manitoba, both in the city of Winnipeg and throughout the whole countryside, and in praying that Providence may soon lower the waters so that the people may begin to rebuild their property.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government expects to be able to bring in a supplementary estimate during this session with respect to this situation. I have in mind the fact that that is what was done in 1948 with respect to the Fraser valley situation. I realize that the Shaw-Carswell commission may be delayed in making its report, but I hope there will at least be a preliminary item in the supplementary estimates before the end of this session.

Mr. St. Laurent: The commissioners attended this meeting with representative officials and citizens. It was strongly impressed upon us all that it was desirable to make as accurate an estimate as could be made, but to make it as expeditiously as possible, for the very reasons mentioned by the leader of the opposition.

With respect to the provision of a supplementary estimate at this time, I can assure the hon. gentleman that all measures will be proposed to parliament that may be required to avoid any delay in taking necessary action.

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre): I rise on a question of privilege, in connection with a newspaper article dealing with this same subject. There is a report in the Ottawa Evening Citizen to which I wish to refer. Before dealing with this article, if I may be permitted, I should like, as one of the members from the city of Winnipeg, to express my own thanks and the thanks of the people of the city of Winnipeg, as well as those of the people of the Red river valley, to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) for his prompt agreement with the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr St. Laurent). I feel that I am justified in expressing the same thanks to every member of this house for the sympathy that has been extended by all of them to the affected people. It is only natural, perhaps, that I should take pride and pleasure in the references of a laudatory nature that have been made to the affected people. I do take that pride, and I desire as emphatically as possible to thank all members, particularly the leader of the opposition, for the way in which this matter has been dealt with so far.

I wish now to refer to a report which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of May 22, concerning the Prime Minister's trip. It makes reference to the press meeting, and Mr. Ross Munro says this with reference to attendance at that meeting:

> He had come from a Liberal party reception downstairs in the hotel and was returning to it.

Manitoba Flood

Mr. Speaker, I know whereof I speak when I say that there was no such reception. There was no party reception; there was nothing whatever political in connection with the visit of the Prime Minister. The so-called reception was partly arranged by me and partly by Premier Campbell, in the belief that it would be well if certain leaders in connection with flood control, the mayors and reeves, could all be brought together for the purpose of talking with each other and speaking with the Prime Minister. Premier Campbell called some of these people and I called some. Those whom I called were such persons as the president of the Manitoba relief fund, the mayors and reeves, some engineers; and they were the people who were at that meeting. There were about fifty altogether. There were two men interested in flood control who had been either sent there from Washington or who came of their own volition. I did not even know the political complexion of more than twenty-five per cent of the fifty people who were present.

The leader of the Conservative party in Manitoba, Mr. Errick Willis, was there. Mr. McLenaghen, the attorney general, who is from the Conservative side of the coalition in Manitoba, I think was there, but I will not say for certain. I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the house that that is the only sort of meeting that there was in Winnipeg at that time.

This flood matter in Winnipeg and in Manitoba is far too important for any person to use it for political purposes. I am confident that there is no member in this house—and at the moment I happen to be looking at those of the parties of which I am not a member—who would descend to making any such use of this so tragic situation. In assuring people as I do on my honour of the nature of the meeting that was held, I just wish to close my remarks to the house this afternoon in the same strain as I opened them, by impressing on hon. members the fact that I know there is no person within the sound of my voice who would make political use of this tragic situation; and second, again to express with deep sincerity my thanks and the thanks of the people of Winnipeg and of the Red river valley for the unanimity of the sympathy that we have already seen exhibited in this chamber.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and I realize that the question may be difficult to answer. It is this. Has he any idea as to when a report might be expected from the commission? I ask that question for this reason. There is a variation in the wording of the two orders in council, the one for the Fraser river valley disaster and for this one. As has been pointed out by the previous speaker and others, this is a much greater disaster than the Fraser valley one. The matter of the Fraser valley disaster was first raised in this House of Commons, and rightfully so, by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) on May 28, 1948, and there was extremely quick action. The then prime minister on June 9 of that year announced in this house a grant, without many strings attached to it either, of $5 million. At that time the hon. member said that was just a token grant. I am happy now that he is quite pleased with the final settlement.

I point this fact out because, as my leader has said, there is great concern amongst these many thousands of people as to whether they will have anything with which to rehabilitate themselves in certain categories. The sooner, therefore, that they may be given a lead from the government, the better. I am pointing out that already there was far greater action at this stage in connection with the Fraser valley flood, which was not as great as this one, having regard to what has happened. I realize that it may be difficult for the Prime Minister to say when he may expect a report from this commission. Then I want to know whether there has been a request for an interim grant to the provincial government, if they cannot make a definite report for some length of time; because some encouragement should be given to these people by telling them on what basis they will be assisted. It will be of great help if that can be done.

Mr. St. Laurent: To answer the last question first, I have no knowledge of any request for an interim grant having been made. In the second place, I was asked in this news conference if any time limit had been set upon the work of these commissioners in preparing their report. I made the answer—and it is the only answer that I can make now—that we tried to choose people upon whom we did not have to put a time limit; that we thought they appreciated the situation and the conditions as well as anybody else; and that I was sure they would continue the work they had already started on Sunday and proceed with it just as expeditiously as possible. But it will be some time before there can be anything even approximate with respect to the amount of damage done. I am told that there are some of these houses which will not have been damaged otherwise than made wet and probably the plaster injured inside, but from which the outer sheathing will have to be removed in order to allow the insulation either to be replaced or to dry out.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is true; a good many.

Mr. St. Laurent: And then it will not be possible to make even an approximate estimate of the amount of household effects lost until people are able to get back. The mayor of Winnipeg told me that they were fortunate in having had no increase in disease, and no epidemic of any kind. He said that they were going to be extremely careful to see that the people did not go back too soon and that they did not do anything that might occasion an epidemic.

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, when the members of this house had an opportunity about a week ago to say a word or two about the flood which has so gravely affected my province, my city and my riding, I had no opportunity to say anything because at that time I was there. If the house will permit me, representing a constituency which contains, I should think, slightly more than half of the abandoned homes in the flooded area, I should like to say a word or two in connection with the statement made today.

I spent eleven days there, three at one time and eight at another. I did not fly over the area. I did not see the drama angle of it. I walked over it the first time. I travelled by boat and high-wheeled truck through most of the streets in that area on my second trip, and I am proud to report to the house my complete agreement with everything that has been said with respect to the spirit, the co-operativeness and self-help of the people in that constituency. I am so greatly impressed with this that I have all the more burning desire to see to it that that type of self-help and co-operativeness should be rewarded by assistance from government at all levels. For that reason I have had a great deal of pleasure listening to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), and the leaders of the other parties. I want to say to the house that if you want an appreciation of what has happened, you cannot describe a catastrophe of this sort by telling how far the water is up or down the wall, how many bridges are washed out or what the damage is to streets and to public utilities generally. If you want to realize what is involved, you should stand at the end of a shuttle service when people are being removed from their homes with a few sandwiches and the clothes they can carry. You need to watch them as they are being sorted out and are being sent to the places to which they are going, in order to realize the magnitude of their losses.

The Prime Minister said that there are some 1,900 houses with water up to—

Mr. St. Laurent: Over the first floor.

Mr. Mutch: Yes, over the first floor. I do not know who counted them, but I am reasonably certain they did not get outside south Winnipeg in making the count. I would imagine that the figures came from a group whose tendency in reporting has been at all times, I think, to minimize the extent of the damage. At any rate, I know where there are two or three hundred where it is well over the second floor, and I have seen a few where it was well up on the roof. I have been driven in a motorboat over the clotheslines in the backyards of one street: in that group there were three hundred in all with water close to the roof. There are other groups where I have looked through windows and watched china cabinets floating upside down and seen chesterfields bobbing up against the upper front windows. When you interpret that in terms of what it means to homes and home-making, all of the things which this government, the province of Manitoba and the municipalities can do can only fall far short of the real requirements, if we are to restore these homes. The number has been given at 13,500 homes—I doubt if it is an exaggeration—which are to some extent flood damaged in the rural, urban and suburban area. I will not dispute it. If one can think of it in terms of that many homes then the response to the appeal for relief will be as generous as Canadians know how to make it, and this house would not only support this government wholeheartedly but would push it, if it were necessary, into the kind of generosity which has been indicated today this house is willing to give.

I have not spoken demandingly before because I never could see there was any sense in kicking people whose help you need. There are many whose estimates with respect to flood damage have been reasoned and sound; but there are others, who when they talk in terms of $10,000 think they are speaking of high finance.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Hear, hear.

Mr. Mutch: My hon. friend knows some of them as well I do. We need a general public movement to bring about realization that this tragedy has not been overestimated. On the other hand, it is good to hear that it is not being underestimated by the authorities who propose to deal with it.

I think I know every street and almost every house in most of flooded south Winnipeg.

If I had not walked them in the last fifteen years I would not be here today. Of all the stories that I have read I have only seen one that overestimated the damage in the country. I believe that most of them have underestimated it. I know that our people will be grateful now that we seem to be moving forward to give the help that this house, this afternoon, through the leaders of the different parties has indicated this parliament wishes us to give.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief, but I should like to say a word or two on this subject. I happen to represent the Fraser Valley riding which was flooded in 1948. Probably from personal experience I know as much about flooding as others. My own farm was flooded at that time. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I think I speak for every hon. member—

An hon. Member: Are you sure?

Mr. Cruickshank: I think I do. I have confidence that every member of parliament will see that justice is done to Manitoba.

In 1948 I had the privilege of taking the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) around the Fraser valley flood. He was taken around in the air, of course. We flew over it; but we also went on foot, in boat and by motorcar. The present Prime Minister of Canada reported back to his prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, at that time. With the unanimous approval of the members of all parties in the house justice and kindness were done to the people of the Fraser river valley and we appreciated it.

The present Prime Minister has intimated that a similar procedure may be adopted in connection with the Manitoba floods. If hon. members will check back Hansard they will see that I, as the representative of Fraser Valley, which unfortunately was the district flooded out in British Columbia, openly water receded. Nobody could, engineer or admitted that we could not estimate the damage that had been done until the layman.

The prime minister of the day, on the advice of his minister, at that time intimated that justice would be done to us, and it was done. I would particularly like to say on behalf of the people of my riding that not only did the government of Canada treat us fairly, but the people, through their private donations, treated us in the most generous manner. In the Fraser river valley we shall never forget it. We are not too sure about this year. The water is very much the same as it was in 1948. I certainly hope that the people in my riding, through the Red Cross and otherwise, will respond to the plight of the people of Manitoba, as the people of Canada and of parts of the United States responded to us in 1948. I can assure the Prime Minister that, in my opinion, he will have the support of every member of this House of Commons in seeing that Manitoba is treated as fairly as we were treated in the Fraser river valley in British Columbia.

COMMITTEE TO RECEIVE CONTRIBUTIONS TO MANITOBA FLOOD RELIEF FUND

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the house on a matter of privilege. Incidentally, it was not expected, so far as I am concerned, that the discussion would have continued so long or take the trend that it has. Nevertheless I think it is helpful and encouraging, and will be greatly appreciated by the people of Manitoba, particularly by those who are in such difficult circumstances at the present time.

With the indulgence of the house I should like to make an announcement in respect of flood relief in Manitoba. The announcement is as follows: the people of the province of Manitoba, and particularly those of the towns and farms along the Red river from the United States boundary to lake Winnipeg, and in the municipalities adjacent to the city of Winnipeg, as well as the city itself, are experiencing at the present time one of the worst economic disasters that have ever occurred in any part of Canada.

The extent of the damage, and the loss in property and personal effects caused by the flooding waters of the Red river, may never be properly assessed or recovered.

That government assistance will be needed on a huge scale there is no doubt. Already there have come generous offers of assistance from other provinces, and from sources outside Canada, but more will be needed. With the object of assisting in the rehabilitation of those whose homes and properties have been destroyed, a voluntary flood relief fund has been established. It is known as the Manitoba flood relief fund. The chairman of the fund is Mr. H. W. Manning, president of the Great West Life Assurance Company, Winnipeg. The objective is to raise $10 million.

Believing that there are many members of the Senate, the House of Commons, the press gallery, the staffs of the Senate and the House of Commons, as well as other Ottawa people who would like to contribute to this fund, representatives from Manitoba have organized a committee which will be prepared to accept contributions to this fund. The personnel of the committee is as follows: W. G. Weir, House of Commons; J. Arthur Ross, House of Commons; Stanley H. Knowles, House of Commons; Hon. A. L. Beaubien, the Senate; Chester A. Bloom, press gallery; John Bird, press gallery; L. Clare Moyer, staff of the Senate; H. Crossley Sherwood, staff of the House of Commons. Any member of this committee will accept contributions and arrange to issue the proper receipt. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that a similar announcement is being made in the Senate this afternoon.

I thank the house for its courtesy in allowing this announcement to be made at this time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TABLING OF REPORT OF RELIEF COMMISSION

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) asked the Minister of Finance whether he would table the interim report on the flood situation in the Fraser valley, dated June 13, 1948. I now beg leave to table two copies of the interim report.

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance if there are any other reports with respect to the Fraser valley situation other than the one he tabled today for the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch). If so, could such reports be tabled?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I am not aware of any others, and I made inquiries. There is of course the report of the diking commission, but this was an interim report of the rehabilitation commission. However, I shall make further inquiries.

Mr. Knowles: I understood it was with respect to rehabilitation. Was there to be a final report?

Mr. Sinclair: I shall have to look it up. It is two years since it happened.

RED RIVER VALLEY—REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs further to the question asked by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) on May 17. When did the international joint commission set up this board of engineers to make a report about that condition, namely, Red river flooding? When he has that information I would ask him to give the names of the engineers comprising the board. The last report was on January 12, 1948. With two severe floods occurring since then, that is not a very satisfactory state of affairs.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member is supposed to put a question and not make a speech. I can easily get the information for him, but I should say at once that it is not correct to imply that no action has been taken since 1948, or any other date. As a matter of fact four interim reports have been made since. I shall get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. Graydon: They did not do much about the floods, then.

FEED GRAINS

SALES BY WHEAT BOARD—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON MAY 22

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, some weeks ago I asked the following question, which was answered yesterday at page 2695 of Hansard, as follows:

1. How many bushels of (a) feed oats; (b) feed barley, were sold by the wheat board to feed merchants, dealers or brokerage houses in each of the months beginning in December, 1949, and to date?
2. What was the average price received for each of said grains in each of said months?

The answer I received was as follows:

1. It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to divulge its sales position within the crop year in which it is operating.
2. See answer to No. 1.

Really, that last answer was surplusage. I rise to make strong objection to the type of answers hon. members in this House of Commons are receiving in respect of so many matters concerning which parliament is entitled to information.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this is not the time to raise a grievance. He has made a short statement, but a general discussion cannot be allowed at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I rise to a question of privilege affecting every member of the House of Commons who should be entitled to have information rather than have it hidden from him.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has risen to what he has described as a question of privilege, in which he has objected to the answers given to certain questions. Now he wishes to generalize. I do not think it is proper to do so at the present time.

Tariff Board Act

TARIFF BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO APPEALS UNDER OTHER ACTS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 236, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the first time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved that the bill be read the first time.

Mr. Graydon: After an explanation.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Casselman: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I might inform the house that the explanation should have come on the motion for leave to introduce the bill, not on the motion for first reading.

Mr. Casselman: We asked for it then.

Mr. Speaker: It is not permissible to debate the motion for first reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 223, for the relief of Marilyn Ruth Cohen Novak.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 224, for the relief of Mary Elizabeth Bernatchez Russell.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 225, for the relief of Winnifred Evelyn Thompson Clift.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 226, for the relief of Maida Maria Howard Martin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 227, for the relief of June Hedy Leshynska Thompson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 228, for the relief of Rosemary Smalley Carrier.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 229, for the relief of William Arthur Goodson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 230, for the relief of Dorothy Melbourne Davis Wand.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 231, for the relief of Frank Lear Rogers.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 232, for the relief of Roma Leduc. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 233, for the relief of Edna Rosaline Casavant Dufresne.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 234, for the relief of Leo Berger. —Mr. Winkler.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

ƧRSONS LISTED IN NOTEBOOK OF KLAUS FUCHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, of which I have sent him notice. Has there been any examination or re-examination of the loyalty of any of the 150 persons then resident in Canada listed in the notebook found as a result of the espionage investigations of 1945 and 1946, since the trial of Dr. Fuchs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is there any reason why that question could not be placed on the order paper? Is there any urgency? I think it should appear on the order paper.

Mr. Claxton: Something like it is on the order paper now.

Mr. Fulton: Might I comment upon that? The reason I asked the question at this time orally rather than through the order paper is that the trial of Dr. Fuchs disclosed that there were persons—there was one name mentioned —engaged in espionage. I felt that for that reason, and in view of certain disclosures in committee recently, there is urgency in the matter.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has correctly stated, he gave me notice of this question last week. I then telephoned to him suggesting that it was one dealing with security, and that before answering I should like to discuss the question with the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who was then absent from Ottawa. I myself was also absent from the city over the week end. Upon getting back to Ottawa I noticed that my hon. friend had placed two questions on Votes and Proceedings dealing with the same subject matter which, I assume, supersede the one he is now asking.

For that reason I should like to take his present question as notice, and bring down the answers to the three of them tomorrow, because they will have to be integrated with one another.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA—COMMUNISM IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask a question of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Apparently the commonwealth conference held at Sydney to consider ways and means of helping resist communism in southeast Asia was terminated last Friday or Saturday. Could the minister give the house a statement concerning the results of that conference?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be very glad to do so, as soon as the information is available. It is not fully in yet; when it is in, I shall be glad to make a statement.

UNITED NATIONS

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL—DRAFT COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs in reference to the covenant on human rights and fundamental freedoms that is now to be submitted to the economic and social council. That body will meet in Geneva on July 3, after which this covenant will be subject to ratification by the various parliaments composing the members of the United Nations.

Is it the intention of the government of Canada to set up any committee of the House of Commons to consider this draft covenant and to make such recommendations for the use of the Canadian representative who will appear on the economic and social council as parliament may deem proper and necessary?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that the universal declaration on human rights was approved by the general assembly of the United Nations on December 10, 1948, by forty-eight votes in favour to none against, with nineteen abstaining, and with the Canadian vote in favour. My understanding is that the covenant to which the hon. member refers, generally speaking, will be based upon the declaration of human rights. That has been already the subject matter of a wide discussion in the house and elsewhere, and consequently it does not seem that it would be useful at this time to set up a committee to go into the covenant.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL BERTHING CHARGES AT VANCOUVER AND NEW WESTMINSTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. This afternoon we received information by wire from Vancouver to the effect that the national harbours board and other bodies owning or controlling wharfage are planning to put on an additional berthing charge to commence next week and to apply to all docks in Vancouver and New Westminster harbours. Can the minister state whether that additional charge has been agreed to here and whether there is any possibility of having it held off until an investigation has been made?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I did not get the hon. member's question until shortly before coming into the house and so was not able to get all the information I would require to answer the question fully. I shall deal with the question as generally as I can. I received similar telegrams, as did the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) and other members from the west coast, complaining about the charge. A berthage charge already exists for vessels that are idle in the ports of New Westminster and Vancouver, but that charge is being extended to working vessels. The charge has been authorized by the British Columbia wharf operators association which is made up of the owners and operators of wharves. Because of financial requirements and other reasons that association, of which the national harbours board and Canadian National Railways are members, decided to put on this new berthing charge effective June 1.

This is a charge which exists in other ports and the association decided that it needed the additional revenue. The national harbours board has been informed that the imposts in Vancouver and New Westminster are far lower than those in the Pacific coast ports south of the border. The national harbours board is following the decision of the British Columbia wharf association. For the information of the house there are some 47 or 48 private wharves in Vancouver, of which seven or eight are operated by the national harbours board.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a further investigation into this increased charge?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think I need make any further investigation. I said I could give a general statement and that is what I have given. The national harbours board has decided to follow the decision of the British Columbia wharf association and the imposts will go into effect on June 1.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

ITEMS ON WHICH UNITED STATES TARIFF HAS BEEN REDUCED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): When we were discussing the tariff items on May 17 I asked the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance if it would be possible to secure a list of the 2,500 United States items on which the tariff had been reduced and at that time the parliamentary assistant said that the list was available to any hon. member who wanted it. I wonder when I shall be able to get that list?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Within the next day or two.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

SENATE REFORM

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the opportunity which is presented by this motion, I wish to introduce a subject which I believe does require definite consideration. For three-quarters of a century there has been considerable discussion in the House of Commons, in the other branch of our Canadian parliament and among people generally of the need for Senate reform. As in most other democratic countries, our constitution provides for two legislative bodies with very similar functions except for the fact that the upper house may not initiate any measures calling for the expenditure of public money.

The historic reasons for having two branches of parliament are familiar to every student of government. For centuries it has been generally agreed that it is wise to have an upper chamber which can exercise proper restraint over hasty and ill-considered legislation and which will also to some extent be removed from the direct effects of sudden swings of sentiment which might carry any democratic government too rapidly away from its charted course.

In nations with a federal constitution the second chamber has a special purpose, which was very much in the minds of those who adopted the resolutions passed at Quebec in 1864, calling for a non-elective upper house in Canada. It is to provide a parliamentary body under which the constitutional rights of the provinces will be protected by a parliamentary body which by the method of its choice is designed to preserve the particular interest of all provincial and other minorities.

Like the weather, the Canadian Senate has been a constant subject of discussion for a very long time without anybody doing much about it. As far back as the session of 1886 a motion was presented to the House of Commons which read in part:

> That appropriate steps should be taken to secure such amendments of the British North America Act as to make the Senate directly responsible to the people of the several provinces of the dominion.

That motion was defeated. Since then no serious attempt has been made to give effective consideration to the reorganization of the Senate, although from time to time proposals have been made for its abolition.

I believe that a substantial majority of the members of this house would not entertain the idea of a one-chamber parliament for Canada. I am sure that the most vigorous objection to any such suggestion would come from the provincial legislatures at a time when the upper house assumes greater importance than ever before as the custodian of provincial rights, now that the Supreme Court of Canada is to be the court of last resort for all legal proceedings in this country including the determination of constitutional issues.

It is particularly significant that during the past few weeks several careful and constructive speeches have been made by members of the Senate emphasizing the need for reform of that branch of our parliamentary system, if it is to fulfil the purpose for which it was created.

The contention of several of those who have spoken in the Senate chamber and outside can be summed up in the words used by the mover of the resolution to which I have already referred, when he said to the House of Commons in 1886:

> The purpose which a second chamber was intended to serve in our parliamentary system has not been secured by the Senate as it is now constituted.

The debate on that motion, which Sir John Macdonald opposed and Sir Wilfrid Laurier supported, indicated fairly general agreement with the proposition contained in the words which I have quoted. The motion was defeated but the differences of opinion, expressed by the members who spoke, related to procedure rather than to purpose.

Over the years, criticism has been directed to the Senate, both by those who thought it interfered too much with the decisions of the House of Commons and by those who thought that it exercised too little independent judgment of its own. This point was covered by Sir John Macdonald when he introduced a motion in the house of assembly asking for approval of the resolutions adopted at the Quebec conference of 1864. These were his words:

> There would be no use of an upper house if it did not exercise, when it thought proper, the right of opposing or amending or postponing the legislation of the lower house. It would be of no value whatever were it a mere chamber for registering the decrees of the lower house. It must be an independent house having a free action of its own, for it is only valuable as being a regulating body, calmly considering the legislation initiated by the popular branch, and preventing any hasty or ill-considered legislation which may come from that body, but it will never set itself in opposition against the deliberate and understood wishes of the people.

Criticism of the Senate has been on two main grounds, one that it unreasonably opposed legislation passed by the House of Commons, and the other that it proposed and initiated nothing. It is not my intention to deal with the validity of either of these criticisms. An examination of Hansard and of reported public speeches does, however, indicate the extent to which criticism has ranged, from the contention on the one hand that the Senate unreasonably obstructed legislation, and on the other hand that it arrives at no independent decisions of its own, and has in fact become "a mere chamber for registering the decrees of the lower house." Whatever justification there may be for criticism on either of these grounds, or for other reasons so often put forward in parliament and outside, we cannot safely disregard the fact that there is widespread criticism of the present constitution of the Senate of Canada. There is a growing demand from within the Senate itself, as well as outside, for reforms which will make the upper house an effective part of a bicameral parliamentary system attuned to the needs of a vigorous and expanding democracy, while at the same time preserving and strengthening those safeguards of our federal constitution which provided one of the primary reasons for creating the upper house.

Quite apart from these reasons of particular historic interest to Canadians, there is a generally accepted reason for the existence of a second chamber, which was very well stated by Sir Clifford Sifton after some twenty years' service in the House of Commons. He said:

> No nation should be under unchecked, single-chamber government. According to my experience, the will of the people is very often better expressed after a check and after a period of searching and critical discussion which generally arises from such a check, than it is in the first instance.

These are the words of a man with considerable experience in the public affairs of Canada. There is, however, another reason of special significance today why we should recognize the importance of an upper house which conforms to the needs of our own parliamentary system. In explaining the decision of the Quebec conference of 1864 to constitute an appointed upper house, the Hon. Mr. Campbell said this:

> The main reason was to give each of the provinces adequate security for the protection of its local interests, a protection which it was feared might not be found in a house where the representation was based upon numbers only, as would be the case in the general assembly.

That reason was constantly before the fathers of confederation. So much was it in the minds of those who met at Quebec in 1864 that the fourteenth resolution calling for the creation of an upper house provided that the first appointments should be "upon the nomination of the respective local governments." That this was not done in no way weakens the evidence which this resolution provides that those who were responsible for making this country one nation fully recognized the important part the Senate should play in preserving those provincial rights which found expression in the British North America Act.

Now that the Supreme Court of Canada is to become the final court of appeal, and steps are also being taken to establish a procedure for amending our own constitution in Canada, this particular responsibility of the Senate assumes even greater importance than it had during the pre-confederation debates, or at the time of the passing of the British North America Act itself. For that very reason it seems most unlikely that final conclusions can be reached by the dominion-provincial constitutional conference unless reform of the Senate is considered at the same time. Not only should it become the effective legislative body which the senators themselves desire, but it should also assure constitutional safeguards which will prevent any tampering in the future with those fundamental principles which are the very bedrock of our national unity.

I do not think there is any need to extend the arguments in support of Senate reform. Almost everyone is agreed on this subject. The only question seems to be how and when it is to be done. In view of the fact that the subject has already been brought forward during the opening stages of the dominion-provincial constitutional conference, it seems that the time to deal with this question is now. If the appropriate steps are taken to review the mass of evidence and opinions which have accumulated over the years, and the subject is approached in a non-partisan manner and with full recognition of the fact that the Senate must be a party to any proposals put forward, then I think the subject should be given consideration without delay by a joint committee of this house and of the Senate, appointed with due regard to all political, provincial and geographical considerations.

No matter what opinion there may be as to the legal or constitutional position, I think it would be folly to bring about the Senate reforms which are so generally desired without full recognition of the fact that the provinces have a very direct and vital concern with the freedom, efficiency and authority of the Senate. This concern of local government in the power and responsibility of the upper house is a much more important consideration in a nation with a federal constitution than in a nation such as England with a single government.

While it was the desire to have the Canadian parliament as much as possible "a transcript of Westminster", nevertheless those who drafted our constitution were greatly influenced by the federal constitution of the United States. In fact the Canadian Senate bears a much closer resemblance to the Senate of the United States of that time than it does to the House of Lords. True, the senate of the United States was not appointed for life, but under their constitution each state legislature, without regard to the size of the population of the state, appointed two members to the senate of the United States. That was the way in which their senate was created and the way in which it functioned until May 31, 1913, when it became an elective senate under the seventeenth amendment.

Although the state legislatures of the United States no longer have the right of direct appointment, nevertheless minority and local rights are protected by the fact that the same number of senators are appointed for each state. Little Rhode Island appoints its two senators, who have the same rights and the same number of votes at Washington as have the two senators from the state of New York, with its enormous population.

It is not my intention to suggest what the reforms should be or how the Senate should be appointed. There are those who believe it should be elective. There are those who believe it should be partly elective and partly appointed. There are those who believe that it should be partly appointed by the dominion government and partly by the provincial governments. There are many other proposals. All should be considered.

The main point is that on a non-partisan basis there should be careful consideration of every reasonable suggestion made for the purpose of bringing about those reforms which are necessary to make the Senate an efficient and vigorous legislative body within our parliamentary system, and at the same time so constitute it and clothe it with the necessary authority as to protect those local interests, which it was intended by those who drafted our constitution should at all times be protected.

I do not propose to go into details of the cost of the Senate to the people of Canada. In sessional indemnities, travelling expenses, official and secretarial service, allocation of building accommodation, to say nothing of the maintenance of the Senate chamber itself and all that goes with it, the figure runs into several million dollars. I do not know that it has ever been segregated in detail. That would only become an important consideration, however, if we were considering the possibility of doing away with the Senate entirely. I, for one, am strongly opposed to any such suggestion. I believe that to be the sentiment of the great majority of the members of this house, and of the people of Canada. The fact that the people of Canada are asked to contribute such large sums of money for this purpose does offer an added reason why the arguments of senators and others should be heard, and that steps should be taken without further delay to make those preliminary inquiries on a non-partisan basis which are the essential requirements for the satisfactory consideration of those reforms which could be adopted with the least possible delay.

I shall introduce a motion calling for the appointment of a joint committee of this house and the Senate. If such a committee is appointed immediately, a preliminary report should be available before this house rises, in view of the fact that the whole field has been so fully canvassed in all the discussions which have taken place. I would remind the members of this house that many of the most important national constitutions now in existence were drafted in less time than remains before this house will rise at the end of the present session. If for any reason it were not possible to make recommendations within that time, the government can arrange for the inquiry to be continued while the house is not sitting by giving the same members of the house and the Senate that authority which has been given under similar circumstances on other occasions.

What I do wish to emphasize is the very great importance of having some recommendations which indicate the thoughts of the members of both houses, without regard to party affiliation, so that when the representatives of the dominion government meet the representatives of the provincial legislature later this year suggestions may be put forward which can be further examined, so that all governments will be in a position to present suggestions to their own legislative bodies when they meet next year.

At a time when democracy is facing as grave a threat as it has ever faced, it is of the utmost importance that our whole parliamentary system be such as to command the respect and admiration of those who govern themselves through the legislative and administrative machinery which our constitution creates. It must be a matter of concern to every one of us, as it so obviously is to the members of the Senate, that as at present constituted the Senate finds itself unable to perform those tasks which it was intended to perform, and to take its full and effective share in our bicameral parliamentary system.

Many excellent speeches have been made over the years emphasizing the need of reform. An earlier prime minister went so far as to state that the survival of our democratic system demanded such reforms. In spite of the fact that this subject has been under discussion for over seventy-five years in the Canadian House of Commons, the one essential preliminary step has never yet been taken. The field of discussion has been fully covered, and from almost every possible point of view. The time has come for positive action if the dominion-provincial constitutional conference is not to founder on this very rock. For the reasons which I have given, and for other reasons which have been so fully stated on other occasions, I do most earnestly urge the members of this house to support the following motion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"It is expedient to appoint a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to study suggested constitutional changes affecting the Senate, including such matters as the method by which the members of the Senate shall be chosen, their tenure of office, and the better functioning of the Senate in our parliamentary system, with a view to formulating proposals to be presented to the government for discussion at the forthcoming dominion-provincial constitutional conference; such committee to have power to call for persons, papers and records; to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time; and that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting and important resolution. I am sorry that, unlike the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), I am not fully prepared to discuss it this afternoon on a moment's notice. I think the resolution, if supported by the house, will serve a useful purpose. Whatever the outcome, it will focus public attention upon the Senate of Canada as at present constituted, and I believe that is all to the good. In our opinion the Senate of Canada is both archaic and undemocratic. It is also not representative of either the provinces of Canada or the points of view that have arisen within Canada since confederation. Consequently, a study of the Senate as part of the parliamentary institution of Canada should have been made long ago.

I would have preferred to have seen this resolution come in perhaps in another way, so that we might have had an opportunity of gathering together some data to support the kind of argument one would like to make. In our opinion, as the house well knows since we have expressed it on a good many occasions, the Senate of Canada should be abolished because we believe it has served, in recent years at least, no useful purpose other than to provide a place to which certain gentlemen who have served the interests of the old political parties may be sent in their later years of life. Whatever the outcome of this committee's work, I believe it should be borne in mind that if the Senate is not abolished then drastic reform should be considered.

I would point out to hon. members of this house that while to a large extent, I think to a larger extent perhaps than the leader of the opposition implied, the Senate of Canada was modelled on the British House of Lords. Its powers, like those of the House of Lords until 1911, are those of absolute veto, if it cares to exercise it, of anything this house may do. Surely it is undemocratic that in 1950 a non-elective chamber should have the power of absolute veto, whatever may be said of the desirability or otherwise of a second chamber having the right to revise, to reconsider, to delay and to refer back. In 1911 the British House of Commons, with the consent of the House of Lords, of course, and with the approval of His Majesty the King, passed the parliament bill which limited that veto so that a bill passed by the Commons at two successive sessions could, at the third session of the House of Commons, be passed without reference to the House of Lords, simply requiring the signature and approval of His Majesty the King.

In the last parliament of Britain that veto was further restricted by a new parliament act which reduced the period during which the Lords might retain control or might delay to a period which I believe now is approximately a year. That of course is the evolution of the democratic control of the parliamentary procedures in the United Kingdom.

We are far behind that legislation. In this country an unrepresentative chamber may delay and indeed may frustrate the will of the elected representative of the people of this country. That situation surely makes our democratic boast a more or less empty one, as long as this absolute power of veto remains. Consequently I have long been in favour of the abolition of the Senate; but if, because of our constitution, that cannot be achieved, then I have been wholeheartedly in favour of bringing in a large measure of reform in relation to the powers of the Senate of Canada.

It is often said that the Senate of Canada was for the protection of minorities. I have not been able to observe, at least in recent times, from my reading either of Canadian parliamentary history or of history since confederation, that that function has been well fulfilled. Indeed, sometimes I have thought that the minorities that have been protected in the past have not been minorities of the type that one would expect to be protected in a democratic country.

Then I have another criticism of the present establishment of the Senate. If we look at the manner in which it is set up we find this. Until recently there have been ninety-six members—now there are one hundred and two—twenty-four from the maritime provinces, twenty-four from Quebec, twenty-four from Ontario and twenty-four from the four western provinces and six from Newfoundland. As to the twenty-four from the four western provinces, when we consider the area of those four provinces and compare it with the area represented by the twenty-four from the maritime provinces—and I am not suggesting that we should take away from the maritime provinces that which they now have —what do we find? We find that we have four great provinces comprising vast areas of land, with quite a large population today, with great natural resources, and represented by four times six, six for each of the western provinces. The representation on that score is obviously unfair.

The leader of the opposition spoke of the United States senate and of the fact that a small state there will have in the senate of the United States the same representation as a large state. There is a great deal to be said for that system even in our own country; although even if we were not prepared to go that far, we should at least consider improving, if any reform is brought in, the representation from various parts of Canada.

As to the manner of choice, if we are going to have a second chamber, I think there is only one way in which that choice should be made and that is by a direct vote of the people. That vote may not be, need not be, and perhaps should not be, coincident with the vote for the House of Commons. The manner in which this choice is made in the United States of course is simple because there the congress has a limited period of time; and that limited period of time of four years is of course the maximum as well as the minimum of duration. There can be no dissolution at any moment up to five years such as we have in our own country.

But in Australia, where you have the two chambers elected, an arrangement has been made whereby the upper chamber—the Senate, if you like to call it the Senate; and I think it is called the Senate—is elected at a different period and at a different time from that at which the more popular assembly is elected; although I believe—and again I am unprepared and am speaking from memory—there is in the Australian constitution a provision whereby under certain circumstances it is possible for the Senate and the house to be dissolved, and for an election for both houses to occur at the same time. I believe I am right in that particular.

When we compare our Senate with that of the United States we have to remember something else about it. I think we must remember that the ideas of the fathers of confederation were not those of the founding fathers of the United States; that is to say, the relationship which the founding fathers of the United States thought of as existing between the central government and the state was entirely different—quite the reverse, in fact—from the idea the fathers of confederation had.

I remember reading some years ago, when I was teaching the formulation of the British North America Act, an interesting letter that was written by Lord Elgin. I tried to look it up the other day for some other purpose but I was not able to put my hands on it. I know, however, that it exists. The letter said that he was happy that the Canadians, as he put it, did not model their institution of parliament upon the congress of the United States, and he gave his reasons therefor. He said that in the United States the founding fathers had taken virtually the situation that existed prior to the revolution, when you had the state's governor and his self-chosen or his own chosen appointees around him as advisers—the family compact as we call it in Canadian history—and that they had incorporated that situation into the American constitution, with dire results. All they had done was to transfer the struggle that went on between the governor and his family compact to a similar struggle between the congress of the United States, and the President and his advisers, who of course are not representative as we understand the cabinet as being representative under our British parliamentary system. That I think stems from this. I think that the whole conception of the United States constitution was different from ours. Under the British North America Act the United Kingdom, upon the advice of the fathers of confederation, delegated certain powers to the provinces, retaining all other power in the hands of the central authority, this federal parliament. In the United States, the states delegated to the central government certain power and retained the residual power in the hands of the state, the very opposite to our own. Therefore, when we are talking about the Senate and the constitution of our two countries, we should always bear in mind that the conception of Canada as a nation was substantially different from the conception of the United States as a nation, and that the fathers of confederation did what they did deliberately when they founded this nation.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the amendment that has been introduced this afternoon can serve a very useful purpose. It can serve the purpose of focusing attention upon the bicameral Canadian institution. It can arouse public interest in the respective value of the House of Commons and of the Senate of Canada. It can lead either to a desire on the part of the people for the abolition of the Senate as now constituted, at least, or to the reform of the Senate in a very drastic and comprehensive way, to bring it more in line with the needs of a modern democracy.

So far as I am concerned, I have not been able to discuss this with any of my colleagues today. I think, however, the amendment should be supported by the house, although I must say I regret the manner in which it has come before the house—and in that I am not criticizing the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). The manner in which it should have come before the house is this. The government, knowing the situation in the upper chamber, should have introduced a discussion of this sort in the house on its own initiative and not left it to the opposition. Coming in at this late date perhaps it makes it a little difficult, although again the leader of the opposition did suggest that we might do what was done in relation to the setting up of a committee to study the new Indian Act and the conditions of the Indians several years ago, namely, continue the committee after the house rises. That could be done.

As I say, I regret that this matter did not come before the house earlier this session, and that the government itself did not take the initiative. I believe I have placed a point of view before the house. It may not be a point of view which is a popular one in the house, but I am certain of this, that the Canadian people want to see our parliamentary institutions reflect democracy in this country. As long as the Senate of Canada remains in the condition in which it is today—and I readily admit there are some good people in the Senate of Canada—it will not invite the respect but rather the ridicule of the people of this and other democratic countries.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately members of our group were not aware before this matter was brought up this afternoon that it was to be brought up today. Consequently, we have had no opportunity to give the matter considered thought. On the face of it, though, I would say that there is much to be commended in the amendment which the leader of the opposition has moved, and much food for thought in the remarks with which he has accompanied the amendment.

In a general way I believe there is agreement across the country that we are not obtaining the results from the Senate that we have a right to expect. The Senate is a rather expensive institution in the Dominion of Canada. I think most people are of the impression that it is capable of delivering a very high order of service to the people of Canada, and that probably it is prevented from doing the good things that even it would like to do because of restrictions under which it is working, over which it has no adequate control.

It would therefore seem that it would be an idea quite worthy of commendation to invite the members of the Senate to meet with the members of the House of Commons and carefully canvass the whole situation, realizing that we have a nation now of 14 million people on our hands whose destinies it is the responsibility of these two great sections of parliament to look after.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the members of my group would be quite ready to support the amendment.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) may I say that the speeches which were delivered by the three hon. gentlemen who have preceded me indicate their interest in this subject. It is a continuing interest. The problem must be solved if democracy is to operate as it should.

As one looks back to the days when our constitution was being considered, it is of interest to note that the Senate originally was conceived on the basis of the legislative council of Canada, which was elective; that when the discussions took place at the time of confederation, or prior thereto, the only reason that the Senate became a nominated rather than elected chamber was that disputes arose among the members of the two conferences. These disputes arose out of the difficulties that the United States had found and which had culminated in the civil war. The debates of confederation days indicate that the final decision to provide for a nominated Senate was in consequence of the fact that the deliberations took place during the period of restoration and reconstruction immediately after the civil war.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said it was unfortunate that this matter had not been brought before the house by the government. I agree with him entirely in that. Indeed I find it difficult to understand, having regard to the numerous occasions on which reform of the Senate has been declared to be of the essence of Liberal policy, that a measure of Senate reform has not long since been introduced. At the convention of the Liberal party in 1893 one of the outstanding resolutions passed dealt with the necessity of doing away with the archaic form of the Senate and bringing it up to date in accordance with the then concept of democratic government and of parliamentary institutions.

This is the only way in which the matter can be effectively brought before parliament by the opposition. If we were to bring it in, sir, through the medium of a private member's resolution you realize what would happen to such a resolution. Certainly no one would suggest that it would be intentionally talked out but that result would be achieved without much difficulty. The end would be that no consideration would be given to this most important matter.

Last fall a constitutional session was held wherein advances were made in our democratic form of government, and in bringing our political system up to date. The first time there was a general discussion regarding constitutional matters, particularly the necessity for reform of the Senate and the abolition of appeals to the privy council, was in the session of 1875, and the matter has been discussed on a number of occasions subsequently.

On March 1, 1875, Mr. Mills moved the following resolution:

> That the house go into committee of the whole to consider the following resolution:
> That the present mode of constituting the Senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, makes the Senate alike independent of the people and the crown, and is in other material respects defective, and that our constitution ought to be so amended as to confer upon each province the power of selecting its own senators and to define the mode of their selection.

That resolution was debated at considerable length. Finally the house divided on it and it was carried by a vote of 77 to 74. After it was carried Mr. Mills was reported as saying in effect:

> The house had committed itself to the principle that a change was desirable in the constitution of the Senate—there could be no doubt about that proposition. The house had affirmed that the constitution of the Senate was inconsistent with the principle of our federal government, and some change should be made which would give to each province the appointment of its senators.

I am not accepting the suggestions then made, but I am pointing out that in the debates which took place the outstanding argument advanced was that the Senate was out of date and that it did not conform to the federal system of government, because appointment to membership was decided by nomination by the government. It is of interest to know that the debate has continued over the years. In 1921 Senate reform was part of the policy of the Liberal party. Reform of the Senate was of the essence of the election in 1925. I think in large measure that policy was the consequence of the debate which took place in 1923 in the house.

A motion was offered by Mr. Jean J. Denis, the then member for Joliette, and that motion appears at page 1364 of Hansard for March 21, 1923, in these words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that a humble address be presented to His Majesty the King praying that the British North America Act be amended so as to provide that the members of the Senate instead of being summoned by the Governor General should be elected by the people for a term of six years in special senatorial divisions, the election for one-half thereof to take place every third year or should be elected for any other period of time or by any other mode of election as may be determined by parliament.

A most interesting debate followed in which various members of the house spoke. The speech by Mr. Denis needs no repetition. He placed on record the various events which had taken place leading up to the Senate being established in its present form. Then he finally arrived at this conclusion, which I believe is of interest to all hon. members, that there is no other self-governing British dominion that has a nominative Senate. The purport of his argument is that the experience since 1867 in Canada and in other parts of the commonwealth had indicated that a Senate appointed by a government in power did not discharge its responsibilities as effectively as it would if provision had been made either for election or for election in part and nomination in part.

Finally Mr. Fielding, a man of great experience in public life and a man who gave to his public service idealism that knew no party bounds over the years when he was premier of Nova Scotia, and following that as a member of the House of Commons, stated:

> The original constitution of the Senate contemplated the recognition of provincial rights. It was taken for granted that it might be a danger to minorities and that the Senate might be needed for the protection of minorities.

Then he went on to say:

I agree that the constitution of the Senate today is not satisfactory. I do not join in any condemnation of the Senate. I think even as organized today it is capable of, and does, very good work. But unfortunately the distribution of our legislative work is such that we do not get the best out of the Senate.

This was said twenty-seven years ago.

For about a month after the Senate meets the chief business is to inquire what is on for the next day. There is nothing, and "Satan finds mischief for idle hands to do." Then, towards the end of the session the Senate is rushed and is not able to do properly the work for which it is specially designed; that is to say, the work of a revising body.

Then he proceeded:

I think it is desirable and expedient that we should have a second chamber, a chamber that should act as a brake—not a block—on the House of Commons; a chamber useful in many ways. I think a second chamber is useful and necessary in these days of so-called democracy, to guard against hasty legislation.

And his final opinion was expressed in this way:

I would appoint a senator for ten years. I would make him eligible for a second term, and retire him at, say eighty.

That was his suggestion, that there be appointment for a limited period of time. Others spoke in favour of election, while still others had in mind a system similar to that in effect in the United States where in fact the Senate is elected by the people and has been, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, since 1913.

Debates on this subject have taken place on other occasions. The leader of the opposition has referred to the debates in the house in 1886. In the election of 1925, when reform was in the air, the former prime minister, Mr. King, promised to reform the Senate in order to make it an effective body to carry out the legislative responsibilities that devolve upon it. The means was that as appointments were made to the Senate those appointed would sign a declaration to the effect that they would join in their own reform. All of us felt through the years that those who had been appointed to the Senate had gone through that method of self-screening, only to find about 1946 that the system had never been carried out or had never been brought into effect.

The experience since 1939 has shown that the Senate has had little or no opportunity to carry out its major responsibilities. Only a few pieces of legislation have originated there. Indeed in some sessions so little was the Senate used that the vast experience in parliamentary life which is available in that body was restricted in large measure to its divorce legislative functions. As far as other matters that came before it were concerned, they were too often to all intents and purposes perfunctory.

The result has been that over the years—this has accelerated in recent years—the people and even the Senators are asking what should be done in order to restore the Senate to a responsibility that it now does not discharge. I could quote various ministers of the crown who are now sitting in the seats of the mighty and who through the years have spoken of the necessity of reform. Only the other day the government leader in the other place spoke of the necessity of something being done. A recent appointee, Senator Stambaugh, made a speech in Alberta during the Easter holidays which indicated that after the few months he had been there his considered opinion was that something had to be done, that some definite consideration should be given to the necessity of reform in so far as the method of appointment and the discharge of a larger share of responsibility was concerned.

In 1925 Senate reform was mentioned in the speech from the throne. Then came 1926 and nothing more was heard about it. Reference to page 208 of Hansard of January 18, 1926, shows that Mr. Meighen spoke on that subject as follows:

I spoke some time ago of dear old friends who are missing and apparently gone forever, and amongst them none was more familiar, none more lamented than the figure of that great apparition known as Senate reform. Its death has been very recent, so perhaps we should speak of it with bated breath.

And he did. Then the late Mr. Lapointe followed and I quote from page 223 as follows:

My right hon. friend was most sarcastic when he referred to the reform of the Senate. Reform of the Senate! We have not changed our views about Senate reform from what they were last year. We said last year that the proposals of the government would be submitted to a conference of the provinces.

Mr. Meighen: What are the proposals?

Mr. Lapointe: The proposals which we will submit, and we expect that some of them, at least, will be accepted by the provinces. I contended then in the house, and I still submit that confederation was a pact among certain provinces and that you cannot alter that pact in any substantial feature without conferring with those who were parties to it.

Then he went on to say:

If my right hon. friend and my hon. friends opposite are kind enough not to put too many obstacles in our way, we will redeem their pledges as well as our own.

He was referring to a pledge to reform the Senate which had been given at one time at Halifax. The fact is that an appointed Senate is an anachronism in a democratic system. As far as I know in no other part of the commonwealth is there an appointed second chamber. Indeed in the countries that have set up constitutions within the last 25 or 30 years an appointed second chamber has not been accepted. Having regard to the unanimous opinion of those sitting opposite over the years as to the need of this being done—I can find no dissenting voice from 1918 to 1930 and indeed some ministers now sitting opposite have been vociferous over the years in support of this proposal—surely we can expect some support to this motion which binds no one as to the form of the change that will be made. I read the terms:

It is expedient to appoint a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to study suggested constitutional changes affecting the Senate—

Various suggestions have been made. Some have suggested that we should have a Senate which was in part elected and in part appointed. Others have suggested that we should have an elected Senate which was elected for a period of time with one-third retiring every one-third of the period. Another suggestion has been that appointment be maintained but limited to a period of years.

This resolution binds no one to actual terms. It places the responsibility in the hands of a committee. It gives that committee the power to gather evidence and to submit recommendations so that when the dominion-provincial conference meets this year the question may be placed before it. Among the matters that will be placed before the committee if set up are such things as the method by which the members of the Senate shall be chosen—their tenure of office—and the better functioning of the Senate in our parliamentary system.

Surely these are desirable aims. Is there any hon. member anywhere who does not believe—I include those in the other place—that changes must be made in order to make the second chamber one that will render outstanding public service and perform the parliamentary responsibilities that it does not have, an opportunity to perform now?

I quote from the motion:

—with a view to formulating proposals to be presented to the government for discussion at the forthcoming dominion-provincial constitutional conference. . . .

We believe in the right of the provinces to be consulted on this matter as on all constitutional changes. What better time could there be than now, when the Supreme Court of Canada has been made the final court of appeal? What better time than now, considering the situation that exists in various parts of the world where parliamentary institutions, because they ceased to operate efficiently, have ceased to exist? What better time than now for parliament to set up such a committee for the purpose of making our parliament more effective in the discharge of its democratic responsibilities? What answer can there be on the part of the government? Their promises of the past call on them to support the amendment. At no time has there ever been a word of dissent by the Liberal party as to the necessity of something being done. Some may argue that the time is too short for the committee to function. There are three or four weeks remaining at the very least, and possibly more, during which such a committee could sit, and study the systems adopted in other countries, and be in a position to place before the government information that it in turn could bring before the dominion-provincial conference.

Surely no one can say, "Let us wait until next year". It was promised in 1921. In 1925 time was of the essence. It was said that unless something was done immediately serious consequences would follow. Indeed I remember well a speech made by Mr. King on election night in 1935, and the outstanding feature of it was that reform of the Senate would no longer be delayed by a majority of the other party in the Senate. That was 1935, fifteen years ago, and I make allowance for the days of war when such matters could not come up. During his term of office the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has proceeded step by step to secure passage through the British parliament to provide for amendment of our constitution by ourselves in so far as federal matters are concerned, and has made the Supreme Court of Canada the final court of appeal in constitutional matters. Therefore is it not time, Mr. Speaker, that we join with members of the other place to build the most effective democracy we can under our parliamentary institutions? Reforms must come in the House of Commons, as we frequently advocate, and reform must also come in the other place. I ask members of the house irrespective of party to support the amendment to the end that the promises of the past and the protestations that have so often been made about the necessity of this being done may at least be carried one step forward in the effectuation of the desires of those on the other side of the house who have waited for so many years for the opportunity to do this very thing.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend at this time to discuss the merits of Senate reform. I have had no opportunity to conduct the research necessary for such learned historical statements as have been made in the house this afternoon. Of course the motion comes as quite a surprise at this time. No intimation of it was given. I am not complaining about that because no intimation has to be given of the matters the opposition chooses to raise when a motion to go into supply is submitted by the government. Possibly if and when it ever happens that we are on the other side of the house we may be doing exactly what my distinguished friends have done on this occasion.

We have a motion to go into supply submitted by the government, and no matter how carefully or skilfully the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and those who agree with him, may gild the pill of an amendment to the motion it is still a motion of want of confidence. They say that they hope the motion will receive support. It is always permissible to hope as long as there is life, and they hope that the government will be defeated. I submit to those who do not agree with them or share their hope that the opposition is not really serious in appealing to members on this side of the house, or in the upper half of the other side of the house, to support their motion.

It is an interesting motion, and we have heard interesting speeches made in support of it. The question of Senate reform is certainly one which is being given thought by a great many serious-minded Canadians who are interested in the Canadian constitution. I submit that first of all the amendment has the defect that it is a gilded attempt to secure a vote of the house which may mean the defeat of the government.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish to make it perfectly clear that the intention of the amendment is not that of want of confidence. We would welcome government support of a motion which is consistent with their expressed views. It is not a want of confidence motion.

Mr. St. Laurent: There is a place the road to which is paved with good intentions, but whatever be the intentions that lie behind the motion its constitutional effect would be the defeat of the government if it were successful.

Mr. Drew: Is that the place the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was speaking about?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry I was not here when the leader of the opposition made his speech, but if I had been here I would have tried not to interrupt him. The other serious defect of the amendment is that it is an invitation to the house to have the government break faith with the representatives of the provincial governments participating in the dominion-provincial constitutional conference which is now adjourned. The conference was called for the sole purpose of bringing back to Canada the right to do in Canada the things which Canadian conditions may require in the form of amendments to the present constitution. It was that invitation which was accepted, and it was on that invitation that the conference met. I have had little time to refer to the report of the conference, but I would remind hon. members that the correspondence leading to the conference was tabled in the house and printed as appendices to various issues of Hansard of the last session of parliament. I have had time to look at some short references to the purpose of the conference which appear in the printed proceedings of the constitutional conference of federal and provincial governments held from January 10 to 12 inclusive, 1950. On page 6 I find this short paragraph in my opening statement:

> The purpose of this conference is to seek together to devise a generally satisfactory method of transferring to authorities responsible to the people of Canada the jurisdiction which may have to be exercised, from time to time, to amend those fundamental parts of the constitution which are of concern alike to the federal and provincial authorities.

Turning to page 11 I should like to read a short paragraph from the statement made by the gentleman who is now premier of Ontario. It is in these terms:

> As I understand it, we have not been called here to discuss proposed amendments to the constitution but rather to examine whether we should have power in Canada to make amendments if the need should arise and by what method. Ontario is not here asking for anything, nor is it being asked to give anything away.
> The one purpose is to consider and answer the two general questions which I have stated.

I have not had time to go through all the statements, but on page 17 there is a statement by the premier of Nova Scotia headed, "Purposes of Conference". It reads as follows:

> This is to discuss the feasibility of devising a constitutional amendment which will enable subsequent amendments to be made in Canada without resort to the parliament of the United Kingdom; except as to matters already within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Canadian parliament, pursuant to the B.N.A. Act (No. 2) 1949, or of the provinces under section 92(1) of the act of 1867.
> It is to be noted that what is to be considered is a general procedure for amendment and not the consideration of particular amendments. We are concerned here with methods, rather than with the substance of amendments.

I had time to turn up one more, which is in the opening address of the premier of New Brunswick, and is to be found on page 21:

> This conference has been called to consider a method of amending the constitution in Canada. We who are taking part in it shall, if we attain this objective, have established another milestone in the march of our country towards the goal of full nationhood.

Senate Reform

As hon. members know it was agreed at the end of three days' deliberation that a continuing committee would be set up to which the provincial governments would submit their views or their memoranda concerning the procedure that might be established. The conference is to be reconvened for the purpose of considering the effect of the joint briefs or memoranda submitted by the ten Canadian provincial governments and the federal government. It is for that purpose, and that purpose alone. I submit that we would not be acting in the spirit in which this conference can best function if we made any change in the purpose and objectives of the conference without prior agreement of those who have participated in it thus far, and who have agreed on the agenda established for their continuing participation.

A third reason is that I think, until we get this procedure for amending our constitution in Canada, it would be premature to discuss a specific amendment and expect the parliament of the United Kingdom to make the kind of reforms to our Senate which would be satisfactory to the Canadian public. I believe it is preferable to arrange our affairs in such order that we can, in our own country, do the things that the experience of seventy-five years will demonstrate to be desirable for the amendment of this democratic machine, which is required for the co-ordination of the common efforts of the Canadian people towards their ultimate destiny. Of course, if we cannot agree on a method of doing in Canada ourselves, if we find we have not yet reached that state of adult citizenship where we can take the responsibility in our own assemblies for the doing of the things that are for the purposes of our Canadian people, then perhaps we can deal with other matters. If we cannot agree on how amendments generally may be made, perhaps we can agree to ask the mother of parliaments to make this kind of amendment for us. I hope that when we come to grapple with this serious problem of making the right kind of amendments to the constitution of our Senate, the method of appointment and tenure of office, we will have already done the other thing and have asserted that we can, in Canada, in spite of the fact that there are ten Canadian provinces, and that on all matters the mentality of the people and the attitude of those who represent them in their legislature are not identical, we are nevertheless broad enough Canadians to devise and operate a system whereby Canadians will be doing in Canada the things designed for the welfare of the future generations of Canadians.

Without being any less prudent than the nember for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in respect of those quoted opinions he has today put upon Hansard, I think I can agree with him, and he would agree with me, that there are important considerations that require serious study to bring about a system which will not create again the anomalous situation, which once before existed in our history, that is to say a one-sided other house of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the Prime Minister mean by "once before"?

Mr. St. Laurent: Once before there was an overwhelming majority of one party, and that was not the Liberal party. Today there is an overwhelming majority of appointees made by Liberal governments. That comes about when a government is, in the opinion of the majority of the Canadian people, so efficient that it remains in office a long time. It was that which created the previous situation. The people of that time, rightly or wrongly—I am not commenting on the merits—felt that the government they had from confederation down to 1873, and which they took back again in 1878 and kept until 1896, deserved their confidence. It happens that for the last fifteen years the people have felt that the party responsible for the government has maintained in office a government that deserves their confidence, and the traditional system has been for the government to make appointments of ladies or gentlemen from its own political party. This brings about an anomalous condition which I think is worthy of serious thought and study, to see whether we can have something that will be more generally representative of the complexion of political opinion throughout the country. I do not think that that would be hastened by supporting this motion. I invite all those who still have confidence in this government to vote against the motion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—ENFORCEMENT REGULATIONS

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (enforcement).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gillis: It should hardly be necessary, Mr. Speaker, to explain this bill inasmuch as it has been introduced in this house on a couple of occasions and had considerable discussion when the national labour code was first adopted in this house. This bill has for its purpose the replacement of sections 43, 44, 45 and 46 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and briefly it means this.

Under the present arrangements the national labour relations board has neither power nor authority in industrial disputes except to call in the parties to the dispute, listen to the evidence, come to no conclusion, and then send both parties to the dispute back home to take strike action and fight it out in the streets. It is our conclusion that the day for that kind of thing has gone by; that the labour movement that comes under the jurisdiction of the national labour code has grown up and that they are in the administrative stage; and that it is time that we brought the rule of law within the legislation that has as its aim the regulation and supervision of disputes that occur from time to time between management and labour. Under the present code, when a dispute gets beyond the jurisdiction of the board, no other action is possible except to apply to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) for the right to have the matter handled in the regular courts of law; and in our opinion it is the wrong place to try a labour dispute in a court of law before magistrates and judges who are trained in criminal law and the straight administration of civil law. Labour relations is an entirely different field, and in our opinion the proper people to determine the question as to whether or not an infraction of the law has been committed by one side or the other is the labour relations board. These men deal with the problem, they listen to the evidence, they know the labour code and its penalties, and they are in a better position to determine whether or not an infraction of the act has been committed by one side or the other.

This bill merely asks this parliament to place in the hands of the board the right to enforce their own legislation, just as is done now with regard to the Income Tax Act, the motor vehicles act and other acts that are in a specific field. They are enforced by the people who have jurisdiction under the act.

There is nothing new in this particular suggestion because we already have precedents in our own country. For example, a couple of years ago there was a dispute in the province of Saskatchewan. That particular labour board took unto themselves the prerogative of deciding that John East Company in Regina was wrong in dismissing seven or eight employees. The board ordered their reinstatement, with full pay for the time they were dismissed. They claimed they were wrongfully dismissed under the labour relations act that existed in that province. That matter went over to the privy council, and the privy council ruled at that time that the board had that right, and they exercised it at that time. Moreover, an act passed within the last couple of months in the province of Ontario has put in the Ontario labour relations act exactly the same provisions that we are asking in this bill to be extended to the national labour code.

The national labour code is applicable only to a small group of employees in this country; that is the group that come within the jurisdiction of the federal government, such as the national railways, the harbours board, the C.B.C. and shipping that is interprovincial. In view of the fact that the board has that limited jurisdiction in the field of labour, I think this is an opportune time to enact this bill and to give the national labour relations board some legal status. All the board will get under this bill is the right to determine that one side or the other has committed an infraction of the act. They assess the evidence. They place that evidence then in the hands of the magistrate who is charged with the enforcement of the act as it is. The magistrate hands down a decision in accordance with the penalties that are laid down now in the national labour code. If one side or the other is not satisfied, they then have the right of appeal. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this house should adopt this bill at this time, and let us see how it works out; for I visualize the time when this national labour code is going to embrace all of the workers in this country. I think the time has now come when we should start experimenting at least with this kind of legislation so that we may have some knowledge of it.

I should just like to draw this fact to the attention of the house. We are in a rather precarious position in the field of labour in national strikes. For example, in the packing house strike here about two years ago, when that whole industry was tied up from coast to coast, nothing could be done about it. Each province has jurisdiction in the field. Your national labour relations board could not touch it. It did not come within the purview of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). It was difficult to get the various provinces together to take some action. I think it is time that we began to think in terms of national legislation, in our own interests, so that we may have jurisdiction in the event of national emergencies developing.

I am not going to occupy any more of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker. I have briefly set out the basic idea that the bill contains, and I am now going to leave it to the tender mercies of the house.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, for the past quarter of a century a double trend has been noticeable in the evolution of law. On the one hand we observe a transfer of their power to apply the law from the courts of justice to other bodies. Commissions, boards, and sometimes administrators have thus been invested with judicial and semi-judicial powers. On the other hand, there has been a growing tendency to apply to collectivities the object of legislation which was originally meant for individuals. This last trend has been most evident mainly in the judicial relations between employers and employees, for example in collective agreements and in the Minimum Wages Act. The legislation does not concern individuals any more but groups.

The bill which is before the house, sponsored by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), is another of those projects which would take away from courts, magistrates and judges the most important part of their functions, namely, that of hearing cases before passing sentences.

I am opposed to such incursions in the field of our judiciary system, one of the best in the world. Let us remember here—and I think this is admitted by all—that courts of justice and their procedure are the best protection we have for human rights and civil liberties.

The act which this bill would amend was assented to during the 1947-48 session and came into force on September 1, 1948. It seems to have worked very satisfactorily since then. The minister has given a broad and generous interpretation to its provisions, so that conflicts arising between employers and employees could be settled without necessarily imposing a fine on delinquents. It is a fact that, in matters of public relations, the conciliation of disputes is the most effective way of maintaining good understanding between those who take part in the production, the transformation and the distribution of goods.

When different classes of society are called upon to co-operate, it is remarkable how much more a peaceful discussion, without recourse to the courts of justice, has helped the parties than a strict application of the provisions of the law. This was the opinion expressed by the Minister of Labour during the debate on the resolution introducing the act in 1947.

We have been told that the amendment is similar to legislation applied by some provinces and some other countries. If my information is correct, in Saskatchewan a provision somewhat like the one we are asked to adopt has given rise to numerous conflicts and litigation. In the United States, where the labour relations board has extensive powers, difficulties have arisen which have been far from improving good relations between employers and employees.

I think I may assert that since the act has come into force there have been few demands for court proceedings and most of the time those conflicts which arose have been settled on a friendly basis.

In order that a law may achieve its aim, it must be possible to apply sanctions against those who violate its provisions, otherwise the law will be useless.

Let us take a brief look at the act which we are asked to amend. It is chapter 54 of 11-12 George VI. This act is in two parts. The first part deals with the powers and duties of those who come under its application. The title of the act should be noticed: "An Act to provide for the Investigation, Conciliation and Settlement of Industrial Disputes". The act is under the administration of the Department of Labour, a labour relations board with powers specified under section 61 of the act. This is dealt with in the second part of the act. The powers of the board are of an inquiring nature. It has to see that the people under its jurisdiction come under the provisions of the act.

The intention of the legislature was that any offence against a provision of the act should be punished; and it is up to the tribunals to decide if there has been any violation and to punish accordingly.

Sections 39 to 47 inclusive provide for appropriate penalties and indicate the manner in which court proceedings should be instituted so that the law may attain its end.

The wording of the title of the act clearly signifies that it provides not simply for investigation but also for the conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes. It is also stipulated that the minister will have power to appoint a conciliation board or conciliation officer in order to prevent a dispute from deteriorating into a lawsuit which would mean heavy fines for the parties and very often considerable costs.

The amendment would do away with: one, the jurisdiction of the minister in matters of conciliation and settlement; two, the jurisdiction of the conciliation boards appointed under the act; three, the jurisdiction of the conciliation officer appointed by the minister; four, the jurisdiction of the courts of justice in charge of the application of the act in matters of violations of its provisions; all of such jurisdiction being turned over to the labour relations board, except as to sentences.

The sections of the act concerned with the proposed amendment are sections 43 to 47 inclusive. Here is a brief summary of the procedure contained in those sections.

If a complaint in writing is submitted to the minister by a party to collective bargaining, that the other party refuses to comply with the law, the minister may refer the case to the labour relations board which shall investigate and order what measures it will deem necessary. Every employer, employers' organization, trade union or other person in respect of whom such an order is given will be bound to comply with such order.

If a person claims that any of the provisions of the act have been violated and makes a complaint in writing to the minister, the minister may appoint an industrial inquiry commission or a conciliation officer to investigate and make a report to him in respect of the alleged violation of the act or of an order of the board which would be binding on both parties. It is only after such investigations that the minister may use his discretion. According to section 45, he does not have to act, but if it should become necessary to do so he must give his consent in writing for the prosecution. Offences must be prosecuted by summary conviction in accordance with part XV of the Criminal Code. Such offences are heard and sentences pronounced by judges or magistrates appointed by the province.

There can be an investigation conducted either by the inquiry commission or by the conciliation officer. After such an inquiry and following the report, the minister can still bring the parties to an understanding; and experience has shown that court proceedings have seldom been necessary. It should be noted that if the parties appear before a court of justice, a new inquiry will be conducted by the judge or the magistrate and it is only after that fines can be imposed. It goes without saying that according to part XV of the Criminal Code, there can be an appeal to a superior court.

The amendment would destroy the entire process of conciliation contained in the act and invest the labour relations board alone with the power to conduct an investigation and of issuing orders indicating that such and such a party is guilty of a violation of some provision of the act. Such order would then be filed in the magistrate's court of the jurisdiction in which the violation took place, and the magistrate would then impose the penalties provided in the act without having any power to examine the merits of the order except that, in the case when the order "is ambiguous or its meaning not clear", he may refer it to the board for clarification.

In my opinion, the amendment, apparently harmless, ruins the whole economy of the act which must be above all an act for conciliation; and on this ground I am opposed to the amendment.

From a judicial point of view, the amendment is harmful because it attacks the separation of powers. It is revolting in law to ask a judge to pronounce a sentence without allowing him to become acquainted with the provisions of the law, hear the parties to the dispute and their witnesses, so that he may judge the merits of the case in which he must pronounce a sentence.

The contemplated amendment is equivalent to this. The labour relations board will say to the magistrate: "Such provision has been violated; please impose the penalty provided in sections 39 and following of the act". Such proceedings would be a blow to the proper functioning of our criminal law. Section 726 of the Criminal Code states as follows:

> The justice, having heard what each party has to say, and the witnesses and evidence adduced, shall consider the whole matter and, unless otherwise provided, determine the same and convict or make an order against the defendant, or dismiss the information or complaint, as the case may be.

According to the amendment, the magistrate can only pronounce on the amount of the fine, say $5 to $250 as provided in the act. The only ground for appeal from such sentence by any party will be the inadequacy of the fine. There will be no appeal on the merits of the conviction.

It can be easily seen, then, that this amendment is a step back instead of a step forward. I should be very much surprised if in a country where justice is held in such high esteem, where everyone shows great confidence in our tribunals, we should find individuals, trade unions and employers who would be willing to see our tribunals hand out sentences as one hands out receipts.

The act had provided for a fair distribution of the powers of investigation and of conciliation, but did not define the powers of the tribunals which were to be called upon only as a last resort.

The act is broad and supple enough in its interpretation to allow an understanding to be reached in labour and industrial relations. It also provided that court proceedings should be instituted only after all other means of conciliation should have been tried. It did not define the powers of the tribunal as it expected those powers to be exercised within the framework of those institutions which we respect and which are the foundation of our democracy.

The protection of the individual rests upon the dealing of justice. This justice should be dealt according to fixed rules in such a way that each party should be satisfied even if one should be fined.

I do not wish my words to be interpreted as an opposition to boards, commissions and administrators. But I am in favour of leaving untouched the fundamental jurisdictions of our courts of justice. The sabotage of the courts of justice is the beginning of anarchy in any country. We can see what is happening in countries under Russia's protection. The courts of justice simply carry out decisions taken beforehand by the government. If a conviction is needed following an order from the head of the state, the court simulates a trial and a conviction occurs in all cases. What hurts in others must be rejected at home.

Knowing the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), I am sure he did not intend to give this meaning to the proposed amendment. He thought it would simplify proceedings. He noticed particularly the powers of investigation mentioned in the act, forgetting that the primary aim of the act is the conciliation and settlement of industrial and labour disputes.

The tendency in the evolution of modern law to invest state organisms with judicial powers makes it easy, even in genuine good faith, to deviate from the important principle stated in section 7 of the declaration on human rights as follows:

> Everyone has the right to have his criminal and civil liabilities and his rights determined without undue delay by a fair public trial and by a competent tribunal before which he has opportunity for a full hearing. The state has a duty to maintain adequate tribunals and procedures to make this right effective.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on May 16, 1947, quoted before this house a declaration of the Manitoba civil liberties association in which it was said:

> No Canadian citizen shall be denied justice as administered in the regularly constituted courts of law.

We have in the country remarkable judiciary institutions. We have competent and respectable justices. Canadian justice is highly respected by all Canadians and by all those outside the country who study our institutions. Why should we overthrow a system by having someone with the power to investigate and someone else with the power to apply sanctions? The faith and confidence I have in our tribunals induces me also to oppose the amendment and I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I do not intend to make a speech, but rise only to ask the hon. member who introduced the bill if he would answer a question in connection with something he said to the effect that the Ontario legislature had passed a bill this year. What bill was it?

Mr. Gillis: It is the provincial labour code which was passed, I believe, about two months ago.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have both of them here and I cannot find that provision in them.

Mr. Gillis: It contains that very provision.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I cannot find it.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member may have the draft bill. The draft is amended, and the final bill which was passed contained the provision I mentioned.

Mr. A. C. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length concerning the bill before the house. The effect of the proposed amendment has been fairly well covered by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) who has preceded me in the debate. However, for the edification of the house perhaps in somewhat shorter terms I might explain what I consider to be the effect of the bill. In my view the effect is to strike out paragraphs 43, 44, 45 and 46 in the present act.

I do not think ninety per cent of the members of the House of Commons have had any requests from unions in their constituency for the repeal of those sections.

Mr. Gillis: Do you mind if I put you right on that?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I do not mind a question; but you have made your speech.

Mr. Gillis: Are you aware of the fact that the Canadian Congress of Labour, representing all of the industrial unions in Canada, on behalf of those unions recommended this when the national labour code was adopted?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I am aware of the fact, and I would remind the hon. member that the Canadian Congress of Labour does not by any means represent all labour organizations in Canada.

Mr. Gillis: I said the industrial unions.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): And I am also aware of the fact that whether they are right wing or left wing of that political party, the C.C.F. and the Canadian Congress of Labour have a very close alignment. The memorandum from the Canadian Congress of Labour to the government is contained in a pamphlet from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada where, at page 13, they say this:

> As indicated in our memorandum of last year, we accepted the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act as a good start in the right direction. We also said then that we would watch the administration of the act very carefully.

They have done that. I have said, and I repeat, that there has been no request from any labour union in my constituency for these amendments.

Mr. Lennard: You have none.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): We have labour unions in our constituency.

Mr. Lennard: Farm unions.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): We have running trades unions and every other kind of union such as wholesale warehouses and so on. None of them has requested these changes. The whole object of these changes is simply to take matters from the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and pass them over to a board. In the time I have attended this house I think hon. members generally will agree that we have heard nothing but compliments about the Minister of Labour and about the way he has conducted the work of his department. We have heard those compliments from our friends in the C.C.F. and from the official Conservative opposition and I think they are well deserved.

If we consider what is happening in labour circles in the United States, if we even compare conditions here with those in the state of Michigan, I think we will agree that the minister has done a good job. The unemployment situation today, despite the prophets of gloom to my immediate left, has improved. In the three constituencies adjoining the employment office at Yorkton there were over 2,000 seasonal unemployed a month ago. That number has dwindled to 500 and they are going to need workers at the end of the month. That is the situation there.

This bill will take away from the Minister of Labour rights that he had under the act. Section 43 of the act provides that when the minister receives a complaint in writing from a party to collective bargaining he may refer the same to the board. That leaves it to the judgment of the minister and from what has happened in Canada it would appear that the judgment of the Minister of Labour has been fairly sound.

Then under section 44 of the act a person complaining to be aggrieved because of an alleged violation of any of the provisions of the act may make a complaint in writing to the minister. That would be taken away by the proposed amendment. That section goes on to provide that the minister may require an industrial inquiry commission to be appointed. Then under section 45 a prosecution for an offence under this act may be brought against an employers' organization or a trade union and an information or complaint in respect of a contravention of the provisions of the act may be laid.

The whole effect of these amendments is to permit the appointment of a board without any consultation with the minister. We have had some experience in Saskatchewan with labour boards. We do know that while the C.C.F. claim that the Canadian Congress of Labour and themselves are one, are almost an entity politically, there are a great number who belong to the Canadian Congress of Labour who have not adopted the C.C.F. as their political arm. I should like to quote from a letter from one who was known as a member of the ginger group and who sat in this parliament for many years. He now lives in Hamilton and he certainly was not biased in so far as the C.C.F. was concerned. He writes:

> I came to Hamilton with a warm spot in my heart for the C.C.F. even if I never called myself a socialist; but it did not take me long to lose any sympathy I had for them when I saw the workings of the C.I.O. machine here. Now I know something about labour unions. I was working energetically to get my brother station agents and telegraph operators organized forty-five years ago. When I left the C.N.R. I was O.R.T. committee man for the C.N.R. territory Winnipeg to Edmonton, Dauphin to Prince Albert and intervening branches. However in those days nothing was done without the full understanding and co-operation of the men and a strike without being authorized by a ballot vote was unthinkable. The steel strike that tied up so much business here three years ago would never have happened had the men been given a government supervised ballot vote.

Mr. Gillis: On a point of order, I should like to know what document the hon. member is reading from, where it was written and what it has to do with this bill.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gillis: I am speaking to a point of order. What has somebody who is working in Hamilton and who belonged to the C.C.F. at one time to do with the present bill under discussion in this house?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Gillis: That is a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is that the document which the hon. member for Yorkton is reading is not related in any way to the principle of this bill. If that is so, then of course the hon. member should not continue to read it. On the second reading of private and public bills, as well as other bills presented to the house, the discussion must be on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I was speaking on the principle of the bill. I have submitted that this bill was not introduced to this house as a result of any request of organized labour.

Mr. Gillis: A lie.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): It was merely put up—

Mr. Gillis: Deliberate.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton):—by the political arm of the Canadian Congress of Labour and they are merely bringing it in as a political party.

Mr. Gillis: I rise on another point of order. Apparently the hon. member is not familiar with the rules of the house because he is imputing motives. I introduced the bill at the request of a legislative body in Canada that represents all industrial workers in this country on an industrial basis. The hon. member would not understand that. I want the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member—

Mr. Mitchell: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. Gillis: The Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton must not impute motives to another hon. member. I am not sure that what he has said amounts to the imputing of motives.

Mr. Gillis: Definitely.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton must accept the statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton South that the bill was introduced by him on request.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I quite agree.

Mr. Mitchell: I rise to a point of order. I think my good friend from Cape Breton South said,—

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Mitchell: If you want it louder I can raise the roof. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South said something about what my friend said being a lie. I do not think that is a fair thing to do. He may be misinformed.

Mr. Gillis: He was not misinformed because five minutes ago I informed him.

Mr. Mitchell: Just a minute, the hon. member is not in local 103, Cape Breton; he is in the House of Commons. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South should withdraw his remark in fairness to the hon. member for Yorkton.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear any hon. member say that the statement made by another hon. member was a lie. Of course that is unparliamentary and I am sure if the hon. member did make the statement he will withdraw it. But at the same time the hon. member for Yorkton must withdraw any imputation which he has made against the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I made no imputation.

Mr. Speaker: Or any reference to improper motives by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): There is nothing on the record. My statement is this, and I will repeat it. If I am out of order I know Your Honour will say so.

Mr. Speaker: I think we can clear up this whole matter. The hon. member for Cape Breton South should withdraw the statement that he made that something said by another member was a lie, and the hon. member for Yorkton should withdraw any imputation which he made against the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Graydon: "Even Stephen".

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): As far as any imputation is concerned I did not even mention the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I said that this bill was introduced by the hon. member for Cape Breton South as a member of the C.C.F. party. I do not think that is unparliamentary.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should clear this up right away. I understand the hon. member for Yorkton imputed a motive to the hon. member for Cape Breton South. The hon. member for Cape Breton South denied the imputation. The hon. member for Yorkton must accept his denial and withdraw it, and the hon. member for Cape Breton South must withdraw the word he used, "lie".

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Then—

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand you both withdraw?

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, he started it and I am waiting for him.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I do not know what I am withdrawing. I did not impute any wrong motives.

Mr. Speaker: The house might agree that the unparliamentary statements of both speakers have been withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): As to the proposed amendment to the bill I should like to quote from an Ottawa dispatch of March 8 relating to the C.C.F.

Mr. Lennard: What year?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): This year. It reads:

C.C.F. leader M. J. Coldwell Wednesday hailed the establishment of a permanent political action committee of the Canadian Congress of Labour.

Mr. Gillis: What has this got to do with the bill?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): It continues:

Coldwell said he had not been previously informed of the C.C.L. decision to put political action on a permanent basis, but said whatever work it did would be certain to benefit the labour movement in politics, represented in Canada by the C.C.F.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment to the act does not help labour one iota, that labour has not asked for the amendment, and that it is a purely political movement to help the C.C.F. in accordance with declared policy. It is to help a political party.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, I rise again on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the statement of the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart) is a question of fact which may be denied or accepted by other members of the house.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, that is the very statement he just withdrew.

Mr. Speaker: No, the statement which was withdrawn was that the hon. member for Cape Breton South was introducing the bill not because he had representations from labour men but wholly for political purposes. That has been withdrawn. Now the hon. member for Yorkton says that it does not help labour.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just repeated what he said before. On the point of order—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Are you on the point of order still?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You have been ruled out of order twice.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Yorkton should take a few lessons from the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). He gives lessons on the rules of the house. The hon. member just made the statement that the bill was introduced without any representations from labour. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and every other member of the industrial relations committee who framed this code—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is argument, not a point of order.

Mr. Gillis: I am just giving the hon. member some information.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point which the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is now making is the point I have just made. He can make these representations at the close of the debate when he replies.

Mr. Gillis: That will be next month.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps. But a second speech would close the debate. The hon. member for Yorkton.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I continue with what I was reading:

"Of course there is no direct organizational connection between the C.C.F. and the C.C.L." Coldwell said.

Mr. Gillis: This has a lot to do with the principle of the bill.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Will you be quiet and keep order. I continue:

"They simply recognize us as the political arm of labour and we recognize them in the same way as we do the Trades and Labour Congress and the Catholic Labour syndicates. Whatever they do in the war of propaganda and educational campaigns as a political action committee will surely benefit us in the next general election campaign," Coldwell added.

The whole purpose of the amendment is not to benefit labour. It is a part of the next general election campaign of the C.C.F. to try to show labour, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South well knows, that they have been trying to do something that labour never asked for. I am opposed to any such change as that in the bill now before us.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, I should like to ask the hon. member for Yorkton to indicate the source of the report he has just read, and also the name of the person who wrote the letter from which he read a few minutes ago.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is not a point of order, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who flatters himself on his knowledge of the rules, well knows. The article in question was contained in an Ottawa paper and the statements I have read are quotations from your own leader.

Mr. Gillis: What Ottawa paper?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You can see it afterwards if you want to.

Mr. Gillis: Not necessarily.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question as to the source of the information should have been asked at the time the information was being given to the house. It is on record now and we cannot strike it off the record. The hon. member for Yorkton has given certain information to the house but there is one detail he has not given, and that is the name of the paper. If he has the name of the paper he might give it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I think it is the Ottawa Citizen. Anyway it is a press dispatch from Ottawa dated March 8.

Mr. Gillis: You are rather careless with your facts.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You get these other people to help you out and you are out of order.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, it is not very long since the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was prohibited from reading a letter to the house because he did not wish to give the name of the person who had written it. I ask the hon. member for Yorkton simply to give the house the name of the person who wrote the letter from which he read.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I will read the rest of the letter and give you his name. I want to get through before nine o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: All right.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): It reads:

> The steel strike that tied up so much business here three years ago would never have happened had the men been given a government supervised ballot vote. Today 1,600 men of the Canadian Car and Foundry Company here are out. These men were summarily called out by the little Hitlers who boss them and never given a chance to vote on whether to accept the company's offer. With the C.I.O. furnishing the campaign funds for the C.C.F. naturally the party is under their domination. Had all the C.I.O. workers with their families voted C.C.F. as they are supposed to do the three seats here, Hamilton West, Hamilton East and Wentworth could easily have been carried by the C.C.F. The men as individuals dare not face up to these leaders (bosses) as reprisals come thick and fast but when it comes to a secret ballot vote such as the election yesterday at least half of them vote against the C.C.F.
> There should be a secret ballot vote conducted by government before any men can be ordered out on strike. The C.I.O. chiefs and the C.C.F. members would fight it but they preach democracy while practising something as near to naziism as it can be.

That letter is written by Mr. Milton N. Campbell who was a member of the old Progressive ginger group in the house for at least ten years, and later a member of the tariff board.

In addition it is not in the best interests of labour relations to transform the Canada labour relations board into a judicial body from which no appeal would lie. It is not in keeping with the best traditions of a democratic country to deprive individuals of the right of access to the courts in matters where penalties may be assessed against them. By removing the necessity for obtaining leave to prosecute from the minister the proposed amendment would tend to make the Canada labour relations board into a grievance committee for either employers or trade unions. The act has only been on the statute books since September, 1948. Nothing that has transpired since would indicate that the present provisions are not wholly effective for their purpose.

As I pointed out, in Saskatchewan we have been given certain labour legislation. A board has been appointed there; and the head of that board happens to be vice-president of the C.C.F. party. If you want to see what this board does on occasion, without requiring permission from the minister, without knowing anything about the laws of evidence or about sizing up witnesses or anything but C.C.F. politics, look at the words of the chief justice of Saskatchewan in re The Trade Union Act 1944, as reported in volume 2 of the Western Weekly Reports of 1949. The judgment of the court, delivered by the chief justice, who has been there many years, contains these words:

> I cannot bring myself to believe that this case is representative of the board's actions in general. If it is then I would say that the board's usefulness is at an end. Businessmen and employees alike will shudder at the thought of bringing their disputes before the board for settlement.
> The board, in some respects, is like the umpire in a baseball game. They both must be strictly impartial. The players and the fans will allow for an occasional mistake on the umpire's part but if the mistakes are flagrant and are constantly to the advantage of one side his usefulness is gone; the game breaks up in confusion and all good sportsmen leave the field in disgust. . . . .

That is the judgment of the chief justice of the court of king's bench, referring to the vice-president of the C.C.F. party, who was chairman of the board in our province. Regardless of the rights of labour or of any particular labour unions, there is another group of people who must be kept in mind in all matters of labour legislation. I refer to those people in Canada who belong to no unions at all. These include the great body of our farmers and the white collar workers to whom we often refer. They do not belong to unions; they are not part of this spiral which is forcing up wages and getting concessions for themselves. They must take what they get, and they need some protection also.

I have heard it said that a strike is healthy, and so on, but the average farmer in my constituency does not like strikes. The average man on the street who must pay more if strikes occur does not like them either. We in this country have been very fortunate in the relations that have been maintained between the labour department and all sections of labour in Canada. We must not put class against class, as the C.C.F. have been doing for the last eight years. They have done nothing but prophesy blue ruin, unemployment, and everything going to the bow-wows. If we have given any help to Russia and the communists it has been through their line of propaganda. That is what we have had in Canada. Thank goodness we have a labour minister who has been a union man himself and understands both the public and the various labour organizations. Because of his broadmindedness we have advanced labour legislation in this country.

Let us give that legislation a fair chance. Let us not try through that legislation to favour one party for political reasons. Don't keep bringing into this house silly amendments that would not work out any better than the labour laws in Saskatchewan are working at the present time. We are going to have another strike there this week in connection with the electric light plants, where there never was a strike before we had a C.C.F. government. I am opposed to any change in our labour law at the present time. I think we should be thankful for what has been done not only by the minister but by the experienced men in his department, both during and since the war, to maintain employment. As I say, the situation out west has improved tremendously, as it will improve all over Canada so long as these calamity howlers do not bring into this house half-baked legislation that means nothing and that no one in Canada wants.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Mitchell: If the hon. member is going to close the debate—

Mr. Gillis: The Minister of Labour is going to talk it out.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not want to talk anything out.

Mr. Gillis: It is five minutes to nine. Let us vote on it.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend spoke for quite a while, and I think I should be permitted to say a few words. I want to say very frankly that fundamentally I am opposed to this legislation. That is a speech in a sentence. I do not believe in amendments to acts of parliament based upon hypothetical cases. If my hon. friend can show me one federal case—

Mr. Gillis: Do you want me to do it?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: Give me one minute and I will give you a case.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Gillis: The minister asked for one example, and I can give it to him in one minute. That is the Hull Transportation Company case. They tested this legislation, and you know the results.

Mr. Mitchell: Oh, all right; I know all about the Hull Transportation case.

Mr. Gillis: That is one case. I can give you one or two more if you like.

Mr. Mitchell: They had their day in court.

Mr. Gillis: Before a magistrate who did not know there was such a thing as a labour code.

Mr. Mitchell: It is very easy to criticize the courts. The only reason my hon. friend is sitting in this House of Commons—he was not here the other evening when I explained it—is because of the rule of law and habeas corpus.

Mr. Knowles: Habeas corpus again.

Mr. Mitchell: Yes, and I told my hon. friend all about that the other evening. You cannot have your cake and eat it. You must have either a judicial board or a representative board; it is as simple as that. I say frankly and sincerely that I do not believe we should amend a law because of a hypothetical case.

Mr. Gillis: It is not a hypothetical case; it is a concrete example.

Mr. Mitchell: That is a matter of opinion, and you are only here as a matter of opinion.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if neither of these hon. gentlemen knows who has the floor I would like a shot at it.

Some hon. Members: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid I must deprive all hon. members of the opportunity of speaking on this bill this evening, because it is now nine o'clock.

Mr. Mitchell: Then I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hour reserved for public and private bills having expired, the house will now resume the business under consideration at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

SENATE REFORM

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on the amendment moved this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) with regard to the question of Senate reform. I do not think any serious person, certainly no serious person interested in the institutions of our country, can be happy when he surveys the position of the Senate at the present time. Even those of us on the outside, who do not participate in its proceedings and have no responsibility for it, cannot help but feel that it is a sad and indeed serious thing that an institution which has played a worthy part in the past and which in my opinion has an opportunity of playing a worthy part in the future should be allowed to languish in the position in which the Senate finds itself at the present time.

It is not as though a second chamber were a new idea that had not been tested before. We all know that second chambers have been employed by practically all serious, civilized nations in their forms of government. There may have been some changes during the war, but immediately before the war it could be said that few countries, and no major countries, were without a second chamber.

I am not going to pursue that further than to say that I think every serious person will wish, not that the Senate should be abolished but that it should be improved. Of course, Senate reform has become a kind of joke in this country because it has been talked about so long and nothing has been done about it. It has become like the weather. I want to recall to hon. members the fact that for thirty years—yes, thirty years—the matter has been commonly talked about. I go back to an incident in this house many years ago; it is not thirty years ago, but it is some twenty-six or twenty-seven years ago. I quote from Hansard of 1926-27, page 355, when the famous pledge with which nearly all members are familiar was disclosed or at any rate confirmed by the former prime minister in this house, in answer to a question by Mr. Evans. Mr. Evans asked this question:

1. What is the form or wording of the pledge, if any, taken from those who have been appointed senators during the last two years with a view to Senate reform?

2. How many have been thus pledged?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Here is Mr. King's answer:

1. An assurance of support of such measure of Senate reform, in conformity with the requirements of the constitution, as may be introduced by the Liberal administration.

That is Mr. King's answer, that the formal wording of the pledge was an assurance of support. And his answer to the question, how many, is this:

2. This assurance has been given by all who have accepted appointments to the Senate within the time mentioned.

Then two years ago the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre—

Mr. Knowles: North Centre.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked again as to these pledges; and again the then prime minister, Mr. King, replied. He said as reported at page 854 of Hansard of 1948:

There was nothing in the nature of a written pledge. There was no pledge made to the government, as a government. It was an undertaking that was given to myself, as the one who is responsible for nominating members to the Senate. How many there were from whom I received that assurance, I cannot say at the present time. Nor am I in a position to say just when I ceased to raise that question. It did not become as important later on when we had a majority in the senate—

There a delightful confession that you should all observe. In other words, Mr. King says in effect that he lost interest in it as soon as there was a majority in the Senate.

It did not become as important later on when we had a majority in the Senate, and were in a position to see that permanent legislation originating in this house was not defeated because of action on the part of a hostile opposition in the upper chamber.

I shall have occasion to show in a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, that there were different views held of the Senate—much better and higher views, in my opinion—and they were held by people, I am glad to say, in both of the old parties.

I call the attention of the house to this pledge situation. I do not know whether we should ask an accounting from these senators, who were appointed many years ago with the idea of Senate reform very much in their minds perhaps, and certainly in the prime minister's mind. I do not know whether to picture them as straining at the leash in all these years in order to have Senate reform effectuated. I do not know whether they were held back by the then prime minister or whether the reverse was the case; but at any rate we all know that during all these years nothing has been done except the uttering of a lot of brave words.

Then we come to the amendment this afternoon, and I should like to refer to what was said by the leader of the C.C.F. party. He said, and I think very truly, that this is a proposal we might well have expected to receive from the government. Certainly after all these years we might have expected to receive it. We did not, however, receive it from the government. What is worse than that, apparently not only was it not to be done by the government but it was not to be done by anybody else because apparently in this house only the government can initiate things. When this moderate resolution was initiated this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) took the view that nothing should be suggested from this side of the house because he said that by so doing the leader of the opposition was inviting the house to defeat the government, to which the leader of the opposition quite properly replied that he was doing nothing of the kind, and that we should be only too delighted if the government saw fit to accept this motion and to vote for it.

I should be fair to the Prime Minister, or try to be. The other afternoon I made this same complaint that nothing could be accepted from this side of the house—it was in discussing a rather minor measure—and I must say that the Prime Minister behaved handsomely. He took me up on it. He said no, that was not the case; and in fact my amendment was accepted. It was a rather small matter, and it seems to me perfectly clear now that that was just a momentary relaxation of the rule that nothing at all must come from this side of the house, that nothing must originate except on the other side, and anything from here must be promptly voted down.

I must say that I think the Prime Minister enjoys greatly having a large majority, and I have no doubt that we all would. It is pleasant to see him look around the house and survey the serried ranks; and this afternoon he issued a kind of trumpet call at the end of his speech, saying that he hoped all those who supported him would vote with him. Really, that seemed to me to be a pure waste of words because there is little indication that there will ever be any doubt on that question.

But the Prime Minister gave another reason for refusing to accept this amendment this afternoon; and that reason was, if I may say so with proper deference to the Prime Minister, a most preposterous reason. As to accepting this amendment which suggests that the question of Senate reform might be presented to the government for discussion at the forthcoming dominion-provincial constitutional conference, the Prime Minister took an extremely high line and said that to do that would be to break faith with the provinces. I was a little bit startled when he used the words "break faith" because the Prime Minister on the whole uses words accurately, and breaking faith is not a charge that one likes to level hastily and carelessly at anybody. As I say, I was startled when I read the moderate wording of this resolution, but I was much more than startled—I was completely flabbergasted—when I examined the documents and found out that the Prime Minister was wholly and absolutely wrong in his suggestion, and that it was far from being a matter of breaking of faith. Incidentally I should say that I think the Prime Minister realized later on that to say it was a matter of breaking faith was going a bit far and he used different language; he said something to the effect that it would not be quite within the spirit of the negotiations which had taken place between the dominion and the provinces.

Let us have a look at that. Let me first of all read a short extract from an article written some little time since, but since last January, by Senator Lambert, which article begins with these words:

> During the dominion-provincial constitutional conference held in Ottawa last January, particular reference was made to the Senate by Hon. Angus L. Macdonald of Nova Scotia.
>
> He said that the sections in the B.N.A. Act dealing with the Senate were "of importance to the provinces no less than to the dominion." He contended that before any change in those sections could be effected, the consent of seven provinces out of ten would be essential to any proposed amendments by the dominion.

And I read on:

> The agenda for the meeting of the official representatives of the dominion and the provinces next autumn to discuss further ways and means of amending the B.N.A. Act should certainly contain an item relating to Senate reform.

And reading further on, he says:

> That is why the recent remarks of Hon. Wishart Robertson, the government leader in the Senate... have been attracting some attention throughout the country.

And again he says:

> In his reply now recorded in Hansard, and widely reported at the time in the Canadian press, Senator Robertson said that he was not interested so much in the headlines of the newspapers as he was in the effective performance of the duties of the Senate.

But do not let me rely wholly on an article written by Senator Lambert, although he is a responsible person and, I understand, is not many miles removed from the confidence of the Liberal high command. Let me read an extract from a speech made by Mr. St. Laurent himself last January at the conference, from which I read briefly as follows.

Senate Reform

In answer to a question by Mr. Macdonald of Nova Scotia, at page 76 he is reported as follows:

> The field really narrows down to these matters which affect the set-up of the central authority.

Then I skip a little bit and go on:

> For instance, those which refer to the Senate and to the representation in the House of Commons are, I think, a part of the Canadian constitution.

And more clearly, he says at page 94:

> Mr. St. Laurent: Would it be fair to take it, as a result of our deliberations, that there is no objection raised to entrenching . . .

Then I skip through three or four lines and he says:

> . . . a provision that the representation of the people of a province in the House of Commons would not fall below its representation in the Senate.

In other words, the question of Senate reform was discussed then; and to suggest that that is in some way improper is, I think, so far from the mark that I am amazed at the Prime Minister for ever slipping into such an error.

I will now take just a moment or two to refer to a conception of the duties of the Senate and to the usefulness and possibilities of the Senate which were held in that chamber not so very many years ago, and expressed first of all by Senator Raoul Dandurand who was at one time leader of the Senate in the 1920's, and also some remarks of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen who was leader of the Senate from 1930 to 1935.

I would ask hon. members first of all to note the unanimity of opinion between these two men as to the duties, responsibilities and possibilities of the Senate. Second, I would ask them to note the high and useful conception which they had of the position of the Senate; and further, before I sit down I want to point out that that is not merely an imaginary picture of what should be, but a picture of what has been when the Senate has been properly conducted.

First of all, I shall read from an article in the Queen's university Quarterly. That is a publication which should be much more widely read than it is. Perhaps I may take advantage of this occasion to put in a plug for it. I am reading from page 21 of the issue of the spring of 1950:

> In 1922, soon after becoming government leader of the Senate, the late Senator Raoul Dandurand addressed his colleagues on the manner in which, he thought, the Senate should function. Analysing the character and work of the Senate he called for a return to the position of the first sessions of that body when Senators acted like "independent judges". He added, "For my part, I refuse to lead a ministerial party in this chamber; I claim no followers; I shun party discipline and the party whip." Later in his career, after the Conservative party victory in 1930, he became leader of the opposition in the Senate. On this occasion he recurred to his statement of 1922 and deprecated the reference to himself by any such title as "leader of the opposition", with its implication of partisanship.

The article goes on:

> Similar views have been expressed from time to time by other distinguished Senators. Senator Arthur Meighen, for years the Conservative party leader in the Senate, contributed a brilliant article to Queen's Quarterly in the summer of 1937. In it he emphasized the unique position of the Senate in the Canadian governmental scheme, and declared that the Senate's fundamental basis was that of representing territory as "against arbitrary action of a bare majority" possible in the House of Commons. He pointed out the Senate's supreme obligation to protect racial, political and economic minorities. Like Dandurand, he asserted that the forms of partisanship should be submerged.

And so on. Before I take my seat, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read another extract from the article by Mr. Meighen, because I suggest again that it puts before us in the clearest language the usefulness, the objective which should be before the Senate, and which distinguishes it sharply from this house. He said:

> The Senate is worthless if it becomes merely another Commons divided upon party lines and indulging in party debates such as are familiar in the lower chamber session after session. If the Senate ever permits itself to fulfil that function and that alone in the scheme of confederation, then the sooner it is abolished the better. This practice is not to be deprecated in the House of Commons. If we are going to have a democracy, the practice must continue. There have to be parties and party manoeuvres; there have to be conflicts and controversies innumerable in variety and wearisome in length.

Mr. Meighen could speak with some experience about that. I continue:

> The great scheme of bringing sections together, letting each see the viewpoint of the other, has to be worked out in the representative chamber. Sometimes we are too impatient and critical of governments in allowing what seems inordinate time for discussion of public business. That discussion is good, but it is not the function of the Senate. Members of the second chamber must get away, lift their minds far from those hard-drawn lines of party, or they cannot serve their country. They have to make up their minds to give every government fair play and not to stand in the way of legislation unless they are convinced it must be defeated on its merits, and that the consequences of failure to defeat it would be serious; nor to stand stubbornly in the path of any government proposal unless it is brought there in their judgment to serve the ends of party by largess in this or some other part of the dominion rather than the true interests of the nation.

I have no intention of detaining the house longer. I have put before the house these opinions expressed by men who served their country well. Before I take my seat I should like to remind the house—and I hope I do not say this in any partisan sense because it was possible only because both sides worked at it—of the relationship between this chamber and the Senate in the years 1930 to 1935. Anyone who takes the trouble to look into the matter will find that first of all the Senate was left absolutely free by the then prime minister, Mr. Bennett. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the reputation of that great man will live when the reputation of many of the detractors who are so fond of picking out little things will not even be a memory of a memory. But anyone who will take the trouble to find out what went on in the Senate between 1930 and 1935 will be convinced that I am right. That was not wholly due to Lord Bennett and Mr. Meighen. It was partly because Senator Dandurand took the same view as I have read here tonight. It was partly also because of course there was much more of equality in numbers in the Senate at that time.

To me there is nothing sadder than to see this body of able men—and there are many able men in the Senate—reduced to the point where in public estimation its reputation I suppose was never so low. That seems to me to be a crying shame. I was glad to hear the leader of the C.C.F. party refer to the obligation of the government. It seems to me a shame that this thing is to be stood over again. It is being stood over for reasons that in my opinion are utterly insubstantial, and the opportunity of doing something to rescue this great institution, before it falls too low, before public opinion reaches the point where it demands that it be done away with to the great injury of us all, may be lost.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support the principle of the amendment moved this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). There are some points of detail in connection with this motion to which I might take exception, but I agree with its spirit and principle, and if it comes to a vote, I shall vote for it.

One of the reasons that I support this motion is that I feel a committee which had an opportunity to discuss the place of the Senate in our parliamentary set-up in this latter part of the twentieth century would have a chance to consider the desirability of abolishing the Senate altogether. In my view that is the most desirable and most useful means of reform, and I believe it to be in keeping with the thinking and the wishes of the Canadian people—certainly where I come from.

I am going to come back in a few moments to my argument that the Senate should be abolished, but before I do there are two things that I want to say. First I want to say this very clearly. In the minds of all of us, I am sure, there is a clear-cut distinction between the men and women who occupy places in the Senate and the Senate as an institution. As a matter of fact I feel sorry for the hon. gentlemen and ladies in the other place, that they have to take the kind of criticism that is offered; I hope they realize that it is criticism of the institution and not of themselves as individuals. I was counting up some days ago, and I believe there are about eighteen members in the Senate at the present time who were members of the House of Commons when I first came here eight years ago. In other words they are persons whom I got to know fairly well, and for whom I have a high regard. The same is true for others who were there before I came here and whom I have met in other ways.

So I wish to make it clear that, for my part—and I am sure all hon. members feel this way—when I criticize the Senate as an institution and when I voice feelings of disrespect and even ridicule felt by people in Canada, it casts no reflection upon the individuals of the Senate themselves.

Another thing I wish to do just now is to deal with two of the points at any rate—there might have been a third, but I did not make a note of it—raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon in his objection to this amendment. In the first place he objected to it on the ground that it was a gilded pill. His argument was that no matter how one might dress it up, an amendment to a motion to go into committee of supply was a motion of non-confidence, which had as its purpose—perhaps, he said, its fundamental purpose—the defeat of the government.

I wish to remind the Prime Minister that at least once within the memories of many of us in the house we had an occasion when an amendment to a motion to go into supply was carried by the house, the carrying of which did not involve the defeat of the government. That happened on August 27, 1948, in connection with an amendment related to the subsidy on milk. Hon. members from all sides of the house spoke in support of the amendment, whereupon the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) rose in his place and said that, so far as the government was concerned, they were willing that a free vote be taken. After that a vote was taken and the amendment carried; but the Minister of Trade and Commerce then got to his feet and, relying upon citation 489 in Beauchesne's second edition, again moved that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply.

The whole procedure was perfectly in order. The life of the government was not at stake at all. On the other hand the house did express itself with regard to a principle. The same can happen with respect to this motion today. All the government needs to do is to say that this is a principle concerning which they would like to have an expression of the views of the house. The motion could carry and then a minister could rise immediately and, relying on the citation to which I have referred, could move again that we go into committee of supply.

I think that precedent must not be forgotten, because it is a very clear one. In view of the fact that this is one of the very few ways in which the opposition can call upon the house to vote in respect of ideas or principles which we feel should be considered, I think the government should refrain from this constant referring to it as a case of non-confidence, and simply calling upon its supporters to vote it down on that basis, without any consideration of the merits of the proposal.

The other argument the Prime Minister advanced this afternoon was that to pass a motion such as this to set up a committee to discuss Senate reform, before the dominion-provincial conference holds its further meetings, would be a case of breaking faith with the provincial governments. I wish to point out first of all that the Prime Minister himself in reading from the relevant documents this afternoon indicated that what that conference is dealing with is methods of amending the constitution, not with subject matter. This has nothing to do with the methods of amending the constitution. Rather, this is a subject matter which some of us in the house feel should be considered.

May I also point out to the Prime Minister that no less a person than the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) on March 10 of this year took the very opposite position to that taken this afternoon by the Prime Minister. That was the occasion when the Minister of National Health and Welfare was asking the house to set up a committee on old age security, upon which occasion he said, as reported at page 643 of Hansard:

> As we approach these discussions with the provinces, it will be helpful for us to have the considered views of all the parties in this house, of organized labour, of industry, of representative social welfare organizations, and of other interested groups in our population, who have given study through the years to the important question of old age security. I believe that in the formulation of a policy nothing could be more desirable before we finally meet the provinces, than to take the organized labour groups of this country into our confidence through this committee, as well as the farmers and other organizations.
> I think that attitude and that approach will commend itself to all hon. members.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Martin: Surely there is a difference in the kind of conference to which I was there directing attention, and the kind of conference to which the Prime Minister was referring. The conference to which he referred is one in which constitutional questions are involved. That to which I referred was a question involving financial considerations in which the jurisdictions of both federal and provincial governments were involved. I submit that, upon reconsideration, my hon. friend will realize that there is no analogy between the two situations at all.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder who is trying to do the gilding now. After all, the situations are exactly analogous in this respect, that in both cases we have matters of joint concern to the dominion and the provinces. In the one case the Minister of National Health and Welfare says, "Before we meet the provinces it would be a good idea to have a committee so that the government will know the views of parliament." Meantime provincial governments are no doubt getting the views of their legislatures on the question.

Similarly, in respect of ways of amending the constitution, I can imagine that many provincial governments are getting the views of their provincial legislatures on these constitutional matters before they meet the dominion government in a further session of the dominion-provincial conference.

I think that after all the government has some responsibility to parliament. It should know what parliament thinks about issues of this kind before it meets the provinces, just as the Minister of National Health and Welfare put it in connection with old age security. And even if the minister had not laid down the principle as well as he did, I suggest the idea would commend itself to hon. members that there is merit in the federal government getting the views of parliament before it meets the provinces, rather than waiting until after the die has been cast.

Mr. Martin: I would remind the hon. member of the inconsistency of the position he now takes. On that occasion he opposed the setting up of a committee, but now he is in favour of setting one up.

Mr. Knowles: I opposed the setting up of a committee, but I did not oppose parliament's discussing and taking action on the question of old age security; in fact I urged that that be done without the delay involved in holding sessions of a committee. On the other hand, what the Prime Minister is trying to do now is to prevent parliament's discussing, in whatever way it may choose, this question of Senate reform, on the ground that that would be breaking faith with the provinces. I suggest the Minister of National Health and Welfare should have made his interjections when the Prime Minister was speaking, and should have set him on the right track.

To get around to the substance of the amendment by the leader of the opposition, I said at the outset that I believe the reform of the Senate most needed is its abolition altogether. I feel that the idea of a second chamber came out of a period in the forward development of the democratic idea, when people believed in democracy and believed in their elected representatives speaking for them, but were not quite sure and were not quite prepared to go all the way.

So, carrying over the idea that was in existence in the United Kingdom with respect to a House of Lords, which was made up of persons not elected by the people, the fathers of confederation agreed to have its counterpart here in Canada, namely, the Senate, which would be appointed rather than elected by the people.

In my view our thinking as to the validity of the democratic way has moved on considerably since 1867, and it is time now that the whole of our parliamentary set-up was on an elected basis, so that everyone in parliament would be directly responsible to the people.

That may suggest to some that the thing to do with the Senate is simply to put it on an elected rather than an appointed basis. If you do that, what you have done is to provide, shall I say, two Houses of Commons to discuss the same legislation. It seems to me that you would have a duplication of effort that would be completely unnecessary. I want to say again that so far as I am concerned anything that I say casts no reflection on the persons in the Senate. I do not even deny the fact that many of them deserve something from this country for the services they have rendered in public life. I would say that many of them probably deserve a pension of some kind for the services they have rendered in various ways, but that has nothing to do with the institution in which they are now functioning.

It is sometimes argued that it is desirable to have a second house to provide a check on hasty legislation passed in the one house. Experience has shown clearly that not since the early twenties has there been any tendency at all on the part of the other place to impose any check on the House of Commons. They are not performing that function at all. As a matter of fact things in this parliament have got to the place where what we are concerned about is not this House of Commons being checked by the Senate but the government being responsible to this House of Commons. That is the checking job that is on our hands in this generation, maintaining the concept of responsible government.

We are getting to the place where the government thinks that once it is elected at the polls it has a free hand to carry on as it wishes until the next election. It has been said a number of times on the floor of this house that the government is responsible directly to the people. Actually the government is responsible to parliament, and primarily responsible to that section of parliament elected by the people. That is the job we should be applying ourselves to. Any notion that the Senate provides any check has been ruled out, and our job is to make sure that we in this House of Commons provide the necessary check on the government, and that is a task for members of all parties in this house.

Any suggestion that the Senate provides protection for minorities, racial, religious, provincial or regional, is gone completely when the Senate is made up of an overwhelming majority on one political side as is the case at the present time. The best way to get a voice to speak for any particular group that feels it is a minority, that feels that its voice should be heard, is to have that voice raised in this House of Commons where members know they have the authority of being elected and can therefore speak more freely and more forcibly than is the case in the other place. I know that some of those hon. gentlemen over there whom we know and to whom we sometimes talk feel that way about it; they know that they have no authority to speak on behalf of the people such as we have simply because they have not been elected.

It seems to me that these things should be very thoroughly considered. I have made my position clear, that I think that times have changed and the point has been reached where we no longer need a second chamber. That is one of the things that a committee of this kind could discuss, namely the abolition of the Senate altogether. If that committee did not agree with me and did not go all the way I would go, a discussion of these matters would produce at least some measure of reform. It is clear from the experience that all of us have had in this House of Commons that it is difficult for any member of the opposition, indeed for any private member on either side of the house, to introduce any proposition substantive in character and get it put through this House of Commons. The best he can do is to get it considered by a committee.

If anyone moved a motion for a specific brand of Senate reform, if anyone moved a motion for the abolition of the Senate, it would stand no chance of being passed. Government members would get up and say that we could not discuss such a proposition on the spur of the moment because it was the sort of thing that should be considered in committee. Here is a chance to refer this whole question, and an important one it is, to a committee to have it gone into thoroughly.

I was interested in some of the quotations that were read during the debate this afternoon by those who spoke and again this evening by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), indicating the way in which this whole question has been tossed about across the years. One of the reasons why the Senate is the butt of so much critical comment is that Senate reform has been toyed with the way it is. It is now nearly thirty years since Mr. King was a young crusader for Senate reform, both in this house and out on the hustings. I have in my hand Hansard of July 19, 1924, where Mr. King is reported on page 4872 as having said:

> Mr. Speaker, having in mind the action of the second chamber with respect to the measure which has just been amended and also the fate of a number of bills adopted by the Commons and defeated in the Senate, I think hon. members will agree with me that the time has come when the Commons in Canada should seek to gain rights and privileges with respect to legislation originating in this chamber similar to those which have been obtained by the House of Commons in the parliament at Westminster. I may say that the government had under consideration, prior to the opening of this session, legislation with this end in view, but we were anxious the public should feel fully convinced of the necessity before pressing it on the attention of parliament. Hon. members will recall that at the close of the last session, and at the close of the preceding session, bills which were passed by this house and which touched matters that are very vital to the electorate failed of enactment owing to the action of the Senate. This year we have instances of bills that have passed this house in three separate sessions of parliament, and which have been rejected each time by the second chamber. I think we owe it to the people of our country with respect to laws demanded by the electorate to see to the supremacy in parliament of the elective chamber. I desire to assure the house that when parliament re-assembles steps will be taken by the government to obtain, if possible, means whereby bills may be enacted by and with the advice and consent of the House of Commons under conditions similar in principle to those which have been sanctioned for the parliament of the United Kingdom.

No one would seek to suggest what was in Mr. King's mind, but I imagine that he had in mind that at least we could get away from the situation where the Senate has a permanent veto which it can exercise year in and year out, ad infinitum, over legislation of the House of Commons, and get to the position they had at Westminster where the House of Lords could do it only so many times—the number having been reduced from time to time since then. But even that measure of reform, if that is what Mr. King had in mind away back in the early twenties, is still not implemented in this country.

The hon. member for Greenwood had something to say about the pledges that were taken by Mr. King from those that he put into the Senate back in those years. I should like to quote what I think is an interesting excerpt from Hansard of January 12, 1926, page 105. The speaker on that occasion was Mr. C. W. Bell, who was listed as the member for West Hamilton. He said:

> Not only the members of this house but the country will remember that the Prime Minister—

The reference there was to Mr. King.

> —in the last three and a half years has always declared his intention of effecting great reforms for the purpose of remedying the various ills from which this dominion has been suffering. But he has consistently given, as two great obstacles to this objective, the obstruction of the Senate and the influence of the Progressive party.

The party which he later absorbed.

> He made the statement from many a platform that upon his return to parliament one of the first things he would undertake would be Senate reform of such character that the upper house would be no longer in a position to render legislation futile. And speaking in London—

That was at London, Ontario, on October 16, 1925.

> —on October 16 last he made a statement which, if it is not known to every member of the house and to every man and woman in the country, ought certainly to be very well known. In the hockey arena in that city on the date I mentioned he said:
> "Only a few days ago a number of Senators were appointed. Every one has given me his pledged word he will be prepared, once a measure passes the Commons, to give it his support. Subsequent Senators will be appointed with that understanding, and as Providence takes away a few of the older members, you will have a Senate pledged to bring about the reforms for which the administration stands."

Well, Providence has done its part since that date but the Liberal party has not kept pace. A little later the questions, to which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) referred, were asked. I would ask the indulgence of the house to refer to them again. These were questions by Mr. Evans and they appear in Hansard for February 16, 1927, at page 355. Let me read them:

> Mr. Evans: 1. What is the form or wording of the pledge, if any, taken from those who have been appointed senators during the last two years with a view to Senate reform?
> 2. How many have been thus pledged?
>
> Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King: 1. An assurance of support of such measure of Senate reform, in conformity with the requirements of the constitution, as may be introduced by the Liberal administration.
> 2. This assurance has been given by all who have accepted appointment to the Senate within the time mentioned.

As the hon. member for Greenwood indicated, in 1948, I placed on the order paper questions similar to those asked by Mr. Evans away back in 1927, but I was unable to get as specific an answer as the then prime minister, Mr. King, had given on that occasion. He did indicate that he recalled having obtained pledges of Senate reform in those years from every member he appointed but he could not quite remember just when he discontinued the practice.

So far as Mr. King is concerned, it is pretty clear that his crusading spirit for Senate reform vanished as the number of Liberals in the Senate increased. I hope that the overpowering number of Liberals that the present government has in the other place will not prevent the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) from taking up the crusade for at least a measure of Senate reform if he cannot go all the way with me for its abolition. Here is another example of how this matter has been toyed with from time to time. On June 4, 1926, as found in Hansard of that year at page 4030, there appears this excerpt:

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Arthur Meighen (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if there is to be any action taken this session with respect to Senate reform? If not, when is the next move to be made in this direction and of what character?

Mr. Jacobs: At the next sitting of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): I might say to my right hon. friend that the government would not like to prolong the session unduly in introducing the subject of Senate reform at this stage. My right hon. friend may be sure it will come up in due course.

In June, 1926, Mr. King did not want to prolong the session unduly to deal with Senate reform. It was to be dealt with in due course. Mr. King's period as prime minister has gone and Senate reform still remains to be carried through. The rest of the quotation is as follows:

Mr. Meighen: I should like to know further, if it is the intention of the government to call a provincial conference on the subject this summer.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I will not say just when but no doubt a conference will be held.

Mr. Meighen: Before another session?

Mr. Mackenzie King: I would not say as to that.

Any who were here in the days of Mr. King will recognize the authenticity of the remarks that I have quoted. My whole point in reading these few excerpts is to indicate the way in which the question of Senate reform has been toyed with down through the years. I think as a matter of fact that members of the Senate could get up from time to time—in that other place—on a question of privilege and complain about the way in which this whole question has been played with. They have it coming to them that the matter be taken seriously, and even though I may go further than the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has indicated in his amendment, I certainly think that the house should go at least that far, should appoint this committee and have the matter investigated. I think we owe it to ourselves, to the Canadian people, and as I have already said, to the senators themselves.

Let me conclude by reading one other quotation. When I have read it I think there will be really nothing more to say. It is taken from Hansard of January 22, 1935, at page 102. I will indicate later who the speaker was. I would rather read the quotation first. It reads:

I believe it was the leader of the opposition who raised the discussion concerning the Senate. I am making reference to all these points because I believe one would do better to put his finger on the spot where the sand may be put into the machinery.

I hear someone saying that he already knows who it is.

The right hon. gentleman has said that we have a Tory Senate. If I gather anything from the temper of the Canadian people, and if it is the policy of the Senate to put sand into the machinery, then we will have to reform the Senate. The time has long since passed when the Senate should be used as unemployment insurance for many of those in political life.

The speaker on that occasion has had something to do with unemployment insurance since then, for he was none other than the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I suggest that we may not always agree with him now in some of the things he says, but certainly the statement that he made over in this corner of the house some fifteen years ago is very much to the point. If I may say so again, Mr. Speaker, I think it is unfair to the ladies and gentlemen in that other place as persons, that cracks like these can be made about them, that the Senate can be referred to as a scheme of unemployment insurance for some of those in political life. People who have served this country in public life for many years have some consideration coming to them, and I would say not just in the form of material assistance or pensions. They have coming to them the right to continue to serve the country in useful positions but let us not do the derogatory thing we are doing to them at the present time by simply putting them into an institution for which the country has, as the hon. member for Greenwood said, perhaps less respect now than has ever been the case.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say again that for my part I think the time has come in the development of our democratic institutions when there should be no portion of parliament that is not responsible to the electorate directly. Therefore I think we do not need the Senate at all. It should be abolished. But surely we cannot do less than to take the course that has been suggested by the leader of the opposition in his amendment, pass it, have this committee set up and get to work discussing this important question, and not leave it for another twenty-five or thirty years as has been the case already. As I sit down I remind the government that to pass the amendment does not defeat the government; that will come in due course. It would mean the setting up of the proposed committee but it would also mean, on the basis of citation 489, that the government could immediately move that we go again into committee of supply.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, an institution should continue to exist as long as it serves a useful purpose. It may be that some hon. members, like the one who has just resumed his seat, would be in favour of abolishing the Senate sooner or later, but they have not dared to say so openly. Ever since I became a member I have noticed that the matter of Senate reform has been mentioned quite often in debates in this chamber as well as outside the house. Some of those debates have shed some degree of light on this question which always attracts considerable attention.

In rising to take part in this debate, I have no intention of striking a fatal blow to the motion moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). However, as regards the upper house, where French-speaking members have so often distinguished themselves, I feel duty bound if not to rise to its defence at least to bring forth some arguments in favour of its existence, of its survival.

Since I both think and act democratically, I believe that the Senate, though its members, unlike those of the House of Commons, do not have to stand for election, nevertheless keeps an open, attentive and practised eye on the various problems considered in this house. Even though some senators are no longer young, we must recognize that they have indeed acquired some experience. That, in my opinion, counts for a great deal in a man's life. May I refer to a few words spoken by a great American industrialist, Henry Ford, who said something to this effect:

> The best salary I have ever received is experience and I believe it is the most commendable thing in the world. It is something no one can take away from me.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that when a member has spent fifteen or twenty years in this house as democratic representative of a constituency of his province, of his country, he has acquired some experience, a way of seeing things. He can also much better understand the economic, political, social and even religious problems which are fairly often brought to our attention. Too often, we hear the time-worn argument that the Senate is a body made up of people with one foot in the grave. Even if some senators are elderly, they nevertheless retain that alertness of mind that is found in younger persons. Besides, we must remember that certain members of the upper house, such as Senators Dandurand, Meighen and Beland, who had reached an advanced age, have made a very useful and commendable contribution not only to the Canadian nation but to the House of Commons.

If hon. members made it a point of finding out what goes on in the other place, they would see that during every session a great many issues are discussed in the various Senate committees, which proves the great usefulness of that hon. chamber and serves to justify its existence. The discussions that take place in those committees are important and useful enough to establish the necessity of the Senate's existence, even if its members are not elected.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying a moment ago, a member of parliament who, for fifteen or twenty years has been a representative of the people, acquires a certain experience. I do not intend to pose as the Senate's defender, but if I put forward my views concerning it, it is not because I feel myself growing old, since after twenty-three years I am still full of the will and desire to fight. I believe that very often derogatory remarks are made concerning the other place. This subject should be approached, however, by really facing up to the problem.

There is no doubt that the point at issue is whether the Senate is useful and whether there is any justification for its existence. To prove it, we have but to listen to the proceedings of a committee of the other place on the rights and privileges of the human being. We would then see how exhaustively a matter which will eventually be submitted to this house is being discussed.

As far as that question of human rights is concerned—and it has been discussed even in the United Nations—I have followed with much interest and attention the work of the Senate committee. We can, I believe, hope that these deliberations will be of some use to us and that we will eventually benefit from them.

Besides, in every human being there is a phenomenon of a psychological nature that makes him perfectible. As the Senate is itself made up of human beings, it is also perfectible, and even though some of its members are old, they are not less intelligent for it. If the situation need be improved in so far as the Senate is concerned, I believe that this house should undertake a more thorough discussion of this question.

The motion of the hon. leader of the opposition, in the terms in which it has been actually moved, might have the merit of initiating such discussion, but it should not be carried by this house. I go on record as opposing the resolution, not only to answer the bid of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who has urged us to oppose it, but also as a member of the Liberal party, which leaves us with our freedom of action and allows us to express our mind openly. I am of opinion that the motion is a little too premature and should be given the six months' hoist. We must all be confident that the Senate will continue to fulfil its basic function and prove its usefulness.

I have here a letter signed by Mr. Paul de Martigny, published in La Patrie. It concerns the Senate indirectly. It is about people who are pensioned off. Many members and many Canadian taxpayers want an age limit for senators. Let them listen carefully to what I am about to read and they will see that such a request is interesting for those who are not so old, but not such a good thing for those who have reached a certain age. I quote:

> A man who is being retired is not very cheerful the day he bids his fellow workers farewell. Why? If you want to know, read what someone wrote to me.
> Retirement means the end of the struggle for a living and brings the assurance that one will not be left in need. That is much better than being let out on the street. It also means, however, that one is retired from active life and put with the has-beens. After having counted as something for a long time, one becomes nothing. For forty years, half a century, if you like, someone has been a cog in the big machinery of society. Then, on the grounds that this cog is old, it is put aside. Not very pleasant for the party concerned.
> I know, of course, that there is the other side of the picture: freedom after the long enslavement of work under conditions that sometimes proved very difficult. It is the end of each day's stupendous effort. But once the task is done, does the memory of it rankle the next day? Of course not, because people realize that life itself is made up of such little hardships which are as old as time. As we advance in years our eyes are opened, our illusions vanish, and we finally understand that life, seen at close hand, is not always beautiful.
> At any rate, it is not as beautiful as the long-anticipated retirement which gradually comes closer and closer until one day it is at hand and it does not look so promising as before. Above all there is the realization that tomorrow we may no longer be of any use. Retirement is like the beginning of a long unending regret.
>
> The more fortunate is not the retired man, it is the one who is not yet retired. It is the fellow worker struck by death at his work, like a soldier in the thick of the battle, weapons in hand.
>
> What good is it to drag out the monotonous and useless life of the retired man?
> What good is it to hark back to the same old stores of a past for which nobody cares? That is why the wise thinks twice before he asks for his retirement. To quit the daily task, however great the effort required, is like getting away from reality, so meagre, so hard though it may be. It is acting like the dog of the good man Lafontaine, who left its prey for a shadow.

Mr. Speaker, it is another psychological phenomenon when a man has worked hard all his life for society he finds one day that he has no longer any soul, that his services are no longer required, that he is considered too old to take part in public affairs.

We only need to look around us, not only in Canada but throughout the world, to see men over seventy who are still very active and who can bring into the discussion of public affairs the contribution of a valuable experience.

I need only mention the former prime minister of Great Britain, the Right. Hon. Winston Churchill, who, despite his seventy-five years, displays an extraordinarily keen mind during the Commons debates and the British elections. Thus the argument that the Senate is made up of men who are too old is worthless.

Besides, I believe the amendment was moved for the sole purpose of launching some sort of a debate and finding out the members' views on the matter.

I do not make these remarks because I have an eye on the other place, or because I want to defend the members of the Senate. I just want to say that the Senate is still a democratic institution, although its members are not elected.

Moreover, I think that the Senate should be protected against the idea, which is becoming generalized, that senators should be elected. To my mind, the Senate is endowed with a certain freedom of action which the elected representatives of the people do not enjoy.

As members of parliament we retain our liberty, but we know that we must sometimes follow public opinion instead of leading it. I remember that when I was still a student at the seminary, a former Quebec premier told me that men in public life should lead public opinion and not follow it.

I believe that the members of the Senate are in a better position to lead public opinion under the present system than they would be if they were elected.

To those who look to the Senate with some emotion, I shall quote a proverb which I found somewhere and which speaks volumes in this respect:

The hardest thing to do is not to reach the top of the ladder, but to make one's way through the crowd at the bottom.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): May I have the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, to revert to motions for the purpose of tabling correspondence with the premiers concerning the autumn conference, and which was asked for the other day. I promised to see if there had been any further correspondence, and I find that there were three letters from Premier Douglas, with answers, and one from Premier Jones, with the answer. I should like to table that correspondence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Has the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the consent of the house to table the documents to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Prime Minister a question concerning the correspondence with the provincial premiers that he has just submitted? Is any provision made on the agenda for discussion of old age pensions or federal aid to education?

Mr. St. Laurent: The agenda has not yet been determined. We are receiving suggestions from the premiers and those suggestions are being circulated to the premiers of the other provinces for their views as to what should be the form of the agenda.

Mr. Drew: Then I take it, from what the Prime Minister has said, that there is nothing to prevent the agenda including what was suggested by the premier of Nova Scotia that there should be a full discussion of appropriate changes in the Senate.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know whether there will be any discussion of changes in the Senate. It is a financial conference; and I would imagine, with respect to the question—

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

Mr. Drew: It is a constitutional conference.

Mr. St. Laurent: No. There are two conferences. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) knows that as well as I do. There is a constitutional conference that has been adjourned and which is to deal with the proposal to seek an amendment of the constitution that would allow other amendments to be made here in Canada. Then there is a general conference, which is the conference that was promised at the last conference, to take place at least one year before the expiry of the agreements that have now been entered into with eight provinces. That is the one with respect to which I am tabling correspondence this evening. To further answer the question asked by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I imagine that we shall be considering the best possible use to which all revenues raised by the various levels of government from the Canadian people can be expended on behalf of the Canadian people.

Mr. Drew: Through you, Mr. Speaker, may I ask if it is not so, that the agenda is wide open for the consideration of any subjects that are regarded as appropriate by the government of the Dominion of Canada and of the provinces?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; provided there is agreement between the premiers of the provinces and the government of Canada that it should be included in the agenda.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether these various documents are just being tabled or whether the Prime Minister asked that they be appended to Hansard? The previous correspondence with the premiers was printed.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the previous correspondence was printed as an appendix to Hansard; and if it is the desire of hon. members that that should be done, I think that you, Mr. Speaker, might so direct. That would apply to the correspondence concerning this conference.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is it the pleasure of the house that these documents be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For the text of correspondence, see Appendix A, page 2793)

FLOOD CONDITIONS

TABLING OF MESSAGES FROM HIS MAJESTY THE KING, QUEEN JULIANA, AND THE PRIME MINISTER OF MALTA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table a copy of a message sent to the lieutenant governor of Manitoba, through the governor general, on behalf of His Majesty, expressing his sympathy with the victims of the recent disaster; also a message from Queen Juliana of The Netherlands to the lieutenant governor of Manitoba, forwarded through the governor general's office; and a copy of a telegram, and my answer thereto, from the prime minister of Malta, also expressing the sympathy of the people of those islands with the victims of this disaster.

Mr. Knowles: Will these messages, particularly the message from His Majesty, be printed?

Mr. St. Laurent: There can be no objection to that. If it is the desire of hon. members that the text of the messages on behalf of His Majesty and the Queen, on behalf of the queen of the Netherlands and of the prime minister of Malta be printed as an appendix to Hansard, perhaps Mr. Speaker could direct that that be done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is it the pleasure of the house that these documents be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of messages, see Appendix B, page 2795).

SUPPLY

SENATE REFORM

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, there are a few observations that I should like to make on the amendment that is now before the house. I listened to the mover of the amendment, and I may say that I enjoyed the address he read to the house this afternoon. In fact, I had read much of the substance in it previously in Maclean's magazine, Saturday Night and other magazines, and I enjoyed it at that time. I may say that I agree with many of the things that were said.

As to reform of the Senate, I think possibly that is essential for the reason that among the people of Canada there is a strong feeling that the Senate is not filling the bill; that is, that it is not giving service commensurate with the money that is spent on it. When we speak of that matter, I think possibly we should take a look around home first of all and clean up our own backyard; because when it comes to the matter of money being spent for loafing, and days being spent in doing nothing, we have a good deal of it right here.

I agree with many of the things that have been said about the matter, but I cannot agree with the amendment because of the way in which it comes before the house. If that amendment had come in as a private motion, it would then have given to hon. members supporting the government an opportunity to vote for it. It may be said that they can support it anyway. But I do not think that any of the people who elected me on June 27, including many who are Conservatives, expect me to get up and support an amendment when by doing so it amounts to a vote of non-confidence in the government which I support. I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who moved the motion, will agree that we do not intend to do that and that it is not the right thing for us to do; and I at least give the hon. member who seconded the motion, the member for Lake Centre, credit for having intelligence enough not to expect us to do this. For that reason, I am not going to discuss the amendment much longer. I think that possibly a committee to study this matter would be a good thing. Many things might be done. We might give them more to do. We could possibly have a limit on the age of the senators and they would have a purpose which they could fulfil, in examining the things that go on in this house. For instance, they could examine estimates, and so on, and it would not be necessary to set up royal commissions; they could do this if necessary. I listened with interest to the speech of the leader of the C.C.F. party and also to the other hon. members of that party. I have listened to their policies along these lines for many years. I heard the same speeches about ten years ago. I will not say whether I agree with them or not. Possibly there may be something in doing away with the Senate. For the last few years I have not heard these same statements from many members of the C.C.F. party because I believe when they got into power in Saskatchewan and they were gaining ground here they thought they might be able to use the Senate. Now that they will never have a chance to get into power here they are not interested in having a Senate at all.

As I say, I agree with some of the arguments that we should have a committee to investigate this matter, but I do not think that even the mover and the seconder of the amendment would expect the government supporters to be stupid enough to vote against the government's motion.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am against doing away with the Senate of Canada. I am in favour of any reform that can be made in the Senate which will be for the public good and for the government of this country. It does seem to me that the great cry that went up against the Senate in years gone by was on occasions when the Senate and the House of Commons were of a different political complexion.

My memory takes me back to 1897 or 1898 when the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier passed an act in this house for the construction of a railway into the Yukon Territory. At the time every businessman in the country was against it. When it went to the Senate, which was a Conservative Senate, it was killed. If there was anything the Senate of Canada ever did to justify its existence it was the killing of the bill for the construction of a railway into the Yukon Territory. Then there was a great howl, among people with whom I have been affiliated for years, against the Senate. That died out in a few years' time and the businessmen of this country impressed upon the government of the day the inequity of building a road into the Yukon Territory.

There comes to my mind another occasion in 1912. Sir Robert Borden came into power in 1911. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government had a plan to build a navy in this country under the control of the Dominion of Canada. When Sir Robert Borden came into power something had to be done, in the opinion of his government, and a bill was introduced in the House of Commons for the purpose of giving to Great Britain a tremendous lot of money to build naval ships. These naval ships were to be built in the old land and were to be controlled by the British Admiralty. That matter was discussed in this house without anybody having a wink of sleep from twelve o'clock on a Monday until twelve o'clock the following Saturday. During that debate the rules of closure were brought into the house. Finally the bill was passed in the house and it went to the Senate. At that time there happened to be a Liberal Senate and they turned down the bill. In my opinion that was the second time that the Senate of Canada justified its existence. There was quite a howl for a year or so from our Conservative friends on the matter of Senate reform.

I rather agree with the gentleman who spoke a while ago. I think charity should begin at home, and that we should do something about reforming this very house along certain lines, and that is something over which we have jurisdiction. But at the same time, as I said a moment ago, if there is any way of doing anything to the Senate that will make for better government in this country for the whole of Canada, then I am in favour of it. But I do not think I have heard anything in the speeches so far that would convince me that it is necessary to reform the Senate along certain lines.

First of all, in regard to reforming the Senate, there has to be an amendment to the British North America Act before it can be done. We may pass all the resolutions we like in this house; we may say we are going in for reform of the Senate, but unless the Senate agrees, there is no constitutional power which will make them agree to anything that we do in this house, and that is proper.

The British North America Act contains the constitution of this country; it contains the constitution under which the Senate is organized in this country. Until the British North America Act is amended, or there is some understanding between the various provinces, the House of Commons and the Senate, it is useless to talk about Senate reform.

I do not like to hear people say anything derogatory about the Senate. I do not think anything derogatory was said about senators as such, but I have heard it said in the past. So far as calibre of governing and intellect are concerned, the calibre of the Senate from 1867 down to the present time compares very favourably with the membership in this House of Commons. It is true that usually men a little older are sent to the Senate than most members who come into the House of Commons; but some years ago a very good rule was adopted. I do not think it is a rule, but it has become a custom that persons shall not be appointed to the Senate after they have passed their sixtieth birthday. Having regard to the death rate in this country in the past, few of them survive after their seventy-fifth birthday. Therefore, unless the life expectancy of people in this country is greatly extended, it is hardly necessary to insist that senators should get out when they reach seventy-five because they will not be there.

As I said, I am against the idea that we should do away with the Senate. As an institution it is something of which we should be proud. It is an institution that has done great work in this country. Since I came to the house the last time the thing that has struck me forcibly is that there has been a great reform in the Senate itself. I was in this house from 1911 on, 1917, 1921 and 1925. Rarely in those days was anything initiated in the Senate. I had not followed events from 1925 up until a year ago. I noticed that in this parliament a great deal of important legislation has had its initiation in the Senate, and when it comes to this house and goes into committee we can look back on the records of the Senate committees and find out exactly what happened there, and it materially helps the work of this house.

Coming back again to the calibre of the Senate, I do not know whether I can point to people in this house who have any more ability to govern this country down through the years—I mean from the comparative standpoint—than the members who occupy Senate seats. I suppose that in this house we have men, including myself, of very poor calibre. We occasionally do have men who perhaps are not fully qualified in the matter of government. The same thing happens in the Senate—and that is not anything against the Senate.

Another point in favour of the Senate is that appointments are made to that body first because of business ability and secondly because they have had a good deal to do with government before their appointment to that body. Let me say—and I am not looking for a senatorship; if one were offered to me tomorrow I would not accept it—that I think it has been a good principle followed by both of the major parties to pick for seats in the Senate those who have had experience in government on the floor of the House of Commons. That is all to the good, so far as the Senate is concerned.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have completed all I wish to say.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, what I have to say perhaps might have been better said on motions when the

Manitoba Flood

Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made his statement on the flood situation, but I am almost certain that I would have been out of order. Therefore I have deferred making any statement until now. I want to tell those who are interested of those things which I actually saw, of those things of which I have firsthand information, but above all of those things which I have felt, which I have lived through having worked with people who today are suffering in desolation and helplessness.

When I came to this country nineteen years ago I landed at the port of Halifax. The immigration officer who examined my goods and effects asked me for what city I was bound and I said, "Winnipeg." He said, "I am glad to hear that because I have just come from there. I have spent some of the happiest years of my life in that city and I have a great affection for it." That is an affection which I myself have found growing over the years. But today there is something more than affection, there is admiration for a city and for a people which ties me to them with bonds that cannot be broken. I have seen heroism, not the heroism of a sudden deed of derring-do or the heroism of some act of gallantry which leaves one almost aghast, but the heroism of people who were down and never knew what it was to be out, the heroism of people who, when they could scarcely lift another limb, nevertheless found within themselves the physical and spiritual strength to fight the encroachment of the river.

I am going to speak of Winnipeg not because I wish to slight any other area, far from it, but because I know what happened there. I am quite sure that what I say of Winnipeg and its people can be applied to every other area which has been afflicted by floods. Therefore the house will understand why I limit my remarks. Yet I know of the case of a farmer, a man near Ste. Agathe, who finally was compelled to surrender to the river, who at the last moment took his wife and children out in a truck leaving behind him about 8,000 bushels of grain, some 200 hogs which even then were strung along the wires squealing madly, leaving his horses and livestock, the last sounds in his ears being the screaming of animals which were doomed to almost certain death. I think of the little poultry rancher near St. Boniface whose whole livelihood was bound up with 1,700 chickens some seven weeks old, not ready for market. Knowing he could not rescue them he slaughtered them. Being a good citizen and knowing the responsibility he might incur by leaving dead poultry lying about and the corruption that might take place, not only did he slaughter them but he also burned them. I think of the market gardeners who have lost everything they had. These things I know only by hearsay but I know them to be correct.

When I landed in Winnipeg it was perhaps natural that I should go to the area where I stay. I found there what I knew of course, that for the second time in two years my wife and I were evacuated. At the worst, however, we find it only somewhat of a nuisance, and certainly only a nuisance compared with the losses which so many others have suffered. What struck Winnipeg was no turbulent flood leaving disaster in its wake such as we saw in the Fraser river valley, but a slow seeping flow of water which it appeared could not be dammed back. It was so slow that the water seemed to have the viscosity of oil and yet it was ruthless and indeed at times almost frightening in its determination to conquer the city. That is the type of water which prevails of course in so many parts of the flooded areas.

As to the river itself, I have heard estimates that the current was only some seven or eight miles an hour. Yet I know on one occasion when I was out in a dinghy powered with a 12 horsepower outboard motor we were going against the stream and we made scarcely one mile an hour. It is a river with tortuous twists and bends, and being in flood naturally it has taken the shortest course to reach its destination and has swept straight across many sections of the city.

I think the time when our people suffered worst was over two weeks ago when rain started on Friday and continued. Altogether some two inches of rain, snow and sleet fell. It was during those days that heroism really was shown. Men and women would work for as long as seventy-two hours at a stretch without any respite in order to keep the river back. A friend of mine, for instance, the mayor of East Kildonan, who was the Progressive Conservative candidate in the last election, rose on Friday morning at seven o'clock and never saw his bed again until three o'clock on Tuesday morning. That experience was shared by many others, men and women alike.

The same story can be told of what happened in St. Boniface and on the dikes in Norwood. Working on the dikes, before lights were strung along them, was a most precarious and hazardous task. In some cases the dikes were 14 to 16 feet high and as much as 20 feet deep. Sandbags had to be lugged up the dikes over slippery, slithery, greasy mud. Nobody will ever know how people did not lose their lives by falling into the river which was but 6 inches below the top of the dikes on the other side. It is true some fell in but they were saved. The task of building the dikes almost staggers the imagination. I worked on them in four-hour shifts, and I know the physical condition I was in at the end of four hours. What then must have been the physical condition of those who worked not for hours but for days?

I saw the ramp which the city engineering department built up to the Provencher bridge to maintain communications between St. Boniface and the city of Winnipeg. Not hundreds but thousands of trucks of gravel were carried to this area and dumped there so that a road could be made through the flood. I saw boys and girls working on the dikes. I saw grandfathers and grandmothers working on them, and every age in between. There were nuns who were filling sandbags and building up dikes to save hospitals. I saw one man who was pointed out to me as the best safecracker in western Canada. He was out on bail and was spending every available moment and all his energy in helping to build dikes. Those who were fighting were citizens of all types from professional gamblers to preachers.

Of course there were incidents which struck one forcibly. I remember a case where a truck careened onto a sidewalk and stalled there. It took the people who were there twenty minutes to slap, pummell, and shake the driver of the truck into consciousness. When he came around it was learned that he had been forty-nine hours driving trucks of gravel to the Provencher ramp without any respite. There were other incidents which perhaps had a more humorous aspect, and people were very ready to see the humorous side of things. For instance there was the report which came over the radio station that all mothers and children should evacuate immediately but single girls and able-bodied men should stay behind. Fortunately many people saw the humour of that. Another case, perhaps not so humorous, is that of the man who saw three dead hogs floating near his house. He was determined that he would get rid of them. He tried the best he could but one slipped away from him and unfortunately crashed through the window of his living room, and so far as I know it is still there.

Mr. Bryce: On the chesterfield.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): As I say I cannot speak of all parts of the city. Nevertheless I think my knowledge of what happened to one area will give members an idea of the situation. In Elmwood there was a tremendous fight to save the community. Men and women were working on the dikes day and night. They had to be sustained and canteens were set up by the women in homes, stores, community clubs, wherever it could be done, and hot food was taken to those who were working. Eventually it was organized on almost a professional basis. At first neighbours would go around trying to borrow a dozen eggs, some bacon or other meat, or anything which they could use to cook a hot meal. Women who were preparing their Sunday roasts would carve them up, place the dinner on a plate and send it down to the men who were working. Eventually some two or three thousand meals a day were being served to those who manned the dikes, and all these meals were being cooked in the homes of the people. When I think of meals I must mention the valiant task which the Red Cross and the Salvation Army performed in every neighbourhood. Their work is beyond all praise. Men would be toiling and slaving on the dikes; along would come a truck from the Red Cross with some girls in it serving sandwiches, coffee and cigarettes. Similar aid, of course, was given by the Salvation Army. There were fishermen who came down from Gimli and the little island of Hecla up north in lake Winnipeg. They took their boats over to the mainland, loaded them on trucks and brought them down to help the beleaguered city. Farmers from Dauphin brought their trucks to help. I saw businessmen from Saskatoon who had nothing to offer but their labour; nevertheless they came to give what they had. I think one of the most impressive sights of all was a Canadian who had been evacuated once before from British Columbia because his skin was yellow. He was of Japanese origin; and in gratitude for the treatment he had received in Winnipeg he left his job and devoted all his time, day and night, to working on the dikes. He said he was glad to do it, because in that community he had been regarded as a human being. There was one difference between this man and other citizens. It was not the pigmentation of his skin. The difference lay in the fact that he had only one hand, having lost his right hand in an accident some two or three years ago.

But the danger is not yet past. It is all very well to read these Canadian Press reports saying that the danger is subsiding. Such is not necessarily the case. The river is only inching down, and there is still the possibility that dikes may go. But care is being taken to see that no lives are lost. In the Luxton area, for instance, which was visited by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), people can go to their flooded homes only when they get permission, when they get a boat, and when they have registered. They are given a card and go about their task, whatever it is; then on their return they surrender that card. In that way the community knows that no one will be lost.

At the same time, however, I think it is right to say that people are now getting their second wind. There is a growing feeling of security amongst them. The pressing urgency is subsiding; and now people are beginning to ask questions. Who is going to pay for the farm homes which have been destroyed? Who is going to pay for the livestock that has been drowned? Who is going to pay for the tractors and other implements that have been left to the mercy of the floods? Who is going to pay for those city homes which are so irretrievably damaged? Today the Prime Minister said that according to Central Mortgage and Housing there were some eight thousand of those homes. I think that is an understatement. The city of Winnipeg knows perhaps more about it than Central Mortgage and Housing, and their estimate is much higher. What of the man I saw with his wife; a man of about fifty-five, who throughout his working life had toiled to own his own home and who is now without work and also without a home? What about the veteran who placed all that he had in the way of rehabilitation credits in a home, which now has been devastated by the floods? The problem which faces Winnipeg and the surrounding community now is not so much one of relief as a tremendous social problem. We were confronted with this fact, for instance, that there are men out of work due to the floods. There were those who had lost their jobs, but whose families were still resident in the city. There were those who had lost their jobs, whose families had been evacuated, but whose homes were still intact. There were those who not only had lost their jobs and whose families had been evacuated, but who had completely lost their homes.

In the packing house industry, of which I know something, the members of the union across Canada decided they would raise money to maintain the incomes of those who had lost their jobs. We took up the matter with the big three packers, and eventually the packing house companies decided that as a matter of policy they would pay all their men for time lost because of floods. That means the money which the union is now collecting can go into the general Manitoba relief fund. But I am sorry I cannot say the same practice is being followed by other branches of industry.

The question in the minds of the people is who is going to pay for all the damages. Obviously the municipalities cannot. Equally obviously the provincial government cannot. While we in Winnipeg and southern Manitoba are eternally grateful for the assistance that has come from every part of Canada, nevertheless it is clear that this fund which the Prime Minister seems to think will deal adequately with rehabilitation in the long run will amount to nothing more than a pittance. We had the extraordinary situation some weeks ago of the governments of Ontario and Saskatchewan offering all the assistance they could give and the premier of Manitoba, still blind to the menace confronting us, declining it. In Winnipeg the Prime Minister said that what he saw was a calamity. I think perhaps he used the wrong word; what he saw was a disaster. The calamity lay in the quality of leadership, or lack of leadership, given by the provincial authorities.

No one knows yet what is going to happen. The city of Winnipeg, by and large, is bearing the financial brunt not only for itself but for the surrounding municipalities. I live in the municipality of West Kildonan. There they could not afford to put down even one sandbag and the homes went by default. Yet the provincial government has done nothing to help this or other municipalities. Instead, the city of Winnipeg is today borrowing well over $100,000 a day, I am sure, for immediate flood purposes. This cannot go on indefinitely, yet still there is no word from any senior government, whether it be provincial or federal, as to what help will be given.

It is eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I therefore move the adjournment of this debate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue this debate to go into supply and call the items I mentioned last night. Then we will take up the bills I also mentioned last night. The order will be the same as announced at that time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Appendix A

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Saskatchewan

Regina, March 8, 1950

The Rt. Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

In your letter of December 19th you were kind enough to suggest that you would be glad to receive recommendations as to subjects for discussion which the government of Saskatchewan would like to see placed on the agenda for the proposed Dominion-Provincial Conference next autumn.

Attached please find a list of the topics which we would like to see considered when the proposed agenda is being formulated. We would be pleased to submit further details with regard to any of the items mentioned should you wish further clarification of the various topics which we have listed.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas.

Suggested topics for discussion which in the opinion of the Saskatchewan government should be placed on the agenda of the general Dominion-Provincial conference—Autumn, 1950

1. Financial arrangements
   (a) Rowell Sirois report—National adjustment grants
   (b) Tax rental agreements
   (c) Indirect taxation rights for the provinces
   (d) Federal assistance to provinces in capital financing

2. Social security and allied topics
   (a) Comprehensive social insurance: unemployment, old age, health, etc.
   (b) Extension of unemployment insurance to cover farm labour
   (c) Assistance to self employed
   (d) Extension of old age pensions to all 65 and over and abolition of means test

3. Public investment
   (a) Counter-cyclical investment—planning and financing of anti-depression public works
   (b) Federal assistance in development of agriculture and natural resources
   (c) Dominion-Provincial relationships in re water conservation and development

4. Marketing of natural products
   (a) Responsibility for marketing schemes
   (b) Expanding domestic consumption and disposition of surpluses

5. Transportation
   (a) Federal assistance for highways
   (b) Control of inter-provincial traffic on highways

6. Education

7. Housing

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
Canada

Ottawa, March 13, 1950

Hon. T. C. Douglas, M.L.A.,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Sask.

My dear Premier:

I duly received your letter of the 8th instant enclosing a list of suggested topics for discussion which, in the opinion of the Saskatchewan government, should be placed on the agenda of the General Dominion-Provincial Conference, Autumn, 1950.

We propose when we have received suggestions from other provincial governments to circulate the suggestions for further consideration. In this connection I note that one of the subjects mentioned in your list is "Education" and that it is not qualified in any way. Since education is exclusively within provincial jurisdiction, and is one of the most cherished of all provincial rights, my colleagues and I would be somewhat apprehensive that the circulation of any suggestion for its inclusion in the agenda, wherever it originated, might give rise to a feeling of anxiety on the part of a large number of Canadians. It may be, therefore, that you would feel it advisable to indicate more specifically what the government of Saskatchewan has in mind.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Saskatchewan

Regina, April 15, 1950

The Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

Thank you for your letter of March 13th, in which I note you request some expansion of Item 6 ("Education") of the topics the government of Saskatchewan thought should be placed on the agenda of the Dominion-Provincial Conference to be held this autumn.

In brief, it is our feeling that there should be a minimum standard of educational opportunity available to all the children of Canada. It should make no difference whether the children are educated in the maritimes, in the central provinces or in the west. A high level of educational opportunity is basic to our democratic way of life.

However, great inequality of educational opportunity exists among the various provinces due to such factors as the number of children to be educated, distribution of population and financial ability of the province. The federal government is the only agency able to bring about an equitable distribution of educational opportunities. It is suggested, therefore, that this problem should be recognized by the federal government, and that rectifying steps be taken either by considering educational need as a factor in determining the amount of federal subsidy, or as a problem warranting special and direct financial assistance from the federal government. It is further suggested that such financial assistance does not in any way need to interfere with provincial jurisdiction in the field of education.

I am sure that you would agree that the future of our nation is dependent upon the children of today. The standard of their education should not be determined by locality. We feel confident that this problem can only be adequately dealt with on a nation-wide scale. In our opinion the provision of assistance to establish a minimum standard of education could be accomplished by federal grants to education without any interference with the exclusive jurisdiction over the matter of education which is now enjoyed by the provinces.

For these reasons, we feel that this subject should be given serious consideration by the conference.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Ottawa, April 17, 1950

Hon. T. C. Douglas, M.L.A.,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

I duly received your letter of the 15th instant, setting forth the views of the government of Saskatchewan as to the reasons why they feel education should be one of the topics placed on the agenda of the Dominion-Provincial Conference to be held in the autumn.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Saskatchewan

Regina, May 9, 1950

The Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

There is apparently one more problem which might be properly considered at the Dominion-Provincial Conference this autumn. I understand the National Physical Fitness Council has considered questions arising out of the application of the National Physical Fitness Act recently, at which time the Honourable Paul Martin indicated that he considered the matters of sufficient importance that they should be on the agenda.

The problems involve:

(a) A ruling, I believe, of the Treasury Board defining the act as applying only to grants in aid of physical fitness. It is contended that this is unduly narrow, as a better term would perhaps be "recreational" or some similar expression which would include grants for arts and drama.

(b) A further question is the sufficiency of funds made available for these important purposes, that play such an important role in the development of our Canadian culture.

The council has yearly passed resolutions in favour of changes in the act. Perhaps, as the Honourable Mr. Martin suggests, the matter should be placed on the agenda.

On behalf of the government of Saskatchewan, we wish to support Mr. Martin in having the problems arising out of the National Physical Fitness Act considered by the conference this autumn.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
Canada

Ottawa, May 23, 1950

Hon. T. C. Douglas, M.L.A.,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

I duly received your letter of the 9th instant suggesting that problems arising out of the National Physical Fitness Act might be included in the agenda for the general conference of the federal-provincial governments in the autumn.

I shall not fail to see that the views of the government of Saskatchewan on this point are communicated to the governments of the other provinces for their consideration.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Prince Edward Island

Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island,

May 17, 1950.

Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

In reply to your earlier letter requesting suggestions as to topics which, as a provincial premier, I thought should be placed on the agenda for consideration at a fall dominion-provincial conference, the then impending meeting of our legislature indicated the desirability of a slight delay in order that the importance of the subject matter receive proper attention.

We had hoped that an early reconvening of the constitutional conference might have taken place, and possibly some problems clarified in the course of the discussions there.

It is apparent that such is not within the bounds of early probability, and I now suggest the following as matters which, I think, should be placed on the agenda at the proposed conference:

(a) Consideration of the scope of provincial public services and its relation to provincial public debt and revenue.

(b) Consideration of the problem of provincial finance as affected by federal programs intended to further the extension of provincial public services.

(c) Review of federal and provincial spheres of taxation with the underlying consideration—the preservation of provincial autonomy.

(d) Negotiation of extension or renewal of federal-provincial tax rental agreements based on current and developing need.

(e) Transfer of certain existing services to federal jurisdiction and adjusting taxation structure to permit provincial solvency, and subsidy revision.

(f) Review of old age pensions and other health and welfare services, and adjustment of federal contributions to provide for an equitable distribution of burden.

(g) Consideration of federal and provincial responsibility for reasonably comparable educational facilities and opportunities throughout Canada as a whole.

(h) The problem of matching grants in its relation to provincial finance.

(i) Specific Prince Edward Island difficulties in relation to transportation.

(j) Provincial economic development. In particular the encouragement of shipping in the gulf of St. Lawrence area and Newfoundland area so that Prince Edward Island products may reach their natural markets.

The above list is not necessarily exhaustive but at least contains some of the matters which we feel should be discussed at the conference.

Sincerely yours,
Walter Jones

Honourable J. Walter Jones, M.L.A.,
Premier of Prince Edward Island,
Charlottetown, P.E.I.

My dear Premier:

I duly received your letter of the 17th instant, listing topics which the government of Prince Edward Island suggest to be placed on the agenda of the dominion-provincial conference to be held in the autumn.

Yours sincerely,

FLOOD CONDITIONS

Messages from His Majesty the King, Queen Juliana and the Prime Minister of Malta.

OTTAWA, May 23, 1950

His Honour
The Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Man.

I am commanded by the Governor General to send Your Honour the text of the following telegram received by His Excellency from His Majesty the King today: The Queen and I have watched with anxious concern the flood situation in Manitoba. We are greatly relieved and thankful to learn that there is now every reason to expect that the flood will recede. We sincerely hope that this may be so and that the great city of Winnipeg will soon recover from the crisis through which she is passing. Signed George R.

J. F. Delaute,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

OTTAWA, May 23, 1950

His Honour
The Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Man.

I am commanded by the Governor General to send Your Honour the text of the following telegram received by His Excellency from Her Majesty Queen Juliana of The Netherlands today: Profoundly touched by the disaster caused to Winnipeg and surroundings by the catastrophal floods I beg you to accept my feelings of deepest sympathy for the stricken inhabitants in this part of the great country to which I am so much attached. Signed Juliana R.

J. F. Delaute,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

Prime Minister
Ottawa

On behalf of the government and people of these islands I convey to you sincere sympathy at the loss suffered in Winnipeg during the recent floods.

Boffa
Prime Minister
Malta.

OTTAWA, May 23, 1950

Prime Minister Boffa
Malta

I shall be pleased to convey to the House of Commons the message of sympathy which you were kind enough to send me on behalf of your government and the people of Malta. You may be assured that your sympathy will be appreciated by the affected people of Winnipeg and region as well as by all Canadians.

Louis S. St. Laurent.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 24, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS

TRIBUTES AND FELICITATIONS ON HIS EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the business of the day, and on a matter of general privilege, I feel it would be appropriate to recognize the fact that today is not only the birthday of Queen Victoria, but it is also the birthday of the senior statesman of the British fellowship throughout the world. Today in South Africa Field Marshal Smuts is celebrating his eightieth birthday. It is appropriate that here in Canada we should indicate our own good wishes to a man who has contributed so much to the development of this great British association to which we belong; to a man who in his own life has given a remarkable demonstration of the way in which friendship may grow out of understanding, and, because of the genius of our system, those who have even been enemies can stand side by side in the great cause of freedom.

Field Marshal Smuts was actually in command of the Boer troops during a considerable period of the South African war. Shortly after that, when South Africa became associated with the rest of us in this common endeavour which is called the British empire, the British commonwealth, or by whatever other term one chooses to describe this really remarkable fellowship of free people, he showed the way in which the hand of friendship can be extended after hostilities have ceased. Surely there can be nothing more dramatic than the fact that one of the most gallant soldiers on the other side of the Boer war became the commander of the South African troops in the war of 1914-18, and again during the second world war was not only prime minister of South Africa but also the supreme commander of the South African troops.

Field Marshal Smuts has been a truly remarkable man, and his service has not by any means been confined to South Africa. Today, when thoughtful people everywhere are reaching out for a wider basis of understanding among the nations of the world, it is interesting to recall that, out of his early experience, he has always sought the widest measure of understanding among nations. He is the only man in public life today who was an active representative of a government at the time the charter of the league of nations came into existence at Versailles in 1919. In the spring of 1945 he went to San Francisco with the experience of a man who had seen the dream of the league of nations emerge, and had seen that dream shattered. It was he who was largely responsible for the drafting of the opening paragraphs of the declaration of the United Nations. In that declaration he sought to overcome the weaknesses of the covenant of the league, which had failed to preserve peace.

Today this man, with eighty years behind him, still shows that out of all that experience he is building for the future. I feel sure that we in this House of Commons today, far separated in distance from South Africa, would wish to extend our best wishes for many happy returns to this great citizen of the free fellowship to which we belong.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is not here on this occasion, because I am sure he would have considered it a privilege to agree with what has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Indeed, he probably would have taken it upon himself to express the congratulations which have been so well expressed by the leader of the opposition.

Since the Prime Minister is not here, however, I find myself in the position of speaking for the group who sit on this side of the house, and on the other side, nearest to you, Mr. Speaker, as well; and in doing so I want to join with the leader of the opposition in the expression of the points of view he has just stated. During the Boer war, General Smuts was one of the leaders who at that time opposed us, and after the war ended in peace he took a leading part in bringing together the peoples of the southern part of the African continent, in very much the same manner as the leaders on this continent had on a previous occasion brought together the two great races here. I have no doubt that had men such as Montcalm lived through the battles of those days and settled in this country, to carry on in relation to what has happened since they would have taken much the same position as General Smuts has taken in South Africa.

I would remind hon. members that when the terms of peace were being discussed and new organizations were being set up in South Africa to meet the new situation, Canada was copied perhaps to a greater extent than any other part of the British commonwealth. From that time until this, General Smuts has taken a great interest in what has been going on in this country, and in doing so has tended to bring our peoples closer and closer together. By applying the same practices and principles in the southern part of Africa as were followed here, he has done much in many parts of world to promote the interests of the commonwealth as they have been promoted here.

For these reasons it gives me great pleasure to join the leader of the opposition in extending congratulations to this grand old man who in his own country has seen so many of his efforts brought to fruition.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, although the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said he was speaking for the group with which he is associated, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said he was speaking for the party sitting on the government side, which has an overflow on this side, they really expressed the sentiment of all hon. members, no matter where they may sit in the house.

I have much pleasure in associating the members of the C.C.F. party with the felicitations extended to Field Marshal Smuts. I believe the story of the lives of Smuts and Botha, and some of their associates who were leaders of the Boer forces against the armies of the empire during the Boer war, indicates that they rendered notable service in promoting the welfare of this commonwealth of nations.

Our good wishes go out to Field Marshal Smuts today, particularly in view of the disturbed conditions that prevail in South Africa. The field marshal has taken a much more moderate attitude than some others do toward racial difficulties in that country; and I hope the day is not far distant when the people of South Africa will join with the other members of the commonwealth in banishing for ever the racial discrimination that now mars the good name of the Union of South Africa.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr Speaker, may I say in the first place that I understand the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has already sent a message to Field Marshal Smuts on the occasion of his eightieth birthday.

It so happens that in 1946, during the conference discussing the terms of peace with Italy and the other four satellites of Germany, it fell to my lot to tender a luncheon party to some of the leading figures at the conference. On that occasion the guest honoured by all was Field Marshal Smuts, the only man present who had been prominently associated with the Paris conference which concluded the first great war. The event took place in the room in the Crillon where Field Marshal Smuts had worked with President Wilson to draft the charter of the league of nations.

RED CROSS

DR. PAUL RUEGGER—TRIBUTE TO WORK OF INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, by coincidence the house is privileged today to have among those who sit in the galleries one who represents another great work for humanity, Dr. Paul Ruegger, president of the International Red Cross. I should like again to express the appreciation every Canadian feels for the splendid work done by that great organization, particularly in respect of the 9,552 Canadian prisoners of war, for whose care and custody and welfare the international committee of the Red Cross in Geneva, and also, in its capacity of protecting power, the country of Switzerland, were responsible. They won and earned our admiration, our gratitude and our continuing support for what was done on behalf of humanity.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

PERSONS LISTED IN NOTEBOOK OF KLAUS FUCHS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked me a question in the following terms:

> Has there been any examination or re-examination of the loyalty of any of the 150 persons then resident in Canada listed in the notebook found as a result of the espionage investigations of 1945 and 1946, since the trial of Dr. Fuchs?

The notebook referred to in the hon. member's question was in fact a pocket address book, containing, as the question indicates, the names of 150 persons then resident in Canada. It formed only one item of many thousands of documents seized in the searches made in conjunction with the arrests of spy suspects in 1946. In this mass of material so seized there were many such notebooks; also desk calendars, memo pads, telephone finders, mailing lists, etc., which contained thousands of names, addresses, telephone numbers and miscellaneous entries. All this material was carefully examined, including the notebook in question.

The list of 150 names referred to was carefully checked to ascertain which of these 150 names, if any, were those of persons who could be suspected of espionage or subversive activity. It was found that a limited number of the persons named belonged to either or both of these groups. In all such cases where positive identification proved possible, the entries were then related to and dealt with on the appropriate investigation files. As some of these investigations are still current, it will be appreciated that it would not be desirable to specify the number of persons identified.

The majority of the entries in this notebook, however, refer to professional people and others of good repute whose loyalty is beyond question.

All these investigation files have since remained extant. They, and the notebook in question, have been examined from time to time as a matter of security routine on every occasion, both before and after the trial of Dr. Fuchs, when information secured in other police investigations or from other sources indicated that such re-examination might contribute to and strengthen security measures.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, arising out of the statement he made today about the espionage case. Without attempting to minimize the responsibility of the United Kingdom government with respect to the Fuchs case, I should like to ask the minister a question I directed to another minister in a committee but which did not wholly come within that minister's department. Does the minister know whether or not the person who had the notebook was carefully examined as to the qualifications and history of all the people mentioned therein? I mean the 436, not just the 150 who were Canadians. As I understand it, six were United Kingdom citizens.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Graydon: I am asking the minister the question. Was the man with the notebook examined as to the six United Kingdom citizens? It seems to me that only the names were forwarded, and not the result of the examination, if any.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was aware of the answer to the question while he was asking it. He wants to know whether I know anything about this matter, and he knows perfectly well that I do not. Not having had anything to do with the examination of the gentleman concerned, I could not possibly answer the question without consulting with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I shall be glad to do that, taking my hon. friend's question as notice for that purpose, but without making any commitment about bringing down an answer.

Mr. Graydon: I want an answer from somebody in the government.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

QUESTION AS TO MEETING OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS

On the order for motions:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I rise on a question of privilege. On Friday last I raised a question about the calling of the standing committee on privileges and elections, but I was in error in referring to that committee. What I intended to refer to was the motion moved on April 18 by the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) for the setting up of a special committee "to study the several amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and amendments thereto, suggested by the chief electoral officer"; the motion then went on to enlarge upon the subjects to be considered. In view of the fact that that motion for a special committee was presented over a month ago by a member of the government, and was agreed to, may I ask the Secretary of State when it is his intention to call the committee together?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I understand that the committee is in process of organization. I shall make inquiries and give my hon. friend further information tomorrow.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TABLING OF REPORT OF RELIEF COMMISSION

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Yesterday, at the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), I tabled an interim report on the Fraser valley flood. At that time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked whether there were any other reports that had been made by this rehabilitation commission and, if so, would they be tabled. I made inquiries and I find that that commission was appointed not so much to make surveys and reports as to do a job. They did that job, and did it well, and at the end of the job they sent a letter to the Minister of Finance. Of course they were working in the closest co-operation with the government of British Columbia which, as in Manitoba today, was the government which had the direct responsibility for the administration of flood relief. If the house wishes to have tabled the letters between the minister and the rehabilitation commission, I shall table them; but they do not constitute an official report such as the hon. member requested.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank the parliamentary assistant for the explanation he has given. I think it would be worth while to have this correspondence tabled.

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—TAX EXEMPTIONS ON RELIEF FUND CONTRIBUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue, although I believe it will concern also the Minister of Finance. Will consideration be given to the request of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce that contributions to the Manitoba flood relief fund be exempted from taxation over and above the five per cent now allowed corporations and the ten per cent allowed individuals? If I may be permitted a word, it has been estimated that $5 million, half of the proposed objective of the fund, can be raised by corporations within Ontario if they are allowed this exemption.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the same point was raised a few days ago. The statement made then indicated that donations would be tax free provided they were supported by a proper affidavit that the funds were to be used for the purpose of flood relief.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Over and above the five and ten per cent?

Mr. Winters: I will have to check that and refer to what was said a few days ago.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I do not believe exemption was provided over and above the five and ten per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable that the question be taken by the minister as notice?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

JUDGES—NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Garson: On May 3 a question standing in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins), was answered, as appears at page 2124 of Hansard. I wish to table a revised answer to this question. The question and the revised answer follow:

Mr. Higgins:

1. Have steps been taken to appoint a fourth judge to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland?
2. If so, when will such appointment be made?
3. How many district court judges are to be appointed in Newfoundland?
4. When are such appointments to be made?

Mr. Garson:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No district court judges can be appointed until the Judges Act is amended to provide the salaries. A bill will be submitted to amend the Judges Act by providing salaries for five judges.

4. Answered by No. 3.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT—REMISSION OF FINES

Mr. Gillis:

1. What is the maximum penalty provided by the Migratory Birds Convention Act for infractions of its regulations?
2. What is the heaviest penalty paid under this act in Canada in the past five years?
3. How many convictions have been secured in Canada under this act during the past five years, with names of offenders and fines paid, by provinces?
4. Have any fines been remitted to offenders during the past five years by order in council or under instructions from any official of the responsible department?
5. Have any representations requesting the remission of fines imposed been received from any (a) members of parliament; (b) members of any provincial legislatures; (c) other particular body that might endeavour to pressure the government in this respect?

Mr. Prudham: On behalf of the Minister of Resources and Development I should like to table the answer to this question with the exception of part of section 3 which asks for the names of persons who have been convicted under the act. I have consulted with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and he has agreed to withdraw that part of the question on the condition that the list is made available to him or any other hon. member wishing to see it.

The answers follow:

1. The maximum penalty provided by the Migratory Birds Convention Act for infraction of its regulations is a fine of $300, or imprisonment for a term of six months, or both fine and imprisonment as stated.

2. The heaviest fine imposed under the above act in Canada from April 1, 1945, to March 31, 1950, according to the records of the department, was $100. In many cases the imposition of a fine was accompanied by forfeiture of weapons and equipment. The records place no specific value on the goods confiscated.

3. From April 1, 1945, to March 31, 1950, departmental records show that 579 convictions were secured under the Migratory Birds Convention Act, distributed territorially as follows: Prince Edward Island, 47; Nova Scotia, 66; New Brunswick, 52; Ontario, 77; Quebec, 250; Manitoba, 8; Saskatchewan, 59; Alberta, 11; British Columbia, 7; Yukon Territory, 2.

In some cases the same person was convicted on the same day of more than one offence, with separate penalties being imposed; such convictions are recorded separately. The names of the offenders are not being tabled with this return, but the list is available to any member wishing to see it. The figures quoted include only convictions secured on information laid by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and do not include convictions secured on information laid by provincial game officers holding the appointment of game officers ex officio under the act. It is not the practice of provincial authorities to report such cases to the federal government.

4. Departmental records indicate that only one fine of $10 imposed for infractions of the Migratory Birds Convention Act has been remitted to an offender during the last five years. Evidence submitted to the Department of Justice after conviction was that a provincial game officer had previously given this offender incorrect information regarding the boundaries of a bird sanctuary in question, and that he had been apprehended while he believed, in accordance with that information, that he was outside the bird sanctuary. On the strength of this evidence his Excellency the Governor General requested that the fine be remitted.

5. No representations requesting remission of fines, other than the one mentioned, imposed under the Migratory Birds Convention Act, have been received by this department during the period since April 1, 1945, from any person or organization.

HOUSING—CONSTRUCTION BY CO-OPERATIVE GROUPS

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. How many houses have been built by co-operative groups during each of the years 1946 to 1949?
2. Where are these houses located by provinces?
3. What was the cost per unit for each group?

Mr. Prudham: The department was unable to get complete answers to this question, but such information as is available has been forwarded to the hon. member for St. John's West, and he has agreed to drop the question.

Question dropped.

RATES FOR CARRYING OF FREIGHT BY TRUCKS

Mr. Hansell:

1. Who is responsible for determining rates for carrying freight by truck within each of the provinces?
2. Who is responsible for determining rates for interprovincial freight by trucks?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Each province has full jurisdiction over intraprovincial traffic on provincial highways.

2. The federal government has claimed the right to exercise jurisdiction over interprovincial highway traffic, but this claim has been disputed by certain provinces.

LEGAL SERVICES—DOUGLAS MCNISH AND D. W. H. HENRY

Mr. Conacher:

1. What was the result of the case of Paul C. Gilbert, sued by the crown on October 27, 1949?
2. What amounts were paid to Douglas McNish and D. W. H. Henry as legal fees?

Mr. Garson:

1. No decision has been given.
2. No legal fees have been paid.

TAX AGREEMENT WITH NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What amounts of money have been paid to the government of the province of Newfoundland since April 1, 1949, by virtue of the recent tax agreement?
2. On what dates were these payments, and what amount on each occasion?

Mr. Sinclair:

1 and 2. $4,859,747.46, on March 29, 1950.

ESPIONAGE—NOTEBOOK OF KLAUS FUCHS

Mr. Fulton:

1. Have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police been able to identify all of the 150 persons then resident in Canada, listed in the notebook found as a result of the espionage investigations of 1945 and 1946, containing the name of Klaus Fuchs?
2. If not, how many have they been able to identify?

Mr. Garson: The notebook referred to in the hon. member's question was in fact a pocket address book containing, as the question indicates, the names of 150 persons then resident in Canada. It formed only one item of many thousands of documents seized in the searches made in conjunction with the arrest of the spy suspects in 1946. In this mass of material so seized there were many such notebooks, also desk calendars, memo pads, telephone finders, mailing lists, etc., which contained thousands of names, addresses, telephone numbers and miscellaneous entries. All this material was carefully examined, including the notebook in question.

The list of the 150 names referred to was carefully checked to ascertain which of these 150 names, if any, were those of persons who could be suspected of espionage or subversive activity. It was found that a limited number of the persons named belonged to either or both of these groups. In all such cases where positive identification proved possible, the entries were then related to and dealt with on the appropriate investigation files. As some of these investigations are still current, it will be appreciated that it would not be desirable to specify the number of persons identified.

The majority of the entries in this notebook, however, refer to professional people and others of good repute whose loyalty is beyond question.

Mr. Fulton:

How many of the 150 Canadians listed in the notebook found as a result of the espionage investigations of 1945 and 1946 and containing the name of Klaus Fuchs (a) have been in the employ of the dominion government at any time since June, 1945; (b) are now in the employ of the dominion government?

Mr. Garson: This question cannot be answered with precision in view of the time covered by (a) and the vagueness of the identifying data available in the notebook. It can be said, however, that the number involved was small. With the exception of two persons who appeared before the royal commission on espionage and subsequently relinquished their positions, there can be no reflection upon the loyalty of the other government employees identified.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—EMPLOYEES DISCHARGED FOR SECURITY REASONS

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many employees of the national research council have been discharged for security reasons since January 1, 1946?
2. What were the dates of such discharges?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Two.
2. March 4, 1946, and March 29, 1946.

SOLDIER SETTLERS—SECURITY ON LAND

Mr. Fair:

1. Under the soldier settlement board legislation dealing with veterans of world war I was it the practice or policy to take a mortgage on a settler's own land to provide security for the soldier settlement board's loan for the purchase of land?
2. If so, in how many cases was security taken on the settler's land?
3. Did the soldier settlement board take foreclosure proceedings to secure title to such land given as security?
4. If so, in how many instances?

Mr. Mutch:

1. Yes, under the terms of section 32 of the Soldier Settlement Act, in some cases where security was insufficient. In other cases, second mortgage was taken; in the case of dominion lands, a charge was registered.

2. There is no statistical record of these cases, and the expense of examining all soldier settlers' accounts is not considered justified.

3. Yes, in some cases.

4. There is no statistical record of these cases, and the expense of examining all soldier settlers' accounts is not considered justified.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

STATIONERY USED BY GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Fulton:

1. For each branch or department of government as shown at pages 2 and 3 of the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1951, how many different types, sizes and forms of stationery for correspondence are presently authorized?
2. How many different types, sizes and forms of envelopes are presently authorized?
3. How many different types, sizes and forms of memorandum paper are presently authorized?

IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

Mr. Hansell:

1. What was the value in dollars of imports from Japan during the years 1948 and 1949?
2. What were the chief classifications of these products in 1949, and what is the value of each?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

T.C.A.—TRANSPORTATION FOR GOVERNMENT PERSONNEL

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the total amount paid to the T.C.A. for air transportation for government officers, employees or officials in each of the fiscal years 1948-49 and 1949-50?
2. Of the said amount what was the amount expended for travelling (a) within; (b) outside of Canada?

R.C.A.F.—TRANSPORTATION FOR MINISTERS AND PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

Mr. Fraser:

1. What cabinet ministers and parliamentary assistants used R.C.A.F. planes for travel during (a) 1949; (b) first two months of 1950?

2. Where were these trips to, and was return made by air?

3. What was charged each department for each of these trips?

4. What was the estimated cost for each of these trips to (a) the R.C.A.F.; (b) government-owned planes; (c) other commercial planes?

NORTH CHANNEL SHIP AND YACHT REPAIR COMPANY

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has any effort been made since May 4, 1950, to ascertain whether Mr. H. K. Hill is connected in any way with the North Channel Ship and Yacht Repair Company?

2. Is the North Channel Ship and Yacht Repair Company registered at the local registry office at Kingston, Ontario?

3. If so, who is listed as the owner or proprietor thereof?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all engineering reports concerning the feasibility of the South Saskatchewan river and irrigation project that have been received since the first of August, 1949.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Saskatchewan since June 1, 1949, and to date, in connection with the South Saskatchewan river power and irrigation project, and in particular concerning the division of financial responsibility in and for the construction of the said project as between the two governments.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the hon. member for Lake Centre that the same information as is sought by this motion was requested before and was brought down on April 17.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am concerned only with anything since that date.

Mr. Gardiner: There has been nothing since.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

CARLETON COUNTY, N.B., RURAL MAIL SERVICE

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of the Post Office Department with reference to the establishing of rural free mail delivery routes for the communities of Holmesville, Mineral, Moose Mountain and Killowen, in Carleton county, New Brunswick, and the eliminating of the post offices at Mineral, Moose Mountain and Killowen, including (without restricting the generality of the foregoing) a copy of all correspondence, and any maps or charts referred to therein, exchanged between the Post Office Department or any officers thereof and Mr. D. R. Bishop.

Inquiries of the Ministry

RADIO BROADCASTING

QUESTION AS TO REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of National Revenue if he will give consideration to having items 267 and 268 of the estimates, relating to the international shortwave broadcasting station, referred to the special committee on radio broadcasting for study and report.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of National Revenue): I will take the question as notice and give an answer later.

ENEMY PROPERTY

CANADIAN CLAIMS FOR WAR DAMAGE—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON MAY 15

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Secretary of State to be good enough to give the information I asked for on May 16 as a supplementary statement or explanation of an answer to a question I asked about assets of former enemies in the hands of the custodian of enemy property.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I have been in touch with the officials of the department, and a statement is being prepared.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have not time to give continuity to the remarks I was making last night by recapitulating what I said. My concluding words were that we had not yet received word from any senior government as to what financial aid was to be given. I shall deal with the provincial government later. At the moment let me deal with the federal government.

We have been told that aid will be given on the same terms as aid was given to those who suffered from the floods in the Fraser valley. I feel that that would be excellent, if it is correct. I am informed that a grant of $5 million was given to British Columbia in the case of the Fraser valley, which rather more than covered rehabilitation costs. An order in council, P.C. 2644, passed in June, 1948, declared the British Columbia flood to be "a national disaster so serious and pressing as to make it necessary for the good government of Canada that the government of Canada join with the government of British Columbia in taking relief and rehabilitation measures."

I know of no such statement being made so far about the flood situation in Manitoba. I know that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has called it a misfortune of the first order, whereas we in Manitoba are inclined to call it, on the basis of our experience, a national disaster. When the Prime Minister was in Winnipeg the other day he attended this by now notorious press conference. He was asked by a reporter if the government had formally recognized the flood as a national emergency. As reported in the Winnipeg Free Press for May 22, 1950, he replied:

> I do not like the words "national emergency." When something happens to Canadians, then all Canadians are interested. Already there is ample proof of the widespread effect upon Canadians that this flood has had.

May I say that there is most widespread and generous proof indeed, but not yet proof from the senior governments. At a later stage the Prime Minister was asked if he had found the picture as black as it had been painted, and he replied, "Perhaps not". We are told on the front page of the Winnipeg Free Press that the Prime Minister made a four-hour tour of the dikes. One cannot hope to see the misery which prevails in the community in a tour lasting only four hours. The Prime Minister also said at the same conference that relatives of his had been affected by floods, that they had recovered and re-established themselves by their own efforts, and so far as they were concerned good luck to them. But the Prime Minister's relatives did not have the flood problems from which the people of Point Douglas in Winnipeg are suffering today. Working class people there have lost their homes and their jobs. Families have been evacuated to points all over the prairies.

In British Columbia the grant was for one phase of the flood. We do not know whether that is going to be so in Manitoba. In addition to the grant there was, however, another seventy-five per cent paid by the federal government toward the cost of fighting the floods, and for the building of permanent dikes. I should also like to point out that the commission which has been appointed has been requested to ascertain the cost of emergency precautions to guard against the recurrence of floods. We are not at all interested in emergency precautions. What we are interested in is something much more permanent. It is plain that the federal government must make its position amply clear so that the people of Winnipeg and Manitoba generally may know where they stand.

I think it only right that I should indicate in chronological order the sequence of events. Here I want to refer to the Winnipeg Tribune, a newspaper to which I have made uncomplimentary references in the past and to which I shall probably refer in the same way in future. I am retracting those references for the period of this crisis, however, for this newspaper has shown courage, vision and a consciousness of responsibility which I find heart-warming in a time such as this. On April 4 the newspaper reported that there were serious floods along the Red river in North Dakota. I believe the permanent officials of the provincial government knew of the situation long before that and that they advised their superiors; nevertheless no action was taken. On April 10 this newspaper warned the people that snow and cold would increase the city flood danger. No action was taken by the premier. On April 11 the Tribune warned the city that floods threatened its well-being; still no action by the premier. On April 12 the people of Fort Garry and East Kildonan, without any help, started to reinforce their own dikes; still no word from the premier. On April 14 an agreement was entered into with the Department of National Defence under which the province of Manitoba agreed to pay for whatever services were rendered; yet the services of the army, the navy and the air force were not utilized until May 6.

I can find no explanation for such a lack of action. It may have been a complete failure to appreciate the devastation which threatened. It may have been a matter of pettifogging parsimony; I do not know. I am only reciting facts as I know them.

On April 18 the Red Cross proclaimed that the floods at Grand Forks in the United States were a disaster; no word from the premier. On April 21 the river was over its banks in certain areas of Winnipeg; the premier was quiet. On April 24 the river was two feet under the 1948 peak; still no word from the premier of Manitoba. On the same date Elm Park, a residential area, was cut off; yet the premier was silent. On May 1, as hon. members will recall, members of all parties in this house discussed the matter of the floods in Manitoba, and we urged the premier of that province to declare it a national emergency. Still he was silent. During that week thousands of homes were evacuated; still there was silence. Thousands of people left the city; the silence continued.

Finally, on May 6, Brigadier Morton, G.O.C. prairie command, was appointed controller of flood relief; but let there be no misunderstanding as to the meaning of that word "controller". It meant very little indeed; for when I went to the dikes and asked people who was in charge, they said no one was in charge. They were doing the work themselves, without supervision or direction, in order that they might save the city. The army had no power either to requisition materials that were needed or to direct people to the areas which needed help most. During those days the Winnipeg Free Press was asking for some centralized control or authority that could give priority to the needs of the city, but to the best of my knowledge that action was never taken.

When I speak of Brigadier Morton, let me take this opportunity to pay tribute to the tremendous efforts of the men of the navy, the army and the R.C.A.F. to help save the city. In particular, my colleagues here from Quebec might be interested to learn that the men of the Vingt-deux regiment played a great part in building that forty-foot dike which today protects the city hydro power station from immersion.

Finally, on May 7, the premier of Manitoba asked the federal government to recognize the situation in that province as a national disaster. Only then did he make his request, but after that he resumed the lethargy which had characterized him up to that time and said nothing more, even though representatives of the city and municipalities went to him and pleaded for some statement as to what part of the cost the province would be prepared to bear. Still there was silence. A meeting of that kind took place only a week ago, and the only result was a wire from the premier to the Prime Minister of Canada asking him to visit the flood area. The premier would give no commitment to those people who were carrying on the battle against the flood. By his silence he piled indecision upon frustration. It is true that night after night he would go on the air to tell the people what he thought was happening. He told of the grand work the people themselves were doing, and of the committees that were going to be set up to help them, but there was not a definite word as to what assistance would be forthcoming to any municipality. Then, just about a week ago today, he told us that his conscience was clear. No one had questioned the clarity of his conscience. No one gave a continental red cent as to the condition of his conscience. A statement like that shows how fatuity has been heaped upon futility by the provincial government throughout.

Today the people are still doing the job that has to be done. Our citizens, without leadership, have shown that inner strength which comes to free people in times like these. They went out and provided their own leadership to do the job that had to be done.

My words of criticism of the leadership in the province should not in any way lead hon. members to think that the need for help is not great indeed. There are those who have travelled with tragedy; who, as far as practical offers of help are concerned, are still doomed to dwell in despair. What is the reaction of the premier to this? Just a few days ago he broke his silence and said that, in cases of need, substantial financial help would be forthcoming. What he meant was that there would be a means test on misery; and that is precisely what is happening. Families have lost everything. There is a tension amongst those who know they have nothing left in the world. There is a tension amongst those who fear they may still lose everything they have; yet we have no leadership and no hope of leadership from the provincial government.

Now, what are the needs? Over 100,000 people have been evacuated. I hope many of them may be able to return to their homes very shortly. Many others will not be able to go back to their homes for several months. Here, then, is a terrific problem in social rehabilitation. How are those people to be kept away from Winnipeg? Who is going to pay the cost if they have to board in other areas or other cities? The Prime Minister says some 8,000 homes have been damaged. I do not think that is correct; I dispute it. The figure is over 12,000 or I miss my guess. Not only have homes been irretrievably damaged; whole city streets have gone. I know of one stretch in my own constituency, at Cathedral and Aikens, which has collapsed to a depth of four feet. Today the city is literally resting on water.

What is the condition of the homes? Take the place in which I used to live, for instance, where the water is right up to the ceiling. Obviously the plaster will be destroyed; and this applies to all homes of that kind. If there is stucco on the outside it will be ruined. If there is insulation it will have soaked up water right to the top storey. All that insulation will have to be torn out; and anyone who knows anything about houses will realize what a task that is. Flooring is completely sprung. Joists, sills and beams are swollen and twisted out of shape, because this water has not been there for only a few days; in many cases it has been there for three weeks, and may well be there for another three weeks. Electrical appliances and electrical wiring are ruined. All these things will have to be rebuilt. In effect new houses will have to be built; and that will perhaps give members an indication of the task which faces us.

I maintain that the very least we can do in the face of this disaster, a disaster which perhaps the insurance companies may term an act of God, is that there should be complete rehabilitation for the victims of these floods. I doubt very much whether the generosity of either this government or the provincial government will permit that to be done, because the damage is extraordinary. I would hesitate to hazard a guess, but if I say the damage amounts to $100 million I am sure I shall not be far out. If we are not going to have complete rehabilitation, then I suggest as the very minimum that all those who receive salaries up to $300 a month be put back in their homes as they were before the flood and without cost to them; all those who receive salaries between $300 and $400 a month might perhaps get ninety per cent, and all those between $400 and $500 a month might perhaps receive eighty per cent. All this, of course, would be subject to any payments made by insurance companies.

I suggest further that those who have lost money due to the floods be permitted to charge those losses against income tax next year. There is a commission to assess the damages which has been asked to give this house accurate data. It will not be possible for any commission to give this house accurate data in time for us to consider the report before the house rises. The best it can do is to give us a progress report, but even then the commission will have to be arbitrary. How will it assess the damages? Will it go around to each house, in each locality, and say that so much damage has been suffered? How can the commission state the damage when the damage will not be seen for months yet? There is only one thing which can be done, and that is to make the houses livable, to refurnish them as far as possible so that the owners may live in them. After that, we can find out the cost.

Let me say that the construction industry and the electrical industry in Winnipeg are more than willing to co-operate with civic authorities. They have already indicated they are at the disposal of the municipality in the tremendous task of rebuilding homes. The electrical industry, for instance, has said that a meeting would be held to decide what charges should be made for each particular item of repair. Flat rates would be set up, and there would be no profiteering by that industry. The building industry has to be mobilized, but what about the contractor who has contracts to build other houses? I do not think this is the time for building new houses. There is too great a problem of rehabilitation, and in some way or other the contractors will have to be protected against suits for breach of contract if they do emergency work. There will be a great demand for skilled craftsmen, such as carpenters, electricians and plasterers. The Department of Labour must consider this problem. There are not enough craftsmen of these types in Manitoba, so we may need a reserve of skilled labour upon which we can draw.

Those are just some of the problems which face us. I could continue enumerating them almost indefinitely, as I am sure other members could, but time does not permit. There is a job of work to be done. I can assure members that every contribution they make to the fund which is being raised in the house is going to be needed desperately. Every contribution which the people of Canada can make is going to be equally needed. It is not right that the people themselves should have to suffer because of the indecision of their leaders. In the final analysis, the collective responsibility of our society, and the financial power of our society, lies in the parliament of Canada. Our people are stricken. As I said before they are not out, and they never will be out; but they are grievously hurt. The federal government must be more positive than it has been up to the present. It must be more generous than it has yet indicated it intends to be.

May I suggest that at the moment the most practical thing we could do here would be to establish a minimum grant in aid, an interim payment as it were, of about $10 million, which could be given to the provincial government, so that it, in turn, could hand the money over to the municipalities to enable them to assume the responsibility which the provincial government has given up by default.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, as has been pointed out by the previous speaker (Mr. Stewart) the Winnipeg Tribune of April 4 carried headlines to the effect that the Red river floods in North Dakota were becoming alarming. Everyone knows that the Red river flows north through Manitoba from North Dakota. It is quite some time since April 4, and I am told by very reliable authorities that the engineers in the United States, from both North Dakota and Minnesota, have shown fine co-operation with the authorities of Manitoba. I believe that to be true.

I wish to refer to a statement by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) which is to be found on page 2478 of Hansard of May 15. I am not finding fault with the statement, but I want to clarify it to some extent. It reads as follows:

> Right from May 6, the day on which Premier Campbell as head of the provincial authorities instructed Brigadier General Morton to take over, he and his staff have been performing a simply magnificent feat of organization and direction.

With that I agree. Now, to people of military service at least, that statement instructing Brigadier General Morton to take over should be clarified. He has only been given authority to fight the flood and to say what districts should be evacuated. That is as far as his authority extends. Then the Red Cross takes over, and it is in charge of the evacuation of the people. I want to say that organization has done a magnificent job. Brigadier Morton and his staff of some 4,000 service personnel and 50,000 civilian volunteers have done a splendid job, as has the Red Cross, the railway companies and their employees, the bus companies and their employees, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Many other organizations have taken part.

I want to make that clear, because many people in Manitoba think that the military had complete authority from that date forward, and that is not so. In fact I shall give the house a concrete example. In Premier Campbell's own constituency there are two airports, one just outside Portage la Prairie, and one at Macdonald. The buildings at these airports I believe could accommodate a thousand people each, but no one had authority to use those buildings. I wanted to make that quite clear. It was referred to in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 12. The editorial reads as follows:

> Many people assume that Brigadier Morton, in the present situation, is the agent of the federal government and in charge of the fight against the flood. He is not either one or the other. He is the agent of the province which is paying the cost of the services of the military employed in the flood. Able and resourceful as he is showing himself to be, he has been given no power. He has no powers except over a limited number of military personnel and such results as he can secure by persuasion. The statements regarding the national emergency, made last Saturday and Monday, do not alter in any respect the responsibility of the provincial government.

Mr. Weir: Would my hon. friend permit me to clarify the matter to which he has referred? Representations were made to me with respect to making the airports around Portage la Prairie available, and I immediately took up the matter with the proper authorities. Incidentally, the ownership of the buildings is an involved matter, but I was finally assured by the Minister of National Defence, that the problem was within the control of the army officers in Winnipeg and the buildings would be available for use at their discretion if requested.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I thank the hon. member for that information, but as I have already pointed out, the army authorities have no authority beyond fighting the flood itself and stating what districts should be evacuated. The authority of the armed forces terminated at that point; therefore the responsibility was that of the Manitoba provincial government.

Mr. Weir: In that same connection I might say that the army authorities did go to inspect these buildings to which my hon. friend has referred in case they might be needed for greater service in evacuating people. The inspection was made and the whole set-up reviewed as one being available if required.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance made a rather significant statement this afternoon on the orders of the day when he said that the Fraser river valley commission was appointed not so much to obtain information as to do a job, which they did. That seems to be the real difference between the handling of the Fraser river situation in 1948 and the Red river flood of today. There is a real difference. I pointed that out to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) yesterday when I asked him whether he had any idea as to when this commission might report. I also pointed out to him how difficult it might be for him to answer the question. Apparently this commission can get information only and report back, as I understand it. I may be wrong.

I asked further whether there had been a request from the Manitoba government for an interim grant, as was done for the British Columbia government in the Fraser river flood in 1948, and the Prime Minister said, not to his knowledge. I am surprised there has not been a request of that kind from the provincial government.

If one has not seen the situation out there, as has the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the Prime Minister, and I think all the members from Manitoba, one cannot appreciate it. I was there on the first day of the evacuation to any great extent. On the night before I was there and on that day they moved out over 15,000 people. I talked with railway people who had not slept for forty-eight hours. Unless you saw these mothers and little children gathered around them with no means left, you cannot appreciate it. I went through one of the special trains and I interviewed many people who had not a dollar of their own money with them. The Red Cross had looked after the transportation, but they were not sure where they were going.

Apart from shells bursting over a city, I have never seen anything that looked more like the picture I witnessed during the first war in France and Belgium when the evacuation from the front lines area was taking place. That is how it impressed me at that time. These people have gone through a great deal. Since then—I am not sure of the figures—in the neighbourhood of 100,000 people have been evacuated from Winnipeg. The people, who out of the generosity of their hearts have taken these families into their homes, and the municipal corporations, are responsible for them.

Yesterday I received a letter from the mayor of a town in my constituency which is at the far end of the province from Winnipeg. They are happy to be looking after these people, and he told me of their problems. He said that the town corporation and the rural municipalities are financing the entire business without, so far, a promise of reimbursement from anybody. He was not complaining about it. He was writing about some other matters, and happened to point out the situation.

As a citizen of Manitoba I am very sorry to say that the only organization that has failed, and has failed miserably to date, has been our provincial government and our Premier Campbell. I do not think people can misconstrue my making that statement, because I have been a supporter of the coalition government. I voted for one of their candidates last fall. I am ashamed of the situation today. I have been in and out of Winnipeg several times in the past few days and have seen this matter from several angles, and what I say is my candid opinion. I want to say in all fairness that some departments of the government and many government employees have done and are doing a magnificent job with respect to the disastrous Manitoba Red river flood problem. I think I should say that on behalf of these people.

An hon. Member: The department of public works?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not mentioning any names. I want to say that they too did a good job. I did not see the minister of public works when I was in Winnipeg, but I have seen his staff. I can tell you that on one Sunday the entire staff worked from daylight to dark. I do not know where the minister was. I presume he was busy in cabinet council. As I say, I did not see him. The deputy minister of public works and his staff worked from daylight to dark and did a magnificent job, as did other members of the provincial government. I saw that myself.

I want to say something about the statement of Mayor Garnet Coulter*, whom I have known for many years. In fact when I had the honour of being president of the Manitoba union of municipalities he was then an alderman in the city of Winnipeg and a member of the executive serving with me. I always considered him a mild-mannered, even-tempered, careful public official, careful about his statements. I think anybody else who has known him will bear me out in that statement. When I read in the newspapers that he was reported as saying—and as I listened to the report over the air—that Premier Campbell was guilty of criminal negligence, I was surprised. I was surprised at that language coming from him, but that is how serious the matter has become.

Many of us from Manitoba used to know Mrs. McQueen and her husband, who was killed in an air crash going west doing war service work. Mrs. McQueen is now doing social service work in Manitoba. According to the press, she used the very same terms. This is a serious business. Both of these public officials stated that Premier Campbell and his government were guilty of causing undue mental suffering to many of these people. As I say, I am sorry about that whole situation.

I said something about the municipalities taking care of these people. On the radio farmers for forty or fifty miles around Winnipeg who had farm tractors that were useful, large trucks and all that kind of thing, were appealed to. They were asked to come in and use that equipment in Winnipeg. I witnessed some of these huge trucks getting into difficulties in the subway going across to St. Boniface. You have all heard and read much of the Norwood dike. I want to tell you of the great piece of human effort that was put into that dike. It has been nothing short of a miracle that it has stood up and that there has been no great loss of life. But I watched those huge trucks going into the subway in several feet of water. The motors would stall, and a caterpillar tractor would be hitched onto them in an endeavour to pull them out and the chain would snap. Any man who is familiar with machinery or is of a mechanical turn of mind knows what damage that would do to those motors and to that equipment. These farmers have been doing that kind of work, supplying their own gas and fuel and that type of equipment without any promise of satisfactory reimbursement. In fact those from Manitoba will bear this in mind. The city of St. Boniface has gone through financial difficulties, and they are not yet in a position to make expenditures of that kind freely. They are making a great comeback; it is a great city, but they are in an embarrassing financial situation right now. I just give that as a concrete example of the difficulties.

There is a great deal of that kind of work being done by private individuals, and some municipalities are not even in shape to reimburse those people who should at least have some definite promise, because it is just about two months since the first warning was given; and even the rural people, whom we are now forgetting to some extent because of the great disaster in the city of Winnipeg, were first to be overrun in this flood. Their homes were flooded, and many of them were destroyed. Some of their stock were lost and they went through terrible difficulties. That is now quite a while ago.

I do not want to repeat many of the arguments that have been made by the previous speakers. I recently received a letter from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce, dated May 15, 1950, which reads as follows:

> At an emergent meeting of the executive of the Winnipeg chamber of commerce held Saturday morning, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:
> The chamber is strongly of the opinion that capital costs and/or restoration and reconstruction of damage occasioned by the flood are the sole responsibility of senior governments and that the chamber make strong representation to the authorities concerned in support of this position. Further, that funds supplied by these governments be administered by a strong independent commission appointed jointly by the senior governments.

With that resolution I agree. That is the least that can be expected.

Then, with respect to the campaign for funds for Manitoba flood relief, in my opinion that certainly deserves the wholehearted support of every citizen and every organization throughout the nation. One may hear the argument that this was advertising on the part of the T. Eaton Company. But, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) in connection with the great contributions made by people throughout this nation to the Fraser valley flood relief, I can tell you that if some people had been living in Manitoba, where I was, last year, and listened to some ministers of this government stating that you could not trust a past head of an Ontario government, and other eastern people, then this contribution by this great company which originated in the east is very heartening.

It is heartening to know that the T. Eaton Company and other companies have done what they have. One thinks of the employees of the T. Eaton Company, which originated in eastern Canada, raising over $153,000, and this sum was matched dollar for dollar by the company executive, making a total of $307,000 from that organization. Surely that gives one fresh faith in humanity. That is being done not only within this nation, but in other nations throughout the world.

I hold in my hand a quotation which states:

> To pity distress is but human; to relieve it is God-like.

So long ago wrote the American philosopher Horace Mann as he meditated on the spontaneous kindness of warm-hearted people of differing faiths and beliefs as they instinctively rushed to aid their fellow human beings in great distress.

The people of southern Manitoba have suffered a catastrophe from flood unequalled in the history of Canada. All those in a rural area containing twelve towns and villages, seventy miles long and thirty miles wide, have been obliged suddenly to leave their farms and homes. Everything they possessed is under water, much of their belongings and a good deal of their livestock and seed is destroyed. Tens of thousands of city people in Winnipeg likewise have had to flee from their homes, leaving behind clothing, household equipment, furniture and possessions of all kinds.

These thousands of refugees—men, women and children alike—now sit sad and bewildered in strange places, far from their once happy farms and homes, wondering what the future holds for them.

But their hearts will be gladdened, their spirits uplifted and their hopes renewed as they hear the tidings that their warm-hearted fellow citizens are donating generously to the Manitoba flood relief fund. Contributions made to this most worthy fund will relieve human distress and, more, will ennoble the giver.

I should like to refer to a question asked on the orders of the day. I did realize that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) announced that contributions of this nature would be exempt from taxation. I believe that under the act goes to the extent of five per cent for corporations and ten per cent for individuals of income. I know personally of individuals who have already obligated themselves to charitable institutions to the extent of ten per cent of their incomes. Some people did that for their churches alone.

Then, in respect of corporations, it has been pointed out by an organization in Toronto that if full exemptions were granted in respect of contributions, throughout the province of Ontario alone one-half the proposed fund of $10 million would be raised. They point out that they believe those corporations would raise $5 million in that province alone. Surely this should be given serious consideration. I know of individuals who, as I say, have obligated themselves to the extent of ten per cent to their churches alone. There are branches of the Legion, and many other charitable institutions to which people make donations each year. If they wish to increase those amounts, surely they should be granted exemptions above the ten per cent for individuals and the five per cent for corporations.

I do not know how to go about it, but I would like to be able to bring some pressure to bear on our provincial government, to give a greater lead for the benefit of these poor, suffering human beings in Manitoba. I have talked with people who have put all their investments into their homes in Winnipeg. In earlier statements I have referred more particularly to rural areas. But those people in Winnipeg have been paying for their homes on the instalment plan, and buying furniture in the same way, in many cases to the extent that they did not have a dollar with which to get out of the flooded area. Surely the senior governments will give these people a greater lead than they have yet seen.

I have seen some terribly disappointed people out there. And while the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is sitting here I wish to say this, that I have heard many people in Winnipeg state publicly that they think the premier of Manitoba has depended too much for advice on the ex-premier of Manitoba, now the minister from Manitoba in this government. If that is not right, then I hope the Minister of Justice will make it clear, because one may take that from his statement which can be read in Hansard for May 1.

As I say, that is the prevalent feeling among those people. Many thousands are in a troubled state of mind. I hope that as members of this House of Commons we can put pressure on the provincial government in Manitoba to give greater leadership to the people of that province who are greatly distressed as a result of this most terrible catastrophe that has befallen any part of this nation.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it certainly had not been my intention to take part in this debate. I feel sure that if the level which was set by the admirable statement by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) had been maintained, I never should have taken part in it. Let me pay my small tribute to the leader of the opposition:

there have been very few occasions where in any gathering I have heard a statement that was more appropriate to the occasion than the one he made in this same connection yesterday.

It is therefore most regrettable that the hon. member who has just taken his seat has not seen fit to follow the example of his leader.

Mr. Ross (Souris): My leader has not been out on the ground there yet.

Mr. Garson: I would repeat my statement whether my hon. friend the leader of the opposition had been on the ground or not because, if I may be permitted to say so, I have sufficient confidence in the leader of the opposition to believe that if he had been there he would still act in the same way he did yesterday.

May I make this clear, that I speak today in this House of Commons with a strong bias. Members of the present Manitoba government, both Liberal and Conservative, were personal friends and colleagues of mine over a considerable period of years. During that time I had never associated with men of greater loyalty, better judgment or greater experience in public life than they displayed. The very Premier Campbell, whom my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Ross) now traduces, is a man who went into the legislature in 1922 and has continued to enjoy the confidence of his constituents, and whose government has continued to enjoy the confidence of the people of Manitoba during the intervening twenty-eight years.

Speaking with that bias, and speaking in my capacity as a private member of this House of Commons—not as a member of the government—I think it is very desirable that there should be placed upon the record certain facts if for no other reason than that the position of Manitoba shall not be misrepresented in respect of the appeal for funds which is being made.

I am free to confess that, although these gentlemen are friends of mine, in one important respect they have been, in my judgment, derelict.

In this modern age when industry and government pay a good deal of attention to public relations, and for the most part have their public relations in the hands of professionals, my friends and former colleagues in Manitoba were so busy doing a job that I regret to say they seriously neglected to tell the people of Manitoba and the world of the job they were doing. Having regard to the fact that in a disaster of this sort the maintenance of public confidence is an important element in the handling of the situation I would be free to confess that in that regard they are subject to criticism.

In respect of that shortcoming, they provided their own penalty of being seriously misjudged by a number of sincere people, two of whom we have heard this afternoon in this debate. For in spite of the fact that I disagree with both hon. gentlemen in some matters I believe they are fair-minded and would not be disposed to criticize too severely if they were convinced there was no proper ground for doing so.

I intend to relate certain facts this afternoon, but I do not think I could achieve any greater over-all effect upon the minds of my listeners than by describing a short episode which took place when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) met the reeves and mayors and representatives of the municipalities concerned in the Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg last Sunday night.

Because of the travel over water and land that was necessary many of the reeves in the rural areas found it impossible to be present, but there was at least one reeve from a rural area present. I had rather gained the impression from this storm of criticism which appeared in certain newspapers and on the part of certain members of the House of Commons that when this meeting with the representatives of the municipalities took place there would be more protest and criticism against both governments, in particular against the provincial government which was represented at the meeting by Premier Campbell himself.

When his turn came to report, this rural reeve said, "We have no complaint to make. We were advised six weeks ago by a representative of the provincial government in plenty of time to make all necessary preparations for the flood. Of course no kind of preparation would enable us to cope with a flood of this size. But we took every step that was possible and were as well prepared as we could be for the flood when it did come." He then went on to relate what assistance they had been receiving, and I intend to lay the statistics with regard to this assistance before the house, and indicated that they wanted to carry on on that basis.

There was none of the deep anxiety and apprehension voiced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), nor was there any of the criticism that has been voiced by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). These people were right in the middle of the flood and were responsible to the municipal citizens. All this bears out a report which I placed on the record on one of the previous occasions when I addressed the house.

Mr. Ross (Souris): To what official is the minister referring?

Mr. Garson: It was Reeve Arthur Beaubien of St. Jean, whom my hon. friend knows personally and who is a very good man.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He is.

Mr. Garson: Of course he is. This experience bears out what I told the members of this house on a previous occasion when I voiced my admiration for what the provincial government had done.

May I say to the hon. member for Souris, if he thinks I am trying to take some credit for having advised them, that I must expressly disclaim it because being a reasonably modest man I do not undertake to advise people how to cope with a disaster which is taking place 1,500 miles away when they are in the midst of it and I am on the outside.

The report I previously put on the record was made in writing by John Conner, head of the livestock branch of the department of agriculture. If I am not mistaken, the hon. member for Souris said that he is a very fine man.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He certainly is. I know him quite well.

Mr. Garson: Hon. members will perhaps recall that the first report was made on April 28 after he had returned from a trip through this area. He stated that he had gone out to warn the people that a flood was coming. Reeve Beaubien told us that the provincial authorities had warned him, had told him that the flood would be two feet higher than it was in 1948, and that the steps they would have to take to meet the situation would have to take that additional height into account. Conner's report was to the effect that many farmers, having so recently suffered the 1948 flood, had taken steps already before he warned them to evacuate their animals, their seed, their feed and the like.

It certainly does not look as though the government were lacking in foresight. It does not look as though they were, as I understood the hon. member for Souris to imply, paying no attention to the views of United States engineers. But they did not have to pay any attention to the views of United States engineers. At a critical stage of the flood they brought up a man—

Mr. Ross (Souris): I gave credit to certain departments and to certain government officials for the splendid work that was being done.

Mr. Garson: I shall deal with the departments to which my hon. friend did not give credit. By a most extraordinary coincidence the department to which he gave credit, public works, happens to be headed by a Conservative minister.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister has referred to Mr. Conner, who is a member of the department of agriculture in the provincial government. He is one of the finest officials in the government.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend and I can agree that Mr. Conner is a fine man.

Mr. Bryce: I will agree with that also.

Mr. Garson: As I was saying, they did not need to have the advice of United States engineers because when they brought a United States engineer up to Manitoba at the request of certain people who wanted to be reassured one statement that he made was this: "I wonder why you went to the trouble of bringing me up here from the Twin Cities when you have here in the person of Don Stephens, deputy minister of mines and resources, a man who knows more about the Red river than I." I believe the hon. member for Souris will agree with that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I respect him as an engineer.

Mr. Garson: That was the basis of the information that they had; that was the basis of the action that was taken. At an early stage in the proceedings the government of Manitoba entered into an agreement. This was a long while before Brigadier Morton was put in charge; that came later. They entered into an agreement in case the flood, which it was anticipated would be two feet higher than the 1948 level, by some unforeseen circumstance rose to a still greater height, to provide that the army would in the meanwhile have some legal status and be ready to take over at a moment's notice. The prognostication of the engineers proved to be remarkably accurate. The flood rose to about that level.

I remember the circumstances very well because I was in the midst of them a little over two weeks ago when I visited Winnipeg over that week end. I am sure that those who have been back to their constituencies will bear me out that for a couple of days there were heavy rains throughout the whole of the Red river valley.

Mr. Ross (Souris): And snow.

Mr. Garson: The expert brought from the United States is authority for the statement that those rains, falling on the various tributary streams in the Red river valley, accounted for not less than an increase of four feet in the level of the river. This created in a matter of a day, in fact in a matter of hours, an emergency of the direst character. On Friday or Saturday night—I am not sure which—after I had had a pretty strenuous day spent in part on the river in the Kingston Crescent area, I was on the point of going to bed when I received an emergency telephone call from Premier Campbell asking me to attend a meeting of all the city and municipal authorities, engineers, officials of the health department, various other civic and provincial officials, the army, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Red Cross and the like to deal with this emergency piled upon an emergency created by the heavy rainfall on top of the spring flood.

I cannot recall whether I indicated this before, but one of the first steps that had to be taken after midnight that night was to evacuate the tuberculosis and contagious diseases hospitals operated by the city of Winnipeg in the Riverview area. Because of the great rainfall that was taking place the dikes in that area were said by the engineers to be in such a condition that they could not guarantee they would hold until morning. If the leadership and the provision for the immediate future to which my hon. friend has referred was one-quarter as bad as he painted it, they might have had casualties in evacuating those hospitals. In a matter of minutes almost they had to evacuate people suffering from tuberculosis and contagious diseases, and transfer them to another hospital where provision for quarantine had to be made. If the government had not three weeks before, with the assistance and co-operation of the Red Cross, made all the necessary arrangements for the evacuation of those hospitals, it would have been impossible to carry it out that night.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To which government does the minister refer?

Mr. Garson: I am referring to the provincial government. It would have been impossible to accomplish this evacuation if the provincial authorities were as bad as the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) says they were. Practically out of a blue sky we were told by these highly competent engineers—

Mr. Ross (Souris): Which department would that be?

Mr. Garson: The engineers?

Mr. Ross (Souris): No, the one concerned with the evacuation.

Mr. Garson: That would be the health department.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I give high credit to the department and its minister right now, and he is a Liberal too.

Mr. Garson: I am very glad to hear that. We may gradually get down to the things my hon. friend thinks were not right. It appears to me that he is searching around for a scapegoat upon whom to put all the sins of Israel.

Mr. Ross (Souris): No, I am not.

Mr. Garson: We can be sure the scapegoat will not be a Conservative. To give hon. members some conception of how urgent the situation was, the meeting lasted until about half past two in the morning. At that meeting Brigadier Morton and the army were put in charge of the whole situation. When the hon. member for Souris, and to a lesser extent the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), although I am not quite sure that I understood the meaning of all he said because although I am a Scotsman myself—

Mr. Ross (Souris): You are not Scotch enough.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask on what point the minister is not clear?

Mr. Garson: There was the odd word or phrase I did not get the meaning of, and therefore I am refraining from quoting my hon. friend to any great extent.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What I said was that the army did not have effective control.

Mr. Garson: I am glad to have that interjection because the position the hon. member takes is pretty much the same as that of the hon. member for Souris.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is true, isn't it?

Mr. Garson: I am coming to that very point, and this is a good introduction to my remarks. I speak with a certain amount of personal knowledge because I was present and took some part in the meeting which decided to put the army in charge. The Red Cross and all these other organizations were represented there and, believe me, Mr. Speaker, we did not split any legal hairs or engage in legal technicalities as to the precise legal status of the army. Everyone present at the meeting agreed to have Brigadier Morton put in charge. They wanted to have one man to boss the show and they said, "If you come in we will do what you tell us." He said, "I am quite willing to tell you what to do but I want your advice. You advise me as to the decisions I have to make when I order you and we shall all get along splendidly together." And that is how they have got along.

I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Souris will not say that the achievements of the people of Manitoba and of Winnipeg during the emergency were in any way inconsiderable. They have been great achievements. For example, miles of the most formidable dikes were constructed. With all deference to the arguments of the hon. member for Souris and the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I do not think that such achievements would have been possible if the degree of disorganization existed which it has been their purpose to urge was the case in their arguments this afternoon.

The fact of the matter is that the organizations represented at the meeting that night either expressly or by clearly implicit terms pledged the co-operation which they have given in full measure ever since. Their co-operation, together with the support of the people of that community given without stint, have made possible their achievements in fighting the flood.

The provincial government is supposed not to have done anything at all to help the municipalities. I will not get into any argument over this. I am now going to talk about the department of public works, of which my hon. friend's friend is the head. They gave every support they could; sandbags, sand, pumps, motors of various types and so on. The province supplied these materials, largely for the municipalities, at a total cost to date of some $1,750,000. I do not know whether my hon. friend knew that was the case when he was criticizing the government.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I certainly did. I got it firsthand on Sunday in Winnipeg, when you were in the same building.

Mr. Garson: Then if my hon. friend was trying to give a balanced, careful, accurate representation of the situation to his fellow members of the house, I am at a loss to understand why he did not tell us that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was talking about the head and most of the members of the government. I give high praise to the department of health and its officials.

Mr. Garson: The government provided well on to five million sandbags, and they had to be handled three times. That handling was largely carried on by the provincial department of public works. Outside of the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface and possibly some of the suburbs, that department was dealing with municipalities which had no engineering staffs capable of coping with a disaster of this magnitude, and it provided all the engineering advice for all the municipalities involved in the disaster. It brought from various parts of Manitoba all its road building and other grading machinery, and put it on the dikes to meet the emergency.

When I say this I do not mean to suggest for a moment that there is anything extraordinary about it. That is what they did. That is what they should have done, but having done these things it does not seem fair that they should be accused of having been deficient and inadequate in their provisions to meet this situation.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the minister tell us how many sandbags were made available? I said last evening that in West Kildonan there were none, and the municipality could not afford to buy them. I believe that is so.

Mr. Garson: In speaking of some particular area my hon. friend may be quite right. I have already given the number of sandbags made available through this source, which was close to five million.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Over four and a half million, I am told.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is checking me up.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was around there.

Mr. Garson: I know, and my hon. friend is quite right; the figure is between four and a half and five million. Manitoba is not a large province. The public works department has not a large staff, but of that staff they had an average of ninety men engaged continuously in this flood work. In the mines and resources branch they had over ninety men working full-time on the floods. Of the equipment in that other branch, which is not large, they had over forty pieces of automotive equipment working, four yawl boats, a large number of canoes, outboard motors and seventeen pumps. All the equipment they could lay hands on was thrown into this emergency.

Then I think perhaps the department of agriculture is another department of which the hon. member for Souris approves. Already they have distributed 700 tons of hay, or about sixty carloads, for feeding stranded and evacuated animals; and of their small staff they have had twenty men working steadily from the beginning of this disaster. Through the efforts of the staff of that department, including the same John Conner whom my hon. friend admires, they have evacuated six thousand head of livestock, and have co-operated in the evacuation by private efforts of another three thousand head. It was they who made the arrangements for pasture and care; because, as in the case of human beings, it is one thing to take them from a place of danger and another thing to make proper provision for them in a place of safety. I think I am safe in saying that thanks to the recollection the farmers had of the 1948 flood, and thanks to the timely and adequate warnings given by the provincial government, the total number of livestock evacuated, some nine thousand, was very much larger than the total number lost in the floods. I think my hon. friend will agree with that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Certainly.

Mr. Garson: They have also made other arrangements. They have set up a seed grain committee to make sure that seed and feed of all kinds are available, with particular reference to coarse grains, the only crop that can be put in at this late date with any hope of success. They have arranged to have a supply of transplants of all the standard vegetables ready for the market gardeners. A farm machinery director and committee have been set up to arrange for the reconditioning of the tractors, trucks and other farm machinery damaged by the flood.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The good old Massey-Harris Company.

Mr. Garson: Perhaps, though some people think highly of International Harvester.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I use all International Harvester machines myself, but I give thanks to Massey-Harris for doing this.

Mr. Garson: The provincial department of agriculture is taking the lead, along with the local people, in arranging co-operative feeding assistance from the area outside the flooded portion, and arrangements are being made now for the return of the livestock from the places to which it has been evacuated.

Strangely enough the next department I come to is another that my hon. friend admires; that is the department of health and public welfare. We have not struck a single department yet that he does not admire; but when you add together all the parts he does admire they make up a whole which he does not admire. In the health department the organization of health facilities to meet flood conditions was undertaken six weeks ago, coincident with the advice from the engineers and the allocation at that time of extra staff to the threatened areas. It was only by reason of those provisions that when we had to evacuate people from the tuberculosis and contagious diseases hospitals, following two days of rain, it was possible to do so safely and avoid the worst kind of disaster. When that meeting broke up at half-past two in the morning it had been arranged that the Free Press siren was to sound a warning which would indicate that a dike had broken. Having a few things to clean up, it was three o'clock when we walked out of the office where the meeting had taken place, and the first siren had gone before we left. We were praying that it would not be the siren for the Riverview dike. All those people were evacuated, involving the moving of seven hundred patients into Saskatchewan, the province to which most of them were taken.

Mr. Ross (Souris): A great airlift job was done that Sunday.

Mr. Garson: That is right; it was a great airlift job, which would have been impossible if proper provisions had not been made in advance to take care of it. One of the things that they had to take care of was the obvious need for drinking water throughout the flooded area. It had to be moved in by tank car. Provision for that was made by the department of health and public welfare. Then, free vaccine had to be provided against typhoid for 125,000 people, and a reserve sufficient for 60,000 people had to be built up. In meeting this need all the supplies of vaccine in Canada were exhausted, and it had to be flown in from places as far away as New York city. Plans have already been organized and worked out for health control at municipal level during the return and rehabilitation of the evacuees. I am informed that at every place in the flooded area where there is what they term a beachhead, there is a representative of the health and welfare department on hand to take care of the people as they move back.

The member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) was rather harsh in his criticism of the two governments for not having used this magic term "national emergency".

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): My complaint was that it had been used in the Fraser valley flood, but not in this case.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. I should like to think, Mr. Speaker, that some magic existed in these words, but I must confess I have not been able to find any support for that idea. In these cases it seems to me that the principle is quite clear. If I am a farmer and suffer from a hail storm when I have not provided hail insurance, that is my misfortune. If the disaster is municipality wide, there is some foundation for moving—it is largely on the basis of public opinion—the municipal corporation to make some provision at the expense of the general body of taxpayers for those who have suffered the misfortune. When the disaster gets beyond municipal competence, then it is necessary for the province to step in to aid the municipality. When it gets beyond the competence of the provincial government, which in the case of both the Fraser river valley and the Red river valley flood was the set of circumstances with which we were faced, then the federal government has to step in to help the provincial government and the municipalities. It is done in somewhat the same way, although this is not perhaps a good analogy, as the matter of relief during the thirties. I wish to make it clear at once that I do not think that is the proper way to handle relief. In respect, however, of matters which in the first instance come under municipal and provincial authority, that is the method of handling them, as my hon. friend knows. It has always been done in that way. It is the facts of the case, rather than the magic of the words used, which determine how the cost is to be divided between the governments.

The thing to be done in the present case is to ascertain the facts, and then on the basis of the facts to make claims. But in saying that I admit, and that is one of my criticisms of the Manitoba government, the psychological value of using the term "national disaster". It makes an appropriate concession to a state of mind, but so far as the final disposition of the matter is concerned nothing turns on the use of the term.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You used the words "national disaster" in the order in council relating to the Fraser river disaster, and you omitted those words from the order in council respecting the Red river valley disaster.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is correct; but there are reasons for that. I believe that in the British Columbia case the term had been used in the negotiations, and carried over into the order in council. The actual basis is, as I am sure my friend agrees from his knowledge of the principles that are involved, where the disaster goes beyond the financial or administrative competence of the province, the federal government, having a responsibility to the same body of citizens, has to step in. In this case it was beyond not only the financial but the administrative competence of the Manitoba government. No provincial government, no matter how efficient and capable, has a staff available to deal with a disaster of this sort. All the existing staff of that government are doing jobs they are supposed to do, and the army is the obvious organization to take care of the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question, in view of his most interesting recital and his statement that the omission of the words "national emergency" from the Red river order in council has no significance. This simple question will remove any doubt as to his meaning. In effect the federal government paid 81 per cent of the cost of rehabilitating the property that was damaged in the Fraser flood, and building permanent dikes to prevent a recurrence. Is the same course going to be followed in the Red river valley?

Mr. Garson: I think if my hon. friend reflected upon that for a moment he would not ask the question. Precisely the same course cannot be followed because there are no dikes in Manitoba comparable to those in British Columbia. As my hon. friend knows, in British Columbia the larger portion of the federal contribution was to rebuild an elaborate set of dikes along the Fraser river. What has been said in the present case is that the principle of the Fraser valley settlement will be applied—to what?

Mr. Diefenbaker: To what extent, that is all I want to know.

Mr. Garson: There is no limitation upon the extent. I am sure the hon. member will agree with me when I say that, as a lawyer, he knows you apply principles to—what? You apply principles to facts, and it is not yet certain that the facts of the Manitoba disaster have all taken place as yet. If we have another two days of rain, as we had a while ago, we shall have more facts to deal with than we have right now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It will become a greater national emergency, that is all.

Mr. Garson: Right. Then when those facts have been ascertained, the two governments will get together and apply the principle of the Fraser valley settlement. This government of Canada has not arrogated to itself the responsibility or privilege of finding all the facts. A fact-finding board has been set up by the two governments for this purpose. I think I should say a word or two about it. I believe the member for Souris (Mr. Ross) is under a misapprehension, as is the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart). There is this difference between the Fraser river valley board and the one that has been set up in Manitoba. The one set up in Manitoba went into a situation that was already under the direction of the army, the Red Cross, the government and so on. The administrative end of it had already been taken care of. One of the first jobs of the Fraser valley board was to start this administration. The sole task of the Manitoba two-man commission will be to ascertain, as quickly as possible, all the facts and report them as promptly as possible to the two governments.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: What do you mean by "the facts"?

Mr. Garson: Well—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The loss?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask this question? It is such a simple thing. If responsibility has been accepted by the dominion government, does it intend to do what it did in British Columbia, namely, accept 75 per cent of the financial loss, the 25 per cent to be allocated as between the province and the municipalities?

Mr. Garson: I do not think I should spend too much time discussing this Fraser river valley thing with my hon. friend. He has not the facts straight.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes. I have the Free Press here. I was reading it a moment ago.

Mr. Garson: I am not speaking from the Free Press. I am speaking from the documents themselves. The settlement in connection with the Fraser river, as my hon. friend knows, consisted of two things: one, the payment of 75 per cent of the cost of rebuilding the dikes, and two, a lump sum settlement of $5 million which was based upon a set of facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Garson: In this case, when the facts are known the settlement will be determined, and the settlement, having been determined, will be administered by the province, as it was in the case of British Columbia, and as it must be in all these cases.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Therefore you have not determined whether it is going to be 75 per cent or less that the government of Canada is going to assume?

Mr. Garson: Well—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): It may have to be more.

Mr. Garson: There is your answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At least 75 per cent. Do you accept that?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): When is the river going down?

Mr. Garson: There was some criticism by the hon. member for Winnipeg North of the statement which was issued in Winnipeg by Premier Campbell saying that compensation for property loss would be paid on the basis of need. As I have said to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) before, I wish to disclaim credit for any of this advice to Premier Campbell that he was attributing to me.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was passing on other comments.

Mr. Garson: I see. But I think probably Premier Campbell may have had some other advisers. He had a delegation from the C.C.F. party in Winnipeg, and they brought in a memorandum which was signed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) and many of the local representatives. This is what it said. I am not implying any criticism; it is an intelligent and proper suggestion.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The minister will remember that in my speech I defined the word "need."

Mr. Garson: The hon. member may have, but I am going to read the statement he signed and it will speak for itself. The statement reads:

> As members of parliament and of the Manitoba legislature, we strongly urge the government of Canada and the government of Manitoba to make an immediate and definite statement that proper compensation will be provided individual farmers, home owners and tenants of the Red river valley and of greater Winnipeg, for personal and property losses that they have suffered in this disastrous flood. It is our firm conviction that the two governments, federal and provincial, should state now that financial assistance of this kind will be provided. Assurance of financial aid has been given in general terms but it is extremely important that it be made clear immediately that such financial aid will include compensation for the individuals who need it.

When the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) is casting around to find out who is the adviser to Mr. Campbell may I say that he will find a very good example right in the document I am reading. That is the basis of need, if it means anything at all. Then it goes on:

> Thousands of people have lost heavily . . .

Would the house like me to read it all?

Mr. Coldwell: You had better put it all on.

Mr. Garson: Yes. I continue:

> Thousands of people have lost heavily and many have lost everything and will find it impossible to re-establish themselves without assistance. Our pledge to the people of Manitoba is to do everything within our power to persuade the two governments to take such action. Next to the immediate emergency, this matter of compensation for individual victims of the flood, so far as we are concerned, has top priority.

May I suggest that that is a very clear indication that the compensation should be made on the basis of need.

My only reason for intervening in this debate was that, in line with the admirable statement made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), I thought if we were to have any attacks or criticisms on any person connected with this matter, it is only fair that if we are to have one side of the story we should have the other side. I am sure the hon. member for Souris will agree with that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Always.

Mr. Garson: I think he well knows that I should place against this rather harsh criticism that he has made nothing more than just the statement of the facts, and it is with that unvarnished statement of facts that I close my remarks.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I was not here last week to take part in the debate that went on in connection with the floods. I was out in Winnipeg getting firsthand information. When I landed in Winnipeg, along with the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), I was alarmed when I saw the constituency of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau). It was practically all water. It was the most terrible thing that I had ever seen. After having lived there for thirty years, and seeing it that morning, I thought it was terrible. We would need somebody with the ability and eloquence of Mr. Brockington or of John Fisher to describe it adequately. It is too bad that either of those gentlemen with no axe to grind could not have visited the area and written a story. It would give the rest of Canada a picture of what has taken place. It would bring it home to them perhaps better than anything else.

I had the opportunity of meeting the mayor of Winnipeg, the mayor of St. Boniface and the reeves of the different municipalities around Winnipeg, some of them from my own constituency, and some of them from outside my own constituency. Naturally I confined most of my activities to my own constituency along the Assiniboine river, St. James and West Kildonan.

I have heard different hon. gentlemen speak about the number of houses that have been damaged and we get different figures. I do not think I should attempt to say how many because the area is so great. When you look at the constituency of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) from the air, there is nothing but water. Everything is ruined there. It will not be possible for these farmers to have a crop this year. Not only will they lose their buildings; they have lost their livestock. They have lost their feed, and they will lose a year's work as well. The men in the city are losing their work. Of course they are still working because they are on the dikes.

Mr. Coldwell: They are working for nothing.

Mr. Bryce: They are working for nothing, but they are working to keep Winnipeg on the map. I tried to estimate the number of homes that were damaged between that part of the constituency of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), that is on Scotia street, and along West Kildonan, in my own constituency. I think I would be quite safe in saying that 800 homes had been severely damaged, as well as many more in the municipality of St. James. I think the reeve agreed with me that 200 homes would be damaged there or at least under water.

I travelled along with the hon. member for Winnipeg North. We both wore waders or rubber boots. Hon. members can imagine the disadvantage I was at in trying to go into water that he could go into. But we were able to get a good view of the situation. Some of them took pity on me when they saw the water running into the top of my boots. They took me into a boat, and I was able to see both sides of the river, from the boat.

The spirit of the people has been wonderful. On the morning I arrived back I saw the St. Boniface radio station which had been moved to the top of a house, and that station was carrying on as usual. The same thing can be said of the different people who make up the community. There was no work for them to do down town, because the basements were flooded, and the power was cut off. They immediately got out on the dikes. Sometimes my face was red when I was seen without a shovel in my hand or carrying a sandbag, particularly when I saw people older than I shovelling sand and carrying sandbags.

It is greatly to the credit of the people of Winnipeg and Manitoba that they rallied so completely to this situation. I am proud to belong to Winnipeg; I am proud of its people. I am sure every member from Manitoba will put political difference aside to see that Manitoba gets a square deal. I am most serious when I say that I cannot describe the condition as I would like to. It was deplorable; no doubt some hon. members will pass through Winnipeg and will be able to see it for themselves.

I said before that I want to thank the Red Cross. I repeat that desire. May I also thank the Salvation Army, and the emergency centres established in Winnipeg. Among the volunteers who came along to do work were men who had never had shovels in their hands, men who went away after a few hours of work with blisters on their hands. These are the things for which we are thankful.

I am not going to enter into this dispute about who is to blame; that is water over the dam. The people of Manitoba will lay the blame where it should be. Mistakes have been made, but my getting into the dispute would only aggravate matters. I want to see the dominion government do what is right; let us look to ourselves. I say this government should send $10 million to Winnipeg right away.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Maybe they will not take it.

Mr. Bryce: Because the city of Winnipeg is building up a debt at the bank. If the money is to be paid to the provincial government, then make an interim payment now, and let them get going. Do not hold it up.

I had the pleasure of meeting Mayor Coulter and Mayor MacLean, and I learned that the amount of money they have to spend each day is very great. They have nothing to back it up, but they must have the money to keep going. I believe in the sincerity of the Prime Minister and I believe the premier of Manitoba means well. That being so, let us give the people of Winnipeg something to work with, instead of having them run up an interest bill at the banks. The government has said, "We will stand by you." Yet, when it comes to the final say-so, the municipalities and the city of Winnipeg will have to foot the bill and pay the interest. Even now they have a large overdraft. The deputy mayor of Winnipeg told me that they have four hundred trucks operating at $2 an hour. That has been going on for three weeks. No municipality or town can stand that drain on its resources.

Call it a token payment or an interim payment, call it whatever you like, but send them some money. Send them a few million dollars so that they may save themselves this bill of interest which is gathering at the banks. They should have prompt and proper treatment coming to them. The Prime Minister has said he will help; then, help now, and do not wait until it is too late.

SEX COMICS AND SALACIOUS LITERATURE

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I have a matter I should like to discuss at this time. Possibly I could have dealt with this subject either in the debate on the address in reply, or in the budget debate. Perhaps I could have waited until the estimates of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) were before the house. However I feel this is an important matter, and I make no apology for discussing it now.

My subject is that of sex comics and passionate literature. It will be recalled that during the last session of parliament we passed Bill No. 10, to amend the Criminal Code, in connection with the portrayal of crime. That act, sponsored by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), has done a wonderful job, and I am sure many citizens feel that it has been worth while.

However certain publishers in Canada have found a loophole, with the result that today they are bringing out something that is perhaps worse than some of the crime comics. Bill No. 10, as I see it, and as many others see it, did not go far enough. Certain publishers in Toronto and Montreal have taken advantage of the situation and are flooding the newsstands with literature not fit to appear on any newsstand.

Mr. Fulton: It is not literature.

Mr. Wylie: I believe I should place on record the names of some of the publishers who are publishing this literature. The ones I have before me all publish in Toronto. I have always been told that Toronto was a good city, and I have heard it described as "Toronto the good". No wonder it is styled as "Toronto the good', because they must ship all the bad out of it.

Some of this trash bears on it three initials. One might see the initials S.D.D., which refers to Superior Distributors located at 21 Wellington Street East, Toronto. Another is C.D.L., Colonial Distributors Limited, located at 2001 Eglinton Avenue East, Toronto. Then there is Magazine Distributors and Sales Limited, 149 Church street, Toronto. I am sure if one of our late members were here today and heard mention of Church street he would get up and say that he had nothing to do with that company. Those are some of the publishers.

Every newsstand in this country is being flooded with trash published by these companies, which have a monopoly on the printing of sex comics and obscene literature. They tell the distributors in the small centres that they must put these books on their newsstands or they will lose their licences. I should like to read an article that appeared in the Medicine Hat News of Wednesday, February 15 of this year, under the heading of "Watson to ban shack-up girlies." It reads:

> Local news dealer takes own action to clear stands of salacious literature published in Toronto.
> The most erotic, two-bit pocket editions about the "shack-up girl" and the "reckless maiden" in the "furnished room" in the flood of licentious literature now sweeping Canada will disappear from local newsstands on Saturday. Oscar Watson, proprietor of Watson's news agency, the principal magazine distributor of Medicine Hat, announced today he has cancelled contracts with Crow library and Newsstand library publishers of Toronto for this type of "torrid tales of turbulent passion."

I admire what Mr. Watson has done in that respect. The trouble is that under the present act the publishers in Toronto and Montreal are allowed to publish this junk which is sent out to the distributors in the cities and small towns across the country who are expected to decide what should be placed on the newsstands. That is entirely wrong. The responsibility should be placed upon the publishers. I am not alone in this and I intend to read letters or excerpts from letters I have received from various organizations across this country. The first letter I should like to read is from the Local Council of Women in Medicine Hat. It is dated February 21, 1950 and reads:

> Dear sir:
>
> The Local Council of Women of Medicine Hat would like you to know that they strongly approve of the stand you have taken against the salacious literature that is appearing on our newsstands today.
> We wish you every success in getting an amendment to Bill No. 10 to cover this literature.
>
> Yours truly,
>
> Mrs. Marjorie Copp,
> Corresponding Secretary for L.C.W.

Another letter is from Macleod, Alberta, dated February 17, 1950, and reading:

> Mr. W. D. Wylie,
> Medicine Hat, Alta.
> Sir:
>
> Your campaign to curb the sale of cheap trashy literature is in my opinion highly commendable. I wish you every success in your endeavour in this matter.
> Olive R. Killoran

The next one is from New Brunswick and this should interest my hon. friend from Saint John. It is from the Catholic Women's League of Canada, dated March 10, 1950, and reads:

> Dear Mr. Wylie:
>
> Through an editorial in our paper printed from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, I note your efforts in regard to the banning of crime comics and salacious literature. On behalf of the Catholic Women's League of Canada of the diocese of Edmundston, I wish to express to you our sincere appreciation of your work in this matter. We realize that the law recently passed against crime comics, et cetera, is by no means adequate, but we feel sure that if we continue to work on the matter we can accomplish a great deal of good. Be assured that we wish you every success in the move you are making, and that, in this matter, you have our complete co-operation.
> Sincerely yours,
>
> Mrs. Frank J. Toner,
> President, Edmundston Diocesan Council, C.W.L.

Then I have a letter from Arthur L. Davis of Moose Jaw, but as it is rather lengthy I shall not read it. The next item I should like to place on the record is a copy of a newscast which was sent over station CKY, at 8 p.m., February 16, 1950. It reads:

> The possibility that the federal government will be asked to investigate the distribution of "lurid" literature at this session, indicated today that "clean-up" legislation would have a considerable effect on local sales.

Social Credit member of parliament, W. D. Wylie, promised recently that he would ask parliament to take immediate action on the sales of what he termed "filthy sex magazines." His contention was that while last year's bill which banned crime comics in Canada was praiseworthy, Canada's newsstands still carried a tremendous amount of indecent literature. He indicated that while children have been denied their diet of cops and robbers, they don't have to go hungry if they want top-flight—if sexy—excitement.

A group of CKY reporters made a survey of Winnipeg newsstands today, and their reports showed that while gangsterism in print has disappeared, what has taken its place is much worse. For every decent or "family" magazine, the survey showed, there appear to be two others which are crammed with lewdness and sensationalism. The "come-on" is usually an alluring title or photograph, and the publications are available to anyone, including children.

Here are some of the titles and stories available almost anywhere in Winnipeg to young children as well as adults. Are Canadian women sex starved? Why European Women are the Sexiest; Smouldering Secrets of Sultry Sirens; Lover's Triangle; A Daring Exposé of How a Woman Snares a Man; Sex Comes to Tarzan; Marriage in a Chemise; Pre-Wedding Madness; I Had to Marry; Wicked: She Was Easy With her Kisses and Free with her Charms; I was Hungry for Love; Striptease Goes West; What Sells You—Sex or Facts; Long Lost Passion; My Scandalous Affair; My Husband's Infatuation; and Vice in Los Angeles.

It was noted that these magazines were exposed prominently on newsstands, and in some cases purchasers had difficulty in concealing their embarrassment. The provincial government department under whose authority these matters are handled says there have been no complaints, and therefore no action is contemplated toward cleaning out newsstands. However, church and youth groups in eastern Canada have gone on record as condemning the magazines, and challenge the government to pass a law similar to the one which last year made the sale of crime comics illegal. Observers stated that if and when such a law is passed it would leave newsstands a little bare but clean.

This newscast was broadcast over CKY, Winnipeg, and that is what they found on the newsstands in that city. I want to refer to one paper in western Canada which is very much worried about the censorship of sex comics and passion literature, the Calgary Herald. This newspaper went all out in an editorial on February 15, 1950, against myself and expressed alarm over the censorship of crime comics, sex comics and passion literature. I must admit this same paper supported the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) when Bill 10 was introduced in the house. I am not going to read all of the editorial because most of it is so silly that it does not even make sense. However, I am going to read what they say in the last two paragraphs.

An hon. Member: Read it all.

[Mr. Wylie.]

Mr. Wylie: You would not enjoy it if I did, and you might consider where it comes from. The last two paragraphs read as follows:

If Canada as a nation has any sense of morality at all and if Mr. Wylie's private book collection is as dangerous as he says it is, then it may be assumed that moral pressure will cause these books to be withdrawn. In the meantime, we suggest that Mr. Wylie devote his attention to the more important matters with which the Canadian parliament would do well to concern itself.

The Calgary Herald surely must realize, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's most valuable asset is the youth of the country. Their good citizenship depends entirely on the bringing up they have in their own homes, and the education they receive in the early days of their youth. For a paper such as the Calgary Herald to publish such an editorial certainly demonstrates their ignorance. I am greatly surprised at their doing so. The Medicine Hat News in an editorial on Monday, February 13, 1950, showed the need for sex comics control. I want to read the editorial because I believe it is a good one and should cause many members of the house to think as I do. It reads:

The need for governmental action to dam the flood of "passion" literature now evident on the shelves of newsstand retailers must be apparent to every thinking adult. It is a wicked business conducted by a few men who are profiting by this mental seduction of youth. It is a deliberate move to compensate for the loss of the crime comic book trade and it replaces one evil with another, an even more serious threat to the moral fabric of this nation.

It is a flouting of the good intentions of Bill 10, designed at the last sitting of the Canadian parliament, and the only way in which it can be stopped is an attack on the fountainhead. The Toronto and Montreal publishing cartel which is trafficking in this epidemic of salacious literature is the group against which restraining legislation should be aimed, not the wholesalers, distributors and retailers who are compelled to handle the filth. In order to obtain the slicks and standard periodicals for distribution dealers are told to take a certain quota of the romance pulps and "comics."

That is the editorial which appeared in the Medicine Hat News, and I believe it is worth while. I am going to read a few titles of books that have appeared on newsstands in Medicine Hat and which were removed by Mr. Oscar Watson, the distributor of this literature in Medicine Hat. One is "Eager is the Flesh", a tale of violent men and surging passions. The trouble is that in every case the cover is the most prominent part of the book; it always shows a picture of a nice looking girl to attract everyone's attention. Another one is "Week-End Girl", an intimate story of reckless love. Then there is "Reckless Maiden"; her love was a mad obsession. Another one shows a picture of a nude girl through a window and its title is "Furnished Room". The minute you look at the cover you think the book will be a spicy one and that you had better buy it and read it.

Mr. Fraser: She should have pulled down the blind.

Mr. Wylie: They have no intention of pulling down the blind. I have another one showing a girl in the nude, and its title is "Shack-up Girl".

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): What does it mean.

Mr. Wylie: You should know. I hope the hon. member does not expect me to explain it to him. These 25-cent novels are brought out in such a way that the cover looks good. They are printed on the cheapest paper that can be obtained.

An hon. Member: It looks bad to me.

Mr. Wylie: These are 25-cent pocket editions of trash. Then they brought out some more in the comic book style: "Women in Love. Here is my sin. My heartbreak, plus other real love secrets." The picture shows a very nice girl. Here is another: "My life. Her kisses were tainted. I hated my home, plus other true to life stories." These are what are taking the place of crime comics, and they are much worse. "Miss Beverley Hills." "Secret loves. Thrilling tales of intimate romances. I had two loves." "First romance. True love stories." Then I assume this one is very good: "Saddle romances. Western love." Here is another one: "Flaming love." I have many more here that I can let hon. members have to read, if they wish.

Today all these love stories I have shown you are on the newsstands. Then on the back of some appears an advertisement, telling you that you can send to the Herald Publishing Company, 2382 Dundas Street West, Toronto—you will notice I am giving the address in case any hon. member wants to take it down—and get twenty-four of these books for $1. Bargain prices! These other books are not on the newsstands, but you can get them by sending to Toronto. When I came down here I wasted a dollar sending for twenty-four more of these books. I really never expected to get them, but when they came I found them to be the same as those selling for 10 cents on the newsstands. Apparently they have more trash they cannot get rid of, so they try to fool you by offering a bargain. I may as well put a few of these titles on Hansard as well. The first is "Nellie the nurse." Then "Teen-age diary secrets," published by Superior Publishers Limited, Toronto. "Aggie Mack," "Dogpatch," "Horse Feathers," "Black diamond," "Venus." There are fifteen or sixteen more, but I do not think it worth while to read them all.

I believe something should be done to prevent this type of literature going out across Canada. I do not think it should be left entirely to the distributors in each town or city to look through all this trash before it appears on the newsstands. Furthermore I believe anyone publishing this sort of thing should be—one hon. member says "shot" and another says "prosecuted"; perhaps "prosecuted" is the best word. People across the country are up in arms about this sort of thing. The only way we can get action is through the House of Commons, as we did with Bill No. 10 last year, which did away with crime comics. Let us do away with these sex comics disguised as literature, which are just as bad if not worse.

I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will see his way clear to do something in this matter, and not leave it entirely to the provincial authorities. After all, this trash is published in Toronto and shipped to every province in Canada. No doubt complaints have been made; no doubt the minister has received many complaints with respect to this literature. It should be stopped at the source, where it is published. I am sure the minister would have the support of hundreds of organizations throughout this country, as well as every member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the grievance I am going to bring before the house concerns the Post Office Department—

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) would permit me to continue the discussion initiated by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie). I shall take only two minutes, if that. Of course it is for the hon. member to say.

Mr. Fleming: I do not expect to be long—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): If the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) wishes to speak on the subject introduced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat he must do so now, unless the hon. member for Eglinton intends to speak on sex comics as well.

Mr. Fleming: I do not wish to speak on that subject.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): If not, no other hon. member can go back to that subject.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, there is one phase of the subject introduced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, in regard to this business of the debasement of womanhood, to which I want to draw the attention of the house and the people of this country; that is, the willingness of certain people in business and certain business institutions to sell anything to anybody, irrespective of the harm that may be done, as long as it is within the law and there is profit in it for them. Thus it is that we must have laws in this country to keep people from selling narcotics and other kinds of dope to high school pupils, or cigarettes and liquor to children.

There is one aspect which I should like to draw to your attention with respect to what I call this debasement of womanhood. This is the stuff we have been hearing about, which is purported to be the glorification of womanhood, the glorification of the female body and all that sort of thing. Let me point out to you, sir, that it is not the glorification of womanhood as motherhood that we get. It is not the idea contained in that old song "Mother Machree", which you may remember:

I love the dear silver that shines in her hair,
And the brow that's all furrowed and wrinkled with care.

That is not the sort of thing we get in these articles. It is the glorification of another type of womanhood, and that is responsible for the creation of false ideas, and wrong human values.

I should like to say that one of the greatest causes of this very type of trash being produced, about which the hon. member has told us, is the low debasement to which the publications known as the "slick" magazines have descended in the matter of their advertising. The United States publications are mostly guilty in that respect, but I blush with shame at some of our own magazines. One or two of them boast about being national publications. I believe this thing is our fault, because we put up with it in those magazines. I might sum it up in this way. The habitual use of the female human body as a means of promoting the sale of anything from gas engines to canned peas is an abomination, and I think it should be eliminated. I do not know how. I do not know to what extent legislation will effect this, because there are ways of getting around legislation. The liquor interests are not supposed to use our magazines for advertising, but what do you see? You see that a brewery is promoting the breeding of good race horses, or a distillery is doing something else for the fine young boys and girls of Canada or promoting some worthy object. I had a letter this morning from some cigarette outfit stating that they are trying to keep down fires in Canada. You and I know that the papers on their cigarettes are saturated with saltpetre, or some other chemical and if you light a cigarette, as one often sees a public speaker do, even though he does not know it is there, it is finished long before he has completed his speech. A speaker may even lay down his cigarette, but it keeps on burning. Any part of a cigarette discarded in the woods is a fire hazard if conditions are right. A lot of our advertising is untruthful, insincere and immoral. Is it any wonder that it creates in the minds of the young false values and wrong ideas, and makes them susceptible to the kind of lurid trash the hon. member for Medicine Hat has just described?

POST OFFICE—DENIAL OF THE USE OF MAILS

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's Globe and Mail carries on the first page an article under this caption, "Denied Use of Mails: Leaside Lions under ban for Conducting Raffle". The article is brief and I shall read it:

Postal authorities have denied the Leaside Lions club and a member, Jack Wyler, use of the mails as the result of a number of tickets for a raffle being sent to club members by mail.

Club president William Priestly said last night the ban was to be in effect until after the raffle has been held on June 6 at the annual Lions carnival. The prize is a car.

Mr. Wyler was chairman of the raffle committee, Mr. Priestly said. The tickets were being distributed by mail to club members for sale to the public, he explained.

"All of Mr. Wyler's personal mail including his pay cheques have been withheld from delivery to his home," said Mr. Priestly. Semi-monthly bulletins of the Leaside Lions club have had to be delivered by hand.

Mr. Priestly said the club received notification of the ban on the use of the mail service in a letter from a district postal inspector. The ban has been in effect for three weeks.

He said the club had signified in writing to the post office that no further infractions of regulations would occur.

After the discussion that has been held in this house in recent weeks in regard to the arbitrary banning by the postal authorities of the use of the mails to certain citizens, I am sure that this latest episode will be viewed by members with real concern. I hope so.

Let me explain, sir, the purpose of the Lions club is carrying on this raffle. The Lions club is doing welfare work, and the purpose of raising money at this fair, by this raffle and other means, is to provide funds for carrying on welfare work, including aid to Winnipeg; that is one of the purposes for which this particular raffle was being conducted. The persons concerned are all thoroughly reputable citizens. Not one of them is getting a cent out of it for himself. The organization is a highly respected organization, and is getting nothing out of the raffle for the benefit of the members. This represents a part of their effort to contribute to worthy welfare objects. The tickets which were going in the mail, and which led to this arbitrary and high-handed action on the part of the post office authorities, were not going to the public. They were going from the chairman of the particular committee in charge of the raffle to the club members. I think, sir, in the face of this action, the members of the house will realize that this arbitrary and abusive power on the part of the postal authorities has gotten to the point where a stop must be put to it. If the postal authorities are going to start interfering with organizations of this type, where there can be no question whatever of an attempt to defraud the public, then the House of Commons should certainly put its foot down, and put it down soon.

What is the next step in the situation, sir? Today's Globe and Mail carries this further information in an article which says:

Both the club and a member, Jack M. Wieler, were placed on the denied mail list by the post office after it was discovered the club had been sending raffle tickets through the mail to members for distribution. Mr. Wieler is chairman of a club committee which is raffling a motor car.

Mr. Priestly estimated that 1,500 raffle tickets were sent out through the mail by the club. "The executive did not know that it was an illegal act," he said.

Last night members of the Lions club were out selling tickets for the raffle on Bayview avenue. On Saturday members will again conduct street sales and the money collected that day will be donated to the Winnipeg flood fund.

The raffle will be held June 10 at the annual club carnival. Postal officials in Ottawa have stated the ban would not be lifted until either the raffle is held or cancelled.

Members of the club have described the action of the post office as unfair and ridiculous. Mayor G. T. Manes said: "I can't understand why the government would clamp down on a charitable organization." The proceeds of the raffle, it was stated, will go to welfare work only.

Mr. Manes is a past president of the Leaside Lions. The town clerk, Richard V. Burgess, also a club member, commented that if service clubs were going to be stepped on like that it would stop all charitable activities.

But, sir, the action on the part of the postal authorities has not been confined to the club's mail. It has been extended to Mr. Wieler's personal mail.

Mr. Gardiner: Is my hon. friend suggesting that just because a thing is done for a charitable institution that should excuse its being done, even though the law says it is illegal?

Mr. Fleming: If the Minister of Agriculture will be patient for a moment, he will hear what I have to say about the clear distinction in the law between the cases that were described by the Postmaster General and these cases. In my submission there is no authority for the post office people to do what they have done here. The action was not confined to the mails of the club.

Mr. Gardiner: Six o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: I thought hon. members wanted to dispose of this motion now—

An hon. Member: We have wasted three days now; we might as well use another day.

Mr. Fleming: I shall try to be brief about it. The article in the Globe and Mail states:

All Mr. Wieler's personal mail including his pay cheques are returned to the dead letter office.

The executive of the club has assured the post office in writing that no further infractions of regulations will take place.

Chief constable Russell Spanton said the Leaside police department had sanctioned the draw each year. "It is an understood matter," the chief said.

A draw is an illegal lottery if the prizes offered individually exceed $50, Inspector Albert Lee, head of the Toronto police morality squad, said yesterday.

The Minister of Agriculture has raised a point. He said: If this is illegal, how can you draw—

Mr. Mitchell: I rise to a point of order. It is now three minutes after six. All during this debate this afternoon the members of the other place have been discussing reform of the House of Commons. After listening to some of the drivel this afternoon, I do not object to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Unless the hon. member has unanimous consent he cannot continue.

Mr. Fleming: I thought I was co-operating with the government in trying to abbreviate my remarks and bring them to a conclusion today.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I intervene? I have been waiting for two days to try to get two departments in. I have listened to many speeches, good ones and bad ones. This one is no worse than some of the others. If the hon. member can conclude in two minutes he should be permitted to go on. I should like to try to get these departments in. I am appealing to the house. I have been waiting four months to try to get some departments in.

Mr. Fleming: The words of the minister are most encouraging. I tried to start last night and to be very brief about it, and I tried to get on earlier today and to be very brief about it.

Sir, the question I raise is whether the postal authorities can distinguish between one kind of illegal act and another. The Post Office Act draws a clear distinction between the different kinds of illegal acts. The language of section 7 (d) reads in this way. The Postmaster General has certain powers in these words:

. . . and for marking on the covering of letters, circulars or other mailable matter suspected to concern illegal lotteries, so-called gift concerts, or other illegal enterprises of like character, offering prizes, or concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public, for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, whether such letters, circulars or other mailable matter are addressed to or received by mail from places within or without Canada . . .

It may be one thing to suspect brokers of intention to defraud; but there is not the slightest evidence in this case, nor can there be the slightest suspicion, that those to whom the use of the mails has been banned here had any intention whatever of deceiving or defrauding the public. Regulation 204, passed under that act, is in the same language. The reference to illegal lotteries is confined, sir, to those in the language used, "concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public, for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences." There can be no suggestion whatsoever that there was anything of that kind involved here. There are courts to deal with illegal lotteries. The police and the courts in the Toronto area and in Leaside are quite competent to deal with this matter without having arbitrary intervention on the part of the postal authorities in an arbitrary abuse of power. I say this sort of thing must stop.

Motion (Mr. Fournier, Hull) agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 153, to amend the Aeronautics Act. Then we will go into committee of supply and take up the estimates of the Department of Transport. We will take up the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs if we conclude transport.

Mr. Green: Only the one bill?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): One bill.

It being six minutes past six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 25, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fourth and fifth reports of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Winkler.

The third report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

RADIO BROADCASTING—REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, as recorded at page 2803 of Hansard, the hon. member for Eglinton asked if items 267 and 268 in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951, and relating to the international shortwave broadcasting station, would be referred to the special committee on radio broadcasting for study and report. This case is strictly comparable to that wherein certain votes for the Department of Transport were referred by the Minister of Transport to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

By leave of the house I therefore move:

That votes 267 and 268 of the main estimates for the year 1950-51 be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the special committee on radio broadcasting, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Motion agreed to.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz.:

Of Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough, for the electoral district of Hamilton West.

Of George H. Hees, Esquire, for the electoral district of Broadview.

OLD AGE SECURITY

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Noseworthy be substituted for that of Mr. MacInnis on the special joint committee on old age security.

Motion agreed to.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

RED RIVER VALLEY—REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): On Tuesday the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) asked me about the appointment of the engineering board by the international joint commission. The board was appointed by the commission on April 7, 1948, with the following membership:

Canadian section:

Norman Marr, chief, water resources division, development services branch, Department of Resources and Development, Ottawa.

T. M. Patterson, engineer, water resources division, development services branch, Department of Resources and Development, Ottawa.

G. L. MacKenzie, chief engineer of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration, Regina.

United States section:

J. W. Dixon, of the United States bureau of reclamation, Washington.

Brigadier General J. S. Bragdon, assistant chief of engineers, corps of engineers, department of the army, Washington.

C. G. Paulsen, chief hydraulic engineer, United States geological survey, department of the interior, Washington.

The engineering board appointed the following to conduct field operations and assist the board in its study and investigations:

Canadian section:

G. N. Munro, assistant chief engineer, prairie farm rehabilitation administration, Regina.

D. B. Gow, district engineer, water resources division, development services branch, department of resources and development, Regina.

D. M. Stephens, deputy minister, department of mines and natural resources, Winnipeg.

E. J. Scammell, chief engineer, water rights division, department of agriculture, Regina.

United States section:

K. F. Vernon, United States bureau of reclamation, Billings, Montana.

Lieutenant Colonel E. J. Gallagher, district engineer, corps of engineers, department of the army, Fort Peck, Montana.

W. V. Taylor, United States representative, fish and wildlife service, Washington.

Henry H. C. Beckman, United States geological survey, Rolla, Missouri.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I understood the minister to say that there were some interim reports. I should like to know if they will be tabled.

Mr. Claxton: There have been four progress reports. As hon. members know, the practice of the international joint commission is to make only one final report containing recommendations to the two governments. That is their function, and then it is the responsibility of the two governments to decide whether or not they shall act on the report. So far it has always been possible for the two sections of the international joint commission to make the same report, and I think it is correct to say that the reports have always been acted upon by the two governments.

It is not the practice of the international joint commission to make available, either to the governments or to the public, working papers and material upon which the commission arrives at its decision and recommendations; therefore it has never been the practice to table reports of this kind, and I understand that that will not be done in this case.

Perhaps at this time I might also deal with the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) for the production of papers. The reference in this case was made by letter dated January 12, 1948. It is not usual for the governments to communicate with the commission, which is the instrument of both governments, after a reference has been made. But in this case the course was adopted, as has been reported already to the house, of communicating with the commission, and a letter was sent to the chairman of the Canadian section by myself as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs under date of May 18, 1950. The commission has no objection to tabling this correspondence in response to the hon. member's motion as it appears on the order paper.

Mr. Graydon: I take it from what the Acting Minister of External Affairs has said about tabling this information that there will be no objection to one or more members of the international joint commission appearing before the special committee on external affairs?

Mr. Claxton: I can assure my hon. friend that his assumption is certainly not correct. In the view of those with whom I have had an opportunity of discussing the matter, it would be quite improper for any member of the international joint commission or one of its officials to appear before a committee of parliament to discuss a matter which is still in process of consideration. After the international joint commission has arrived at a decision and made its recommendations to the governments, the situation might be different; but until the commission, which is representative of both countries, has had an opportunity to consider all the information before it and arrive at a decision, it would not be proper for a member of the commission to appear before a committee of this house for the purpose of stating views and expressing opinions before even his colleagues on the other section, or perhaps on the Canadian section itself, had had an opportunity of considering the position.

I suggest that that would end the usefulness of the commission as an international organization which has been remarkably successful and which has presented an example to the whole world of the way in which two countries can co-operate. One of the secrets of its success has been the fact that it has been objectively representative of both countries, and that its recommendations have always been carried out.

Mr. Graydon: The estimates now being considered by the external affairs committee of the house deal with the salaries and other expenses of the members of the international joint commission.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is statutory.

Mr. Graydon: It may be statutory, but it is in the estimates. I say to the minister that if it is not proper for them to attend, then I do not think the house ought to give them any money until they do.

Mr. Claxton: I should think that the comment of the hon. member for Peel will be noted by the people of Canada and the United States as being a most unjustifiable comment on a great international organization.

Mr. Graydon: A great organization that will not appear before the public.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): In view of the fact that the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs made reference to a motion which appears in my name on the order paper, I should like to say a word with regard to it. The motion reads:

> For a copy of all correspondence since the 15th day of January, 1948, and to date, between the international joint commission and the government of Canada relative to suggestions and recommendations as to means or methods or public works to be undertaken to prevent a repetition of the flood on the Red river of 1948.

The other day the minister mentioned that there had been four interim reports. Surely those interim reports would be made to the government of Canada. We would not expect the commission to report to itself on a matter in respect of which the people of the Red valley wished action and the government asked for action.

Mr. Claxton: I think I made it perfectly clear that the interim reports were made to the international joint commission by the engineering board appointed by the commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently no action was taken.

Mr. Knowles: Just to have the matter clear—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask if it is the case that there has been no final report respecting the Red river situation?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Since the matter was referred to the international joint commission two years ago.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: When there is a final report, will it be tabled?

Mr. Claxton: I should think that would be a matter for the attention and consideration of the government at that time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table correspondence between the Minister of Finance and the Fraser valley flood rehabilitation commission.

(Translation):

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—REFERENCE TO ST. BONIFACE RADIO STATION

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, yesterday during the discussion on the flood, as reported on page 2818 of Hansard, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) made the following statement:

> On the morning I arrived back I saw the St. Boniface radio station which had been moved to the top of a house and that station was carrying on as usual.

I must say that this statement is inaccurate, since during all the time the flood lasted, the St. Boniface radio station continued to operate from its centre-town studios.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RIVIERE-AU-RENARD, QUE., RIVER IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Was any work done at the mouth of the river at Riviere-au-Renard, county of Gaspe, during the summer of 1949?
2. If so, what work, and at what cost?
3. Who was the foreman, and what salary did he receive?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. (a) Repairs and improvements to fishermen's wharf; (b) $21,415.13.

3. (a) Salomon Bernier; (b) $8 a day.

*AERIAL PHOTOGRAPHY

Mr. Wright:

1. What firms received contracts for aerial photography work in the three western provinces in 1949?
2. What price was paid for the work done?
3. Were these contracts let by tender?
4. Have any contracts for aerial photography work been let in the province of Saskatchewan for 1950?
5. If so, who are the contractors, and what is the price to be paid for this work?
6. Were tenders called for these contracts?

Mr. Maybank:

1. Survey Aircraft Limited, Vancouver—contract for approximately 12,212 square miles in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Arctic Air Lines Limited, Edmonton—contract for approximately 12,947 square miles in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Air Surveys Limited, Edmonton—contract for approximately 10,740 square miles in Saskatchewan.

5. Survey Aircraft Limited, Vancouver; Arctic Air Lines Limited, $55,741.96; Air Surveys Limited, $48,067.87.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. Survey Aircraft Limited, Vancouver, approximately $15,093.60.

Orders for Returns

SURVEYS—NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What plans, if any, have been made for the 1950 season for survey parties engaged in Newfoundland in (a) geological work; (b) geodetic work; (c) topographic work; (d) hydrographic work?
2. Where will such parties operate?

Mr. Maybank:

1 and 2. Subject to possible minor changes, plans have been completed for the 1950 survey parties in Newfoundland. They are as follows:

(a) Geological work—seven parties to operate in the following areas:

(1) Harbour Grace; (2) Gull Pond; (3) Campbellton; (4) Labrador coast; (5) Quebec-Labrador iron region (three parties).

(b) Geodetic work—four parties to operate in the following areas:

(1) South coast of island—triangulation; (2) St. John's to Port-aux-Basques—levelling; (3) Goose Bay—triangulation; (4) Quebec-Labrador boundary area—triangulation.

(c) Topographic work—seven parties to operate in the following areas:

(1) Wesleyville to Peters Arm (two parties); (2) Avalon peninsula (two parties); (3) Dyke lake area (three parties).

(d) Hydrographic work—four Canadian government ships and two chartered motor vessels will carry out hydrographic surveys in the following areas:

(1) St. John's harbour; (2) Wabana; (3) Hare Bay; (4) east coast of Labrador (three ships).

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CIVIC HOLIDAY—WINNIPEG POST OFFICE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has a decision yet been reached with respect to holidays to be observed by civil service and other government employees during the remainder of 1950?
2. If so, what is such decision?
3. Does such decision include a provision for civic holiday, wherever the same is observed in any particular locality, to be observed as a holiday by civil servants and other government employees in that locality?
4. Does such decision include a provision which will ensure that the post office employees in the city of Winnipeg will be given a holiday with pay on civic holiday of this year?
5. Is any decision, as noted above, for this year only, or will it apply to future years?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—TRAVELLING EXPENSES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many government employees or officials in each department were paid travelling expenses in each of the fiscal years of 1948-49 and 1949-50 of (a) over $8,000; (b) between $5,000 and $8,000; (c) between $3,000 and $5,000; (d) between $2,500 and $3,000?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON MONDAYS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday, May 29, 1950, and every Monday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

FREIGHT RATES

INCREASE AWARDED TO RAILWAYS—OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the announcement made by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada regarding an increase in railway freight rates, and since it is expected that the minister's estimates will come up this afternoon, will he call item 524, administration, board of transport commissioners, so that the house may discuss this matter, which is of some urgency in many constituencies?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I should like to have the opportunity of giving the question some consideration. When the preceding judgment was handed down I think it was the desire of the house that we set aside a time for such a discussion. Naturally I am anxious to get on with my estimates, but if it is the wish of the house that this be done, I can give the matter some thought while the discussion of the bill to amend the Aeronautics Act is taking place. Personally I would prefer to discuss the freight rates question at a later time.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not going to press it because of what was said before. I had considered raising the question today by moving the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. I thought I would give the minister the opportunity of allowing us to discuss it on his estimates, rather than initiate a separate debate. If a day is to be set aside, I believe that will be satisfactory, but I think it should be done soon, in view of the fact that the increase in freight rates affects many constituencies adversely indeed.

Mr. Chevrier: I feel that such a debate will be a lengthy one, much lengthier than the usual discussions on estimates of the department. For that reason perhaps I might turn the question over in my mind until we reach the estimates of my department.

HON. LIAQUAT ALI KHAN

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER OF PAKISTAN—INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Is the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to tell the house today what the program will be on the occasion of the visit to Ottawa next week of the leader of one of the commonwealth countries, Hon. Liaquat Ali Khan, Prime Minister of Pakistan?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is understood that the Prime Minister of Pakistan will arrive from Boston at Rockcliffe airport, Ottawa, at 11 a.m. on Tuesday, May 30. He will be greeted by a general salute by the guard of honour, and at 12.30 will lay a wreath at the national war memorial. That evening he will be entertained by Their Excellencies. At 11.00 a.m. on Wednesday, May 31, he will confer with members of the cabinet. I am informed that the Prime Minister has already approached the Speaker of this house and the Speaker of the Senate for the purpose of arranging, if it meets the wishes of all hon. members, for the Prime Minister of Pakistan to address a joint meeting of both houses at 3 p.m. on Wednesday, May 31, in accordance with the practice under which prime ministers of commonwealth countries have been extended that invitation. There will be a government dinner that night.

On Friday, June 2, the Prime Minister of Pakistan will leave by air for Kingston, where he will be received by the national conference of Canadian universities and the members of the national defence college. That same day he will proceed by air to Toronto where he will visit the international trade fair. Later he will leave Toronto by automobile for Niagara Falls, where he will spend the night and stay until he leaves Canadian soil on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Low: Thank you.

WHEAT

REPORTED TERMINATION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, in reference to a radio announcement over the C.B.C. this morning to the effect that negotiations between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and representatives of the British government with regard to the marketing of wheat had terminated rather sooner than was expected. Is the acting minister in a position to give a report on the matter of the fixing of a price for the coming year?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not in a position to give any information, Mr. Speaker. No report has come back, and I do not expect that there will be a report until the minister, the deputy minister and the chairman of the wheat board return tomorrow.

THE LATE FIELD MARSHAL WAVELL

TRIBUTES AND EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Before we proceed to the orders of the day I would deem it a privilege, Mr. Speaker, if I might make a reference to the passing of a great soldier, a wonderful administrator and a constructive statesman who was a personal acquaintance of mine. I refer, of course, to the late Field Marshal Wavell. He would not be known to many Canadian soldiers during the first world war, but between the first and second world wars his name became known to a great many Canadians in the different services, because he had prepared a textbook on the campaigns in the Near East which gave an outline of the type of operation in which Canadians were to take part in the second world war. In addition, his series of lectures on generals and generalship showed not only that he was preparing himself for high command but that he was indicating a way to leadership which was followed by a great many Canadians in the second world war.

I became acquainted with the late field marshal when he was in command of the second division at Aldershot during the thirties. There his original methods of training and instilling initiative into the British soldier were the forerunners of the battle drills which were later associated with Field Marshal Montgomery.

During the second world war, of course, he was in command in Africa and the Middle East. There, with very slender resources, he was able to make use of his great business capacity in organizing for victory in Africa in 1940. His supreme moment of trial, and I think the greatest triumph of his life, came when he was called upon to implement the decision of the allies to support Greece from the few resources he had available. His decision in that respect has been frequently criticized; but a given pledge was kept and a nation's honour saved, two matters which were of no small importance to a man of Earl Wavell's character.

I think every Canadian of Hellenic extraction will feel that he has lost a true friend in the passing of Field Marshal Wavell, and I am sure this house and everyone concerned extends deepest sympathy to Lady Wavell and her family.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, because I had already sent messages to Lady Wavell and to Mr. Shinwell, Secretary of State for War in the United Kingdom, it had not been my intention to make reference today to the death of this great soldier. However, I should like to associate myself with everything that has been said by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes).

It was not my privilege to know Viscount Wavell through having served under or with him, as it was the privilege of the hon. member for Nanaimo, but I think we were fortunate in that it was possible for him to visit Canada last November in his capacity as honorary colonel of the Black Watch, Royal Highland Regiment of Montreal, and on that occasion he visited a number of our defence establishments, including the national defence college and Royal Military College. He showed himself to be an understanding leader as well as a great soldier, and when he died I am sure many of us had the feeling that we had lost a firm friend of our country and of our services.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO POWER OF MINISTER TO MAKE REGULATIONS, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 153, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—"Minister" defined.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, after this bill was given second reading it was referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where we had an opportunity to go into the proposed changes in some detail. Today I should like to make a few remarks having to do particularly with the powers and authority of the air transport board.

The bill is divided into ten sections. The first three deal with the authority of the Minister of Transport which are set out under the Aeronautics Act in part I. Then clauses 4 to 9 of the bill deal with the air transport board, which was set up under part II of the Aeronautics Act passed in 1944. The tenth section deals with part III of the act, which covers the publication of regulations, makes provision for the employment of staff, and contains various other general provisions of that kind.

Today my remarks have to do particularly with the air transport board. I should like to urge upon the minister and the house that the time has come to give the air transport board the authority it deserves. Instead of doing that, the bill we are considering takes away some of the board's authority. So far as I can ascertain from a study of the bill, there is no attempt whatever to strengthen it and put it on a basis similar to that of the board of transport commissioners.

I believe it would be worth while to refer the committee to a statement made by—

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he is now dealing with the powers of the air transport board. We do not deal with that board until we get to section 4 of the bill. I was wondering if we could not confine the discussion to the relevant sections. I understand that in committee of the whole discussion should be directed to the sections of the bill. The first part of the bill deals with ministerial powers, while the second part deals with the powers of the board.

Mr. Green: In the discussion of the first section of a bill there is always wide latitude given. Actually my remarks today apply to practically all the sections of the bill. I have to refer to the powers of the minister; therefore I really cannot make my presentation unless I am allowed to do it on the first section of the bill.

The Chairman: I shall ask the hon. member to discuss generally the principle of the bill, and not refer to any particular section. Then, as each section is called, he may discuss it.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the hon. member not discuss this matter under the sections dealing with the air transport board?

Mr. Green: No; I prefer to do it now. I think I can do it better under this section.

When the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was introducing the amendments to the Aeronautics Act in 1944, which amendments provided for an air transport board, he had something to say about the functions of that board. His remarks may be found on page 3599 of Hansard for June 6, 1944. He said:

> The effect of the amendments is to form a board of three, a chairman and two members, who will administer the Aeronautics Act, take over the duties now being performed by the board of transport commissioners in regulating civil aviation as well as the duty of assigning airworthiness certificates and of licensing aviation enterprises within Canada. In addition, the board will function to advise the government as to ways and means of advancing civil aviation. The board will take the initiative in laying out routes, within Canada and overseas, which promise possibilities of profitable operation and will guide the government in seeing that these routes are operated by Canadians who are capable of carrying out such undertakings.
> The judicial functions of the board are not new, but the functions of the board as advisers to the government on aviation policy are new, and will, I think, be helpful in bringing about the rapid development of civil aviation, both internal and external.

Members will notice that at that time the minister, who was then minister of munitions and supply, attributed great importance to this air transport board. In the committee the other day we got a short statement from the chairman of the board indicating just what it is doing at the present time, six years after that statement. The statement of the chairman of the board will be found at page 243 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of that committee. He was asked what the functions of the board now are, and this is his answer:

> The board under the minister is responsible for the granting of licences or refusal of licences, as the case may be, to commercial air services.

Members will note those words, "under the minister". That is the first job of the board, and here is the second:

> It is also responsible for general economic regulation and economic relationships between commercial air services—

Then, the third is:

> —and for such general aviation matters as the minister wishes the board to report upon or offer advice upon.

The fourth and final job of the air transport board is indicated by the following statement of its chairman:

> Apart from that I should also add it is responsible on behalf of the government for taking care of the policy matters in connection with our part in the International Civil Aviation Organization, and the Canadian representative on the council of ICAO is a member of the board's staff.

As hon. members know, the function of licensing commercial air services came under—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he is not generally discussing the principle of the bill. He is discussing a special matter which comes under a particular clause, and that cannot be done.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact this first clause deals with a definition of "minister", and because of that fact, quite apart from the rule of the house that we are allowed wide latitude in discussing the first section of a bill, I submit my remarks are in order. I am pointing out that the air transport board has too little power, and the minister too much; therefore my remarks come within the scope of this section.

Mr. Chevrier: I have to point out that we are dealing now with part I of the bill, while my hon. friend's discussion is directed exclusively to part II.

Mr. Green: No; my remarks cover the scope of the whole bill, and if you will allow me to proceed, Mr. Chairman, you will see that is the case.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to interrupt, but it seems to me that this speech should have been made either on second reading when we were discussing the principle of the bill, or on third reading. We are now in the committee of the whole. I do not want to prevent the member from discussing anything he wishes to bring up, but I think considerable latitude was allowed in dealing with the principle, and it would be helpful to the whole house if we could deal with the sections of the bill.

Mr. Green: It will not save the house five minutes. It will take extra time if members have to make six speeches instead of one. The minister has said I should have made this speech on second reading, but the basis of this speech is the evidence we obtained in committee after the bill was given second reading. There should be no such limitation as the minister is trying to put on me in this discussion. Mine is a general statement concerning the set-up of this act, and the division of powers as between the minister and the air transport board.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the bill deal with the powers of the minister, and, as I explained in opening, sections 4 to 9 deal with the air transport board. My remarks can properly be made only on this first section, because they cover the whole bill. I am entitled to make these remarks on the first section.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but since the remarks refer to particular matters, I believe they are out of order when made on the first section. A general discussion may be had on the first section, and particular matters may be discussed as each section is called.

Mr. Green: This is a general discussion I am engaging in now.

The Chairman: Proceed, and I shall see.

Mr. Green: The air transport board, in dealing with applications for licences, which is their first function, should be able to act as a judicial body, free and independent of interference of any kind by the minister or any other authority. That is the position of the board of transport commissioners when they deal with applications having to do with the railways of Canada or with shipping, or when they act under the other powers conferred upon them.

The Aeronautics Act provides that the air transport board, in issuing a licence, must be satisfied that the proposed service is and will be required by the present and future public convenience and necessity of Canada; in other words, in the Aeronautics Act they are given that test—the consideration must be the public convenience and necessity. Furthermore, in the amendments which were passed to the Aeronautics Act in 1945, the air transport board were given the power of a court; for example, they have powers to have their orders enforced in certain courts of the land; they have power to send for witnesses, and they have power to issue commissions to take evidence; they are given wide powers, just as though they were an independent court; but actually their position is not that at all.

In the committee we questioned the chairman of the air transport board about the powers of the board in issuing a licence, and about the control the Minister of Transport had or has over these applications. At page 244 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence we find the following:

Q. When you render a decision —

That is, on an application for a licence.

—is that published by yourselves and a licence issued, or do you merely recommend it to the minister?

A. The board's decision is signed by the board members and if it is an affirmative decision it is submitted to the minister for his approval; if he approves the decision he signs it and the board then issues a licence to the carrier. In the event of a denial of an application, that under the statute may be taken care of by the board itself without submission to the minister, but with the right of appeal on the part of the carrier to the minister.

Then I asked him this question:

Q. I see. So that if an application is granted you make a recommendation, and then that has to be approved by the Minister of Transport?

A. That is correct.

Q. And, subject to that approval, you issue the licence?

A. That is correct.

[The Chairman.]

Q. And if the application is denied there is no recommendation made by the board to the minister but the applicant has the right of appeal to the minister?

A. The applicant has the right of appeal to the minister.

Q. Is that appeal to the minister or to the cabinet?

A. To the minister.

There are hundreds of applications for these licences. Here we have the position that this air transport board, which was set up by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1944 with such a glowing description of the part it was to be allowed to play in aviation, has no power to issue a single licence without having the application referred to the Minister of Transport. The jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners is, of course, quite different. It is a judicial body; it makes its decision and the only appeal is to the governor in council. But this air transport board is handicapped in that, in every case in which an application is granted, it can only recommend to the minister, and he has the final approval or rejection of that application.

That provision, Mr. Chairman, has two bad results. In the first place, it must of necessity weaken the air transport board, and anything that tends to weaken it is a bad thing. This air transport board should be made into a strong body. The second bad effect is that the Minister of Transport is given too much power. He is not in a position to know whether or not those applications should be granted. How on earth is it possible for him to judge the merits of hundreds of applications for licences? It simply is not possible for him to do that, and I do not believe he does it. I think he just takes the recommendation of the air transport board and approves of the granting of the licence. That very fact is clear proof that this power of the minister should be done away with and that the air transport board should have the final word as to whether or not an application for a licence is to be granted. There would have to be some appeal, of course; but if there is to be an appeal, then let that appeal be to the cabinet.

This power held by the Minister of Transport over the issuing of licences is a hangover from the days when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was administering the act. He likes to have powers of that kind right in his hands, and the air transport board was set up with that idea in mind; it was set up so that it could not make a move without coming to him. He had an arbitrary and dictatorial control over the air transport board. In my opinion the time has come when that control should be done away with. There may have been some excuse for it during the war—

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend is swallowing himself. What he wants is bigger and better bureaucracy.

Mr. Green: I do not think that remark has any connection with my speech; and I am not surprised that such is the case, considering the source from which it comes.

Mr. Mitchell: That is mutual.

Mr. Green: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Mitchell: I say that is mutual.

Mr. Green: Thank you very much. Then we are both happy. The Minister of Labour has the habit of coming into the house, when he has not heard the discussion and does not know what is going on, making some wisecrack with the look of a Solomon, and then going out. That is exactly what he has done here.

Mr. Mitchell: Let me say this to my hon. friend—

Mr. Green: I have the floor. Do you want to ask a question?

Mr. Mitchell: I rise on a point of privilege. Let me say to my hon. friend that I spend as much time in this House of Commons as he does.

Mr. McIlraith: You put it to better use, though.

Mr. Mitchell: I was going to come to that. I use it in a more intelligent way. Let us just keep the record straight; that is all.

Mr. Green: I do not know what that has to do with the debate. Now that the Minister of Labour has had his little say, perhaps we can get back to the Minister of Transport.

I was saying that this dictatorial power is a hangover from the days when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was the minister in charge, and that it should be wiped out. There is now no reason why the minister should have a veto over every decision made by the air transport board on an application for a licence.

The air transport board is working under another handicap. When the board was set up in 1944 a provision was written into the act to the effect that the board could not issue a licence to anyone in the transportation business without such applicant first obtaining the approval of the governor in council. That meant that the air transport board could not issue a licence to a shipping company to go into the air transport business, or to a trucking company. The restrictions covered all other forms of transportation business.

The reason was that at that time the present Minister of Trade and Commerce had a battle on with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and had announced as his policy that they would have to divest themselves of Canadian Pacific Air Lines—and, incidentally, that the Canadian National Railways had to get rid of their interest in Trans-Canada Air Lines. That was the policy at the time the air transport board was set up in 1944.

However, the provision is still in the act. It is another hangover from those days when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was in charge. Government policy has now changed. The Canadian Pacific Railway have been allowed to carry on and greatly to extend Canadian Pacific Air Lines. Canadian National Railways have been allowed to retain their ownership of Trans-Canada Air Lines. But, while the policy has been changed, the air transport board still labours under these restrictions.

We asked the chairman of the board about it, and this is what he said as it is reported at page 272 of the proceedings of the committee:

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Green, I believe the original statutory restriction in this regard appears because it was felt that some such precaution was required to ensure the fullest possible development of commercial aviation. The reason for that was that it might be possible for a surface carrier to acquire control of an air service which was competitive with it for the deliberate purpose of stifling the air service. That was the fundamental reasoning behind the original restriction, as I understand it, and I do not know that there is much more that I can offer in the way of explanation other than to say that there are alternative methods of taking care of that situation. One of them is the method which parliament took of writing this restriction into the act leaving a way open for exceptions where no harm was going to result. Alternatively—

And I draw attention to this alternative.

—it could be dealt with through the control of licensing but it seems to me that the alternative selected is not a matter for the board to decide but for the government and parliament to decide upon.

And the chairman of the board was quite right in taking that stand. In effect he said, "I cannot do anything about this; it is up to the government". I do suggest the air transport board should not be asked to work under that further restriction.

Then a further restriction is placed on the board by the government. This is what I call the monopoly policy of the government, in so far as aviation is concerned. A discussion of this subject appears at page 251 of the proceedings of the committee, where I questioned Mr. Baldwin as follows;

Q. What is the policy of the board with regard to the control of competition? I understand that you are pretty strict about lines competing on routes.

Does that mean that you decide that one line shall have a monopoly on a route; or, just what does it mean?

A. The policy of the government, as you will recollect, was laid down some time ago to the effect that not more than one "scheduled" air line, to make that distinction, should operate on any one route, and the board has operated within the framework of that general policy in that where we have found that public convenience and necessity require the provision of a scheduled air service only one operator is licensed to perform that service.

Then later on he referred to the non-scheduled field in this way:

When you come to the non-scheduled field the policy is somewhat different. We use our discretion in granting to what we call class two routes which are services on an irregular basis following a regular route pattern. Normally speaking we have only had one carrier on a class two route for the simple reason that we have followed the philosophy which governed the decision regarding scheduled operators.

Mr. Chevrier: Would you read the next sentence, please?

Mr. Green: Yes.

The factor which governs in a situation of this kind is the potential traffic which exists in Canada, and generally it has not been sufficient to justify putting on more than one carrier; otherwise neither would have a chance to succeed.

The point I make is this: Surely if the board is competent, then it should be given full responsibility, without being hedged in by these different restrictions from the government. Furthermore, it has no control whatever over Trans-Canada Air Lines. That provision was set out in the amendment to the Aeronautics Act of 1944, and there is a further amendment in the present bill.

The chairman explained quite clearly just what the position of the board is in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines. The questions and answers in this connection are found at page 252, as follows:

Q. What control does the board have over Trans-Canada Air Lines?

A. The board is required to grant licences to Trans-Canada Air Lines in accordance with contracts that may be approved between the government and Trans-Canada Air Lines. That having been done, Trans-Canada Air Lines comes within the general rate jurisdiction of the board; and as far as direct control in regard to their licensing goes we exercise no independent jurisdiction. We may be called upon to advise the government with regard to a proposed T.C.A. service, but once a contract is authorized by the government then we are required by statute to grant a licence.

Q. In effect then the operations of T.C.A. are outside of your scope and you have to issue permits for them to fly a route if they apply for it?

A. Except in so far as the period during which the route is being discussed in the first instance is concerned; that is, before the government reaches a decision to operate a certain route; and the practice is that the board is called upon to advise the government as to whether it is a route which the government should designate for operation by T.C.A.

Q. And the T.C.A. routes are designated by the government?

A. That is correct.

Q. And once that has been done the board has no jurisdiction?

A. The situation is virtually the same as when an international agreement authorizing routes is made. In the first instance our role is advisory and in negotiating, but once the decision is made by the government we carry it out.

Q. Which means that you really have no licensing authority in the international field, you act only in an advisory capacity?

A. That is correct, sir.

There again we have the situation where the board is not free to deal, on its merits, with an application by Trans-Canada Air Lines for a licence. They must accept the route dictated by the government. I believe the present Minister of Trade and Commerce said in one of the other committees of the house the other day that he is the man who decides what routes should be flown by T.C.A. So it is not even the Minister of Transport who has that degree of jurisdiction. Here we find an outside minister deciding on the routes and the air transport board really has no discretion or authority whatsoever.

It will be noticed that the chairman said the same was true in connection with international air routes. In effect, the air transport board has no authority over international routes; and the bill before the committee today cuts down the statutory authority the board formerly had in that respect. I believe further that the air transport board will have practically no authority with regard to non-scheduled international services. The other day the minister did not set out government policy with regard to these services. He promised to give us order 15, I think it was, which sets out the powers.

Mr. Chevrier: I have it here.

Mr. Green: We have not received it as yet but I take it from the evidence given by Mr. Baldwin, chairman of the air transport board, that that board will have little authority with regard to international non-scheduled air services. Incidentally it was agreed that these services were becoming of greater importance all the time.

The board has no control whatsoever over private aircraft. I do not know whether it would be possible to give them some authority over private aircraft, but it seems to me—I am not speaking as an expert—that the air transport board should have some control over such aircraft.

That is just a summary of the handicaps under which the air transport board is working. I believe that hon. members generally would prefer to see this board given real authority so that it could carry on as the present Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated in 1944. Then, the plan was that the air transport board would give leadership in promoting civil aviation in Canada. I do not believe that the board is in position to do that today because of the various restrictions I have mentioned. I do hope that the minister will not be too abrupt in turning down these suggestions or saying that the board has all the authority it needs.

Mr. Chevrier: He never is.

Mr. Green: No. I must admit that he is not as abrupt as some other ministers. These suggestions are placed before him and before the committee with great earnestness, believing that we could further the development of civil aviation in Canada if the air transport board was given additional authority.

Mr. Knowles: The remarks I wish to make I intended to defer until a later section of the bill is before us, but because of what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said perhaps I should say something at this point. I sympathize with the view of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that the air transport board seems to be getting into a position where its functions are merely perfunctory. However, I must part company with the hon. member when he suggests that the air transport board somehow or other should be divorced completely from government direction and government policy.

My mind goes back to 1944 when this act in its present form was introduced. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I were both here and we took part in the debate—on opposite sides. It seems to me that there are things that are natural monopolies, such as railroads, electrical services and pipe lines if you will. In certain cases it is not in the public interest to have two lines where one will do the job. In connection with public services, public utilities and natural monopolies of this kind, either there should be complete public ownership or the decision as to what is to take place should be a matter of government policy and regulation. I might quarrel with government policy, and I certainly do quarrel with government policy so far as aviation matters are concerned, especially the way in which the government has gone back on its announced policy, but I support the idea that government policy is necessary in arriving at basic decisions so far as civil aviation is concerned.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has referred to the basic government policy that was set up during the war years, and in particular with the passing of the Aeronautics Act in 1944. In fact, a year earlier it was made clear by the former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, that the main air lines in Canada were to be operated by the government-owned Trans-Canada Air Lines. It was indicated that the feeder lines and non-scheduled services would be open to private companies. It was also made clear that all international services connecting Canada with other countries were to be operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines. While that particular part of government policy was not written into the statute, it was laid down clearly in a statement by the Prime Minister and confirmed from time to time.

I feel that that policy has been gone back on so far as services in Canada are concerned, notably in that Canadian Pacific Air Lines has been permitted to develop lines which certainly are not feeder lines. Their air line map today looks like a main-line operation. Another point in that policy, namely with respect to international air services, has been reversed by the government. I refer to the Pacific air services. Not only was it spelled out and stated clearly by the former prime minister that all international air services were to be operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines, but when an agreement was entered into between Australia and New Zealand on the one hand and Canada on the other for transpacific services, one of the terms was that so far as the Canadian part of the operation was concerned it would be carried on by the government-owned Trans-Canada Air Lines. The Minister of Transport will well remember the nuisance I was in the session of 1948.

Mr. Chevrier: I do.

Mr. Knowles: I thought the minister was saying that I am always a nuisance.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no.

Mr. Knowles: In the session of 1948 I tried to get out of the minister in every way known to me, by questions on the orders of the day, by raising it on going into supply, by questions on the minister's estimates and so on, whether or not there was anything in the widely circulating rumour that the government was going to turn over the Pacific service to Canadian Pacific Air Lines. The Minister of Transport was most adroit in his answers; they were answers that seemed to imply that there was nothing to the rumour, that I was all wrong. However, I remember that it was only a week or ten days after the session when I picked up a paper and lo and behold the Pacific service had been turned over by the government to Canadian Pacific Air Lines. It is that sort of thing that I quarrel with. I will stand by my basic contention that the policy respecting civil aviation, because it is a natural monopoly, has to be determined by the government. Nevertheless I feel it is unfortunate that the government should get hold of a good policy, announce it, lay it down clearly, and then for some reason or other—not explained—change it in various respects.

Another item of government policy—and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has already referred to this—relates to the announcement by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1944 when he was minister of munitions and supply to the effect that, commencing one year after the end of the war in Europe, all transportation companies operating ground services were to be asked to divest themselves of the ownership of air lines. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said, the purpose seemed to be to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from developing Canadian Pacific Air Lines into a large private system. The minister of munitions and supply, as he then was, made it clear to us that he had had a bit of a quarrel with the Canadian Pacific people, and that he also felt that mistakes had been made in the building of railways in this country which he did not want to see repeated so far as air lines were concerned. He felt it was unwise to allow a corporation such as the Canadian Pacific Railway to build up a huge air lines system.

This policy was not only announced by the then minister of munitions and supply but was also written into a statute, namely, the Aeronautics Act, chapter 28 of the statutes of 1944-45. We had a bitter debate over the policy. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Lake Centre and others of the Conservative party fought it for all they were worth. There was not much support for it even on the Liberal side. I think that the C.C.F. party probably gave more support to it than the Liberals but at any rate the Liberals voted for it and it was passed. It is spelled out in sections 12, 13 and 14 of the act. There was a decision of parliament to back up the announced policy of the government with respect to that phase of civil aviation.

Time went by, the war in Europe came to an end, and a year or so after I began to wonder when this policy was going to go into effect. I have the necessary data here and may refer to it later when we get to the section, but I remember very well asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce about it one day and he told me very blithely that the date in the act had been changed by order in council. I was horrified at the thought that a statute had been changed by order in council, and I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it had been tabled. He said yes, that I did not know all the orders in council that were tabled and that I had missed that one. I certainly had. I was curious afterwards as to how a statute could be changed by order in council. Therefore I got in touch with the proper officials to try to get hold of the order in council and I soon found out that there was none.

Therefore I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce very tactfully in a day or two on the orders of the day if he could tell me the number and date of that order in council. His reply was that his officials had informed him there was no order in council, that it had been done by cabinet decision. We had quite a battle over it, if I may shorten the story, because some of us certainly did not think that cabinet decisions were the proper way to legislate. As a matter of fact we could not see how a statute could be changed by an order in council. Later on in the session the present Prime Minister, who was then minister of justice, admitted to me there had been some mistake about the whole matter, and that it was perfectly true that a statute could not be changed by order in council. In other words, the law still stood that surface transportation companies had to divest themselves of the ownership of air lines.

I kept wondering why this was not done, and in 1947 I learned by asking various questions how the government managed to get around the section of the act which they put in there over the bitter opposition of members of the Progressive Conservative party. I found out how they got around the section which was put in there to implement their own policy. They did so by relying on an escape clause in another section which gave the governor in council the power to issue licences to surface transportation companies in exceptional cases. I well remember the time when the Minister of Trade and Commerce told me that there was a block of 53 licences that had to be cancelled under the terms of section 14 of the act, which implemented the policy about which I am talking. All 53 were reissued under the escape or emergency clause in the act. Believe it or not, every case was an exceptional case.

That makes a farce of statute law, Mr. Chairman. It makes a farce of parliament to force it to put in the act a section which the official opposition did not want. I was in favour of it but a section of the opposition did not want it. A year or so later the government changed its mind mainly because the Minister of Trade and Commerce got on more friendly terms with the Canadian Pacific, and they just decided they were not going to obey the law as it was passed by parliament. We stand up from time to time and ask for certain changes or improvements in various matters and we are told time and time again that these things cannot be changed because they are statutory. We are told the voice of parliament has decided.

Let us understand what is happening. Parliament has reached the point where it decides, through the weight of the government majority, merely what the government wants to put on the statutes, and if the next day the government does not want to go ahead with what it has decided it gets around it in one way or another. When we reach that section of the act we will see that certain sections are now being repealed.

Mr. Coldwell: No wonder the Senate wants to reform the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: My leader says it is no wonder the Senate wants to reform the House of Commons. There is one thing on which members of the House of Commons and of the Senate might get together. We might agree that the government needs to be reformed. I will not say anything further at this time. I wanted to make it clear that there are a number of ways in which government policy has been changed from time to time that I dislike intensely. I dislike it particularly when a clear-cut policy has been laid down that appears to be the policy for all time, and then is changed for reasons that are not made clear to us at all.

Even so I cannot agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in his suggestion that the air transport board should be an independent judicial body. I feel that matters relating to civil aviation are of such importance that they should be subject to government policy. After all, this is a field in which a great deal is at stake. Aviation does not only play an important part in the development of our country in transportation, communications and so on; it is also a field in which the protection of life and safety measures are of extreme importance. I am satisfied it is not a field in which there should be the kind of unrestricted competition that some of our friends to the right would like to have. When you go in for that sort of thing you decrease the safety factor as competing lines try to get ahead of one another. I am all for aviation being a matter of government policy but I want government policy to be the right one. When the government has achieved the right policy I want them to stick with it and not flout it in contempt of parliament, as has been the case from time to time, these past four or five years.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Green: Is the minister not making any reply to the points I raised?

Mr. Chevrier: I have covered most of the matters referred to by my hon. friend, and perhaps they could be dealt with more specifically as we come to the sections.

Mr. Green: Then will the minister explain the division of work as between the aviation branch of the Department of Transport and the air transport board? For instance, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just mentioned safety precautions. It is my understanding that the air transport board has nothing whatever to do with that matter; I believe it comes under a branch of the Department of Transport, though in 1944 the present Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the board would have the duty of assigning airworthiness certificates. As I read the provisions now, however, that work is done by the department, not by the board. It would be helpful if the minister would make clear the division of authority as between the department and the board.

Mr. Chevrier: Section 1 is a simple amendment changing the name of the Minister of National Defence for Air to that of the Minister of National Defence. It has nothing to do with the division of duties as between the board and the department. The statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra a moment ago, that airworthiness certificates were to have been issued by the air transport board, is erroneous. Those certificates are given by the officials of the Department of Transport, through the minister. The only purpose of this amendment is to change the designation minister of national defence for air, as that office no longer exists, to the Minister of National Defence, as the latter is the authority in respect of military airports. A division still exists in that certain airports which are military remain under the Department of National Defence. Over those airports the Department of Transport has no jurisdiction. That is the only reason for the amendment.

Mr. Green: The section provides:

> . . . the Minister of Transport or such other minister as the governor in council may from time to time designate . . .

Apparently the Minister of Transport has some powers under this act, while others are not exercised by him but by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. Just how is it possible to divide the powers in that way? I find that the report of the Department of Transport lists the boards, commissions and government-owned companies coming under the minister. We have a group starting with the air transport board and ending with Trans-Canada Air Lines and Trans-Canada (Atlantic) Air Lines. Then in the list of acts administered by the Department of Transport I find the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act. In this bill there is reference to agreements made by the minister with Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the air transport board has to carry out whatever terms are contained in such agreements. Incidentally, in the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act the minister is defined as the Minister of Transport, yet apparently the Minister of Trade and Commerce has complete control over Trans-Canada Air Lines. Just how is it possible to make that division, when the act reads that it shall be the Minister of Transport or such other minister as the governor in council may designate? Surely if some other minister is to be designated under the act, that other minister should take over the whole act, instead of having only one or two sections.

Mr. Chevrier: I think we will get along much faster and much more satisfactorily if we deal with the sections as we go along. In the questions my hon. friend has put to me he has touched upon at least four sections to which we will come later on. Dealing with the first section which we are discussing at the moment, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has no authority thereunder. I said so when we were discussing the principle of the bill on second reading, and I repeat it now. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has jurisdiction over Trans-Canada Air Lines, by virtue of the transfer of duties act, but he has no jurisdiction in respect of ministerial powers contained in part I of the Aeronautics Act. Neither has he jurisdiction in regard to the powers of the air transport board, which are contained in part II. So, dealing briefly with the first question, under section 1 of this bill the Minister of Trade and Commerce has no authority or jurisdiction over civil air matters.

Mr. Knowles: Is there any need to carry forward in this section the words "or such other minister as the governor in council may from time to time designate"? I ask the minister to think of this seriously and carefully. When this legislation was brought in, back in 1944, it was the desire and intention of the government that the minister to be designated would be the Minister of Trade and Commerce; hence these words were necessary at that time. At a later date, however—I forget just when it was, but around 1946 or 1947—the government decided to transfer the administration of this act from the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the Minister of Transport. Most other acts do not contain phrases of this kind. There is a transfer of duties act which enables the government to make transfers that had not been anticipated, and it does seem to me, since other phrases or sections of this act are being cut out because their usefulness has ended, that the same is the case here and that the words I have indicated should be deleted. All we require is the provision:

> In this part, "minister" means the Minister of Transport, except that in any matter relating to defence, "minister" means the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Chevrier: There is a very definite reason why those words should be retained. In the past the government has decided to assign responsibility for the Aeronautics Act to other ministers. My hon. friend was inadvertently in error a moment ago when he said these duties had been assigned to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They were first assigned to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and later on to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. Green: They were the same man.

Mr. Chevrier: And at a later date they were assigned to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Green: Still the same man.

Mr. Chevrier: It has been indicated to me that they were not under this act assigned to the Minister of Trade and Commerce but were returned to the Minister of Transport, where they were originally. The air services branch is one which it might be found advisable at some time or other to assign to a minister other than the Minister of Transport, and for that reason I think it is advisable to retain the provision.

Mr. Graydon: It seems to me that if the minister were sitting on this side of the house, as perhaps he will be before long—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not see any sign of it.

Mr. Graydon: I did not want to start an argument. If he were on this side I think he would be the first to try to smoke out the government on the question of why the Minister of Transport does not handle all the transport end of the government enterprises. That is what the public find very confusing. As the minister said a few moments ago, first it was in the hands of the minister of munitions and supply, then the minister of reconstruction, and then the Minister of Trade and Commerce. To the public that might seem like quite a change from time to time; but to us, who know that those portfolios have been held by the one man who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it is not so convincing an argument. I should like to ask the minister why it is that he has not jurisdiction over all transportation affairs?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is that the Minister of Transport has jurisdiction over all matters concerning aviation under the Aeronautics Act, save and except the subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways, T.C.A.

Mr. Graydon: Why have you not got that?

Mr. Chevrier: The government has decided, as I explained the other evening, that that should be in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. While I am dealing with that matter, I might refer to one of the points the member for Vancouver-Quadra has brought up. He says that the air transport board should be an independent body, and should have far more power than it has.

Mr. Green: In its judicial functions.

Mr. Chevrier: He says the minister has too much power in a judicial capacity. The other evening the leader of the opposition said the minister did not have enough power, and should have under his jurisdiction T.C.A., which is the same argument the member for Peel is making. The minister cannot have too much power and not enough at the same time. It is either one thing or the other. In answer to the question, I say that the government has decided that Trans-Canada Air Lines should be responsible to another minister.

Mr. Graydon: That is just drawing a red herring across the trail. It has nothing at all to do with the point I mentioned. I cannot see that it makes any difference, from the standpoint of the argument advanced by the member for Vancouver-Quadra, to the point I have been making. It seems to me the cabinet ought to tidy up its own household and put the affairs of transport under one minister. I cannot see why there should be a residue of the cabinet estate left in the hands of another minister. I should think the Minister of Transport—

The Chairman: That is out of order.

Mr. Graydon: Surely, Mr. Chairman, we have not come to the position where we cannot discuss the cabinet.

Mr. Chevrier: So far as I am concerned the members can discuss anything, but I do wish they would keep to the section with which we are dealing. It provides for changing the designation minister of national defence for air to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Graydon: Surely I am right on the beam so far as this section is concerned, because it says:

> In this part, "minister" means the Minister of Transport or such other minister as the governor in council may from time to time designate . . .

I think we ought to have transport matters under the Minister of Transport, and that is all I shall say about it.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Transport has just given us a reason why the Minister of Trade and Commerce should not have charge of a commercial air line, the Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is a subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways, and the Minister of Transport has charge of that railway. Why should he not, therefore, also have charge of Trans-Canada Air Lines? I am afraid the position is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not give up Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the cabinet is afraid to make him do so.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend knew what the facts were, he would not make that statement. The position is far from that. The government has decided the Minister of Trade and Commerce shall have jurisdiction over Trans-Canada Air Lines. If the government decides otherwise, it will announce the policy.

Mr. Green: You mean when he decides otherwise.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me the members on my right are confusing things here. This section does not deal with the question as to what minister has charge of Trans-Canada Air Lines; it deals with what minister has charge of the Aeronautics Act. My point is that the supervision of this act has now got to the right place, the Minister of Transport. Surely, it is not going to be turned over to the Minister of Public Works or any other minister.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You never know.

Mr. Graydon: Wait until the Minister of Trade and Commerce returns from England.

Mr. Knowles: There are no other ministers in the house at the moment to whom it could be turned over.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There are not many members in the house, either.

Mr. Knowles: There are not many over there.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Nor are there many on your side.

Mr. Knowles: My point is that the government has now brought the supervision of the act to the Minister of Transport where it belongs.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Duties of minister.

Mr. Green: The explanatory note says:

This amendment is intended: To include the increasingly important field of non-scheduled international air services.

In the committee the other day the minister was unable to give us a statement of government policy with regard to this particular service. Could he explain that policy to us today?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the section with which we are dealing is section 2 (h) which gives the minister power to take such action as may be necessary to secure, by international regulation or otherwise, the rights of His Majesty in respect of his government of Canada in international air routes. It is now sought to change those words "in international air routes" to "in international air traffic" because it is a broader term and takes in more ground—perhaps I should say more air.

The object, as is set out in the notes, is to include the increasingly important field of non-scheduled international air services. In giving his evidence before the committee the other day, the chairman of the air transport board explained that there was a policy governing that, but it was an interim policy. It was contained in a circular that had been given out to the various air carriers. I have that circular with me, and I shall be glad either to table it or to send it over to the hon. member.

Mr. Green: Could the minister not give us a summary of the policy? It was pointed out in the committee the other day that these services are becoming of great importance, because there are commercial planes flying over the boundary with private parties. For example, they are taking parties on fishing or hunting trips, or bringing over tourists. Apparently it is a development that has taken place within the last year or two. There is a great deal more of that kind of traffic each year, and members will see that it involves such questions as the game regulations. All sorts of difficulties crop up as a result of those services. I think it is of sufficient importance for the minister to give us a summary of government policy with regard to these non-scheduled international air services.

Mr. Chevrier: The matter to which my hon. friend refers now, particularly wildlife conservation, is covered by amendments on page 5, section 7. This amendment simply changes the words "international air route" to "international air traffic", because international flying now comprises a large volume of non-scheduled traffic which does not conform with any route pattern such as it did under the former section. The change will mean that the minister will now have powers which will apply to all international air traffic, whereas before they only applied to certain routes on which there were prearranged schedules approved by the board.

I am informed there is a legal interpretation which has some bearing on the change. Lawyers seemed to feel that "scheduled route" did not cover as much as "scheduled traffic". Because of the rapid development of aviation, the words "air route" take in a far greater field.

Mr. Green: That is all very interesting, but it does not deal with the question I asked. The explanatory note of this particular subsection reads:

This amendment is intended: To include the increasingly important field of non-scheduled international air services.

It obviously does that because it changes the word "routes" to "traffic" so that the non-scheduled flights would now be included. At the conclusion of the sittings of the committee the other day the minister assured us that the government has a policy with respect to this particular kind of traffic. I should like to know what that policy is; or if the minister wants to place the statement on Hansard, that is quite satisfactory to me. I think the committee is entitled to some explanation of the policy.

Mr. Chevrier: I told my hon. friend that I would give him this circular, and I will do it now. I think there has been a misunderstanding as to what I said in the committee. There is a full discussion reported in the evidence. I think the evidence will bear out that my statement was to the effect that the policy concerning these non-scheduled international air services was not yet clarified, that there was not a fixed policy, but that there was an interim policy based on the advice given to the government, which was adopted and laid down by the air transport board by circular No. 15. It is fairly lengthy though, so I would rather give it to my hon. friend than read it. But here will be found the present position with regard to the international non-scheduled air services.

Mr. Green: Why not put it on Hansard?

Mr. Chevrier: If the committee has no objection, I have none.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that this document be put on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: The circular reads:

AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

Circular No. 15

Operation of commercial air services to and from Canada by foreign air carriers other than agreed services on specified routes by designated air lines

The information to be furnished and the procedure to be followed by foreign air carriers who wish to operate commercial air services, to or from Canada, other than agreed air services operated on specified routes by designated air lines, is laid down in air transport board circular No. 14, which became effective May 15, 1949. This supplements the said circular and outlines the policy which is followed by the air transport board in dealing with applications for permit to operate commercial air services to and from Canada.

When the proposed movement is between Canada and a country with which Canada has a bilateral air agreement providing for agreed air services between the two countries—

(a) The board believes that the appropriate designated air carriers of the two countries have primary rights to the carriage of traffic between those two countries and requires to be satisfied that one or other of such designated air carriers is not in a position to furnish the proposed transportation on a reasonable basis;

(b) If the appropriate designated air carrier of one or other of the countries is not in a position to furnish the proposed transportation, the board prefers that the traffic be carried by some other air carrier of one of the two countries;

(c) If the board is satisfied that one air carrier of one country or the other is unable to furnish the transportation on a reasonable basis; and if the board is satisfied that the transportation applied for would be in the public interest, then it is prepared to grant a permit to the air carrier of a third country;

(d) Any large movement involving frequency, regularity or volume, is reviewed with care. When the applicant is a carrier of a third country, the board would refuse a permit unless satisfied that the traffic should be moved by air carrier of a third country and in such cases may require either association with an appropriate designated air line if any, or some other form of direct governmental sponsorship from one of the two countries involved;

(e) In dealing with applications from foreign air carriers under the foregoing principles, the board takes into consideration primarily the position of the Canadian air carriers, assuming that the other country from, or to which the proposed movement is to take place, will protect the interests of its own carriers.

(f) In all such cases the board reviews the proposed charges and conditions of carriage to make sure that they are just and reasonable.

When the proposed movement is between Canada and a country with which Canada has no bilateral agreement—

(a) The board requires to be satisfied that it is in the public interest that the transportation be furnished by an air carrier other than the designated air carriers whose combined services connect Canada and that country.

(b) If the board is so satisfied, preference would normally be given to carriage by either a Canadian carrier or a carrier of the country to or from which the traffic is moving. A reasonable liberal attitude is taken towards applications from the carriers of third countries for occasional flights. In the case of large or frequent movements however, the board takes the general attitude indicated in 2(d) above.

(c) A rate review on the basis indicated in 2(f) above also takes place.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Powers of minister to make regulations with approval of governor in council.

Mr. Green: The explanatory note dealing with new clause (d) reads:

This amendment is intended: To mark clearly the application of the paragraph to the use and operation of aircraft as distinguished from the economic regulation of commercial air services.

That raises a question as to where the boundary is between the work done by the minister and his aviation branch and the work of the air transport board; because the air transport board deals with economic regulation of all commercial air services. A few minutes ago, when I asked the minister to explain just where the boundary was, he said he would wait until he got to a section of the bill; and I think this is the section on which that answer should be given.

Mr. Chevrier: A while ago the hon. member made the point that the air transport board did not possess sufficient power and authority, that it should have more power and authority, and that it should not be subject to the approval of the minister with regard to the granting of licences; and he argued in favour of a completely independent board, as did his leader the other evening, I think.

Mr. Green: That is dealing with the judicial functions.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. There is a reason why that situation should be as it is, because the air transport board has to deal with a problem which is entirely different from that where there would be nothing but independent air carriers, as in the United States, for instance. In Canada the largest operator is a government-owned air line, and I think it would be improper for the board to have exclusive powers such as my hon. friend argues for with reference to a government-owned body such as T.C.A. In other words it is felt that the board should have powers to advise on routes concerning T.C.A., and powers to advise economically as it does, but that there should be a limitation, as is set out in the amendment, because of this special position in respect of T.C.A.

My hon. friend asks for a division of the powers as between the departmental officials and air transport board officials or as between the minister and the board. They are fairly clearly set out in part I as opposed to part II. In committee the other day I think I gave at some length the functions of the air transport board and the duties of the air transport board under the various sections. This section seeks to change the words:

The conditions under which aircraft may be used for carrying goods, mails and passengers, or for the operation of any commercial service whatsoever;

To:

The conditions under which aircraft may be used or operated; . . .

So that there will be a distinction between the powers of the department or the powers of the minister and those of the board. In the language used before, among the departmental officials there was some feeling that there was an impingement of the duties of the board, and the amendment is sought to clarify the duties as between the board and the department.

Mr. Green: When I was speaking on section 1, I mentioned the government policy which restricts competition on these different routes. That apparently is underlying government policy not set out in any statute, order in council or directive but which, according to the chairman of the air transport board, is obviously considered by him to be binding upon the board. Can the minister give us any clarification of that particular policy and tell us whether or not there is any other policy of some kind which is not written into the statutes or not in an order in council but which, nevertheless, is recognized as government policy in the field of civil aviation?

Mr. Chevrier: In the committee the policy was gone into at some length. It is somewhat technical, and I do not know that I should like to give it again. It can be found in the evidence. But the board follows the government policy. That policy has been announced in the house here on more than one occasion.

Mr. Green: You are referring to the policy announced in 1944, are you?

Mr. Chevrier: I think it was 1943.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, 1943.

Mr. Chevrier: In 1943, dealing with domestic scheduled routes, and that not more than one carrier should operate on any one route. I think my predecessor did announce that at that time. The board follow that policy, of course. But more than that, the board are in agreement on that policy and believe that it is correct. Otherwise the board could, under its advisory powers, make recommendations to the contrary to the minister who would take it up with his colleagues in the cabinet in order to ascertain whether the policy should remain as it is or be amended.

Mr. Green: Then on page 3, clause 6, we find this provision:

Any regulation made under subsection one may authorize the minister to make orders or directions with respect to such matters coming within this section as the regulations may prescribe.

The explanatory note at the side is as follows:

Minister may carry out regulations by ministerial order or direction.

We went into that at length in committee, and I think it will be agreed that what is sought here is power for the minister to issue directives which will have the same force and effect as if they were regulations and, of course, would carry the same penalty.

Hon. members will find at page 3 of the bill a new provision for penalties, where it is indicated that the penalty may be $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or to both fine and imprisonment. That punishment is to apply to the directives issued by the minister, just as it applies to the regulations passed by the governor in council. I do not think that is giving the person who may be fined or put in jail a fair run for his money. I say that for these reasons:

Under part III of the Aeronautics Act all regulations have to be published in the Canada Gazette; furthermore they must be laid before the House of Commons within ten days after publication, if parliament is then sitting or, if parliament is not sitting, within ten days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof. This means that parliament took care to give the public a chance to know what the regulations are. That is as it should be, because it is a serious thing to put a man in jail for a year.

If the minister has to issue directives covering certain conditions which may arise, then there should be some different sort of punishment for breach of those directives, rather than making the culprit subject to fine up to $5,000, or to imprisonment for a year, or both fine and imprisonment. The minister is given wide powers to cancel or suspend licences. If these directives are issued and then are not followed, I believe it would be sufficient punishment to suspend a licence for a time, or even to cancel it. But, instead of that, a breach of these directives is made just as serious as a breach of the regulations; yet there is no provision for publicizing directives, and there is no way in which it can be made certain that the people in this business will know what directives have been issued.

For that reason I would urge that the minister make provision in the act whereby punishment for a breach of the directives shall not be the same as that for a breach of the regulations.

Mr. Coldwell: Is there any difference between regulations, orders and directives?

Mr. Green: If this amendment is passed as it now stands there will be no difference in the punishment for a breach. The section indicates, as explained in the side note, that the minister may carry out regulations by ministerial order or direction. I think the proper procedure would be to issue a new regulation. It does not take long, because regulations could be passed by the cabinet within a matter of a few days. But this amendment goes further than that. He may issue a directive, then the day after this amendment is passed if that directive is not complied with the person guilty of the offence can be dragged into court and fined or imprisoned.

Mr. Coldwell: If that is so, it seems to me that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has raised an important point. I am not a lawyer and not given to interpreting some of these legal phrases; but I am just wondering about a provision whereby the minister is authorized to make orders and directions with respect to such matters as come within this section, as the regulations may provide, and then the further provision which states that:

> Every person who violates the provisions of a regulation is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or to both fine and imprisonment.

If the interpretation placed upon the section by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is correct, whereby the minister may issue a directive or order which would not be confirmed by an order in council, as a regulation would be, and to which no publicity is given, then it seems to me the hon. member is right in his criticism of this proposal. Would the minister given an explanation of it?

Mr. Graydon: If I may be permitted to make an observation on the same point, I suppose the minister and his officials have perhaps surrendered to one of the inevitable trends of human nature, that of trying to find an easier administrative way to handle the situation quickly, even though it may be at the expense of the public generally.

This situation takes us along the road of order-in-council government just another mile, it seems to me—only it takes us along the road not only in daylight, but another mile in the dark. I say that because if this amendment is accepted the minister may, if he wishes, prosecute someone who has not even learned that he is violating the law, and has no way of finding out what law he is violating.

Mr. Chevrier: No, that is not so.

Mr. Graydon: As I read the section it is so.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Graydon: Unless one happens to be in the cabinet, one will not know what the law is—and there are not many in the cabinet, even though there are a number on the opposite side of the chamber who would like to find themselves there.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the hon. member be a little more serious.

Mr. Graydon: I am sorry that this section is not a little more serious, because the position the minister has taken today reflects a mentality, so far as the government is concerned, that is anything but serious when dealing with the ordinary public.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh no.

Mr. Graydon: I suggest that before this section is carried the committee should be told just where we are going. Not only are we travelling in the dark; we are going in the opposite direction to that which I think the public wants us to follow. The public does not want us to place more authority in the hands of the executive, but rather to bring the procedure of law-making back into the parliamentary system whereby the representatives of the people shall have some control over the laws the people must obey.

The minister should further consider whether in the final analysis he requires anything like this amount of power. This is adding more fads and frills to order-in-council government that the public would not like to have—and I do not like it, either.

Mr. Chevrier: I was going to say that perhaps if we were to get back to a somewhat calmer discussion of the section we would make greater headway. The questions asked were normal ones, and I should like to answer them to the satisfaction of the committee. I believe the committee is entitled to know just what the section means and how it will work, and I shall try to give that information.

Section 4 of the present act says that with the approval of the governor in council the minister may make orders and regulations with respect to licensing pilots, registration and identification of aircraft, stating conditions under which aircraft can be used for carrying goods, the conditions under which goods may be exported or imported, and the like. The moment those orders in council are passed they are gazetted and are open for public inspection.

This section goes a step further, I must admit, and provides:

> Any regulation made under subsection one may authorize the minister to make orders or directions with respect to such matters coming within this section as the regulations may prescribe.

The officials of the department think that that is necessary. I think the committee should know that there are times when because of emergency or urgency it is impossible to move quickly enough by means of an order in council. I could give some examples. An accident occurred to a Moth aircraft in which a passenger was killed and a pilot injured, as the result of the aircraft getting into a spin at low altitude because of jammed controls. The operators and pilots of this type of aircraft were cautioned to see, first, that the passenger's safety belt is fastened; second, that the control column and rudder connections are removed; and, third, that the control box cover is fastened in place. The circular is sent out making it mandatory that these things be done for the protection of the passenger flying in that type of aircraft. That is not done by order in council because it would take too long.

Mr. Green: How long would it take?

Mr. Chevrier: Anywhere from four days to two weeks or even longer depending upon the amount of work the government had at the time. There are a number of other examples I could give which might be more important than this one. There are thousands of circumstances in which it is important to issue orders and directives. If it were necessary to ask the minister to get an order in council and submit it to cabinet it would take a considerable amount of time.

Here is one having to do with the condition of the airstrips at Gander. During a certain period of the year when the frost comes out of the ground planes weighing above a certain tonnage may not land on the airstrips. The frost comes out of the ground quite suddenly and if it were necessary to get an order in council through before the directive or circular was issued, it would take too long. It is necessary that this be done by a directive or order.

Here is another case where it is provided that no person in an aircraft shall carry out acrobatic flying over any city or town or populous district. Second, shall not carry out any acrobatic flying or exhibition flying over any regatta, race meeting or meeting for public games or sports except when specially arranged for in writing by the promoters of such regatta or meeting and authorized by the minister. Third, shall not carry out any flying which, by reason of low altitude or proximity to persons or dwellings, is dangerous to public safety.

Many accidents have taken place because of a breach of this order. This order has not the force of law; it has only the force of a circular.

Mr. Coldwell: It seems to me that in the cases cited, particularly this last one, it would be quite simple to have a regulation. I am not so sure about the one dealing with the frost at Gander or perhaps the danger disclosed in connection with flying in Moth aircraft, but in a case of wide application I cannot see the force of having an order rather than a regulation.

Mr. Chevrier: That may be so, but I am told that these orders and directives that are put out in circular form run into the hundreds. I have quite a number of them here and could go on and on. While the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra took exception in the committee the other day to this amendment, I think the feeling generally was that these orders and regulations were of such importance that they should be given the effect of law. It is not something new. If the committee is surprised at what appears to be the granting of powers that are said to be out of the ordinary, let me say that this is done under the Customs Act as well as under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. It is done in the United Kingdom where they have had far more experience than we. I can assure the committee that it is not a question of taking powers that seem to be irregular and out of the ordinary.

If it were possible to pass an order in council to cover each case, I think it should be done. But it cannot be done as it would be too cumbersome. For that reason the officers of the department have suggested that we should follow what has been done in the Customs Act and the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and give the force of law to orders and directives. There is no secrecy about these orders and regulations, and I hope the committee has not got that impression. They are circulated to all fliers and to all owners and operators of air lines because we want to give them as much publicity as possible. It is important that publicity be given to them; that they should not be kept hidden.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister sign these directives himself?

Mr. Chevrier: As it is now, I do not sign them; they are sent out as circulars. If this amendment passes, yes, I would sign them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There will be none put out except as signed by the minister?

Mr. Chevrier: The minister or the deputy minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister. He is the one who takes the responsibility.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, they would be signed by the minister.

Mr. Knowles: Do I understand that so far these orders and directives do not have the force of law?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right, and they do not have to be obeyed.

Mr. Knowles: The department and the minister feel that they should be made obligatory by order in council?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: I notice it is suggested that the penalty for infractions of these regulations be increased from $1,000 to $5,000. Is that because there has been too much disregard of some of these orders and regulations?

Mr. Chevrier: There are two reasons for increasing the penalty. First, it was thought that the penalties for infractions of sections under part I of the act should be the same as the penalties for infractions under part II. Another reason is that there have been some infractions, although I cannot say that they have been numerous, and it was thought desirable to have a higher penalty.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister any information as to the number of infractions and what class of operator has been most guilty?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not that at hand, but I can get it.

Mr. Green: I suggest that this is moving in a very dangerous direction. The minister has said that there are hundreds of directives. If they are to be issued in this easy way then several results will follow. One will be that practically everything will be done by directive. There will be no incentive to have regulations. It is so much easier simply to draw up an order and have the minister or deputy minister sign it, and that will be the normal course followed. I suggest it will mean a good many more directives than there would be if some restriction were placed on the power to issue orders of this kind.

Surely there should not be the same penalty for breach of a directive as there is for breach of a regulation. For example, if the section is passed in its present form, a person can be given the same punishment for breaking one of these ministerial directives as he would receive for operating a forty-passenger plane without a commercial licence. The penalty is exactly the same. In the standing committee we asked general counsel for the department whether or not it was the intention that there should be prosecutions under these directives. At page 262 of the proceedings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, he said:

> I think that would have to depend on the regulations themselves. And if the regulation said that certain directives of the minister had to be complied with, then I would think that non-compliance with the directives would involve a breach of the regulations which would result in a possible prosecution. It might come back to the regulations themselves and be treated as a breach of regulations.

Mr. Coldwell: That would have to be decided by the court, and would the court not take into consideration how serious the breach was?

Mr. Chevrier: Just as in any other summary procedure.

Mr. Green: If parliament passes this section it will be making a breach of the directives as serious a matter as a breach of the regulations, and crown counsel will be within his rights to argue that before the judge. I suggest that the penalty for a breach of these directives should be different from the penalty for a breach of the regulations. For example, the minister already has power under the act to suspend a licence. If he finds any flier or firm committing a breach of the terms of a directive then he can meet that situation by suspending the licence. In fact that would probably be just as effective as if court action were taken. It is going very far for parliament to say that it will give the minister the authority to issue an order, a breach of which carries exactly the same penalty as a breach of the regulations which must be approved not by one minister or one deputy minister but by cabinet. Regulations have the judgment of other members of the cabinet, are then duly published, and people all over the country have some chance to know that there is such a regulation in force.

I do not think there can be any justification for putting a ministerial directive on the same basis as a regulation passed by order in council. If the amendment is passed in its present form that is exactly what parliament is doing.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member suggests that perhaps we would be better off by suspending the licence. I think we would be far worse off if we were to suspend the licence. We have given this matter very careful consideration. I can imagine what would happen if, because of a breach of these orders, the licence was suspended.

Immediately there would be a great cry, "We did not get a chance to defend ourselves before the licence was taken from us". When there are automobile accidents on highways drivers' licences are not suspended without other things being done first. First of all a charge of criminal negligence, speeding or something else, is laid in a police court. If the magistrate so wishes he may, over and above fining the individual or imposing a prison term, suspend his licence. We can also do that, but I think it would be a mistake to suspend the licence without other action being first taken. It would be going much further than we would sometimes wish to go.

The other point raised was as to placing a directive, so far as fine or imprisonment is concerned, on the same basis as a regulation. The fact is that some of the orders and directives made under order in council are far more important, and the breach thereof is far more serious, than some of the regulations made under order in council. That is the reason why it has been found necessary to do this, and it seems to me that it is the proper thing to do under the circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the minister with some interest when he said that the same provision was in the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and in the Customs Act. Would he mention the sections of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and the Customs Act to which he made reference, and would he also read in full the sections to which he refers?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not have them before me but I am informed, so that there will be no doubt about my sincerity of purpose—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know that.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed by the Department of Justice that similar provisions are contained in the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and other statutes whereby orders and directives are made under authorized regulations. I cannot point to the section but if I got the act I presume I could. I am informed on good authority that such is the case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says that it takes from four days to two weeks to pass an order in council. I think that is rather longer than it takes.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member wants to put words in my mouth.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what you said. If I misinterpreted the minister—

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: If I said that, perhaps I did not use the correct language. It does not take from four days to two weeks to pass an order in council. It takes a very short time to pass an order in council, but it takes from four days to two weeks before an order in council can be considered. It has to be prepared, it has to be brought before the subcommittee of cabinet dealing with it. There might not be time at the particular meeting dealing with orders in council to consider all of them, and it is held over for another meeting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the average number dealt with per day?

Mr. Chevrier: It is not a question of per day; it is a question of per meeting. It might be 5,000. I am advised on some occasions there have been as many as 5,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this is even worse than I thought it was. Certainly it shows the extent to which orders in council, including of course treasury orders, are passed. I have been trying to help the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say that my reference was to 5,000 a year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course it is a great many more than 5,000 a year. As a matter of fact it must run to five times 5,000 at the very least. I have not the latest figures but I am very much interested in the rather easy manner in which the minister brushes aside all objections raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. He gave certain examples where haste was necessary. One example was low flying. Surely that must be an offence now under the regulations. That example did not appeal as a basis for having laws made by officials of the department. This looks like a short cut suggested by officials in order to get things done without having laws made, either by order in council or through parliament.

To say that the penalty is the same in a directive as in a regulation constitutes a serious derogation of legislative authority. It means that two or three officials of the department can simply make out such a directive as appeals to them at the moment, hand it to the minister and say, "We need action on this immediately." This is not going to apply retroactively; therefore I see no reason for this haste. This is not done in the United Kingdom. Only the other day I was reading a debate that took place in the House of Lords, and this is one thing that is simply not done. Within the last ten days, speaking in the House of Lords, Viscount Cecil of Chelwood used these words:

The growing power of the cabinet is a danger to the democratic constitution of the country.

He was referring to the power of the cabinet to issue orders in council. This amendment places authority over the liberty of the subject in the hands of officials, who may decide that they are in a rush for action and issue a directive to meet their own desires thus penalizing the individual. Viscount Simon dealt with the matter also, and used these words:

> The rule of law has largely ceased to protect citizens of this country over a wide range of rights and liabilities.

That is just what these orders and directives would do. This amendment will give an official in this department power to say to one person, "I issue a directive making it an offence in your case punishable by a heavy fine, whereas it does not apply to another person." This denies the rule of law and equality as between individuals, and I am surprised that the minister presses this amendment so assiduously. After all, he has tremendous powers under section 4, providing for almost every eventuality, certainly everything contemplated by the minister at the time the act was passed. There would be no abnegation of authority if the minister were to withdraw this amendment. When I first heard my hon. friend and colleague dealing with the matter I could not conceive that the minister had gone so far. Surely this power is not needed. He mentioned as an example the frost going out in Gander airport. Well, I would imagine the frost goes out there at about the same time each year. That may be an unusual case, but surely one unusual case does not justify parliament absolutely abdicating its legislative authority and putting in the hands of one official power over the liberty of the subject. This is a request on the part of the minister to put officialdom in a position where, if they see something wrong, even if it is but a peccadillo, they may decide to issue a directive and impose punishment by means of a fine not exceeding $5,000 or one year in jail.

Punishment like that should not be within the discretion of an official in the department. Coming back to my main objection, apart from those raised by my hon. friend, this places the minister or his officials in a position where they can discriminate, where they can continue to deny the application of the rule of law, where they can pass laws to meet peculiar situations and make individuals liable to the penalties set out. I suggest to the minister that, in the interests of the preservation of the rights of the individual against unjust or tyrannical directives, this amendment should be withdrawn.

As a matter of fact it is interesting to note that in the explanations the reason for asking for this amendment is this:

> To provide for proper enforcement of detailed safety procedures requiring frequent change . . .

In other words we may have one law today and another tomorrow, not based upon the considered judgment of the minister but upon the caprice of the moment. Tremendous improvements have been made within the last two years in this country in connection with order in council government. The Prime Minister has gone so far as to have orders in council regularly tabled, and legislation now before parliament will increase the opportunity of the individual to ascertain what is the law. Having this in mind, this section is actually a retrograde step. Such authority should not be in the hands of officials who at a given moment may be antagonized by the attitude of one person and who, without intending to do so, still have power to discriminate.

Knowing the minister as I do I feel sure that on reconsideration he will withdraw this amendment. He has very wide powers already under section 4. This amendment will simply give him and his officials carte blanche to do as they please in individual cases, regardless of what may be the application of the law in general cases.

Mr. Coldwell: If the hon. member for Lake Centre is right of course this amendment would be wholly bad. But is it true to say that a directive may be issued discriminating against one individual, more or less at the caprice of some official? Is it not a fact, or am I wrong, that an order or directive so issued would have general application, and not application to only a particular individual at a particular time?

Mr. Chevrier: If I may answer that question now, it would have general application. It would be issued as a circular to the pilot, the owner and the operator.

Mr. Coldwell: A little earlier the matter of low flying was mentioned, and no doubt other orders and directives of a similar nature have been issued. I can see that it might happen that such orders or directives must be issued within a few hours, if there is an emergency; but when that happens should they not be subsequently issued as regulations, with the authority of an order in council, if as the minister says they are sufficiently important that they should have general application? It seems to me that while there may be occasions when something unforeseen may happen and it is necessary to issue an immediate order or directive, that immediate order or directive issued because of the necessity of the moment should, if it is to have general application thereafter, be the subject of a regulation issued in the usual way by order in council and published. As I said earlier when I first drew attention to this, to my mind the section is worded in such a way that it is difficult to understand just what the implication is, because it speaks of the violation of the provisions of a regulation, not an order or directive. There is confusion, I believe, in the manner in which it is worded.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member suggests that in important instances, such as those that were mentioned earlier in the discussion, the orders and directives should be tabled or made the subject of a regulation at a later date. I can see some merit in that, and I would not have any objection, if it were the wish of the committee, that all orders and directives be tabled so that the house would know what was in them.

Mr. Coldwell: That was not my only point. If they are of general interest, then it seems to me they should cease to be mere orders and directives, and should become regulations in the same sense as other regulations, with the authority of the government through order in council. That is the point I am making; not necessarily tabling them but converting them, if they are of general importance, into proper regulations with the authority of order in council.

Mr. Green: Apparently the minister is not going to do anything about changing this section, and that means the responsibility rests with him. As has been pointed out by other speakers, this section is not drafted properly. I think there are different ways in which it could be corrected, but the minister has not yet—

Mr. Coldwell: How does the hon. member suggest it should be remedied?

Mr. Green: The member for Rosetown-Biggar made one suggestion.

Mr. Chevrier: He suggested it should be withdrawn.

Mr. Green: The member for Rosetown-Biggar made one suggestion, that if there were need for regulations to be passed on short notice or for some action to be taken quickly, then a directive should be issued, and the directive should be made a regulation within a set period. Such a procedure would eliminate my main objection. There are different ways in which the evil in this proposed amendment could be dealt with. Another way would be to provide for a penalty which is not so severe.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

In view of the fact the minister is not accepting any of these suggestions, and apparently wants to push this section through in its present form, I move, Mr. Chairman, that clause 6 of section 3 of the bill be deleted.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, for the reasons I gave earlier, and because of the discussion which took place in committee on this matter at some length, I would have to oppose the amendment of the member.

Mr. Low: Would the minister reconsider the whole situation in the light of what has been said this afternoon, and perhaps allow the section to stand?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I am not prepared to reconsider it because I was asked to do that when the bill was before the committee on railways, canals, and telegraph lines. I gave the matter careful consideration, and came back and gave the reasons why I thought it was necessary that orders and directives be made.

Mr. Coldwell: Apparently the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra agrees with the suggestion I made, that if orders or directives have general application and are of sufficient importance, then they should be made regulations by order in council. It seems to me that if the minister agrees to that he removes the objection the member for Vancouver-Quadra has, and that I feel has some validity. I do not want, Mr. Chairman, to deny the minister the right, in an emergency, to issue an order or directive temporarily, so long as it is regularized afterwards, if it is of general application.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not deal with that point for the reason that, if that were consented to, then it would defeat the purpose of the amendment entirely. Who is going to decide how important these directives are? The hon. member may feel they were all important, and that being so orders in council by way of regulation would have to be passed to cover them all.

Mr. Knowles: One order in council could cover fifty directives. There is one point about the wording of these sections about which I am still not clear. I wish the minister would follow what I am trying to say, and I should also like the member for Lake Centre to follow it, to see if we can get this thing sorted out.

Subsection 2, starting at line 5 on page 3, says:

> Any regulation made under subsection one may authorize the minister to make orders or directions . . .

Now, subsection 1 gives the governor in council the power to make regulations respecting air navigation. Subsection 3, starting at line 11 on page 3, says:

Every person who violates the provisions of a regulation is guilty of an offence . . .

Supposing a regulation is passed by order in council giving the minister power to make certain directives. If I violate that regulation, it is clear I am guilty of an offence, but when the minister, under that regulation, isues an order or directive and I violate that order or directive, have I violated the regulation?

Mr. Chevrier: I suppose that is a question of law, but certainly the order would have been violated. It is the object of this amendment to penalize, by way of a fine or imprisonment, a person who has violated an order made under the regulation.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): These regulations are for the protection of life and property. Since I have lived beside a large airport for a good many years, it occurs to me that these regulations cannot be too strict. Quick decisions must be made, and authority must be given to the men at these airports to act quickly. Many accidents are caused by people who wilfully disobey regulations with respect to landing at airports on the northwest staging route. Our friends from the United States are sinners in that regard. They come in their private planes, and very often neglect to obey simple regulations which are set down for the protection of life. Without going into a legal quibble about language, it would seem to me that the stronger these regulations are made, and the more authority you give for the protection of human life, the better it will be for everyone concerned.

This is not a matter of riding a bicycle on the street, or something of that sort. When a passenger plane, possibly carrying fifty passengers, comes in for a landing, and there are some small craft flying about, and not obeying the regulations, somebody has got to act quickly. The penalty should be increased rather than decreased.

Mr. Coldwell: We are not discussing the regulations, Mr. Chairman. This is a matter of an order or directive issued under a regulation. I hesitate to deny to the minister the power that is asked for, because I can see that in the interests of safety and so on it may be necessary to issue an order. I can see that immediately. But once an order is issued which has a general application and is found to be essential to the safety of the travelling public, I am wondering if that should not be regularized by order in council and made a regulation instead of an order or directive. That is the point that I have in mind, and just that one point. I do not feel that I would be justified in denying the power that is asked for, but I would like the safeguard.

Mr. Chevrier: Once again, Mr. Chairman, in answer to that I cannot say any more than I have already said.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the minister understands what I mean.

Mr. Chevrier: I fully understand, and I appreciate the point. I think that is the only point that has been made in the discussion, and it has been made by more than one member; that is the point as to the section making the same penalty applicable to violators of the order or directive as is applicable to violators of the regulation. It may well be that there should be a difference between the penalties in those two cases. After having listened to the points that were made, I think perhaps there is something in the argument. But I think it would be a mistake to wipe out the whole clause. My hon. friend shakes his head. I know that he is not asking for that and neither did the leader of the Social Credit party ask for that; but that has been asked for—

Mr. Green: I said if you are willing to amend it that will be perfectly all right.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me go on. After listening to the discussion I think perhaps there is a reason for differentiating between violation of a regulation and violation of a directive or order, by way of a variation in the punishment and penalty; and I would be prepared to accept an amendment. In fact, I am prepared to move one which would leave the penalty for the infraction of the order or regulation as it is now, and is as follows:

Amend subclause (7) of clause 3 of Bill 153 by adding the following as subsection (4):

4. Every person who violates an order or direction of the minister made under a regulation is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both fine and imprisonment.

I would ask my colleague to make this motion accordingly.

Mr. Claxton: I move accordingly.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to withdraw his own amendment, in view of the amendment suggested by the minister?

Mr. Green: Even at that, I am much against this business of issuing directives. I would, however, be willing to withdraw my amendment, provided that this amendment to the next clause is put forward by the government.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes. The Minister of National Defence moves accordingly.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra the unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Green) withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Claxton) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Regulations.

Mr. Green: I wonder if we could call it six o'clock and let this section be taken up after the supper recess?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: The house in committee on Bill No. 153.

Mr. Ross (Souris): On a matter of privilege, I did not check very closely the Hansard report of my speech yesterday, and at page 2808, in the 16th line, it reads, "As I listened to him over the air." It should read, "As I listened to the report over the air."

I, along with others, did hear this news report over a Winnipeg station the morning of May 18, attributing to the mayor of Winnipeg the statement charging the premier of Manitoba with criminal neglect.

Also in this afternoon's Ottawa Journal is the report of a denial by Mayor Garnet Coulter. I should like to read it:

> Mayor Garnet Coulter last night denied "very firmly" that he had ever accused Premier Douglas Campbell of maladministration in the Manitoba flood crisis.
>
> He was replying to a statement made in the House of Commons by J. A. Ross (P.C.—Souris). Mr. Ross said he had heard the Winnipeg mayor charge in a radio broadcast that the premier had been "guilty of criminal negligence" in his handling of the situation.
>
> "In one of the meetings of the city's flood-control committee," Mayor Coulter said, "there was somewhat harsh criticism of Premier Campbell, but not by me.
> "It is possible that some such expression (as that referred to by Mr. Ross) was used."

I checked the Winnipeg Tribune of May 17, and found that the deputy mayor, Alderman C. E. Simonite, is reported on the front page, in heavy type, as having made that statement.

I accept the denial of Mayor Garnet Coulter, and I wish to apologize and make amends to him.

The Deputy Chairman: We were discussing section 6.

Mr. Green: What change is there in this section with regard to tolls?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend, I understand, is dealing with section 6(g). The only change in section 6(g) is the addition of the word "toll" after the word "tariff." This is a change in phraseology. It was felt that because the word "toll" covered a wider field than "tariff" it should be inserted. It is also felt that a tariff is a document including charges filed with the board, whereas a toll is a specific charge.

Mr. Green: I had reference more particularly to the new paragraph (gg).

Mr. Chevrier: This change is for the same reason as those in sections 2(4) and 4(1). It is to give to the board jurisdiction over tolls outside the territorial jurisdiction of Canada. I think the note opposite section 2(4) would give an exact explanation of this amendment. As the act stands today there is no jurisdiction to cover tolls outside Canada, and because of commitments made by ICAO it is felt there should be jurisdiction in that respect.

Mr. Green: There is a provision being written into section 12 of the act the effect of which would be to give the board power to exempt international routes. If they are exempt from the control of the board, then why does the board retain any jurisdiction over the tolls?

Mr. Chevrier: May we discuss that when we reach section 12; we are still on section 6. That discussion would be more applicable under section 7. Could we have section 6 passed?

Mr. Green: No; this paragraph (gg) apparently gives power with respect to tolls on international routes. Yet, as I understand it, the board is going to divest itself of any control over international routes.

Mr. Chevrier: No, not as to tolls or tariffs; but it may grant a licence under section 12, for public convenience and necessity.

Mr. Green: It will be in a position of having some control over tolls and tariffs, whereas it may not have over the routes flown?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, full economic control over tolls, but not over routes.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Exception.

Mr. Knowles: Section 7 in this bill is the one which makes whatever changes are proposed in section 12 of the act. So far as I can determine, no change has been made in any prior amending act and no change is now contemplated with respect to section 12(2). Is it because section 12(2) stands?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that that underlines the farce of this whole business. Let me read section 12(2)—and I do that because we are now dealing with section 12:

> No such licence shall be issued in respect of a commercial air service, owned, leased, controlled or operated by any person who is engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward by means other than aircraft unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued.

That section did not appear in the Aeronautics Act until after the policy announced by the then minister of munitions and supply in 1944 to the effect that, commencing one year after the end of the war in Europe, railway and surface transportation companies would no longer be entitled to operate air lines. To get the full effect of it one has to look at section 14; however, we shall come to that later.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask my hon. friend this question. He is the expert on the rules of the house, for his party.

Mr. Knowles: Just ask the question.

Mr. Chevrier: Section 12(2) is not being amended in any way and is not before the committee. Therefore I do not think it can be discussed.

Mr. Knowles: But the amending of section 12 of the act is now before the committee, and I submit it is in order to discuss the section being amended.

Mr. Chevrier: It is in order to discuss the subsection being amended. There are eleven or twelve subsections in section 12. At the moment we are dealing with subsection 3A, which is being amended. We are not dealing with subsection 2, because it is not being touched. Therefore I do not think it can be discussed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, when the minister tries to stop me from discussing this matter now I would tell him that I can come back to it when we get to the section which seeks the repeal of sections 13 and 14. I would remind the minister that, in part, they deal with the same question. Since it is his intention later on to repeal section 14, why does he not at the same time repeal section 12(2)? To leave on the statute books a subsection that says no surface transportation company is to operate an air line, except under the most exceptional circumstances, is surely making a joke of statute law. That represents the policy as announced by the minister of munitions and supply in 1944. However, that has been changed, and it has not been carried out at all. Why does that subsection stay on the statute books?

The Deputy Chairman: Does the section carry?

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to answer the question?

Mr. Chevrier: The matter is not before the committee, but since it has been raised earlier by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, perhaps I could say a word about it—although the discussion is entirely out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: If the discussion is out of order I cannot permit it. Let us settle this question. If it is in order, let us have it; but if it is not in order, I cannot permit it.

Mr. Graydon: The committee could give consent.

The Deputy Chairman: It we have unanimous consent we can discuss matters which are not now before the committee. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: We do not have unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, I think you should consider this matter carefully. This clause in the bill before us amends several parts of section 12 of the act. There is a certain relationship between them. I submit that for the Minister of Transport to hide behind the contention he is putting forward now is simply not being fair with the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to allow the hon. member to say that I am hiding behind anything. The hon. member should not use that expression as he knows better than that. I am not trying to hide behind anything. It was raised before and I am willing to deal with it now, but I do not want to be faced now, and again when my estimates are up later, with the statement that I consented to a discussion of a matter than was out of order. If there is going to be a twenty or thirty minute debate on a subject that is not even before the committee, then it is only with the consent of the committee I shall speak now. However, it would be on the distinct understanding that we do not get into a lengthy debate and that I will not be told that this having been out of order anybody else can bring up other matters and perhaps have an extended debate on them. If the committee feels that the matter should be dealt with I am ready to consider it. I was starting out to say a moment ago that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra raised this question originally on second reading and then again in the committee. There is some reference to it in the evidence. I do not see anything abnormal about subsection 2 as it now stands. If my hon. friend places a different interpretation upon it than I do then perhaps he and I have not the same view of the meaning of words.

This subsection reads:

> No such licence shall be issued in respect of a commercial air service, owned, leased, controlled or operated by any person who is engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward by means other than aircraft unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued.

As has already been placed on Hansard, the meaning of that subsection is that no licence shall be issued to a surface carrier, a trucking company or a shipping company unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued. There has been a departure from that statutory prescription by means of government policy announced, I think, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and perhaps by the Prime Minister, which permitted both the T.C.A. and the C.P.A., as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said this afternoon, ostensibly to operate in the face of that subsection. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra argued that as this subsection serves no useful purpose it should be taken out altogether. I said to him in committee that I would consider it. I told him at the time that I had no views one way or another but I was anxious to hear the views of others. Certain views were expressed in committee.

Since that time I have been able to discuss the matter with some of my colleagues. There was not a complete discussion at a meeting of cabinet because I have not had that opportunity, but I have spoken to some of my colleagues and the feeling is that the section should remain as it is because no harm is done. Since there has been a derogation from the general policy, the words "unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued" justify what has been done under government policy. The feeling was that because of that the subsection should remain as it is.

Mr. Knowles: Would this subsection ever have been put into the act if it had not been for the policy of the government as announced in 1944 that surface transportation companies were not to continue to operate air lines?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot answer that.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister—

Mr. Chevrier: I would not know that. I would not be able to answer that because I had absolutely nothing to do with the drafting of the original act. Therefore I am not able to give my hon. friend an answer.

Mr. Knowles: The minister was a member of parliament, as I and others were, in 1944 when the whole question was before the house. It was certainly crystal clear then that the purpose of this subsection was to implement that policy of the government. I think it is clear to anyone who looks at it. There cannot just be the casual interpretation that the minister places on the subsection. It was put in the act clearly for the purpose of implementing the policy as announced by the government at that time. Although I have not Hansard of that long debate before me at this moment I am sure that when that subsection was being discussed the minister of munitions and supply made it clear that that was in the act for the purpose of implementing that policy. In 1947 I asked the minister how the surface transportation companies were to be permitted to operate air lines beyond a year after the end of the war in Europe, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce told me that that was done by cancelling all the licences of these companies—there were fifty-three—and reissuing them under the terms of section 12, subsection 2.

I contend that that escape clause in subsection 2 is at variance with the purpose of the section in the original act. If the government has changed its policy, if it is no longer the intention of the government to deny to surface transportation companies the right to operate air lines, they should not leave this now meaningless subsection in the statute.

Mr. Green: Does not the minister think that having extra restrictions of this kind in the act may prevent transportation companies from entering the field of civil aviation? With that restriction in the act a company operating busses or a shipping company might not even consider establishing an air line. I am wondering whether it would not be wise to take the subsection out of the act unless it is government policy that there shall be extra restrictions in effect against any company in the transportation business.

If that is the policy of the government then I can see the value of this subsection, but the actions of the last two or three years would indicate that that is no longer the policy. Such being the case it does seem unwise to have a restrictive provision of this kind which certainly is not an inducement to transportation companies to enter the air business.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend asks if I do not think it is a deterrent. I do not think it is, any more than it was in the case of the subsidiaries of the railway companies, the T.C.A. and the C.P.A. A trucking company would more likely be interested in that field of transportation than a shipping company, and if it felt that it would like to operate an air service I think there is an "out" provided by the last part of the subsection which states:

—unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued.

I do not think that is a deterrent.

Mr. Green: Is it clear that government policy is to treat all applicants on the same basis whether or not they are transport companies?

Mr. Chevrier: I would think so.

Mr. Green: There are a couple of other questions I should like to ask about this section. The first has to do with the new 3A. Under that section the board can now exempt any scheduled commercial air service from its jurisdiction unless that air service operates wholly within Canada. When the bill was explained in the other place it was pointed out that the main purpose of this change was to make the provision such that international routes could be exempted from control by the board. That would appear to be the main purpose of the section. Apparently from now on the air transport board is to exercise no jurisdiction over international scheduled air routes. I should like the minister to explain why that step is being taken, and why the board is being deprived of this jurisdiction.

Mr. Chevrier: Because of international agreement, because of bilateral agreement.

Mr. Green: Even though there is a bilateral agreement is it not necessary for somebody to check such routes and approve of them? I do not understand why the power to conduct such a check should be taken away.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not taken away. The board still has the same duties and responsibilities with reference to air routes as they had before. I thought that had been explained by the chairman of the board in the standing committee. My understanding of the section is that all it does is to permit the board to exempt international air carriers from public convenience and necessity. They are still subject to the control of the board in so far as rates are concerned, and I presume the rates will be those which have been approved by international agreement.

Mr. Green: But the routes will not be subject to any control by the board?

Mr. Chevrier: The routes will still be subject to control. The only change that is being made is that it will no longer be necessary to consider public convenience and necessity in granting a licence for that sort of international route.

Mr. Green: The new subsection 5 is the one which gives power to the board to issue licences, and so on. Of course that is subject to the first subsection of section 12 of the act which reads:

Subject to the approval of the minister, the board may issue to any person applying therefor a licence to operate a commercial air service.

The point I tried to make this afternoon was that a decision of the board in favour of granting an application should not be subject to veto by the minister. Is there any intention on the part of the government—

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry, I cannot follow the hon. gentleman. Is he dealing with 12(5)?

Mr. Green: Yes. Of course that is subject to the first subsection of section 12 reading:

Subject to the approval of the minister, the board may issue to any person applying therefor a licence to operate a commercial air service.

Therefore at the present time the board cannot issue a licence without having it approved by the minister. As I pointed out this afternoon, that takes away from the board any semblance of freedom in making decisions. Is there no intention on the part of the government to give the board full power to grant or reject licences, subject of course to an appeal? It seems ridiculous that when hundreds of applications for licences are being granted each one of them must be dealt with by the minister. I cannot understand why the board is not given that judicial power without a veto by the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to interrupt the trend of thought of my hon. friend but if he will just look at 12(5) he will see it deals with an entirely different matter. Subsection 1 of section 12 states that the board with the approval of the minister may issue to any person applying therefor a licence to operate a commercial air service; but, under subsection 5 of section 12, in issuing any licence the board shall prescribe the routes, et cetera, as mentioned there. The amendment simply states:

In issuing any licence, the board may prescribe the routes which may be followed or the areas to be served and may attach to the licence such conditions as the board may consider necessary or desirable in the public interest, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the board may impose conditions respecting schedules, places of call, carriage of passengers and freight, insurance, and, subject to the Post Office Act, the carriage of mail.

The amendment is introduced to change the accent to public interest rather than efficient operation. The board looked before to efficient operation, and now the accent is on public interest because there are a number of matters that have come to the attention of the board and the department that cannot be dealt with since they fall under another jurisdiction. The board feels that it may well be able to enter into certain negotiations with these other jurisdictions and in the public interest prescribe in the licences certain terms and conditions which will be of use.

Mr. Green: Of course the words "necessary or desirable in the public interest" are the same words which are found in the act setting up the board of transport commissioners. Looking at them as they appear in subsection 5, one would think that the air transport board is to be given power to decide on each application on the basis of whether or not it is in the public interest that the application should be granted. What I am complaining about is that behind all that there is still subsection 1 of the same section which says that the board cannot issue any licence without the approval of the minister. I ask the minister whether there is no plan in the minds of the cabinet to do away with approval by the minister of each licence. It seems very unwise. The minister cannot possibly have all the facts because there are so many licences being granted. In addition the minister's power of veto cuts down the prestige and authority of the air transport board quite unnecessarily.

Mr. Chevrier: I thought I covered that point this afternoon when my hon. friend brought it up. All I can do is to repeat what I said then, namely, that there is a distinction to be made between the board of transport commissioners and the air transport board, between air carriers in Canada and air carriers in the United States. In the United States air carriers are nearly all private. By that I mean under private enterprise. In Canada there is one large government-owned corporation.

Mr. Green: But it does not come under this board.

Mr. Chevrier: It does with reference to routes. The chairman of the air transport board explained in committee that with respect to the consideration of routes into new countries it does come under the board.

Mr. Green: Purely as an advisory body.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: Otherwise, too. In Canada the largest operator is the government-owned T.C.A., and for that reason it is felt that if the board were an independent body, without having to refer to the minister for approval, it would not be in the best interests.

Mr. Green: Then one other question on this section, having to do with the new subsection 6, which provides for the issuing of licences to Trans-Canada Air Lines. That subsection reads:

The board shall upon application grant to Trans-Canada Air Lines a licence to operate a commercial air service under such terms and subject to such conditions as will enable Trans-Canada Air Lines to perform any agreement made, under sections fifteen or twenty-five of The Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, between the Minister of Transport and Trans-Canada Air Lines or between the Minister of Transport and any corporation created under section twenty of the said act.

The committee has been told that the Minister of Transport is not in charge of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is in charge of T.C.A.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: Yet this section provides that the agreement is to be between the Minister of Transport and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: Or between the Minister of Transport and a corporation created by Trans-Canada Air Lines, which I believe has power to set up other companies such as the line across the Atlantic.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, subsidiary companies.

Mr. Green: Is that section not wrong? The minister said this afternoon he was the only minister concerned with the Aeronautics Act. Here we have a clear case where the Minister of Trade and Commerce is right in the picture, because he is the man running Trans-Canada Air Lines and he is the man making these contracts with Trans-Canada Air Lines. Why not say that in the section, instead of saying the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Chevrier: I think the section is quite clear, and I believe all the statements I made this afternoon concerning the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport and that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are accurate. The Trans-Canada Air Lines Act clearly states that "minister" means the Minister of Transport. That is why the words used here are "Minister of Transport." As I stated earlier, by virtue of the transfer of duties act Trans-Canada Air Lines have been brought under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. So for the purposes of the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act the minister responsible is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The agreement referred to herein is an agreement entered into between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Trans-Canada. It could not be otherwise and make sense.

Mr. Graydon: When is the Minister of Transport not the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Chevrier: I think I will let the opposition answer that question.

Mr. Green: I do suggest that the minister recommend to his cabinet colleagues that the Minister of Trade and Commerce stick to selling wheat, because here is ridiculous phraseology. It refers to an agreement between the Minister of Transport and Trans-Canada Air Lines, yet the Minister of Transport has just admitted that the contract will not be between himself and Trans-Canada Air Lines at all but will be made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It really is an absurd position, which I believe the people of this country are entitled to have remedied.

Mr. McIvor: I do not see why we should raise any objection to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If he is given a job to do by the government he will do it in a straightforward, honest, businesslike way. We should offer no apology or criticism along that line.

On section 8—Repeal.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: No doubt some of those who are shouting "carried" will think I am going to continue beating a dead horse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Just wait and see whom I beat before you say "hear, hear." It does seem to me we should not repeal these two sections of the Aeronautics Act without a brief review of their history. They relate to the same question I was discussing a few moments ago, on section 7, when I raised the question as to why subsection 2 was being left in section 12 of the act. Let me read sections 13 and 14, which are now being repealed:

13. The board shall review all licences respecting commercial air services issued under part III of The Transport Act, 1938, or under part VII of The Air Regulations, 1938, prior to and in force at the time of the coming into force of this part and may cancel or suspend any such licence as it sees fit.

14. Every licence issued under part III of The Transport Act, 1938, or under part VII of the Air Regulations, 1938, prior to and in force at the time of the coming into force of this part shall be deemed to be a licence issued under section twelve of this act, but every such licence, if not cancelled or suspended by the board under section thirteen of this act, shall cease to be valid one year after termination, as fixed by order in council, of the war in Europe which commenced on the tenth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine.

I know we had an extended debate about the policy involved in section 14 when it was brought before us in 1944. I know that policy has been changed, that it has gone by the board; and I will admit that if the policy has gone by the board it is just as well to have it taken off the statute books. That was why I thought subsection 2 should go out of section 12 as well.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: Despite these shouts of "carried" I want to protest as strongly as I can against the use of parliament and of statutes in this way. When section 14 was finally passed by parliament in 1944 we thought it meant what it said; that within one year after the end of the war in Europe, the date of that end to be determined by order in council, companies operating surface transportation systems would have to divest themselves of the ownership of air lines. When time went by and this was not done I asked the present Minister of Trade and Commerce about it. My questions can be found in Hansard for August 17, 1946. It will be remembered that the war in Europe ended in May, 1945, so more than a year had elapsed when I asked those questions. I asked the minister what had happened to this policy and why, since a year had elapsed, the railway companies were still operating their air lines. This was the minister's reply, at page 5002 of Hansard for that year:

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend has given a correct statement of the policy announced by the government in 1944. At the time I made the announcement I was very sure I was right. A good section of the house was very sure I was wrong, but that gave me no pause whatsoever. At that time the public was not getting the service to which I believed it was entitled, and I think the public in that area believed it too. Certainly the relations between the government and Canadian Pacific Air Lines were far from satisfactory, and there was no doubt at that time that the non-competitive position of Trans-Canada Air Lines was being challenged.

Legislation was passed, and the present technical position is that the mandatory date, which would be May, 1946, has been advanced one year under the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister mean it has been advanced solely for the purpose of this legislation?

Mr. Howe: Yes. The effective date of this legislation has been advanced by order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Knowles: I suppose that order in council was tabled.

Mr. Howe: Yes; all orders in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act are tabled.

Mr. Knowles: I never heard of that one.

Mr. Howe: You were engaged in higher statesmanship for a considerable period.

Mr. Knowles: I was flying in your planes.

Those last references were to the fact that I was overseas at the time attending the sessions of the United Nations. As I thought that over, I was horrified at the implication that a clear-cut provision in this section 14 had been changed, so the minister said, by an order in council passed under the emergency powers act. I went to my office later, and I studied the act itself. I could see no provision in it for changing a section by order in council. I proceeded, therefore, to try to find that order in council. I had no success, so a few days later, on August 20 to be exact, I put a question to the minister of reconstruction, which appears on page 5077 of Hansard. It reads as follows:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply with reference to an order in council to which he referred in the course of the debate on August 17. He indicated at that time that an order in council had been passed advancing the effective date contained in section 14 of the act to amend the Aeronautics Act. I have endeavoured to get a copy of the order in council from the privy council office, but they do not seem to be aware of the order to which the minister refers. Will he indicate the number and date of the order in council?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Reconstruction): My legal department calls my attention to the fact that there was no order in council.

In effect, he admitted that his statement of a few days before, that it was done by order in council, was in error. There are a few humorous interjections, and then I continue:

Mr. Howe: It was a cabinet decision arrived at on February 16 last.

Mr. Knowles: The cabinet decision was taken under what section of the act?

Mr. Howe: Under the authority of the government. This was the decision:

At this point the present Minister of Trade and Commerce pulled a slip of paper out of his pocket, and read this:

The cabinet, after discussion, agreed that the time limit for separation of control of air services from that of railways be extended for another year, i.e., until two years after the end of the European war.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a question of privilege. The section of the act says that it must be done by the governor in council. There was no order in council, and therefore I suggest that the act has been violated.

Mr. MacKenzie: It does not have to be under an order in council; the government decides in council.

Mr. Coldwell: Without the authority of parliament? May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction or the leader of the house, if either of these gentlemen means to imply that the government has authority to do what is not authorized by this house or by statute?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. MacKenzie: The government of the Dominion of Canada is a responsible body, responsible to parliament and responsible by answering questions on the floor of the house, and whether there is an order in council or not the government can take action and answer to parliament accordingly.

Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I indicated that later in the same session, on August 26, the present Prime Minister, who was then minister of justice, and I had an amicable discussion about this whole matter. He agreed that there had been some mistake, and it was quite clear that statutes could not be changed by order in council, or by a minute of cabinet or anything of that nature. What this whole business spells out clearly is a feeling on the part—I should not blame the present Minister of Transport, because he was not involved in this at all—of the right hon. gentleman who was the minister in charge of these matters at that time, that statutes are something to be passed when you need them for the convenience of the government; but they are something to be ignored, to be changed by order in council or by a minute of cabinet, when it is felt the government wants to change its policy.

It was a year later before I was able to get the information that the whole business was regularized, in the eyes of the government at any rate, by allowing all the licences then in effect, as provided in sections 13 and 14, to expire, and by reissuing the whole lot under the escape clause in section 12, subsection 2. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that even though some might think this is flogging a dead horse now that the incident is all over, the government should be told again that this kind of irresponsible action, this sort of playing with statute law, is simply not good enough under our parliamentary system. It reminds me of our fight over the tabling of the McGregor report, and other instances of the government ignoring the law. Although the present minister is not involved in this—it was another minister who is not here—it does seem that this section 8 which wipes out the whole business should not be passed without the government being reminded that there is still such a thing as governmental responsibility to parliament, and there is still such a thing as the government being obligated to obey the laws that are placed upon the statute books.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Prosecution within twelve months.

Mr. Green: Section 10 contains an amendment to part III of the Aeronautics Act, and that is the part which provides for the aeronautics all day, and the board is here. It is a small item, and it would obviate the necessity of having the officers come back again if the committee would be agreeable to that. We might pass that item and then go on to the one at which we left off the other evening.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Air transport board—

523. Salaries and other expenses, including the Canadian delegation to the international civil aviation organization, $229,335.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the increase in this item?

Mr. Chevrier: The main reason for the increase is the transfer of certain officials of the Canadian government who were being paid by the Department of External Affairs heretofore and who are now paid by the Department of Transport through vote 523.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister now the answers to the questions I asked him this afternoon about infractions of air regulations?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. There are twenty-two persons or companies which were prosecuted in the last two and a half years and charged with thirty-six offences. The fines ranged from a minimum of $10 or ten days to a maximum of $2,000.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say what classes of operations were involved? Was Trans-Canada Air Lines or Canadian Pacific Air Lines involved?

Mr. Chevrier: No, not that class; mostly all small carriers.

Mr. Knowles: What was the nature of the violations?

Mr. Chevrier: Mostly operation of the service without a valid commercial certificate.

Mr. Knowles: So far as the big companies are concerned, they do not cause any trouble at all?

Mr. Chevrier: Their record is clear.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

467. Nautical service administration, $194,262.

Mr. Green: This item was under discussion when the estimates were last up for consideration and it has to do with the nautical service administration. I wish to deal with it this evening because it includes a vote for the rehabilitation of merchant seamen. As you will remember, Mr. Chairman, we were on that particular subject on the previous occasion.

I cannot understand why these Canadian merchant navy veterans should be treated as though they did not serve honourably in the war; because in effect that is exactly what their treatment amounts to. One would think they took no part whatever in the victory in the recent war. It is true we find in this particular vote that there is the amount of $4,000 for campaign stars and $6,000 for war medals. It seems strange that while they get this recognition, while they can get medals from the Department of Transport, they cannot get the benefits which go to the men in the other fighting forces. Let us take, for example, the case of a young lad who contracted tuberculosis while serving in the merchant navy. He cannot get a pension. I have one case in my files here in which it was admitted by the pension commission that the disease arose out of service but—

The Deputy Chairman: I would appreciate it if the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra would assist me. I see that in this vote 467 there is reference to vocational training, campaign stars and war medals, but I do not see how the hon. member can speak about the veterans of the merchant navy not getting pensions.

Mr. Green: I am going to point out, Mr. Chairman, that even in vocational training, they are not getting the same benefits as the other veterans can get; and I think it is in order to indicate to the committee and to the country that these men are not treated in the same way as the veterans of the other forces. As I was saying, it is almost impossible for them to qualify for pension. They cannot get—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. When the hon. member refers to pensions, and the qualifications these men may have, I suggest he is discussing a subject which might more properly be discussed when the estimates of the Minister of Veterans Affairs are before the committee.

Mr. Green: No.

The Deputy Chairman: But not on these estimates, where the vote is for nautical service administration. He might make reference to vocational training and war medals as they affect merchant seamen.

Mr. Green: It goes further than that. The Department of Transport is the only department that can do anything for these men. They are the charge of that department. Even the vocational training cannot be given by the Department of Veterans Affairs unless the Department of Transport has first ruled that they are eligible.

publication of regulations as well as for laying them before parliament. This afternoon the minister agreed to an amendment with regard to directives which are to be issued by him, as distinct from regulations passed by order in council. I believe there should be some provision written into the act for the publication and filing of those directives. I presume such a section would have to be placed in part III of the act. I would ask the minister whether he has given any consideration to that, and if so whether he would be willing to provide for such notice being given of those directives. In fact, I believe it is really more important that there be some publication of these directives, because otherwise nobody is going to know what they are. Take the house, for example. Hon. members will have no way of knowing what directives have been issued; I do suggest that they should at least be filed in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: There are two considerations that enter into the picture here. First, I presume my hon. friend is also dealing with the report. He made some query about a report by the board.

Mr. Green: I asked if an annual report could be made by the board.

Mr. Chevrier: There are some difficulties in the way of preparing an annual report because of staff considerations and the like, but the board is now drafting one which I think should be tabled in due course. The last report was prepared in 1948, and since then none has been made. The board is of the opinion such a report should be written, in fact it is in hand now. In due course, that report will be tabled.

I did say this afternoon that these orders and directives might well be tabled. I have no objection to that. In fact, I think I could give the undertaking now that they would be tabled. But I do not think it is necessary to include a clause in the act covering that. I think there are other instances where documents are tabled on an understanding and the commitment given by the minister. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I now say that I will table the orders and directives under the section about which there was so much discussion this afternoon, and an annual report will be prepared in due course.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): When shall this bill be read the third time?

Mr. Green: Next sitting.

Some hon. Members: Now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Next sitting of the house. I understand that the second reading of this bill took place long ago, but it has only been reported today.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Under standing order 73, I think we are entitled to have third reading tonight. There is no amendment to the bill.

Mr. Green: Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, that is right; there was one.

Mr. Green: You had better sit down.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have spent three days on this discussion. I would appeal to the house that we be allowed to get third reading of this bill tonight, unless there is some extraordinarily good reason to the contrary.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has already signified his willingness to have third reading tomorrow. There has been an amendment to the bill. I do not suppose there will be any discussion tomorrow, but something might crop up in the meantime. I do not know why the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) should try—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You cannot always have your own way.

Mr. Green: I do not know why the Minister of Public Works should be trying to get third reading through tonight.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You would if you ever tried to lead the house.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Is there any purpose in not giving it third reading tonight?

Mr. Green: If some of these backbenchers would get up and say what they have to say, we could deal with them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Green: Next sitting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Next sitting of the house.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the committee would consent to my calling item No. 523, because it has to do with the air transport board. We have been discussing it, no matter what their age may be. Actually it is very difficult for men who have followed the sea to obtain other work, particularly if they are forty years of age, or so. To give them vocational training would be a great help.

Then, another way in which the restrictions are too severe is that an applicant apparently must have signed a contract with a manning pool. I am told that in many cases young men were not allowed to sign manning pool contracts. If a young lad of seventeen or eighteen went into the merchant navy they would not sign him, because of his age. Yet now he finds that he cannot qualify for training because he did not sign a manning pool contract. Under the present regulations also he must prove that he was eligible for the special bonus which was paid to the men of the merchant navy. In some cases men served on Canadian ships who were not signed up under contract or who for one reason or another did not get that bonus and so cannot qualify for the training. I do not understand why the department is so strict in laying down the rules. It would seem to me that if a man served on a Canadian ship and was honourably discharged he should be eligible for vocational training, particularly in view of the fact that he gets practically no other benefits.

There is another reason why something should be done. Within the last few months there has been a drastic reduction in the number of available jobs on Canadian ships as a result of the policy of transferring ships to British registry. Many hundreds of men were put out of work. In announcing the new shipping policy toward the end of the last session the Prime Minister said that the provisions for training would be extended in order to help men who were bound to lose their jobs when the Canadian ships were transferred. Yet the extension under the regulations has not been sufficient to meet these cases and I urge upon the minister that such step be taken now; that we throw open vocational training to any men who served on Canadian ships during the war.

This is having a direct effect, not only upon the present but upon the future Canadian merchant marine. We have always been a maritime people but we cannot hope to have a merchant marine if we do not treat these men properly. There are men in all the seaports of Canada who have had experience on Canadian ships and who feel they have not received a fair deal. In my opinion they are quite right; I think they have had shabby treatment. It may be because there are so few of them, it may be because they are to be found largely in the seaports, or it may be because of the attitude taken by officials of the Department of Transport. I sometimes wonder whether they are not working under the old principle that the only way to get along with a sailor is to kick him around.

In my opinion this failure to give these merchant seamen adequate vocational training and other benefits is going to have a serious effect on Canadian shipping in the future. There is much talk these days of more trouble of another war. If by any sad chance there should be more fighting a Canadian merchant navy will be needed just as much as, and perhaps more than, it was in the last war. We are not laying a very good foundation for a Canadian merchant navy by this niggardly treatment of men who served in the merchant navy during the last war.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the minister give us a little more information on this subject of vocational training? The vote is decreased from $350,000 last year to $50,000 this year, and I should like to know the reason. Can he tell us where the training is given, the number of applicants who were trained and the number rejected?

Mr. Chevrier: I put most of that information on Hansard the other evening. I gave the reason for the decrease by stating that there was to be a supplementary estimate in the neighbourhood of $150,000. I placed on Hansard answers to the questions which my hon. friend has asked.

Mr. Noseworthy: At what centres is this training given?

Mr. Chevrier: The two orders in council are administered jointly by the Department of Transport and the Department of Veterans Affairs. The application is made to the Department of Transport and the administration is under the Department of Veterans Affairs. My understanding is that the vocational training is given in various schools across Canada but I am afraid I cannot state just where they are located.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the minister give any information with regard to the entrance requirements for this training?

Mr. Chevrier: It is set out in the orders in council. A person is entitled to vocational training who signed a manning pool agreement or who received a war risk or special bonus.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am told by a number of merchant seamen in Toronto that the centre there is the Ryerson Institute and that the entrance requirements are such that few merchant seamen can qualify for the courses.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not a question of ability to take the course, it is a question of a

In the report of the Department of Transport for the year ended March 31, 1949, we find the whole subject matter dealt with under the heading, "Rehabilitation of Merchant Seamen"; when the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs are up cannot proceed because I am told, "We have nothing to do with this; you will have to go to the Department of Transport." I believe I am in the right spot now, because the minister in charge is before the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank the hon. member for his explanation; but I am wondering if that does not become a matter of government policy which might better have been discussed under the first item for departmental administration.

I assure the hon. member it is difficult to draw the line, because there are many subjects hon. members may wish to bring in. But according to the standing order, speeches in committee of supply must be strictly relevant to the item. If I permit the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to go beyond what is permitted under the item, then I shall have to give the same freedom to other hon. members.

I remember that when the items were before the committee of supply on the last occasion there was a general discussion with respect to merchant seamen, having particular reference to the special headings set out in the details of item 467. I remember that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra spoke on that occasion, as did also the hon. member for Cape Breton South. But they did not go any further than would have been covered by the subheadings of vocational training and war medals.

Tonight we did that again, quite properly. But the minute the hon. member refers to their qualifications for pensions, I am afraid he is out of order because it would be completely extraneous to the subject matter before the committee.

Mr. Green: Then I shall deal with vocational training. I believe I can make my point on that, without touching the other matters. The point is that these men of the merchant navy are not receiving the same training benefits as are the men of the other forces. My submission is that they should be treated in exactly the same way. It has been surprising to read some of the statements made by members of the cabinet about these men.

For example, in January of this year the Minister of Veterans Affairs was out at the coast and, when he was asked about these merchant navy veterans, he said this:

> We have gone so far in the field of veterans affairs without friction between civilians—

Note that word "civilians".

> —and members of the armed forces, that to give special benefits to special groups would kill something good.

In effect he was saying that merchant navy veterans were civilians, and was distinguishing them from the members of the other three armed forces. That stand is very different from the statement contained in the speech from the throne at the close of the war. In the speech from the throne on September 6, 1945, we find this:

> We rejoice that our armed forces have achieved so much in helping to defend and liberate nations to whose past and present our own is so closely akin. Our country will ever remember with pride the heroic exploits of Canada's fighting men and merchant seamen.

That was the attitude in 1945. Statements to that effect had been made by the former prime minister and, I think, by most of the ministers of that time, including no doubt the present Minister of Transport. So my suggestion is that on this question of, let us say, vocational training, these men should be treated in exactly the same way as the members of the other forces.

I raise this matter now because the other night the minister said that there is to be a supplementary vote covering this rehabilitation. Therefore it is not too late for him to give consideration to widening the scope of this vocational training. I am afraid the difficulty is that the Department of Transport has been looking at this training only from the point of view of training men who are going to stay in the merchant navy.

At page 54 of the 1949 report we find this:

> The Department of Transport was authorized to take the necessary steps to implement the recommendation—

That is, for training.

> —in such a way as not to induce merchant seamen to abandon the sea as a means of livelihood.

That was the approach of the minister's advisers, as indicated in this report, namely, that the training was to be given only in such a way that it would not induce sailors to abandon the sea as a means of livelihood. The result was, of course, that the benefits were very seriously curtailed.

For example there is the restriction that a man over thirty years of age cannot qualify for this vocational training unless special provision is made for him. His case is to be the exception, rather than the rule. I do not think there should be any age limit. If these men can benefit by vocational training, then they should be allowed to have merchant seaman having obtained either one or other of the bonuses I mentioned a moment ago. If he did not get one of those two bonuses he is not entitled to vocational training under the orders in council.

Mr. Green: What about the young men who were too young to sign manning pool contracts?

Mr. Chevrier: What about them?

Mr. Green: Why are they not allowed to take this training?

Mr. Chevrier: I presume it is because they were too young to sign an agreement when they entered the merchant navy. My information is that there were very few who were unable to sign manning pool agreements. I do not know the age limit when war was declared, but I presume it was the legal age limit of eighteen years. There would be many men under that age who would be turned away and my information is that most of them went to serve with foreign merchant marines.

Mr. Green: If a boy served on a Canadian ship even without signing a manning pool agreement, why should he not get the training?

Mr. Chevrier: The veterans affairs committee was charged with the responsibility of going into this whole matter two years ago. That committee made a number of recommendations and I believe that those concerning the merchant marine were approved by the government. The result of that approval was these two orders in council that have been referred to. My hon. friend asks why these men who were too young are not covered by the orders in council. I can give no other answer than that the veterans affairs committee received representations, heard evidence and brought down recommendations which the government accepted. Beyond that I do not think I can go.

Mr. Green: I do not believe the veterans affairs committee received full representations on this point.

Mr. Chevrier: They certainly brought in a full report.

Mr. Green: Even if they did, that was two or three years ago. Here we have the position that the responsibility is that of the Department of Transport. It had charge of all these men during the war years. I presume the department has a record of the men who served on Canadian ships whether or not they got a bonus. I suggest that if a man served on a Canadian ship he should at least be given an opportunity to take this training. What has his age got to do with it? A man who is thirty-five needs rehabilitation just as much as a younger man. Now that the minister has the information and is aware of the need for something to be done about it I urge upon him that further consideration be given to broadening the terms of the order in council.

Mr. Brooks: With reference to the veterans affairs committee, I have not the report here but my recollection is that their recommendations were not all carried out by the department. We made a number of recommendations that received no consideration at all. I would not like the minister to be definite in saying that all the recommendations of the veterans affairs committee were carried out so far as the merchant marine is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not now and was not then a member of the veterans affairs committee but my officers inform me that all recommendations made concerning vocational training of merchant seamen were carried out.

Mr. Brooks: We are both speaking without having the record here, but I am satisfied that the record will not bear out the minister's statement.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have a copy of a telegram sent to the minister on May 20, I believe, by the Canadian merchant navy veterans association in which they imply that many hundreds of veterans had no way of learning about the vocational training benefits that were offered, and had no opportunity to see the advertisements placed by the department to which the minister referred on May 11. Has the minister any statement to make?

Mr. Chevrier: That telegram is entirely inaccurate and erroneous. I replied that there was plenty of opportunity for publication. Publication was made in the house, over the radio, and in a number of notices and advertisements. The hon. member for Halifax demanded on more than one occasion that the time limit be extended. So did the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and other members of the house. They also asked for the extension of the age limit. There was plenty of publicity given to the matters referred to in that telegram.

Mr. Green: Is there to be any provision made for the men who have been losing their jobs as a result of the policy announced last December? I have a press dispatch dated December 10, 1949, which appeared in one of the Vancouver papers. The heading is:

Beached Seamen Offered Training for Other Jobs

The article reads in part:

Five thousand Canadian seamen left "on the beach" by the government's order cutting the merchant marine will get vocational training.

That was the news which went out across the country last December 10. So far as I can see, absolutely nothing has been done along that line.

Mr. Chevrier: We are just getting into the position that you tried to avoid, Mr. Chairman, by your direction at the outset of this discussion. I would think the time to discuss the question of the men whose employment on the sea may be affected would be when we come to the item for the maritime commission or the item of $3 million subsidy provided following the statement made by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister made a statement in December of last year in which he outlined the policy in respect of the transfer of ships, subsidies, and the like. That article certainly is not in accordance with the facts. Unfortunately some men will be put out of work. I will be able to deal with that when we come to it, but certainly the number is nowhere in the proximity of the figure given by my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

468. Marine service steamers, including icebreakers—maintenance, operation and repairs, $3,603,070.

Mr. McLure: I should like to know how many icebreakers there are in this service, where they operate as icebreakers, and during the season when there is no ice in what capacity they are employed.

Mr. Chevrier: There are three icebreakers under this item, the Lapointe, the McLean and the Lady Grey. A new ship, the C. D. Howe, is being provided and she will be used in the dual capacity of icebreaker and for the transport of supplies to the northern part of the country. The other ships mentioned break ice in the wintertime, and at other times carry supplies to the eastern and Arctic areas, and to the various lighthouses and lighthouse depots on the east coast.

Mr. Cardiff: Will the minister tell the house the necessity for the increase of $502,000?

Mr. Chevrier: It is because of two new ships that are being brought into operation, the C. D. Howe, which I mentioned a moment ago, and the Edward Cornwallis. The Edward Cornwallis will operate from the Atlantic coast and the C. D. Howe from Quebec.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. McLure: What company is building the C. D. Howe?

Mr. Chevrier: The Davie Shipbuilding Company.

Mr. Gibson: Under this item I notice that the number of wireless operators has been increased from two to six. I am rather curious to know whether this indicates a change in policy on the part of the government as to the number of wireless operators that should be carried on our ships, and if the government is setting an example for other ship operators.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not say there is a change in policy. I think it is because of the new ships. With the construction of these vessels we intend to put into effect the most modern means of communication and transportation. That accounts for the increase in the number of operators.

Mr. Gibson: These ships usually operate within a stone's throw of lighthouses, and most of the time they are close to radio stations. I would have thought you would be able to use ordinary radio telephone equipment.

Mr. Chevrier: The C. D. Howe and the McLean operate away up at Churchill and in the northeastern Arctic area, as will the Cornwallis.

Mr. Noseworthy: I notice one detail in this item amounting to $1,163,626 involving 773 so-called temporary assistants for which no detail whatever is given. There is just the lump sum of over a million dollars. Is there any explanation?

Mr. Chevrier: This covers the personnel of the various ships.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

469. Construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $4,503,495.

Mr. McLure: What bonuses have been given to lighthouse keepers, over and above their contracts, to take care of the high cost of living?

Mr. Chevrier: I think there is a misapprehension. For the most part lighthouse keepers operate under the civil service commission, and from time to time they get statutory increases and reclassifications. They would not be entitled to a bonus as such.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

470. Agencies—salaries and office expenses, $436,505.

Mr. Cardiff: There is an increase of $65,091 in this item. Would the minister explain it?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. There are 102 annual increases, that is statutory increases varying from $5 to $10 per month. Then there are 147 basic salary increases, which amount to $26,000.

Mr. Cardiff: Was there an increase in personnel?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, because of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
471. Maintenance and repairs to wharves, $5,000.

Mr. Fraser: This item is said to be for the maintenance and repair of wharves, but the details show $1,500 for materials and supplies, $1,500 for travelling expenses and $2,000 for sundries. Where do the repairs come in?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is a small item—

Mr. Fraser: I know it is, but I want to know why they have to travel so much without doing any repairs.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend will permit I shall try to explain it. As the committee knows, the Department of Public Works is responsible for repairs to most of the wharves under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport, but from time to time there are minor demands made by various bodies, organizations and groups; and before it can be determined whether or not the work should come under this vote a certain amount of travelling is necessary. That is the reason for the $1,500.

Mr. Fraser: Then what are the sundries?

Mr. Chevrier: That is to cover long distance telephone calls and snow clearing.

Mr. Fraser: Do I understand that the work is looked after by public works, and you supply the material?

Mr. Chevrier: No, we do not supply the materials.

Mr. Fraser: Then what are these supplies for?

Mr. Chevrier: We do the work ourselves, in these small items.

Mr. Fraser: Then there are no salaries or wages involved?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Fraser: How is the work done, then; by a miracle?

Mr. Chevrier: It is done by marine service employees, or other employees of the department. These are small repairs which amount to perhaps $50, $60 or $100.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
473. To provide for Canada's share of the cost of the North Atlantic ice patrol, $20,000.

Mr. McLure: What agency does the ice patrolling in the spring of the year? Is it the same one that is covered by this item for the North Atlantic ice patrol?

Mr. Chevrier: No, this is an entirely different matter. This is done by international agreement, among several countries, under the safety of life at sea convention which was signed in London in 1929 and re-negotiated in 1948. By virtue of that international agreement Canada is assessed a certain portion of the cost of patrolling the ice in the eastern area.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
475. Life-saving service, including rewards for saving life, $137,490.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item in which there appears to have been a substantial reduction?

Mr. Chevrier: As the committee will remember, last year a relatively large amount was voted to cover the acquisition of four lifeboats, two on the east coast and two on the west coast. It has been found possible to acquire only one of those, and we have not proceeded with the other three because of the reference to an interdepartmental committee of the matter of air rescue operations. There was no use spending money until it was known what the decision would be in that regard, and that is why there is a reduction.

Mr. Green: What is the position now with respect to the air rescue reference?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot add anything to what I said the other day. Perhaps I should say that on two occasions I have had an opportunity of discussing the work of the committee with the chairman of the maritime commission, and I am hopeful that it will be possible to make an announcement soon.

Mr. Green: Is there any possibility of Canada establishing a coastguard service in the near future?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not like to answer that until I am in a position to deal fully with the report.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
476. To provide subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec and British Columbia, $65,000.

Mr. Fulton: To what firms or persons are these moneys payable?

Mr. Chevrier: To the extent of $40,000 they are payable to the Quebec Salvage and Wrecking Company Limited, and to the extent of $25,000 to Pacific Salvage Limited, to ensure that adequate facilities are provided both east and west in case of wrecks.

Mr. Green: Is that paid on the basis of the work they do, or is it an annual retainer?

Mr. Chevrier: It is an annual contract.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

478. Miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping, including grants as detailed in the estimates; and for repayment to a proper authority, or to the government of the United Kingdom, under section 296 of the Canada Shipping Act, of expenses incurred in respect of distressed seamen left behind out of Canada, including the repayment of excepted expenses, as defined in the said section, $138,809.

Mr. Lennard: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. Chevrier: This is for the following miscellaneous activities related to navigation and shipping: examination of candidates for masters' and mates' certificates; operation of navigation schools at Yarmouth, Halifax, Saint John and Quebec for training candidates for certificates of competency; investigations into marine casualties; registration of shipping; removal of obstructions to traffic in navigable waters; grants in aid to separately operated schools of navigation at Rimouski, Kingston and Vancouver.

Mr. Lennard: Do these examiners travel about, or do the examinations take place at certain definite points?

Mr. Chevrier: Both. Some examinations take place at the schools; others are conducted by examiners who travel from the office in Ottawa.

Mr. Noseworthy: I notice that this item includes payments to the United Kingdom in connection with the repatriation of seamen to Canada, but I can find no reference to that in the details on page 295. Was any of this money spent for that purpose last year?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, money was spent to repatriate from the United Kingdom and other parts of the world seamen who were stranded or otherwise in difficulty.

Mr. Noseworthy: Has the minister any details of the amount spent for that purpose?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry I do not have them available. I will see that my hon. friend gets them.

Mr. Fulton: According to the details I notice that the item for sundries has increased by some $18,000. Could the minister explain the reason for that increase?

Mr. Chevrier: The increase in sundries is made up as follows: An additional amount provided in this item for the removal of obstructions to navigation. The previous vote of $5,000 was not sufficient for even a minor job of this nature. That accounts for $17,000. Then, there is an additional amount to cover the payment of charges incurred on account of excepted expenses, those relating to deserted seamen, $1,900. This answers, in part, the question asked by the member for York South.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

479. Steamship inspection and the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines, $394,280.

Mr. McLure: Has the minister taken into consideration the inspection under the new rules which will be in force within a short time on all steamships, or is this item similar to the one covering inspections made under the provisions before the new regulations came into effect?

Mr. Chevrier: This is the same vote as before, and covers the same personnel, the same administrative operation.

Mr. McLure: It does not anticipate what will have to be done in the next year to make these ships safe?

Mr. Chevrier: No. Well, we do not spend money to make ships safe. The government passes regulations and it is the company that is affected by the regulations that spends the money. My answer was therefore correct, but I thought I should add that explanation.

Mr. Fulton: There is quite a heavy item of travelling expenses here, an increase of over $4,000. Could the minister explain the reason for that?

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend will recall, it was said in the last two years, and rightly so, that there was not a sufficient number of steamship inspections. There were nine additional inspectors appointed, and that accounts for the increase in travelling expenses.

Mr. Green: There has been some talk during this session of adopting new regulations, for example with regard to the use of radio operators on ships. The minister has said that he would bring down amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. The session is now drawing to a close, and the house is starting morning sittings next week. I hope the minister can bring down those amendments fairly soon. Can he give us some indication as to when we may expect them?

Mr. Chevrier: I am as anxious as anyone to bring them down. I should point out to the house that it will be a rather lengthy bill, because it includes all the safety of life at sea conventions that were made at the conference in 1948. While it left my department some time ago, it has to be approved by the Department of Justice. At this time the Department of Justice has a considerable number of bills, and other legislation that must be given consideration. I am hopeful that it will be possible to have it approved next week, but that does not mean it will be on the order paper next week. I hope it will be on the order paper early in June.

Mr. Green: Is it still the intention of the government to put through the amendments at this session?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is. I am most anxious to put them through.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
480. Marine signal service, $158,643.

Mr. Lennard: I notice in this vote there is an item of $34,000 for telegrams, telephones and postage. This amount constitutes about one-fifth of the whole item. I believe that with the air mail service we have today the department could curtail some of these telegrams and telephone calls. I know it is handy when you have a telephone at your elbow to call Vancouver or Halifax, but under present circumstances I believe some of these expenditures could be drastically curtailed. The item seems to be the same as last year's, so could the minister tell me how much of the $34,000 was used last year?

Mr. Chevrier: All of it.

Mr. Lennard: I think that is an item that could be curtailed.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I should say to the hon. member that this covers the rental of various lines. The marine signal service is a service which operates on the St. Lawrence and in other parts of Canada, and must report as many as eight, ten, twenty or twenty-five times a day the passage of ships at certain points. It is a service using facilities rented from the telephone company.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
481. River St. Lawrence ship channel—contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, including cost of administration—capital, $3,128,052.

Mr. McLure: This item appears every year, Mr. Chairman, as an expenditure of about $3 million. What class of dredging is being done—rock dredging or just mud digging? It seems to be a large item, and apparently the channel requires dredging every year.

Mr. Chevrier: This item covers a contract entered into between the government and Marine Industries Limited for the deepening and widening of the St. Lawrence ship channel, which extends from about forty miles below Quebec to the head of the Lachine canal. It covers stone, gravel and the like. It is a contract which is now in its fourth year, and which provides for dredging to a certain depth, namely 35 feet, and the widening of the channel at certain portions, as well as provision for anchorage bases where ships can anchor at night and still be out of the channel.

Mr. Lennard: It is for one contractor?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Lennard: Who is the contractor?

Mr. Chevrier: Marine Industries Limited.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What has been the total expenditure to date for dredging, deepening and widening the channel in the St. Lawrence?

Mr. Chevrier: I think I would have to get that information for the hon. member, if he will allow me. I have not got it here.

Mr. Green: The minister said that this covers a contract, but the contract only accounts for a portion of the item. Why is it necessary to have a staff of 125 to look after this contract?

Mr. Chevrier: It is necessary, under the terms of the contract, to see to it that this work is done. We have the staff to make sure that the terms of the contract are being carried out; it is being checked, audited and so forth.

Mr. Green: Are all the 125 people occupied in checking the contract?

Mr. Chevrier: They are on various ships. If my hon. friend had been down the St. Lawrence at this time of year, and more particularly in June and July, he would notice dredges extending from Montreal harbour right down to below Quebec. There are as many as five or six ships doing this work, and it is necessary to have a crew on each ship.

Mr. Green: Is it not a contract with Marine Industries? The minister has said there is a contract with this company to do the dredging. Now, what work do the government officials do? Apparently there are 125 government officials, and the item is listed as covering contract dredging. What work do the 125 government officials do which makes up the balance of the item?

Mr. Chevrier: They prepare the plans and specifications, and tell these people what work they have to do; that is set out in the contract. Then, they supervise the work, and that includes the 125 men to whom my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before this item passes, I should like to ask the minister the explanation of the note which appears on page 297 of the estimates, "contract dredging —capital—$2,939,500." As I understand it, we are passing the annual appropriations for this service.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not understand that question.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): On page 297 the minister will note in the details of this vote we are passing, "contract dredging—capital —$2,939,500." Then there is an item under it of maintenance, $300,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that is the cost of our own office, divided between capital and maintenance.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Are we voting now capital outlays on these annual estimates?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. We are voting an amount of $2,939,500 which is a payment that will be made to this company for the dredging of the channel.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Are we making any appropriations out of annual expenditures for dredging or is it all borrowed money?

Mr. Chevrier: It is a payment under a contract for dredging.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): We borrow the money to pay for it?

Mr. Chevrier: No, we do not borrow the money.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): It is under capital. As I understand capital, it is borrowed money; it is capital expenditures.

Mr. Knowles: Did the minister not give the wrong figure there?

Mr. Chevrier: It is to differentiate it between the amount paid the company and the other items that are set out in the details.

Mr. Green: It is rather hard to understand that explanation. In the details we find "contract dredging, capital, $2,939,500; maintenance, $300,000." If it is a contract to do this work, why should that payment be divided into capital and maintenance? Just what is the reason? That terminology does not seem to fit the actual situation.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I get the point now. The capital is divided in accordance with the work that is done along the channel. For instance, the $2,939,500 is made up of an item of $970,000 in the Montreal harbour; $10,000 at Longue Pointe; $166,000 at Pointe aux Trembles channel; $681,000 in lake St. Peter at Yamachiche bend; $37,000 at Cap de la Madeleine; $10,000 at Becancour; $450,000 at Cap a la Roche; $5,000 at Ste. Croix; $609,000 at Brule Bank channel. That is a breakdown of the capital amount of money paid to the contractor for the work along the channel extending from Montreal to Quebec.

Mr. Green: Why is it called capital? Because apparently this money has to be spent every year. It certainly does not look like a capital item as we understand the word.

Mr. Chevrier: This is a five-year contract. This is work for one year only. According to the terms of the contract the work must be completed within a period of five years and they do about a fifth. They have the right to do a little more each year if they wish. The amount that they will do in 1950-51 is the amount as I have just read it.

Mr. Green: Next year they will do a different part of the river, is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: Next year they will do a different part of the river.

Mr. Green: What does this maintenance mean? There is $300,000 for maintenance. How does that enter into the picture?

Mr. Chevrier: That item is our own expenditure. It is to cover stone lifters and other ships of the Department of Transport that are used in conjunction with the operation and completion of this contract.

Mr. Green: So that, in addition to the contract, the government spends $300,000 for maintaining its own equipment, also engages 125 employees and then has other items such as board, $48,250; fuel, $66,000; materials and supplies, $32,000; repairs and upkeep of equipment, $70,000; and sundries, $11,463. Those are all government items over and above what is paid to this firm under the contract. Is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: The item of $2,939,500 is the item that I gave the breakdown for a moment ago. I am informed that the other items are expenditures of our own department.

Mr. Knowles: Expenditures of the minister's own department for doing what? From the estimates it looks as though they are expenditures in administering the expenditure of the $2,939,500 and the $300,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I indicated a moment ago that there was an engineering staff in the department that prepares the plans and specifications and that lays out each year the work that must be done under the contract; and the items are set out in the details.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister has mentioned several localities where dredging is being done. Is that all under one contract?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): It is all under one contract, the minister says. Were there different tenders called for this on a five-year undertaking or five-year contract?

Mr. Chevrier: There is just one tender called for, or rather there is just one contract. There were several tenders, if my recollection serves me aright, although it is four or five years ago now.

Mr. Fulton: What is the explanation of this item at the bottom of the detail:

Less: Amount chargeable to administration, maintenance and operation, $628,505.

How does that credit arise?

Mr. Chevrier: That is the amount that goes into the next vote: amount chargeable to administration, maintenance and operation.

Mr. Fulton: It goes into the vote next year, you mean?

Mr. Chevrier: No; into the next item, item 482.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

483. To provide towards the construction of an icebreaking vessel to meet the St. Lawrence and northern transportation requirements (estimated cost $5,000,000) capital (revote $400,000), $2,000,000.

Mr. Brooks: Just where is this icebreaker being constructed and were tenders called? Are bigger and heavier icebreakers being built with the object in view of opening the channel of the St. Lawrence river earlier every spring? I understand that this was one of the purposes of building icebreakers, and I should like to hear from the minister whether that is correct or not.

Mr. Chevrier: As to the last question, it is rather difficult to answer it categorically or specifically, because it is the hope that the St. Lawrence will be opened up to navigation earlier each year, but that hope is not always met.

Mr. Brooks: At that point may I ask the minister if he considers that this object is altogether fair to the maritime ports of Saint John and Halifax?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that it is unfair to them. The icebreakers do a job not only with reference to the opening of the port but, as my friend knows, also one that has a great deal to do with avoiding flood conditions. Each year in the spring in the Laprairie basin on the south side of the river St. Lawrence in the Montreal area there is a backing of ice which causes a great deal of damage. Experience has taught us in the department that the more quickly we can get the channel opened and break the ice, the less danger there is of a backing of water. Some two or three years ago serious damage was done to both sides of the Jacques Cartier bridge. Certainly it is not done with the object of hurting in any way the maritime ports. On the contrary, the national harbours board does everything in its power by way of making available additional facilities to assist the ports. The Department of Transport has provided a number of new ships. The Edward Cornwallis has been launched and is now in operation, and there is provision for other ships for the maritimes.

Mr. Brooks: But opening the port of Montreal and taking trade away from the ports of Saint John and Halifax does not in any way help the maritime ports. I can understand the use of an icebreaker to do away with the condition the minister mentioned in connection with the flooding of the channel, and the danger from ice; but I do not follow his other argument.

Mr. Knight: I presume this is for the building of a new member in the icebreaker fleet. What is the definition of the term "northern" as it is found in the estimate?

Mr. Chevrier: The purpose of this icebreaker is to service the ports in the northeastern Arctic. It is to break the ice in the St. Lawrence, and from time to time replace the McLean in that area.

Mr. Knight: Since the minister has expressed the hope that the St. Lawrence river might be opened up, I was going to express the hope that the same thing might happen with the Hudson bay route. To what extent have icebreakers which have been used on the St. Lawrence gone into northern waters under their own steam for icebreaking purposes?

Mr. Chevrier: They are sent up north each year. The McLean makes an annual trip to the northeastern Arctic, and into Hudson bay to Churchill.

Mr. Knight: I know about the McLean. Has any other ship gone up there in recent years?

Mr. Chevrier: The C. D. Howe will make a journey up there.

Mr. Fulton: It will blast things out.

Mr. Knowles: That will get rid of the ice, especially the thin ice.

Mr. Brooks: The minister did not answer my question as to where this new icebreaker was being built, and also whether tenders were being called.

Mr. Chevrier: The Davie Shipbuilding Company.

Mr. Brooks: In Glasgow?

Mr. Chevrier: No, at Lauzon, Quebec.

Mr. Fulton: Is that the new aluminum icebreaker?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Brooks: Were tenders called for construction, and what were the amounts of those tenders.

Mr. Chevrier: No, tenders were not called for.

Mr. Brooks: Is that considered good business?

Mr. Chevrier: I think it is, under the circumstances. Perhaps I could explain to the committee why that was done. The experience in the Department of Transport two years back was that when tenders were called some yards that were deserving of work were not able to get it because they were never the lowest tenderers. I do not wish to mention the names of any yards, but I know of one, which is very efficient, and to which many of the tenders were going.

Representations were made to us that that was not a fair method of procedure, and that if the Department of Transport and the government were going to build ships they should be divided as fairly as possible among the main yards. We acceded to that request and instructed the maritime commission to prepare a plan whereby the main shipyards of this country would be awarded contracts for the vessels required for the Department of Transport and other departments. By virtue of that policy I think a fair distribution has been made.

I have not the total items now, but I think I can give pretty substantial reasons for indicating why that was good policy.

Mr. Brooks: Then how did the department arrive at the amount that should be paid for the construction of these icebreakers and other vessels, if no tenders are called?

Mr. Chevrier: The maritime commission and the department were given the responsibility of making estimates of the cost of the ship. In some cases the tenders were called but not accepted; and in some cases contracts were granted on a cost-plus basis.

Mr. Fraser: In this instance these ships were costing more money than they should; is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: No, they are not.

Mr. Fraser: This one ship may cost much more. You do not know whether it is higher or lower than it should be. It definitely must be more.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: I am saying it is not.

Mr. Fraser: How do you know? You have no method of finding out.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I told the hon. member.

Mr. Fraser: The commission does not know.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes, they do; and probably the hon. member would be one of the first to admit that, after a while, when we come to another item.

Mr. Fraser: Which one?

Mr. Chevrier: We will see.

Mr. Fraser: Tell me now.

Mr. Chevrier: The commission has a staff, and so has the Department of Transport.

Mr. Fraser: Are they naval engineers?

Mr. Chevrier: Some of them are. And they are able to establish the costs of the ships. Furthermore there is the auditing branch, treasury officers, not only in the Department of Transport, but in the Department of Finance, that supervises the operation of these contracts.

Mr. Fraser: All they would do is this: when accounts would come to them they would check them and pass them. They would not check items to see whether purchases could be made cheaper somewhere else.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me that in his explanation the minister definitely said that certain shipyards—or that a certain shipyard —were getting the greater part of the work, because their tenders were consistently lower. He seemed to indicate that one shipyard was getting most of the work. Then representations were made that this was not fair, and it was as a result of those representations that the policy was instituted of dividing up the work among the various shipyards.

It seems to me that if that is the basis of the new policy—and I believe I have reproduced correctly what the minister said—then the only result can be that the cost of building these ships is going to be greater, because instead of tenders being given to the shipyard which consistently made the lowest tenders, they are given to other shipyards without calling for tenders at all. I do not believe any other conclusion can be drawn from the minister's explanation. While we are on this subject I suggest the minister should tell us who is building this particular ship, and how many naval architects there are on the maritime commission?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, just to recapitulate what I said: Early in 1949 the government reached the conclusion that, from the national defence point of view, and following out the recommendation made in the report of the Canadian maritime commission, it was imperative to maintain in operation a nucleus of shipyards for construction purposes. It directed the maritime commission to determine, in so far as the government ship construction program was concerned, which yards should be given the work, in order to help them maintain a minimum of employment in their yards.

My hon. friends often complain about the fact that certain shipyards do not get contracts. That complaint has been made in the House of Commons from time to time. The attempt here was to meet the request which had been made. As a result of this policy a number of necessary government ships are at the present time being built, the major orders being as follows: naval icebreaker, Marine Industries Limited, Sorel, Quebec; Department of Transport icebreaker, Davie Shipbuilding, Lauzon, Quebec.

Mr. Green: What are the figures?

Mr. Chevrier: I am now dealing with item 483. I can give further information when we come to the other vote. Item 483 makes provision for $5 million. Then, these further ships: three naval escort vessels, Vickers, Montreal; Burrards, Vancouver; and Halifax Shipyards, Halifax; two weather ships for the Department of Transport, Marine Industries Limited, Sorel; Gate vessel, George T. Davie, Levis, Quebec; four minesweepers, Saint John drydock, Davie shipbuilding, Port Arthur shipyard and Victoria machinery depot.

So far as the cost is concerned, before we build these ships we have the advice of independent naval architects. In the case of the ship we are discussing we had the advice of German and Milne who gave an estimate of what it would cost to build a ship. We proceeded on the same basis when we built the S.S. Abegweit. The Abegweit was built on a cost-plus basis, but before we decided to build it we obtained from the same firm of naval architects, German and Milne, an estimate of the cost. We are proceeding on the same basis in connection with item 483.

Mr. Brooks: That does not tell us anything.

Mr. Fulton: When was the contract let?

Mr. Chevrier: The contract has not been signed.

Mr. Fulton: There is a note in the item, "estimated cost, $5,000,000; capital revote, $400,000." In the details it is shown that under this item in 1949-50 the sum of $1 million was authorized. I was wondering how this amount could get into the estimates last year and how there could be a revote such as is mentioned this year?

Mr. Chevrier: That was provided in the further supplementary estimates, 1949-50. It takes some time to prepare plans and specifications.

Mr. Fulton: But $1 million, surely not?

Mr. Chevrier: This is an estimate, it is not a case of voting money that has been contracted for. In this case the total cost of the ship is estimated to be $5 million and we are putting in the estimates an item of $2 million. In last year's supplementary estimates we had an item of $1 million, but it was not possible to advance the progress of the plans and specifications sufficiently to enter into a contract. The same applies this year. The plans and specifications are in course of preparation but they are not sufficiently advanced to permit the signing of a contract. They will be during the course of the year and that is why the amount is in there.

Mr. Ferrie: Will these new icebreakers be able to break ice in Hudson bay?

Mr. Chevrier: That is a difficult question to answer because it would depend a great deal on the thickness of the ice. In so far as the N. B. McLean is concerned, it has always been successful in getting to Churchill, sometimes under very adverse conditions, it having had some narrow escapes. This icebreaker will be more modern and I think should be stronger than the McLean.

Mr. McLure: How will the new boat compare with the S.S. Abegweit? Will it be as powerful and will it do the same class of icebreaking?

Mr. Chevrier: No, she will not do the same class of icebreaking. This is not the same kind of ship. The Abegweit was built as a ferry boat to operate between Prince Edward Island and the mainland and to break ice at certain seasons of the year. This ship is not in the same class. It is not going to cost as much but I suppose it will be a more modern ship.

Mr. McLure: Will she have a greater horsepower than the Abegweit?

Mr. Chevrier: She is to have 10,800 horsepower and may go to a maximum of 14,000.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand it, we authorized $1 million in last year's supplementary estimates, but this year we are being asked to authorize $2 million, of which $400,000 is a revote. That would indicate that we spent $600,000 of the money authorized last year.

If I am incorrect in my understanding I ask the minister to tell us what was spent last year.

Mr. Chevrier: We spent $40,000.

Mr. Fulton: Why is there only a revote of $400,000 of what was authorized last year? Why is not the revote $960,000?

Mr. Chevrier: I must confess that I cannot explain it. I am told that all we spent was $40,000, and that was spent in the preparation of plans and specifications.

Mr. Knight: To what extent is the St. Lawrence season lengthened by the use of icebreakers?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that it is difficult to give an exact estimate. They do help to hasten the opening of navigation but the main purpose is to prevent flooding.

Mr. Knight: At about what date in the spring would the need for icebreakers cease?

Mr. Chevrier: It varies from year to year. I think this year it was April 10; I have known it to be in March, and some years it is the end of April.

Mr. Knight: The fact that the St. Lawrence is open so much earlier than Churchill should make available to Churchill all the necessary icebreaking equipment when the season there is about to open.

Mr. Chevrier: To a large extent that is right, but one must keep in mind that a ship cannot get up to Churchill at all seasons in the year. If navigation is open here about April 10 I would think it would be difficult for the McLean or any other icebreaker to operate in the Hudson bay area at that time. If my hon. friend wants me to say that with the additional icebreakers more will be available for that area, I think the answer would be "yes."

Mr. Knight: May I suggest to the minister that they could go up there a little earlier than they have been going up.

Mr. Brooks: Why should they go up at all?

Mr. Knight: They certainly could go up there in May or June.

Mr. Fulton: I think this item should stand. Going back to what the minister said a moment ago, we were told that only $40,000 was spent last year when we authorized $1 million. Instead of being told that the revote this year is $960,000, it is only $400,000. This year we are being asked to authorize $2 million and it does not seem possible to reconcile the explanations. Would it not be wiser to let this item stand until a full explanation can be given? If we are in fact revoting $960,000 of what was authorized last year, not only should that be made known to the committee but it is possible that the $2 million we are being asked to authorize this year could be reduced accordingly. When the minister is dealing with that could he tell us when this contract will be signed and how long it is expected it will take to build this icebreaker?

Mr. Chevrier: In explanation of the first question asked, I am told that when these estimates now before us were prepared it was anticipated that expenditures last year would amount to $600,000 leaving a revote of $400,000 out of the $1 million voted last year. I think that covers the point. The type of contract covering this icebreaker has not yet been decided upon. Therefore I am not able to answer the question. I do not know whether it will be a management fee contract, a cost plus contract, or perhaps a firm price contract although I have some doubt that it will be. I am informed that the time it will take to build the ship will be roughly a year and a half to two years.

Mr. Fulton: Personally I am opposed to voting $2 million for a contract which is not yet signed. Not only has it not been signed but we have just been told that we do not know exactly what kind of contract we are going to have. Apparently it is quite a serious matter to decide just what the terms of the contract will be. It has been under negotiation for over a year now, and I would gather from what the minister has just said there are not any signs that it is nearing completion yet if all these other things remain to be decided. When our total expenditures are running so high I see no purpose in voting twice as much this year as we voted last year when we actually spent only $40,000 of what was voted. I do not see why the minister cannot get along with a million dollar vote this year.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend's argument is correct we will have to take out of the estimates at least five or six similar vessels. I am looking at the next page, not because I want to refer to it particularly, but there is an item to provide for the construction of an auto ferry between Yarmouth and a port in the New England states. When I made a statement in the house as to this project it received unanimous approval. That money is in the same position as item 483. The contract has not been let and the contract cannot be let for reasons that I will give when we come to the item. That applies to the weather ships and also to the ship on the east coast which are in these estimates. If my hon. friend's argument were to be followed we would never get anything done.

I am told the same thing applies to all these ships which I mentioned a moment ago. We want for the navy three naval escort vessels, a minesweeper and a gate vessel. We want a naval icebreaker for the navy, and if that argument were followed we would not get them at all.

Make no mistake about it, the Department of Finance gives all these things a pretty good check, and all departments get a pretty tough ride before treasury board when we ask for more than we are entitled to. The reason the amount is asked for is that it is anticipated that during the course of the year we will spend that money. We may not have to spend it. The reason we did not spend the $1 million we got last year was that the plans and specifications were not forthcoming nearly as quickly as we expected they would be, because of certain new technical developments in the field of icebreakers. I hope my hon. friend will not pursue his argument because it would cause some of his good friends on that side of the house to lose vessels which I am sure they would not want to lose, and which I am sure the people in those areas want to have.

Mr. Fulton: That argument does not follow at all. What I have said is that we are faced with a contract which is not even signed yet, and we are being asked to vote $2 million for it. No assurance is given that the money will be required this year. In the case of the other vessels, if we could be assured that there is a good chance the money will be required this year then we would be willing to vote it, but if the situation is the same as the minister has indicated with respect to this contract then I am not sure, although we all agree that the contracts should be let and construction should proceed, that we should be required to vote large sums of money in advance of the signing of the contracts or in advance of a reasonable prospect that the contracts will be signed.

Mr. Chevrier: I am giving my hon. friend that assurance now. For instance, with reference to the Yarmouth ferry, the maritime commission and others are working on the plans and specifications, and if we do not get the $1 million involved there, and the $2 million under the item now before the committee, I would be the first one to be criticized because we were not moving fast enough. If I followed the argument of my hon. friend, then when I came back next year I would be asked why we did not move more rapidly and I would have to say "Oh well, the hon. member for Kamloops said that since the contract was not signed we should not have the money in the estimates." I do not want to be unfair or derogatory but the position is a ridiculous one.

Mr. Fulton: It certainly is, a revote of $400,000 and you tell us you only spent $40,000.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend understands me, the position taken by him is a ridiculous one. The proof of it is that work in this particular case has been started, and quite often contracts are not given prior to the voting of the money. I think that is a natural position to take.

Mr. Green: Why do they start work before a contract is signed? Does that not prejudice the making of a proper contract?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it does. They have a letter of intention to proceed. That practice is not uncommon.

Mr. Green: In what other departments of the government is a practice of that kind followed?

Mr. Chevrier: By virtue of the statement I made and the policy I announced a moment ago, it is being followed in the case of all these ships.

Mr. Lennard: Do I understand as to this revote of $400,000 there was $550,000 paid out for construction that has taken place so far?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Lennard: I may be dense but I do not understand this revote of $400,000. You say there was only $40,000 spent for plans. I cannot get it through my head. I do not see why that is in there at all.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not prepare the estimates. The Department of Finance arranges them. The explanation I gave a moment ago to the hon. member for Kamloops was that when these estimates were prepared last year it was anticipated that the expenditures last year would amount to $600,000 leaving a revote of $400,000 out of the $1 million voted last year.

Mr. Lennard: But there was only $40,000 spent.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: When were the estimates prepared?

Mr. Chevrier: The main estimates were prepared in November, 1949.

Mr. Green: Because it would appear that the situation is that the completion of a contract has not been possible at as early a date as was expected by the department, and therefore the amount of money is not required that it was thought would be required. Is that the position?

Mr. Chevrier: That happens from time to time.

Mr. Green: I can understand that but is the minister sure that in the present fiscal year he will require this $2 million?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I am.

Mr. Green: In order that the contract may be proceeded with.

Mr. Chevrier: As much as any person can be sure, I am.

Mr. Green: There is one thing about the whole picture that worries me quite a bit, and that is whether there is any method of keeping the price down to a fair figure. The minister will remember that during the war there was some provision—I am not sure whether or not it was in the contracts—whereby after ships had been built the department of munitions and supply went back and checked the costs very carefully, and I believe in many cases large amounts had to be paid back. The minister will know whether I am correct in that statement. Is a course of that kind to be followed here? I urge that some such plan be put into effect because otherwise these costs may just run wild. It seems to me where the government is letting these contracts without tenders there must be the most careful check, and also wide power to cut down the figure asked after the work has been done and it is possible to audit all the expenses. Is it the intention to have a contract of that type?

Mr. Chevrier: During the war—I am familiar with it because I had to make a special study of it—in the war expenditures committee we did examine various kinds of contracts. We came to the conclusion that fixed price contracts were of course the best; but we had to derogate from that practice on many occasions, and the next best was the cost plus percentage contract, the cost plus management fee contract, and various other kinds of bonuses added to the cost plus contract. During those days there was a renegotiation branch of the department of munitions and supply, which had auditors of its own together with those of treasury; and when it was discovered that costs were greater than they should be certain amounts of money were renegotiated. I am told that a similar procedure of renegotiation will be followed in all these contracts.

Mr. Green: Has the minister the facilities in his department for carrying on renegotiations?

Mr. Chevrier: I am told that is to be done by the comptroller of the treasury.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: Has the minister power under existing legislation to enter into contracts of that kind? I doubt very much whether there is that power.

Mr. Chevrier: I am told that these contracts contain a clause which is equivalent to renegotiation. In other words if the costs are higher than they should have been, there will have to be a renegotiation or a repayment after audit.

Mr. Green: Has any consideration been given to following a tender system and then paying subsidies in order to help out the yard the government believes should have the work? The tender system would at least provide a check on the figures. The present arrangement appears to be a subsidy, in effect; that is what it amounts to. These firms which cannot build ships as cheaply as some other firms are getting the work at an increased price, so actually the government is paying a subsidy on at least some of these ships. Has any consideration been given to the use of tenders plus subsidies?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Green: Would anything of that kind be feasible?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that it would not be. I am told by one of the officers that the position then would be even worse than it is now.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister told the committee that he was being protected in letting these contracts without tenders through the estimates of firms of naval architects; and he mentioned one firm, German and Milne, who gave the department an estimate when the ferry Abegweit was under construction. Would the minister inform the committee what was the estimated cost of this boat, and what was the ultimate cost?

Mr. Chevrier: I can only give it from memory, but I know the point my hon. friend has in mind. He is trying to make the point that the estimate given was far less than the final cost. That is true; it was less by a million and a half or two million dollars. The point there, however, is that the contract was given at a time when prices had not started to go up on account of the war. The ship was finished in 1947, I think, several years after the contract had been let. There was a very full discussion in the house as to the reason for the increase. In fact German and Milne, after having given the original estimate, seeing that it took so long to build the ship because of the difficulty in getting materials, revised their estimate on at least one occasion. That matter was fully discussed in the house and I think satisfactorily explained.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

484. To provide towards the construction of a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for service in the maritimes (estimated cost $1,500,000)—capital, $200,000.

Mr. Green: Is this the same sort of transaction?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it will be.

Mr. Fulton: Has the contract been let?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it has not. The plans are not completed. They are in the course of preparation, but are not finalized.

Mr. Green: Can the plans be completed, the contract let, and $200,000 worth of work done within the fiscal year?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, because it is a relatively small vessel. It is of the nature of the Edward Cornwallis, which took a year and a half to complete.

Mr. Green: What firm is going to do this job?

Mr. Chevrier: The contract has not been awarded.

Mr. Green: Is it not unusual that we should be asked to vote money before we even know what firm is going to do the work?

Mr. Chevrier: That was the position in reference to the Cornwallis. We started by asking for $50,000 or $100,000 for plans and specifications, and this is $200,000.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

485. To provide towards the construction of a service vessel for the eastern Arctic patrol (estimated cost $2,400,000)—capital (revote), $600,000.

Mr. Fulton: What are the particulars of this item?

Mr. Chevrier: This is the C. D. Howe, which is now practically completed. This is to cover the balance of the payments.

Mr. Fulton: What firm built that boat?

Mr. Chevrier: The Davie Shipbuilding Company.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

486. To provide towards the construction of an auto-ferry vessel for service between Yarmouth, N.S., and the New England states (estimated cost $3,000,000), subject to an agreement being entered into on the part of the province of Nova Scotia for a contribution, upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, up to 50 per cent of the cost of construction but not exceeding $1,500,000—capital, $1,000,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like the minister to make a statement with respect to this item. This is the ferry being built to accommodate tourists between southern Nova Scotia and the state of Maine. I understand that fifty per cent of the cost is to be paid by the province of Nova Scotia. Would the minister make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: What was the question?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to know from the minister what progress is being made in the construction of the ferry to serve tourist traffic between southern Nova Scotia and the state of Maine.

Mr. Chevrier: As announced to the house some time ago, the government decided to defray one-half the cost of construction of a ferry vessel between Yarmouth and a point in the state of Maine.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has that point been decided yet?

Mr. Chevrier: I will come to that. Eastern Steamship Lines, which operated the service, indicated to the maritime commission last year that they would not operate it after this season. So, after consultation with the government of Nova Scotia it was decided that each government would defray one-half the cost of construction, and a committee was set up to deal with the project. That committee was composed of C.N.R. officials, transport officials, maritime commission men, and I think someone from finance, together with representatives of Nova Scotia. This committee has met on several occasions. It is they who will decide the nature and type of the vessel. I believe that has been pretty well decided; and they will also decide the port at which the ship will call on the American side. That is still under discussion.

Mr. Coldwell: Who will operate the ship?

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian National Railways, I hope.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

487. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $64,000.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask how many private railway cars are involved in this expenditure. Is this to cover the repair or reconditioning or air-conditioning of one of the cars, which was not air-conditioned heretofore?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is not. This covers the cost of operation, maintenance, running repairs and general overhaul of five official railway cars, two of which are the cars of the governor general; one is the car of the Prime Minister; one the car which is assigned to cabinet ministers and distinguished visitors; and No. 104, a car which has always been assigned to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the car which was formerly used by Mr. Mackenzie King now air-conditioned?

Mr. Chevrier: I could not say. I know it has gone back to the railway. It was traded for another car, one of the five that are now in operation.

Mr. Knowles: Is No. 104 air-conditioned?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is. I do not use it nearly as often as I should like.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—
488. Hudson Bay Railway—construction and improvements—capital, $35,000.

Mr. Knight: What is this expenditure for?

Mr. Chevrier: It is for capital expenses. Each year there are two votes concerning the Hudson Bay railway, one to cover capital expenditure and the other to cover the deficit of the railway. This covers: first, the construction of four new standard section houses between Amery and Churchill, $16,000; second, material, 40,000 rail anchors, $16,000; third, provision for contingencies, $2,000; fourth, engineering supervision, $1,000.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—
489. Hudson Bay Railway—to provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1951, not exceeding $400,000.

Mr. Helme: I notice there is a reduction of $100,000 in this item over that of a year ago. We are all glad to see that reduction, although I do not know what brings it about. It may be due to better operation of the route during the last season, or it may be due to a more optimistic outlook for the handling of grain through the port in the coming year. Those of us who come from the west are looking forward to the day when an item such as this will not be necessary. I am sure we feel that if the fullest possible use could be made of the port this item would disappear from the estimates.

We have a very short season in that part of the country, but the season we do have is not being used to the fullest extent. The 1949 official season was about 65 days. During 20 of those days there was not a single ship in the harbour; for 27 days there was only one ship at a time, and for 18 there was more than one. If we are to have an economic use of this port, it is only reasonable that it be used to the fullest possible extent. We have the railway and the port facilities and I should like to see them used as much as possible. It is my understanding that the men who are sent there to help in the operation of the facilities have to be paid whether or not they are working. Those of us who are from the west are greatly concerned about the Hudson bay route, and we look forward to seeing it used to the fullest possible extent.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister what use is to be made of the port this year? I saw a statement the other day by Mr. Dalgleish of the Dalgleish Lines to the effect that, while it was expected there would be more freight incoming this year, the difficulty was in getting cargoes for the outward bound ships. I quite agree with the member for Prince Albert, and the other members from the west, that we are all anxious to see proper use made of this port. The Hudson bay route association in western Canada has been doing everything in its power to get business for that port. It has never had a really thorough tryout, but many of us believe it is an economically feasible proposition from the point of view of the western grain producer, and particularly if the grain were there so that the ships could be loaded.

We need to encourage two-way traffic. While there has been a considerable increase in the amount of freight brought in, we do not want to see the outgoing ships without cargo, or ships not coming in, as is the case with the Dalgleish line who used that port for some years. Could the minister tell us something about the provisions for this year?

Mr. Chevrier: To deal first with the question of the hon. member for Prince Albert, the reason for the decrease in the deficit is an increase in the revenue. I am happy to say that business was much better than expected.

Dealing with the question of the member for Rosetown-Biggar I am unfortunately not able to tell him how much wheat will be moved out of Churchill. It is difficult to do that at this time. I can say though that in the last four years there has been a considerable increase. In 1946-47, the number of bushels moved was 1 million. It rose in the last fiscal year to 5,719,000 bushels. I hope the increase will continue this year.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the minister know what grain is in storage in the elevator ready for shipment?

Mr. Chevrier: I could not say, but I could get that information. I can deal with it when we come to the national harbours board item concerning the port of Churchill. It really is the item which concerns the elevator, not the railway.

Mr. Coldwell: All right.

Mr. Chevrier: It is true that the difficulty about Churchill is that there is outgoing cargo, but there is no incoming cargo.

Mr. Coldwell: It doubled last year.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but you will be interested in knowing that representations were made by the Hudson bay route association, which saw the Prime Minister and others quite recently. Because of the representations which were made by them, I made the announcement in the house which I think will be very helpful. I hope it will be possible, from time to time, to assist this group, because I am sure the house would like to see more business directed through Churchill.

Mr. Ferrie: While this route is being considered, I may say that I do not see any estimate covering the survey of the Lynn lake route for the Hudson Bay railway. Is anything being done about that this year?

Mr. Chevrier: No, this matter just deals with the operation of the Hudson Bay railway itself. Any item covering a branch line, if there is to be one, would be in a supplementary estimate.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with my colleagues of the various political parties from the west in saying that I am very pleased now at the increased amount of activity there seems to be about the port of Churchill.

Mr. Ferrie: You have some Liberal members down here now.

Mr. Knight: I may say to the hon. member, as this house and the minister well know, I have been talking about this thing for the last five years; that would be my answer.

There is no doubt that grain is beginning to move towards the port of Churchill a great deal earlier this year than it has before. As a matter of fact, my own estimate is that it is about a month earlier. As I say, I have been making speeches on this subject at various times; in fact, I made one earlier this session. I do not want to repeat what I said before. I was interested in the minister's statement that the reason there was a lower deficit was that there was more revenue. I may point out the self-evident fact that if still more use is made of the port there will be a still smaller deficit; that is the thing for which we have been pleading for years. It has been proven, I believe, that 15 million bushels passing over that route would cancel out the deficit, and after that we might even expect a small amount of profit.

I should like to thank the minister for his support, and particularly for the support which the government has given and the assurances given to the delegation which came down here. I may say that a member of that delegation came from my own city of Saskatoon. I think it was Mr. Woodward who presented the case to the government and who was for many years editor of our local paper there. I think a tribute should be paid here, if it is paid to any man; if this port ever does fulfil the expectations which some of us have for it, I think it will be largely due to the efforts of Mr. Frank Eliason, the present secretary of the Hudson bay route association; he is a man who has served that association under its various names but always with the one purpose in mind, namely that our people of the prairie west should make more use of the port that they have at their own back door.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

491. Strait of Canso—transportation improvements and facilities—capital (revote $200,000), $2,000,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before this item carries I should like a statement up to date from the minister advising us just what progress has been made with respect to drawing up the plans of the Canso bridge and the letting of the tenders. The public in Nova Scotia have for years been anxious to secure this bridge and they have accepted the assurances from the minister and the government that progress was being made with this undertaking and that the contract would be called for early this year. This calling for contracts was delayed, and the explanation was given by the minister and the premier of Nova Scotia; and notwithstanding the disappointment over the delay, the public in Nova Scotia have accepted the statement of the minister but they would like to know that the project is being proceeded with at an early date.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the house when some weeks ago I made a statement concerning a new development that had taken place. It was owing to the fact that the original plans were based on a roadway of twenty-two feet, but when discussions were entered into between the government and the provinces with regard to the trans-Canada highway, it was decided that the minimum width of that highway should be twenty-four feet. Hence certain revisions had to be made on the Canso project. I saw Dr. Pratley quite recently; he is the engineer in charge. He was one of the members of the board who recommended the low level bridge, and he is our consulting engineer in connection with the project. He is the one who is preparing the plans and specifications. He informed me that these plans and specifications are now almost complete. He has already entered into discussions with the engineers of the Canadian National Railways and of the province of Nova Scotia, and will continue those discussions. Those plans that are now in the course of preparation and almost complete must of course be approved by the engineers of the government of Nova Scotia, of the Canadian National Railways and the board of transport commissioners. I presume the plans will have to be in their hands for some time before they receive final approval. But just as soon as they have been approved by those three groups of engineers Dr. Pratley assures me that he will then be in a position to call for tenders.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister indicate more definitely when he expects that the tenders will be called for?

Mr. Chevrier: I would say about August; but that again, of course, is subject to the time that the engineers will want to give to the study of the plans. I make this additional point. This is a particularly difficult project. Hon. members will recall the difficulty that there was from the point of view of the board of engineers and the discussion that was held, my own officers being of a certain view and the board of engineers being of another view. I should not like to be tied down to August, although I hope it will be then.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I realize that it is a difficult undertaking and that we have reliable engineers dealing with it. In this connection I should like to ask the minister if any progress is being made in the construction of the approaches of the bridge on both sides, on the Nova Scotia side and on the Cape Breton Island side.

Mr. Chevrier: No. I do not think it would be wise to touch this until the plans and specifications have been approved by both groups of engineers.

Item agreed to.

Maritime Freight Rates Act—

494. Amount required to provide for payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1950-51 of the difference (estimated by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and certified by the said board to the Minister of Transport, as and when required by the said minister) occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (referred to in section 9 of the said act) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1950 under the tariffs approved by the following companies: Canada and Gulf Terminal Railway; Canadian Pacific Railway, including: Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company and New Brunswick Coal and Railway Company; Cumberland Railway and Coal Company; Dominion Atlantic Railway; Maritime Coal, Railway and Power Company; Sydney and Louisburg Railway, $1,450,000.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before these items on maritime freight rates carry, in view of the material increase in the freight rates which so greatly affect all the business and traffic in the maritimes it would seem to me that the increase in the estimates over the previous year will not be nearly enough to provide for the proportionate increase in the freight cost.

Mr. Chevrier: That will be covered by a supplementary item if there is reason for it.

Item agreed to.

General—

497. To provide for the expenses of the royal commission on national transportation, $100,000.

Mr. Green: That provides for the costs of the royal commission on national transportation. Can the minister tell us how much has been spent on that commission up to the end of the last fiscal year and whether this vote of $100,000 will complete the expenditure?

Mr. Chevrier: $278,000. I am informed that this vote of $100,000 will meet the cost for the first three months of this fiscal year.

Mr. Fulton: And it is expected that they will bring down their report about that time, is it?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I am afraid they will not. The forecast now is September or December.

Item agreed to.

Air service—

498. Air service administration, $203,890.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Green: I suggest that we let this item stand, Mr. Chairman. It is eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up the third reading of the Aeronautics Act, then Bill No. 179, to amend the Research Council Act. Then we shall continue with the estimates of Transport. Then, if we conclude these estimates, we shall take up the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that I was hoping that tomorrow we might go to item 524 of the transport estimates in order that there might be some discussion of freight rates in the house. That is what I asked on orders of the day this afternoon. The minister said that he would give it consideration. I should like to know whether it is possible that we might do that tomorrow, because I think this is a matter of some urgency. I think that the house should have an opportunity of discussing it and of expressing some opinion on a problem which is a grave one from the point of view of those of us who live on the prairies, in the maritimes and in British Columbia.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, there are about ten or twelve items still left unpassed before we get to the item of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Coldwell: The only thing is this. It would seem that we have been dealing with railways. This is a railway item, and the item that was to stand just now dealt with air service.

Mr. Knowles: There are over twenty items.

Mr. Coldwell: There are over twenty items between.

Mr. Fulton: Twenty-six items.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to get on with these items. Suppose we let the matter stand until six o'clock tomorrow and see what happens after that. Since my hon. friend spoke to me, others have said that while they are willing to have a debate on the decision of the board of transport commissioners as handed down today, they feel they should be given time to consider the effect of the decision, and that they would not have an opportunity of doing that if the debate were brought on tomorrow. I am in the hands of the house, ready to go on at three o'clock tomorrow. But I should like to go on until six o'clock with these estimates—

Mr. Coldwell: That would mean nine o'clock tomorrow night, and it would give only two hours. I can understand that some hon. members might like to consider the report. But I do not like to see the House of Commons prevented from discussing this by, we will say, the fact that an appeal may be lodged—and undoubtedly if there is going to be an appeal it will be made within a few days.

Mr. Chevrier: The only appeal there can be is to the governor in council, and I think Mr. Speaker has already ruled that an appeal to the governor in council does not prevent the House of Commons from discussing the judgment.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, if that is so—

Mr. Chevrier: I am not quite sure about that; but that is my memory on the point. I believe that was the ruling by Mr. Speaker. The reason he prevented discussion before was that it was a review of the previous order. I certainly will not object to a discussion.

Mr. Coldwell: Then it is agreeable to the minister to go on after six o'clock tomorrow night? We could get along for a time.

Mr. Chevrier: I do think it would be better if it were set aside for another day.

Mr. Drew: I know there are those who would like an opportunity to examine the decision of the board of transport commissioners. If this item could be stood over until, let us say, Monday afternoon, then those who wish to discuss the matter would know in advance that it is to be dealt with and would have had an opportunity to examine the findings of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Chevrier: I am quite agreeable to any arrangement. I must point out however that next week I shall hardly be able to be here. I have a commitment for the international trade fair on Monday; then ICAO sits on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, and I must be there. The earliest day for me next week would be Friday. That is the only day I would have available.

Mr. Johnston: If the minister would just name a day, it would not matter which day. Let there be a day set aside for this. I would be agreeable to that, because I am interested in it. If the minister wishes to make it Thursday or Friday of next week, that would be all right.

Mr. Chevrier: Friday would be all right with me, if it would be agreeable to the house.

Mr. Coldwell: So long as we are not delaying it too long. That is the only point that worries me.

Mr. Johnston: Friday would be all right.

Mr. Chevrier: Of course, unless my estimates could be moved forward to the point where we would come to the item for the board of transport commissioners early tomorrow—under those circumstances it would be all right.

Mr. Drew: I do suggest that this matter is of sufficient importance that it would be desirable if at all possible to let members have an opportunity of examining the findings before the discussion takes place.

Mr. Coldwell: So long as they do not delay too long, and the rates are put into effect, or something of that kind.

Mr. Chevrier: Then, let us say Friday.

Mr. Coldwell: They have to publish a tariff.

Mr. Chevrier: There is an allowance of fifteen days. It would be within the fifteen days if we had it next Friday.

Mr. Coldwell: I would agree to next Friday.

Mr. Chevrier: Then, let us leave it at Friday, subject to an appeal for an earlier date being made, if something of an urgent nature comes up.

Mr. Coldwell: That is satisfactory.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Marine service—

467. Nautical service administration, $194,262.

468. Marine service steamers, including icebreakers—maintenance, operation and repairs, $3,603,070.

469. Construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $4,503,495.

470. Agencies—salaries and office expenses, $436,505.

471. Maintenance and repairs to wharves, $5,000.

472. To provide for breaking ice in Thunder bay, lake Superior, and other points deemed advisable in the interests of navigation, $30,000.

473. To provide for Canada's share of the cost of the North Atlantic ice patrol, $20,000.

474. Administration of pilotage, including authority for temporary recoverable advances; contributions, and the operation and maintenance as required, of necessary pilotage vessels in certain pilotage districts, $284,670.

475. Life-saving service, including rewards for saving life, $137,490.

476. To provide subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec and British Columbia, $65,000.

477. Grants of $300 to each of the Royal Arthur Sailors' Institute at Port Arthur, Ontario and the Welland Canal Seamen's Institute, $600.

478. Miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping, including grants as detailed in the estimates; and for repayment to a proper authority or to the government of the United Kingdom, under section 296 of the Canada Shipping Act, of expenses incurred in respect of distressed seamen left behind out of Canada, including the repayment of excepted expenses, as defined in the said section, $138,809.

479. Steamship inspection and the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines, $394,280.

480. Marine signal service, $158,643.

481. River St. Lawrence ship channel—contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, including cost of administration—capital, $3,128,052.

482. River St. Lawrence ship channel—operation and maintenance, $628,505.

484. To provide towards the construction of a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for service in the maritimes (estimated cost $1,500,000)—capital, $200,000.

485. To provide towards the construction of a service vessel for the eastern arctic patrol (estimated cost $2,400,000)—capital (revote), $600,000.

486. To provide towards the construction of an auto-ferry vessel for service between Yarmouth, N.S., and the New England states (estimated cost $3,000,000), subject to an agreement being entered into on the part of the province of Nova Scotia for a contribution, upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, up to 50 per cent of the cost of construction but not exceeding $1,500,000—capital, $1,000,000.

Railway service—

487. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $64,000.

488. Hudson Bay Railway—construction and improvements—capital, $35,000.

489. Hudson Bay Railway—to provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1951, not exceeding, $400,000.

490. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—construction and improvement of terminal facilities—capital (revote $238,568), $354,000.

491. Strait of Canso—transportation improvements and facilities—capital (revote $200,000), $2,000,000.

492. Canadian government railways—enlargement of dock and terminal facilities at North Sydney, N.S. (estimated cost $2,000,000)—capital, $1,500,000.

Maritime Freight Rates Act—

493. To hereby authorize and provide for the payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1950-51 to the Canadian National Railway Company of the difference (estimated by the Canadian National Railway Company and certified by the auditors of the said company to the Minister of Transport as and when required by the said minister) occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (upon the same basis as set out in section 9 of the said act with respect to companies therein referred to) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1950 under the tariffs approved on the eastern lines (as referred to in section 2 of the said act) of the Canadian National Railways, $5,869,000.

494. Amount required to provide for payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1950-51 of the difference (estimated by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and certified by the said board to the Minister of Transport, as and when required by the said minister) occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (referred to in section 9 of the said act) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1950 under the tariffs approved by the following companies: Canada and Gulf Terminal Railway; Canadian Pacific Railway, including: Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company and New Brunswick Coal and Railway Company; Cumberland Railway and Coal Company; Dominion Atlantic Railway; Maritime Coal, Railway and Power Company; Sydney and Louisburg Railway, $1,450,000.

Pensions and other benefits—

495. Amount required to pay pensions at the rate of $300 per annum to former pilots: Alphonse Asselin; Raoul Lachance, Adelard Delisle, George Larochelle, Wilhelm Langlois, Arthur Baquet, Auguste Santerre, Jules Lamarre, $2,400.

496. Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1950, to March 31, 1951, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $15,500.

General—

497. To provide for the expenses of the royal commission on national transportation, $100,000.

B—General—

Air transport board—

523. Salaries and other expenses, including the Canadian delegation to the international civil aviation organization, $229,335.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 26, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON BILL NO. 133

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Hunter be substituted for that of Mr. Thomson on the special committee on Bill No. 133, the National Defence Act.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

ELEVATORS DECLARED TO BE FOR GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 249, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Canada Grain Act is one of the statutes of 1930, but there is still one section of a 1927 act in existence. Both these acts contain schedules of elevators, and one list is known to be more than seventy per cent inaccurate because of the changes necessary as a result of the passage of time. The new bill being introduced will do away with these schedules and provide that all elevators shall be listed as works for the general advantage of Canada.

The bill also provides that elevator storage of foreign grain intended to be re-shipped out of Canada will be subject to the regulations of the board, in order to ensure that adequate storage is available for the handling of western grain on a priority basis.

The bill also provides that mills that are licensed as country elevators may unload wheat from railway cars for milling or manufacture. At the present time country elevators may unload wheat only when it is to be used for seed or feed.

The bill also provides that the weigh-over of grain in elevators, now required to be made in each year, may be deferred by the board of grain commissioners when such weigh-over is impracticable for certain reasons, such as where an elevator is so congested that a weigh-over is not possible. The bill provides for a maximum time limit beyond which the weigh-over cannot be delayed.

The bill also provides for a change in the publication of the regulations of the board so that a consolidation may be published at the beginning of the crop year. At the present time some confusion exists owing to the fact that the regulations are published at the wrong time to meet the needs of the trade.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

LEVYING OF TAXES FOR CERTAIN WORKS OR SERVICES—AMENDMENT TO BILL NO. 235

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That the following provision be inserted as subsection three of section three of Bill No. 235 (letter O-6 of the Senate), intituled "An act to amend the National Parks Act" now before the house:

"(3) Paragraphs (p) and (q) of subsection one of section seven of the said act, as enacted by section nine of chapter sixty-six of the statutes of 1947, are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(p) levying taxes upon the residents of a park or upon the interest of any person in land in a park in order to defray the cost of health and welfare services supplied to such residents by a province pursuant to an agreement made under paragraph (o) or supplied to such residents by the government of Canada;

(q) levying taxes upon the interest of any person in land in a park in order to defray, in whole or in part, the cost of the establishment, operation, maintenance and administration of any public works, improvements or utility services referred to in paragraph (i) and prescribing that such taxes may be levied with respect to any or all of the following lands (i) all lands in the park; (ii) lands in such area or areas in the park as may be designated by regulations, and (iii) lands benefited by such public works, improvements or utility services;

(r) the sale or forfeiture of lands for non-payment of taxes;

(s) the abatement and prevention of nuisances'."

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FLOOD CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST BY MANITOBA FOR INTERIM GRANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the government of Manitoba requested the federal government to make an interim grant in connection with the flood? If not, can the minister say whether the federal government has advised the Manitoba government that an interim grant will be available on request?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I think the hon. member has mistaken the identity of the minister on the front bench to whom he should address his question. If I am not mistaken, it should be addressed to the Prime Minister. I have no knowledge whether the government of Manitoba has or has not made such a request.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to ask the same question of the Minister of Finance that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre directed to the Minister of Justice. It is a matter for the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the Minister of Finance prepared to answer the question?

Mr. Abbott: I am prepared to answer any question, Mr. Speaker, but of course I cannot always say that the answer will be satisfactory.

Mr. Ross (Souris): May I repeat the question?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The Prime Minister was asked the same question the other day, and he was not sure of the answer either. Has a request been made by the government of Manitoba for an interim grant in view of the flood catastrophe? If not, is the federal government prepared to make such a grant anyway?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I have been absent for two or three days, but so far as I am aware, no such application has been made. As to the second question, that is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

COMMUNISM

METHODS OF COMMUNIST PARTY—REFERENCE TO PHOTOSTATIC COPY OF LETTER IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has his attention been directed to a photostatic copy of a letter appearing in today's Montreal Gazette containing evidence of the methods being used and the pressure applied to persuade people by force to join the communist party? If his attention has been directed to it, will the minister now, or at an early day, make a statement as to what steps are being taken to combat this sort of influence?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): My attention has not been drawn to the letter, but I shall be glad to examine it and make a statement if necessary.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO DEBATE IN SENATE ON HOUSE OF COMMONS REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the leader of the house whether, in view of the wealth of intellect we have in the house, the government has directed anybody to read yesterday's debate in the Senate on House of Commons reform.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO POWER OF MINISTER TO MAKE REGULATIONS, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 153, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL VICE-PRESIDENT —DEFINITION OF "INVENTION"

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 179, to amend the Research Council Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask the parliamentary assistant a general question with regard to the administration of the national research council. I am sure there are no two opinions about the usefulness of the council and the excellence of the work it is doing. Nevertheless I should like to be informed as to just how close and effective is the liaison between the national research council and similar organizations which I understand exist in most if not all of the provinces. I should like the parliamentary assistant to give us not merely a general assurance that there is co-operation. I should like to know in some detail how it is maintained and how close the contact is.

For example, if I may expand the question slightly, let us say that a research council, or whatever the proper name is, in a province undertakes to do work on such and such a project. Let us take the manufacture of leather, or any other subject on which an answer might more conveniently be given. How are steps taken to ensure that we do not have overlapping, which of course can take place quite easily when there are several bodies, all of them valuable, all of them energetic, all of them ambitious, and all of them anxious to expand their own efforts?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think I must answer the question by first giving the assurance that there is no overlapping, that in fact these bodies work together in complete accord. Perhaps I should illustrate that by first pointing out that work of a scientific nature is not undertaken by the national research council without a meeting first being held of the national advisory council. The national advisory council is composed of some seventeen, I believe it is, of the leading scientists of the country. If you will examine the individual records of these men it will be found that in many cases the same men are heading the research activities of provincial bodies or universities. That list has been printed in volume 1 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the special committee examining into the operations of the national research council. I do not think there is any point in reprinting it in Hansard.

To give an example of how closely this co-operation works out in practice, a lengthy release was sent to each member of the House of Commons covering scholarship awards. It will be seen therefrom that awards are given after clearing to see that there is no duplication with the awards given by certain of the provincial research organizations. To give another example of the co-operation in effect, Canadian Patents and Development Limited, a subsidiary of the national research council which handles patent matters, in fact handles such matters for a great many of the provincial research foundations as well as for universities. Perhaps that illustrates better than anything else how it works in practice. The various personnel work closely together, and there is no opportunity for duplication.

If the hon. member wants any further information, I shall be glad to give it if I can.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is a strong assurance, and I am perfectly satisfied it is given sincerely and with considerable knowledge of the subject. Nevertheless I should like to press the matter a little further. I mentioned leather a little while ago. Is any special research on leather being carried on by the research council at the moment? If not, could we have a list—not necessarily an exhaustive one—of some of these projects that have been undertaken? I do not know whether any of them are affected by security; if so, of course I do not want them. There must be some going on, however, and I should like to know just what they are. I should like to know also whether in fact the parliamentary assistant can say that parallel inquiries are not going on in any of the provinces. I do not say that a parallel inquiry necessarily would be a bad thing; but I shall leave it at that for the moment.

Mr. McIlraith: I think perhaps there is a basic point that needs clearing up. The system under which the national research council operate is such that they do not undertake new scientific work on their own account if that work is being done by some university or other provincially sponsored body. That is, in addition to actually undertaking work themselves, they may further scientific research in a particular field by assisting work already going on. That is the common practice in all universities; and of course a great deal of the provincial research work is done in the universities. The same thing applies to the provincial research foundations; so the work does not and cannot get started by the council if it is a duplicate effort. It is caught before it starts.

The policy is not necessarily to do all the research work in the research council. They may assist another body to do that work. Where a university or a medical institution of one kind or another is doing research work, the policy may be to assist that body rather than carry on the same work in the research council. The national research council started off as a body to co-ordinate all research activity in Canada; that was its basic function and concept. Then about 1924 the idea was conceived of developing laboratories to carry on research work on government account, and of course that has developed since that time.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether the national research council has done any work in conjunction with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation into the type of building materials best suited to the various climates in Canada?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Chairman; that work is going on now. Materials have been tested in identical structures in different areas, to withstand the varying conditions of those areas. A little more than three hours ago we were examining the structures that had been put up here in Ottawa. Similar structures are in existence already at Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, and there will be similar structures at the maritime regional laboratory when it is finished, which I presume will be later this year, though I cannot be too definite about the time. Research into housing construction and so on is getting a great deal more attention now than formerly. As such, apart from research into individual materials, it is one of the newer fields being undertaken by the council.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Quite a number of Winnipeg people are interested in building houses on higher levels than they have occupied in the past. Are any of the reports that have been made on various building materials available to individuals who may wish to see them? Are there, for instance, reports on various types and qualities of materials?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes; there is a great volume of technical information available. I do not know how far advanced some of the housing research may be, but as to individual materials, numbers of scientific documents are available. Actually last year the research council published some two thousand purely technical documents of an authoritative nature.

Mr. Fraser: Has a proper structure been put up for the storage of radium needles used by the research council? Some time ago, we remember, a boy picked up some of these needles; are they now stored in a proper structure until required for use in the laboratory? It seems wrong that thousands of dollars' worth of these needles should be stored under the conditions that prevailed at that time. What has happened in the interval?

Mr. McIlraith: The needles were not left lying around through any neglect on the part of the council. They are deliberately kept out of the laboratories. Radioactive needles give off rays that make scientific instruments react improperly; I do not know the technical term. Even many types of wrist watches cannot be worn in the laboratories because of the radiations from the luminous dials. These radium needles are therefore stored in a separate building outside the laboratory. If they were kept in the laboratory they would contaminate the very fine instruments and could easily ruin hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of equipment. That is why they are kept outside.

I presume the hon. member for Peterborough West is referring to the needles which were stolen from the building that was broken into a short time ago. I cannot say what the final construction is, but at that time I know the whole question of the storage of these needles was examined very carefully by the vice-president (administration) and by the president. I cannot say what was finally done.

Mr. Fraser: I mention the matter because I believe a proper building should be put up, with proper locks, so that people could not break in and scatter things like that around. I know that if we as individuals scattered poison around we would be held liable. I think the government should be very careful. If the building has to be lined with lead, let that be done, but let us make sure no harm comes from these needles.

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind hon. members that this is an amending bill with limited objects. If one reads the explanatory notes one sees that the purpose of the bill is, first, to provide an additional vice-president; second, to give authority for the use of the name national research council; third, to make provision with regard to discoveries and inventions. Certain latitude is always permitted on the first clause of a bill, but that latitude should not extend beyond the scope of the amending bill. I have permitted the discussion because the parliamentary assistant was willing to reply to questions which seemed to me entirely out of order. I would ask all hon. members to remember that this is an amending bill, with limited objectives.

Mr. Fraser: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, while this is an amending bill, we may have no other opportunity to ask these questions.

Mr. McIlraith: They can all be discussed on the estimates.

Mr. Fraser: Some of us may not have an opportunity to do that. Even if some of this discussion should take place on the estimates, the estimates will go through that much more quickly if the discussion has already taken place.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think information of that general nature would be more easily available on the estimates. There appears to be one misconception, and perhaps I should straighten it out. This building was securely locked, and it was a matter of a burglary job to break into it and steal these things. The great danger from the needles is the danger of contaminating the laboratory.

Mr. Fraser: It was only a shed.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a substantial shed. If that is the definition of shed, then there are a great many sheds used as office buildings by the government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand the ruling is that general questions as to the effectiveness of the national research council are not in order here. Really I welcome the ruling, because I think I shall be able to embarrass the parliamentary assistant much more when we come to the estimates. I shall do my best, at any rate.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air service—

498. Air service administration, $203,890.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, this item is up $74,000. Will the minister tell us the reason for that?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yes; the main increase is in respect of total salaries. There has been an expansion of this division of 42 positions, and that accounts for the increase in salaries.

Mr. Fraser: Those are statutory positions?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: This air division looks after civil aviation?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. The air service comprises three divisions—civil aviation, meteorology and radio. This item provides for the administrative staff in Ottawa, plus six controllers for the six districts across Canada.

Mr. Fraser: This administration would set up the rules and regulations under which private planes would be allowed to enter Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: That is the next vote.

Mr. Fraser: That is the control end of it.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

499. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $676,656.

Mr. Fraser: It has been mentioned in the house that the United States has a defence zone over the great lakes, which stops planes from going into the United States if they have not sent word that they are coming. What have we on this side?

Mr. Chevrier: We have two things on this side. First, if it is a commercial carrier it must obtain a permit from the air transport board. Next, if it is a private plane it should file a flight plan before coming into Canada, indicating to the Department of Transport the schedule which it wishes to follow.

Mr. Fraser: Would the airports in the United States have facilities for informing the operators of these planes as to whom they must report?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. It would be published in two ways. First, the information is given to all known commercial operators. It is also given to the civil aeronautics board in the United States. Any flier who wanted to come to Canada would naturally find out from that board what the regulations were in Canada.

Mr. Fraser: According to the press there is to be a radar screen from Quebec city to Montreal; is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: That is something entirely new. It is not covered in this vote.

Mr. Fraser: But in that section, too, the same regulations would apply?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Fraser: Does that regulation cover planes crossing the international line right from one end to the other?

Mr. Chevrier: It is not an international regulation. As I said a moment ago, control is exercised partly by the board and partly by the departmental officials, and circularized to all American fliers moving into Canada. It has nothing to do with the defence announcement made the other evening by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Fraser: Does the minister know when the radar screen will be set up?

Mr. Chevrier: That would not come under this vote.

Mr. Green: What control is there over aircraft coming in from Siberia? Under what department or branch of department would that be handled?

Mr. Chevrier: Aircraft coming in from Siberia would be subject, I presume—and I am now outside of my own field—to the defence department and the defence regulations. There are a number of defence airports in the northwest, and the Department of National Defence operates the northwest staging route. It has airports all along that route, running into Whitehorse. I take it that the moment it was known a foreign military plane was coming over the airports, there would immediately be a notice to stop the plane. That, however, is not my field. So far as we are concerned, a plane from Siberia would not strike our airports until it got to Edmonton, unless it came by way of Vancouver. If it had not permission, we would stop it.

Mr. Green: Suppose it is a civilian plane?

Mr. Chevrier: If it is a civilian plane—that is, if it is a commercial air service—it must obtain a licence from the air transport board. If it is a private plane, it must file a flight plan with the Department of Transport, setting out its route. It must therefore get two certificates, one from the air transport board and one from the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the type of control over private aircraft, both domestic planes and planes coming in from the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: A plane coming in from the United States must come down at the first customs office. If it were coming along the Detroit area it would of necessity have to come down at customs, just as a plane going south, say to New York, would have to come down at the first customs entry port unless it had made arrangements to go to that point direct. When a plane comes down at a Canadian customs airport it must satisfy both customs and immigration that it has the right to be in Canada, first, by showing some licence if it is a commercial air service, and, second, by some operating clearance from the departmental officials.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

Airways and airports—

500. Construction and improvements, including radio facilities; and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $421,000—capital, $9,430,340.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister a question about the Blissville airport in New Brunswick. Has the department decided to close it? What has been the cost of operating the airport during the past year?

Mr. Chevrier: It is the intention of the department to take the range away from Blissville.

Mr. Brooks: The what?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: The radio range, but not to close it down at this time.

Mr. Brooks: What does the minister mean by taking the range away? Does it mean that the port will not be in operation?

Mr. Chevrier: It means that the port will be in operation for certain planes, but not for planes that fly with instruments.

Mr. Brooks: Will the same staff be maintained as is there at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: The radio range staff will disappear, but it will be a port on the caretaker basis, the same as many others that are operated by the department.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Under this item I suppose one can discuss the airports on the northwest staging route?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a later item that is directly connected with that route, and perhaps the hon. member will allow the matter to stand until then.

Mr. Knowles: What is the distinction between the money voted under this item and that voted under the next two items, bearing in mind the fact that in the details item 500 includes a large amount for field services and radio services; then the next two items deal with civil aviation services and radio aviation services.

Mr. Chevrier: The vote we are now dealing with, item 500, is exclusively a capital vote for construction of airports and aerodromes across Canada. The other two votes, 501 and 502, deal with operation and maintenance of civil air services at these various airports and radio air services; so that the second vote is one of operation and maintenance, and the first one is a capital vote.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, in the next two votes approximately the same amount is voted every year, but this one may or may not be repeated?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: I note that we voted $13 million last year, and the vote this year is $9 million. Can the minister give any indication as to the proportion of this money that is spent to facilitate flying by Trans-Canada Air Lines, by Canadian Pacific Air Lines and by small private operators?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that question can be answered. This vote is to provide runways and landing strips at a number of airports across Canada, and to provide radio facilities at these airports. Just as we build canals and bridges for the service of the public, so we build airports and aviation facilities for the operation and the use of carriers. They are not specifically for the use of T.C.A. or privately-owned or commercially operated planes; they are for the use of the public generally.

Mr. Knowles: I understand that there are such things as landing fees on these airstrips. Is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Do commercially owned, government owned or private air companies pay anything towards the radio facilities provided by the government?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no charge for radio facilities.

Mr. Fraser: Has the minister or his department considered building an airstrip in the Peterborough district? We are a bit isolated there. The nearest port is Oshawa. An American plane coming in used to be able to land at Oshawa and get customs and immigration clearance there; now it has to land at Malton, clear there, then fly to Oshawa, and from there passengers must travel by car to Peterborough. It is a bit awkward.

Mr. Chevrier: I think in the territory to which my hon. friend refers—I know it generally from having flown over it—it is more a matter of a seaplane base than a landplane base. To my knowledge we have received no application for a seaplane base. If we do, we shall certainly be glad to give it consideration.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is a lot of land around there.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Lennard: Can the minister give a list of the airfields or airstrips covered by this item?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. It is fairly lengthy. Perhaps I could give the larger ones. There is provision for building airstrips and certain buildings ranging anywhere from $1,000 to $1 million. I will take the largest one. Malton, for instance, is the highest expenditure: $1 million for the lengthening, widening and strengthening of the runway for heavier aircraft. Then there is an item of $515,000 for Fredericton; one of $455,000 for Gander; one of $570,000 for Dorval; one of $870,000 for Saint John. That is the new airport at Loch Lomond. There are items for Oshawa, Ottawa, Patricia Bay, Edmonton, for the district north of Edmonton, $44,600; Fort Resolution, Northwest Territories, $44,500; Fort Smith, $29,200; Baie Comeau, $155,000.

Mr. Lennard: Perhaps the minister would save time by just having the list put on Hansard.

Mr. Chevrier: I can get it and table it. I have it in my notes.

Mr. McLure: I should like to know first of all if Charlottetown airport is included in this list. Has the Department of Transport taken over the Charlottetown field?

Mr. Chevrier: It still belongs to the city, I am informed, but we are operating it. There is an item of $30,000 for Charlottetown. Perhaps that will please my hon. friend.

Mr. Brooks: I wish to ask the minister a question with reference to customs clearance. A short time ago some planes were kept out of Gander, I think on account of fog, and they came either to Halifax or to Moncton and got customs clearance.

Mr. Chevrier: Dartmouth.

Mr. Brooks: Have arrangements been made for clearance at these different ports in the maritimes such as Dartmouth, Halifax, Saint John and Fredericton?

Mr. Chevrier: Gander is the port of entry for Canada, and in certain cases Montreal. Sometimes, because of difficult flying conditions, it is impossible to go to Gander; therefore alternate airfields are operated by the Department of Transport. Moncton is one, and Sydney is another. Dartmouth is a field operated by the air force, is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence, and therefore is under that department's rules and regulations. I understand that Dartmouth field was built to take care of planes that weigh about 50,000 pounds. I am told that a stratocruiser weighing 100,000 pounds would not be allowed to land because it would tear up the runways. The difficulty about the plane to which my hon. friend has reference was that Dartmouth would not allow it to land, and it had to go elsewhere.

Mr. Fulton: Where did it land?

Mr. Chevrier: It went back to Gander.

Mr. Fulton: It landed there first, and they would not clear it through customs.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not a customs port—it is not a port of entry. It is unfortunate that that was the case, but it was not the fault of the administration of transport.

Mr. Brooks: They could get clearance at Moncton or Sydney.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has a matter under his consideration to which I brought his attention concerning an airport at Kamloops. I will not take the time of the committee to ask him to go into it in detail, but if I did not say a word about it he might feel that I had lost interest in it.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure my hon. friend has not. I told him in my reply that I would see that consideration was given to the matter.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is provision being made for the maintenance of the airport at Amherst, Nova Scotia? The airport was built partly by the town of Amherst and partly by the government during the war, and it performed excellent service at that time. It is a valuable airport, and is fairly free from fog, much more so than most of the ports on the Atlantic coast. Personally I feel that it should be maintained. I would ask the minister to make a report.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no provision made here, because it is not operated by the Department of Transport. It is owned by the city and operated by themselves.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The government still has title to it. I do not think the town took it back from the department.

Mr. Chevrier: My officers say that we developed it, put it in shape and then transferred it to the city. That is the information I have. In fact I am told that they own the site.

Mr. Fulton: I notice that there is a substantial amount for sundries, $200,000 shown in the detail on page 299. Can the minister give the justification for that item?

Mr. Chevrier: There are miscellaneous expenses for engineering, investigation, survey, reconnaissance, telephones, telegrams, printing and stationery. Perhaps I should amplify that a bit. There are constant demands from various communities across Canada for air services, some in isolated parts of the country. I can think now of a demand that was made from the northern part of Canada, a demand that I thought was urgent. We sent engineers to make a survey to ascertain, first, whether the terrain would lend itself to the establishment of an airport, and second, whether there is any considerable amount of traffic. It costs money to make these surveys. Men have to go either from Ottawa or from Edmonton, if it is in the Edmonton district, and from Vancouver if it is in the British Columbia district, or from Moncton if in the maritimes; and this item is for that purpose.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: How much was actually expended last year under sundries? The authorization was $225,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot answer that except in this way: out of the $200,000 the engineering part amounts to $135,000.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if we could put in a motion now, as it were, asking that greater detail be made available in subsequent years as to the actual composition of those sundry items.

Mr. Chevrier: In this vote?

Mr. Fulton: In any vote where they run into several thousand dollars or more.

Mr. Chevrier: I think so. I now ask my officers to do that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In the detail of item 500, as in a great many other items, there are telegrams, telephones and so on. Some of them are very large; some of them are not so large. If my memory serves me, in the whole department they total up to between $4 million and $5 million. We get them in bits and pieces. We get $50,000 here, $75,000 there, and $1 million somewhere else, and so on. I should like to have a comprehensive statement, treating this on a functional basis. That is to say, there is this surprisingly large item to the layman of four to five millions for various things. For instance, I should like to know how much is spent on teletypes, and what teletypes we have; because it seems to me it is only in that way we can find out whether all of these things are necessary, or whether some of them are just beautiful gadgets that people like to use.

We all know how we like to use these gadgets. I am going to say this in advance, that perhaps some of these things which may not appear to us to be necessary at the moment may be precautionary from the point of view of defence. Notwithstanding that, I should like to have the information, if the minister will give it, rather than have it in bits and pieces. There will be about twenty of the bits and pieces. I wonder whether the minister would agree that it should be dealt with as a whole? It raises the question, for instance, whether the long distance telephone is used when very often an air mail letter would do just as well. It raises the question of controls. I think we all like to use the long distance telephone when the other fellow is paying for it; I think I do. It is reasonable to ask how these things are controlled. In particular it is reasonable to ask, and to know in a comprehensive way, how our whole system of communication works. As I say again, it costs something more than $4 million. We should know how it is integrated. The minister will know how co-operative I am. I do not want to ask any niggling little questions. I do want to have a comprehensive statement. I suggest that now is the time to have it.

Mr. Chevrier: I think my hon. friend is quite right in demanding what he has, and I am grateful to him that he asks for it in that form, so that it will not be necessary to go into the matter in detail. I think I know what my hon. friend has in mind, because I have been furnished with a statement which I asked of the officers indicating the increases in amounts in certain divisions of the department. For instance, under the heading, "Freight, express and cartage" in the Department of Transport there has been an increase from $10,450 in 1938-39 to $488,348. Under the item, "Telephones, telegrams and postage" there has been an increase from $323,330 in 1938-39 to $1,878,880. I could go on with other divisions, such as buildings, works and structures, and equipment. If my hon. friend wants the figures, I can give them to him; but I think what he is interested in is getting some idea of why this has been necessary. The best reply I can give, without going into detail, is to indicate the rapid expansion and the progress made by civil aviation across Canada. It has been just phenomenal.

I do not know whether the hon. member was in the house when the first debate took place on the Aeronautics Act, but there was considerable criticism of the government on the ground that we were not going nearly fast enough; because the department was not developing the routes that it was thought should be developed; because the services were not nearly as adequate as they should be; because Trans-Canada Air Lines and other commercial air services in Canada were not nearly as effective as those of other foreign routes.

Now, I have before me a statement which indicates what has happened in the air services of the Department of Transport. For instance, I shall deal first with Trans-Canada Air Lines and then with the department. In 1938 T.C.A. travelled 3,098 route miles; in 1949 they travelled 16,000; and this year I think I would be safe to add on another 4,000 or 5,000 miles. In 1938 the revenue passengers carried were 2,086; today they are 648,574. When I refer to today I mean 1949 because I have not the figures for 1950. In 1938 the revenue miles flown were 1,122,179; today they are 16,364,733. That gives some idea of the expansion of T.C.A. from 1938 to 1949.

In the case of the department, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1939, there were 27 terminal and intermediate fields operated by the Department of Transport; at the end of March, 1950, there were 75. At the end of March, 1939, there were 31 radio ranges and instrument landing systems; today there are 109, and by today I mean March 31, 1950. At the end of March, 1939, there were three other radio stations being operated; at the end of March, 1950, there were 28. The number of employees in the department at the end of March, 1939, was 1,048; today it is 5,118. The route miles covered by domestic scheduled services for the year ending March 31, 1939, were 3,000; today they are 21,250. In 1938 the meteorological and airways control, which is the telephone and teletype land mileage to which my hon. friend referred a moment ago, consisted of 3,300 miles; today the total is 27,892 miles.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could we have some of the details?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not got them here but they would be obtainable. In 1939 our airports were built to accommodate planes weighing 18,000 pounds; today the main airports are being lengthened and strengthened to handle North Stars weighing 85,000 pounds, and overseas airports are able to handle planes weighing 150,000 pounds. Over and above that, we have taken charge of Gander airport at an additional expenditure of $3 million per annum. We have taken charge of the Canada-Alaska telephone communications system for which the committee will be asked to vote later on. We have established greatly increased weather forecasting service. We have increased the airways traffic control system. We have taken over from public works the government telegraph and telephone services.

Coming back to the operators. In 1939 there were a small number of operators—I gave the figure when we were discussing the Aeronautics Act—but today 220 licences have been granted, some for regular scheduled services, some for class 2 services or secondary regular services and some for charter services from a fixed base. These 220 licences have been granted to some 700 or 800 different individuals which gives some idea of the development of the air services.

The carriage of goods by planes, the carriage of air cargo, has increased tremendously and is reflected in the increase in the ton mileage which was 3,000 miles in 1945 as compared with 754,000 miles in 1949. Mail services to remote areas have also shown a substantial increase. The total miles flown in 1949 by 304 aircraft were 12,194,000 as compared with 841,000 in 1945 by only 26 aircraft.

I give those details to indicate the progress made and the expansion that has occurred in the air services branch. It is evident that because of this tremendous expansion it has been necessary to increase the cost of the services. It has been necessary to increase the amounts voted for the operation and maintenance of airports and airways, for the control of airways, and incidentally the cost of telephones and telegraphs, travelling expenses, motor cars, trucks and the like has increased. I hope it will not be necessary for me to give now, because I could not give it, a breakdown of the total amount for telephones and telegraphs and the like. I suppose I could get it, but I am making now a general answer to indicate the main reasons for the increases in the items to which my hon. friend has referred.

An increase in items such as telephones, telegraphs, travelling expenses, motor cars and so on will be found in each vote as we go along. If my hon. friend compares the position in 1939 with reference to the two items I have mentioned with the position in 1949 there is unquestionably a tremendous increase. I would not be fair with the committee if I did not admit that. The reason for that big increase is the tremendous expansion which has taken place. While we were operating several airports in 1939, today we have hundreds of airports. At the main airports, particularly for domestic service across Canada, we have installed instrument landing facilities about which we will hear more as the estimates go along. Those are very costly and they require additional staff. When you have additional staff then the items referred to are increased.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am grateful to the minister for the statement he has made, but I have a few questions with regard to the details. Is there any system of checking the free use of the long distance telephone? I do not think it would be giving away any secrets to indicate just what is done. One cannot help but be impressed with the apparent freedom with which this method of communication is used. The cost runs into a substantial amount. I should like to know what system there is of checking, such as there would be in a private corporation.

Mr. Chevrier: In the vote we are now considering the amount for telephones and telegraphs is quite small compared with the other votes. The officer before me tells me that there is a method of checking by both the officers of the department and by the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I thought the minister had agreed that instead of taking up this matter fifteen or twenty times we could perhaps consider generally this question of communications. When the minister says there is a check, does he mean merely a check that the expenditures were made or does he mean that there is some control over the use of this expensive medium of communication?

Mr. Chevrier: A report of each long distance call indicating to whom the call was directed and by whom must be made. That is checked by an officer of the department or the branch and it then goes to the treasury where it is again checked by an officer of the treasury board. Very often a directive will come back stating that the expenditure is high in comparison with other departments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have a few questions to ask with regard to the teletype services. Would the minister prefer to leave those for the more relevant item?

Mr. Chevrier: I would prefer that.

Mr. Fraser: The minister said that his department operates government telephone and telegraph lines. I understand that the Department of Finance took over the telephones in Ottawa. Am I right?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: And you have them outside Ottawa?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Fraser: There is one item in the details on page 300 about which I want to ask. It refers to professional and special services.

The Deputy Chairman: That is under item 501.

Mr. Green: The minister mentioned some of the larger airports at which transoceanic planes are landing. When his estimates were up before I asked him whether the government had any intention of laying out new runways at the Vancouver airport. I believe they are having some difficulty now with the transpacific planes because the present runways are not adequate. When the minister read the list of airports on which money is to be spent during this fiscal year he mentioned $1 million for Malton airport, but I do not think there was anything for Vancouver airport. Malton airport is a great airport, and I have no objection to its being improved, but I doubt very much whether planes of the size of the transpacific craft land there. I know there is considerable concern in Vancouver about the runways, and the minister's own officials are concerned about them. I wonder why there is no money included in this vote for improvement of the runways.

Mr. Chevrier: I am also greatly concerned. Some weeks ago a delegation from Vancouver came to Ottawa to discuss in detail the position there, and I am now giving it some consideration. It is true there is nothing in these estimates because they were prepared in November of last year. I am not saying that there will be something in further estimates but I am giving it consideration at the moment.

Mr. Brooks: When the minister gave the list a few moments ago there was an amount for the airport at Saint John and I think $400,000 odd for the airport at Fredericton. Are these amounts for additional runways, or for what purpose is the money to be expended?

Mr. Chevrier: At Fredericton it is to complete the runways. At Saint John, where a strip has already been built, the item is for one runway.

Mr. Brooks: There will be one runway at Fredericton and two at Saint John?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Item agreed to.

501. Operation and maintenance—civil aviation services, $7,708,041.

Mr. Fraser: On page 300 there is a reference to professional and special services. What does "professional" mean? Do you call in outside help?

Mr. Chevrier: Professional and special services in the amount of $97,000 cover payment to Trans-Canada Air Lines toward the operation of airway facilities at Kinross airport adjacent to Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, on the great lakes route, and for payment to the corps of commissionaires at Malton, Dorval and other airports for guarding airport properties.

Mr. Fulton: Referring to the details again, I find there is a very heavy item for travelling expenses of $178,365. There are 774 personnel in this branch of the department so that I suppose it might be argued that is not very much per head. On the other hand, if you look at the immediately preceding item for allowances you will find there is an amount of $192,033 for allowances which is an increase of $150,000 over last year. There are only 60 more personnel in the department than there were last year, and yet allowances have gone up from $42,000 to $192,000. If you add allowances and travelling expenses together you get $370,000. Will the minister tell us how that can be justified?

Mr. Chevrier: As to travelling expenses, there has been a reduction of some $6,000. There has also been a reduction in telephones, telegrams and postage of $8,000. It is true there has been an increase in allowances but I understand these cover payments made to those living in extreme northern areas. A northern allowance is granted to employees in that part of Canada north of the 56th parallel of latitude because of both the high cost of living and hard lying conditions. Forty-seven allowances amounted to $39,575. Isolation allowances are granted to employees again because of hard lying conditions. There are thirty-seven of those at a cost of $7,320. Then, in Newfoundland there are 310 allowances amounting to $142,000. I think that covers the question of allowances generally.

Mr. Fulton: Is the increase due to the 310 extra in Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I would not say that; I think it is due to both. I do not know if my friend has been in the Northwest Territories. I flew up there two years ago with the officers who are before me now. I can think of three or four places where we came down within the Arctic circle where people were living under most difficult circumstances. The officers pointed out that these people should be entitled to allowances because of the difficult conditions. After giving the matter careful consideration, we came to the conclusion that should be the case and we granted these allowances. Having done it for the Northwest Territories and other places, the only logical thing to do was to extend it to Newfoundland when Newfoundland became our tenth province.

Mr. Fulton: I can appreciate that, but what I am concerned with is the substantial increase. The minister says that was two years ago, and as the estimates show allowances were paid last year. What I want is the reason for the very substantial increase of $150,000.

Mr. Chevrier: It is pointed out to me that Newfoundland allowances included in casuals and others last year have now been transferred to the proper primary.

Mr. Fulton: So the main cause of this quite substantial increase is the inclusion of personnel from Newfoundland who were not included before?

Mr. Chevrier: I am told it is not exactly that. It is showing them in the right vote that accounts for it.

Item agreed to.

Operation and maintenance—

502. Radio aviation services, $4,489,730.

Mr. Fulton: I have the same question here. There is a substantial increase in allowances of $56,000, and travelling expenses are up by $14,000. The total of the two votes is approximately $400,000, being $211,403 for allowances and $183,505 for travelling expenses. In addition there is an increase in the sundries item of $7,000. In a sense I regret having to raise these points on each item but, as was pointed out earlier, if we are interested in reducing expenditures and thus saving taxes, as we hope, unfortunately the only way we can do so is by taking up the time of the committee to get explanations.

Mr. Chevrier: Dealing with the allowances, the same reason is indicated as in the previous vote. Increase in the number and amounts of northern allowances payable to employees appointed to that part of Canada north of the 56th parallel of latitude because of high costs amounted to $55,533. That is the total increase there. In travelling expenses there is an increase of $14,000, in a vote of $4,480,000. In the sundries there is an increase of $7,000, which is not a tremendous amount. I do not think I can add much more.

Mr. Fulton: I might make just one observation with respect to sundries. I think the minister is to be commended because he has a fair number of detailed headings of expenditure in the breakdown of this item. In spite of that, however, we find this general item of $43,000 for sundries. It would be interesting to know what sort of things go in there; or is that just a sort of open expense account?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I could give the details of the increases, though I have not a complete breakdown. Sundries cover the rental of land and buildings; snow removal by contract; legal advice, and miscellaneous expenditures. The increase of $7,000 represents the rental of nine houses at Edmonton from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which rents previously were paid by the employees. The department now pays the rentals directly to the corporation, and deductions from the salaries of the employees are credited to the consolidated revenue fund. Snow removal and land rental of additional I.L.S. installations made up the balance.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): At the bottom of page 301 there is an item for the northwest general purpose teletype circuit. This is probably a good time to find out the following points. I should like to know the purpose of that, whether it is purely civilian or whether there is anything about it connected with the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Chevrier: It was a defence matter which has been turned over to the Department of Transport for operation since the war. This covers payment to the northwest communications system, a facility which is operated by the Department of Transport, for a teletype circuit between Edmonton and Alaska. It replaces the point to point radio circuits formerly operated by the radio division. The circuit carries meteorological data, administrative traffic, and air line operational traffic.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did I understand the minister to say this was really for defence purposes?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no. I said it was for defence purposes originally, and had been taken over to the Department of Transport some two or three years ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then the Department of National Defence no longer has anything to do with it?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand there was a system of radio communication before that?

Mr. Chevrier: There are two items that deal with the whole matter. I refer to items 510 and 511, the capital vote and operational vote for the northwest communications system. Perhaps we could deal with all these matters on those items.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Very good, if that is the way the minister wishes it.

Mr. Lennard: Would the minister explain the item: Trans-Canada Air Lines operational traffic (contract)?
